Form and purpose of the building The plan is that of a hīra, i e the Arab type of camp, reproduced in building materials, and so called after the Lakhmid capital, with the prince's tent or house on the central axis just as is described by Masʿūdī in his account of Sāmarrā (cf E Herzfeld, Erster vorlaufiger Bericht uber die Ausgrabungen von Samarra, Berlin 1912, p 39 sq) Mshattā, Ukhaidir and Sāmarrā are descendants of this eastern type of palace Just as the form could only be recognised as typical after the examination of Ukhaidir in the ʿIrāk and by the excavation of Sāmarrā, so it was the investigations of H Lammens that first elucidated the purpose of these buildings (La Bâdia et La Hira sous les Omeiades, in M F O B, iv) Following Lammens, Herzfeld explained Mshattā as a bādiya [q v], i e a country palace which was built in the form of a hira for an Umaiyad as an occasional residence

History of exploration, bibliography and date After its first discovery by H B Tristram in 1872, Mshattā was explained by his archaeological adviser J Fergusson as a Sāsānian palace, built by Khusraw II after his conquest of Syria in 614 A D It found a place in literature with this description in Tristram's The Land of Moab (London 1873) It was not till about the end of the century that Mshattā became a subject of archaeological study and discussion when it was visited in 1898 by A Musil and soon afterwards examined by R E Brünnow and A v Domaszewski and published in their Provincia Arabia (1904–1909) In the meanwhile the Prussian expedition sent to take it down under B Schulz had already been there and the Berlin publication by Schulz and Strzygowski appeared in the Jahrb d preuss Kunsts, 1904 To Professor Strzygowski is due the credit of having urged W Bode to bring the façade to Berlin Thanks to the interest displayed by the Emperor William II in the plan and his friendly relations with Sultān ʿAbd al Hamīd, the latter, with the traditional generosity of an Oriental despot, gave the German Emperor a present of this ornament of the desert As a result of his study of the architecture and decoration, Strzygowski dated Mshattā between 400 and 600 A D M v Berchem with Clermont-Ganneau and Dussaud decided on historical grounds for the Lakhmid dating, i e that it was built as early as the fourth century A D (Aux pays de Moab et d'Edom, iv, J S, 1909, p 401—408) while Brünnow and Musil assumed a Ghassānid origin On the other hand in his review of Strzygowski (Z A, xix, 1905—1906, p 419 sqq and Islamstudien, p 276 sqq), C H Becker championed the Umaiyad dating, which E Herzfeld in his Genesis der islam Kunst und das Mshattaproblem (Isl, i, 1910, p 27–63 and 105—144) supported with evidence from the history of art, and was strengthened by the appearance at the same time in M F O B, iv, 1910, p 91—112 of H Lammens' study Bâdia et Hira This Umaiyad dating Herzfeld tried to make more convincing in his Mshattâ, Hîra und Bâdiya (Jb d preuss Ksts, 1921) and finally crowned his work with the discovery of an inscription drawn up by Walīd II himself recording repairs done by him, Walīd II was murdered after a year's reign (126 = 743 -744) and work on the building was not completed This attribution found further support in a story quoted by H Lammens (in J A, 1915) from Ibn al-Mukaffaʿ, according to which Walīd II was murdered by a man named Ibrāhīm while building a "town" in the desert, which was to bear his name Lammens identifies this town with Mshattā Recently the Syrian desert palaces were again thoroughly investigated by the two fathers and teachers of the École Biblique St Étienne in Jerusalem, Jaussen and Savignac (Mission Arch en Arabie III Les chateaux Arabes de Qoseir Amra, Haraneh et Tûba, 2 vols, Paris 1922) As regards Tūba and Mshattā the two students came to the same conclusion as earlier scholars, namely that they belong to the same period As it seemed to them impossible to attribute them to the Umaiyad period, they attributed them to the pre-Islāmic period, as both buildings were left unfinished, they must have been built towards the end of a dynasty or kingdom The discovery of idols at Mshatta also, they said, prevented its being attributed to the Umaiyad period (cf Diez, Die Kunst d islamischen Volker, 11th ed, 1926, p 153)

Establishment of the Umaiyad date of Mshattā The archaeological material at Strzygowski's disposal when he wrote on Mshattā in 1904 was still insufficient for the proper appreciation of the historical position It was not yet possible to have a complete conception of Umaiyad art Herzfeld who knew the lands in question by long residence and frequent travels was able six years later to approach the problem from much more solid premises The most important monument from which deductions could be drawn was the Mihrāb of the Djāmiʿ al-Khāssakī, discovered by Sarre and Herzfeld in the meanwhile in Baghdād, which must be either pre- or early ʿAbbāsid, and the decoration of which formed a parallel to that of Mshattā (Isl, i 33 sq and plate i) The explanation of the niche in the chamber right of the gateway as a mihrāb had to be decisively rejected and indeed less emphasis had been laid on it by Herzfeld than by superficial writers on the question for whom the "mihrāb" meant an easy proof of their point Schulz had previously ascertained on the spot that this niche is not a mihrāb, and a study of the plan and Schulz's measurements shows a piece of masonry jutting 65 cm out of the wall, containing a niche 1 62 m broad and 1 48 deep The fact that the mihrāb is never in a projection from the wall (an exception would prove nothing) as well as the breadth of the niche which would be exceptional, even in very large mosques of late date (such a depth is hardly ever found anywhere), prove that this can only be a tribunal niche or something of the kind Kaṣr al-Tūba has in its south wall four similar semi-circular apse-like niches about 10 feet broad, which surely no Muslim archaeologist would claim as miḥrābs Mshattā, however, does not require such illusive evidence to prove its Umaiyad date The conclusive proofs are found in the variety of material used and architectural styles, in the application of the principles of the minor arts to the decoration of buildings, already noticed but not correctly interpreted by Strzygowski, and the variety of styles in the areas of the triangles which fall into four groups

The combination of ʿIrāk brickwork with Syrian stonework in the royal residence proves the co-operation of different groups of workmen working on the system of conscription which was revived by the Umaiyads The construction of the brick arches is also ʿIrākian in form and, besides, they are pointed arches which were unknown before the beginning of the seventh century, so that it is impossible to put the date before 600 A D It was only in the early Muslim period that their use spread We find Syrian torus profiles on the basilical building and North Mesopotamian profiles on the frieze The pillars in the basilical hall are taken from older buildings as was the custom wherever possible in the early Muslim period In the pre-Muhammadan period neither wooden braces in the arches nor material from older buildings were used (Herzfeld)

On the significance of the decorative façade we may add a little to Strzygowski's and Herzfeld's observations Two points were hardly touched on in the previous discussion that the frieze is to be considered and understood only as the basis of a great façade which was planned but was never finished, and the origin of this system of decoration from Persian textile art, which alone could supply the foundation for it and explain the sudden appearance of this completely new world hitherto unknown in architectural ornamentation The façade proper planned above this architectural border would have contained a pattern on a much larger scale just as we see on carpets The thousandfold opposed groups of animals still to be found on Russian carpets and textiles influenced from Persia and the Caucasus of the XVIIIth—XIXth centuries and the zigzag friezes filled with tendrils each with a cypress (in place of a rosette) in the centre show the popularity and wide distribution and permanence of this motive When it was taken over for architectural decoration, the popular textilised forms, however, were translated into the traditional forms of the art of the land and time This explains the different stylistic execution of the same plan by the stone-masons

This historic breach with tradition, this surprising control over a differently oriented artistic tendency presupposes a radical change and reorganisation of society and outlook An artistic creed so perfect and complete in itself cannot possibly be explained by the ambition of some upstart of a desert sheikh but it presupposes in addition to enormous wealth and far-reaching power a highly trained artistic sense, which was only possible at the time of the Umaiyad Court and actually existed there, as we know from many sources Only a passionate builder and lover of architecture could visualise such a work and only at a court filled with scholars, poets and artists from all countries could the plans for it be drawn up This illuminating emancipation from the Hellenistic façade with its pillared niches is only to be explained as the expression of a new outlook rooted in religion and proudly conscious of its quite different ideals, as was the case with young Islām For the first time, the new teaching was here given artistic expression, in a design on a figured ground, which was to develop into the frieze of inscriptions on the Īwān in Khārgird in the XIth century (cf Diez, Churanische Baudenkmaler, Pl 18/2)

Bibliography given in the article

(E DIEZ)

MU'ADHDHIN [See MASDJID, I, II, 4 and ADHĀN]

AL-MU'AIYAD [See HISHĀM II]

AL MALIK AL MU'AIYAD SAIF AL-DIN, Shaikh al-Maḥmūdī (so called after his first owner) al-Khāsskī (member of the bodyguard), a Circassian by birth, was brought as a slave to Cairo and purchased by the Atābeg Barkūk When the latter became Sultān in 784 (1382) he gave him his freedom, put him in the corps of pages (djamdār, q v), moved him to the corps of cup-bearers (sāḳī, q v) and later appointed him to the bodyguard (khāṣṣḳī, whence his nickname) Barkūk's son, Nāsir Faradj [q v], on his accession in 801 (1399) appointed him emīr of a thousand and in the following year governor of Tripoli He served as a troop commander in the battle of Damascus against Tīmūr, was taken prisoner, soon after his release again became governor of Tripoli and later of Damascus The reign of Sultān Faradj was a period of uninterrupted fighting between the Sultān and his governors and Shaikh was always in the midst of intrigues, often he was on the Sultān's side, more often in rebellion against him His relations with his rival, the powerful governor Newrūz, were similar Finally the Sultān succumbed to the emīrs, was deposed and put to death, the caliph ʿAbbās b Muhammad al-Mustaʿīn succeeded him in 815 (1412) The governor Shaikh who was in Cairo at the time, was appointed first minister (niẓām al-mulk) and retained power by filling all available offices with his followers A rebellion of the Egyptian Beduins gave a pretext for deposing the Sultān al Mustaʿīn The emīrs demanded that a man of vigour should occupy the throne and in Shaʿbān of the same year chose Shaikh as Sultān While he encountered no difficulties in Egypt, the governors of the Syrian provinces refused to recognise him He had himself to go to Syria to bring them to reason He gradually succeeded in taking one after the other prisoner, and after he had executed his chief enemy Newrūz his throne was secure The last rebellion in 818 (1415) he put down with comparative ease

The defeat of the Ottoman Sultān Bāyazīd in 804 (1402) by Tīmūr and the civil strife in the Mamlūk kingdom had been utilised by the neighbouring rulers in the buffer-states between Egypt and the Ottoman empire to capture a number of towns and fortresses in southern Asia Minor up to a line Larenda-Abulustain Darenda, which had previously been under Mamlūk rule Sultān Shaikh regarded it as his duty to recapture these fortresses and again force these former vassals to recognise his suzerainty in order to give his kingdom the necessary strength to resist its enemy, the Ottoman Sulṭān, and to protect the northern frontiers against the plundering raids of the Turkomans The first campaign took place in 820 (1418) because, in spite of repeated demands, the prince Muhammad b ʿAlī of the house of Karamān would not surrender the town of Tarsūs, which he had taken, although he was ready to recognise the Sultān's suzerainty on the coins and in the khutba The Sultān set out from Cairo, receiving in Syria envoys from the families of Dhu 'l Ghādir, Karamān and Ramadān, who brought the submission of their chiefs Malatiya, Abulustain, Darenda and Tarsūs were successively occupied, then Behesnā, Kahtā and Karkār west of the Euphrates, the citadels of the two last named were besieged, but the siege was raised when the commanders recognised the suzerainty of the Sultān In the following year, a dangerous enemy of the Sultān, Karā Yūsuf, chief of the Black Sheep, invaded Northern Syria in his pursuit of Karā Yelek, chief of the White Sheep (both called after their banners), plundered the towns in the N E of the Mamlūk empire but then returned to Baghdād The Sultān's successes were rendered useless by his return to Egypt, as the Syrian governors did not succeed in retaking the citadels The Sultān therefore sent his son Ibrāhīm with a strong army to Asia Minor The latter reached Kaisarīya, appointed friendly chiefs as governors, while several hostile chiefs were taken prisoners and put to death and others slain in their flight Ibrāhīm himself returned to Cairo in triumph but died there in 823 (1421) to the great grief of his father (the story that the latter poisoned him out of jealousy of his fame is absurd) Karā Yūsuf was threatening the eastern frontier, but he had to turn his attention to his enemies, a rebellious son and Timūr's grandson Shāh Rukh, and at the end of the year he was poisoned The Sultān himself had suffered for years from an affection of the foot, his illness (probably inflammation) became so serious that he could scarcely leave his bed He had installed his eighteen months' old son as his successor and three of his emīrs formed a kind of regency His death took place on the 8th Muharram 828 (Jan 14, 1427) His kingdom was secure, the frontiers consolidated, but at home there was a lack of order Beduins were plundering the country and Alexandria was not infrequently exposed to attacks from the sea by Frankish pirates Offices were freely sold and the people suffered much from the extortions of the officials From time to time the Sultān deprived high officials of the profits of their extortions or imposed severe punishments on them Taxes oppressed the country The Sultān himself was brave and to the end of his life fulfilled his duties as a ruler in spite of his painful affliction — he had frequently to be carried Although he led a life of pomp and gave popular entertainments, fireworks and feasts with great splendour, he was outwardly a pious and humble Muslim, who in times of famine and pestilence took part in prayers in the penitential garb of the Sūfīs on the bare ground and like a pious Muslim observed a three days' fast in times of drought He was harsh on Jews and Christians, dismissed them from government offices where they had clerical and administrative posts, and punished them in addition The old strict regulations about dress were again enforced and all kinds of humiliations heaped on the "unbelievers"

Bibliography Weil, Geschichte der Chalifen, v 129—156, Ibn Iyās, II 2—10, Ibn Taghrībirdī, ed Popper, VI/I/III 168—176, Ibn Taghrībirdī, al-Manhal al-sāfī, Arab MS Vienna, Mixt 329, fol 382—91, for the Asia Minor dynasties see E de Zambaur, Manuel de Generalogie et de Chronologie, Hanover 1927, p 157 sq

(M SOBERNHEIM)

AL MU'AIYAD FI 'L-DĪN, ABŪ NASR HIBAT ALLĀH B ABĪ ʿIMRĀN MŪSĀ B DĀWŪD AL SHĪRĀZĪ, a Fāṭimid dāʿī of high rank, d 470 (1087) At the beginning of his mission al-Mu'aiyad propagated the Ismāʿīlī doctrine in the East, especially in Shīrāz He succeeded in converting the Buwaihid amīr Abū Kālīdjār [q v], but on account of opposition at home he went to Baghdād and Mawsil, and thence to Cairo, where he was received after some time at the court of al-Mustansir bi 'llāh [q v] He now became chief dāʿī and bāb of the Imām, and was probably in relations with the other great dāʿī Nāsir-i Khusraw [q v] Al-Mu'aiyad was sent in command of an army to help al-Basāsīrī [q v] against the Turkmens With his assistance al Basāsīrī inflicted a severe defeat on the Turkmens at Sindjār, took Baghdād, and read the khutba in the name of the Fāṭimid Caliph Al-Mu'aiyad was also in direct communication with the leaders of the Fāṭimid daʿwa in Yaman In addition to his capacities as a general he was possessed of great literary ability and a poet of no mean talent His dīwān, which consists of panegyrics on the Fāṭimid Imāms al-Mustansir and al Zāhir, deals partly with philosophical subjects Another important work, al-Madjālis, contains 800 "assemblies", dealing with different theological and philosophical questions, including his correspondence with the poet philosopher Abu 'l ʿAlāʾ al-Maʿarrī [q v] on the subject of vegetarianism (see D S Margoliouth, in JRAS [1902], 289 sqq) His autobiographical work, al-Sīra, gives a detailed account of his mission in Shīrāz and his admission to the court of al-Mustansir, and is carried down to 451 (1059) Besides being one of the few autobiographies in Arabic literature, it is of considerable interest for the history of the Buwaihids and their relations with the Fāṭimids The MSS of these works are preserved in some collections of Ismāʿīlī works in Yaman and India

Bibliography Contained in the article, also Ibn al-Sairafī, al Ishāra, Cairo 1924, p 69, Fārsnāma (GMS, N S, I), 119, al Makrīzī, Khitat, I 60, Idrīs ʿImād al-Dīn b al Hasan, ʿUyūn al-Akhbār, vols VI and VII, R A Nicholson, Studies in Islamic Poetry, p 134—136, 142 (H F AL-HAMDANI)

MU'AIYAD-ZĀDE, ʿABD AL-RAHMĀN ČELEBĪ, an important Ottoman theologian and legist Born in 860 (1456) in Amasia of the family of Mu'aiyad-zāde (his father ʿAlī was one of the three sons of Diwrikli zāde Shams al Dīn Mu'aiyad Čelebī [d 851 = 1447], Shaikh of the Yaʿkūb Pasha Zāwiyesi in Amasia), he became, as a young student of theology, acquainted with prince Bāyazīd, the younger son of Sultān Mehmed al-Fātih and afterwards Sultān, who had been appointed wālī of Amasia as a seven year old boy, and became a member of his circle It is to this period that his relations with the famous poetess Mihrī Khatun [q v] belong The relations between the gifted youth and the prince who was about 9 years older than he (born 854 = 1447), became so intimate that Mu'aiyad soon became the inseparable comrade of Bāyazīd When Sulṭān Mehmed heard from various sources, especially from a complaint in verse by Halīmī Luṭf Allāh, Kādī of Sīwās, who had been gravely insulted by the entourage of the prince, of alleged abuses at the prince's court, especially the orgies of drug taking (mukeyyefāt bersh, afiyūn, maʿdjūn), he sent a commission of enquiry which arrived in Amasia when the prince was with Muʾaiyad on a pleasure trip to Ladik The result of the enquiry was the issue of an order for the execution of the two chief culprits, one of whom was Muʾaiyad (this hukm-i sherīf is given in Ferīdūn, Medjmūʿa-i Munsheʾāt, Constantinople 1274², i 270—271) From a note by Muʾaiyad in a book bought by him during his stay in Ladik in Rabīʿ I 882 (June 1477) (the Zīdj of Shems al-Dīn) the date is exactly fixed (the date in Ferīdūn should therefore be altered from 884 to 883, cf Ḥusām al-Dīn, Amasia Taʾrīkhi, Istanbul 1927, iii, 230 note 1) Muʾaiyad, receiving timely warning of the fate threatening him, escaped from Amasia, provided with everything necessary by Bāyazīd, and after a short stay in Halab went to Shīrāz, where he completed his theological studies under the celebrated Djalāl al-Dīn al-Dawwānī

When Muʾaiyad returned home, on hearing of Bāyazīd's accession, he received an idjāza (teacher's diploma) from Dawwānī In 887 (1482) he reached Amasia where his father had died three months earlier After staying six weeks here he went to Constantinople where his extensive learning soon gained him a reputation among the theologians Bāyazīd appointed him muderris at the Kalender khāne-medrese in Constantinople In 891 (1486) Muʾaiyad married the daughter of the famous legist Muslih al-Dīn Kastellānī (Mawlāna Kestellī) who was the last Kādī-ʿasker general of the Turkish empire and after the reforms by which this office was divided became Kādī-ʿasker of Rumelia Muʾaiyad had a brilliant career in 899 (1494) he became Kādī of Adrianople, in 907 (1501) Kādī-ʿasker of Anatolia, in 910 (1504—1505) Kādī-ʿasker of Rumelia and head of all the ʿulamāʾ In 917 (1511) the Janissaries who had taken the part of prince Selīm plundered his house because his sympathies were with Ahmad, the favourite son of Bāyazīd He himself was dismissed by the now senile Sultān under pressure from the Janissaries Selīm I soon after his accession recalled however him to his old office as he saw in him the right man to carry through the important duties of a Kādī-ʿasker Selīm took him with him on his campaign to Persia against Shāh Ismāʿīl But on the way back Muʾaiyad was deprived of his office in Čoban Kopru, as symptoms of a mental breakdown had begun to show themselves (920 = 1514) He died in 922 (1516) in Constantinople and was buried in Eyyūb

Muʾaiyad wrote a number of treatises on law and theology especially on Kurʾānic exegesis Brockelmann, G A L, i 227 and Brusalī Mehmed Tāhir, ʿOthmanlī Muʾellifleri, Istanbul 1333, i 355, give a list of his works that survive in MS Under the nom-de plume of Khātemī, Muʾaiyad also wrote poetry in Arabic, Persian and Turkish His great service to Turkish literature lies however less in his own original work than in the magnificent liberality with which he encouraged rising young talent, like the poets Nedjātī and Zātī, the historians Kemāl-Pasha-Zāde and Muhyī al-Dīn Meḥmed, the jurist Abu 'l-Suʿūd and others Muʾaiyad was also famed as a calligraphist He was the first Ottoman to form a private library of over 7,000 volumes, a huge figure for the time

Bibliography In addition to the works already quoted Tāshköprüzāde, Shakāʾik i nuʿmāniye, Constantinople 1269, p 308—311, transl into German by Rescher, Constantinople 1927, p 191—194, 86, Sehī, Hesht bihisht, Constantinople 1325, p 27—28, Laṭīfī, Tezkere, Constantinople 1314, p 238, Habīb, Khatt u Khaṭṭātān, Constantinople 1306, p 116, M Shemʿī, ʿIlāweli ethmār el-Tewārīkh, Constantinople 1295, p 165, Thureiya, Sidjill-i ʿothmānī, iii 310, Sāmī, Kāmūs al-Aʿlām, iv 30, 70—71, Hammer, G O D, i 305, Gibb, H O P, ii 29—31 (Th Menzel)

MU'AIYID AL-DAWLA, Abū Mansūr Būye b Rukn al-Dawla, Būyid governor born in Djumādā II 330 (= February–March 942), died in Djurdjān in Shaʿbān 373 (January–February 984) See the article Fakhr al-Dawla

AL MU'AKHKHIR [See Allāh, II]

AL-MUʿAMMĀ, anagram, sometimes charade, a kind of enigma propounded in verse and rarely in prose, its meaning is made "blind" or obscure with the object of misleading the wits and the eye It is formed by designating one or more words by various allusions to the letters forming it or them or by allusions relating to the pronunciation the alphabetic value, the numeral value of the letters, misinterpretation or inversion (kalb) Very frequently no notice is taken of the vowels or of letters only connected with the spelling Good taste is the rule

There are several varieties of muʿammā which will be found enumerated in the works given in the Bibliography

The invention of the muʿammā is attributed to Khalīl b Aḥmad, the inventor of prosody, while the Persians of course attribute it to ʿAlī b Abī Tālib

The following is an example of a muʿammā on the name Aḥmad Awwaluhu thālithu tuffāhatin, wa-rābiʿu 'l tuffāhi thānīhī Wa awwal al miski lahū thālithun, wa-ākhiru 'l-wardi li bākīhī, "Its first is the third of [the word] tuffāha (apple) = A, and the fourth of [the word] tuffāh (apples) is its second = H, and the first of [the word] misk (musk) is its third = M, and the last of [the word] ward (roses) is the remainder of it = D"

Here is a Persian example on the word satīk Nām i butam ān māh tirāzī, haft ast bihārisiy u tāzī, "The name of my idol, this [woman] fair as the moon, is seven in Persian and Arabic" The word satīk divided into two, gives sat or sitt which in Arabic means "six" and ik or yek which in Persian means "one", whence we have 6 + 1 = 7

Bibliography Kutb al-Dīn al-Nahrawālī, al-Kanz al-Asmā fī Fann al Muʿammā (Brockelmann, G A L, ii 383), ʿAbd al-Munʿim b Aḥmad al-Bakkāʾ, al-Tirāz al-Asmā ʿalā Kanz al-Muʿammā (Brockelmann, G A L, ii 285, 381), anonym, Djalāʾ al Dayādjī fi 'l-Muʿammayāt wa 'l-Aghāz wa 'l-Ahādjī, Bairūt 1882, Tāhir b Ṣālih al-Djazāʾirī, Tashil al-Maḍjāz fī Fann al-Muʿammā wa 'l-Alghāz, Bairūt 1308, ʿAbd al-Hādī Nadjā al-Abyārī, Suʿūd al-Mutālīʿ li-Suʿūd al-Maṭālīʿ, Būlāk 1283, i 3, Ṭashköprüzāde, Miftāh al-Saʿāda wa Miṣbāh al-Siyāda, Haidarābād 1329, i 224 (N° 35), ʿAbd al-Kādir b Muhammad al-Tabarī, ʿUyūn al-Masāʾil

min Aʿyān al-Masāʾil, Cairo 1316, p 108, Muhammad b Kais al-Rāzī, al Muʿdjam fī Maʿāyīr Aṣḥāʿr al-ʿAdjam, ed Mīrzā Muhammad and Browne, Leyden 1901, p 397, al-Djurdjānī, Taʿrīfāt, Constantinople 1307, p 150, Garcin de Tassy, Rhetor et prosodie des lang des musul de l'Or, Paris 1873, p 165 (MOH BENCHENEB)

MUʿAṬṬILA [See TAʿṬĪL]

MUʿĀWAḌA (A), barter, exchange

1 Muʿāwada, barter, is historically an early form of the exchange of commodities between two parties and the predecessor of buying and selling (baiʿ, Roman law emptio-venditio) In course of time sale developed out of exchange when, with the coming of money, a sum was given in place of the goods which the other party had to give in return In Muslim law we find the following four kinds of sale

a Exchange of one thing for another This is the primitive method of exchange (muʿāwada) Exchange is a transaction in kind Payment takes place "hand upon hand" (yadan bi-yadin)

b Exchange of a thing for a definite sum (thaman) By thaman (gold or silver) a sum of money is meant Here we have a sale in the proper sense of the word (cf BAIʿ)

c Exchange of one definite sum (thaman) for another, this is the case of gold or silver being exchanged for each or one another This is called ṣarf (q v, money-changing)

d Exchange of a claim (dain, debt) for a definite sum The main business under this head is the salam or salaf [q v]

2 Muʿāwada is a subdivision of the form of agreement called ṣulh [q v] According to Ibn al Kāsim's definition, p 338, and other fukahāʾ such an agreement is either sulh al ibrāʾ, reduction of debt (not wiping it out) or sulh al-muʿāwada, exchange of debts Ibn al Kāsim thus defines the latter "And the exchange i e the composition is the ceding of one's right to a third e g when some one claims a house or a part of it and he allows this claim and concludes an agreement with him by which the debt is paid in some definite thing e g clothes" In this case the creditor instead of the thing claimed by him which the debtor is unwilling to give up takes another to wipe out the disputed debt An agreement may also be made about a legal claim instead of a thing The following is a practical illustration Zaid has a legal claim against ʿAmr ʿAmr raises a claim against Zaid Each of them abandons his claim in ṣulh al-muʿāwada and the demands are cancelled

3 Lastly Muʿāwada is a technical term in the general Muslim law of contract, on which there is so far no comprehensive study taking full account of the sources A contract (ʿakd) may be based on onesided or mutual obligation (contractus unilateralis or bilateralis) The latter form, which is the basis for mutual obligations, claim and counter-claim, is called muʿāwada in Muslim law Examples of contract of this sort are those of sale, lease, marriage etc

Bibliography L W C van den Berg, De Contractu "do ut des", Leyden 1868, p 29, Ahmad Abu 'l-Fath, al-Muʿāmalāt, Cairo 1340, i 41, 187, sqq, al-Shīrāzī, Kitāb al-Tanbih, ed A W T Juynboll, Leyden 1879, p xi, xlviii, xiv, R Grasshoff, Die allgemeinen Lehren des Obligationenrechts, Gottingen 1895, also the usual works on Fiḳh (OTTO SPIES)

MUʿĀWIYA, the first Umaiyad caliph, son of Abū Sufyān [q v] and Hind [q v], was born in Mecca in the first decade of the seventh century A D Under the training of his father, the most influential personage in, if not the actual leader of the merchant republic of Mecca, he had an opportunity to be initiated into the principles of government as the Meccans understood it Converted to Islām in the year of the fath or surrender of Mecca, he made himself useful to the Prophet in the capacity of secretary Here he gained an insight into the workings of the new regime and learned to know the men with whom he was later to work or struggle the autocratic ʿOmar, the presumptuous ʿAlī, a whole crowd of ambitious people, like Talha, Zubair and ʿĀʾisha, sometimes redoubtable for their talents and capacity for intrigue, like ʿAmr b al-Ās [q v] and Mughira b Shuʿba [q v] This dual training early matured the young Muʿāwiya who was remarkably gifted, and prepared him from the first for his high destiny

In the caliphate of Abū Bakr he was sent to the conquest of Syria as second in command to his brother Yazīd, in this new field he displayed an astonishing activity and distinguished himself by military successes, like the taking of Caesarea and other cities of the Phoenician coast On the premature death of Yazīd, he took his place as governor of Damascus In ʿOmar's reign, with the advance of Arab arms, he added to this office the governorships of the other provinces of Syria ʿOthmān, who was related to him, confirmed him in these offices and still further increased his authority Muʿāwiya gained the attachment of those under him and established in Syria during the twenty years of his governorship a model province, the best organized, and with the best disciplined troops of the young empire Not having been able to prevent the assassination of ʿOthmān, he was able cleverly to take upon himself the task of avenging him This was to lead him to the caliphate and bring him into open conflict with ʿAlī Delaying his attack, he let his rival use up his forces and lose his prestige in civil strife and in sterile conflicts with the dissenters (ʿOthmānīya, q v) and others, who accused him of complicity in the murder of his predecessor The indecisive battle of Siffīn [q v] resulted in the arbitration of Adhroh [q v] In pronouncing that ʿAlī should lose the caliphate, the verdict restored to Muʿāwiya liberty of movement He had won over ʿAmr b al-ʿĀs to his side and at once used this valuable supporter for the conquest of Egypt Encouraged by his military and diplomatic successes, he allowed his troops to proclaim him caliph and continuously harassed the provinces that still recognised ʿAlī Ibn Muldjam's crime removed the last obstacle separating him from the throne Muʿāwiya profited by it to inaugurate his reign in Jerusalem To him the title of caliph merely meant official recognition of a fait accompli, the result of twenty years of labour and devotion to those under his governorship in Syria To law-abiding men, he alone seemed capable of putting an end to the anarchy in which the empire had been struggling for more than ten years In the course of a rapid campaign in the ʿIrāk in 41 (661), he acquired from Hasan b ʿAlī a definite renunciation of his family's claims The submission of the provinces to the east of the Tigris restored the unity of the caliphate This year is known as the year of reunion (al-ǧamāʿa)

One man continued to sustain in Persia the flag of the ʿAlids, Ziyād b Abīhi [q v] Muʿāwiya won him over by istilḥāk, a procedure by which he recognised him as his half-brother, son of Abū Sufyān This bold stroke secured him the support of the ablest governor of the caliphate, a worthy rival of ʿAmr b al-ʿĀs and Mughīra b Shuʿba, already supporters of the caliph Against the combination of these four brains all the plots hatched by the anti-Umaiyad opposition were to come to nothing On the death of Mughīra, Ziyād added the governorship of Kūfa to his own of Basra and for eight years ruled the whole of the eastern provinces By his ability and loyalty, Ziyād showed himself most worthy of the confidence placed in him Freed from anxiety about this half of the empire, Muʿāwiya devoted his energies to the pacification and development of the prosperity of other parts of his vast empire and to removing the traces of the long struggle from which it had emerged He organised the Arab navy while his lieutenants actively pursued the work of foreign conquest He took Cyprus and Rhodes and on two occasions his son Yazīd closely blockaded Constantinople His great work was the creation of the Syrian army of troops blindly devoted to their sovereign It formed the great military reserve of the empire for his successors, an inexhaustible nursery of soldiers and leaders He was able to keep it in training by annual invasions of Byzantine territory razzias on a large scale rather than campaigns with a definite plan of conquest By thus keeping the enemy engaged at home, he managed to defend his own frontiers very efficaciously Taken at a disadvantage during his tense struggle with ʿAlī by an invasion of the Mardaites [q v], he did not hesitate to purchase the withdrawal of these adventurers from the emperor If after his elevation to the caliphate he rarely left Damascus — henceforth the official capital — to lead his armies in person, he nevertheless was still the "real organiser of victory" He saw to the comfort and equipment of the troops, doubled their pay and saw that they were paid with a regularity hitherto unknown His rival ʿAlī said that on the call of Muʿāwiya the Syrian army "would take the field without demanding pay, not two or three times a year only, wherever it pleased its leaders to take them" His intuition everywhere chose the ablest administrators, the best leaders among the Kuraish and other tribes. To the names already mentioned we may add those of Dahhāk b Kais, Abu 'l-Aʿwar al-Sulamī, Muslim b ʿUkba, Busr b. Abī Artāt, Habīb b Maslama [q v] By the help of enormous subsidies and by his magnanimity he was able to keep the members of the Prophet's family, the ʿAlids and the Hāshimīs, quiet Ibn ʿAbbās and Ibn Djaʿfar, ʿAḳīl, the brother, and "the two Hasans", al-Ḥasanān, the sons of ʿAlī He used the business experience of the Sardjūnids to organise the financial administration This fiscal reform gave him the resources required to maintain his armies, carry out desirable public works and pay the subsidies necessary to secure the success of his plans He continuously interested himself in agriculture He paid special attention to the development of the province least favoured by nature, the Ḥiḏjāz His example, which was copied by his relations and most influential contemporaries, brought this region a century of prosperity under the Umaiyads such as it was never to see again In the lands of Medīna and Mecca and Ṭāʾif, Muʿāwiya carried out great irrigation schemes, sank wells and built dams

In Syria he strengthened his authority by a close alliance with the fellow-tribesmen of his Kalbī wife Maisūn [q v] and through them with the other tribes of Kudāʿa and those from the Yemen, these groups formed the bulk of the Arab population of Syria It was on these foundations that the hegemony exercised by Syria throughout the Umaiyad period was built and consolidated His policy towards Christians was a tolerant one Lastly, he endeavoured to train his son Yazīd to be an heir capable of continuing his traditions of government, by checking certain tendencies of his well endowed but impetuous nature with its fondness for pleasure Seeing his end approaching, he skilfully succeeded in getting Yazīd recognised as his successor, first of all in Syria and then in other provinces These difficult negotiations were the last of his political successes Muʿāwiya was now entering on the twentieth year of his caliphate, in 60 (Oct 679) and probably was in the 80th year of a life which had been marked by constant success By the year 3 or 4 — contrary to the assertion of Ibn Duraid (Kitāb al-Ištiḳāḳ, p 256) — he must have reached manhood, for four years later he was secretary to the Prophet In the course of the forty years of his public career, no serious check ever interrupted his progress After the abdication of Ḥasan b ʿAlī, he had "reigned without a rival, without losing any of the conquests of Islām Neither ʿAbd al Malik, nor Mansūr, nor Hārūn al-Rashīd earned this praise, unique in the annals of Islām" (Dhahabī) He died at Damascus in the month of Radjab of the year 60 (April 680) and was buried in the cemetery of Bāb al-Ṣaghīr where his tomb still survives Before his death he entrusted the regency to Dahhāk b Kais and to Muslim b ʿUkba until Yazīd should return from Anatolia Companion and secretary of the Prophet, brother of Umm Habība [q v], "the mother of the believers", these claims have not preserved him from the hatred of the Shīʿīs and the official maledictions pronounced by certain ʿAbbāsid caliphs More tolerant to his memory than to that of his son Yazīd, orthodoxy generally agrees to recognise his right to the respect which is due to the Ṣaḥābīs The Syrians long cherished the memory of his glorious reign and even beyond the bounds of Syria he had partisans among the Hanbalīs, called ghulāt, the enthusiasts for Muʿāwiya

II Muʿāwiya's policy In the historical and anecdotal literature of the Arabs there are few collections which do not devote a paragraph to Muʿāwiya's "wise mildness and complete self-control" (Wellhausen), qualities which the Arabs include under the term ḥilm By this supreme virtue they claim to recognise the true statesman The Sufyānid sovereign is said to have owed the great success of his career to it "Muʿāwiya's ḥilm" thus became proverbial A somewhat mixed virtue, essentially opportunist in character, it may be combined with astuteness, or the less scrupulous forms of diplomacy In our hero this quality has been found even in the most difficult trials inflicted on his amour-propre His smiling imperturbility was able to disarm the proudest of his adversaries, who were then completely won over by his generosity With the golden chains of pensions and rich gifts the ruler was able to hold in leash his most intractable enemies When his friends expressed surprise at the vastness of certain donations, he would reply "a war costs infinitely more" This was his favourite method of dealing with the ʿAlids and Hāshimids He has been unjustly accused of having introduced the custom of publicly cursing the name of ʿAlī from the pulpit of the mosque There is no certain evidence of this practice before the time of the Marwānids

The collateral branches of the Umaiyad family supplied him with distinguished assistants He was careful not to bring the more ambitious of them too much to the front or to leave them too long in one office He was studious to inculcate into all his relations the feeling that they must stand by one another and that this consisted in the blind execution of his orders The Umaiyads formed his natural supporters He could not do without them But the unsettled problem, of the dynastic succession made him distrustful of relatives called upon to share the responsibilities of power He did not fail to keep a close watch over them With men like Ibn ʿĀmir, Saʿīd b al-ʿĀs, Marwān b al Hakam [q v], of remarkable gifts and considerable influence, who did not conceal their aspirations, he came to terms in a way that effectually discouraged them from following the dictates of their ambitions As to the sons of the Caliph ʿOthmān, they seemed to him too insignificant to cause him any disquiet On the other hand, Marwān and Saʿīd were appointed to succeed one another at about regular intervals in the government of the Hidjāz, the cradle of Islām and of the ruling family Muʿāwiya was unwilling to give them time to create in such an important centre a position for themselves and connections which might have compromised the future of the dynasty Ultimately he decided to replace these two relatives by a nephew of his own, now almost grown up, the Sufyānid Walīd b ʿUtba [q v] In the important governorship of the ʿIrāk, which controlled the eastern provinces, Muʿāwiya showed his preference for Thakafī officials, Mughira, Ziyād and the latter's son ʿUbaid Allāh He appreciated the devotion of these men, who came from the shrewd society in Tāʾif, suspected by the other Umaiyad families, compelled to rely on their sovereign, the author of their fortunes For a moment, the extraordinary promotion of Ziyād and the confidence the Caliph showed in him suggested that he had him in view as his successor In this attitude to his relatives, the interests of the dynasty surpassed all other considerations The heir presumptive was young Muʿāwiya wanted to save his Umaiyad cousins from the temptation to set up as rivals of his successor The first step was to do Yazīd rather a bad turn If, instead of the inexperienced Walīd, Muʿāwiya had retained or restored for another period of office in the governorship of the Hidjāz the energetic Marwān, there is no reason to think that this would not have turned the incautious Husain from the hopeless exploit of Karbalāʾ

In the traditional view Muʿāwiya appears as the perfect type of Arab ruler When writers, jurists, encyclopaedists and compilers of anthologies have to quote a trait or a saying illustrating kingship, or the conduct of states, they rarely hesitate to credit it to our hero This unanimity which reflects so much to his credit has been transformed into censure by orthodoxy Muʿāwiya is reproached with having transformed the khilāfat, the vicariate of the Prophet, into mulk, into a temporal sovereignty, with having, if we may use the term, secularized the supreme power, really a purely lay one, in the heart of Islām This criticism is an attempt to throw odium on Muʿāwiya while in reality it calls attention to his great merit In him the ruler, "the king", i e the organizer and administrator, appear very distinctly while they are difficult to find in his predecessors, painfully fighting against the outbursts of Beduin anarchy This transformation of the patriarchal power had begun with ʿOmar who was the first to realise the necessity for it and attempted to realize it Muʿāwiya endeavoured to hasten its evolution towards more effective centralization, an extension of the powers and personal authority of the sovereign To secure for the latter the advantages of external pomp, the prestige given by formalities, he gave more ceremony to the hitherto democratic appearance of the caliph at the Friday services He appeared in the minbar or pulpit, surrounded by a shorta or guard — ʿAlī had already had one — and remained seated while delivering his address, the khutba Some have thought to see in this attitude a sign of pride This is to forget the primitive nature of the minbar as the seat of the ruler, the sovereign's throne, before it became of liturgical significance as the pulpit of the mosque, after the latter had become a building for religious worship This charge of mulk was also intended to render suspect the sincerity of the faith of the Sufyānid monarch But austerity characterised his morals and private life He was a good father and a devoted husband We find him conscientiously performing his religious duties and dying at length a good Muslim

The chroniclers unanimously find in the complex character of Muʿāwiya another trait besides hilm political finesse, what the Arabs call dāhiya To be credited with this it was necessary to have in addition to diplomatic skill, a remarkable gift of eloquence, force of decision, a resourceful nature and a conscience broad enough not to shrink from the use of trickery Muʿāwiya was reckoned among the five best Kuraish orators of his time He was fond of saying "I have won more success with the tongue than Ziyād (b Abīhi) with the sword" Arab writers prefer to attribute these successes to the Machiavellian nature of the sovereign He is said never to have shrunk from recourse to violence or the use of poison when he wished to get rid of troublesome adversaries To support this charge the cases of ʿAbd al Rahmān b Khālid, Hasan b ʿAlī and Ashtar b Mālik [q v] are quoted But each of the examples is capable of a more natural explanation We would readily put Muʿāwiya in the category of those statesmen to whom useless crime is naturally repugnant, too wise to allow themselves to be tempted by violent solutions but not scrupulous enough to hesitate in such an extremity, if reasons of state seemed to advise it One of his successors, ʿAbd al-Malik, called him "the cunning (mudāhin) caliph" The pleasure loving son of ʿAlī, ruined by his easy life, forgotten and retired to Medina, did not deserve to be feared The two other individuals above mentioned died by accident or were victims of private vengeance

The poets, the "journalists" of the period, had an undoubted influence on their contemporaries This influence the sovereign succeeded in controlling and subjecting to dynastic interests Himself very susceptible to the charms of verse, he would have liked to see poetry confine itself to developing patriotism, and renouncing satire which was a source of dissension among the tribes The restorer of ǧamāʿa, national unity, felt more than anyone the necessity for this concord to heal the wounds caused by anarchy Powerless to prevent the incursions of poetasters into the field of politics he endeavoured to win them over to his side by gifts and the use of tact To win them over was to have "a good press", and at the same time gain their tribes to the cause of order, for the tribes usually agreed with the ideas spread by their bards He exploited his son Yazīd's relations and friendships with the poets to compromise them in favour of the Umayyads and make them less amenable to the advances of the reactionary parties He paid for their panegyrics, he took them under his protection whenever their lack of discipline brought them into trouble with the local authorities He did not hesitate to shut his eyes to some of their poetical outbursts, which seem to compromise the reputation of his own hearth, under the ʿAbbāsids such audacity would have meant death He further left it to these indiscreet auxiliaries to deal with abuses by officials and found in them a useful check on arbitrary exercise of authority by his lieutenants It was at the same time a satisfaction of their amour-propre, allowed to the vanity of these rhapsodists, who were courted by all parties and intoxicated by the terror which their wit inspired In return for this toleration, he was able to get less disinterested services from them He imposed on them the duty of preparing public opinion in favour of the baiʿa, the recognition, of Yazīd as heir-apparent To accustom the Arabs to this step so repulsive to their democratic instincts, to give the caliph leisure to calculate its chances of success, there was nothing so useful as the intervention of these heralds with their echoing phrases It enabled the government to remain discreetly in the background, ready to come out at the opportune moment

The biased Masʿūdī himself cannot help admiring the pliant ease of Muʿāwiya's policy, "his great generosity to his subjects and the benefits which he heaped upon them, winning their sympathy and seducing their hearts with such skill that they put him before their kinsmen and natural affections" Firmness in administration, skill in managing men according to their rank, cordiality, these are some of the qualities credited by this historian, the friend of ʿAlī, to the successful rival of Fātima's husband

Let us now deal with the charges brought against him by orthodoxy With the object of making them more readily accepted, the indictment is carefully put in the mouth of the austere Hasan al-Basrī "Muʿāwiya committed four crimes — one of them alone would suffice to cover him with dishonour — he abandoned the nation to men of no repute, deprived it without consulting it (by the baiʿa of Yazīd) of the control of its destinies and that in the life-time (i e to the detriment) of numerous Companions and virtuous individuals He chose as his successor an incorrigible drunkard, robed in silk and playing the harp He adopted Ziyād Lastly he condemned Hudjr b ʿAdī [q v] to death" The impartial historian will have little difficulty in clearing the sovereign from these charges, which reveal his political flair, his instinct for rulership which raised him high above the prejudices of his contemporaries The measures for which he is blamed secured the caliphate twenty years of peace and prosperity, the longest period it ever knew

To sum up, Muʿāwiya appears in the series of Muslim rulers as one of the most attractive individuals and one of all round ability In him the Arabs see the very incarnation of sovereignty In the opinion of Masʿūdī his successors at best could only try to copy him without being able to equal him In spite of their little liking for the able Sufyānid, the Marwānids frequently appealed to his traditions and the methods of government inaugurated by him He was, beyond doubt, the least oriental and the most modern of the rulers of Islām He did not disdain public opinion One must be grateful to him for not having believed in the power of force alone in the management of men, for not having sought to reestablish, as the ʿAbbāsids were to do, the old Asiatic autocracies, for having preferred that his subjects should become voluntarily attached to him by winning their sympathies, for proclaiming that "the world is more surely led by the tongue than by the sword" This conviction led him to adopt several institutions of Bedouin democracy — such as the wufūd, deputations from the provinces and the principal tribes — to consult the views of such assemblies on as many occasions as possible, to associate them openly with public business by recognising their right of remonstrance The astuteness of the sovereign knew how to direct these manifestations of the old individualism of the nomads and to bring them to cooperate with his designs To quote the comparison of the Byzantine historians, he appeared as a πρωτοσύμβουλος in the midst of his σύμβολοι, in the deliberations of his Syrian parliament, he posed as primus inter pares He was gradually able to advance the political education of his subjects and to control the signs of lack of discipline He was never perturbed by their criticisms nor by the satires of the poets "I do not trouble" he said "about words so long as they do not lead to deeds" These liberal principles became restricted under the Marwānids and disappeared with the coming of power of the absolute monarchy of the ʿAbbāsids

As is frequently the case with men who have grown old in politics, a long period of power — he exercised it without interruption for 40 years — had made him a sceptic This benevolent scepticism was revealed in a knowing smile when, with eyes half closed, he used to listen without missing a word to the petitions and recriminations of his visitors and pretended to be taken in by their customary excesses From his youth, passed in the cosmopolitan city of Mecca, then in Medīna in the very mixed society of the Companions, he had been in too close contact with his contemporaries to be under any illusions about their disinterestedness He had not to invent, but no one managed better than he, that instrument of government, the taʾlīf al-kulūb, the rallying of hearts, an ingenious euphemism of the Kurʾān, meaning the art of purchasing hesitating adherents Other caliphs surpassed him in courage, in outward austerity, zuhd, in love of knowledge and other qualities that dazzle the eyes of the multitude No one possessed to such a degree as Muʿāwiya the gifts of the founder of an empire vision, energy and promptitude in action, breadth of view, logical thinking, absence of antiquated prejudices, skill in adapting the prestige and ceremonial of his position to Arab taste, ability to use men and to deal tactfully with their prejudices so as not to offend them directly This rare combination of qualities enabled him to extract order out of the chaos of Bedouin anarchy If we endeavour to appreciate fairly Muʿāwiya's work with its inevitable deficiencies, one must take into account the intractable material on which he had to work and the resistance opposed by the inveterate individualism of the nomads He succeeded not only in disciplining them but also in transforming them into conquerors, able to rule over peoples of superior culture, heirs to the oldest civilisations

For achieving this result, the son of Muhammad's old opponent has deserved well of Islām In the list of those responsible for this great revolution his name should come after that of the Prophet beside the name of the caliph ʿOmar Orthodox tradition likes to exalt the latter and present him as the second founder of Islām Of European writers, Sprenger and von Kremer have popularised this view In it we may recognise the reply of the schools of the Ḥiḏjāz to the ʿIrāk legend woven round the memory of ʿAlī To their work we owe the fantastic proportions assumed by the personality of ʿOmar, it absorbs not only Abū Bakr, but even throws its shadow upon the Prophet ʿOmar is brought into the origin of all religious and administrative institutions, especially of all those that cannot decently be credited to the author of the Kurʾān This exaggerated admiration of the Ḥiḏjāz was to provoke the protestations of theʿAbbāsids The counterblast of Shiʿa tradition was to place ʿAlī alongside of ʿOmar to direct him and if necessary to correct him The indisputable merits of the second caliph lie elsewhere In the midst of the terrible confusion that resulted from the conquests he was able to maintain the unity and cohesion of the empire, immeasurably enlarged, to bring the Arabs intoxicated with success under comparative control Closely watched, harassed by the selfish claims of his Medinese senate and its disturbing element formed by the redoubtable group of the "ten mubashshara" or "the chosen" and the oldest friends of the Master, he succeeded in neutralising their restless activities, their due passion for intriguing and in exploiting their greed and mutual jealousies In the provinces the generals and governors showed an obedience scarcely less intermittent ʿOmar had frequently to resign himself to approving by sanatio in radice in order not to lose touch with such undisciplined auxiliaries and to remind all of the existence of the vicariate of the Prophet The day on which he thought of a more effective centralization, of a less ideal systematization, assassination brutally delivered him from his error The same fate was to overtake ʿOthmān, when under pressure from the Umaiyads, he took up his predecessor's programme where it had been interrupted With ʿAlī the caliphate relapsed into chaos and lost a quarter of a century of progress on the way to reorganization One province alone formed an exception, Syria, which had been governed since its creation by the Umaiyads

But for the intervention of Muʿāwiya and his able lieutenants, the ʿAmrs, Ziyāds and Marwāns, the Muslim empire would have been transformed — like the ʿIrāḳ and Khurāsān — into an arena to which the Arabs came to settle their petty tribal quarrels Once on the throne, the Sufyānid worked to extend gradually to the rest of the caliphate the methods of government which had secured the prosperity of Syria Encouraged by the results obtained in this country, he set himself to discipline the other Bedouins who, according to the idea ascribed to ʿOmar, formed the "substance of Islām" From this rudis indigestaque moles, this rebellious mass, gradually broken in by the influence of Syria, fashioned by teachers trained in his school, the first Syrian caliph recruited soldiers, then formed from them the cadres of a regular army wonderful troops always ready to play their double part, the ḏjihād abroad, and at home the maintenance, against any threat from within, of the ḏjamāʿa, the unity of the empire Muʿāwiya succeeded in impressing on these descendants of caravan-leaders of Arabia, nomads, all obstinate landsmen, the importance of the mastery of the seas Arab thalassocracy dates from this period Forced to use primitive institutions, the sunna, tradition, sanctioned by the Prophet and the Medina caliphs, he endeavoured to turn them to the needs of a great empire He managed at least to suppress the anarchical working of the shūrā by regulating the dynastic succession He organised the finances, he began by revising and reducing the enormous pensions granted by preceding governments without regard to services rendered to the state Down to his time the central treasury of the caliphate had been supplied by intermittent and always unwilling contributions extorted from the provinces Muʿāwiya endeavoured to settle the amount to be paid by each province and to regularise its collection Under him the treasury ceased to be a relief fund which the conquerors claimed to use as they pleased His predecessors had had to empty it periodically to secure assistance or neutrality important for the success of their policy Hitherto "māl al muslimīn, the collective property of the Muslims", the treasury now became māl Allāh, the treasury of the state, intended to cover general expenses, to secure the representation and the defence of the empire These reforms made Muʿāwiya the first sovereign, malik, of Islām, the first ruler to enjoy a definite authority, independent, unlike his predecessors, of the anarchic good-will of his subjects, and no longer at the mercy of an oligarchy interested in the maintenance of old abuses The Medinese vicariate which developed from the triumvirate, could not long survive this coup d'état, this drastic solution of the problem of the succession to the Prophet Before Muʿāwiya, the caliphate had only had a nominal existence For this figment, the son of Abū Sufyān substituted a reality, he created the Arab state a creation seen darkly by ʿOmar without having been brought to realisation

Bibliography We refer the reader to our Etudes sur le regne du calife omaiyade Moʿāwia I, following our Califat de Yazid I (reprint from MFOB, i—iii) The references are there given One may also with advantage consult G Levi della Vida, Il califfato di ʿAli secondo il Kitāb ansāb al-asrāf di al Balāḏuri, in RSO, vi 427—507, our Ziād ibn Abihi, vice-roi de l'Irāq, lieutenant de Moʿāwia I (extract from the same periodical, iv)

(H LAMMENS)

MUʿĀWIYA B ʿUBAID ALLĀH [See ABŪ ʿUBAID ALLĀH]

AL-MUʿAWWIḎHATĀNI, name of sūras cxiii and cxiv, taken from the opening words "Say, I take refuge with " The term al-muʿawwiḏhāt occurs also, it denotes these sūras together with sūra cxii — The muʿawwiḏhatāni belong to those parts of the Kurʾān which are frequently recited (after every salāt Ahmad b Hanbal, Musnad, iv 155, before going to sleep Bukhārī, Daʿawāt, bāb 12, in order to avert the evil eye Lane, Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians, Paisley and London 1899, p 259, chapter Superstitions)

AL-MUʿAẔẔAM [See TŪRĀNSHĀH]

AL-MALIK AL-MUʿAẔẔAM SHARAF AL-DĪN ʿĪSĀ B MALIK AL-ʿĀDIL B AIYŪB was born in 576 (1180) In 597 (1200) he became governor for his father al-Malik al-ʿĀdil [q v] in Damascus and next year was besieged by Saladin's sons Ẓāhir and Afdal in course of the dispute about the succession between them and ʿĀdil ʿĀdil came as far as Nāblus with his army but could not relieve Damascus so that its fall was imminent Then a quarrel broke out between the brothers as to who was to get Damascus The majority of the emīrs in the army made peace with ʿĀdil and the siege was raised in the course of the year ʿĀdil was recognised as the head of the Aiyūbids and ʿĪsā continued to govern Damascus and the lands going with it as far as the Egyptian frontier for his father When ʿĀdil died in 615 (1216) he had the inhabitants swear fealty to him but recognised his older brother Kāmil as suzerain in the Friday khuṭba He was, like his brothers, on fairly good terms with the Crusaders, but at the decisive moment he joined forces with his brothers against them and it is not least due to him, as the most important Aiyūbid leader of the period, that the Crusaders had to withdraw from Damietta in 618 (1221) His desire to seize central Syria (Hims and Hamāt) was not fulfilled as Kāmil threatened him with war when he attacked these towns ʿĪsā therefore made an alliance in 623 (1226) with the Khʷārizm-Shāh Djalāl al-Dīn and mentioned him as suzerain in the Friday prayer instead of his brother He thus felt strong enough to turn away the Emperor Frederick II's ambassador in this year while Kāmil, who did not feel too secure, negotiated with him It did not however come to fighting between the two brothers as both feared the intervention of Frederick II But before the latter set out for the Holy Land, ʿĪsā died on 1st Ḏhu 'l-Ḥiḍḍja 624 (Nov 12, 1227) in Damascus of dysentery Had he lived longer, Frederick II would probably not have taken Jerusalem It was ʿĪsā's son Nāṣir al-Dīn Dāwūd who succeeded in regaining Jerusalem for the Muslims ʿĪsā's rule stretched from south of Hims beyond Jerusalem to al-ʿArīsh on the Egyptian frontier In addition to his military ability, he is celebrated as a friend of poetry and letters and he is also said to have been an author himself Unlike the other Aiyūbids, he followed the school of Abū Ḥanīfa

Bibliography Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt al-Aʿyān, N⁰ 526 (transl de Slane, ii 428 sqq), Abu 'l-Fidāʾ, in Recueil des historiens orientaux des croisades, i (s index), Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, in Recueil, ii (s index), Masʿūdī, ʿ*Ukd al-Djumʿān, op cit*, and also Rohricht, Geschichte des Konigreichs Jerusalem (s index)

(M SOBERNHEIM)

MUBĀH [See SHARIʿA]

MUBAIYIḌA [See AL-MUḲANNAʿ]

MUBALLIGH [See MASDJID, I, D, e and H, 4]

MUBĀRAK GHĀZĪ, an Indian saint In all parts of the Sundarbun, the Muhammadan woodcutters invoke certain mythical beings to protect them from tigers and crocodiles In the 24 Parganas it is Mubārak Ghāzī who, in the Eastern parts of the Delta goes by the name of Zindah Ghāzī, the living warrior Mubārak Ghāzī is said to have been a fakīr (mendicant) who reclaimed the jungle tracts along the left bank of the river Hoogly Every village has an altar dedicated to him and no one enters the forest nor do any of the boat's crew, who might sail through the districts, pass without first making offerings at one of these shrines The fakīrs in these dangerous forests, who claim to be lineally descended from the Ghāzī, indicate with pieces of wood called sang the precise limits within which the forest has to be felled Mubārak Ghāzī, so the legend goes, came to Bengal when Raḍja Matak ruled over the Sundarbun The saint happened to have a dispute with the chief, who thought himself to be in the right, upon which the latter agreed to give his only daughter Shushila in marriage to the former, should his own opinion be proved wrong This the Ghāzī succeeded in doing and won his bride in consequence Since no man saw him die, he is believed to reside in the depths of the forest, to ride about on tigers, and to keep them so obedient to his will that they dare not touch a human being without his express desire Before entering a jungle or sailing through the narrow channels whose shady banks are infested by tigers, boatmen and woodcutters, both Hindus and Muhammadans, raise little mounds of earth and on them make offerings of rice, plantains, and sweet meats to Mubārak Ghāzī, after which they fearlessly cut the brushwood and linger in the most dangerous spots

This strange myth, there cannot be any doubt, is borrowed from Hindus to suit the taste of the superstitious boatmen and woodcutters

Bibliography Ward, Hindus, iii 186, Major R Smyth, Statistical and Geographical Report of the twenty-four Pergunnahs Districts, 1857

(M HIDAYET HOSAIN)

MUBĀRAK SHĀH, MUʿIZZ AL-DĪN, the second king of the Sayyid dynasty of Dihlī, was the son of Khiḍr Khān, the first king, and succeeded his father on May 22, 1421 The limits of his kingdom were then restricted to a few districts of Hindūstān proper and Multān, and he was obliged to desist from an attempt to establish his authority in the Panḍjāb by the necessity for relieving Gwalior, menaced by Hūshang of Mālwa, who raised the siege and met him, but after an indecisive action came to terms and retired to Mālwa From 1425 to 1427 he was engaged in attempting to restore order in Mewāt, and received the formal submission of the rāḍjās of Gwalior and Čandwār (Fīrūzābād), but Muhammad Khān Awhadī of Bayāna, whom he had taken prisoner, escaped and took refuge in Mewāt, and the work there was to do again Muhammad Awhadī, on being hard pressed in Bayāna, fled to Ibrāhīm Shāh of Djawnpūr, and as the latter marched against Kālpī, Mubārak marched to meet him Ibrāhīm, who had been plundering Mubārak's dominions, avoided a conflict for some time, but on April 2, 1428, the armies met near Čandwār and Ibrāhīm, though not decisively defeated, retired

the next day to Djawnpūr Mubārak then collected revenue in the neighbourhood of Gwalior and retired by way of Bayāna, which was evacuated by Muhammad Awhadī, who had returned thither For the rest of the year his officers were engaged in restoring order in the Pandjāb, ravaged by Djasrath the Khokar, and he in a similar task in Mewāt, and in collecting revenue by force In 1430 Fūlād Turkbača successfully defied the royal authority in Bhātinda, and in 1431 a rebellion broke out in Multān and had no sooner been suppressed than Djasrath renewed his activity in the Pandjāb The chronicle of the rest of the reign is a record of rebellions in the Pandjāb, Multān, Sāmāna, Mewāt, Bayāna, Gwalior, Ṭidjāra and Itāwa, and a rebel captured Lāhor and attacked Dīpālpūr Lāhor was eventually recovered, but the whole country remained in a disturbed condition

War broke out between Ibrāhīm of Djawnpūr and Hūshang of Mālwa in connection with Kālpī, the suzerainty over which belonged to neither and was claimed by both, and Mubārak, marching thither, turned aside to inspect Mubārakābād which he was building, and then, on February 19, 1434, he was assassinated at the instance of Sarwar al-Mulk, whom he had dismissed from the post of minister in the preceding year

Bibliography Muhammad Kāsim Firishta, Gulshan i Ibrāhīmī, Bombay 1832, Muntakhab al-Tawārīkh and translation by Lt Col G S A Ranking, Tabakāt i Akbarī and translation by B Dé (both in the Bibl Ind Series of the Asiatic Society of Bengal), Yahyā b Ahmad, Ta'rikh-i Mubārak Shāhī, rare in MS, but reproduced by the authorities cited above

(T W Haig)

MUBĀRIR AL DĪN [Muhammad b al-Muzaffaz]

AL MUBARRAD, Abu 'l-'Abbās Muhammad b Yazīd al Thumālī al Azdī, an Arab philologist, born on the 10th Dhu 'l Hidjdja 210 (March 25, 826) in Basra, was there taught by Abū 'Omar al-Djarmī, Abū 'Othmān al-Māzinī and Abū Hātim al Sidjistānī, the pupil of Asma'ī In his early works, the Kitāb Masā'il al Ghalat, he criticised the Kitāb of Sībawaih, but only a small number of his criticisms were well founded and of these only a minority were original (al-Suyūtī, al-Muzhir, [1] ii 188, [2] ii 232) Later he went to Baghdād where he became a very busy teacher, among his pupils were Niftawaih, Ibn Durustawaih and Ibn Kaisān His rival for favour at court was the Kūfan Tha'lab, to whom he was far superior in ability and style, the rivalry between these two scholars seems to have been the origin of the later tradition of the opposition between the schools of Kūfa and Baghdād His epithet al-Mubarrad seems to refer to his skill in disputation, but there are a number of anecdotes explaining it in very different ways (Muzhir [2], ii 267, 11 sq, Bughya, p 116—117, Irshād, vii 137, 15 sqq) He died in Baghdād in Shawwāl or Dhu 'l-Ka'da 285 (Oct 898)

His chief work al-Kāmil fi 'l-Adab is a typical example of the work of the old philologists as developed from their teaching Without being tied down to any fixed arrangement or even aiming at cohesion in the separate chapters, it combines traditions of the Prophet, sayings of pious men, proverbs, many poems mostly of the older period, and also historical matter like the important chapter on the Khāridjīs (characteristic is the passage on p 409 in Wright's edition "In this chapter we shall mention something of everything in order by change to prevent the reader from being wearied and mix a little jest with the earnest so that heart and soul may be recuperated", similarly p 428, exceptions like the chapters on simile p 447 or on laments for the dead and consolation p 713 are rare) The important feature is the full grammatical and lexicographical commentary which he gives to every quotation The work was given its final form with numerous additions and glosses by Abu 'l-Hasan al Akhfash (d 315 = 927) Al-Batalyūsī wrote a commentary on it which has not survived (Muzhir [1], i 182, 8, [2] 223, 5), there is an anonymous commentary in the possession of Ismā'īl Efendi in Stambul It was first printed in Stambul in 1286, editions The Kâmil of El-Mubarrad edited for the German Oriental Society by W Wright, part i–12, Leipzig 1864—1892, reprinted Cairo 1308, 1323, 1324 (with extracts from Djāhiz on the margin), 1339, with two modern commentaries Tahdhīb al-Kāmil by al Sibā'ī al-Baiyūnī, Cairo 1341 (1923), 2 vols and Raghbat al-'Āmil min Kitāb al-Kāmil by Saiyid Ibn 'Alī al Marsafī (professor at al Azhar), 8 vols, Cairo 345–346 (1927–1928), Das Kharidschitenkapitel aus dem K, transl into German by O Rescher, Stuttgart 1922 His second collection of material, the Kitāb al Muktadab, met with less success, because, it is said, it had been transmitted by the heretic Ibn al-Rāwandī, it is preserved with a commentary by Sa'id b Sa'id al-Fārikī (d 391 = 1000, see Yākūt, Irshād, iv 240) in the Escurial manuscript [2], p 111 and in Stambul, Koprulu, N° 1507—1508 (cf Rescher, in Z D M G, lxiv 197 photograph in Cairo, Fihrist [2], ii 123) Of his numerous other works given by his biographers we only have the Kitāb al-Ta'āsī, Escurial [2], p 534, 1, the Kitāb Nasab 'Adnān wa-Kahtān, in Stambul 'Ātif Ffendi, 2003 (M F O B, v 491) = Welī al-Dīn, 3178 (M F O B, vii 108), Escurial, Casiri 1700, fol 59r—68v (s Levi Della Vida, Les livres d'es chevaux, Leyden 1928, p xiii), his answer to a letter from Ahmad b Wāthik on the question whether poetry is superior to eloquence, in Munich 791 and in a fragment in Berlin, Ahlw 7177 as well as the Kitāb al-Mudhakkar wa 'l Mu'annath as transmitted by Abū 'Alī al-Fālisī, in Damascus, Zaiyāt, p 36, N° 113, 2 His other works are only known from quotations, e g his Kitāb al-Ikhtiyār, which he himself quotes Kāmil, p 760, 4, the Kitāb Gharīb al-Hadīth, which Ibn al-Athīr mentions among his sources in the preface to the Nihāya, the Kitāb ma 'ttafaka Lafzuhu wa 'khtalafa Ma'nāhū (Suyūtī, Sharh al-Mughnī, Cairo 1322, p 195, 20), the Kitāb al-Rawda, a collection of poems by contemporary poets beginning with Abū Nuwās, Aghānī [1], viii 15, 20, [2] 15, 1, 26, 13, al Djurdjānī, Kitāb al-Kināyāt, p 29, 9, Ibn al-Athīr, al Mathal al sā'ir, p 189, 16, the Kitāb al-I'tinān on the causes of the poetical strife between Djarīr and Farazdak, 'Abd al-Kādir al-Baghdādī, Khizānat al-Adab, i 305, 21, Kitāb al-Sharh (i e Sharh Kalām al-'Arab), l c, ii 193 infra

Bibliography Fihrist, p 59, Ibn al-Anbārī, Nuzhat al Alibbā, p 279—293, Ibn Khallikān, N° 608, iii 35, Zubaidī, Tabakāt al-Nahwiyīn, ed Krenkow, R S O, viii, N° 40, al-Azharī, in M O, 1920, p 26, Yākūt, Irshād, vii 137—143, Suyūtī, Bughyat al-Wu'āt, S 116, al-Yāfi'ī, Mir'āt al-Djanān, ii 210—213, Flügel,

Die gramm Schulen, p 93, Wüstenfeld, Die Geschichtschr d Araber, p 80, C Brockelmann, G A L, I 108, Rescher, Abriss, II 149 (C BROCKELMANN)

AL-MUBARRAZ, a fortress on the Persian Gulf, about a mile north of al-Hufhūf, surrounded by open villages and date palm-groves The population of the fortress and of the hamlets that belong to it is given, sometimes at 10,000, sometimes at 30,000

Bibliography C Ritter, Die Erdkunde von Asien, VIII/1 (Berlin 1846), p 574, VIII/2 (Berlin 1847) p 524 (ADOLF GROHMANN)

AL-MUBDI' [See ALLĀH, II]

AL-MUḌĀDJI', name of sūra XXXII, which is also called al-saḏida or al-ḏjuruz

MUḌAR [See RABI'A]

MUḌĀRI', the twelfth metre in Arabic prosody, which is very rarely used Theoretically each of its hemistichs consists of three feet (mafā'ilun fā'ilātun mafā'ilun), in practice the third foot is lacking

It has one 'arūd and one darb only mafā'ilun fā'ilātun mafā'ilun fā'ilātun Mafā'ilun however must become mafā'ilu The first mafā'ilun may lose its ma, in that case the form is fā'ilu (= maf'ūlu) and fā'ilu (M BENCHENEB)

AL-MUDAWWANA [See SAHNŪN]

AL-MUDDATHTHIR, title of sūra LXXIV

AL-MUDHILL [See ALLĀH II]

MUDĪR, title of the governors of the Egyptian provinces, called mudīriya The use of the word mudīr in this meaning is no doubt of Turkish origin The office was created by Muhammad 'Alī, when, shortly after 1813, he reorganised the administrative division of Egypt, instituting seven mudīriyas, this number has been changed several times [s KHEDIVE] At the present day there are 14 mudīriyas The chief task of the mudīr is the controlling of the agricultural administration and of the irrigation, as executed by his subordinates, viz the ma'mūr, who administers a markaz and the nāzir who controls the kism which is again a subdivision of the markaz Under Sa'īd Pasha the office of mudīr was temporarily abolished with a view to preventing oppression Until that time they had been without exception Turks, but under Ismā'īl Pasha, when the function was instituted again, this high administrative position was opened also to native Egyptians

Bibliography A B Clot Bey, Aperçu Géneral sur l'Egypte, Brussels 1840, II 172 sqq, A von Kremer, Aegypten, Leipzig 1863, II 8, Ilyās al-Ayyūbī, Ta'rīkh Miṣr fī 'Ahd al-Khadīw Ismā'īl Basha, Cairo 1341, I 62 sqq, J Deny, Sommaire des archives turques du Caire, Cairo 1930, p 130 (J H KRAMERS)

AL-MUDJĀDILA, title of sūra LVIII

AL-MUDJĀHĪD [See RASŪLIDS]

MUDJASSIMA [See TASHBĪH]

MUDJAWWAZA [See TURBAN, IV 890b sq]

AL-MUDJĪB [See ALLĀH II]

MUDJĪR AL-DĪN [See AL-OLAIMI]

MU'DJIZA (A), part act IV of '-dj-z, lit "the overwhelming", has become the technical term for miracle It does not occur in the Kur'ān, which denies miracles in connection with Muḥammad, whereas it emphasizes his "signs", āyāt, i e. verses of the Kur'ān, cf the art KORAN Even in later literature Muhammad's chief miracle is the Kur'ān (cf Abū Nu'aim, Dalā'il al-Nubuwwa, p 74) Mu'djiza and āya have become synonyms, they denote the miracles performed by Allāh in order to prove the sincerity of His apostles The term karāma [q v] is used in connection with the saints, it differs from mu'djiza in so far as it denotes nothing but a personal distinction granted by Allāh to a saint

Miracles of Apostles and Prophets, especially those of Muhammad, occur in the sīra and in hadīth Yet in this literature the term mu'djiza is still lacking, as it is in the oldest forms of the creed The Fikh Akbar, II, art 16, mentions the āyāt of the prophets and the karāmāt of the saints Mu'djiza occurs in the creed of Abū Hafs 'Umar al-Nasafī (ed Cureton, p 4, ed Taftāzānī, p 165) "And He has fortified them (the apostles) by miracles contradicting the usual course of things"

Taftāzānī explains it in this way A thing deviating from the usual course of things, appearing at the hands of him who pretends to be a prophet, as a challenge to those who deny this, of such a nature that it makes it impossible for them to produce the like of it It is Allāh's testimony to the sincerity of His apostles

A very complete and systematic description occurs in al Īdjī's Mawākif He gives the following definition of mu'djiza It is meant to prove the sincerity of him who pretends to be an apostle of Allāh Further he enumerates the following conditions 1 It must be an act of Allāh, 2 it must be contrary to the usual course of things, 3 contradiction to it must be impossible, 4 it must happen at the hands of him who pretends to be an apostle, so that it appears as a confirmation of his sincerity, 5 it must be in conformity with his announcement of it, the miracle itself must not be a disavowal of his claim (da'wā), 7 it must follow on his da'wā

Further, according to al-Īdjī, the miracle happens in this way that Allāh produces it at the hands of him whose sincerity He wishes to show, in order to realise His will, viz the salvation of men through the preaching of His apostle Finally, as to its effect, it produces, in accordance with Allāh's custom, in those who witness it, the conviction of the apostle's being sincere

Bibliography Abū Hanīfa, Fikh Akbar with the commentary of 'Alī b Sultān Muhammad al-Kārī, Cairo 1327, p 69, Abu 'l-Barakāt 'Abd Allāh b Ahmad al Nasafī, 'Umda, ed Cureton, p 15 sqq, Abū Hafs Nasafī, ed Taftāzānī, Constantinople 1313, p 165—167, Muḥammad A'lā al-Tahānawī, Kashshāf iṣṭilāhāt al-Funūn, Calcutta 1862, p 975 sqq, Abū Nu'aim Ahmad b 'Abd Allāh al-Isbahānī, Dalā'il al-Nubuwwa, Haidarābād 1320 (A J WENSINCK)

MUDJTAHID [See IDJTIHĀD]

MUDJTATHTH, the fourteenth metre in Arabic prosody, has theoretically three feet, consisting of two successive fā'ilātun in every hemistich, in practice there are two feet only

It has one 'arūd, and one darb only mustaf'ilun fā'ilātun mustaf'ilun fā'ilātūn The foot fā'ilātun of the darb and also, though seldom, that of the 'arūd, may become fa'ilātun, on condition that mustaf'ilun retains its n, it loses its n when mustaf'ilun loses its s

Mu'staf'ilun loses its s, when the preceding fā'ilātun retains its n, it also loses its n, when fā'ilātun following it, does not become fa'ilātun (MOH. BENCHENEB)

AL-MUFAḌḌAL B MUḤAMMAD B YAʿLĀ B ʿĀMIR B SĀLIM B AL-RAMMĀL AL-ḌABBĪ, an Arabic philologist of the Kūfan school By birth he was a free born Arab, the date of his birth is not known His father was a recognised authority on the events in the wars of the Arabs on the frontiers of Khurāsān in 30—90 A H (quoted in Tabarī's Annals) It is possible that his son was born in this region As a partisan of the house of ʿAlī he took part in the rising against the ʿAbbāsid caliph al-Mansūr led by Ibrāhīm b ʿAbd Allāh [q v], brother of al-Nafs al-zakīya The rising was put down and Ibrāhīm killed, al Mufaddal was taken prisoner but pardoned by the caliph and appointed tutor to his son, the future caliph al-Mahdī, and in his train he visited Khurāsān He then worked in Kūfa as a philologist and teacher, among his pupils was his stepson al-Aʿrābī The date of his death is variously given, the Fihrist does not give it at all while others give 164, 168 or 170

al-Mufaddal, like his contemporary Ḥammād [q v], bore the epithet and title of honour al-Rāwiya, and was regarded as an authority on the poetry of the Ḏjāhilīya In contrast to Ḥammād, he is celebrated for the reliability of his transmission In the Kitāb al-Aghānī there are several stories illustrating this fact While Ḥammād was reproached with having inserted verses which he had himself composed into the work of the prominent poets of the Ḏjāhilīya, al-Mufaddal is praised for handing down the old poetry pure and unfalsified There was, of course, a great rivalry between the two rāwīs which also finds expression in the stories of the Aghānī al-Mufaddal is reported to have said that the influence of Ḥammād on Arabic poetry had been most disastrous, to a degree which could never be made good again To the question how this was and whether Ḥammād had made mistakes in the attribution of the poems or linguistic errors, he replied if that were all, it could be made good, but he had done worse than this Since he was such an authority on the old poets, he was able himself to write verses in their style and he had inserted such verses of his own composition in genuine old kasīdas so that now only very good critics of the old poetry could recognise them (cf Aghānī, v 172 and Yākūt, Irshād, vii 171) It is also recorded that al Mufaḍḍal once in the presence of the caliph caught Ḥammād passing off verses of his own as the work of Zuhair b Abī Sulmā The kaṣīda which Ḥammād was reciting began with daʿ dhā, and on the caliph asking for the missing nasīb he added several nasīb verses al-Mufaddal however said quite rightly that there had probably been a nasīb before the surviving verses, but no one any longer knew it Ḥammād was thereupon forced to confess his forgery It is interesting to learn that, as is recorded in this passage of the Aghānī, Ḥammād was rewarded for his recitation but the sum given to al-Mufaddal was considerably greater al-Mufaddal was given his reward, not only for his knowledge, but also for his fidelity and honesty in transmission (cf Aghānī, loc cit and Yākūt, loc cit)

al-Mufaddal worked in different fields of Arabic philology He was considered an authority on rare Arabic expressions, celebrated as a grammarian and was also an authority on genealogy and on the Arab battles (Ayyām al-ʿArab) He wrote a number of books a Kitāb al-ʿAmthāl (on proverbs), a Kitāb al-ʿArūḍ (on metres), a Kitāb Maʿna 'l-Shiʿr (on the meanings of poems) and a dictionary Kitāb al Alfāẓ His principal work, however, is a collection of old Arabic kasīdas called the Mufaḍḍalīyāt, which he compiled for his pupil, the future caliph al-Mahdī Al-Mufaddal himself is said to have given another story of the origin of this anthology, which is one of the most valuable Arabic collections When on one occasion Ibrāhīm b ʿAbd Allāh was in hiding in his house, he brought him some books to read at his request Ibrāhīm marked a number of poems and these he collected in one volume because Ibrāhīm was a good critic of the old poetry This collection was later called the Ikhtiyār al-Mufaḍḍal (cf Flugel, Gramm Schulen, p 144, note 1)

The Mufaḍḍalīyāt contains 126 poems, some complete kaṣīdas of many verses, some fragments of small size, while in Abū Tammām's collection, the Ḥamāsa, only little fragments of poems or separate verses are contained The latter was compiled some fifty years later, at first it was much more popular than the Mufaḍḍalīyāt and more frequently annotated But al-Mufaddal's anthology is of quite outstanding merit The great bulk of it is the work of pagan poets and mukhaḍramūn, while only 6 of the 67 poets represented were born Muslims Two of the poets whose kasīdas are contained in the Mufaḍḍalīyāt, were Christians The poems, the date of composition of which can frequently be deduced from events mentioned in them, are in some cases very old The earliest are those attributed to Muraḳḳish the Elder, which probably belong to the first decade of the sixth century A D al-Mufaddal's anthology offers a rich selection of the old Arabic poetry, the value of which is increased by the great age of the poems preserved in it The name of its collector, who enjoyed a good reputation among his contemporaries for his reliability, also gives us a certain guarantee that we have in the poems of the Mufaḍḍalīyāt really genuine specimens of old Arab poetry

Bibliography Kitāb al Aghānī, v 172 sq and passim, Fihrist, ed Flugel, p 68 sq , Yākūt, Irshād al-Arīb ilā Maʿrifat al-Adīb, ed Margoliouth, London 1926, vii 171 sqq , al Mufaddal al-Dabbi, al Mufaḍḍalīyāt, ed Ch Lyall, Oxford 1918, 1921, esp Introd, vol ii , C Brockelmann, G A L , i , Weimar 1898, G Flugel, Die grammatischen Schulen der Araber, Leipzig 1862, p 142 sqq , Die Mufaḍḍalīyāt, ed H Thorbecke, Leipzig 1885

(ILSE LICHTENSTADTER)

AL-MUFĪD ABŪ ʿABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD B MUḤAMMAD B AL-NUʿMĀN AL-ḤĀRIṮHĪ, also called IBN AL-MUʿALLIM, a distinguished Twelver scholar of Baghdād under the Būyids, was born at the end of 333 or 338 (945 or 950), and came of an old Kuraish family which, as his second epithet shows, had a reputation for scholarship, he himself became, as his epithet shows, the teacher from whom all "later students have derived advantage" While he took little active part in politics, he was a very prolific author His correspondence, usually replies to queries, came from Mawṣil, Ḏjurdjān, Dīnawar, Rakka, Khwārizm, Egypt and Tabaristān His literary connections with other leaders of the Twelvers are seen in the fact that the Dogmatics mentioned third below is a critical commentary on Ibn Bābūya's Risālat al-Iʿtikādāt (published in a collected volume, Teheran

1300) and was in turn commented on by the Baghdādī nakīb al-Sharīf al-Murtadā, the work on law and tradition given second below was also the basis upon which his pupil Shaikh Tūsī [q v] wrote as a commentary his Tahdhīb al-Ahkām, one of the "4 (5) books" of the Twelvers Mufīd wrote pamphlets against Djubbā'ī, Dja'far b Harb, Ibn Kullāb, Karābīsī, the Mu'tazilīs, Zaidīs, the followers of al-Hallādj, Hanbalīs, Djāhiz and the 'Uthmānīya (for other collected titles see al-Khayāt, Kitāb al-Intisār, p 156) The number of his writings runs to nearly 200 In addition to those preserved in European libraries, there are many other manuscripts in Shī'ī libraries, e g in Nadjaf Among them are the usual handbooks on fikh, on the usūl e g on idjmā', as well as the furū' e g on the hadjdj and the law of inheritance, also treatises on fundamental philosophical conceptions such as the predicate, the state of being created etc , but it is with specifically Shī'a problems that he mainly deals Mufīd, as the titles of several of his works and his influence on later writers show, championed the enhancement of the dogma of Prophets, dealt with the question, a painful one for the Shī'is, whether Abū Tālib was a believer, with the imāmate of 'Alī and the proof that the Imāms are higher than the angels He naturally dealt also with the usual special tenets of the Twelvers, like the concealment of the Imām and the prohibition of meat butchered by the "People of the Book" He also wrote guides for pilgrims to the peculiarly Shī'ī holy places

Mufīd died on Ramadān 28, 413 (Nov 26, 1022) The nakīb al Sharīf al-Murtadā conducted the funeral service, he was buried beside Ibn Bābūye [q v] at the feet of the ninth imām Muhammad al Djawād in al Kāzimain

Bibliography His own works al-Irshād, Teheran 1308, al-Mukni'a fi 'l-Fikh (ibid), the life by al-Bahrānī is printed at the beginning, Lu'lu'at al-Bahrain, Tashīh I'tikād al-Imāmīya, ed with notes by Hibat al-Dīn in al-Murshid, I and II, Baghdād 1344 sq , Tūsī, Fihrist, N° 685, al-'Allāma al-Hillī Ibn al-Mutahhar, Khulāsat al-Akwāl fī Ma'rifat al-Ridjāl, Teheran 1312, p 255 sq , Astarābādī, Manhadj al-Makāl fī Tahkīk Ahwāl al-Ridjāl, Teheran 1304, p 317—318, Khwānsārī, Rawdāt al-Djannāt, Teheran 1304—1306, p 663—670, I'djāz Husain al Kentūrī, Kashf al Hudjub wa 'l-Astār, Calcutta 1330, N° 167, 591, 812—819, 2456—2459, 2469, 2474—2477 and pass , C Brockelmann, G A L, I 188, R Strothmann, Die Zwölfer-Schī'a, Leipzig 1926, index, cf also L Massignon, al-Hallaj, Paris 1922, index, W Heffening, Das islāmische Fremdenrecht, Hanover 1925, index (R STROTHMANN)

MUFTĪ [See FATWĀ]

MUGHAL, the name given to the dynasty of Emperors of Hindūstān founded by Bābur in 932 (1526), in virtue of the claim made by Timūr, the ancestor of the dynasty, to relationship with the family of the Mongol (Mughal) Čingiz Khān [q v] For the detailed history of the dynasty see the articles BĀBAR, HUMĀYŪN, AKBAR, DJAHĀNGĪR, SHĀH-DJAHĀN, AWRANGZĒB, and their successors

I THE MUGHAL EMPIRE TO THE DEATH OF AWRANGZĒB
- A Military Organization
- B Economics and Administration

II THE DECLINE OF THE MUGHAL EMPIRE

III MUGHAL ARCHITECTURE IN INDIA

I THE MUGHAL EMPIRE TO THE DEATH OF AWRANGZĒB

A Military Organization of the Mughal Empire

The army which Bābur led into India, and with which he defeated at Panīpat the army of Ibrāhīm Lodī, 100,000 strong, consisted of about 10,000 combatants, mainly cavalry, but comprising a corps of artillery and a small proportion of infantry, chiefly matchlockmen Bābur's son and successor, Humāyūn, though hampered by the virtual independence of his brother Kāmrān, governor of Kābul, who annexed the Pandjāb, and thus cut him off from the best recruiting grounds of the Muslim army in Northern India, Afghānistān, and Transoxiana, was nevertheless able to lead into the field at the battle of the Ganges, near Kanawdj, where he was defeated by Shīr Shāh, an army of 100,000 men On his return to India in 1555 he left Kābul with an army of no more than 15,000 men, and it was his son and successor, Akbar, who was the creator of the army of the empire of which he was, in fact, the founder

The empire was a military despotism The governor of a province was entitled sipāhsālār, or "commander-in chief", the governor of a pargana, or sub-district, fawdjdār, or "commandant", and practically all courtiers and officials, even those holding civil and judicial posts, were graded as commanders of horse Thus we find Shaikh Abu 'l-Fadl, Akbar's secretary, graded as a commander of 2,500, Rādjā Bīr Bar, court wit and Hindī poet laureate, as a commander of 1,000, Sayyid Muhammad, Mīr-i 'Adl, a judge, as a commander of 900, and Shaikh Faidī, the poet, as a commander of 400 horse A command of horse was known as mansab ("rank" or "dignity"), and its holder as mansabdār ("officer") Each of these nominally commanding from 500 to 2,500 horse was classed as an amīr ("noble"), and each of those nominally commanding more as amīr-i kabīr ("great noble") These commands were nominal, conferred merely for the purpose of regulating the rank of the official holding them, and were styled mansab i dhāt ("personal rank") Each of those actually exercising military authority had, in addition to his personal rank, sawār (horseman) rank Thus, a commander of 5,000 might be described as "commander of 5,000, with 4,000 horsemen", that is to say, one ranking as a commander of 5,000, but supposed to maintain only 4,000 horsemen In Akbar's reign, apart from the rank held by the royal princes, commands ranged from 10 up to 5,000 horsemen, but at the end of the reign two or three nobles were promoted to commands of 6,000 and 7,000 In these two high commands there was no distinction of grade, but each of the other commands was divided into three classes, viz 1 those whose sawār rank was equal to their personal rank, 2 those whose sawār rank was half, or more, of their personal rank, and 3 those whose sawār rank was less than half of their personal rank Thus, a commander of 5,000 with 5,000 horsemen would be in the first class of his rank, a commander of 5,000 with 3,000 horsemen in the second, and a commander of 5,000 with 2,000 horsemen in the third A purely civil official often had no sawār rank, but the distinction between military and civil officials was less clearly marked than it is to day, and all officials were, in theory, soldiers The secretary, Abu 'l-Fadl, served, at least on one occasion, in the field, and Akbar once entrusted military commands in the field to his court wit and to a leading physician, with disastrous results

The lists of "commanders of horse" given in such works as the Ā'īn-i Akbarī, the Tabakāt-i Akbarī, and the Pādshāhnāma are not "army lists", but graded lists of the whole establishment of public servants, civil as well as military Even where, as in the Pādshāhnāma, sawār rank is given as well as personal rank, the lists are no guide to the effective strength of the imperial army, for commanders with sawār rank did not maintain, and were not even expected to maintain, the number of horse indicated by that rank Thus, Shāh-Djahān issued an edict to the effect that commanders were not required to maintain more than one-third, and, in some cases, not more than one-quarter of the number of horse indicated by their sawār rank, and in the Balkh campaign they were not required to muster more than one-fifth of their nominal quota

The yearly salaries of "commanders of horse" ranged from Rs 350,000 a year for a commander of 7,000 down to Rs 4,000 a year for a commander of 100, but in the commands in which there were three classes the salary varied with the class Thus, in the 5,000 command an officer of the first class received Rs 250,000, an officer of the second Rs 242,500, and an officer of the third Rs 235,000 These salaries were attached to the personal rank, and were intended to enable the official to maintain his position at court or in the provinces, his household, his transport, and such horsemen as he might require for his personal service For the payment of troops actually maintained separate allowances were made

The horsemen were styled tābīnān ("followers" or "troops"), and the majority of them provided and maintained their own horses and arms, and, in the field, their own transport They were divided into three classes three-horsed and two-horsed men, each of whom received nearly Rs 25 a month, and one horsed men, each of whom received rather more than Rs $16^1/_2$ a month At a later date higher rates of pay than these were allowed in the Dakhan Horsemen who could not supply their own horses were styled bārgīr, and were the servants or followers of these who supplied them The proportion of these classes in every ten troopers was usually three three-horsed, four two-horsed, and three one-horsed troopers, or ten men and twenty horses

The payment of the contingents maintained by the manṣabdārs was at first provided for by the grant of ḏjāgīrs, or fiefs, so that the army was maintained on a feudal system, which, however, differed from the feudal system of Europe in that the fiefs were not hereditary, and the ḏjāgīrdārs, or fief-holders, had no proprietary rights in them A fief-holder might be transferred from one fief to another, or a portion of his fief, or even the whole of it, might be resumed In 1574 an edict was promulgated by Akbar resuming all fiefs and converting them into crown lands, the payment of the troops being provided for by orders on the treasury for payments in cash This edict caused much discontent, for the ḏjāgīr system was, for many reasons, far more popular than the nakd, or cash-payment, system Under the nakd system a muster-parade might at any time be made a condition precedent to the issue of a payment order, and a ḏjāgīrdār might reap much profit by economizing in the administration of his fief, by rack-renting the landholders, and by encroachments, but the nakd system furnished him with no such means of enriching himself The edict was immediately modified, and though the nakd system was introduced in the settled provinces of the empire, the ḏjāgīr system was retained in the more recently conquered provinces of Bengal, Gudjarāt, and Sind, and, after Akbar's death, was restored, in many cases, in other provinces

Another reform introduced at the same time, the dāgh u-mahallī, or branding regulation, was resented even more than the substitution of the nakd for the ḏjāgīr system It was seldom that manṣabdārs maintained their full quota of troopers, "false musters were an evil from which the Mughal army suffered, even in its most palmy days Nobles would lend each other the men to make up their quota, or needy idlers from the bazars would be mounted on the first baggage pony that came to hand, and counted in with the others as efficient soldiers" It was to check such fraudulent practices that Akbar introduced the dāgh u mahallī regulation, which required the preparation of descriptive rolls of men and horses, the latter being branded on being passed as fit for service, and at muster-parades only these who produced branded horses were paid This system originated, apparently, with the Saldjūḳs in Transoxiana and Persia, and was introduced into India by 'Alā' al-Dīn Khaldjī in 1312, but was not enforced after his death until it was revived by Shīr Shāh in 1541 After his death it was again abandoned, and Akbar had great difficulty in reviving it, owing to the determined opposition to any measure designed to prevent public officials from enriching themselves by defrauding the state Even he was obliged to exempt commanders of 5,000, or a greater number, of horse from its operation, though these were required to parade their contingents for inspection when ordered In the later days of the empire, the regulation was not enforced, and when Burhān al-Mulk joined Muhammad Shāh at Karnāl, to meet Nādir Shāh, a historian considers it worth while to describe his contingent as mawdjūdī na kāghazī, that is, "actually present, not merely on paper", and later, in 1750, an officer in Bengal receiving pay for 1,700 men was said not to have been able to muster more than seventy or eighty

Besides the contingents of the princes and the mansabdārs there were the sovereign's personal troops His body-guard was a corps known as the Wālāshāhī, composed chiefly of men who had been attached to him from his youth, and had served under him as a prince Manucci refers to these as the emperor's slaves, and says that they numbered 4,000 under Awrangzīb Details of their pay are not given, but they probably received more than the troopers serving in the contingents of the manṣabdārs There was also a corps d'elite first formed by Akbar, and styled the Ahadī corps Abu 'l-Fadl, in a characteristically foolish passage says that they were so called because they were fit for a "harmonious unity", whatever that may mean, but they seem to have been called ahadī because they enlisted singly in the personal service of the emperor, and were not brought into the service in bodies by a manṣabdār They stood, in rank, between the lower manṣabdārs and the tābīnān, and received nearly double the pay of the latter They may be compared to "gentlemen of the life-guard", and many were seconded from the corps in order that they might hold civil appointments The proportion of three-horsed, two-horsed, and one-horsed troopers was the same in the Ahadī corps as in the contingents of the mansabdārs

A commander of horse, whether he held a jāgīr or whether he drew the pay of his contingent from the treasury, made his own arrangements for its disbursement He was entitled to retain five percent of the pay of his men for himself, and pay was not always allowed for a whole year, often only for six, five, or four months Manucci, writing of the army in the reign of Awrangzīb, says, "in respect of one year's service they receive six or eight months' pay Even that is not all in coin, they are always foisted off as respects two months' pay with clothes and old raiment from the household Over and above this, there is almost always due to them the pay for two or three years' service The soldiers are obliged to borrow money at interest from the ṣarrāfs, or money-changers These men lend to them, it is true, but it is hardly ever without a command from the general or officer, and these latter have an understanding with them about the profit from interest, which they share between them Some times the soldiers sell their papers to these money changers, who for a note of hand for one hundred rupees will give them twenty or twenty-five It is by these and such-like extortions that these generals ruin the wretched soldier, who, unable to find other means of gaining his bread, is forced to remain on in his service Speaking generally, it is impossible for them to escape such extortions, for these disorders reign throughout all the princes' establishments If any one resigns service at his own request, they deduct two months' pay Nevertheless service in the cavalry was socially an honourable profession, a common trooper was looked upon as being, to some extent, a gentleman, and such were, even when illiterate, often used to the highest positions"

The infantry was, in every respect, an inferior arm With it were classed doorkeepers, watchmen, runners and spies, gladiators, wrestlers and palanquin-bearers, but the combatant branch consisted of musketeers or matchlockmen (barkandāz), archers, and spearmen Akbar maintained a corps of 12,000 matchlockmen, the officer in command of which was styled dārūgha A secretary and a treasurer kept the accounts and disbursed the pay of these troops The non-commissioned officers of the corps were graded in four classes, the first of which received $7\frac{1}{2}$, the second 7, the third $6\frac{3}{4}$, and the fourth $6\frac{1}{2}$ rupees a month The privates were divided into five classes, the pay of which ranged from $4\frac{3}{4}$ down to $2\frac{3}{4}$ rupees a month

Besides this corps was a number of troops styled dākhilī, of which one-fourth were matchlockmen and three-fourth archers. These were the troops allowed to the fawjdārs in the parganas or sub-districts, to assist them in maintaining order and collecting the revenue The non commissioned officers of the matchlockmen received Rs 4 a month, and the privates Rs $3\frac{1}{2}$ each The archers were considered more efficient than the match-lockmen, for the matchlock was not an arm of rapid fire or precision, and an archer could shoot many arrows while a matchlockman was loading his matchlock Neither matchlockmen nor archers could, as a rule, face cavalry in the field, and it was not until the emperors and their vassals were brought face to face with troops armed and drilled after the European fashion that they discovered that infantry was the queen of battles, but belief in the superior efficiency of cavalry died hard

The artillery was divided into two classes, the heavy and the light Bābur had an efficient corps of artillery, and used it with great effect, but the Muslims of India were not skilled artillerists, and the heavy artillery was usually officered and partly manned by ʿUthmānlī Turks, Portuguese renegades of pure or mixed blood, and occasionally by other Europeans The light artillery consisted of field-pieces carried on bullock-carts, wall-pieces on animals' backs, and zambūraks, or still lighter service-guns, carried on and fired from the backs of camels The heavy artillery was drawn by strings of oxen, or, occasionally, by elephants, and, as the army gradually declined in efficiency the heavy guns increased in length and calibre until they became so heavy as hardly to be mobile, so that often they could not be dragged to their destination but were left stranded by their road A defeated army could seldom save its heavy and field artillery All that it could do was to spike the guns and leave them The ammunition was solid shot, sometimes of stone, sometimes of iron, and field guns and heavy guns in the field were sometimes loaded to the muzzle with the rough copper coin of the time, which took the place of case shot, and did great execution at close quarters The artillery also comprised a corps of rocketeers The whole of the artillery was commanded by an officer entitled Mīr-i Ātush, or "lord of fire" The officers were entitled sadīwāl ("commander of 100") corresponding to a battery commander, and mīrdaha (commander of 10), who had charge of a subdivision, or one gun The wall-pieces and zambūraks, which were numerous, account for the enormous numbers of "guns" mentioned in accounts of armies in the field

Akbar used elephants freely in battle, and brought them into the field in great numbers They usually carried archers or musketeers on their backs Their use as a fighting force was, however, soon abandoned, and would have been abandoned sooner than it was, had it not been for their imposing appearance, for it had long been established that they were more dangerous to their own side than to the enemy "To the last some elephants protected by armour were brought into the battle-field, but their use was confined almost entirely to carrying the generals or great nobles, and displaying their standards The baggage elephants were assembled in rear with those bearing the harem, the women remaining mounted on the latter during the battle, and protected by a strong force posted round them"

Under Akbar the elephants ridden by the emperor were called khāṣṣa ("special"), and all others were arranged in groups of ten, twenty, or thirty, called halka ("ring", or "circle") In later reigns the same classification was employed, but with a more extended meaning, khāṣṣa then including all riding, and halka all baggage elephants Manṣabdārs from 7,000 down to 500 were required to maintain each one riding elephant, and, in addition, five baggage elephants for each Rs 2,500 of pay It appears that these elephants belonged to the emperor, and were not even made over to the manṣabdārs for use, except in the field In the Ā'īn-i Akbarī Abu 'l Fadl says that 'Akbar "put several halkas under the charge of every grandee, and required him to look after them"

The commander-in-chief of the army was the emperor himself, but at the head of the military administration was an officer entitled Bakhshī al-Mamālik, whose position may be described as that of adjutant general and muster master-general He was assisted by three bakhshīs and a number of bitikcīs, or clerks, and the duties of this department included enlistment, mustering, and passing the pay of both mansabdārs and tābinān, for which purpose they were obliged to see that the branding regulations, so long as they were enforced, were observed by those to whom they applied Manucci says, "twice a year the bakhshī holds a review of all the cavalry present at court, examines all the horses, and sees whether any of them are old and unfit for service In the latter case he makes the owners get rid of them and buy others" These officers remained at headquarters, and from some authorities it appears that one of them had charge of the Wālāshāhīs, or body guard, but the Ahadī corps, which was commanded by one of the great nobles, had its own dīwān, or paymaster and quartermaster, and its own bakhshī, both officers being assisted by bitikcīs Certificates granted by the bakhshī were recorded by the wāki'a nigār, or writer of the official diary, and were by him submitted to the wazīr, or minister, who, after passing them, sent them to the office of revision and record, but pay was issued on the minister's order "In addition to the bakhshīs at headquarters there were officers with similar functions attached to the governor of every province", their office being generally combined with that of wāki'a-nigār, or provincial diary-writer, and in imitation of the imperial establishments each great noble had his own bakhshī, who performed for him the same duties as those performed for the emperor by the imperial bakhshīs

It is impossible to estimate accurately the strength of the army in Akbar's reign, for the sawār rank of the manṣabdārs is not given, either in the Ā'īn-i Akbarī or in the Tabakāt-i Akbarī He maintained 12,000 matchlockmen, and Blochmann estimates the whole strength of his army at 25,000, of which 12,000 were cavalry and the rest matchlockmen and artillery, but this seems to be much too low an estimate Humāyūn could put 100,000 cavalry into the field, and it is not likely that Akbar, with far wider dominions, would have been content, or could have ruled and extended his empire with a smaller army It seems probable that Blochmann's estimate included only the emperor's personal, or household, troops In the latter half of Shāh Djahān's reign the contingents of the princes and nobles would have numbered 425,500 if each manṣabdār had maintained the full quota of his sawār rank, but this they were not even expected to do Fortunately a fairly exact return of the strength of the army is given in the Pādshāhnāma There were 8,000 manṣabdārs of all ranks, 7,000 mounted Ahadīs and barkandāz, 200,000 cavalry, exclusive of the troops allowed to fawdjdārs for the maintenance of order and the collection of the revenue, and 40,000 foot matchlockmen, artillery, and rocketeers, of whom 10,000 were at headquarters and 10,000 in the provinces and the forts It is not quite clear what is meant by the mounted barkandāz classed with the Ahadīs, for barkandāz is the word used for a matchlockman, and horsemen certainly did not carry the cumbrous matchlock, and carbines and pistols had not been introduced, but it may be that a few men carrying a lighter musket than the ordinary matchlock were attached to the Ahadī corps Of the army in the reign of Awrangzīb Manucci writes, "ordinarily the king keeps fifty thousand horse in garrison besides those in movement every day, an almost equal number He has twenty thousand infantry, all Rādjpūts, out of them twelve thousand are in charge of the artillery, the rest are for guarding the royal palace, mounting sentry, et caetera"

The army of the Mughal emperors was not drilled Muster parades consisted merely in the troopers passing in single file before the bakhshī, and the nearest approach to any manœuvres was the participation of the army, or part of it, in a royal hunt, when the troops, aided by the people of the country side, acted as beaters, surrounded a large tract of country, and, day by day, closed inwards until in a small area was enclosed an enormous quantity of game, which was then slaughtered wholesale by the emperor and those who were permitted a share in the "sport" Apart from this species of hunting styled shikār-i kamargha, the army was never exercised in any combined movements, or drill, but the individual trooper paid great attention to the training of his body, exercising himself with all his weapons, sabre, spear, mace, battle axe, buckler, dagger, and bow and arrows The bow was considered a most effective weapon, as a horseman could shoot six times before a musketeer could fire twice The trooper also went through various exercises for strengthening his limbs and his body, both with and without apparatus, the latter consisting of dumb-bells, mugdar, or Indian clubs, and the līzam, a strong bow with a steel chain instead of a string, most effective in training these muscles employed by an archer The horses were also trained in a sort of manège

Bibliography Abu 'l-Fadl, Ā'īn i Akbarī, Bibliotheca Indica Series of the Asiatic Society of Bengal, and translation in the same series by Blochmann and Jarrett, Calcutta 1873 and 1891, 'Abd al-Hamīd Lāhawrī, Pādshāhnāma, same series, Calcutta 1867, 1868, Nizām al-Dīn Ahmad, Tabakāt i Akbarī, Lucknow 1875, Nicolao Manucci, Storia do Mogor, translated by William Irvine, Indian Texts Series, London 1907, 1908

(T W HAIG)

B Economics and Administration

The Mughal Empire lived mainly by agriculture The only metals available in quantity were iron and copper, both were relatively expensive, and local supplies of the latter were failing in the XVIIth century The existence of coal was unknown, and of other minerals only lime, salt, saltpetre, and, locally, building stone were largely produced The agricultural land was divided into areas known as villages (deh), usually, but not always, inhabited. The villages were grouped traditionally in larger areas (pargana), which were usually treated as administrative units (mahall) Most villages, but not all, were occupied by a community of peasants, held together by the tie of common ancestry, each member of these bodies had separate possession of the land which he cultivated, but the community acted as a whole, through the headmen (mukaddam), in the management of the village, letting surplus land to tenants, paying the revenue and other expenses, and transacting such other business as emerged

The population was predominantly vegetarian Meat for the officials and the army was provided where required, but its supply lay outside the ordinary course of agriculture The products of the land were mainly food, cereals, millets and pulses, with, on a smaller scale, sugar, vegetables, and condiments Oilseeds were grown for local needs, opium was produced largely, and tobacco, a recent introduction, had spread rapidly through the empire, cotton and some other fibres, together with indigo and other dyes, were the chief industrial crops Holdings were usually small, and were worked largely by the peasant himself with the aid of his family and the landless labourers of the village Oxen were used for tillage, implements were few and primitive, and there was in general a scarcity of agricultural capital, necessitating prompt sales of produce at each harvest, to the peasant's loss and the middleman's gain

Handicrafts were numerous and varied, but weaving was by far the most important Cotton cloth was woven all over the empire, most of it for local consumption, but near the coasts production was directed largely to supplying oversea markets, while finer goods — muslins and prints — were carried long distances by land Most of the consuming markets were conservative, adhering closely to established styles and patterns There was thus little scope for invention, copying was safer than designing, and such developments as are recorded were the result of either patronage by wealthy amateurs, or the extension of the European demand Silk weaving was locally important in Bengal and Gudjarāt, in the latter case from imported material, jute and hemp also were only of local importance, but in the xviiith century an export trade in sacks and sacking was beginning to develop

In peaceful regions commerce was active, and, for the period, highly organised Funds were ordinarily transmitted by bills of exchange, which could be negotiated in all the principal towns, and in some centres outside the empire Merchants were, however, disinclined to carry large stocks of commodities, and preferred to utilise their funds in money-lending, the rate of interest in commercial transactions was commonly about 10 or 12 per cent, but the charge was much higher when the element of risk was great

External land-trade was almost limited to the two caravan routes westward by way of Kābul and Kandahār, though there was some small traffic with Tibet By sea, Gudjarāt had old-established connections with the Red Sea and the Persian Gulf, with East Africa, and with Sumatra, Malacca and further East, on a much smaller scale Sind had relations with Persia, while Bengal dealt chiefly with the south of India and with Burma and Siam

During the xvith century all the sea routes were dominated by the Portuguese, who were concerned rather to exploit than develop, the chief extension of trade due to their efforts was the supply of cloth to Brazil and West Africa, but most of this was drawn from the Coromandel Coast, which was outside the empire until almost the end of the xviith century After "factories" (i e agencies) had been established at Sūrat by the English (1611) and the Dutch (1617), an important trade with western Europe grew up in indigo and calico In the middle of the century the indigo trade yielded to competition from the West Indies, while the depopulation of Gudjarāt by the famine of 1630 transferred the bulk of the calico trade to the East Coast, Sūrat remained, however, an important centre until its supersession by Bombay In the second quarter of the xviith century the Dutch, followed by the English, established factories on the Hūglī in Bengal, and trade developed in silk, saltpetre, fine calico, and muslin Towards the close of the century a change of fashions in Europe produced a great demand for muslin and prints, which was met partly by Bengal, and partly by Madras, by this time technically within the limits of the empire

The outstanding feature of all trade with India was the need for importing gold and silver India bought little beyond the industrial metals and luxury goods, but was eager to sell produce for cash, and, since Western Europe could not supply what was most in demand, the operations of the trading Companies were necessarily so organised as to direct streams of gold and silver to India from those countries which would part with them, notably, at this period, gold from China, and silver, and later gold, from Japan The seaports serving the empire were thus brought into a complex but efficient organisation, which took whatever they had to sell, supplied whatever they wanted to buy, and, so far as was possible, satisfied the demand for gold and silver

Inland transport was necessarily less efficient The Indus, the Ganges, the Djumna, and the waterways of Bengal were largely used, but the bulk of the empire depended on what were then called roads, unmetalled tracks, sometimes defined by lines of trees, with halting-places which were generally walled or otherwise defended against robbers, and usually furnished with supplies Transport was effected by carts and pack-animals, generally oxen but in some places camels Passengers travelled on horseback, in palanquins, or in carts drawn by fast oxen There were excellent arrangements for the rapid transit of letters, but these were for official use, and were not ordinarily available for private persons, who hired messengers when required, or in a few cases, clubbed together to send messengers periodically

Standards of life presented sharp contrasts The mass of the population, peasants, artisans and labourers, lived in such extreme poverty as to excite the commiseration of European visitors An almost equally low standard prevailed among the numerically important class of servants in the towns, whether freemen or slaves, who, however, enjoyed a more secure life than the rural population The middle classes, comparatively smaller in numbers than now, were thrifty and frugal, and, even when wealthy, were careful to avoid any display which might lead to exactions by officials The superior grades of officers employed by the State were exceedingly well paid when allowance is made for the high purchasing power of money, and spent their incomes freely in extravagance and display, increased by the fact that on their death their property reverted to the treasury

The prosperity of the empire depended mainly on three factors the character of the rainfall, the degree of internal tranquillity, and the working of the revenue administration The seasonal rainfall was, as it still is, uncertain, and any serious defect resulted in insufficiency of food The difficulty of transport made it impossible to afford adequate relief on the spot, the people abandoned their homes to wander in search of food, and in contemporary narratives we read again and again of the then familiar features of deaths from starvation, cannibalism, and the sale of children into slavery Recovery from such a calamity was a slow process, and the famine which desolated Gudjarāt and the Dakhan in 1630—1631 left its mark for at least a generation Exceptionally favourable seasons might also prove calamitous, though not to the same extent There was no local market for the surplus produce, prices fell to a ruinous level, and in official regulations low prices were treated as a calamity requiring relief on the same footing as drought or hail

The dominance of the weather was inevitable, the other influences on prosperity were matters of administration Here a clear distinction must be drawn between the general and the revenue administration, a distinction denoted by the current phrase mulkī wa-mālī The emperor was of course supreme in both branches, and was assisted at his headquarters by four principal officers, the Wakīl or Prime Minister, the Wazīr or Revenue Minister, the Bakhshī (see col 629[a]), and the Sadr, who was in charge of Islāmic law and also administered the department dealing with charitable grants and endowments The post of Wakīl was not always filled, and when it was in abeyance the duties attaching to it devolved on the Wazīr In practice the powers of these Ministers depended on the personality of the Emperor, under Akbar or Shāh-Djahān they were definitely subordinates, while Djahāngīr's Prime Minister was at times practically the ruler of the country

The system of general administration to which the Mughals succeeded in Northern India was not highly developed The great bulk of the country was held by officers in assignment (a term explained below), the assignee was responsible for keeping the peace, and in practice had a free hand in the methods employed Under Akbar a more effective system was established, which was maintained throughout the period The empire was divided into provinces (ṣūbah), each of which was in charge of a Viceroy (Sipahsālār, Ṣūbahdār), who at first was responsible to the Emperor for all branches of administration, but after 1595 was relieved of revenue work Apart from the Viceroy, officers who may be described as Governors were stationed at selected places, with the duty of keeping the peace and putting down rebellion, a term which covered failure to pay the revenue due The ordinary designation of these Governors was Fawdjdār, but in outlying regions which were controlled by fortresses the Governor was the fortress-commander (Kil'adār), while in a few large assignments the assignee exercised the powers of a Governor Cities were governed by officers designated Kotwāl, who combined the functions of magistrate, police-commandant, municipality, and censor of morals There was no regular police force at the disposal of these officers, who were expected to employ the troops they maintained as a condition of their rank, obtaining help when their own forces were insufficient The efficiency of this organisation varied with that of the central administration, which depended mainly on the personality of the Emperor, by the close of the xviiith century it was definitely breaking down, and conditions of anarchy were spreading over the empire

It is difficult to state in precise terms the relation of this organisation to the extensive portions of the empire where internal jurisdiction remained in the hands of Hindu Chiefs, but apparently the Chief was regarded officially as assignee of his territories, and was expected to maintain order within them If he failed to do so, the Viceroy or Governor concerned might intervene, but his action would ordinarily be directed against the Chief rather than against the people

The revenue administration was controlled by the Wazīr, sitting in the Revenue Ministry, which was known as Diwānī, as opposed to Hudūr, or the Court, whence orders were issued by, or in the name of, the Emperor Revenue at this period meant practically Land Revenue, the Imperial Treasury had receipts from other sources — Customs, Salt, Mint, Presents, Inheritance, and, under Awrangzēb, the Capitation Tax (djizya) —, but, taken collectively, they were of little importance compared with the income obtained from the peasants Under the system traditional in India, and embodied in Hindu law, every person cultivating land was required to pay a share of the produce to the King, who determined, within somewhat elastic limits, the amount of the share, and who also prescribed the methods of assessment and collection The first Muslim conquerors accepted this "King's share" as the kharādj to which they were entitled under Islāmic law, the question of property in land was not raised, but occupants were ordinarily allowed to retain possession subject to due payment of the revenue

In the Mughal period agricultural land fell into three classes Chiefs', Reserved and Assigned The areas governed by the more important Chiefs were not assessed to revenue (kharādj) by the Wazīr, that was the privilege of the Chief, and any payments which he made to the treasury were in the nature of a tribute, determined by negotiation The treatment of the numerous smaller Chiefs is not on record, but the few facts which have survived are consistent with the view that assessment was made through them, and that they were allowed to retain a portion of the revenue in return for their services In the regions which were directly administered, certain areas of land, described as khālisa, were reserved to furnish the treasury with cash, and were managed by the staff employed by the Revenue Ministry, at first the local staff was under the provincial Viceroy, but in 1596 a Dīwān was posted to each province, to manage all revenue business directly under the Minister, and in this way emerged the dichotomy into dīwānī (revenue business) and fawdjdārī (general business) which henceforward characterised the local administration

The land not reserved for the treasury was available for assignment Every officer appointed to the Emperor's service was entitled to an income defined in cash, which represented both his personal salary and the cost of the troops he was required to maintain For a short period in Akbar's reign, this income was paid, as well as defined, in cash, but the ordinary practice in the empire was to assign to each officer an area (djāgīr, tuyūl, or ikṭā') estimated to yield as revenue the amount of his stated income, and the officer thereupon took charge of the area assigned to him, and assessed and collected the revenue in accordance, at least theoretically, with the general orders in force If the yield proved insufficient, he could claim the balance from the treasury, while he could be required to account for any excess receipts, but in practice these matters seem usually to have been adjusted by bribery, for which there was also extensive scope in securing profitable assignments, and in getting rid of those which had been squeezed dry Changes of assignment were ordinarily so frequent that an officer would have been unwise to spend money on fostering agricultural development, or do anything beyond extracting the largest income which his assignment could be made to yield The great bulk of the land was ordinarily assigned, the reserved area being one-sixth or one-seventh of the whole

The share of the peasants' produce claimed by Akbar was one-third, later, at some uncertain time in the first half of the xviith century, this figure became the minimum, with a maximum of one-half, which inevitably tended to become the standard Three principal methods of assessment were in vogue Sharing (ghalla bakhshī), Measurement (paimāyish), and Group-Assessment (nasak) In Sharing, the produce of each peasant was ordinarily estimated (or occasionally ascertained at harvest), and the prescribed share valued to determine the cash revenue due for that season In Measurement, a fixed charge, varying with the crop, was made on each unit of area sown, it might be fixed in either cash or produce and in the latter case it was valued at current prices Under both these systems payment in cash was the general rule, but payments in kind were permitted in some backward regions where currency was scarce In Group-Assessment, the official concerned came to terms with the headmen of the village to pay a sum fixed in cash for the year, thus avoiding the necessity of detailed assessments on individuals, this system tended to pass into Farming, when terms were made, not with the headmen, but with an outsider

Each ruler determined at his pleasure which of these methods should be employed, and in what regions Group-Assessment was the prevailing system at the time of Bābūr's conquest, and apparently was accepted by him After the expulsion of Humāyūn from India, Shēr Shāh introduced Measurement throughout his kingdom, and his methods were at first adopted by Akbar, the revenue claimed from each unit of area was at this time a stated quantity of produce, calculated to be one-third of the average yield, and, except in the tracts where payment in kind was practised, this amount of produce was commuted to cash at prices fixed officially for each season Practical difficulties arose, however, in regard to commutation, and in 1579—1580 the revenue was put definitely on a cash basis, the charge on each unit of area sown being a fixed number of dām (reckoned at 40 to the rupee) instead of a fixed weight of produce Schedules of cash-rates adapted to the varying productivity of different regions were now drawn up, which remained in operation during the rest of Akbar's reign At some uncertain period, probably under Djahāngīr, these schedules were discarded, and a return was made to Group-Assessment, which was the standard system in the middle of the xviith century, and survived into the British period, Sharing was now practised only in backward tracts, or in some cases where the headmen refused to pay what the assessor thought a reasonable revenue, in which case he proceeded to detailed assessment on individuals, by Sharing or by Measurement according to circumstances

Such was the history of assessment in the heart of the empire, but the outlying provinces were not brought into rigid uniformity, local conditions determining the system applied in each, while in the Dakhan provinces a distinct and elaborate system was introduced in the middle of the xviith century in order to promote recovery from the effects of war and famine

It would be futile to criticise these varying institutions, for the value of all alike depended on the spirit in which they were worked In administrative circles there was throughout the Muslim period a definite ideal of agricultural prosperity as the foundation of the State, its elements being extension of cultivation, improvement in the class of crops, and development of irrigation Against this ideal operated the urgent need for the largest immediate revenue that could be wrung from the peasants The course of the struggle cannot be traced in detail but the central fact is that by the middle of the xviith century agriculture had ceased to be an attractive career, and the peasants were deserting the land for other occupations, the resulting decline in agricultural production was the chief economic factor in the eventual collapse of the empire

The remaining branches of the administration require little description Customs duties were formally low, but their incidence was increased by arbitrary over-valuation and unauthorised payments required to secure prompt clearance of goods In the towns, civil justice was administered mainly by the kādī, in the country, disputes were apparently decided summarily by the executive officials Punishments for crime were summary and drastic, and were not always in accordance with Islāmic law By Indian tradition, local officials raised a large revenue for local purposes by a multitude of taxes and exactions of a most oppressive nature, these were prohibited en masse by Akbar, and again by Awrangzēb, but the system survived Its worst feature was the levy of transit dues on internal trade, which were a cause of constant complaint by Indians as well as foreigners

Special attention was given to the coinage, as being a recognised appanage of sovereignty Gold, silver and copper were coined, all the coins circulating at their metallic value, so that the exchange rate between different denominations fluctuated, but gold was not in general circulation The chief coin of the empire was the silver rupee, containing nearly 180 grains of almost pure silver, the principal copper coin was the dām, of nearly 324 grains, and there were various smaller coins of both metals

The unit of weight used in wholesale commerce

was the maund of man, which varied in different parts of the country In the south of India it ranged round about 25 lb, in Gudjarāt it was 33 lb, but in 1635 this was raised to 37 lb, in North India, it was 52 lb at Akbar's accession, was raised by him to 55 lb, by Djahāngīr to 66 lb, and by Shāh-Djahān to 74 lb In Bengal, it was 64 lb in the West, and 46 lb in the East All these figures are given to the nearest lb The unit for retail trade varied from place to place, but was ordinarily smaller than those which have been named Measures of capacity were not used in wholesale commerce The measure of length in the North was the gaz or yard, which was standardised by Akbar at about 33 inches, and by his successor at about 40 inches, but the smaller unit survived, in the South the hāsta, or cubit, of about 18 inches was used, in Gudjarāt the unit was about 26 inches, and in Bengal about 27 inches

Bibliography Sources a Indian ʿAbbās Khān Sarwānī, Taʾrīkh i Shērshāhī (MSS Br Mus Or 164, 1782), ʿAbd al-Hamīd Lahawrī, Bādshāhnāma, Calcutta 1866—1872, Abu 'l-Fadl ʿAllāmī, Āʾīn i Akbarī, Calcutta 1867—1894, do, Akbarnāma, Calcutta 1873—1921, Awrangzēb's Revenue Farmāns, text and transl by J Sarkar (J A S B, June 1906), Bābur, Bāburnāma, transl A S Beveridge, London 1921, Badāʾōnī, Muntakhab al-Tawārīkh, Calcutta 1864—1925, Bāyazīd (Sultān), Taʾrīkh-i Humāyūn (MS India Off, Cat, N° 223), Djahāngīr, Tūzuk-i Djahāngīrī, ed Aligarh 1864, transl Rogers, ed Beveridge, London 1909—1914, Firishta, Taʾrīkh, Bombay 1834, transl Briggs, London 1829, Gulbadan Begam, History of Humāyūn, ed and transl A S Beveridge, London 1902, Khāfī Khān, Muntakhab al-Lubāb, Calcutta 1868–1925, Muhammad Sākī Mustaʿidd Khān, Maʾāthir-i ʿĀlamgīrī, Calcutta 1870—1873, Muh Sālih Kanbū, ʿAmal i Sālih, Calcutta 1912—28, Muʿtamad Khān, Ikbālnāma-i Djahāngīrī, Lucknow 1870, portion also in Bibl Ind, Calcutta 1865, Nizām al-Dīn Ahmad, Tabakāt i Akbarī (MSS Br Mus Or 2274 and Add 6543), Shāhnawāz Khān, Maʾāthir al-Umarāʾ, Calcutta 1887–1895

b Foreign F Bernier, Travels, transl V A Smith, London 1914, contains a bibliography, T Bowrey, The Countries round the Bay of Bengal, London 1903, Dagh-Register gehouden int Casteel Batavia, The Hague and Batavia 1896—1928 (in progress), D de Couto, Da Asia, Lisbon 1777—1788, J de Laet, De Imperio Magni Mogolis, Leyden 1631, P della Valle, Travels to India, London 1891, P du Jarric, Thesaurus Rerum Indicarum, Cologne 1615—1616, Dutch Commercial Records (unpublished collections in Algemeen Rijksarchief at The Hague), Sir W Foster, The English Factories in India, Oxford 1906—1927, do, Early Travels in India 1583—1619, London 1921, J Fryer, A New Account of East India and Persia, London 1909—1915, W Geleynssen de Jongh, De Remonstrantie, The Hague 1929, J Hay, De Rebus Iaponicis, Indicis, et Persanis, Antwerp 1605, India Office Records, from 1670 (calendared up to 1669 in The English Factories in India, see above) J Jourdain, Journal of a voyage to the East Indies, London 1904, Letters received by the East India Company, ed Danvers and Foster, London 1896–1902, S Manrique, Travels, transl Luard, London 1927, N Manucci, Storia do Mogor, transl Irvine, London 1907, J Marshall in India, ed S A Khān, London 1927, A Monserrate, Mongolicae Legationis Commentarius (Mem As Soc of Bengal, III 9), P Mundy, Travels, London 1905—1919, J Ovington, A voyage to Suratt in the Year 1689, London 1696, F Pelsaert, Remonstrantie, transl (as Jahangīr's India) Moreland and Geyl, Cambridge 1925, Purchas His Pilgrimes, London 1625, Sir T Roe, Embassy to India, ed Foster, London 1926, Streynsham Master, Diaries, ed Temple, London 1911, J B Tavernier, Travels in India, transl Ball, ed Crooke, London 1925 (contains bibliography), J van Twist, Generale Beschryvinge van Indien, Amsterdam 1648

Selected Modern Works Bal Krishna, Commercial Relations between India and England, London 1924, Beni Prasad, History of Jahangīr, London 1922 (contains bibliography), J J A Campos, The History of the Portuguese in Bengal, Calcutta 1919, H M Elliot and J Dowson, The History of India as told by its own Historians, London 1867—1877, Imperial Gazetteer of India, Oxford 1909, S A Khan, The East India Trade in the Seventeenth Century, London 1923, W H Moreland, India at the Death of Akbar, London 1920, do, From Akbar to Aurangzeb, London 1923, do, The Agrarian System of Moslem India, Cambridge 1929 (all with bibliographies), J Sarkar, History of Aurangzīb, Calcutta 1912—1924, do, Studies in Mughal India, Calcutta 1919, do, Mughal Administration, Calcutta 1920, V A Smith, Akbar, the Great Mogul, Oxford 1919 (contains bibliography), H Terpstra, De Opkomst der Westers-Kwartieren van de Oost Indische Compagnie, The Hague 1919

(W H Moreland)

II The decline of the Mughal empire

The decline of Mughal authority, already manifest during the reign of Awrangzēb, rapidly developed under his immediate successors Bahādur Shāh [q v] (1707—1712) was too amiable, Djahāndār Shāh [q v] (1712—1713) was too vicious, Farrukhsiyar [q v] (1713—1719) was too feeble, to revive the empire In seven bloody battles of succession, fought within six years of Awrangzēb's death, the imperial family attested its inherent lawlessness and declining power Then it became the sport of rival factions For a while the two famous Saiyid brothers, ʿAbd Allāh and Husain ʿAlī of Bārha, became the joint mayors of the palace But they were unable to conciliate the support of the Mughal nobles In 1720 Āsaf Djāh Nizām al-Mulk rose in arms Husain ʿAlī marched against him, but was murdered with the connivance of Muhammad Shāh, the emperor whom he and his brother had set up in 1719 Shortly afterwards, his brother ʿAbd Allāh was defeated, and, after lying in prison at Dihlī for two years, was poisoned When they fell, Nizām al-Mulk strove hard to restore something like the old order of administration But he was unwilling to force himself upon Muhammad Shāh as the Saiyids had forced themselves upon Farrukhsiyar When the emperor whom he had delivered refused his advice, and the favourites of the court made fun of his antiquated dress and ceremonious manners, he preferred to retire and rule the Dakhan in virtual independence Ironically enough, Muhammad Shāh believed that Nizām al-Mulk had been plotting his overthrow

With Nizām al-Mulk's departure from Dihlī the last chances of a revival of the empire vanished Never did a falling state betray greater incapacity for reformation No phoenix could arise from those shameful ashes Even while Nizām al-Mulk still retained the nominal control of affairs, extraordinary incidents could occur At Dihlī itself, for example, a Hindu clerk in one of the imperial offices turned Muslim, and, when his wife and daughter refused to follow his change of faith, he laid a complaint against them, alleging that, as his daughter had not attained puberty, she was therefore of her father's religion The case offered certain technical difficulties, was at last referred to the sadr al-ṣudūr His treatment of the case displeased the Dihlī mob Riots arose, the recital of the khutba at the Djahān-numā Masdjid was interrupted, two or three Hindus were seized and circumcised To pacify the rioters, the girl was imprisoned, and, a few days later, buried with Muslim ceremonial "To cut a long story", says Kāmwar Khān who relates the incident, "she was killed, otherwise there would have been many headaches and much vexation"

Nizām al-Mulk's successors were worthy of the frivolous emperor whom they professed to serve For twelve years the imperial councils were directed by a man called Shāh ʿAbd al-Ghafūr By origin a cotton-weaver of Tatthā, he had lived both as yogī and fakīr Claiming magical powers and popularly believed to consort with djinn and devils, he was summoned to interpret the dreams of the emperor's mother This led him into the imperial service, and he contrived to accumulate in his own hand a great number of offices, producing a revenue of 5,000 rupees a day, apart from the bribes which he received, said to amount to as much more This man was pithily described as never having spent money on a good work, never having conferred a favour, and never having done a kindness He was a miser, and at his downfall (for even at Dihlī under Muhammad Shāh such qualities at last produced their natural reaction) more than a crore of rupees was found in his private hoards But the unpopularity which his character and habits naturally evoked were as nothing compared with the detestation with which his son and daughter were regarded No one in Dihlī was safe who displeased them or denied them anything that they desired

Amid such confusion and under such rulers the empire rapidly lost its cohesion The Marathās [q v], whom even Awrangzēb sought in vain to subdue, soon became the most formidable power in India On Awrangzēb's death, his successor, Bahādur Shāh, had released the Marāthā prince, Shāhū Rādjā, in the desperate hope of reestablishing through him the form, if not the substance of imperial control Shāhū Rādjā met with influential and talented support In 1708 he took possession of Satara and by the next year was generally recognised as ruler A Chitpavan Brahman, Bālādjī Wishwanāth, became his pēshwā or first minister, and began to develop the characteristic Marāthā policy, which was to play a part in the enfeeblement of the empire This was to put forward claims to a share (under the title of čauth or a quarter part) in the imperial revenues in as many provinces as possible In 1709 the Mughal governor in the Dakhan admitted this claim, and, although later governors contested it, it was again recognised by the Bārha Saiyids in 1719 In the next year Bālādjī Wishwanāth was succeeded by his son, Bādjī Rāo I, and the process was extended farther afield Particular provinces were assigned to particular officers, who were to realise the cauth either by collecting the amount from the provincial governor, or by plundering the country Bādjī Rāo employed Pīladjī Gāekwāṛ as his chief leader in raids in Gudjarāt, Raghudjī Bhonsla established himself at Nāgpūr, these and other leaders spread the terror of Marāthā devastations in all directions, and it was no longer possible for the provincial governors to make their annual remittances to the capital At the same time, seeing that their tenure of office was coming to depend more and more upon their own power and resources, the governors tended to become virtually independent rulers Āsaf Djāh Nizām al-Mulk in the Dakhan continued to profess himself a humble servant of the emperor, but he repelled by force of arms the persons who came with imperial farmāns ordering his supersession, and when he died in 1748 he was succeeded by his son In Bengal too the succession had become a matter of heredity or war But the respect which the name of the empire still enjoyed and the degradation into which the empire itself had fallen were exemplified by the large gifts sent by a new ruler for farmāns of investiture and the unhesitating compliance with which they were issued

The troubles bred by this internal dissolution were enhanced by those of foreign invasion In 1722 the Safawids were overthrown in Persia, and, after a short period of great confusion, the Turkmān Nādir Kulī established himself as ruler under the title of Nādir Shāh [q v] With him difficulties arose over the Kandahār frontier He was engaged in reducing the Ghilzais there to submission Thrice he sent envoys to the court of Dihlī requesting that his enemies should not receive shelter in the Mughal territory But by this time the Kābul province was falling into a like disorder with the rest The governor spent his time in prayer and hunting The money which had been regularly sent from Dihlī to bribe the hill-tribes into quietude and pay the troops ceased to be sent, partly because of the growing imperial penury, partly because it was believed that it never reached the governor but was embezzled by his patron at court Large bodies of Ghilzais therefore were able without the least difficulty to take shelter from Nādir Shāh's troops in the Mughal province, while the Mughal court foolishly supposed it was evading its difficulties by neglecting to answer Nādir Shāh's repeated demands The ineptitude of the court, therefore, rather than (as used to be supposed) any elaborate intrigue of party against party, made Nādir Shāh resolve to invade India No effective opposition could be offered in either the Kābul province or the Pandjāb In 1738 Kābul was occupied In the next year Nādir Shāh's army appeared before Dihlī The emperor went out, not to strike a blow in his own defence, but to make his humble submission Conqueror and captive then entered the city The Dihlī mob, grievously mistaking its strength, attempted to massacre the foreigners As a punishment Nādir Shāh deliberately let loose his troops for five long hours — from 9 o'clock in the morning till 2 in the afternoon — during which some 20,000 of the inhabitants are believed to

to have perished, and beyond this toll of life a great ransom was exacted, including 50 crores' worth of those wonderful jewels which earlier Mughal sovereigns had heaped up for their delight From this time onwards the annals of the Mughal empire contain nothing but dishonour Nādir Shāh fell, but Ahmad Shāh Durrānī established on the borders of India another empire and repeatedly invaded India between 1748, the year of the ignominious Muhammad Shāh's death, and 1761, the year in which he inflicted the severest defeat in all their history upon the Marāthās at Pānīpat Until the decay of the Durrānī empire in the early years of the nineteenth century, the provinces of Sind, the Pandjāb, and Kashmīr, were dependencies of the Afghān kingdom

Europeans in India — Dutch, French, and English — had observed these events with great concern Farly in the eighteenth century the Dutch had sent a great embassy to Bahādur Shāh, and a little later the English had sent one to Farrukhsiyar Both had secured far reaching farmāns by profuse expenditure, both had found that their farmāns were waste paper wherever they ran counter to the interests of local governors But it was the Frenchman Dupleix who first sought to put into practice the conclusions to be drawn from this situation Others were convinced that European force could easily establish itself in India, but he began experiments, and, in the hope of keeping the English motionless while he acted, he professed to be acting on behalf and in the name of the Mughal emperor This fiction became the traditional basis of French policy in India, and down to the end of the century Frenchmen were elaborating plans (which their failure to control the sea brought to nothing) for establishing themselves in India and expelling their rivals under cover of imperial grants With equal consistency the English adopted a political realism which squared far better with the circumstances of the time They fought and overcame Dupleix in the name of their national interests When they acquired Bengal, they carefully avoided all obligation to reestablish the imperial authority, and it appears that their acceptance of the dīwānī of Bengal was dictated, not by any desire to mask the reality of their power (which no one in India doubted), but by the desire to take on behalf of the East India Company something which could not be taken over by the English crown as a territorial sovereignty certainly would have been Thus it was that Prince ʿAlī Gawhar, who proclaimed himself as Shāh ʿĀlam II [q v] in 1760, on learning of of his father ʿĀlamgīr's murder by his wazīr, Ghāzī al-Dīn, first came under the protection of the English He had for some years been attacking the province of Bihār with the aid of the Nawāb Wazīr of Oudh But after the battle of Baksar in 1764 he had given up the struggle, joined the English camp, and in the following year on Clive's demand bestowed on the East India Company the dīwānī of the provinces it held in return for an annual allowance of 26 lakhs of rupees At the same time the districts of Kora and Allāhābād were assigned to him and he proceeded to reside in the latter city Soon however, he wearied of his position of dependence, and departed to join the Marāthās, who, having recovered from their defeat at Pānīpat, were once more invading northern India On this Warren Hastings decided to hand Kora and Allāhābād over to the Nawāb Wazīr and refused to continue the payment of the 26 lakhs From this time until the close of the century he remained under the control of the Marāthās, except at such times as their internal dissensions led to the recall of their forces from the north One of their chief leaders at this time, Mahadadjī Sindhia, gradually built up a strong principality for himself, conquering the provinces of Agra and Dihlī, and becoming the emperor's real custodian So matters remained till Sindhia's defeat by the English in 1803 transferred the guardianship of Shāh ʿĀlam into the hands of the latter They carefully refrained from entering into engagements with him, but they assigned revenues for the maintenance of the imperial family, they permitted all orders issued in the city of Dihlī to run in the emperor's name, though the actual administration was conducted by an English agent, and they attempted no interference within the precincts of the palace Gradually the traditional observances broke down The Mughal emperor and the British governor general met with the ceremonial of equals The emperor's name was removed from the coinage And it had been resolved no longer to recognise the imperial title after the death of its holder, Bahādur Shāh II, when the Indian Mutiny, in which several of the imperial princes took an active part although they seem to have had little share in bringing it about, led to the formal trial and deposition of the emperor and the disappearance of the shadowy court which for a century had lingered on under the toleration of the real powers of India

Bibliography For the period down to 1739 Irvine, Later Mughals, Calcutta 1922, 2 vols, and the numerous authorities therein cited, for the period after 1739 the Cambridge History of India, ed Dodwell, vol v, Cambridge 1929, and the bibliographies included therein

(H H Dodwell)

III Mughal architecture in India

The Mughal dynasts brought to India strong Central Asian predilections and a keen feeling for natural beauty But each in succession obeyed his own instincts, education and caprices Hence they patronised no "schools" of art, but came to employ an almost cosmopolitan body of artists, Persian, Indian, Turk and even European, who one and all had to adapt their own canons to the aesthetic moods of their employers In general the Mughals forbade any sculpture of the human form, but like the Orthodox Greek Church, were usually less rigid towards paintings of it and even fostered portraiture till it reached a high level Yet, with relatively few exceptions, the Mughal buildings were all religious, comprising mosques and tombs or shrines Hence their scope was limited, though within their limits they express the religious feelings and policies of the dynasty Even the conqueror Bābur found leisure in his brief reign of five years, 1526—1531, to build at Pānīpat the Kābul Shāh mosque, whose name commemorates at once his love of Kābul and his victory at Pānīpat in 1526 His mosque at Sambhal in Rohilkhand is marked by an ovoid dome When he required constructive work Bābur summoned pupils of Sinān, an Albanian, from Constantinople, and avoided Indian, Hindu or indigenous standards, though he must have employed Indian workmen in spite of his dis-

parageement of Indian skill and knowledge in design or architecture

Humāyūn's longer but still more chequered reign produced many buildings, of which few remain His mosque at Fathābād near Dihlī is massive and well-proportioned, recalling the Tughlaḳ or Turkish period, with domes rather more than hemispherical It is decorated with enamelled tiles in the Persian manner, apparently the earliest example of that style now extant His tomb at Dihlī, doubtless begun, as is customary among pious Easterns, during his lifetime, is of red sandstone and also Persian in style, but in it coloured tiles are replaced by white marble, of which the dome is wholly composed, the rest of the masonry being also inlaid with that material The main dome has a narrow neck, the first of its type to appear in India, the four corner cupolas, also a new feature, support domes of an earlier style

Akbar (1556—1605) was versatile in his architectures as he was in his religion In the Fort at Āgra he built the palace — one of the few secular buildings of the Mughal period which survive — called the Djahāngīrī Mahall His other buildings at Āgra were demolished by Shāh-Djahān This palace, built of red sandstone which has weathered badly, bears the impress of Akbar's vigour and originality Throughout arches are used sparingly, the horizontal style of construction being the rule Its forms also are as Hindu as its construction, but the ornamentation, carved on all flat surfaces, is of a type used by Akbar but not found in other buildings During the early part of his reign was erected at Gwalior the tomb of Muhammad Ghawth, who died in 1562 Closely resembling that of Sher Shāh at Sahsarām, it marks a considerable advance in tomb-building during the brief period that had elapsed between the erection of the two, an advance ascribed by Fergusson to the invigorating touch of Akbar's genius, but doubtless due in great measure to the skill of the Gwalior school of architects and masons who were probably Hindus The tomb is a square, 100 ft each way, exclusive of the hexagonal towers, and its chamber forms a hall, 43 ft square, with the angles cut off by pointed arches so as to form an octagon on which the dome rests Around this square building is a wide gallery, enclosed on all sides by a screen of exquisite tracery in pierced stonework with a projecting porch on each face

At Fathpur-Sīkrī, the new capital founded by Akbar where the court resided from 1569 to 1584, the emperor's eclectic phase found its fullest expression Its architecture is admirably illustrated in W E Smith's works [1]), but all its significance has not yet been explained The site was chosen because Akbar's patron saint, the Sūfī Salīm Čishtī, lived in a cave on its summit [2]) Akbar's own residence was the "House of Dreams", the Khwāb-gāh, an unpretentious structure standing on the roof of the Mahall i Khāss, which contains paintings attributed by Smith to Chinese artists and apparently depicting Buddha as Yamāntaka [1]). However this may be, the design of his throne in the Dīwān-i Khāssa massive pillar symbolizes that he sat there as a Čakravartin or ruler of the four quarters, as Havell suggests, though it is conceivable that it signified his claim to the supreme headship of his new religion, the Dīn-Illāhī But it is rash to dogmatise on the symbolism of a builder who seems to have had no settled design for the plan of his new city The Mahall i Khāss regarded by Fergusson as the original block of building at Fathpur Sīkrī, has two spacious courtyards and is larger than the Red Palace at Āgra, but its surrounding structures are inferior in richness of design and ornamentation From time to time Akbar added courts and pavilions as if to compensate for this inferiority While the Dīwān-i Khāss is square, as befits a Hall of Audience, the Daftar-Khāna or Record Office is peristylar like the one erected by Akbar at Allāhābād The Panč Mahall, a five-storeyed open pavilion with richly carved pillars, and long colonnades and walls connecting these buildings one with another, complete this group of structures The most characteristic and beautiful of his designs here are the three small buildings, the Mahall or apartment of Birbal's daughter, the house of Mariam Zamāni, mother of Djahāngīr, and the palace of the Rūmi Sultāna, Rukaiya Begam, a cousin of Akbar and his first consort Akbar's greatness however demanded more grandiose monuments The Djāmiᶜ Masdjid or cathedral mosque, erected in 1571 (the year in which he proclaimed himself the mudjtahid of his age and openly claimed the spiritual headship of Islām) commemorated his victories in the Dakhan (Southern India) It ranks amongst the finest ecclesiastical buildings of India According to its inscription, it was designed by Shaikh Salim Čishtī himself and modelled on the Kaᶜba Though highly ornate it betrays few or no traces of Indian influence [2]) The tomb of the Shaikh, in its courtyard, is built wholly of white marble, with windows of pierced tracery of the most exquisite geometrical patterns, and a deep cornice of marble supported by brackets of a design so elaborate as to be almost fantastic The other tomb in the courtyard, that of Salīm's grandson, Shaikh Islām Khān, is of sober and excellent design but eclipsed by its surroundings The Buland Darwāzah or "lofty gateway", built in 1602, commemorates Akbar's conquest of Khāndesh and dwarfs even the Djāmiᶜ Masdjid It is the grandest gateway in India and one of the loftiest in the world, its height being enhanced by its position on the brow of the hill on which Fathpur-Sikrī stands Its architect placed its portals at the back of a semi dome, which thus became its porch or portico, and its dimensions impress themselves as those of the actual portal It must be added that Akbar intended his new capital to be a school of all the arts and that he allied architecture to painting From the fragments of interior mural paintings which survive, it is clear that he employed Persian and Indian artists, who worked independently, and some idea of their technique is doubtless to be gathered from the miniatures of this period, as mural artists were also required to illustrate manuscripts

1) The Mughal Architecture of Fathpur-Sikri, Allāhābād, Government Press, N W P and Oudh, 1898, 4 vols and Journal of Indian Art, Nrs 47, 64 and 60

2) The tomb of Salīm Čishtī is described and illustrated in Smith's work cited above and in J Indian Art, N° 64 (vol viii, p 41 and sqq), 1898

1) J Indian Art, N° 47 (vol vi, p 66), 1894

2) For its wall-paintings see J Indian Art, N° 66 (vol viii, p 55), 1899

At Allāhābād, the city where Akbar was compelled by administrative duties to reside more than at his new but isolated capital, he built the pavilion of the Čālīs Sītūn or "Forty Pillars", of which only the hall survives Its plan is square, supported by eight rows of columns, eight in each row, making sixty four in all, and it is surrounded by a deep verandah of double columns, with groups of four at the angles, all surmounted by bracket capitals of the richest design

But perhaps the most characteristic of Akbar's buildings, observes Fergusson, is his tomb at Sikandra, begun in his lifetime [1]) but completed by his successor Unfortunately Djahāngīr, in his Tūzuk (transl A Rogers, i 152), asserts that he demolished Akbar's work and reconstructed the tomb But, seeing that the plan of the building is unique in India and has no Persian or Saracenic parallel, it is more likely that only its exterior is the work of the fastidious orthodox Djahāngīr Its original plan was modelled on the Panč Mahall, being composed of five square terraces diminishing in size as they ascend Thus the outline of the structure is pyramidal, not domical Standing in an extensive garden it is approached by a single gateway and stands on a raised platform Excluding the angle towers the lowest storey measures 320 ft each way, and on this terrace stand three more, similar in design but more ornate, each about half the height of the lowest storey or terrace Within and above the highest storey is a white marble enclosure, 157 ft square, contrasting with the red sandstone of which the rest of the structure is built The outer wall of this enclosure is entirely composed of beautiful trellis-work, and inside it is a colonnade or cloister, also of white marble, in the centre of which is placed the tomb of Akbar, resting on a platform of exquisite arabesque tracery This doubtless typifies Akbar's celestial resting-place, for below it lie his remains under a far plainer tombstone in the basement That Djahāngīr here departed from the original plan is certain According to W Finch, the tomb was to have been covered with a canopy of "curious white and speckled gold richly inwrought" What Akbar planned and what he meant to express by his design must remain a matter of conjecture Fergusson postulates a Buddhist model, and even sees in the pavilions which adorn the upper storeys reminiscences of the cells which stand on the edge of the great rock-cut rath at Māmallapuram, but these may have been intended for use as a theological college like the rooms and pavilions in the upper storey of Humāyūn's tomb He also thought that a domical chamber over the tombstone formed part of the original design, since no such royal tomb remains exposed to the air in any Indian mausoleum — a dangerous generalization Havell sees in the building an Indian five-storeyed Assembly Hall, apparently a meeting-house for the royal order, the Dīn Ilāhī, the four lower pavilions (or terraces) corresponding to the four grades of the order Even Cambodian influences have been conjectured [1]) Yet it is not impossible that a Zoroastrian model was kept in view, as Akbar borrowed from that faith among others

As compared with Akbar Djahāngīr contributed little to the architectural magnificence of Mughal India At Lahore, which he made his capital, he added the Barā Khwāb-gāh or greater sleeping apartment to the Fort, and the tomb of Anārkalī was also erected in that city Near Srīnagar in Kashmīr he made the Shālīmār gardens with their summer-houses, and the fine gateway to the Sarāī at Nūrmahal near Djalandhar is also ascribed to his reign The quadrangle at Lahore was doubtless executed by Hindu artisans, as the colonnade, which surrounds three sides of its area, is supported by pillars of red sandstone with bracket capitals and carved figures of elephants, peacocks and conventional animals like those found in the Red Palace at Āgra Djahāngīr's greatest buildings were however erected at Dakka, in Eastern Bengal, where he made a new provincial capital in supersession of Gawr, but his structures there were principally built of brick, covered with stucco, only the pillars and brackets being of stone, and they have been almost destroyed by the jungle In one respect only did Djahāngīr innovate In 1600 he built the Motī Masdjid or "Pearl Mosque" at Lahore, the first of its kind in India Between Akbar's style and that of Djahāngīr little difference exists The former had used colour ornamentation at Fathpur-Sīkrī, its later buildings were richly decorated with wall-paintings, and marble mosaic was used in the Djāmi' Masdjid Djahāngīr relied still more on mosaic decoration, e g in Akbar's tomb at Sikandra, but soon after its completion we find variegated marble mosaic supplemented by pietra dura, as in I'timād al-Dawla's tomb, and in the Tādj we still find inlay almost exclusively used Akbar had continued the use of enamelled tiles at Fathpur-Sīkrī for roofing and more sparingly for ornamentation, and they were employed by Djahāngīr at Sikandra and by Wazīr Khān, his wazīr, on his mosque at Lahore Indeed this mosque is only noteworthy on account of this decoration Akbar had also introduced painting on interior walls

Djahāngīr's wife Nūr Mahall or Nūr Djahān erected at Āgra the tomb of her father, I'timād al Dawla, completed in 1628 Built almost entirely of white marble, enriched with semi-precious pietra dura patterns, it foreshadowed the finest work of Shāh-Djahān's reign Djahāngīr's tomb, at Shāhdarā near Lahore, has little architectural merit, consisting of a vast platform 209 ft square, with a minaret at each corner The façades are decorated with white marble let into the red sandstone and the flat roof with geometrical mosaics The emperor's remains are probably buried beneath an opening in the roof so that the rain and dew of heaven might fall on his tomb, as his earliest chronicler says [2]) In brief the actual grave was hypaethral [3]),

1) This view is contested in Archaeological Survey of India, Annual Report, 1903—1904, p 19, but it was certainly the usual custom for a Mughal emperor, like any other good Musulman of means, to build his tomb during his lifetime The problem is fully discussed in The Tomb of Akbar, by E W Smith and W H Nicholls, published by the Arch Survey of India, Allāhābād 1908

1) Cf Vincent Smith, A History of Fine Art in India and Ceylon, p 411

2) Muhammad Sālih Kambū, in his Shāh-Djahān-Nāma (also called the Amal-i Sālih in Elliott and Dowson's Hist of India, vii, p 123) cited in Arch Survey of India, Annual Rep, 1906—1907, p 13

3) A contrary view, that the tomb had a closed

following the precedent set by Bābur The sarcophagus is of white marble, inlaid with pietra dura, and it stands in an octagonal chamber 21 ft high and 20½ in diameter This chamber is enclosed in nearly solid walls of masonry, 56 ft thick on all sides, and access to it is afforded by two oblong apartments, one on each side, but it does not open into any of the forty other rooms behind the arches which surround the structure, each façade having a central arch with five smaller arches on each side

Under Shāh-Djahān (1627—1658) Mughal architecture attained its zenith One of his earliest buildings was the incomparable Tādj Mahall [q v], begun the year after the death of the empress, Arjumand Bānū Begam, entitled Mumtāz Mahall, or the "Chosen One of the Palace" For himself Shāh Djahān planned a corresponding tomb of equal magnificence on the opposite bank of the river Djamnā, but Awrangzēb did not carry out the scheme, probably because it savoured of paganism [1]) Considerable controversy has raged over the question of its architect Shāh Djahān's style was essentially Persian, with an indefinable difference of expression, and it was sharply distinguished from those of Ispahān and Constantinople by a lavish use of white marble, sumptuously decorated with pietra dura Coloured tiles had by now become rare Spacious grandeur was combined with feminine elegance, to which inimitable open work tracery contributed In the mosques colour was eschewed, and the finest art is found in the Pearl Mosques at Āgra and Dihlī The former was built in 1646–1653 Meanwhile Shāh-Djahān had founded Shāh-Djahānābād, the great palace near modern Dihlī, recently restored to something like its pristine beauty A Persian engineer, ʿAlī Mardān Khān, had tapped the Djamnā 6 miles above Dihlī, and his canal fed the new capital with many streams The most favoured of them was the Nahr-i Bihisht of "Stream of Paradise", which was so named by Shāh Djahān himself It fell in a cascade down a marble chute in a pavilion — the Shāh Burdj — and flowing along the terrace which bordered the Hayāt Bakhsh ("life giving") garden, it traversed the chain of stately edifices that lined the eastern wall of the Palace — the Hammām, Dīwān-i Khāss and Khwāb-gāh — silently gliding beneath the Mīzān-i Insāf ("Balance of Justice") across a sun-bathed court into the cool of the Imtiyāz Mahall or "Palace of Distinction", styled later the Rang Mahall Kalān or "Greater Colour Palace", from its elaborate painted decoration and gilding Set on a marble terrace which formerly swept from end to end of the Fort, it overhung the Djamnā whose course then flowed along the base of the red sandstone walls On the West an orchard separated it from the Dīwān-i ʿĀm Thence, still southward, it passed through the Lesser Rang Mahall, the Mumtāz Mahall and other buildings of the imperial zanāna Thus Dihlī combined the Mughal love of enclosed gardens, watered by running channels, with their passion for architectural beauty It preserved Bābur's love of nature, and perhaps added to it a sense of landscape which also found expression in the Mughal gardens of Kashmīr

With Awrangzēb (1659—1707) set in the period of decline, due no doubt largely to that emperor's orthodox prejudice against art, but partly also to his conscientious parsimony He declined to complete Shāh-Djahān's tomb, ostensibly on the ground of expense, but also perhaps because he regarded the scheme as savouring of paganism Yet he constructed at Benares the great mosque with its lofty graceful minarets, built a copy of the Dihlī mosque at Lahore, and at Awrangābād imitated, though on a small scale and with success, the Tādj in the tomb of his favourite wife Awrangzīb's own tomb, at Khuldābād, a hamlet just above the caves at Elūra, is mean and insignificant But some of his buildings, in spite of their incipient decadence, are the last great examples of the Mughal style His Djāmiʿ or Bādshāhī mosque at Lahore is pleasing in form, though the marble ornamentation of its great central and front façade is very inferior in detail to its prototype at Dihlī Its three domes of white marble and the imposing gateway of red sandstone and marble leading to it from the Hazūrī Bāgh are its finest features

Near Dihlī the tomb (1756) of Nawwāb Safdar Djang, Wazīr of Oudh, is a passable copy of a Humāyūn's mausoleum, but its interior is marred by indifferent plaster decoration

At Lucknow, the capital of the Nawwāb Wazīrs of Oudh, the buildings erected by that dynasty and its nobles hardly deserve to be classed as Mughal The one exception is the vast Imāmbāra, built by the fourth Nawwāb, Āsaf al-Dawla, in 1784 Conceived on a grand scale for the celebration of the Muharram according to the Shiʿa rite, its details will not bear close examination, though its solidity is impressive The buildings of the Muhammadan dynasty of Mysore (1760—1777) have still less claim to be regarded as Mughal

To conclude, the architecture of the Mughals was, like all their arts, a resultant of many forces

---

roof and only an uncovered tombstone is maintained by J P Thompson in the Journal of the Panjab Historical Society, 1 12—30 (also W H Nicholls, in Arch Survey of India, Annual Rep, 1906—1907, p 12) But hypaethral shrines were not uncommon during the Mughal period (see H A Rose, in Journ Panjab Hist Soc, III 144—145, and Glossary of Panjab Tribes and Castes, 1 534) It is possible to reconcile the structural evidence with tradition by assuming that the tomb was originally hypaethral, but that a dome was subsequently erected over it and that Awrangzīb removed the addition in order to restore the original design but hardly, as Moorcroft states, with the intent that "his grandfather's tomb might be exposed to the weather as a mark of his reprobation of the loose notions and licentious practices of Djahāngīr" (cf W Moorcroft and G Trebeck, Travels in the Himalayan Provinces, London 1841, 1 108—109)

1) For twin shrines on either side of the Indus see the account of Daira Dīn Panāh in Muzaffargarh (Punjab) District Gazetteer, Lahore 1910, p 71 Tavernier records this tradition in his Travels, Bk 1, Ch VII, but he does not add the further tradition that Shāh-Djahān's mausoleum was to have been of black marble, a rarity hardly procurable in India The Tādj was however only the central feature in a group of smaller and hardly less beautiful buildings, e g the four Saheli Burdjes, tombs of the empress' maids-of-honour, see Arch Survey of India, Annual Rep, 1903–1904, p 14 and plate III

But its essential distinction over Hindu art lay in its balanced use of purely Indian and imported technique, while it recognised the value of symbolism in its structures, it never made its arts merely a vehicle for symbols, as Hindu sculpture tended to do

Bibliography The fullest collection of material for the study of Indian architecture is to be found in the publications of the Archaeological Survey of India The best comprehensive works are James Fergusson, History of Indian and Eastern Architecture, edited by James Burgess, vol ii, London 1910, Gustave Le Bon, Les Monuments de l'Inde, Paris 1893, Fi Wetzel, Islamische Grabbauten in Indien aus der Zeit der Soldatenkaiser, Leipzig 1918, Oscar Reuther, Indische Palaste und Wohnhauser, Berlin 1925 A comprehensive and critical bibliography of the Muhammadan Architecture of India by K A C Creswell appeared in The Indian Antiquary, vol li (1922) (H A Rose)

MUGHAMMAS or according to others Mughamis, a valley near Mecca on the borders of the sacred area According to tradition, Abraha [q v] ordered his army to encamp here when he was going to attack Mecca, but was prevented from doing so as birds slew his soldiers by dropping stones on them In Mughammas is shown the tomb of the Tāʾifī Abū Righāl who died here after acting as guide to Abraha He was so hated by the Meccans for this that the custom grew up of casting stones on his grave [cf AL-DJAMRA] Whether this explanation is true or not is unknown, but in any case a verse of Hassān b Thābit (ed Hirschfeld, LXII/1) shows that in the time of the Prophet the mention of his name was sufficient to insult the Tāʾifīs The antiquity of the custom of stoning his tomb is shown by a verse of Djarīr "When al-Farazdak dies, stone him as you stone the grave of Abū Righāl"

Bibliography al-Bakrī, Geogr Worterbuch, ed Wüstenfeld, p 553, Ibn Hishām, ed Wüstenfeld, p 33, Tabarī, ed de Goeje, i 937, Azrakī, ed Wustenfeld, p 93 sq, Noldeke, Geschichte der Araber und Perser, p 207 sq (Fr Buhl)

AL-MUGHĪRA B SHUʿBA, of the sept of the Ahlāf, a subdivision of the Thakif, further a member of the clan of the Banū Muʿattib — guardians of the sanctuary of al-Lāt — and nephew of ʿUrwa b Masʿūd [q v], companion and martyr For having attacked and plundered some travelling companions during their sleep, he was forced to leave Tāʾif, his native town, and came to Medīna to offer his services to Muhammad The latter used him to attract the Thakīf to Islām and after the submission of Tāʾif, sent him to this town to superintend the destruction of the national sanctuary and the liquidation of the treasure of al-Lāt In the caliphate of Abū Bakr, although he never succeeded in attaining to one of the great posts which were reserved for the Kuraish, Mughīra was able to keep a position in governing circles ʿOmar, while under no illusions about his morals, appointed him governor of Basra A scandalous incident temporarily interrupted his administrative career He was accused of adultery The evidence was overwhelming instead of having him stoned, ʿOmar only dismissed him Mughīra holds in tradition the record for marriages and divorces the figures of 300, 700 and 1,000 are given In the year 21 (642), recalled to public life, he was appointed to the important governorship of Kūfa His slave Abū Luʾluʾa, who lived in Medīna, assassinated the Caliph ʿOmar Under ʿOthmān, Mughīra retired to private life In the reign of ʿAlī, he withdrew to Tāʾif to watch the course of events He went without having been invited to the conference of Adhruh [q v] In 40 (660), taking advantage of the general confusion that followed the assassination of ʿAlī, he produced an alleged certificate of appointment from Muʿāwiya and took over the control of the annual pilgrimage

The great Sufyānid was able to appreciate at their true value auxiliaries of the stamp of Mughīra, one of the chief dāhiya of his time, the man "who could get himself out of the most hopeless difficulty" "if (it was said) he were shut behind seven doors, his cunning would have found a way to burst all the locks" Of shocking morals, free from any attachment to the ʿAlid party, equally free from any claims to the caliphate, free from the jealousies of the Kuraish families, as well as the narrowmindedness of the Ansār clans, a member of the intelligent and enterprising tribe of Thakīf, everything attracted Muʿāwiya's attention to him In the year 41 (661), this Caliph appointed him governor of Kūfa, a region disturbed by the intrigues of the Shiʿa and the continual risings of the Khāridjīs Mughīra succeeded in not compromising himself with the former he was content to advise them to avoid any too striking outburst Now nearly sixty, the able Thakafī felt the unusual ambition of remaining where he was and of finishing his troubled career in peace and honour This opportunist, who had come over to the Sufyānids after cool calculation, felt little desire to sacrifice his own peace and leisure for the consolidation of the Omaiyad dynasty, he was solely concerned with keeping on the right side of the sagacious Muʿāwiya The sudden rising of the Khāridjī leader Mustawrid failed to disturb his equanimity With remarkable cleverness he was able to let loose against these rebels their born enemies, "the fine flower of the Shiʿa" Whichever was victorious, it could not fail to lighten his responsibilities By setting them against one another he rendered harmless the most dangerous elements of disorder in his province The crushing of the Khāridjīs enabled him to breathe freely

Thanks to this combination of mildness and astuteness, and by knowing when to shut his eyes, Mughīra succeeded in avoiding desperate measures against the people of the ʿIrāk, who were a continual source of trouble, and succeeded in retaining his position He was even regretted by his former subjects after he was gone Not quite satisfied, Muʿāwiya thought of breaking this lieutenant of his who was playing a double game Mughīra was always able at the opportune moment to provoke troubles which required the continuation of his services In this way he prepared the return to favour of Ziyād b Abīhi [q v], destined to be his successor He is also said to have disarmed the Caliph's suspicions by suggesting the plan of proclaiming Yazīd heir-apparent As the general situation had considerably improved in the ʿIrāk and order prevailed, on the surface at least, the Caliph left him in office till his death, the date of which is uncertain but which must be placed between 48 and 51 (668—671) Mughīra died of the plague at the age of about 70

Bibliography Aghānī, xix 97, 140—148, xvi 2 sq, xviii 165, xx 117, xxi 281—284, Ibn al-Athīr, Usd al-Ghāba, iv 116, Tabarī, ed de Goeje, ii 4, 8, 10, 16, 19—21, 36—39, 40, 42, 44, 61, 67, 86—88, 111—115, 173, 174, 181, 207 — For other references cf H Lammens, Ziād ibn Abīhi, vice-roi de l'Iraq, lieutenant de Moʿāwia Ier, p 1—15, extract from the R S O, iv 1—15 (H LAMMENS)

AL-MUGHNĪ [See ALLĀH II]

AL MUHĀDJIRŪNA, the emigrants, a name often applied in the Kurʾān to those followers of Muhammad who had migrated from Mecca to Medīna with him The word is derived from hidjra, which does not mean "flight" but breach, dissolution of an association based on origin, in the place of which a new connection is formed The term muhādjir is not applied to the Prophet himself but only to those who migrated with him and later made up a considerable portion of the population of Medīna The followers of the Prophet who were natives of Mecca were given the name Anṣār [q v] to distinguish them from the Muhādjirūn, because the immigrants were mainly dependent on their help and active support after they had given up their homes and livelihoods in Mecca It now became one of Muhammad's main objects to arouse sympathy for them, because in the early days after their migration they were for the most part in very needy circumstances With the greatest eloquence he describes them as the particular favourites of Allāh who will receive a splendid reward for their sacrifices "when those who have adopted the faith, who have migrated and fought for Allah's cause may hope for his grace" (Sūra ii 215), "the sins of the emigrants and of those driven from home are forgiven" (iii 191) Those who remained in Mecca and feared to migrate although the earth was large enough to afford them shelter are severely censured He who emigrates finds a home on the earth and if he dies Allāh will reward him (iii 101) This was however at first only an indication of a future which had not yet materialised and in addition to these rosy utterances (cf xvi 43, viii 75, xxii 57) the Prophet made more practical efforts to help those who were living in difficult circumstances A portion of the plunder taken in fighting was given to the poor emigrants who had been driven from their possessions in order to aid Allāh "they are the trustworthy" (lix 8) In order to make the bond between them and the Medīnese as tight as possible it is announced in Sūra viii 73 that the emigrants who had left their homes to fight for the true religion and those who gave them shelter (cf Ibn Hishām, p 321 sqq) and assistance (the Ansār) should enjoy rights of kinship with one another while on the other hand, those, who while adopting Islām had not migrated, should not have any rights of kinship According to the usual interpretation, this passage refers to the peculiar bond of brotherhood which Muhammad instituted between each emigrant and a Medīnese believer, an explanation which is however not quite certain as the passage perhaps only expresses a general principle (cf Fr Buhl, Leben Muhammeds, p 209) Besides, the usual exegesis sees in the regulations for inheritance (Sūra iv 13, 15) a proof that this special bond was very early abolished again.

The high esteem in which the emigrants were held finds expression in Sūra ix 20, where we read "those who believed and migrated and expended blood and treasure in fighting for the cause of Allāh, occupy a higher position (than other believers), they are the fortunate ones" Muhādjir in this way became a title of honour (cf Sūra xxix 25 where Lot is so called) Individuals who had migrated not to Medīna but to Abyssinia also proudly called themselves muhādjir (see Fr Buhl, op cit, p 172) But the real "migration" was that to Medīna in which the Prophet himself took part The number of the Muhādjirūn gradually grew as the increasing power of Muhammad from time to time induced Meccans to leave their heathen city and go to Medina It is to them that Sūra viii 76 refers, where those who adopted Islām later than the first emigrants who migrated and afterwards fought alongside of the older Muhādjirūn are acknowledged as belonging to the community ("they are of you") After the treaty of Hudaibiya [q v] in particular, we hear of Meccan women who left their pagan husbands and went to Medīna where in accordance with Muhammad's interpretation of the treaty they were not surrendered if they offered the so-called women's pledge (see Sūra lx 11 sqq) Thus the Muhādjirūn, later and earlier, formed an increasing element in the population of Medīna, whom Muhammad often mentions along with other sections of the community as possessing equal rights with them (e g Sūra xxxiii 6, 49) in which connection it should be noted that Muhādjirūn is never, as was the case among the Ansār, used in genealogies

That these emigrants were specially dear to Muhammad is easily intelligible, for they had shared his sufferings in Mecca and made the greatest sacrifices for him and included in their number men who had adopted his teaching out of pure conviction With the occupation of Mecca, the migration ceased while the Muhādjirūn remained as a separate highly honoured body It is natural to suppose that a certain amount of rivalry might easily arise between them and the other elements of the community, and that there was actually a certain amount of friction between the emigrants and the Medīnese is evident from the fact that in the troubles after the Prophet's death the Medinese endeavoured to set up one of their number, Saʿd b ʿUbāda, as successor to the Prophet The attempt failed through the energetic action of ʿUmar, Abū Bakr and Abū ʿUbaida, and the leadership of the community remained in the hands of the Muhādjirūn until the descendants of Muhammad's old opponents in Mecca seized power for themselves

Bibliography The biography of Muhammad, especially Ibn Hishām, ed Wustenfeld, p 341 sqq (FR BUHL)

MUHĀL [see MANTIK]

AL-MUHALLAB B ABĪ SUFRA, ABŪ SAʿĪD AL-AZDĪ, an Arab general Al-Muhallab is said to have been born two years before the death of Muhammad In the reign of Muʿāwiya he undertook a campaign against India and raided the country between Kābul and Multān (44 = 664–665) He next distinguished himself in the expeditions of the governors of Khurāsān against Samarkand. Then however, he left the Umaiyads and joined the anti Caliph ʿAbd Allāh b al Zubair who gave him the governorship of Khurāsān When he was just about to start for there, he was appointed commander-in-chief in the war against the Azrakīs

[q v] on the urgent appeal of the people of Basra After he had driven them from the Tigris he defeated them in Shawwāl 66 (May 686) at Sillabrā, east of the Dudjail, whereupon they withdrew to the east He then took part in the war against al Mukhtār b Abī ʿUbaid [q v] On the latter's defeat and death (Ramadān 67 = April 687) he was sent to al Mawsil to defend the frontier against the Syrians by Musʿab b al-Zubair, who shortly before had been appointed governor of Basra In the meanwhile, the Azrakīs had been growing more and more dangerous and the only course for Musʿab was to send al Muhallab once again to al-Ahwāz Here he fought the Azrakīs for eight months, when Musʿab fell at Maskin (72 = 691) he paid homage to the caliph ʿAbd al Malik The new governor of Basra, Khālid b ʿAbd Allāh b Khālid b Asid, himself then undertook the leadership in the war against the fanatical Azrakis, but he was not fit for this task so that the caliph found himself forced to send for al-Muhallab and give him the supreme command Khālid was soon afterwards dismissed and Basra given to ʿAbd al Malik's brother, the governor of Kūfa, Bishr b Marwān But since the latter out of jealousy worked against Muhallab, the latter's movements were hampered, though he succeeded in seizing the town of Rāmahurmuz On the death of Bishr, al Hadjdjādj [q v] received the governorship of the ʿIrāk and as soon as he took up his appointment, the campaign against the Azrakis was resumed with vigour (beg of 75 = 694) At the end of Shaʿbān 75 (Dec 694), al Muhallab assumed the offensive The Azrakis had to retire to Kazarūn where they held out for over a year They then left Fārs and went to Kirmān Here they entrenched themselves in the town of Djīraft and it was some time before Muhallab could overcome them so that al Hadjdjādj became impatient and tried to hurry him up Al-Muhallab preferred however to await the favourable moment Fortunately the Azrakis split into two parties, one of which, led by Katarī b al Fudjāʾa [q v] and ʿAbīda b Hilāl, fled to Tabaristan whereupon al Muhallab easily overcame the rest He then returned to Basra where as a reward for his services he was given the governorship of Khurāsān (78 = 697–698) From Merw he undertook two expeditions against Bukhārā, on his way back he died at Zāghūl, a village in the district of Merw al-Rūdh, in Dhu 'l Hidjdja 82 (Jan–Feb 702) According to another statement, his death did not take place till next year His son Yazīd succeeded him in his office By finally disposing of the fanatical Azrakīs al-Muhallab rendered a lasting service to the caliphate and he is incontestably entitled to a place of honour among the generals of the Umayyads

Bibliography Balādhurī (ed de Goeje), p 360, 396, 411, 417, 432, 442, Anonyme arab Chronik (ed Ahlwardt), p 15, 102—111, 113 sq, 123—125, 135, 271—277, 292, 310 sq, al Mubarrad, al Kāmil, p 626 sqq, Yaʿkūbī (ed Houtsma), ii 300, 316, 324, 329 sq, Tabarī, see index, Masʿūdī (ed Pavis), v 210 sqq, 291 sqq, 350 sq, 388 sq, al-Aghānī, see Guidi, Tables alphabetiques, Ibn al-Athīr (ed Tornberg), iii 372 sq, 380, iv, passim, v 64 sqq, Ibn Khallikān (ed Wustenfeld), N⁰ 764 (transl by de Slane, iii 508 sqq), Weil, Gesch d Chalifen, i 291, 366 sqq, Muir, *The Caliphate, its Rise, Decline, and Fall*³, p 336 sqq, Wellhausen, Die religios-politischen Oppositionsparteien, p 34 sqq, do, Das arabische Reich, p 141 sq (K V Zetterstéen)

AL-MUHALLABĪ, Abū Muhammad al-Hasan b Muhammad, a vizier of Muʿizz al-Dawla He belonged to Basra and was born in Muharram 291 (= Dec 903) In 334 (945) when Muʿizz al Dawla was marching on Baghdād, he sent him in advance to negotiate with the Caliph and on Djumādā I, 27, 339 (= Nov 950) al-Muhallabī was appointed vizier He was given the supreme command in the war with ʿImrān b Shāhīn [cf Muʿizz al-Dawla] and had brought him into a very precarious position when he himself fell into an ambush and could only save himself with difficulty, whereupon Muʿizz al Dawla had to conclude peace with ʿImrān In 341 (952—953) the ruler of ʿOmān, Yūsuf b Wadjih, undertook a campaign against Basra, al Muhallabī, however, anticipated him, occupied the town and defeated Yūsuf In the same year, he fell into disgrace but was able to retain his office and the good relations between Muʿizz al-Dawla and his vizier were restored A few years later, Muʿizz al Dawla equipped an expedition against ʿOmān and put al Muhallabi in command The latter set out in Djumādā II, 352 (= June/July 963), but soon fell ill and decided to return to Baghdād He died on the way on 26th Shaʿbān of the same year (= 19th Sept 963) and was buried in Baghdad On his death Muʿizz al-Dawla confiscated all his property, a measure which aroused general indignation

Bibliography Yākūt, Irshād al Arib (ed Margoliouth), iii 180—194, Ibn Khallikān (ed Wustenfeld), N⁰ 177 (transl de Slane, i 410–412), Muhammad b Shākir, Fawāt al-Wafayāt, i 131—133, Ibn al Athir (ed Tornberg), viii 337, 365, 368 sq, 372—375, 405

(K V Zetterstéen)

MUHAMMAD, the founder of Islām, was a native of the city of Mecca, out of which the energetic Kuraish had in the sixth century created a flourishing centre of commerce by exploiting the much visited places of pilgrimage there In consequence of the unreliability of the sources at our disposal the very first question a biographer has to ask, namely when was his hero born, cannot be answered with certainty That Muhammad's activity in Medīna covered ten years (622–632) is certain, but we have no certain data for the Meccan period There is however no cogent reason to doubt the statement in a poem ascribed sometimes to Abū Kais b Abī Anas and sometimes to Hassān b Thābit (ed Hirschfeld, N⁰ 19, 1) to the effect that his prophetic activity in Mecca lasted "ten and some years" The parallelism between the two periods, which might be brought forward as a ground of suspicion, is not complete, and on the other hand, the annual recurrence of the great pilgrimage at Mecca must have made it easy for the inhabitants to reckon by them, so that a chronological statement originating there deserves more confidence than others The Meccan period in any case must not be put too short, for according to ʿUrwa's story mentioned below (Tabarī, i 1181), "several years" passed after the migration of his followers to Abyssinia before they returned, after which new difficulties arose which produced the migration to Medīna — For the period before he came forth as a religious reformer we have only the indefinite expression ʿumr (Sūra x 17) The

Muslim historians make him usually 40, sometimes 43 years old at the time of his call, which, taken with the already mentioned data, would put the date of his birth at about 570 A D When however tradition puts the date of his birth in the "year of the Elephant" (see ABRAHA and Sūra cv), this is a result of an unhistorical combination, for Abraha's attack on Mecca must have taken place considerably before 570 But Lammens has cast various, not unfounded doubts on the whole chronological calculation itself, in particular the fact that Muhammad's migration to Medina and his resultant activities there do not give the impression that he was then a man already in the fifties In reality 580 or one of the years immediately following would suit very well as the date of the Prophet's birth, so that the Kur'ānic expression 'umr would mean about 30 years

The name "Muhammad" occurred previously among the Arabs (e g Ibn Durayd, ed Wustenfeld, p 6 sq , Ibn Sa'd, I/i 111 sq) and therefore need not be regarded as an epithet only adopted later in life by the Prophet As to Muhammad's descent, several old poems (e g Hassān b Thābit, ed Hirschfeld, N° 25,7, A'shā in Ibn Hishām, p 256, 1, cf also on Dja'far Hassān b Thābit, N° 21,8, Ka'b b Mālik in Ibn Hishām, p 800, on Hamza Ibn Hisham, p 630, 7, on Abū Lahab Hassān b Thābit, N° 217,3) confirm the statement of tradition that he belonged to the family of Hāshim, and that he was recognised by them as one of themselves is evident from the fact that only the protection of a fairly powerful family could have made it possible for him to stay so long in Mecca in face of the hostility of his fellow citizens (cf the words put in the mouth of the enemies of Shu'aib [Sūra xi 93] "Had we not had consideration for thy family, we would have stoned thee") The Hāshim family related to the Banū Muttalib (Ibn Hishām, p 536, 14) was apparently one of the better class families of Mecca (cf Ibn Hishām, p 821 and the words of the poetess Kutayla, ibid, p 539, which however might be interpreted merely as a polite formula, cf Song of Solomon, vii 2, Dalman, Palastinischer Diwan, p 190, 255 sq , E Littmann, Neuarabische Volkspoesie, p 141) On the other hand, the Meccan enemies of the Prophet say in Sūra xliii 30 that they would believe in him more readily if he had been one of the prominent men of the two cities (Mecca and Tā'if) The Hāshim family in any case could not compare with the most prominent families like the Makhzūm and Umayya, and what is recorded of the needy circumstances of Muhammad and some of his relatives suggests that the Hāshim family must have been exceedingly poverty stricken at this time On his mother's side he had connections, which are not clear to us, with Medina [cf ĀMINA and HĀSHIM], according to Mūsa b 'Ukba the Medinese called al 'Abbās their "sister's son" (cf Ibn Sa'd, IV/i 8, 12) We know nothing more that is definite about his ancestry, for most of what is related is legend His father, who is said to have died before his birth, is quite a colourless figure, whose name 'Abd Allāh is perhaps only a later improvement on a heathen name His grandfather is called Shayba or 'Abd al-Muttalib, the connection between these two names is however as obscure as is that between 'Abd al-Muttalib and the oft mentioned family of Muttalib (Hassān b Thābit, N° 184, 2, Ibn Hishām, p 230, 13, 536, 14) or the Banū Shayba (Ibn Sa'd, I/i 94, 6, II/i 124, 25)

The only thing certain from the Kur'ān is that Muhammad grew up as an orphan in very miserable circumstances (Sūra, xciii 6 sq) The first tangible historical figures among his relatives are his uncles Abū Tālib, with whom tradition records that he found a kindly reception, 'Abbās, Hamza [q v] and 'Abd al-'Uzzā [cf ABŪ LAHAB] On the idyllic little story of the boy's stay with the Beduin tribe of Sa'd b Bakr, see the article HALIMA The story of the cleansing of his breast (a similar story is related of Umayya b Abi 'l Salt, cf Goldziher, Abh z Arab Phil, I 213) is a materialisation of Sūra xciv 1

In Sūra xciii already quoted, we are told that Allāh made the poor orphan prosperous Corresponding to this in tradition is the marriage of Muhammad with a rich merchant's widow, in whose service he had been [cf KHADĪDJA] She bore him four daughters, who play a part in later history, and several sons all of whom died in infancy, one of them at least must be historical as his pagan name 'Abd Manāf (Sprenger, I 199 sq , Caetani, I 173) could not be invented by later writers, such a fiction in any case, as posthumous comfort to alleviate the disgrace of the lack of male heirs (Lammens), would be very inadequate, if it had to make the sons die again soon after their birth The interest in business matters apparent in the Kur'ān (Sūra II 194, lxii 9 sq) as well as his fondness for business expressions (cf however similar expressions in the Wisdom of Solomon, iv 20, Pirqe Abot, III 16, IV 22, Horn, Gesch d Pers Lit, p 10) are very natural if Muhammad took part in business transactions as Khadidja's assistant and husband On the other hand, it would be wiser to set aside the alleged trading journeys into neighbouring lands, which he is said to have made even as a child with Abū Tālib and later in Khadidja's service, in the form in which they are given, they have distinctly apologetic tendencies [cf BAHĪRA] and are quite unnecessary to explain his later religious development Sūra xxxvii 137 sq in any case is not clear proof that he himself had passed by Lot's dwellings on a journey Nor did Khadidja equip trading caravans independently Equally little confidence is to be placed in the story, which is given in the usual marchen style, of the part played by Muhammad in rebuilding the Ka'ba

While the questions already raised are really of no great importance, the problems which concern Muhammad's début as a religious reformer are of the utmost importance but offer the greatest difficulties to the student in view of the insufficient material available in the sources The main question is whence did Muhammad, who everywhere betrays a great receptivity for foreign matter, get his ideas? That he originally shared the religious conceptions of his milieu is in every way the most natural supposition — his uncle Abū Lahab was an ardent defender of paganism and Abū Tālib, who was like a father to him, died without adopting Islām — and is confirmed not only by the name of his son already mentioned but also by Sūra xciii 3 "God found thee wandering and guided thee" (cf also xlii 52 "Thou didst not know what book or belief was" and the statement of Ibn al-Kalbi that he once brought a sheep as a sacrifice to al 'Uzzā) Distinct traces of his early beliefs survived in his later life He shared the belief of his fellow-countrymen in djinn and shayātīn, in evil omens etc Mecca with its sanctuary was a sanctified place in his eyes (Sūra xxvii 93, xxviii 57, xxix

67, cv 1 sqq, cvi 1 sqq), he admitted the sacrifices offered there into the true worship (cviii 2) and allowed his followers to take part in the pilgrimage (vii 29 sq) so that it was all the easier for him later to accept it as one of the main features of his religion (see below) We shall later discuss a relapse into paganism, which however was speedily overcome, as well as the fact that he was only gradually led to attack on principle the gods of Mecca He was also influenced by the manner of the old Arab inspired soothsayers (cf on the modern Rwala Musil, Die Kultur, 1910, p 10) to the extent that he adopted their peculiar form of speech with mysterious oaths and rhymed prose (*sadj*ᶜ, cf Goldziher, Abhandlungen z arab Philol, i 59 sqq, Masᶜūdī, Murūdj, iii 381 sq) when he began to announce his revelations All his earlier conceptions were however driven out except for such trifling residua as these, when a new world of ideas began to fill him to an ever increasing extent, until he was finally compelled with irresistible force to come forth and proclaim them These new ideas point mainly to the religions of the "possessors of a scripture" — Judaism and Christianity — and he was conscious of this, in as much as he repeatedly emphasises the agreement between his teaching and these older religions of revelation as irrefutable evidence of its truth (cf the significant passage "If thou art in doubt about what We have revealed, ask them who read the scripture before thee", Sūra x 94) The only question is, in what way did he become possessed of these new ideas This much only is certain that he did not get them from his own reading of the holy scriptures of the Jews and Christians The word ummī [q v], applied to him (Sūra vii 156) signifies, without committing us to anything about his ability in reading or writing — as a merchant he must have had a certain knowledge of these arts — that he was an illiterate layman, who was not able to read the Hebrew or Greek Bible, and that this was actually the case, the Kur'ān shows on every page For this explanation of the term Wensinck, Acta orient, ii 191 and (citing the Hebrew ummōt ha-ᶜolām) Horovitz, Koranische Untersuchungen, p 52 would put "pagan", ἐθνικός, but, although this might fit some passages, it could hardly suit Sūra ii 73 where there is a reference to a difference between the "possessors of a scripture" and the *ummiyūn*ᵃ among the Jews The usual explanation suits well enough, as it is certain and it is confirmed by the Kur'ān everywhere that, while Muhammad had some notion of the books of the Bible, the Hebrew and Greek Bibles were closed books to him Utterances like the saying that Jesus "received" the Gospels (iii 44, v 50, lvii 27) and that it should be "observed" like the law (v 70, 72) clearly show that he did not know its real contents Sūra xxi 105 contains a quotation from the Psalms, but this is quite an isolated instance and he knew nothing of the Psalms as a part of the Old Testament (xvii 57) The parable of the camel and the eye of a needle (vii 38) proves of course no literary dependence and the alleged description of Muhammad and his followers in the Gospels (xlviii 29) shows what he could build up on a vague recollection of something he had heard On the other hand the stories reproduced, e g the long account of Joseph (Sūra xii), show that he was indirectly dependent on the Bible and not only on the Old but also on the New Testament (cf what he relates of Mary, Joseph, Zacharia and John), the story of the Seven Sleepers (cf ASHĀB AL KAHF and M Huber, Die Wanderlegende von den Siebenschläfern, 1910) also presupposes Christian authorities One therefore cannot blame his enemies when they said that he had foreign teachers (xvi 105, xxv 5 sq, xliv 13), which is certainly not refuted by the reply in xvi 105 Further it is clear from the Kur'ān that he did not come into contact in this indirect way with the books of the Bible in their simple form, but that his authorities had drawn on Midrashic and Apocryphical works, which is easily explained by the varied and luxuriant character of the religious tendencies in Arabia In particular what he tells of the birth and childhood of Jesus (xix 22 sqq, iii 41, v 109 sq) comes from Apocryphal sources, and his account of the death of Jesus (iv 156) has parallels among the Manichaeans and Basilidians

To state exactly what religion exercised particular influence on Muhammad's ideas is hardly possible in view of the scanty information available about conditions in these days, especially as many things indicate that he was influenced from various sides, primarily by Christian sects, but later also by the Jews There was ample opportunity to become acquainted with both these religions from caravans passing through to Syria or the lands of the Euphrates, from communication by sea with Abyssinia, and from foreign merchants visiting the great markets, and not only in the more advanced districts of South Arabia, but also among several Bedūn tribes (e g Bakr, Taghlib, Hanīfa, Tayy), Christianity had established itself, while Jewish colonies had settled in Medina and the oases north of it But a citizen of Mecca in particular had repeated opportunities of coming into contact with Christians and Jews The great festivals attracted people from all districts and it is expressly recorded that Christians also took part in the pilgrimage (Snouck Hurgronje, Het Mekkaansche Feest, p 28, 128, 159), in addition there were Christians captured in war and immigrant Ghassānids living in Mecca (Azrakī, ed Wustenfeld, p 97, 458, 466, cf the Christian slave in Fā'if Ibn Hishām, p 280 sq) In the Kur'ān alongside of expressions coming from the Aramaic, several Ethiopic loanwords are evidence of religious influence from Abyssinia (cf Noldeke, Neue Beitrage zur semitischen Sprachwissenschaft, p 47) Recently scholars have been fond of seeking a main source of Muhammad's ideas and their formulation in the religious development which is alleged to have taken place in South Arabia This is certainly a possibility to be reckoned with, but so long as we know so little of South Arabian religious history and in particular so long as no intermediate South Arabian forms are found for the Abyssinian loanwords in the Kur'ān we are better to set it aside It should also be noted that Muhammad in his stories of the prophets frequently mentions the Arab tribes of ᶜĀd and Thamūd [q v] but only rarely touches on the older history of South Arabia (Sūra xxvii 20 sqq, xxxiv 14 sq, xliv 26, l 13, on the other hand hardly lxxxv 1 sqq, cf M Hartmann, Die arabische Frage, p 474) In the utterance ascribed to the Prophet (Bukhārī, ed Krehl, iii 56) "Belief and wisdom are Yemenī", Yemenī, as the context shows, only means "of Yemenī fashion", i e cultured, human, in contrast to Bedūn uncouthness The main objection however, is that the hypothesis would only mean an unnecessarily circuitous route, for Muhammad always appeals directly to his agreement with Christianity, without suggesting any remodelling of these religions through a South Arabian medium And the stronger one endeavours to make Yemenite influence on religious matters in Mecca, the more unintelligible becomes the stubborn opposition of the Meccans to Muhammad Much greater weight should be given to Tor Andrae's treatment of the question of Muhammad's dependence on Christianity After calling attention to the wide dissemination and dominating position of Nestorianism in the Persian empire, which is of importance as it must have been much more accessible to Muhammad than Monophysitism, he points out the close relationship between Muhammad's ideas and the ecclesiastical writings of the Syrians the contempt for worldly possessions, the strong condemnation of the arrogance and frivolity of the unbelievers, the warnings against laughing, joking and careless speech, the emphasis on the significance of almsgiving as an atonement for sin, the descriptions of Paradise (we even find the houris in Ephraim the Syrian) etc Alongside of these very instructive similarities, there is however one point to be remembered in which the relationship is somewhat modified, namely Muhammad's Christology It is, in any case, remarkable in several respects for it is distinguished from his other accounts of prophets and approximates to the teaching of the Church in striking fashion, e g in the account of the birth of Jesus and his miraculous gifts and in the undeniable echoes of the doctrine of the Logos (Sūra iii 34, iv 169) But already in the Meccan period (e g xliii 57 sqq) Muhammad vigorously rejects the idea of Christ being the son of God and definitely denies that he had ever asserted anything of the kind of himself Here it is not sufficient to point to the Nestorians since they did not deny that Christ was the son of God When Muhammad from the first insists on the complete agreement of his teaching with the old revealed religions, i e with Christianity also, he seems to have been influenced by a form of Christianity where this dogma occupied a very unimportant position

What one can deduce in this way from the Kur'ān about Muhammad's development is supplemented in an important way by tradition, according to which he was not alone in his search for a purer religion Various individuals are named who, dissatisfied with old Arab religion, were seeking for a more intellectual faith, in particular a cousin of Khadīdja, Waraka b Nawfal Even if these traditions cannot be utilised in the form in which we have them, as they have been influenced by later Muslim ideas, yet they certainly have a historical basis, because they are not taken from the Kur'ān and are not intended to show Muhammad in a more favourable light In addition there are the Hanīfs [q v] of whom the traditions of the Arabs have preserved only a very hazy picture, and Umaiya b Abi 'l Ṣalt [q v] whose poems often have points of contact with the Kur'ān, which would be of great importance if they could even in part be regarded as genuine [cf also the article MUSAILIMA]

While Muhammad was in a state of great spiritual excitement as a result of contact with the religious ideas that had penetrated into Arabia, something happened which suddenly transformed his whole consciousness and filled him with a spiritual strength which decided the whole course of his life he felt himself called to proclaim to his countrymen as a prophet the revelations which were communicated to him in a mysterious way When Caetani wishes to see in this the result of a long development and continued reflection, this is certainly not correct We have much rather every reason to trust the tradition which tells of a sudden outburst of conviction that he was called to proclaim the word of God For this view we have the analogy of prophets in general, from the Old Testament prophets down to Joseph Smith, and no long drawn reflections but only an overwhelming spiritual happening could give him the unshatterable conviction of his call This is also confirmed by several passages in the Kur'ān, which point to a deciding moment, definite in time (xliv 2 sq, xcvii, 1, ii 181), in which connection it is of minor importance whether it is possible to identify the revelation of the call itself among the Sūras of the Kur'ān (according to a common opinion, xcvi 1 sqq, according to some, on the other hand, lxxiv 1 sqq), especially as one must reckon with the possibility that the very earliest revelations were not written down If this really was the case, however, the reason certainly was not that they were deliberately suppressed, since a revolutionary change of his world of ideas into its diametrical opposite while retaining the earlier apparatus of inspiration would be quite an untenable hypothesis

The Kur'ān gives only a few hints about the manner of these inspirations, a veil lay over them which the Prophet either could not or would not raise completely Perhaps the wrapping up (lxxiii 1, lxxiv 1) refers to a preparation for the reception of the revelations in the manner of the old Arab kāhins, but we are taken further in an indirect way by the oft recurring accusation of his enemies that Muhammad was possessed (madjnūn), a soothsayer (kāhin), a magician (sāhir), for they show that in his moments of inspiration he made an impression similar to those figures well known in ancient Arabia In addition there are several traditions which describe his condition in such moments more fully and may undoubtedly be regarded as genuine, since they are the last thing later Muhammadanism might be expected to invent, while these mysterious seizures afforded to those around him the most valid evidence for the superhuman origin of his inspirations In Byzantine authors we find it stated that the Prophet was an epileptic (e g Theophanes, Chronographia, ed de Boor, i 334), and modern psychiaters recognise the correctness of these descriptions of his attacks and we must of course leave it to them to define the exact nature of his condition From the scientific point of view the fact is that the voice heard by him only uttered what he had from time to time heard from others and which now cropped up out of his subconscious The scientific student therefore does not see in Muhammad a deceiver but fully agrees with the impression of sincerity and truthfulness which his utterances in the older revelations make (e g Sūra, x 16, 20, 113, xxviii 85 sq, lxix 44, lxxv 16 sq, cf vii 202, xvi 100, the cogent imperatives lxxiv 2, xcvi 1, the self denunciation lxxx 1 sqq etc) along with the fact that he unselfishly endured years of hostility and humiliation in Mecca in the unshakable conviction of his lofty task It is more difficult with the later Medīnese revelations, in which it is often only too easy to detect the human associations, to avoid the supposition that his paroxysms (e g at the battle of Badr Ibn Hishām, p 444, in the slandering of ʿĀʾisha, p 736, 2) could sometimes be artificially brought on, and there is even a tradition which makes ʿĀʾisha say to the Prophet "Thy Lord seems to have been very quick in fulfilling thy prayers" It must not be forgotten however that natures like this, without actually being conscious of it, are able to provoke the same states of excitation, which earlier arose without their assistance, and so probably not only were his followers in Medīna (cf Kaʿb b Mālik in Ibn Hishām, p 614, 9) but even he himself convinced, that the spirit was continually hovering about him to communicate the revelations to him By this we do not of course mean that in his ecstatic condition he received the divine communications in extenso, as we now have them in the Kurʾān, only the foundations were given him, which he afterwards developed into discourses of greater length Since in doing this he used the external forms of the old Arab soothsayers it is natural that the Meccans took him for one, but it does not follow that he was spiritually akin from the first to those soothsayers who were inspired by djinns The indignation with which he objects to being associated with them is not a proof of such a relationship of which he wished to rid himself, simply because he was conscious of the similarity, but a natural result of the fact that the enlightened Meccans saw in persons of this kind ludicrous fanatics of the lowest kind, while he was firmly convinced that he was filled with quite a different spirit, one quite unfamiliar to his enemies

While it is in this way possible with the help of the Kurʾān and Tradition, to get an on the whole satisfactory picture of Muhammad's development and his condition when prophesying, he himself gives in the Kurʾān quite a different interpretation of the revelations that came to him, which is based on a peculiar theory which he apparently did not invent himself but adopted from others The fundamental idea in it is the conception of a divine book existing in heaven, al Kitāb, a well guarded book, which only the pure may touch (lvi 76 sqq), a well guarded tablet (lxxxv 21 sq), the mother of the book (xliii 2 sq), on honourable leaves, exalted and pure, by the hands of noble and pious scribes (lxxx 13 sqq) He himself did not read this book, as E Meyer erroneously thinks, but it was communicated to him orally piece by piece, not in its original form but in an Arabic version intelligible to him and his countrymen (cf xii 1, xiii 37, xx 112, xxvi 192 sqq, xli 2, xliv 58 and especially xli 44 "If we had made it a Kurʾān in a foreign tongue, they would say Why are its āyāt ["signs", from the small sections of the text] not expounded intelligibly ?, a foreign text and an Arab reader !") In addition there is the fact that Muhammad was aware that the complete contents of the book were not communicated to him, as he expressly states, e g of the stories of the prophets, not all of which were related to him (xl 78, iv 162) He received the communications orally, Allāh rehearsing to him the substance of the separate sections (lxxv 16 sqq etc), while in several passages it is stated more precisely that the revelations were communicated through the Spirit (xxvi 192 sq, xvi 104, xlii 52) or the Angel (xvi 2, xv 8, cf lii 5 sqq, lxxxi 23 sqq), a late passage of the Medīna period (ii 91) is even more precise in saying that they were communicated by Gabriel References to visions are rare (e g the encouraging apparitions in Sūra viii 45, xlviii 27, the night journey must also have been a vision) and even in such cases the main thing is not what he heard (liii 10, lxxxi 19) These communications were the great miracle that was granted him, while he expressly and repeatedly says that the ability to perform miracles in the usual sense was denied to him (unlike Jesus)

From this book in heaven, the all-comprising contents of which are not by any means exhausted in the extracts forming the Kurʾān, also came the older religions of revelation "of the possessors of a scripture", whose religions therefore in his view coincide with his and, as he often says, were confirmed by it (cf Hassān b Thābit, N° 134, 5) This again is connected with a theory expounded by him of a line of prophets which began with Adam, and of which he was the last representative His source for this idea was not Judaism, for he does not know of the great prophets who wrote books of the Old Testament, instead of them he mentions individuals, whom the Jews do not count as prophets, e g Lot, Joseph, Solomon, Job, etc , on the other hand the fact that Jesus and John the Baptist are the last links in the chain of prophets clearly suggests a Christian origin, and certain parallels in more or less heretical early Christian literature can be demonstrated Of the prophets Muhammad relates a number of stories, which do not begin to appear in any number until the middle Meccan period when the Meccans were beginning sharply to reject his mission

The ideas in the oldest, passionately excited inspirations, developed under a baroque power of imagination rarely reached later, are very simple They are based not on the dogmatic conception of monotheism but on the strong general religious and moral impression which contact with older religions had made upon him, which was bound finally to lead to a breach with polytheism In particular he was filled with the idea of the moral responsibility of man created by Allāh, and with the idea of the judgment to take place on the day of resurrection, which again points undoubtedly more to Christian than Jewish influence (cf especially the introductory sounding of trumps, not found among the Jews) To this are added vivid descriptions of the tortures of the damned and seductive pictures of the joys of Paradise, which are further of interest because they reveal Muhammad's strongly sensual temperament Gradually monotheism was emphasized as an overruling basic idea and at the same time he attained a somewhat wider conception of the Deity With all the vigour of an elemental religious nature, he points to the wonders of everyday life, especially to the marvellous phenomenon of man (in this connection cf the poem of the Jew Samawʾal, al Asmaʿiyāt, ed Ahlwardt, N° 20, 1) The religious duties which he imposes on himself and others are simple and few in number, one should believe in God, appeal to Him for forgiveness of sins (xxiii 11), offer prayers frequently on the model of the Jews and Christians, in the night also (xi 116, lxxiii 20, cf lxxvi 25 sq), assist one's fellow-men, especially those who are in need, free oneself from the love of delusive wealth and — what is significant for the commercial life of Mecca — from all forms of cheating (xxvi 182 sq, lv 8 sq), lead a chaste life and not expose newborn girls, as the barbarous custom of the time was (according to Sūra vi 152, xvii 33 from poverty, cf al-Mubarrad, Kāmil, ed Wright, p 277, originally perhaps a kind of magic to procure sons, when only girls had been born, cf Musil, Kuṣair ʿAmra, p 38, even before Muhammad's time there had been people who fought against this barbarous custom, cf al Mubarrad, Kāmil, loc cit) This is the ideal of the truly pious man who is called by the name of muslim (lxviii 35, xxi 108 etc) or ḥanīf (x 105, xxx 29, xcviii 4, cf vi 79 and the article) Cf in this connection the list of Muhammad's precepts in Aʿshā's poem (Ibn Hishām, p 255, Morgenlandische Forschungen, p 25 sq)

From all this, it is quite evident that Muhammad had at this time no thought of founding a new religion His task was only to be a "warner" (li 50, lxxiv 2, lxxix 45, lxxx 11, lxxxviii 21 sqq), in view of the approach of the day of judgment, to his countrymen, to whom no prophet had yet been sent (vi 157, xxviii 46, xxxii 2, xxxiv 43, xxxvi 51, no notice is taken here of Hūd and Sālih) and as a result of the revelations granted him to give them, in the form of a lucid Arabic Kurʾān (see above), what the "possessors of a scripture" had in their scriptures, which were not accessible to the Arabs and thereby to save them from the divine wrath The Jews and Christians also must therefore testify to the truth of his preaching (x 94, xvi 45, xxi 7, xxvi 197, xxviii 52 etc)

On account of the insufficiency of the sources, it is very difficult to ascertain in detail how Muhammad's relations with the Meccans developed The Kurʾān contains only vague hints, which permit no chronological arrangement, while the traditions are very full but little reliable Only one report, which ʿUrwa composed for the caliph ʿAbd al-Malik (Tabarī, i 1180 sq, 1224 sq), the value of which has already been indicated by Sprenger, gives a brief but apparently trustworthy glimpse of the main events (cf also al-Zuhrī in Ibn Saʿd, I/i 133) At first Muhammad met with no serious opposition and in not a few cases his preaching fell on fruitful soil, indeed in the words addressed to Sālih (xi 64) we may find a hint that he had at first aroused considerable expectations among the Meccans All traditions agree that Khadīja was the first believer, while they differ as to who was his first male adherent In any case Abū Bakr, the manumitted slave Zaid b Hāritha, Zubair b al ʿAwwām, Talha b ʿUbaid Allāh, ʿAbd al-Rahmān b ʿAwf, Saʿd b Abī Wakkās, and Muhammad's cousin ʿAlī [q v] were among his earliest followers The majority of those who were won over by his preaching were however young and of no great social standing, while the well-to-do and influential held back (xix 74, xxxiv 30 sqq, xxxviii 62 sq, lxxiii 11, lxxx 1 sqq, cf the veiled references in vii 73, xi 29, xvii 17, xxvi 111) This became still more the case when the full consequences of his ideas became clear to him and he openly attacked the religion of his native town, for the Meccans, to the majority of whom such devotional meetings had been a matter of complete indifference, now discovered that a religious revolution might be dangerous to their fairs and their trade That this was the salient feature of their resistance to Muḥammad is evident from the fact that he frequently endeavours to calm the fears of the Kuraish on this point the Meccan sanctuary, he said, belonged to his god Allāh, whom the Meccans also recognised as the highest god (xxxi 24, xxxix 39, cf Kais b al-Khatīm, ed Kowalski, v 14, xiii 12 where Allāh is the lord of the Kaʿba) and he will protect and bless his sanctuary, if they submit to him (xxvii 93, xxviii 57, xxix 67, cvi 1 sqq) In addition there was the conservative attitude of these merchants in the field of religion and their animosity to new and fantastic ideas, particularly to that of the resurrection of the dead

Traditions record at great length the persecution and ill treatment which Muhammad and his followers suffered at the hands of the Meccans These descriptions are undoubtedly much exaggerated, for the object was to glorify the self-sacrifice of the believers and no doubt also to put the old patrician families of Mecca in an unfavourable light But it is equally certain that there is some foundation for these stories ʿUrwa speaks of two persecutions (fitna) which twice forced the believers to migrate, and in the Kurʾān there is mention of "trials" which their opponents inflicted upon the believers, men and women (lxxxv 10), and it is expressly mentioned that the influential wished to prevent Muhammad from praying (xcvi 9 sq, cf the veiled account vii 84), while on the other hand, the complaints about what they would have liked to do should not be taken at their face value without more ado (viii 26, xxxvi 17, xvii 78, cf xi 93) The peculiar feature, repeatedly found in stories of the prophets, that their opponents threaten them and their followers with stoning (Sūra xi 93 and frequently) might suggest the hypothesis that Muhammad was actually threatened in this way by the Meccans, but this would probably only have been in a momentary outburst of passion and in any case the quarrel was mainly conducted in endless wordy disputations in which the spiritual advantage lay with Muhammad His strength lay in the consciousness that he lived in a higher intellectual world which was closed to the Meccans and that he proclaimed ideas, "the equal of which neither men nor djinn with combined efforts could produce" (xvii 90) Very pertinently he often points to the lack of logic in his enemies, when they recognise Allāh as the real true God but will not draw the logical deductions from this But even his most crushing arguments rebounded from the impregnable wall of their prejudices which were based on their material interests This circumstance now began to influence the matter of his preaching in a very remarkable way When his opponents mocked him because the divine judgment threatened by him did not come (xxxviii 15, lxx 5) he began to describe in an increasing degree in his stories how the contemporaries of earlier prophets had met them with incredulity and had therefore brought on their heads dreadful punishments That he did not use such means at the very beginning of his mission is evident from the fact that his preaching, according to the already mentioned credible tradition, at first gave no offence, and indeed this feature is lacking in the sūras which are certainly the oldest It was the hardness of heart of his countrymen which made him take to this weapon in order to stir them At first it proved by no means ineffective, as the Arabs knew of old trading peoples like the

Thamūd [q v], whose destruction might well give them cause for reflection But gradually this line of attack lost its effect To Muhammad however this resistance to the obvious truth was something so unintelligible that he could only find solace in an idea, which was to be of far-reaching importance in the further development of Muhammadan dogmatics Allāh, the immeasurably exalted and almighty, could of course not be impeded by the resistance of mortals, the unbelief of the Prophet's opponents was therefore an effect of the divine will "Allāh makes to err whom he will and guides whom he will" (x 99, xxxii 12 sqq, xxxv 9, lxxiv 34 etc), a view which his enemies endeavoured not unskilfully to turn against himself (xvi 37, xxxvi 47)

Several episodes stand out in the Meccan period which are unfortunately more or less obscure and may be interpreted in various equally uncertain ways It is certain, in spite of the silence maintained about it in the Kur'ān (even xvi 43 sq does not refer to it), that Muhammad's community was at one time in so great distress that a considerable section of them migrated to Abyssinia The later view was that participation in this flight became a patent of nobility similar to that conferred by the great Hidjra to Medina, which was actually granted as a titular distinction (Wellhausen, Skizzen, iv 113), but the Prophet gave the advice to seek protection among the Abyssinian Christians only to those of his followers, of whom he was afraid that they had not sufficient strength to maintain their faith under the difficult conditions in Mecca (cf the significant story of the cool reception which some of the exiles later received on their return to Medīna, Bukhārī, ed Krehl, iii 128) M Hartmann's view that the emigrants were to conduct political propaganda in Abyssinia is not capable of proof According to 'Urwa, these emigrants (i e probably the greater number of them) returned to their native town, when Islām had become strengthened by the accession to its ranks of a number of individuals of position At the same time there is a different story of their return, which it would not be difficult to combine with 'Urwa's story if we assume that they gradually drifted back We are told that Muhammad proclaimed in one of his sermons that the favourite deities of the Meccans, al-Lāt, al-'Uzzā and Manāt [see these articles], might be regarded as divine beings whose intercession was effectual with Allāh This led to a general reconciliation, news of which reached Abyssinia and induced a number of the Muslims there to return home Here however they learned to their horror that the agreement had been of short duration, as the Prophet had very soon recognised these words as interpolations of Satan and had substituted for them the words which we now have in Sūra liii 19—23 The credibility of this story has been doubted, certainly wrongly, for in view of the absolute impossibility of such a story being a later invention, any possible objections to the reliability of the authorities cited (Tabarī, i 1192, 1195, Ibn Sa'd, i/i 137 sq) hardly deserve consideration and passages like vi 56, 57, xvii 75 sq (cf iv 113) amply show that the incident was quite possible from the psychological point of view

It is much more difficult to elucidate another episode of the Meccan period, the story of the boycott of the Hāshimids That Muhammad's whole position during his struggle with the Meccans was only made possible by the support given him by his own family has already been indicated All members of the family of Hāshim with the exception of Abū Lahab [q v], who on this account is perpetually damned in the Kur'ān along with his wife, chivalrously fulfilled their duty in this respect, although only a few of them believed in his call It would therefore be not unnatural in itself for the Meccans in the end to attempt to make the whole family innocuous without bringing on themselves the guilt of bloodshed by an open attack The story, however, which tells how they forced the Hāshimids to withdraw into their own part of the town and pledged themselves to refrain from intermarriage or commerce with them, is confirmed neither by the Kur'ān nor by 'Urwa, but sounds in itself somewhat suspicious and is probably much exaggerated That the effort finally failed is conceded by the story itself On the other hand, it is quite possible that Khadīdja's fortune may have suffered considerably from Muhammad's obligations to his necessitous followers and from the enmity of the influential merchant princes

To the last portion of the Meccan period most probably belongs Muhammad's nocturnal journey, later so celebrated, to the "remotest place of prayer", to which xvii 1 (perhaps also verse 62) briefly refers, no doubt a vision, which however made upon him an impression of reality According to the prevailing opinion, the terminus of this journey was the temple in Jerusalem, and conclusions are drawn from this about the great significance which this city then had for him Schrieke (Isl, vi 1 sqq) and Horovitz (ibid, ix 159 sqq) have however sought to show that masdjid al-aksā refers to the place of prayer of the angels in heaven (cf vii 205, xxxix 75), for which view several cogent arguments can be produced, notably that the nocturnal journey is associated with the journey to heaven as early as in the tradition given by Ibn Ishāk and that in the Kur'ān there is several times a reference to an ascent into heaven (vi 35, xvii 92 sqq, xv 14 sq)

Of other details we may further recall that Muhammad, who, as already remarked, was firmly convinced that his preaching agreed with the religion of the "possessors of a scripture", nevertheless had already begun in Mecca to reject the christological dogmas of the church This is certain from the conversation with his pagan opponents (xlii 57 sqq) which can only have taken place in Mecca This however does not affect his idea of the fundamental identity of his with the older revelations but only the false doctrine later adopted in the church, for he makes Jesus vigorously reject the doctrine of his divinity, but this limitation of his theory was not without importance and was able to serve him as a model in his later criticism of Judaism

The sources are somewhat fuller for the close of the Meccan period, although late tendencious historiography has coloured everything in the traditions According to 'Urwa's account, Muhammad did, it is true, succeed in winning a few notables in Mecca (including probably 'Umar) for his teaching, after the emigration of a number of his followers to Abyssinia But on the whole his attempt at a religious reformation could be regarded as having failed, and when Khadīdja and Abū

Tālib died, his position gradually became more and more hopeless An attempt to establish himself in Ṭā'if brought him into considerable danger, according to the narrative, although the approval of his preaching expressed by some ǧinn (cf xlvi 28, lxxii 1) certainly raised his drooping spirits It was probably at this period that Muṭ'im b ʿAdī took him under his protection, which is corroborated by Ḥassān b Thābit (N⁰ lxxxviii) He could now have consoled himself with the reflection that he had done his duty as a "warner" and could regard it as the will of Allāh that his countrymen were not to be saved (cf x 99, xliii 89) But the consciousness of being a chosen instrument of Allāh had gradually become so powerful within him that he was no longer able to sink back into an inglorious existence with his object unachieved His astonishing gift of being able to exert a powerful religious suggestion even on men who were intellectually superior to him imperiously demanded a wider sphere of activity than a small number of adherents, mostly without influence In addition, there was a factor of which he himself was certainly unconscious but which is apparent on every page of the Meccan sūras, namely his mental exhaustion All this brought him to the idea of looking for a new sphere of activity outside Mecca, however difficult it must have been for an Arab to break the links that bound him to his tribe and family The congress of people from all parts at the pilgrimage gave him good opportunities to attempt to find one After several unsuccessful negotiations he found a favourable soil for his scheme with some men from Medina Unfortunately we know very little about conditions at this time in this town [q v] but we may safely assume that the large number of Jews in it had contributed to make the peasant population of Medina somewhat familiar with religious ideas (cf Ibn Hishām, p 178) There is however no question that the Medinese did not so much want to attract an inspired preacher to themselves as to get a political leader, who would readjust their political relations, which had been shattered in the tribal conflicts culminating in the battle of Buʿaṯ [q v] With this we are faced with one of the most difficult problems in the biography of Muhammad, the double personality which he presents to us The inspired religious enthusiast, whose ideas mainly centred around the coming last judgment, who had borne all insults and attacks, who only timidly touched on the possibility of active resistance (xvi 127) and preferred to leave everything to Allāh's intervention, with the migration to Medīna enters upon a secular stage and at one stroke shows himself a brilliant political genius That Muhammad's eye in Mecca took in the wider political situation is evident from the prophecy in Sūra xxx 1 sq, but the passage is quite isolated there and in any case M Hartmann's effort (Die arabische Frage, p 53), to make him play the part of a far seeing diplomat in international politics is based on fanciful arguments with no basis in the sources Nevertheless in the despatch of a section of his followers to Abyssinia and in the attempt to reach a compromise with the polytheists in Mecca, we have hints which to some extent bridge over the gulf between the two figures The decisive point however is that the Medinese would certainly not have thought of seeking in him a saviour from their social and political difficulties, if they had not been much impressed by his abilities in this direction

After Muhammad had entered into relations with some Medinese who had come as pilgrims to Mecca, the latter began to spread Islām in their native town along with men whom he had sent there and thus he was able after a preliminary conference in al-ʿAḳaba [q v] to conclude at the pilgrimage next year (622) at the same place a formal agreement with a considerable number of Medinese, in which they pledged themselves in the name of their fellow citizens, to take him into their community and to protect him as one of their own citizens, which, as the further history shows, was also to hold for his Meccan followers if they moved to Medina Tradition, and no doubt rightly, here mentions only the promise of the Medinese to take Muhammad under their protection and not any further obligations On the other hand according to Ibn Hishām, p 287, at the first conference at ʿAḳaba Muhammad is said to have imposed a series of commands upon them, but this so called "women's homage" is, as the very name shows, taken from the later Sūra lx 12 and is clearly adapted to Meccan conditions (cf especially the vow not to kill children) These negotiations, which could not remain unknown to the Meccans, produced great bitterness, and a second fitna, as ʿUrwa says, began for the believers, which must have still more confirmed them in their resolution to migrate to Medina They slipped away in larger or smaller bodies, so that finally only Muhammad with Abū Bakr and, according to the story ʿAlī, was left That the Prophet did not go with the others was certainly due to the fact that the Meccans otherwise would have prevented the whole emigration They knew him well enough to see the danger if he were to ally himself with another tribe and there is therefore no reason to doubt Tradition when it relates, although with much legendary embellishment (cf on David's flight Ṭabarī, i 556), how he had to be the last to flee from the town Tradition is also confirmed by Sūra ix 40 where there is mention of Muhammad and his companion (Abū Bakr) stopping in the cave

The migration of the Prophet, the Hiǧra [q v], has been with justice taken by the Muslims as the starting-point of their chronology, for it forms the first stage in a movement which in a short time became of significance in the history of the world According to the usual calculation, he arrived in Kubā', a suburb of Medina, on the 12th Rabīʿ I of the first year, i e Sept 24, 622 and shortly after went into his new home The tasks which awaited him placed the greatest strain on his diplomatic and organizing abilities He could only rely with absolute certainty on those who had migrated with him (the *Muhāǧirūn*ª, q v) for their whole future existence depended entirely on him and of course only those had migrated who were firmly convinced of the truth of his mission In addition, there were those Medinese who had already adopted Islām or did so soon after his arrival, the so-called Anṣār [q v] or "helpers", who however formed only a portion of the inhabitants of Medīna He only found direct opposition in a few families, like the ʿAws Allāh, but at the same time there were a number who while they did not exactly oppose him only reluctantly accepted the new relations, the so called *munāfikūn*ª [q v], who were to cause him much anxiety Fortunately for him, they were led by a man, the Khazradjī ʿAbd Allāh b Ubaiy, who possessed the munāfik quality of irresolution to such an extent that he regularly let slip every occasion on which he might have offered successful opposition A further danger lay in the fact that the old and bitter feud between the two chief parties, the ʿAws and Khazradj, had by no means died down, but might easily break out again on any occasion Finally there were the Jews (in the first place al-Kʿāhnān, i e the Nadīr and Kuraiza, cf Kais b al-Khatīm, ed Kowalski, xx, Hassān b Thābit, N⁰ 216, 19, Ibn Hishām, p 660 and Ibn Saʿd, viii 86, 91) and the judaicised tribes in Medīna, who played an important part because of their wealth and the support they had in the Jewish colonies in Khaibar etc For Muhammad they were on the whole a plus factor in his calculations for, according to his theory already mentioned, he ought to expect that they would champion the truth of his preaching His relations with the Christians in Medina (cf Hassān b Thabit, N⁰ 133, 17) were no longer absolutely unstrained, since he had begun in Mecca to reject the orthodox ecclesiastical Christology, but they were insignificant and could be ignored He also had a much greater sympathy with them than with the Jews (v 85, lvii 27)

Muhammad had to form a united community out of these heterogeneous elements The first problem to be tackled was how to procure the necessary means of subsistence for the emigrants, who were for the most part without means or work, which could for the time being only be done through the self sacrifice of the Ansār and certainly only very inadequately To strengthen their claims for protection, he ordered the relationship of brotherhood to be created between each emigrant and a man of Medina This arrangement, to which was added brotherhood between every two emigrants, was abolished after the battle of Badr by Sūra xxxiii 6 and left only a few traces (see Ibn Saʿd, iii xxxiv) On the other hand, we possess for a somewhat later period, when relations between Muhammad and the Jews had begun to be strained, a very valuable document in Muhammad's constitution of the community which has been preserved by Ibn Ishāk It reveals his great diplomatic gifts, for it allows the ideal which he cherished of an umma definitely religious in outlook to sink temporarily into the background and is shaped essentially by practical considerations It is true that the highest authority is with Allāh and Muhammad, before whom all matters of importance are to be laid, but the umma included also Jews and pagans, so that the legal forms of the old Arab tribes are substantially preserved This scheme had however no considerable practical importance, it is nowhere mentioned in the Kurʾān (hardly even in viii 58), because it was soon rendered obsolete by the rapidly changing conditions

It is a proof of the Prophet's political wisdom that he endeavoured to attach the Jews to himself by taking over several features of their worship Thus he made the 10th Muharram a fast-day, obviously in imitation of the Jewish fast on the 10th Tishri, the day of atonement, which is particularly obvious in its name, taken from the Aramaic (ʿāshūrāʾ) On Jewish practice are probably also based the introduction of the midday salāt, which was now (ii 239) added to the morning and evening salāts and the easier rule about purification before the salāt (iv 46, v 97) On the other hand, Friday as the day of the common salāt, which probably goes back to the Jewish day of preparation (cf Becker's correction to Ibn Saʿd, III/i 83, 23, in Isl, iii 519), is said to have been already introduced before the Hidjra by Musʿab b ʿUmair (according to others, Asad b Zurāra) Whether the choice of Jerusalem as the kibla [q v] was one of the concessions made to the Medinese Jews is uncertain as the statements about his attitude in Mecca on this point differ But it is improbable that he should have turned towards the Kaʿba there, otherwise it is difficult to understand how the different stories could have arisen But whether he then used Jerusalem as the kibla, which need not necessarily mean a borrowing from the Jews, as this direction of prayer was elsewhere found in the east, e g among the Ebionites and Elkesaites, whether he turned to the east like many Christians, or whether he had a kibla at all (the Kurʾān is silent on the point) is uncertain, but in any case the balance of probability is in favour of the Jerusalem kibla having been one of the alterations made to gratify the Medinese Jews If some writers have seen in the immediate erection of a place of prayer (Ibn Hishām, p 336) a copying of the Jewish synagogues, Caetani has with weighty reasons argued that this was not a building definitely assigned to the worship of God, since the alleged masdjid was also used for all kinds of secular purposes, because in reality it was simply the court-yard (dār) occupied by Muhammad and his family, while the assemblies for regular worship were held on the musallā [cf MADĪNA] But nevertheless the "mosque of opposition" so called by the Prophet with horror (Sūra ix 108, see below) seems to have been an actual building recalling the Jewish synagogues In spite of these concessions to the Jews, it soon became obvious that he had seriously miscalculated with regard to them Although they undoubtedly cherished lively expectations of the coming of the Messiah (Ibn Hishām, p 286, 373 sq) they could not possibly recognise an Arab as the expected Messiah and he had soon reason to lament that only a few among them believed in him (iii 106) In particular, the misunderstandings in his reproduction of the Old Testament stories or laws aroused the notorious Jewish love of ridicule and thus brought him into an unfortunate position His conviction of the divine origin of his mission and his position among the believers would not allow him to confess that he had made a mistake and on the other hand he had too often himself appealed to the testimony of the older religions of revelation to be able to ignore this criticism He rescued himself from this dilemma by asserting that the Jews had only received a portion of the revelation (iv 47, cf iii 115) and even this included a number of special laws adapted to a particular age (iv 158, vi 147, xvi 119) but they had also concealed all sorts of things in their holy scriptures (ii 39, 141, 154, 169, iii 64 etc) and indeed had even falsified their scriptures (ii 56, iv 48, v 16, 45, vii 162, cf Hassān b Thābit, N⁰ 96, 2, and the article TAHRĪF), in short they obtained hardly more benefit from their scriptures than an ass from the books which he is carrying on his back (lxii 5) The Jews were not able to refute these assertions for, although he challenged them to produce these scriptures

(III 87) neither he nor his followers could read a word of them He therefore now poured forth the vials of his wrath upon the Jews in many speeches and awaited the time when he would be able to refute their criticism and malicious witticisms and tergiversations in convincing fashion (e g III 177 sqq, IV 48) As he had now already begun to regard the church doctrine of the Christians as a corruption of the true teaching of Jesus, he felt himself called upon to reform the degenerate religions of revelation, each of which asserted it was the only true one (II 107) As a result he now claimed a special place among the prophets he is seal of the prophets (XXXIII 40, a metaphorical expression which Mani among others applied to himself and which indicates the conclusion of the series), he is the last prophet, to whom Jesus himself had pointed under the name Ahmad (LXI 6, cf III 75) Still he is not thinking any more than before of introducing a new religion but only of restoring the religion proclaimed by the prophets from the beginning But nevertheless the early years after the migration were the period when Muhammadanism was born as an independent religion, for parallel with his criticism of the religions of revelation and in particular opposition to Judaism ran a positive shaping of Islām, through which he was emancipating himself in important points from his previous models He gave his religion a pronounced national character by taking over various elements from the worship of the old Arabs and associating them with his religious ideas In the second year of the Hidjra (July 623—June 624) after some hesitation, he ordered that Jerusalem should no longer be the kibla at prayer but the ancient sanctuary of the Black Stone at Mecca (II 136—145) for it "is a gathering-place and a safe retreat for men" (II 119) His native town was thus made the centre of the true religion As a substitute for the pilgrimage which he now adopted into his religion as one of the main rites, but from which he and his followers were temporarily cut off, he had an animal sacrificed in this year on the 10th Dhu 'l-Hidjdja on the musallā in Medina (Tabarī, I 1362, according to Ibn Sa'd, I/II, 9 he continued this after the occupation of Mecca) and in the following year he calls the hadjdj one of the obligations of believers towards Allāh (III 90 sq) Friday retained its significance but was not to be a day of rest like the Jewish Sabbath (LXII 9 sq), which is connected with his rejection of the Old Testament idea of God resting after the creation (L 37) In place of the fasting on 'Āshūrā', he substituted quite a new particular rite, according to which his followers were to fast throughout Ramadān, the month, in which he had received the fundamental revelation (II 281), as long as the sun was visible in the heavens The Manichaeans had a similar custom, but whether he took the new revelation from them or from another sect cannot be ascertained [cf RAMADĀN]

This nationalisation of Islām, which was to have so many results, gave Muhammad a final legitimation, which brought it into harmony with his earlier appeal to the religions of revelation, as he came forward as the restorer of the religion of Abraham (millat Ibrāhim) which had been corrupted by the Jews and Christians Abraham, whom Jews and Christians alike regarded as the great type of faith and whom he had himself emphatically indicated as the true hanīf (e g VI 79), now becomes the great hanīf, not only in contrast to the heathen but also to the possessors of a scripture (neither polytheist, nor Jew nor Christian [II 129, III 60, 89] wherefore, as Snouck Hurgronje has shown, VI 162 and XVI 124 must also be Medinese) He and his son Ishmael, the ancestor of the Arabs, founded the Meccan sanctuary and the rites celebrated here, now corrupted by the heathen, which Muhammad is to restore (II 118 sq, XXII 27 sqq) Whether this bold idea, which according to Sūra III 58 met with opposition from the possessors of a scripture, was an original one and in this case a really brilliant invention of Muhammad's or whether it was already in existence, for example among arabicised Jews, cannot be decided The only thing certain is that he cannot have been acquainted with it in Mecca for we meet it nowhere in connection with mentions of the Ka'ba and it is actually excluded by the passages mentioned above (p 726a)

While his religion was being transformed in this way, Muhammad's personal position was being gradually changed by the altered conditions According to the already mentioned constitution of the community, all important matters were to be laid before Allāh and himself It now became a fundamental duty of the believers to be obedient to Allāh and to himself (III 3, 29, 126, 166, IV 17 sq, 62 [where it is added "and to those among you who have to exercise authority"], V 93, XXIV 51, 62, cf also IX 12, the "women's homage" which is inserted in the account of the second conference at 'Akaba, Ibn Hisham, p 289) and those who are disobedient are threatened with the tortures of hell (IX 64) Alongside of the belief in Allāh now appears belief in the Prophet (XLVIII 9, LXIV 8 etc) Allah is his protector, as is Gabriel, and the angels are at his disposal (LXVI 4) He claims certain privileges, which suggest a worldly mortal rather than a spiritual leader (XXIV 62, XLIX 2 sqq, XXIV 63, LVIII 13 sq, XXXIII 53) but which however must be described as quite moderate demands

The elevation of Mecca to be the centre of his religion imposed on Muhammad new tasks, which were soon to lead to unexpected results If visiting the holy places in and around Mecca was a duty of the Muslims, who were excluded from the town (XXII 25 sq), the result was the inevitable necessity of forcing admission to them In addition the Prophet had an account to settle with the Meccans, for by his expulsion they had triumphed over him in the eyes of the world and the punishment repeatedly threatened them had not materialised, unlike the stereotyped punishments of the godless in the stories of the prophets This led to a new command, that of the holy war ("war on the path of Allāh", al-djihād, Q V), and to set such a war in motion now became the object of his endeavour, which he tenaciously pursued There were however considerable difficulties in the way of achieving this object The Medinese had only pledged themselves to defend him like one of their number if he were attacked, and the anything but warlike merchants of Mecca were not inclined to oblige him by beginning The emigrants were, it is true, not bound in this way, but it went nevertheless very much against their feelings as Arabs openly to fight members of their tribe and blood relations How much their resistance vexed him is shown by the vigorous reproaches which he makes to his followers in this connection (II 212, XXII 39 sqq etc) He succeeded however in finding a way out of the difficulty, which might be able to pave the way for military enterprises without injuring these feelings too much After he had sent different men with small armed forces who did not succeed in encountering the enemy, in Radjab, one of the sacred months in which all fighting was forbidden, he sent some of his followers to Nakhla, where a caravan was expected and gave their leader sealed orders in which he left it to their judgment what they should do They did not disappoint him for they fell upon the caravan which felt secure until the end of the month and one of the Meccans was killed The rich plunder was sent to Medina, where in the meanwhile a storm of indignation had broken out Muhammad however gave the people time to recover and finally calmed them, by the revelation II 214 The success of the coup had had such an effect in Medina that not only emigrants but also a number of Ansār offered their services, when he appealed for followers in Ramadān 2 A H in a new raid, which he himself would lead On this occasion chance came to his aid in unexpected fashion He had learned that a rich caravan was on its way from Syria and he decided to ambush it at Badr [q v] The very cautious Abū Sufyān [q v] who was leading the caravan got wind of his plan however and sent messengers express to Mecca for help But when by a diversion to the coast he had reached safety, he soon afterwards sent other messengers to Mecca to cancel the first message The angered Meccans had however already collected an army which was three times the size of Muhammad's little handful of men and were unwilling to let the opportunity escape of properly chastising their troublesome enemy They went to Badr where soon afterwards Muhammad arrived with his men, expecting to meet Abū Sufyān's helpless caravan When they discovered their mistake they were filled with terror (VIII 5 sqq, cf the continuation of ʿUrwa's story Ṭabarī, I 1284 sq), but the Prophet saw in the encounter the wonderful dispensation of Allāh, who wished to force them to a battle and his remarkable power of suggestion was able so to inspire his men that they completely routed the far superior enemy A number of the Meccans, including the leader of the aristocrats Abū Djahl, were slain and several, including Muhammad's uncle ʿAbbās, were brought prisoners to Medina, where Muhammad had two of them, al-Nadr and ʿUkba b Abī Muʿait, put to death, while the others were held to ransom This in our eyes very insignificant fracas, which however must be judged in light of the observation by Doughty who knew the country (Travels, II 378), became of the utmost significance for the history of Islām, for Muhammad saw in the victory a powerful confirmation of his belief in the superiority of Allāh (VIII 17, 66, III 119, cf Kaʿb b Mālik, in Ibn Hishām, p 520 sq) and in his own call, and besides the commercial city of Mecca enjoyed such great prestige in Arabia that its conqueror was bound to attract all eyes to himself He therefore displayed even greater energy and was able to utilise the advantages he had won After he had drawn up the programme given in Sūra VIII 57 sqq he began to besiege the Jewish tribe of Kainukāʿ in their forts The Munāfikūn[a] did not dare to oppose him seriously and the other Jews left their co-religionists in the lurch in shameful fashion (cf IIX 14) so that the latter were forced to migrate to Transjordania

In order to protect himself while fighting from attacks from another foe, Muhammad at this time adopted a plan which is a further proof of his outstanding political ability He concluded, as a number of letters that have been preserved show (cf J Sperber, Mitteilungen des Seminars für orient Sprachen, 1916), as lord of Medina, alliances with a number of Beduin tribes in which the two parties pledged themselves to assist one another

In the year 3 A H (June 624—June 625) Muhammad continued his attacks on the Meccan caravans so that the Kuraish finally saw the necessity of taking more vigorous measures and revenging themselves for Badr An army of 3,000 men was equipped and set out with much display for Medina under the leadership of Abū Sufyān, who was little suited for the task Although several of his followers advised Muhammad to make his defence within the town, he decided to go out with his forces, which, had been much reduced by the departure of the Munāfikūn, and took up a position at the foot of the hill of Uhud [q v] In spite of the numerical superiority of the Meccans, the fighting at first went in favour of the Muslims, until a number of archers who had been placed to defend his flank joined against Muhammad's express orders in the battle, which promised to yield rich booty and this at once enabled Khālid b al-Walid to fall upon Muhammad's flank The tables were now turned and many of the Muslims began to flee, especially when the rumour spread that the Prophet had fallen (cf III 138) In reality he was only wounded and escaped with a few faithful followers through a ravine on to the south side of the hill Fortunately for him, the Meccans were quite incompetent to follow up their victory and as they thought that Muhammad had been punished and their honour saved, they turned quietly back to Mecca The Prophet was thus saved from the worst, but he had to lament many fallen friends including Hamza [q v] and his newly acquired prestige naturally also suffered With all the eloquence in his power he endeavoured to raise the morale of his followers by exhortation and censure alike (III 114 sq, 133—154, 159—200) but the consequences of his reverse did not fail to materialise The Jews who had taken no part in the fighting (according to Ibn Hishām, they were observing the Sabbath), made no secret of their delight at his misfortune, and several Beduin tribes next year (4 A H = June 625–beginning of June 626, the eclipse of the moon which took place in Djumādā II of this year was that visible in Medina in the night of Nov 19–20, 625, cf Rhodokanakis, in W Z K M XIV 105, Caetani, I 598 sq) showed how much his prestige with them had sunk [cf BIʾR MAʿŪNA] It was therefore all the more necessary to make an example and another Jewish tribe in Medina, the Nadir, seemed a suitable object after Kaʿb b Ashraf's (q v and cf Hassān b Thābit, N[o] 97) murder had served as a prelude It is made a charge against them in Sūra LIX 4 that they defy Allāh and his messenger, on which account Tradition imputes all sorts of crimes to them After a siege of several weeks (Ṭabarī, I 1850, cf Euting, Tagebuch, p 111) they were forced to emigrate to Khaibar or Syria They left behind them their weapons and their gold and silver as a rich booty, the distribution of which on this occasion Muhammad reserved for himself (lix 6 sqq)

To this period most probably belongs the prohibition of the drinking of wine which is characteristic of Islām (v 92 sq, cf the instructive gradation in lxxxiii 25, xvi 69, iv 46, ii 216, where the word "great" is to be deleted as Schwally proposes) It has been connected with a number of features of life in the old Semitic east but the main reason should rather be sought in the connection with the maisir games [q v] Drinking-bouts with feasting on a specially slain camel and games of chance, which were in the eyes of the old Arabs the bright spots in their hard struggle for existence, and in which they endeavoured to display their nobility and hospitality, brought the Muslims into suspicious relations with pagans and with Christian and Jewish wine-sellers, which might easily lead to their faltering in their new religion (cf Wākidī, transl Wellhausen, p 100, Bukhārī, ed Krehl, ii 270 sq), and this might explain why he forbade both at the same time, which of course does not exclude the possibility that forms of abstinence for other reasons may have been known to him (Musailima's prohibition of wine was obviously intended as asceticism, cf the article) While Muhammad was endeavouring to restore his weakened authority, a new and threatening storm came upon him and Medina from Mecca The Kuraish, whose caravans were being continually harassed by him (cf Hassān b Thābit, N° 16, 6 sq) and who were urged on by the Jews of Khaibar, recognised that the victory at Uhud had only been a blow in the air and realised the necessity of occupying Medīna, which they had then neglected to do Conscious of their slight military skill, they negotiated vigorously with various Beduin tribes and thus raised a large army — said to have been 10,000 men — with which they set out against Medīna in the year 5 (June 626—May 627) The various accounts of the season of the year (sometimes a month after the barley harvest, sometimes cold winter storms, the latter in agreement with Sūra xxxiii 9, cf Hassān b Thābit, N° 14, 9) may be reconciled by the possibility that the siege lasted a considerable time (cf Doughty's description, Travels, ii 429 sqq of the siege of ʿAnēze, which in general illustrates this war excellently) The advance of this imposing army produced great consternation in Medīna, which was still further increased by the vacillating attitude of the Munāfikūn[a] and by the discovery or perhaps only the suspicion that the Jews were conspiring with the enemy (xxxiii 10 sqq, 26) Muhammad in order to strengthen the defences had a ditch (khandak, a Persian word) dug in front of the unprotected parts of the town According to several stories, he did this on the advice of a Persian named Salmān but J Horovitz (cf Isl, xii 178—183) would reject this as a later accretion Modest as the defences were — about 150 years later ʿĪsā b Mūsā bridged the ditch which had been restored by Muhammad b ʿAbd Allāh, by throwing a few doors across it — they seem to have imposed upon the enemy who had little experience in the art of war and the siege gradually dragged on The able lord of Medīna used the time for secret negotiations with the Ghatafān and cleverly stirred up distrust of one another among his opponents and when at the same time the weather conditions became unfavourable the besiegers lost heart and gradually began to retire so that the last effort of the Kuraish to destroy their sinister foe came to nothing For one section of the participants however, the comedy of the "War of the Ditch" was to become a bloody tragedy Hardly had the besiegers retired than the Prophet declared war on the last Jewish tribe of any size, the Kuraiza, and began to besiege their quarter of the town The Jews no doubt hoped to escape in the same easy fashion as the Nadīr had, especially as their allies, the ʿAws, were very actively trying to induce Muhammad to clemency, but this time he was inexorable and carried out seriously a threat that he had previously made (lix 3) Tradition has however endeavoured to put the responsibility for the massacre of the Kuraiza on Saʿd b Muʿādh (cf Hassān b Thābit, N° clxvii, who asserts Saʿd's innocence) But there are various indications that it was the Prophet himself who made the decision and perhaps induced the Jews to surrender On this occasion the Jews showed a strength of character and nobility of spirit which throws a redeeming light on their otherwise so ignoble history

By these amputations, which however did not remove all the Jews from Medīna (cf Ibn Hishām, p 895, Wākidī–Wellhausen, p 264, 309, 393, Hassān b Thābit, N° 133, 17), the Prophet had come nearer his goal, the organisation of an umma on a purely religious basis, which hitherto he had to keep somewhat in the background for political reasons For the present he continued his attacks on the Meccan caravans far into the year 6 (May 627—May 628) and his raids, usually punitive expeditions, on Beduin tribes, of these expeditions, which have no particular interest, mention may be made of that against the Banū Mustalik which must have taken place about this time, as it gave rise to a serious conflict between the Muhādjirūn[a] and the Ansār and involved ʿĀʾisha [q v] in the celebrated adventure which nearly cost her her position as the wife of the Prophet, until finally a revelation saved her (xxiv 4 sq, 10—20)

Towards the end of the year 6 Muhammad thought that his position in Medina was so firmly established that he could risk a step, which would bring him nearer the desired goal He and the emigrants were still excluded from Mecca and its holy places, but through secret confidential agents, among whom we may certainly include his carefully calculating uncle ʿAbbās, he knew that feeling in the town had been gradually coming round (cf xlviii 15, lx 7) An increasing number had become tired of the hopeless wars and thought it would be much more advantageous for the commerce of Mecca to make peace with their indefatigable enemy, especially after he had adopted into his programme the pilgrimages to their fairs, the source of the city's wealth Trusting to this revulsion of feeling he gave his followers in Dhu 'l-Kaʿda of the year 6, i e March 628 (the news of the death of the Persian king Khusraw Parwēz on the Feb 29 of this year reached him on the way) orders to provide themselves with sacrificial victims and undertake an ʿumra [q v] with him to Mecca, as Allāh in a vision had promised him a successful fulfilment of the visit (xlviii 27) He probably chose an ʿumra deliberately (Ibn Hishām, p 740, Wākidī–Wellhausen, p 249 sq, 253, cf Sūra, xx 30, 34) instead of the great pilgrimage which was soon due, as the consequences of an encounter with all manner of tribes, with whom he might possibly have been waging war, were too incalculable for him, but perhaps he cherished also the hope that, if all went well, he might remain there in the following month also (cf II 192 which perhaps belongs to this connection) The step was nevertheless a risky one, so that he asked several Beduin tribes to accompany him in case they met with resistance To his disappointment however, they refused (xlviii 11 sq) so that he decided to abandon the military character of the march and make his followers go as harmless pilgrims In Mecca many were inclined to meet his wishes but the belligerent party was still strong enough to get a body of armed men sent to meet him to prevent him entering the town He therefore encamped at al Hudaibiya [q v] where he began to negotiate with the Meccans, and when this led to no result he sent ʿUthmān, who was protected by his family connections, into the town as his representative But when the latter showed no signs of returning and finally a rumour got about that he had been murdered, the situation became critical and Muhammad dropped all negotiations, collected his followers under a tree, probably one long held sacred, and made them swear to fight for him to the last, which they did with enthusiasm (xlviii 10, 18) But soon afterwards a number of Meccans arrived and offered a compromise, which is very characteristic of the aimless Meccan policy, by which he was to retire this time but to be allowed to perform an ʿumra next year He agreed to the proposal, concluded a ten years' truce with the Kuraish and further promised to surrender all Meccans of dependent status who came to him His followers, whom he had worked up into a state of great excitement by his promises and the taking of the oath, heard these conditions with scarcely concealed anger, but Muhammad calmly ordered the sacrificial animals brought with them to be slain, which was to have been done at an ʿumra in the town (see Lane, Lexicon, s v mahill), and had his hair cut and by his authority forced his grumbling followers to do the same Only later did they discover that he had made a brilliant stroke of policy for he had induced the Meccans to recognise the despised fugitive as an opponent of equal rank and had concluded a peace with them which promised well for the future

He and the participants received ample compensation for the apparently frustrated ʿumra at the beginning of the year 7 (May 628—April 629) by the capture of the fertile oasis of Khaibar [q v] which was inhabited by Jews It was the first actual conquest by the Prophet and he instituted on this occasion a practice which became regular afterwards, when Jews or Christians capitulated he did not put the people to death or banish them but let them remain as tenants, as it were, who had to pay dues every year This expedition which also brought the Jewish colonies of Wādi 'l-Kurā in to his power, made the Muslims rich (xlviii 18–21)

In this period, although the exact date is variously given, tradition puts the despatch of letters from the Prophet to Mukawḳis, governor of Alexandria, the ruler of Abyssinia, the Byzantine emperor, the Persian king etc, in which he demanded that they should adopt Islām The alleged original manuscript of the first of these has however proved not to be genuine (see J A, 1854, p 482 sqq, Zaidān, in Hilāl, 1904, p 103 sq, Becker, Papyri Schott-Reinhardt, I 3) But even what is related about these epistles hardly deserves the faith most people have put in it Even if we disregard the many apocryphal details, we must surely consider it very unlikely that so sober a politician as Muhammad, who had at this time a very definite object, the conquest of Mecca, before his eyes, should have though of indulging so fantastic an idea as the conversion of Heraclius or the Persian king, to whom the "lucid Arabic Kurʾān" was no less unintelligible than the Bible to the Prophet and his countrymen, and whom he could neither compel by force nor entice with proferred advantages It is very doubtful if Muhammad ever thought at all of his religion as a universal religion of the world, as for example Noldeke, in W Z K M, xxi 307, Goldziher, Vorlesungen uber den Islam, p 25, and T W Arnold, The Preaching of Islam, p 23 sqq hold (against them, see Snouck Hurgronje, Mohammedanism, p 48 sqq, H Lammens, Etude sur le regne du calife Moʿawia, I 422) The passages in the Meccan sūras which can be quoted in favour of this theory (vi 90, xii 104, xxi 157, xxv 1, xxxiv 27, xxxvi 70, xxxviii 87, lxviii 52, lxxxi 27, cf from the later period iii 90, xxii 25) are limited by their context or by unambiguous parallels (like vi 92, xlii 5 [the mother of the city, i e Mecca], cf xxvi 214) Besides, in the Medina period, the place of persuasion and proof ("no compulsion in religion" ii 257, cf xvi 126), was taken by the spread of Islām by force of arms, which, although based on the supremacy of Islām over other religions (iii 79, ix 33, lxi 4), was confined to the lands inhabited by Arabs If after the conquest of Mecca he also declared war on the possessors of a scripture (see below) the campaigns undertaken by him prove that he was only thinking of Arabs under Byzantine or Persian rule, and it cannot be proved that he ever went beyond this in his schemes (the gift of Hebron, Balādhurī, ed de Goeje, p 129 may be confidently asserted to be a forgery, cf the article USĀMA) The decisive consideration however is that Muhammad at the height of his power never demanded from Jews or Christians that they should adopt Islām but was content with a political subjection and the payment of tribute The correct conclusion is therefore to reject those stories and to look for the real historical basis in negotiations of a purely political nature, e g with the friendly Mukawkis (q v and cf Butler, The Arab Conquest of Egypt, 1902) and to assume that the idea of a great missionary enterprise arose later under the influence of Christian traditions, notably of the miracle of Pentecost

On the other hand, the character of the genuine letters of the Prophet to the Arab tribes changes at this time, for he was no longer content with a purely political agreement but, relying on his now consolidated power, also demanded that they should adhere to his religion, which involved performing the salāt and paying "alms", he even gave the Djudhām on the Syrian coast a respite (amān) of two months after which they were to decide (see Speiber, op cit, p 14 sqq)

In March 629, Muhammad performed the ʿumra stipulated for him by the peace of Hudaibiya (the ʿumra of the "contract" or "recovery") For him who had been driven out of his native city it was undoubtedly a great satisfaction to be able to visit Mecca as the acknowledged lord of Medina, but otherwise the significance of the occasion was more symbolical and the efforts of the practised diplomat to prolong his stay by his marriage with a sister-in-law of his secret ally ʿAbbās [see MAIMŪNA] were politely but firmly resisted by the Meccans On the other hand, it was of great significance that some of the most important Meccans, like ʿAmr b al ʿĀṣ and the military genius Khālid b al Walīd, who saw he was the coming man, openly joined him, while his uncle ʿAbbās and the very patriotic (Ibn Hishām, p 275) but cautious Abū Sufyan endeavoured in secret negotiations to prepare in the most favourable way for the inevitable result In the meanwhile he continued his military expeditions His forces suffered a serious reverse in the first considerable effort to extend his authority over the Arabs on Byzantine soil, at Muʾta [q v] in Transjordania, this is also recorded by Theophanes (Chronographie, ed de Boor, i 335) But several Bedouin tribes now began to see what advantages they would procure not only for the next but also for this world by joining him, and large groups like the Sulaim voluntarily adopted Islām and placed themselves under his flag

That it was Muhammad's intention to break the truce with the Kuraish at the first opportunity may be taken as certain, for it must have been intolerable for him that the heathen should still have Allāh's sanctuary in their control (ix 17 sq, cf iii 3) The tactlessness of the Meccans now gave him his opportunity Very much against the advice of Abū Sufyān, the belligerent party in Mecca had supported the Bakr against the Khuzāʿa, who were Muhammad's allies, and thus given a plausible casus belli (cf perhaps ix 12 sq) In Ramaḍān of the year 8 (May 629—April 630) he set out at the head of an army of Muhāǧirūna, Anṣār, and Bedouins The news produced considerable anxiety in Mecca where the number of those who wanted to fight shrank daily so that the more prudent now could take control Abū Sufyān, who was sent out with several others (including the Khuzāʿī Budail b Warka who was a friend of the Prophet's) met Muhammad not far from the town, paid homage to him and obtained an amnesty for all the Kuraish who abandoned armed resistance (cf ʿUrwa, Tabarī, i 1634 sq) Except for a few irreconcilables (cf Dīwān der Hudhailiten, N° 183, Mubarrad, al-Kāmil, ed Wright, p 365), they acquiesced and thus the Prophet was able to enter his native city practically without a struggle and almost all its inhabitants adopted Islām He acted with great generosity and endeavoured to win all hearts by rich gifts (taʾlīf al kulūb, a new use of the alms, cf ix 60) Only he demanded ruthlessly the destruction of all idols in and around Mecca Only Sūra cx seems to preserve an echo of the exaltation with which this victory filled him, here as in the unusually touching passage xlviii 1 sq, he sees in the success of his plans a sign that Allāh has forgiven him all his sins

Muhammad did not rest long upon his laurels for not only was Ṭāʾif, which was closely associated with Mecca, still unsubdued but the Hawāzin tribes in Central Arabia were preparing for a decisive fight A battle was fought with these Bedouins at Hunain on the road to Ṭāʾif [q v] which at first threatened to be a fatal disaster to the Prophet, mainly because of the unreliability of a number of the new converts, until some of his followers succeeded in recalling the fugitives and routing the enemy (ix 25 sq) On the other hand, his inexperienced troops were unable to take Ṭāʾif with its defences (cf the description of impregnable fortresses in Dīwān der Hudhailiten, N° 66, 10 sq) The people of Ṭāʾif however afterwards fell in with the spirit of the time and adopted Islām When Muhammad, after raising the siege, was distributing the booty of Hunain, the Anṣār who as soon as he entered Mecca had expressed the fear that he would take up his residence again in his native town, became very indignant about the rich gifts that he made to his former opponents in order "to win their hearts", while they themselves went empty handed (cf Ḥassān b Ṯābit, N° xxxi) but he spoke so kindly to them that they burst into tears and declared themselves satisfied His conduct on this occasion reminds us to some extent of that of David towards the Jews and Ephraimites after Absalom's rebellion

The characteristic feature of the year 9 (April 630–April 631) in the memory of the Muslims was the many embassies which came from different parts of Arabia to Medīna, to submit on behalf of their tribes to the conqueror of Mecca (cf cx 3) and the letters which he sent to the tribes, to lay down the conditions of their adoption of Islām In the autumn of this year, he made up his mind to conduct a campaign against Northern Arabia on a considerable scale, probably because the defeat in Transjordania required to be avenged and because the Ghassānid king was adopting a hostile attitude (cf Ibn Hishām, p 911, Bukhārī, Maghāzī, b 78, 79) But his appeal for followers met with little support Munāfikūna as well as Bedouins held back and even among his devoted followers, there were some who put forward all sorts of objections, out of fear of a campaign so far away in the glowing heat (cf ix 45, lvi 84—91, 98 sqq) In particular he seems to have had to face at this time a considerable opposition in Medina (ix 58—73, 125) so that he had to have recourse to his old instrument of intimidation and his words recall in a remarkable way the period of passion in Mecca (ix 71, 129 sq) Matters came to such a pitch that some of the opposition, behind whom is said by one tradition to have been his old inexorable opponent, the ascetic Abū ʿĀmir ʿAbd ʿAmr, founded a house of prayer of their own "for division among the faithful and a support for those who had formerly fought against God and his Prophet" (ix 108 sqq) Unfortunately the expressions in the Kurʾān and in the traditions are quite insufficient to enable us to get a clear picture of this very remarkable affair In spite of all opposition however, he carried through his plan, but when after great hardships he had reached Tabūk on the frontier (in the land of the Byzantines, cf Ibn Hishām, p 956), he stayed there some time and then returned to Medīna The campaign was however not without success His prestige had now become so great that the petty Christian and Jewish states in the north of Arabia submitted to him during his stay in Tabūk, for example the Christian king Yuhannā in Aila [q v], the people of Adhruh [q v] and the Jews in the port of Makna Khālid also occupied the important centre of Dūmat al-Ǧandal (cf for a criticism of the account Caetani, II/1 261—268, Sperber, op cit, p 44 sqq, on the alleged letter from Muhammad to the Jews in Makna, see also Wensinck, in Isl, ii 290)

Unfortunately we do not know how the matters which were rapidly coming to a head in Medina actually developed, but we may safely assume that the death of ʿAbd Allāh b Ubaiy, which took place not long after the expedition to Tabūk, must have contributed to slacken the tension These years showed a marked increase in the prestige of the lord of Medīna abroad Mecca was in his hands and among the Beduins an inclination was noticeable in several places to submit to the will of the conqueror of this town, to be safe against his attacks and to have a share in his rich booty This was for example the case with the group of tribes of ʿĀmir b Ṣaʿṣaʿa, with portions of the great tribe of Tamīm and the neighbouring Asad and further north with the Bakr and Taghlib Even in regions so remote as Bahrain and ʿOmān within the Persian sphere of influence and among the chiefs of South Arabia, the new teaching and order of things penetrated and found ardent followers in some places But we must not allow ourselves to be deceived by the representations of the historians, from which it appears as if all the people in these lands adopted Islām Caetani and Sperber in particular have shown that these accounts are not in keeping with reality and that it was only little groups that submitted, while there was a not inconsiderable number who rejected the Prophet's demands As regards open opponents the question was quite simple, when they were heathen, adhered to their paganism and would not abandon their polytheism, they were to be threatened by Muhammad with the "holy war" He had not only to deal with such as those in Arabia, but there were also in addition to the Jews who had already felt his strength, a considerable number of Christians, and some Parsis in the eastern and southern districts Muhammad was thus faced with a problem which he had to solve From his words in Sūra ix 29 sqq where he includes the Christians and even the Jews, the people of such strict monotheism, among the polytheists, who give Allāh a son and honour men as lords beside him, one would expect that he would have fought them like the heathen, if they did not adopt Islam (cf also the attack on the Christians, verse 76 sqq) But in contrast to such utterances we have another (Sūra v 85) where he mentions the Christians very sympathetically because they, unlike the Jews, show themselves kindly towards true believers and are not arrogant, which he ascribes to the fact that they have priests and monks (cf his judgment on monasticism Sūra lvii 21) These remarkable contradictions may be explained, as pointed out by Tor Andrae, by the difference between the Monophysites and the Nestorians The former aroused his unqualified displeasure by their Christology, while the latter, who were then predominant in the Persian empire, attracted him much more, and this attitude was shared by his followers after his death, as the letter of the Catholicos Īshōʿyah, quoted by Tor Andrae, shows On the other hand, his remarks about the Jews are always very severe It is therefore all the more remarkable that the distinction between Jews and Christians completely disappears when their position is finally settled They were included together as "peoples of a scripture" and they were allowed to retain their religion if they recognised the political suzerainty of the Prophet by paying a tax (ǧizya, q v), if they did not they were to be fought without mercy The memory of the agreement between Muhammad's teaching and that of the "peoples of a scripture", earlier so much emphasised, must have contributed to this rather illogical settlement and in addition there was the fact that treating the Jews as tax-paying tenants, and allowing them to practise their religion, as had been already done at Khaibar, was much more practical for the Muslims than fighting them till they gave in A further compromise with the "peoples of a scripture" was that believers were allowed to marry the daughters of the "peoples of a scripture" and to eat food prepared by them (v 7) It is noteworthy that the Parsis (Maǧūs xxii 17) were included among the "peoples of a scripture" which made a difficulty for later better informed generations (Ṭabarī, i 1005, 19 sq, Balādhuri, p 79), probably Muhammad did not dare for political reasons to demand that they should give up their religion This extended application of the term "peoples of a scripture" is found not in the Kurʾān but in a letter of Muhammad's to the Parsis in Hadjar (Ibn Saʿd, 1/ii 19) but with the limitation that the Muslims are forbidden to marry their women and eat meat killed by them

With these exceptions, the Prophet had approached nearer the object which was always before him, although it hitherto eluded him, the formation of an umma on a definitely religious basis, for the inhabitants of a number of parts of Arabia were now actually bound together by religion The old differences between the tribes with their endless feuds, their blood-vengeance and their lampoons which continually stirred up new quarrels, were to disappear at the will of Muhammad and all believers were to feel themselves brethren (ix 11, xlix 10 sq) There was to be no distinction among believers except in their degree of piety (xlix 13) The Prophet certainly had an ideal before him but it was realised only in a very incomplete way The very rapid extension of Islam had been accompanied by a considerable diminution in its religious content Alongside of the older adherents, who were really carried away by his preaching and whose faith had been tried by privations and dangers, there were now the many new converts who had been gained mainly by fear (cf the well known poem of Kaʿb b Zuhair, the poem of the Hudhaili Usaid b Abi Iyās in Kosegarten, Carmina Hudsail, N⁰ 127) or by the prospect of material advantages In spite of the teachers sent out to them there could be no question of any deep seated conversion among these Arabs and how the old Arab spirit continued to flourish among them unweakened is shown for example by the boasting and abuse in the poems in Ibn Hishām, p 934 sqq, which are in no way inferior to the old poems The Prophet himself in Sūra xlix 14 has recorded very definitely how far the Beduins were from the true faith they cannot say that they believe but only that they have adopted Islām Commandments relating to religion and worship, which had considerably occupied Muhammad in the early Medinese period, give way in striking fashion to social and political regulations, a natural result of the fact that the new members were not ripe for the former Uncertainty on these matters was still great and even at headquarters much seems still to have been in an embryonic state This is true even of so fundamental a law as the rule for the times of daily prayer, as the five prayers later obligatory are nowhere laid down in the Kur'ān (see above, cf also the expression "morning and evening" in A'shā's poem Morgenland Forsch, p 259) That they were introduced by Muhammad himself at the end of his life is possible, but not very probable in view of the silence on the point in the Kur'ān, and in any case it is not certainly proved by the mention of the five times of prayer in a letter of the Prophet's (Ibn Hishām, p 962) as we are not justified in expecting absolutely literal accuracy in the transmission of such documents Only one or two religious institutions are dealt with at all fully in the Kur'ān, the great pilgrimage to the sanctuaries at Mecca and the 'umra in the town itself, but the ḥadjdj was indeed the crown of his endeavours begun in Mecca and carried through with tenacity The Prophet, although he was now lord of Mecca, did not yet take part in the pilgrimage in the year 8, which was so inexplicable to later generations that they invented an 'umra unknown to many of his followers (Ibn Hishām, p 886, Tabarī, i 1670 ['Uwa], 1685, Wākidī, p 380, Ibn Sa'd, II/ii 1, 123 sq, III/i 103, 18, cf II/i 123 sq, Snouck Hurgronje, Het Mekkaansche Feest, p 58 sq) Nor did he come in the year 9 to Mecca to the ḥadjdj, he showed his interest in it however by sending Abū Bakr as his representative and making him read a proclamation which had momentous results (Bukhārī, iii 163, 249, according to the usual tradition, it was 'Alī who acted as his deputy, but this is probably a tendencious alteration, cf Tabarī, i 1760 sq where Abū Bakr complains about being passed over and is comforted by Muhammad, there is also another tradition, according to which Abū Bakr commissioned Abū Huraira to proclaim the exclusion of the heathen from the pilgrimage (Ibn Sa'd, II/i 121 sq) This was what is known as the barā'a [q v] in which Muhammad, who had been for so many years excluded from the pilgrimage, forbade all heathen any participation in it and gave them a period of four months, after the expiry of which they had the choice between the adoption of Islām and merciless warfare (Sūra ix) This explains his absence from the celebration in the two preceding years, he wished to wait until he could celebrate it as sole ruler and completely in agreement with his intentions or, as he said, with the ceremonies introduced by Abraham (ii 119 sq) Finally all was prepared and at the end of the year 10 (April 631–March 632) he was able to carry through the first reformed pilgrimage (the "Farewell Pilgrimage" or the pilgrimage of Islām), which became the standard for all time It is remarkable that the regulations for the ceremonies of the ḥadjdj, the object of which was to remove all that was too obviously pagan in the old ceremony (cf e g the awthān in Minā in Farazdak, in Z D M G, lix 604, Azrakī, ed Wüstenfeld, p 402) and to give it an Islāmic colouring, are found mainly in traditions, where later details can of course easily have been inserted, and only in fragments and more or less incidentally in the Kur'ān, but broadly speaking, the later form is undoubtedly based on what the Prophet laid down on this memorable occasion [cf the article HADJDJ]

The Farewell Pilgrimage, at which an effective address, of which somewhat variant versions have been handed down, is put in the Prophet's mouth, marks the culminating point in his career His feelings at this time are probably expressed in Allāh's words in Sūra v 5 "To-day I have perfected your religion, and completed my favours for you and chosen Islām as a religion for you" There is therefore a touch of the dramatic in the fact that his career closed a few months later He himself hardly expected this, for only a month before his death he was preparing an expedition, which was to set out under the leadership of the young Usāma [q v] against Transjordania (not as in some traditions to West of the Jordan, cf the article USĀMA) in order to avenge the death of his father The situation was such in other directions also that it required a man in full vigour to deal with it, in several places the appearance of different "prophets" had provoked disturbances [cf AL-ASWAD, TULAIHA and MUSAILIMA] Then Muhammad suddenly fell ill, presumably of the ordinary Medīna fever (Farazdak, ix 13), but this was dangerous to a man physically and mentally overwrought He rallied a little but then died on the 13th Rabi' I of the year 9 (i e June 8, 632, only this date suits the statement in Hassān b Thābit, N° cxxxiii and all traditionists that it was a Monday) on the bosom of his favourite wife 'Ā'isha, according to the story with the words "The highest friend" (rafīk, for which Goldziher once proposed rakī', "the vault of heaven") of Paradise!" He left — fortunately however for his community — no legal successor, for even the little Ibrāhīm whom the Coptic slave Māriya bore to him had died shortly before (on Jan 27, 632, if the statement is right that there was an eclipse of the sun on the day he died, cf Rhodokanakis, in W Z K M, xiv 78 sqq, Mahler, op cit, p 109 sqq) The wild confusion which party passions let loose on Mecca when his death became known had the remarkable result that his corpse remained neglected for a whole day until it was finally buried under 'Ā'isha's hut (Tabarī, i 1817, Ibn Sa'd, II/ii 57, 2, 58, 28, 59, 1, 71, 6)

The great difficulty which the biographer of Muhammad feels on every page is this, that the real secret of his career, the wonderful strength of his personality and his power of influencing those around him by suggestion, is not recorded in the early sources and indeed could not be recorded From the Kur'ān, it is true, one becomes acquainted with his earliest remarkable inspirations, which even now are not without effect, and with his eminent political gifts later in Medina We do of course find instances in the battle of Badr or the agreement of Hudaibīya where his intellectual superiority is overwhelmingly evident, but these are only isolated flashes and for the most part we have to read the essentials between the lines and be content with instructive analogies, among which the influence of Joseph Smith on the intellectually far superior Brigham Young is a particularly striking example The really powerful factor was his unshakable belief from beginning to end that he had been called by Allāh, for a conviction such as this, which does not admit of the slightest doubt, exercises an incalculable influence on others, and the certainty with which he came forward as the executor of Allāh's will gave his words and ordinances an authority which proved finally compelling His real personality was revealed quite openly with its limitations, his strength and his knowledge were limited, the ability to perform miracles was denied him and he speaks quite frankly of his faults (vi 69, xxxiv

49, xl 57, xlvii 21, xlviii 1 sq, lxxx 1 sqq, ix 43) Apart from the revelation with which he was favoured, he is a man like any other and several times refers to the fact that he will die (xxxix 31, xxi 35 sq, iii 138, the episode in Ibn Hishām, p 1012 sq is not historical but a tendentious story directed against the tendency becoming apparent to apotheosise the Prophet) This is exactly the field in which later ages have felt dissatisfied, so that they quite early, driven mainly by their disputations with the Christians (see M Schreiner, in Z D M G, xlii 594), wove around the person and life of the Prophet a network of superhuman features (see Jor Andrae's work quoted below) Apart from the traditions which are clearly confirmed by the Kur'ān we can only have certainty in the strictest sense of the word in cases where the stories place the Prophet in an unfavourable light, not only from our point of view but also from that of the Muslims, e g in the story of his temporary recognition of the three Meccan goddesses or of his being censured by ʿUmar for putting off the iḥrām between the ʿumra and ḥadjdj on the Farewell Pilgrimage, for it is quite incredible that such features should be later inventions and as a rule in such cases the compromising stories are confirmed by the existence of variant traditions which endeavour to dispose of the offensive features by glossing them over or altering them

If the biographers of Muhammad must for these reasons impose a very considerable restraint upon themselves, there is nevertheless one essential aspect of his activity, which ought to be very strongly emphasised, particularly as justice is not always done to it in modern treatments of his life There is a tendency in some recent writers not only to emphasise all that is unfavourable but also to neglect his real religious importance If he had really only been an oversexed man, anxious for worldly profit and quite unscrupulous in the choice of his means, Islām, which had been created by him and developed after his death, would have been an effect without a cause It is impossible for the unbiassed historian to deny that he aroused the religious instinct of his countrymen, and gave expression to a body of religious and moral conceptions which not only satisfied his fellow countrymen but supplied the needs of the people of lands which had old civilizations conquered by the Muslims and served them as foundations for a vigorous and far reaching intellectual activity Although as a result of his singular theory of inspiration, his direct dependence on the older religions of revelation remained concealed, he was able in his own way to communicate to his countrymen a part of the spiritual wealth of the "peoples of a scripture" and how he touched the soul of the Arabs is best seen by the efforts of the Wahhābīs at a reformation In lands of ancient culture, Islām, it is true, was only able to carry out its task by a sometimes radical remoulding and the intellectual activity already mentioned developed also under the influence of Christianity and mysticism, but yet it was Muhammad who set the whole process in motion and he could not have gained this influence if he had only been what the writers mentioned profess to have found in him

Bibliography E Sachau, Das Berliner Fragment des Mūsā b ʿUkba, in S B Pr A, 1904, p 445—470, Wüstenfeld, Das Leben Muhammeds v Muhammad b Ishāk, ed by Ibn Hishām, 1858—1860 (German transl by Weil, 1864), Wellhausen, Muhammed in Medina, das ist Vākidis Kitāb al-Maghāzi in verkürzter deutscher Wiedergabe, 1882, Muhammad b Saʿd, ed by E Sachau, I/i, ii, II/i, ii, Ibn Wādih al-Yaʿḳūbī, Historiae, ed Houtsma, ii 1 sqq, al-Balādhurī, ed de Goeje, 1866, Tabarī, Annales, i 1073 sqq, works on ḥadīth, esp al-Bukhārī, ed L Krehl (vol iv, ed Juynboll) — Of later date Nūr al Dīn al-Halabī, al-Sīra al-halabiya, Cairo 1308

J Gagnier, La vie de Mahomet, 3 vols, 1748, Lamaitresse and Dujarric, Vie de Mahomet d'apres la tradition, 1897, 1898, A Sprenger, Leben und Lehre des Mohammed, 3 vols, 1861—1865, W Muir, Life of Mahomet, 4 vols, 1858—1861, abbrev by Weir, 1912, G Weil, Mohammed der Prophet, sein Leben und seine Lehre, 1843, Th Noldeke, Das Leben Muhammeds nach den Quellen popular dargestellt, 1863, I Krehl, Das Leben des Muhammed, 1884, Aug Muller, Der Islam im Morgen- und Abendlande, i 44 sqq, R Dozy, Essai sur l'histoire de l'Islamisme, 1879, p 18 sqq, H Grimme, Mohammed, 2 vols, 1892, 1895 and Mohammed, 1904, Fr Buhl, Muhammeds Liv, 1903, do, Muhammeds religiose Forkyndelse efter Quranen, 1924, do, Das Leben Muhammeds, Leipzig 1930, D S Margoliouth, Mohammed and the Rise of Islam, 1905, Reckendorf, Mohammed und die Seinen, 1907, Caetani, Annali dell' Islām, I and II/i

Of further literature we may mention Wellhausen, Skizzen und Vorarbeiten, iv (on Medīna, Muhammad's constitution of the community and the embassies and letters), Sperber, Die Schreiben Muhammeds an die Stamme Arabiens (in M S O S, xix), Snouck Hurgronje, Het mekkaansche feest, 1880, do, De Islam, in de Gids, 1886, 2, H Lammens, Mahomet fut-il sincere, 1911, do, Coran et Tradition, 1910, do, Fātima et les filles de Mahomet, 1912, Wensinck, Mohammed en de Joden te Medina, 1908, H Hirschfeld, Essai sur l'histoire des Juifs à Medina, in R E J, x 26, R Leszynsky, Die Juden in Arabien z Zeit Mohammeds, 1910 (is one-sided), A Geiger, Was hat Mohammed aus dem Judentum aufgenommen?, 1833, Rudolph, Die Abhangigkeit des Qorans v Juden- und Christentum, 1922, J Goldziher, Muhammedanische Studien, 1889, 1890, Jor Andrae, Die Person Muhammeds in Lehre und Glauben seiner Gemeinde (in Archives d'Etudes Orientales, xvi 1918), do, Mohammed, sein Leben und Glaube, Gottingen 1932 (Fr Buhl)

MUḤAMMAD I-III [See Umaiyads II]

MUḤAMMAD I, according to the current view, the fifth Sultān of the Ottoman Empire, reigned, after the Empire's restoration in 1413, as sole acknowledged ruler until his death in 1421 Like many details of the first century of Ottoman history, the year of the birth of this Sultān is unknown, Sidjill-i ʿOthmānī, i 66 gives 781 or 791 (1379 or 1389) It is commonly agreed, that he was the youngest of the six sons of Bāyazīd I, which probably has made von Hammer accept the later date At the time of Timur's invasion, Muhammad resided at Amasia, but he was present at the battle of Angora (end of July 1402) From here he escaped with the help of the vizier Bāyazīd

Pasha and was able to maintain himself in Amasia and Tokat against Timur's governor in Niksār and against Turkoman bands Soon after Bāyazīd's death in 1403, having found support with the dynasties of Karamān and Dhū 'l-Kadr, he conquered Brusa from his brother ʿĪsā, who had fled there after the battle of Angora Then followed the struggle with his other brother Sulaimān, who had escaped to Adrianople but reappeared in Anatolia on account of his dealings, friendly as well as hostile, with the Izmīr Oghlu Djunaid Sulaimān was able to take Brusa but was soon obliged to return to Rūm-ili, where Muhammad had sent their brother Mūsā (who, after Angora, had been prisoner for some time with the Germiyān Oghlu) When in 1410 the struggle between Sulaimān and Mūsā ended in the latter's victory, Muhammad, whose position in Anatolia was now strengthened, had to face Mūsā himself At first the conquest of Rūm-ili did not seem hopeful, but after some high functionaries, like the Djandar-oghlu Ibrāhīm Pasha (cf Taschner and Wittek, in Isl, xviii 95) and representatives of the old nobility, like Ewrenos, had gone over from Mūsā to his side, and after he had made the Byzantine Emperor Manuel his ally, Muhammad was able to crush Mūsā in the battle of Čamurlu in Serbia (July 1413) By this battle the unity of the Ottoman state was re-established, nevertheless one gets the impression that, even after the battle of Angora, the supremacy of the house of ʿOthmān over the other Muhammadan and Christian chiefs in Anatolia and the Balkan Peninsula was never seriously questioned The hereditary enemy in Asia, Karamān Oghlu Mehmed, who in the meantime had gone as far as besieging Brusa, was subdued at Djānik in 1414 and at the same time the turbulent Izmīr Oghlu Djunaid was finally driven away from Smyrna In 1416 the Ottoman power in the Aegean Sea was strengthened by the battle of Gallipoli against a Venetian fleet That same year witnessed the extremely serious dervish revolt in Aidin and the peninsula of Kara Burun, connected with the name of Simawna Oghlu Badr al Dīn (cf Babinger's monograph on the subject in Isl, xi 1—174 and, as to the date, p 62 sqq), its suppression required the levying of troops from all parts of Anatolia under Bāyazid Pasha In the European part of the Empire the Sultān kept up friendly relations with the Byzantine Emperor The Turks intervened, however, in Wallachia where the succession was disputed and they built there the fortress of Djurdjewo (Turk Yer Kioku) on the northern bank of the Danube, at the same time (1419), the raids of the Turkish troops reached Hungary, Bosnia and Styria On the Asiatic side large parts of the possessions of the prince of Kastamuni, including Tosia and Kangheri, were incorporated into the Ottoman possessions From 1416 Muhammad had moreover to face a pretender to the throne who claimed to be his brother Mustafā, this Dozme Mustafā found an ally in Djunaid Both were defeated near Selānik and had to fly to Constantinople The Sultān died in 1421 in Adrianople, shortly after his return from Anatolia His death was kept secret from the army during forty days, until the heir to the throne Murād had arrived at Brusa

Muhammad I has won the reputation of a mild and benevolent ruler, he often occurs with the surname of Čelebi (as also do his brothers) Another surname is Kürüshdji, the "Wrestler", which takes unrecognizable forms in the European sources ("Crixia" in the Ragusan documents cited by Babinger on p 63 of his article in Isl) Important administrative measures are not recorded under his reign, the political and religious unification and pacification occupied all his forces Some famous edifices are connected with his name, he finished the Ulu Djāmiʿ in Adrianople and the mosque of the same name in Brusa A new building of this Sultān was the well known Yeshil Djāmiʿ at Brusa (cf Ewliyā Čelebi, Travels, ii 15)

Bibliography The ancient Ottoman chronicles ʿĀshīk Pasha Zāde and Tawārīkh-i Āl i ʿOthmān, edited by Giese, Urudj Bey, ed Babinger and the later historians, especially ʿĀlī, Kunh al Akhbār — Of the Byzantine writers this period is treated by Phrantzes, Ducas and Chalcondylas Further von Hammer, G O R, i 331 ssq, Zinkeisen, Gesch des Osm Reiches, Hamburg 1840, i 388—500 and Jorga, Gesch des Osm Reiches, i 361—377 (J H Kramers)

MUHAMMAD II, with the surname Abū 'l Fath, or, more popularly, Fātih, seventh ruler of the Ottoman Empire, reigned from 1451 until his death in 1481 He was born, according to Sidjill-i ʿOthmāni, i 67, in Radjab 832 (April 1429) and resided during his father Murād II's lifetime as governor in Maghnisa, after the death of his brother ʿAlā' al-Dīn in 1444 he became heir to the throne Before his final enthronement Muhammad had twice resided in Adrianople as sultān, on account of the abdication of Murād II, the first time in June 1444, after a ten years' peace had been concluded with Hungary When, notwithstanding this treaty, Hungary and her Christian allies again took the offensive in July, Murād came back from Maghnisa, to which he had retired, and won the battle of Varna (Nov 10, 1444) Then Murād abdicated a second time, but a menacing revolt of the Janissaries in Adrianople made the grand vizier Khalīl Pasha call him back again, after which Muhammad was relegated once more to his Anatolian governorship until his father's death

On Febr 9, 1451 this new sultān arrived at Adrianople and seemed at first peacefully inclined In reality his reign was to become a period of untiring and continual conquest under the personal leadership of Muhammad himself, who, especially in the beginning of his reign, took part in nearly all the important campaigns His conquests did not very much enlarge the boundaries already reached at Murād II's death, but consisted more in a bringing under immediate Turkish rule of a large number of countries, regions and towns that were still held by local rulers under the Ottoman suzerainty In this way Muhammad's conquests made possible the enormous expansion of the Ottoman empire in the xvith century

The first, and at the same time most conspicuous military achievement of his reign was the conquest of Constantinople, where, by the grace of Murād II, the Palaeologue Constantine was still reigning The preparations for this memorable siege had begun in 1452 with the construction of the castle of Rūmili Hisār (in which an inscription by Zaghanos Pasha, one of the builders, of 856 [1452], is found, cf Khalīl Edhem, in T O E M, ii 484—497) and other military preparations, e g the casting of an enormous siege gun Constantinople was taken on May 29, 1453 and Galata surrendered soon afterwards [cf CONSTANTINOPLE] In the next year, the sultān obtained successes against Serbia, while Turākhān [q v] intervened in Morea, where the last Palaeologue despots were at war with the Albanians Immediately after the taking of Constantinople the grand vizier Khalīl Pasha had been deposed and executed by order of the sultān, who had personal and political causes of complaint against him (cf Taeschner and Wittek, in Isl, xviii 105 sqq), he was replaced after nearly a year by Mahmūd Pasha [q v], who for the next twelve years was to be a no less energetic supporter of Muhammad in the achievement of the programme of conquest The year 1455 saw both of them in Serbia and on the Aegean coast, where the principal conquests were Aenos and the island of Lemnos [q v] In 1456 they were unsuccessful in the siege of Belgrad During the years 1458 and 1459 Serbia was made a direct Ottoman province (Semendra taken in 1459 by Muhammad), and in the same year and in 1460 the sultān took part in several campaigns in the Morea, the northern part of which was conquered from the Paleologues About the same time a temporary understanding was reached with Skanderbeg [q v] in Albania

Then came the amazing Asiatic campaign of 1461 Amasra (Amastris) was taken from the Genoese and Sinub [q v] from the last Isfandiyār Oghlu, the fall of Trebizond immediately followed [cf TARABZUN], after the beginning of a conflict with Uzun Hasan of the Ak Koyunlu In the next year the sultān's army drove the famous Wallachian woiwod Wlad Dracul from his principality, which was given to his brother Radul, and at the end of the year Muhammad and Mahmūd made an end to the rule of the Genoese dynasty of Lesbos The years 1463 and 1464 were mainly occupied by the annexation of the kingdom of Bosnia In 1463 began a war with Venice, which was to last seventeen years, the main theatre of hostilities was the Morea, but also in the islands of the Aegean there were continual encounters with Venetian fleets

The death of the Karaman Oghlu [q v] Ibrahim in 1464 had first provoked the sultān's intervention and soon nearly all the towns of this once powerful principality were conquered during Muhammad's campaign of 1466 (battle of Laranda) In that same year Muhammad was successful in Albania, where he fortified the town of Elbasan [cf SKANDERBEG]

Mahmūd Pasha had been deposed as grand-vizier after the Karaman campaign and replaced by Rūm Muhammad Pasha But it was Mahmūd who as governor of Gallipoli and Kapudan Pasha, helped Muhammad in the conquest from Venice of the islands of Negroponte (Euboea) in 1470 In the same year began again a series of campaigns under Rūm Muhammad and Gedik Ahmad Pasha against the last towns held by descendants of the Karaman Oghlu, who were supported by Uzun Hasan [q v] and by Christian fleets on the sea side When Uzun Hasan had even taken the offensive by conquering the town of Tokat, great preparations were made for a new Asiatic campaign of the sultān, and Mahmūd was again made grand vizier The sultān's army won in 1473 the great victory of Erzindjān, which put an end to danger from that side In this campaign a part was played by prince Mustafā, the heir to the throne, who completed in 1474 the conquest of Ič Ili (Cilicia) but died soon afterwards Mahmūd Pasha had been deposed again from the grand vizierate and executed in August 1474, Gedik Ahmad Pasha took his place

In the following years, until 1480, the sultān's chief attention was given to conquests in Europe He built in 1471 the fortress of Sabacs (Bogurdelen) in Syrmia, near Belgrad, while his troops in these and the following years made incursions into Hungary and far into Austrian territory, the war with Venice continued and in 1474 the Albanian Skutari (Shkodra) was in vain besieged The year 1475 brought the great success of the conquest of Kaffa from the Genoese and, as a result of the establishing of the Ottoman power in the Crimea, the submission of the Tatar Khānate of the Crimea to Ottoman suzerainty In 1476 the sultān himself was successful in Moldavia, but in the next years the Turkish armies had less success against the Venetians in Albania and southern Morea, finally in 1478 Muhammad himself went to Albania and took Croia, Skutari was besieged a long time, but surrendered only on account of the peace negociations with Venice, which led to a peace treaty (confirmed January 26, 1479) leaving a certain number of towns in Albania and Morea to Venice The Ionian islands, however, were conquered in 1479 by a fleet under Gedik Ahmad, who, at the same time, went so far as to take Otranto in southern Italy An endeavour to conquer the island of Rhodes in the same year was not successful

Muhammad's last campaign took place in 1480, when he intervened in the dynastic disputes of the dynasty of Dhū 'l Kadr [q v], which intervention gave rise to the first difficulties with Egypt In the next year, 1481, he had already set out for a new military enterprise in Asia, the aim of which was yet unknown, but may have been connected with the same difficulties, when he died, rather suddenly, in the place called Tekfur Čayīrī or Khunkiār Čayīrī between Skutari and Gebze (May 3, 1481) His body was transported to Constantinople and buried in the turbe of the Fātih Mosque

Besides being a great conqueror, Muhammad II was the builder of many important edifices, in the first place of the Fātih Mosque in Constantinople and the mosque of Eyyūb (Hadīkat al-Dja-wāmi', 1 8 sqq, 243 sqq) and further of the castles on the Dardanelles and other works of naval and military importance In the army administration he succeeded in restoring discipline among the Janissaries by incorporating in them the corps of the Segbans, further his name is connected with the first Ottoman Kānūn nāme (printed as an appendix to TOEM, III) He encouraged scientific studies and showed an interest in literature and poetry (he pensioned thirteen Turkish poets), even for the Renaissance arts in Italy (he summoned Gentile Bellini to Constantinople, who made his portrait, cf also Tschudi, Vom alten Osmanischen Reich, Tubingen 1930, p 18)

Bibliography Among the early sources, the Byzantine historians (Phranzes, Ducas, Chalcondyles) are by far the more important The Greek description of Muhammad's life by Critobulos was translated into Turkish (appendix to TOEM, I and II) The old Ottoman chronicles (Neshrī and others) often treat the beginning of Muhammad's reign in their last part, the later historical sources (Sa'd al Dīn, 'Alī, Feridūn) are far from being reliable for this time Further von Hammer, GOR, I, II, Zinkeisen (I) and

Jorga (i), Heyd, Histoire du Commerce du Levant, ii, L Thueasne, Gentile Bellini et Sultan Mohammed II, Paris 1888 (J H KRAMERS)

MUḤAMMAD III, thirteenth ruler of the Ottoman Empire, was born on May 16, 1567, the son of Murād III and the Venetian lady Baffa, and reigned from January 27, 1593 until his death, December 22, 1603 He was the last sultān who, as crown prince, had resided as governor in Maghnisa During his short reign he does not seem to have exercised any great influence on the policy of the Empire, being mostly under the influence of his mother who, as wālide sultān, intervened in affairs of state through her protégés within and without the palace Much against her will but on the insistence of a large part of the troops and of the high dignitaries, Muhammad took part in one campaign, namely that of 1596, in which the Hungarian town of Erlau (Egri) was taken by the Turks (September 1596) This campaign was a part of the war against Austria that lasted during all his reign and occasioned every year a military expedition to Hungary or to Wallachia The grand vizierate was changed not less than twelve times under this sultān, the most conspicuous grand vizier was Dāmād Ibrāhīm Pasha [q v], his brother-in law and the protége of the wālide Ibrāhīm three times held the sultān's seal, three other titularies ended their office by being executed In the same year as the conquest of Erlau, the Turks won the battle of Keresztes over the Austrians and Hungarians, the severity of the then grand-vizier Čighala Sinān caused a great number of the troops to desert and to appear some years afterwards as firāris or djelālis, provoking dangerous revolts in Asia Minor which lasted thirty years and began with the taking of Urfa by Kara Yazïdjï [q v] in 1599 A third memorable feat of the Hungarian war was the conquest of Kanizha in 1600 by Ibrāhim Pasha In other parts of the Empire the situation was relatively quiet, only in the Crimea was there a war between two rivals to the khānate, in which the Ottoman government had to intervene Relations with the European powers were peaceful France began already to exercise considerable influence through her ambassador, with Persia there was peace until September 1603, when a war began with the taking of Tabriz and Nakhčawān by ʿAbbās I

The Empire was still supported by the traditions of Suleimān's time, but the lack of strong government had introduced a lot of abuses, notably in the administration of the timārs and of the finances One of the consequences was the dangerous revolt in January 1603 of the sipāhīs in Constantinople, who demanded the abolition of the harem régime in the capital and the restoration of the authority of the government in Anatolia Two high harem functionaries fell as victims of this revolt, the grand vizier Yemishdji Hasan was able to oppose the sipāhīs with the aid of the Janissaries, thus creating an everlasting feud between the two corps, but in October of the same year this nefarious policy caused his own fall and execution

Muhammad III was buried in a turbe of the Aya Sofia, a short time before his death, he had ordered the execution of his eldest son Mahmūd He is said to have made a great show of piety, and had some excellent councillors in his environment, such as the khwādja Saʿd al-Dīn (died 1599), who had determined him to accompany the army in 1596, but on the whole his mother's influence prevailed by keeping him mainly confined to the harem in the palace

Bibliography Among the Turkish historians the works of ʿĀlī (until 1596), Selāniki (until 1600), Pečewī and Hasan Beg Zāde are valuable as contemporary sources, further Naʿimā (i) and Hādjdjī Khalīfa Von Hammer, G O R, iv and the works of Zinkeisen (iii) and Jorga (iii) A contemporary European source is Laz Soranzo, Ottomanus sive de rebus turcicis liber continens descriptionem potentiae Mahometis III, 1600 (J H KRAMERS)

MUḤAMMAD IV, nineteenth Sultān of the Ottoman Empire, was born on December 30, 1641 and was placed on the throne on August 8, 1648, after the deposition, soon followed by the execution, of his father Sultan Ibrāhim The power in the state was at that time divided between the court, where the old wālide Kosem [q v] and Sultān Muhammad's mother, the wālide Tarkhān, held the reins, and the rebellious soldiery of the Janissaries and the Sipāhis The lack of stability in the government at this time is shown by the fact, that, until the nomination of the grand vizier Koprulu Muhammad in 1656, there were no less than thirteen grand viziers In 1651 the old wālide Kosem was assassinated and at the same time the resistance of the Janissaries was broken, the regime of the court party that followed under the sultān's mother did not improve the situation The grand vizierate of Ibshir Pasha (1654—1655), who at first seemed to be the strong man needed, was brought to an early end by his rival Murād Pasha, and in the meantime the Cretan war against Venice was exhausting the resources of the Empire In March 1656 a military rebellion forced the sultān to allow the execution of several of his favourite courtiers

The real strong man proved to be Koprulu Muhammad Pasha [q v] (Sept 15, 1656—Oct 31, 1661) who eliminated immediately the influence of the harem on state affairs and became until his death the real ruler of the Empire His regime began with a Turkish maritime defeat by the Venetians at the Dardanelles, but already in the following year he obtained as serʿasker successes in Transylvania and succeeded at the same time in establishing firmly the Turkish authority in the Danube principalities, the collaboration with the Crimean Khān was here of great value In 1658 and 1659 he was able to suppress rebellions in Asia Minor, and in the Venetian war a great fleet of Venetian ships and other Christian allies did not succeed against the Turkish forces on Crete After his death (Oct 31, 1661), he was succeeded in his office by his son Koprulu Ahmad Pasha, who completed the work of his father by carrying through the final conquest of Crete (surrender of Kandia on Sept 4, 1669) followed by peace with Venice In 1661 the war with Austria had begun again, where Sultān Muhammad took part in several campaigns, notably that of 1663 in which Újvár (Neuhäusel) was taken In 1664 took place the famous battle of St Gotthard, where the Turks were beaten by an allied army, a part of which was formed by French troops, still the peace concluded with Austria in 1665 was favourable for Turkey In 1672 the sultān took part in the campaign against Poland, after the Ukrainian cossacks had invoked Ottoman aid against the Polish king, the Polish war, ending in a peace treaty of 1676, strengthened still further the Empire's position in the north Koprülü Ahmad Pasha died Oct 30, 1676 Though the sultān, who had developed in the meantime a morose and capricious character, never showed him the same deference as to his father, Ahmad had been easily able to maintain himself against enemies in the interior, not least by forming new troops (the beshli and the goñullu), who were far more reliable than the Janissaries and Sipāhīs He had not been able, however, to put an end to the extravagant luxury of the court, which wasted enormous sums The sultān had an abnormal liking for big hunts, that were organized at enormous cost in the environment of Adrianople, which town he preferred as a residence to Constantinople

After Ahmad's death the sultan did not himself take the affairs of state in hand, he appointed Kara Mustafā Pasha [q v] as his grand vizier The latter continued in an unnecessary way the tradition of warfare, in 1677 and 1678 he obtained successes against the Cossacks, behind whom the Muscovite power now began to gain in importance in Turkish affairs In 1682 war broke out again with the Austrian monarchy and led to the second Turkish siege of Vienna (July 13 —Sept 12, 1683), ending in a Turkish debâcle, thanks to the intervention of the Polish king Sobiesky This disaster cost Kara Mustafā his office and his life and at the same time the influence of the Serail became again predominant The grand viziers now following proved unequal to their task and in the years 1685—1687 nearly the whole of Hungary was lost to the Austrian armies (Turkish defeat at Mohacs on June 22, 1687) At the same time the hostilities with Venice had been reopened in the Morea and in the Archipelago

All these disasters caused a revolt of the troops in the field, they marched on the capital in September 1687 under Siyawush Pasha of Aleppo This time the sultān himself fell a victim to them, he was deposed on November 8, 1687 by the kā'im makām Koprulu Mustafā Pasha and lived in seclusion in Adrianople until his death on December 17, 1692 He was buried next to his mother in the Yeñi Djāmi'

Bibliography Na'ima (ii) and Hādjdjī Khalīfa, and until 1660 the Ta'rīkh of Rāshid are the most important Turkish historical sources The Siyāhat-nāme of Ewliyā' Čelebi describes many of the military expeditions of this period and is also otherwise a valuable source of information Among the European sources this period is covered by P Ricaut, Histoire des trois derniers empereurs des Turcs depuis 1624 jusqu'a 1677, Paris 1683 Further, von Hammer, G O R, v, vi and the works of Zinkeisen (iv and v) and Jorga (iv) See also the monographs of Ahmad Refik, Koprululer, Constantinople 1331 (1913), Kadînlar Saltanatî, Constantinople 1914—1924, and Felāket Seneleri (1094—1110), Constantinople 1332 (1914)

(J H Kramers)

MUHAMMAD V Reshād, thirty-fifth Ottoman Sultān, was born on November 2, 1844 as a son of Sultān 'Abd al-Madjīd During the reign of his brother 'Abd al Hamīd II he lived in seclusion, his very existence inspired 'Abd al-Hamīd with such terror that even the mentioning of persons with the name Reshād had to be avoided in his presence (cf Snouck Hurgronje, Verspreide Geschriften, iii 232) He was a man of mild character, who owed his accession to the throne (April 27, 1909) only to the victory of the Young Turks, moreover he was the first constitutional ruler of Turkey, but he was unable to give direction to the very disparate political tendencies that manifested themselves within and without the Parliament during the years after the Revolution, and, after the final victory of the Unionist party in January 1913, Muhammad V had to submit, much against his will, to their government

At the very beginning of his reign, Turkey lost her last vestige of authority over Bosnia and Herzegovina by Austria-Hungary's annexation, and over Bulgaria by the declaration of its independence (Oct 5, 1909) The cabinets under Husein Hilmī Pasha (until January 18, 1910) and Ismā'īl Hakkī Pasha (q v until Sept 29, 1911) were not able to bring about a peaceful situation in the interior (revolts in Albania) Hakkı Pasha had to resign on account of the declaration of war by Italy Under the grand vizierate of Sa'id Pasha [q v] the Italian war led to the loss of Tripoli, confirmed by the peace treaty of Ouchy (Oct 15, 1912) The peace was signed under the anti-unionist cabinet of Ahmad Mukhtār Pasha, but in the same month began the so called Balkan War against the confederated Balkan States The reactionary cabinet of Kamil Pasha soon showed an inclination to conclude a disastrous peace through the intermediary of the European powers (Conference of London), then on January 23, 1913 the Unionist coup d'etat brought again a Unionist government under Mahmūd Shewket Pasha The result was a reopening of the hostilities and, after the failure of Bulgaria, the recapture of Adrianople (July 22, 1913) In the meantime Mahmūd Shewket had been murdered (June 28) by adherents of the liberal opposition, but this did not bring about a change in the political course, his place was taken by Sa'id Halim Pasha, whose government signed the peace treaties with Bulgaria (Sept 29, 1913), Greece (Nov 14) and Serbia (March 14, 1914) From this time on, the Committee of Union and Progress, which from the beginning of Muhammad Reshād's reign had not ceased to work behind the scenes, became all powerful and its leaders Talʿat Bey and Enwer Bey came more and more to the front Afterwards, when at the beginning of the Great War, the Ottoman Government had decided to remain neutral, it was the unionist sympathies with Germany that brought about a gradual estrangement between Turkey and the Allies (the "Goeben" and "Breslau" incident), culminating in the entrance of Turkey into the war on the side of the Central Powers (the Turkish fleet in the Black Sea on October 29 and 30, 1914) Talʿat Pasha himself became grand vizier in February 1917 The Allied endeavour to force a way through the Dardanelles was definitely abandoned in January 1916 and in the meantime Turkish troops fought on the Egyptian front, in 'Irāk and on the Russian and Persian frontiers Before the end of the war Muhammad V died unexpectedly on July 2, 1918

Bibliography de la Jonquière, Histoire de l'Empire Ottoman, 1914, ii, Ahmad Emin, Turkey in the World War, New Haven 1930, besides many other publications on the war and on the general politics of Turkey

(J H Kramers)

MUḤAMMAD VI WAḤĪD AL DĪN, last Sultān of the Ottoman Empire, was born on January 14, 1861, as son of Sultān ʿAbd al-Madjīd He was called to the throne on July 3, 1918, after the death of his brother Muhammad V Reshād, the former heir to the throne Yūsuf ʿIzz al Dīn, son of ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz, having died in 1916 When on October 30, 1918, nearly four months after his accession, the armistice of Mudros was signed he was the ruler of an empire that seemed to be at the mercy of its former enemies, whose military forces occupied the capital and other hitherto unconquered parts of Turkey On the other hand, the power of the Committee of Union and Progress was broken, but, since in the beginning of 1919 there began in Anatolia an increasing opposition against the foreign occupation, joined with an aversion to obey the Constantinople government, Muhammad VI seemed to have no other choice than to throw in his lot with the Allies and, together with his grand vizier Dāmād Ferīd Pasha, he collaborated with the Allies in the endeavours to suppress the nationalist forces (beginning of 1920), this anti-nationalist action was even sanctioned by a fetwā of the Shaikh al-Islām As the nationalist movement grew ever stronger, the Sultān's authority could only be upheld in Constantinople by the support of the Allies His government had to sign the Treaty of Sevres (August 10, 1920) and the Tewfik Pasha cabinet (since October 21, 1920) tried to summon the Parliament for its ratification But in 1921 things had already gone so far that Tewfik Pasha recognized the powerlessness of his government to represent Turkey The final success of the nationalists against the Greeks (seizure of Smyrna September 9, 1922) brought about the armistice of Mudania (October 11, 1922), to which the Sultān's government was not a party It was still invited to represent Turkey in Lausanne, together with the Angora government This was not accepted by the Great National Assembly, which, on November 1, 1922, declared the Ottoman sultānate abolished from March 16, 1920 (occupation of Constantinople), Tewfik Pasha's cabinet resigned accordingly (November 4) and Muhammad VI remained as Khalīfa in Constantinople, where, on November 10, he appeared at his last selāmlīk When, however, the National Assembly decided some days afterwards to try Wahīd al-Dīn on a charge of high treason, this last Ottoman Sultān left Constantinople as a fugitive on a British ship (November 17, 1922) and the very next day the Angora government declared him divested of the caliphate Having gone first to Malta, the ex sultān proceeded to Mecca as the guest of king Husain From here he launched a proclamation to the Islāmic world, in which he maintained that the separation of the caliphate from the sultānate was contrary to the sharīʿa (text in Oriente Moderno, II 702—705) This appeal found hardly any response in the Islāmic world The last Ottoman Sultān left Mecca again and went to live in San Remo, where he died on May 16, 1926 In 1924 he had even recognized king Husain's claim to the caliphate

Bibliography Jaschke und Pritsch, Die Turkei seit dem Weltkriege, in W I, vol x, 1927—1929, and vol xii, Heft 1—2, 1930, where in the Introduction all available Turkish and Western sources are indicated

(J H KRAMERS)

MUHAMMAD, Muʿizz al-Dīn b Sām, was the fourth of the Shansabānī princes of Ghūr to rule the empire of Ghaznī His name was originally Shihāb al-Dīn, but he assumed that of Muʿizz al-Dīn His elder brother Ghiyāth al Dīn succeeded his cousin Saif al-Dīn in 1163 and made Muhammad governor of Herāt, entrusting to him also the duty of extending the dominions of the house in India

Muhammad led his first expedition into India in 1175, expelled the Ismāʿīlian heretics who ruled Multān, placed an orthodox governor in that province, and captured Uch In 1178 he rashly led an army into Gudjarāt, was defeated by the rādjā, Bhīma the Vāghela, and returned to Ghazni with no more than the remnant of his army, but in the following year he took Peshāwar, and in 1181 Lāhor, taking prisoner Khusrau Malik, the last of the Ghaznawids, and adding the Pandjāb to his brother's dominions In the winter of 1190—1191 he invaded the Čawhān kingdom of Dihlī and captured Bhātinda, but the rādjā, Prithwī Radj, marched against him and defeated him at Tarāwrī, near Karnāl He was wounded, but escaped, and in 1192 returned to India, defeated and slew Prithwī Rādj at Tarāwrī, captured Hānsī, Sāmāna, Guhrām, and other fortresses, and plundered Adjmer On returning to Ghazni he left Kutb al Dīn Aibeg [q v] in India as viceroy, and at the end of 1192 Aibeg took Dihlī and made it his capital In 1197 Aibeg was beleaguered in Adjmer and Muhammad sent a relieving force which enabled him to defeat Bhima of Gudjarāt and to plunder his capital, Anhilvāra

Muhammad was now employed with his brother in recovering Khurāsān On the death of Takash Khān Khwārizmshāh [q v] in Marw, on July 3, 1200, Muhammad Čurbak was sent to Marw, which he captured and occupied for Ghiyāth al Dīn, and Ghiyāth al-Dīn and his brother besieged and took Nishāpūr Muhammad was then sent in command of an expedition to Rayy but the misbehaviour of his troops earned a rebuke which led to the only quarrel between the brothers

On the death of Ghiyāth al Dīn in 1202 Muhammad succeeded to the great empire which he had helped his brother to build up, but Muhammad Khwārizmshāh [q v] took Marw from Muhammad Čurbak, recovered Nishāpūr, but failed to capture Herāt Muʿizz al-Dīn Muhammad marched against him but suffered a crushing defeat near Andkhūī and fled to Tālakān He was besieged by the army of Gūr Khān of Karā Khitāī and purchased a safe retreat only by the surrender of the whole of his baggage and material of war On his arrival before Ghaznī in this plight his slave Īldīgiz refused to admit him, and he passed on to Multān where the governor likewise refused him admittance, but he attacked and defeated him and appointed Nāsir al-Dīn Kubāča [q v] to the government of the province He returned to Ghaznī and established himself there, sparing the life of Īldīgiz By the treaty which he concluded with Muhammad Khwārizmshāh he was permitted to retain Balkh and Herāt, but not Nishāpūr and Marw

On Oct 20, 1205, he marched from Ghaznī for India and, with the help of Kutb al-Dīn Aibeg, defeated the Khokars, but on returning towards Ghaznī was assassinated, on March 15, 1206, on the bank of the Indus, either by Ismāʿīlī heretics or by some Khokars He was succeeded in Ghūr

by his nephew Mahmūd, son of Ghiyāth al-Dīn, but the viceroys of the provinces, Aibeg in Dihlī, Kubāča in Multān, Tādj al-Dīn Yildiz in Kirmān, and Ildigiz in Ghaznī, became independent

Bibliography Tabakāt-i Nāsirī, and translation by Major H G Raverty (Bibl Ind), Ta'rīkh-i Guzīda, by Hamd Allāh Mustawfī and translation by Professor E G Browne (G M S), The Cambridge History of India, vol iii

(T W Haig)

MUHAMMAD, Tughluk, the second king of the Tughluk dynasty of Dihlī, was the eldest son of Ghiyāth al Dīn Tughluk, its founder During the short reign of the usurper, Nāsir al-Dīn Khusraw, he was in some peril, but escaped and joined his father, who was marching on Dihlī He was known at first as Djawna Khān, but received the title of Ulugh Khān and was sent in 1321 to Warangal, to reduce to obedience the rādjā, Pratāpa Rudradeva II In this distant region he attempted to rebel, but his army refused to believe his story of his father's death at Dihlī and to accept him as their king, and he was obliged to return in haste to the capital, where he either persuaded his father of his innocence or gained a pardon, for, though his accomplices suffered cruel deaths, he was again sent, in 1323, into Telingāna, and on this occasion compelled the rādjā to surrender and sent him to Dihlī In the following year he acted as regent during his father's absence on an expedition into Bengal, but his conduct aroused suspicion, and his father rebuked him in letters sent from Bengal He received the king, on his return, in a temporary kiosk of wood, so constructed that the dislodgement of a beam would bring the whole structure down, and by this device crushed the old man to death, and ascended the throne in February 1325 The delineation of a character so complex and contradictory as that of Muhammad Tughluk is no easy task He was one of the most extraordinary monarchs who ever sat upon a throne To the most lavish generosity he united revolting and indiscriminate cruelty, to scrupulous observance of the ritual and ceremonial prescribed by the Islamic law an utter disregard of that law in all public affairs, to a debasing and superstitious veneration for all whose descent or whose piety commanded respect a ferocity which when roused respected neither the blood of the Prophet nor personal sanctity Some of his administrative and most of his military measures give evidence of abilities of the highest order, others are the acts of a madman

The chronicle of his reign is largely a record of rebellions punished with gross barbarity In the second year his cousin Gurshāsp rebelled in the Dakan and was flayed alive In 1327 he rebuilt Devagīr, named it Dawlatābād, made it his capital, and two years later drove the whole population of Dihlī thither In 1328 Kishlū Khān rebelled in Multān and was defeated and slain, and in 1329 India was invaded by the Mughul, 'Alā' al-Dīn Tarmāshīrīn, who, however, was driven from the country In the same year the enhancement of the land-tax in the Gangetic Doāb drove the inhabitants into rebellion, and the measures taken to suppress the rising depopulated the country At about the same time Muhammad issued his famous fictitious currency, decreeing that his brass tokens should be accepted as equivalent to silver tangas No precautions were taken against counterfeiting, and when the experiment failed and the tokens were recalled the treasury was obliged to purchase mountains of brass at the price of silver

In 1331 a rebellion in Bengal was crushed by Bahrām Khān, but in 1338 he died, and a second rebellion separated the province from the kingdom of Dihlī, and in 1334 Sayyid Djalāl al-Dīn Ahsan established his independence in Madura Muhammad marched to punish him, but a pestilence in his army compelled him to retreat, and on his return he established in the Dakan the pernicious system of farming out the revenue for extravagant sums, the result of which was to drive both the impoverished cultivator and the defaulting farmer into rebellion Hūshang of Dawlatābād, believing a report of the king's death, rebelled, but was captured and pardoned, a rare instance of clemency, but a rebellion in the Pandjāb was crushed with great severity

An enormous army raised for the conquest of Persia melted away for want of funds to maintain it, and in 1337 a heavy calamity fell on northern India, a famine of unusual severity which lasted for seven years The king's measures to combat the famine were, on the whole, well conceived and well executed Grain was plentiful in Awadh, which proved that the famine was largely due to artificial causes, and he built a temporary city, Sarga-dwārī (Swarga dwāra, Sansk "the Gate of Paradise"), on the western bank of the Ganges, transferred thither the citizens of Dihlī, and with the assistance of 'Ain al-Mulk, governor of Awadh, fed them from the granaries of that province In the following year he committed one of the greatest of his many follies in assembling an army of 100,000 horse for the invasion of Tibet and sending it into the Himālaya, where it perished

In 1339 a rebellion in the Dakan was crushed and even the faithful 'Ain al Mulk was goaded into rebellion, but, in consideration of his services, was imprisoned instead of being put to death Almost immediately afterwards Shāhū the Afghān rebelled in Multan, but fled before the king's wrath into Afghānistān The famine was now at its height, and the people were eating human flesh Muhammad set himself to the framing of regulations which should improve and extend agriculture and obviate future famines By these means, says the contemporary historian, with conscious or unconscious irony, agriculture would have been so promoted that plenty would have reigned throughout the earth, had they been practicable They included the extension of the system of farming the revenues, and bred confusion and rebellion, which reacted on the king until he regarded his subjects as his natural enemies and waged war against them with all the weapons of despotic power The tale of executions is recorded, with sickening details, by Ibn Battūta Rebellions in Sunām, Sāmana, Kaithal, Guhrām, Kara, and the Dakan were all traceable to the king's revenue system, but he attributed the discontent in the Dakan to the disaffection of his officers and sent to that province a wretch who slew ninety officers in cold blood, and was himself slain in the rising which his barbarity provoked Muhammad marched into Gudjarāt and personally undertook the collection of arrears due to the treasury, so alarming the officials in the Dakan that they seized the fort of Dawlatābād and proclaimed an Afghān, Ismāʿīl Mukh, as their king The king marched to Dawlatābād, captured the city, and besieged the rebels in the citadel, but was recalled to Gudjarāt by a serious rebellion headed by a man named Taghī He pursued the rebel in Gudjarāt and Kāthiāwār for three years, drove him into Sind, and followed him thither, and on March 20, 1351, died within a few miles of Thatha, where the rebel had taken refuge "The king", as a historian says, "was freed from his people, and they from their king"

His empire, at its greatest extent, included the whole of India except the small kingdoms of the Čolas and the Pāndyas, in the neigbourhood of Cape Comorin and the principality of Girnār in Kāthiāwār Before his death he lost Bengal, the Dakan, the Peninsula, and Sind, and left the remnant of his dominions seething with discontent

Bibliography Diyāʾ al-Dīn Baranī, Taʾrīkh i Fīrūz Shāhi (Bibl Ind), and later historians, Tuhfat al-Nuzzār fī Ghara'ib al Amsār, by Ibn Battūta, The Cambridge History of India, vol III, chap VI See also J R A S for July, 1922

(I W Haig)

MUḤAMMAD III, the sixth king of the Tughluk dynasty of Dihlī, was the son of Fīrūz, at whose death the son of Fath Khān, his eldest son, was raised to the throne on Sept 20, 1388, as Ghiyath al-Dīn Tughluk II, but was slain on Feb 19, 1389, and was succeeded by his cousin Abū Bakr, son of Zafar Khān, the second son of Fīrūz Muhammad, the third son, contested the succession and, after suffering more than one defeat, occupied Dihlī and ascended the throne on Aug 31, 1390 Abū Bakr took refuge with Bahādur Nāhir in Mewāt but was pursued and defeated, and was imprisoned in Mīrath, where he shortly afterwards died The old servants of Fīrūz, men of Eastern Hindūstān, who had been the principal factors in all the troubles of the kingdom, were put to the sword, after being tested by a shibboleth which distinguished them from the natives of Dihlī

A rebellion in Gudjarāt was suppressed in the same year by Zafar Khān, who in 1396 became independent in that province, and in 1392 Muhammad crushed a serious rebellion in the Doāb, captured Itāwa, ravaged the districts of Kanawdj and Dalman, and built near Djalesar a fort, which he named Muhammadābād In the same year, he put to death his minister, Islām Khān, who was meditating rebellion, and appointed in his place Khwādja Djahān Another rebellion was crushed in the southern Doāb, and in August 1393, Muhammad invaded and plundered Mewāt and returned to Djalesar, where he fell sick Bahādur Nāhir took advantage of his illness to plunder some villages in the neighbourhood of Dihlī and Muhammad marched into Mewāt, defeated him, and put him to flight, but on his return to Muhammadābād his disorder increased, and on Jan 20, 1394, just as he had ordered his son Humāyūn Khān to march against the Khokars, who had captured Lāhor and were ravaging the Pandjāb, he died

Bibliography Muntakhab al-Tawārīkh, ed and translation by Lt Col G S A Ranking, Tabakāt i Akbarī, ed and translation by B Dé (Bibl Ind Series of A S B), Muhammad Kāsim Firishta, Gulshan-i Ibrāhimī (Bombay 1832)

(T W Haig)

MUḤAMMAD I, the second king of the Bahmanī dynasty of the Dakan, was the eldest son of Hasan, ʿAlāʾ al-Dīn Bahman Shah, usually, but incorrectly, styled Hasan Gangū On succeeding his father, on Feb 11, 1358, he carefully organized the government of the four provinces of the kingdom and the administration of the army The pertinacity of the Hindū bankers and moneychangers in melting down the gold coinage which he introduced led to a general massacre of the community and the measure involved him in hostilities with the Hindū states of Warangal and Vidjayanagar He invaded the dominions of Kānhaiya of Warangal three times, put his son Venāyek Deva to death, and compelled him to pay heavy indemnities and to surrender the town and district of Golkonda After this success he grossly insulted Bukka I of Vidjayanagar by paying some dancing girls with a draft drawn by him on Bukka's treasury Bukka invaded the Rāičūr Doāb, captured Mudgal, and massacred its garrison Muhammad marched against him, attacked him with great impetuosity, defeated him, and recovered Mudgal, where he rested during the rainy season In 1367 he met Bukka at Kawthal, again defeated him, and carried out an indiscriminate massacre of his subjects The Hindūs were cowed by the slaughter of 400,000 of their race, and Bukka was compelled to sue for peace He honoured the draft and paid an indemnity, and received in return a guarantee that non combatants should be spared in future wars, and the agreement, though sometimes violated, mitigated to some extent the horrors of the long period of intermittent warfare between the two states On returning from Vidjayanagar he completed, in 1367, the great mosque at Gulbarga, and then turned against his cousin Bahrām Khān Māzandarānī, who had for some years been in rebellion at Dawlatābād, defeated his army, and drove its leaders into Gudjarāt He died in 1377 and was succeeded by his elder son, Mudjāhid

Bibliography Muhammad Kāsim Firishta, Gulshan-i Ibrāhimī (Bombay 1832), Muntakhab al Lubāb, vol III (Bibl Ind Series of A S B), Burhān-i Maʾāthir (MSS) and translation by Major J S King (The History of the Bahmanī Dynasty), An Arabic History of Gudjarāt, edited by Sir E Denison Ross (Indian Text Series), The Cambridge History of India, vol III, chap XV

(T W Haig)

MUHAMMAD II, the fifth king of the Bahmanī dynasty of the Dakan, was the son of Mahmūd Khān, the youngest son of ʿAlāʾ al Dīn Bahman Shāh, the founder of the dynasty, and was raised to the throne on May 20, 1378, after the assassination of his uncle, Dāwūd Shāh Firishta's statement that this king's name was Mahmūd has misled all European historians, but is refuted by inscriptions, legends on coins, and other historians

Muhammad II was a man of peace, devoted to literature and poetry, and his reign was undisturbed by foreign wars He invited Hāfiz to visit his court, and the great poet set out from Shīrāz in response to the invitation, but was so terrified by a storm in the Persian Gulf that he disembarked and returned to Shīrāz, whence he sent to Muhammad his excuses in a well known ode

Between 1387 and 1395 the Dakan was visited by a severe famine, and the king's measures of relief included the free importation of grain, the establishment of schools at which children were taught, fed, and lodged at the public expense, and special allowances to readers of the Kurʾān and the blind, but only those of his own faith profited by his benefactions He died of a fever on April 20, 1397, and was succeeded by his eldest son, Ghiyāth al-Dīn

Bibliography See art MUHAMMAD I, also J A S B, vol lxxiii, part 1, 1904

(T W HAIG)

MUHAMMAD III, LASHKARĪ, the thirteenth king of the Bahmanī dynasty of the Dakan, was the younger son of Humāyūn Shāh, and succeeded his elder brother, Nizām Shāh, on July 30, 1463, at the age of nine His minister was the famous Mahmūd Gāwān, Malik al-Tudjdjār, Khwādja Djahān A campaign against Mālwa in 1467 was unsuccessful, but between 1469 and 1471 Mahmūd Gāwān conquered the southern Konkan In 1472 Malik Hasan Bahrī, Nizām al Mulk, a Brāhman who had been captured in Vidjayanagar and educated as a Muslim, led a successful expedition into southern Urīsa and was rewarded with the government of Telingāna Fath Allāh ʿImād al Mulk, another Brāhman with a similar history, was made governor of Barār, and Yūsuf ʿĀdil Khān, a Turk, was appointed to Dawlatābād In the same year Muhammad captured the fortresses of Bankapūr and Balgānw, and his conduct at the siege of the latter earned for him the title of Lashkarī, "the Soldier" In 1474 the Dakan suffered severely from a famine which lasted for two years, and in 1476 a rebellion in Kondawīr led the king into Telingana He relieved Malik Hasan, who had been besieged in Radjamahendri, invaded Urīsa and punished the rādjā, who had supported the rebels, and on his return, in 1478, captured Kondawīr and assumed the title of Ghāzī

He then set out to invade the eastern Karnātak, but first divided the great province of Telingāna into two governments, mortally offending Malik Hasan, the governor The partition was part of a scheme, devised by Mahmūd Gāwān, to be applied to all the provinces of the kingdom

Muhammad made Kondapallī, in the Karnātak, his headquarters, and returned thither after carrying out a daring raid to Kāndjeweram From Kondapallī he issued an edict dividing the other three provinces of his kingdom, Barār, Dawlatābād, and Gulbarga each into two governments The measure was intensely unpopular, but it was only the vindictive Malik Hasan that actively resented it He regarded Mahmūd Gāwān as the author of all the unpopular reforms, and by means of a forged letter persuaded the young king that his minister was in league with the foreign enemies of the state Muhammad, when under the influence of drink, summoned his faithful minister, and on April 5, 1481, without any inquiry into the circumstances of the case, caused his head to be struck off Mahmūd's innocence was established immediately after his death, and from the day of his unjust execution may be dated the collapse of the authority of the Bahmani kings Of the two parties in the state all the foreigners, led by Yūsuf ʿĀdil Khān, who established himself in Bīdjāpūr, and the respectable portion of the Dakanīs, led by Fath Allāh ʿImād al-Mulk of Barār, avoided intercourse with the king, who was thrown into the arms of the assassins, led by Malik Hasan The amīrs accompanied Muhammad to Bīdar and subsequently on an expedition to Balgānw, but encamped apart from the royal troops, and always saluted the king from a distance, refusing to enter his presence Muhammad attempted to drown his grief and humiliation in drink, from the effects of which he died at Bīdar on March 22, 1482, crying out in his last moments that Mahmūd Gāwān was slaying him He was succeeded by his son Mahmūd, who was never a king but in name

Bibliography See art MUHAMMAD I

(T W HAIG)

MUHAMMAD B ʿABBĀS [See KADJAR]

MUHAMMAD B ʿABD ALLĀH, great-grandson of Hasan, the eldest son of ʿAlī and Fātima, was one of the ʿAlids who did not spend their time passively awaiting the fulfilment of their aspirations but endeavoured to realise them by personal effort He and his brother Ibrāhīm had, according to Wākidī, been brought up as future rulers and Muhammad was called al Mahdī by his father As early as the reign of the Umaiyad caliph Hishām, the two sectarians al Mughīra [q v] and Bayān [q v] who did not recognise Muhammad b ʿAlī al-Bāḳir [q v] endeavoured to make propaganda for him When signs of the imminent collapse of Umaiyad rule became apparent after Walīd's death, ʿAbd Allāh's family by his command paid homage to Muhammad with the exception of al-Bāḳir's son Djaʿfar Wider circles also recognised him as the legitimate heir, including the Muʿtazilīs, who in those days had a distinctly ascetic character Abū Djaʿfar, later the ʿAbbāsid caliph, was at this time attached to this school and it is several times recorded that he was among those who paid homage to Muhammad This is in itself by no means improbable and well explains his hostile attitude to him, although it remains remarkable that Muhammad later nowhere, even in his polemical letters to him, refers to this important fact The Umaiyad governor Ibn Hubaira also thought of joining him when he was besieged in Wāsit in 132 (750) but dropped the matter when he received no answer to his letter

When finally the ʿAbbāsid Abu 'l-ʿAbbās in the same year won the caliphate and ousted the ʿAlids, the two brothers disappeared and showed thereby that they would not recognise him There now began for them a period full of adventure and danger, especially after Abū Djaʿfar became caliph in 136 (754) They went secretly from place to place to gain adherents, nowhere could they feel safe from the caliph but the people were on the whole favourably disposed to them and at least would not betray them In this way they reached not only Basra and Kūfa but even went as far as al Sind via ʿAden, as a rule however, they stayed in Arabia, most securely among the Djuhaina, in whose territory lay the hill of Radwa, which so often appears in the history of the ʿAlids The caliph was very uneasy at the continued lack of success of his search for them, more and more angrily he demanded of his governors in Medīna that they should be produced and he dismissed several in rapid succession, when they appeared, perhaps not without reason, ineffective and lukewarm in their efforts He himself took very active steps but with as little result On his pilgrimage in 140 (758) he had Muhammad and Ibrāhīm's father thrown into prison because they would not betray their place of concealment, and on a later pilgrimage (144 = 762) the same fate met the sons and grandsons of Hasan, ʿAbd Allāh's brother They and ʿAbd Allāh were taken to Kūfa, treated most brutally and thrown into prison, where most of them died The same thing happened to Ibrāhīm's father-in law Muhammad b ʿAbd Allāh, a descendant of ʿUthmān, whose head the caliph sent to Khurāsān with a certificate on oath that it was the head of the ʿAlid Muhammad in order to intimidate his followers there Shortly before (Dec 761), he finally found a governor after his own heart, Riyāh b ʿUthmān, who conducted the search with the necessary vigour But he was soon able to save himself the trouble for in Radjab 145 (Nov 762) Muhammad appeared in Medina and began the revolution while his brother Ibrāhīm went to Basra to do the same It is not clear whether they did this because in Muhammad's opinion the time was ripe or whether they were forced by circumstances to hasten their plans In any case, the enterprise was not sufficiently prepared, for although they had a large number of followers in Kūfa, Basra, Egypt, where however Muhammad's son ʿAlī was arrested by the ʿAbbāsid governor, in Khurāsān and even in Sind, to which another son ʿAbd Allāh al-Ashtar was sent, there was no question of any organisation, and, as so frequently, the enthusiasm for the ʿAlids was like a fire of straw which blazes up quickly but dies down as soon In Medina where Riyah was completely taken by surprise, Muhammad in keeping with his character acted with great mildness, he opened the prison, forbade all bloodshed and was content with arresting Riyāh The best elements in the town came over to him after the jurist Mālik b Anas declared invalid his oath taken to the ʿAbbāsids, Mecca also surrendered to the new ruler The outbreak of the revolt was really a relief to Abū Dja'far for he had now, as he said, enticed the fox out of his hole He hurriedly left Baghdād, with the building of which he was busy, and went to Kūfa, the point of danger With keen instinct he saw that the weak point of the rebellion lay in Medina which must be attacked first, for in this remote spot there was a lack of materials of war and the roads thither could easily be barred But he first of all offered a complete amnesty to Muhammad, which however only led to a characteristic exchange of letters, in which one reproached the other with the weaknesses of his family He then sent his relative ʿĪsā b Mūsā against him with 4,000 men, with instructions however to settle the matter peacefully if possible His arrival had a sobering effect upon the Medinese, of whom a number seized the opportunity to get out of their difficult position Muhammad however remained undismayed He rejected the well meant advice of several men to abandon Medīna as an insult to the town but left his people free to stay with him or not He trusted in Allāh "from whom victory comes and in whose hand the matter lies", and imitated all that the Prophet had done in his time in romantic fashion For example he restored the ditch which the Prophet had dug round Medīna when it was besieged by the Kuraish, he used Muhammad's sword and his battle-cry was the same as that at the battle of Hunain, even the old single combat before the battle proper was revived The result in these circumstances was easily foreseen ʿĪsā, after offering a free pardon in vain for a few days, laid a few doors over the ditch, entered the town and began a battle in which Muhammad's supporters became less and less in numbers until their leader finally fell (Monday, 14th Ramadān 145 = Dec 6, 762) Muhammad's head was cut off and sent to the caliph For the further course of the rebellion see the article IBRĀHĪM B ʿABD ALLĀH

Muhammad is described as tall and strong with a very dark skin, on which account the caliph sardonically called him al-Muhammam, the "Blackened" He was rightly called "the pure soul" (Tabarī, iii 200) for he was an ideal character, gentle in spite of his personal bravery, but he lacked those qualities which are required of a pretender in times like his

Bibliography Tabarī, ed de Goeje, iii 66, 143—259, 359, sqq, 2508, Fragmenta historicorum arab, ed de Goeje, (I), 209, 230—246, Masʿūdī, Murūdj, ed Barbier de Meynard, vi 189—192, do, Tanbīh, in B G A, viii 341, Yaʿkūbī, ed Houtsma, ii 418, 424, 431 sq, 450, 452 sq, Mubarrad, Kāmil, ed Wright, p 146, 302, 575, 786 sqq, Noldeke, Orientalische Skizzen, p 126—131, v Vloten, in Z D M G, lii 213—218, 225

(Fr Buhl)

MUHAMMAD B ʿABD ALLĀH, a Tāhirid, governor of Baghdād Born in 209 (824—825) Muhammad in 237 (851) was summoned by the Caliph to Baghdād and appointed military governor in order to restore order in the chaos then prevailing In spite of the great power of the Tāhirids, who ruled Khurasan as independent sovereigns in practice, although they nominally recognised the suzerainty of the Caliph, his task was by no means a light one After al-Mustaʿīn had ascended the throne (248 = 862), he confirmed Muhammad in his office and also gave him the governorship of the ʿIrāk along with the two holy cities of Mecca and Medina In the following year troubles broke out in Baghdad and Sāmarrā The Arabs were defeated by the Byzantines and the rage of the people was turned against the Caliph The vizier Utāmish however finally succeeded in restoring order with the help of the two Turkish generals Wasif and Bogha the Younger The ʿAlids also gave the government trouble on several occasions A descendant of ʿAlī named Yahyā b ʿOmar rebelled in Kūfa and drove out the governor of the town After he had routed an army sent against him by Muhammad, he was attacked by the ʿAbbāsid general al-Husain b Ismāʿīl while another division took him in the rear and he finally fell in the battle (Radjab 250 = Aug 864) Another ʿAlid, al-Hasan b Zaid, had more success Two prominent men in Tabaristān, who were dissatisfied with the rule of the Tāhirids, appealed to him in 250 and very soon he was acknowledged as lord of the whole of Tabaristān The Tāhirid governors of al-Raiy and Kazwīn were driven out and replaced by ʿAlids, Muhammad b Tāhir, governor of Khurāsān, a nephew of the governor of Baghdād, then sent an army against al-Raiy The ʿAlid governor was defeated and captured and the town had to surrender, but again fell into the hand of the ʿAlids When the former governor of Tabaristān, Sulaimān b ʿAbd Allāh, invaded this province and conquered it completely, al-Hasan b Zaid had to flee to Dailam where he was defeated by Muhammad b Tāhir (351 = 865–866), after some years (257 = 870–871) however, he inflicted a defeat on the latter's troops in Djurdjān and in 259 (872—873) he again became lord of Khurāsān, where he founded an ʿAlid dynasty which lasted about sixty years Arabia

also did not escape the ʿAlid plots A descendant of ʿAlī named Ismāʿīl b Yūsuf raised trouble there in 251 (865), plundered Mecca and Medina and killed so many pilgrims that he received the epithet of al-Saffāk, "the Bloodshedder" There was also continual trouble in the capital In Muharram of the same year (= Feb 865), al-Mustaʿīn left Sāmarrā and went to Baghdād Al Muʿtazz [q v] was then taken by force from his prison in Sāmarrā and proclaimed Caliph, he then appointed his brother Abū Ahmad, later co regent with the Caliph al-Muʿtamid, commander in chief in the war against al-Mustaʿīn and his governor When all negotiations failed, the latter had to take to arms but was several times defeated Fighting took place in and around Baghdād with varying success during almost the whole year, while anarchy in the provinces increased and when Muhammad finally began negotiations with Abū Ahmad, he was accused of treason, so that the Caliph had to protect him against the troops who were furious with him But when Muhammad's friends told him that al-Mustaʿīn intended to sacrifice himself, he made peace with Abū Ahmad The Caliph had reluctantly to confirm the treaty and abdicate in favour of his rival al-Muʿtazz (Dhu 'l-Hidjdja 251 = Jan 866) and the latter thereupon ascended the throne Muhammad died in Dhu 'l Kaʿda 253 (Nov 867)

Bibliography Yaʿkūbī (ed Houtsma), ii 592, 602, 604, 608, 610 sq , 613, Tabarī, iii , see Index , Masʿūdī, Murūdj (ed Paris), vii 255 sqq , Ibn al Athīr (ed Tornberg), vii 43, 72—125, Ibn Khaldūn, al ʿIbar, iii 283 sqq , Weil, Gesch der Chalifen, ii 379—390, 402, Muir, The Caliphate, its Rise, Decline, and Fall[3], p 535 sqq , Le Strange, Baghdad during the Abbasid Caliphate, p 119, 311–313, Rothstein, in Orient Studien, Th Noldeke gewidmet, p 165 sq

(K V ZETTERSTEEN)

MUHAMMAD B ʿABD ALLĀH HASSĀN AL MAHDĪ, the well known Somali Mahdī called by the British "the Mad Mullah" He was a Somali belonging to the Ogaden Bah Geri tribe, section Rēr Hamar He was born about 1860 A D and had been from his youth devoted to religious and mystic studies, in 1895 A D he performed the pilgrimage and during his stay in Mecca became acquainted with Sayyid Muhammad Sālih [cf SOMALILAND] of whom he became an eager follower After his return to Somaliland he first settled in the Dūlbahanta tribe's territory and began a vigorous propaganda on behalf of the Sālihiya tarīka and to call Somali Muslims to a more strict rule of life As he was a learned, eloquent man and a skilful impromptu composer of poems (the ancient and best way to propagate one's ideas among the Somali Beduins), he was easily able to attain a great popularity among the Dūlbahanta in British Somaliland and his Ogadēn countrymen in Abyssinia His influence brought him to the knowledge of the government of Berbera, and British officials had sometimes recourse to him to settle through his mediation disputes arising between Beduin groups In March 1899 however, the Mullah suddenly changed his former attitude to an openly hostile one towards the British Government In August 1899 he assembled his followers in Buraʿo and declared himself to be the Mahdī and proclaimed the holy war against the infidels A first expedition was sent against him by the Abyssinians to prevent a further extension of the rebellion in Ogadēn, but Grāzmāč Bānti, the leader of this force, retired to Harar after a violent pillaging razzia led by him against the Rēr ʿAlī, an Ogadēn tribe In 1901 Colonel Swayne drove back the Mullah as far as the boundaries of Italian Northern Somaliland and defeated him at Fardiddin on July 16, 1901 A second British expedition in 1902 won another victory in the fight at Ēragō on October 6, 1902 In 1903 it was decided to send against the Mullah a great expedition in three columns a British one departing from Hōbya according to a British-Italian agreement concluded in the same year to that effect, another British column departing from Berbera, and a third, an Abyssinian force departing from Harar The British forces were placed under the command of General Manning But the first column fell into an ambush and was defeated by the Mullah at Gumburi on April 17, 1903, the second column suffered heavy losses in a fierce fight at Daratola on April 22, 1903, the Abyssinian column made only, as usual, a razzia against Ogadēn groups in the valley of the Shabēlla In 1904 a fourth British expedition defeated the Mullah at Djidbāli on January 9, 1904 and again, after the landing of a naval force on the shore of the Indian Ocean, at Ilig in Italian territory on April 21, 1904 In the meantime, Sayyid Muhammad Sālih on the invitation of the British and Italian Governments had directed a letter to the most influential Muslim learned men in Somaliland, which contained a declaration against the Mullah, who was said to have violated the rules of the Salihiya tarika and thus to have become worthy of the curses of the true followers of the Sālihiya The victories of the British, however, as they could not be followed up by a permanent occupation of the interior, had not been sufficient to subdue the rebellion It was therefore attempted to conclude an Anglo Italian agreement with the Mullah and this was carried through by offering to the Mullah the concession of the Italian portion of the Nūgāl valley with Ilig as his seat The Mullah subscribed to these conditions in Ilig on March 5, 1905, but added to his signature the clause "wa 'l-kunsil yaʿrifu hālī" (and the Consul knows my condition), which was explained in Europe as meaning a close trust in the Consul, but otherwise in Somaliland, as he (the Mullah) was a Sūfī, and therefore by no means obliged to execute any arrangement he might have concluded with infidels on account of temporary political conditions In January 1908 the Mullah actually began again to lead razzias against British and Italian subjects No great expedition was however sent against him by the British, who even retired from the interior of their colony, a Camel Constabulary Corps was raised as a mobile force to be employed in raids and swift operations against the Mullah's parties But after many successful and gallant raids the Camel Constabulary Corps was met by an overwhelming enemy force at Dulmadōba on August 9, 1913 and the Commandant of the Corps, Sir Richard Corfield was killed in the fight In the meantime, the Italians had almost entirely occupied the interior of Southern Somaliland through a very successful policy, which avoided any considerable military action, in this way they brought about in Northern Somaliland the subjection of the two Sultāns (the Sultān of the Madjērtēn and the Sultān of Hōbya) to the Italian

Government, and further they organised the Sultān's forces to employ them against the Mullah, thus assuring the defence of the northern frontier of their colony There then began a series of raids led by Somali auxiliary bands, especially against the Mullah's followers in the northern valley of the Shabēlla and towards Nūgāl, where Djiriiban and Garʿad were occupied by the Sultān of Hobya These energetic actions which took place even during the Great European war, besides wearing down the Mullah's army, caused him to lose political control of a very large zone where the population concluded peaceful agreements with Italy and forced him to be continually ready to defend his territory from the south also However, after the end of the Great War, the British Government decided to attack the Mullah from Berbera and to finally overthrow him In January-March 1920 after violent bombardments of the Mullah's defences by the British airmen, a British force advanced to Talēh, the Mullah's last camp, he, rapidly pursued by the Camel Corps and Somali auxiliaries, fled to Ogadēn and then into the Karanla tribe's territory, where he died on November 23, 1920

The Mullah's career is a very typical one for the study of the Somali mind He had begun his movement as an agent of the Sālihiya tarīka, then his increasing popularity tempted him to a more ambitious sphere and, accordingly, after placing his propaganda on a severely religious basis, he tried to become the leader of all the Somali by making the ties of the common faith prevail over the tribal bonds This is really the only way to lead such a movement in Somaliland where Islām may be regarded as a tie of brotherhood among tribes otherwise deeply divided by their secular history of wars and revenge Therefore Muhammad b ʿAbd Allāh Hassān said in a famous poem "Have I not put my prayer-mat on this sea to join together the Muslims who were not brothers?" alluding also to his relations with the Sālihīya in Arabia He desired for the same reason that his followers should call themselves "Daraāwish", forgetting even the name of their original tribe Therefore he affected to become angry when he was referred to in official correspondence as "Muhammad ʿAbd Allāh, the Ogadēn Bah Geri" while he used to add to his signature only the nisba al-Hāshimī (alluding to the origin of the Somali from ʿAkīl b Abī Tālib) [see the art SOMALILAND]

Further, instead of the tribal forces he raised special armed corps, often with a new name, like the Hagattu ("the scratchers") recruited among the Habar Gidir, the Dūgad recruited among the Mikāhīl ("Dūgad" means "shooter"), the Kaiyād recruited among the Dūlbahanta But he did not pursue this policy to the end the hostility of the greater part of the Isāk tribes, which was a strong appeal to the old rivalry between Isāk and Dārōd, Muhammad Sālih's letter, which was undoubtedly a severe blow to him, since he had had already provoked the hostility of the Kādirīya and so had to rely entirely on Sālihīya support, the necessity of getting booty for his soldiers who otherwise would have hardly remained with him, all these things and his very nature caused the religious prestige of the Mullah as the Mahdī of Somaliland to decline and he gradually became merely the chief of a tribe, a powerful chief indeed of a large tribe as the Darāwīsh were, formed from various elements and therefore very similar to the federations well known in the Somali customary law It was obvious that, when he began to regard himself in this light (that is regarding himself as a chief of a Somali tribe rather than "the brother born from the same father and the same mother of all the Muslims"), it was very difficult for him to restrain himself and his followers from exaggerating those tendencies so familiar to their own national character, and therefore they came back gradually to the ancient Somali custom of gueirilla warfare conducted in the traditional way, even to defying the tribes of the enemy in insulting or scornful poems or designating them with typical ironical nicknames or giving to every razzia a special name ("the razzia smashing the bones" was the name given to the fight at Dulmadōba, cf the Ayyām al-ʿArab)

It may therefore be concluded that the Mullah's attempt to avail himself of Islām to conquer the old rivalries between the tribes and combine the Somali to drive the Europeans out of the country, failed both on account of the strength of the European armies and the fierce resistance, often unconscious, opposed by the Somali on behalf of their ancient tribal organisation and customary law

Bibliography M MacNeill, In pursuit of the Mad Mullah, London 1902, J W Jennings, With the Abyssinians in Somaliland, London 1905, the Italian Green Book Somalia Italiana Settentrionale, XXII legislatura, Sessione 1904–1906, Rome 1906, the British Blue Book Correspondence relating to affairs in Somaliland (CD 7066), London 1913, Douglas Jardine, The Maa Mullah of Somaliland, London 1923

(ENRICO CERULLI)

MUHAMMAD B ʿABD ALLĀH [See IBN AL-ʿABBĀR, IBN AL-KHATIB, IBN MĀLIK]

MUHAMMAD B ʿABD AL-MALIK, ABŪ DJAʿFAR, called Ibn al-Zaiyāt, vizier to several ʿAbbāsids Ibn al-Zaiyāt began his career as secretary in the chancellery in Baghdād and when the caliph al Muʿtasim noticed his ability and learning he appointed him his vizier (219—220 = 834—835) He also filled this office in the reign of al Wāthik, but as he treated the latter's brother Djaʿfar, the future caliph al-Mutawakkil, with a lack of respect he earned his hatred After the death of al-Wāthik in Dhu 'l Hidjdja 232 (Aug 847), Ibn al-Zaiyāt wished homage to be paid to his son Muhammad, the latter, however, was thought to be too young by the Turkish general Wasif and in his stead Djaʿfar was proclaimed caliph under the name al-Mutawakkil The vizier was at first allowed to remain in office but in Safar of the following year (Sept 847), he was arrested, deprived of his possessions and subjected to a cruel form of torture which he himself had invented After enduring the most horrible cruelty he died in Rabīʿ I 233 (Nov 847)

Bibliography Yaʿkūbī, ed Houtsma, II 584, 590 sq , Tabarī, III, index, Masʿūdī, Murūdj, ed Paris, III 403, VII 103 sq, 146—148, 194—197, 215, Ibn al-Athīr, ed Tornberg, VI 320, 338, 365 sq, 373, VII 20, 22—26, Ibn Khallikān, ed Wustenfeld, N° 706, transl de Slane, III 249 sq , Ibn al Tiktakā, al Fakhrī, ed Derenbourg, p 202, 322—326, Weil, Gesch der Chalifen, II 327 sq, 348 sq

(K V ZETTERSTÉEN)

MUHAMMAD B ʿABD AL-MALIK [See IBN ṬUFAIL, IBN ZUHR]

MUḤAMMAD B ʿABD AL-RAḤĪM [See IBN AL-FURĀT]

MUHAMMAD B ʿABD AL-WAHHĀB [See WAHHĀBĪYA]

MUḤAMMAD B ABĪ ʿĀMIR [See AL-MANṢŪR B ABĪ ʿĀMIR]

MUHAMMAD, a son of Abū Bakr and one of his wives, Asmāʾ of the tribe of Khathʿam He was born in the last year of Muhammad's life so that his father could not have exercised any influence on him, while the memories of Abū Bakr's great friend which were kept alive in his family must have had all the more influence on the passionate nature of the boy, which receives important confirmation from the fact that Ibn Kutaiba describes him as one of the "pious" (nussak) among the Kuraish When in the reign of ʿUthman the bitterness at the preference of the Umayyads in combination with a reaction against the strong secularisation of Islām provoked a movement which grew in strength, he took part in it with great vigour and began along with ʿUthmān's ungrateful foster son Muhammad b Abi Hudhaifa to stir up the people of Egypt against the Caliph He later went with other revolutionaries to Medina where his equally ardent but much wiser half sister ʿĀʾisha in vain advised him to go with her to Mecca and leave others to carry through the crime, but he was one of those who broke into the Caliph's room where he ill treated the helpless old man although it was Kinana b Bishr who dealt the death-blow He was one of the few Kuraish who joined ʿAlī and the latter apparently cherished a real affection for the young man, which his enemies of course interpreted as further evidence of his friendship with the murderers of ʿUthmān Muhammad took part in the battle of the Camel, at the conclusion of which the chivalrous ʿAlī commissioned him to escort his half-sister to Basra The sources give somewhat different accounts of the last phase of his life in Egypt According to Wākidī in Balādhurī, Abū Mikhnaf (Tabarī, I 3392 sq) and Yaʿkubī, ʿAlī at once appointed him governor of Egypt after unwisely recalling Kais b Saʿd, but as he soon discovered how foolish it was to appoint a youth inexperienced in war to this difficult post, he sent for his ablest follower al-Ashtar [q v] and gave him command in Egypt while he appeased Muhammad's rightly injured feelings by a kind letter The attempt to make good the mistake failed, however, for al-Ashtar was poisoned on the way in al-Kulzum at the instigation of Muʿāwiya Al-Ṭuhrī's account (Tabarī, I 3242) shows ʿAlī in a somewhat more favourable light After the recall of Kais he sent al-Ashtar as governor to Egypt and only after he was poisoned did he send Muhammad Finally there is a third story (Ibn al Kalbī and Masʿūdī) according to which al Ashtar was sent to Egypt only after the death of Muhammad, but this must be due to some misunderstanding of the first version In any case, the choice of Muhammad was an unfortunate one, for the inexperienced youth, who had no authority and was besides insufficiently supported by ʿAlī, was not fit to meet experienced opponents like Muʿāwiya and ʿAmr b al ʿĀṣī, as anyone but ʿAlī would have seen ʿAmr b al ʿĀṣī came with an army and a battle was fought at al Musannāt (the dam) When the actual murderer of ʿUthmān, Kināna b Bishr, had fallen after a brave resistance, the Egyptians lost heart and Muhammad, abandoned by all, was captured and killed while trying to escape (38 = 658)

Bibliography Balādhurī, ed de Goeje, p 228, Tabarī, ed de Goeje, I 2869—3414 passim (s index), III 2470, Dinawarī, ed Guirgas, p 160 sq , Ibn Kutaiba, Kitāb al-Maʿārif, ed Wustenfeld, p 87, 98, Masʿūdī, Murūdj, ed Barbier de Meynard, IV 277, 279—281, 421 sq , Yaʿḳūbī, ed Houtsma, II 203 sq , 226 sq , Wellhausen, Das arabische Reich, p 59–62 (FR BUHL)

MUHAMMAD B ABĪ BAKR [See IBN KAYYIM AL DJAWZĪYA, IBN SAYYID AL-NĀS]

MUHAMMAD B ABI 'L-KĀSIM [See IBN ABĪ DĪNĀR]

MUHAMMAD B ABĪ MUHAMMAD [See IBN ZAFAR]

MUHAMMAD B ABI 'L SĀDJ ABŪ ʿUBAID ALLĀH, son of Abu 'l-Sādj Diwdad, an Eastern Iranian (not Turkish) noble from Ushrūsana in Mā-warāʾ al Nahr (see Barthold, Turkestan, G M S, p 169) For his early career see the article SĀDJIDS After his rupture with Khumārawaih he returned to Baghdad (276 = 889) and appears to have remained there (cf Tabarī, III 2122) until his appointment as governor of Ādharbāidjān in 279 (892) Though on his arrival he had entertained friendly relations with the Bagratid king of Armenia, Sembat (acc 891), after seizing Marāgha in 280 (893) he made a first incursion into Armenia, but without success At the same time he had strengthened his position at Baghdād by giving his daughter in marriage to al Muʿtadid's confidant, the general Badr al Muʿtadidī Having been rejoined by his Ghādim, the general Wasif, who had defeated the Dulafid ʿUmar b ʿAbd al ʿAzīz in al Djibāl in 281 (894—895) but did not succeed in annexing his territory, he made a second expedition into Armenia in 282—283 (895—896) and captured Kars, Dwin and Waspurakan Subsequently he came to terms with Sembat, but his son Diwdād remained as governor of Dwin until Muhammad's death In 284 (897—898) Muhammad declared his independence, but finding himself unable to withstand al Muʿtadid made prompt submission, was pardoned, and in the following year officially recognized as governor of Armenia in addition to Ādharbāidjān About the same time he appears to have adopted the title of al-Afshīn, which appears on his coinage, and which was evidently intended as a claim to descent from the old princely family of Ushrūsana (see the article AFSHĪN and Justi, Iran Namenbuch, s v Pisina) In 287 (900) he made a further indirect attempt to extend his rule over the territories which were slipping from the grasp of the Tūlūnids by encouraging Wasif to seize Malatya and to apply to the caliph for investiture with the government of Cilicia Al-Muʿtadid, however, learning that this was only a preliminary step towards the seizure of Diyār Mudar by Wasif and al Afshīn, put an end to their design by a swift and unexpected campaign against Wasif, who was himself captured Al-Afshīn died a few months later (Rabiʿ I, 288 = March 901) at Bardhaʿa

Bibliography In addition to the works cited above and under the article SĀDJIDS see Masʿūdī, Murūdj al Dhahab, VIII 144–145, 196–200, al Kindī, Wulāt Miṣr (ed Guest), p 238, Ibn Khallikān, transl de Slane, I 500, Histoire de l'Armenie par le patriarche Jean VI, trad

par J St Martin (Paris 1841), p 132—133, 145—146, 153—159, 165—169, 173—178, M F Brosset, Collection d'historiens armeniens (St Petersburg 1874–1876), i 187–189, 193–196, ii 428, R R Vasmer, O mon'etakh sadjidov (Baku 1927), p 4—8, J Markwart, Sudarmenien und die Tigrisquellen, Vienna 1927, p 116*—117* (H A R GIBB)

MUḤAMMAD B ABĪ ZAINAB [See ABU 'L-KHAṬṬĀB]

MUḤAMMAD B AGHLAB [See AGHLABIDS]

MUḤAMMAD B AḤMAD [See IBN AL-ʿALKAMĪ, IBN IYĀS, IBN RUSHD]

MUḤAMMAD B ʿALĪ, a grandson of Husain the son of ʿAlī, his kunya was Abū Djaʿfar On account of his learning he was given the honorific name of al-Bākir (the investigator, who goes deeply into things) He was a recognised authority on tradition and a number of pious utterances are also recorded of him, he had at the same time the characteristic fondness of his family for embroidered silk garments and colours That he did not escape the usual fate of his family of being celebrated by a section of the Shīʿīs as an imām is shown by a poem of the ʿIdjlī Abū Hurana, but he lived contentedly in Medina and apparently played no part in politics although he was treated, for example by ʿUmar II, with respect He was expressly disowned by extreme Shīʿīs like al-Mughīra and Bayān When the party which had hitherto paid homage to his brother Zaid, abandoned the latter, they transferred his privileges to him, or rather, since he was dead, to his son Djaʿfar [cf DJAʿFAR B MUḤAMMAD] The reason of the breach is said to have been that Zaid would not insult the memory of the two first Caliphs as his followers demanded but this does not agree very well with the fact that Muḥammad in Ibn Saʿd's obviously much retouched account emphatically declares his fondness for Abū Bakr and ʿUmar The date of his death is variously given as 114, 117 or 118 A H

Bibliography Ṭabarī, ed de Goeje, ii 1699 sq, 1739 sq, iii 213, 2495 sq, Fragm historicorum arab, ed de Goeje, p 96 sq, 230, Yaʿkūbī, ed Houtsma, ii 365 sq, 384 sq, Nawawī, Biographical Dictionary, ed Wustenfeld, p 113 (FR BUHL)

MUḤAMMAD B ʿALĪ [See AL-DJAWĀD AL-ISFAHĀNĪ, IBN AL-ʿARABĪ, IBN ASKAR, IBN BĀBŪYA, IBN AL-ṬIKTAKĀ, IBN WAHSHĪYA]

MUḤAMMAD B ʿALĪ AL-RIDĀ, ninth imām of the Twelver Shīʿa, was born in Ramaḍān 195 (June 811) in Medina As, according to Abu 'l Faradj al-Isfahānī, Makātil al-Ṭālibiyin (Teheran 1307), p 195, 18, he was of negroid appearance, it may be true that his mother, a slave woman, variously called Sabīka, Durra and Khaizurān, was a Nubian, to give her an honourable pedigree it was added "of the family of Maria the Copt" When al-Maʾmūn attached ʿAlī al-Riḍā to his court, he married the boy to one of his daughters, Umm al-Fadl, who was taken to him in 215 (830) Al-Muʿtasim on his accession summoned him to Baghdād He arrived there at the beginning of 220, but was dead already by Dhu 'l-Kaʿda (Nov 835) According to the Shīʿīs and in keeping with their scheme of martyrdom, he was poisoned at the instigation of al-Muʿtasim by Umm al-Fadl who remained childless, but even the already mentioned Makātil, which record every murder of an ʿAlid, know nothing of this This Muḥammad is, generally speaking, only occasionally mentioned outside the Shīʿa, along with his father, e g in Ibn Wādih al-Yaʿkūbī, Taʾrīkh, ed Houtsma (Leyden 1883), ii 552 and in Ṭabarī, Annales, iii 1029, 1102, according to al-Masʿūdī, Murūdj al-Dhahab (Paris 1861 sqq), vii 117, Muḥammad died in 219, according to vii 171 not till the reign of al-Wāthik, i e after 227 Even within the Shīʿa, his role is quite a passive one After his father's tragic end, those with Zaidi views who had hoped some day with him as Caliph to put into force their activist ʿAlid political programme, went their own ways again, while of those who held Imāmī views, one group, as usual in such a case, became "standfast" Wākifīya and another chose Aḥmad, a brother of al-Riḍā, as Imām, for Muḥammad was only seven at the time For those who remained faithful to him, there arose in the Shuʿūt al-Imāma the question of the child Imām's knowledge The case was repeated with the following three Imāms But the authority to teach was in the hands of men whose activity extended through several imāmates, with Madjlisī (s Bibl), xii 125 infra cf Mirzā Muḥammad al-Asterābādī, Manhadj al Makāl (Teheran 1306), p 217, Abū ʿAmr al-Kashshī, Maʿrifat Akhbar al Ridjāl (Bombay 1317), p 353 sq, 374 sqq, Ṭūsī, Fihrist Kutub al Shīʿa (Bibl Ind, N° 60) N° 124, 150, p 289, note 1 The gradual development of the dogma in question, which is associated with the child Jesus teaching in Sūra xix 30 sqq, is not quite clear, as regards its apportionment to the various Imāms Heresiographers including al Nawbakhtī, Firak al Shīʿa (Bibl Isl, N° 4), p 74 sqq, quote the doctrines anonymously Besides, there is the confusion of names (which has also entered European indices), for Muḥammad b ʿAlī was also the name of one of his grandchildren, who died before his father, the 10th Imām ʿAlī al Nakī, but left issue, his adherents continued the imāmate further than the Twelvers through these children, while they deny the existence of the twelfth Imām Muḥammad al Mahdī as son of his brother, the eleventh Imām Ḥasan al-ʿAskarī Shīʿa works avoid confusion by giving the ninth Imām the kunya Abū Djaʿfar al-Thānī, his official title is al Takī, "the God-fearing", a common epithet is al Djawād, "the liberal" he is said to have paid his father's debts As wakīl or bāb, he had, like al Riḍā before him, ʿUthmān b Saʿīd al ʿAmrī, called Sammān or Zaiyāt Among the usual miracles of the Imāms, Abū Djaʿfar al-Saffār (d 290) in Baṣāʾir al Daradjāt (in Madjlisī, xii 108) relates that the ninth Imām carried a worshipper at night from Syria to the holy sites of Kerbelāʾ, Kūfa and Medina as well as to Mecca The fact that his memory has been kept so green to the present day is due to the fact that he was buried beside the tomb of his grandfather, the seventh Imām, Mūsā al-Kāzim [q v], thus arose the double Meshhed al Kāzimain

Bibliography A full account with exact references to the sources is given in Muḥammad Bākir b Muḥammad Takī al-Madjlisī, Biḥār al-Anwār, xii (Teheran 1302), p 99—126, of earlier works we may specially mention al-Mufīd [q v], al-Irshād (Teheran n d without pagination, arranged in the order of the Imāms (R STROTHMANN)

MUḤAMMAD B ʿAMMĀR [See IBN ʿAMMĀR]

MUHAMMAD B ANUSHTEGĪN [See KHWĀRIZMSHĀH]

MUHAMMAD B BAKĪYA B ʿALĪ [See IBN BAKĪYA]

MUHAMMAD B DĀWŪD [See IBN ĀDJURRŪM, AL-IṢFAHĀNĪ]

MUHAMMAD B AL-DJAZARĪ [See IBN AL-DJAZARĪ]

MUHAMMAD B DUSHMANZIYĀR [See KĀKŪYIDS]

MUHAMMAD B FARĀMARZ [See KHOSREW MOILĀ]

MUHAMMAD B HABĪB [See IBN HABĪB]

MUHAMMAD B AL-HANAFĪYA, a son of ʿAlī and Khawla, a woman of the tribe of the Banū Ḥanīfa, who had been brought a prisoner to Medīna after the battle of ʿAkrabāʾ [q v] and came into ʿAlī's possession (cf Ḥaiyid's poem Kitāb al-Aghānī, vii 4 "she was a servant in the house"), he was born in 16 A H Although he did not, like Ḥasan and Ḥusain, have the blood of the Prophet in his veins, he became involved not only in the political turmoils but also in the schemes which the boundless fancies of the extreme Shīʿīs built up around the family of ʿAlī He was not to blame for this, for he was of a retiring disposition and acted very cautiously But when Ḥasan had sold his rights and Ḥusain had fallen at Kerbelāʾ in 680, many turned their eyes to him as the natural head of the family This aroused the suspicion of ʿAbd Allāh b Zubair who, after the death of Ḥusain, appeared more and more openly as a pretender, the fact that Muhammad had no sympathy with the efforts of the opposition in the Ḥidjāz is evident from the interesting statement of Balādhurī that he definitely declared the accusations brought against the Caliph Yazīd I by the Medinese to be false The matter only became serious when the adventurer Mukhtār [q v] after several vain efforts to get others to join him stirred up a movement on a large scale in the ʿIrāk in 66 (685), as champion of Muhammad's rights Even now Muhammad acted with great restraint and declined the significant title "al-Mahdī" with which they wished to greet him (cf Tabarī, ii 610 and Ibn Saʿd, v 68, which has certainly been misinterpreted by Lammens) He obviously did not care for Mukhtār at all, and he had every reason to doubt the genuineness of his enthusiasm for him, but in view of the many dangers which surrounded him and probably also from a want of decision he did not wish to break with him openly Therefore when some people came to him from Kūfa to clear up his attitude to Mukhtār, he only gave them a diplomatic answer which was non-committal (cf the somewhat different versions Ibn Saʿd, v 72, Yaʿkūbī, ii 308, Tabarī, ii 607 and thereon Kāmil, p 598) but which they interpreted as a kind of approval, as it did not definitely disown him As a result the revolutionary movement spread in extent and much blood was shed to avenge Ḥusain and other ʿAlīds Muhammad was against this also (cf Ibn Saʿd, v 72 sq, 77), but when Ibn Zubair's attitude became more and more hostile and he finally imprisoned Muhammad and several relatives, including ʿAbd Allāh b ʿAbbās, at Mecca near the Zemzem well, he saw nothing else for it but to appeal for help to Mukhtār This was what the latter wanted and he sent a body of cavalry at once to Mecca and released Muhammad and the other prisoners in the nick of time but by the latter's express orders avoided conflict with Ibn Zubair's troops, as the town was not to be desecrated by bloodshed Muhammad then sought shelter with his family at Minā (cf Kāmil, p 554, 597, Kitāb al-Aghānī, viii 33, Kumait, ed Horovitz, i 78) and later went to Ṭāʾif He made no further use of Mukhtār and was therefore not compromised when the revolution failed and his champion fell in 67 (686—687) In spite of the threats of Ibn Zubair and the demands couched in more friendly language of ʿAbd al Malik and although a safe place of residence was granted him neither in Ḥidjāz nor in Syria, he defined his attitude by paying homage to neither of the two pretenders and adhered to the principle that he would only recognize a ruler around whom the Muslim community were united He therefore appeared in the noteworthy pilgrimage of the year 688 along with the Zubairīds, Umaiyads and Khāridjīs, as an independent head of a party, although only under an armed neutrality Only when, after the fall of Ibn Zubair (73 = 692), the unanimity of the vox populi which he had demanded, became a reality, did he finally recognise the Marwānid as the legitimate ruler and visited him in 78 (697—698) at Damascus He returned however to Medina, where he died in 81 (700—701) His strict passivity in the political field is always attributed to purely religious motives in the traditions, not human force but Allāh's help alone should assist ʿAlī's family to their rights, but there is no doubt that a further reason was his lack of enterprise and self-confidence, a trait common to a number of ʿAlīds That, like his whole family, he at the same time liked the good things of this world is evident from the heavy demands which he sent to ʿAbd al-Malik for the payment of his debts and annual pensions for his children, relatives and clients, there is also evidence that he had the family fondness for fine clothes and cosmetics It is all the more remarkable then that the more fanciful and extravagant school of Shīʿīs seized upon him at once after his death and spread the belief that he was not dead but lived in a kind of fairy kingdom on the hill of Radwā west of Medina, whence he would return as the victorious leader of an army (cf Kitāb al-Aghānī, vii 4 sq, 9 sq, viii 32) This was the idea of radjʿa which ʿAbd Allāh b Sabā [q v] had associated with ʿAlī (cf Friedländer, in Z A, xxiii 309 sqq) and which was now transferred to him, and in fact it was now easier to bring him into the forefront than it had been while he maintained an attitude of stubborn passive resistance in his lifetime

Bibliography Tabarī, ed de Goeje, i 1126—ii 783 passim (s indices), iii 2337, 2476, 2530, Ibn Saʿd, ed Sachau, v 66—86, Balādhurī, Ansāb al Ashrāf, in Z D M G, xxxviii 394, Masʿūdī, Murūdj, ed Barbier de Meynard, v 176 sqq, 267 sq, Yaʿḳūbī, ed Houtsma, ii 267, 308, 311—314, 320, Mubarrad, Kāmil, ed Wright, p 296 sq, 554, 580 sqq, 597 sq, Nawawī, Biographical Dictionary, ed Wustenfeld, p 113—115, Dīnawarī, ed Guirgas, p 156 sqq, 186 sq, 234 sq, 242, 274, 297 sq, 303—315, T W Arnold, al-Muʿtazila, p 10 sq, v Vloten, Recherches sur la Domination arabe etc, 1894, H Banning, Muhammad ibn al Hanafīya (dissert), 1909,

Fr Buhl, Det danske Videnskabernes Selskab, Oversigter 1910, p 355 sqq, H Lammens, Études sur le règne du Calife Omaiyade Moʿāwia, p 166, 169 sq (Fr Buhl)

MUḤAMMAD B HĀNIʾ [See Ibn Hānīʾ]

MUHAMMAD B AL-HASAN [See Ibn Duraid, Ibn Hamdūn, al-Shaibānī]

MUHAMMAD B AL-HUDHAIL [See Abu 'l-Hudhail]

MUHAMMAD B HUSAIN, an Ottoman dignitary and historian, who at the request of the first Wālī of Baghdād, Derwīsh Mehmed Pasha (Thuraiyā, Sidjill i ʿOthmānī, ii 33), translated into Turkish the history of ʿAlī b Shihāb Hamadhānī, written in 10 bāb in Persian, he added two bāb to it and gave it the title Tuhfat al Maʾmūn The work only exists in manuscript

Bibliography Biusalī Mehmed Tāhir, ʿOthmanlī Muʾellifleri, iii 142, cf also Hādjdjī Khalīfa, Kashf al-Zunūn, Būlāk 1274, i 404, where Mustafā Shaʿbān is named as the Turkish translator

The MUHAMMAD KHALĪFA (محمد خليفهٔ كيهكار), who was a dignitary of the court and flourished under three sultāns (Murād IV, 1032—1049 = 1623—1640, Ibrāhīm, 1049—1058 = 1640—1648, and Mehmed IV, 1058—1099 = 1648—1687), was not identical with him He wrote a chronicle of his time entitled Taʾrikh-i Ghilmānī which covered the years 1060—1075 = 1650—1665 The work which consists of 3 bābs and a khātima (of which the second bāb contains two and the third 13 fasl) was published by Ahmad Rafīk as supplement 11 to TOEM, parts 78—83, Istanbul 1340 (1924)

A certain Muhammad Khalīfa b Husain is perhaps the same person, he also was a dignitary of the court of the same three sultāns and wrote a history of his time which covered the years 1043—1070 (1633—1659) The only known manuscript is in Vienna

Bibliography Ahmad Rafīk, biographical introduction to the Taʾrikh i Ghilmānī, Flügel, Katalog, ii 271, Babinger, G O W, p 209, N⁰ 179 (text wrongly 170) and 180 (Th Menzel)

MUHAMMAD B AL-HUSAIN [See Abu 'l-Hasan, Abū Saʿd, Ibn Mukia, al Sharīf al-Radi]

MUHAMMAD B IBRĀHĪM [See Abu 'l Hasan]

MUHAMMAD B IBRĀHĪM ʿĀDIL SHĀH (1035–1070 = 1626–1660) succeeded to the throne of Bidjāpūr after the death of his father In the year 1044 (1634), the armies of the emperor Shāh Djahān invaded the Dakan and laid waste the country of Bidjāpūr After the subjugation of Dawlatābād and other forts, Muhammad b Ibrāhīm ʿĀdil Shāh agreed to pay a considerable tribute to the emperor of Dehli He was the last king of Bidjāpūr who struck coins in his own name In the latter part of his reign, his vassal Shīwādjī, son of Sāhū Bhuslā, by stratagem and treachery obtained great power, and the foundation of the Bidjāpūr monarchy became weakened He died in 1070 (1660) and was buried in Bidjāpūr where his tomb is called „Gūl Gumbaz" (circular dome)

Bibliography Fuzūnī Astarābādī, Futūhāt ʿĀdil Shāhī, fol 314b, Imperial Gazetteer of India, viii 189 (M Hidayet Hosain)

MUḤAMMAD B ILYĀS [See Abū ʿAlī]

MUḤAMMAD B ʿĪSĀ [See ʿIsāwīya]

MUHAMMAD B ISḤĀḲ [See Ibn Ishāk, al Nadīm]

MUHAMMAD B AL-ḲĀSIM [See Abu 'l ʿAināʾ, al-Anbārī]

MUHAMMAD B ḲĀSIM, a cousin of Walīd I (86—96 = 705—715) and son-in-law of al-Hadjdjādj b Yūsuf, was the governor of Basra, in 92 (711), he was sent to conquer Sind Having defeated and killed the Rādjā of the place called Dāhir, he took possession of that country in 93 (712) and finally penetrated as far as Multān about 500 miles from the sea and even reached the foot of the Himālayas Various accounts are given of the death of this general The common story is that Muhammad b Kāsim was falsely accused by the two daughters of the Rādjā of Dāhir, whom he had sent to the harem of Sulaimān (96—99 = 715—717), the brother and successor of Walīd, of having violated their chastity, and that he was therefore sewn up alive in a raw cow hide, by order of the enraged caliph Others say that Muhammad b Kāsim, with other members of his family, was tortured and put to death by Sālih b ʿAbd al-Rahmān, governor of ʿIrāk, in revenge for the murder of his brother by Hadjdjādj

Bibliography Balādhurī, Futūh al-Buldān, p 435—441, Taʾrikh Firishta, ed Bombay 1832, ii 605, 608, Nizām al-Dīn Ahmad Harawī, Tabakāt Akbarī, Lucknow 1875, p 633, 634, A W Hughes, Gazetteer of the Province of Sind, 1875, p 24, 25, Imperial Gazetteer of India, ii 351, xxii 395, Camb Hist of India, vol iii, chap i (M Hidayet Hosain)

MUHAMMAD B MAHMŪD Abū Shudjāʿ Ghiyāth al Dunyā wa 'l-Dīn, a Saldjūk Sultan 547—554 (1153—1159), born 522 (1128), like his brother Malikshah was educated with the atābeg Buzaba, who set them up as claimants to the throne against their uncle Masʿūd When Buzaba in 542 (1147—1148) was taken prisoner in a fierce battle and executed, Masʿūd adopted his nephew and married Muhammad to his daughter He probably intended him to succeed him and not Malikshāh, as Ibn al Athir and others say, because after his death (547 = 1152) the latter was actually raised to the throne Muhammad was away at the time but within three months he was recognised as sultān by the powerful Khassbeg, after he had come to Hamadhān, because Malikshāh proved quite incompetent The new sultān showed his gratitude by treacherously putting Khassbeg to death and sent his head to the emīrs of Marāgha and Ādharbāidjān in the hope that he would win them over But he was disappointed for, although they hated Khassbeg, their horror at the cruel deed made them prefer to pay homage to Muhammad's uncle Sulaimān, who had escaped from years of imprisonment on Masʿūd's death Muhammad therefore fled to Isfahān, but because Sulaimān was an inveterate drunkard, he could not hold out in Hamadhān and when he had gone away Muhammad returned and was henceforth recognised as sultān by the emīrs In the meanwhile Sulaimān succeeded in escaping to Lihf and entered into relations with the Caliph al-Muktafī li-Amr Allāh The latter was endeavouring not without success to make himself independent of the Saldjūks and let Sulaimān come to Baghdād (550 = 1155) to use

him against Muhammad He was also able to win Malikshāh over and to collect an army, which was however scattered in the following year by Muhammad with the help of Mawdūd, lord of al-Mawsil, and Sulaimān was again made prisoner Muhammad now thought himself strong enough to attack the Caliph himself and to besiege him in Baghdād ʿImād al-Dīn, who was in the town, gives a full account of the siege (Rec Hist Croix, ii 246 sqq) Muhammad hurriedly raised the siege when news reached him that Ildigiz had occupied Hamadhān with Malik shāh and Arslān (552 = 1157) By the time the sultān arrived there they had retired, but he was at war with them till his death in 554 (1159)

Bibliography see the article SELDJUKS (M Th Houtsma)

MUHAMMAD B MALIKSHĀH Abū Shudjāʿ Ghiyāth al-Dunyā wa 'l-Dīn Kasīm Amīr al-Muʾminīna, a Saldjūk sultān (498—511 = 1105—1118), was born on the 18th Shaʿbān 474 (Jan 20, 1082) of a slave, who was also the mother of Sandjar, and was given the Turkish name of Tapar After his father's death, he stayed at first with Turkan Khatun but then joined his brother Barkiyāruk who granted him the town of Gandja Arrived there, he also seized Arrān and allowed himself to be seduced by Muʾaiyad al-Mulk b Nizām al Mulk into dropping his brother's name out of the khutba The two brothers fought one another with varying success in the following years until finally in 497 (1104) Barkiyāruk withdrew from the western provinces of the empire to Isfahān and left Muhammad to enforce recognition as sultān from the governors in these lands When Barkiyāruk died soon after, at the end of 1104, Muhammad turned first to Baghdād because he was sure of the homage of the Caliph, who had already received him and his brother a few years before in ceremonial audience (cf the account in Ibn Khallikān, Būlāk 1299, ii 444, had the emīr Ayār, who had at first had the khutba read for Malikshāh b Barkiyāruk, treacherously put to death and sent the king of the Arabs Sadaka back to his capital al Hilla with orders to restore peace in Basra and among the Arab tribes of the neighbourhood He then hurried to Isfahān, where the Bātinīya had achieved great successes in the troubled reign of Barkiyāruk and had established themselves in several hill-fortresses in the neighbourhood One of their leaders, Ibn Attāsh, had by a ruse secured possession of the fortress of Diz-Kuh or Shāh Diz built by Malikshāh The Sultān regarded it as his first duty to subdue and root out if possible these unbelievers, he sent his troops to besiege the fortress and, when it was taken, razed it to the ground and had the captured Bātinīya executed in cruel fashion (500 = 1107, cf the text of the report sent by him to the Caliph's vizier in Ibn al-Kalānisī, ed Amedroz, p 152 ff) Nor did he hesitate to have his own vizier, Saʿd al Mulk Abu 'l Mahāsin al-Ātī, executed at the gate of Isfahān, he was suspected, according to Anusharwan wrongly, (cf Rec Hist Croix, ii 91) of having had dealings with the Bātinīya

While Muḥammad was still in Isfahān, the emīr Čawali Saḳawu, who ruled between Fārs and Khūzistān, made his submission to him, the sultān had frequently tried in vain to bring him to obedience through the emīr Mawdūd The sulṭān was so pleased that he granted him the town of al-Mawsil where Djekermish, who had only paid homage to him under compulsion, was in command The latter was not inclined to submit to the arrangement, but was taken prisoner in an encounter with Čawali The latter however was not yet lord of al-Mawsil, for the followers of Djekermish now supported his son Zangī and appealed for help to Aḳsonḳor al-Bursukī, the governor of Baghdād, to Sadaḳa and to Kïlïdj Arslān, the Saldjūk of al-Rūm The last-named alone answered the appeal and came with his troops to al-Mawsil where he had homage paid to himself as sultān, but soon afterwards, after an unsuccessful encounter, he was drowned in the Khābūr on his retreat Čawali now had little difficulty in taking the town and going on to his further task, the war against the Crusaders It would take us too far here to sketch the course of this war, and the reader may therefore be referred to Weil, Gesch der Chal, iii 191 sqq During his absence he again fell into disgrace with the Caliph, who had in the meanwhile returned to Baghdād and sent his troops to attack Sadaka, with whom he was also dissatisfied Sadaka fell in battle in 501 (beg of 1101) The sultān sent Mawdūd to al-Mawsil and granted him the same dignity as he had previously given Čawali The latter after some time made his peace with the sultān and was appointed as atābeg to Fārs, where he fought the unruly elements in the population with great energy (cf Ibn al-Athīr, ed Tornberg, x 361 sqq) The Bātinīya however gave Muhammad no peace, so long as they were able to hold their strong mountain citadel of Alamūt, Abū Nasr Ahmad, a son of Nizām al-Mulk, who after Saʿd al-Mulk acted as the sultān's vizier, was therefore given orders to take this fortress and when he did not succeed, he was dismissed in 504 (1109—10) In the meanwhile the sultān was being urged more and more from different sides to prosecute the war with the Crusaders seriously, and he succeeded in persuading the various governors the of western provinces to combine and attack the Christians under the leadership of Mawdūd accompanied by the young prince Masʿūd After Mawdūd's assassination (507 = 1113) Aksonkor al Bursukī took command and after him Bursuk assumed the supreme command but on account of the strife among the Turkish emīrs, the valour of the Crusaders and the complicated situation in Syria, decisive successes could not be attained For the course of the campaign we again refer the reader to Weil, op cit, p 194 sqq and the historians of the Crusaders In the last years of his life, the sultān sent the emīr Anushtegīn Shīrgīr against the Bātinīya in Alamūt, but he died on the 24th Dhu 'l-Hidjdja 511 (Apr 18, 1118) before the fortress was taken He was only 36 years old and this is why Weil suggests that the Bātinīya had a hand in his death, but there is nothing to support this hypothesis in the oriental chronicles On the contrary, individuals in his immediate entourage, notably the Great Hādjib ʿAlī Bār, seem to have been not quite innocent, because they, apparently to avert suspicion from themselves, accused the sultāna Guhaz Khatun and the famous poet al-Tughrāʾī of having caused the sulṭān's illness by magic arts The former was blinded and strangled on the day Muhammad died The reason given by Matthias of Edessa for this (Docum Arm, i 120) is wrong The sulṭān deserves credit for having, with the assistance of his brother Sandjar who ruled in Khurāsān and the adjoining lands, restored the fortunes of the Saldjūḳ kingdom, which had declined since the death of Malikshāh and for having vigorously fought infidels and sectarians in his zeal for Sunnī Islām and the ʿAbbāsid caliphate He was, as Rec Hist Croix, II 118 has it, the perfect man of the Saldjūks and their strong he-camel

Bibliography given in the article SELDJUKS (M TH HOUTSMA)

MUHAMMAD, ABŪ AHMAD, DJALĀL AL-DAWLA WA-DJAMĀL AL-MILLA, ABŪ AHMAD MUHAMMAD, second son of Sultān Mahmūd of Ghazna, was born about 387 (997) He was married to a daughter of Abū Nasr Muhammad b Abu 'l Hārith Ahmad b Muhammad, the Farīghūnī ruler of Djūzdjānān After the death of Abū Nasr Muhammad in 401 (1010—1011), Sultān Mahmūd assigned to his son Muhammad the government of the province of Djūzdjānān In 417 (1026), at the instance of Sultān Mahmūd, the ʿAbbāsid Caliph al Kādir bi 'llāh conferred on him the titles of Djalal al-Dawla wa-Djamāl al-Milla Towards the close of his life, Sultān Mahmūd divided his empire between his sons, giving Ghazna, Khurāsān and India to Muhammad and Rayy, Djibāl and Isfahān to Masʿūd, and took solemn vows from both to respect this division When Mahmūd died in Rabiʿ II, 421 (April 1030), Muhammad ascended the throne at Ghazna, but Masʿūd, disregarding his vows, marched from Isfahan to take possession of Ghazna In the meantime, the nobles at Ghazna deposed Muhammad on 3rd Shawwāl 421 (October 2, 1030) and read the khutba in the name of Masʿūd Muhammad was then deprived of his sight by orders of Masʿūd and imprisoned in a fort His reign had lasted only 6 months

In 431 Sultān Masʿūd suffered a crushing defeat at the hands of the Saldjūks, and resolved to settle in India In the beginning of 432 (September 1040), leaving Ghazna in the hands of his son Mawdūd and his wazīr, he marched to India with all his treasures, but on 13th Rabīʿ II, 432 (December 24, 1040) his slaves deposed him and raised Muhammad to the throne Shortly after this, Masʿūd was put to death Hearing this, Mawdūd advanced with a large army to avenge the death of his father, defeated Muhammad near Dunpūi on 3rd Shaʿbān 432 (April 1041), and put him to death The second reign of Muhammad lasted only 4 months

Muhammad was obedient to his father and was a man of amiable temperament He resembled his father in appearance

Bibliography Abū Saʿid ʿAbd al-Hayy b al Dahhāk al-Gardīzī, Kitāb Zain al-Akhbār, ed M Nazim, in Browne Mem Series, I, al-ʿUtbī, Kitāb al-Yamīnī (ed Lahore), p 294—295, numerous scattered notices in Taʾrīkh-i Masʿūdī by Abu 'l Fadl Baihakī, Ibn al-Athīr (ed Tornberg), IX 281—283, 331—334 and Taʾrīkh-i Farishta (ed Bombay, 1832), p 60, 68—69 (MUHAMMAD NAZIM)

MUHAMMAD B MARWĀN, an Umayyad governor In 65 (684—685) he was sent by his father, the caliph Marwān I, to Mesopotamia, and in the battle of Dair al-Djāthalik in 72 (691) in which his brother, the caliph ʿAbd al-Malik, defeated Musʿab b al-Zubair, he commanded the advanced guard of the Syrian army In the following year ʿAbd al-Malik gave him the governorship of Mesopotamia and Armenia which carried with it the command in the war with the Byzantines On account of climatic conditions the Arab expeditions always took place in summer In 73 (692), the emperor Justinian II was defeated at Sebaste or Sebastopolis in Cilicia In 75 (694) Muhammad again took the field against the Byzantines and was successful against them at Marʿash, and in the following year he invaded Armenia Along with his nephew ʿAbd Allāh b ʿAbd al-Malik he was sent to al-Hadjdjādj in the year 82 (701), to support him against the rebel ʿAbd al-Rahmān b Muhammad b al Ashʿath, and in the negotiations with the ʿIrāḳīs before the battle at Dair al Djamādjim the caliph was represented by Muhammad and ʿAbd Allāh In the same year, Muhammad led an expedition against Armenia, and again in 84 (703) and 85 (704) After the accession of al-Walīd (Shawwāl 86 = Oct 705) Muhammad fell gradually into the background while Maslama, the caliph's brother, was the actual commander, but the former retained his governorship for some time until in 91 (709—710) he was replaced by Maslama here also Muhammad died in 101 (719—720)

Bibliography Ibn Saʿd, v 176, Yaʿkūbī, ed Houtsma, II 324 sq, 336, 350, Balādhurī, ed de Goeje, p 188, 200, 205, 332, Tabarī, II 592, 804—808, 853, 863, 1073—1075, 1096, 1850, III 51, Masʿūdī, Murūdj, ed Paris, v 244 sqq, VI 47, Ibn al-Athīr, ed Tornberg, IV 264—267, 294 sq, 303, 317—320, 338, 377 sq, 382, 385, 399, 411, 439, V 52, 328, Weil, Gesch d Chalifen, I 406 sq, 455, 468 sq, 472, Brooks, The Arabs in Asia Minor (641—750), in The Journal of Hellenic Studies, XVIII 182 sqq, Wellhausen, Die Kämpfe der Araber mit den Romaern, in N G W Gottingen, 1901, p 432 sqq (K V ZETTERSTEEN)

MUHAMMAD B MUHAMMAD [See ABŪ ʿALĪ, ABU 'L-WAFĀʾ, AL GHAZĀLĪ, IBN ʿĀSIM, IBN BAṬṬŪṬA, IBN DJAHĪR, IBN AL-HABBĀRIYA, IBN NUBĀTA, ʿIMĀD AL DĪN

MUHAMMAD B MUKARRAM [See IBN MANẒŪR]

MUHAMMAD B MŪSĀ B SHĀKIR [See MŪSĀ BANŪ]

MUHAMMAD B AL MUSTANĪR [See KUTRUB]

MUHAMMAD B AL MUZAFFAR [See MUẒAFFARIDS]

MUHAMMAD B ʿOMAR [See IBN AL-KŪTĪYA]

MUHAMMAD B ʿOTHMĀN [See ABŪ ZAIYĀN]

MUHAMMAD B RĀʾIK [See IBN RĀʾIK]

MUHAMMAD B RAZĪN [See ABU 'I-SHĪS]

MUHAMMAD B SAʿD [See IBN MARDANĪSH, IBN SAʿD]

MUHAMMAD B SĀLIM [See IBN WĀSIL]

MUHAMMAD B SAʿŪD [See GHŌRĪ DYNASTY]

MUHAMMAD B SAʿŪD (properly Suʿūd) B MUHAMMAD of the Mukrin clan of ʿAnaza, the founder of the Wahhābī dynasty of the Āl-Saʿūd in Nadjd [see the article IBN SAʿŪD], succeeded his father as amīr of Darʿīya in 1137 (1724) or 1140 (1727) His association with the reformer Muhammad b ʿAbd al-Wahhāb [cf WAHHĀBĪYA] began in 1157 (1744) Thereafter until his death (end of Rabīʿ I, 1179 = Sept 1765) the history of his reign consists of an unceasing and on the whole indecisive struggle against the neighbouring settlements and tribes and his former suzerains, the Banū Khālid of al-Hasā He took little active part in these operations, and his personality is overshadowed by the figures of the Reformer himself and of his own son ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz Nevertheless his talents as a diplomatist more than once saved the Wahhābī state from being crushed by a coalition of its enemies, notably after the disastrous defeat by the forces of Nadjrān at Hā'ir in 1764

Bibliography The only full source is the Kitāb al-Ghazawāt (vol II of Rawdat al-Afkār) of Husain b Ghannām (d 1225 H), MS British Museum Add 23,345, fol 3a—39b [the Bombay lithograph (1332 H) is very inaccurate] summarized by H St J Philby, Arabia, London 1930, p 12–22 — See also A Musil, Northern Neǧd, New York 1928, p 258—259, and Amīn al-Raihānī, Taʾrīkh Nadjd al Haaīth, Beirūt 1928, p 50–53, and for general works the Bibliography to the article IBN SAʿŪD (H A R GIBB)

MUHAMMAD B SĪRĪN [See IBN SĪRĪN]

MUHAMMAD B ṬĀHIR, governor of Khurāsān After the death of his father, Muhammad received the governorship of Khurāsān (Radjab 248 = Sept 862) In 250 (864—5) the ʿAlid al-Hasan b Zaid rebelled, which led to a long and serious struggle [see MUHAMMAD B ʿABD AL LĀH] When ʿAbd Allah al Sidjzī rebelled against Yaʿkūb b al Laith al-Saffār and appealed for help to Muhammad, who appointed him governor of al-Tabasain and Kuhistān, Yaʿkūb found a welcome pretext to invade Khurāsān Muhammad sent an embassy to him, but as Yaʿkūb had already found a following among discontented Khurāsānians, all negotiations were in vain In Shawwāl 259 (Aug 873), or according to another statement in 258, he entered Nīsābūr without striking a blow, put an end to the Tāhirid dynasty and took Muhammad prisoner But when he rebelled against the Caliph al-Muʿtamid, he was defeated in Radjab 262 (April 876) by the latter's brother al Muwaffak and Muhammad, whom he had with him in chains, escaped The Caliph restored the latter to his former office in Khurāsān, the exiled Tāhirid however never found an opportunity to exercise his functions He was further appointed — probably not till 270 (853—4) — by the vizier Saʿīd b Makhlad as his deputy as military governor of Baghdād He held this office until the accession of al Muʿtadid (279 = 892) He died in 296 (908—9)

Bibliography Yaʿkūbī, ed Houtsma, II 204 sq, 219, Tabarī, III, see Index, Masʿūdī, Murūdj, ed Paris, VIII 42, 44, Ibn al-Athīr, ed Tornberg, VII 77—294, VIII 42, Ibn Khaldūn, al-ʿIbar, III 309 sqq, Weil, Gesch d Chalifen, II 379 sq, 393, 438, 442, 447, Noldeke, Orientalische Skizzen, p 194 sqq, Rothstein, in Orient Studien, Th Noldeke gewidmet, p 164 sq, Barthold, ebenda, p 185 sqq

(K V ZETTERSTÉEN)

MUHAMMAD B ṬĀHIR [See IBN AL KAISARĀNĪ]

MUḤAMMAD B TAKASH [See KHWĀRIZMSHĀH]

MUHAMMAD B TUGHDJ B DJUFF (or Djaff) B YALTAKĪN B FŪRĀN B FŪRĪ B KHĀKĀN, Abū Bakr, known as AL-IKHSHĪD, from the title granted to him by the Caliph al-Rādī in 327 (939), was the founder of the Egyptian dynasty of the Ikhshīdids [q v]

He was born in 268 (882) at Baghdād and must have spent his youth in Syria, as his father, who joined the service of the Tūlūnids at about the same date, was appointed governor of Damascus and Tabarīya c 276, a post which he held for some fifteen years, and he himself acted for a time as his father's deputy for Tabarīya In consequence of the overthrow of the Tūlūnid dynasty in 292 (904), he was imprisoned at Baghdād He was released in 294 (907), attached to the wazīr al-ʿAbbās b al-Hasan, and being implicated in his murder, had to fly when the conspiracy of Ibn al-Muʿtazz [q v] failed in 296 (908) He escaped to Syria and found himself reduced to a humble station Next year he passed on to Egypt, where Takīn, its governor, took him into favour, so that he kept him with himself, both in Egypt and in Syria when he was transferred thither to act as governor at intervals (302—307 and 309—311), and promoted him to appointments of importance

At this period Muhammad came into contact with the powerful Mādaraʾī family, and also attended Muʾnis [q v] when he was brought to Egypt by the Fātimid invasions He had already attracted some attention at Baghdād by an exploit in 306 In 316 (928), through influence at the capital, he became governor of Ramla, quitting Takīn abruptly In 319 he obtained a transfer to Damascus, where he became powerful, and in consequence of his defeat of Bushrā in 321 extended his rule over the whole of Syria In the same year (March 933) Takīn died, and Muhammad b Tughdj succeeded in obtaining the appointment as governor of Egypt in his place, but only nominally and for one month (Sept 933) Two years later, by means of a large army and fleet, he entered Fustāt and took possession of the country, overcoming the resistance of al Mādaraʾī (Muhammad b ʿAlī), who by appointment from Baghdād was then in control of Egypt, the governor being under his direction (tahta tadbīrihi) Superior to al Mādaraʾī, however, was al Fadl b Djaʿfar b al-Furāt [for whom see the article IBN AL-FURĀT], the inspecting minister (wazīr kashf) of Egypt and Syria, who had been specially granted full executive powers Muhammad b Tughdj had acted with the authorization of al-Fadl and later (324) obtained the confirmation of al Rādī to the addition of Egypt to the province of Syria already held by him Probably at the same time he was granted the suzerainty over al-Yaman and the Holy Cities of Mecca and Medīna, for in his letter of the following year to the Emperor Romanus he boasts of these places as part of his kingdom Until the death of al-Fadl in 327 (March 939), he seems to have been subject, at least in theory, to some control by him

In 324 a decisive victory by the troops of Muhammad b Tughdj near Alexandria (battle of Ablūk, March 31, 936) crushed the third Fātimid invasion of Egypt and led to overtures from the Fātimid Caliph al-Kāʾim, which in the end came to nothing Muhammad did indeed decide three years later to recognize the Fātimid, and had given the order that al Kāʾim should be proclaimed in Egypt, out of indignation at the ʿAbbāsid government at Baghdād, but was induced to reconsider his decision

Only a month after he had received his title al-Ikhshīd from al Rādī (Ramadān 327 = June–July 939), he found himself threatened from Rakka by Ibn Rāʾik [q v] and learnt that his provinces had been granted to this rival Badjkam [q v], as amīr al umarāʾ at Baghdād, gave no answer to his appeal but that the question must be decided by the sword, the powerless Caliph could say nothing Ibn Rāʾik rapidly possessed himself of Syria, driving back the forces sent to oppose him, and had soon captured Ramla (Oct 939) Muhammad b Tughdj himself confronted him with an army at Faramā, and with no fighting beyond some skirmishing entered into negotiations, ending in an agreement to cede Syria from Tabarīya to the north on condition that Ramla and the rest were restored to him Ibn Rā'iḳ soon broke this treaty and again advanced This time Muhammad b Tughdj encountered him at al-ʿArīsh and routed him (15th Ramadān 324 = June 24, 940), but as he followed him into Syria, met with a reverse in his turn, one of his detachments being surprised and badly defeated at Ladjdjūn (18th August) Peace was then renewed on the same terms as before, and Muhammad b Tughdj undertook to pay an annual subsidy of 140,000 dīnārs He was back in Egypt in October

The death of Badjkam in 329 (April 941) drew Ibn Rā'iḳ back to Baghdād, and Muhammad b Tughdj was soon relieved of him completely, for he was murdered a year later by the Hamdānids Muhammad lost no time in recovering Syria, marching thither himself (June 942) and remaining in the country about six months before coming back to Egypt It must have been at about this period that he succeeded in dispersing some minor encroachments on Syria from the direction of Raḳka that are alluded to without details, those of ʿAdl (al-Badjkamī) and Badr al-Kharshanī He had to meet more serious attacks from the Hamdānids One of them, al-Husain b Saʿīd, took Halab from him in 332 (March 944), and in May he set out to recover it The Caliph al-Muttaḳī, moreover, insecure under the protection of the Hamdānids from Tūzūn, the amīr al umarā', had appealed to him for help His enemy retired at his approach and having regained the town he proceeded to Rakka, where he met the Caliph (Sept 7, 944) At this time he had thoughts of becoming amīr al umarā' himself He urged al-Muttaḳī to come with him to Syria and Egypt, and even offered to go with him to Baghdād He begged him not to trust himself to Tūzūn, but could not dissuade him After receiving flattering marks of honour he departed Before he reached Fustāt on his return the Hamdānid Saif al Dawla [q v] had retaken Halab (Oct 944) The Egyptian army sent to meet this new aggression was severely defeated at Rastan near Hims, and Saif al Dawla advanced to Damascus and entered it (April–May 945) Muhammad b Tughdj, coming from Egypt with his army, obliged him to retreat, pursued him, brought him to battle at Kinnasrīn (May—June 945), and defeated him Again Muhammad made easy terms when victorious Saif al Dawla retained Syria north of Damascus and was also given a subsidy The treaty was concluded in Rabīʿ I, 334 (Oct–Nov 945), and Muhammad then went back to Damascus, remaining there until he died a few months later (21st Dhu 'l-Hidjdja 334 = June 24, 946), just after the arrival of a Byzantine envoy concerning an exchange of prisoners for which he had opened negotiations

Next to nothing is recorded of the internal events of Egypt during his reign, the country was doubtless quiet Its revenue, said to have amounted to two million dinārs annually, was no longer accounted for to Baghdād, and no regular payments were made from it to the central treasury But he sent large occasional gifts to the Caliphs, so that al-Rādī considered him an exemplary vassal He left seven million dīnārs at his death besides considerable other property No constructional works of much importance are credited to him At Fusṭāt he rebuilt the shipyard on the mainland, and on its site on the island of Rawda made a garden called al-Mukhtār, he enlarged the government house in which he resided, a Tūlūnid building that was situated near the still existing tomb of al-Kādī Bakkār, and added a maidān, he also made another garden known later as al Kāfūrī, afterwards the site of the western Fātimid palace of Cairo His armies at times seem to have been large At the battle of Ablūk the Egyptians are said to have had 15,000 horsemen, at that of Kinnasrīn 50,000 men Such numbers would have been reached by means of levies for particular emergencies, which he is known to have raised more than once On one occasion his personal retainers (ghulāms), on whom he more especially depended, numbered 500 The constantly repeated and universally accepted figures of 400,000 for his army and 8,000 for his bodyguard can be dismissed as ridiculous, notwithstanding that they rest on the early authority of al-Tanūkhī (d 384), and with them the accompanying myth as to his habit of concealing his sleeping places when on campaign

The most renowned of his followers was Kāfūr [q v] Another of his ghulāms, Fātik, rose to some eminence ʿAlī b Muhammad b Kalā was his secretary both at Damascus and in Egypt Muhammad b ʿAlī al-Madarā'ī was his wazīr for a few months (328—329), Muhammad b ʿAlī b Mukātil, previously secretary to Ibn Rā'iḳ, was his wazīr at his death His four brothers were all younger than himself, al-Hasan was in command at the battle of Ablūk, and represented him in Egypt during all his absences, al Husain was in command at Ladjdjūn and killed there, ʿUbaid Allāh acted for him in Syria, ʿAlī disappears early

Notable Egyptian authors who flourished during his reign were the historian Ibn al-Dāya (d 334), al Kindī (d 350), and ʿAbd Allāh al-Farghānī (d 362), who came to Egypt in 329 and was in his confidence at Rakka in 333 Al-Masʿūdī moreover visited Egypt in 330 Al-Mutanabbī, just rising to fame, recited once in his presence in Syria and addressed a verse or two to him and to his brother ʿUbaid Allāh (d 333 at Ramla)

Muhammad b Tughdj was strong physically, but subject to occasional fits of melancholia His character is illustrated by a number of incidents that have every appearance of being authentic He was strict, but in no way vindictive or cruel He often brought his officers to account, and then after punishing them by arrest or fine would restore them to favour Hardly any executions are heard of in his reign He would not allow torture and the maltreatment of accused persons, so common in his time His tact and sagacity were conspicuous He was decent in his life and liked by his men and the people On the other hand, he was certainly oppressive and unfair in some of his money exactions, and though at times not ungenerous was inclined to be mean and miserly in minor matters The two great faults attributed to him, even to his face in his lifetime, parsimony and timidity, are not altogether without foundation As to the latter, his own defence in a particular instance looks valid

His career was closely parallel to that of Ahmad b Ṭulūn [q v], even as regards several fortuitous occurrences It leaves no doubt of his capacity, and if admitting of occasional overcaution, will not allow of anything like cowardice He did not make the same mark as his predecessor, but was a milder and perhaps a better ruler

Bibliography Ibn Saʿīd, al Mughrib (ed Tallqvist, Leyden 1899) contains the text of the principal authorities, a list including subsidiary authorites, and a full biography in German carefully worked out from both sources By far the most important authority is the long and detailed biography of Muhammad b Tughdj which forms part of Ibn Saʿīd's work, and appears to consist of the life composed by Ibn Zūlāk between 350 and 355, reproduced almost but not quite verbatim The other principal authority is the Kitāb al-Wulāt of al-Kindī, ed Guest Little, if anything, can be added from books published after al Mughrib

(R GUEST)

MUHAMMAD B TUGHLUK [See MUHAMMAD TUGHLUK]

MUHAMMAD B TŪMART [See IBN TŪMART]

MUHAMMAD B ʿUBAID ALLĀH [See ABU 'L-MAʿĀLI]

MUHAMMAD B AL WALĪD [See IBN ABĪ RANDAKA]

MUḤAMMAD B YAHYĀ [See IBN BĀDJDJA]

MUHAMMAD B YĀKŪT, ABŪ BAKR, a chief of police in Baghdād In 318 (930) Muhammad, whose father was chief chamberlain to the Caliph al-Muktadir was appointed chief of police The maintenance of order in the capital at this time was much neglected and the praetorians conducted a regular reign of terror In a fracas between infantry and cavalry Muhammad intervened on behalf of the latter, their opponents were cut down, some driven from the city and only a small contingent of negroes, who at once surrendered, remained unscathed (Muharram 318 = Feb 930) Some months later these mutinied and demanded more pay, but they were driven out of the town by Muhammad and then routed by the chief emīr Muʾnis [q v] near Wāsit The confusion was increased by the breach between Muʾnis and Muhammad At the instigation of Muʾnis, Muhammad was dismissed in Djumādā II 319 (June—July 931) Muʾnis was nevertheless not satisfied but demanded that his hated rival should be banished The Caliph at first refused to grant his request, but when Muʾnis threatened him with force, he had to yield, whereupon Muhammad went to Sidjistān (Radjab 319 = July 931) Soon afterwards the Caliph quarrelled with Muʾnis and recalled Muhammad In Muharram 320 (Jan 932) the latter returned to Baghdād, the Caliph then sent him with an army to al-Maʿshūk in the region of Takrīt But when Muʾnis advanced from Mōsul, the Caliph's troops under Muhammad and Saʿīd b Hamdān retired to Baghdād without striking a blow After the victory of Muʾnis and the murder of al-Muktadir in Shawwāl of the same year (Oct 932) the latter's son ʿAbd al-Wāhid fled with Muhammad and his other supporters to al-Madāʾin and then to Wāsit where a number of his generals abandoned him When the forces of the new Caliph al-Kāhir approached under the command of Yalbak, ʿAbd al-Wāhid and Muhammad fled to Tustar Muhammad was not popular on account of his arrogance and selfishness, so that one after the other laid down his arms and finally ʿAbd al-Wāhid surrendered Muhammad entered into negotiations with Yalbak and the Caliph pardoned him He then returned to Baghdād where he gained a great influence over al-Kāhir On the accession of al-Rādī in Djumādā I, 322 (April 934), Muhammad became the real ruler in a short time, the Caliph appointed him chief chamberlain and also made him his commander in-chief while the vizier Ibn Mukla played a more subordinate part When al-Muktadir's cousin Hārūn b Gharib, whom al-Kāhir had appointed governor of Māh al Kūfa, al-Dīnawar and Māsabadhān rebelled, Muhammad was sent with an army against him In the resulting battle, Muhammad suffered a defeat (Djumādā II 322 = May 934), soon afterwards however, Hārūn fell from his horse and was killed by one of Muhammad's slaves With the death of their commander the resistance of Hārūn's followers collapsed, Muhammad was nevertheless unable long to retain his position of power On the advice of Ibn Mukla who feared his ever increasing power, al-Rādī had him arrested along with his brother al Muzaffar and the secretary Abū Ishāk al Karārīti on the 5th Djumādā I, 323 (April 12, 935) Muhammad died in prison in the same year

Bibliography ʿArīb (ed de Goeje), p 145 sqq , Ibn al-Athīr (ed Tornberg), viii 160 sqq , Ibn Khaldūn, al-ʿIbar, iii 390 sqq , Weil, Gesch d Chalifen, ii 565—74, 645 sq , 652, 656—58

(K V ZETTERSTÉEN)

MUHAMMAD B YAZĪD [See IBN MĀDJA, AL-MUBARRAD]

MUHAMMAD B YŪSUF [See ABŪ HAIYĀN]

MUHAMMAD ʿABD AL-KARĪM ʿALAWĪ, better known as ʿAbd al Karīm Munshī, a Persian historian of the middle of the xixth century His best known work is the Taʾrīkh i Ahmad or Ahmadshāhī composed for ʿAbd al-Rahmān b Hādjdjī Muhammad Rawshan Khān, a history of the founder of the Durrānī dynasty in Afghānistān, Ahmad Shāh After ʿAbd al-Karīm had finished a history of Shudjāʿ al-Mulk Durrānī and the conquest of Khurāsān in 1235 (1820), he decided to write a complete history of the Durānīs and began his Taʾrikh i Ahmad The work is based on the Taʾrīkh-i Husainshāhī of Imām al Dīn Husainī (Rieu, Cat Pers MSS Brit Mus, iii 904b) and is really only a paraphrase of it It begins with the story of Ahmad Shāh which he continued to the year 1212 Then follows a description of the Pandjāb and the roads between Kābul, Harāt, Pashāwar and Kandahār and a chapter on Turkistān under Narbūta Bey The work concludes with the accession of Shudjāʿ al Mulk In addition to this book, ʿAbd al-Karīm in 1263 (1847) wrote the Muhārabāt i Kābul wa-Kandahār, which describes the war with the English down to General Pollock's expedition (Sept–Oct 1842) It again is not original but based on the poem Akbar-nāma of Kāsim Djān According to Beale, Oriental Biographical Dictionary (London 1894, p 5), he also wrote a history of the Sikh war entitled Taʾrīkh-i Pandjāb Tuhfatan li 'l-Ahbāb, but there is no mention of a manuscript or lithograph of any such work in any of the European catalogues It is possible that there is some confusion with the Pandjāb section of the Taʾrīkh-i Ahmad In the Catalogue of the Persian printed Books in the British Museum (London 1922, p 19), E Edwards ascribes to the author a dictionary of English and Persian homonyms entitled A Dictionary of Anglo-Persian homogeneous words being a Collection of Words having nearly the same Sound and the same Meaning, Bombay 1889, it is however unfortunately not possible to be certain that the author of the book is the same ʿAbd al Karīm Munshī

Bibliography O Mann, Quellenstudien zur Geschichte des Ahmed Šâh Durrâni, in Z D M G, lii (1898), p 106 sq The Turkistān chapter is translated in Ch Schefer, Histoire de l'Asie Centrale par Mir Abdoul Kerim Boukhary, Paris 1876, p 280 sq The Taʾrīkh-i Ahmad appeared in lith in India 1266 A manuscript of the Wāqiʿāt-i Durrānī in E Browne, A supplem Handlist of the Muhammadan MSS in the Libraries of the Univerity and Colleges of Cambridge, 1922, N⁰ 228 An Urdu transl of it lith in Cawnpore 1292 (1875) Muhāwarāt lith in Lucknow 1848 and Cawnpore 1267 (1851) A manuscript in W Ivanow, Concise descriptive Catalogue of the Persian MSS in the Curzon Collection of the A S B, Calcutta 1926, N⁰ 22 (E Berthels)

MUHAMMAD ʿABDUH, a Muslim theologian, founder of the Egyptian modernist school

Muhammad ʿAbduh belonged to an Egyptian peasant family and was born in 1849 in Lower Egypt He spent his childhood in the little village of Mahallat Nasr in the mudiriya of Buhaira When Muhammad ʿAbduh had learned the Kurʾān by heart, he was sent in 1862 to the theological school of Tantā but he left this after a year and a half discouraged and was only induced to resume his studies through the influence of a grand uncle who aroused in him an interest in mysticism In 1865 he returned to Tantā but the next year proceeded to Cairo to the Azhar mosque There at this moment the first movements of a new spirit were becoming apparent in the beginning of a return to the classics and an awakening interest in natural science and history, which agreed with mysticism in a lower estimation of the old traditional studies In this milieu Muhammad ʿAbduh at once devoted himself entirely to mysticism, practised asceticism and retired from the world It was again his grand uncle who persuaded him to give this up About the same time, 1872, Muhammad ʿAbduh came into contact with Sayyid Djamāl al-Dīn al Afghānī [q v] who had just arrived in Egypt and was destined to exercise a profound influence upon him It was he who revealed traditional learning to Muhammad ʿAbduh in a new light, called his attention to European works accessible in translations and attracted his interest finally to Egyptian and Muslim problems of the day Muhammad ʿAbduh soon became his most ardent disciple and in his very first work of a mystic nature (Risālat al-Wāridāt, 1290 = 1874) enthusiastically described Sayyid Djamāl al-Dīn as his spiritual guide The influence of Sayyid Djamāl al-Dīn is still more marked on the matter of Muhammad ʿAbduh's second work, notes on dogmatics entitled Hāshiya ʿalā Sharh al-Dawānī li 'l-ʿAkāʾid al-ʿAdudiya [1292 = 1876] The influence of Sayyid Djamāl al Dīn and the development of affairs in Egypt towards the end of the reign of the Khedive Ismāʿīl caused Muhammad ʿAbduh in 1876 to take to journalism, which he practised henceforth After concluding his studies at the Azhar mosque and acquiring the certificate of an ʿālim (scholar), he first of all gave private tuition, in 1879 he was appointed as teacher in the Dār al ʿUlūm, which had been founded a few years before to modernise instruction in religious learning In the same year, shortly after the accession of the Khedive Tawfik, Muhammad ʿAbduh was dismissed for reasons that have not been clearly explained and sent to his native village, while Sayyid Djamāl al-Dīn was banished from Egypt, but a liberal ministry very soon recalled Muhammad ʿAbduh (1880) and appointed him chief editor of the official gazette al Wakāʾiʿ al-Miṣriya, which not only contained official announcements but also endeavoured to influence public opinion, under Muhammad ʿAbduh's control it became the mouthpiece of the liberal party In spite of a common ultimate goal the liberation of the Muslim peoples and a renaissance of Islām by its own strength, there was an essential difference between Muhammad ʿAbduh's programme and that of Sayyid Djamāl al-Dīn, the latter was a revolutionary who aimed at a complete upheaval, Muhammad ʿAbduh, on the other hand, held that only gradual reform could be successful, thought that no political revolution could take the place of a gradual transformation of mentality and regarded a reform of education, especially moral and religious, as the first preliminary to progress His interest gradually became concentrated on Islām and its position in the modern world ʿArābī Pāshā's rebellion put an end to Muhammad ʿAbduh's activity on these lines His part in this movement has not yet been sufficiently elucidated, although it is certain that he neither shared the optimism of military circles nor approved their use of force, he put himself on the side of the nationalist opponents of absolutism and endeavoured to exert a moderating influence on its leaders After the suppression of the rebellion he was condemned to banishment from Egypt at the end of 1882 He first went to Beirūt and then to Paris where in the beginning of 1884 he met Sayyid Djamāl al Dīn The two founded a society called al-ʿUrwa al-wuthkā and published a paper with the same name, which had to cease publication after eight months but exercised a very profound influence on the development of nationalism in the Muslim east In Tunis Muhammad ʿAbduh continued propaganda for the society, but then cut himself off from it and settled in Beirūt at the beginning of 1885 The ʿUrwa expressed the views of Sayyid Djamāl al-Dīn entirely In Beirūt he taught at a theological school and engaged in Muslim and Arabic studies In this period he produced his translation from the Persian of the Risālat al Radd ʿala 'l-Dahriyyin, the only considerable work of Sayyid Djamāl al-Dīn (1302 = 1886), and two valuable philological treatises (Sharh Nahdj al-Balāgha [1302 = 1885] and Sharh Makāmāt Badiʿ al Zamān al Hamadhānī [1306 = 1889]) When in 1889 he was allowed to return, he at once went to Cairo His wish to resume teaching again was not at once granted, instead he entered the judiciary and was immediately appointed a judge on the Tribunaux Indigènes, two years later Conseiller at the Cour d'Appel, in 1899 he attained the highest clerical post in Egypt, that of state muftī, an office he held till his death One result of his work in the courts was the publication of his verdicts in Takrīr fī Iṣlāh al-Mahākim al-Sharʿiya (1318 = 1900) which gave the stimulus to important reforms in the administration of the sharīʿa, and the foundation of the College for Kādīs goes back primarily to his efforts In the same year, 1899, he became a member of the Conseil Législatif, which marked the first stage in the representation of the Egyptian people Finally he was allowed to resume his interest in education, in 1894 he became a member of the governing body of the Azhar, which had been constituted at his suggestion, and in this capacity not only acquired great renown by his reforms in the university but himself took an active part in the teaching In addition to this many-sided activity in the fifteen years after his return he found time to publish a number of works, including his most important the Risālat al-Tawhīd (1315 = 1897), his principal theological work based on his lectures in Bairūt, the publication of a work on logic (Sharh Kitāb al-Basāʾir al-Nāsirīya, Taṣnīf al-Kādī Zain al Dīn [1316 = 1898]), a defence of Islām against Christianity in the field of knowledge and civilization entitled al-Islām wa ʾl Nasrānīya maʿa ʾl ʿIlm wa ʾl Madanīya (1320 = 1902, first published in al-Manār) Muhammad ʿAbduh was not able to finish his commentary on the Kurʾān, on which he laid great importance and of which he had published portions in al-Manār, it was revised by his disciple and friend Shaikh Muhammad Rashīd Ridā and published first of all in al-Manār Of Muhammad ʿAbduh's numerous articles by which, along with his lectures, he most influenced public opinion, two (of 1900) were published in a French translation entitled L'Europe et l'Islām by Muhammad Talʿat Harb Bey (1905) The advanced ideas put forward by Muhammad ʿAbduh provoked the most vigorous hostility in orthodox and conservative circles which manifested itself not only in serious refutations but also in attacks on and intrigues against him, as we see from a whole literature of lampoons But his teaching met with remarkable support among all seriously minded Muslims The principal organ of his views was the monthly al-Manār, which had appeared since 1897 under the editorship of Sheikh Muhammad Rashīd Ridā, who has also produced an extensive literary monument to his master (but his views and the tendencies of his periodical must not be identified offhand with those of Muhammad ʿAbduh) Muhammad ʿAbduh died in 1905, but his teaching has retained its influence steadily to the present day

Muhammad ʿAbduh's programme according to his own statement was 1 the reform of the Muslim religion by bringing it back to its original condition, 2 the renovation of the Arabic language, 3 the recognition of the rights of the people in relation to the government His political activity was dominated by the idea of patriotism, which he was the first to champion enthusiastically in Egypt As an opponent equally of the political control by Europe and of Oriental despotism in Muslim lands he favoured an inner assimilation of western civilization, without abandoning the fundamental Muslim ideas and a synthesis of the two factors From this programme, which assures Muhammad ʿAbduh an important place among the founders of modern Egypt, must be distinguished his effort to carry it through in the field of theology Muhammad ʿAbduh is in the first place a theologian, his life was devoted to the attempt to establish and maintain Islām, at least as a religion, against the onslaught of the west, while he abandoned without a struggle those aspects of Muslim-Oriental life in which religion was of less moment However great a stimulus he may have received from progressive western thought, the actual foundations of his teaching came primarily from the school of Ibn Taimīya and Ibn Kaiyim al Djawzīya, who favoured reform on conservative lines, and from al Ghazzālī's ethical conception of religion Deeply convinced of the superiority of true Islām, unaffected by the vicissitudes of time, Muhammad ʿAbduh wished to get rid of the abuses which falsified the Muslim religion and made it out of keeping with the times, and to adapt Islām to every real advance by going back to its true principles Muhammad ʿAbduh was thus brought to attack the madhāhib and taklīd [q v], to demand freedom for idjtihād [q v] and a new idjmāʿ [q v], in keeping with modern conditions, based on the Kurʾān and the true sunna, for the establishment of which he laid down strict criteria, he was also brought to reject the hairsplitting of the fukahāʾ, the worship of saints and all bidʿas, and to the endeavour to create a more ethical and deeper religion instead of a mechanical formalism The antiquated system of Fikh, against which Muhammad ʿAbduh claimed full freedom, was to be replaced by new laws capable of development, in which consideration for the common good (maṣlaha) and the times should, in keeping with the true spirit of Islām, have if necessary preference to the literal text (nass) of revelation, just as in any conflict between reason and tradition in settling what is laid down by religion, the verdict of reason should be followed Alongside of the belief in the sublimity of revelation there was in Muhammad ʿAbduh the conviction that knowledge and religion, properly understood, could not come into conflict at all, so that reason need not recognise a logical impossibility as a religious truth, religion was given to man as a thread to guide him against the aberrations of reason, reason must therefore, after it has tested the proofs of the truth of religion, which it is qualified to do, accept its dogmas, Muhammad ʿAbduh's object was a cooperation between religion and science In dogmatics he adopts essentially the most rational conception that could still be reconciled with orthodoxy At the same time he interiorises the conception of revelation (to him it is intuitive knowledge caused by God and provided with the consciousness of this origin, but this kind of religious experience is limited to the prophets) and deflects that of religion (to him it is an intuitive feeling for the paths to happiness in this and the next world, which cannot be clearly grasped by the reason) The task of prophecy for him is the moral education of the masses Religious teaching and commandments are therefore intended for the masses and not for the elite Muhammad ʿAbduh regards the Kurʾān as created and endeavours to weaken the rigidly opposed point of view of orthodoxy The saints he does take into his system but is sceptical regarding belief in miracles In spite of the denial of causality and laws of nature by orthodoxy, he finds a basis for explaining nature by causal laws but by quite scholastically formal reasoning As regards the duties of religion, Muhammad ʿAbduh adheres to the four main duties ritual prayer, the almstax, fasting and pilgrimage, only he shifts them, as usual in mysticism, from the sphere of worship to that of religion and morals On the old question of free will Muhammad ʿAbduh decides for indeterminism, he thereby opens the way to build up a moral system for society, which, excluding all fatalism, preaches vigorous activity by every one and, following the ethics of the mystics, mutual support His view of the substance of Muslim teaching Muhammad ʿAbduh defends not only against traditional orthodoxy but against Christianity also by a kind of philosophy of history of religion, the sending of prophets was a gradual process of education of step by step, the last and highest stage, that of absolute religion, is the sending of Muḥammad, if the Muslim peoples of the present do not correspond to the Muslim ideal, this is only the result of the fact that they have lost the old purity of the teaching, an improvement is possible by return to it This primitive Islām of Muhammad ʿAbduh is however not the historical Islām but a very much idealised one The superiority of Islām over Christianity in substance lies, according to Muhammad ʿAbduh, in its rationalism and its closeness to reality and its avoidance of unattainable ideals of life

In this theology, the religious content consists of humility before God, reverence for the Prophet, enthusiasm for the Kurʾān The basis of this Islām is the recognition of a not too retrogressive system of dogmatics, its object is the observance of an ethical system which is favourable to progress, and both are influenced by a strongly marked rationalism, which is genuinely old Muslim but for Muhammad ʿAbduh is no indifferent inheritance but the main weapon of defence of Islām and actually takes the place of a deepening of religion so that his theology has the character of an apologetic compromise

Bibliography Bergsträsser, Islam and Abendland, in Auslandsstudien, iv, Konigsberg 1929, p 15 sqq, Goldziher, Die Richtungen der islamischen Koranauslegung, p 320 sqq, R Hartmann, Die Krisis des Islam, p 13 sqq, Horten, Mohammed Abduh, in Beiträge zur Kenntnis des Orients, xiii, xiv, B Michel and Cheikh Moustapha Abdel Razik, Cheikh Mohammed Abdou, Risalat al Tawhid, Expose de la Religion Mnsulmane (translation with introduction on the life and teaching of Muhammad ʿAbduh based on published and unpublished Arabic sources, and with bibliography) On the life story of Muhammad ʿAbduh is based the trilogy of novels by F Bonjean and A Deyf

(J SCHACHT)

MUHAMMAD AḤMAD B ʿABD ALLĀH, the Mahdī of the Sūdān, was born about 1258 (1843) on the island of Darār in Dongola among the Argū islands north of el-ʿOrde A member of the Kunūz family of the Nubian Arab Berābera, in later life when Mahdī to prove his kinship and mystical relationship with ʿAlī and the Prophet, he traced his genealogy on his father's side to Hasan and on the mother's to Hasan and ʿAbbās He was the second son of a ship's carpenter and had an older sister and three brothers Mystic tendencies early revealed themselves in him, after the usual early education he therefore in 1277 (1861) entered the order of the Sammānīya with Shaikh Muḥammad Sharīf, after a seven years' noviciate Muhammad Sharīf appointed him a shaikh of the order. After a short stay in Khartūm where he married, he went to the island of Abbā (in the White Nile, north of Kosti), built a djāmiʿ there and a khalwa and collected pupils around him His master Muhammad Sharīf, with whom he maintained a constant connection, settled near him in 1288 (1872), which seems to have been unwelcome to Muhammad Shortly after this event there awoke in Muhammad the consciousness that he was the Mahdī al-muntaẓar, under the influence of the traditional ideas of the Mahdī, which brought about a breach between him and his master He now joined the enemy of his former leader, the Shaikh al Kurashī, and in 1297 (1880) became his successor In his wanderings (siyāha) from Dongola to Sennār, from the Blue Nile to Kordūfān, he convinced himself of the discontent of the people, who were oppressed by the Egyptian government, the turbulent, mixed population of the Sūdān, the religious fanaticism, the dissension between Turks and Arabs, the old opposition of the Shiʿa to the Turkish ruling official classes, all formed a fruitful soil for his claims to be the Mahdī, the movement begun by Muhammad Ahmad which, as his letters and proclamations show, was based on a religious experience in which he earnestly believed, became from the first mixed up with political and social ideas, which in the east cannot be separated from religion, and in which finally deception and cunning played an evil part According to the traditional formula, Muhammad Ahmad felt himself called "to purify the world from wantonness and corruption" For this purpose he summoned the people to fight in the first place against "the infidel Turks" He had previously bound a number of chiefs in Kordufān and Dārfūr to him by baiʿa (oaths of fealty, after the model of the Prophet, for the text see Dietrich, in Islām, 1925, p 39) and had been cleverly able to attach men of action like the unscrupulous ʿAbd Allāh al Taʿayishī, later his Khalīfa, to him, at the same time he practised a shameless nepotism He further incited the people by numerous pamphlets and edicts, which contained his visions of the Prophet, who had appointed him Mahdī, of al-Khiḍr, Gabriel, the aḳṭāb, summons "to purify religion", to "emigrate", to swear fealty, to imitate the Mahdī, to the djihād etc The hill of Gadīr in Dār Nūba became the centre of this secret propaganda, in Shaʿbān 1298 (July 1881) he made his first public appearance as Mahdī Negotiations begun by the government in Khartūm with Muhammad Ahmad proved fruitless Two companies sent against him under Abu 'l-Saʿūd were destroyed, this secured further victories for him The Egyptian government was moreover prevented by the rebellion of ʿArābī Pāshā from taking vigorous action The expeditions of the governor of Fashōda, Rashīd Pāshā, Yūsuf Pāshā al-Shallālī (at Gadīr, May 1882) and of Hicks Pāshā (at Shaikān or Kashgil), all ended unsuccessfully The Mahdīya thus spread unhindered from Kordufān via Bahr al-Ghazāl to the eastern Sūdān, there in Sawākin, ʿOthmān Digna, a former slave dealer, soon to be the ablest Mahdist general, entered Muhammad Ahmad's service Attempts by the Mahdī to extend his power to the west and with this object to conclude alliances with Muhammad al-Sanūsī in Djaghbūb and with Morocco came to nothing At the height of his power the campaign of 1301 (1884) took him to Khartūm, which after a heroic defence by Gordon fell into the Mahdī's hands on Jan 30, 1885 Gordon was killed Muḥammad Aḥmad did not however long survive his victory, he died, probably of typhus, on 9th Ramadān 1302 (June 22, 1885) at Omdurmān near Khartūm, Mshattā. Front of the three-naved Hall. Reconstruction.

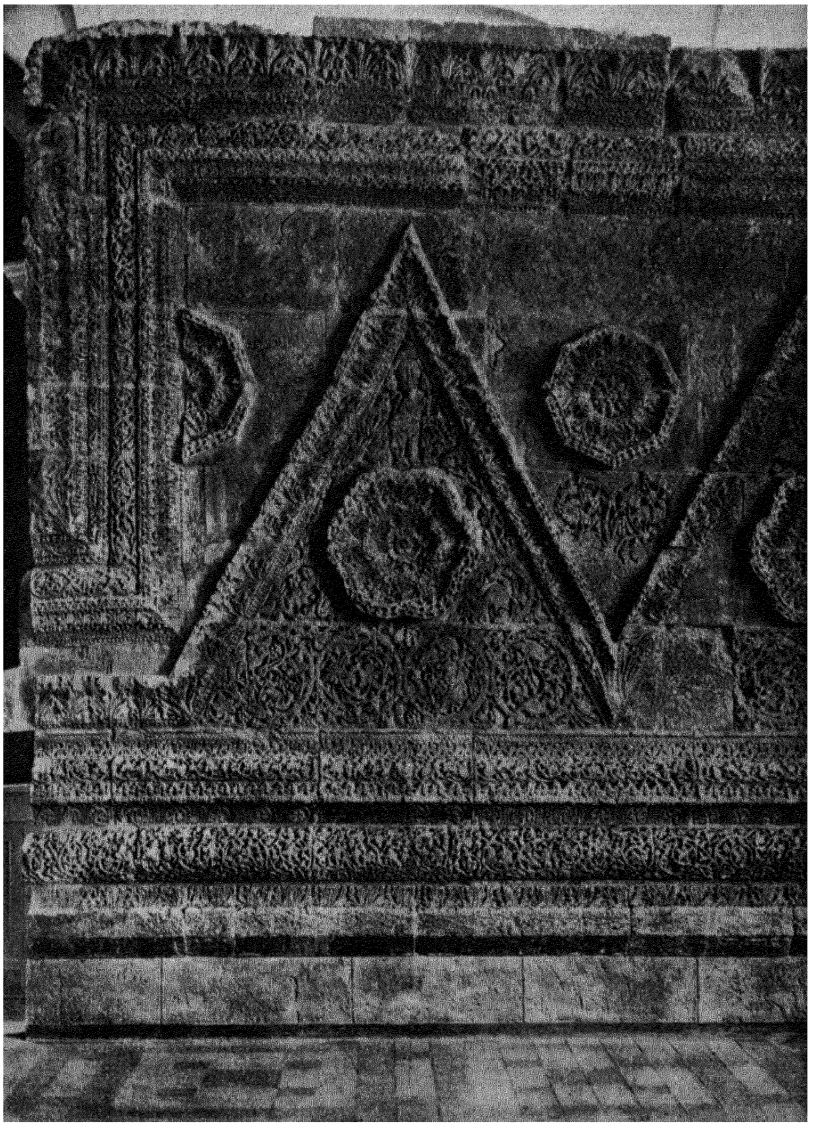
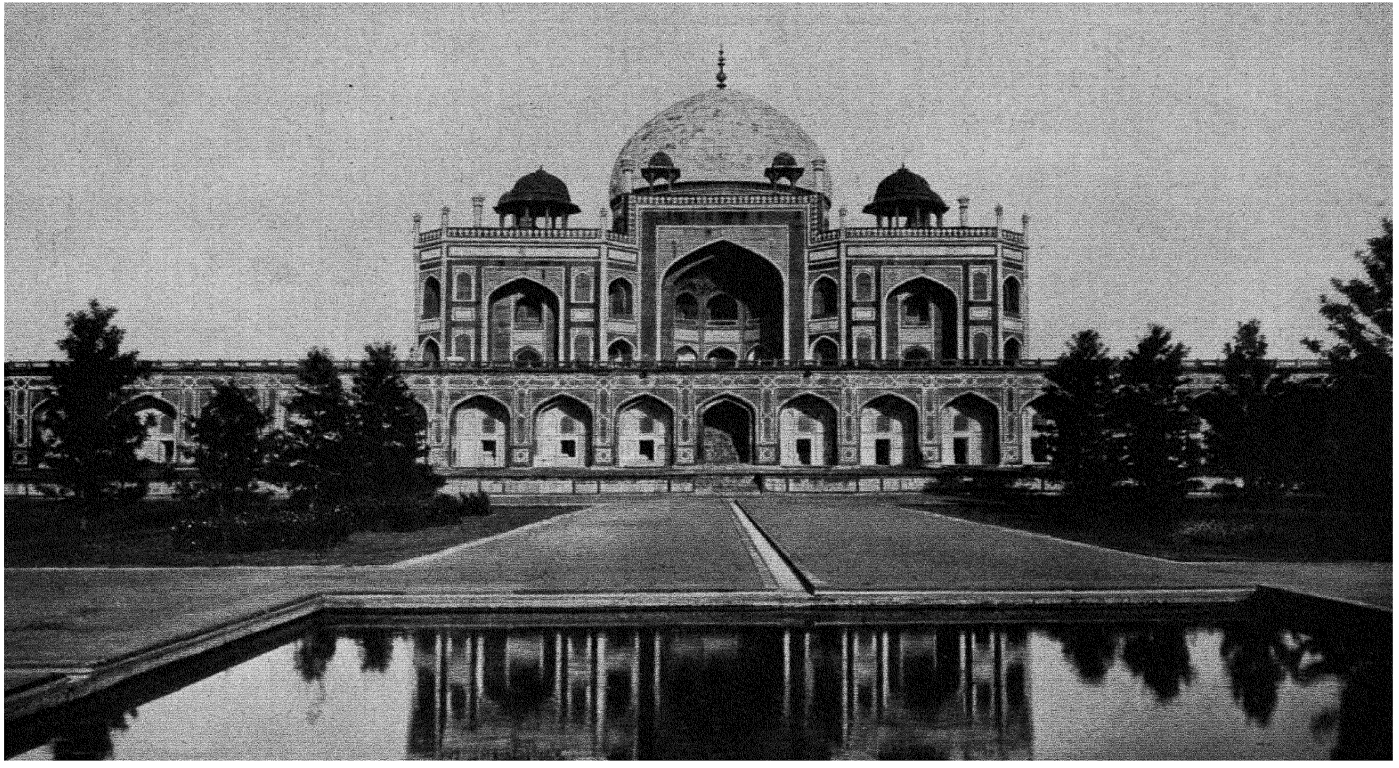
Mshattā. Suggested Reconstruction. Plan.

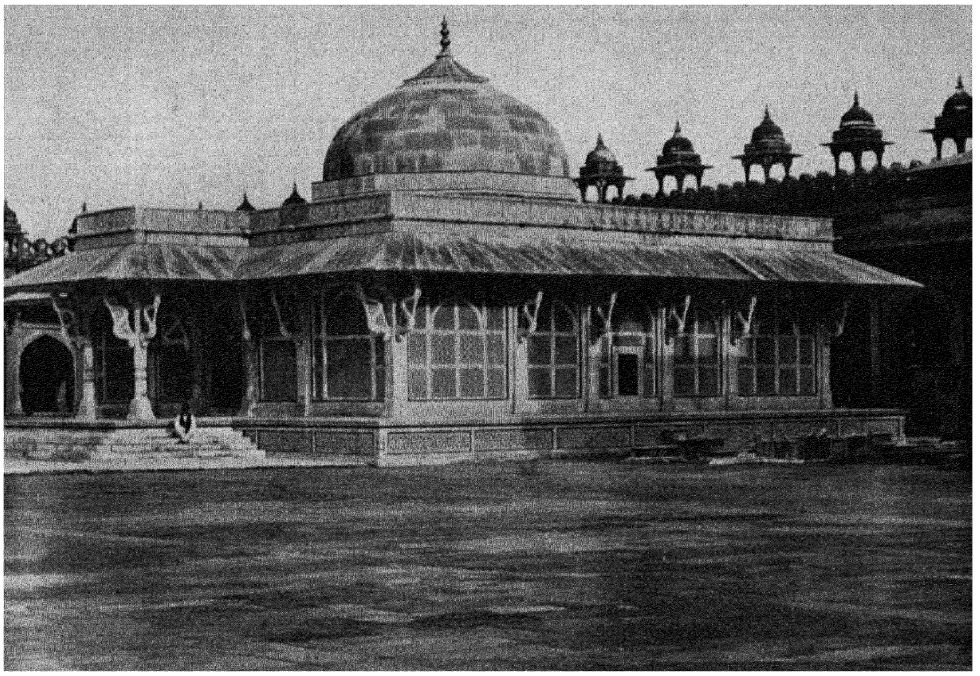


Mshattā. Façade.

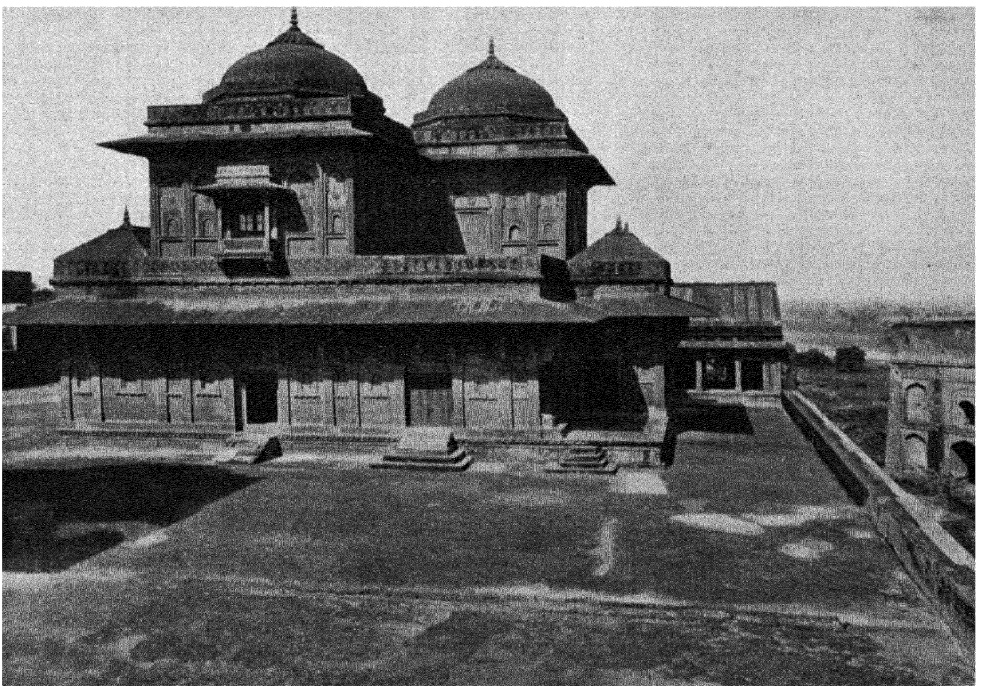


Delhi. Tomb of Humāyūn. General view.

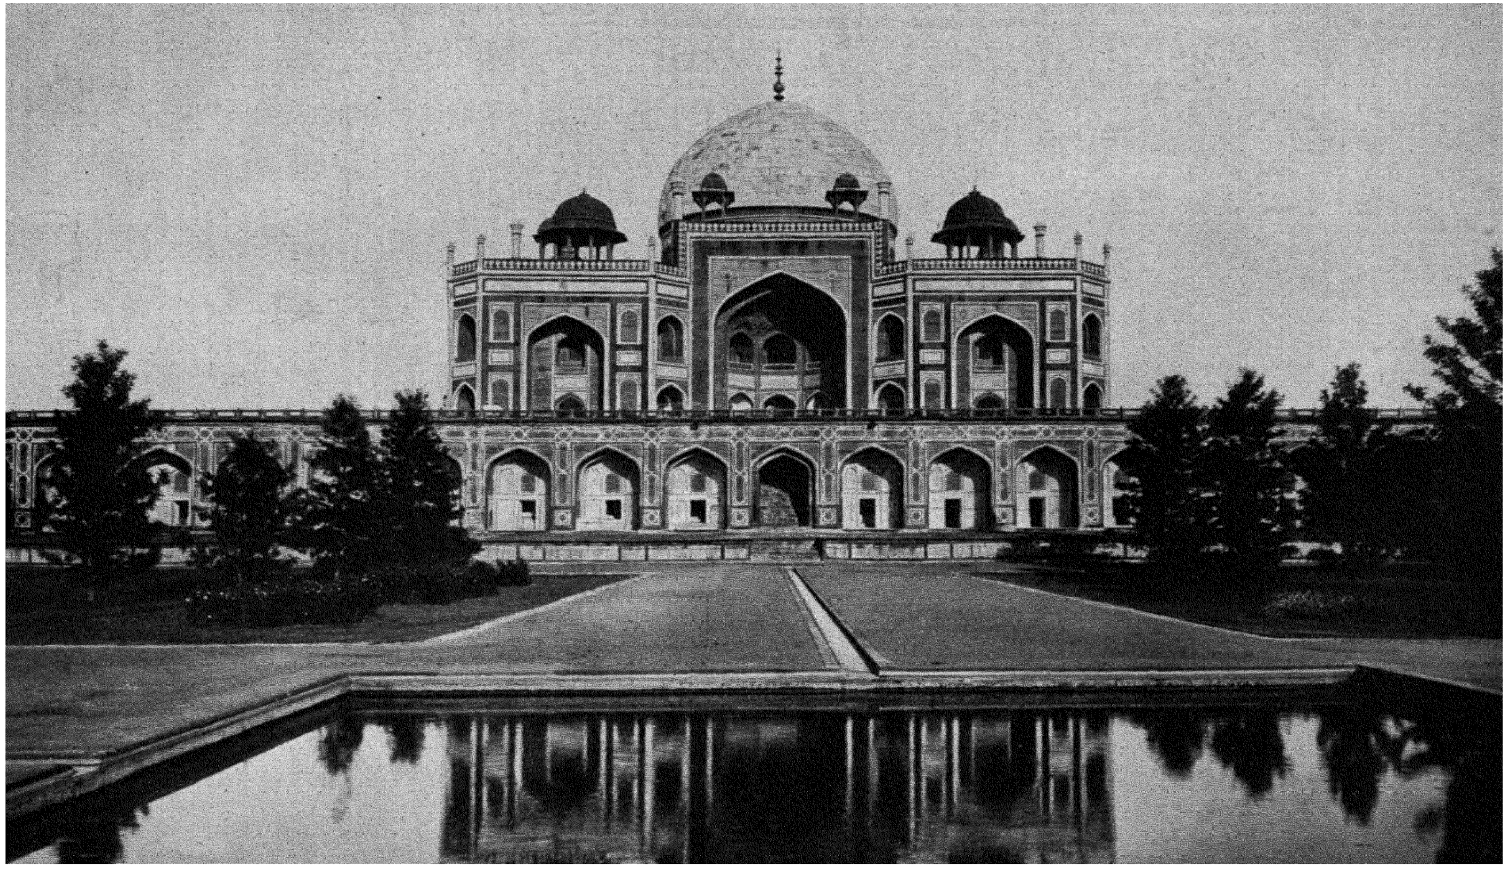
ART. MUGHAL III.



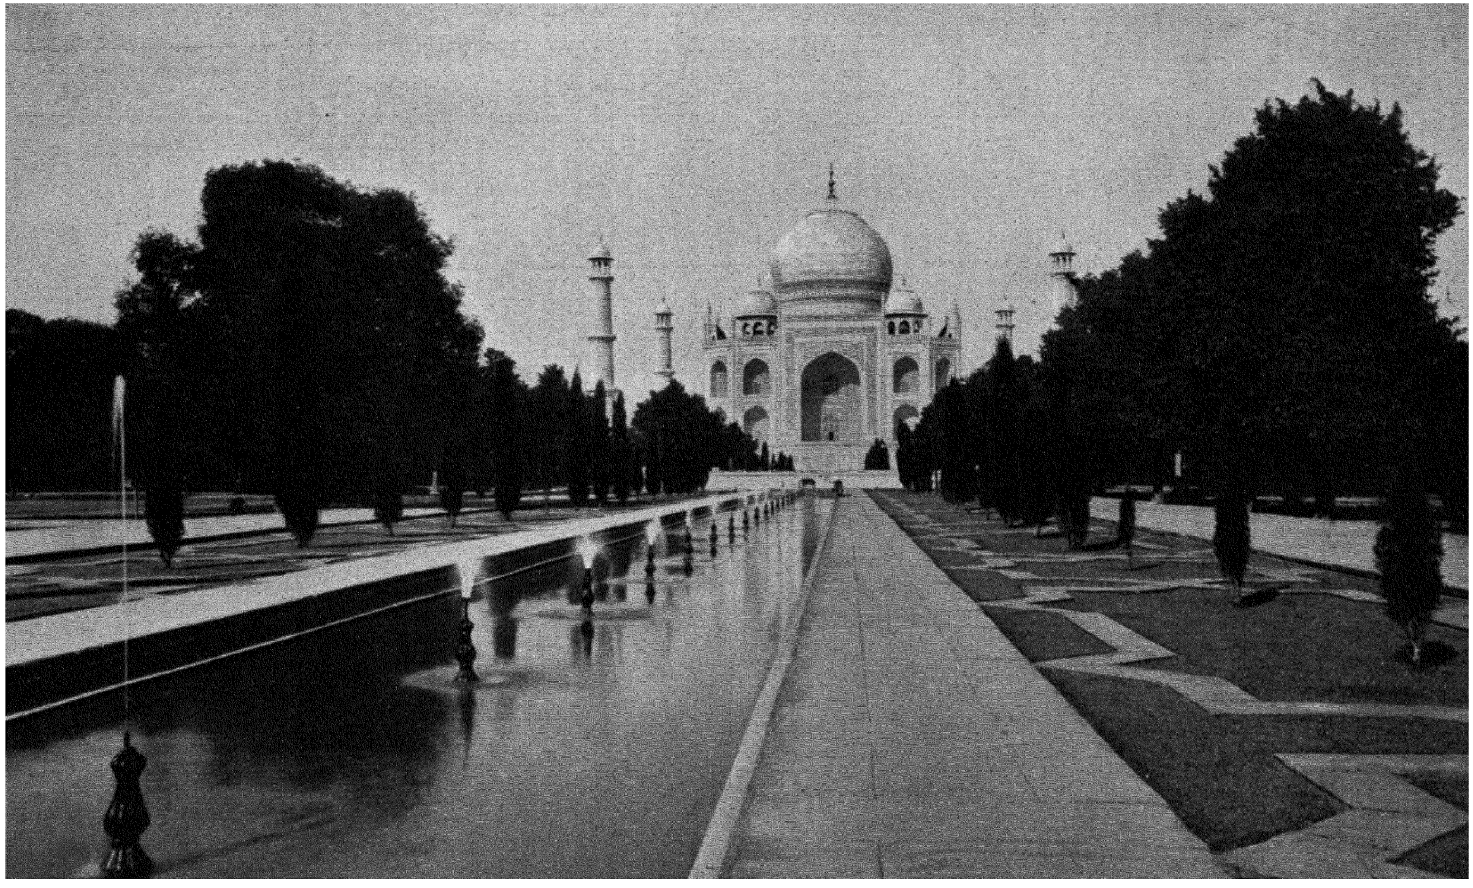
..thpur Sikrī, Agra. Sheikh Selim Čishti's tomb. General view.



Fatḥpur Sīkrī, Agra. House of Birbal's daughter. General view.



Sikandra, Agra. Akbar's tomb, general view. From parapet of main entrance to the garden.



Tādj-i Maḥall, Agra. General view showing fountains.

where a kubba was erected to him by his successor, the Khalīfa ʿAbd Allāh; it was henceforth the Mahdist capital until Kitchener put an end to ʿAbd Allāh's rule and to the Mahdīya in 1898

The organisation of the Mahdīya under Muhammad Ahmad, which was primarily to follow the sunna of the Prophet, was early developed, it was quite military in character, for the djihād was considered more important than the hadjdj He had four khalīfas beside him, of whom al-Taʿayishī was the most intimate and undoubtedly had the most pernicious influence on him Particular attention was devoted to the distribution of booty and to the administration of the treasury (bait al-māl)

Muhammad Ahmad's teaching shows some of the features of the extreme popular Sūfism and some of those of an idealised primitive Islām His asceticism was hostile to progress, the contempt for learning in the Mahdīya and the order to burn all books on sunna and tafsīr alienated the educated classes from him The only things that had validity in addition to the Kurʾān were the proclamations of the Mahdī, the Rātib (a collection of dhikr exercises) and the Madjlis, a work that contained Muhammad Ahmad's own sunna as a substitute for the previous one but remained incomplete In the abolition of the four madhhabs we see the ikhtilāf tendencies frequent among the Sūfīs Wahhābī influences are very probable in a number of regulations, for example in the prohibition of adornment, music, extravagance at weddings, tobacco and wine, particularly however in the zeal against the worship of saints and sorcery, as a matter of fact Muhammad Ahmad himself became an object of worship among his followers even before his death

The only really new thing in Muhammad Ahmad is the addition to the shahāda " wa anna Muhammadan Ahmada ʿbna ʿAbdi ʾllāhi huwa Mahdiyu ʾllāhi wa-khalīfatu rasūlihi Where the traditions of the Mahdī did not suit him, he did not hesitate to alter them He laid down the following 6 arkān instead of the arkān of the sunna 1 salāt, on the congregational performance of which the greatest stress was laid, 2 djihād, in express opposition to the sunnī practice and in place of the hadjdj, 3 obedience to God's commandments, 4 the extended shahāda, 5 recitation of the Kurʾān and 6 of the Rātib

A few extremist ideas, like that of equality between rich and poor, come partly from the revolutionary character of the old Shiʿa, partly from the political and social conditions of the time, the social ideas were however not his central ones but only incidentally used cunningly to attract the masses In practice the Mahdīya had an exceedingly unifying and equalising effect slaves and slave-dealers fought under one banner, the humblest often rose in a short time to the highest offices

Muhammad Ahmad's eschatology centres round the world domination of the Mahdī The conquest of the Sūdān was to be followed by that of Egypt, Mecca, Syria and Constantinople

The formation of legends around Muhammad Aḥmad's personality began very early, sometimes deliberately encouraged by him and his immediate followers and sometimes actually believed by them Under pressure from him his court chronicler Ismāʿīl ʿAbd al-Kādir composed a highly coloured sīra entitled Kitāb al-Mustahdī ilā Sīrat al-Imām al Mahdī It covered the years 1298 to 1302 A H but was burned in the time of the Khalīfa ʿAbd Allāh The Egyptian writer Shukair (see below) claims to have had in his hands a copy that was said to have survived

Bibliography Naʿūm Shukair Bey, Taʾrīkh al Sūdān, Cairo 1903 (in the third part Shukair, utilizing the edicts of Muhammad Ahmad and the Khalīfa ʿAbd Allāh, which were collected and printed under the Khalīfa, as well as the above mentioned Sīra and his own experiences in the Anglo Egyptian army, gives a very full account of the Mahdīya under Muhammad Ahmad and ʿAbd Allāh), Djurdjī Zaidān, Riwāyat Asīr al-Mutamahdī, Cairo 1892 — On two fatwā's of the Egyptian government against the Mahdīya s Dietrich, in Isl, 1925, p 83 — F R Wingate, Mahdiism in the Egyptian Sudan, London 1891, do, The Rise and Wane of the Mahdi Religion, London 1893, Jos Ohrwald, Aufstand u Reich des Mahdi, Innsbruck 1892, Slatin Pasha, Fire and Sword in the Sudan, London 1896, Hasenclever, Geschichte Ägyptens im 19 Jahrhundert, Halle 1917, Ernst L Dietrich, Der Mahdi Mohammed Ahmed nach arabischen Quellen, in Isl, 1925, p 1—90 (with further literature), J Darmesteter, The Mahdi, London 1885 (DIETRICH)

MUHAMMAD ʿALĪ PASHA (in European sources often Mehemed Ali or Mehemet Ali) was the well-known powerful viceroy of Egypt during the years 1805–1849 (which period comprises the entire reign of Sultān Mahmūd II q v), and the founder of the khedivial, later royal dynasty of Egypt Seen in the light of history his life work fully entitles him to the epithet of "the Founder of Modern Egypt"

Muhammad ʿAlī was born in 1769, possibly of Albanian extraction, in the town of Kawāla [q v] in Macedonia, he was engaged in the tobacco trade until he joined, as bin bashi in a corps of Albanian troops, the Turkish army that landed in Egypt in 1799 and was beaten by Bonaparte at Abū Kir (July 25) In 1800 he was one of the two chiefs of the Albanian troops in Turkish service who were left behind in Egypt, this secured him an influential military position when, after the final departure of the French in 1801, Turkey began to try to recover her authority over Egypt At the end of 1801 he fought as a general against the Mamlūks, but in the troubled years that followed he was alternatively on the side of the Mamlūk Beys (headed by al-Bardīsī) and of the Turkish governors sent from Constantinople He intrigued against Khusraw Pasha [q v], who had to leave Egypt in May 1803, and was, already in the same year, appointed titular governor of Djidda Under the following governorship of Khurshīd Pasha, Muhammad ʿAlī succeeded in winning the favour of the inhabitants of Cairo and their spiritual leaders, and used them with success in his intrigues against Khurshīd, whose Turkish troops — composed of delis — were a scourge to the population, while his own Albanians were ordered to behave well The result was that Khurshīd had to withdraw in August 1803, leaving the citadel of Cairo to Muhammad ʿAlī The Turkish government, though sending several emissaries and trying to remove the Albanian troops, failed to keep Egyptian affairs under control and ended by recognizing Muhammad ʿAlī's self-assumed position (November 2, 1805), he was solemnly installed in April 1806

The internal and external difficulties of the Sublime Porte did not allow her to interfere any further for the moment and the new governor had soon occasion to show himself a loyal vassal when the English — then at war with Turkey [cf SELIM III] — landed in Alexandria in March 1807 At that time Muhammad ʿAlī had already undertaken the struggle against the Mamlūk Beys al-Bardīsī and al Alfī, the latter of whom was strongly supported by the English He came back hastily from Upper Egypt, fortified Cairo, and gained a victory over the English army at Rashīd (Rosetta) in April Soon after the departure of the British fleet in September the viceroy began the execution of his far-reaching administrative and economic measures, which were to restore Egypt's economic strength and consequently to assure for himself a more powerful position than any Turkish governor had had for the last two centuries [cf MAMLŪKS] In the meantime the Beys (whose two leaders had died in 1807) continued their opposition (no doubt increased by the viceroy's land policy), which was finally broken by the massacre of about 300 Mamlūks in the citadel of Cairo on March 1, 1811, on the occasion of a festival The persecution of the Mamlūks was at the same time extended to the other parts of the country Muhammad ʿAlī now could send, without danger to his own position, his Albanian troops in the campaign against the Wahhābīs in Arabia, to comply with a request of the Porte The Wahhābī war began in September 1811 and was conducted, until 1816, by Muhammad ʿAlī's son Tusun, after the latter's death the command was taken over by his elder brother Ibrāhīm Pasha [q v] Muhammad ʿAlī himself took part in an expedition to Yaman, but had to return before the end of the war, because his position as governor seemed to be in danger

The military successes of the Egyptian troops against the Wahhābī power immensely increased Muhammad ʿAlī's authority all over Arabia and in a larger sense in the entire Near East, European policy began to look for the first time on Egypt as a factor of political importance This importance was further increased by the expeditions to the south that followed immediately on the Arabian campaign Egyptian power was established for the first time in the Sūdān [q v], where Muhammad ʿAlī's third son Ismāʿīl found his death in 1822, the year in which the town of Khartūm [q v] was founded At this time Egyptian power was also extended in the direction of the Red Sea, which made an end to the hitherto continuous plague of the incursions of nomadic Arabs into the Nile valley, the ports of Sawākin and Massawa (Maswaʿ) came under the Egyptian sphere of influence, although the direct authority of the Porte was maintained

A new phase in the development of Muhammad ʿAlī's power began by his participation in the military repression of the Greek revolt by the Turks Only through Egyptian aid was the submission of the whole of Greece with the exception of Nauplia obtained, first by the conquest of Crete by Ibrāhīm Pasha (1823) and then by the Egyptian army that landed in 1825 in Morea When in 1827 England, Russia and France intervened in the Greek question, the combined Turkish-Egyptian fleet was destroyed in the bay of Navarino (October 20, 1827), in the following year the Egyptian troops evacuated the peninsula, after a convention had been concluded between Muhammad ʿAlī and the British admiral Codrington (August 6, 1828) Crete remained under Egyptian administration until 1841

Muhammad ʿAlī's power was now such that he could conclude international agreements without the sultān's cognizance, at the same time the two Mediterranean naval powers, France and England, were endeavouring to win him over as an independent political factor In 1829 France had almost induced Muhammad ʿAlī to undertake the conquest of the Barbaresque states of Algiers and Tunis, the viceroy, however, was more inclined to seek territorial expansion in the east, the more so as the four governorships of Syria had been promised him by the Porte as reward for his participation in the Greek war, a promise that had never been fulfilled At the end of 1831 there arose difficulties between Muhammad ʿAlī and the Porte on account of the governorship of ʿAkkā, which he claimed for himself The conflict soon brought about the sending of an Egyptian army under Ibrāhīm Pasha into Syria On May 27, 1832 ʿAkkā was taken In the following month the army that was sent by the sultān was repeatedly defeated and finally beaten near Konya (December 21, 1832) The Egyptian army, continuing in the direction of Constantinople, reached Kutahia Here at last an armistice was concluded between the Porte and Ibrāhīm as representative of his father, thanks again to the intervention of the European powers, of whom Russia had already sent military aid to Constantinople Muhammad ʿAlī was granted the governorship of Syria and Adana by the definite peace of April 6, 1833

During the following six years the viceroy's power was at its height While Ibrāhīm administered Syria, severely but on the whole to the prosperity of the country, Muhammad ʿAlī continued his administrative programme in Egypt and inaugurated a pan-Arabian policy, the aim of which was to be the union of all Arabic-speaking peoples under his leadership In Arabia his influence was still considerable since the Wahhābī war, he now tried to extend Egyptian influence as far as the ʿIrak This policy, while at the same time constituting a threat to the ambitions of the European powers in the Near East, was to bring him again into conflict with the sultān, who, having succeeded at last in subduing too independent vassals in other parts of his empire, was waiting for an opportunity to crush his most powerful vassal in Egypt The latter, in 1838, had even made known his intention of declaring himself independent of the Turkish government

Not long after the outbreak of hostilities the Turkish army under Hāfiz Pasha was completely defeated at Nasīb in North Syria (June 24, 1839), while the Turkish fleet under the Kapudan Pasha Ahmad sailed to Alexandria and went over to Muhammad ʿAlī's side In this desperate situation the authority of the Porte was saved by the intervention of the five European powers, in defence of the integrity of the Ottoman Empire The Egyptian question had thus produced an international political crisis, which was aggravated by the opposition of France, which had long been the best intentioned towards Muhammad ʿAlī among the European governments By the convention of

London (July 5, 1840) England, Russia, Austria and Prussia agreed with the Porte upon the terms to be imposed upon Muhammad ʿAlī When the latter did not accept, there followed military demonstrations against the coastal towns in Syria (ʿAkkā taken on November 4, 1840) Soon afterwards a a British fleet appeared in Alexandria, where Admiral Napier on November 27 concluded an agreement with Muhammad ʿAlī The viceroy consented to the return of the Turkish fleet and renounced his governorship of Syria, Adana and Crete, while on the other hand he was to keep the hereditary governorship of Egypt as a part of the Turkish Empire These terms were confirmed by an imperial firmān of February 13, 1841, completed by another of May 23, in which the mutual relations of sultān and viceroy were definitely regulated The chief points were the right of succession according to seniority in Muhammad ʿAlī's family, the payment of a tribute and the permission to maintain an Egyptian army of 18,000 men, the higher officers of which were to be appointed by the sultān

Muhammad ʿAlī's last years were passed in peace In 1846 he visited Constantinople and Kawālā, in 1848 he lost his son Ibrāhīm to whom so many of his military successes were due On August 2, 1849 he himself died in Alexandria, to be succeeded by Ḥusun's son ʿAbbās Pasha [q v] He was buried in the new mosque which he had had erected in the citadel of Cairo

Still more amazing than the career of this once obscure Turkish officer are the enormous changes brought about by his work in the condition and the international position of Egypt, they have made him a hero in the history of the Near East His reign is an era by itself in Egyptian history Muhammad ʿAlī's latest biographer says "He began by seeking only to raise money He ended by seeking, however mistakenly, to develop and civilise the country" (Dodwell, p 220) His work indeed did not at all mean a break with the government traditions prevailing in the Turkish Empire, but the political aim that Muhammad ʿAlī had set himself, seconded by his persevering energy and the continuous supervision of his autocratic individuality, led at last to a result which, in similar conditions, would otherwise have been difficult to attain, as is shown by the state of things prevailing at the same time in other provinces of the Ottoman Empire

As the measures taken by Muhammad ʿAlī in the field of administration, land policy and the industrial and commercial mobilisation of the country have been briefly sketched in the art KHEDĪW, it is unnecessary to enter here into the same details It is sufficient to point to the fact that all these measures had as their first object to make the pasha himself the sole proprietor and administrator of the riches of Egypt He certainly listened to the advice of European and other councillors and valued European institutions as examples to follow to a certain extent But he followed oriental methods and made as good as no use of Europeans as officials in the home administration

This was not the case in Muhammad ʿAlī's newly created army The pasha himself had not been entirely able to keep his mercenary troops under control (mutiny in Cairo in 1816) So he decided to form a new army, moved by the same motives that had led Sultān Selīm III to create new regular troops (nizām-i djedīd) From 1819 this enterprise was confided to and brought to a successful end by the French captain Seve, who, after having embraced Islām, served Muhammad ʿAlī as Sulaimān Pasha A first attempt to use negro slaves from the Sūdān as soldiers having failed, the *fallāh*s of Egypt itself were recruited, the officers were mainly taken from among the young Mamlūks, besides whom there were not a few Europeans With this army were won the military successes in Morea and Syria The recruitment met with exceedingly strong opposition among the people of Egypt and later in Syria, and the methods used to get the required number were sometimes cruel, but the pasha's energy prevailed At length this military organisation proved to be a means of education for the people and prepared the growth of national feeling among the generations to come As has been said already, the final Imperial firmān of 1841 limited the Egyptian army to 18,000 men in time of peace

Muhammad ʿAlī's attempts to create an Egyptian fleet go back as far as 1815 At first he had ships built in France and Italy and in Bombay, but soon Alexandria itself got its yards After the destruction of the Egyptian fleet at Navarino ship-building began again and quite a number of French and Italian officers were employed in the Egyptian navy after 1831 The Egyptian fleet, however, did not long survive its founder

On the whole, Muhammad ʿAlī's rule wore a Turkish character Most of the responsible posts in the administration and in the army were held by Turks and by descendants of the Mamlūks Thus the Ottoman ruling system, with some modifications applied after the European model, was imposed on Egypt most completely at the time when the country itself was politically loosened from the empire It may be called an exception that the Armenian Boghos Bey, who was for a long time Muhammad ʿAlī's minister of finance and of foreign affairs, came to this exalted position, although the use of Christians (Armenians and Copts) in more subordinate offices had always been a government practice in Turkey as well as in Egypt The viceroy himself is said never to have spoken well any language other than Turkish

Muhammad ʿAlī was not a great builder of magnificent architectural monuments He erected a mosque after the Turkish fashion in the citadel of Cairo, but he never built costly palaces for himself Most of his works were of public utility, such as the improvement and the enlargement of the irrigation system in the Delta, including the Nile Barrage below Cairo This last work was undertaken in 1847, but failed

The judgments on Muhammad ʿAlī's personality were very divergent even during his life-time Most of his admirers were found amongst the French, in view of the on the whole friendly attitude of the French government this is of course not strange British opinion was less favourable, but all those who came into contact with the viceroy were impressed by his personal charm Now that his era belongs to the past, the impression remains of a great man in many respects, possessed of considerable personal courage and trustworthy and loyal in a high degree His methods were sometimes cruel and in the beginning of his career he often had recourse to intrigues, but in the circumstances it is hard to understand how it could have been otherwise As years passed by and the prosperity of the country increased, his methods of government grew more lenient, so that, at the end of his reign, he had become decidedly popular with his subjects An equestrian statue of Muhammad ʿAlī now commands the chief square of Alexandria and one of the largest thoroughfares in Cairo is called after him

Bibliography Documentary sources from the Egyptian, French, English and Italian archives have only recently begun to be published in the beautiful collection Publications speciales de la Société Royale de Geographie d'Egypte, published in Cairo So far have appeared G Douin, L'Egypte de 1802 à 1804 Correspondance des Consuls de France en Egypte, 1925, G Douin, Mohamed Aly Pacha du Caire (1805—1807) Correspondance des Consuls de France en Egypte, 1926, E Driault, Mohamed Aly et Napoléon (1807—1814) Correspondance des Consuls de France en Egypte, 1925, E Driault, La formation de l'Empire de Mohamed Aly de l'Arabie au Soudan (1814—1823), 1927, G Douin et Mme E C Fawtier-Jones, L'Angleterre et l'Egypte la campagne de 1807, 1928, E Douin, Mahomet Aly et l'expedition d'Alger, J Deny, Sommaire des archives turques du Caire, 1930, A Sammarco, La marina egiziana sotto Mohammed Alì Il contributo italiano, 1931 A Sammarco, Il regno di Mohammed Alì nei documenti diplomatici italiani inediti, Genesi e primo svolgimento della crisi egiziano-orientale del 1831–1833, 1931 On further publications in preparation see also the same author, I documenti diplomatici concernanti il regno di Mohammed Alì e gli archivi di stato italiano, in Oriente Moderno, 1929, p 287, where also a bibliography of the reign of Muhammad ʿAlī by Munier is announced Nothing has yet been published from the archives of Constantinople Dr Asad Rustam, al-Usūl al-ʿarabīya li-taʾrīkh Sūrīya fī ʿAhd Muhammad ʿAlī, 2 vols, Bairūt 1347—1350, L Hoskins Halford, Some recent works on Mohammed Ali and Modern Egypt, American Historical Journal, March 1932, p 93—103

Contemporary or partly contemporary historical sources Eastern sources al Djabartī, ʿAdjāʾib al-Āthār, vol III, IV, Cairo 1297 (French translation published in Cairo 1896 sqq as Merveilles Biographiques et Historiques ou Chroniques), Ahmed Djewdet Pasha, Taʾrikh, Constantinople 1301, vol VII—X (comprising the years 1803–1825), Ahmed Lutfī, Taʾrīkh, 6 vols, Constantinople 1290—1328 — Western sources P P Thédénat-Duvent, L'Egypte sous Méhemed Ali ou aperçu rapide de l'administration civile et militaire de ce pacha, Paris 1822, F Mengin, Histoire de l'Egypte sous le gouvernement de Mohammed-Aly, 2 vols, Paris 1823, J Planat, Histoire de la regenération de l'Egypte Lettres écrites du Caire à M le Comte A de Labord, Paris 1830, E de Cadalvène et J de Breuvery, L'Egypte et la Turquie de 1829 à 1836, tome I 2, Egypte et Nubie, Paris 1836, E de Cadalvène et E Barrault, Histoire de la guerre de Méhémed-Ali contre la Porte ottomane (1831—1833), Paris 1837, A de Vaulabelle, Histoire de l'Egypte sous Mohammed Ali, vol IX, X de Histoire scientifique et militaire de l'Expedition Française en Egypte, Paris 1830–1839, F Mengin, Histoire sommaire de l'Egypte sous le gouvernement de Mohammed-Aly (1823—1836), Paris 1839, J. Bowring, Report on Egypt and Candia, addressed to the Right Hon Lord Viscount Palmerston, London 1840, Clot Bey, Aperçu General sur l'Egypte, 2 vols (I 75 sqq, Mehemet Ali et sa famille), Brussels 1840, Puckler-Muskau, Aus Mehemed Alis Reich, Stuttgart 1844, J Napier, The War in Syria, 2 vols, London 1842, F Perrier, La Syrie sous le gouvernement de Mehemet-Ali jusqu' en 1840, Paris 1842, E Gouin, L'Egypte au XIXeme siecle Histoire militaire et politique, anecdotique et pittoresque de Mehemet-Ali, Ibrahim Pacha, Soliman Pacha, Paris 1847

Later historical studies A von Kremer, Ägypten, Leipzig 1863, I W Zinkeisen, Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches in Europa, vol VII, Leipzig 1863, G Rosen, Geschichte der Turkei, 2 vols, Leipzig 1866, A A Paton, A History of the Egyptian Revolution from the Period of the Mamelukes to the Death of Mohammed Ali, 2nd ed, London 1870, M Lüttke, Ägyptens neue Zeit, Leipzig 1873, A von Prokesch-Osten, Mehmed-Ali, Vize-König von Ägypten, Vienna 1877, ʿAlī Pasha Mubārak, al-Khitat al Tawfikiya, I 67–74, Būlāk 1306 (1889), H Dehérain, Le Soudan Egyptien sous Mehemet Ali, Paris 1892, Benedetti, Mehemed-Ali durant ses dernieres annees, in Revue des deux Mondes, tome 129, Paris 1895, L Bréhier, Histoire de l'Egypte de 1798 à 1900 Paris 1900, C A Murray, A short Memoir of Mehemed Ali, London 1898, G Zaidān, Tarādjīm Mashāhīr al-Shark, 2nd ed, vol I, Cairo 1910, W A Phillips, art Mohammed Ali in the Encyclopædia Britannica, 1911, do, in The Cambridge Modern History, N Jorga, Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches, vol V, Weimar 1912, K Sussheim, in Historische Jahrbucher, 1915, A Hasenclever, Geschichte Ägyptens im 19 Jahrhundert (1798–1914), Halle a S 1917, Mohammed Ali et le Khalifat (1833—1837), in Actes du Congres de Geographie du Caire 1925, tome V, p 15, Asad J Rustum, The Struggle of Mehemet Ali Pasha with Sultan Mahmud II and some of its geographical Aspects, in Actes du Congi de Geogr du Caire, tome V, p 46, Muhammad Rifʿat, Taʾrīkh Misr al-Siyāsī fī 'l azmina al hadītha, Cairo 1926, Shafik Ghorbal, The Beginnings of the Egyptian Question and the Rise of Mehemed Ali A Study in the Diplomacy of the Napoleonic Era based on Researches in the British and French Archives, London 1928, M Sabry, L'Empire Egyptien sous Mohamed Ali et la question d'Orient (1811–1849), Paris 1930, H Dodwell, The Founder of Modern Egypt, a Study of Muhammad Ali, Cambridge 1931 (J H Kramers)

MUHAMMAD ʿALĪ B MUZAFFAR AL DĪN. [See Kadjar]

MUḤAMMAD BAIRAM (Muhammad b Muṣṭafā b Muhammad b Muhammad b Muhammad b Husain b Ahmad b Muhammad b Husain b Bairām), a Tunisian patriot and man of letters, born in Tunis in Muharram 1256 (March 5–April 3, 1840) and died on Wednesday, 25th Rabiʿ II, 1307 (Dec 18, 1889) in Egypt, at Hulwān, and was buried in Cairo near the tomb of the Imām al-Shāfiʿī

Belonging to the family of the Bairams whose ancestor Bairam, at the head of a body of soldiers, took part in the capture of Tunis by Sinān Pāshā on 25th Djumādā 981 (Sept 24, 1573) and of which several members had held the office of grand muftī of Tunis, Muhammad Bairam studied at the Djāmiʿ al Zaitūna and had as teachers al-Tāhir b ʿĀshūr, al-Shādhilī b Sālih, Ahmad Bairam, Mustafā Bairam, the Shaikh al-Islām Muhammad b Muʿāwiya and others At the age of 17, he compiled a kunnāsh in which he recorded the ordinances, decrees and administrative regulations which the emīr Muhammad Pāshā ordered the authorities to enforce

On the death of his paternal uncle Bairam IV, he was given charge of the Madrasat al-ʿUnukīya on 9th Djumādā I, 1278 (Nov 10, 1861) and on the 9th of the following month (Dec 13) of that of the Djāmiʿ al Zaitūna Soon after this, troubles provoked by the despotic régime began to disturb Tunisia and resulted in the closing of the representative assemblies in which Bairam was interested He published in the Rāʾid, the official gazette, the two first political articles that ever appeared in Tunisia and in them he condemned the tyranny of the authorities, preached the love of liberty and begged the government to be liberal and to grant its subjects representative assemblies

On Safar 17, 1291 (April 6, 1874) he was appointed to administer the awkāf, which he hastened to reorganise The hard work ruined his health and forced him to take a journey in Europe to recuperate, this caused him to begin his Safwat al Iʿtibar He left in Shawwāl 1292 (Oct 31—Nov 28, 1875) and visited Paris In the same year the Sādikī College was founded, Bairam shared in the preparation of the regulation and programme of studies, modelled on those of European institutions, and was one of the first to enrol his son so as to encourage his compatriots to take advantage of such innovations

On 1st Djumādā II, 1292 (May 7, 1875) he was put in charge of the government printing works which he at once reorganised, and securing eminent assistants like Muhammad al-Sanūsī of Tunis and Hamza Fath Allāh of Cairo he produced the Rāʾid regularly It was at this time also that he reorganised the Maktabat al-Ṣādikiya alongside of the Djāmiʿ al-Zaitūna

In 1293 (1876) he assisted Turkey in the war with Serbia and Montenegro by sending money, horses and camels, political considerations preventing the despatch of help in men

In the summer of 1295 (1878) he went a second time to Paris, visited the Exhibition and was received with great consideration by President MacMahon He took the opportunity to visit London and England and, on his way back, Algiers He took a very prominent part in the reorganisation or rather the creation of the Sādikī Hospital which was opened on Safar 18, 1296 (Feb 1879) At the same time he was one of the two arbitrators appointed by the Tunisian government in the case of Henshīr Saiyidī Thābit and the French government In the middle of the same year, he was appointed by the vizier to go to Paris, to receive medical attention, it was said, but in reality to ask Gambetta to remove the French consul, who was interfering in the domestic affairs of the country and even managing them The consul thwarted the plans of Bairam and the vizier On his return he told the vizier that France intended to annex Tunisia Tired of the vexatious pestering of the vizier Mustafā b Ismāʿīl he obtained, after many attempts, permission to make the pilgrimage to Mecca and left Tunis, never to return, on Shawwāl 16, 1296 (Oct 4, 1879) He went via Malta, Alexandria and Cairo, where he was received by the Khedive Tewfīk Pāshā, and thence to the Hidjāz, visiting Mecca and Medīna He then went via Yambuʿ and the Suez Canal to Bairūt, where he was much honoured by the people and by Midhat Pāshā, the governor of Syria, and on to Constantinople He wrote a kasīda in honour of Sultān ʿAbd al Hamīd The Tunisian government at the instigation of the French consul, who feared the establishment of closer relations between Turkey and Tunisia, demanded his return but the Sublime Porte diplomatically did not receive the request

It was in Constantinople that he began to prepare the Safwa for publication and finished the first two volumes The penetration of France into Tunisia was a rude shock to Bairam, who in collaboration with the former vizier of Tunisia, Khair al-Dīn, was appointed by the Sublime Porte to prepare a report on the situation created by France Despairing of returning to his native town he went to Leghorn and was joined by his family, he then went to Geneva, where he left his son to finish his education, and to Vienna and Bucharest and then settled in Constantinople The Sultān, wishing to send some horses as a present to the Emperor Frederick III of Germany, Bairam was appointed to write the letter conveying the gift During the eighteen months which he spent in the Turkish capital, Bairam drew a pension of £T 25 per month It was during this stay that he prepared the third volume of the Safwa

His health being undermined by an illness which grew worse daily and being unable to meet his expenses and fearing the machinations of his detractors, who saw in him a man to be removed, he left Constantinople on 1st Muharram 1302 (Oct 21, 1884) to go to Egypt, where his letters of recommendation secured him the esteem of the Khedive Tewfik Pāshā, who gave him a pension

On the 25th Rabiʿ of the same year (Jan 13, 1883) he produced al-Iʿlām, a political and scientific journal

Two years later, he went to London to attend the Jubilee celebrations of Queen Victoria, had medical attention in Paris and returned to Egypt via Berlin and Vienna He then completed a work which he had begun in Constantinople entitled Tadjrīd al-Sinān li ʾl-Radd ʿala ʾl-Khatīb Rinān (Renan), in which he refuted the arguments which Renan had advanced at a conference in the Sorbonne on March 29, 1883 on Islamisme et la Science (Paris 1883), in which he alleged that religion was an obstacle to the diffusion of science among Muslims He also published a Risāla in which he declared that it was permitted to purchase bonds or shares in a Muslim government loan so that Muslim money should not leave the country, and that this had no character of usury He wrote a report on the compulsory use of the Arabic language in the teaching even of modern sciences He finished the fourth volume of the Safwa and had begun the fifth which death prevented him from finishing

On 12th Djumādā I, 1306 (Jan 14, 1889) Bairam was appointed a judge in the Tribunal de Ier Instance in Cairo Going to Hulwān for a change of air, he took pleurisy and died after 25 days' illness

He had a vast knowledge of Hadīth, law, history, ancient and modern, and historical and political geography

In addition to the works already mentioned and numerous *risāla*s which it would take too long to enumerate, we may mention the following 1 Tuhfat al Khawāṣṣ fī Hill Saīd Bunduḳ al-Rasāṣ, printed at Cairo in 1303 in which he claims that the law regards as permitted the flesh of game killed with fire arms, 2 a treatise on prosody, 3 a risāla in which he says that it is permissible for men to let their hair hang down and float in the air, contrary to the opinion of several *fakīh*s, 4 al-Tahkīk fī Masʾalat al Rakīk, a study in which he shows what slavery among Muslims is according to the law, points out the motives of slavery and the rules regulating it, and concludes by saying that slaves who are sold at the present day are free men and that Muslim governments which forbid the sale of slaves are acting in accordance with the law, 5 Safwat al Iʿtibar bi-Mustawdaʿ al-Amsār, published in 6 vols in Cairo in 1302—1303, 1303, 1304, 1311, the sixth volume being devoted to the biography of Muhammad Bairam and edited by his son of the same name, it is perhaps the best treatise yet written in Arabic on political geography

Bibliography The biography written by his son and published at the end of the Safwa, E Van Dyck, Iktifāʾ al-Kanūʿ, Cairo 1896, p 414, G Zaidān, Taʾrīkh Ādāb al-Lughat al-ʿArabīya, Cairo 1911—1914, iv 289

(Moh Benchenhb)

MUHAMMAD BAKĀʾ, son of Shaikh Ghulām Muhammad, born in 1037 (1627), was first taught by his father and then by Shaikh ʿAbd Allāh, called Mīyān Hadrat, and Shaikh Nūr al-Hakk b ʿAbd al Hakḳ Dihlawī After a few years he himself began teaching in his native country He first became a murīd or disciple of his father, and after the latter's death attached himself to the famous saint, Muhammad Maʿsūm Sarhindī He was pursuaded by Iftikhār Khān, Mir Khānsāmān, to come to the court of Awrangzēb and accepted the duties of Bakhshī (pay master) and Wākiʿahnigār (writer of the official diary), but by special favour he enjoyed much leisure, which he devoted to literary work He died in 1094 (1683) at Sahāranpūr He is the author of 1 Mirʾāt Djahān Numā (a general history compiled under Awrangzēb), 2 Riyād al-Awliyāʾ (life of saints), 3 Tadhkirat al-Shuʿarāʾ (biographies of the poets)

Bibliography Bakhtāwar Khān, Mirʾāt al-ʿĀlam, fol 478b, Elliot Dowson, History of India, viii 145—165, Rieu, Cat Pers MSS Br Mus, iii 890a, Ethe, Cat of Persian MSS, India Office, p 49 (M Hidayet Hosain)

MUḤAMMAD BAKHTIYĀR Khaldjī was an inhabitant of Ghōr [q v] He was of a very mean appearance and amongst other deformities of his person it is said that when he stood upright the end of his fingers extended considerably below his knees When he reached the age of manhood he went to Ghazna [q v] and offered himself as a volunteer to the officers of Muhammad Ghōrī, but they refused to enrol him He, therefore, repaired to Dihlī and was appointed by Kutb al-Dīn Aibeg [q v] to command an army destined for the conquest of Bihār about 596 (1199) Here he was very successful He was next ordered to invade Bengal In 600—601 (1203—1204) he proceeded to Nadyā, the capital of Bengal, and captured it without any bloodshed His last attempt was directed towards the invasion of Bhūtān and Tibet, but he met with reverses which compelled him to retreat He succeeded in reaching Dēvīkōt in Bengal where he died, but his body was carried to Bihār and buried there in 602 (1206)

Bibliography ʿAbd al Bākī Nihāwandī, Maʾāthir Rahimī, part i, p 292—294, Stewart, History of Bengal, London 1813, p 38—50, Wheeler, History of India, iv, part i, London 1886, p 46, and Beale, Oriental Biographical Dictionary, London 1894, p 261

(M Hidayet Hosain)

MUHAMMAD BEY ABŪ DHAHAB [See ʿAlī Bey]

MUHAMMAD BEY ʿOTHMĀN AL-DJALĀL was born in Egypt in 1829, the son of a judge in the Court of Appeal, named Yūsuf al Hasanī When a boy he learned English, French and Turkish at the school of languages (Madrasat al Alsun) and when only 16 was given an appointment in the government translation bureau His patron, the engineer Clot Bey, had him appointed to the Conseil de Medecine In 1863 he entered the War Ministry and five years later the Ministry of the Interior In 1879 the Khedive Tewfik Pasha appointed him to his civil cabinet and several times took him to accompany him on journeys After the death of the Khedive he was appointed a judge in Cairo In 1895 he was pensioned and he devoted himself to literary work till his death at the end of 1898

In collaboration with Clot Bey, he published a sketch of the history of Muhammad ʿAlī and an elementary grammar of the Arabic and French languages and also a description in rhyme of his journey with the Khedive Tewfik He then devoted himself to the translation of poetry first of the fables of J de Fontaine, the novel Paul et Virginie, and of Racine's tragedies Alexandre le Grand, Esther and Iphigenie All these he translated into classical Arabic But his real importance lies in his endeavour to translate Moliere's comedies into the modern Arabic vernacular of Egypt, freely adapting them to Arabic conditions

a Tartuffe under the title Shaikh Matlūf, which Vollers edited under the title Is seḫ Matlûf (cf Z D M G, xlv 71 sqq and thereon Socin, ibid, xlvi 131 sqq), b Madrasat al-Azwādj (L'Ecole des Maris), transcribed and translated by M Sobernheim, Berlin 1896, c al-Nisāʾ al-ʿālimāt (Les Femmes Savantes), transcribed and translated by Fr Kern, Berlin 1898, d Madrasat al-Nisāʾ (L'École des Femmes), e Riwāyat al-Thukalāʾ (Les Fâcheux), 1897 His collections of popular poems were also lithographed Himl Zadjal

The Egyptians were not much attracted by these comedies translated into the vernacular The language did not appear cultured enough to the Egyptian public They were hardly ever produced and the rich vocabulary which the comedies contain has not been noticed or utilised by students of modern Arabic

Bibliography On metre and language see Socin, Sobernheim and Kern, loc cit, and see also Brockelmann G A L, ii 176 sq, the poet's autobiography in al-Khiṭaṭ al djadīda of ʿAlī Pasha Mubārak, xvii 62, al-Adab al-ʿarabiya fi 'l-Karn al-tāsiʿ ʿashr, ii 91 sq, J E Sarkis, Dictionnaire encyclopedique de bibliographie arabe, ii, col 1306 (M Sobernheim)

MUHAMMAD ČELEBĪ [See GHAZĀLĪ]

MUḤAMMAD DAMAD PAṢHA, grand-vizier, also called ÖKÜZ MUHAMMAD PASHA, was the son of a farrier of Constantinople and was educated (rather unusual at that time for a boy from Constantinople) in the imperial palace for a military career He left the palace as silihdār, but we do no not know his career until he was appointed, in 1016 (1607—1608), governor of Egypt Here he was successful in the energetic suppression of a Mamlūk revolt and when he returned in 1610 to the capital with two years' tribute, he was appointed Kapudan Pasha, being at the same time married to sultān Ahmad's seven years' old daughter Gawhar Khān (married afterwards to Radjab Pasha and Siyāwush Pasha, cf Sidjill-i ʿothmānī, i 147), which assured him the qualification damad As Kapudan Pasha he was made responsible for a defeat inflicted in 1613 on a part of his fleet, off the island of Chios, by a small Spanish Sicilian fleet, this blow prevented the landing of Turkish ships in Syria on an expedition against the Druses Damad Muhammad was dismissed from the post of Kapudan, became, however, second vizier and, after Nasūh Pasha's execution (October 17, 1614) he was appointed grand-vizier In this office he commanded in 1615 as ser-ʿasker in a new campaign against Persia, the peace negociations having ended unsuccessfully a short time before Nothing was undertaken, however, that year, partly owing to astrological calculations The grand-vizier remained that winter in Aleppo The next year the Persians were attacked in Armenia, where they had made some progress, Erīwan was beleaguered and capitulated beginning of July 1616 after a 25 days' siege The Turkish army was obliged, however, to withdraw with heavy losses occasioned by the rude climate and the insufficient food supplies Damad Muhammad was dismissed in January 1617 to be succeeded by Khalīl Pasha [q v], in the Venetian Relazioni Khalīl Pasha and Muhammad Pasha are described as the only members of the Imperial Dīwān that really count The next year, after the accession of ʿOthmān II, he became Khalīl's kāʾim-makām during that year's Persian campaign and, after Khalīl's disgrace, was appointed a second time grand-vizier (January 18, 1619) His dignity he held only a year, in which peace was concluded with Persia, the reason of his dismissal was a dispute with the Kapudan Guzeldje ʿAlī Pasha [q v], a favourite of the sultān (January 1620) Damad Muhammad went as governor to Aleppo after having been deprived of all his wealth by the extortions of his successor He died soon after his arrival in Aleppo and was buried in the tekke of Shaikh Abū Bakr, where he had a turbe made for himself

Bibliography The principal Turkish sources are Naʿīmā I, Peçewī and Hādjdjī Khalīfa (Fedhleke and Tuhfat al Kibār) Further von Hammer, G O R, iv 442, 468, 475 sqq, 507 sqq where some contemporaneous western sources are indicated, ʿOthmān Zāde, Hadīkat al-Wuzarāʾ, p 61, Sidjill-i ʿothmānī, iv 147

(J H KRAMERS)

MIRZĀ MUHAMMAD DJAʿFAR ḲARADJA-DĀGHĪ, Munshī of the Kādjār prince Djalāl al-Dīn Mīrzā and translator into Persian of the famous comedies of the Ādharbāidjānī playwright Mīrzā Fath ʿAlī Ākhundzāde After they had been published (1859) Mirzā Fath ʿAlī sent a copy of his plays to the above-mentioned Kādjār prince in the hope that he would take notice of it But the book lay unheeded for years in the prince's library until Muhammad Djaʿfar opened it by chance The munshī, delighted with the plays, at once decided to translate them into Persian As no one would help him, he was forced to print the translation at his own expense, which brought him into considerable financial difficulties The translation appeared in lithograph in Teheran in 1874 under the title Tamthilāt When the work was finished, Muhammad Djaʿfar corresponded with the author and found out that they were related The Persian translation is of the greatest importance for the history of Persian theatre as it gave the stimulus to the composition of original works The influence of Ākhundzāde on the work of Malkum-Khān and even on more recent dramatists, such as Mahmūdī, is quite apparent From the artistic point of view however, Muhammad Djafar's translations cannot be called successful as their language is very clumsy and filled with countless Ādharbāidjānisms It is remarkable that European orientalists first became acquainted with Ākhundzāde's works in their Persian dress and published a considerable number of these translations (see Bibl) as textbooks for the study of spoken Persian, although, in view of their linguistic defects, the translations cannot by any means be regarded as models of the living Persian language

Bibliography H Ethe, Grundriss, ii 316, W H D Haggard and G Le Strange, The Vazir of Lankuran, London 1882 Reviews of this book by A Chodzko, Bulletin de l'Athenee Oriental, Paris 1883 and Barbier de Meynard, Revue critique, Paris, March 19, 1883, Barbier de Meynard and S Guyard, Trois comedies traduites du dialecte turc azeri en persan, Paris 1885, A Wahrmund, Monsieur Jourdan der parisei Botaniker in Qarabāgh Neupersisches Lustspiel von Muh Gaʿf Qaraga dagi, Vienna 1889 Review by V Zhukovski, Zap, v (1890), 129—132, A Rogers, Three Persian Plays, London 1890 An edition of the Hakim i Nabātāt, without author's name, London 1893, A Krimski, Perski t'eatr zwidki win uzavs i jak rozwiwawsa, Kiev 1925, p 83—86 (Ukrainian), L Berthels, Očerk istorii persidskoj literaturi, Leningrad 1928, p 130 (Russian)

(E BERTHELS)

MUHAMMAD ESʿAD [See GHĀLIB DEDE]

MUHAMMAD ESʿAD [See EsʿAD EFENDI]

MUHAMMAD GHAWTH GAWĀLIYĀRĪ, an Indian saint He was a descendant of the famous saint Shaikh Farīd al-Dīn ʿAttār [q v], his full name being Abu 'l Muʾayyad Muhammad b Khatīr al-Dīn b Latīf b Muʿīn al-Dīn Kattāl b Khatīr al-Dīn b Bāyazīd b Farīd al Dīn ʿAttār Some say that his great-grand-father Muʿīn al-Dīn Kattāl came to India and died at Djawnpūr One of his brothers, Shaikh Bahlūl, who was attached to the service of Humāyūn, fell in battle and lies buried at the gate of the fort in Bayāna According to his own statement, Muhammad Ghawth was born in 906 (1500) He was a pupil of Shaikh Zuhūr al-Dīn Hādjdjī Hudūr, and belonged to the Shattārīya sect of Sūfīs He and his eight brothers were disciples of Shaikh Hādjdjī Hamīd, khalīfa of Shāh Kādan, the disciple and khalīfa of Shaikh ʿAbd Allāh Shattārī After leading a solitary life for more than thirteen years in the mountains of Čunār, he came to Gudjarāt, where he became acquainted with the popular saint and scholar Shaikh Wadjīh al-Dīn Gudjarātī He went to Āgra in 966 (1558) and was treated with high regard by Akbar Subsequently he returned to Gawāliyār, where he died in 970 (1562) Humāyūn is also said to have been a faithful follower of Muhammad Ghawth

He was the author of several Sūfī works, the most popular of which is Djawāhir-i Khamsa, in Arabic, which he completed in 956 (1549), and which he subsequently rendered into Persian with additional improvements His other works are Kalīd i Makhāzin, Bahr al-Hayāt, and Mi'rādj Nāma It is related that his ecstatic sayings in the Mi'rādj Nāma were condemned by the 'ulamā' of Gudjarāt, who passed orders for his execution, but that he was saved by the timely intervention of the above-mentioned Shaikh Wadjīh al-Dīn

Bibliography Bankipore Lib, Cat, vol xvi, Nis 1383—1384, Akhbār al-Akhyār, p 236, Khazīnat al-Asfiyā', p 969, Tadhkira i 'Ulamā' i Hind, p 206, see also Hādjdjī Khalīfa, ii 643, Ethé, India Office Lib Cat, Nrs 1875–1876, Loth, Arab Cat, Nrs 671—672

(ABDUL MUQTADIR)

MUḤAMMAD GURDJĪ PASHA Two Turkish grand-viziers are known under this name

1 The one who is also called KHĀDIM MUHAMMAD PASHA began his political career after having been a eunuch in the imperial palace, in 1604 he became wālī in Egypt, where he was able to establish some order, after that he was twice kā'im makām of the grand-vizierate in the capital, in 1611 and in 1615, in the meantime he had held governorships in Erzerūm, Bosnia and Belgrad He was called to the grand-vizierate in the days of Sultān Mustafā I's second reign, when the Janissaries and the Sipāhīs were dictating their will at Constantinople (September 1622) Khādim Muhammad owed his nomination to the Sipāhīs — who had obtained the dismissal of Mīr Husain Pasha, the leader of the Janissaries — but also to the confidence of the wālide and to his well-earned reputation of a wise and experienced politician He succeeded indeed in the abolition of abusesin the army administration by convoking a large council of dignitaries, where the reinforcement of the kānūn was decided When, however, in several parts of the empire, there arose opposition against the Janissary regime, especially the action of Abāza Pasha [q v] in Erzerūm, the grand-vizier was unable to oppose the Janissaries in Constantinople Their leader Mīr Husain was intriguing again, while at the same time the soldateska was crying for revenge for Sultān 'Othmān II, as a result of these riots the former grand-vizier Dāwūd Pasha was killed in January 1623 On February 5 of the same year the rebellious Janissaries, declaring that a eunuch could not be their grand-vizier, obtained his dismissal in favour of Mīr Husain Gurdjī Muhammad went into exile, but after the enthronement of Murād IV he came back to the capital as vizier and acted for the third time as kā'im-makām in May 1624 when the then grand-vizier went on an expedition against Abāza He died on March 26 and was buried in a turbe in Eyūb His age is not given in the sources In the opinion of the English resident Roe, Gurdjī Muhammad was one of the few personalities that were able to lead the affairs of the empire

Bibliography The historians Na'īmā, Pečewī, Hasan Bey Zāde, Hādjdjī Khalīfa (Fedhleke), Tughī, Wak'a'-i Sultān 'Othmān Khān (used by von Hammer, not printed but existing in a French translation, cf Babinger, G O W, p 157), 'Othmān Zāde Tā'ib, Hadikat al-Wuzarā, p 71, Sudjill i 'othmānī, iv 151, von Hammer, G O R, iv, Jorga, Gesch des Osm Reiches, iii

2 One of the grand viziers of the first period of Muhammad IV's reign, when the state affairs were really governed by the wālide Kosem [q v] and the kizlar aghasi Sulaimān This Gurdjī Muhammad had already a long career as governor of Syria and other provinces behind him when, at the age of 94 years, he was called to the highest dignity in the beginning of November 1651 as successor of Siyāwush Pasha, who had shown too much independence towards the court During his grand vizierate he is said to have shown fully his lack of capacity, taking the alarming revolts in Asia Minor of Abāza Pasha, Ipshīr Pasha and Katirdjī Oghlu with the greatest equanimity He was especially anxious to remove from the capital all possible rivals to the grand-vizierate, amongst them Muhammad Koprulu, which brought him, as Na'īmā says, the nickname of habb al-salātīn "the pill of the sultāns" On June 19, 1652 he was deposed again by the court party After having been exiled he lived some time at Eyyūb and died in 1664, at the age of 110 years, in Temesvar

Bibliography The histories of Na'īmā and Pečewi, further Wedjihī (not published and used by von Hammer, cf Babinger, G O W, p 208), also the Siyāhat nāme of Ewliyā, 'Othman Zāde Tā'ib, Hadīkat al-Wuzarā', p 95 sqq, von Hammer, G O R, v, Jorga, Gesch des Osm Reiches, iii, iv, Ahmad Rafīk, Kadīnlar Saltanati, Constantinople 1914—1924

(J H KRAMERS)

MUHAMMAD HASAN KHĀN, a Persian man of letters, who died on 19th Shawwāl 1313 (April 3, 1896) His honorific titles were Sani' al-Dawla and later I'timād al Saltana

Through his mother he was related to the Kādjārs [q v] and through his father he claimed descent from the Mongol rulers His father, Hādjdjī 'Alī Khān of Marāgha, was a faithful servant of Nāsir al-Dīn Shāh (in 1852 he discovered the conspiracy of Sulaimān Khān) and the son from his youth upwards was in the service of the court

Muhammad Hasan Khān was one of the first students at the Dār al-Funūn founded in 1268 (1851) and spent 12 years there Later he went with his father when he was appointed governor of 'Arabistān In 1280 (1863) he was appointed second secretary to the Paris Legation and spent three and a half years there On his return to Teherān he was appointed interpreter to the Shāh and in this capacity accompanied him on his travels In 1288 (1871) he was appointed head of the dragomanate (dār al-tardjuma) and of the press bureau (dār al-tibā'a) as well as director of the official Rūznāma-yi dawlati In 1290 he was appointed superintendent of the palaces and assistant to the minister of justice and henceforth continually rose in rank

E G Browne criticises severely the work of

Muḥammad Ḥasan Khān and accuses him of having put his name to books alleged to have been written for him by indigent scholars On the other hand, Joukovsky speaks with much respect of his works and shows that he inspired a great many literary undertakings (e g the printing of the Kurʾān with an inter linear Persian translation, concordance and index, the foundation of a press for printing in Roman characters, the establishment of the Mushīrīya school, encouragement of the daily press etc) although after the appearance at Bombay of a satirical work by Shaikh Hāshimī Shīrāzī the censorship was established on the suggestion of Muḥammad Ḥasan Khān

The fact is that the number of works — often very useful — bearing the name of Muḥammad Ḥasan Khān, is very large Without the help of "secretaries" some of these books could not have been undertaken To Muḥammad Ḥasan Khān is in any case due the honour of having suggested them His principal works deal with the history and geography of Persia and are often in the form of almanacs They are Mirʾāt al-Buldān, i , two editions (1293, 1294, a dictionary of geo giaphy letters ا — ی), ii , 1295 (history of the years i —xv of the reign of Nāṣir al Dīn and calendar), iii (years xvi —xxxii of the reign of Nāṣir al-Dīn and calendar), iv , 1296 (geography letters ی — ج and history of 1296) In the geographical portions we find quotations from Yākūt and European travellers along with notes specially prepared by the local authorities (an extract from the Mirʾāt al-Buldān Taʾrīkh-i Bābul wa-Nīnawā was published at Bombay in 1311), Taʾrīkh-i muntaẓam-i Nāṣirī, 3 parts, 1298—1300 (history from the time of the Hidjra, vol iii history of the Kādjārs 1194—1300), Matlaʿ al-Shams, 3 vols , 1301—1303 (description of the journey to Khurāsān with important archæological data, ii 165—213 contains the autobiography of Shāh Ṭahmāsp, and ii 469—500 a list of books in the library of the sanctuary of Mashhad), Kitāb Hidjdja al Saʿāda fī Hadjdja al Shahāda, Tihrān 1304, Tabrīz 1310 (history of the martyrs of Karbalā), Khaṭrātun ḥisānun [cf Sūra lx 70], 3 vols , 1304—1307 (biographies of famous women of the Islām), Kitāb Durar al-Tidjān fī Taʾrīkh Banī Ashkān, 1308—1310, 3 vols (history of the Arsacids), Kitāb al Maʾāthir wa 'l-Āthār, 1309 (historical almanac for the 40th anniversary of the reign of Nāṣir al-Dīn Shāh), Kitāb al Tadwīn fī Aḥwāl Djabal i Shaʿwīn, 1311 (history and geography of Sawād-kūh in Māzandarān)

In the field of literature Muḥammad Ḥasan Khān was only a translator (Swiss Family Robinson, romances of Jules Verne, discovery of America, Taʾrīkh-i Inkishāf i Yangī Dunyā, Tihrān 1288, Memoirs on the Indian Mutiny of 1857) He also wrote a number of text-books on geography and on the French language

Bibliography V A Joukovsky (Žukowski), obituary of Muḥammad Ḥasan Khān in Z V O, x, 1896, p 187—191, Browne, Persian Literature in Modern Times, p 453—456, Edwards, Catalogue of Persian Books of the Brit Mus, p 479—480

(V Minorsky)

MUḤAMMAD ḤUSAIN TABRĪZĪ, a famous Persian calligrapher, pupil of the celebrated Mīr Saiyid Aḥmad Mashhadī and teacher of the no less famous Mīr ʿImād His remarkable command of the art of calligraphy, so popular in Persia, brought him the title of honour Mihin Ustād (greatest master) His father Mīrzā Shukrullāh was Mustawfi al Mamālik to the Safawid Tahmāsp I (1521—1576), the master himself, according to the Oriental sources, was vizier to Shāh Ismāʿīl II (1576—1578) but lost the favour of the sovereign and was forced to fly to India where he remained to his death Rieu says he died about 950 (1543), but this does not agree with other biographical details and is indeed improbable That he spent the remainder of his life in India is evident from the fact that most of the manuscripts known to have been written by him were finished in India The inscriptions on the masdjids and khānkāhs of Tabrīz are said to have been his masterpieces but unfortunately they have been almost entirely destroyed by earthquakes After completing these inscriptions he made the obligatory pilgrimage to Mecca and on his return devoted himself exclusively to copying the masterpieces of Persian poetry A Diwān of the Persian poet Amīr Shāhī from his pen is in the Cambridge University Library

Bibliography Cl Huart, Les calligraphes et les miniaturistes de l'orient musulman, Paris 1908, p 237, E Browne, A Catalogue of the Persian MSS in the Library of the University of Cambridge, 1899, N° 265, p 353, Mīrzā Habīb, Khaṭṭ u Khaṭṭāṭān, Constantinople 1306, Taʾrīkh-i ʿĀlamārāy-i ʿAbbāsī, Tehran 1314, p 126, Ch Rieu, Catalogue of the Persian MSS in the British Museum , p 782a, 783a, 785a (E Berthels)

MUḤAMMAD ISMĀʿĪL b ʿAbd al-Ghanī al Shahīd Mawlānā was born on the 28th Shawwāl 1196 (1781), of a Dihlī family that traces its origin to the Caliph ʿUmar He was a nephew of the famous Mawlānā Shāh ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz (d 1239 = 1823) Having lost his father early, he was brought up by his uncle Mawlānā ʿAbd al Kādir (d 1242 = 1826) In childhood he was inattentive to his studies and fond of swimming in the Djamna, but thanks to a retentive memory and a keen intellect he later on became a learned man

Being shocked at the shirk or idolatrous tendencies, then prevailing among Indian Muslims, he zealously preached the doctrines of Islām Impressed by the religious sanctity of Saiyid Aḥmad al-Mudjaddid, he became his disciple and his constant companion In 1236 (1820) they went to Mecca and then to Constantinople, where they were received with marked consideration Six years later, on their return to Dilhī, they gained many followers In 1243 (1827) they with many disciples went to Peshāwar and declared a religious war against the Sikhs But owing to some innovations upon the usages of the Afghāns, their power declined and during a retreat they perished in a skirmish with the Sikhs in 1247 (1831)

He is the author of the following works

1 Risāla Uṣūl al-Fikh, a treatise on the principles of Muhammadan law according to the Hanafī school,

2 Manṣab-i Imāmat, a Persian treatise on the Imāmat,

3 Takwiyat al Īmān, an Urdu treatise on theology (printed 1293, translated into English by Mīr Shahāmat ʿAlī, cf J R A S, xiii 316),

4 Ṣirāt al-Mustakim, a treatise in Persian on the doctrines of Islām

Bibliography Siddīḳ Ḥasan, Ithāf al-Nubalāʾ, p 416, Sayyid Aḥmad Khān, Āthār al-Sanādīd, ii 97, and J R A S, xiii 310 (M Hidayet Hosain)

MUḤAMMAD KĀẒIM b Muḥammad Amīn was a munshī or secretary to Awrangzēb He was entrusted with the compilation, from official records, of the history of the emperor's reign and was ordered to submit it to him for correction He accompanied the emperor on his journey to Adjmīr where he fell ill and was consequently sent back to Dihlī and died there shortly after his return in 1092 (1681)

The history which he composed is known as ʿĀlamgīr Nāma, it begins with the departure of Awrangzēb from Awrangābād in 1068 (1657) and is brought down to 1078 (1667) It has been printed in the Bibliotheca Indica, Calcutta 1865–1868

Bibliography Khāfī Khān, Muntakhab al-Lubāb, ii 210, Elliot-Dowson, History of India, vii 174—180, N Lees, Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, N S, iii 464, and Rieu, Cat of the Persian MSS Br Mus, ii 267a (M Hidayet Hosain)

MUḤAMMAD KHALĪFA [See Muḥammad b Ḥusain]

MUHAMMAD KHĀN BANGAS̱H, Nawwāb styled Ghadanfar Djang, was a Rohila chief of the tribe of Bangash The city of Farrukhābād was founded by him in the name of his patron the emperor Farrukhsiyar When Muhammad Shāh became emperor of Dihlī, he appointed him governor of Mālwa in 1143 (1730), but as he could not stop the repeated attacks of the Mahrattas he was removed in 1145 (1732) and appointed governor of Ilāhābād Muhammad Khān intended to reduce the Bundēlas of whom Radjā Čhatursal was chief He captured several places but as he did not know the roads, Čhatursāl with the help of Peshwa Bādjī Rāo, surrounded him suddenly with an army The Nawwāb took refuge in the fortress of Djaitgarh, whereupon his son, Kāsim Djang, having collected an army of Afghāns marched to Djaitgarh and escorted his father in safety to Ilāhābād The imperial ministers then removed him from the governorship He died in 1156 (1743)

Bibliography Maʾāthir al-Umarāʾ, ii 771—774, Taʾrīkh-i Farrukhābād (Asiatic Society's copy), fol 9, 13, 18, 20, 26 and 46–48, and Imperial Gazetteer of India, xii 64—65 (M Hidayet Hosain)

MUHAMMAD KÖPRÜLÜ [See Koprulü]

MUḤAMMAD LALA PASHA [See Muḥammad Pasha Lala]

MUḤAMMAD LĀLEZĀRĪ, Shaikh, author of a work on tulips, Mīzān al-Azhār "Balance of Flowers" This treatise on the cultivation of tulips was composed in the reign of Sultan Ahmad III (1115—1143 = 1703—1730), who had given the author the title Shukūfeperwerān on the suggestion of the grand vizier Ibrāhīm Pasha between 1718 and 1730

Bibliography H Fr von Diez, Denkwurdigkeiten aus Asien, Halle and Berlin 1815, ii 1 sqq, reprinted as Vom Tulpen- und Narcissen-Bau in der Turkey aus dem Turkischen des Scheich Muhammed Lalezari, Halle and Berlin 1815, Pertsch, Katalog der turk Hss Berlin, p 305, N° 232 (Th Menzel)

MUḤAMMAD LĀLEZĀRĪ, Tāhir, the name of a Kādī who died in 1204 (1789) in Constantinople, who wrote a series of theological treatises and commentaries, which are still only accessible in mss Mīzān al-Mukim fi Maʿrifat al-Kisṭās al mustakim, *Daf*ʿ l'tirād Rāghib fī Hakk al-Kusūs, commentary on the Kaṣīde-i nūniye, and the commentaries in a collected volume in the ʿĀshir Efendi-Library in Constantinople (Defter i Kutubkhāne i ʿĀshir Efendi, Constantinople 1306, p 188, N° 124 [3rd Wakf-foundation]) containing Djawāhir al-zāhire (on Ghazālī), Yākūtat al hamrā (on Birgewī), Zumrudat al-khadrā (on ʿAbd al-Kādir al Gilānī), al-Durrat al zuhrā (on Hizb al-Bahr) and Kawkab al-dirrī (on Ibn Mashīsh) The name Lālezārī comes from Lālezār, a quarter of Constantinople near the Fātih Mosque

Bibliography Brusalī Mehmed Tāhir, ʿOthmānlī Muʾellifleri, i 349, to which may be added Thuraiyā, Sidjill i ʿothmūni, iii 243 Tāhir Lālezār-zāde, who in 1201 (1786—1787) was Mollā of Eiyūb (Th Menzel)

MUHAMMAD MUHSIN AL-ḤĀDJDJ, son of Hādjdj Faid Allāh, son of Āghā Fadl Allāh, a rich merchant of Iran who came to India in the early part of the xviiith century, was born at Hūglī in 1143 (1730) For a time the Āghā resided at Murshidābād and carried on there an extensive mercantile business, but finding the rising port of Hūgli a more convenient centre, he finally settled there with his son Hādjdj Faid Allāh

Already settled at Hūgli was one Āgha Mutahhar, who, coming originally from Persia like Āghā Fadl Allāh, had won his way at the court of Awrangzēb [q v] That monarch had conferred upon him extensive djāgīrs in Djisūr and other places in Bengal, and Āghā Mutahhar, eager to take possession, finally himself set out from Dihli for the Eastern province So well did he manage his newly acquired lands that he soon became one of the wealthiest men in the province He selected Hūglī as his headquarters Āghā Mutahhar for many years remained childless and it was only in very old age that a daughter was born to him Round this only child, named Mānū Djān Khānam, all his affections centred, and dying when she was only seven years old he left her all his property The widow of Āghā Mutahhar was displeased with the conduct of her husband and subsequently married Hādjdj Faid Allāh, the son of Āghā Fadl Allāh, her late husband's friend The fruit of this marriage was Hādjdj Muhammad Muhsin He was eight years younger than his half-sister, Mānū Djān Khānam Muhammad Muhsin was first brought up at Hūgli, afterwards he completed his education in Murshidābād After finishing his studies at Murshidābād, he returned to his sister's house at Hūglī Later, he started on a long journey and for twenty seven years he continued his travels in India, Arabia, Persia and Central Asia It was not until he had reached his sixtieth year that he finally decided to terminate his travels and return home Making his way slowly across Northern India he came at last to Lucknow Thence he came to Murshidābād in 1216 (1801), with the intention of settling there But during his long absence his sister, Mānū Djān Khānam, had married her cousin, Ṣalāh al-Dīn Muhammad Khān, nephew of Āghā Muṭahhar, her husband died in the prime of life and she was anxiously waiting for the arrival of her step-brother At last at the solicitation of his sister, Muhammad Muhsin came to Hūglī, and when she died at the age of eighty-one in 1218 (1803), she left a will bequeathing to Muhammad Muhsin the whole of her property

It was thus not until Hādjdj Muhammmad Muhsin had reached the age of seventy-three that he became possessed of the great wealth which greatly helped his co-religionists in Bengal in the pursuit of education He had never married and the death of his half-sister left him without near relatives He was anxious that his great wealth should be put to good use after his death and consequently on the April 26, 1806 (1221 A H) he signed a Deed of Trust, setting apart the whole of his income for charitable purposes in perpetuity

Hādjdj Muhammad Muhsin lived for six years after making this noble disposition of his property For his own personal use he had reserved only so much property as would bring him in about one hundred rupees a month In 1227 (1812) he died at the age of about eighty two and was buried in the garden adjoining the Imāmbārā which he had so splendidly endowed

Bibliography F B Bradley-Bert, Twelve Men of Bengal, Calcutta 1910, p 35—59, Mahēndra Chandra Mitra, Life of Hajī Mohammed Mohsin, Calcutta 1880, p 1—29, O'Malley, Bengal District Gazetteers, Hooghly, Calcutta 1912, p 292—294, D G Crawford, Hooghly Medical Gazetteer, Calcutta 1903, p 243, Bengal Past and Present (Journal of the Calcutta Historical Society), II 63 sqq, Calcutta 1908 (M HIDAYET HOSAIN)

MUḤAMMAD MURTAḌĀ B MUHAMMAD B MUHAMMAD B ʿABD AL-RAZZĀK ABU 'L-FAIḌ AL-HUSAINĪ AL-ZABĪDĪ AL-HANAFĪ, an Arabic scholar, born in 1145 (1732) in Bilgrām in Kannūdj in N W India, settled, after travelling for many years in pursuit of knowledge, in Cairo on 9th Safar 1167 (Dec 7, 1753) There he succeeded in reviving an interest in the study of Tradition by giving lectures to specially invited companies In Upper Egypt also he was always a welcome guest with the Arab Shaikh Humām and in the Egyptian country towns, and his fame spread to the Sūdān and even to India From the year 1191 (1777) he drew a pension from the government He died in Shaʿbān 1205 (April 1791) in Cairo of the plague

His principal works are two great commentaries He wrote the Tādj al-ʿArūs on Fīrūzābādī's Kāmūs, finishing it in 1181 (1767) after 14 years' work, although in the preface he quotes over a hundred sources used by him, he takes most of the additions to the Kāmūs bodily from the Lisān al-ʿArab of Ibn Manzūr It was printed incompletely in 5 vols in Cairo 1286—1287 and in 10 vols in Cairo 1307 He wrote a commentary, also very extensive, on Ghazzālī's Ihyāʾ ʿUlūm al-Dīn, entitled Ithāf al-Sāda al-muttakīn, in which, in addition to explaining words he devotes special attention to establishing traditions quoted by al Ghazzālī, it was printed at Fās in 1301—1304 in 13 vols, at Cairo in 1311 in 10 vols He also composed a number of smaller works on lexicography and Tradition and also on the genealogy of the ʿAlids 1 Nashwat al-Irtiyāh fī Bayān Hakīk al-Maisir wa 'l Kidāh, ed by Landberg, Primeurs arabes, 1 40—55, 2 al-Kawl al-mabtūt fī Tahkīk Lafz al-Tābūt, Cairo, Fihrist[2], 1 96, 3 Tahkīk al-Wasāʾil li-Maʿrifat al-Mukātabat wa 'l-Rasāʾil, Mōsul, Dāwūd, Makhtūtāt, p 140, 1, 4 al-Amālī al-Shaikhūnīya, lectures on traditions, which he gave in the Djamiʿ Shaikhū, Berlin, Ahlwardt, N⁰ 10253, 5 Risāla fī Ahādīth Yawm al-ʿĀshūrāʾ, Cairo, Fihrist, VI 209, 6 Tuhfat al-Kamāʿil fī Madh Shaikh al-ʿArab Ismāʿīl in the form of a makāma, Cairo, Fihrist, III 47, 7 Īdāh al-Madārik fī 'l-Ifsāh ʿanī 'l ʿAwātik, finished on 4th Rabīʿ II 1194 (April 10, 1780), ibid, V 51, 8 Diadhwat al-Iktibās fī Nasab Banī 'l ʿAbbās, finished on 26th Dhu 'l-Hidjdja 1182 (May 2, 1769), ibid, p 150, 9 Hikmat al-Ishrāk ilā Kuttāb al-Āfāk, history of the Arabic script and of famous calligraphers, finished on 12th Dhu 'l-Hidjdja 1184 (March 30, 1771), ibid, p 163, 10 al-Rawd al-mi'tār fī Nasab al Sāda Āl Diaʿfar al-Ṭayyār, ibid, p 205, 11 Muzīl Nikāb al Khafāʾ ʿan Kunā Sādātinā Banī 'l Wafāʾ, finished on 16th Ramadān 1187 (Nov 21, 1774), ibid, p 343, 12 Nisbat al Sayyid Muhammad Efendi Ibn Hawwāʾ bint Ahmad, ibid, p 346, b, 8

Bibliography al-Djabartī, ʿAdjāʾib al Āthār, Cairo 1927, II 196—210, followed by ʿAlī Pāshā Mubārak, al Khitat al-Tawfikīya al-djadīda, Būlāk 1306, III 94—96, Muʾmin al-Shablandjī, Nūr al-Abṣār fī Manākib Āl Bait al Mukhtār, Būlāk 1290, p 273 sqq

(C BROCKELMANN)

MUHAMMAD PASHA [See MUḤAMMAD DAMAD PASHA, MUHAMMAD GURDJI PASHA, KARAMĀNĪ MEHMED PASHA, SOKOLLI]

MUHAMMAD PASHA, BALTADJĪ, grand vizier, was born about 1660 in the town of ʿOthmāndjīk and, after an education in the imperial palace entered the corps of the baltadjīs On account of his beautiful voice he acted for some time as muʾedhdhin, later on he became a scribe and rose rapidly in this career In 1703, at Ahmad III's accession, he became mīr-ākhor and was made Kapudan Pasha in November 1704 In December of the same year he obtained the grand vizierate as successor of Kalaylī Ahmad Pasha, against whom, although he had been at one time his fellow baltadjī, he had used all his power of intrigue, for which he was especially notorious, according to the historiographer Rāshid On May 3, 1706 he was dismissed — on account of his lack of capacity, as Rāshid says — and sailed to Lemnos, but his friends obtained for him the nomination to the governorship of Erzerūm In January 1709 he became governor of Aleppo and from here he was called, in August 1710, a second time to the grand vizierate, after Koprülü Nuʿmān Pasha had proved unable to restore stability in the way that had been expected from him At that time the first great conflict with Russia was drawing near, Charles XII of Sweden, after the battle of Poltawa, remained in Turkey The beginning of Baltadjī Muhammad's second grand vizierate was therefore filled with preparations for the war with Russia, which had been decided upon at a great state council in November 1710, and approved of by a fatwā of the Shaikh al Islām The grand vizier was made commander of this memorable campaign, which quickly was ended by the battle near Falčiu (Falksen, Turk Falči) on the Pruth (July 21-22, 1711) Peter the Great's army was left in a desperate position, but his generals succeeded in concluding a truce with the grand vizier, by the terms of which the Russian army was allowed to withdraw, while Azof was restored to the Turks The general feeling in the Ottoman historical tradition is that Baltadjî Muhammad had been bribed, his enemies at any case intrigued against him in Constantinople so that, even before his return to the capital, he was informed of his dismissal at Adrianople (Nov 1711) The conclusion of the armistice of the Pruth was also much against the wishes of Charles XII who, on his remonstrances to the grand vizier, is said to have got the insinuating reply that, in case Peter had been taken prisoner, there would have been nobody to govern his country and that, in general, it was not good that sovereigns should leave their country (Voltaire, Histoire de Charles XII et de Pierre I) Baltadjî was exiled to Lesbos and then to Lemnos, where he died in 1712, aged over fifty

The bad reputation which this grand vizier has in Turkish history, and which is also given him by von Hammer, does not seem to be confirmed by western sources (Jorga, iv 308)

Bibliography The chief Turkish authority is Rāshid's Ta'rikh, the campaign against Russia has been described in a Ta'rikh i Moskof, contained in the work of Hasan of Crete and in a Munich manuscript (Babinger, G O W, p 307, 310), Dilāwer-Zāde, Dhail to the Hadikat al-Wuzarā', p 7 sqq, Sidjill i ʿothmāni, iv 208 sqq, von Hammer, G O R, vii 111 sqq, 148 sqq, Jorga, Gesch des Osm Reiches, iv where other western sources are indicated, Ahmed Refîk, Mamālik-i ʿothmāniyede Demir Bash Sharl, Constantinople 1910, Ahmad Mukhtār, Rus menābiʿine gore Baltadjî Mehmed Pashanîn Prut sefari, T O E M, vol 8, p 160 sqq, 238 sqq

(J H KRAMERS)

MUHAMMAD PASHA, ELMAS, grand vizier, was born about 1660 in a village near Sinūb as son of a ship's captain After having been attached to the service of the pasha of Tripolis, he was educated in the khāss oda of the palace and became in 1687 silahdār, soon afterwards he became nishāndjī and obtained the rank of vizier In Ahmad II's reign he was pasha in Bosnia, but did not yet play a prominent part, though he is said to have been one of that sultān's favourites After Mustafā II's accession he was appointed kā'im-makām of the imperial stirrup and, when a revolt of the Janissaries had cost the grand vizier Sürmeli ʿAlī Pasha's life, he was appointed in his stead (April 1695) He accompanied the new sultān during the campaigns against Austria of the years 1695, 1696 and 1697 On September 11, 1697 the Turkish army was attacked by the Austrians under prince Eugène, while it was passing the Theiss near Zenta in order to march on Szegedin The sultān had already reached the left bank, but the grand vizier, together with a number of high military chiefs, was killed that day in the battle, which meant a heavy loss for the Turkish troops Elmas Muhammad had been against this military enterprise, but the other members of the council had persuaded the sultān to the contrary He is said to owe the surname Elmas "diamond" to his accomplishments and handsome physique

Bibliography The Ta'rikh of Rāshid is the chief Turkish source, further ʿOthmān Zade Tā'ib, Hadikat al-Wuzarā', p 122 sqq, Sidjill-i ʿothmāni, i 395, von Hammer, G O R, vi, Zinkeisen, Gesch des Osm Reiches, v, Jorga, Gesch des Osm Reiches, iv, Ahmad Rafîk, Feleket Seneleri, Constantinople 1332

(J H KRAMERS)

MUḤAMMAD PASHA ḲARAMĀNÎ [See KARAMĀNÎ MEHMED PASHA]

MUHAMMAD PASHA, LALA, grand vizier under Ahmad I He was a Bosnian by origin and a relation of Muhammad Sokolli Pasha The year of his birth is not given After having had his education in the palace, he was mir-akhor and became in 1595 agha of the Janissaries Two years later he took part in the Austrian wars as beylerbey of Rūm ili and was commander of Esztergom (Gran, Turkish Usturghon) when this town capitulated to the Austrian army in September 1595 During the following years Lala Muhammad was several times ser ʿasker in Hungary and when, in July 1604, the grand vizier Yawuz ʿAlī had died in Belgrad, on his way to the Hungarian theatre of war, the sultān sent the imperial seal to Lala Muhammad Although peace negotiations were continually being resumed, the new grand vizier took in that year Waitzen (Turk Wāč) but besieged in vain Esztergom During next year's campaign Esztergom was taken by Lala Muhammad (Sept 29, 1605) and in November he crowned the Hungarian Bocskay as king of Hungary (without the regions occupied directly by the Turks) and Transylvania In that same year the Turkish eastern army under Čighale Pasha was beaten by the Persians, while the troops sent to subdue the revolt in Anatolia were routed at Bulawadin After his return it was decided that the grand vizier should remain next year in the capital and lead the war on the two fronts and, if possible, bring to a successful end the long drawn peace negotiations with Austria The young sultān, however, changed his mind in keeping with the wishes of the Kapudan Pasha Derwîsh, who was intriguing against Lala Muhammad Accordingly the latter was ordered to take command of the army against Persia He had already put up his tent in Üskudar, when overcome by sorrow because of the frustration of his plans, he was seized with an apoplexy and died three days afterwards (May 23, 1606) He was buried near the turbe of Sokolli Pasha

Bibliography The ta'rikhs of Pečewî — who, as scribe, had served Lala Muhammad on several occasions (cf Babinger, G O W, p 192) —, Naʿîmā and Hasan Beyzāde, ʿOthmān Zāde Tā'ib, Hadikat al-Wuzarā', p 52 sqq, Sidjilli ʿothmāni, iv 140, von Hammer, G O R, iv

(J H KRAMERS)

MUHAMMAD PASHA, RŪM, vizier and, according to some sources, grand vizier under Sultān Muhammad II As his surname indicates he was a Greek renegade After having had an education in the palace he was destined for a military career and became at one time beylerbey The dates of his birth and of his military advancements are not recorded He had taken part in the final campaign of Muhammad II against Karamān in 1466 and was charged by the sultān with the transfer of parts of the population of the conquered regions to Constantinople, instead of the grand vizier Mahmūd Pasha [q v] who executed these measures in too lenient a way, as the sources say On the way back to Constantinople Mahmūd was dispossessed of his dignity in favour of Rūm Muhammad The latter remained grand vizier until

470, during which time Muhammad II went on is campaigns in Albania [cf SKANDER BEG] and Negroponte Rūm Muhammad Pasha does not seem o have taken part in these expeditions, but, as critical perusal of the sources has shown, he was specially charged with the problem of the repopulation of Constantinople, his commissionership or the transfer of the Karamānian population had een connected with the same problem

As the measures taken to make the new capital gain inhabited must have been unpopular in Muslim ircles — the Greeks and other Christian elements ere granted as favourable conditions as the Muhammadans to settle in the town — the historical adition of the early Ottoman chronicles is rather gainst Muhammad Pasha They ascribe to him he reestablishment of the house-rent in Constanople called mukāṭa'a, which was considered as n injustice to the new Muslim settlers The muāta'a is said to have been instituted by the sultān, hen abolished and again instituted by this grand izier But, as F C Giese has shown by an analysis f the text of 'Āshīk-Pasha-Zāde and Iursun Bey cf Isl, xix, 1931, p 268 sqq), these measures ere part of the policy of the sultān himself and ere probably only executed by the temporary rand vizier, who, being a Greek, must have had pecial qualifications for the difficult task This ast circumstance, however, makes him the more uspect in the eyes of the historiographers and or this reason we may perhaps assume that his eported cruelty towards the population of the Karamānian towns has been exaggerated by the sources, n order to add glory to his predecessor Mahmūd 'asha, whose memory has survived as that of national hero It is not even beyond question hat Rūm Muhammad was ever really grand vizier Sidjill-i 'othmānī) The Hadīkat al-Wuzarā' of Othmān Zāde (p 10) ascribes Mahmūd Pasha's fall o Rūm Muhammad's intrigues, but makes Ishāk 'asha his immediate successor in the grand-izierate So do other historians

He was dismissed in 875 (1470) and was afterwards (according to the Sidjill-i 'othmānī in 879 1075]) appointed wālī of Konya with the mission o pacify the newly conquered territory He was defeated, however, by the tribe of the Warsak in he Cilician passes, soon afterwards he died, probably killed by order of the sultān (according to Āshīk-Pasha Zāde, ed Giese, p 133) The chronological order of these events is not certain

Rūm Muhammad Pasha was buried in a mosque which he had founded in Üskudār

Bibliography Among the old chronicles those of Neshrī and 'Āshīk-Pasha-Zāde, and among the later historians especially 'Ālī, Sidjill-i 'othmānī, iv 104, von Hammer, G O R 2, i 488, 499, Hāfiz Husain al-Aiwānserāyī, Hadīkat al-Djawāmi', ii 195 (J H KRAMERS)

MUHAMMAD PASHA, SOḲOLLI [See SOḲOLLI]

MUHAMMAD PASHA, SULṬĀN ZĀDE, grand vizier under Sultān Ibrāhim, was born about 1600 as son of 'Abd al-Rahmān Bey, son of the former grand vizier Ahmad Pasha (under Murād III), and by his mother a grandson of a princess of the imperial house, whence his surname Sultān Zāde After having been kapīdjī bashī in the palace, he adopted a military career, became already in 1630 kubbe wezīri and was appointed in 1638 governor of Egypt In 1642 he was made commander of the expedition against Azof [q v] which town he rebuilt after it had been burned by the Cossacks before its surrender On his return he formed with the silahdār Yūsuf Pasha and the sultān's favourite Djindjī Khwādja a triumvirate, supported by the wālide Kosem [q v], they intrigued against the grand vizier Kara Mustafā Pasha, who sought to remove the danger by sending Sultān Zāde Muhammad in 1643 to Damascus as wālī After Kara Mustafā had been executed on January 1, 1644, Sultān Zāde Muhammad was made grand vizier One of his most conspicuous characteristics in this office seems to have been his ability to flatter the sultān and to satisfy his very extravagant wishes by obtaining money from all possible sources and by giving sandjaks to many of Ibrāhim's favourites At this time the Empire was at peace with Austria (which sent in August 1644 an extraordinary embassy to confirm the peace) and with Persia, although Rakoczy, the prince of Transylvania, did his best to involve Turkey in a war with Austria There was, however, a strong desire to go to war with Venice and to conquer Crete The grand vizier was against this undertaking, but his former confederates drew the sultān to their side Accordingly Yūsuf Pasha sailed as serdār to Crete in the spring of 1645 and took Canea (August 17) The bad feelings that arose after Yūsuf Pasha's return led to Sultān Zāde's dismissal from the post of grand vizier (December 1645) After Yūsuf Pasha in January 1646 had fallen a victim to Sultān Ibrāhīm's cruel capriciousness, Sultān Zāde himself was made serdār against Crete He departed in April 1646, drove the Venetians from Tenedos, which they had taken by surprise, and died shortly after his arrival in Canea (July 1646) He was buried in the teke of Hudā'ī in Üskudār

Bibliography Na'īmā's Ta'rīkh is the chief Turkish authority, valuable contemporary information is given in the Siyāhat-nāme of Ewliyā Čelebi, who himself went with the expedition against Azof Further the Dheil-i Tawārikh-i Āl-i 'Othmān of Nasūh Pasha Zāde (cf Babinger, G O W, p 211) and an anonymous Nasīhat nāme (G O W, p 152, note), 'Othmān Zāde Tā'ib, Hadīkat al-Wuzarā', p 84 sqq, Sidjill-i 'othmānī, iv 161, von Hammer, G O R, v (J H KRAMERS)

MUHAMMAD PASHA, TIRYĀKĪ, grand vizier under Mahmūd I, was born about 1680 at Constantinople His father was a Janissary He began his career as a scribe and rose to important posts, in 1739 he played a role in the peace negotiations at Belgrad with Austria He had been kiaya of the grand vizierate, viz minister of the interior, when the sultān, under influence of his new kizlar aghasi, the so called Beshīr the Younger, dismissed his predecessor Hasan Pasha and called him to the grand vizierate (August 1746) The twelve months of his period of office were not filled with war but with important diplomatic negotiations, in which he was supported by the new kiaya Muhammad Sa'īd, later grand vizier, and the re'is efendi Mustafā, both of them equally well versed in European diplomacy During Tiryākī Muhammad's grand vizierate peace was concluded with Nādir Shāh of Persia (September 4, 1746) and the peace treaties with Austria and Russia were renewed As the reason for his dismissal (August 24, 1747) is given his addiction to the use of drugs

(hence the surname Tiryākī) and his quarrelsome, vindictive character, by which he had made enemies, especially in the ranks of the ʿulemā' After his fall he was governor in different eyālets, as Iċ Ili, Mōsul, Baghdād, Diyārbekr, and he died in July 1751 at Rethymo in Crete, where he lived, probably in involuntary retirement According to the Sidjill-i ʿOthmānī, he was a capable official before his coming to the grand vizierate, afterwards he was a failure in every office

Bibliography The Ta'rīkh of ʿIzzī, Dilāwar Zāde ʿOmar, Dheyl to the Hadīkat al-Wuzarā', p 73 sqq, Sidjill-i ʿOthmānī, iv 237 (where the dates are wrong), von Hammer, G O R, vi (J H KRAMERS)

MUHAMMAD PASHA, YEGEN, grand vizier under Mahmūd II He was called Yegen "the Nephew" because he stood in that relationship to Kel Yūsuf Efendi, a high official in the financial administration (Sidjill-i ʿOthmānī, iv 659), he also began his career by holding different financial offices, and was also kapī kiayasī of the grand vizier Topal ʿOthmān Pasha (1732) In 1737 he became kā'im-makām in Constantinople during the absence of the grand vizier ʿAbd Allāh Pasha The latter was successful that year against the Austrians on the Danube frontier (taking of Feth Islām), but was nevertheless dismissed, after his return, through the influence of the kizlar aghasī Beshīr Yegen Muhammad was appointed in his place (December 1737) and had to continue the peace negotiations with Austria and Russia, which were made especially complicated by the rivalry between France (represented by de Villeneuve) and the Sea Powers in offering their good services as mediators The grand vizier himself was rather in favour of continuing the war and, being of a proud and arrogant character, made the negotiations still more difficult In June 1737 he went as serdār to the Austrian front and was successful in recapturing Semendra and Orsowa (August) He was back in the capital in November At the end of the year the Russians retired from Očakow and Kilburnu, which placed Turkey in a favourable position in the never ceasing peace negotiations, in which Poland also had become involved But not even this grand vizier was to bring the war to an end, the same influence that had disposed of his predecessor obtained his dismissal in March 1739 After that Yegen Muhammad was governor of Crete, Bosnia, Aidin and Anadolu When in this last office he was called to the post of serdār on the front of Kars (March 1745) against the Persians He received large reinforcements from different quarters and thought himself strong enough to attack Nādir Shāh in his encampment near Eriwan This battle resulted in disaster for the Turks, owing mainly to a mutiny among the irregular *lewend*s Yegen Muhammad was killed, probably by the mutineers, in August 1745

Bibliography The Turkish historians Subkī, ʿIzzī, Dilāwer Zāde ʿOmar, Dheyl i Hadīkat al-Wuzarā', p 60 sqq, Sidjill-i ʿothmānī, iv 234, von Hammer, G O R, vii, Zinkeisen, Gesch des Osm Reiches, v, Jorga, Gesch des Osm Reiches, v (J H KRAMERS)

MUHAMMAD (MEHMED) RA'ŪF, an important Ottoman author and poet who plays a very prominent part in the development of the Turkish moderns and of the written language

Born on Aug 12, 1291 (1875) in Constantinople, the son of an Anatolian, who came from Kutāhya, and a Circassian mother, he received a good education He attended the Naval School and became a naval officer but he only spent eighteen months in the navy, mainly in Crete When quite a boy, he displayed an irrepressible love for the theatre and literature and began to write at the age of 10, taking as his models the novels of Ahmad Midhat and the translations of French romances of adventure This first production was a drama, Denā'et yakhod Gaskonya Kursanlarī ("Baseness or the Corsairs of Gascogne") As his knowledge of French, and later of English, increased, he extended the scope of his reading and of his interests, so that at school he received the nick-name Roman okuyan Efendi (the novel-reader) and later Romandjī (the novel-writer) His literary activity proper only began in the Naval School where he became acquainted with Georges Ohnet, Octave Feuillet, Alphonse Daudet, Emile Zola, Flaubert, the French realists and naturalists and endeavoured to imitate them His story Djānfezā is the most notable of his efforts at this period

When he became acquainted with the works of the modernist ʿUshakī Zāde Khālid Ziyā [q v] he came completely under his influence, especially after entering into correspondence with him and having his story Dushmush published by him in the periodical Khidmet Through Ziyā who remained his model and Husein Djāhid, whose friendship he made soon afterwards, he adopted the career of letters completely and became an author When Djenāb Shihāb al-Dīn had to go to the Hidjāz as medical officer, he left the editorship of his periodical Mekteb in the hands of Ra'ūf In 1312 (1896) Ra'ūf at the suggestion of Ziyā published his novel Gharām-i Shebāb ("Youthful Passion") in Ikdām, but it did not meet with any special success He only began to be famous as an author with his cooperation in the periodical Serwet i Funūn in 1312 (1896), which was of great influence in the development of modern Turkish literature Here he worked with Ziyā and the poet Tewfik Fikret [q v], to whom he had become related by his marriage In 1901 the Serwet-i Funūn came to an end and with it his literary activity till the Revolution of 1908

His first contributions to the Serwet were Nakāhatda ("In Convalescence") and Uzakdan In the 19th volume was published in serial form his most celebrated novel Eylūl ("September") which then appeared in book form like most of his works in the collection, so important for the development of Turkish literature Edebīyāt i djedīde Kutub khānesi, vol vi, 1317 (1901) This novel, which was reprinted several times and which remained unique of its kind and represents a height of achievement never again reached by Ra'ūf, had great influence and won general approval In vivid, moving, although unequal language he describes in impressively realistic fashion the development and tragic end of a noble, innocent love The exhausting verbosity in which Ra'ūf revels here was aptly compared by Ziyā to a gimlet which always turns at the same spot

Of his novels we may also mention Ferdā-i Gharām ("The Morning of Passion"), Edebīyāt-i djedīde, N° 28, Gendj Kīz Kalbī ("A Young Girl's Heart"), Menekshe ("Violet") and Kābūs ("Nightmare")

More important are his collections in the pre vailing fashion of short sketches, tales and long stories Among these is his second most famous work Siyāh Inǰiler ("Black Pearls"), a collection of poems in prose modelled on Ziyā's Mansūr Shi'rler and Beaudelaire's Fleurs du mal (Edebiyāt, N° 11, 1317), also the collection of long stories 'Āshikāne ("Enamoured") (Edebiyāt, N° 16, 1325 = 1910), Ihtizār ("Death Agony") (Edebiyāt, N° 12, 1325), Son Emel ("The last Hope") (Edebiyāt, N° 29, 1329 = 1913) and Bir 'Ashkin Ta'rikh i ("History of a Love Affair") (1330 = 1914), further Üč Hikāye ("Three Tales"), Ezhar ("Flowers"), Perwāneler gibi ("As butterflies") etc

Ra'ūf was no less successful as a dramatist He wrote the following pieces Pence ("The Talon"), a drama (oyun) in four acts (fasl) (Edebiyāt, N° 14, 1325 = 1909), Ferdi we-Shurekāsi ("Ferdi and Co") in 3 acts, a dramatisation of the novel of the same name by Ziyā (Edebiyāt, N° 17) and Djidāl ("Battle") in 5 acts (Edebiyāt, N° 30, 1327 = 1911), also Iki Kuwwet ("Two Powers"), Yaghmurdan doluya

Ra'ūf died on Dec 23, 1931 at Constantinople

Numerous contributions by him are in the Serwet i Funūn, the finely produced women's periodical Mehāsin of which he edited the only volume that appeared Contributions by him, some his own work, especially poems (Ra'ūf possessed not inconsiderable poetic talent and was regarded as the Turkish Baudelaire), also essays and criticisms, of which his analyses of the contemporary novel are valuable, were published in different collections, periodicals and newspapers in vast numbers His Zambak ("Lily") brought him trouble It was confiscated on account of its sensuality and the author was imprisoned He wrote other things in the same style which were not printed

In his works he appears as a very artistic, rather sentimental nature, even what he writes in prose is pure poetry His prose is as good as that of Ziyā, the leader of the Serwet-i Funūn movement He is one of the most important personalities in this group of men of letters, although his marked merits in form and style are counter-balanced by equal defects, which became worse as he paid no attention to the cultivation of his style, in him we find a reversed process, from the more perfect to the less He would have been held in higher repute generally, if he had ceased to write after his first works — Owing to the identity of the name and the parallel literary activity Muhammad Ra'ūf was often taken for M Ra'ūf, the son of Farīk 'Ātif Pasha, who died on Febr 23, 1918 and was buried at Haidar Pasha M Ra'ūf was editor of the Resimli Kitāb He was a dramatist and wrote Perwāne, Nigāhda Kerāmet ("Wonder in sight"), a comedy Ātesh ile Bārūt arasında ("Between Fire and Powder") and a piece entitled Tīrāže written jointly with Rā'if Nedjdet, one of his most intimate friends The following dramas were never printed Ṣalāh al-Din-i Eyyūbi, Neǰimān and a number of adaptions From the English he translated Saiyid Ameer Ali's The Life and and Teachings of Mohammed or the Spirit of Islam in 2 vols entitled Muṣawwer Ta'rikh i Islām

Besides being an author, M Ra'ūf was also a teacher, a task for which his extensive knowledge of languages qualified him (in addition to French and English, he knew Arabic, Persian, German, Italian, Greek and others) He lectured at the University on mythology and Greek and Italian literature, on which he wrote two text books Yūnān i kadim Ta'rikh-i Edebiyāti and Italya Ta'rikh-i Edebiyāti He was also for a time teacher of western literatures, Turkish literature and French at various secondary schools

Bibliography Brusali Mehmed Tāhir, 'Othmānli Mu'ellifleri, II 218, Newsāl i Mīlli, 1330, p 224—236, Shihāb al-Dīn Sulaimān, Ta'rikh-i Edebiyāt-i 'othmāniye, 1328, p 367, Ismā'il Hikmet, Turk Edebiyāti Ta'rikh i, Baku 1925, I 931—951, Ibrāhīm Nedjmī, Turk Edebiyāti dersleri, 1338, p 307, Ismā'il Habīb, Turk Tedjeddud i Edebiyāti Ta'rikhi, 1340, p 533, Rā'if Nedjdet, Hayāt i edebiye, 1922, p 202 sqq, 287, 349, 350, Khalīl Hāmid, in Serwet-i Funūn, liv, 1918, p 82—83, Fazy and Memdouh, Anthologie, p 255—259, M Hartmann, Dichter der neuen Turkei, in M S O S As, xix, (1916), p 124–179 and xvi (1918), p 43 and in Urkunden und Untersuchungen zur Geistesentwicklung des heutigen Orients, III, Berlin 1919, p 83—86, O Hachtmann, Die turkische Literatur des 20 Jahrh, Leipzig 1916, S 13—16, N O II, 1918, p 530 and 560, C Frank, Zum Gedachtnis M Reufs, in N O, II (1918), 167, Th Menzel, Die turkische Literatur, in Hinnebeig's Kultur der Gegenwart, Die Orientalischen Literaturen, Leipzig 1925 ², p 313

(Th Menzel)

MUHAMMAD SA'ĪD (Mīr Djumla), minister of 'Abd Allāh Kutb Shāh of Haidarābād during the xviith century, was originally a diamond merchant, and was famous in the Deccan for his wealth before he became minister After the defeat of his master 'Abd Allāh by Awrangzēb, Mir Djumla took service under the latter, and was made Governor of Bengal from 1071—1075 (1660—1664) He defeated Shāh Shudjā' when the latter fought against his brother Awrangzēb Mīr Djumla was afterwards employed in the conquest of Cooch Bihār and Āssām in 1072—1073 (1661—1662) He overran both these countries but owing to the rainy season and the spread of disease among his troops, he was compelled to return, only to die of dysentery contracted during his campaign, shortly after his arrival at Dacca in 1073 (1663)

Bibliography Ma'āthir al-Umarā', III 530, Blochmann, J A S B, xli/1 51, Elliot-Dowson, History of India, vii 199, Imperial Gazetteer of India, II 402, vii 214, Elphinstone, History of India, 1889, p 588—613

(M Hidayet Hosain)

MUHAMMAD SA'ĪD [See Khalīl Ffendi Zādf]

MUHAMMAD SHĀH (1131—1161 = 1719—1748), emperor of Dihlī, surnamed Muhammad Rawshan Akhtar (or, the Brilliant Star), was the son of prince Djahān Shāh, one of the three brothers who perished in disputing the crown with their eldest brother Djahāndār Shāh, son of Bahādur Shāh He was born on Friday the 24th Rabī' I 1114 (August 7, 1702), and was crowned by the two Saiyid brothers, Saiyid 'Abd Allāh and Saiyid Husain, after the death of Rafi' al-Dawla on the 25th Dhu 'l Ka'da 1131 (September 29, 1719) Muhammad Shāh reigned for about 30 years and died one month after the battle of Sarhind, which his son fought against Ahmad Shāh Abdālī [q v] His death took place on Thursday the 27th Rabī' II 1161 (April 16, 1748) He was buried in the court before the Mausoleum of

Nizām al-Dīn Awliyāʾ at Dihlī This emperor may be called the last of the Tīmūrid line, who reigned in Dihlī and enjoyed any power The few princes of that sovereign's family who were raised to the throne after Muhammad Shāh were mere puppets in the hands of the nobles of the court

Bibliography Muhammad Hāshim Khāfī Khān, Muntakhab al-Lubāb, iii 840, Elliot-Dowson, History of India, vii 485, Elphinstone, History of India, 1889, p 692

(M Hidayet Hosain)

MUHAMMAD SHĀH I, ʿALĀʾ AL-DĪN KHALDJĪ (695—715 = 1295—1315), was the nephew and son-in-law of Sultān Djalāl al-Dīn Fīrūz Shāh II, Khaldjī, whom he murdered by treachery at Karā Mānikpūr, in the province of Ilāhābād, in 695 (1295), and ascended the throne of Dihlī in the same year He re conquered Gudjarāt (697 = 1297), took Čitōr and temporarily subdued the Rādjpūts (703 = 1303) His eunuch general, Malik Kāfūr, seized Deogīr and Warangal, and founded a Deccan province of the Dihlī kingdom The empire is said to have flourished during his reign Among contemporary poets Amīr Khusrau and Khwādja Hasan held the first rank, Shaikh Nizām al-Dīn Awliyāʾ, one of the greatest saints of India, flourished at the same time He died in 715 (1315) and was buried in the tomb which he had constructed in his life-time in Old Dihlī

Bibliography ʿAbd al-Bākī Nahāwandī, Maʾāthir Rahimi, p 322—330, Nizām al Dīn Ahmad Harawī, Tabakāt Akbarī, Lucknow 1875, p 68–86, Saiyid Ahmad Khān, Āthār al Sanādīd, Dihlī 1874, ii 157, Wright, Cat of the Coins in the Indian Museum, Calcutta, ii 8, Elphinstone, History of India, 1889, p 390—400

(M Hidayet Hosain)

MUHAMMAD SHĀH BAHMANĪ [See Muhammad I—III, above p 664 sq]

MUHAMMAD SHARĪF al-Nadjafī was born in the Deccan where he spent the first twenty five years of his life He afterwards visited in an official capacity Gudjarāt, Mālwa, Adjmīr, Dihlī, Āgra, the Pandjāb, Sind and Kashmīr He went to the last country in the train of Djahāngīr and under the command of Kāsim Khān (1031 = 1621) He is the author of Madjālis al Salātīn, a short history of the kings of Dihlī and of the Deccan dynasties from the Muhammadan conquest to the accession of Shāh Djahān, completed in 1038 (1628)

Bibliography Elliot Dowson, History of India, vii 134—140, Rieu, Cat Persian MSS Br Mus, p 907 (M Hidayet Hosain)

MUHAMMAD TĀHIR al-Fatanī al Gudjarātī, was born at Patan in Gudjarāt in 914 (1508), after completing his education in his native land, he proceeded to Mecca, where he studied traditions with eminent scholars such as Ibn Hadjar al-Haitamī al-Makkī and others He acquired much learning from ʿAlī b Husām al Dīn al-Muttakī (d 975 = 1567) and also became his disciple in the Kādirī and Shādhilī orders After his return to his native country he tried his utmost to spread learning and to uproot the doctrines of Muhammad al-Djawnpūrī who had claimed to be the Mahdī of his time and had a considerable following among the Bohorās [q v], a community to which Muhammad Tāhir himself belonged

In 980 (1572) Akbar went to conquer Gudjarāt After its conquest he conferred honour on Muhammad Ṭāhir by tying with his own hands a turban on his head, saying that it was incumbent on him (Akbar) to spread the true principles of Islām Khān Aʿzam ʿAzīz Muhammad Kūkaltāsh was appointed governor of Gudjarāt and he helped Muhammad Tāhir in uprooting the new doctrines of Mahdism But when ʿAbd al-Rahīm Khān Khānān succeeded him as governor, Muhammad Tāhir suffered much at the hands of the followers of the Mahdī, and proceeded to the court of Akbar in Akbarābād for redress On his way at Udjdjain he was murdered by some followers of the pretended Mahdī in 986 (1578)

Among his various compositions the following may be mentioned

1 Madjmaʿ Bihār al Anwār fī Gharāʾib al Tanzīl wa Latāʾif al Akhbār, a copious dictionary of the Kurʾān and the Traditions, lithographed, Lakhnaw 1248, 1284 and 1314,

2 al-Mughnī, a dictionary of proper names of Muhammadan traditionists, lithographed on the margin of Takrīb al-Tahdhīb by Ibn Hadjar al-ʿAskalānī (Dihlī 1290),

3 Tadhkirat al-Mawdūʿāt, a treatise on traditions that have been incorrectly attributed to the Prophet

Bibliography ʿAbd al-Hakk Dihlawī, Akhbār al Akhyār, Dihlī 1309, p 272—273, Ghulām ʿAlī Āzād Bilgrāmī, Subhat al Mardjān, Bombay 1303, p 43—45, ʿAbd al-Hay, al-Taʿlikāt al-Sanīya ʿala ʾl-Fawāʾid al-Bahiya, Lucknow 1895, p 67, Fakīr Muhammad, Hadāʾik al-Hanafiya, Lucknow 1308, p 385—387, Siddīk Hasan, Abdjad al-ʿUlūm, Bhopal 1396, p 895, Ithāf al Nubalāʾ al-Muttakīn, Cawnpore 1288, p 397—400, Brockelmann, G A L, ii 416 (M Hidayet Hosain)

MUHAMMAD ZAʿĪM, a Turkish historian All that we know of his life is gleaned from his works He was born in 939 (1532) for he tells us that at the accession of Sultān Murād III, i e in 982 (1574), he was 43 At the early age of eleven he took part in the campaign of 950 (1543) along with his elder brother Perwāne Agha, who at that time was Kapudjī Bashī to the Sandjak Beg of Lepanto, Yahyā Pasha Oghlu Ahmad Beg When the latter, after the capture of Stuhlweissenburg, was appointed Sandjak Beg there, the brothers seemed to have remained in his service, probably till 952 (1545) when Ahmad Beg was summoned to Stambul, in connection with the plundering of the Stuhlweissenburg churches In 961 (1554) when Sultān Sulaimān took the field against Shāh Tahmasp of Persia, Muhammad Zaʿīm was a secretary in the service of the governor of Syria, Teki Oghlu Mehemmed, and a year later he was secretary to the powerful grand vizier Mehemmed Sokollī and in this capacity compiled the official report of the death of Selīm II and the accession of Murād III which was sent to the governors of Diyārbakr, Aleppo and Baghdād This office, to which he perhaps succeeded on the promotion (978 = 1570) of the famous Ferīdūn Ahmed Beg [q v], he must have filled till the death of Mehemmed Sokollī in 987 (1579), we hear nothing further about it He held a great fief (zaʿāmet, hence his epithet Zaʿīm), he himself says zuʿamā i ʿatebe i selātīn-i āl-i osmānīyeden Mehemmed ile muteʿāref we-shehīr Friends requested him to write a history and he finished it within a year He began the work in Muharram 985 (beg March 21, 1577) and had completed it in Dhu ʾl-Hidjdja of the same year (beg Feb 9, 1578) The date of his death and the site of his tomb are not known but he is said to have left charitable endowments in Karaferia near Salonika

He called his book Humā-i Djāmiʿ al-Tawārīkh and dedicated it to his master Mehemmed Sokolli As his sources he mentions eleven historians from Fīdawsī and Tabarī down to the anonymous Tawārīkh i Selātin i Āl i Osmān and gives as his main source Behdjet al-Tawārīkh, from which, as has been proved, he copied out whole pages without a qualm The book, which is not yet printed, is divided into a preface and five large sections (aksām, subdivided into gurūh and then again into makālāt) and concludes with an epilogue Rieu and others have given an account of the contents from the manuscripts In the fourth gurūh of the 5th kism he deals with the Ottomans and here alone do we have statements of any value, when the author describes from his own experience events from 1543 onwards He brought his story down to the time of writing and the last event that he mentions took place in the month in which the book was finished

The passages in the book relating to Hungary have been dealt with by Thúry (Török tortenetirók, II 364—389) who also collected the above data for his life, the earlier from 1390 to 1476 are given in extracts and the later from 1521 to 1566 translated in full Of the other less valuable parts of the book Diez (Denkwurdigkeiten von Asien, I 212 sqq) has edited a portion of the very early history, dealing with Cain and his descendants, while v Hammer (Sur les origines russes, lxi 120) edited and translated a portion on the tribal divisions of the Turks, where the Rūs appear as the ninth Turkish tribe Of the later Ottoman historians, Ibrāhīm Pečewī utilised and quoted from the work of Muhammed Zaʿīm from the year 1542 onwards

Bibliography Babinger, G O W, p 20, 98 sq, 193, where further references are given (W Bjorkman)

AL-MUHAMMADĪYA, a name of several heretical schools, notably the ultra-Shīʿī Muhammadīya

As the example of the Kaisānīya [q v] shows, at an early date some Shīʿīs transferred the imāmate to ʿAlids who were not descendants of the Prophet's daughter Fātima and then to those who were not ʿAlids at all The Mansūrīya revered such an one in Abū Mansūr al ʿIdjlī, whom Yūsuf b ʿOmar al-Thakafī, governor of the ʿIrāk, executed in the reign of the Caliph Hishām, i e before 125 (743) Abū Mansūr, rejected by the Imām Djaʿfar al-Sādik for Shīʿī exaggeration, thrust the ʿAlids aside by still further increasing this tendency Muhammad's family, he said, was heaven, the Shīʿa the earth and he himself the "fragment falling from heaven" mentioned in Sūra lii 44, as he had been personally touched and taught by God on a journey to heaven, he is said to have abolished the religious laws While one group, the Husainīya, recognised the Imām in his son al-Husain after the death of Abū Mansūr, another, the Muhammadīya, recognised Muhammad b ʿAbd Allāh b al Hasan b al-Hasan b ʿAlī b Abī Tālib He is the pretender celebrated as al-Nafs al-zakīya ("the pure soul"), who in 145 (762) fell at Medīna fighting the troops of the ʿAbbāsid Caliph al-Mansūr The Muhammadīya quoted as authority for the recognition of an ʿAlid again an alleged testamentary disposition of Abū Mansūr and compared the following order of succession testament of the Husainid Muhammad Bākir for Abū Mansūr and of the latter for the Hasanid Muhammad b ʿAbd Allāh, with the Jewish line first Moses, then Joshua, son of Nun, then the sons of Aaron (the later priesthood is meant) This arrangement was chosen in both cases so that conflict might not arise between the two lines of brothers (batnān) — We cannot be certain that the Muhammadīya formed a definite sect The name rather records the fact that the rising of al-Nafs al-Zakīya, which was of great extent, attracted all circles of the Shīʿa to its ranks, even those who belonged to the Husainid camp, and members of the Mughīrīya, the followers of Mughīra b Saʿīd, killed in the year 119 (737) by Yūsuf b ʿOmar's predecessor Khālid b ʿAbd Allāh al-Kasrī, probably under the leadership of Djābir b Yazīd al Djuʿfī, supported al Nafs al Zakīya with their good wishes at least

Quite a different group is the ultra-Islāmic Muhammadīya or Mīmīya It took its name from the belief in the divinity of the Prophet Muhammad in reply to an ʿUlyānīya or ʿAinīya who regarded ʿAlī as God Its principal representative al Faiyād b ʿAlī was executed between 279 (892) and 289 (902)

The Khāridjī Muhammadīya was a separate party within the strictly Khāridjī sub-group of the ʿAdjārida, it is called after a certain Muhammad b Zurak

Bibliography al-Ashʿarī, Makālāt al-Islāmiyin, ed H Ritter, Constantinople 1928, I 8 sq, 22 sq, as-Baghdādī, al-Fark bain al Firak, Cairo 1328, p 42 sq, 214 sq, 234 sq, Ibn Hazm, al Fisal fi 'l Milal, Cairo 1317—21, IV 186 sq, cf al-Idjī, Mawākif, ed Soerensen, Leipzig 1848, p 353 sq, Masʿūdī, Murūdj, ed B de Meynard, cf Index, J Friedländer, The Heterodoxies of the Shiites, in J A O S, xxviii und xxix, cf Index, Th Haarbrucker (on Shahrastānī's) Religionsparteien und Philosophenschulen, II 409 (R Strothmann)

MUHAMMARA, a town and port at the head of the Persian Gulf and in the Persian province of ʿArabistān It lies on the right bank of the Haffār channel (formerly called Nahr Bayān) which connects the Kārūn river with the Shatt al-ʿArab The original village from which the town grew appears to have lain on the left bank of the channel, on the island of ʿAbbādān [q v], and Muhammara is probably therefore not to be identified with the town of Bayān, though it now lies on the same site Further, Bayān was included in ʿIrāk ʿArabī by the geographers, whereas Muhammara, lying on ʿAbbādan island, was a part of Persia until the shifting of a channel threw the possession of the town into dispute between that country and Turkey By the treaty of Erzerum (1847) it was assigned to Persia, but though the government was nominally directed from Shushtar, it remained in reality in the hands of the Arab shaikh of the Čaʿb (or kaʿb) tribe, who were Shīʿīs From the fact that the Arab geographers ignore the town, at any rate under its present name (for references to Bayān see G Le Strange, below), it may be inferred that the place (? Muhrizī) was either of minor importance or of comparatively recent origin At the present time the port is of some importance for the trade of Persia, its principal article of commerce being dates, though it is also connected with the oil trade

Bibliography G Le Strange, The Lands of the Eastern Caliphate, p 48, S H Longrigg, Four Centuries of Modern Iraq, index, H G Rawlinson, Notes on Mohamrah and the Cha'ab Arabs, in P R G S, I 351 sqq, Yākūt, Mu'djam, IV 709 (R Ievy)

MUHĀRIB, the name of several Arab tribes (Wustenfeld, Register zu den geneal Tabellen, p 320 gives five of this name) of which the most important is that of the Muhārib b Khasafa b Kais ʿAilān (Wüstenfeld, Geneal Tabellen, D, 8) They do not however seem to have been of very great importance either in the Djāhilīya or in Islām, Ibn al-Kalbī only gives them two pages of his Djamharat al-Ansāb (Brit Mus MS, Add 23,297, fol 163b—165b) but these add considerably to the very meagre information in the Tabellen especially as regards the lines of ʿAlī b Djasr b Muhārib and of Badhāwa (sic) b Dhuhl b Tarīf b Khalaf b Muhārib A typical Bedouin tribe, the Muhārib lived in the mountainous region of southern Nadjd between Medīna and al-Yamāma (Wustenfeld, Register, p 320 following Ibn Kutaiba, Kitāb al Maʿārif, ed Wüstenfeld, p 41), several places in their territory are recorded in Yākūt's geographical dictionary (cf the index of tribes, s v) We know very little about their history before Islām, they were closely connected with other tribes of the great group of the Kais ʿAilān, like the Hawāzin, with whom they are said to have shared the worship of the idol Djihār (Yākūt, Mu'djam, ed Wüstenfeld, II 167, l 2—3 = Wellhausen, *Reste*², p 65 cf Tādj al-ʿArūs, III 115, l 7 from below), and especially the Ghatafān (notably their clan Tha'laba b Sa'd b Dhubyān) alongside of whom the clan of the al-Khudr b Tarif b Khalaf b Muhārib (the genealogy of the Tabellen is to be rectified in as much as al-Mālik is the name of al Khudr and not that of his father) fought the war known as the yawm al-huraka or yawm Dārat Mawdūʿ alluded to by the poet of the Dhubyān Husain b al Humām in some of his poems (cf al-Mufaddaliyāt, ed Lyall, Nrs XII and XCI and the commentary of Ibn al-Anbarī, with the passages quoted in the notes)

The Muhārib at the beginning of Islām were hostile to Muhammad, this hostility was perhaps only the continuation of that which prevailed between the nomad tribes of the ʿĀliya of al-Nadjd and the citizens of Madina Thus we find, in the early years of the Hidjra, that Muhammad sent against them (and against the Ghatafān) a series of expeditions, of the nature of raids and counter-raids rather than regular military enterprises (our sources give 30 or 40 men as the total of the Muslim forces), the details of their fighting are given in Caetani, Annali dell' Islām, I, p 537—538 (3 A H § 6), 596—597 (5 A H § 3), 689—690 (6 A H § 1), 694 (6 A H § 6) with reference to the sources utilised (we may add Ibn Sa'd, II/I 23—24, 43—44, 61—62) One part at least of the tribe must however have been attracted within the growing sphere of Muslim influence since we find Muhāribīs in the cavalry led by al-Zubair at the taking of Mecca (Caetani, Annali, II [8 A H § 390]) But it was only in 10 A H that the Muhārib sent their ambassadors to Muhammad and gave their formal adhesion to Islām (Ibn Sa'd, I/II 43, cf Caetani, Annali, II 344—345), even on this occasion they were conspicuous by their uncouthness, quite Bedouin, of which another example is given in the anecdote of the Muhāribī (he is said to have been called Suwā' b al-Hārith or b Kais) who dared to doubt the Prophet's word in connection with the purchase of a horse (cf Ibn Sa'd, IV 2, 90—91 etc, and Caetani, Annali, IX 627—628)

The Muhārib abandoned Islām during the Ridda but were easily brought back to obedience (Annali, II, p 594, 596, 11 A H §§ 115, 118), they took part in the conquest of the ʿIrāk (Ibn Hadjar, Isāba, Cairo 1325, IV 20—21 biography of ʿĀ'idh b Sa'īd, who fought at al Kādisīya and Djālūlā and again, in 36 and 37, at the battle of the Camel and that of Siffīn, where he was slain), they were encamped at Kūfa in the same quarter as the Usad and Ghatafān, not far from that allotted to the Tamīm (Tabarī, I 2490, 2495)

The contribution of the Muhārib to the politics and literature of Arabia is practically nil, we need only mention the name of Lakīt b Bukair b al-Nadr (d 190), who belonged to a branch of the Banū ʿAlī b Djasr b Muhārib, a poet (cf Tabarī, III 540), ascetic and historian (Fihrist, p 94 and Yākūt, Irshād, ed Margoliouth, VI 218—220, give a list of his works, relating mainly to literary history)

Of the other tribes bearing the name of Muhārib the best known is the Meccan tribe of the Muhārib b Fihr to which al Dahhāk b Kais belonged [q v], the Muhārib lampooned by al-Farazdak and celebrated by Djarīr (Nakā'id, ed Bevan, p 817 l 4, 1039 l 2) are difficult to identify it is not certain, although they are so identified in the index, that they were the Muhārib b Khasafa

Bibliography given in the article (G Levi Della Vida)

AL-MUHARRAM (A), the first month of the Muhammadan year The name is originally not a proper name but an adjective, as the article shows, qualifying Safar In the pre-Muhammadan period the first two months of the old Meccan year were Safar [q v] I and II, which is reflected in the dual "a potion" al-Safarāni for al Muharram and Safar, in the old Arab year the first half year consisted of "three months of two months each" (Wellhausen), as the two Safars were followed by two Rabī's and two Djumādās The first of the two Safars, as the one that belonged to the sacred months, was given the adjectival epithet al-muharram which gradually became the name of the month itself As Dhu 'l-Hidjdja also belonged to the sacred months, three of the four sacred months came together except in leap year The month intercalated to equate the year to the solar year was inserted after Dhu 'l Hidjdja and was not sacred It thus came about that learned Muslims described the intercalation as renaming the Muharram concerned Safar, i e as making Muharram not sacred, they mean that the month after the pilgrimage, which they consider as al-Muharram, following the custom, is not sacred i e is "Safar" and the second month i e in their view Safar, is "al-Muharram" In doing this they of course overlook the fact that Safar proper now only comes third, but when the intercalary month was abolished in Islām, the proper conception of the state of affairs was lost [cf NASĪ']

In the early period when an attempt was made to equate with the solar year by inserting intercalary months, — which was not successful on account of the ignorance of the old Arabs in astronomical matters — al-Muharram introduced the winter half year as the names of the first six months show The Arab year began, like the Jewish, in autumn After Muhammad had forbidden the insertion of the intercalary months in Sūra ix 37, 1st Muharram, the beginning of the year, went through all the seasons as the year, which now consisted of 12 lunar months, had always only 354 or 355 days, as it still has Whether the first month of the year was originally marked by a festival we do not know Wellhausen has endeavoured to show that the ḥaḍjdj originally fell in the first month of the year, so that Muharram was ḥarām in its quality as "Dhu 'l-Ḥidjdja" This also suggests that there was originally only one sacred month, but it was observed at different times in different parts of Arabia Muhammad in the Kur'ān always speaks only of the sacred month (ii 194, 217, v 2, 97), only in Sūra ix 36 in laying down the method of reckoning time does he speak of four sacred months, in which it was sought to recognise a later declaration of the equal sanctity of four different sacred months of different districts, which was however illusory, as within Islām the peace of God reigns without this and, according to Sūra ii 217, the defence of the faith takes preference over the sacred month What the sacred month referred to in the Kur'ān is, we do not know, in Sūra v 2, at any rate, the month of the pilgrimage must be meant, which fits Wellhausen's theory excellently The commentators think Radjab or Dhu 'l Ka'da is meant, at any rate not al-Muharram

Al-Muharram has 30 days of which, in addition to the 1st as the beginning of the year, the following are specially noted the 9th as the fast-day of the Shī'ī ascetics, the 10th as the anniversary of Kerbelā' (60 = 680), on which al-Ḥusain b 'Alī b Abī Tālib [q v] fell fighting against the Caliph Yazīd b Mu'āwiya and therefore the great day of mourning of the Shī'a (on the significance of the 10th Muharram for the Sunnis see 'ĀSHŪRĀ'), celebrated by pilgrimages to the sacred places of the Shī'a, especially to Kerbelā' [see MESHHED HUSAIN], in which the passion play, representing the death of 'Alī's sons [see TA'ZIYA], plays the most important part, also the 16th as the day of the selection of Jerusalem as the Kibla [q v] and the 17th as the day of the arrival of the "people of the elephant" (Sūra cv)

Bibliography Wellhausen, Reste arab Heidentums[2] (1897), p 94—101, Moberg, An-Nasi' (Koran IX, 37) in der islamischen Tradition (Lunde Universitets Årsskrift, N F, Avd 1, vol xxvii, N° 1) [1931], Buhl, Das Leben Muhammeds (1930), p 57, note 129, p 350 sq (p 350, line 7 from below, read intercalary month, for day), al-Bīrūnī, Āthār, ed Sachau, p 60, 62, 196, 201, 328 sqq, al-Kazwīnī, 'Adjā'ib al-Makhlūkāt, ed Wüstenfeld, p 66, 68 (where further events that happened on the 10th Muharram are given), on the "people of the elephant" cf Buhl, op cit, p 12 sq

(M PLESSNER)

MUḤĀSIBĪ ABŪ 'ABD ALLĀH ḤĀRITH B ASAD AL-'ANAZĪ, called Muḥāsibī, i e "he who examines his conscience", was born in Basra, he died in Baghdād in 243 (857) A legist of the Shāfi'ī school, a theologian who advocated the use of reason ('akl), using the dialectic vocabulary of the Mu'tazilīs, which he was the first to turn against them, he finally adopted a life of ascetic renunciation after a moral conversion long meditated which is described at the beginning of his Wasāyā Involved with the Mu'tazilis in a general persecution as a result of Ibn Hanbal's attack on the dialecticians, he had to give up all teaching in 232 (846) and died in retirement

His principal works are Ri'āya li-Ḥukūk Allāh, Waṣāyā (more accurately Nasā'ih), Kitāb al-Tawahhum, Mā'iyat al 'Akl wa Ma'nāhu, Risālat al-'Azama, Fahm al-Salāt, none of them is yet printed The Dawā' dā' al-Nufūs, which Sprenger attributes to him, is of an earlier date, it was arranged by his chief teacher Ahmad b 'Āsim Antākī

Muḥasibī is the first Sunni mystic whose works reveal a complete theological education, they combine in a very original way a keen concern for exact philosophical definitions, and a fervid reverence for the most naive traditions with the rigorous search for an increasing moral purification

In his Ri'āya he discards the foundations of that "method" of introspection which Antākī had envisaged, he shows that a correlation is possible between two series of human happenings, the external actions of the members and the intentions of the hearts (against this 'Allāf and the majority of contemporary mutakallimūn), he proves in detail that the enchainment of the states of conscience (aḥwāl) can be guided progressively towards a perfect purity, provided an ascetic and moral rule of life is observed, the true rahbāniya mentioned in Sūra lvii 27

His adversaries (muḥaddithūn), especially Hanbalīs, attacked him for having differentiated the concepts of 'ilm and 'akl (parable of the "sower"), imān and ma'rifa (like Ibn Karrām), admitted the created character of the lafz (our pronunciation of Kur'ānic verses), held that the elect, in Paradise, would be summoned to enjoy directly familiarity with the divine being, chosen his references from authors not by following the formal correctness of their isnāds, but on account of their intrinsic significance, from their moral weight ('ibra), for the reader

The Ri'āya is his main work, it forms in 61 chapters, in the shape of advices given to a pupil, a complete manual of the inner life Ghazālī used it before writing his Iḥyā', and in spite of periodical attacks, its reputation among Arabic-speaking Muslim mystics lasted for a long time and may be compared with that of the Imitatio Jesu Christi among Christian mystics using Latin, the Shādhilīya brotherhood, with Mursī, Ibn 'Abbād Rundī and Zarrūk Burnūsī, have always recommended its use, and one of them, 'Izz al-Dīn Makdisī, has made a summary of it

The Ash'arī theologians also esteem Muḥāsibī as a precursor

Bibliography Hudjwīrī, Kashf al-Maḥdjūb, ed Zhukovski, Leningrad 1926, p 134, 219, transl Nicholson, in G M S, 1911, p 108, 176, Ghazālī, Munkidh, ed Cairo, p 28—29, Sam'ānī, Kitāb al-Ansāb, in G M S, 1912, fol 509b sqq, Subkī, Tabakāt, ii 37–42, Leo Africanus, Descrittione dell' Africa, Venice 1550, book iii, § 43, Margoliouth, Third Internat Congr of Orientalists, Oxford 1908, i 292–293, L Mas-signon, Essai sur les origines de la mystique musulmane, Paris 1922, p 210–225 and 126–127, do, Passion d'al-Hallaj, index, s v, do, Textes inedits concernant la mystique musulmane, Paris 1929, p 16—23, and add

(L MASSIGNON)

MUHIBB AL-DĪN [See AL TABARĪ]

AL-MUHIBBĪ, a family of scholars in Damascus of the xth—xiith (xvith—xviith) centuries of which three members distinguished themselves in literature

1 Muhibb al-Dīn Abu 'l-Fadl Muhammad b Abī Bakr b Dāwūd b ʿAbd al-Rahmān b ʿAbd al-Khālik b Muhibb al-Dīn ʿAbd al-Rahmān b Takī al-Dīn al-ʿUlwānī al-Hamawī al-Dimashkī al-Hanafī, born in the middle of Ramadān 949 (Dec 23, 1542) in Hamāt, studied there, in Halab and Hims and after a journey to Constantinople obtained a post as teacher in the Madrasa al-Kudāʿīya in Damascus In 978 (1571) he accompanied the Shaikh al-Islām and Chief Kādī Čiwī Zāde to Cairo, was for a period a kādī there and after a second journey to Constantinople was appointed kādī in Hims, Maʿarrat al-Nuʿmān and several other towns of northern Syria In 993 (1585) the post of a chief nāʾib (al-niyāba al-kubrā) was given to him, at the same time he was military judge, judge of the Syrian caravan, taught in several madrasas and gave fatwās at the Sultān's request He died on the 23rd Shawwāl 1016 (Feb 18, 1608) Of his numerous writings only three have survived his commentary written in 969 (1561) (according to al-Muhibbī, iii 322, on the other hand, prepared at the age of 16) on Muhammad b al Shihna's (d 815 = 1412) Urdjūza al-Bayānīya (Manzūma fī 'l-Maʿānī wa 'l Bayān) in the Berlin, Ahlwardt, Verz, N⁰ 7256—7257 and Gotha, Pertsch, N⁰ 2789 MSS, his Travels, al Rihla or Hādī 'l Azʿān al-Nadjdīya ila 'l-Diyār al-Misrīya, in the Paris, Cat de Slane, N⁰ 2293, Cairo, Fihrist, vii 646, Stambul, ʿĀtif Efendi, N⁰ 2030 (s Rescher, in MFOB, v 496) MSS, which he wrote when kādī in Maʿarrat al Nuʿmān, and his commentary written in 1011 (1602) on the authoritative verses in Zamakhsharī's Kashshāf entitled Tanzīl al-Āyāt, pr Būlāk 1281, Cairo 1307—1308, and on the margin of Kashshāf, ibid, 1318

Bibliography al-Muhibbī, Khulāsat al-Athar, ii 322—331, Wüstenfeld, Die Gelehrten familie Muhibbī in Damaskus, in Abh G W Gott, Hist -Phil Cl, xxx/iii, 1884, p 5—9

2 His grandson Fadl Allāh b Muhibb Allāh b Muhibb al Dīn was born on the 17th Muharram 1031 (Dec 2, 1621) in Damascus, at an early age showed great linguistic ability, received in 1048 (1638) from Nadjma al-Dīn al-Ghazzī (d 1061 = 1651), (see Brockelmann, G A L, ii 292) the idjāza for Hadīth, and after failing to secure something in Halab through the Shaikh al Islām Muhammad b Zakarīyā, was given by his father the latter's post at the Derwīshīya In 1051 (1641) he accompanied Muhammad ʿIsmatī to Constantinople, was appointed to the Madrasa Arbaʿīn there, but dismissed a year later, when he returned home In 1059 (1649) he accompanied the kādī Muhammad b ʿAbd al-Halīm al-Bursawī to Egypt and became his deputy After a quarrel with him, he resumed his studies in al-Azhar and came home next year In 1073 (1662) he again went to Constantinople and four years later was appointed kādī of Bairūt but returned to Damascus in 1079 where he died on 23rd Djumādā II, 1082 (Oct 27, 1671) While his own Dīwān and his description of his journeys to Constantinople have not been preserved, his edition of the poems of his friend Mandjak Pasha (d. 1080 = 1669 in Damascus) are still in existence He first of all arranged them chronologically, beginning with a poem on Sultān Ibrāhīm I of the year 1055 (1645) (in addition to the MSS mentioned in Brockelmann, G A L, ii 277 there are now Koprulü, ii 1245 and Mōsul, Dāwūd, Makhtūtāt, N⁰ 153, 20), then alphabetically, including poems of a later period down to 1071 (1660), this edition was printed at Damascus in 1301 In 1078 (1667) he edited the biographical work of al-Hasan al-Būrīnī (d 1024 = 1615), Tarādjim al Aʿyān min Abnāʾ al Zamān and published it with a supplement, we may add to the MSS mentioned by Brockelmann, G A L, ii 290 Muhammad Kurd ʿAlī, in R A A D, iii, 1923, p 193—202

Bibliography Muhibbī, op cit, iii 277–286, Wustenfeld, op cit, p 15—19

3 His son Muhammad al-Amīn b Fadl Allāh b Muhibb Allāh b Muhammad Muhibb al-Dīn al-Dimashkī, born in 1061 (1651) in Damascus, went with his father in 1077 (1666) to Bairūt but returned home several times from there A friend of his father's, Muhammad b Lutf Allāh b Bairām al ʿIzzatī, who had been kādī in Damascus in 1065 (1655) and was military judge in Anatolia in 1078 (1668), provided him with funds to study in Brusa He returned home after a brief stay there on 8th Safar 1086 (May 4, 1675) in company with the muftī Muhammad b ʿAbd al Halīm Al-ʿIzzatī had in the meanwhile been appointed military judge in Adrianople and was able to procure him a post there But his patron fell ill soon after wards and had to resign Muhammad accompanied him to Stambul and looked after him till his death on 10th Shawwāl 1092 (Oct 24, 1681) He then returned to Damascus and began to write When in 1101 (1690) he had made the pilgrimage to Mecca, he was appointed deputy kādī and then a teacher in the Amīnīya in Damascus He died there on the 18th Djumādā I 1111 (Nov 11, 1699)

His principal work is a collection of 1,289 biographies of scholars, poets etc of his time and the period immediately preceding it arranged in alphabetical order, entitled Khulāsat al-Athar fī Aʿyān al Karn al hādī ʿashar, the first fair copy of which he finished in 1096 (1685) (printed Cairo 1284, 4 vols) The draft of a number of biographies from the Hidjāz and Yemen, which is preserved in the Brill Houtsma MS, N⁰ 112 appears to be part of the preliminary work on this collection, the draft of a synopsis is in Berlin (Ahlwardt, N⁰ 9895) A synopsis was prepared by ʿAlī b ʿAbd al-Hadjdj al-Ghazzī al-ʿĀmirī (d 1191 = 1777, Murādī, iii 215), MS in Tübingen (Seybold, N⁰ 9) A second great biographical work on celebrities of all ages entitled al-Iʿlām was to give under each letter al-aʿlām wa 'l-nisab wa 'l-kunā wa 'l-abnāʾ wa 'l-nisāʾ wa 'l-ummahāt separately In the draft in Leipzig (Vollers, N⁰ 683) giving the letter mīm the sources, which from the articles are taken usually word for word, are generally quoted He also wrote a continuation of al-Khafādjī's Rashānat al-Alibbāʾ entitled Nafhat al-Rashāna wa-Rashhat Ṭilāʾ al Hāna, which survives, in addition to the MSS quoted by Brockelmann, G A L, ii 294, in Stambul, Nūr-i ʿOthmānīya, N⁰ 4352 (M S O S, xv 22) and Mōsul, Dāwūd, Makhtūtāt,

N⁰ 264, 7, an anonymous selection from it called Mukhtārāt is in Cairo, *Fihrist*², iii 342 A supplement (dhail) to it was written by Muḥammad b Muḥammad al Su'ālātī in 1111 (1699), MSS in Berlin, Ahlwardt, N⁰ 7422, Copenhagen, Mehren, N⁰ 170, St Petersburg, As Mus, N⁰ 251, Brit Mus, Or 6516 (Descript List, N⁰ 57), Yale-Landberg, N⁰ 179, Damascus, Zaiyāt, N⁰ 78, 64 A companion work of the middle of the xi^th century is ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b Shāshū's Tarādjim baʿd al-Aʿyān min Ahl Dimashk min ʿUlamāʾihā wa Udabāʾihā, pr Beirūt 1886 His Diwān, mainly kaṣidas on friends and patrons, which are as a rule also included in his Khulāṣa, is preserved in the autograph copy in the library of A Taimūr in Cairo, s R A A D, iii 342, and the Berlin MS, Ahlwardt, N⁰ 8007, cf N⁰ 8008, Flügel, Z D M G, ix 224 In the Urdjūza Baʿḍāhat al-Arwāḥ fī ʿilal al Surūr wa 'l-Afrāḥ, Berlin, N⁰ 8162 he collected sayings and proverbs Al-Tha'ālibī's Kitāb Thimār al Kulūb fi 'l Mudāf wa 'l-Mansūb was arranged alphabetically by him as Mā yuʿawwalu ʿalaihi fi 'l Mudāf wa 'l-Mudāf ilaihi, MS in Stambul, Top Kapu, N⁰ 2455, ʿĀtif Efendi, N⁰ 2247 (see R S O, iv 727), Aya Sofia, N⁰ 4136 (M S, vii 132), Cairo, *Fihrist*², iii 285 The monograph on grammar Dhany al-Dhan natain fī Nawʿaʾ 'l-Muthannayain is preserved in a MS belonging to A Taimūr Pasha (R A A D, iii 340, iv 147) and printed in Damascus 1348 The lexicological work Sawāʾ al-Sabīl fī-mā fi 'l-Lugha al-ʿarabiya min al Dakhīl is preserved in a Damascus MS, see R A A D, iii 340

Bibliography al-Murādī, Silk al-Durar, iv 86—91, Wustenfeld, Geschichtschreiber, N⁰ 590, do, Die Gelehrtenfamilie Muḥibbi, p 19—28 (C BROCKELMANN)

MUḤIBBĪ. [See SULAIMĀN I]

MUHĪṬ [See BAHR MUHĪṬ]

MUHR (P, Sanskrit मुद्रा), seal, signet or signet-ring Pronounced in Persian mohr and mohr and in Turkish muhur with the second vowel disjunctive and unstable or popularly mohur (Hindoglou, Aucher, Ciakciak and Holdermann) or even, according to Viguier, mihir The word has been arabicised in the form of barbarous derivatives like tamhīr "action of sealing" and mamhūr (synonym muhurlu) "sealed, hidden"

Muslim legend, according to Mouradgea d'Ohsson (vii 121), traces the use of seals to Lāhuk, vizier of Lātis, son and successor of the Pharaoh of Moses (cf Carra de Vaux, L'abrege des merveilles, p 387, in contradiction with Genesis, xli 42)

In the article KHĀTAM are given useful references to the use of seals among the Arabs and also among Turks and Persians and the coin of this name is dealt with under MOHUR Here we shall deal more particularly with the word muhr as a complement to that article We have not however to forget that this word muhr was used by the Persians and Turks either alongside of khātam or in place of it, to express also ideas taken directly from the Arabs, as in the phrase muhr-i Suleimān or muhr i Djem "seal of Solomon" (also the name of a plant) or muhr-i nūbuwwet "the famous mark of a prophet which appeared on Muḥammad's back"

The Shāhnāma regards the seal (muhr, with its synonym of ring or nigīn, the two words sometimes appear together muhr-i nigīn, vi 51, verse 557 of Mohl's edition) as an attribute of sovereignty, like the crown and throne It is the same when sovereignty is delegated to governors (vi, p 5, v 1, cf i, p 499, v 163, iii, p 421, v 111, vii, p 459, v 374, p 463, v 418) There is a reference in the same poem to seals of amber (i, p 545, v 692) such as actually existed (cf Reinaud, Mon, i 129) They were sometimes steeped in Chinese musk (vi, p 351, v 2288)

In Turkey the seal was again the emblem of power The imperial seal (muhr-i humāyūn) was handed to the grand vizier, hence also called sāhib i muhr [cf SADR AʿZAM], with great solemnity (cf M d'Ohsson, vii 120), and Naʿīmā (iv 430) in speaking of ambition to become grand vizier uses the phrase muhur arzusu ("desire for the seal")

We may mention here that according to d'Ohsson (ibid), the sultān had four seals with a tughra, set in rings, one was square and remained in his possession, he entrusted the others which were round, to the Grand Mistress or Lady Treasurer of the Harem (khazna-dār) and to the khāss oda-bashi, a white eunuch who at one time held the office of first chamberlain

The seal was changed at each accession of a new monarch (cf Naʿimā, i 117) as was the tughra itself Ewliyā Čelebi's statement, which implies the contrary, is therefore rather strange (vii 300, v 4 from below) In Persia the seal was retained but the name was changed [cf KHĀTAM]

The grand vizier produced the imperial seal on the dīwān days for the cawush bashi to seal the bag (kise) for the registers of the rūznāma and the archives of the Finance Department or māliye defter khānesi, the Treasury (khazīne) and the general Archives (defter khāne) (M T M, 499) The grand vizier also had, like all the viziers or governors of provinces, two other seals, one, a large one, impressed at the top of buyuruldu or "ordinances", and the other, a small and modest one, placed at the foot of letters from the vizier, including official ones (cf Ahmad Rāsim, ʿOthm Tārikhi, iii 1514)

The use of seals in Turkey (we know very little of those of the Saldjūks, cf Reinaud, Mon, i 121 note) was exceedingly widespread They were used for impressions in wax (muhur mumu) and for stamping in a particular kind of ink to which saliva was added, as in Persia (cf I e Père Raphael du Mans, p 129) In more modern times the seal was carried in the purse (cf a verse by Mehmed ʿĀkif in his poem Seifi Baba) It is only recently that under the influence of the west the muhur has been displaced by the signature It must have received its coup de grâce with the recent adoption of the Roman alphabet and of rubber seals

The industry of seal engraving has thus been gradually disappearing It had at one time reached a high degree of perfection and the artists used to sign their work These signatures were usually very brief, Mithli, Sāʿi, Ahmad etc They were written in characters so minute that they could only be distinguished with a lens and only when very clearly engraved Quite a study could be written on these artists

Ewliyā Čelebi gives the following information about the seal engravers of Istanbul (i 575) He distinguishes

1 Engravers on stone, hakīkīākīān, 105 workmen in 30 shops They engraved on stones such as

agate, garnet, turquoise and jasper Their patron saint or pīr was ʿAbd Allāh Yamanī, a disciple of Uwais al-Karanī who is buried in Taʿizz

2 The engravers of muhur muhurkʿenān who worked especially for the viziers, 80 workmen in 50 shops Their pīr was the Caliph ʿOthmān In the reign of Murād IV the most noted were Mahmūd Čelebi, Rizā Čelebi and Ferīd Čelebi, who charged from 100 to 500 piastres for their work

3 The engravers of silver seals and talismans muhurkʿenān-i sīm u-heyākil, 40 workmen in 15 shops Pīr ʿUkkāsha who is buried near Marʿash, who, having seen on the Prophet's back the muhr-i nubuwwet (cf above), began to engrave talismanic formulae (two of these are quoted) These workmen "cannot engrave Yemen agate" They were established in the area called Seyisḳhāneler

We may still mention the custom of making partisans, whose loyalty one wished to be sure of, stamp their seals on a Kurʾān (Kurʾān muhurletmek), cf in the Turkish papers of June 8, 1925, statements by a rebel Kurd

The word memhūr in the old language of the Janissaries meant vouchers for their pay (M d'Ohsson, VII 337)

In figurative language Persian and Turkish uses the expression "to break the seal" muhr berdaṣhten, muhur almak (or bozmak, acmak, gʿotuı mak) for "to deflower a virgin" [cf further thh art IAMGHA]

The MUHRDĀR (mohrdāı), Turk muhurdār [cf the article KHĀTAM], keeper of the seals or better "private secretary" (cf below), was therefore a very important personage Mir ʿAlī Shir Newāʾi was the mohrdār of Husain Baikara before becoming dīwān begi and first minister (cf Belin, Notice sur Mir , 1861, p 13, cf de Sacy, N E, IV 282, 261) He was succeeded in these offices by another poet, Merwārīdī (ibid) — On the mohrdār in Persia, cf Le Pere Raphael du Mans, p 21 In Central Asia the title of muhrdār seems to have replaced' that of tamghači which occurs as early as the Orkhon inscriptions

In Turkey, each vizier had his muhurdār (Ahmad Rāsim, ʿOthm Tārikhi, I 455) Cf the account of the career of a muhurdār in the Sidjill i ʿothmānī, II 31 below (Behdjet Pasha [the same as is mentioned in the Memoirs of Saʿid Pasha, I 4])

The rūznāmedji had also their own muhurdārs (J Deny, Sommaire des archives turques du Caire, p 136) At Kādī Kʿoy there exists a quarter called Muhurdār For the work bearing the title Murhudār Tārikhi, cf Babinger, G O W, p 216 sq

With the viceroys of Egypt the muhurdār was a "private secretary" of the Khedive The title of muhurdār was abolished in 1884 but the office has remained His salary was the same as that of the chief of the cabinet (cf ibid, p 92 and 476)

Bibliography Cf the article KHĀTAM We may now add Babinger, Das Archiv des Bosmaken Osman Pacha, Berlin 1931, p 23 and note 5, where reference is made to a little known article by Riza Efendi Mudezirovic Cf also von Hammer, Hist de l'Empire Othoman, XII 425, 539, XVI 2 (J DENY)

MUḤSIN ʿALĪ, son of Shāh Husain Hakīkat, was an inhabitant of Lucknow In poetry he was the pupil of Khwādja Wazīr He flourished in the latter part of the XIXth century He is the author of a Dīwān, a collection of lyrical poems, and a biography of Urdū poets called Sarāpā Sukhan

Bibliography Nassākh, Tadhkira-i Shuʿarāʾ (Lucknow 1874), p 419

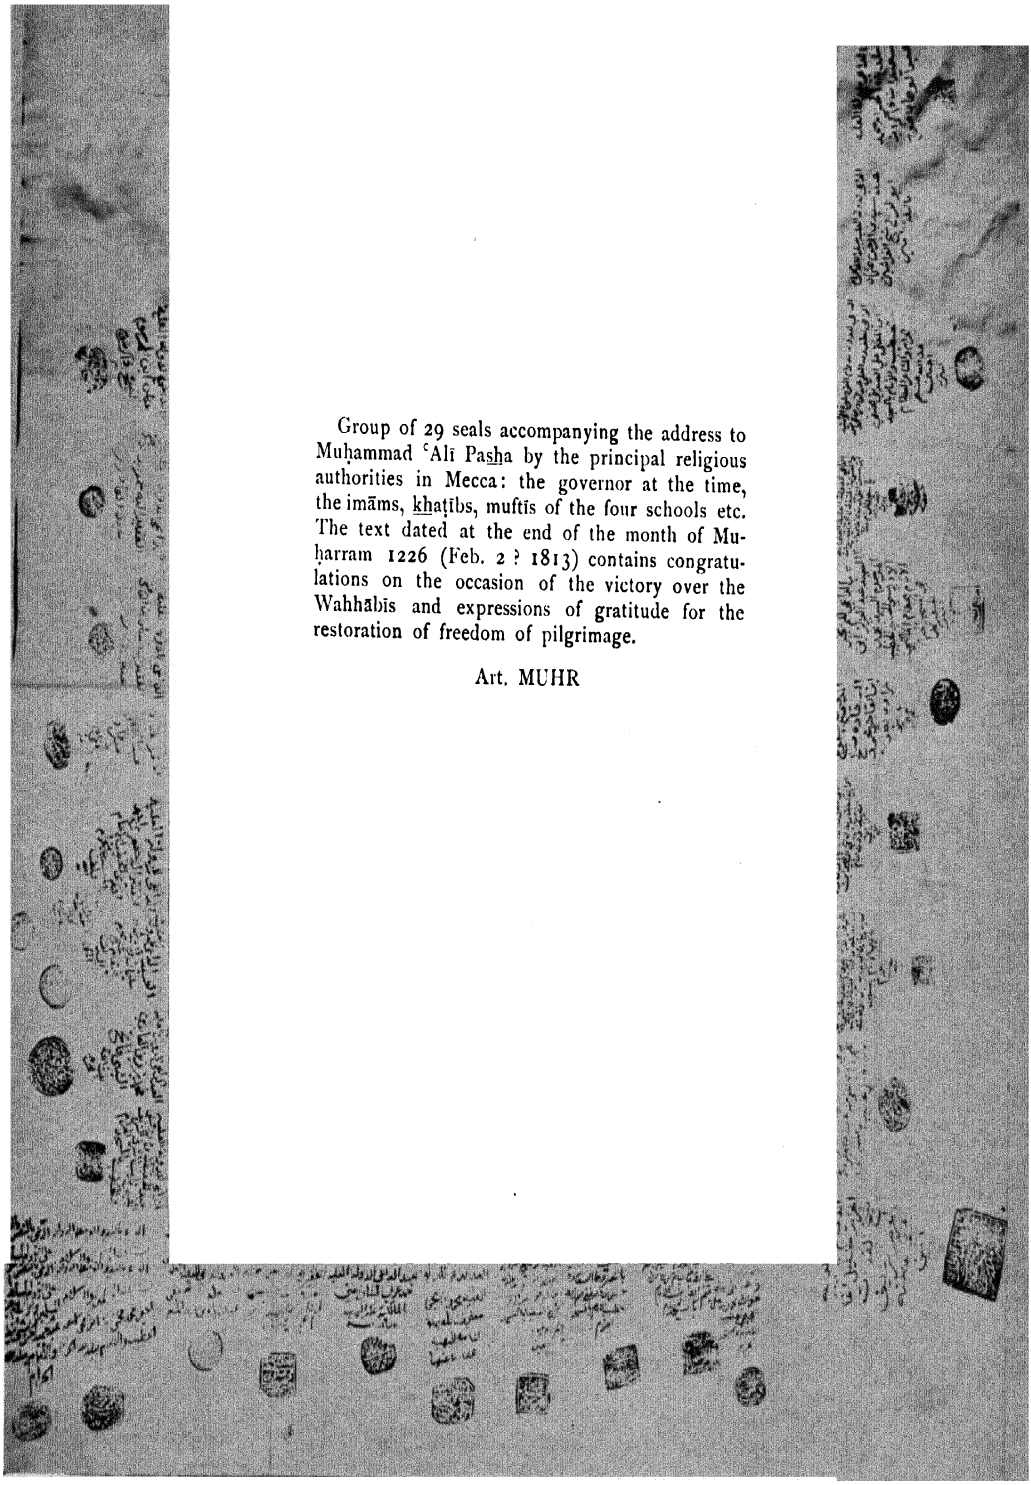
(M HIDAYET HOSAIN)

AL-MUHTADĪ, ABŪ ʿABD ALLĀH MUHAMMAD, an ʿAbbāsid caliph After al Wāthik's death, a number of officials wished to pay homage to the young Muhammad, son of the deceased caliph and a Greek slave, instead however, al-Wāthik's brother was proclaimed his successor and only after the deposition and murder of the unfortunate al-Muʿtazz (end of Radjab 255 = July 869) Muhammad ascended the throne with the name al-Muhtadī His ideal was the Umaiyad ʿUmar b ʿAbd al ʿAzīz Like the latter, he was distinguished for the strictness with which he conducted his life, with piety and simplicity however, he combined strength and ability and during his brief reign he did his best to raise the caliphate from its degradation and to restore the power of the Commander of the Faithful In several provinces there were risings by ʿAlids, real or alleged, but the most dangerous enemy of the caliph was the Turkish general Mūsā b Bogha When the latter, who was fighting against the ʿAlids in Persia, heard of the accession of al Muhtadī, he returned home Reaching Sāmarrā in Muharram 256 (Dec 869) he forced the caliph to take an oath to bring to justice the Turkish chief Sālih b Wasīf, who had robbed the mother of the caliph al-Muʿtazz of all her priceless treasures When Sālih concealed himself, the Turkish mercenaries mutinied and were intending to depose al-Muhtadī but were appeased by the resolute action of the latter Al-Muhtadī then promised Sālih's followers that he would pardon him, but as the latter did not appear, they went to Sāmarrā and began to pillage it until they were scattered by Mūsā Sālih was soon afterwards discovered and killed by one of Mūsā's men When Mūsā had taken the field against the Khāridjīs, al-Muhtadī began to incite the people against him and his brother Muhammad b Bogha and accused them of embezzlement Muhammad was brought to trial and put to death although al-Muhtadī had expressly guaranteed his pardon The only course left for the caliph was to dispose of Mūsā if he wished to keep his throne But his plan was betrayed, Mūsā advanced with superior forces and the caliph suffered a disastrous defeat As he declined to abdicate, he was murdered in Radjab 256 (June 870) in horrible fashion

Bibliography Ibn Kutaiba, Kitāb al-Maʿārif, ed Wustenfeld, p 200, Yaʿḳūbī, ed Houtsma, II 590 sq, 616—619, Tabarī, III 1368, 1372, 1537, 1712—1834, Masʿūdi, Murūdj, ed Paris, VII 398 sq , VIII 1—41, Kitāb al-Aghānī, XX 64–69, Ibn al-Athīr, ed Tornberg, VII 23, 134—138, 149—162, Ibn al-Tiktakā, al-Fakhrī, ed Derenbourg, p 335–341, Muhammad b Shākir, Fawāt al-Wafayāt, II 270 sq , Ibn Khaldūn, al-ʿIbar, III 296 sqq, Weil, Gesch d Chalifen, II 409—421, Müller, Der Islam im Morgen- und Abendland, I 529 sq , Muir, The Caliphate, its Rise, Decline, and Fall, new ed. by Weir, p 539—543 (K V ZETTERSTÉEN)

MUḤTASIB (A), "censor", an officer appointed by the caliph or his wazīr to see that the religious precepts of Islām are obeyed, to detect offences and punish offenders His office was the hisba, and to it only men of good standing could, in theory, be appointed Like all



Group of 29 seals accompanying the address to Muḥammad ʿAlī Pasha by the principal religious authorities in Mecca: the governor at the time, the imāms, khaṭībs, muftīs of the four schools etc. The text dated at the end of the month of Muḥarram 1226 (Feb. 2 ? 1813) contains congratulations on the occasion of the victory over the Wahhābīs and expressions of gratitude for the restoration of freedom of pilgrimage.

Art. MUHR

holders of public office, he had to be a Muslim and free Generally he was a fakīh, and in addition to his police functions he performed those of a magistrate In some respects his duties were parallel with those of the kādī, but the muhtasib's jurisdiction was limited to matters connected with commercial transactions, defective weights and measures, fraudulent sales and non-payment of debts Even in these matters he could hear only those cases in which the truth was not in doubt As soon as evidence had to be sifted and oaths administered the muhtasib's jurisdiction ceased As a censor he had power to enforce the law without first requiring complaint from an injured party He had to see that in a place where Muslims lived they did not neglect to hold a Friday service in the mosque and that if they numbered forty or more they formed themselves into an organised community But if the number was large and there were differences of opinion on the question of worshipping together, his authority might be disputed, and it was not within his power to compel the attendance of the individual Muslim at the mosque unless he was a persistent defaulter Even then the officer could do no more than admonish the delinquent So far as the mosque was concerned the muhtasib could insist on the adhān and he could examine the mu'adhdhin in the subject of the times lawful for the adhān If a public mosque fell into disrepair, the muhtasib was charged with the duty of calling the attention of the authorities to the matter

An important part of the muhtasib's duties was to see that the laws of the shar' were maintained Persons breaking the fast of Ramadān, widows and divorced women who did not observe the 'idda [q v] before remarriage, and other transgressors, were liable to have to make explanations before him Public morals, further, came under his jurisdiction He had to prevent men from consorting with women in public and from indulging openly in wine, also the playing of forbidden musical instruments came under his ban and he had to see that games and toys did not lead to offences against the shar' However, he could not act on suspicion alone nor had he the right to go behind closed doors to pursue his investigations His powers would appear to have been wider where the spiritual welfare of Muslims was concerned Thus if a fakīh propounded views contrary to idjmā' [q v] it was the muhtasib's duty to admonish him and to report him to the sovereign if he persisted in preaching heretical doctrines Also, if a person not a fakīh suddenly turned to the study of the fikh, the muhtasib had to make investigation in order to discover his motive and to prevent his misleading persons who might apply to him Schools also had to be visited by the muhtasib, though not so much for the purpose of inspecting the character of the teaching as to ensure that teachers did not beat their pupils too severely (Makrīzī, Khiṭaṭ, i 464) Other matters which came within his jurisdiction were concerned with public amenities rather than with morals or religious institutions Thus, in towns where the source of drinking-water was fouled or no provision was made for poor wayfarers he could order the townsmen to rectify matters He had to ensure that no house overlooked the women's quarters of another belonging to a Muslim and that no house had projecting rainspouts or drains leading on to the street to the inconvenience of wayfarers, and finally that the sūk was kept clean and clear of obstacles to traffic

Bibliography Māwardī, al-Ahkām al-sultāniya (ed Enger), p 420 sq , Tanūkhī, Nishwār al-Muhādara (ed Margoliouth), p 250, Makrīzī, Khiṭaṭ, i 463 sq , 'Abd al-Rahmān b 'Abd Allāh al Shāfi'ī, Nihāyat al-Rutba fī Talab al-Hisba (British Museum, MS Or 9221), translated by Behrnauer, in JA, 5th series, vol xvi , p 347–392, vol xvii , p 1—76 — On muhāsaba and the muhtasib from the point of view of ethics and theology, see Ghazālī, Ihyā', part iv , book viii (R Levy)

AL-MUHYĪ [See Allāh, b 2]

MUHYI 'L-DĪN [See Ibn (al-)'Arabī]

MUHYI 'l DĪN MUHAMMAD (Mehmed) b 'Alā' al-Dīn 'Alī al-Djamālī, a Turkish theologian and historian of the time of Selim I (1512—1520) and Sulaimān I (1520—1566) His father was the famous muftī Zanbilī 'Alī al-Djamālī, a grandson of Djamāl al-Dīn Mehmed of Ak Serai (hence the epithet Djamālī) He received his theological training first from his maternal grandfather, Husām-Zāde Efendi, then from his father 'Alā' al Dīn and later from Mu'aiyad-Zāde Efendi He worked as mudeiris in several medreses, in Constantinople at the Murād medrese and at the eight schools of the Fātih mosque and in Adrianople where he was also a mollā for a period He died in retirement and was buried at Adrianople in 957 (1550), according to some, however, in 956 (1549)

His main importance lies in the fact that he edited the anonymous Ottoman chronicles, the Tewārikh i Āl-i 'Othmān, under the title Ta'rīkh-i Āl-i 'Othmān These chronicles which run from the beginning of the Ottoman empire were continued by him down to 956 (1549) i e till shortly before his death

Two versions of his Chronicle exist, both of which go back to him 1 a shorter one to which corresponds the translation of the Beck manuscript by Gaudier-Spiegel Chronica oder Acta von der Turckischen Tyrannen herkommen vnnd gefuhrte Kriegen, aus Turckischer Sprachen ver deutschet Vorhin nie in Druck ausgangen Frankfurt a/O 1567, it was also published in Latin and German by Leunclavius Annales Sultanorum Othmanidarum a Turcis sua lingua scripti, Frankfurt 1588, 2nd edition with index and German transl Newe Chronika Turckischer Nation von Turcken selbs beschrieben, Frankfurt a/Main 1590,

2 a longer version the so-called Verantian Chronicle (Codex Verantianus), edited in Latin and German by Leunclavius Historiae Musulmanae Turcorum de monumentis ipsorum exscriptae libri XVIII, Frankfurt 1591 There were 18 books instead of the 30 planned As early as 1590 the first three books were published in German at Frankfurt Neuwer Muselmannischer Histori, Turckischer Nation, von ihrem Herkommen, Geschichte vnd Taten, drey Bucher, die ersten vnter dreyssigen, followed by the complete German translation of the Annales Neuwer Musulmanischer Histori Turckischer Nation, Frankfurt a/M 1595

In addition to his chronicle, which exists only in manuscript (MSS in Vienna, Munich, Berlin, Gotha, London, Constantinople etc), Muhyī al-Dīn is also credited with poems in Turkish, Arabic and Persian (also extant in a manuscript) and a theological work

Bibliography Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, Kashf al-Ẓunūn, Constantinople 1311, p 218, Tashkoprizāde, Shakā'ik al-Nu'māniye, Constantinople 1269, p 389, transl by O Rescher, Constantinople 1927, p 247, Djamāl al-Dīn, 'Othmānlī Ta'rīkh we-Muwessesākhlerī (Ayīne-i Zurefā), Constantinople 1314, p 10 and 25, Rif'at, Rawdat al-'azīziye, p 180, Thuraiya, Sidjill-i 'othmānī, iii 488, Brusalī Mehmed Tāhir, 'Othmānlī Mu'ellifleri, iii 63, Babinger, G O W, p 72—74, J H Mordtmann, Isl, x 160, xiii 153 sqq, Carl Ausserer, ibid, xii 226 sqq, F Giese, M O G, i 49—75, P Wittek, ibid, i 77 sqq, see also the Catalogues of Manuscripts

(Th Menzel)

MUḤYĪ LĀRĪ (d 933 = 1526—1527), a Persian writer, author of the famous Futūḥ al-Haramain, a poetical description of the two holy cities, Mecca and Medina, which also contains a full account of all the rites of the obligatory pilgrimage (ḥadjdj)

This book, written in 911 (1506) and dedicated to Muzaffar b Mahmūd Shāh of Gudjarāt (917—932 = 1511—1526), was for a long time wrongly attributed to the celebrated poet 'Abd al Raḥmān Djāmī Muḥyī Lārī was a pupil of the great philosopher Muḥammad al Dawānī (d 907 = 1501) and made use of his extensive philosophical knowledge in a commentary on the great Kasīda of Ibn al-Fārid, which is known as al-Tā'īya al-kubrā In this work he endeavoured, following in the footsteps of his teacher, to reconcile the principles of orthodox Muhammadan mysticism with the teachings of Aristotle in the form in which they were disseminated in the east

Bibliography Rieu, Cat Pers MSS Brit Mus, ii 655a — Persian text of the Futūḥ al-Haramain lithographed Lucknow 1292 A full description of the contents in Wiener Jahresbuchern, lxxi, Anzeigeblatt p 49, Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, iv 385, H Ethé, Neupersische Literatur (Grundriss der iranischen Philologie, ii 306)

(E Berthels)

AL-MU'ĪD [See Allāh, b 2]

MU'ĪN AL-DĪN SULAIMĀN PARWĀNA, vice-regent of the Saldjūk empire in Asia Minor after the Mongol invasion of that territory His father Muhadhdhib al Dīn 'Alī al-Dailamī (in some sources, such as the Ta'rīkh-i Guzīda, Mu'īn al-Dīn is called "al-Kāshī", which implies origin from Kāshān) had been a minister during the reign of Kaikhusraw II and had been able, after the battle of Kose Dagh (1243), to secure for a time the continuation of the Saldjūk dynasty in Asia Minor, by his intercession with the Mongol general Baidjū (Ibn Bībī, p 243) His son Mu'īn al Dīn Sulaimān soon rose to hold important offices and had been commander of Tokat, and later of Tokat and Erzindjān, when, in 1256, he was promoted, by the favour of Baidjū, to the rank of parwāna The title parwāna denoted a high administrative office (high chancellor) in the Saldjūk empire and is erroneously explained by the Persian dictionaries as a synonym of farmān (the word is fully discussed in the foot-note on p 46 of Khalīl Edhem's article in T O E M, vol viii, cf also Huart, Les Saints, etc, i 80) At the time indicated the three sons of Kaikhusraw were nominally reigning, but Mu'īn al-Dīn was already the real director of affairs After Hūlāgū had appeared on the scene in 1260, the empire was divided into two parts, of which Rukn al Dīn Kīlidj Arslan got the eastern part with Parwāna as vizier at his side The latter had also a family connection with the dynasty, for he was married to a daughter of Kaikhusraw II, while one of his own daughters became the wife of the Saldjūk Ghiyāth al-Dīn Mas'ūd II As vizier of Rukn al-Dīn he conquered Sinope (Sīnūb) from the Greek emperor of Trebizond, the town was given to himself, and after his death some of his descendants continued to reign there (cf Sinūb and Tewhīd, Sinūbda Parwāne Zādeler, in T O E M, 1st year, p 203) In February 1265 Parwāna, warned that his sultān wanted to get rid of him, had him imprisoned and afterwards strangled at Ak-Serāy The two and a half years' old son of Rukn al-Dīn, Ghiyāth al-Dīn Kaikhusraw, was set up as a puppet-king During the following years, when Parwāna was, under the supervision of the Mongols, the real master in Eastern Anatolia, the wretched situation of the country induced many notable Turks to emigrate to Egypt, where they incited Sultān Baibars to a military expedition against the Mongol domination in their country It is highly probable that Mu'īn al Dīn Parwāna himself was secretly at the head of these negotiations Baibars invaded Asia Minor, defeated a Mongol army at Albistān and occupied the town of Kaisarīye in April 1277 Here he waited for Parwāna to join him, but the latter had lost his confidence in the enterprise and fled to Tokat with the young sultān Baibars returned again to Syria and soon a Mongol army appeared under the Ilkhān Abaka to inflict drastic punishment on the Muslim population, he is said to have killed over 200,000 people At the same time suspicion fell on Parwāna He was accused of having fled with his army at the battle of Albistān, of having not appeared before the Ilkhān after the defeat, and of having neglected to inform the Mongols of Baibars' approach At first Abaka was willing to spare him, but on the insistence of the relatives of those killed in the battle of Albistān, he ordered him to be executed at Ala Dagh, together with his retainers, probably on the 1st Rabī' I 676 (August 2, 1277) Ala Dagh is, according to Khalīl Edhem, probably the same as Kose Dagh, to the east of Siwās His burial place is not known A foundation inscription on a mosque built by Mu'īn al Dīn Parwāna in 663 (1264—1265) is still extant in Marzīfūn His death inspired several poets to make elegies on him (Munadjdjim Bashī) From the tradition of the Mawlawī order it appears that Parwāna was on intimate terms with Djalāl al Dīn Rūmī, the latter's work Fihi mā fihi was dedicated to him (cf Kropulu-Zāde M Fu'ād, Ilk Mutesawwifler, p 258)

Bibliography The Saldjūk nāme's of Ibn Bībī (Houtsma, Recueil, iv) and of Akserāyī (used in manuscript by modern authors), Rashīd al-Dīn, Djāmi' al-Tawārīkh, ed Blochet, Paris 1911, p 548, Hayton, in Historiens armeniens des Croisades, ii 179, al-Makrīzī, al-Sulūk li-Ma'rifat al-Mulūk, translated by Quatremère (1837—1844) and by Blochet, 1908, al-Nuwairī, Nihāyat al-Arab (used by Weil, Geschichte der Chalifen, iv), Abu 'l-Fidā', Ta'rīkh, Constantinople 1286, iv 10, Mustawfī, Ta'rīkh-i Guzīda, in G M S, 1910, p 484, Munadjdjim Bashī, Ṣahā'if al-Akhbār, ii 571—573, J von Hammer, Geschichte der Ilchane, Darmstadt 1842, i 299, Nedjīb 'Āsim, Turk Ta'rīkhi, Constantinople 1316, p 436 sq, Husain Husām al-Dīn, Amasya Taʾrīkhi, Constantinople 1920, i, ii, Tewhīd, Rūm Seldjūkī Dewletinin inkirāzile teshekkul eden Ṭewāʾif i Mulūk, in T O E M, vol i, Khalil Edhem, Mevzifūnda Parwāna Muʿīn al Dīn Sulaimān nāmina bir Kitābe, in T O E M, Nº 8, p 42 sqq, do, Duwel-i Islāmiye, Constantinople 1927, p 211, 272, Cl Huart, Les Saints des Derviches Tourneurs, Paris 1918—1922, i, ii, passim (J H KRAMERS)

MUʿĪN AL MISKĪN whose full name was MUʿĪN AL-DĪN MUHAMMAD AMĪN B HADJDJĪ MUHAMMAD AL FARĀHĪ AL-HARAWĪ and whose takhallus was Muʿīnī (d 907 = 1501—1502), a celebrated traditionist He studied Hadīth for 31 years and throughout this period preached every Friday in the great mosque of Herāt He was for year kādī of Herāt but gave up the post by his own request In 866 (1461—1462) at the request of a friend, he began to write a little book on the life of the Prophet Muhammad Out of this little book there grew in time the great biographical work, exceedingly popular in the East, called Maʿārid̲j al-Nubuwwa fī Madārid̲j al Futuwwa, which was not finished till 891 (1486) and contains a very full account of the life of the Prophet consisting of a Mukaddima, four books and a Khātima Besides this gigantic work Muʿīnī also wrote a commentary on the Kurʾān entitled Bahr al-Durar and a collection of forty hadīths, Rawdat al-Wāʿizin His study of the history of the prophets produced a large history of Moses entitled Muʿd̲jizāt i Mūsawī (also called Taʾrikh i Mūsawī or Kissa yi Mūsawi), which was completed in 904 (1498—1499), and the story of Yūsuf and Zulaikhā, Ahsan al Kisaṣ

Bibliography H Ethé, Neupersische Literatur (Grundriss der iranischen Philologie, ii 235, 319, 358), Rieu, Cat Pers MSS Brit Mus, i 149ᵃ, Habib al-Siyar, Bombay, iii/iii 328, text of the Maʿārid̲j al Nubuwwa lithographed Lucknow 1292 A Turkish translation by Altī Parmak (d 1033 = 1624) entitled Dalāʾil al Nubuwwa yi Muhammadī printed in Constantinople 1257 A manuscript of the Taʾrikh i Mūsawī in the India Office, Nº 2029 A manuscript of the Ahsan al Kisas in the Bodleian (Elliott, Nº 409) (E BERTHELS)

AL-MUʿIZZ [See ALLĀH, II]

AL-MUʿIZZ B BĀDĪS [See ZĪRIDS]

MUʿIZZ AL-DAWLA, ABU 'L-HUSAIN AHMAD B ABĪ SHUDJĀʿ, a Būyid, was born in 303 (915/916) After the taking of Shīrāz by the Būyids he brought Kirmān under his rule in 324 (935—936) When the rebel governor of al-Ahwāz, al-Barīdī [q v], after several unsuccessful encounters with Bedjkem [q v], the general of the ʿAbbāsid caliph, sought the help of the Būyid ʿImād al-Dawla, the latter sent his brother Ahmad against al Ahwāz with an army, Bedjkem was defeated first at Arradjān and then at ʿAskar Mukram (326 = 938), whereupon Ahmad took this town, but when he demanded as a reward for the help he had given that al-Barīdī should help the Būyid Rukn al Dawla against Washmgī, the brother of Mardāwīd̲j [q v], al-Barīdī refused and went to Basra After Ahmad had received reinforcements from ʿImād al-Dawla, he was able to take al-Ahwāz In 332 (943—944) he undertook a campaign against Wāsit while the Amīr al Umarāʾ, the Turkish chief Tuzun, was involved in a war with the Hamdānid of al-Mawsil Tuzun hurriedly made peace and set out against Ahmad, and the two armies met in Dhu 'l Kaʿda of this year (July 944) The details are variously given, it is certain at least that Ahmad soon afterwards returned to al-Ahwāz At the end of Radjab of the following year (middle of March 945), he made a further attempt to take the town but had to withdraw the next month on the approach of Tuzun In 334 (945) he attacked Wāsit for a third time, its governor had gone over to his side and the town surrendered without a blow being struck, he then marched against Baghdād and in Djumadā I 334 (December 945) entered the capital where he at once seized the power The caliph al Mustakfī appointed him Amīr al-Umarāʾ and gave him the title Muʿizz al Dawla but was deposed and blinded a few weeks later because he was alleged to be dealing with the enemies of the Būyids Muʿizz al Dawla was soon afterwards attacked by the Hamdānid Nāsir al-Dawla of al-Mawsil, who advanced on Baghdād along with Abū Djaʿfar b Shīrzad and very quickly occupied the eastern part of the capital Nāsir al Dawla was not driven back till Muharram of the following year (Aug 946) when he made peace with the Būyids but without consulting his Turkish allies The latter were angered at this and turned against him Nāsir al-Dawla had to flee and only succeeded in bringing the Turks to terms with the help of the Būyids, he then returned to al Mawsil as a vassal of the Būyids Abu 'l Kāsim, son and successor of al Barīdī, was the next to be dealt with Muʿizz al Dawla sent an army against him which put his forces to flight and in 336 (947) he took the field in person Abu 'l-Kāsim fled to the Karmatians of al-Bahrain and Muʿizz al-Dawla occupied Basra Abu 'l-Kāsim's governor ʿImrān b Shāhin however held out in al Djamida, the capital of the Euphrates territory between Wāsit and Basra, and after several years fighting Muʿizz al-Dawla had to confirm him in his governorship In 337 (948—949) Muʿizz al-Dawla undertook a campaign against al-Mawsil because Nāsir al Dawla did not send the tribute imposed on him The latter fled to Nasibin, but when Rukn al-Dawla, brother of Muʿizz al-Dawla, was attacked by the Sāmānids, Muʿizz al-Dawla had to send him help and concluded peace with the Hamdānids In 347 (958—959) Nāsir al-Dawla rebelled again but on the approach of Muʿizz al Dawla he left al Mawsil and went first of all to Nasibin and then to Halab to his brother Saif al Dawla, while Muʿizz al-Dawla advanced on al Mawsil and took this town and also Nasibin Through the intervention of Saif al Dawla however peace was made (Muharram 348 = March—April 959) In the last year of his life Muʿizz al Dawla had to fight the Karmatians and ʿImrān b Shāhīn The former acknowledged his suzerainty, the war against the latter was interrupted by the death of Muʿizz al-Dawla on 13th or 17th Rabiʿ II 356 (March 28 or April 1, 967)

Bibliography Ibn Khallikān (ed Wustenfeld), Nº 71 (transl de Slane, i 155 sqq), Ibn al Athīr, ed Tornberg, viii, Ibn al Tiktakā, al-Fakhrī, ed Derenbourg, p 376—378, 388—390, Abu 'l-Fidāʾ, ed Reiske, ii 402 sqq, Ibn Khaldūn, al-ʿIbar, iv 426—444, Hamd Allāh Mustawfī-i Kazwīnī, Taʾrikh-i Guzīda (ed Browne), i 418 sq, Wilken, Gesch der Sultane aus d Geschl Bujeh nach Mirchond, iv, Weil,

Gesch d Chalifen, II 651—653, 666 sqq, 688, 692, 695—697, III 2—7, Le Strange, Baghdad during the Abbasid Caliphate, p 161–164, 231–233, 318 sq (K V Zetterstéen)

AL-MUʿIZZ LI-DĪN ALLĀH, Abū Tamīm Maʿadd b Ismaʿīl al Mansūr, fourth Fātimid caliph, was born at Mahdiya on 11th Ramadān 319 (28th Sept 931), proclaimed heir apparent in 341 (952—953), and succeeded to the throne in Shawwāl of the same year (March 953) His first object was to restore the Fātimid power, which had been reestablished in Ifrikiya by his father, over the remaining provinces of the Maghrib In 342 he led in person an army of Kitāma into the Awrās mountains and not only reduced the turbulent tribes of that region for the first time, but also received the formal submission of the chiefs of Zenāta and of the ruling princes of the west The hostility and intrigues, however, of the Umaiyad ruler of Spain, ʿAbd al-Rahmān III [q v], maintained a situation of unrest in the Maghrib, and after ineffectual naval raids on both sides, al Muʿizz despatched thither in 347 (958) a strong force under the command of his freedman and kātib Djawhar al-Rūmī [q v] Fāhart and Sidjilmasa were captured with little difficulty, Fās surrendered after an obstinate siege of eleven months in Ramadān 348, and the other strongholds in the Maghrib were occupied, with the exception of Salā and Sabta, which were held for ʿAbd al-Rahmān Although the results of this campaign in the western Maghrib were ephemeral, the establishment of the Sanhādja chief Zīri b Manād at Fāhart placed an effective check upon the Zenāta of the Central Maghrib There can be no doubt that al Muʿizz was already contemplating the conquest not only of Egypt and Syria, but also of Baghdād, using for this purpose the Kitāma, as the ʿAbbāsids had used the army of Khurāsān, while the Sanhādja should hold North-west Africa for him, and with this end in view he actively pursued a policy of conciliation of these tribes by lavish gifts and the abolition of financial exactions

Though this ambition was no secret, it is represented in the official correspondence of al Muʿizz as subsidiary to his desire (which was probably sincere) to assume the leadership in the djihād against the encroaching Greeks Already in 350 (961) the Cretans, besieged by Nikephoros Phokas, and despairing of assistance from Kāfūr, had solicited his aid In spite of the victory claimed for al Muʿizz by Ibn al-Athīr (VIII 404), it appears that he was unable to send assistance in time, but he seized the opportunity to denounce the treaty made with the Emperor Constantine VII in 956, and opened a fresh attack in Sicily Taormīna was captured in 351 (962), and an expeditionary force sent from Constantinople was severely defeated both on land and sea, the general Manuel Phokas being killed, and the commander Niketas taken prisoner

In the same year (355 = 966) al-Muʿizz began his preparations for the advance on Egypt, by ordering wells to be dug along the route His relations with Kāfūr at this time are obscure Fātimid emissaries had long been engaged in active propaganda in Egypt, and had evidently made some headway, aided by the resentment of the population against the Sūdānī troops, who were fanatical Sunnīs Their propaganda was indulgently regarded by Kāfūr, and it is not impossible that, as the Fātimid writers claim, he privily declared his adhesion to al-Muʿizz His death on 21st Djumādā II, 357 (24th May 968) gave the signal for the advance of the Fātimid army, said to have been over 100,000 strong, which set off under the command of Djawhar on 14th Rabiʿ I, 358 (6th Feb 969), with the support of a naval squadron The disorganization which prevailed in Egypt and the terror inspired by the Greek armies (who in 968 had swept over the whole of northern Syria without meeting opposition and had taken immense numbers of prisoners), contributed greatly to the prospects of its success, moreover, many of the Egyptian notables and even of the troops had sent letters to al-Muʿizz inviting his intervention On Djawhar's approach the population made their submission by an embassy of notables, but the Ikhshidī and Tulūnī regiments rejected the conditions laid down in the agreement, and had to be forcibly dislodged from their positions at Djiza and on the islands The retreating Mamlūks split up into bands, some of which continued to give Djawhar much trouble as local centres of disaffection, ending only with the arrest and deportation to Africa of their commanders, and the disarmament or imprisonment of the remainder

Djawhar, having entered Fustāt on 17th Shaʿbān 358 (7th July 969) and laid the foundations of the new city of al-Kāhira, immediately took in hand the reform of the administration Complete religious toleration was promised, and confirmed by the reinstatement of the existing officials, weekly sessions for the hearing of mazālim were instituted, several vexatious taxes were abolished and property which had been illegally sequestrated to the Treasury was restored to its owners, and regular salaries were assigned to the officers of the mosques Another of his reforms, however, caused great resentment, this was the striking of a new coinage to replace the existing debased coinage, and the order to levy all taxes in the new currency His difficulties were increased by a prolonged famine and by the turbulence of the Berber soldiery, and it was not until the arrival in Egypt of al-Muʿizz himself in Ramadān 362 (June 973) that the task of reorganization was completed by centralizing the financial administration under Yaʿkūb b Kilis [q v] and ʿAslūdj b al-Hasan, and by the removal of the Berber troops to a new camp near Heliopolis

The course of events in Syria after the occupation of Egypt is differently related and obscure in detail Djawhar's lieutenant Djaʿfar b Falāh defeated the joint forces of the Ikhshidids and Karmatians under al Hasan (in some sources al-Husain) b ʿUbaid Allāh b Tughdj at Ramla in the early months of 359 (970), but the general disorganization and the licence of the Arab tribesmen preventing him from entering Damascus until Dhu 'l-Hidjdja of the same year Shortly afterwards he detached some contingents against the Greeks, but the troops sent to recover Antioch were defeated near Iskandarūna, or, according to Yahyā b Saʿīd (ed Cheikho, p 139), were recalled after besieging the city for five months Meanwhile the Karmatian general al Hasan b Ahmad al-Aʿsam (in some versions al-Aghsham), in revenge, it is said (but see de Goeje, Les Carmathes du Bahrain, p 181–190), for the stoppage of the subsidy he had received from the Ikhshīdid al-Hasan, opened negotiations with the Buwaihid ʿIzz al-Dīn and the Hamdānid amīr of al-Mawṣil, and with the aid of subsidies from them and some Ikhshīdī contingents, defeated and killed Djaʿfar and recaptured Damascus in Dhu 'l-Kaʿda 360 (Aug–Sept 971) Having shut up the remaining Egyptian forces in Yāfā, he marched on Cairo, but was defeated by Djawhar in Rabīʿ I 361 (Dec 971), and his fleet was destroyed at Tinnīs The Karmatians retained their hold on Damascus, however, repulsed a strong Maghribī force despatched to Palestine by Djawhar in Ramadān 361, and with an army of Arab auxiliaries and Ikhshīdis (some sources also add Dailamis) made a second descent upon Egypt after the arrival of al-Muʿizz By bribing the Arabs, the Caliph succeeded in dividing and defeating the Karmatian army outside Cairo in Ramadān 363 (May–June 964), but not before Karmatian forces had overrun both the Delta and the Saʿīd On al Hasan's return to al-Aḥsāʾ the ʿUkailid Zalim b Mawhūb occupied Damascus on behalf of al Muʿizz, but came into conflict with the Maghribī troops, whose indiscipline and excesses at length led the citizens to appeal to the Turkish general al-Aftakin, who remained in possession of the city until he was captured by al-ʿAziz [q v] Meanwhile in northern Syria the Fāṭimid troops gained a series of striking successes against the Greeks Tripoli and Bairūt were captured in 364 (975), and John Zimiskes suffered a crushing defeat both on land and sea at the hands of Rayyān, governor of Tripoli, on his attempt to recover the city

The empire which al Muʿizz bequeathed to his successor, though it fell short of his ambitions, was still of imposing extent The viceroy to whom he had committed the western provinces, Bulukkin b Zīrī [q v], proved both loyal and capable, when, on the departure of the Caliph, the Zenāta again rose in revolt, he scattered their forces and recaptured Tahart and Tilimsān The holy cities of Mecca and Madina acknowledged the suzerainty of the Fāṭimids, and they had a powerful following in Sind Only in Syria had the Karmatians, on whose cooperation al Muʿizz had confidently relied (though the letter reproduced by al-Makrizī, Ittiʿāz, ed Bunz, p 133 sqq is of doubtful genuineness), brought him to a halt, but by this action they had placed a fatal obstacle in his way This disappointment preyed on his mind and, worn out by ill health and by grief at the loss of his eldest son ʿAbd Allāh (died 364), he died at Cairo on 11th Rabiʿ II, 365 (Dec 19, 975), having nominated as his successor his second son Nizār al-ʿAzīz

The personal character of al-Muʿizz was singularly noble, frank, accessible, simple in his habits, endowed with brilliant gifts and all the traditional qualities of ḥilm, he was at the same time a capable administrator and just towards his subjects, though the financial exactions of his last years left a bitter memory No instance of cruelty is recorded of him, except the execution of his Karmatian captives, and he was completely devoid of religious fanaticism

Bibliography, The fullest accounts are those of al-Makrizī, Ittiʿāz (ed Bunz, p 59—143), and the dāʿī Idrīs b al-Ḥasan (ʿUyūn al-Akhbār, vol vi), both of whom utilized the biography by Ibn Zūlāk (d 387), and the latter also the works of the Kādī al-Nuʿmān b Muḥammad (d 363) Additional details are furnished by Ibn al-Athīr (vol viii), whose chronology is at variance with earlier sources, Ibn Taghrībirdī, ed Juynboll, ii 398—494, Ibn al-Kalānisī, ed Amedroz, p 1—14, Ibn Muyassar, ed Masse, p 43—47, al-Kindī, ed Guest, Supplement, p 584—589, Ibn ʿAdhārī, ed Dozy, i 229—237, Yaḥyā b Saʿīd, ed Cheikho, p 129–146, 295–296, Ibn Ẓāfir, MS Brit Mus, Or 3685, fol 47b–50b, al Dhahabī, Taʾrīkh, MS Brit Mus, Or 48, fol 92—93, sub 365 AH, and the Dīwān of Ibn Hānī al-Andalusī, ed Bairūt 1326, in addition to the references quoted in the text — European works include, besides the general histories of Egypt by Wustenfeld and Lane Poole, a study by Quatremère, La Vie du Khalife Moezz lidin Allah (J A, ser iii, vols 2, 3) (H A R GIBB)

MU IZZĪ, AMĪR ABŪ ʿABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD B ʿABD AL MALIK, one of the most famous of Persian court poets His place of birth is not exactly known According to most of the sources he was born in Samarkand about 440 (1048—1049) but Nasā and Nīshāpūr are also mentioned The son of a little known poet ʿAbd al Malik Burhānī, who was attached to the court of the Saldjūk Alp Arslān (1063—1072), he was introduced to Sultān Malik-Shāh (1072—1092) by Amir ʿAlī b Farāmurz, ruler of Yazd (443–488 = 1051/1502—1095), made a favourable impression on the sultān and received from him the takhallus of Muʿizzī, which comes from the lakab of Malik-Shāh, Muʿizz al Dīn He enjoyed even greater distinction under the last great Saldjūk ruler Sandjar (1118—1157) and was appointed his malik al-shuʿarāʾ and the head of a regular establishment of poets, said to have numbered 400 He is reputed to have become fabulously wealthy from the splendid gifts of the ruler and he received a salary paid out of the revenues of Isfahān Nevertheless he continually tried to increase his fortune and, as he himself tells us, never wrote a single panegyric without making certain in advance that his work would be well paid According to the Oriental sources, he came to a tragic end, being accidentally killed by Sultān Sandjar, while practising archery in his tent This is not possible however, as Muʿizzī himself mentions this incident in his Dīwān and says that, although he suffered a long illness as a result of being struck by the arrow, he completely recovered in the end This event took place in Marw, about 496 (1102—1103), but he lived for another 46 years and died there in 542 (1147—1148) There is an elegy written on the occasion of his death in the Dīwān of Madjd al-Dīn Sanāʾī Muʿizzī is one of the most brilliant writers of kasīdas in the old Ghaznawid style (ʿUnsurī) but his art was finally displaced by Anwarī's new style and came to be forgotten

Bibliography H Ethé, Neupersische Literatur (Gr I Ph, ii 260, 263, 267, 283, 573), Ed Browne, A Literary History of Persia, ii 327—330, Habīb al-Siyar, ii 4, 103, Madjmaʿ al Fuṣaḥāʾ, i 571, Rieu, ii 552 A longish monograph on the poet by ʿAlī Riḍā Khusrawānī Turfa in the monthly Armaghān, iv 529 A good MS of the Dīwān in the Leningrad University Library, N⁰ 939, C Salemann, Zap, ii (1888), p 253 (E BERTHELS)

MUḲĀBALA, Gr διάμετρος, in the Almagest ἀκρόνυκτος, Lat oppositio, the term in astronomy for the opposition of a planet and the sun or of two planets with one another In opposition the difference in longitude between the two heavenly bodies is 180°, while the modern use is to take no note of the deviations of latitude from the ecliptic, al-Battānī expressly emphasises (Opus astronomicum, ed Nallino, III 196) that we can only have the true mukābala when both bodies are either in the ecliptic itself or are in equal ecliptical latitudes when opposed in other words when they are diametrically opposite one another in the heavens (cf "διάμετρος"!) Opposition with the sun can only occur for the moon and the outer planets (in ancient astronomy only for Mars, Jupiter and Saturn), not for the two inner ones, Mercury and Venus When an outer planet is in opposition to the sun, its conditions of visibility are at their best, at midnight it passes through the meridian and is above the horizon the whole night When the moon is in opposition to the sun we have the full moon, the usual technical expression for this in Arabic astronomy is al istiḳbāl which is derived from the same root as mukābala (Greek ἡ παντέληνος) and is rendered by Plato Tiburtinus and other mediaeval translators by praeventio, but we not uncommonly find the general term mukābala applied to the opposition of sun and moon, while on the other hand we never find al-istiḳbāl used in the general sense of opposition of the planets (cf al-Battānī, II 349, s v k b l)

Al-mukābala, opposition, forms along with al-tarbīʿ, quadrature (Gr τετράγωνον, Lat tetragonum, quadratum), al-taṯlīth, trigon (Gr τρίγωνον, Lat trigonum, triangulum, triquetrum, aspectus trinus), and al tasdīs, hexagon (Gr ἑξάγωνον, Lat hexagonum, sexangulum, aspectus sextilis), the four astrological aspects (aṯkāl, sg ṯakl, Gr σχήματα, σχηματισμοί, συσχηματισμοί, also ὄψεις, Lat aspectus or radiationes), which are applied to the ecliptical differences in longitude of two planets to the amount of 180°, 90°, 120° or 60° respectively The aṯkāl also play a part in the astrological arrangement of the signs of the zodiac (burūḏ) (cf the article MINṬAKA and al-Battānī, III 194) It should be noted that the conjunction of planets (mukārana, Greek σύνοδος, for moon with sun [new moon] always iḏtimāʿ) is not included among the aṯkāl, nor the position when the difference of latitude is 30° or 150° (cf al-Battānī, op cit)

In horoscopes mukābala and tarbīʿ are as a rule regarded as unfavourable in principle, taṯlīth and tasdīs on the other hand as favourable

Bibliography al-Battānī, Kitāb al Zīḏ al-Ṣābiʾ (Opus Astronomicum), ed C A Nallino, Milan 1899—1907, I—III, Boll-Bezold, Sternglaube und Sterndeutung, 3rd ed by W Gundel, Leipzig 1926, p 63—64

(WILLY HARTNER)

MUḲADDAM (A), "placed in front" Applied to persons the word means the chief, the one in command, e g of a body of troops or of a ship (captain) Dozy, Suppl, s v, gives a number of police appointments which have this name In the dervish orders the word is used for the head of the order or the head of a monastery

As a neuter noun the word is a technical term in logic and arithmetic In logic it means the protasis in a premise in the form of a conditional sentence, e g "If the sun rises (it becomes day)", where this whole sentence is to be regarded as premise of a syllogism But as every sentence can be a premise, mukaddam is really identical with the condition in the conditional sentence In arithmetic mukaddam means the first of two numbers in a proportion, i e 3 (5) or in other words the divided in a simple division — In logic and in arithmetic the portion following the mukaddam (in brackets above) is called tālī

Bibliography Dozy (cf above) and other dictionaries, Thorning, Beiträge zur Kenntnis des isl Vereinswesens (Turk Bibl, XVI), p 106, Dict of Technical Terms, ed Sprenger, p 1215, 1362 (M PLESSNER)

AL-MUḲADDASĪ, SHAMS AL DĪN ABŪ ʿABD ALLĀH MUHAMMAD B AHMAD B ABĪ BAKR AL-BANNĀʾ AL-SHAʾMĪ AL-MUKADDASĪ AL-MAʿRŪF BI 'L-BASHSHĀRĪ as he is called on the first page of the Berlin manuscript (Cat Ahlwardt, N⁰ 6034), is the author of the most original and at the same time one of the most valuable geographical treatises in Arabic literature The name-form al-Mukaddasī, denoting his origin from Jerusalem, goes back to Sprenger, who brought the Berlin manuscript from India and made this author first known in Europe (A Sprenger, Die Post- und Reiserouten des Orients, Leipzig 1864, p XVIII), but the form al-Makdisī is probably more correct as Jerusalem is commonly spelt al-Bait al Makdis (Yakūt, Muʿḏam, IV 590) Yākūt always quotes him as al-Bashshārī

Biographical dates on the life of this author are only to be found in the text of his treatise In 356 (966), when he was at Mecca, he was about twenty years of age, it is probable that he lived at least as late as 1000, as the last datable information in the treatise belongs to the end of the IVth (Xth) century His grandfather Abū Bakr al Bannāʾ was an architect in Palestine and had made for Ibn Ṭūlūn the gates of the town of ʿAkkā His mother's family was originally from Biyār in Kūmis, from where his grandfather Abu 'l-Ṭaiyib b al Shawā (in B G A, IV, p VII, l 12 "paternus" is to be corrected into "materinus") emigrated to Jerusalem Muhammad b Ahmad himself shows also a good knowledge of architecture, besides a good literary and general erudition

The geographical treatise is known from two old manuscripts, which form the basis of de Goeje's edition in the B G A, III, Leyden 1877 and of his revised edition of 1906 The Berlin manuscript has the title Aḥsan al-Taḳāsīm fī Maʿrifat al-Aḳālīm, while the Constantinople manuscript (Aya Sofia, N⁰ 2971 bis, cf Ritter, in Isl, XIX 43), written in 658 (1260), is only indicated as Kitāb al Aḳālīm The Leyden manuscript (Cat, V 191) is a modern copy of the Constantinople one, while another Berlin manuscript (Cat Ahlwardt, N⁰ 6033) is a bad copy of the other Berlin manuscript The date of composition is not certain The text itself states that it was completed in 375 (985) (B G A, III 9), but as has been said, information of a later date has been added, while Yāḳūt (I 653) gives the year 378 (988) The manuscript C(onstantinople) is somewhat less extensive than B(erlin) and de Goeje, hesitatingly, considers the redaction of C as the older one It is dedicated to a certain Abu 'l-Hasan ʿAlī b al-Hasan and mentions the Sāmānids as the most important dynasty, B, on the contrary, does not contain the dedication and is more orientated towards the Fāṭimids

The general scope of the work proves beyond doubt that it is based on the same geographical tradition as the treatises connected with the names

al-Balkhī — al-Istakhrī — Ibn Hawkal, the same is proved by the fact that the maps accompanying both manuscripts show the still rather primitive type of the Istakhrī maps (the Makdisī maps have been published by K Miller, in Mappae Arabicae, vol I—V, Stuttgart 1926—1931) In this last respect al Makdisī's work does not really reflect the considerable progress of geographical knowledge that is manifested in the text As in the texts of al-Istakhrī and Ibn Hawkal the object is to treat only the Islāmic world (mamlakat al-Islām) of the IVth (Xth) century and that after a division into regions (akālīm) which, on the whole, is the same as that of the two authors mentioned, the order is not always the same, but the distinction between western and eastern regions is maintained The treatment is often more detailed than with the earlier authors, while the disposition of the geographical matter is the same, each region ending with a survey of the distances between the different towns In how far al Makdisī is dependent on al Istakhrī and Ibn Hawkal remains to be examined His introductory chapters show not a few original features and are especially valuable for information about earlier geographical authors As de Goeje has already remarked, this information is more accurate in the redaction C than in B, if the latter redaction is really later it would seem that the rather depreciating judgment he gives therein of al-Balkhī, al Djaihānī and others (p 4) must be explained by the change of the author's political predilection in favour of the Fātimids and occidental Islām Al Makdisī's style and language is sometimes difficult, owing to his expressly stated endeavour to adapt himself in the description of each region to the special idiom used in that region Moreover, the reading of his text is several times made unpleasant by the boisterous way in which the author speaks of the merits of his work

A English translation of part of the treatise was published by G S A Ranking and R F Azoo in the Bibliotheca Indica, Calcutta 1897—1910, vol I—IV

Bibliography The author and the work are discussed by de Goeje in the introduction to vol IV of the B G A, p VI—VIII, further cf Brockelmann, G A L, I

(J H KRAMERS)

AL MUKADDIM [See AILĀH, II]

MUKALLĀ (MAKALLA), a seaport on the south coast of Arabia, $2^1/_2$ miles N W of the cape of the same name The town lies between two bays at the foot of a reddish limestone cliff, which rises to a height of 300 feet behind the town, four towers for the defence of the town are built upon it On the west side a wall runs from the cliff to the shore with only one gate in it The only buildings of any size are the great mosque on the coast with a minaret which can be seen from a great distance, and the sultān's palace, the other buildings are mainly huts with a few houses of stone The palace is a great six storey building with decorated windows which stands on a kind of peninsula In the centre of the town is a large cemetery with the tomb of Walī Ya'kūb, in the modern western part of the town is the bazaar which is provided with all kinds of goods and has some modest industries which provide the native population with baskets, pipes of a kind of limestone, silver powder-horns and muskets without stocks There is a yard in the harbour where the native sailing-boats are built The country around is not fertile, a mile to the west however is an oasis belonging to the ruler, which is watered by a stream which also provides the town's water supply The climate of Mukallā is very dry, the coast hot, only from October to April and in June and July do fresh breezes and showers temper the heat The population varies between 6,000 and 12,000

Mukallā is the only place between 'Aden and Maskat that deserves the name of harbour It cannot however be used as an anchorage during the southwest monsoon, in this period its place is taken by Burūm, 16 miles southwest The trade with India, Somaliland, the Red Sea and Maskaṭ is considerable The exports are mainly gum arabic, skins, honey from the Yeshbom valley, senna and some coffee, the imports are cotton goods, metals, pottery from Bombay, dates and dried fruits from Maskat, coffee from 'Aden, sheep, aloes and frankincense from the African coast The fisheries also give a considerable yield while amber is obtained in considerable quantities Parsīs and banians from Bombay play a leading part in the trade and Hindustānī is spoken almost as much as Arabic Since 1881 Mukallā has been under the al Ka'aitī dynasty with which England concluded a treaty granting a protectorate on May 1, 1888 According to Ibn al-Mudjāwir, the old name of the town was al-Mukannā, and the natives also call al-Mukallā, like al Shihr, Bender al-Ahkāf or Sūḳ al Ahkāf The port has steamship communication with 'Aden, most of the traffic is borne by native sailing-boats of 100—300 tons, which are busiest at the time of the date harvest

Bibliography A Sprenger, Die Post- und Reiserouten des Orients (Abh f d Kunde des Morgenlandes, III/3, Leipzig 1864), p 145, I Hirsch, Reisen in Süd Arabien, Mahra-Land und Hadramūt, I eyden 1897, p 83—92, ders, Ein Aufenthalt in Makalla (Südarabien), in Globus, LXXII (1897), p 37—40, Th Bent, Southern Arabia, I ondon 1900, p 74—77, C Landberg, Etudes sur les dialectes de l'Arabie méridionale, I, Leyden 1901, p 148, F Stuhlmann, Der Kampf um Arabien zwischen der Turkei und England, in Hamburgische Forschungen, I, Hamburg 1916, p 145 sq, A Handbook of Arabia vol I General compiled by the Geographical Section of the Naval Intelligence Division, Naval Staff, Admiralty I ondon, p 232, A Grohmann, Südarabien als Wirtschaftsgebiet, I (Osten u Orientforschungen, vol IV, Vienna 1922), p 21, 39, 137, 139, 145, 146, 148, 152, 154, 162, 168, 187 sq, 202, II (Brunn 1931), p 47—49, 55, 60, 61, 66, 73, 77, 81—84, 88 sq, 93, D v d Meulen and H v Wissmann, Hadramaut, Leyden 1932, index, s v Makalla

(ADOLF GROHMANN)

AL MUKALLAD B AL MUSAIYIB, HUSĀM AL-DAWLA ABŪ HASSĀN, an 'Ukailid After the death in 386 (996) or 387 (997) of the 'Uḳailid emir Abu 'l-Dhawwād Muhammad b al Musaiyib [cf BAHĀ' AL-DAWLA], a quarrel arose between his brothers, 'Alī and al-Mukallad, each of whom claimed power 'Alī was the elder, but al-Mukallad wrote to Bahā' al-Dawla and promised him an annual tribute and then told his brother that Bahā' al-Dawla had appointed him governor of al Mawṣil and asked 'Alī's help to take the town Bahā' al-Dawla's general in al-Mawṣil, Abū Dja'far al-Hadj-

djādj, took to flight and the two brothers agreed to share the government Disputes between al-Mukallad's representative in Baghdād and Bahā' al-Dawla's officials gradually led to open hostilities A reconciliation was soon brought about and al-Mukallad promised to pay 10,000 dinārs and in return received the title Husām al Dawla with al Mawsil, al Kūfa al-Kasr and al-Djāmi'ain as a fief In 387 (997) he took 'Alī prisoner As a result the third brother advanced with a strong army against al Mukallad, before they came to blows however, their sister Rahila succeeded in making peace among the brothers 'Alī was released and received his confiscated property back and al-Mukallad turned his attention to the lord of Wāsit, 'Alī b Mazyad, who was on the side of 'Alī and Hasan But when al-Mukallad learned that 'Alī had designs on al-Mawsil, he turned back but through the intermediary of Hasan, the two brothers were again reconciled Soon afterwards 'Alī and Hasan left al Mawsil After long negotiations, it was agreed that 'Alī should be al-Mukallad's representative in al-Mawsil whenever the latter had to leave the town On 'Alī's death in 390 (999—1000), Hasan succeeded to his privileges but was driven out by al Mukallad and had to take refuge in the 'Irāk In Safar 391 (Dec 1000—Jan 1001) al Mukallad was murdered in al-Anbār by a Turkish Mamlūk

Bibliography Ibn Khallikān (ed Wüstenfeld), N° 745 (transl de Slane, III 415 sqq), Ibn al Athīr, ed Tornberg, IX 88 sq, 94—96, 116, Ibn Khaldūn, al-'Ibar, IV 255–257, Weil, Gesch d Chalifen, III 49—50

(K V ZETTERSTÉEN)

MŪḴĀN (Mūghān), a steppe lying to the south of the lower course of the Araxes, one part of which (about 5,000 square kilometres) belongs to Russia (U S S R) and the other (50—70 × c 50 kilometres) to Persia The steppe which covers what was once the bottom of the sea has been formed by the alluvial deposits from the Kur (in Russian Koura) and its tributary the Araxes (The latter has several times changed its course and one of its arms flows directly into the gulf of Kïzïl-Aghač) In the interior the only water in Mūghān is from a number of springs, but it is covered with tells and shows traces of the old system of irrigation Mūghān has a very mild climate in winter (Kazwīnī calls it djurūm Ādhar bādjān) and in the spring is covered with a rich carpet of verdure but in summer the heat makes it a regular hell and it is infested with snakes (Monteith says "in June the snakes literally covered the ground", cf Abū Hāmid al-Gharnatī in Kazwīnī, p 379)

The name The old Arabic transcription (Balādhurī, Tabarī) is Mūkān (without article) but quite early in certain manuscripts of the Arab geographers we find Mūghān (probably a popular etymology mūghān "magi") which becomes general in the Mongol period Markwart, Z D M G, 1895, p 633 connects the name of Mūkān with that of the people mentioned by classical writers as inhabiting this region Hecataeus, fragment 170 ἐκ Μυκῶν εἰς Ἀράξην, Pomponius Mela, book III, ch v *Mochi ("ad Hyrcanium fretum Albani et Moschi et Hyrcani") This tribe is to be connected with the Caspians who lived in this region, (cf Hübschmann, Die altarm Ortsnamen, 1904, p 269, cf in Yāḳūt, IV 676 the genealogy invented by Ibn al Kalbī, according to which Mūkān and Djīlān — both inhabitants of Tabaristān — were the sons of Kamāshah (?) b Yāfith b Nūh, cf Genesis X) The Chronicle of Theophanes, p 363, has Βουκανία (var Βουκακία), the Armenian geography Mukan, the Georgian chronicle Mowakan (another Mowakan lay near the confluence of the Alazan with the Iora)

History The Byzantine general Leontius in 678 subdued Iberia, Albania, Bukania (cf above) and Media The district of Mūkān was conquered in 21 (642) by an officer of Surāḳa Bukair who addressed a letter guaranteeing peace to "the people of Mūkān of the mountains of al-Kabdj" (Caucasus, Tabarī, I 2666) According to Balādhurī, p 327 329, in 25 (645) Walid b 'Ukba undertook a campaign against the people of Mūkān (ahl Mūkān), of al-Babr [cf TĀROM] and al Lailasān (= Tālish) Another campaign of Sa'id b 'Āsī against the people of Mūkān and Djīlān, although successful, entailed severe losses According to Ya'kūbī, ed Houtsma, II 395, 15, in 123 the future Caliph Marwān II b Muhammad undertook a campaign in Djīlān and Mūkān Mūkān figures several times as a stronghold of Bābak (Tab, III 1174, 1178) In the third (ninth) century Ibn Khurdādhbih, p 119, mentions one Shakla (?) as chief of Mūkān According to al-Mas'ūdī, Murūdj, II 5, in his time the Sharwān [cf SHIRWĀN] had conquered the states (mamlaka) of Lāyzan (several variants) and al-Mūkāniya It appears from Ibn Miskawaihi (ed Margoliouth, I 399) who mentions the ispahbad of Mūkān b Dalūla as ally of the Gīl chief Lashkarī b Mardī, who rebelled against the Dailamīs in 326 (937), that Mūkān enjoyed a certain degree of autonomy In 339 (950) the Kurd Daisam sent his vizier "into the mountains (sic !) of Mūkān to entrench himself" In 349 Mūkān appears as a centre of rebellion (Ibn Miskawaihi, II 136, 178—179) The poet Katrān mentions the rising of the ispahbad of Mūkān against the Rawwādī Wahsūdān (344—378, cf Kisrawī, Pādshāhān-i gumnām, Tihrān 1929, II 94) Later we hear of Mūkān mainly as an excellent area for the winter pasturage of the conquering nomads In Yākūt's (IV 676) time the majority of the people of Mūkān were still Turkomans In the history of the Khwārizmshāh Djalāl al-Dīn, Mūkān is constantly mentioned The sultān sends his booty there, keeps his baggage and mobilises his troops there (Nasawī, Sīra, p 210, 280, 366 etc) But in 617 (1220—1221) the Mongol generals Djebe and Subutay spent the winter in Mūkān (Djuwainī, I 116), and Kazwīnī, p 379 says that Mongols took Mūghān for their winter pastures and drove out the Turkomans In the time of Timūr, Mūkān must have been included in the region of Karabāgh where this conqueror liked so much to pass the winter During the winter of 804 (1401) Timūr restored an old canal which was given the name of his tribe Barlas The canal left the Araxes at Kūshk-i Čangshī and at a distance of 10 farsakhs ended at Sardja-pīl (bel?) Since, in order to give the necessary instructions, Timūr (who was to the north of the Araxes) had to cross the river (Zafarnāma, II 395), we may suppose that the canal lay to the south of the Araxes, i e in the steppe of Mūghān It must correspond to the Yegin G'aur arkhï of which traces can still be seen for a length of about 35 miles Sardja-pīl may correspond to Čarčeli on the Russian map (according to the involved description by Monteith, the Barlas canal issued in the neighbourhood of Kara su [1]) The canal is in any case quite distinct from another canal which Timūr traced in 806 to the north of the Araxes towards the town of Bailakān (Zafar nāma, ii 543)

In the Safawid period (and perhaps already under the Karakoyunlu) Mūghān became the possession of the Shī'ī Turkoman tribes who formed the principal support of the dynasty and became known as Shāhsewān [q v] By article ii of the treaty of Gulistān of 1813 the steppe of Mūghān was divided between Russia and Persia The boundary line was more precisely defined in article iv of the treaty of Turkmančai [q v] In 1884 Russia forbade Persian nomads to cross into Russian territory Towards the end of the xixth century the project of irrigating the land of Mūghān was conceived and realised between 1902 and 1907 The four systems of canals were to make 200,000 hectares cultivable, particularly for cotton From 1884 the steppe was occupied solely by nomads who were Russian subjects But in 1917 there were already 46 Russian villages with 17,000 inhabitants while the Turkish nomads who had become settled on the banks of the Kur and of the Araxes numbered 30,000 souls As a result of the tragic events of 1918, the whole Russian population had to leave Mūghān and the canals became silted up Between 1920 and 1924 the work of restoration was carried out and the fugitives began to return The total area of irrigated land in Mūghān is estimated at 253,000 hectares, while immediately to the north of Mūghān the steppe of Mīl (from Mil-i Bailakān, "the tower of Bailakan", cf Khanikow, Mem sur les inscriptions musulm au Caucase, in JA, Aug 1862, p 72) has another 165,000 irrigated hectares

Historical geography The Arab geographers are fairly well acquainted with Mūghān (cf the Bibliography) In the Mongol period, Mūghān must have comprised all the lands to the north of the Salāwāt range (which is a western outlier of Russian Tālish and forms the watershed between the middle course of the Kara su and the Bolgaru), to the east of the lower course of the Kara-su (where it follows the northern direction) and to the south of the Araxes Towards the east Mūghān stretched to the Caspian Sea and included the coastal region of Russian Talish The mountainous part of the latter, held as in a vice, must also have belonged to Mūghān The same condition must have existed in the Arab period for the curious expression of Ibn Miskawaihi, ii 136 referring to the Djibāl Mūkān can only refer to the mountainous part of Russian Tālish

We may note Mukaddasī's remark (p 380) who among other wonders mentions, one marhala (7—8 farsakhs = 20–25 miles) distant from Mūkān, an imposing fortress called al Hsra (?) below which are houses and palaces in which there are large quantities of gold (dhahab 'azim) in the form of birds and wild beasts and "many kings made plans to seize it but never succeeded in reaching it" Mukaddasī does not definitely say that the fortress belongs to Mūkān and evidently speaks of it by hearsay Is this a reference to Shindān kal'a (which is about 50 miles = 2 marhala to the south of the presumed site of the shahristān of Mūghān)? On this imposing mountain (6,000 feet high) can still be seen ruins of important fortifications (Radde, p 135 "ruins of a strong castle many ruins of brick buildings") Finally in a Persian translation of Istakhrī, p 186, 17, we read "The Gīls and the Mūkān are tribes on foot who rarely go on horseback" which can only refer to a few remnants of the old population settled in upper Tālish (where the highlanders are very distinct from the lowlanders)

Bibliography cf the article SHĀHSEWAN, Djihān numā, p 192 (of little originality), Olearius (1633), Voyages, book iv, ch 21 [ed 1656, p 447—451] Shamākha-Djawād-Balharu river-Bedjirwān Dizle-Aghīz-Sāmiyān-Ardabil, J Struys, Les voyages, Amsterdam 1720, ch 27 (ii, p 235) itinerary exactly identical with that of Olearius, J J Lerch, Nachricht von d zweiten Reise nach Persien (1747), in Busching's Magazin, part x, p 367—476 Shamākha–Djawād–Bolgaru–Lankurān–Astārā–Rasht, Monteith, Journal of a tour through Azerdbijan (sic [1]), in JRGS, 1834, iii, p 28—31 Ardabīl Barzand-Kīzīl kal'a (at the confluence of the four rivers which form Balarood = Balharu [2]) Kuyular-tapa-Agha-mazār-Yedi boluk–Altun [Altan] takht–Aslanduz–Bayat (wrongly taken for the old Bailakān)–Bardha'a, Toropov, Muganskaya steppe, Kavkaz kalendar, 1864, p 242—298, Toropov, in Kawkaz, 1864, N° 28, Ogranovič, Urocišče Belasuwar, in Kawkaz, 1871 N° 32, Dorn, Caspia, St Petersburg 1875, index, Ogranowic, Prowintsii Persii Ardebilskaya i Serabskaya, in Zap Kawk Otdel Impet Russ Geogr Obsič, x/1, 1876, p 214 Udjarūd, Radde, Reisen an der persisch russischen Grenze, Talysch und seine Bewohner, Leipzig 1886, passim Belasuwar etc — On the flora and fauna of Mūghān and the plans for irrigating it there is a whole literature in Russian The most recent references are in W S Klupt, Zakawkazye, Moscow 1929, p 50

(V MINORSKY)

AI-MUKANTARĀT [See ASTURLĀB]

MUKĀTIL B SULAIMĀN B BASHĪR AI-AZDĪ AI-KHURĀSĀNĪ AI-BALKHĪ, ABU 'L-HASAN, traditionist and commentator on the Kur'ān, was born in Balkh and lived in Marw, Baghdād and Basra where he died in 150 (767), there is also a reference to a stay in Baitūt Of his life we know almost nothing apart from a few details for his judgment as a traditionist The name of his wife Umm Abī 'Isma Nūh b Abī Maryam has been preserved According to Ibn Duraid, he was one of the mawālī of the Banū Asad He is sometimes quoted as Mukātil b Djawāl dūz or Dawāl dūz Ibn Hadjar, Lisān al-Mizān, expressly states in contradiction of wrong ideas that this is our Mukātil and that Dawāl dūz is not a lakab of Mukātil himself but of his father

Mukātil's prestige as a traditionist is not very great, he is reproached with not being accurate with the isnād His exegesis enjoys even less confidence The biographers vie with one another in telling stories which illustrate his mendacity and particularly his professing to know everything Contempt is poured on his memory by stories of ludicrous questions which were put to him about the most impossible things and to which he either gave fantastic answers or could make no reply It is in keeping with this profession of universal knowledge that the sources are unanimous in talking of his extreme anthropomorphism (tashbīh)

It did little to help his fame also that he is said to have told pious stories [cf KISSA] in the mosque, at a time when this was strictly forbidden In politics he is said to have belonged to the Zaidīya, in theology to the Murdji'a [q v]

Mukātil's literary activity was somewhat comprehensive, yet until quite recently nothing was known of his works Only since 1912 has a Kur'ān commentary by him been known in the MS Or 6333 of the British Museum, the genuineness of which however Goldziher did not think beyond doubt The Fihrist gives a list of his works, Hādjdjī Khalifa also gives some of them They deal mainly with the language and exegesis of the Kur'ān, but a pamphlet against the Kadarīya is also mentioned This is however hardly in keeping with another story, according to which he wrote a pamphlet against Djahm [q v] and the latter wrote against him

Bibliography Ibn Duraid, Kitāb al-Ishtikāk, ed Wustenfeld, p 294, Ibn al-Athīr, ed Tornberg, v 454, Fihrist, ed Flugel, p 179 etc , Ibn Khallikān, ed Wustenfeld, N° 743, al-Dhahabī, Mīzān, iii 196, N° 1723 and 1724, Ibn Hadjar, Tahdhīb, x 279—285, do , Lisān al-Mīzān, vi 82 sq , al-Nawawī, Tahdhīb al-Asmā' ed Wustenfeld, p 574 sq , al-Shahrastānī, ed Cureton, p 75, 106, 108, 121, Goldziher, Muh Stud, ii 206, do , Richtungen d islam Koranausleg, p 58—60, 87, 112

(M PLESSNER)

AL-MUKATTAM, the part of the range of hills west of the Nile, which lies immediately to the east of Cairo and from which the mountains take a north-easterly direction, bordering the Nile delta to the south east It reaches a height of about 600 feet and consists, as does the greater part of the north African mountains, of limestone (cf Description de l'Egypte, Etat moderne, Paris 1822, ii/ii 751)

The name Mukattam (the Tādj al-'Arūs records also the popular form al-Mukattab) does not go back to a pre-Muhammadan nomenclature, nor is it considered, in spite of its correct Arabic formation, as a true Arabic word, for the geographers (cf Yākūt, iv 607 sqq) give, hesitatingly, different explanations of its meaning The name occurs for the first time in the historical tradition of the Egyptian Arabs, as found in the Futūh Misr of Ibn 'Abd al-Hakam (cf Torrey's edition, New Haven 1899, p 156 sqq), in half legendary tales in which also al Mukawkis [q v] plays a part Some of these traditions give it an eponymous hero, Mukattam b Misr b Baisar b Hām, or lay stress on the special sanctity of the mountain, declaring that, in some way, it is connected with the mountain of Jerusalem As in the last mentioned traditions Ka'b al-Ahbār [q v] is named as final authority, it seems probable that the origin of the name must be sought in Jewish legendary traditions (for Jewish traditions about mountains, cf the Midrash Thillim on Psalm lxviii 17) and that the name has been fixed only in course of time on the ill-defined mountainous region to which it is attached since the flourishing times of al-Fustāt and al-Kāhira The vagueness of the geographical definition has survived in the Arabic geographical sources, which either call Mukattam the entire eastern mountain range as far as Uswān (Yākūt), or even represent under the name Mukattam the whole of the mountain system that runs over the inhabited world from China to the Atlantic Ocean (Ibn Hawkal and others) Moreover several geographers give the legendary statement that in the Mukattam are mines of emerald and other precious stones, while in reality it contains only stone quarries, but these were used already in very ancient times Makrīzī, Khitat, ed Būlāk, i 123 gives a fairly complete survey of the different traditions and opinions

It may be thus assumed that the Mukattam acquired a real geographical identity only after the foundation of al Fustāt Its geographical situation, viz its proximity to the bank of the Nile, has deeply influenced the territorial expansion of this town and later of Cairo [q v] Parts of the town and famous sites are situated on the western spurs of al-Mukattam, such as the mosque of Ibn Tūlūn and the citadel of Saladin The elevation of Ibn Tūlūn's mosque bears, however, the special name of Djabal Yashkur The cemetery of al Karāfa belongs likewise to the Mukattam and it is with this cemetery that are connected the ancient traditions already mentioned, in which al-Mukawkis plays a part, al Mukawkis informs 'Amr b al 'Ās that the mountain, instead of earthly vegetation, is destined to bear the plants of Paradise and the caliph 'Umar, informed by 'Amr, decides that by these plants of Paradise can only be meant Muslims who have died Accordingly, tradition records a number of sahābīs who are buried in al Karāfa On the summit of al Mukattam was built in the Fātimid period the mosque of al Djuyūshī, by Badr al Djamālī in 478 (1085), for this reason the mountain is also called Djabal al Djuyūshī On the southern slopes, towards Hulwān, lay the Christian monastery Dair al-Kusair (description by al Shabushtī towards 1000, cf Sachau, in Abh Pr Ak Wiss, 1909) A historical, or perhaps legendary feature, connected with al-Mukattam is that the Fātimid caliph al-Hākim is said to have disappeared mysteriously, in the night of 27th Shawwāl 411 (Feb 23, 1021), when he had gone for a ride in the Mukattam — Finally it may be mentioned that the Mukattam has given its name to one of the large modern Arabic newspapers published at Cairo

(J H KRAMERS)

AL MUKAWKAS, AL-MUKAWKIS, the individual who in Arab tradition plays the leading part on the side of the Copts and Greeks at the conquest of Egypt The Prophet is said to have sent a letter to him in the year 6 A H In the address on this letter, the text of which is given in Ibn 'Abd al Hakam (ed Torrey, p 46), al-Makrizi (Khitat, i 29), al-Suyūtī (Husn al Muhādara, i 58) and al Manūfī (p 29), as well as in an entirely different version in Pseudo-Wākidī (p 10), and also in the accounts of the incident in the Arab historians, the position of Mukawkis is described in the following phrases

1 Sāhib al Iskandarīya (Nawawī, p 577, Ibn 'Abd al Hakam, p 45, 52, Abū Sālih, p 38 [100], Ibn Kathīr, iii , fol 159v, along with N° 7 in Ibn Sa'd in Wellhausen, Skizzen und Vorarbeiten, iv 3 [99]), 2 Malik al-Iskandarīya (Ibn 'Abd al-Hakam, p 49, al-Suyūtī, i 60, Pseudo Wākidī, p 25, Ibn Hishām, p 971), 3 Sāhib Misr (Abu 'l-Fidā', i 149), 4 Malik Misr (al-Manūfī, p 7, cf al-Makrīzī, Khitat, i 163, 22 sq), 5 Malik Misr wa 'l Iskandarīya (Pseudo-Wākidī, p 10), 6 Sāhib Misr wa 'l-Iskandarīya (Pseudo-Wākidī, p 10), 7 ʿAẓīm al-Kubṭ (Ibn ʿAbd al Hakam, p 46, 47, al-Makrīzī, Khiṭaṭ, I 29, 12, 16, al Suyūṭī, I 58, al-Manūfī, p 29, al-Tabarī, I 1575, al-Masʿūdī, Tanbīh, p 261, 5 along with I, q v)

All these epithets no doubt mean simply the actual ruling authority in Egypt, whose true title was not known to the Arabs If we remember that in the year 6 (628) the Persians were masters of Egypt, we can hardly give much credence to the story of the Arab historians This is evident from the statement recorded by Manūfī (p 30) that Egypt was under the rule of Mukawkis continuously from the lifetime of the Prophet, through the caliphate of Abū Bakr to the beginning of the caliphate of ʿOmar Muhammad's letter to Mukawkis was long ago declared not to be genuine by E Amélineau (Fragments coptes, p 392) and Wellhausen (Skizzen und Vorarbeiten, IV 90) although they did not doubt the fact of the embassy to him, later Butler (Conquest, p 522) and Th Noldeke (Z D M G, xlvIII 160) still believed in the embassy although the latter granted the possibility that tradition might have transferred the name known from the time of the conquest to the man to whom Muhammad sent gifts, while for example S I ane Poole (Egypt in the Middle Ages, p 6, note 2) supposes that the Mukawkis of 628 and the Mukawkis of the conquest are two different people This suggestion however is disposed of by the fact that the Mukawkis of the letter is called in Ibn Kathīr حريج ابن مينا (in Abu 'l-Fidāʾ the patronymic has been corrupted through مينى to مينى, Nawawi only gives Djuraidj), i e the same as the Mukawkis of the conquest, for we need not heed the patronymic of Mukawkis given by Pseudo-Wākidī (p 10) (بن راعل), while the epithet al Farkab al-Nūnī, which al-Masʿūdī, Tanbīh, p 261, 5 has taken in an obviously corrupt form from an old source, is the Ibn Kurkub al-Yūnānī of the Mukawkis of the conquest In view of the many serious contradictions, which the transposing of Mukawkis into the period of Persian rule in Egypt offers, there is no alternative but to regard with Caetani, Annali dell' Islām, IV 90 the story of Muhammad's embassy to Mukawkis as legendary and devoid of any historical value (cf also G Rouillard, p 187 and note 2) The genuineness of the parchment found in a monastery at Akhmim by the French egyptologist E Barthélemy in 1852, which was thought to be the original of Muhammad's letter to Mukawkis and was actually put among the relics of the Prophet in the old Serail, thus disappears (cf the publication by Belin, in JA, 1854, p 482—518 and Djurdjī Zaidān, in Hilāl, XIII/2, 1904, p 103 sq) Its falsity had already been recognised by J Karabacek (Beitrage zur Geschichte der Mazjaditen, Leipzig 1874, p 35, note 47 and Mitteilungen des K K Osterr Museums, XIX [1884], p 183) (cf also Noldeke-Schwally, Geschichte des Qorāns, I, Leipzig 1909, p 100) As a matter of fact palaeographical grounds are clearly against any assumption of a date in the first century for this document

The same discrepancies, which we find in the transmission of the name and title of the Mukawkis of Muhammad's letter are found in the Mukawkis of the conquest In the historians we find the following names

1 Djuraidj b Mīnā (Abū Ṣālih, p 30 [81], 101 [230]), 2 Djuraidj b Mīnā b Kurkub (Ibn ʿAbd al-Hakam, p 64, note 9, Ibn Hadjar, Isāba, III 1090), 3 Ibn Kurkub or Ibn Karkab (al Kindī, p 8, al Makrīzī, Khiṭaṭ, I 289, 27, Ibn Taghrībirdī, I 9, Yākūt, Muʿdjam, III 894, 14)

Taking first of all the name of his grandfather, J v Karabacek's endeavour (p 2) to dispose of apparent contradictions in the statements about the patronymic by assuming a double name Mīnā Farkab proves unnecessary, when we see the name unequivocally given in N⁰ 2 When Karabacek (p 3) preferred the reading Farkab for Kurkub, he was at least able to quote the form فرقب in the Codex Parisinus of Ibn Taghrībirdī, but I cannot agree with Amelineau in supporting Karabacek's proposal (Fragments, p 394 sq) to equate this name with Παρκαβιος, especially if we remember the variant قرقوب of the Isāba, and Noldeke must be right when he (Z D M G, xlvIII 161) restores this to the Προκόπιος rejected by Karabacek The form قرقوب (unpointed however) has however so far been found in only one papyrus, the more usual form being قرقونيوس (Z D M G, I 158) Butler's conjecture (p 523) on the name فرقب seems to me as improbable as Karabacek's identification He calls attention to Abū Ṣālih's observation (p 67 [156]) that قرقر is a corruption of Gregorios and supposes that Karkab is a corruption of Karkar so that Ibn Karkab would be an error for Ibn Karkar and mean "son of Gregory" Casanova's proposal (in Butler, p 523) must be dismissed as still more improbable, viz, that Ibn Karkab is a corruption of Abū Kirus The office filled by Mukawkis is described by the sources in the following terms

1 Ṣāhib Miṣr (al-Balādhurī, p 226), 2 Malik ʿalā Miṣr (al Makrīzī, Khiṭaṭ, I 163, 22 sq, Ibn Dukmāk, V 118), 3 Amīr al-Kubṭ bi-Miṣr (Ibn Hadjar, III 1090), 4 ʿĀmil ʿalā Miṣr (Ibn ʿAbd al-Hakam, p 64, note 9, al-Makīn, p 29), 5 ʿĀmil ʿala 'l-Kharādj bi-Miṣr (Futychius, II 302) If the three first terms only mean the ruler of Egypt in general, the two last named limit the sphere of activity of Mukawkis to the administration of taxation and the expression given in 4 may be taken as synonymous with amīr "governor" In this connection we have the very clear evidence of Ibn ʿAbd al Hakam, p 37 and Ibn Dukmāk, V 119 who preserve the statement that Mukawkis was appointed by the emperor Heraclius as governor of Egypt and entrusted with the waging of war and the levying of taxation Abū Sālih's statement (p 30 [81 sq]) that Mukawkis Djuraidj b Mīnā had rented the taxes of Egypt from Heraclius for 18,000,000 dīnārs fits in with this This makes intelligible the statement of Eutychius (II 302) who calls Mukawkis controller of the land taxes (ʿāmil al kharādj) and traces his attitude to the Arabs to his embezzling the taxes raised, and further explains the description of Mukawkis (ⲡⲕⲁⲧⲭⲓⲟⲥ) as ⲧⲁⲝⲓⲁⲣⲭⲏⲥ ⲉⲧⲛ ⲛⲁⲙⲱⲥⲓⲟⲛ ⲡⲧⲉⲭⲱⲣⲁ ⲛⲕⲏⲙⲉ in the Vita of Apa Samuel published by Amélineau (p 367), to which we may add the statement of the Ethiopic Synaxar that Mukawkis had been Patriarch and financial controller of Egypt

M J de Goeje and J v Karabacek have laid special stress on this side of the activity of Mukawkis and identified the prefect George mentioned in John of Nikiu (p 559), whom de Goeje regards as prefect of Lower Egypt and Karabacek (p 8) as pagarch of Babylon, with Mukawkis who is called in the sources George son of Menas A J Butler (note 4 to Abū Sālih, p 81), Milne and Lane Poole have followed de Goeje while Amélineau (Fragments coptes, p 404, Samuel de Qalamon, p. 24 and Resume de l'histoire de l'Egypte, p 243) wished to identify Mukawkis with the Patriarch George who was appointed by the emperor Heraclius as successor or deputy to Cyrus during the period of the latter's stay in Constantinople (cf John of Nikiu, p 574)

In contrast to these attempts at identification, which are in more than one respect in contradiction to the sources, the most probable solution of the Mukawkis problem is the identification of Mukawkis with the Patriarch und governor Cyrus of Phasis, who was sent in the year 631 A D by Heraclius to Alexandria where he died on March 21, 642 While Zotenberg (in his edition of John of Nikiu, p 576, note 2) had already pointed out that the main features of the activity of Cyrus are found in the Arabic stories of Mukawkis, although no doubt the legend mixes up the activities of several individuals under this name, F M Esteves Pereira, (Vida do Abba Samuel, p 41—53) completely proved the identity of the two Independently J Krall in an unpublished article for the Mitteilungen aus der Sammlung des Papyrus Erzherzog Rainer, on the authority of three new fragments of the Vita of Apa Samuel, had come to the same conclusion The full study of the whole problem by A J Butler, the main result of which, the identity of Mukawkis with the Patriarch Cyrus, has been adopted by B Evetts (Patrologia Orientalis, I 491, note 1), by M Guidi in his doctoral thesis, C H Becker and O Braun in his article Cyrus in the Kirchliches Handlexicon, II, col 530 and others, has been critically examined by L Caetani (Annali dell' Islām, IV 86 sqq) The decisive evidence for the identity of the two individuals is found in the History of the Patriarchs of Severus of Ashmūnain (ed Evetts, p 490 sq, ed Seybold, p 106 sq) in which there are references to the Patriarch and governor of Heraclius in connection with the flight of the Patriarch Benjamin once as Cyrus (قورس), then a few lines later as al Makawkaz or al-Makawkas, the synaxars in this connection also give the name al Makawkas (cf E Amélineau, Fragments coptes, S 397, note 1, p 398, note 1, p 406, note 1 and the edition by R Basset, Patrologia Orientalis, XI 562) and the Arabic Vita of Benjamin (Amélineau, p 400, note 1), of peculiar importance is the text edited in R O C, XX 393, where the combined names Cyrus al-Muḳawkiz appear There is the additional fact that the period of ten years which, according to the history of the Patriarchs, lay between the flight and return of the Patriarch Benjamin coincides within a year with the period of office of Cyrus (631—642) in Egypt, whom the Christian sources describe as an "unbeliever" (ⲡⲁⲥⲉⲃⲏⲥ, Amélineau, Fragments coptes, p 364, 366, kāfir in Severus of Ashmūnain, p 495 [108]), godless and sinful Kauchios (ⲡⲕⲁⲩⲭⲓⲟⲥ ⲡⲁⲥⲉⲃⲏⲥ ⲙⲡⲁⲣⲁⲃⲁⲧⲏⲥ, Vienna Coptic fragments of the Vita of Apa Samuel in Krall, Kauchios frequently in Amélineau), deceitful Antichrist (ⲡⲁⲛⲧⲓⲭⲣⲓⲥⲧⲟⲥ ⲙⲡⲗⲁⲛⲟⲥ in Amélineau, p 366 sq) and Pseudoarchiepiskopos (ibid, p 365) The double position of Cyrus or Muḳawḳas as supreme head of the administration and archbishop, of which we have ample evidence (cf G Rouillard, p 230, note 2), and which is quite certain from the testimony of Severus (p 490, 495 [106—108]) and the Arabic and Ethiopic synaxar (Amelineau, p 406, note 1 دوس ونطرك, p 399) and also by the Vita of Samuel (Amelineau, p 367), was quite unknown to the Muslim Arabic sources Noldeke has already called attention to this remarkable fact (p 160) and it remains a crux for the identification of the two figures There was however no necessity for the Arabs to refer to his position in the church He was only of importance to them as head of the administration If one wants to, one can see an indication of his ecclesiastical dignity in the wish expressed by Mukawkis during the negotiations with ʿAmr regarding the capitulation of Alexandria (in Ibn ʿAbd al Hakam, ed Torrey, p 72) that he might be buried in the Church of St John (cf thereon Amélineau, p 400 sq) How much the Christian sources differ in their ideas of the personality and position of Mukawkis may be gathered from the description of the death of Mukawkis According to Severus of Ashmūnain (ed Evetts, p 495, Seybold p 108), the governor and Patriarch of Alexandria poisoned himself after the occupation of Alexandria lest he should be put do death by ʿAmr, while John of Nikiu (p 335, 578) says that Cyrus weakened by vexation at the faithlessness of ʿAmr caught dysentery and died According to Caetani, the contradictions and obscurities on the part of the Arab historians show that they did not consider who Mukawkis exactly was, but simply used the name as the family name of the chief personage in Egypt at the time of the Muslim conquest Evidently all who negotiated with ʿAmr in the name of the Copts are included in one individual The unanimity with which Mukawkis is described as a Copt and the different names given him suggests that Mukawkis conceals not only Cyrus but also other Egyptian negotiators — e g perhaps the commander of Babylon, George, and the bishop of the same town, Menas The Arabs must have made one out of these two negotiators and given him like Cyrus the name Mukawkis Of the attempts to explain this name, Karabacek's (p 8) μεγαύχης is as little probable as Amélineau's explanation (p 407—409) which makes Kauchios "the man from Kaukhion" We would rather think with Butler and Guidi of a connection with καυκάσιος, which indicates the home of Cyrus But even this explanation is by no means certain and the connection of Mukawkis with Cyrus has again (in Canterelli) given rise to serious doubts Nau, p 11 has compared Mukawkis with μακός His name survived in the Kōm el Mukawkis in the area of old Cairo (Ibn Dukmāk, IV 53)

Bibliography Ibn ʿAbd al Hakam, Kitāb Futūh Miṣr wa Akhbārihā, ed Ch C Torrey (in Yale Oriental Series Researches, III, New Haven 1922), p 37, 45—49, 52 sq, 58, 63—72, 109, 156, sq, 161, 173, 175, 317, al Kindī, Kitāb Taʾrikh Miṣr wa-Wulātihā, ed Rh

Guest, in G M S, Leyden 1912, xix 8, al Balādhurī, Kitāb Futūh al-Buldān, Cairo 1901, p 222 sq, 226—229, Ibn Sa'd in J Wellhausen, Skizzen und Vorarbeiten, iv, Berlin 1889, text, p 3, N° 4, transl p 90, 99, al Makrīzī, Khiṭaṭ, Būlāk 1270, i 29, 163, 167, 289, al Suyūtī, Kitāb Husn al Muhādara fī Akhbār Misr wa 'l Kāhira, Cairo 1299, i 58, 60, Ibn Dukmāk, Kitāb al Intiṣār li-Wāsitat 'Ikd al-Amsār, Cairo 1893, iv 53, v 118 sq, Ibn Taghrībirdī, al Nudjūm al zāhira fī Mulūk Miṣr wa 'l-Kāhira, ed T G J Juynboll–B F Matthes, Leyden 1855, i 9, al Manūfī, Kitāb Latā'if Akhbār al-Uwal fī man taṣarrafa fī Miṣr min Arbāb al Duwal, Cairo 1300, p 7, 29 sq, Abū 'Abd Allāh Muhammad b 'Umar b Wākid al-Wākidī al Madanī, Kitāb Futūh Miṣr wa 'l-Iskandarīya, ed H A Hamaker, Leyden 1825, p 9 sq, 25, 214, al-Tabarī, ed de Goeje, i 1575, Ibn Kathīr, al-Badāya wa 'l-Nihāya, Cod N F, N° 187 of the National Library in Vienna, fol 159v, Abu 'l-Fidā', Ta'rīkh, Stambul 1256, i 149, al Makīn, Ta'rīkh al-Muslimīn, ed Th Erpenius, Leyden 1625, p 29, Ibn Hishām, Sīra, ed F Wüstenfeld, p 5, 121, 971, al-Nawawī, Kitāb Tahdhīb al Asmā', ed F Wustenfeld, Gottingen 1842—1847, p 577, Ibn Hadjar, Iṣāba, ed A Sprenger, iii 1090, al Mas'ūdī, Tanbīh, B G A, viii 261, Yākūt, Mu'djam, ed Wüstenfeld, iii 894, Eutychius, Annales, ii 302, Chronique de Jean, eveque de Nikiou, ed M H Zotenberg, in N E, xxiv/1 335, 559, 562, 564, 570—578, Severus b al-Mukaffa', Kitāb Sīrat al-Abā' al-Batārika, ed C F Seybold, Bairūt 1904, p 106—108, do, ed B Evetts, in Patrologia Orientalis, i, Paris 1907, 490—495, Abū Sālih, Ta'rīkh, ed B I A Evetts (Anecdota Oxoniensia, Semitic Series, vii, Oxford 1895), p 30, 38, 81, 100 sq, 230, F M Esteves Pereira, Vida do Abba Samuel do mosteiro do Kalamon, Lisbon 1894, p 41—53 (cf Th Noldeke's discussion in Z D M G, xlviii 158—161) F Wustenfeld, Die Statthalter von Ägypten zur Zeit der Chalifen, i, Abh G G W, xx (1875), 2—7, M J de Goeje, De Mokaukis van Egypte, in Etudes archeol ling et hist dediés à C Leemans, Leyden 1885, p 7—9, J v Karabacek, Der Mokaukis von Aegypten (Mittheil a d Sammlung d Papyrus Erzh Rainer, i, 1886) p 1—11, F Amélineau, Fragments coptes pour servir à l'histoire de la conquete de l'Égypte par les Arabes (J A, ser viii, vol xii, 1888), 361—410, do, Samuel de Qalamoun, in R H R, xxx (1894), p 12—24, do, Resumé de l'histoire de l'Egypte, Paris 1894, p 243 (cf also Acad des inscriptions, Comptes rendus, xv 477 sq), A J Butler, On the identity of 'al-Mukaukis' of Egypt, in P S B A, xxiii (1901), p 275–290, the same art enlarged in A J Butler, The Arab Conquest of Egypt and the Last thirty Years of the Roman Dominion, Oxford 1902, appendix C On the identity of al-Mukaukas, p 508—526, L Caetani, Annali dell' Islām, i 725 sqq, iv 86 sqq, 110, 179—181, 233, 239, 244, 255 sq, 261 sq, 330, 337, 342, J B Bury, A History of the later Roman Empire, London 1889, p 214, 262, 270, S Lane-Poole, Egypt in the Middle Ages, London 1924, p 6, J G Milne, A History of Egypt under Roman Rule, London 1898, p 224, O Braun, article Cyrus von Phasis, in Kirchliches Handlexikon, ed by M Buchberger, ii, Munich 1912, col 530, Cantarelli, La serie dei prefetti di Egitto, in Mem R A L, sec morale v, vol xiv, p 432, C H Becker, Islamstudien, i, Leipzig 1924, p 148, G Rouillard, *L'administration civile de l'Egypte byzantine*², Paris 1928, p 187, 230, note 2, p 243 sq, Nau, La politique matrimoniale du Cyrus (le Mocaucas) etc, Le Museon, xlv (1932), p 1—17, cap p 8—17 (A Grohmann)

MUKHADRAM (A), the term applied to an individual whose life fell within the periods of both paganism and Islām Various explanations are given of the origin of the name Some derive it from udhn mukhadrama "cropped ear" and say the meaning is that these people were cut off from the Djāhilīya by Islām (cf nāka mukhadrama "a she-camel with cropped ears") It is said that the tribes who adopted Islam cropped the ears of their camels differently from what they had done in the pagan period A man who had therefore seen both the pagan and Muslim styles was called mukhadram Others derive the word from mā' khadrim "(a well) which contains much water" and explain that a man who has lived in both Djāhilīya and Islām was called mukhadram, since he was fully acquainted with both periods The term muhadram is occasionally found with the same application and the explanation given is that the individuals had mixed paganism and Islām Some commentators describe as mukhadramūn only those who adopted Islām after the death of Muhammad

The word mukhadram is particularly used to describe one of the four classes into which the Arab philologists divide the poets It means those whose work was begun in the period of the Djāhilīya but who lived to see Muhammad and his mission and some even adopted Islām Among these for example were Labīd, al A'shā and Ka'b b Zuhair These poets are still completely immersed in the poetic tradition of the Djāhilīya The new outlook was late in finding its way into poetry so that the change is not yet reflected in the poets who were Muhammad's contemporaries The scheme of the kasīda of the pagan poetry with its fixed themes and stereotyped images also holds for the mukhadramūn and in their poems one can hardly find the slightest hint that they were contemporary with the great religious change in Arabia The only exception is the kasīdas composed in honour of Muhammad, like the kasīda of Ka'b b Zuhair called after its opening words Bānat Su'ād and the panegyric on the Prophet by al-A'shā While these still follow the scheme of the kasīda as regards form they reflect Muhammadan points of view and legal ordinances and also use Kur'ānic phrases

Bibliography W Ahlwardt, Über Poesie und Poetik der Araber, Leipzig 1875, Ka'b b Zuhair, La Banat Sou'ād, ed by R Basset, Algiers 1910, Morgenlandische Forschungen, Festschrift für Fleischer, Leipzig 1875, p 235 sqq, Lisān al-'Arab, xv 75, Tādj al-'Arūs, viii 281, al Suyūtī, Muzhir, section 49 (Ilse Lichtenstadter)

MUKHLIṢ AL-DAWLA [See AL-MUKALLAD

AL-MUKHTĀR B Abī 'Ubaid al-Thakafī, a Shī'a agitator who seized possession of Kūfa in 66 (685—686) The clan of Thakīf to which he belonged was the same as that of the poet Umaiya b Abi 'l-Salt [q v] and another poet, Abī

Mihdjan, was his second cousin (al-Mukhtār's grandfather Masʿūd being the son of ʿAmr b ʿUmair b ʿAwf, cf Wüstenfeld, Gen Tab, G 19) He is said to have been born in 622 (Tabarī, i 1264) a statement which has perhaps no real foundation (cf Tabarī, ii 2 in 40, he was a "young man", ghulām shābb) and based on the fact that his adversary ʿAbd Allāh b al-Zubair was born in the same year His father having died the death of a hero at the battle of the Bridge in 13 against the Persians, the orphan was brought up by his uncle Saʿd b Masʿūd who became governor of al Madāʾin under the caliph ʿAlī Al-Mukhtār was his deputy when Saʿd left al-Madāʾin to go after the Khāridjīs who had left ʿAlī's camp in 37 (Tabarī i 3366, al-Dīnawarī, p 218) His early life and his family traditions therefore made him a partisan of ʿAlī al-Tabaī (ii 2) however says that when ʿAlī's son al-Hasan took refuge with al-Mukhtār's uncle when fleeing from Muʿāwiya in 40, the nephew proposed to surrender him to his rival and he was reproached with this disloyal act 25 years afterwards by the Shīʿīs This is all we know of the early days of one who was destined to become the champion of the extreme Shīʿīs his refusal to bear witness before Ziyād b Abihi against Hudjr b ʿAdī, who was accused of having attempted an anti-Umaiyad rising at Kūfa in 51 (Tabarī, ii 134), shows however that his feelings were already pro-ʿAlid It is only when, after the death of Muʿāwiya, the hopes of the partisans of ʿAlī's family began to rise again, that al-Mukhtār emerges from obscurity, he took part in the rising of Muslim b ʿAkil in 61 and, imprisoned by the governor ʿUbaid Allāh b Ziyād, he was only released after the failure of al-Husain's attempt and returned to Mecca, where ʿAbd Allāh b al Zubair was secretly engaged in preparing the movement which was to take him to the head of the anti Umaiyad rising It is alleged that al-Mukhtār, after vainly trying to compromise Ibn al-Zubair prematurely, disappeared from Mecca for a whole year which he spent in his native town of al-Tāʾif It was no doubt in this period that the ideas ripened in him which made him the initiator and leader in a new political and religious phase of the Shiʿa movement, but of the way in which his ideas came to him, their immediate origin and the influences which went to form them, history unfortunately knows nothing

In any case, al-Mukhtār returned to al-Zubair, who had in the meanwhile been publicly recognised as caliph, and fought bravely at the first siege of Mecca in 64 But his adhesion to the cause of Ibn al-Zubair had no other object than to enable him to return to Kūfa which was then under the anti-Umaiyad caliph According to one source which is in contradiction to Tabarī, al-Mukhtār was sent by al-Zubair himself to the capital of the ʿIrāk to take charge of its administration, having promised him the support of the ʿAlid party (al-Masʿūdī, Murūdj, v 70), it seems more probable that, as Tabarī says, he went there of his own accord to carry out his plans for a Shiʿa revival

The Shīʿīs of Kūfa were at this time (Ramadān 64) under the influence of Sulaimān b Surad [q v] Al-Mukhtār did not wish to join his party and began propaganda of his own, saying he was the emissary of Muhammad, son of ʿAlī called Ibn al-Hanafīya from the name of his mother's tribe [cf MUHAMMAD B AL HANAFĪYA] The motives which gave al-Mukhtār the idea that he could pass off as the legitimate successor to the rights of ʿAlī, this son, who was not born of Fāṭima, the daughter of the Prophet, have not been fully explained, but as the other children of ʿAlī who had escaped the massacre of Kerbelāʾ were quite incapable, al-Mukhtār's choice was limited In any case, his fiery and peculiar eloquence (he pronounced his discourses in sadjʿ with obscure phrases and expressions which recalled the Kurʾān, without being a slavish imitation of it, he also said or allowed it to be said of him that he was inspired by the angel Gabriel) was able to gain partisans for the idea of the Mahdī whose imminent coming would restore the rule of the true religion Without being yet openly hostile to the rule of Ibn al-Zubair, al-Mukhtār's attitude was suspected He was therefore imprisoned by the Zubairid governor ʿAbd Allāh b Yazid al-Anṣārī but his captivity was not rigorous and enabled him to remain in contact with the people of Kūfa After the defeat and death of Sulaimān b Surad, which he had predicted, he was set at liberty on guaranteeing he would not fight against the Zubairid government Al Mukhtār took advantage of the liberty restored to him to secure the cooperation of Ibrāhīm b al-Ashtar, son of ʿAlī's famous general, who kept up his father's traditions The latter hesitated long before accepting al-Mukhtār's proposals and only agreed on receiving a letter, undoubtedly a forgery, in which Ibn al-Hanafiya introduced al-Mukhtār to him as his plenipotentiary (amīn) and minister (wazīr)

The rising then began (14 Rabīʿ I 66) the resistance of the chiefs of the tribes (the Ashrāf), who while opposed to the Umaiyads and former fighters by the side of ʿAlī, had long lost their enthusiasm for the cause of his family, was overcome by the onslaught of the troops, composed for the most part of adventurers and mawālī led by Ibn al Ashtar, a most capable warrior The Zubairid governor fled (he was at this time ʿAbd Allāh b Muṭīʿ al Kurashī), the Ashraf capitulated and al Mukhtār, undisputed lord of Kūfa, rapidly extended his power over Mesopotamia and the eastern provinces, to which he at once appointed governors the south alone, with Basra, remained to Ibn al-Zubair

Al-Mukhtār had naturally to give the Ashrāf positions of authority in his organisation but he could not completely gain their confidence Although old partisans of ʿAlī, or sons of partisans, they were moderates who distrusted al Mukhtār as an extremist and demagogue indeed, the favour which the latter showed to the mawālī, who formed his real support, threatened to overthrow the system on which the political and economic supremacy of the Arabs over the native population was based, for not even the conversion of the latter to Islām had made them equal to their conquerors Al-Mukhtār therefore was faced with the necessity of deciding for one or other He preferred the mawālī party, probably more from genuine conviction than for political reasons he must have believed that the triumph of the Mahdī whom he foretold would make all believers equal without distinction of race During the absence of the army which had gone under Ibn al-Ashtar to fight ʿAbd al-Malik's troops, the Ashrāf made an attempt to overthrow al-Mukhtār who was forced to temporize with them, but succeeding in informing Ibn al

Ashtar of his difficulty, the latter returned to Kūfa and completely routed the enemies of al-Mukhtār This was the signal for putting into execution the latter's full Shīʿa programme, all those who had taken part in the murder of al-Husain, or had neglected to defend him, were put to death This bloody deed seemed to have divine approval, for two days later the Syrian army which had set out for the ʿIrāḳ was completely routed on the banks of the Khazīr by Ibn al-Ashtar, and its leader ʿUbaid Allāh b Ziyād, who had defeated and killed al Husain, was killed in the battle (Muharram 67) In the fanatical enthusiasm of these days in which the Shīʿa cause seemed to have won a definite success there took place episodes of great religious interest although unfortunately not yet clearly explained, notably the worship of the empty chair (Ṭabarī, ii 702—706, cf al-Mubarrad, al Kāmil, ed Wright, p 597–600) But in spite of his successes at home and abroad, al Mukhtār was threatened by the presence in Basra of the brother of ʿAbd Allāh b al Zubair, Muṣʿab, whose army, organised by al-Muhallab b Abi Ṣufra, hardened in the war with the Khāridjis and strengthened by the accession of the Kūfan Ashrāf who had left the town, was one to be feared Indeed, the Shīʿī troops were defeated by it at al Madhār on the Tigris, a little later at Ḥarūrā', they suffered a complete rout, mainly because of the absence of Ibn al-Ashtar who was in the north at al Mawṣil and whom al Mukhtār either through distrust of him or through excess of confidence in himself had neglected to recall Al Mukhtār who had taken refuge in the citadel of Kūfa held out there valiantly for four months Finally abandoned by most of his men, he was slain in a desperate sortie (Ramaḍān 14, 67) His body was mutilated, his hand suspended at the gate of the great mosque (and it was only taken down many years later by al-Ḥadjdjādj), one of his wives, who would not disown him, was executed in brutal fashion, although she was the daughter of al-Nuʿmān b Bashīr al-Anṣārī, who had been governor of Kūfa under Muʿāwiya A great many of al-Mukhtār's followers were also massacred

The nature of the movement led by al-Mukhtār has been variously judged by modern historians The historical tradition which grew up in Kūfa, especially in the milieu of the Ashrāf, is naturally hostile and regards him as an adventurer and false prophet His conduct was undoubtedly somewhat crooked occasionally, the way in which he exploited the name of Ibn al-Hanafīya (who never wished to be completely compromised in the business of the Mahdī) was not quite fair But neither these doings nor his double dealing with regard to the Ashrāf (they paid him back however only too well) are sufficient to convict him of bad faith They were tactical expedients which every one who wants to stir the masses is justified in employing for the triumph of his cause It seems certain that al-Mukhtār sincerely believed in his mission, and his equalitarian ideas about the mawālī, although premature, were, as the future was to show, the only ones which could secure to Islām its later expansion and transform it from the exclusively Arab movement it was at first into a world wide civilization What is still and will remain mysterious in the personality of al-Mukhtār (Wellhausen rightly observes that "demoniac" natures like his are always problematic), is the manner in which he arrived (no doubt through a crisis within himself) at the religious and eschatological conception of the Shīʿa of which he was the creator and which is infinitely greater than the expiatory sacrifice of the tawwābūn of Sulaimān b Ṣurad It is owing to this conception that the importance of the movement started by al-Mukhtār is far greater than the ephemeral political success which he enjoyed, in the popular enthusiasm which welcomed his propaganda we see the germs of the ideas which transformed the Shīʿa from a political movement to a religious doctrine In what measure these ideas were in existence before al-Mukhtār, in what relation they stood to that enigmatical personage ʿAbd Allāh b Ṣaba' and his disciples are points that are still obscure But if he was not the inventor of the doctrine of the Mahdī, it was undoubtedly he who in locating in a real person, Muhammad b al-Hanafīya, the mystical figure of the Messiah, the restorer of the true religion, gave it the stamp which was henceforth typical of Imāmī doctrines

The name Mukhtāriya is borne by one of the many Shīʿa subdivisions given in the lists of the writers on heresies, but it is doubtful if it ever had a real existence as an organised sect, especially as the sources which mention it do not clearly distinguish it from the Kaisāniya [q v] and the Khashabiya [q v], which seem very likely to be the legitimate successors of the teachings of al-Mukhtār

Bibliography The principal and almost the only source for the history of al-Mukhtār is al-Ṭabarī (ed de Goeje), ii 530—752 and passim, which is based for the most part on the statements of eye-witnesses of the events The secondary sources add practically nothing new, they are quoted in Caetani, Chronographia islamica, a 64 § 13, 65 § 6, 66 §§ 5—7, 9—12, 67 §§ 2, 4, 42 (a few details also in the biography of Muhammad b al Hanafīya in Ibn Saʿd, v 71—77), H D van Gelder, Mokhtâr de valsche Propheet, Leyden 1888, J Wellhausen, Die relpol Oppositionsparteien im alten Islam (Abh G W Gott, N S, v 2, 1901), p 74—89 Cf also the bibliography given in the articles KAISĀNIYA and KHASHABIYA (add al-Nawbakhtī, Firak al Shīʿa, ed Ritter [Bibl Islamica, iv, 1931], p 20—30) (G LEVI DELLA VIDA)

MUKHTĀR PASHA, GHĀZĪ AHMAD, a Turkish general and statesman, was born in Sept 1832, the son of a high official in Brussa, and received a military training there and in Constantinople (officer in 1854) He took part in the Crimean War, from 1860 taught in the Mekteb i Harbīye as professor of the art of war and in 1865 was tutor to the prince Yūsuf ʿIzz al-Dīn After holding a command in Albania (1867—1870) he distinguished himself under Redif Pasha in the Yaman campaign, the conduct of which he took over in 1871 as General of Division and Pasha On his return he was given the title of mushīr In the Herzegovina he was defeated in 1876 at the Duga Pass After the declaration of war by Russia (April 24, 1877) he was given the supreme command on the Caucasus front, where after at first having to retire to Koprükoy, he counter-attacked at Dahar (June 21) and Ziwin (June 25) and forced the Russians under the Armenian generals Loris-Melikoff and Ter-Hugassoff, to evacuate Ottoman territory and occupied Sukhum,

Successes in August on the Yaghnī Dagh and at Kïzïl-Tepe (near Bash Gedikler) earned him the title of honour of Ghāzī [q v] but did not prevent the collapse of the army in Oct—Nov [cf DEWE BOYUN, KARS and ERZERUM] Appointed Commander-in-Chief of the Artillery, he restored peace in Crete in 1878, in 1879—1885 he served as commissioner on the Greek frontier As a result of the Anglo Turkish agreement of Oct 24, 1885, he became the first High Commissioner of the Porte in Egypt, holding the post till 1906 and playing a part in the Taba affair In this period he busied himself with the question of reforming the calendar, he advocated a uniform Hidjra solar year for all Muslims (see Bibl)

From Dec 1908 Vice-President of the Ottoman Senate, he proposed in the National Assembly of April 27, 1909 to give prince Reshād the name Mehmed V in memory of the first conqueror (Fātih) of Constantinople [see MUHAMMAD II] (communication of ʿAbd al-Rahman Sherief to Martin Hartmann), he himself led the deputation which announced his accession as Sultān Caliph and brought him to the War Ministry to receive the oath of allegiance [cf BAIʿA] On Oct 14, 1911 he succeeded Saʿīd Pasha [q v] as President of the Senate and on July 22, 1912 as grand-vizier in the cabinet of the "Great Ones" (Buyukler) Under pressure from the association of old-Turkish officers (Khalāṣkārān) he persuaded the Senate on Aug 4 by a bold interpretation of the constitution to declare the session of Parliament closed He endeavoured to free the army and civil service from politics, obtained an amnesty for Albania, recalled Ahmad ʿIzzet Pasha from the Yaman, instituted the Naval Medal and Medal of the Red Crescent, obtained favourable terms in the treaty of peace with Italy (Oct 18, 1912) but could not avert the catastrophe in the Balkan War On Oct 29, 1912 he retired in favour of Kāmil Pasha, but remained a member of the Senate till 1918, in which on Feb 12, 1917 he advocated the adoption of the Gregorian calendar and rejection of the Christian reckoning for the financial year He died on Jan 21, 1919 Mahmūd Mukhtār Pasha is his son

Bibliography Général Izzet-Fuad, Autres Occasions perdues , Critique stratégique de la Campagne d'Asie Mineure 1877—1878, Paris 1908 (Izzet-Fuad Pasha makes use of Mehmed ʿĀrif Bey's book Bashïmïza Gelenler which was inspired by Mukhtār Pasha), Ghazi Ahmed Moukhtar Pacha, La Reforme du Calendrier (transl O N E), Leyden 1893, Collection Dustūr, Tertīb i thānī, vol i, v, vii, Osmanischer Lloyd, Constantinople 1908—1912 and other scattered sources (G JASCHKE)

MUKHTĀRĪ, SIRĀDJ AL-DĪN ʿUTHMĀN B MUHAMMAD AL-MUKHTĀRĪ AL GHAZNAWĪ, court poet of the later Ghaznawids Ibrāhim b Masʿūd II (1059—1099) and Masʿūd III b Ibrāhīm (1099—1114) He lived for a considerable period in Kirmān, where he wrote panegyrics on the Saldjūk Arslān Shāh b Kirmānshāh (1101–1141) The great poet Madjd al-Dīn Sanāʾī showed him the greatest reverence and celebrated him in a long kaṣīda as the best poet of his time He could not have been Sanāʾī's teacher, as the Bankipore Catalogue (i 32) says, since he must have been only a year or two older than Sanāʾī His influence however is quite marked in many of Sanāʾī's works One of Mukhtārī's philosophical kasīdas may be regarded as the one of the finest examples of the old Persian school of poetry since nazīras on it were written by the best poets such as Khākānī, Amīr Khusraw, Athīr-i Akhsïkatī, ʿAbd al Rahmān Djāmī and Nawāʾī His chief work is a large Dīwān of lyrics, the majority of which are panegyrics in the style of the old Ghazna wid poets like ʿUnsurī and Farrūkhī, and dedicated to Arslān-Shāh, Bahrām Shāh, Adud al Dawla Dailamī, Tamghash Khan and a number of viziers Besides these kasīda's there were in the Dīwan a few short mathnawī's, one of which of an astronomical nature seems to have had a great influence on later poetry We should probably also ascribe to our poet the authorship of the Shāhriyār-nāma, an imitation of the Shāh nāma, the hero of which is Shāhriyār son of Barzū son of Suhrāb, i e a great-grandson of Rustam, and the action of which is laid in India The poem is dedicated to Masʿūd III, in the preface the poet says that he has worked at it for three years and hoped for a present worthy of this labour If he does not receive this gift however, he will not write a satire this, seems to be a direct reference to Firdawsī The year of Mukhtārī's death is not exactly known, 530 (1135), 534 (1139), 544 (1149) and 554 (1159) are mentioned The last date seems to be the right one

Bibliography H Ethé, Neupersische Literatur (Gr I Ph, ii 234, 256—257), Dawlatshāh, p 93, Madjmaʿ al Fusahāʾ, i 598—607 A manuscript of the Shahriyār nāma in Rieu, ii 542 (E BERTHELS)

AL-MUKĪT [see ALIYĀH, II]

MUKRĀ, a district and village in the Yaman, a day's journey south of Sanʿāʾ The Arab geographers mention a cornelian mine here The name is also given to a mountain in the Yaman Sarat According to Sprenger, we cannot connect the Himyar tribe of this name with the Μοκρῖται of Ptolemy

Bibliography al-Hamdānī, Sifat Djazirat al ʿArab, ed D H Muller (Leyden 1884–1891), p 68, 104 sq , al-Mukaddasī, B G A, iii 91, al Hamadhānī, B G A, v 36, Ibn Khurdādhbih, vi 141, al-Yaʿkūbī, B G A, vii 319, Yākūt, Muʿdjam, ed F Wustenfeld, iii 130, iv 437, 603, A Sprenger, Die alte Geographie Arabiens, Bern 1875, p 244 (A GROHMANN)

MUKTADAB, name of the thirteenth metre in Arabic prosody, very little used, in theory it consists of three feet, with two successive mustafʿilun, in each hemistich, but in practice it has only two

There is one ʿarūd and one darb

mafʿūlātu mustafʿilun mafʿūlātu mustafʿilun However, mafʿūlātu should lose its f (maʿūlātu = faʿūlātu) or change its ū to u, which is very frequent (mafʿulātu = fāʿilātu)

Mustafʿilun can never retain its f (mustaʿilun = muftaʿilun) (MOH BENCHENFA)

AL MUḳTADĪ BI AMRI 'LLĀH, ABU 'L-KĀSIM ʿABD ALLĀH B MUHAMMAD, ʿAbbāsid caliph His father was a son of the caliph al-Kāʾim and his mother an Armenian slave girl named Urdjuwān After the death of his grandfather al Kāʾim in Shaʿbān 467 (April 1075), al-Muktadī succeeded him as caliph The real ruler was the Saldjūḳ sultān Malikshāh [q v] to whose daughter al-Muktadī was married in 480 (1087) By 482 (1089) however, she had returned to her father because she was neglected by the caliph Malikshāh, who wished to prevent the caliph interfering in affairs of state, endeavoured to induce him to leave Baghdād and take up his residence in another town, this plan however came to nothing through the death of the sultān in Shawwāl 485 (Nov 1092) and al-Muktadī was left in peace in the capital About this time the power of the Saldjūks reached its greatest height and in all the lands conquered by them the spiritual supremacy of the caliph was recognised Al Muktadī died suddenly on 15th or 19th Muharram 487 (4th or 8th Feb 1094) at the age of 38 He was perhaps poisoned by Malikshāh's son and successor, Barkiyārūk [q v] whom he had offended by confirming the selection of his minor brother Mahmūd as sultān

Bibliography Ibn al Athīr, ed Tornberg, x, see Index Ibn al-Ṭiktakā al Fakhrī, ed Derenbourg, p 398—403, Muhammad b Shākir, Fawāt al-Wafayat, i 233, Ibn Khaldūn, al ʿIbar, iii 472 sqq, Hamd Allāh Mustawfī i Kazwīnī, Taʾrīkh i Guzīda, ed Browne, i 359 sq, Weil, Gesch d Chalifen, iii 121—137, Houtsma, Recueil de textes relatifs a l'histoire des Seldjoucides, ii 12, 22, 45, 49—81, Le Strange, Baghdad during the Abbasid Caliphate, p 283, 292 sq, 326 (K V Zetterstéen)

AL-MUKTADIR [See Allāh, II]

AL MUKTADIR BI 'LLĀH, ABU 'L FADL DJAʿFAR B AHMAD, ʿAbbāsid caliph, son of al Muʿtadid and a slave named Shaghab After the death of his brother al-Muktafī in Dhu 'l Kaʿda 295 (Aug 908), al-Muktadir who was only 13 at the time was proclaimed caliph Many however preferred ʿAbd Allāh, son of the caliph al Muʿtazz, and after the murder of the vizier al ʿAbbās b al Hasan b Ahmad [q v], al Muktadir was declared to be deposed and Ibn al Muʿtazz elected caliph The eunuch Muʾnis [q v] came forward to save al Muktadir, Ibn al Muʿtazz was slain and al-Muktadir retained the caliphate He showed very little independence however and allowed himself to be guided, sometimes by the personnel of the harem and sometimes by the viziers among whom special mention may be made of the intriguing Ibn al-Furāt [q v] and the brave Ibn al Djarrāh [q v] Al-Muktadir's caliphate was therefore marked by a gradual decline In his reign the dynasties of the Fātimids [q v] and Hamdānids [q v] became independent The Karmatians also rebelled once more In the years 307 (919—920) and 311 (923) Basra was plundered by the Karmatian chief Abū Ṭāhir Sulaymān [cf AL DJANNĀBĪ] and at the end of the year 311 (924) he fell upon the pilgrim caravan returning from Mecca In Dhu 'l-Kaʿda of the following year (925) he attacked the caravan which was going on the pilgrimage to Mecca from Baghdād and put it to flight He next plundered al-Kūfa and then returned to Bahrain An army sent against the Karmatians under the command of Muʾnis arrived only after they had retired In 314 (926—927) Yūsuf b Abī 'l-Sādj was summoned from Ādharbāydjān to help, but Sulaymān defeated him in Shawwāl of the following year (Dec 927) and took him prisoner The caliph's troops did not dare to give battle and in Muharram 316 (March 928) Sulaymān seized the town of al-Rahaba After an unsuccessful attack on al-Rakka he retired, in 317 (929—930), or, according to others, in 316, he plundered Mecca and carried off the Black Stone On the Byzantine frontier both sides continued their raids with varying fortunes In 305 (917) the Byzantines made an offer of peace and after two years peace was definitely concluded, but hostilities very soon broke out again In 314 (926—927) the Byzantines ravaged the district of Malatya and in the following year they crossed a considerable part of Armenia After taking several Armenian cities which belonged to the Arabs (316 = 928—929) and occupying northern Mesopotamia (317 = 929—930) they lost all their gains in 319—320 (= 931—932) In Muharram 317 (Feb 929) a rebellion broke out in the capital Al Muktadir was forced to abdicate but was brought to a place of safety by Muʾnis, while the soldiery plundered the palace His brother Muhammad was summoned to be Commander of the Faithful in his stead with the style al-Kāhir, but since the chief leader of the rebels, the head of police Nāzūk, could not satisfy the demands of the troops for higher pay, al-Kahir was deposed after a few days and al Muktadir placed on the throne once more In Baghdad the confusion increased and in 320 (932) the catastrophe came The enemies of Muʾnis took advantage of his absence to persuade the caliph that Muʾnis intended to dethrone him and when Munis approached at the head of his army, al Muktadir was persuaded with great reluctance to take the field against him, he fell at the beginning of the encounter (27th Shawwāl 320 = Oct 31, 932) See also the article MUHAMMAD B YĀKŪT

Bibliography Tabarī, ed de Goeje, iii 2280—2294, ʿArīb, ed de Goeje, p 21—186, Masʿūdī, Murūdj, ed Paris, viii 247—286, ix 6, 8, 47, 52, Kitāb al-Aghānī, ii 76, v 32, Ibn al Athīr, ed Tornberg, viii 6 sqq, Ibn al Ṭiktakā, al Fakhrī, ed Derenbourg, p 352—374, Ibn Khaldūn, al-ʿIbar, iii 358 sqq, Weil, Gesch d Chalifen, ii 540 sqq, A Muller, Der Islam im Morgen und Abendland, i 532 sqq, Muir, The caliphate, its rise, decline, and fall, new ed by Weir, p 563, 565, Le Strange, Baghdad during the Abbasid Caliphate, see Index, do, A Greek Embassy to Baghdād in 917 A D, in JRAS, 1897, p 35 sqq, M Bowen, Life and Times ʿAlī ibn ʿĪsā, Cambridge 1928

(K V Zetterstéen)

AL MUKTAFĪ LI AMR 'LLĀH, ABŪ ʿABD ALLĀH MUHAMMAD, ʿAbbāsid caliph, born on 12th Rabīʿ II 489 (April 9, 1096), son of al-Mustaẓhir and a slave girl After the deposition of his nephew al Rashīd, al-Muktafī was acknowledged as caliph on the 8th Dhu 'l Hidjdja 530 (Sept 17, 1136) While the Saldjūks were fighting among themselves, he did his best not only to maintain his independence but also to extend his, rule and one district after the other in the ʿIrāk fell into his hands In 543 (1148) a number of emīrs announced their allegiance to Sultān Masʿūd and marched on Baghdād but dispersed after several encounters with the caliph's troops According to some sources, the same thing took place again next year In Radjab 547 (Oct 1152) Masʿūd died, and was succeeded by his nephew Malikshāh who was deposed in a few months and succeeded by his brother Muhammad In the meanwhile the caliph seized the two towns of al-Hilla and Wāsiṭ In the following year Sultān Sandjar who lived in Khurāsān was attacked and taken prisoner by the rebel Ghuzz [q v] whereupon his emīrs proclaimed Masʿūd's

brother Sulaimānshāh sultān In Muharram 551 (Feb–March 1156) the latter was recognised by the caliph on condition that he did not interfere in the affairs of the ʿIrāk Although al-Muktafī supported him he was defeated in Djumādā I (June—July) of the same year by his nephew Muhammad and the latter's auxiliary In Dhu 'l-Hidjdja (Jan–Feb 1157) Sultān Muhammad advanced on Baghdād to take vengeance on the caliph The latter had to retire to the eastern part of the town and was besieged there for several months In Rabīʿ I 552 (May 1151) however, the sultān suddenly raised the siege because Malikshāh was advancing on Hamadhan As the latter therefore retired, hostilities automatically ceased and Muhammad is said to have later made his peace with al-Muktafī The latter twice besieged Takrīt in vain, on the other hand, he succeeded in taking Lihf The Crusaders continued their hostilities in al Muktafī's caliphate The most powerful pillar of Islām was the Atābeg of al-Mawsil, ʿImād al-Dīn Zangī, and his son Nūr al-Dīn Mahmūd in Syria Al-Muktafī died on 2nd Rabīʿ I 555 (March 12, 1160)

Bibliography Ibn al-Athīr (ed Tornberg), xi 27 sqq, Ibn al Ṭiktaḳā, al-Fakhrī (ed Derenbourg), p 416—425, Ibn Khaldūn, al-ʿIbar, iii 512 sqq, Hamd Allāh Mustawfī-i Kazwīnī, Taʾrīkh-i Guzīda (ed Browne), i 364 sq, Weil, Gesch d Chalifen, iii 219, 258—306, Houtsma, Recueil de textes relatifs a l'histoire des Sel djoucides, ii, see Index

(K V Zetterstéen)

AL-MUKTAFĪ BI 'LLĀH, ABŪ MUHAMMAD ʿALĪ B AHMAD, ʿAbbāsid caliph, son of al-Muʿtadid and a Turkish slave girl named Čiček (Arabic Djidjak) In 281 (894—895) he was appointed by his father governor of al-Raiy and several towns in the neighbourhood, and five years later he was made governor of Mesopotamia and took up his quarters in al-Rakka After the death of al-Muʿtadid on 22nd Rabīʿ II, 289 (April 5, 902), he ascended the throne and at once won the good-will of the people by his liberality and by destroying the subterranean dungeons in the capital He proved a brave and fearless leader who fought with success against the many enemies of the caliphate The Karmatians were ravaging Syria, one town after another fell into their hands and Damascus itself was plundered On the 6th Muharram 291 (Nov 29, 903) the general Muhammad b Sulaimān finally succeeded in inflicting a crushing defeat on them and they scattered in all directions Muhammad then turned his attention to Egypt where he put an end to the rule of the Tūlūnids Many of their followers joined him and after the Tūlūnid Hārūn b Khumārawaih had been slain, the capital had to surrender (Safar 292 = Jan 905) and ʿĪsā al-Nūsharī was appointed governor of Egypt An attempt to restore the Tūlūnids was easily crushed (293 = 905—906) About this time the Karmatians again began to be troublesome and at the beginning of the year 294 (Oct–Nov 906) they attacked the great pilgrim caravan returning from Mecca, massacred the men and carried off the women and children In Rabīʿ I of the same year (Dec 906—Jan 907) they were defeated near al-Kādisīya by the caliph's troops under Wasīf b Ṣawārtegīn The war with the Byzantines was also vigorously pursued In 291 (903—904) a Greek named Leo who had adopted Islām undertook a number of raids on the Greek coasts with his fleet of 54 ships The Byzantines however had the advantage by land In 292 (904—905) Maraʿash, al-Massīsa and Tarsūs were taken by the Greek general Andronicus and in the following year the Byzantines advanced as far as Halab Then the Muslims gained the upper hand and Andronicus went over to them Al-Muktafī died in Dhu 'l Kaʿda 295 (Aug 908) at the age of 31, cf also the article AL-ʿABBĀS B AL HASAN B AHMAD

Bibliography Tabarī (ed de Goeje), iii 2140 sqq, 2207—2281, ʿArīb (ed de Goeje), p 1 sqq, Masʿūdī, Murūdj (ed Paris), viii 213–247, ix 47, 52, Kitāb al-Aghānī, viii 54, ix 141, xv 99, Ibn al-Athīr (ed Tornberg), vii 324 sqq, viii 4 sqq, Ibn al-Ṭiktaḳā, al-Fakhrī (ed Derenbourg), p 350—352, Muhammad b Shākir, Fawāt al-Wafayāt, ii 41 sq, Ibn Khaldūn, al-ʿIbar, iii 352 sqq, Weil, Gesch d Chalifen, Rise, ii 483, 488, 516 sqq, Muir, The Caliphate, its Decline, and Fall, new ed, p 554 sqq, Le Strange, Baghdad during the Abbasid Caliphate, p 120, 195, 252 sqq (K V Zetterstéen)

AL-MUKTANĀ, BAHĀʾ AL DĪN, a Druse missionary and author, with his teacher Hamza (b ʿAlī, q v) founder of the theological system of the Druses [q v], the fifth minister of the Druse theogony, with several titles of honour, in addition to the above two al-Djanāh, al-Aisar, al Tālī, al-Khayāl, al Mukāsir etc His "secular" name was Abu 'l-Hasan ʿAlī b Ahmad al-Samūkī Of his life practically nothing is known As Arab historians are silent about him (Silvestre de Sacy, Expose de la religion des Druzes, ii 320), his own writings are almost the only source According to Druse tradition, he was kādi in Alexandria in al-Hākim's time [q v] (M v Oppenheim, Vom Mittelmeer zum Persischen Golf, i, Berlin 1899, p 135) As his works reveal quite a good knowledge (not without misunderstandings) of Christian religion and literature, he may have been born a Christian, probably in Syria Only for the period of his teaching do we have chronological exactness His taklīd of investiture is dated on the 13th Shaʿbān of the third year of Hamza's mission i e 411 (1020) (S de Sacy, op cit, i 474—475, ii 309, 313, transl, ibid, ii 297—309) The earliest of his known writings is of the tenth year of Hamza, 418 A H (ibid, ii 326) In consequence one must assume that he came to the front after the disappearance of al Hākim and Hamza His activity was not a continuous one and he had even to live for a time in concealment (about the year 17—18 of Hamza, see S de Sacy, op cit, ii 364), whether in Egypt or Syria is not certain (H Guys, La nation druze, p 114) The latest date known in his writings is the 26th year of Hamza, i e 433—434 (1042) (S de Sacy, op cit, i 496, ii 379) His farewell epistle dates from this year, according to it he had retired into concealment (ibid, i 514—515, ii 358), nothing more is known of him The "Druse theogony" does not agree with these dates, it gives 17 years as the period of his activity (H Guys, op cit, p 107) Ph Hitti's assertion (The Origins of the Druze People, p 11) that he died in 1031 is due to a misunderstanding

Druse tradition not unjustly ranks him with Hamza and regards him as the greatest theological writer, to whom four of the sacred books are ascribed (M v Oppenheim, op cit, i 135–137) These are not books in the proper sense but collections of separate tracts, usually in the form of epistles, directed to followers of the Druse teaching or of other creeds in various lands (Byzantium, Syria, Egypt, Arabia, India) They are to this day frequently read by the Druses in their khalawāt, commentaries were written on some of them by the last independent Druse theologian ʿAbd Allāh al-Tanūkhī (d 1480, on him see Ph Hitti, op cit, p 53, 71, M v Oppenheim, op cit, i 137) Of the some 110 Druse treatises so far known in Europe, 70 are ascribed by S de Sacy to al Muktanā (op cit, i 484 and 496) Except for a few short texts published by S de Sacy along with other writings of Hamza (see Bibl) very few have been printed, namely the Kitāb al Bad' by Chr Seybold (s Bibl) and al-Risālat al-Kustantiniya, sent in 1028 to the Byzantine Emperor Constantine VIII, by J Khalil and L Ronzevalle (s Bibl and extracts in Hitti, op cit, p 64—67) Others are accessible only in translations and extracts (espec in Silvestre de Sacy, al-Risālat al-Masihiya, a synopsis in Hitti, op cit, p 68—70) As with other Druse writers, the style is very obscure and artificial, frequently embellished with rhymed prose

Silvestre de Sacy, whose book still is the most important collection of material, regards al-Muktanā as "un enthousiaste de bonne foi" (op cit, i 508) It is highly desirable that some one should devote a special study to his life and work, paying particular attention to the authenticity of his works and to a critical edition of them

Bibliography (cf also the references in the text) Silvestre de Sacy, Expose de la religion des Druses, ii, Paris 1838, p 297—384 and passim The German version is still valuable for its Index Ph Wolff, Die Drusen und ihre Vorläufer, Leipzig 1845, p 394-402 and passim, H Guys, La nation druze, Paris 1863, p 106–115 and do, Theogonie des Druzes, Paris 1863, p 66—68, 119—120, Philip R Hitti, The Origins of the Druze People and Religion, New York 1928, Index, Silvestre de Sacy, Chrestomathie arabe[2], ii, Paris 1826, p 67–105 (text) and p 191—273 (transl), by al-Muktanā are N° 9—11 and probably N° 7, Chr Seybold, Die Drusenschrift Kitāb Alnoqat Waldawā'ir Das Buch der Punkte und Kreise, Kirchhain N-L, 1902, p ix and p 76–79 (Kitāb al Bad'), J Khalil and L Ronzevalle, L'Épitre à Constantin, in MFOB, iii, Bairūt 1909, p 493–534

(Ign Kratschkowsky)

MULAI [See Mawlā]

MULK (a), royal power, is used in the Kur'ān with reference to God and to certain pre-Islāmic personages, who all appear in the Old Testament, and in the former case is synonymous with malakūt, the latter word however occurs only four times in the Kur'ān and always with a dependent genitive (kull shaiʿ or al samawat wa 'l ard) while mulk is often used absolutely To God alone belongs mulk, He has no associate therein, to Him belongs mulk over heaven and earth as well as over the judgment He gives mulk to whom He will, the unbelievers have no share in it Shaitān promised Ādam imperishable mulk and tempted him with this promise to eat of the shadjarat al khuld (Sūra xx 118) Nimrūd endeavours to claim for himself God's mulk against Ibrāhīm (ii 260) but God gives mulk to the family of Ibrāhīm (iv 57) Yūsuf thanks God in prayer for the mulk which He has given him (xxi 102) Firʿawn boasts of his right to the mulk Miṣr (xliii 50), God wills to give Ṭālūt mulk over the recalcitrant Israelites and to send the tābūt as a sign (ii 248 sqq) Dāwūd's mulk is mentioned ii 252 and xxxviii 19 and Sulaimān's ii 96, the latter prays for it (xxxviii 34)

That the conception of mulk was not carried over into Muslim law generally has been explained in the article MALIK, an exception is Egypt during the Ayyūbid period and in quite modern times Cf also the article ʿĀDJ and G Richter, Studien zur Geschichte der älteren arab Furstenspiegel (Leipz Sem Studien, N F, iii, 1932), esp p 6

(M Plessner)

MULTĀN is an ancient town of the Pandjāb situated in 30° 12′ N and 71° 31′ E, and has been known at various times as Kashtpūr, Hanspūr, Bāgpūr, Sanb or Sanābpūr, and finally Mulasthān, of which Multān is a corruption This name is derived from that of the idol and temple of the sun, a shrine of vast wealth, which the Arabs, who plundered it, named dār al dhahab, or the house of gold It remained the Arab capital, and the outpost of Islām in India, for three centuries but by A D 900 its ruler had become independent of Baghdād At this time it was seized by ʿAbd Allāh the Karmatī, and became a stronghold of the Karmatian heretics, who were crushed and expelled by the orthodox Mahmūd of Ghaznī The town and province remained nominally subject to his descendants until Khusraw Malik, the last of them, was carried into captivity by Muʿizz al Dīn Muhammad b Sām, when it became a province of his Indian empire On his death the governor, Nāsir al Dīn Kabāča, attempted to establish his independence of Dihlī, but Kutb al-Dīn Aibak reduced him to obedience, and the province remained nominally subject to Dihlī from 1206 to 1438 when Shaikh Yūsuf Kuraishī became independent ruler of Multān and was followed by the kings of the Langāh tribe, who reigned until 1527 The town was occupied both by Tīmūr in 1397 and by Bābūr in 1528

The province was one of the sūbas of Akbar's empire, and remained nominally subject to his successors until 1752, when its allegiance was transferred to Kābul It was threatened by the Sikhs as early as 1771, but was not annexed by them until 1818, when Randjīt Singh took the city by storm It was not affected by the first Sikh war, but the murder of two British officers by Mūlrādj led to the second Sikh war, and the city was captured on January 3, 1849 Its fortifications were dismantled in 1854 and its garrison was disarmed in the mutiny of 1857

Bibliography Firishta, Gulshan i Ibrāhimī (Bombay 1832), Tabakāt i Akbarī, by Nizām al-Dīn Ahmad, Sir Edward D Maclagan, Gazetteer of the Multan District (Lahore 1902)

(T W Haig)

MU'MIN, title of sūra xl See also Allāh, II and Īmān

AL-MU'MINŪN, title of sūra xxiii

AL MUMĪT [See Allāh, II]

MUMKIN [See Mantik]

AL-MUMTAHINA, title of sūra lx

MUMTĀZ, Barkhwurdār b Mahmūd Turkmān Farāhī, a Persian writer, a contemporary of the Safawid Sultān Husain (1694—1722) At an early age he left his native town of Farāh

and went to Marw where he entered the service of the governor Aslān-Khān After two years however, he left this post and became munshī with Hasan Kūlī Khān Shāmlū Kūrčī bāshī in Isfahān At a banquet there at his master's house he heard a story which attracted him exceedingly He wrote it down and it became the foundation of a great collection, Mahfilārā, which contained about 400 stories and consisted of a mukaddama, eight bāb and a khātima Soon afterwards he returned to Farāh, spent some time in Herāt and Meshhed and then entered the service of the emīr Minūčihr Khān b Kārčighāy whose duty it was to defend Darūn and Khabūshān against raids by the wild nomad tribes His stay there was disastrous for Mumtāz, since he lost all his goods and chattels and the valuable manuscript of his Mahfilārā during a nomad raid, he did not have another copy of it He resolved however to restore the book and wrote all the stories that he could remember a second time Thus arose the second version of the Mahfilārā, which consists of a mukaddama, five *bāb*s and a khātima and has come down to us under the title Mahbūb al Kulūb The book is written in an extravagantly artificial style The khātima is the best part, it contains the celebrated story of Zibā and Ranā, which is very common in Persia in a simplified form in many editions from the popular presses

Bibliography H Ethé, Neupersische Litteratur (G I Ph, ii 333) A MS of the Mahbūb al-Kulūb in Rieu, ii 767, 1093, lith Bombay 1852 (Edwards, Catalogue, p 150) See also Malcolm, History of Persia, i 614

(Ḥ Bertheis)

MUMTĀZ MAHALL, wife of Shāh Djahān, and the lady for whom the Tādj Mahall [q v] was built She was the daughter of Abu'l-Hasan Āsaf Khān, who was Nūr Djahān's brother Her name was Arḏjumand Bānū, the title Mumtāz Mahall being conferred on her after Shāh Djahān's accession She was his favourite wife and bore him fourteen children, seven of whom grew up She was born in 1593, married in 1612, and died, at Burhānpūr in the Deccan, very shortly after the birth of a daughter in 1631 She was beautiful and amiable, and Shāh Djahān loved her tenderly

Bibliography Khwāfī Khān, Muntakhab al-Lubāb, i 459, ʿAbd al-Hamīd Lāhōrī, Bādshāhnāma i 384, Manucci, Storia do Mogor, translated by W Irvine, Elliot-Dowson, vii 27, Indian Magazine for December 1913, p 316

(H Beveridge)

MUNADJDJIM [See Astrology]

MUNADJDJIM BAṢHĪ is the name by which the author of the most important general historical work written in Turkey is known His real name was Ahmad Efendi, son of Lutf Allāh, a native of Eregli near Konya He was born in Selānik, in the first half of the xvith century, received a scholarly education and served in his youth for fifteen years in the Mewlewī-khāne of Kāsim Pasha under Shaikh Khalīl Dede (Sidjill-i ʿothmānī, ii 287) Afterwards he studied astronomy and astrology and became court astrologer (munadjdjim bashī) in 1078 (1667—1668) In 1086 (1675—1676) he was admitted to the intimate circle of Sulṭān Muhammad IV as musāhib i pādishāhī He was dismissed in Muharram 1099 (November 1687) and banished to Egypt From here he went some years later to Mecca, where he became shaikh of the Mewlewī-khāne In 1105 (1693—1694) he was obliged to move to Medina, where he lived for seven years Soon after his return to Mecca he died there on the 29th of Ramadān 1113 (February 27th 1702) and was buried near the tomb of Khadīdja

Besides writing his historical work, Munadjdjim Bashī displayed a considerable literary activity Of his works are mentioned a hāshiya on the Kurʾān commentary of Baiḍāwī, a commentary on the ʿAḳāʾid al-ʿAḍudīya of al Īdjī, a Laṭāʾif-nāme, a translation of the anecdotes of ʿUbaid-i Zākānī, and a number of treatises on geometry, mysticism and music His Turkish dīwān also gives him a place in the ranks of Turkish mystical poets, his takhalluṣ was ʿĀshik

The general history was written in Arabic under the title Djāmiʿ al-Duwal, but although manuscripts of the Arabic original exist (the Semāʿ-Khāne-i Edeb of ʿAlī Enwer mentions two MSS not mentioned by Babinger, viz one in the library of the mosque of Selīm II in Adrianople and the other in the imperial palace, in the library of Ahmad III), it is much better known in the Turkish translation made by the poet Nedīm [q v] in the xviiith century under the title Sahāʾif al-Akhbār (printed in three volumes in Constantinople in 1285) It is a world history, arranged, after the fashion of similar Arabic works, according to dynasties, with a main division into three parts the first treating of the history of Muhammad, the second the non-Muhammadan dynasties and the third the Muhammadan dynasties In the introductory chapters the author cites his numerous sources, not a few of which are lost in the original Therefore the work has a special value for the knowledge of many smaller dynasties and for this reason it has been especially used by E Sachau for Ein Verzeichnis muhammedanischer Dynastien, in SB Pr Ak W, Berlin 1923 (cf the introduction) The last dynasty treated is that of the Ottoman Sultāns, it is proportionately longer and more detailed than the history of the other Muhammadan dynasties and based on several imperfectly known sources, the last part, which ends in 1089 (1678), gives contemporary history The Turkish translation of Nedīm is very readable and not composed in the high-flown literary style that prevailed in his period For this reason it is especially praised and represented in Ebuzziyā Tewfīḳ's Numūne-i Edebiyāt-i ʿothmānīye^{6}, Constantinople 1330

Bibliography F Babinger, O G W and the sources mentioned there

(J H Kramers)

AL MUNĀFIḲŪN (A), the term applied in the Kurʾān to those Medinese upon whose fidelity and zeal Muhammad could not absolutely rely The Arabs (e g Mubarrad, Kāmil, ed Wright, p 153) derive the word from *nāfiḳā*ʾ ("one of the entrances to the hole of a fieldmouse"), but it is certainly the borrowed Ethiopic manāfek "heretic" from nafaka to "split", nāfaka "to be divided, irresolute" The meaning "waverer", "doubter" quite fits the usual use of the word in the Kurʾān, while the usual translation "hypocrite" only suits a few passages Another description of the same people in the Kurʾān is "those in whose hearts there is sickness (weakness, doubt)", again in contrast to the unshakably firm believers Sometimes (ix 68 sq, xxxiii 73, xlviii 6, lvii 13) there are references to women of this type (munāfiḳāt) in addition to the male munāfiḳūn A closer consideration of the passages in question shows we have not to think of a regular, rigidly defined party, sometimes the reference is to such Medinese as had only joined the Prophet under compulsion or reluctantly, and sometimes to those who had quite honestly joined him but had not been able to retain their belief and enthusiasm (ix 67, lxiii 3) Muhammad also on one occasion speaks of munāfiḳūn among the Bedouins The first group found their leader in ʿAbd Allāh b Ubaiy [q v] who would have been the chosen head of the Kaila tribe, if a new and superior force, which he could not meet, had not opposed him in Muhammad Nevertheless these grumblers, joined by other unreliable elements, were strong enough to cause the greatest embarrassment to the Prophet in critical moments e g before the battle of Uhud (iii 160 sq), in the War of the Ditch (xxxiii 1, 12—24, 60, 73) and before the march on Tabūk (ix 65—69, 74, 78), as he had always to be careful not to drive them over into the enemy's camp It is no wonder then that his utterances about them are always made in a tone of great irritation He describes them as hypocrites, who say something different from what they mean in their hearts (iii 161, xiii 1), in their irresolution they join, according to their view of the future, sometimes the Muslims and sometimes the enemy (iv 137—142, v 57), if it goes badly with the believers, they think that their religion has deceived them (viii 51) When they are together among themselves they revenge themselves for the restraint which they must put upon themselves by malicious remarks about the Prophet and his revelations, but are in great anxiety, lest Allāh may communicate their secret conversations (ix 65 sqq, x 79, 125 sqq) They are indolent at prayer (iv 141), refuse to take part in the fighting or to contribute from their means (xlvii 22, 31, lvii 1 sq, lxiii 71, cf iv 40 sqq), they hope for a weakening of his power so that the more worthy may expel the meaner (lxiii 8) As representatives of the true Meccan aristocracy, their attitude and eloquence made a certain impression on the Prophet but on closer examination they are nothing but "propped timbers" (lxiii 4) In a word, they are no better than the unbelievers God makes them err (iv 50 sqq) and their abode shall be hellfire (ix 74, lvii 13 sq) We cannot help feeling in some ways a certain sympathy for these men who were deprived of their rights, but in the end they deserved their fate for their complete lack of ideas and courage at decisive moments and their conduct with regard to the Jews in Medīna, whom they incited to resist Muhammad and then left in the lurch (cf lv 11), makes a very unfavourable impression With the death of ʿAbd Allāh they lost their leader and their opposition was forced to be silent before the great successes of Muhammad's last years

The word munāfik remained however and like other Kur'ānic terms was used in the fighting between the various parties as a term of abuse, cf e g its application to Ibn Zubair (Ṭabarī, ii 467, 3) and his party (Ahlwardt, Anonyme arab Chronik, p 73, 4)

In the Kur'ān Sūra lxiii is called after the Munāfiḳūn, it is connected by most commentators with the campaign against the Banū Mustaliḳ

Bibliography Wellhausen, *Reste arabischen Heidentums*², p 232, Noldeke, Neue Beitrage zur semitischen Sprachwissenschaft, p 48 sq, Noldeke-Schwally, Geschichte des Qorāns, p 88 sq, 167 sq, 209, Ibn Hishām, ed Wustenfeld, p 411—413, 546 sq, 558—560, 651, 670, 688, 726, 734, 894 (Fr Buhl)

AL-MUNḌHIR B MUHAMMAD [See Umaiyads II]

AL MUNḌJIYA, title of sūra lxvii, which is also called al mulk and al wāḳiya

MUNGĪR (Monghyr), the head-quarters of the Mungir District in Bihār and Orissa in India, situated in 25° 23′ N and 86° 28′ L on the south bank of the Ganges The population of the district in 1911 was 2,132,893, of whom 200,339 were Muhammadans Muhammadan historians state that Bakhtiyār Khaldjī was the first Muhammadan who conquered Mungir during his subjugation of Bihār about 595 (1198) Henceforth it became a place of military importance In 1177 (1763) Nawwāb Mīr Kāsim, the Nawwāb Ṣūbadār of Bengal, when he proposed to fight against the British made Mungir his military head quarters He founded here an arsenal under Gurgīn (Gregory) Khān, his Armenian general The gun making industry for which the town is famous is said to date from the establishment of this arsenal

Bibliography Imperial Gazetteer of India, xvii 401—403, O'Malley, Bengal District Gazetteers, Monghyr, Calcutta 1909, xvii (M Hidayet Hosain)

MŪNIS DEDE or Derwīsh Mūnis, Ottoman poet of Adrianople He belonged to the Mewlewī Order He received his education from the famous Fenīs Dede (d 1147 = 1734) He died in 1145 (1732) in Adrianople, where he is buried

Bibliography Fatīn, Tezkere, Constantinople 1271, p 385, Ḥuraiyā, Sidjill-i ʿothmānī, iv 527, ʿAlī Enwer, Semā khāne i Edeb, Istanbul 1309, p 226 (Th Menzel)

MU'NIS AL-MUẒAFFAR, Abu 'l Hasan, principal ʿAbbāsid general from 296 to 321 (908—933), and latterly virtual dictator (usual attribution to him of nisba al-Kushūrī seems to rest on passage — p 347 — in Hilāl al-Ṣābi''s Kitāb al-Wuzarā' [ed Amedroz], where Nasr should be read for Mu'nis), a eunuch (passage of Ibn Miskawaih [ed Amedroz and Margoliouth, i 160] shows that khādim in this case does not mean merely freedman, as suggested by Massignon, al-Hallaj, p 205, N⁰ 2), said by al Dhahabī, Ta'rikh al Islām (followed by Ibn Taghribirdī, ed Juynboll, ii 255) to have been 90 years old at death (though this age would seem incredibly great for a recently active commander), i e, to have been born in 231 (845—846), and to have held the rank of amīr for 60 years

Mu'nis first appears (if passage of al Ṭabarī, iii 1953, refers to him) as a ghulām of al-Muʿtaḍid (not yet caliph) in Zandj [q v] campaign of 267 (880—881), and is mentioned as Chief of Police in caliph's camp in 287 (900) Al Dhahabī (also Ibn Taghribirdī, loc cit) states, again, that he was banished to Mecca by al-Muʿtaḍid, to be recalled on accession of al-Muktaḍir [q v], and as Mu'nis is nowhere referred to during intervening reign of al Muktafī, the statement may be true (If so, in al Masʿūdī's description, Murūdj

al-Ḏhahab, ed B de Meynard, VIII 212, of al-Mu'tadid's death, for kẖādim read kẖāzin, as in 'Arīb, ed de Goeje, p 29)

Mu'nis owed his later eminence mainly to his leading the defence, in 296 (908), of the Hasanī palace at Baghdād for al-Muktadir against the partisans of the latter's cousin, the pretender Ibn al-Mu'tazz [q v] During the caliph's youth his gratitude and that of his powerful mother for this service assured Mu'nis's position, and though later al-Muktadir's favour turned to enmity, by that time Mu'nis's authority was hardly in need of support, owing chiefly to his almost invariably successful generalship For though he undertook no very important campaigns, except perhaps the repulse of the Fātimid al-Mahdī [q v] in 307 (919—920) (for which he received the lakab al-Muẓaffar), and the defence of Baghdād from the Karmatians [q v] in 315 (927—928), he was only once defeated — in 306 (918)

Mu'nis early fell out with the wazīr Ibn al-Furāt [q v], repeatedly opposing him, till in 312 (924), on Ibn al-Furāt's third term of office, Mu'nis played a prominent part in securing his dismissal and execution He now became all-powerful, being invariably consulted on the appointment of viziers and so controlling the government Hence the change of al-Muktadir's affection to dislike, first signalized (315 = 927) in an abortive plot of the caliph's to murder him In 316 Mu'nis lent himself to al Muktadir's deposition in favour of his half-brother al-Kāhir [q v] He almost immediately restored him, however, thereby becoming more absolutely his master than ever Al Muktadir eventually defied Mu'nis (319 = 931), who thereupon left Baghdād Next year, however, having meanwhile collected a strong force, he marched on the capital intending to reimpose his authority He duly defeated the caliph's army outside the walls, but al-Muktadir himself was killed on the field

Mu'nis now restored al-Kāhir But by resuming his dictatorial ways he soon so alienated him also that he was obliged in self defence to keep the new caliph a prisoner in the palace He even contemplated deposing him Al-Kāhir, however, succeeded in luring Mu'nis, together with his chief supporters, into the palace, where he shortly had them executed in Sha'bān 321 (August 933)

Mu'nis' influence was on the whole exerted for good, but he was neither strong nor intelligent enough to prevent the decline of the caliphate His example of depriving the caliph of real power was pernicious It was to be followed all too soon by the series of adventurers who, with the style of amīr al umarā' [q v], were to dominate al-Kāhir's successors

Bibliography In addition to the authorities cited above Ibn al-Athīr al Kāmil, VIII, al-Kindī, Governors and Judges of Egypt (G M S, XIX) p 273, 277—278, Hilāl al-Sābi', Kitāb al-Wuzarā' (ed Amedroz), index, Ibn Miskawaih, Taḏjārib al-Umam, V, passim (= Amedroz and Margoliouth, Eclipse of the Abbasid Caliphate, vols I and IV), 'Arīb, ed de Goeje, index, H Bowen, Life and Times of 'Alī b 'Īsā, Cambridge 1928, index (HAROLD BOWEN)

MUNKAR WA-NAKĪR (the forms with the article are also found), the names of the two angels who examine and if necessary punish the dead in their tombs To the examination in the tomb the infidels and the faithful — the righteous as well as the sinners — are liable They are set upright in their tombs and must state their opinion regarding Muhammad The righteous faithful will answer, that he is the Apostle of Allāh, thereupon they will be left alone till the Day of Resurrection The sinners and the infidels, on the other hand, will have no satisfactory answer at hand In consequence of this the angels will beat them severely, as long as it will please Allāh, according to some authorities till the Day of Resurrection, except on Fridays

In some sources a distinction is made between the punishment and the pressure (daghṭa) in the tomb, the righteous faithful being exempt from the former, not from the latter, whereas the infidels and the sinners suffer punishment as well as pressure (Abu 'l-Mu'īn Maimūn b Muhammad al-Nasafī, as cited in the commentary on the Wasīyat Abī Hanīfa, Haidarabād 1321, p 22)

The punishment in the tomb is not plainly mentioned in the Kur'ān Allusions to the idea may be found in several passages, e g sūra XLVII 29 "But how when the angels, causing them to die, shall smite them on their faces and backs", sūra VI 93 "But couldst thou see, when the ungodly are in the floods of death, and the angels reach forth their hands, saying, Yield up your souls this day shall ye be recompensed with a humiliating punishment", sūra VIII 52 "And if thou wert to see when the angels take the life of the unbelievers, they smite their faces and their backs, and taste ye the torture of burning" (cf further sūra IX 102, XXIII 21, LI 47)

The punishment of the tomb is very frequently mentioned in Tradition (see Bibliography), often, however, without the mention of angels In the latter group of traditions it is simply said, that the dead are punished in their tombs, or why, e g on account of special sins they have committed, or on account of the wailing of the living

The names of Munkar and Nakīr do not appear in the Kur'ān, and, so far as I can see, once only in canonical Tradition (Tirmidhī, Ḏjanā'iz, bāb 70) Apparently these names do not belong to the old stock of traditions Moreover, in some traditions one anonymous angel only is mentioned as the angel who interrogates and punishes the dead (Muslim, Īmān, trad 163, Abū Dawūd, Sunna, bāb 39b, Ahmad b Hanbal, III 233, 346, IV 150, Tayālisī, N° 753)

So there seem to be four stages in the traditions regarding this subject the first without any angel being mentioned, the second mentioning "the" angel, the third two angels, the fourth being acquainted with the names Munkar and Nakīr

This state of things as reflected in hadīth finds a similar reflex in the early forms of the creed In the Fikh Akbar I, which may date from the middle of the VIIIth century A D, the punishment of the tomb appears as the only eschatological representation (art 10) In the Wasīyat Abī Hanīfa, which may represent the orthodox views of the middle of the VIIIth century, we find, apart from an elaborate eschatology, the two following articles (arts 18, 19) "We confess, that the punishment in the tomb shall without fail take place We confess, that in view of the traditions on the subject, the interrogation by Munkar and Nakīr is a reality" The term "reality" is apparently intended to oppose the allegorical interpretation of eschatological representations as taught by the Muʿtazilīs

The Fikh Akbar II, which may represent the new orthodoxy of the middle of the IXth century A D, is still more elaborate on this point (art 23) "The interrogation of the dead in the tomb by Munkar and Nakīr is a reality and the reunion of the body with the spirit in the tomb is a reality The pressure and the punishment in the tomb are a reality that will take place in the case of all the infidels, and a reality that may take place in the case of some sinners belonging to the faithful" In the later creeds and works on dogmatics the punishment and the interrogation in the tomb by Munkar and Nakir are expressed in similar ways

The Karrāmiya [q v] taught the identity of Munkar and Nakīr with the two guardian angels who accompany man (ʿAbd al-Kāhir al Baghdādī, Uṣūl al-Dīn, Stambul 1928, p 246) Ghazālī admits the idea that eschatological representations are a reality that takes place in the malakūt

The origin of the names is uncertain, the meaning "disliked" seems doubtful The idea of the examination and the punishment of the dead in their tombs is found among other peoples also The details to be found in Jewish sources (hibbūt hak keber) are strikingly parallel to the Muslim ones

Bibliography The passages from hadīth in Wensinck, Handbook of Early Muh Tradition, s v Grave(s), further E Sell, The Faith of Islam, London 1880, p 145, Mouradgea d'Ohsson, Tableau de l'Empire othoman, Paris 1787, I 46, Wensinck, The Muslim Creed, Cambridge 1932, General Index, s v Punishment and Munkar and Nakir, J C G Bodenschatz, Kirchliche Verfassung der heutigen Juden, Erlangen 1748, III 95 sq, al Tahāwī, Bayān al Sunna wa 'l-Djamāʿa, Halab 1344, p 9, Abū Ḥafṣ ʿUmar al Nasafī, Akāʾid, Stambul 1313, with the commentary of Taftāzānī, p 132 sqq, al-Ghazālī, Ihyāʾ, Cairo 1302, IV 451 sqq, do, al-Durra al-fākhira, ed Gautier, p 23 sqq, Kitāb Ahwāl al-Kiyāma, ed M Wolff, p 40 sq

(A J WENSINCK)

MUNSARIH, the name of the tenth metre in Arabic prosody, it has three feet to the hemistich It has three ʿarūd and four darb

1st ʿarūd	mustafʿilun	mafʿūlātu	mustafʿilun
	mustafʿilun	mafʿūlātu	mustafʿilun
	mustafʿilun	mafʿūlātu	mustafʿilun
	mustafʿilun	mafʿūlātu	mafʿūlun
2nd ʿarūd	mustafʿilun	mafʿūlān
3rd ʿarūd	mustafʿilun	mafʿūlun

We rarely find mustafʿilun in the darb of the first ʿarūd The second darb of the first ʿarūd is not indicated by al Khalīl b Ahmad but Ibn Barrī notes it was much used by the muwallad poets, among them Ibn al Rūmī It may be noted that the second and third ʿarūd are regarded as belonging to the radjaz metre

Mustafʿilun may lose 1 its s except when used as the first darb in the first ʿarūd, 2 its f and the foot becomes (mustaʿilun =) muftaʿilun, 3 its s and f at the same time (which is very bad) and the foot becomes (mutaʿilun =) fāʿilatun This last change could not be undergone by the first ʿarūd

Mafʿūlātu loses 1 its f, which is very bad and the foot becomes (maʿūlātu =) mafāʿilu, 2 its w and the foot becomes (mafʿulātu =) fāʿilātu, 3 its f and w at the same time which is very bad and we have (maʿulātu =) faʿilātu

Mafʿūlān and mafʿūlun may lose their f and become (maʿūlān =) faʿūlān and (maʿūlun =) faʿūlun (MOH BEN CHENEB)

MUNSHI' [See INSHĀ']

MUNṢIF (A), part active IV of n ṣ-f, "to be just, to act with justice", the title of a native judge of the lowest grade in India

Bibliography Yule and Burnell, Hobson-Jobson, s v moonsiff

AL MUNTAFIK, a section of the Arab tribe of the Banū ʿUkail, which in turn is a subdivision of the great group of the ʿĀmir b Saʿsaʿa [q v] Genealogy al Muntafik b ʿĀmir b ʿUkail (Wustenfeld, Gen Tab, D 19) The very scanty information in Wüstenfeld can be supplemented by the notice which Ibn al-Kalbī gives of the Banu 'l-Muntafik (Djamharat al-Ansāb, MS Brit Mus, fol 130v—131r), but this little clan nowhere appears to play a great part in early history The territory inhabited by the Banu 'l Muntafik is the same as that of the other divisions of the Banū ʿUkail, in the southwest of Yamāma, some places belonging to them are quoted by al Bakrī (Muʿdjam, ed Wustenfeld, p 567), Yākūt (Muʿdjam, ed Wustenfeld, I 793—794, IV 712, l 78 we may note that in these two passages al Muntafik is said to be the surname of Muʿāwiya b ʿUkail while the usual genealogy makes this Muʿāwiya a son of al Muntafik), al Hamdānī (Djazīra, ed D H Muller, p 177, l 12—15 note the mention of gold mines in their territory) The Banu 'l-Muntafik numbered among their clients the Banū Tathr (Wustenfeld, Gen Tab, C 13) whose eponym was said to have been made a prisoner by them (Kitāb al-Aghanī, VII 110), one of the few episodes of the pre Islāmic period in which this clan is mentioned is the battle of Shiʿb Djabala where Kais b al Muntafik distinguished himself (Aghānī, X 44, Nakāʾid, ed Bevan, p 671 l 12—672, l 14, where Ibn Tufail should be deleted) In the history of the origins of Islām, several of them appear as ambassadors of the Banū ʿUkail to the Prophet such were Anas b Kais b al-Muntafik and Lakīt b ʿĀmir b al Muntafik (Ibn Saʿd, I/II 45 etc, on the latter the biographical collections have long discussions as to whether he is to be identified with this or that muhaddith cf among others Ibn Hadjar, Tahdhīb al Tahdhīb, VIII 456) In the period of the conquests, the Banu 'l-Muntafik settled in the marshy region between Kūfa and Basra (al-Kalkashandī, Nihāyat al-ʿArab, p 65—66) All that we know of them after this period is the names of a few individuals who held public offices a certain ʿAmr b Muʿāwiya b al-Muntafik, mentioned by Tabarī, I 3284 at end, as fighting at Siffīn, is said by Ibn al-Kalbī to have been governor of Armenia and Ādhaibāidjān under Muʿāwiya, according to Ibn al Kalbī, ʿAbd Allāh b Muʿāwiya b Rabīʿa b ʿĀmir b al Muntafik was governor of Marw and Ahwāz, also under Muʿawiya, and ʿAbīda b Kais b al-Muntafik of Armenia, under Yazīd I These men are not mentioned elsewhere the same is true of the poet Djahm b ʿAwf b al-Husain b al-Muntafik (Ibn Hadjar, Isāba [ed Sharafiya, Cairo 1325], V 124 follows Ibn al-Kalbī)

Bibliography Given in the article

(G LEVI DELLA VIDA)

AL-MUNTAḲIM. [See AILĀH II]

AL-MUNTAṢIR (also called Mustanṣir) BI 'LLĀH, ABŪ DJAʿFAR MUHAMMAD B DJAʿFAR, ʿAbbāsid caliph, son of al-Mutawakkil by a Greek slave After his father had been murdered in Shawwāl 247 (Dec 861) by conspirators, among whom was al-Muntaṣir, the latter ascended the throne, aged 25 according to the usual statement As a ruler he was only a tool in the hands of the vizier Aḥmad b al Khaṣīb and the Turkish generals His brothers al Muʿtazz and al Muʾayyad were forced to renounce their claims to the throne and Waṣīf, the commander of the bodyguard, was sent to the Byzantine frontier Unlike his father, he treated the ʿAlids with great consideration, nothing else remarkable is recorded of him Al-Muntaṣir died in Rabīʿ II 248 (June 862) or, according to a less trustworthy report end of Rabīʿ I, in Sāmarrā after a reign of six months

Bibliography Yaʿḳūbī (ed Houtsma), ii 594—596, 601—603, Ṭabarī, iii 1379 sqq, Masʿūdī, Murūdj, Paris, vii 290—323, ix 46, 52, 72, Kitāb al-Aghānī, see Guidi, Tables alphabetiques, Ibn al-Athīr (ed Tornberg), vii 27 sqq, Ibn al-Ṭiḳṭaḳā, al-Fakhrī (ed Derenbourg), p 327—329, Muhammad b Shākir, Fawāt al Wafayāt, ii 184, Ibn Khaldūn, al-ʿIbar, iii 282, Weil, Gesch d Chalifen, ii 351 sqq, Muir, The Caliphate, its Rise, Decline, and Fall, p 531 (K V ZETTERSTÉEN)

MURĀBIT [See ALMORAVIDS]

MURĀD, the name of an Arab tribe, belonging to the great southern group of the Madhḥidj [q v], genealogical tradition (Ibn al-Kalbī, Djamharat al-Ansāb, Escurial MS, fol 114b–117b, which is followed by Ibn Durayd, Kitāb al-Ishtiḳāḳ, ed Wustenfeld, p 238, 4, cf also Lisān al-ʿArab, iv 409) regards Murād as a nickname, for this tribe was said to have been the first to rebel (tamarrada) in the Yaman an etymology which is not convincing Murād's own name is said to have been Yuhābir b Madhḥidj and he was therefore a brother of the ʿAns and the Saʿd al-ʿAshīra (Wustenfeld, Geneal Tabellen, p 7, 11) Although they were neighbours of the South Arabian civilization, the Murād have always retained a typically Bedouin character, their country (usually called al-Djawf and placed to the east of Nadjrān and Maʾrib) is bare and sterile (cf the picturesque description given of it by the Kitāb al-Aghānī, xviii 135 and "the mountains of the Murad" mentioned by Yāḳūt, Muʿdjam, ii 78) and its inhabitants are notorious as brigands (fatk Murādī, cf Kitāb al-Aghānī, x 147) The land inhabited by the Murād and by their neighbours, the Hamdān [q v], had once belonged to the Ṭayʾ (Yāḳūt, Muʿdjam, i 129), who had left it to settle in the north of the Arabian peninsula, it is probable that it was from the old masters of the country that the Murād and the Hamdān inherited the cult of the god Yaghūth (cf below)

The Murād appear for the first time in history in connection with an episode, not however at all clear, of the last days of the dynasty of the Lakhmids of al-Ḥīra, as the king ʿAmr b al Mundhir (III) b Māʾ al-Samāʾ had excluded his half-brother ʿAmr, a son of Usāma, sister of Hind mother of the first-named ʿAmr, from a share in the kingdom, the latter sought refuge with the Murād, who recognised him as their chief but when he began to rule tyrannically, they killed him, which gave ʿAmr b Hind a pretext for invading the land of the Murād and putting to death the murderer of ʿAmr b Usāma (al Mufaḍḍal al Ḍabbī, Amthāl al-ʿArab, Constantinople 1300, p 68—69, who gives a more satisfactory account than that contained in the passages quoted by G Rothstein, Die Dyn der Lahmiden, p 99, in which Yāḳūt, iv 130 should be read for i 130) ʿAmr is said to have been killed by a certain Ibn al Djuʿaid (the same story is given by Ibn al-Kalbī, Djamhara), according to Yāḳūt on the other hand by Hubaira b ʿAbd Yaghūth surnamed al Makshūḥ, the latter's son Kais seems to have been one of the most powerful chiefs of the Murād at the time of the rise of Islām

The Murād had just then suffered a disastrous defeat, which had considerably weakened them, at the hands of the Hamdān, as the result of a quarrel which had arisen in connection with the control of the worship of the god Yaghūth (cf Wellhausen, *Reste arab Heidentums*², p 19—22 and the sources mentioned by him) It is probably this defeat (Yawm al-Raḥrḥ), which tradition places in the same year as the battle of Badr, which made a section of the Murād think it advisable to seek an alliance with Muhammad, but Kais b al-Makshūḥ refused to join in this It was therefore another Murādī chief, Farwa b Musaik, who went to al-Madīna in the year 10 A H, and concluded a treaty there with the Prophet (cf Caetani, Annali dell' Islām, ii 332) To what extent tradition is right in saying that Farwa was given authority to levy ṣakat on all the tribes of the Yaman, is very difficult to ascertain In any case, the policy of the Murād was not oriented towards Muhammad under the leadership of Kais b al Makshūḥ In the great rising led by al-Aswad al-ʿAnsī against Persian hegemony in the Yaman, the Murād were against him But if, as tradition has it, Muhammad used his connections with some chiefs of the Yaman to prevent al-Aswad's success, after the death of the Prophet these same chiefs refused obedience to Abū Bakr and resolutely threw themselves into the struggle against Islām It is again Kais b al Makshūḥ who plays the chief part in these events Taken prisoner, Abū Bakr granted him his life and henceforth the chief of the Murād and his tribe played their part bravely in the conquests We find them sometimes in Syria, sometimes in the ʿIrāḳ, and Kais everywhere distinguishing himself by his exploits He lost an eye at the battle of Yarmūḳ (cf Caetani, Annali dell' Islām, i—v, index s v Qays b Hubayrah) But the account of his death in the civil war between ʿAlī and Muʿāwiya at the battle of Ṣiffīn is based on confusion with another man of the same name of the tribe of Badjīla (this fact, which is clearly indicated by Ibn al Kalbī, Djamhara and Ṭabarī, i 3301—3302, has already been noted by Ibn Ḥadjar, Iṣāba, ed Sharafiya, v 281, Annali dell' Islām, ix 638 should be corrected) We also find the Murād in the conquest of Egypt (Annali, iv 573, 21 A H, § 191 b [29]) But it was at Kūfa that they settled in the largest numbers It was there that one of them, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b Muldjam, assassinated the caliph ʿAlī, it was there also that in 60 (679) Hānīʾ b ʿUrwa al-Murādī was executed by orders of the governor ʿUbaid Allāh b Ziyād after being found guilty of conspiring with Muslim b ʿAḳīl in favour of al-Ḥusain (Ṭabarī, ii 227 sq) He was a descendant of the poet ʿAmr b Kiʿās (R S O, xiii 58, 327[1]), one of the very few poets of this tribe, which does not seem to have produced many individuals of note either during the Djāhilīya or under Islām We may however mention Uwais al-Karanī (of the Banū Karan b Radmān b Nādjiya b Murād, Wustenfeld, Geneal Tab, p 7, 25), one of the prototypes of Muslim asceticism

Bibliography Given in the article (G Lefvi Della Vida)

MURĀD I, according to the common tradition the third ruler of the Ottoman state, was a son of Orkhān and the Byzantine lady Nilūfer Although some Ottoman sources profess to know the year of his birth (Sidjill i ʿothmāni, i 74 gives the year 726 = 1326), this date, like all dates given by Turkish sources relating to this period, is far from certain The name Murād (Greek sources such as Phrantzes have Ἀμουράτης, from which later Latin sources make Amurath, while contemporary Latin sources from Italy have Moratibei) must have originated in mystical circles and hardly occurs in earlier times An ʿAbdal Murād lived in Orkhān's time (cf Sidjill-i ʿothmāni, iv 354, ʿĀshīk Pasha Zāde, ed Giese, p 200, photographs of his tomb in R Hartmann, Im neuen Anatolien, Leipzig 1928, plates 9 and 10) The ancient Turkish chronicles often call Murād Ghāzi Khunkiār, later Turkish historians Khudāwendkiār [q v]

During his father's lifetime Murād had already been entrusted with the governorship of In Önü and later of Brusa His brother Sulaimān Pasha had held the more important sandjaks and was destined to become Orkhān's successor Sulaimān's untimely death, shortly before that of Orkhān himself, placed Murād unexpectedly at the head of the Ottoman principality This happened about 1360, the date of Orkhān's death is uncertain

Murad I became the first great Ottoman conqueror on European soil In this he followed the footsteps of his brother Sulaimān Pasha and of other Turkish emirs before him

It is not yet possible to gain a clear idea of the succession of the military achievements by which the Ottomans succeeded in establishing themselves firmly on the Balkan Peninsula Even the outstanding victories are confounded with each other in the Ottoman and Western sources, and the exact dating of even important events is subject to great difficulties The Byzantine sources, the most reliable of all, are mainly concerned with the tortuous policy of the Byzantine rulers On the other hand, many tales of a legendary character have entered the historical accounts of later times The impression on the whole is, that the Ottoman successes were mainly due to the mutual rivalry between the then existing Balkan states, Byzantium, and the Bulgarian and Serbian kingdoms, complicated by the struggle of Venice and Genoa for an advantageous position in the Levant, and the zeal of the popes for bringing the Greek church back to Rome This secured the Ottomans at all times allies in the Christian camp itself Nor is it possible to ascertain which Ottoman expeditions were really planned by Murād and his councillors and which were merely successful raids by Turkish bands All this makes it extremely difficult to form an adequate judgment of Murād's personality as a warrier and as a statesman

Provisionally three periods can be distinguished The first begins shortly after Murād's accession with the conquest of Western Thrace, in which were taken Čorlu, Demotika (if this town had not already been taken under Orkhān), Gümüldjina, Adrianople (about 1362, cf EDIRNE) and Philippopolis, mainly through the activity of the beglerbeg Lala Shāhīn and Ewrenos Beg These conquests provoked a coalition of Servians, Bosnians and Hungarians, who were beaten on the river Maritza by Hādjdjī Ilbeki The western part of Bulgaria was raided up to the Balkan Mountains and the Byzantine Emperor John Palaeologos made his first submission as vassal to Murād Murād himself had been on a campaign in Anatolia, which brought him as far as Tokat [q v] during which he consolidated the Ottoman hold on Angora (already taken by Sulaimān Pasha in 1354, cf Wittek, Festschrift Jacob, 1932, p 347, 351 sqq) He then came to Rūm ili and took up his residence in Demotika, to change this town in 1366 for Adrianople, from this time on the European capital of the Ottomans The story about a treaty between Ragusa and Murād concluded in 1365 has a legendary character (cf Giese, Festschrift Jacob, 1932, p 42, after Jireček) In the meantime the hostility between Byzantines and Bulgarians gave Murād the opportunity of taking Ishtebol (Sozopolis) near Burgas, and the same hostility led to the failure, about 1366, of a crusade undertaken at the instigation of Pope Urban V by count Amadeo of Savoy to come to the rescue of the Byzantine Emperor, the expedition only drove the Turks from Gallipoli for a short time

A second period of Murād's reign may be said to begin with the crushing of a Serbian advance on the Maritza near Čirmen, probably in 1371 This Serbian defeat is known to the Turkish sources as sirf sindighi and gave the Turks during the following years the important Macedonian towns of Seres, Drama and Kawalla, and at the same time the possibility of advancing west of the Vardar These conquests were made by Ewrenos and Djandarlī Khalil Pasha, while Lala Shāhin obtained about the same time successes in eastern Bulgaria (battle of Samakow) Then followed again some years of comparative tranquillity, in which the newly won regions were partly colonized with Ottomans, the still unsubdued northern parts of Serbia and Bulgaria were governed by the local rulers as vassals of Murād The latter had more than once to interfere with the dynastic affairs of the Palaeologoi After John Palaeologos had sold in 1375 the island of Tenedos to Venice, this led to an action of Genoa in combination with the Turks, in course of which John lost his throne and was imprisoned, until, by the favour of Murād, he became Emperor again in 1379, his dependency went so far as to help the Turks, together with his son Manuel, in the conquest of Philadelphia (Ala Shehir), the only remaining Greek fortress in Asia Minor The end of this second period is marked by an increased activity in Anatolia A part of the territory of the Germiyān-Oghlu [q v] was acquired as a wedding gift to prince Bāyazīd when he married the daughter of that ruler (probably in 1381), this territorial accession was followed by the sale of the greater part of the lands of the Hamid Oghlu to Murād and by the conquest of a part of the principality of Teke

About 1385 there followed new conquests in Europe Turkish troops intervened in Epirus and Albania (under Khalil Pasha), but decisive for the establishment of Ottoman power in the Balkans

was the taking of Sofia (1385 ?) and Nish (1386 ?) About the same time, the Italian republics, Genoa and Venice, obtained by treaties with Murād, concluded respectively in 1385 and 1388, commercial privileges in Turkish territory Immediately after the successes in Serbia, probably also in 1386, Murād went to war with the Karamān-Oghlu ʿAlāʾ al-Dīn, his son in law, this conflict had long been threatening [cf KARAMĀN-OGHLU], now the Ottoman power had grown so far as to destroy the political equilibrium in Anatolia Murād was victorious in the battle of Konya, but left ʿAlāʾ al-Dīn in his possessions and set the example, henceforward traditional, of leniency in dealing with the Anatolian population This caused a lively discontent amongst the Serbian troops who had taken part in the battle of Konya These Serbians are said to have contributed to the anti-Turkish feeling among the Serbians in general, who, under the leadership of Lazar Gresljanowitch, and with the Bosnian king Twrtko as a powerful ally, were preparing a last effort to free themselves from Turkish vassalage They succeeded in defeating an Ottoman army at Plochnik (1388) The results were meagre, however, for at the same time the Turks made new conquests in Bulgaria (Shumla and Tirnovo) and even raided Morea In 1389 Murād himself marched against the Serbians and their allies and fought the famous battle of Kossowo Polje (Turkish Kosowa), where he himself lost his life, although the Serbians, partly owing to treachery in their own ranks, were defeated The most probable date is June 20, 1389 (Gibbons, cf also Giese, in Ephemerides Orientales, N° 34, April 1928, p 2 sq) The way in which Murād was killed, during or after the battle, is not clear from the early sources, the later Serbian epic tradition has the well-known tale that Murād was murdered by Milosh Obranowitch, Lazar's son-in-law, who, claiming to be a deserter, had obtained an audience with Murād after the battle, was admitted to his presence and killed him with a dagger Murād's body was transported to Brusa and buried in a turbe near the mosque which he had built at Čekirge in Brusa (cf Ahmed Tewhīd, in T O E M, vol III)

Murād I was the first ruler under whom the state founded by ʿOthmān rose to be more than one of the then existing Turkoman principalities in Asia Minor This development is symbolised in the successive change of titles given to him in different building inscriptions dated in his reign (cf Taeschner, in Isl, xx 131 sqq) While the oldest inscription calls him simply Bey, like his father Orkhān, and gives him a lakab (Shihāb al Dunyā wa 'l-Dīn) after the Saldjūk fashion, he is already called Sultān [q v] in 785 (1383), while in the inscription from 790 (1388) on the ʿimāret built by him in Iznīk, we find the style which afterwards became a tradition with the Ottoman sultans (al-malik al-muʿazzam al-khākān al-mukarram al-sultān ibn al-sultān) It was a time when the old Saldjūk traditional institutions no longer held and new forms of government and administration came into being, to which the example of Byzantine institutions, and also those of Mamlūk Egypt may have contributed Even if it is not true that Djandarlī Khair al-Dīn Khalīl Pasha — who was appointed Murād's vizier at the beginning of his reign and died about 789 (1387) — was the first Ottoman grand vizier, it cannot be denied that the activity of this man — who by his origin belonged to a higher culture than the Ottoman — as Murād's councillor as well as his military deputy and administrator in Macedonia, makes him a true prototype of the grand viziers of a later age (cf Taeschner and Wittek, in Isl, xvIII 66 sqq) His son ʿAlī Pasha began also to play an important military part during the later years of Murād's reign It is also with Khalīl Pasha that the old Turkish sources connect the institution of the Janissaries as troops formed from converted Christian prisoners of war In the administration of the timārs [q v] a Kānūn of Murād I is said to have brought improvements Some of these measures were closely connected with the problem of acquiring a quiet and loyal population in the newly conquered Christian territories, this was not possible by Turkish colonisation only but succeeded mainly through a humane treatment of the original inhabitants, after the region had once been conquered

The more important buildings of Murād I are all in Asia Minor The best known are the Khudāwendkiār Djāmiʿi in Čekirge, near Brusa, where Murād himself is buried, and the Ulu Djāmiʿ in Brusa, further a mosque in Biledjik, the Nilūfer ʿImāreti in Iznik (recently described by Taeschner, in Isl, xx 127 sqq) There is also a mosque of Murād in Serres The old Ottoman chronicles enumerate his foundations — On Murād I's coins cf ʿĀlī, in T T E M, xIV 224

Bibliography The information given by the old Turkish chronicles (ʿĀshīk Pasha Zāde, Anonymus, ed Giese, Urūdj, the translations of Leunclavius, also Dustūr nāme i Enweri, ed Mukrimin Khalil, Istambul 1928 and this editor's Medhal, Istambul 1930) is sometimes supplemented by the later historiographers (Saʿd al-Dīn, ʿĀlī, Münedjdjim-Bashī) The Byzantine historians (Phrantzes, Ducas, Chalcondyles), however, give a far clearer survey of this period so far as it came under their attention, while documents from Venice, Genoa and Rome throw light on the diplomatic activities provoked by the advance of the Turks in Europe Ibn Hadjar al-ʿAskalānī, Inbāʾ al-Ghumr fī Anbāʾ al-ʿUmr, contains also a biography of Murād I Further the historical works of von Hammer, Zinkeisen and Jorga, and H A Gibbons, The Foundation of the Ottoman Empire, Oxford 1916, p 110 sqq , C Jirecek, Geschichte der Serben, Gotha 1918 (J H KRAMERS)

MURĀD II, sixth ruler of the Ottoman Empire, was born in 806 (1403—1404) and ascended the throne in May 1421, when he arrived in Adrianople some days after his father Muhammed I's death, his decease had been kept secret on the advice of the vizier ʿIwad Pasha until the new sultān's arrival As crown prince he had resided at Maghnisa, and he had taken part in the suppression of the revolt of Simawna Oghlu Badr al-Dīn Immediately after his accession he had to face the pretender known in Turkish history as Dozme Mustafā [q v] and his ally Djunaid [q v] Both were supported by the Byzantine emperor Manuel and at first were successful in the European part of the empire Bāyazīd Pasha, sent from Brusa, was defeated and killed in the battle of Sāzlī Dere (between Seres and Adrianople) and the allied Greek forces took Gallipoli Then Murād himself had to face them in Asia, he succeeded in sowing discord between Mustafā and Djunaid and defeated the first in the battle of the bridge of Ulubad Then Murād went over, with the help of ships from the Genoese colony of New Phocea (Yeñi Foča), recovered Gallipoli, after which he entered Adrianople and killed the pretender In 1422 he began a siege of Constantinople, this siege was raised, either by the effect of Byzantine gold (through the intermediary of the graecophil vizier Ibrāhīm Pasha) or as a result of the rise of a new pretender in Iznīk in the person of Murād's younger brother Mustafā The latter was at last betrayed by his former supporter Ilyās Pasha and killed Then followed a struggle with Djunaid, who had established himself again at Aidin, but surrendered at last in 1425, after which he was killed Murād was now at peace with all his European neighbours and vassals, the Emperor Manuel had died in 1424 and was followed by John Palæologos, with whom peace was concluded Several towns had been taken in the meantime in Morea, and Wallachia paid tribute In Anatolia there had been a conflict in 1423 with Isfendiyār of Sīnūb, ending with the acquisition of a part of his territory by Murād, after 1425 the Ottoman power was confirmed in Teke and Menteshe and the Karamān Oghlu Ibrāhim, who tried to take the already Ottoman Adalia, had to retire and made peace In eastern Anatolia Yurkedj Pasha subdued the Turkomans round Tokat and Amasia and of the region of Djanik In 1428 there began difficulties on the Hungarian frontier The most noteworthy exploit of this period was however the capture of Saloniki (Selanik, q v) in March 1430, after the Greeks had sold this town to Venice in 1427, Murād had never given up the plan of avenging that transaction Peace with Venice soon followed

Occasionally the Turks had taken several fortresses in Epirus and Albania, but their interest began more and more to concentrate on the north western regions, where George Brankovitch ruled as vassal over Serbia With the latter peace was renewed in 1432 and his daughter Maria was given to Murād, but the Turkish raids continued in Serbia as well as far into Hungarian territory In 1438 the Turks made, together with Serbians and Wallachians, incursions in Hungary (capture of Semendria), in 1440 they beleaguered Belgrad in vain and in 1442 Turkish troops under Mezid Bey laid siege to Hermannstadt Here they suffered a heavy defeat by John Hunyadi, who in the coming years was to act as champion of Hungary and Christian Europe He was the leader, in 1443, of a big crusading army including Serbians, Poles and Germans, the Turks were thrown back at Nish, after which Sofia was taken The campaign ended with a heavy defeat of the Turks at Jalowaz, between Sofia and Philippopolis In the same year Murād had to oppose again the Karamān Oghlu, who supported the Christian allies But the peace with Hungary, concluded in July 1444 at Szeged, though advantageous to Hungary, maintained the former frontiers of the Ottoman political influence, only Wallachia became tributary to Hungary

After this peace, which was to last ten years and seemed to Murād a guarantee for the future, he abdicated in favour of his son Muhammad, leaving with him Khalīl Pasha, son of Ibrāhīm Pasha (who had died of the plague in 1429) and Khusraw Molla [q v] as councillors He retired himself to Maghnisa, but had to come back when, in September of the same year, the Hungarians, flouting the peace treaty, were preparing a new crusade They marched south of the Danube to Varna, here the army of Murād inflicted on them a crushing defeat, in which King Ladislas of Hungary was killed Again Murād II went back to Maghnisa, but in the following year a Janissary revolt broke out in Adrianople and it was the vizier Khalīl who invited Murād to return a second time, as the young Muhammad did not seem to be able to face the situation

During the last six years of his reign Murād led again several campaigns in the Balkan peninsula In 1446 an action was undertaken against the Palæologoi in the Morea (destruction of the Hexamilion, capture of Corinth and Patras), in 1447 against Albania, where the activity of Skander Beg [q v] had begun in 1443, in 1448 he faced again a Hungarian invading army, which was beaten on the plain of Kossowa, and in 1450 he was again in Albania (siege of Croja) In that year Constantine Palæologos became, by the grace of Murād II, the last Byzantine Emperor, after the death of John Shortly afterwards, in the first days of February 1451, Murād died at Adrianople He was buried in Brusa at the side of his mosque (cf Ahmad Tewhid, in TOEM, iii 1856)

His reign was of extraordinary importance for the future political and cultural development of the Ottoman Empire After the first critical years he continued his father's work of consolidation His aim was mainly to live on peaceful terms with the vassal princes, of whom the ruler of Sīnūb and the despot of Serbia gave their daughters to Murād This peaceful policy was in concordance with his character, the Byzantine historians and other Christian sources describe him as a truthful, mild and humane ruler His most influential viziers were not yet the renegades of later times, they belonged to the old families that had supported the cause of Murād's forefathers and were becoming a kind of hereditary nobility Ibrāhīm Pasha and Khalil Pasha of the Djandarlī Oghullarī (F Taeschner and P Wittek, in Isl xviii 92 sqq), Hādjdjī ʿIwad Pasha (Taeschner, in Isl, xx 154 sqq), the sons of Timurtash, of Ewrenos and others The mystical tradition was strong in his surroundings, as is proved by the great influence of a man like the Shaikh Amir Bukhārī, other shaikhs came to his court from Persia and Mesopotamia This determined also the direction which the classical Ottoman literature was to take in following centuries Murād II was the first Ottoman prince whose court became a brilliant centre of poets, literary men and Muhammadan scholars [see TURKS, B, iii] But also to non Islāmic envoys and visitors Murād's court seemed a centre of culture (cf Jorga, i 464 sqq, which description applies principally to Murād II) Amongst the sultān's buildings a mosque in Brusa (cf H Wilde, Brusa, p 51) and one in Adrianople (the Üc Sherfeli Djāmiʿ), are notable and some large bridges His army organisation is well known from a full description by Chalcondylas

Bibliography The older Turkish sources Neshrī (Hamiwaldanus), ʿĀshīk Pasha Zāde, Urudj, Rūhī, Anonymus Giese, are completed by the Byzantine historians Phrantzes (who himself played a part in the diplomatic history of the time), Ducas and Chalcondylas, and also by the later Ottoman authors Sa'd al-Dīn, 'Ālī and Munedjdjim Bashī A curious contemporary description is that of an unknown captive from Muhlenbach in Transylvania (captured 1438) in his Tractatus de moribus conditionibus et nequitia Turcorum (cf K Foy, in MSOS, iv, v)

General later descriptions of Murād II's reign in the works of von Hammer, G O R, i, Zinkeisen, i and Jorga, i

(J H Kramers)

MURĀD III, twelfth ruler of the Ottoman Empire, was born on the 5th Djumādā I 953 (4th July 1546, Sidjill-i 'othmānī, i 76) as son of the later sultān Selīm II and the khāṣṣeki Nūr Bānū He arrived at Constantinople on Dec 21st, 1574, after Selīm II's death and reigned until his death on January 16, 1595 or a few days later His reign is not characterized by great conquests in Europe The peaceful relations with Austria were officially maintained, peace was several times confirmed (in 1575 and 1584) by a new treaty and by extraordinary Austrian embassies Nevertheless there were continual Turkish raids into Austrian territory, especially in Croatia in 1578 — where even a new sandjak was formed — followed by triumphal processions in the capital, which the Austrian envoys were forced to witness It was only in 1593 that a formal war broke out, in which the then grand vizier Sinān Pasha took the town of Raab (1594) The relations with Venice were of the same kind as with Austria, notwithstanding several serious naval collisions peace was maintained, mainly through the influence of Murād's khāṣṣeki Safiye (of the family of Baffa) and the Kapudan Pashas, who were Italian renegades In the Danube principalities the never ending dynastic disputes went on, this was also the case in Transylvania Even Poland was considered more or less as an Ottoman tributary vassal state, the Polish king, Stephan Bathory, owed his crown to the sultān's protection and after his death (1587) the new king Sigismund began to reign by the grace of Murād The Porte had to intervene several times in the disturbances caused by Polish cossacks in Moldavia and the Tatar Khānate and by Tatar incursions in Poland In the Crimea the Ottoman intervention was even stronger, because the Persian war necessitated in 1581 and 1583 expeditions by the way of Kaffa and the Crimea against Dāghistan and Transcaucasia

The most outstanding military exploit of the Ottoman Empire during Murād III's reign was the war with Persia, which lasted from 1577 to 1590 Persia passed, after Shāh Tahmasp's death in 1576, through serious inner troubles This gave the Turks a favourable opportunity of enlarging their territory Between 1577 and 1584 the chief theatre of the war was Georgia, Lala Mustafā Pasha won the battle of Lake Čaldır (August 9, 1578), after which the princes of the small Georgian kingdoms became nominally Ottoman vassals, while several towns, like Tiflis and Shakī, came under direct military occupation In 1579 the town of Kars was fortified That same year Sinān Pasha became ser-'asker on the Georgian front The completion of the conquests confronted the Ottoman armies with serious difficulties, especially after Simon, the former king of Kartli, had come back from exile in Persia This made necessary the already mentioned expedition by the way of the Crimea in 1581 under Özdemir 'Othmān Pasha who was joined in 1583, by the same way, by Dja'fer Pasha, they came back to Constantinople again via the Crimea and 'Othmān Pasha was received with great honour by the sultān after his return, although it would seem that the real aim of the expedition — a junction with the Turkish forces of the south — was not reached, owing to the combined efforts of the people of Georgia and Shirwān (cf W E D Allen, A History of the Georgian People, London 1932, p 157) The second phase of the Persian war began with the taking of Tabrīz in 1585 by 'Othmān Pasha, followed by other successes on Persian territory (Gandja in Transcaucasia and Nihāwend) In 1587 Shāh 'Abbās I ascended the throne, soon afterwards there began peace negotiations, ending in a peace treaty (March 21, 1590) which left Georgia, Shirwān, Karabāgh, Tabrīz and Luristān to the Ottoman Empire One of the peace conditions was that the Persians should give up most of their anti Sunnite religious practices

During Murād III's first years Muhammad Pasha Sokolli [q v] had continued to administer the huge Empire as grand vizier, but his once unquestioned authority began to wane under the influence of the sultān's courtiers like Shemsī Pasha and the defterdār Uweis, an influential personality also was the Khwādja Sa'd al-Dīn — the historian — and the eunuch Ghazanfer Agha Home and foreign politics were influenced also by Murād's mother Nūr Bānū and the already mentioned khāṣṣeki Ṣafiye (Baffa), who used as a powerful agent outside the palace the Jewess Kira (Chierazza in the Italian sources) Sokolli's confidants were relegated from the capital (as the nishāndjī Ferīdūn) or executed (like Michael Cantacuzenos) But he was still grand vizier, when he was murdered on October 11, 1579 After him the grand vizierate was changed no less than ten times under Murād III Sinān Pasha, already mentioned, held the office three times, 'Othmān Pasha, appointed in 1585, after his return from Dāghistān, died eight months afterwards As the sultān, though well-intentioned, was too weak himself to direct a consistent policy, — as he acknowledged himself according to 'Ālī (cf Hammer, G O R 2, ii 567) — all kinds of abuses gradually began in this epoch, especially in the administration of the fiefs [cf TIMĀR] and the enrolling of the Janissaries, they are summed up in Koči Bey's Risāla This sultān's reign witnessed for the first time revolts of the Janissaries directed against the imperial diwan itself The first mutiny, in April 1589, was caused by depreciation of the coinage and could be appeased only — as so often afterwards — by the sacrifice of the lives of high officials In 1592 there was a similar Sipāhī revolt More than one provincial rebellion had to be subdued by force, the most celebrated expedition was that of Ibrāhīm Pasha, the later dāmād and favourite of Muhammad III, to Egypt and Syria in 1585, in Syria he persecuted severely the Banū Ma'an, the leaders of the Druses, but very soon afterwards the successful career of Fakhr al-Dīn [q v] began

Murād's reign can be characterized as the beginning of the internal weakening of the Ottoman power The sultān did not possess the strong personality of his grand father, his amorous tendencies were much encouraged by his mother and his wife Safiye, and he had far more than a hundred children Besides he was inclined to mysticism, he protected mystic poets and himself wrote poems under the takhallus Murādī, besides a mystical treatise called Futūhāt al Siyām (Hādjdjī Khalīfa, N° 1003) It is possible that he was in sympathy with the repeated outbursts of Muhammadan fanaticism that occurred during his reign and led to the conversion of several churches in the capital into mosques, amongst them the church of the Greek Patriarchate These actions caused violent but vain remonstrations from the representatives of France and other Catholic powers The outward splendour of the court was extravagant, the festival of the circumcision of his son Muhammad, in June 1582, seems to have surpassed all similar ceremonies in the Ottoman history (description by Leonclavius)

Bibliography The Turkish contemporary sources are the historical works of ʿĀlī (a Nusrat nāme of ʿĀlī is dedicated to the Georgian campaign), Pečewī, Selānikī, Solak Zāde and Hasan Bey Zāde, Naʿīmā and the Fedhleke of Hādjdjī Khalīfa begin with the year 1001 of the hidjra (October 1592) Contemporaneous western sources are the Relazioni of the Venetian bailo's, the diary of Gerlach, further v Hammer, G O R, iv and the historical works of Zinkeisen, iv and Jorga, iii , E J W Gibb, H O P, ii 170 sqq

(J H Kramers)

MURĀD IV, fifth son of sultān Ahmad I, and seventeenth ruler of the Ottoman Empire, was born 28th Djumādā I 1021 (July 27, 1612) and called to the throne as a result of the mutiny of the Janissaries and Sipāhis, which had forced Mustafā I to abdicate, on September 11, 1623 When the lives of Murād and his brothers were in danger, they had been hidden by Khalīl Pasha But even after his enthronement Murād IV's position was far from strong The turbulent and continuously mutinying Janissaries and Sipāhīs were the real masters of the situation and the seven grand viziers that succeeded each other between the accession and 1632 were more or less dependent on the momentary wishes of those militias The young sultān and his mother Kosem [q v] were at first unable to restore the authority of the government, and more than once they were constrained to sacrifice a high official to the mutinous soldateska, amongst them the grand vizier Hāfiz Pasha [q v] in February 1632 Gradually the old experienced statesmen of ʿOthmān II's time regained their influence, and sometimes the sultān was able to suppress unreliable officials, as already in April 1624 by the execution of the grand vizier Kemānkesh ʿAlī Pasha [q v], but it was only in 1632 that he became real master of the situation, in that year he had the grand vizier Redjeb Pasha — until that time one of the most influential men at court — executed, after which began Murād IV's personal reign of terror

During this period from 1623—1632 the Asiatic affairs of the Empire required all the available energy of the Porte In 1623 Baghdād had fallen after many atrocities into the hands of the Persians as a result of the intrigues of the Turkish su bashī Bekir, Mōsul also became Persian, and the Anatolian army under Hāfiz Pasha was powerless Abāza Pasha [q v] was still in revolt at Erzerūm, in 1624 an agreement was reached with him, but only in 1628 the grand vizier Khosrew Pasha forced him to surrender, after which Abāza played a part as governor of Bosnia and of Silistria In the meantime several vain efforts were made to recover Baghdād, by Hāfiz Ahmad Pasha in 1626, and by Khosrew Pasha [q v] in 1630

From 1632 Murād IV prepared with incredible energy the mobilisation of all the country's resources for the war against Persia, where Shāh ʿAbbās I had died in 1627 He suppressed with great cruelty the rebellious movements among the Janissaries and reduced their number by not applying the dewshirme for twelve years New and more reliable troops were formed from the djebedjis, bostandjis and especially the segbāns (seymens) The necessary funds were procured by drastic financial measures, amongst them the confiscation of large fortunes Every attempt at opposition was cruelly suppressed, in 1633 even the Shaikh al Islām Akhī Zāde Husain was executed In October 1633 an army under the new grand vizier Tabanī Yasī Muhammad Pasha left Constantinople, but that year and the following no important military operations took place The Kapudan Pasha Djaʿfar, however, was successful in suppressing the power of the Druse Amir Fakhr al Dīn [q v] and bringing him alive to Constantinople In 1635 Murād himself left the capital, joined the grand vizier's army in Erzerūm and conquered Erīwan (August 1635) Then the undefended Tabrīz was taken and destroyed, after which the sultān returned In the following year the Persians recaptured Erīwan Finally, in 1638, Murād took the field for the second time with the grand vizier Tayyār Muhammad Pasha, Baghdād was taken by them in December 1638, and thousands of Shīʿīs were massacred This was the end of the Persian war, in 1639 a peace was concluded, which left Baghdād to Turkey and Erīwan to Persia

In comparison with the events in Asia, European affairs were of secondary importance The peace with Austria was several times renewed (1625 at Gyarmath and 1627 at Szon) although predatory raids from both sides never ceased Serious trouble was caused in 1624 by the appearance of Cossack ships in the Bosporus, they were defeated only in 1626 Another hotbed of unrest was the Crimea, where from 1624 till 1628 the Porte had to suffer against its will the Khān Muhammad Girāy and his brother Shāhīn Girāy, who even took Kaffa for a time After 1628 the Tatar Mīrzā Kantemīr (or Kantimur), chief of the Noghays, became the most powerful man in the khanate, his continual incursions caused serious conflicts with Poland (peace restored in 1634) and in Moldavia At last Kantemīr was executed at Constantinople in 1637

The peaceful relations with Venice and the western sea powers continued, in 1624 the capitulations had been renewed, but as the Porte was without authority over the Barbary states of Algiers and Tunis, England, Holland and France concluded separate treaties with their rulers in order to avert as much as possible the damage done to their trade by the ships of the corsairs In 1638 a more serious battle took place in the Adriatic between the Venetian fleet and Barbary corsairs, at first Murād ordered the massacre of all Venetians in his Empire, but in 1639 peace was restored In Constantinople the ministers of Holland (Haga) and England (Roe) intervened successfully in the troubles between the Porte and the Greek Patriarchate

Murād IV died on February 9, 1640 and was buried in the turbe of the mosque of his father Ahmad, he was the last warlike sultān of the Empire, by his energy he restored for some time its military authority, but his reforms did not last after him Still a separate kānūn nāme bears Murād IV's name He was a man of considerable physical strength and of high personal erudition and he liked the company of poets His attachment to the poet Tiflī [q v] is famous in literary tradition The poet Nefʿī [q v] on the other hand was executed by his order On verses written by Murād cf Gibb, H O P, III 248 sqq He had four sons, all of whom died young, at his death there was only his brother Ibrāhīm to take the succession His brothers Bāyazīd and Sulaimān were killed by his order during the Erīwan campaign, and later also his brother Kāsim In course of time Murād had become ever more ferocious, and he is said to have sworn in 1639 that he would subdue all his Christian neighbours (Jorga, IV 1)

Bibliography The chief Turkish sources are Naʿīmā, Pečewī and Karā Čelebi Zāde's Rawdat al-Abrār Further the continuation of ʿAtāyī's biographical work by ʿUshākī Zāde (G O W, p 259), Fwliyā Čelebi's Sīyāhat-name is also particularly rich in information about the reign of Murād IV Of Western contemporary sources must be mentioned the Venetian Relazioni and the correspondence of Sir Thomas Roe and Cornelius Haga (Rijks geschiedkundige Publicatiën, X, Bronnen tot de Geschiedenis van den Levantschen Handel, 1590—1660, II, 's Gravenhage 1910) Later treatments of this period in the general works of von Hammer (V), Zinkeisen (IV) and Jorga (III)

(J H KRAMERS)

MURĀD V, Ottoman Sultān from May 31 till Sept 7, 1876 He was born on Sept 21, 1840 as son of Sultān ʿAbd al Madjīd and was deprived of all influence on public affairs during the reign of his elder brother ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz, who had the plan of altering the succession in favour of his own descendants, so as to deprive Murād of his rights Murād was called to the throne by the coup d'etat of the recently established cabinet, of which Midhat Pasha [q v], Muhammad Rushdī and Husain ʿAwnī were the leading members By deposing Sultān ʿAbd al ʿAzīz they hoped to eliminate the influence of reactionary elements who were opposed to their schemes of reform and they expected to find an ally in Murād In the night from 30th to 31st May 1876 Murād was induced with some difficulty to proceed to the Serʿaskerate in Constantinople, where he received the homage of the troops and the high dignitaries He confirmed the cabinet in office Very soon afterwards took place the suicide of the deposed sultān (June 5) and the murder of the ministers Husain ʿAwnī and Rashīd Pasha during a cabinet meeting in Midhat's house (June 15) These events seem to have been fatal to the mental equilibrium of the new sultān, who, already in the night of his accession, had shown signs of abnormal nervous excitement He was unable to appear before his people at the selāmlīk, nor could the sword-girding ceremony (kīlīdj alayī) be applied to him Midhat Pasha and his friends, although fearing that a new change of rulers might endanger their plans had to arrange another deposition, they had the sultān's health examined by a number of physicians and, on their report, obtained a fatwā from the Shaikh al Islām Hasan Khair Allāh Efendī, authorizing Murād's deposition (September 1) His younger brother ʿAbd al-Hamīd II became sultān and Murād went to live in the Čiraghan Palace, where he died on August 29, 1904 His confinement during ʿAbd al-Hamīd's reign continued to excite speculation as a yet unsolved mystery and was occasionally represented as one of the crimes of the Hamīdian regime

Bibliography Keratry, Mourad V, prince, sultan, prisonnier d'etat 1840—1876, Paris 1878, Djemaleddin Bey, Sultan Murad V, the Turkish Dynasty Mystery 1876—1895, London 1895, Newfīk Nūr al-Dīn, Sultān ʿAzīzīn Khalʿī we Intihārī, Constantinople 1324, Ahmad Sā ib, Taʾrīkh-i Sultān Muhammad Khāmis, Cairo 1326, Husain Hifzī, Sultān Murād Khāmis we-Sebeb-i Khalʿī, Constantinople 1326, ʿOthmān Nūri, ʿAbd al Hamīd Thāni we-Dewr-i Saltanatī, Constantinople 1327, I 30 sq, 91 sq,, Ali Haydar Midhat, Life of Midhat Pasha, London 1903

(J H KRAMERS)

MURĀD PASHA, Turkish grand vizier under Ahmad I, was a Croatian by birth and was born about 1520 He served the empire as military commander and later as wālī in different provinces (Egypt, Yaman, Anatolia) and was made prisoner by the Persians in the battle of Tabrīz (Sept 1585), where Čighāle's army was defeated In 1601 he was pasha of Budin and in 1603 commander-in-chief on the Hungarian front In these posts he repeatedly conducted for the Porte peace negotiations with Austria He was the chief negotiator of the peace of Zsitvatorok (Nov 11, 1606) A month afterwards (Dec 11, 1606), after the execution of Derwīsh Pasha in Constantinople, he was appointed grand vizier, being then already about 80 years of age

As grand vizier Murād Pasha became particularly famous by his relentless persecution and repression of the many rebellions in the Asiatic provinces In 1607 he defeated the Kurd Djānbulād [q v] in North Syria (battle of Urudj Owasī in Oct 1607) After having passed the winter in Aleppo, he succeeded in crushing the forces of the arch rebel Kalender Oghlu at the pass of Goksun in Cappadocia (July 1908), where he decided the battle by his personal courage Then he pursued from Sīwās the rebel Maimūn and defeated him near Baiburt His habit of throwing the captured rebels into pits dug for that purpose brought him the name of Koyudju Murād Pasha Notwithstanding the sultān's order — provoked by his enemies in the capital — that he should proceed immediately against Persia, he returned in December to Constantinople, where he was received with great honours Poets celebrated his achievements against the rebels In 1609 Murād Pasha went to Scutari for the Persian campaign, but he went no further that year, because he wished first to deal with two remaining dangerous rebels Muselli-Čaush in Ič Ili and Yūsuf Pasha in Aidin By false propositions of reconciliation these two were at last induced to surrender and afterwards killed Murād Pasha had to make use more than once of his personal influence with the sultān to restrain the latter's impatience before his plans had succeeded

On the other hand, the sultān had to protect several dignitaries against the personal hatred of the terrible old man In 1610 the grand vizier at last marched to Persia and destroyed Tabrīz, then he went to Erzerūm, from where he began long and extended negotiations with Shāh ʿAbbas Before the following year's campaign had begun, he died (August 5, 1611) He was buried in a turbe near the medrese he had founded in the quarter Wezneḏjiler in Constantinople

By his successes in restoring the internal order of the empire Murād Pasha is considered as one of the most able grand viziers, the historians give ample proofs of his sound judgment of persons and situations To his initiative is due a compilation of the kānūns regulating the tīmār administration (G O W, p 141)

Bibliography ʿOthmān Zāde, Hadīkat al-Wuzarāʾ, p 55, the historians Naʿīmā, Peçewī, Hādjdjī Khalīfa (Fedhleke) and Hasan Beg Zāde Mostly after them von Hammer, G O R, iv, Zinkeisen, iv, Jorga, iii (J H Kramers)

MURĀD SŪ [See al-Furāt]

MURĀDĀBĀD [See Morādābād]

MURĀDĪ, takhallus of Murād III [q v] and Murād IV [q v]

MURCIA (Ar Mursiya), a town in the S E of Spain, 140 feet above sea level in the centre of the famous huerta de Murcia ("gardens of Murcia") watered by the river Segura (Ar Wādī Shakūra [q v] or Wādī 'l abyaḍ, "the white river") The area of Murcia has a large population over 150,000, although the town in the strict sense has barely 30,000 Murcia is the capital of the province of the same name and the see of a bishop, it has also a university Its port, 40 miles to the south on the Mediterranean coast, is Cartagena, the Ḳarṭādjanna or Ḳarṭādjannat al Ḵhulafāʾ of the Arabs

The situation of Murcia in the centre of very fertile gardens, forming an island of vegetation in a bare country poorly endowed by nature, had been noticed already by the Arab geographers who give more or less long accounts of it Abu 'l Fidāʾ, for example, says that it was like Seville for the number of its groves and parks (muntazahāt), among which he mentions the famous al Rushīkī

Murcia in the Umayyad period was the capital of a province or kūra which bore the name of Todmīr [q v, iv 805] This name which is connected with the name of Theodemir, a Visigothic chief of the region at the time of the Muslim conquest, was also applied to the town of Murcia itself, from the time when it supplanted Orihuela [q v] as the chief town of the region Indeed almost all the Arab authors who speak of Murcia agree in saying that it was a comparatively recent foundation, it was built by order of the Umayyad emīr ʿAbd al Rahmān II al Hakam about the year 210 (825), according to the al-Rawḍ al miʿṭār in 216 by the governor Djābir b Mālik b Labīd

The land of Todmīr and with it of course Murcia was much involved in the civil wars provoked by the rivalry of the Yamanīs and the Mudarīs of Spain in the period of the independent emīrs of Cordova In the reign of ʿAbd Allāh (275–300 = 888–912), a rebel, the renegade Daisam b Ishāk, rose there with the connivance of the famous agitator Ibn Hafṣūn [cf UMAIYADS II] He ruled independently all the province of Todmīr until the emīr of Cordova sent to suppress him in 283 (896) an army led by his uncle Hishām b ʿAbd al-Rahmān b al Hakam and the general Ahmad b Muhammad Ibn Abī ʿAbda Daisam was defeated between Aledo and Lorca and the latter town besieged The country was only definitely pacified and restored to the central power in Cordova in the reign of the caliph ʿAbd al Rahmān III and his successor al-Hakam II

During the events which ended in the break up of Umaiyad Spain, Murcia became, like the majority of the great towns of the Peninsula, the capital of a little independent state At first in the hands of the "Slavs" [cf SAKĀLIBA] Khairān and Zuhair, along with Almeria and Jaen, the principality of Murcia was then for some time attached to the kingdom of Valencia, in the reigns of ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz al Mansūr Ibn Abī ʿĀmir and his son ʿAbd al-Malik al-Muzaffar The governor who then ruled Murcia was Abū Bakr Ahmad b Ishāk Ibn Tāhir, when he died in 455 (1063) after amassing a considerable fortune, he was succeeded by his son Abū ʿAbd al-Rahmān Muhammad who soon proclaimed himself independent and repudiated the authority of the Valencian dynasty

The principality of Ibn Tāhir soon aroused the covetousness of the minister of al-Muʿtamid [q v] Ibn ʿAbbād, king of Seville, and an expedition was sent against Murcia with the help of an independent lord of the district, Ibn Rashīk Ibn Tāhir was taken prisoner and shut up in Monteagudo, but escaping, he reached Valencia where after acting as adviser to al-Kādir Ibn Dhi 'l-Nūn [q v] and having almost succeeded him, he finally died in 508 (1119) The conquest of the kingdom of Murcia by Ibn ʿAmmār in the name of the ʿAbbāsids took place in 471 (1078), but it was only nominal and it was Ibn Rashīk who exercised the real power instead of Ibn Tāhir

The kingdom of Murcia was one of the first districts of the Peninsula to be conquered by the Almoravids Murcia was taken for Yūsuf b Tāshfīn [q v] in Shawwāl 484 (Nov -Dec 1091) by the Lamtūnian general Ibn ʿĀʾisha who next took Denia and Játiva Ibn ʿĀʾisha remained governor of Murcia, he was replaced later by Abū Bakr b Ibrāhim Ibn Lifilwit, then by a brother of the sultān ʿAlī b Yūsuf, Abū Ishāk Ibrāhīm

A general rising against the Almoravids took place in Spain in the beginning of the xiith century and gave rise to the formation of a new series of kingdoms of "taifas" Murcia therefore between 1145 and 1147 was in the hands of two rival leaders, ʿAbd Allāh b Iyād and ʿAbd Allāh b Faradj, until the Valencian ruler Muhammad b Ahmad b Saʿd Ibn Mardanīsh seized it and took up his residence there This individual, who was of Spanish origin (cf above, ii, p 403), soon became the powerful ruler of all S E Spain, between Valencia and Almeria, and instituted a series of fruitful alliances with the Christian rulers of Catalonia, Aragon and Castille He was for long able to resist the attacks of the first Almohads ʿAbd al-Muʾmin [q v] and Yūsuf [q v], and it was only after his death in 567 (1172) during the siege of his capital Murcia that his kingdom passed finally to the Muʾminid sovereigns

From the fall of the Almohad empire in Spain until its conquest by the Christians Murcia had a very troubled existence It was in turn the residence (from the beginning of the xiiith century) of princes of the family of the Banū Hūd of Saragossa Muhammad b Yūsuf al Mutawakkil, the latter's uncle, Muhammad, Abū Bakr Muhammad al-Wāthik, then it passed to the Nasrids of Granada to ʿAbd Allāh b Alī Ibn Ashķīlūla For details of the obscure history of this period see the monograph by Gaspar Remiro quoted below According to Ibn al-Abbār (cf M Bencheneb, Notes chronologiques sur la conquete de l'Espagne, in Melanges Rene Basset, Paris 1923, ii 73), Murcia was surrendered to the Christians by Ahmad b Muhammad b Hūd, son of the governor, on Thursday 10th Shawwāl 640 (April 2, 1243) But if we may believe the Christian chronicles it was in February 1266 that Don Jaime of Aragon took definite possession of Murcia

Bibliography al-Idrīsī, Description de l'Afrique et de l'Espagne, ed and transl Dozy and de Goeje, p 194—236, Abu 'l-Fidā', Takwim al-Buldān, ed Reinaud and de Slane, p 178—256, Yāķūt, Muʿdjam, ed Wüstenfeld, iv 497, Ibn ʿAbd al-Munʿim al-Himyarī, al-Rawd al miʿtār, art Mursiya, Akhbār madj mūʿa, Ibn al-Kūtīya, Iftitāh al Andalus, passim, Ibn ʿIdhārī, al-Bayān al-mughrib, ii and iii, indices, all the historians and biographers of the Muslim west, European writers A good monograph has been written on Muslim Murcia by M Gaspar Remiro, Historia de Murcia Musulmana, Saragossa 1905 Cf also Dozy, Histoire des Musulmans d'Espagne, 2nd ed , index, do, Recherches, passim, A González Palencia, Historia de la España Musulmana, p 57, 82, 88, A Prieto Vives, Los Reyes de Taifas, Madrid 1926, E Lévi Provençal, Inscriptions arabes d'Espagne, Leyden—Paris 1931, p 96 sqq ; do, L'Espagne musulmane du Xeme siecle, Institutions et vie sociale, Paris 1932, index, E Tormo, Levante (Guias Calpe), Madrid 1923

(E LÉVI-PROVENÇAL)

MURDĀDH (P), the fifth month of the Persian solar year running from July 19 to Aug 18 (Murdādh māh) Murdādh is also the name of the seventh day of each month (Murdādh rūz), it is the last of the series of the days which are called after the Amesha Spentas Murdādh (Pehlevi amūrdāth "immortality") forms with Khurdādh [q v] (Pehlevi khūrdāth perfection) an indivisible pair and the days which bear these names come together They denote a pair of archangels, of whom Murdādh has charge of the gifts of the earth on which the life of man depends The seventh day of the month Murdādh on which the names of the day and of the month are the same is called Murdādhgān

Bibliography al-Bīrūnī, Āthār, ed Sachau, p 42, 43, 70, 221 Geiger-Kuhn, Gr I Ph, ii 638, 675 sqq (M PIESSNER)

AL-MURDJI'A, name of one of the early sects of Islām, the extreme opponents of the Khāridjites [q v] The latter thought that a Muslim by committing a mortal sin becomes a kāfir The Murdji'a, on the other hand, were of opinion that a Muslim does not lose his faith through sin This doctrine led them to a far-reaching quietism in politics, according to their doctrine, the imām who was guilty of mortal sins did not cease to be a Muslim and must be obeyed The salāt performed behind him was valid

Occidental and Oriental explanations of the name show considerable divergencies (cf e g Sale, Preliminary Discourse, p 229 sq , Goldziher, Richtungen der islam Koranauslegung, p 179, v Kremer, Gesch d herrschenden Ideen, p 20, Houtsma, Stryd over het dogma, p 34) It seems to me that the origin of the name must be sought in the term irdjā', in this way that Murdji'a meant adherents of the doctrine of irdjā' (ʿAbd al-Kāhir al-Baghdādī uses the term for their doctrine) and that this term goes back to verse 107 of sūra ix The context of this verse not only explains the term irdjā', but may also give an insight into the evolution of the ideas of the Murdji'ites In the preceding verses Muhammad makes a distinction between two groups among the Madīnese who had forsaken him in the expedition to Tabūk [q v] some had shown nifāk without penitence, they were to receive punishment in this and in the other world (verse 102) Others had shown penitence (tawba), they were left to Allāh's mercy (verse 103) The third group, who had not made penitence, were left in suspense (murdjaʾūna, or, according to a different reading, murdjawna)

The situation in Madīna after the expedition to Tabūk was generalised by later sects As a matter of fact, the third group mentioned in the passage discussed — viz sinners who did not show penitence — was relegated to Hell by the Khāridjites In opposition to this, the Murdji'ites taught the doctrine of irdjā' mentioned in sūra ix 107 and therefore they were called Murdji'a, i e the adherents of the doctrine of respite or hope, for this the term irdjā' means, the variants murdjaʾūna and murdjawna are irrelevant in this respect

In the course of time the doctrine of the Murdji'a assumed a double aspect Their chief thesis was the indelible character of faith, in opposition to the Kharidjites Their second thesis was of an eschatological nature where there is faith, sins will do no harm On account of the latter doctrine they were called the adherents of promise (ahl al waʿd), in contra-distinction to the Muʿtazila [q v] who were called the adherents of threats (ahl al-waʿīd) So the doctrine of irdjā' had acquired a triple aspect — which accounts for the divergent explanations of the name —, viz the doctrine of faith bearing an indelible character, an indulgent attitude towards sinners in the Muslim community, and a hopeful prospect for them in the Last Judgment

These are the chief tenets of the Murdji'a as they appear to us as well as to later Muslim writers such as al Shahrastānī Earlier authors enumerate a number of divergencies among the different groups of Murdji'ites Al Ashʿarī mentions their variety of opinion regarding faith, unbelief, sins, tawhīd, interpretation of the Kur'ān, eschatology, mortal and venial sins, forgiveness of mortal sins, the impeccability of the Prophets, punishment of sins, the question whether there were infidels among the early generations of Islām, redress of wrongs, the beatific vision, the nature of the Kur'ān, the quiddītas of Allāh, His names and sifāt, predestination

ʿAbd al-Kāhir al-Baghdādī mentions three groups of Murdji'a a those who taught irdjā' regarding faith and free will, to this group belonged Ghailān Abū Marwān al-Dimashkī, Abū Shāmir, Muhammad b Abī Shabīb al-Basrī, b those who taught irdjā' regarding faith and compulsion (djabr), c those who gave faith the pre eminence before works and belonged neither to the adherents of the doctrine of free will nor to those of predetermination, to the latter group belonged the followers of Yūnus b ʿAwn, Ghassān, Abū Thawbān, Abū Muʿādh al-Tawmanī, Bishr b Ghaiyāth al-Maīsī [q v] The followers of Ghassān reckoned Abū Hanīfa as one of their friends, not, however, quite rightly, according to al-Baghdādī That Abū Hanīfa shared the general views of the Murdjiʾa, appears from his (unedited) letter to al-Battī, which is preserved in a MS in the library of Cairo

Although al-Baghdādī mentions a hadīth in which the Murdjiʾa are cursed, the high esteem in which Abū Hanīfa stood as a dogmatist and as a doctor of the law would be in itself sufficient proof of the fact that the "sect" was not too eccentric As a matter of fact, their political quietism was largely practised by orthodoxy itself As regards eschatological punishment, the Fikh Akbar, II (art 14) rejects the Murdjiʾī doctrine of our good deeds being accepted and of our sins being forgiven, Allāh being free to punish the sinner or to grant him forgiveness — The same ʿakida, however, shares the Murdjiʾī doctrine of the constancy of faith (art 18)

Bibliography M Th Houtsma, De strijd over het dogma in den Islâm tot op al-Ashʾari, Leyden 1875, p 34 sqq, I Goldziher, Vorlesungen uber den Islam, Heidelberg 1910, Index, s v Murdschiʾa, A J Wensinck, The Muslim Creed, Cambridge 1932, General index, s v Murdjites, al-Ashʿari, Makālāt al-Islāmiyin, ed Ritter, Stambul 1929, I 132 sqq, ʿAbd al-Kāhir al-Baghdādi, Kitāb al-Fark bain al-Firak, ed Muh Badr, Cairo 1328, p 190 sqq, al-Shahrastānī, Kitāb al-Milal wa 'l-Nihal, ed Cureton, p 103 sqq, Ibn Hazm, Kitāb al-Fiṣal, II 112 sqq, IV 44 sqq, 204 sqq, Ibn al-Athīr, ed Tornberg, X 29, Muir, The Life of Mohammad, 3rd ed, Edinburgh 1914, p 431

(A J Wensinck)

MURGHĀB [See MERW AL-SHĀHIDJĀN]

MURĪD, novice, the term applied during his period of preparation to one who wishes to enter a derwish order [TARĪKA, q v, cf also DERWĪSH] or a guild [SINF, q v] The task of the murid and his obligations to his master (shaikh, pīr) and to his ideal and their mystic and erotic foundations have been often and fully discussed, so that it is here sufficient to give a reference to the most important literature of modern times, which will guide one to the sources themselves In the wider application of the word murīd has become a term for mystic in general

Bibliography the articles mentioned and SHADD, H Thorning, Beitrage zur Kenntnis des islamischen Vereinswesens (Turk Bibl, XVI, 1913), R Hartmann, al-Kuschairîs Darstellung des Sûfîtums (Turk Bibl, XVIII, 1914), Dict of Techn Terms, ed Sprenger, s v, Asín Palacios, El Islam cristianizado, 1931, esp p 145–158

(M Plessner)

AL-MŪRIYĀNĪ, ABŪ AIYŪB SULAIMĀN AL KHŪZĪ, vizier of the caliph al-Mansūr When the governor of Fārs Sulaimān b Habīb al-Muhallabī in the Umaiyad period had the future caliph al-Mansūr, who was accused of embezzling state funds, flogged and intended to treat him with still greater indignity, the latter was saved by Abū Aiyūb al-Mūriyānī who was Sulaimān's secretary According to another story, al Mansūr purchased him as a young boy and sent him in some capacity to his brother, the caliph al Saffāh, who was so pleased with him that he at once took him into his service and retained him there after his manumission Al-Mūriyānī was in any case appointed vizier by al-Mansūr in succession to Khālid b Barmak He had a great influence over the caliph, in 153 (770) however, he was arrested with his brother and the latter's sons and deprived of all his property According to some, his crime was that he had embezzled a large sum received from al Mansūr to make a district in Khūzistān arable and deceived the caliph when he came to inspect it by making the place look as if it were cultivated According to others, he had a son of al Mansūr murdered He died in prison in 154 (770/1) — The nisba al-Mūriyānī comes from Mūriyān, a town in Khūzistān

Bibliography Ibn Khallikān (ed Wustenfeld), N° 275 (transl de Slane, I 595 sq), Yaʿkūbi (ed Houtsma), II 468, Tabarī, ed Leyden, III 370, 372, Masʿūdī, Murūdj (ed Paris), VI 165 sq, Ibn al-Athīr (ed Tornberg), V 466 sqq, Ibn al-Tiktakā, al Fakhri (ed Derenbourg), p 236—239 (K V Zetterstéen)

MURSAL (A), part pass IV from arsala "to send" As a technical term it denotes a an apostle of Allāh, b traditions of which the isnad is defective in a certain sense, cf HADITH, III c

AI MURSALĀT, title of sūra LXXVII, after the first verse "By those which are sent by Allāh, following one another in a continual series" According to some interpreters a certain group of angels is meant here, according to others, however, the mursalāt are the verses of the Kurʾān See the commentaries on the Kurʾān on sūra LXXVII 1

MURSHIDĀBĀD, district in the Presidency Division of Bengal, area 2,143 sq m, pop 1,372,274, of whom 713,152 are Muslims The public offices are at Barhāmpūr, but the old capital is at Murshidābād, which before Murshid Kuli's appointment was known as Makhsūsābād or Makhsūdābād The district is mainly agricultural, and produces much rice, jute, etc, and is famous for its mangoes The silk industry was formerly of great importance, but has now much declined The district played a very prominent part in the history of Bengal, and is full of historical sites though Plassey is now outside its borders The history of Calcutta and of the English in Bengal is intimately connected with Murshidābād But the Nawābs are no longer of political importance

Bibliography J H Γ Walsh, History of Murshidabad District, London 1902, Purna Ch Mazumdar, Musnad of Murshidābād, Murshidābād 1905, Ghulām Husain al-Tabātabāʾī, Siyar al Mutaʾakhkhirin, translated by Mustafā, a French renegade, in 1789, Ghulām Husain of Mālda, Riyād al-Salātin (Bibl Ind, text and translation), reference may also be made to Anquetil Du Perron's account of his travels, to Mrs Sherwood's Autobiography, Bishop Heber's Journal, and to Macaulay's Essays, Fifth Report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons on the Affairs of the Hon East India Company, 1812, Census of India, 1911, vol v, parts I and II, Imperial Census of India, vol XVIII, W W Hunter, Statistical Account of Bengal, vol IX, Rev J Long, The Banks of the Bhāgnathi (Calcutta Review), S C Hill, Bengal in 1756—1757 (Indian Records Series)

(H Beveridge)

AL-MURTAḌĀ AL-SHARĪF ABU 'L-KĀSIM ʿALĪ B AL-ṬĀHIR DHI 'L-MANĀKIB ABĪ AHMAD AL-HUSAIN B MŪSĀ B MUHAMMAD B IBRĀHĪM B MŪSĀ AL-KĀẒIM B DJAʿFAR AL-SĀDIK B MUHAMMAD AL-BĀKIR B ʿALĪ ZAIN AL-ʿĀBIDĪN B AL-HUSAIN B ʿALĪ B ABĪ ṬĀLIB, ʿALAM AL-HUDĀ, Arab author born in 355 (966), died in 436 (1044) as Nakīb of the ʿAlids in Baghdād Of his works, which are detailed in Ahlwardt, Verzeichnis der Hdss in Berlin, N⁰ 16, we still have the following 1 His principal work Ghurar al-Fawāʾid wa Durar al-Kalāʾid bi 'l-Muhādarāt, usually called briefly al-Durar wa 'l-Ghurar, which he finished on the 22nd Djumādā I 413 (Aug 24, 1022) is an adab book which to the discussion of verses of the Kurʾān and traditions adds numerous philological and lexicographical notes and extensive references to poets and is divided into 80 (82) madjālis, lith Tihrān 1273, 1277, pr Cairo 1325 as the Kitāb al-Amālī, 2 Kitāb al Shāfī, a defence of the imāmate of the Twelvers against the Mughnī of the Muʿtazilī chief kādī of the Shāfiʿīs in Raiy Abu 'l-Hasan ʿAbd al Djabbār b Ahmad al-Asadābādī († 415 = 1024), along with an abbreviation of the year 432 (1040) by Shaikh al Tūsī entitled Talkhīṣ al-Shāfī printed in one volume Tihrān 1301, 3 Irshād al-ʿAwāmm in 1 collected volume Tihrān 1304 (s E G Browne, A Year among the Persians, p 554), 4 al-Dharīʿa ilā Usūl al-Sharīʿa, Brit Mus Or 5581 (Descriptive List, N⁰ 21), 5 al-Masāʾil al-Nāṣirīya in the collected volume al Djawāmiʿ al-fikhīya, Tihrān 1276, 6 al-Intiṣār, on the differences between the Shiʿa and the other madhāhib, lith Bombay 1315 (s Goldziher, Vorl uber den Islam, p 271), 7 al-Shihāb fi 'l-Shaib wa 'l-Shabāb, pr Stambul (Djawāʾib) 1302 in a Madjmūʿa, Tihrān 1272 (s Goldziher, Abhandl zur arab Philologie, ii , p xxi , lvi)

He is also regarded by some as the author of the Nahdj al-Balāgha, a collection of reputed sayings of ʿAlī, which others (so always in Yemen, according to MSS of the Ambrosiana, see R S O, iii 574) attribute to his brother al-Radī Abu 'l-Husain Muhammad, born in 359 (969), d 406 (1015) [s vol iv , p 354 sq], lith Tabrīz 1247, Tihrān 1271, Cairo n d , Bairūt 1885 with commentary by Muhammad ʿAbduh (d 1905), Cairo 1290, 1328, with footnotes by Muhammad Hasan Nāʾil al-Marsafī, 1925 Commentaries on it were written by 1 his contemporary ʿAlī b al Nāṣir al-Husainī entitled Iʿlām Nahdj al Balāghi, s Catalogue of the Arabic MSS in the Būhār Library, N⁰ 413, ii , 2 ʿIzz al-Dīn Abū Hāmid ʿAbd al-Hamīd b Hibat Allāh b Abi 'l-Hadīd al-Madāʾinī, d 655 (1257) [G A L, i 249—282], Bombay 1304, Tihrān 1270, 2 vols , 1281, 10 vols , Cairo 1330, 20 vols , 3 Kamāl al-Dīn Mitham b ʿAlī b Mitham al-Nadjrānī in 776 (1374), Fihris, Cairo, iv , b, 60, 4 ʿImād al-Dīn Yahyā b Ibrāhīm b Yahyā al-Djahhāfī (s Brit Mus Suppl , N⁰ 1228, iv , his Dīwān in Munich, Glaser, N⁰ 104) in the Ambrosiana, C 7, s R S O, vi 1304, 5 (Persian) Fakhr al-Dīn ʿAlī b Hasan al-Zawārī in the reign of Shāh Tahmāsp I (930–984 = 1524–1576), s Story, Pers Literature, i 14, 6 (Persian) the latter's contemporary Husain b ʿAbd al-Hakk al-Ilāhī al Astarābādī, s Ivanov, Cat As Soc Bengal, N⁰ 1107 The book was also several times translated into Persian e g by ʿAlī b Hasan al-Zawārī about 647 (1249) entitled Rawdat al Abrār, s Catalogue Browne, p 10, by Fath Allāh b Shukr Allāh al-Kāshānī (d 978 = 1570, according to the Kashf al-Hudjūb, p 143 in 997 = 1589) entitled Tanbīh al Ghāfilin wa-Tadhkirat al-ʿĀrifīn, s Rieu, Brit Mus, N⁰ 18, 1120—1121, Ivanov, Cat As Soc Bengal, ii 372, Cambridge Suppl, N⁰ 1342, Asafiya, ii 1608, N⁰ 185

While the authorship of the Nahdj al-Balāgha must remain open the anthology Taif al-Khayāl is to be ascribed to our author and not with Derenbourg, Cat Escur ², N⁰ 348 to his brother, as in the preface he quotes his own work mentioned under N⁰ 7 He and not his brother as in the article SHARĪF PASHA is to be credited with the Madjāzāt al-Kurʾān, which Hādidjī Khalīfa N⁰ 11377 ascribes as al-Madjāz to al-Radī and he is probably also the author of the Kitāb al Madjāzāt al-nabawīya, also ascribed to al-Radī and extant in a manuscript in the British Museum (s Oriental Studies presented to E G Browne, p 137, N⁰ 2) and was printed at Baghdād in 1328 This also holds of the Kitāb Maʿānī al Kurʾān, there quoted but now lost The Turkish commentary on the Dīwān ascribed to ʿAlī also credits him with the authorship

Bibliography Ibn Khallikān, ed Wustenfeld, N⁰ 454, Cairo ed , i 243, al Bakharzī, Dumyat al-Kaṣr, p 75, Tusy, List of Shia Books, p 472 (C BROCKELMANN)

MURTADD (A), "one who turns back", especially from Islām, an apostate Apostacy is called irtidād or ridda, it may be committed verbally by denying a principle of belief or by an action, for example treating a copy of the Kurʾan with disrespect

1 In the Kurʾān the apostate is threatened with punishment in the next world only, the "wrath of God" will fall upon him according to a Sūra of the latest Meccan period (xvi 108 sq) and severe punishment (ʿadhāb) "except he did it under compulsion and his heart is steadfast in belief" Similarly it is written in the Medina Sūra iii 80 sqq " This is the punishment for them, that the curse of Allāh, the Angels and of men is upon them for all time (82), the punishment shall not be lightened for them and they shall not be granted allevation, (83) except for those who later repent and make good their fault, for Allāh is forgiving and merciful (84) Those who disbelieve after believing and increase in unbelief, shall not have their repentance accepted, they are the erring ones (85) Those who are unbelievers and die as unbelievers, from none of them shall be accepted the earth full of gold even if he should wish to ransom himself with it, this is a painful punishment for them and there will be no helpers for them" (cf also iv 136, v 59, ix 67) Sūra ii 214 is to be interpreted in the same way although it is adduced by Shāfiʿī as the main evidence for the death penalty " He among you who falls away from his belief and dies an unbeliever — these, their works are fruitless in this world and the next, and they are the companions of the fire for ever"

2 There is little echo of these punishments in the next world in the Traditions (cf Ibn Mādja, Hudūd, bāb 2, Ibn Hanbal, i 409, 430, 464 sq , v 4, 5) Instead we have in many traditions a new element, the death penalty Thus Ibn ʿAbbās transmits an utterance of the Prophet "Slay him, who changes his religion" or "behead him" (Ibn Mādja, Hudūd, bāb 2, Nasāʾī, Tahrīm al-Dam, bāb 14, Ṭayālisī, N° 2689, Mālik, Akdiya, tr 15, cf also Bukhārī, Istitābat al Murtaddin, bāb 2, Tirmidhī, Ḥudūd, bāb 25, Abū Dāwūd, Hudūd, bāb 1, Ibn Hanbal, 1 217, 282, 322) According to another tradition of Ibn ʿAbbās and ʿĀʾisha, the Prophet is said to have permitted the blood to be shed of him "who abandons his religion and separates himself from the community (Djamāʿa)" (Bukhārī, Diyāt, bāb 6, Muslim, Kasāma, tr 25, 26, Nasāʾī, Ṭahrīm al-Dam, bāb 5, 14, Kasāma, bāb 6, Ibn Mādja, Hudūd, bāb 1, Abū Dāwūd, Hudūd, bāb 1, Tirmidhī, Diyāt, bāb 10, Fitan, bāb 1, Ibn Hanbal, 1 382, 444) But there was no agreement from the first on the nature of the death penalty, thus ʿIkrima (d 106 = 724) and Anas b Mālik (d 91 = 710) criticise ʿAlī for having burned apostates (Bukhārī, Istatābat al-Murtaddīn, bāb 2, Tirmidhī, Hudūd, bāb 25, Abū Dāwūd, Hudūd, bāb 1, Ibn Hanbal, 1 217, according to a variant the reference is to Zindiks or Zutt, who served idols, Nasāʾī, Taḥrīm al-Dam, bāb 14, Ibn Hanbal, 1 282, 322) According to a tradition of ʿĀʾisha's, apostates are to be slain, crucified or banished (Nasāʾī, Taḥrīm al-Dam, bāb 11, Kasāma, bāb 13, Abū Dāwūd, Hudūd, bāb 1)

On the question whether the apostate should be given an opportunity to repent, traditions differ According to one tradition of Abū Burda (d 104 = 722), Muʿādh b Djabal refused to sit down until an apostate brought before him had been slain "in accordance with the decision of God and of his apostle" (Bukhārī, Maghāzī, bāb 60, Istitābat al-Murtaddin, bāb 2, Aḥkām, bāb 12, Muslim, Imāra, tr 15, Abū Dāwūd, Hudūd, bāb 1, Ibn Hanbal, v 231) In the same tradition in Abū Dāwūd however, it is added that they had tried in vain for 20 nights to convert the apostate The caliph ʿOmar is also represented as disapproving of this proceeding with the words "Did you then not shut him up for three days and give him a round loaf (raghīf) daily and try to induce him to repent Perhaps he would have repented and returned to obedience to God O God! I was not there, I did not order it and I do not approve, see, it was thus reported to me" (Mālik, Akdiya, tr 15) There are also traditions according to which God does not accept the repentance of an apostate (Ibn Hanbal, v 2 sqq) and others according to which even the Prophet forgave apostates (Nasāʾī, Taḥrīm al-Dam, bāb 14, 15, Abū Dāwūd, Hudūd, bāb 1, Ibn Hanbal, 1 247, Tabarī, Tafsīr, III 223)

3 a In the Fikh there is unanimity that the male apostate must be put to death, but only if he is grown up (bāligh) and compos mentis (ʿākil) and has not acted under compulsion (mukhtār) A woman on the other hand is imprisoned, according to Hanafī and Shīʿī teaching, until she again adopts Islām, while according to al Awzāʿī, Ibn Hanbal (Tirmidhī, Hudūd, bāb 25), the Mālikīs and Shāfiʿīs (cf Umm, 1 131, where Shāfiʿī vigorously attacks Abū Yūsuf who is not mentioned by name) she also is put to death Although this punishment is not properly hadd (cf thereon Shāfiʿī, Umm, VII 330, 20–22) it is regarded as such by some jurists, as it is a question of a hakk Allāh (cf e g Sarakhsī, Siyar, IV 162), therefore the execution of the punishment lies with the imām, in the case of a slave however, the mawlā can carry it out, as with any other hadd punishment Execution should be by the sword According to the above traditions, apostates must sometimes have been tortured to death The caliph ʿOmar II had them tied to a post and a lance thrust into their hearts (Abū Yūsuf, Kharādj, p 112) Bādjūrī expressly forbids any form of torture, like burning, drowning, strangling, impaling, flaying, according to him, Sulṭān Baibars (708–709 = 1308–1309) was the first to introduce torture (Snouck Hurgronje, Verspr Geschriften, II 198) Lane (Manners and Customs, ch III, near the end) records the case of a woman who had apostatised and was led through the streets of Cairo on an ass, then strangled in a boat in the middle of the Nile and thrown into the river [The throwing of the corpse into the Nile was already usual in Cairo in the Fātimid period, cf Mez, Renaissance d Isl, p 29] In quite recent times followers of the Kādyānī or Ahmadīya sect in Afghanistān were stoned to death (O M, v [1925], 138) In former Turkish territory and Egypt as well as in Muslim lands under European rule since the middle of the XIXth century, under European influence the execution of an apostate on a kādī's sentence has been abolished, but we still have imprisonment and deportation (cf Isabel Burton, The inner Life of Syria, London 1875, 1 180 sqq), but nevertheless renegades are not sure of their lives as their Muslim relatives endeavour secretly to dispose of them by poison or otherwise Occasionally modern Islāmic writers (Ahmadiya movement) endeavour to prove that Islām knows of no death penalty for apostasy, the Indian apologist Muhammad ʿAlī lays great stress on the fact there is not once an indication of the death penalty in the Kurʾān (Zwemer, The Law of Apostasy, in Islam, p 17, 37 sq, London 1924, O M, v [1925], 262)

I should like here to call attention to an agreement which is probably not accidental As in Islām, in addition to apostasy, unchastity and unnatural vice (even by stoning are punished by death) according to both Shāfiʿīs and Mālikīs, as well as blaspheming God or a prophet and magic, we find in Islām all crimes punished by death which in the Mishna (Sanhedrīn, VII 4) are threatened with stoning

b Whether attempts at conversion must be made is a question of ikhtilāf A number of jurists of the first and second (VIIIth and VIIIth) centuries deny this (as do the Zāhirīs) or like ʿAtāʾ (d 115 = 733) make a distinction between the apostate born in Islām and one converted to Islām, the former is to be put to death at once (so also the Shīʿīs) Others insist on three attempts at conversion (relying on Sūra IV 136, cf Tabarī, Tafsīr, V 193 sq) or have him in the first place imprisoned for three days (cf above 2) According to others again one should await the round of the five times of prayer and ask him to perform the ṣalāt at each, only when he has refused at each is the death punishment to be enforced If however he repents and and professes Islām once more, he is released (cf thereon Shāfiʿī, Umm, 1 228, Abū Yūsuf, Kharādj, p 109) In later times istitāba was always applied

c Apart from the fact that apostasy deprives the murtadd of burial with Muslim rites it has certain civil consequences The property of the murtadd is faʾ according to Shāfiʿī and the Mālikīs, if the fugitive murtadd returns penitent, he is given back what remains (cf Umm, 1 231 sqq, where Shāfiʿī opposes the contrary Hanafī view) Others, especially later Shāfiʿīs, regard the rights of ownership of the apostate as suspended (mawkūf) and regard him as one who is under guardianship (maḥǧūr), only if the fugitive apostate dies in the dār al-ḥarb, does his property become faʾ (Shīrāzī, Muhaḏḏhab, Cairo 1343, ii 240, cf Shāfiʿī, Umm, vii 355) Among the Hanafīs and Shāfiʿīs the estate is allotted by the kādī to the legal heirs (cf also the traditions in Dārimī, Faraʾāʾid, bāb 40), the mudabbar and umm walad are set free, even when the apostate escapes into the dār al ḥarb, for this is equivalent to his death If he comes back penitent, however, he receives of his property what still exists, the heirs however are not liable for compensation — The marriage of the murtadd is void (bāṭil) Of his legal undertakings the istīlād is effective (nāfiḏh), i e the umm walad becomes free, the kitāba also continues Other legal activities, like manumission, endowment, testament, sale are suspended (mawkūf) according to Abū Ḥanīfa, according to Abū Yūsuf they are effective as in the case of a person in good health, according to Muhammad al Shaibānī however only as in the case of an invalid, i e they cannot deal with more than one third of the estate In the case of the female apostate however, they are always effective If the apostate makes such legal arrangements after his flight into the dār al-ḥarb, they are invalid (Sarakhsī, Siyar, iv 152, cf also Abū Yūsuf, Kharāǧ, p 111) But since according to Shāfiʿī and Mālik his whole estate becomes faʾ, such legal arrangements are invalid, only the manumission of a slave remains suspended until his possible return penitent, in the case of his death also this slave becomes faʾ (cf however above the view of later Shāfiʿīs)

He is punished for crimes committed before apostasy, if he returns penitent, for crimes committed during ridda, no notice is taken of the ḥukūk Allāh (i e no ḥadd) but only of the ḥukūk al-ʿibād, and he must for example pay the diya (Sarakhsī, Siyar, iv 163, 208 sq , cf Shāfiʿī, Umm, i 231)

Bibliography In addition to the books on Tradition and Fikh see especially Shāfiʿī, Kitāb al Umm, Cairo 1321, i 227—234, v 51, vii 330 sqq , 355, Abū Yūsuf, Kitāb al Kharāǧ, Cairo 1302, p 109—112, Sarakhsī, Sharḥ al-Siyar al kabīr, Haidarābād 1336, iv 146—219, Dabūsī, Taʾsīs al-Nazar, Cairo n d , p 22, Goldziher, Muh Studien, Halle 1890, ii 215 sq , Santillana, Istituzioni di diritto musulmano malichita, Rom 1926, i 131—134, Zwemer, The Law of Apostasy in Islam, London 1924, German transl , Gutlersloh 1926

(Heffening)

MŪSĀ, the prophet Moses of the Bible

i In the Kurʾān Muhammad regards Mūsā as his predecessor, his model, and believes he had already been foretold by Mūsā (vii 156), his religion is also Mūsā's religion (xlii 11) Mūsā is also conceived in Muhammad's image Charges are brought against him similar to those made against Muhammad he is said to want to pervert people from the faith of their fathers, (x 79), he practises magic (xxviii 18) Mūsā and Hārūn seem rather to be sent to the stubborn Pharaoh than to the believing Israelites Revelation is granted him tawrāt, kitāb, furḳān, ṣuḥuf (ii 50, xxi 49, liii 37, lxxxvii 19), illumination, instruction and guidance The picture of him is made up of Biblical, Haggadic and new elements Mūsā is exposed, watched by his sister, refuses the milk of other nurses and is suckled by his own mother Coming to the assistance of a hard pressed Israelite he kills an Egyptian but repents of this crime to which Satan had tempted him He is pursued and escapes to Madyan At a well there he waters the flocks of the two daughters of a shaikh One of them invites him home modestly He receives her as his wife at the price of 8—10 years service This preliminary history is told in Sūra xxviii 1—28, the mission itself is often mentioned

Mūsā receives from the burning bush in the holy valley of Tuwan (xx 12, lxxix 16) orders to take off his shoes, the message to Pharaoh, the signs of his mission, the rod, the snake, the hand that becomes white His speech is difficult to understand (xliii 52), Hārūn accompanies him as wazīr (xx 30, xxv 37) Pharaoh reproaches Mūsā with ingratitude, saying he had been brought up by them (xxvi 17) Pharaoh assembles his magicians but their rods are devoured by Mūsā's The magicians profess their belief in God and are mutilated in punishment (vii 106—123, xx 59—78, xxvi 36—51) Pharaoh wishes prayers to be offered to him as God, orders Hāmān to build him a tower so that he can reach the God of Mūsā (xxviii 38, xl 38) Mūsā performs nine miracles (xvii 103, xx 59—78, xxvii 12) These are 1 the rod and snake, 2 white hand, 3 deluge, 4 locusts, 5 lice, 6 frogs, 7 blood, 8 darkness, 9 dividing the sea (cf e g Tabarī, ed de Goeje, i 485)

Mūsā spends 30 and 10 nights with God (vii 138) He brings instruction and admonition on the tablets In his absence Sāmirī makes the lowing golden calf (vii 146, xx 79—98) Mūsā breaks the tablets He desires to see God God crumbles the hill to dust (vii 139) Israel fears war and has to wander 40 years in the wilderness (v 24—29) Mūsā's enemies, Kārūn (Korah), Pharaoh and Hāmān, perish (xxix 38)

Some details differ from the Biblical story Instead of Pharaoh's daughter, it is his wife who rescues the infant, instead of seven shepherdesses Mūsa assists two Instead of ten plagues, Muhammad speaks of nine miracles Mūsā strikes twelve springs out of the rock, one for each tribe (ii 57, a memory of the twelve springs of Elim, Exodus xv 27) The divergence is greater when Hāmān is made minister to Pharaoh Then there are new features Mūsā repents of having slain the Egyptian Mūsā sees the burning bush at night and desires to take a brand from its fire for his house (xx 10, xxviii 29) Pharaoh's magicians die for their belief in God

The following seems to originate in Haggada God forbids the infant to be suckled by an Egyptian mother (xxviii 11) In the Haggada Moses is offered to all Egyptian suckling mothers, but the mouth that is to speak with God cannot imbibe anything impure (Sōṭa, 12ᵇ) That God tilts the mountain over Israel (ii 60, 87, vii 170) is explained from the Haggada Israel hesitated to accept the Tora and God tilted Sinai over them Tora or death (Sabbath, 80ᵃ, ʿAboda Zara, 2ᵇ) The turning of the sabbath breakers into apes (ii 61, iv 50, v 65, vii 166) recalls the Haggada in which the builders of the tower of Babel become apes (Sanhedrin, 109ᵃ) Kārūn is represented as an exceedingly rich man the keys of whose treasure can hardly be carried by many strong men (xviii 76, 79), the Haggada says that Korah found a hidden Egyptian treasure, 300 mules carried the keys of his treasury (Pesachim, 119a, Sanhedrin, 110a, Pal Sanh, x 27d, Ginzberg, Legends, vi 99, 560) — The Kur'ānic story of a believer at the court of Pharaoh who wants to save Mūsā is not quite clear (xl 29) Ought we to compare Jethro in the Haggada who advises clemency at Pharaoh's court? (Sōṭa, 11a, Sanhedrin, 106a, Ginzberg, v 392, 21, v 412, 101)

The story of Mūsā accompanying a wise man on a journey seems without parallel (xviii 59—81) The attempt is often made to distinguish this Mūsā of Khadir as Mūsā b Manasse from Mūsā b ʿImrān [cf the article KHADIR]

2 Mūsā in post-Kur'ānic legend The histories of the prophet (especially Thaʿlabī's) supplement the Kur'ānic story with much from the Bible, Haggada and folklore

Much is added from Haggada Pharaoh's sick daughters are cured as soon as they touch Moses's cradle Exodus Rabba, i 23 makes Pharaoh's daughter be cured of leprosy — The infant Mūsā scratches Pharaoh's chin Pharaoh wants to slay him On the intercession of Āsiya he tests him by putting gold and jewels on one side and burning coals on the other Mūsā reaches for the gold but Gabriel directs his hand to the burning coal Mūsā puts his burned hand on his tongue and therefore becomes a stammerer (Ginzberg, v 402, 65, Hamilton, Zeitschr f romanische Philologie, xxxvi 125—159)

Elements of other legends are woven into the legend of Mūsā The Ibrāhīm Namrūd legend supplies the following features Pharaoh frightened by dreams persecutes the infants, Mūsā is hidden from the assassins in the burning oven but the fire becomes cool and does him no harm Pharaoh orders prayers to be offered to himself as to a god, has a tower built, shoots an arrow against heaven, the arrow comes back blood stained and Pharaoh boasts he has slain God (Ṭabarī, i 469) — From the story of Jacob and Laban come the following Mūsā serves 8—10 years for his wife (xxviii 27) His father in law offers him the spotted lambs born in his flock and the ewes for the watering troughs bear spotted lambs (Thaʿlabī, p 112) There are frequent references to a pious Egyptian woman who is martyred by Pharaoh with her seven children, the youngest of whom is still at its mother's breast (in Thaʿlabi, p 118, 139), this is of course modelled on the martyr mother of the Maccabees

There are many fanciful embellishments, e g the miracle of the snakes, the plagues, the scenes on the Red Sea, Moses's rod in particular plays a great part It came from Paradise, Ādam, Hābil, Shīth, Idrīs, Nūh, Hūd, Sālih, Ibrāhim, Ismāʿīl, Ishāḳ and Yaʿḳūb had previously used it (Kisāʾī, p 208) In Ṭabarī (p 460 sq) an angel brought the rod Mūsā obtained it from his wife, his father-in law quarrels with him about its ownership and an angel decides in favour of Mūsā It is a miraculous rod and Thaʿlabi (p 111—116) in particular relates the wonders it performs It shines in the darkness, it gives water in a drought, and placed in the ground it becomes a tree bearing fruit, it produces milk and honey and fragrant scent, against an enemy it becomes a double dragon It pierces mountains and rocks, it leads over rivers and sea, it is also a shepherd's staff and keeps beasts of prey from the herds of Moses When Mūsā was asleep on one occasion the rod slew a dragon, on another occasion seven of Pharaoh's assassins

The varied Biblical, Haggadic, legendary and fairy tale features in the Islāmic legend of Mūsā are thus blended into a very full picture and in Thaʿlabī form a regular romance

Bibliography Sūra ii 48–130, vii 101–160, x 76—88, xx 8—93, xxvi 9—65, xxviii 2—76, xl 24—56 and the commentaries thereon, Ṭabarī, ed Leyden, i 414—449, Thaʿlabī, Ḳiṣaṣ al-Anbiyāʾ, Cairo 1325, p 105—156, Kisāʾī, Ḳisaṣ al Anbiyāʾ ed Eisenberg, p 194—240, Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, Būlāḳ, i 61—78, Abr Geiger, Was hat Mohammed, 1902 2, p 149–177, M Grunbaum, Neue Beitrage, p 153—185, J Horovitz, Koranische Untersuchungen, p 141—143, R Basset, 1001 Contes, Recits et legendes arabes, iii 67, 85, D Sidersky, Les Origines des Legendes musulmanes dans le Coran et dans la Vie des Prophetes, Paris 1933, p 73–103, J Walker, Bible Characters in the Koran, p 84—111 (BERNHARD HEILER)

MŪSĀ B NUṢAIR B ʿABD AL RAHMĀN B ZAID AL LAKHMĪ (or AL-BAKRĪ) ABŪ ʿABD AL RAHMĀN, Arab governor, conqueror of the western Maghrib and of Spain He was born in 19 (640), his father had been in the immediate entourage of Muʿāwiya [q v] Mūsā was at first appointed by the caliph ʿAbd al Malik to collect the kharādj at al-Basra, but having been suspected of embezzlement, he fled and took refuge with the caliph's brother, the governor of Egypt ʿAbd al ʿAzīz b Marwān, the latter took Mūsā to Syria to the caliph who fined him 100,000 dīnārs ʿAbd al ʿAzīz provided half of this sum for Mūsā and brought him to Egypt where he gave him the governorship of Ifrīkiya which had been previously held by Hassān b al-Nuʿmān The various chroniclers are not agreed as to the date of his appointment to the office but it possibly took place in 79 (698) or the following year

Mūsā and his troops thereupon entered on a career of successful conquest which ended in the consolidation of Arab power in Ifrikiya and in the conquest of the rest of north Africa and of Spain Here we give only the most essential details Assisted by his son ʿAbd Allāh al Marwān he sent successful expeditions against Zaghwān and Sadjūma and reduced the Hawwāra, the Zanāta and the Kutāma The Berbers taking refuge in the west of the Maghrib, Mūsā decided to bring them to subjection, confirmed in his office by ʿAbd al Malik's successor al Walid, he continued his advance to Tangier and Sūs [q v] and returned to Ifrikiya leaving as his deputy in the Maghrib his freedman Ṭārik [q v] The latter in 92 (710–711) invaded Spain and Mūsā anxious about and at the same time jealous of the progress made by his lieutenant crossed himself in the following year leaving his son ʿAbd Allāh as governor of Ifrikiya Landing at Algeciras in Ramadān 93 (June–July 712) with his other son ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz, he refused to take the same route as Ṭārik and taking the towns of Sidona (Shadhūna, q v), Carmona, Seville and Merida, he was on his way to Toledo when Ṭārik came to meet him and was bitterly reproached by his master Mūsā b Nusair then continued his march and completely subjugated the north of Spain from Saragossa to Na-

vaire In 95, he left Spain with immense booty, leaving his son ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz as governor, he reached Kairawān at the end of the year and continued by land to Syria in a triumphal procession of Arab chiefs and Berber and Spanish prisoners The caliph al-Walīd then near his end urged him to hurry while his brother and heir presumptive Sulaimān, eager to appropriate the vast wealth brought by Mūsā, tried to delay him He arrived in Damascus shortly before the death of al Walīd and when Sulaimān assumed power he at once displayed his hatred of the conqueror Regarding Mūsā b Nusair's stay in Syria before his death in 98 (716—717), the Arab historians give a number of details which are obviously of quite a legendary character

Bibliography All the Muslim chroniclers who deal with the conquest of Africa and Spain deal more or less fully with Mūsā b Nusair We may mention among the more important Ibn ʿAbd al-Hakam, Futūḥ Miṣr, ed Torrey, Yale Univ Press, 1922, Ibn al Kūṭīya, Iftitāḥ al-Andalus, ed Ribera, Aḵẖbār maǧmūʿa, ed Lafuente y Alcántara, Ibn ʿIḏhārī, al-Bayān al-muġẖrib, ed Dozy, i and ii, Ibn al-Aṯīr, Kāmil, etc — Biographical notes on Mūsā b Nusair are given by Ibn Ḵẖallikān, Wafayāt al-Aʿyān, iii 475, Ibn al-Faradī, Taʾrīḵẖ ʿUlamāʾ al Andalus, in B A H, viii, N° 1454, al-Dabbī, Bughyat al-Multamis, in B A H, iii, N° 1334, Ibn al Abbār, al-Hullat al siyarā, ed Dozy, (Notices sur quelques manuscrits arabes, Leyden 1847—1851), p 30—32 Cf also Fournel, Les Berbers, Étude sur la conquete de l'Afrique par les Arabes, Paris 1857—1875, Saavedra, Estudio sobre la invasion de los Arabes en España, Madrid 1892, Dozy, Hist des Mus d'Espagne, new ed Leyden 1932, i 121

(E Lévi-Provençal)

MŪSĀ ČELEBI, one of the younger sons of the Ottoman sultān Bāyazīd I According to some sources he was younger than his brother Muhammad I [q v], who is generally considered as the youngest Mūsā had been taken prisoner in the battle of Angora (1402) and was left by Timūr in custody with the Germiyān Oghlū Yaʿkūb Beg The latter sent him afterwards to his brother Muhammad in Amasia, and for some time he became Muhammad's helper in the re-establishment of Ottoman power in Anatolia, he is even said to have driven their brother ʿIsā from Brusa, though the current opinion is that Muhammad went there himself When, in 1404, their eldest brother Sulaimān Čelebi appeared in his turn in Brusa, Mūsā first opposed him in the name of Muhammad and went afterwards, with the latter's consent, to Europe, where he hoped to make an end of Sulaimān's reign with the aid of Mirče of Walachia and Stephan of Serbia At first this enterprise failed through a defeat inflicted on Mūsā near the walls of Constantinople Sulaimān resided in Adrianople Here Mūsā appeared suddenly in 1411 (or 1410), Sulaimān had to flee and was killed on his way to Constantinople, after which Mūsā took his place as ruler of the Ottoman territory in Europe, surrounded by the military and political councillors of Sulaimān, as Ewrenos Beg and the Djandarlī Oghlu Ibrāhīm Pasha Mūsā began his short reign with great energy, recovering nearly all the Ottoman possessions in Serbia and Thessaly, and sending raiding expeditions as far as Carinthia. At the same time he adopted a despotic attitude which displeased his entourage and prepared the final victory of his brother Muhammad Ibrāhim Pasha, sent to Constantinople to exact tribute, went from there to Muhammad's court (cf Taeschner and Wittek, in Isl, xviii 94) and, when Mūsa soon afterwards began a siege of Constantinople, Muhammad came to the rescue of the emperor In this he failed for the moment and he was obliged to return to Anatolia But in 1413 Muhammad appeared again in Europe, having found allies in the Serbians Meanwhile, the Turkish commanders in Serbia and Thessaly were drawn to Muhammad's side and even the old Ewrenos prepared to leave Mūsā's cause, his son and other military chiefs went over openly to Muhammad The latter approached Adrianople from the north and followed from here Mūsā's army beyond Philip, polis, then he joined his allies in Servia and met Mūsā's army on the plain of Čamurlu, east of Sofia Here Mūsā's army was defeated (July 1413) and Mūsā himself perished in the flight His corpse was found and buried in the turbe of Murād I in Brusa

Bibliography The ancient Ottoman chronicles of ʿĀṣẖīḳ Pasha Zāde, Neshrī, Uruǧ Beg and Tawārīḵẖ i Āl i ʿOṯẖmān (Anonymus, ed Giese), besides the Byzantine historians Phrantzes, Ducas and Chalcondylas Further all general Ottoman histories since the Ṭāǧ al-Tawārīḵẖ, and the modern works of von Hammer (G. O R, i), Zinkeisen and Jorga, Mehmed Zaki, Maktūl Shehzādeler, Constantinople 1332, p 11 sqq

(J H Kramers)

MŪSĀ, Abū Muhammad al HĀDĪ, an ʿAbbāsid caliph After the death of his father on Muharram 22, 169 (Aug 4, 785) al Hādī ascended the throne and at once put an end to the influence of his mother al-Ḵẖaizurān, by forbidding her to interfere in the slightest in matters of state When he proposed to exclude his brother Hārūn from the succession in favour of his son Djaʿfar, he met with vigorous opposition from the Barmakid Yahyā b Ḵẖālid [q v] When the latter boldly persisted in his opposition, he was arrested, but the caliph's plan came to nothing for he died suddenly in Rabīʿ I 170 (Sept 786) in ʿIsābādh near Baghdad According to the usual but not at all certain story, he was poisoned or stabbed by his mother's orders Al Hādī who was only 26 when he died is described as brave, just, liberal and full of joie-de-vivre The most important event of his brief reign was an ʿAlid rising in Mecca and Medīna ʿOmar b ʿAbd al ʿAzīz, the governor of Medina, had punished an ʿAlid along with some other citizens of the town for drinking wine As a result the ʿAlids rebelled and renounced their allegiance to the caliph After several days fighting the ringleader of the movement, a descendant of ʿAlī called al Husain b ʿAlī, marched on Mecca where he obtained a number of additional followers Soon afterwards the pilgrims arrived, at Fakhkh near Mecca, a battle took place and al-Husain was killed (Dhu 'l-Ḥiḍḍja 169 = June 786) As regards the fighting with the Byzantines, the Muslims under Maʿyūf b Yaḥyā invaded Asia Minor where they took much booty

Bibliography Ibn Kutaiba, Kitāb al-Maʿārif (ed Wüstenfeld), p 193, Yaʿkūbī (ed. Houtsma), ii 476, 487—491, 515, Balādhurī

(ed de Goeje), p 190 sq, 233, 297, 323, Tabarī, iii 467 sqq, 533—599, Masʿūdī, Murūdj (ed Paris), vi 261—287, viii 294, ix 44, 51, 66, Kitāb al-Aghānī, see Guidi, Tables alphabetiques, Ibn al-Athīr (ed Tornberg), vi 13—74, Ibn al-Tiktakā, al-Fakhrī (ed Derenbourg), p 254—263, Ibn Khaldūn, al-ʿIbar, iii 208 sqq, Weil, Gesch d Chalifen, ii 104, 112, 118—121, Muller, Der Islam im Morgen- und Abendland, i 477 sqq, Muir, The Caliphate, its Rise, Decline, and Fall[3], p 465—477, Le Strange, Baghdad during the Abbasid Caliphate, p 193 sq (K V Zetterstéen)

MŪSĀ AL-KĀẒIM the seventh Imām of the Twelfer Shiʿa, son of Djaʿfar b Muhammad al-Sādiḳ [q v], was born about 128 (745) at al Abwāʾ [q v], the traditional burial place of Āmina, mother of the Prophet He grew to manhood in his father's house in Medīna and remained there as Imām after the latter's death in 148 (765) without playing any part in politics In particular he took no share in the great rising of the Hasanid ʿAlids which collapsed at Fakhkh in 169 (786) Nevertheless the caliph was suspicious of him He was perhaps already imprisoned by al-Mahdī In 179 (795) Hārūn had him brought first to Basra and then to Baghdād, he is said to have been released for a time but he died in prison in Baghdād, according to the usual story in Radjab 183 (Aug—Sept 799)

Little attention was paid to Mūsā outside the Shīʿa, but we find him occasionally, as the Shīʿis point out, quoted as an authority, for example for a strongly pro ʿAlid tradition in Ahmad b Hanbal, Musnad, i 77 infra (cf al-Dhahabī, Mīzān al-Iʿtidāl, N° 1835) The Shīʿa records are more voluminous He is said to have had the honorific al-Kāzim "he who restrains his anger" because he returned kindness for injury to an opponent so that the latter came over to him As evidence of his fitness for the imāmate he is reputed to have had a great knowledge of fikh and is thus brought into connection with Abū Hanīfa The chapters on miracles, usual in all biographies of the imāms, credit him with being born with a knowledge of languages, e g Ethiopic and the language of birds, in later stories also of "Frankish" to fit a story, modelled on a later Kerbelāʾ motif, that Hārūn could not find a Muslim to assassinate him and therefore brought Franks, who were so impressed by his nobility that they refused to kill him Prayers by Mūsa have been handed down, a letter of warning to al-Husain b ʿAlī b al-Hasan, the leader of the Fakhkh rising, letters from prison, a statement of his claims to the imāmate against Hārūn through relationship with the Prophet, not through ʿAlī like the ʿAbbāsids through ʿAbbās but through Fātima, whom he compares with the mother of Jesus Considerable portions of the biography are the result of the disputes within the Shīʿa, even the account of his conception and birth That his mother was bought from a slave dealer is not disputed, but great pains are devoted to proving she was a virgin When at the death of his father a group of the Nāwusīya "remained" steadfast to him, the Ismāʿīlīya [q v] and the Fathīya branched off, the claims of Mūsā had to be based on a will of Djaʿfar, the authenticity of which is as doubtful as that of Mūsā in favour of his son ʿAlī al-Riḍā, this was used against the followers of another son Aḥmad, as well as against the Mamtūra who "remained" by Mūsā himself and a similar party in the Mūsawīya (Mūsāʾīya, for details see the writers on heresy, especially al-Ashʿarī, Makālāt, ed Ritter, Constantinople 1930, p 25 sqq) The dispute with the latter groups also explains the very detailed stories of witnesses who had seen Mūsā's corpse Bitter differences of opinion within the family are revealed by the fact that even Mūsā's son Ibrāhīm for a long time denied his father's death, and also by the fact that Mūsā's brother Ibrāhīm or a nephew ʿAlī b Ismāʿīl played the traitor with Hārūn, inciting him by pointing out the great sums which were given to Mūsā as the true caliph by his followers, on the other hand, the incautious acknowledgment of Mūsā's imāmate by the theologian Hishām b al Hakam is made responsible for his capture — The kunya of Mūsā is Abū Ibrāhīm or Abu 'l-Hasan, also Abū ʿAlī, the statements regarding the number of his children vary between 30 and 60, 37 is the usual figure Besides his successor ʿAlī al-Ridā some prominence was attained by the partial imām Ahmad, but more by Zaid, who at the time of the great rising of Abu 'l-Sarāyā in Basra, by burning the houses and followers of the ʿAbbāsids acquired the name Zaid al-Nār, "Zaid of the fire" (Tabarī, iii 986), and Ibrāhīm, who on account of similar activities in Sanʿāʾ was called al-Djazzār, "the butcher" (Tabarī, iii 987), a daughter Fātima, who died in Kumm, has given to this city in her tomb its most important sanctuary Mūsā himself was buried in the cemetery of the Kuraish in Baghdād, where his grandson, the ninth imām Muhammad al Djawād [q v], was in time interred beside him, thus arose the twin sanctuaries al-Kāzimain [q v]

Bibliography Mufīd, al-Irshād (Teheran without date or pagination arranged in the order of the imāms), Ibn Bābūya, ʿUyūn Akhbār al-Ridā (MS Berl N° 9663), esp fol 10b—52a, comprehensive collection of Shiʿī accounts with references to the sources in Muhammad Bāḳir al Madjlisī, Bihār al-Anwār, xi, Teheran 1303, p 230—317, Abu 'l-Faradj al Isbahānī, Makātil al-Tālibiyīn, Teheran 1307, p 172—176, Ibn Khallikān Wafayāt, Būlāk 1299, ii 172 sq (from al-Khatīb, Taʾrīkh Baghdād), Masʿūdī, Murūdj (ed Barbier de Meynard), vi 309 sqq, 329 sq, E de Zambaur, Manuel de genealogie et de chronologie, Hanover 1927, table D — As the importance of imāms like Mūsā lies less in their own personality than in the views of the dogmaticians upon them, their vitae should also be compared cf in Kashshī, Maʿrifat Akhbār al-Rudjāl, Bombay 1317, section Ashāb Mūsā b Djaʿfar wa-ʿAlī b Mūsā, p 344 sqq and also the vitae of Hishām b al Hakam, Hishām al Dhawālīḳī, ʿAmmār b Mūsā al Sābātī etc, and the same names in the alphabetically arranged works of Nadjāshī, al Rudjāl, Bombay 1917, Tūsī, Fihrist, Calcutta 1853—1855, Astarābādī, Manhadj al-Makāl, Teheran 1306

(R Strothmann)

BANŪ MŪSĀ, more precisely BANŪ MŪSĀ B SHĀKIR, the usual name for the three brothers Abū Djaʿfar Muhammad, Abu 'l-Kāsim Ahmad and al-Hasan b Mūsā b Shākir, who made a reputation under the ʿAbbāsids from al-Maʾmūn to al-Mutawakkil as mathematicians, astronomers and technicians and also at times played a part in politics The father is said to have begun life as a bandit in Khurāsān, then to have become an astronomer and geometer We have no means of testing such stories or learning how a bandit could become an astronomer If we assume however that Mūsā b Shākir like Muhammad b Mūsā al-Khwārizmī joined al-Maʾmūn's train in Khurāsān as astronomer and astrologist and then came with him to Baghdād, we can understand that al-Maʾmūn took his three sons, still young, into his service on Mūsā's death and had them educated in mathematical sciences by the astronomer Yahyā b Abī Mansūr The Banū Mūsā thus at a comparatively early age were admitted to that circle of scholars who, by their thorough and expert translations, introduced Greek science to Islām and by their own researches laid the foundation for the glorious development of the sciences in the IIIth (IXth) and IVth (Xth) centuries Attaining fame and fortune, they used their wealth to purchase Greek manuscripts and sent agents into the Byzantine provinces to seek for and purchase books Of Muhammad b Mūsā it is related that he met Thābit b Kurra in Harrān while on a journey and induced him to settle at the caliph's court It may be assumed they these scientific expeditions to seek books and scholars did not take place without the caliph's support

History also records political and literary feuds A particular enmity is said to have existed between al-Kindī and the three brothers, because the caliph al-Muʿtasim did not entrust them but al-Kindī with the education of his son Ahmad The feud went so far that the Banū Mūsā are later said to have intrigued against the choice of Ahmad as caliph This story can only be understood in connection with court intrigues, in which the ambitions of the brothers and the jealousy of the courtiers played the same parts as elsewhere If all is true that is recorded of the malevolent attitude of the brothers to recognised scholars, little praise can be bestowed on their character The stories of the huge incomes, especially that of Muhammad b Mūsā — he is said to have had for a time an annual income of £ 300,000 — exceed all that even the most liberal caliph could heap upon a scholar

The works of the Banū Mūsā include translations and original works on geometry, astronomy and mechanics Many of their works are written jointly by two or three brothers, others only by one Muhammad b Mūsā is regarded as the most versatile, al-Hasan the best mathematician, Ahmad as specially interested in mechanical and technical problems The astronomical and metrological observations of the brothers were probably made mainly in Sāmarrā, their tables of observations of the sun are mentioned by Ibn Yūnus M Curtze, H Suter, E Wiedemann and F Hauser have devoted special attention to the editing and elucidation of these works that have survived in Arabic or Latin

Bibliography Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, ed Flügel, p 271, Ibn al-Kiftī, ed J Lippert, p 315 and 441—443, Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, ed Wüstenfeld, N° 718, transl de Slane, III 315, Caussin de Perceval, in N E, 1803—1804, M Steinschneider, Die Söhne des Musa b Schakir, in Bibl math, N S, I, 1887, p 44—48, 71—75, M Cantor, Ahmed und sein Buch über die Proportionen, in Bibl math, N S, II, 1888, p 7, H Suter, Das Mathematikerverzeichnis des Fihrist, in Abh z. Gesch d Math, VI, 1892, p 24, H Suter, Die Mathematiker und Astronomen der Araber, ibid, X, 1900, N° 43, M Curtze, Der Liber trium fratrum de geometria, in Nova Acta Acad Germ Nat curiosorum, vol XLIX, Halle 1885, E Wiedemann, Beiträge, VI, 1906, X, 1906 and XII, 1907, F Hauser, Über das Kitāb al hiyal der Benū Mūsā, in Abh z Gesch d Naturw u d Med, I, 1922, E Wiedemann and F Hauser, Über Trinkgefässe und Tafelaufsätze nach al-Ǧazarī und den Benū Mūsā, in Isl, VIII 55—93, 268—291, Ibn Abī Uṣaibiʿa, ed Muller, index, Ṭabarī, ed de Goeje, indices, Carra de Vaux, Les penseurs de l'Islam, II, Paris 1921, p 140, Abu 'l Fidāʾ, ed Reiske, II 241, Abu 'l Faraǧ, Taʾrīkh Mukhtaṣar al Duwal, ed Pococke, Oxford 1663, text, p 280, transl, p 183 (J RUSKA)

MUṢʿAB B ʿUMAIR, a follower of Muhammad of the Kuraish family of ʿAbd al-Dār The son of rich parents, this handsome young man had attacted attention by his elegant appearance when Muhammad's preaching made so deep an impression upon him that he abandoned the advantages of his social position to join the despised adherents of the Prophet Tradition dilates on the contrast between his former luxurious life and later poverty but these, like such stories in general, are somewhat suspicious, although not impossible, since the people in Muṣʿab's time had not yet acquired wealth and could not have been accustomed to luxury

When his parents endeavoured to prevent him taking part in the worship of the believers, he went with several of the faithful to Abyssinia from which he returned however before the Hiǧra The Prophet thought highly of him and sent him after the first meeting at ʿAḳaba as a missionary to Medīna where he won a number of followers for Islām According to some traditions, he on this occasion, following the practice of the Jews [see MUHAMMAD], introduced the common Friday salāt, which however, as was noted as early as by Mūsā b ʿUḳba, others ascribe to the Medinese Asʿad b Zurāra, while others in an effort at harmonising say that Asʿad conducted the common salāt during the absence of Muṣʿab

At Badr and at Uhud he carried the Prophet's banner in memory of the old privilege of the ʿAbd al Dār, he met his death in the latter battle With what ardour he adopted the new teaching is seen from his attitude to his mother who is depicted as a most lovable character and particularly from his words at the capture of his brother in the battle of Badr His wife was Hanna bint Ǧahsh of the Asad

Bibliography Mūsā b ʿUkba, ed Sachau, in S B Pr Ak W, 1904, p 451, Ibn Hishām, ed Wustenfeld, p 208, 241, 289 sq, 459 sq, 487, 560, 566, 586, Ṭabarī, ed de Goeje, I 1182, 1214 sqq, 1337, 1386, 1394, 1404, 1425, al Wākidī, transl Wellhausen, p 49, 68, 79, 106, 114, 135, 143, Ibn Saʿd, ed Sachau, III/I, 81—86, III/II, 139, Nawawī, ed Wüstenfeld, p 556 sq, Ibn Ḥaǧar al ʿAskalānī, Iṣāba, ed Sprenger, III 861, Wensinck, Mohammed en de Joden te Medina, p III sq (FR BUHL)

MUṢʿAB B AL-ZUBAIR, son of the famous huwārī of the Prophet, al-Zubair, and brother of the anti-Caliph ʿAbd Allāh b al-Zubair Handsome, chivalrous, generous to the most foolish prodigality, he resembled his elder brother ʿAbd Allāh and the family of the Zubairids only in his bravery and in fits of severity in exacting punishment which bordered on barbarity He began his military career at the beginning of the caliphate of Marwān I by a badly planned invasion of Palestine Later sent as governor to Basra by his brother ʿAbd Allāh, he soon found himself called to the help of the people of Kūfa, tired of the yoke of Mukhtār b Abī ʿUbaid [q v] He began by putting to flight the army brought against him by the redoubtable Ḥakafī agitator and then besieged him for four months in the citadel of Kūfa On the death of Mukhtār, Musʿab ordered several thousands of his followers to be executed and by this savage act made as many enemies as the victims had relatives He was less successful against ʿUbaid Allāh b al-Ḥurr [q v] who had been sent into the ʿIrāk to stir up a counter-revolution in favour of the Marwānids A similar attempt at Basra by the Umayyad Khālid b Asīd failed But by proceeding with great severity against Khālid's followers Musʿab alienated the most influential personages in the city

Soon he found he had to defend the ʿIrāk which was directly threatened by the Caliph ʿAbd al-Malik, troops were massed at Bādjumaira Musʿab awaited the Syrian army here and then retired to Dair al Djathālīk [q v] His position soon became critical for the Basran troops refused to follow him The best troops of the province were far away with Muhallab, engaged in an interminable campaign against the Khāridjīs The Zubairid's troops displayed only moderate enthusiasm His officers tired of his iron hand were prepared to betray him and entered into negotiations with ʿAbd al Malik The Marwānid was not stingy in his promises He also tried to negotiate with Musʿab, who learning of the perfidy of his followers rejected all offers and decided to die like a brave man Among his followers Ibrāhīm b al-Ashtar alone fought vigorously in the battle, the others folded their arms during the fighting or went over to the Syrian ranks ʿAbd al Malik offered Musʿab his life for the last time with the government of the ʿIrāk, but in vain Thrown from his horse, the Zubairid received the coup-de grace from an avenging Bakrī, ʿUbaid Allāh b Zabyān This took place about the middle of Djumādā I (October) of 72 (691) ʿAbd al Malik wept for him and ordered his poets to commemorate his heroic end Musʿab's great generosity earned him numerous eulogies from poets He is also famous for the fact that he had in his harem the two most independent and haughtiest women of the time, belonging to the most undoubted aristocracy of Islām, ʿĀʾisha bint Ṭalha [q v], the second huwārī of the Prophet, and Sukaina, grand daughter of ʿAlī, feminine types, remarkable in spite of their frivolity for having bravely tried to fight against the degradation of their sex in Muslim society

Bibliography Ṭabarī (ed de Goeje), i 1330, ii 59, 60, 118, 340—349, 481, 576, 592—593, 602—603, 662—678, 688, 716—727, 531—535, 740—745, 748—753, 764—765, 670—680, 783—822, 830—831, 1064—1072, 1260, 1266, 1466, Kitāb al-Aghānī, ii 138, 139, iii 103—104, 122, viii 85, 138, 178, x 54—57, xiii 33, 38, 42, xiv 84, 166—172, xvii 262—266, xx 10, Balādhurī, Ansāb al Ashrāf (ed Ahlwardt), p 3—4, 8, 10, 16—19, 23—24, Masʿūdī, Murūdj, (ed Barbier de Meynard), v 240-142, 247-49, Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil (Cairo), iv 123—124, 137, 139, H D van Gelder, Moḥtār de valsche profeet, Leyden 1888, p 125 sq (H LAMMENS)

AL-MUSABBIḤĀT, name of sūra's lvii, lix, lxi, lxii, lxiv as a group, after the first word of each of them, sabbaha or yusabbihu The name is old, cf Muslim, Zakāt, trad 119

MUSĀFIRIDS (Kangarī or Sallārī), a dynasty of Dailamī origin which came from Tārom [q v] and reigned in the fourth and fifth centuries of the Hidjra in Ādharbāidjān, Arrān and Armenia

Its coming to power was one of the manifestations of the great movement of Irānian liberation which formed a kind of interlude between the end of Arab domination and the first Turkish invasions While in Khurāsān and Transoxania this movement culminated in the rule of the Sāmānids [q v], in western Persia and Mesopotamia its standard-bearers were the Dailamīs and to a smaller extent the Kurds (cf V Minorsky, La domination des Dailamites, Paris 1932)

The Musāfirids and the Djustānids According to a genuine document quoted in Yākūt (iii 148—50), the Kangarī family only comes into history after seizing the famous stronghold of Shamīrān in the district of Tārom [q v] which was under Kazwīn The Kangarīs have therefore to be distinguished from the ruling family of Dailam, i e the Djustānids of Rūdbār, of whom seven are known from between 189 and 316 (805—928), while members of the family can be traced till 434 (1042) We know that Muhammad, son of Musāfir, the eponym of the dynasty (whose real Irānian name must have been Aswār, cf Masʿūdī, Murūdj, ix 16), had married Kharāsūya, daughter of the Djustānid Djustan III (from 250 until after 300) From such alliances the names peculiar to the ruling family of Dailam (Djustān, Wahsūdān, Marzubān) became popular among the Musāfirids In 307 (919) Muhammad killed his wife's uncle ʿAlī b Wahsūdān to avenge the death of his father in law Djustān b Wahsūdān Henceforth there was a breach between the two families The last Djustānid took refuge with the Dailamī chief Asfār (lord of Rayy and Kazwīn) who sent the Ziyānid Mardāwīdj against Muhammad but instead of fighting they joined forces and Mardāwīdj slew Asfār Muhammad was an important ruler and Musʿir b Muhalhil speaks with praise of his buildings at Shamīrān (1,850 houses) on which 5,000 workmen were employed (the ruins of Shamīrān have been described in Brugsch, Reise d preuss Gesandtschaft, 1862, ii 471—472) but he was a difficult character and did not agree even with the members of his own family

The two branches of Musāfirids In 330 (941) his sons Marzubān and Wahsūdān by arrangement with Kharāsūya, seized Shamīrān and shut their father up in a fortress, after which the dynasty broke up into two branches Wahsūdān remained in the hereditary fief of Tārom, while Marzubān extended his power over Ādharbāidjān, eastern Transcaucasia and some districts of Armenia

The fourth generation of the Musāfirids consisted of the sons of Marzubān Djustān, Ibrāhīm, Nāsir and Kay Khusraw, and of the sons of Wahsūdān (330—355) Ismāʿīl, Nūh and Haydar (?)

Marzubān This ruler (330—346 = 941—957) is the most important figure in the dynasty After the death in 314 (926) of the Sādjid [q v] Yūsuf, Ādharbāidjān became the scene of the struggle between the Khāridjī Kurd Daisam b Ibrāhīm and Lashkarī b Mardī, a native of Gīlān, whom the Ziyārid Wushmagīr supported alternately

Lashkarī died in Armenia and Daisam was betrayed by his vizier Abu 'l Kāsim ʿAlī b Djaʿfar who had come to an arrangement with Marzubān for both were bāṭnī (Ibn Miskawaih, ii 32) Marzubān occupied Ardabīl and Tabrīz and finally Daisam surrendered to Marzubān and received from him a castle in Tārom Marzubān extended his territory northward as far as Darband In 332 (943—944) the Russians (Rūs) came by the Caspian and the river Kur and took the capital of Arrān [q v], Bardaʿa [q v], in spite of the resistance of the subjects of Marzubān At the same time, the Hamdānids of Mawṣil had conceived designs on Ādharbāidjān and Marzubān had to deal with a force under Abū ʿAbd Allāh Husain b Saʿīd b Hamdān and the Hadhbānī Kurd Djaʿfar b Shakūyā, which had reached Salmās [q v] but was soon recalled to Mawsil by Nāsir al Dawla On the other hand, the Russians, decimated by disease and harassed by the Muslims, beat a retreat (cf the sources on the Russian invasion including the Armenian historian of the tenth century, Moses Kałankatvatzi, in Dorn, Caspia, St Petersburg 1876, the text of Ibn Miskawaih, ii 62–67, was translated with commentary by Yakubowski in the Vizant Vremennik, Leningrad 1926, xxiv, p 63—92)

A new danger arose in the south east of the lands of Marzubān when in 335 (946) the Būyid Rukn al-Dawla occupied Raiy (disputed by the Sāmānids and Ziyārids) Marzubān filled with wrath at the Būyids decided to attack them in 336 But Rukn had time to get reinforcements from his brothers In 338 (949) Marzubān, defeated near Kazwīn, was besieged in the castle of Sumairam (in Fārs)

The fugitives from his army gathered round his father Muhammad and occupied Ardabīl while Wahsūdān remained in Tārom Muhammad soon gave dissatisfaction to his captains and was shut up by Wahsūdān in his castle at Shīsagān (?) Rukn al-Dawla sent to Ādharbāidjān Muhammad b ʿAbd al-Razzāk, the former governor of Tūs [q v], who had deserted the Sāmānids Wahsūdān released Daisam in the hope that he would be able to organise resistance Daisam who had time to take Ardabīl, was defeated by Ibn ʿAbd al-Razzāk but the latter disgusted by the intrigues around him returned to Raiy in 338 (949) Daisam reoccupied Ardabīl but the advance of ʿAlī b Mīshkī, a supporter of Marzubān, forced him to seek shelter with the Artsrunids of Waspurakan [cf WĀN]

In the meanwhile by an ingeniously planned coup, Marzubān escaped from Sumairam and recovered all his strongholds and treasures (in 342) After a long series of adventures which brought him to Mawsil, Baghdād and Aleppo, Daisam in 344 (955) collected a force and read the khutba at Salmās in the name of the Hamdānid of Aleppo Saif al Dawla Marzubān quickly put down a rising in Darband and later drove Daisam back, who once again sought refuge with the Artsrunids who handed him over to Marzubān under threats from the latter

In an important passage, Ibn Hawkal, p 251–255, gives the list of the tributaries of Marzubān compiled by his minister Abu 'l-Kāsim (in 344) The names include those of the lords of Shīrwān, Abkhāz (? uncertain name of a district north of Shīrwān, cf Marquart, Streifzuge, p 174 *Abkhān), of Shakkī [q v], of [illegible], of Djurzān wa-Saghiyān (Gurziwān and Saghiyān to the west of Shīrwān), of Vayots-dzor (district of Siunie), of Ahar and Waizakan (N E of Tabrīz), of Khīzān (N of Bākū ?), as well as the Artsrunids, Bagratids and the princes of Khačen (west of Baidaʿa)

Wahsūdān and his nephews Marzubān died in Ramadān 346 (Dec 957) and while bequeathing the power to his brother Wahsūdān forgot to cancel his first will by which his sons Djustān, Ibrāhīm and Nāsir were to succeed him in succession

The commanders of the fortresses would not surrender them to Wahsūdān who returned to Tārom in disgust Djustān b Marzubān was recognised by his brothers but was only interested in his harem Marzubān's old general Djustān b Sharmazan set up in Urmiya [q v] and won to his side Ibrāhim, with whom he occupied Marāgha

In 349 (960) the grandson of the caliph Muktafī Ishāk b ʿĪsā rebelled in Gīlān and took the name of Mustadjīr bi 'llāh Djustān and Ibrāhīm became reconciled and defeated the rebels at Mūkān [q v]

Wahsūdān began intriguing among his nephews and detached Nāsir from Djustān but the quarrel was of short duration Under assurances from Wahsūdān, Djustān with his mother and Nāsir came to Tārom but were thrown into prison Wahsūdān sent his son Ismāʿīl to Ādharbāidjān Ibrāhīm who was ruling Armenia (Dwin) made a move in 349 or 350 which gave Wahsūdān an excuse to massacre his prisoners Ismāʿīl soon afterwards died at Ardabīl after which Ibrāhīm reoccupied Ādharbāidjān and laid Tārom waste while Wahsūdān sought refuge in Dailam Meanwhile Wahsūdān's general Sharmazan b Mishkī, however, succeeded in defeating Ibrāhīm and the latter, abandoned by all his soldiers, sought refuge with his brother-in law Rukn al-Dawla, who had married a daughter of Marzubān (355 = 966)

Rukn al-Dawla with his usual chivalry heaped favours on Ibrāhim and sent to Ādharbāidjān his famous minister Ibn al-ʿAmīd (Ustādh Raʾīs) who reinstated Ibrāhim and subjected the Kurds and Djustān b Sharmazan to him Ibn al ʿAmīd who was much impressed by the wealth of Ādharbāidjān proposed to Rukn al-Dawla to annex this province but his master recalled him to Raiy, saying that he did not wish to be accused of coveting the inheritance of one who had sought his protection After the return of Ibn al ʿAmīd matters went badly and from the allusions in Ibn Miskawaih we know only that Ibrāhīm was deposed and imprisoned (probably about 369 = 979, the year in which the Tadjārib al-Umam stops)

The end of the Musāfirids In the Muslim sources the situation in Ādharbāidjān till 420 is obscure but the statements of the Armenian historian Stephen Asołik, Hist Universelle, part ii, book iii, transl by Macler, Paris 1917, ch 11, 12, 18, 19, 29, 38 and 41, enable us to fill the gaps According to Kasrawī, in 369 (979) Ibrāhīm b Marzubān was dispossessed of his lands in Ādharbāidjān by the Rawwādī family (on which see the articles MARĀGHA, MARAND, TABRĪZ and Kasrawī, op cit, ii) The son of Ibrāhīm Abu 'l-Haidjā (the "Ablhadj Delmastanī" of Asołik) retained Dwin [q v] and on the invitation of king Mushel of Kars in 982—983 made an expedition into Armenia where he desecrated the churches This Ablhadj later lost all his lands to his neighbour Abutluph of Gołthn (i e Abū Dulaf Shaibānī, lord of Ordūbād) He later wandered in Georgia and Armenia and even visited the Byzantine emperor

Basil II, he was killed by his servants at Ukhthikh (Oltı) Finally another Ablhadj, son of Rovd, amīr of Atrapatakan (Abu 'l-Haidjā b Rawwād of Ādharbāidjān), took from Abū Dulaf "the towns of Salar and after sacking Gołthn marched on Dwin, seized this town and demanded from the Armenians the arrears of tribute" (Asołik, ch xviii) King Smbat II hastened to accede to the demand The Rawwādids thus gained possession of the remainder of the possessions of the Musāfirids of whom they claimed to be the successors There is no reason to connect the Arab-Kurd Rawwādids with the Musāfirids, who were of Dailamī origin, although there may have been intermarriage between the two families

The Tārom branch After the disappearance of the descendants of Marzubān, Tārom, the original fief of the dynasty, alone remained in their hands Wahsūdān had extended his power over the adjacent districts of Zandjān, Abhar and Suhraward (the latter name is usually mutilated in the sources) A kasīda of Mutanabbī (Kasrawī, op cit, i 45) dated probably in 354 suggests that Rukn al-Dawla drove Wahsūdān from Tārom for a time, but his family had remained there, for from Yākūt, iii 148—150 we learn that in 379 (989) the Būyid Fakhr al-Dawla took Shamirān from the young son of Nūh b Wahsūdān, whose mother he married (the child's name was probably Djustān, cf Yākūt, Irshād al-Arīb, ii 308)

In 387 (997) after the death of Fakhr al Dawla, Ibrāhīm b Marzubān b Ismaʿīl b Wahsūdān seized the fortress of Sardjihān and Tārom In 411 (1020) even Kazwīn was in his hands (cf Nuzhat al-Kulūb, in G M S, p 58) When Mahmūd of Ghazna had taken Raiy, he sent against him the Dailamī Kharāmil After the return of Mahmūd to Khurāsān (420), his son Masʿūd attacked Ibrāhīm but only captured him by a stratagem Sardjihān, however, remained in the hands of Ibrāhim's son In 427 (1037) we find the "sālār of Tārom" in his fief again

Nāsir i Khusraw who was in this region in 437 (1045), speaks in high terms of the lord of Shamirān Djustān (b) Ibrāhīm whose title was "Marzubān al Dailam Djil-i Djilān Abū Sālih, Mawlā Amīr al-Muʾminīn"

Under 454 (1062) Ibn al-Athīr records the visit of Tughril to Tārom, where he imposed a tribute of 100,000 dīnārs on Musāfir, who is the last Musāfirid known From Yākūt's words we may conclude that the Ismāʿilis of Alamūt put an end to the rule of the family when they dismantled Shamirān

Bibliography Cf the articles MARĀGHA, MARAND, TĀROM, TABRĪZ, URMIYA The principal source is Ibn Miskawaih, ed Amedroz and Margoliouth (abridged in Ibn al-Athīr, viii —ix) The Taʾrikh Ādharbāidjān of Ibn Abi 'l-Haidjā al-Rawwādī (cf Safadī, in J A, 1912, xix, March, p 249, and Hādjdjī Khalīfa, ii 107) has not yet been found Cf also Munedjdjim Bashi, Sahāʾif al-Akhbār, i 505

Sauvaire, Sur quelques monnaies de M. de l'Ecluse, in J R A S, 1881, p 380–398 (résumé of Ibn al Athīr, description of a dirham struck at Ardabil in 343 in the names of "Sālār Abū Mansūr" [? perhaps Wahsūdān] and "Malik al-Muʾaiyad Marzubān b Muhammad Abū Nasr", and of a dīnār struck at Marāgha in 347 in the names of Ibrāhīm and Djustān, son of Marzubān), Justi, Iranisches Namenbuch, 1895, p 441, Marquart, Notes on Mayyafāriqīn, in J R A S, 1909, p 170—176, Sir E D Ross, On three Muhammadan Dynasties in Northern Persia, in Asia Major, 1925, ii /2, p 212—215 (cf also Sir E D Ross, in J R A S, 1924, p 617–619), Huart, Mosāfirides de l'Ādharbaidjān, in A Volume presented to E G Browne, Cambridge 1922, p 229–256, R Vasmer, Zur Chronologie d Ġastaniden und Sallāriden, in Islamica, 1927, iii /2, p 168—186, Zambaur, Manuel de genealogie, Hanover 1927, p 180, Saiyid Ahmad Kasrawī, Pādshāhān i gumnām, Teheran, i , 1928, and passim, ii —iii , 1929—1930 (a very good book analysing all the Muslim and even some Armenian sources), Markwart, Die Entstehung d armenischen Bistumer, in O C, xxvii /2, N° 80, Rome 1932, p 150—151 (recognises the identity of the Rawwādis of Tabrīz and Marāgha) (V MINORSKY)

MUSAILIMA (a contemptuous diminutive from Maslama, which is the form of his name given in Mubarrad, Kāmil, ed Wright, p 443, 5, Balādhurī, ed de Goeje, p 422 ult , cf Tulaiha [q v] for Talha), a prophet of the Banū Hanīfa in Yamāma contemporary with Muhammad His genealogy is variously given but always contains the name Habīb, his kunya was Abū Thumāma According to the usual account, he appeared as a prophet soon after the death of Muhammad, after having visited the latter in Medina with a deputation There is however another tradition according to which he began his prophetic career before Muhammad did, and D S Margoliouth has given very cogent reasons for accepting this According to Ibn Ishāk (Ibn Hishām, ed Wüstenfeld, p 200), Muhammad's enemies reproached him with having obtained his wisdom from a man of Yamāma named Rahmān Now we have ample evidence (Wākidī, transl Wellhausen, p 28, Tabarī, i 1935, 14, Balādhurī, p 105, Baghawī on Sūra xxv 61) that Musailima, who preached in the name of Rahmān, was himself called Rahmān Further the story recurring in all traditions that Musailima proposed to the Medinese prophet a division of authority or a transfer of his power to him on his death (a similar story is told of the Hanīfa chief Hawdha) becomes more intelligible if this prophet already occupied in Yamāma a position similar to that of Muhammad in Medina It is also worthy of note that the prophetic utterances attributed to Musailima recall the earliest Meccan sūras with their short rhyming sentences and curious oaths and have no resemblance at all to the later Medinese sūras In particular the fact that all the Banū Hanīfa followed him into battle against the Medinese shortly after the death of Muhammad shows that he must have been active for a considerable time and was no upstart imitator of Muhammad That the latter was the usual method of explaining the "liar" Musailima, is readily intelligible, nor is it to be wondered at that orthodox tradition could not deny itself the pleasure of depicting his relations with the Tamīm prophetess Sadjāh [q v] in the most scurrilous fashion Fortunately however, the otherwise little reliable Saif gives quite a different story, which although influenced by later ideas (Musailima in order to gain followers reduces the five daily salāts to three, he has a muʾadhdhin and a mukim, he tries in vain to imitate Muhammad's miracles etc), gives a picture of him which is in the main correct and we can agree with Wellhausen that his utterances have a distinctly Yamāma

colouring According to Saif's account, he must have been considerably influenced by Christianity for he speaks of the kingdom of heaven and of him who will come from heaven Like several other men of the time in Arabia of deep religious feelings he favoured asceticism He forbade wine and marital intercourse after the birth of a son It is interesting that Palgrave on his journey into Nadjd found a number of sayings still current under Musailima's name, unfortunately he did not trouble to record them so that we cannot compare them with what is recorded of his utterances in literature This rival community in the heart of Arabia meant a serious danger to the young faith of Islām Therefore when the first attempts to repress it had failed, Abū Bakr sent his ablest leader Khālid b al-Walīd against Musailima and the Banū Hanīfa A battle was fought at ʿAkrabāʾ [q v] in 12 A H which at first went against the Muslims, but Khālid's superior strategy finally prevailed and Musailima and many of his followers fell martyrs for their faith The battle was unusually fierce and the Muslims also suffered heavily, among the fallen being a number of the best authorities on the revelations of Muhammad

Bibliography Ibn Hishām, ed Wüstenfeld, p 945 sq, 964 sq, 971, 996 sq, al-Balādhurī, ed de Goeje, p 86 sqq, Tabarī, ed de Goeje, i 1737—1739, 1748—1750, 1795—1797, 1871, 1880, 1915—1921, 1929—1957, Ibn Kutaiba, Kitāb al-Maʿārif, ed Wüstenfeld, p 206, Masʿūdī, Tanbih, in B G A, vii 275, 284 sq, Baihakī, Kitāb al-Mahāsin, ed Schwally, p 32, Muir, Annals of the Early Caliphate, p 31, 38—46, Wellhausen, Skizzen und Vorarbeiten, iv 102, 115, 156 sq, vi 15—19, Caetani, Annali dell' Islām, ii 450 sq, 635–648, 727–738, Hirschfeld, New Researches, p 25, D S Margoliouth, in J R A S, 1903, p 485 sqq, against him Lyall, ibid, p 771 sq, Palgrave, Narrative of a Year's Journey through Central and Eastern Arabia, i 382 (Fr Buhl)

MUṢALLĀ (A), part pass II of ṣ-l-w, place where the salāt is performed on certain occasions When Muhammad had fixed his abode in Madīna, he performed the ordinary salāt's in his dār, which was also his masdjid not in the sense of temple) The extraordinary salāt's, however, were performed on a place situated outhwest of the city in the territory of the Banū alima, outside the wall, northeast of the bridge in the wādī, where at present the street from he suburb al-ʿAnbarīya reaches the market place arr al-Munākha (cf Burton, Personal Narrative, lan opp i 256, picture of the musallā as well s of the mosque of ʿUmar situated on the place, pp i 329, al-Batanūnī, al-Rihla al Hidjāzīya, nd ed, plan of Madīna opp p 252, part of the arr al-Munākha, ibid, opp p 264, Caetani, Annali, ol II/1, opp p 72)

On this spot the salāt was performed on the st Shawwāl and on the 10th Dhu 'l-Hidjdja (Tabarī, 1281, 1362) On the latter day the salāt was ombined with the slaughtering of two spotted ams (Bukhārī, Adāhī, bāb 6) On the two days f festival Muhammad and his followers on their vay to the musallā were preceded by Bilāl who ore the spear (ʿanaza, q v)

It is also said that the ṣalāt for rain was held n the musallā (copious data in Tradition, cf Wensinck, Handbook, s v Rain, and do, Mohammed en de Joden, p 141) Further it is related that the service for the dead was performed on this spot (Bukhārī, Djanāʾiz, bāb 4, 61, Wensinck, Mohammed en de Joden, p 140) Finally the musallā is mentioned as the place where executions took place (Bukhārī, Talāk, bāb 11, Tabarī, i 1903) The sacred character of the place appears in the fact that menstruating women were taught to avoid it (Bukhārī, Haid, bāb 23) According to Caetani (A H 1, § 55, note 3, cf A H 2, § 24, note 1), the musallā was used more frequently

It was not only in Madīna but in a large number of other places that the rites mentioned, or some of them, were performed on a musallā According to al-Nawawī (commentary on Muslim's Sahīh, Cairo 1283, ii 296), this was the practice of most of the capitals The custom prevails up to the present day According to Doutté, the North African musallā is used for the rites of the 10th Dhu 'l Hidjdja It is a large threshing-floor, with a wall provided with a mihrāb, there is also an elevated place for the khatīb This is the form of the musallā in many towns of Morocco

To the doctors of the law it was questionable whether the festival ceremonies should be performed on the musallā or in the mosque There was divergency of opinion on this point, even within the madhhab's (Abū Ishāk al Shīrāzī, Tanbih, ed Juynboll, p 41, where "the field" (al sahrāʾ) is mentioned side by side with the mosque, Zurkānī, comm on the *Muwatta*ʾ, i 328, Khalīl b Ishāk, Mukhtasar, Paris 1318, p 33 sq, al-Nawawī, op cit, ii 296)

Wensinck has conjectured that even in pre-Islāmic times rites of several kinds were performed on an open area, threshing-floor, musallā or the like The connection between all those rites and the special place is sought by him therein, that they had a special connection with the fertile earth, of which the threshing-floor and the like were symbols

Bibliography Caetani, Annali dell' Islam, A H 2, § 7, 24, note 1, 67, 91, 101, A H 6, § 19, A H 11, § 55, note 3, 159[1], Buhl, Das Leben Muhammads, transl Schaeder, Leipzig 1930, p 205, 233, R Burton, Personal Narrative of a Pilgrimage, London 1857, i 378, Wensinck Mohammed en de Joden te Medina, Leiden 1908, p 25, 138—142, do, Handbook of Early Muh Tradition, s v, do, Rites of Mourning and Religion, in Verh Ak Amst, N R, vol XVIII/1, p 1 sqq, Doutté, Magie et religion dans l'Afrique du Nord, Algiers 1908, p 462, Samhūdī, Khulāsat al-Wafāʾ, Cairo 1285, p 187 sqq, Wustenfeld, Gesch der Stadt Medina, in Abh G W Gott, IX, separate ed, Gottingen 1860, p 127 sqq, Ibn al-Athīr, ed Tornberg, ii 89, al-Yaʿkūbī, ed Houtsma, ii 47, al-Diyārbakrī, Taʾrīkh al-Khamīs, ii 14, Yākūt, Muʿdjam, iii 104, 703, iv 51 (poetic references), Yule and Burnell, Hobson-Jobson, s v mosellay (A J Wensinck)

MŪSĀWĪ [See Mecca, ii 4]

AL-MUṢAWWIR [See Alī ʿAbd al-Rahmān II]

MŪSH, town in Western Armenia near the southern bank of the Murād Ṣu (Arsanias), some 70 km as the crow flies to the west of Khilāt In pre-Muhammadan times it was the principal town of the district of Taraun (Hübschmann, Idg Forsch, xvi 326, J Saint-Martin, Memoires Historiques et Géographiques sur l'Armenie, i, Paris 1818, p 102) In Islāmic times the name Tarūn

(as spelled by Yāḳūt, IV 534) is sometimes used for the town itself as in Ṭabarī, III 1408 (cf J Markwart, Sud Armenien und die Tigrisquellen, Vienna 1930, p 354) The tradition of the Armenian historians connects the foundation of Mūsh with Mushel Mamikonean, the ancestor of the powerful, originally non-Armenian family of the Mamikoneans, who lived in the IVth century A D To him is ascribed the construction of a castle, the ruins of which are still visible on one of the hills that dominate Mūsh This town itself is situated at the mouth of a mountain gorge and before it extends, as far as the river, a large fertile plain, the "plain of Mūsh" During the first centuries after the Muhammadan conquest, Mūsh remained a centre of Armenian national life, from 825—851 it was the residence of the Bagratid Bagrat After the abduction of this prince to Baghdād in 851, the inhabitants revolted and killed the Muhammadan governor Yūsuf b Abī Saʿīd al Marwanī (Ṭabarī, III 1408 sq) Later on it was part of the vassal kingdom of the Bagratids Occasionally it was occupied by Muhammadan adventurers, as in the days of Sayf al-Dawla (Ibn al Athīr, VIII 408) in 353 (964) About this time the name Mūsh appears for the first time in Islāmic geographical literature (al-Makdisī, p 150) In Saldjūk times the influence of Islām became stronger, the atabegs of the Armanshāh dynasty disputed the territory of Khilāt and Mūsh with the Urtukids and even the Ayyūbid Nadjm al Dīn laid siege to Mūsh in 604 (1207) (Ibn al Athīr, XII 169, 180), and in 625 (1228) Djalāl al-Dīn Khwārizmshāh was master of the country, in that year a battle was fought by him and lost on the plain of Mūsh against the Saldjūk ruler of Erzerūm (Ibn al-Athīr, XII 314, Djuwaynī, Taʾrīkh-i Djihān gushā, II 181) This accounts for the ruined state of the town in the middle of the XIVth century (Ḥamd Allāh Mustawfī) After the Mongol period Mūsh was raided by Timūr in 1386, when he invaded the possessions of the Kara Koyunlu (Sharaf al-Dīn, Bitlis, 419) In 1473 the power of the Ak Koyunlu ruler Uzun Ḥasan was definitely broken in Armenia and from that time on Mūsh belonged to the Ottoman Empire At that time the population of its surroundings was already strongly mixed with Kurds and Turcomans The direct authority was exercised by Kurdish local chieftains, who, in the ruling system of the Empire, were subordinated, as sandjak begs, either to the pasha of Bitlis or to that of Wan At the beginning of the XIXth century ruled the Kurdish mīrmīrān Emīn Pasha, who was deposed in 1828—1829 (Ritter, X 676 and Sidjill-i ʿothmānī, I 426) In the middle of that century, Mūsh became the chief town in the merkez kazā Mūsh, in the sandjak Mūsh in the wilāyet of Bitlis, and in the Turkish republic it is a kazā in the wilāyet of Bitlis The population of the town (some 5,000 inhabitants) was, until the Great War, half Armenian and half Muhammadan, one of the Armenian churches had been converted in 979 (1571) into a mosque, according to an inscription (Ritter) The environs of Mūsh had also a mixed population, where, however, ancient Christian sanctuaries had long continued to exist, such as the monastery of Surb Karapet, called by the Turks Čanlī Kilise and described by Ewliyā Čelebi

During the Armenian troubles in the last years of ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd II's reign, in 1905, there began in Mūsh a revolutionary movement of Armenian tashnakists, which brought about an intervention of the Kurds and a suppression by government troops, in which the population suffered much In the Great War the Russian advance in Armenia had gone as far as Mūsh, when, in accordance with the treaty of Brest-Litowsk (1917), the Russian troops retired in 1918, leaving this part of Armenia again in Turkish possession

Bibliography Yākūt, Muʿdjam, IV 682, Abu 'l Fidā', ed Reinaud, p 392—393, Ḥamd Allāh Mustawfī, p 106, Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, Djihān-numā, ed Constantinople, p 416, Ewliyā Čelebi, Siyāḥat nāme, III 228, C Ritter, Erdkunde, X, Berlin 1843, p 662 sqq, 676 sqq, V Cuinet, La Turquie d'Asie, I, Paris 1841, p 551, 575

(J H KRAMERS)

AL-MUSHABBIHA [see TASHBĪH]

MUSHAF (A), Ethiopic loanword (cf Noldeke, Neue Beitrage, p 49 sq, the forms mishaf and mashaf occur also, according to some grammarians they are less correct, especially the latter), codex, or, according to the definition of Arabic lexicographers, leaves (suḥuf, plural of ṣaḥīfa), when they are bound together between two covers In the tradition on the redaction of the Kurʾān [q v] by Ḥudhaifa b al Yamān during ʿUthmān's caliphate, it is said indeed, that the collection of leaves that had been made by Zaid b Thābit at ʿUmar's instigation, was copied and arranged into maṣāḥif These were sent to all regions (as standard copies), the suḥuf were restored to ʿUmar's daughter Ḥafṣa, in whose possession they had been ever since her father's death Other suḥuf were annihilated as often as occasion offered itself (Bukhārī, Faḍāʾil al Kurʾān, bāb 3, ʿIlm, bāb 7, Djihād, bāb 12, Tafsīr, sūra 9, bāb 20, Aḥkām, bāb 37, Tirmidhī, Tafsīr, sūra 9, trad 19)

From the time of the redaction of the Kurʾān under ʿUthmān maṣāḥif are frequently mentioned in Arabic literature In a tradition on ʿAmr b al-ʿĀṣ's well known stratagem during the battle of Ṣiffīn it is said that a huge mushaf from Damascus was tied to the points of three lances (al Dīnawarī, Kitāb al-Akhbār al ṭiwāl, ed Girgass, p 201 sq, Naṣr b Muzāḥim, Waḳʿat Ṣiffīn, Bairūt 1921, p 350, cf p 353), in other traditions "copies of the Kurʾān" in several numbers are mentioned (e g Ṭabarī, I 3329)

In a tradition on the ṣalāt it is assumed that in the mosque of Madīna the mushaf had a fixed place (Bukhārī, Ṣalāt, bāb 95, Muslim, Ṣalāt, trad 263, 264), nowadays this place is by the dikka (cf Lane, Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians, chap Religion and Laws, and supra, art MASDJID, I, D, f)

It is said that ʿĀʾisha had a mushaf copied for her private use by her mawlā Abū Yūnus (Tirmidhī, Tafsīr, sūra 2, trad 29, cf Bukhārī, Faḍāʾil al-Kurʾān, bāb 6)

Maṣāḥif were taken into the field by Muslim soldiers (cf Tirmidhī, Ḥudūd, bāb 28, Abū Dāwūd, Djihād, bāb 135), this practice met, however, with objections (cf Bukhārī, Djihād, bāb 129, Muslim, Imāra, trad 92, 93), founded on the fear that they might fall into impure hands For a similar reason persons impure in a ritual sense were prohibited from touching maṣāḥif, save in a special cover (ʿalāka, Bukhārī, Ḥaiḍ, bāb 3)

Bibliography The lexicons, s v

(A J WENSINCK)

MUSHĪR (A), councillor, Turkish pronunciation mūshīr and mushur (modern orthography muşur) with meaning "Marshal" Mushīr literally means "one who points out, advises" Cf also the article MUSTASHĀR

According to some authorities, mushīr was at first (before the ʿAbbāsids) the title of the ministers (later wazīr, q v) or secretaries of state (kātib) So at least we are told by Ibn al-Tiktakā' (ed Derenbourg, p 206, transl Amar, p 244) Khalīl al-Zāhirī (ed Ravaisse, p 106 and 114) says that "formerly" an official to whom he gives fourth rank in the hierarchy, which shows he clearly distinguishes him from the wazīr, bore the title of mushīr We seem however to have very little other information about this dignitary On the other hand, the word mushīr in a non-technical sense is often found along with wazīr of which it sometimes seems to be a doublet or synonym (cf Makrīzī, ed Wiet, iv, fasc 1, p 20 and 74, Noldeke, Die Erzahlungen vom Mäusekonig und seinen Ministern, Gottingen 1879, p 53 mushīr nāṣih, wazīr nāṣih)

We may note however that this older and broader conception did not survive According to Ibn Khaldūn the wazīr is, it is true, an "assistant" to the sovereign, but to his predecessor Māwardī (Les statuts gouvernementaux, transl Fagnan, p 43 sqq) the wazīr is not the adviser of the imām but his delegate

If Ibn al-Tiktakā"s statement is correct we must see a survival of this older state of affairs in the usage of the Mamlūk chancellery where we find among the honorific *lakab*s of the wazir that of mushir al-dawla (or al saltana or al mulūk wa 'l-salāṭīn) Cf Kalkashandī, vi 70

The same usage, which perhaps came from the Saldjūks, is still more clearly established in the Ottoman chancellery We actually find the word mushīr among the alkāb of the Turkish wazir (vezīr) and almost at the head of the formula, which shows its importance dustūr-i mukerrem, mushir-i mufakhkham, nizām ul-ʿālem etc Whence in the epistolary style the epithets mushirī and mushīrāne used along with dustūri and dustūrāne or khidiwi and khidiwāne to designate all that belongs to an official of the rank of wezir

Mahmūd II in creating the principal ministries naturally thought of again giving a real value to this title of mushīr, which he gave to the principal ministers, and in the reign of his successor ʿAbd al-Madjīd "the privy council (medjlis i khāss, a regular council of ministers) consisted of the grand vizier, the sheikh al islām, eleven mushīr and three officials of the first rank" (Bianchi, Le premier annuaire imperial de l'Empire Ottoman, Paris 1848, p 7, Bianchi translates mushīr by "councillor or under secretary of state" and has been followed by Barbier de Meynard in his Supplément, the references in which should be taken with this reservation) In 1250 (1834—1835) the title of mushir was given to the new nāzir of the Interior (mulkiye nāziri = the former ket khūdā) and of Foreign Affairs (khāridjiye nāziri = the former rēis ul-kuttāb, cf Lutfī, v 29) The zabtiye mushirliyi was created in 1262 (1846) (Lutfī, viii 87)

Mahmūd II also created the post of beylei beyi wezir or chief of the imperial guard, who bore the title mushīr-i ʿasākir-i khāṣṣe (pasha), an officer who took rank after the serʿasker or War Minister (Hammer, Hist de l'Emp Ott, xvii 188 and 189) This title was soon to be contrasted with that of mushir i ʿasākir-i shāhāne by the other troops (Lutfī, v 28)

The ministers did not long bear the title of mushīr which gave place to nāzir, but the former of these titles, perhaps under the influence of the word "marshal", which it more or less resembles, became a special military title It became the highest rank in the army, corresponding to vizier in the civil service and of kazasker in the religious hierarchy At first the title redif i manşūre mushīri (cf Lutfī, v 68, 74) was given to the *wālī*s of certain provinces, or simply mushīr of such and such a province (ibid, p 165 sqq, vi 102, 103, vii 70) This corresponded to the demarcation of the army corps

The number of mushīr or "marshals" soon increased and in the reign of ʿAbd al-Hamīd II, there were 39 in 1890 and in 1895, 31 (see the Salnāme i ʿaskerī of the years 1306 and 1311) Those who had the right to this title were the serʿasker, the topkhāne i ʿāmire mushiri or "grand master of artillery", the sarāy mushīri or "grand master of the Palace" (replacing the old cawush bashi, according to Ahmad Rāsim, Taʾrikh, i 156 and 186), the khāṣṣe mushiri (as under Mahmūd II), the commanders of the seven army corps (kol ordu), the heads of the army services, the aides de camp to the sultān (yāwer i ekrem) The only duty of five of the mushīr was to superintend the ceremony of the Selāmlik (selāmlik resm i ʿālisine meʾmūr) The officer in charge of the police station (merkez) of Beshiktash, near the Yildiz Kiosk, was also a mushīr (M S O S, vii, 1908, part 2, p 40) Instead of sarāy mushiri the more usual phrase was mā-beyn mushir (Lutfī, vii 62)

The honorific form of address for a mushīr was dewletli (dewletlu) efendim hazretleri In the plural the Persian form mushirān or with epithet mushīrān i ʿizām The name of the office is mushirīyet or mushirlik, more rarely mushīrī (Lutfī, v 91)

The title of mushīr, which has been borne by Mustafā Kemāl Pāshā himself, has survived in the Turkish republic but there is at present only one mushir in office, the Chief of the General Staff, Fewzī Pasha

In Khedivial Egypt they stopped at a stage where the influence of the reforms of Mahmūd II was still felt The rutbet mushir there was down to the present reign exclusively the highest grade of officers but without distinction between military and civil offices It was also in theory a civil rank (rutba mulkiya) to which all the princes of the khedivial house had a claim

In Persian the title mushir has been rarely used Cf however the case of the mushīr ed dowle (cf the similar title above) borne by an aide de-camp of Nasr al Dīn Shāh (Feuvrier, Trois ans a la Cour de Perse, p 135—136)

Bibliography Cf J Deny, Sommaire des archives turques du Caire, Cairo 1930, index, s v mouchir, Mme Kibrizli Mehemet Pacha, 30 ans dans les Harems d'Orient, Paris 1875, p 126 (description of a ceremonial presentation of a mushīr's firmān), on the word mushirīye in actual use in Damascus, cf Saussey, Les mots turcs dans le dialecte arabe de Damas, in Mel de l'Inst fr de Damas, i, 1929, p 117

(J DENY)

MUSHRIK. [See SHIRK]

AL-MUSHTARĪ, the planet Jupiter, Pers Hurmuzd < Aurmazd (Ahura-mazdāh) The name of the planet is in Sumerian Shulpa'e, later also Mulu-babbar "the white star" (= Μολοβαβαρ in Hesychios, cf Meissner, Babylonien und Assyrien, Heidelberg 1925, ii 404), in the later Accadian period it is always identified with the numen supremum Marduk (Biblical Merodach) In Hebrew it is called Sedek, in Greek — just as among the Babylonians, as the symbol of the highest deity — ὁ τοῦ Διὸς ἀστήρ As a synonym of al-Mushtarī we find (e g in Hadīth) the name Barǧīs (cf Lisān al-ʿArab, vii 323)

The Arab astronomers, like Pythagoras and Ptolemy, put Jupiter in the sixth sphere (falak) from within i e the third from without On the interior it adjoins the outer surface of the sphere of Mars and on the exterior the inner surface of the sphere of Saturn The following table gives the least, mean and greatest distance of Jupiter from the centre of the earth, expressed in radii of the earth, as given by al Battānī (Opus astronomicum, ed Nallino, ch 50), al-Farghanī (Compilatio, ch 21), Ibn Rusta (Kitāb al-Aʿlāk, ed de Goeje, p 18–20) and Abrāhām bar Hīyā (Sphaera mundi, ch 9), as well as the Hindu values given by al-Bīrūnī from the compilation by Yaʿkūb b Tārik of the year 161 A H, and the modern figures for these distances

	least distance (perigee)	mean distance	greatest distance (apogee)
al-Battānī	8,022 rad of the earth	10,473 rad of the earth	12,924 rad of the earth
al Farghānī	8,876 "	$11{,}640\frac{1}{2}$ "	14,405 "
Ibn Rusta	8,820 "	$11{,}503\frac{1}{2}$ "	14,187 "
Bar Hīyā	8,000 "	10,200 "	12,400 "
Hindu (al-Bīrūnī)	$8{,}019\frac{1}{21}$ "	$10{,}866\frac{2}{3}$ "	$13{,}714\frac{2}{7}$ "
Modern	92,500 "	122,250 "	152,000 "

The radius of the earth is here estimated at 3,250 (al Battānī, al-Farghānī and Bar Hīyā) and 3,818 Arab miles respectively (Ibn Rusta) while, according to al-Bīrūnī, the Hindus give it as 1,050 farsakh = 3,150 Arab miles (1 Ar m = 1,973 metres, cf Nallino, Il valore metrico del grado di meridiano) The true geocentric distances of the planet Jupiter are actually about $11\frac{1}{2}$ times greater than given by al-Battānī for example It should however be pointed out that the relation of 37 23 ∞ $1^{11}/_{18}$ for the greatest and least observed apparent diameter taken by this scholar, with the help of which the distance of the apogee was calculated from the estimated distance of the perigee at 8,022 radii of the earth agrees remarkably well with the modern estimate The apparent diameter of Jupiter at the mean distance is given by al Battānī as $\frac{1}{12}$ of the diameter of the sun From this and the mean distance he calculates the true diameter of Jupiter at $4\frac{1}{3}$ diameters of the earth (= $8\frac{2}{3}$ radii), and its volume at 81 times that of the earth (i e $[4\frac{1}{3}]^3$) The true values are 2 56 (i e 170 times larger) diameter of Jupiter = 11 14 diameters of the earth, volume = 1,380 times the volume of the earth

Following Ptolemy (Almagest) al Battānī gives the greatest observed northern (geocentric) latitude as 2° 4′, the greatest southern as 2° 8′ On the other hand, he points out (ch 31 and 45) that he found the length of the apogee of the eccentric circle from his observations to be about 8° smaller (in 879 A D, 164° 28′) than was to be expected from the Almagest, taking into account the precession

The movement of Jupiter is as in the Almagest represented to be through four circles ("spheres", aflāk) (cf al-Battānī, Op astr, ch 31) The astronomical tables take for its mean daily sidereal motion the value of 5′ Its period of sidereal revolution is given by al Kazwīnī (Āthār, ed Wustenfeld, i 26) at 11 years, 10 months, 15 days

Al-Mushtarī in astrology Al-Mushtarī is the ruler (rabb) of the Buyūt al-Kāmil (Sagittarius, night-house) and al-Hūt (Pisces, day-house), also night-ruler of the 1 Muthallatha (Triquetrum), which consist of al Hamal (Aries), al-Asad (Leo) and al Rāmī (Sagittarius), whose ruler by day is the sun, and finally companion (rafīk) of the 3 Muthallatha It has its Sharaf (exaltation) in the 15° of al-Saratān (Cancer), its Hubūt in the 15° of al-Djady (Capricornus) According to al Kazwīnī (i 22), "the astrologers call al Mushtarī the larger star of fortune", al-Saʿd al-akbar, because its good influence surpasses that of Venus, they attribute to it numerous happy states and the greatest good fortune The idea that the planet Jupiter is a star of good fortune is general among other peoples also, we also find it in Babylonia, India and China For further details of the part played by Jupiter in Arab astrology see the works of Abū Maʿshar

Bibliography See that of the articles ʿUṭārid and Minṭaka (W Hartner)

MŪSĪKĪ or موسيقا or موسيقى as it was written in the West (al Fārābī, Ihsā' al-ʿUlūm, Schiaparelli, Vocabulista in Arabico = Latin musica), is the name given to the science of music It is a post classical word derived from the Greek μουσική, and was already current at the time of Ishāk al-Mawsilī (d 236 = 850) [q v] In the Mafātih al-ʿUlūm (ivth = xth century) mūsīkī is one of the four mathematical sciences Its author says "As for mūsiki, its meaning is the [science of the] composing of melodies (alhān) It is a Greek word, and it is named the muṭrib And the composer of the melodies is the mūsikūr or mūsikār (p 236)" The contemporary Ikhwān al-Safā' say (i 87) "Mūsikī is ghinā', and the mūsikār is the mughannī, and the mūsikāt (mūsikārīya in Dieterici) is the instrument of music (ghinā')" ʿIlm al-mūsiki was the name given by the Arabs to the Greek or mathematical theory of music as distinct from ʿilm al-ghinā' which was the Arabian practical theory, as we know from the Kitāb al Aghānī and Yahyā b ʿAlī b Yahyā b Abī Mansūr (d 300 = 912) The latter tells us (Brit Mus MS, Or 2361, fol 236v) of the "disagreement between the masters of Arabian ghinā' and the masters of [Greek] mūsiki" Of course, the Arabs and Persians possessed a theory of music long before they became influenced by the translations made from the Greek

at the end of the IIth (VIIIth) and beginning of the IIIth (IXth) century

The Pre-Islāmic System The source of both Persian and Arabian theory of music was an older Semitic one which had influenced, if it had not been the actual foundation of Greek theory (cf Farmer, Hist Facts , p 123) No Persian or Arabic technical nomenclature of a theory of mūsīkī (i e speculative theory) has come down to us from pre Islāmic times, although it must have existed Al-Fārābī (d 339 = 950) describes a musical instrument, still used in his day, called the ṭunbūr al-baghdādī or al-mīzānī, the frets (dasātīn, a Persian word) of which gave a "pre-Islāmic scale" (Kosegarten, Lib cant, p 89, Mafātīḥ al-ʿUlūm) It was a quarter tone scale which was arrived at by dividing a string into forty equal parts The idea could be traced to Eratosthenes (Ptolemy, Harm, ed Wallis, II 14) but probably was of far greater antiquity (Farmer, Influence of Music, in Proceedings, Musical Association, 1926, p 121) Although al-Fārābī's instrument did not actually give the following scale, yet the theoretical division mentioned above would produce a scale which, expressed in cyclic cents, would register

Fret	Nut	2nd	4th	6th	8th	10th
Cents	0	89	182	281	386	498

J P N Land was of opinion that the later Pythagorean lute scale of the Old Arabian School was derived from the system of the tunbūr al-baghdādī It is more likely however, that there was an earlier lute scale than that of the Old Arabian School, as has been hinted elsewhere (Farmer, Hist of Arabian Music, p 70) This was a one octave scale fixed by the accordatura (taswiya) C-D-G-a, the frets of which gave the following scale

Cents 0 204 408 498 702 906 1110 1200

For a discussion of this scale see Farmer, An Old Moorish Lute Tutor, p 27, do , Hist Facts , p 310

The Old Arabian System In the Ith (VIIth) century we get definite glimpses of a theory in the music of the Arabs and Persians We read of a certain Ibn Misdjah [q v] (d ca 97 = 715) who had learned Persian music (ghinā') and accomplishments in playing (darb), and had received instruction from Byzantine (rūmī) barbiton players (barbaṭiya) and theorists (ustūkhūsīya = στοιχειαται) These borrowings from abroad he incorporated into a system which came to be recognized throughout the peninsula (Kitāb al-Aghānī, III 84) We are told however, that Ibn Misdjah rejected from Persian and Byzantine methods what he found to be "alien to Arabian music" (ghinā') This would appear to show, as Land once pointed out (Remarks, p 156), that these foreign importations "did not supersede the national music, but were grafted upon an Arabic root with a character of its own" We know that about the same time, or perhaps slightly later (Kitāb al-Aghānī, I 98), that the Arabs adopted the Persian lute in the place of their own instrument This latter, as we have seen, gave a one-octave scale based on the accordatura C-D-G-a, whilst the Persian lute was tuned in fourths thus A-D-G-c, which enabled the performer to attain (with a shift) the double octave Yet only the highest and the lowest strings of their old lute needed to be altered, and these were given the Persian names of zīr and bamm, whilst the second and third strings retained their old Arabic names of mathnā and mathlath The new accordatura of the lute brought about a change in the scale (ṭabaka) as the following distribution of the frets shows (Brit Mus MS, Or 2361, fol 237) The lute with the Arabs was the basis of all "theory", just as the lyre was with the Greeks

FRETS	STRINGS
	Bamm	Mathlath	Mathnā	Zīr
Muṭlak (Open string)	0	498	996	294
Sabbāba (1st Finger)	204	702	1200	498
Wusṭā (2nd Finger)	294	792	90	588
Binṣir (3rd Finger)	408	906	204	702
Khinṣir (4th Finger)	498	996	294	792

Nevertheless, this scale did not satisfy everyone, and we find that the Persians introduced a new wusṭā fret at 303 cents, whilst later a famous musician at Hārūn's court named Zalzal [q v] (d 175 = 791) adopted a fret at 355 cents, half way between the new Persian wusṭā fret and the binṣir fret By the time of Ishāk al Mawṣilī (d 236 = 850) these Persian and Zalzalian frets seem to have created such confusion that this musician attempted to recast the lute scale in its old Pythagorean mould, which, we are told, he did without recourse to Euclid or a solitary book of the "Ancients" as the Greeks of old were called (Kitāb al Aghānī, V 52—53, ʿIḳd al farīd, III 188) His reform appears to have been successful in ʿIrāk and lasted there until the IVth (Xth) century (Kitāb al-Aghānī, I 2, Rasā'il Ikhwān al-Ṣafā', I 98) Elsewhere however, the Persian and Zalzalian notes continued in favour, as we know from al Fārābī (Kosegarten, Lib cant, p 85) and the Mafātīḥ al ʿUlūm, p 239 A century later, whilst the Persian note of 303 cents had disappeared, that of Zalzal was still popular (Ibn Sīnā, Shifā', India Office MS, fol 173v)

There is but little preserved of the writings of the theorists of the Old Arabian School Whether the books of Yūnus al Kātib (d ca 148 = 765) [q v] and the more famous al-Khalīl (d 175 = 791) [q v] on music (nagham and īlā') dealt with these theories we know not since they have perished (Fihrist, p 43, 143) A similar fate appears to have overtaken the music books of ʿUbaid Allāh b ʿAbd Allāh b Tāhir (d ca 300 = 912), ʿAlī b Hārūn b ʿAlī b Yahyā b Abī Mansūr (d 352 = 963) and Sulaimān b Ayyūb al-Madīnī (Kitāb al-Aghānī, V 45, Fihrist, p 144, 148) Beyond the sparse information given in the Kitāb al-Aghānī and the Murūdj of al-Masʿūdī (VIII 89 sq), we have only the Risāla fi 'l-Mūsikī of Yahyā b ʿAlī b Yahyā b Abī Mansūr (d 300 = 912) to depend on, since the Kitāb al-Lahw wa 'l Malāhī of Ibn Khurdādhbih (d ca 300 = 912) [q v] is in private hands (Hilāl, XXVIII 204)

Although we read that Ishāḳ al-Mawṣilī made his calculations by hisāb (Yahyā b ʿAlī, fol 237v), yet the Old Arabian School, so far as we know from Yaḥyā b ʿAlī b Yahyā, did not adjust the frets of the lute (ʿūd) or pandore (ṭunbūr) by this method Their rule for fixing the frets was based on tuning a note with its octave or, as they termed it, its ṣiyāh or diʿf, although the latter term shows that they recognized the interval ratio 1 2 When the Greek scholiasts came to deal with the theory of music all this was changed

The Greek Scholiasts By the middle of the IIIth (IXth) century, the effects of the writings of the ancient Greeks on music, which had been translated into Arabic, began to be felt Among these treatises were Aristotle's Problems and De anima, the commentaries of Themistius and Alexander Aphrodisiensis on the latter, two works by Aristoxenus — including the στοιχεῖα it would seem, the two books on music attributed to Euclid, a treatise by Nicomachus, presumably the lost book, and the Harmonics of Ptolemy, all or most of which had been translated by the first half of the IVth (Xth) century at least, as we know from al-Fārābī (Fihrist, p 266, 269, 270, Ibn al-Kiftī, p 65, al-Makkarī, Anal, II 87, ʿIkd al farīd, III 186, B G A, VII 128, Rasāʾil Ikhwān al Safāʾ, I 102, and Farmer, Greek Theorists of Music in Arabic Translation, in Isis, XIII, p 325)

The ʿilm al mūsīkī now became one of the courses of the ʿulūm riyādiyya or quadrivium, and was studied by most savants at this period although later a few fought shy of the subject probably, as in Western Europe (Farmer, Hist Facts , p 184), because it was too abstruse (Ibn Khallikān, III 471) The early scholiasts dealt with the theory of sound (sawt), intervals (abʿād), genres (adjnās), species (anwāʿ), systems (djumūʿ, djamāʿāt), mutation (intikāl) and composition (taʾlīf), after the manner of the Greeks, and from the above order we see that Euclid influenced them in this respect To this was added rhythm (īkāʿ) All this was of immense value to Arab theorists and their later copyists, the Persians and Turks Instead of the old method of describing intervals according to their frets they were now given definite names and recognized by ratios The octave became al-kull ("the whole"), whilst the fifth, fourth, and ditone were given identical names in Arabic The tone was variously known as the ṭanīn, ʿawda or mudda The semitone or nuṣf ṭanīn was recognized in its two forms, the inṣāl or ἀποτομή, and the bakīya or fadla which was the λεῖμμα, whilst the quarter tone was the irkhāʾ In some ways the Scholiasts were slavish and diffuse in what they borrowed, although in others they were eclectic On the question of the physical bases of sound however, and their treatment of musical instruments, they pushed ahead of their masters

The first to take advantage of the newly found treasures of the "Ancients" was al-Kindī (d 260 = 874) [q v] Seven treatises on music theory appear under his name (Fihrist, p 255—257, Ibn al-Kiftī, p 370, Ibn Abī Usaibiʿa, I 210), and four of them would seem to have survived (Farmer, Hist of Arabian Music, p 127, do, Some musical MSS identified, p 91) Three of them are at Berlin (Ahlwardt, Verz, Nrs 5503, 5530, 5531) Risāla fī Idjzāʾ khabarīya al-Mūsīkī, Risāla fi ʾl Luhūn, and another without title The fourth, the Risāla fī Khubr Taʾlīf al-Alhān, is in the British Museum (Or 2361), and is probably later than the others In the latter we see the author's indebtedness to Euclid and Ptolemy He had written a Risāla fī Kismat al-Kānūn, presumably Euclid's Sectio canonis He uses a one-octave alphabetic (abdjad) notation which was an improvement on Greek methods, but his pointing the way to a reform of the scale was probably of greater import to the Arabs By introducing a fifth string on the lute, so as to reach the double octave without recourse to the shift, he obtained the Complete System (djamʿ al aʿṣam Ptolemy's σύστημα τέλειον) To accomplish this a fret called the mudjannab had to be introduced at 114 cents between the muṭlak and the sabbāba fret, which in itself created another problem, and eventually led to frets being tried between the mutlak and the above mudjannab at 90 cents and between the wusṭā and binsir frets at 384 cents Here was the germ of the limma, limma, comma scale of the later tunbūr al-khurāsānī, the forerunner of the Systematist scale

After al Kindī, we have a gap of a century in actual documents There are names of theorists in abundance but their works have not survived Al Kindī's two disciples, Ahmad b Muhammad al-Sarakhsī (d 286 = 899) and Mansūr b Talha b Talhī, contributed works on the theory of music, the former writing six (Fihrist, p 117, 149, 261) More important perhaps, were the three books of Thābit b Kurra (d 288 = 901) [q v], as well as those of Muhammad b Zakariyā al Rāzī (d 320 = 932) [q v] and Kustā b Lūkā (d ca 320 = 932) [q v] (Fihrist, p 276, 295, Ibn Abī Usaibiʿa, I 309, Kitāb al Aghānī, VIII 54, Hādjdjī Khalīfa, V 161) The greatest of all the scholiasts however was al-Fārābī (d 339 = 950) [q v] (Ibn al Kifti, p 277, Ibn Abī Usaibiʿa, II 134, Steinschneider, al Fārābī) Although we lack two of his books on music, the Kalām fi ʾl Mūsīkī and the Kitāb fī Ihsāʾ al Ikāʿ, yet his greatest work, the Kitāb al-Mūsīkī al-kabīr, has been preserved This treatise, so he tells us, was written because he found an "incompleteness" in what had been handed down from the Greeks It has been called "the most important treatise on the theory of Oriental music" (cf vol II 54), but it probably deserved to rank as one of the greatest works that had been written on music His treatment of the physical and physiological principles of sound and music is certainly an advance on the Greeks, whilst he was the first to devote a detailed study to musical instruments, a subject on which nothing has come down to us from the Greeks Al-Fārābī was a good mathematician and physicist, and that enabled him to do justice to what the Arabs called the ʿilm al nazarī or speculative theory, even to not repeating the errors of the Greeks (Farmer, Hist Facts , p 292—293) Yet he was something more He was a practical musician and could appreciate the art as well as the science, which was more than Themistius could do, as al Fārābī himself mentions As a performer with a reputation (Ibn Khallikān, III 309, Rasāʾil Ikhwān al Ṣafāʾ, I 85) he could bring the ʿilm al-ʿamalī or practical art to bear upon the discussions So whilst he was more thorough than the Greeks in handling the physical bases of sound, he could also make valuable contributions to physiological accoustics, i e the sensations of tone, a question which the Greeks left practically untouched

By the time of al-Fārābī further additions had been made to the scale The principle by which the Persian and Zalzalian wusṭā frets at 303 and 355 cents had been determined, was also applied to the insertion of corresponding mudjannab frets, between the muṭlak and the sabbāba, at 145 and 168 cents, with the result that there were now three muḏannab frets known respectively as the Ancient, Persian and Zalzalian, whilst the one at 114 cents had disappeared Here is the fretting of the lute in al-Fārābī's day

FRETS	STRINGS
	Bamm	Maṯlaṯh	Maṯnā	Zīr	Ḥādd
Mutlak	0	498	996	294	792
Ancient muḏannab	90	588	1086	384	882
Persian muḏannab	145	643	1141	439	937
Zalzalian muḏannab	168	666	1164	462	960
Sabbāba	204	702	1200	498	996
Ancient wusṭā	294	792	90	588	1086
Persian wusṭā	303	801	99	597	1095
Zalzalian wusṭā	355	853	151	649	1147
Binṣir	408	906	204	702	1200
Khinṣir	498	996	294	792	90

Al-Farābī also noted the scale of the tunbūr al-khurāsānī proceeding by a limma, limma, comma, which doubtless was prompted by al-Kindī's speculations It became the parent of the later theory of the Systematist School In describing the scales of the ʿūd or rebec he shows one that gave the just minor third (316) and just major third (386)

The next great writer after al Fārābī was Abu 'l-Wafāʾ al-Buzdjānī (d 388 = 998) [q v], the most eminent of the Arabic writers on mathematics His book on rhythm (īkāʿ) has unfortunately disappeared, although its importance has been testified to (Bibl Ind, 1849, p 93) The contemporary encyclopædists, the Ikhwān al-Ṣafāʾ in their Rasāʾil, and Muhammad b Ahmad al-Khwārizmī in his Mafātīh al-ʿUlūm, also deal with the theory of music The latter does not break fresh ground although his work is helpful in controlling others The former, however, are of considerable import because of their able and lucid treatment of accoustics Here is an instance According to Helmholtz (op cit, p 10), musical tones are distinguished by their force, pitch, and quality, and the force of a musical tone, he says, increases and diminishes with the extent or so-called amplitude of the oscillations of the particles of the sounding body Preece and Stroh refused to accept this definition and pointed out that loudness does not depend upon amplitude of vibration only, but upon the quantity of air put in vibration (P R S, xxviii, p 366) The Ikhwān al Safāʾ had already enunciated this opinion "Hollow bodies" they say, "like vessels will resound for a long time after they are struck, because the air within them reverberates time after time until it becomes still Consequently, the wider the vessels are, the greater the sound, because more air is put in vibration" (i 89) They also recognized the spherical propagation of sound (i 88), which was an improvement on the Aristotelian De audibilibus (802, a) which said that "the direction of sound follows a straight line" (cf Vitruvius, De arch, v 3)

The next writers whose works have been spared us are Ibn Sīnā (d 428 = 1037) [q v] and Ibn Zaila (d 440 = 1048) Two treatises on music stand to the credit of Avicenna, as he was known in Europe, and they are contained in the Shifāʾ (India Office MS, 1811) and the Naḏjāt (Bodleian MS Marsh, 521) (Ibn al Kiftī, p 413, Ibn Abī Usaibiʿa, ii 2, cf Casiri, i 271) Unlike al-Fārābī, the shaikh al-raʾīs was not a practical musician, yet his biographers claim that he dealt with questions on the theory of music which were neglected by the Greeks He is scientific and philosophic in his approach, and even critical at times, but he displays little of that originality that is so apparent in his other writings Ibn Zaila was his disciple and echoed his opinions, although some fresh details emerge when dealing with the practical art He quotes from al-Kindī on the question of rhythm, and is useful on that account

Egypt also contributed its quota of music theorists, two outstanding writers being Ibn al-Haitham (d 430 = 1039) [q v] and Abu 'l-Salt Umaiya (d 528 = 1134) Ibn al Haitham appears however to have written commentaries on both the κατατομὴ κανόνος and the Εἰσαγωγὴ ἁρμονική of Euclid (Ibn al-Kiftī, p 168, Ibn Abī Usaibiʿa, ii 90) Although there were several Arabic commentaries on Euclid's Canon not one appears to have survived Yet we have two at least in Hebrew whose authors probably depended on Arabic works One of these was Moses Nievy (Halevy) who quotes Shem Ṭob b Isaac Shafrūt, and the other was Isaiah b Isaac (Beth osar hassphārōth, Year i, xxix, xxxi) The Risāla fi 'l Mūsīkī by Abu 'l Ṣalt was probably of some importance since it is quoted by Jewish writers (Ibn Abī Usaibiʿa, ii 52, Ahlwardt, Verz, N⁰ 5536 [5], P Duran, Grammar, Vienna 1863, p 37) In Syria we have Ibn al-Nakkāsh (d 574 = 1178), Abu 'l-Hakam al-Bāhilī and his son Abu 'l-Maḏjd Muhammad (d 576 = 1180), and ʿAlam al Dīn Kaisar (d 649 = 1251), all of whom were interested in music theory (Ibn Abi Usaibiʿa, ii 144, 155, 162, 181, Ibn Khallikān, iii 471), whilst further East we have such names as Ibn Manʿa (d 551 = 1156), ʿAbd al-Muʾmin b Ṣafi al-Dīn (vith = xiith century?), Fakhr al Dīn al Rāzī (d 606 = 1209) [q v], and Nasīr al Dīn al Ṭūsī (d 673 = 1274) [q v] (Ibn Khallikān, iii 467, Bodleian MS Ouseley, N⁰ 117, Brit Mus MS Or 2972, Paris Bibl Nat MS, Arabe, N⁰ 2466) In the West, the two theorists of consequence are Ibn Bāḏjḏja (d 532 = 1138) [q v] whose book on music enjoyed the same reputation in the West as that of al-Fārābī in the East (al-Makkarī, Anal, ii 125), and Ibn Rushd (d 594 = 1198) [q v] whose commentary on Aristotle's De anima reveals that lucidity of treatment in the section dealing with the phenomena of sound that made him so famous on other questions

The Systematist School After Ibn Sīnā and Ibn Zaila, the most thorough exposition of the theory of music, so far as existing documents show, was made by a musician in the service of the last Caliph of Baghdād, named Ṣafī al-Dīn ʿAbd al-Muʾmin b Fākhir (d 692 = 1294) [q v], the author of two estimable works, the Risālat al Sharafiya and the Kitāb al-Adwār, which almost every subsequent writer in music uses as his principal authorities A later theorist, ʿAbd al-Kādir b Ghaibī, frankly admitted that Safī al Dīn was the fountain head in music theory, whilst a modern has called him "the Zarlino of the Orient" (Kiesewetter, p 13), and many commentaries have been penned on his theories Safī al-Dīn was no mean physicist, and he attacks both al Fārābī and Ibn Sīnā when

e finds that their terms and definitions are inexact luch of it may be mere quibbling over verbal iceties, but it redounds to his credit that he ealized that in a science we must start off with erminological exactitudes Like al-Fārābī, he was practical musician, and the reform of the scale, hich must be attributed to him (cf Helmholtz, 280), was possibly due to this fact The Greek choliasts had done much to stabilize Arabian usic theory, yet anomalies still existed The ost notable was the Zalzalian wusṭā note at 55 cents together with its attendant sixth at 53 cents These did not conform to the scholiasts' cale which produced a succession of fourths (cf Helmholtz, p 281) It was to remedy this defect, t would seem, that Safī al Dīn laid down a new heory of the scale in which the octave was divided nto seventeen intervals in the succession of limma, imma and comma, which enabled him to embrace he fractious Zalzalian notes of 355 and 853 cents y close approximations which worked out at 384 nd 882 cents This scale, which has been con idered "the most perfect ever devised" (Parry, Art of Music, 1st ed, p 29), gave consonances urer than our scale of equal temperament can fford us (Riemann, Catechism of Musical History, 65) It is no wonder therefore that Helmholtz has onsidered the theory of the Systematist School so noteworthy in the history of the development of usic" (p 283) Here is the scale of Safī al-Dīn

FRETS	STRINGS
	Bamm	Mathlath	Mathnā	Zīr	Ḥadd
Muṭlak	0	498	996	294	792
ʿaud	90	588	1086	384	882
Mudḏannab	180	678	1176	474	972
abbāba	204	702	1200	498	996
Persian wusṭā	294	792	90	588	1086
ʿalzalian wusṭā	384	882	180	678	1176
Binṣir	408	906	204	702	1200
Ḫinṣir	498	996	294	792	90

After the fall of Baghdād (654 = 1256), the hub f culture moved further East, and the writings of he Systematist School have to be sought as much n Persian as in Arabic Most of this literature as been preserved Kutb al-Dīn al-Shīrāzī (d 710 = 310) [q v], who devoted a valuable ḏjumla to the science of music" in his Durrat al Tāǧ (Brit Mus, MS Add 7694), was the first of these writers in ersian He was followed by Muhammad b Mahmūd l-ʿĀmulī (viiith = xivth century), whose Nafāʾis l-Funūn also has a section on music (Brit Mus, MS Add 16827) Another xivth century Persian ork deserving of mention is the Kanz al-Tuḥaf Brit Mus MS, Or 2361) More important were he four works of ʿAbd al-Kādir b Ghaibī (d 839 = 435) [q v], entitled the Ḏjāmiʿ al-Alḥān, with its wo epitomes the Makāṣid al-Alḥān and the Mukhtaṣar al-Alḥān (?) (Bodleian MSS, Marsh, N° 282, Ouseley, N° 264, 385), and the Sharḥ al Adwār a fifth work, the Kanz al-Alḥān, the most precious of ll since it contained noted music, has disappeared bn Ghaibī depends on al-Fārābī, Ibn Sīnā, and afī al-Dīn, but is by no means servile What he dds to our knowledge of the music of his day oncerns the practical art Both his son and his grandson were theorists, and their works still exist, the Nakāwat al-Adwār and the Makāṣid al-Adwār (Nūrī ʿUthmāniya Library, Nrs 3646, 3649) They were in the service of the Turkish sultāns, who were now patronising this class of savants, and we find two theorists, Ḫiḍr b ʿAbd Allāh and Ahmad Ughlū Shukrullāh, writing in Turkish, the latter translating the Kitāb al-Adwār of Safī al-Dīn (Lavignac, N° 2978) They were eclipsed, however, by two Arabic writers, the author (fl 855—886 = 1451—1481) of the Muhammad b Murād Treatise (Brit Mus, MS Or 2361), and Muhammad b Abd al-Hamīd al Lādiḳī (fl 886—918 = 1481—1512), the author of the Risālat al Fathīya (Brit Mus, MS Or 6629) Al Lādikī is the last writer to deal in an appreciable way with the speculative theory of music which had been suscitated by the Scholiasts (cf Kiesewetter, p 88) As for the author of the Muhammad b Murād Treatise, we have in him an able mathematician who places the Arithmāṭīkī of Nicomachus and Ibn Sīnā under contribution He is replete with argument and carefully examines the statements of his predecessors on questions of acoustics We find him saying that he had put certain theories to practical test and found them wanting He gives divisions of the string other than those laid down by Ṣafī al-Dīn

The contemporary encyclopædias also contain a section on music, the most notworthy being the Durr al-Nazīm (Vienna MS, NF, N° 4) or Irshād al-Ḳāṣid (Bibl Ind, 1849) of Muhammad b Ibrāhim al-Akfānī (d 749 = 1348), the Makālid al-ʿUlūm (Brit Mus, MS Or 3143) attributed to ʿAlī b Muhammad al Djurdjānī (d 816 = 1413), and the Unmūdhaḏ al-ʿUlūm (Vienna MS, N F, N° 7) of Muhammad Shāh Čelebī b Muhammad al Fanārī (d 839 = 1435) To al-Djurdjānī may also be ascribed the Sharḥ Mawlānā Mubārak Shāh, the most thorough and illuminating commentary on the theories of Ṣafī al-Dīn ʿAbd al Muʾmin, and the most strikingly original treatment of the physical and physiological rudiments of sound (Brit Mus, MS Or 2361) After the close of the ixth (xvth) century, treatises on the ʿilm al-mūsīḳī are rare Writers abound who profess to deal with it, but actually they are only concerned with the practical art If any ʿilm is displayed in these later books it is the ʿilm al-nuḏjūm, and authors fill their pages with astrological tables linking up the twelve buyūt of the heavens with the twelve makāmāt, and so forth Many treatises are written in verse, a form which, however much it may attract the pure adab lover, is scarcely suitable in dealing with a science The author of one of these however, Shams al-Dīn al Saidāwī al Dhahabī (or al-Dimashḳī), is worthy of attention by reason of his use of a stave for the purpose of a musical notation, a device which may be traced to the year 1200 at least (Bodleian MS, Marsh, N° 82, Paris Bibl Nat MS, Arabe, N° 2480) In the West, treatises on the theory of music are scarcer still Ibn Khaldūn (d 809 = 1406) [q v] gives a glimpse of what was taught under this heading in his day (Prol, ii 410), but actual works are rare A certain ʿAbd al Rahmān al Fāsī wrote a treatise in 1650 entitled the Kitāb al-Ḏjumūʿ fī ʿIlm al-Mūsīḳī wa 'l-Tubūʿ (Ahlwardt, Verz, N° 5521), but its author borrows his theory from older authorities (Farmer, An Old Moorish Lute Tutor, p 14)

The Modern School The chief feature of this school is the so called quarter tone system, and its most important theorist is Mīkhā'īl Mushāka (d 1888) [q v] The system was not invented or introduced by him as Parisot thought (Rapport, p 21) because Mushāḳa himself tells us that it existed before his day (M F O B, vi 52, 105) Nor can we say that the xixth century was the period of its origin (cf Lachmann, Grove's Dict of Music, iii 576) since we know that it was practised in the xviiith century as Baron de Tott (La Borde, i 436–439), Toderini (i 243) and Murat (Fétis, ii 363) have shown Nor can it be traced in a MS mentioned by Villoteau, as Land suggested (Recherches, p 77–78), because this work can be identified with a MS entitled al-Shadjara dhāt al Akmām (Brit Mus, MS Or 1535) in which there is no mention of the quarter-tone theory How did the system originate? Dr Lachmann holds that it was due to the needs of transposition (Grove's Dict of Music, iii 567) On the other hand, Collangettes avers that in actual practice (for the lute is no longer fretted) it is simply the Systematist scale to which several smaller intervals have been added (p 419) Some of the technical terms used in the system are of Persian origin such as those for the quarter tone, three quarter tone, and tone, nim ʿaraba, tik ʿaraba, and barda Further, as early as the xvth century, as we know from Ibn Ghaibī, Shihāb al Dīn al-ʿAdjamī, and the author of the Muhammad b Murād Treatise, intervals finer even than those of the Systematist School were being used in the newly adopted shuʿab or modal extensions, which were not used in the time of Safi al Dīn ʿAbd al Muʾmin, although they are part of the earlier (?) Persian system as reflected in the Bahdjat al-Rūh by ʿAbd al-Muʾmin b Safi al Dīn (Bodleian MS, Ouseley, N° 117) A Persian origin of the quarter-tone system is, therefore, not unlikely, although Mahmūd Rāghib, a well known writer on Turkish music, argues in favour of a Greek origin (see the Turkish journals Milli Madjmūʿ, May-Oct, 1927, and the Turkische Post, June and Aug, 1928) In the xviiith century we have evidence (La Borde, i 436) that the octave was divided into twenty-four equal parts of 50 cents each producing a scale comprising three major tones of 200 cents, each divided into four quarter tones, and four minor tones of 150 cents, each divided into three quarter-tones

TONES	Rast	Dūkāh	Sīkāh	Djahārkāh	Nawā	Husainī	Awdj	Māhūr
CENTS	200	150	150	200	200	150	150	Total	1200

Mushāka tells us that he was dissatisfied with the theorists of his day in regard to their division of the octave (cf Murat's division of the octave into 55 commas) There was certainly a difference so far as Egypt was concerned, since one theorist divided even the minor tones into four parts as well as the major tones, thus giving twenty-eight intervals to the octave (Muhammad b Ismāʿīl Shihāb al-Dīn) At any rate, Mushāka attempted to lay down a principle that would establish the quarter tone (rubʿ) system on a proper basis His method is by no means clear (Land, Recherches, p 75, Collangettes, p 417, 418), but Ellis (J S A, p 497) and Parisot (Mus orient, p 15—16) believe that he was aiming at a quarter-tone scale of equal temperament, twenty-four to the octave, which was actually the scale (see La Borde, i 436) that he found in use (cf Collangettes, p 419)

NOTES	Yakāh	ʿUshairān	ʿIrāk	Rast	Dūkāh	Sīkāh	Djahārkāh	Nawā
CENTS	0	200	350	500	700	850	1000	1200

This is the same scale as the preceding with the exception that the base has been given a lower note in the system, i e yakāh instead of rast The system of the quarter-tone scale is generally accepted to day throughout the Islāmic Near East (Collangettes, p 415), and even the Middle East (ʿAlī Nakī Khān Wazīri)

Although in the Maghrib very little is written about the theory of music nowadays, yet in Egypt, Syria, Persia, and Turkey, there is no lack of books on the subject, as the Bibliography will show, although many of the treatises are merely manuals for practitioners Even in Turkestān, under the auspices of the Soviet, works are being published During the last decade a great fillip has been given to the study of the theory of music by the establishment of conservatories of music in the great Oriental capitals and chief cities, notably the Dār al-Alhān at Constantinople and the Nādi 'l Mūsīkī al-Sharkī at Cairo

Bibliography General works quoted Kitāb al-Aghānī, Būlāk 1869, The twenty-first vol of the Aghānī, Leyden 1888, Casiri, Bibl Arab Hisp Escurialensis, Madrid 1760–1770, Hādjdjī Khalifa, ed Flugel, London 1835–1858, Ibn ʿAbd Rabbihi, ʿIkd al-farīd, Cairo 1887—1888, Ibn Abī Usaibiʿa, ʿUyūn al Anbāʾ, ed A Muller, Konigsberg 1882—1884, Ibn Khallikān, ed Wustenfeld, London 1843—1871, Ibn al Kifti, Taʾrīkh al Hukamāʾ, ed Lippert, Leipzig 1903, al Makkari, Analectes, Leyden 1855—1861, al Masʿūdī, Les prairies d'or, Paris 1861—1877, Steinschneider, al-Fārābī (Alpharabius), St Petersburg 1869, Ibn al Nadim, Fihrist, ed Flügel, Suter, Die Mathematiker u Astronomen der Araber (in Abh z Gesch d Math, x, xiv), Leipzig 1900—1902

Theoretical Treatises Mediæval Arabic Textes al-Akfānī, Irshād al-Kāsid, in Bibl Ind, 1849, Muhammad b Ahmad al-Khwārizmī, Mafātīh al-ʿUlūm, ed van Vloten, Leyden 1895, Ikhwān al-Safāʾ, Rasāʾil, Bombay 1887–9, Die Abhandlungen d Ichwān es Safā, ed Dieterici, Leipzig 1886, al-Fārābī, Min Kitāb al Mūsikī (Actes du VIème Cong Orient), Leyden 1884, Fasl al Mūsikī, in Ihsāʾ al-ʿUlūm (al Irfan, vi), Saida 1921, Muhammad b ʿAlī al-Irbilī, Djawāhir al-Nizām, in Mach, xiv, Ibn Khaldūn, Mukaddima, in N E, xvi, xvii, xviii, i, ii, iii, Paris 1858 — Modern Arabic Texts Muhammad b Ismāʿīl Shihāb al-Dīn, Safīnat al-Mulk, Cairo 1892, Ahmad Afandī al Safardjalānī, al Safīnat al-adabīya, Damascus 1891, ʿUthmān b Muhammad al-Djundī, Rawd al Masarrāt, Cairo 1895, Mīkhāʾīl Mushāka, Risālat al-Shihābiya fi 'l Sināʿat al mūsīkī, Beirūt 1899, and in M F O B, vi, 1913, Ahmad Afandī Amin al-Dīk, Nāʾil al Adab fi Mūsīkī Afiandi

wa 'l-ʿArab, Cairo 1902, Muhammad Kāmil al-Khulaʿī, al-Mūsīkī al-sharkī, Cairo 1904, Nāʾil al Amānī fī Dustūb al Aghānī, n d , Abū ʿAlī al-Ghawthī, Kashf al-Kināʿ, Algiers 1904, Darwīsh Muhammad, Safāʾ al Awkāt fī ʿIlm al Naghamāt, Cairo 1910, Tantāwī Djawharī, al Mūsīkī al-ʿarabīya, Cairo 1914 — Modern Persian Texts Muhammad Wadjīd ʿAlī, Ṣawt al-Mubārak, Lucknow 1853, Muhammad ʿUthmān Khan, Ṣawt al Nākūs, Lucknow 1874, ʿAlī Nakī Khān Wazīrī, Taʿlīmāt Mūsīkī, Berlin n d — Modern Turkish Texts Th Djamil, Rahber-i Mūsīkī, 1904, Fakhrī Bey, Nazarī we-ʿIlmī ʿŪd Derslarī, Raʾūf Yekta Bey, Sharḳ Mūsīkī Taʾrīkhī, Constantinople 1924, Turk Mūsīkī nazarīyate, Constantinople 1924, Fitrat, Uzbik kilāssik Mūsīkāsī, Tashkent 1927 See Borrel, Contribution à la bibliographie de la Musique turque au XXème siècle, in R E Isl, 1928 — Translations Dieterici, Die Propaedeutik der Araber [Ikhwān al-Safāʾ], Berlin 1865, Land, Recherches sur l'histoire de la gamme arabe [al-Fārābī] (Actes du VIème Congr Orient, 1883), Leyden 1884, Wiedemann, Über al Fārābīs Aufzahlung der Wissenschaften, De Scientiis, in S B P M S Erlg, xxxix, Erlangen 1907, do, Abschnitt uber die Musik aus Schlusseln der Wissenschaft [Mafātīh al-ʿUlūm], in S B P M S Erlg, liv, Erlangen 1922, do, Angaben von al Akfānī uber die Musik, in S B P M S Erlg, liv, Erlangen 1922, Djalāl al-Dīn Muhammad, Practical Philosophy of the Muhammadan People , transl by W F Thompson, London 1839, Carra de Vaux, Le traite des rapports musicaux par Safi ed-Dīn ʿAbd al Mumin, in J A, 1891, Mac Guckin de Slane, Prolegomenes hist d'Ebn Khaldoun, in N E, xix, xx, xxi, Rouzevalle, Un traite de Musique arabe moderne [Mushāka], in M F O B, 1913, E Smith, A Treatise on Arab Music [Mushāka], in J Am O S, i, R D'Erlanger, La musique arabe [al Fārābī], Paris 1930, Farmer, An Old Moorish Lute Tutor [Lisan al Dīn, etc], Glasgow 1933, do, al-Fārābī's Arabic Latin Writings on Music, London 1934, do, Ibn Khurdādhbih on musical Instruments, in J R A S, 1928, Lachmann, Gesellschaft z Erforschung der Musik des Orients, i [al-Kindī], Berlin 1931

General works on Arabian, Persian, and Turkish music theory Laborde, Essai sur la Musique ancienne et moderne, Paris 1780, Toderini, Letteratura Turchesca, Venice 1787, Villoteau, Description de l'Egypte, etat moderne, Paris 1809—1826, Kiesewetter, Die Musik der Araber, Leipzig 1842, Kosegarten, Alii Ispahanensis Liber cantilenarum magnus , 1840—1843, Soriano-Fuertes, Musica Arabe-Española , Barcelona 1853, do, Historia de la musica Española , Madrid 1855, Murat, Einiges uber die Musik der Orientalen, insonderheit uber das dominirende persisch-turkische Tonsystem (in Asthetische Rundschau, 1867), Vienna 1867, Fétis, Histoire generale de la Musique, Paris 1869–1876, Mendel, Musikalisches Conversations-Lexikon, Berlin 1870–1879 [All the afore mentioned must be used with caution, and reliance can only be placed on Kosegarten, and, in some respects, on Kiesewetter] — Caussin de Perceval, Notices sur les principaux musiciens arabes , in J A, 1873, Barbier de Meynard, Ibrāhīm fils de Mehdi, in J A, 1869, Land, Recherches sur l'hist de la gamme arabe (Actes du VIème Congr Inter Orient, 1883), Leyden 1884, do, Remarks on the earliest development of Arabic music (Trans ixth Congr Orient, 1892), London 1893, do, Essais de notation musicale chez les Arabes et les Persans, in Études dediés à Dr C Leemans, Leyden 1885, do, Tonschriftversuche u Melodieproben aus dem muhammedanischen Mittelalter, in Vierteljahrschrift f Musikwissenschaft, ii, Leipzig 1886, Rouanet, La musique arabe, in Lavignac's Encyclopedie de la musique, v, Paris 1913—1925, do, Les visages de la musique musulmane, in La revue musicale, Paris 1923, Von Hornbostel, Phonographierte tunesische Melodien, in S I M G, viii, Leipzig 1906, do, Musikalische Tonsysteme, in Handbuch der Physik, viii, Berlin 1927, Lachmann, Die Musik in den tunesischen Stadten, in Arch f Musikwissenschaft, v, 1923, do, Musik des Orients, Breslau 1929, Idelsohn, Die Maqamen der arabischen Musik, in S I M G, xv, Leipzig 1913, Bartok, Die Volksmusik der Araber von Biskra u Umgebung, in Zeitschr f Musikwiss, ii, Leipzig 1920, Parisot, Musique orientale, Paris 1898, do, Rapport sur une mission scientifique en Turquie d'Asie, Paris 1899, do, Rapport sur une mission scientifique en Turquie et Syrie, 1903, Dalman, Palastinischer Diwān, Leipzig 1901, Collangettes, Etude sur la musique arabe, in J A, 1904, 1906, Ronzevalle, op cit, Tripodo, Lo stato degli studii sulla Musica degli Arabi, Rome 1904, Mitjana, L'Orientalisme musical et la Musique arabe, in M O, i, Uppsala 1906, Helmholtz, On the Sensations of Tone , transl by A J Ellis, 3rd Eng ed, London 1895, Ellis, On the musical Scales of various Nations, in Journ Soc Arts, London 1885, Ribera, La musica de las Cantigas , Madrid 1922, do, Historia de la musica arabe medieval y su influencia en la Española, Madrid 1927, do, La musica andaluza medieval , Madrid 1923–1925, Ibrāhīm Bey Mustafā, La valeur des intervalles dans la Musique arabe, in B I E, ii, Cairo 1888, Raouf Yekta Bey, La Musique et les modes orientaux, in Revue musicale, Paris 1907, La Musique turque, in Lavignac's Encyclopedie de la Musique, v, Paris 1913–1925, Farmer, Hist of Arabian Music, London 1929, do, Arabic musical MSS in the Bodleian Library, 1925, do, Historical Facts for the Arabian Musical Influence, London 1930, do, The Organ of the Ancients from Eastern Sources , London 1931, do, Studies in Oriental musical Instruments, London 1931, do, Some musical MSS identified, in J R A S, London 1926, Uspensky, Klassicheskaya muzyka Uzbekov (Sovietsky Uzbekistan), Tashkent 1927, Uspensky and Belaiev, Turkmenskaya muzyka, Moscow 1928, Gairdner, The Source and Character of Oriental Music, in M W, vi, 1916, Chilesotti, Le scale arabo-persiana e indu, in S I M G, iii, Leipzig 1902, Fleischer, Review of Land's Recherches gamme arabe, in Viert f Musikwissenschaft, ii, Leipzig 1886, Stumpf, Review of Ellis' On the musical Scales of various Nations, in Viert f Musikwissenschaft, ii, Leipzig 1886

(H G FARMER)

MUSLIM (A), part IV of s-l-m, denotes the adherent of Islām [q v] The term has become current in some European languages (also in the forms moslim, moslem), as a noun or as an adjective or as both, side by side with Muhammadan (in different forms) It has replaced Musulman (in different forms), except in French, where the latter term is used as a noun and as an adjective The origin of musulman is probably muslim with the ending ān of the adjective in Persian In some countries, e g Germany and the Netherlands, popular etymology has taken man for the vernacular "Mann, man", whence the plural forms Muselmänner, muzelmannen etc These forms have, however, become antiquated — In Arabic literature the term Muslim is and has always been used to denote the adherents of Islām See further the artt IMĀN, AMĪR AL MUSLIMĪN

Bibliography H Yule and A C Burnell, Hobson-Jobson, s v Mussulman, H Lammens, Remarques sur les mots français derives de l'arabe, Beyrouth 1890, p 176, E Littmann, Morgenländische Worter im Deutschen, 2nd ed, Tubingen 1924, p 61 sq, R Dozy, Oosterlingen, 's-Gravenhage–Leyden–Arnhem 1867, p 44

(A J WENSINCK)

MUSLIM B ʿAKĪL, cousin of Husain b ʿAlī The latter, taking refuge in Mecca after the death of Muʿāwiya I, sent him to study the situation in Kūfa where the partisans of ʿAlī were inviting him to come and proclaim himself caliph Muslim there received promise of support from thousands of Shiʿīs He wrote to Husain imploring him to hasten there and take command of the movement in person In the meanwhile, the energetic ʿUbaid Allāh b Ziyād had replaced the irresolute Nuʿmān b Bashir [q v] Realising the seriousness of this change Muslim took refuge with Hānīʾ b ʿUrwa [q v] A stratagem devised by the new governor soon revealed his hiding place Hānīʾ having been captured, Muslim, abandoned by all his followers, wandered from one place of concealment to another The descendants of Ashʿath b Kais [q v] revealed the secret of his last hiding place — a deed which earned the family the hatred of the Shiʿa The unfortunate ʿAlid when discovered surrendered without resistance to the minions of ʿUbaid Allāh His head was sent to the caliph Yazīd I

Bibliography Tabarī, ed de Goeje, ii 227—229, 231—272, 281, 284—286, 292—294 For other references see the writer's Califat de Yazid, i 136—145 (in MFOB, v)

(H LAMMENS)

MUSLIM B AL-HADJDJĀDJ ABU 'L-HUSAIN AL-KUSHAIRĪ AL-NĪSĀBŪRĪ was born at Nisābūr in 202 (817) or in 206 (821) He died in 261 (875) and was buried at Nasrābād, a suburb of Nīsābūr An anecdote regarding the cause of his death is related by Ibn Hadjar (see Bibliography) His fame is based upon his Sahīh, which, along with Bukhārī's book of the same name, enjoys the highest fame among the collections of traditions

Muslim travelled widely to collect traditions, in Arabia, Egypt, Syria and ʿIrāk, where he heard famous authorities such as Ahmad b Hanbal, Harmala, a pupil of Shāfiʿī, and Ishāk b Rāhūya His Sahīh is said to have been composed out of 300,000 traditions collected by himself He wrote a large number of other books, on fikh, traditionists and biography, none of which seems to have survived

The Sahīh differs from the other collections of canonical hadīth in that the books are not subdivided into chapters, whereas in Bukhārī's work the traditions act as examples of the tardjama's Still, it is not difficult to trace in the order of the traditions in Muslim's Sahīh a close connection with corresponding ideas of fikh As a matter of fact the groups of traditions have been provided with superscriptions which may be compared with Bukhārī's tardjama's, this was not, however, done by Muslim himself, as appears from the fact that the headings are not uniform in the different editions of the Sahīh

A second difference between Muslim and the other collections consists in the fact that he pays peculiar attention to the isnād's, to such an extent that a tradition in his work is often followed by several different isnād's which serve as an introduction to either the same or to a slightly different matn Such a new isnād is indicated in the text by ~ (tahwil or hawāla "change") Muslim is praised for his accuracy regarding this point, in other respects, however, Bukhārī is superior to him, as is even recognised by a man so devoted to him as al Nawawī, who wrote upon the Sahīh a commentary, which in itself is a work of immense value for our knowledge of Muslim theology and fikh

Muslim has prefixed to his work an introduction to the science of tradition The work itself consists of 52 books which deal with the common subjects of hadīth the five pillars, marriage, slavery, barter, hereditary law, war, sacrifice, manners and customs, the Prophets and the Companions, predestination and other theological and eschatological subjects The book closes with a chapter on the Kurʾān (Tafsīr), the shortness of which is several times outweighed by the value of the Kitāb al-Īmān, which opens the work, and which is a complete survey of the early theology of Islām

On the commentaries upon the Sahīh see Brockelmann, GAL, i 160, to which may be added ʿAlī b Sulaimān al Maghribī, Washy al-Dibādj ʿalā Sahih Muslim b al Hadjdjādj, Cairo 1298

Bibliography Brockelmann, GAL, i 160 sq, al-Nawawī, Tahdhīb, ed Wustenfeld, p 548 sq, Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt al-Aʿyān, ed Wustenfeld, N° 727, 19,153, Ibn Hadjar al-ʿAskalānī, Tahdhīb al-Tahdhīb, Haidarābād 1327, x 126—128, Hādjdjī Khalīfa, ed Flugel, Index auctorum, s v Abú 'lhosein Moslim Ben Hajjáj, Noldeke-Schwally, Geschichte des Qorāns, ii 149 sq, Goldziher, Muh Studien, ii 245 sqq, J E Sarkīs, Muʿdjam al-Matbūʿāt al-ʿarabiya wa 'l muʿarraba, Cairo 1346 (1924), col 1746

(A J WENSINCK)

MUSLIM B ḲURAISH SHARAF AL DAWLA ABU 'L-MAKĀRIM of the Arab family of the ʿUḳailids [see ʿOKAILIDS] was the most important ruler of the last great Arab dynasty in the Nearer East, during his reign the struggle between Fāṭimids and ʿAbbāsids for supremacy in Syria and Mesopotamia was decided in favour of the latter In the year 433 (1042) the 20 year old Muslim was chosen chief of the tribe after the death of his father Kuraish b Badrān and succeeded him as ruler of Mōsul Like most Arab rulers of the lands of the Euphrates he recognised the Fāṭimid caliph in Cairo as his suzerain partly because he was himself a Shiʿī Quite early in his reign he began to cherish the ambitious plan of gradually extending the rule of his tribe over Mesopotamia Every means of extending his power was taken by him The first opportunity occurred

when in 458 (1066) the Saldjūḳ Sulṭān Alp Arslān [q v] after conquering the Khwārizmians was proceeding to establish his supremacy in Syria For this he had to entice the Arab chiefs from the sphere of influence of the Fāṭimid caliph and win them over to an alliance with him and to a recognition of the ʿAbbāsid caliph He therefore concluded an alliance with Muslim and granted him several towns in Mesopotamia As a partner in this alliance Muslim defeated the Banū Kilāb who were vassals of the Fāṭimids In 463 (1070) Alp Arslān died The alliance was renewed with his son Sultān Malik Shāh [q v] With his help Muslim was able a few years later to extend his power into Syria and take Aleppo In 472 (1079) this town had no strong owner, the town was ruled by the Kādī al-Khuta'ītī, and the citadel by one of the last Mirdāsids [cf the article HALAB] There was a lack of provisions, as the town was continually threatened by enemies and the roads to it were cut off

Damascus was in possession of Sultān Tutush [q v], to whom his brother Malik Shāh had granted Syria, which was still to be conquered It was natural for Tutush to wish to bring Aleppo also into his power but the people did not care for him because of his cruelty and greed, shut their gates against him and appealed for help to Muslim After Tutush had withdrawn, Muslim approached the town with large supplies of provisions and after lengthy negotiations both town and citadel were handed over to him [see HALAB] and the Mirdāsid chiefs received some smaller towns in compensation He received a grant of confirmation from Malik Shāh who did not want his brother to become too powerful, on paying a considerable annual tribute (£ 150,000) Muslim extended his territory by adding to it Ruhā (Edessa), Harrān and a number of smaller fortresses, out of which he drove the leaders of Turkish bands so that his power stretched from Northern Syria to the Euphrates Instead of being content with this his unbounded ambition made him overestimate his strength Like Tutush he had dreams of conquering all Syria, especially Damascus He could not obtain the town from Malik Shāh who had granted Central Syria to Tutush He therefore again joined forces with the enemy of the Saldjūks, the Fāṭimid caliph, who promised to send troops to assist him to take Damascus Muslim took advantage of the absence of Tutush who was engaged in a campaign against the Byzantines in Antioch, to advance on Damascus He occupied several towns in Central Syria, including Baalbek [q v] But the Fāṭimid help did not materialise and Tutush was called back by his vassals who hated Muslim These circumstances and a rising in Harrān forced him to retire To replace Muslim who had deserted him, Malik Shāh bestowed his favour on the sons of a former vizier of the ʿAbbāsids, Ibn Djahīr, and sent them against a supporter of the Fāṭimids, the Marwānid Mansūr, to deprive him of his chief possession Āmid The latter found support from Muslim They joined forces, were attacked at Āmid and withdrew into the fortified town leaving their other possessions undefended Sultān Malik Shāh seized the opportunity to send ʿĀmid al-Dawla, another son of Djahīr, to Mōsul, to take this city from Muslim who had in the meanwhile escaped from Āmid When Muslim saw that he had lost his possessions he made overtures to the Sulṭān through the son of the vizier Nizām al-Mulk and humbly begged for mercy The Sultān, who thought Muslim no longer dangerous, pardoned him and restored his lands to him but Muslim could not be at peace Perhaps in secret agreement with Malik Shāh, he turned in 477 (1084) against a Saldjūk prince of Asia Minor, Sulaimān b Kuṭulmish, who had taken Antioch from the Byzantines and demanded from him the same tribute as the Byzantines had paid When Sulaimān refused to pay, he advanced against him with a force of Arabs and Turkomans In the neighbourhood of Antioch in Ṣafar 478 (May 1085) the forces met, unexpectedly for Sharaf al Dawla, his troops, who hated Muslim, went over to Sulaimān Muslim was defeated and slain along with 400 of his Arabs (cf Ibn al-ʿAdīm, fol 68b) With his death the power of the ʿUkailids was at an end They lost Aleppo on Muslim's death and only survived a few years longer (till 489 = 1090) as governors of Mōsul [see ʿOKAILIDS] Muslim is described as an able and just man and his tolerance of Christians was remarkable His rule is said to have been able and orderly and indeed he did bring the finances of Aleppo into order in a very short time after taking it In any case he had wide vision and successfully endeavoured to maintain the power of the Arab tribes in Syria and Mesopotamia It ceased with him, Turkish generals became the rulers of Syria and Mesopotamia

Bibliography Ibn al Athīr, al Kāmil, index, E v Zambaur, Manuel de genealogie, index, s v (M SOBERNHEIM)

MUSLIM B ʿUKBA of the tribe of the Banū Murra, a famous leader in the armies of the Sufyānid caliphs We know very little about the early stages of his career We find him early established in Syria to which he probably came with the first conquerors Completely devoted to the Umaiyads and of great personal valour, he led a division of Syrian infantry at the battle of Siffīn But he failed in an attempt to take the oasis of Dūmat al-Djandal [q v] from ʿAlī The caliph Muʿāwiya appointed him to take charge of the kharādj, the finances, of Palestine, a lucrative office in which he refused to enrich himself Muslim was prominent at the death-bed of Muʿāwiya The caliph had charged him and Dahhāk b Ḳais [q v] with the regency until the return of Yazīd who was in Anatolia at the head of his troops The confidence which the great Sufyānid had in his loyalty is seen in his advice to his heir "If you ever have trouble with the Ḥidjāz, just send the one eyed man of the tribe of Murra there" (Muslim had only one eye) This time had now come

Muslim had been a member of the embassy sent to Medīna to bring the Ansār back to obedience All other efforts at conciliation having failed, Yazīd I decided to resort to force In spite of Muslim's age and infirmities, Yazīd felt he was the man to command the expedition He was obliged to travel in a litter so infirm was he At Wādi 'l Kurā, Muslim met some Umaiyads who had been driven out of Medīna, these exiles informed him of the military situation of the town When he reached the oasis of Medīna, Muslim encamped on the ḥarra of Wākim and for three days awaited the result of the negotiations begun with the rebels, Ansār and descendants of the muhādjirun of the Kuraish On the fourth day, all overtures

having been rejected, he made his plans for battle It was a Wednesday, the third last day of Dhu 'l Hidjdja 63 (Aug 26 27, 683) After a slight initial advantage for the Ansār, the battle ended at midday in the complete rout of the rebels The Syrians followed them into Medina and began to plunder the city Anti-Umaiyad legend has much exaggerated the horrors and the duration of this pillaging which it extends to three days On the day after the battle, Muslim's intervention restored order and he used the next few days in drawing up the case against and trying the principal leaders of the rebellion who had fallen into his power

Having established order in the town, which he left in charge of Rawh b Zinbāʿ, in spite of the aggravation of his malady, he resumed his march on Mecca to deal with ʿAbd Allāh b al-Zubair [q v] who had rebelled against the Umaiyads Arriving at Mushallal [q v] he became so ill that he had to stop In obedience to the caliph Yazīd's instructions, he appointed to succeed him in command of the army Husain b al-Numair [q v], his second in command He died at Mushallal, where his tomb long-continued to be stoned by the passers-by Writers with Shiʿa sympathies are fond of twisting the name Muslim into Musrif (criminal an allusion to Kurʾān, v 36, vii 79, xl 29, 36 and passim) One statement which must be a ridiculous exaggeration puts his age at 90 Every thing, however, points to his having been born before the Hidjra He died a poor man This disinterestedness is not the only feature in his character which makes us take him as one of the most representative of the types of this generation of soldiers and statesmen, whose talents contributed so much to establish the power of the Umaiyads Dozy described him as "un Bedouin mécréant" Muslim, it is true, retained all the proverbial uncouthness (djafāʾ) of the Banū Murra But his whole career reveals the Murrī general as a convinced Muslim of a rectitude rare in this period of unsettlement, which saw so many extraordinary vicissitudes of fortune and wavering loyalties

Bibliography Tabarī, ed de Goeje, i 3283, ii 198, 409—425, 427 Other references are given in the writer's Califat de Yazīd Ier, p 223 sqq, reprint from MFOB, v 225 sqq and in his Etude sur le regne du calife omaiyade Moʿāwia Ier, in MFOB, i sqq, p 19, 45, 269, 373 (H LAMMENS)

MUSLIM B AL-WALĪD AL-ANSĀRĪ (called Sarīʿ al-Ghawānī = "he who is laid low by the fair ones", as was al-Kutāmī [q v] before him), an Arab poet of the early ʿAbbāsid period, born in Kūfa c 130—140 (747—757), d 208 (823) in Djurdjān His father, a mawlā [q v] of the Ansār [q v], was a weaver Nothing is known of the poet's education He probably got his literary training not from particular teachers or from books but in the busy life of the Mesopotamian cities, the intellectual life of which had risen to a still higher level with the advent of the ʿAbbāsids Like most of his contemporaries he earned his living as a poet by writing panegyrics and was acquainted with many statesmen and emīrs Among the former were the general Yazīd b Mazyad al-Shaibānī (see Dīwān, N° 1, 6, 10, 16, 49), Dāwūd b Yazīd al-Muhallabī (N° 20), Mansūr b Yazīd al-Himyarī (N° 31) and many others He gradually won the favour of the influential Barmakids (cf N° 17, 40, 45) and of the caliph Hārūn al-Rashīd (N° 14, 41, 57), according to one story, he received his nickname from the latter on account of a verse of his (N° 3, 35, cf also N° 23, 39) He even mentions the caliph's sister ʿAbbāsa in an ode (N° 57, 10) The fall of the Barmakids about 187 (803) did not affect his career he dedicated some of his odes to al-Amīn (N° 7, 28, 30) but his principal patron in later times was al-Maʾmūn's vizier Fadl b Sahl [q v] Through his intervention he received from al-Maʾmūn an official post (probably sāhib al-barīd) in Djurdjān He remained faithful to Fadl b Sahl until his death in 202 (818), and out of grief for him he wrote no more There is a story told by his rāwī according to which he destroyed a considerable part of his poems before his death

As regards the matter and style of his poems he was on quite traditional ground In addition to his old-fashioned odes and elegies his satires are particularly interesting in this respect, in his polemics with the (otherwise little known) poet Ibn al-Kanbar on the merits of the Ansār and Kuraish he revived the coarse and bitter tone of the polemics of an al Farazdak [q v] or an al-Tirimmāh [q v] on a similar subject The two hundred years of development of Arabic poetry were naturally not without influence on him, in his nasībs we frequently find the style of an ʿUmar b Abi Rabiʿa or al-ʿAbbās b al-Ahnaf [see IBN AL-AHNAF], Muslim's contemporaries His drinking songs deserve special mention Although Noldeke only very rarely finds in them "the natural effusion of Bacchantic joy as so frequently in Abū Nuwās [q v]", Arab critics are of another opinion These two poets are to them practically the same in this respect and we must confess they are right His drinking-songs are not only of great value for the descriptions of society and social life in the cities but from the point of view of poetry they are among the best of Muslim's work If we must, as regards subject matter, number Muslim among the imitators of the old poets, in style he belongs to a more modern period The historians of Arabic literature frequently mention him as the first to introduce the "new style", al badīʿ, with its tropes and figures This is however not quite such a simple point, the "new style" arose only gradually in Arabic poetry, although Muslim with his contemporaries, Bashshār b Burd [q v], Abū Nuwās etc, was one of the first who definitely struck out on the new path The younger generation, especially Abū Tammām [q v], drove this new style to banality

Muslim was on terms of friendship or enmity with many contemporary poets, e g Abū Nuwās, Abu 'l-ʿAtāhiya [q v], al ʿAbbās b al-Ahnaf (who maliciously called him Sarīʿ al Ghīlān or Sarīʿ al-Kās, cf Dīwān, N° 44), Abu 'l Shīs [q v], al-Husain al Khalīʿ etc His literary influence was not inconsiderable Diʿbil [q v] was his pupil (which did not prevent him exchanging satires with Muslim), Abū Tammām was particularly fond of studying his poems His Dīwān has been transmitted in very unsatisfactory fashion, it was collected in alphabetical order by al-Sūlī [q v] but this edition has not come down to us (there are a few traces of it in the Kitāb al-Aghānī), another story speaks of the collection made by the philologist al Mubarrad The only known European manuscript (Leyden)

on which de Goeje's edition is based, contains only a portion of his poems (including a few spurious, see Barbier de Meynard, op cit, p 17 sq), it represent an unknown edition and is of little importance for the criticism of the text

Bibliography Diwan Poetae Abu-'l-Walid Moslim ibno-'l-Walid al-Ançâri cognomine Çario 'l-ghawani, ed de Goeje, Leyden 1875 (unfortunately without an index of rhymes), the Cairo edition of 1325 (Matbaʿat Madrasat Wāliddat ʿAbbās al Awwal, 8°, p 97) although called al-Tabʿa al ūlā, repeats de Goeje's text in an alphabetical arrangement, the Bombay lithograph of 1303 (1886) is not accessible to me (see Rescher, op cit, it claims to give a better text than the Leyden edition, see Sarkis, op cit) Most of the sources are given by de Goeje in his edition (p 228—310), the most important is of course the Kitāb al-Aghānī (p 228—271) Of others we may note Ibn Kutaiba, Kitāb al-Shiʿr, ed de Goeje, p 528—535, passim (s index), Ibn al Muʿtazz, Tabakāt al-Shuʿarāʾ al-muhdathīn (MS Escurial, N° 279), fol 15r—15v, al Marzubānī, al Muwashshah, Cairo 1343 (al-Matbaʿa al-salafīya), s index — Modern literature Th Noldeke, review of de Goeje's edition, in G G A, June 9, 1875, p 705—715, Brockelmann, G A L, i 77, N° 7 (with misprint in date of death 803 for 823), M Barbier de Meynard, Un poete arabe du IIème siecle de l'hegire (Actes du XIeme Congres des Orientalistes, section iv, Paris 1899, p 1—21), Cl Huart, *Litterature arabe*², Paris 1912, p 72—74 (with the same error as in Brockelmann), Djirdjī Zaidān, Taʾrīkh Ādāb al Lugha al-ʿarabīya, ii, Cairo 1912, p 66, A F Rifāʿī, ʿAṣr al-Maʾmūn, ii, Cairo 1927, p 374—392, J E Sarkis, Dictionnaire encyclopedique de bibliographie arabe, Cairo 1930, col 1746—1747, O Rescher, Abriss der arabischen Litteraturgeschichte, Lieferung IV, Stambul 1929, p 12—15

(Ign Kratschkowsky)

MUSNAD [See Hadīth, iv]

AL-MUSTADĪ' BI-AMR' 'LLĀH, Abū Muhammad al-Hasan, ʿAbbāsid caliph, born on 23rd Shaʿbān 536 (March 23, 1142), son of al-Mustandjid and an Armenian slave named Ghadda After his father's death on 9th Rabiʿ II 566 (Dec 20, 1170) al Mustadī' succeeded him and at the beginning of the following year was formally recognised as caliph in Egypt also, which passed into the hands of the Ayyūbids at this time [see the article Fāṭimids, ii 96] The assassins of al Mustandjid soon quarrelled among themselves ʿAdud al-Dīn [q v] whom al-Mustadī' had been forced to make vizier was dismissed by 567 (1171—1172) at the instigation of the emīr Kaimaz In Dhu 'l-Kaʿda 570 (May 1175) the latter was about to attack the treasurer Zāhir al-Dīn b al-ʿAttār, but the latter fled to the caliph whereupon Kaimaz began to besiege the palace of the latter Al-Mustadī' appealed to the people to help him, the house of Kaimaz was pillaged and he himself fled but died soon afterwards and ʿAdūd al-Dīn again became vizier Al-Mustandjid already had quarrelled with Shimla, lord of Khūzistān In 569 (1173—1174) a war broke out between the latter's nephew Ibn Shankā and al-Mustadī', Ibn Shankā was soon taken prisoner and put to death The insignificant al-Mustadī' died on the 2nd Dhu 'l Kaʿda or, according to another statement, at the end of Shawwāl 575 (end of March 1180)

Bibliography Ibn al-Athīr, ed Tornberg, xi 237 sqq, Ibn al Tiktakā, al Fakhrī, ed Derenbourg, p 428—433, Muhammad b Shākir, Fawāt al Wafayāt, i 137 sq, Ibn Khaldūn, al-ʿIbar, iii 525 sqq, Hamd Allāh Mustawfī-i Kazwīnī, Taʾrīkh i Guzīda, ed Browne, i 367—369, Weil, Gesch d Chalifen, iii 337—363, Houtsma, Recueil de textes relatifs à l'histoire des Seldjoucides, ii 304, I e Strange, Baghdad during the Abbasid Caliphate, p 87, 195, 260, 280 (K V Zetersteen)

MUSTADJĀB KHĀN BAHĀDUR (NAWĀB), thirteenth son of the celebrated Rohilla leader Hāfiz al Mulk Hāfiz Rahmat Khān (1707—1774) and author of a biography of his father, which he wrote in Persian under the title Gulistān-i Rahmat Hāfiz Rahmat Khān, who was an Afghān of the tribe of Yūsuf-zāi by descent, had been since 1748 a chief in Rohilkhand (Katehr) and throughout his life waged a bitter warfare with the Mahrātās He fell in 1774 in a fight at Mīrānpūr Katra where he was fighting against the combined forces of the Nawāb of Oudh Shudjāʿ al Mulk and the English Warren Hastings' act in supporting the Nawāb with English troops became the subject of a judicial investigation Mustadjāb Khān's book describes Hāfiz Rahmat Khān as a fine representative of Afghān chivalry and contains much of value for studying the relations between the individual Afghān tribes

Bibliography I do not know of any edition of the original text of the Gulistān-i Rahmat There is an abbreviated English translation by Ch Elliott, The Life of Hafiz oolmoolk, Hafiz Rehmut Khan, written by his son the Nuwob Moostʿujab Khan Buhadoor and entitled Goolistan-i Rehmut, London 1831, H Hamilton, *The East-India Gazetteer*², London 1828, ii 468, Imperial Gazetteer of India, London 1908, xx 138 and xxi 307 sq

(E Berthels)

MUSṬAFĀ I, the fifteenth Ottoman Sultān, was born in the year 1000 (1591) as son of Muhammad III He owed his life to the relaxation of the kānūn authorising the killing of all the brothers of a new sultān and was called to succeed his brother Ahmad I at the latter's death on November 22, 1617 But his weakmindedness — which is said to have him made escape death on account of superstitious fear of Ahmad — made him absolutely incapable of ruling Ahmad's son ʿOthmān, who felt himself entitled to the succession, had little difficulty in procuring Mustafā's deposition in a meeting of the Imperial Dīwān, by the khizlar agha, the muftī and the kāʾimmakām, the grand vizier Khalīl Pasha [q v] being absent This happened on February 26, 1618

Unexpectedly Mustafā I was again called to the throne when, on May 19, 1622, the rebellion of the Janissaries broke out against ʿOthmān II He was taken by force from his seclusion in the haiem and the Janissaries forced the ʿulamāʾ to acknowledge him as sultān The next day ʿOthmān was killed and until June the grand vizier Dāwūd Pasha, the man responsible for the murder, remained in power Then he was deposed by the wālide The real masters were the Janissaries and Sipāhī's, several grand vizieis were nominated and deposed again at their pleasure The Sipāhī party began, after some time, to exact vengeance for ʿOthmān and in January 1623, when Gurdjī Muhammad Pasha [q v] was grand-vizier, Dāwūd Pasha was killed Soon the Janissary party came again to influence under the grand-vizier Mere Husain Pasha (Feb 3) The latter succeeded in maintaining himself until August 20, then the general feeling amongst the ʿulamāʾ and the people, combined with the steadily growing opposition in the provinces against the tyranny of the militiar in the capital, as manifested by the action of Saif al-Dīn Oghlu in Tripolis and still more by the revolt of Abāza Pasha [q v] in Erzerūm, brought about Mere Husain's deposition The new grand-vizier, Kemānkesh ʿAlī Pasha, together with the muftī, deposed the sultān on Sept 10, 1623 and called Ahmad's son Murād to the throne

During all his reign Muṣṭafā had continued to give signs of his complete mental aberration, he died in 1638 and was buried in the Aya Sofia The only important international act that took place during his reign was the peace concluded with Poland in February 1623

Bibliography The Turkish sources for this period are the historical works of Naʿīmā, Hādjdjī Khalīfa (Fedhleke), Pečewī, Hasan Bey Zāde and Tūghī Contemporaneous reports in in the Memoirs of the English envoy Sir Thomas Roe Further the general historical works of von Hammer, Zinkeisen and Jorga

(J H KRAMERS)

MUṢṬAFĀ II, the twenty second Ottoman sultān, was a son of Muhammad IV Born in 1664, he succeeded to his uncle Ahmad II on February 6, 1695, at a time when the empire was at war with Austria, Poland, Russia und Venice The new sultān in a remarkable khatt-i sherīf proclaimed a Holy War and carried out, against the decision of the Dīwān, his desire to take part in the campaign against Austria Before his departure a mutiny of the Janissaries had cost the grand vizier Defterdār ʿAlī Pasha his life (April 24, 1693) and the campaign was led by the new grand vizier Elmās Muhammad Pasha [q v] The Turkish army operated not without success in the region of Temesvár, taking Lippa, Lugos and Sebes The Venetians had been beaten in February near Chios and were beaten again in September In October Azof was delivered from the Russian siege Next year the sultān and his army were again successful in raising the siege of Temesvár, but no part of the lost territory could be recovered from the Austrians That year, however, the Russians took Azof The campaign of 1696 is memorable for the heavy defeat inflicted on the Turks near Zenta on the Theiss (Sept 11), where Elmās Muhammad lost his life, while the sultān, who had already crossed the river, had to fly to Temesvár The imperial seal fell into the hands of the Austrians From Temesvár Mustafā nominated ʿAmūdja Zāde Husain [q v], of the Koprülu family, his grand vizier Under this very able statesman peace was at last concluded In 1698 the grand vizier went to the frontier, while the sultān stayed at Adrianople, but the peace negotiations were pursued more earnestly than the war In October of that year began the peace negotiations at Karlowitz (Turk Karlofča, see CARLOWITZ) on the Danube, where on February 26, 1699 peace was concluded with Austria, Poland and Venice With Russia only an armistice was concluded to be followed in 1700 by a definite peace The English and Dutch ministers took part in the negotiations as intermediaries The peace treaty meant the loss of Hungary and Transylvania, with the exception of the district of Temesvar, Poland recovered Kamenicz, while Venice had to cede Lepanto and some other towns in Morea With Russia the Dniestr became the frontier

The peace enabled the grand vizier to bring order into the affairs of state, which had suffered by the long and disastrous war The Reʾīs Efendi Rāmī and the muftī Feizullāh, who had great influence with the sultān, were his collaborators Some interior troubles were easily appeased, only in 1701 a campaign in ʿIrāk was needed to take Basra from the hands of a local party that had submitted to Persia Fortresses were put in a better state of defence and a new Kānūn-nāme was issued for the fleet Husain Pasha resigned his offices in Sept 1702 and died soon afterwards His deposition was partly the work of the muftī Feizullāh, who made the sultān appoint in his place Daltaban Muhammad Pasha When the latter showed himself of too warlike a disposition and caused at the same time unrest in the capital by favouring the claims of the Tatar Khān, the influence of the muftī caused his deposition and execution (Jan 1703) Rāmī [q v] became grand-vizier Rāmī's measures to enforce the authority of the central government were salutary but made him many enemies, moreover the Janissaries were not contented with a grand-vizier who was not a military man The general unrest was increased by the permanent residence of sultān Mustafā in Adrianople All these circumstances brought about in July 1703 a Janissary revolt in Constantinople, directed at first against Rāmī Pasha and against the muftī The latter's deposition was obtained without much difficulty, but the rebellion continued under the leadership and organisation of a certain Hasan Agha A deputation of the rebels to Adrianople was imprisoned and treated in an insolent way Too late the sultān promised to come himself to Constantinople, the ʿulamāʾ were constrained to give a fatwā authorising the sultān's deposition In August 1703 a rebel army went on its way to Adrianople, after having agreed on Mustafā's brother Ahmad as successor to the throne When Mustafā saw himself at last abandoned by his own Janissaries he resigned on August 21 He died soon afterwards on Dec 31, 1703 and was buried in the Aya Sofia He is rightly considered as a wise and good ruler, as is proved by his careful choice of able statesmen He wrote poems under the takhallus of Meftūnī and Ikbālī Under him the imperial tughra appeared for the first time on the Ottoman coins

Bibliography The chief source is the Taʾrīkh of Rāshid, besides an anonymous historical work, used by von Hammer and only mentioned in a note by Babinger, G O W, p 247 and 248 Useful information also in the history of the Crimea by Mehmed Girāy (G O W, p 235) and Saiyid Mehmed Ridā (G O W, p 281) The Inshāʾ of the grand-vizier Rāmī Pasha (not mentioned in G O W) has importance as containing contemporary documents Further the general histories of von Hammer, Zinkeisen and Jorga

(J H KRAMERS)

MUṢṬAFĀ III, the twenty-sixth ruler of the Ottoman Empire, was one of the younger sons of Ahmad III and was born on Safar 14, 1129 = January 28, 1717 (Sidjill-i ʿoṯhmānī, i 80) When he succeeded to the throne, after ʿOṯhmān III's death on October 30, 1757, his much more popular brother and heir to the throne, Muhammad, had recently died, in December 1756 Turkey enjoyed at that time, since the peace of Belgrad of 1739, a period of peace with her neighbours Since December 1756 the very able Rāghib Pasha [q v] was grand vizier and remained the real administrator of the empire until his death in 1763 Rāghib had removed from the capital all those who might have counteracted his influence, taking at the same time wise financial measures and endeavouring to keep the military forces in good condition The sulṭān meanwhile, who was of a vivid and active temperament, busied himself, like his predecessor, with regulations concerning the clothes of his non-Muslim subjects and the appearance in public of Muhammadan women, at this time there was also taken up again the never realized plan of linking the gulf of Iznik with the Black Sea [see SABANDJA] The Seven Years' War in Europe (1756—1763) had not remained without influence on the policy of the Porte, after long hesitation Turkey agreed at last to conclude a treaty of friendship with Prussia (March 29, 1761) Rāghib himself was inclined to conclude even an alliance, but the sultān and the influential ʿulamāʾ were peacefully minded

After Rāghib's death Mustafā began to reign himself and different grand viziers succeeded one another at short intervals From 1765 to 1768 the grand vizierate was held by Muhsin Zāde Muhammad Pasha, under whom the disastrous war with Russia broke out Difficulties with Russia had already commenced in 1762, when Russia had supported the ruler of Georgia against the Turkish Pasha of Akhiskha (Čaldīr), here, as well as in Montenegro, Russian emissaries worked in secret against the Turkish rule Moreover the Khān of the Crimea repeatedly complained about Russian military measures on his northern frontier, while the party of the Confederates in Poland urgently appealed for the intervention of the Porte against the aggression of Catherine's government on Polish liberty In these circumstances the Porte had no more interest in seeking the alliance of Prussia, where, in 1764, Ahmad Rasmī Efendi had gone as envoy, of which embassy he afterwards wrote his well known Sefāret nāme The sultān himself was decidedly anti-Russian, but the diplomacy of the Russian minister Obreskoff and the pacifism of the ʿulamāʾ delayed the war, until, in August 1768, Mustafā obtained from the then muftī Walī al-Dīn a fatwā authorizing the war with Russia War was declared only on October 6, after the dismissal of the grand vizier Muhsin Zāde, who had advised delay until the spring Obreskoff was imprisoned in Yedi Kule

The war began in January with destructive raids of the Crimean Tatars in southern Russia under their newly appointed Khān Kirīm Girāy, at that time de Tott was an eye witness with the Tatar army In March 1769 the then grand-vizier Muhammad Emīn Pasha left Constantinople with the Holy Banner, on this occasion there was an outburst of Muhammadan fanaticism against the Austrian internuntio and his party, who had come to witness the procession While the grand vizier went to the Dobruča, the Russians made an attack on Chotin (Turk Khočin), which they were able to take only in August In the meantime the grand vizier had been deposed and executed, his place was taken by Moldowandji ʿAlī Pasha, who had encounters with the Russians on both sides of the Dniestr Other Russian armies took Jassy and Bucarest and advanced into Transcaucasia The year 1770 was still more disastrous for Turkey The Russians reached, through Rumania, the Danube and in the autumn they took Kilia, Bender and Braila, in the immediate neighbourhood of the Turkish general headquarters in Baba Daghī In the same year a Russian fleet appeared in the Mediterranean, several towns in Morea were conquered and evacuated again, but the heaviest blow was the burning of the Turkish fleet in the bay of Česhme (July 1770) Moldowandji ʿAlī — already dispossessed of his grand vizierate — was sent to strengthen, with de Tott, the defences of the Dardanelles But the Russian fleet had ceased to be a danger and the Danube campaign of the following spring also was rather favourable for the Turks In the beginning of 1771 the military organisation had been improved That year, however, the Russians forced the isthmus of Perekop and conquered the entire Crimea This was a definite loss for Turkey, and a great majority of the Tatars declared their allegiance to the Russian empress The Turks were able, however, to remain in Očakow and Kilburnu In Constantinople meanwhile laborious diplomatic negotiations went on with the envoys of the European powers who offered to mediate, notably Austria and Prussia With Austria the Porte concluded in July 1771 a secret "treaty of subsidy" for diplomatic services, while the Porte disinterested herself completely in Polish affairs, going so far as to propose a partition of Poland The result was an armistice, concluded in June 1772 at Giurgewo, followed by the peace congress of Focani (August 1772), where Turkey's chief representative was the arrogant nishāndji ʿOṯhmān Efendi After the failure of the negotiations the armistice was prolonged and a new conference began at Bucarest in November These negotiations were again broken off in March 1773, mainly from lack of agreement on the subject of the Turkish fortresses on the Black Sea, as to the Crimea, Turkey had already agreed to a formula such as was later adopted in the peace of Kučük Kainardji In Constantinople it was chiefly the ʿulamāʾ who had opposed the Russian peace conditions The war in 1773 was not very eventful, the general headquarters had been transferred to Shumna after Muhsin Zāde had become grand vizier a second time (Dec 1771) The Russians won a victory at Karasu in the Dobruča, but attacked Silistra and Warna in vain Bairūt was bombarded by Russian ships in connection with the rebellion of the Mamlūk ʿAlī Bey [q v] in Egypt, who was supported by them In the summer of 1773 sultān Mustafā made known his desire to accompany the army against the Russians, but he was prevented from doing so by his entourage and by his illness, to which he succumbed on December 24, 1773, to be succeeded by his brother ʿAbd al-Hamīd I Mustafā was buried in his own turbe, connected with the Lāleli Djāmiʿi, which he had begun to build in 1759 (Hadīkat al-Djawāmiʿ, i 23).

Muṣṭafā III is praised in the Turkish sources as a good ruler He had a special liking for religious disputations in his presence and was particularly interested in astrological calculations He took an interest in the least important affairs and this prevented him from such a real statesmanlike insight as was much wanted in the later years of his reign In his way he was an "enlightened despot" But even a more able ruler would probably have failed to save Turkey from her military inferiority against the Russian armies, measures of military organisation were taken with the aid of de Tott, but this could not prevent the desertion of the troops from assuming disastrous dimensions during certain episodes of the war Besides the Lāleli Djāmiᶜ, Mustafā built the Ayazma Djāmiᶜi at Scutari for his mother, he caused a new suburb of Stambul to be built outside the Yeñi Kapu His reign is further marked by the extremely severe earthquake that laid large parts of the capital in ruins in 1766

Bibliography The Taᵓrīkh of Wāsif [q v] is the chief historical source for Mustafā's reign, Wāsif himself played a prominent part as secretary during the long-drawn-out peace negotiations with Russia It is completed by the Taᵓrīkh of Enwerī The Wakāᵓiᶜ-nāme of Diyāᵓī, son of Ḥakīm Oghlu ᶜAlī Pasha, seems not to be preserved (G O W, p 300) The well-known Aḥmad Rasmī Efendi wrote a history of the war with Russia under the title Ḫulāṣat al-Iᶜtibār (G O W, p 310) The Talkhīṣāt of the learned grand vizier Rāghib Pasha (G O W, p 288) give documents from the beginning of Mustafā's reign A contemporary western source is the Memoires sur les Turcs et les Tartares of Baron Fr de Tott, Maestricht 1785 Further the historical works of von Hammer, Zinkeisen and Jorga

(J H Kramers)

MUṢṬAFĀ IV, twenty-ninth sultān of the Ottoman Empire, was a son of ᶜAbd al-Ḥamīd I and was born on Shaᶜbān 26, 1193 = Sept 19, 1778 (Mehmed Thüreiyā, Sidjill-i ᶜothmānī, i 81) When the anti-reform party, headed by the kāᵓim makām Mūsā Pasha and the muftī, and supported by the Janissaries and the auxiliary troops of the Yamaks had dethroned Selīm III [q v] on May 29, 1807, Mustafā was proclaimed sultān Immediately afterwards, the unpopular nizām i djedīd corps was dissolved and Kabakdji Oghlu, the leader of the Yamaks, was made commander of the Bosporus fortresses Turkey was at that time at war with Russia and England, but peace negotiations had already begun and, moreover, the foreign affairs of the empire were really governed by general European politics A secret article annexed to the peace treaty of Tilsit (July 7, 1807) had in view — already at that time — a conditional partition of Turkey Turkey's ally, France, tried to urge a peace with Russia and obtained a Russo-Turkish armistice at Slobosia (near Giurgewo), by the terms of which the Danube principalities were to be evacuated When in the end Russia was unwilling to put into effect the terms of the armistice, relations with France became strained (departure of Sebastiani in April 1808) and new preparations for war followed, while overtures were made to England, the English admiral Codrington had already entered into negotiations with ᶜAlī Pasha of Yanina

Meanwhile the kāᵓim makām and the muftī were the real rulers in Constantinople, the grand vizier Čelebi Mustafā Pasha remained with the army in Adrianople and had no influence The Janissaries and Yamaks, however, continued to be rebellious, measures had to be taken against them and the sultān himself went so far as to favour secret plans for restoring the nizām-i djedīd under another name In December 1807 Mūsā Pasha was dismissed from the office of kāᵓim makām — on account of dissension with the muftī — and was succeeded by Taiyār Pasha The latter, dismissed in his turn, fled to Bairakdār Mustafā Pasha [q v], an acknowledged friend of the reform party, in Ruščuk From here began the action against the régime in the capital Bairaḳdār went first to Adrianople and joined forces with the grand vizier in June 1808 They arrived in July before the gates of Constantinople at Dāwūd Pasha Sultān Mustafā came there on July 23 to accept their terms, which for the moment were only the destruction of the ruling party and of the Yamaks On July 28 Bairakdāi, after having seized the sultān's seal from the grand vizier, began to act on his own account He went with his troops to the palace, where the sultān — who had left shortly before for an excursion — returned in haste He had only the time to order the execution of Selīm III but was deposed immediately afterwards by the intruders, who put his younger brother Mahmūd on the throne After having passed some months in confinement, he was killed by order of the new sultān on November 16, in the days of the general revolt against Bairaḳdār's régime, when the existence of the former sultān had become a real danger for Maḥmūd's position Mustafā was buried in the turbe of his father ᶜAbd al Ḥamīd I, near the Yeñi Djāmiᶜ

Bibliography Djewdet Pasha, Taᵓrīkh, 2nd ed, viii (Stambul 1303), p 145 sqq, ᶜĀsim, Taᵓrīkh, ii (where large use has been made of Saᶜīd Efendi's Taᵓrīkhce, cf F Babinger, G O W, p 338), A de Juchereau de St Denis, Revolutions de Constantinople de 1807 et 1808, new ed, Paris 1823, Zinkeisen, Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches, vii

(J H Kramers)

MUṢṬAFĀ, name of several princes belonging to the Ottoman dynasty

1 Mustafā Čelebi, eldest son of Bāyazīd I, the date of his birth is not recorded He disappeared in the battle of Angora (July 1402) This Mustafā is the first Ottoman prince to bear this name, which, like such other names as Bāyazīd and Murād, originated in mystical circles in Asia Minor in the xivth century According to the Byzantine sources, this Mustafā is the same as the person called by the majority of the Turkish sources

Dozme Mustafā, who came forward in 1419 as pretender to the Ottoman throne against Muhammad I He was supported by Mirče of Wallachia and by the Izmīr Oghlu Djunaid [q v] Near Selānik they were beaten by Muhammad and Mustafā took refuge in the town together with Djunaid, the Byzantine commander refused to give them up to the sultān and sent them to Constantinople In a treaty concluded with the emperor Manuel, the sultān promised to pay a yearly subsidy to provide for the maintenance of the prisoners, while the emperor undertook to keep them in custody This treaty was observed until Muhammad's death, Muṣṭafā was relegated to a monastery on the island of Lemnos After Muhammad's death, however, he was released and the emperor supported him against Murād II [q v] In a short time he was master of the Ottoman territories in Europe, the army sent against him under Bāyazīd Pasha went over to his side at Sazlī Dere between Seres and Adrianople He was joined likewise by great feudal lords like the sons of Ewrenos He soon felt strong enough to break his alliance with the Greeks and expelled them from the recently taken Gallipoli After having resided some time in Adrianople, he went together with Djunaid to Asia Minor, where they met Murād's army in a battle near the bridge of Ulubad By the treacherous retreat of Djunaid, Mustafā was beaten and fled to Gallipoli and Adrianople, from here he tried to reach Wallachia, but was taken by Murād's troops and executed at Adrianople All this happened in the first year of Murād II's reign (1421—1422)

Bibliography Ducas and Chalcondylas relate the events before Muḥammad's death, so does the chronicle of Neshrī, but the other early Turkish chronicles know only of what happened in the beginning of Murād's reign On coins struck by Mustafā T O E M, xv 387, von Hammer, G O R, 1, Mehmed Zekī, Maktūl Shehzādeler, Constantinople 1332, p 45 sqq

2 Mustafā, son of Muhammad I and younger brother of Murād II, was supported as pretender against the latter in 1423, while Murad besieged Constantinople This Mustafā was about 13 years of age, he had fled to the Karaman Oghlu with his lālā Ilyās From here they took Iznik and marched against Brusa Mustafā even went for some time to Constantinople, but Murād, raising the siege, returned to Brusa, where Mustafā was delivered to him by the treachery of Ilyās, he was executed by the sultān's orders

Bibliography The Byzantine writers Ducas and Chalcondylas, the old Turkish chronicles and after them the later historians, von Hammer, G O R, 1, Mehmed Zekī, Maktūl Shehzādeler, p 53 sqq

3 Mustafā, son of Sulaimān the Magnificent, was born in 921 (1515) (Mehmed Ḥüreiyī, Sidjill-i ʿothmānī, 1 79) He had been made, in 1533, governor of Sarukhān in Maghnisa, later he became governor of Konya, while Sulaimān's favourite son Muhammad was given Sarukhān When Muhammad died in 1545, Sarukhān was given to Mustafā's younger half-brother Selim and he himself was placed in Amasia This setting aside of the elder, more talented and more brilliant son was the work of Khurram Sultān (Roxelane), mother of Selīm, and of her son in-law, the grand vizier Rustam Pasha Already some years before there had been signs of Sultān Sulaimān's lack of confidence in Mustafā's loyalty When, in 1553, a new campaign had been planned against Persia, of which Rustam was to be the commander, Sulaimān decided at the last moment to accompany the army himself, being warned again against Mustafā through the intermediary of Selīm's favourite Shamsī Agha Selīm joined him on the way and, when at Eregli near Konya, prince Mustafā came to pay homage to his father, he was killed by order of Sulaimān on October 6, 1553 His corpse was conveyed to Brusa and buried in the turbe of Murād II This execution of an Ottoman prince is one of those events that made the deepest impression in the empire It caused immediately the threatening of a Janissary revolt, which could only be appeased by the dismissal of the grand vizier Rustam Pasha It is said that his brother Djihangīr died soon after him of grief, a minor son of his was killed in Brusa shortly after his execution Mustafā had also made himself beloved as a patron of poets and scholars, amongst whom Surūrī is to be mentioned in the first place Several poets lamented his death in elegies, in which Rustam and others were openly accused of having caused the murder, best known is the merthiye of the poet Yahyā Bey Mustafā wrote poetry under the takhallus Mukhlisī There is further strong evidence for the probability that Mustafā wrote a history of his father's reign, a Sulaimān-nāme, under the pseudonym Ferdī (cf G O W, p 83)

Bibliography The historical works of ʿĀlī, Solak Zāde and Pečewī The tragic death of the prince is also treated with more or less veracity in contemporary sources, as the Letters of Busbecq In later times von Hammer, G O R, III, ʿAlī Djewād, Taʾrīkhiñ kanlī Sahifeleri Shehzāde Sultān Muṣṭafā, Constantinople, n d (cf Fr Babinger, G O W, p 398), Ahmad Rafīḳ, Kadīnlar Saltanatī, 1, Constantinople 1914, Mehmed Zekī, Maktūl Shehzādeler, Constantinople 1336, p 223 sqq (J H KRAMERS)

MUSṬAFĀ KĀMIL PASHA, leader of the second nationalist movement in Egypt (on the first, see the articles ʿARĀBĪ PASHA and KHEDIVE)

The son of an Egyptian engineer, he was born in Cairo on 1st Radjab 1291 (Aug 14, 1874), studied at the Khedivial school of law there and after taking his examination went to study in Toulouse where in 1894 he took his "licence en droit" When still a student of 18 he began his political activity and entered into personal relations with the Khedive ʿAbbās II [q v] On his return from France he founded in 1894 the second Egyptian national party (al Hizb al watanī) with the object of inducing England by appeals to justice to abandon the occupation and restore the complete independence of Egypt Later he also aimed at getting the Sūdān handed back to Egypt and tried to prepare the Egyptians by modern education for parliamentary government As the representative of his party he spent each year a considerable time in Europe, especially France where he consorted with politicians and journalists and conducted a vigorous propaganda for his object All his life he was very friendly with the journalist Juliette Adam, he had dealings with Rochefort, Drumont, Col Marchand, Pierre Loti and in 1896 had a correspondence with Gladstone Later he visited Berlin, London, Vienna, Budapest, Geneva and Constantinople where he was highly thought of because he insisted on the Sultān's suzerainty over Egypt, Sultan ʿAbd al-Hamīd II [q v] gave him in 1904 the title of Pasha In Cairo he founded in 1898 a school for training the youth in nationalist ideas, and in 1899 started the newspaper al-Liwāʾ (The Banner), which appeared early in 1900, had a great success and from 1907 appeared also in English and French editions From 1902 he published the nationalist quarterly Madjallat al-Liwāʾ In his speeches and articles he emphasised his aims with fiery eloquence, at the same time he expressed his approval of the building of the Turkish strategic Hidjāz railway and his sympathy with the Japanese in their war with Russia (1904—1905) Muṣṭafā Kāmil also regularly emphasised the privileged position of Muslims as belonging to the state religion and recognised the sultān as caliph and head of Islām and thus contributed to the pan-Islāmic movement which began early in the twentieth century

The "Entente Cordiale" concluded on April 8, 1904 between England and France was a severe blow to him and the nationalist party, by it France, in return for a free hand in Morocco, dropped its objections to the English occupation of Egypt The Egyptian nationalists thus lost all hope of open or secret support from the French government and were thrown upon their own resources This situation caused Muṣṭafā Kāmil to redouble his energy and in vigorous speeches and writings against France and England, in travelling and negotiating with statesmen of different lands, he endeavoured to make Egypt's point of view clear As a result of the intensity of his agitation there was a breach between him and the Khedive ʿAbbās II (Oct 1904), on the other hand, his following in Egypt rapidly increased and began to be troublesome to Lord Cromer who had so far treated the new nationalism created by Mustafā Kāmil as a "quantité négligeable" The Dinshawā'ī (a village near Tantā in the Delta) affair gave the nationalists a great stimulus, on June 13, 1906, some English officers out shooting were said to have wounded an Egyptian woman and were attacked by fellāhīn with clubs and one of the officers was killed A special court set up by the English government sentenced four fellāhīn to death and 17 to prison or flogging and the sentence was carried out next day The indignation in Egypt and Europe rose to great heights and even in the House of Commons the authorities were criticised Mustafā Kāmil hurried to London and discussed the matter with the Prime Minister, Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, whom he endeavoured to convince of the necessity of recalling Lord Cromer and giving greater freedom to Egyptians On this occasion he mentioned as suitable representatives in a parliamentary system of government all those Egyptians who in the later political movement after the war played important parts On his return to Egypt, through the press and mass meetings in which he urged Egyptians to unite against England, he gave a great stimulus to the nationalist movement and soon had the satisfaction of seeing Lord Cromer recalled — although he was not at all the only cause of this — and replaced by Sir Eldon Gorst The latter adopted a milder tone with the Egyptians, was on good terms with the Khedive and endeavoured to support him with a newly founded party Mustafā Pasha attacked this representative of England vigorously also, in Oct 1907 put his national party on a broader basis and summoned it to a "national congress", which met on Dec 7 of the same year in Cairo, 1,017 delegates from all over Egypt appeared and after a speech by Mustafā Kāmil which carried them away the latter was elected life-President of the party This was however his swan-song — he had been ill since the summer of 1906, he died on Feb 10, 1908 (8th Muharram 1326) at the age of 34 of a slow internal trouble (intestinal tuberculosis) The rumour spread that he had been poisoned at English instigation His funeral was an impressive expression of the national grief Mustafā's creations did not long survive him and his party, which produced no leader to equal him and was broken up by dissensions, gradually sank into insignificance Although he obtained no positive results by his agitation, he prepared the way for the third and greatest nationalist movement (under Saʿd Zaghlūl Pasha from Nov 13, 1918) It is to his credit that he conducted his whole campaign without any appeal to force, which would have been quite useless against the British Empire, and without bloodshed

Of his numerous writings only the more important can be mentioned, many of them were only printed after his death, some in the great (never completed) biography by his brother ʿAlī Bey Fahmī Kāmil al-Masʾala 'l-sharḳiya (1898 and 1909), Miṣr wa 'l-Iḥtilāl al inḏjlīzī (collection of speeches and essays, Cairo 1313), Difāʿ al-Miṣrīʿ ʿan Bilādihi, Cairo 1324 (1906), al Shams al-mushriḳa (Cairo 1904, on the Russo-Japanese war), Lettres françaises-egyptiennes (Cairo 1909, also in Arabic and English transl His letters to Juliette Adam), Egyptiens et Anglais, Paris 1906 (speech of July 4, 1895 in Toulouse), Le peril anglais, Paris 1899, What the National Party wants (Cairo 1907, speech of Oct 22, 1907)

Bibliography ʿAlī Fahmī Kāmil, Mustafā Kāmil Bāshā fī 34 Rabīʿan (Cairo 1326—1328 = 1908—1910, 9 vols , his life and speeches to Feb 1900), do , Sīrat Muṣṭafā Kāmil fī arabʿa wa-thalāthīn Rabīʿan, vol 1 , Cairo 1344 (1926), only to August 1899, Mahmūd Hasīb, Fakīd al-Watan wa 'l-Umma al maghfūr lahu Muṣṭafā Kāmil Bāshā (in Maḏjallat al Maḏjallāt al-ʿarabīya, Cairo Febr 10, 1908, year 8), Muhammad Husain Haikal, Tarāḏjim miṣrīya wa-ʿarabīya, Cairo 1929, p 139—162, Juliette Adam, L'Angleterre en Egypte, Paris 1922, p 144—198, Ahmad Shafīk Bāshā, Hawliyāt Miṣr al siyāsīya, vol 1 , Cairo 1345 (1926), passim, Th Rothstein, Egypt's Ruin, London 1910, p 366 sqq , W S Blunt, Secret History of the English Occupation of Egypt, London 1907, passim, do , My Diaries 1888—1914, London 1919—1920, passim, H R F Bourne, Egypt under British Control, London 1906, passim, A Colvin, The Making of Modern Egypt, London 1909, passim, E Dicey, Our Position in Egypt (Empire Review, xi , London 1906, p 322–338), Mohamed Duse, In the Land of the Pharaos, London 1911, passim, H Spender, England, Egypt and Turkey, London 1906, Foreign Office, Egypt 1906, N⁰ 3 —5, London 1906, Ad Hasenclever, Geschichte Ägyptens im 19 Jahrhundert 1798—1914, Halle a/S 1917ʿ p 462—466, P G Elgood, The Transit of Egypt, London 1928, p 147 sq and 184 sq

(MAX MEYERHOF)

AL-MUṢṬAFĀ LI-DĪN ALLĀH [See NIZAR B AL-MUSTANSIR]

MUṢṬAFĀ PASHA BAIRAḲDĀR, Turkish grand vizier in 1808, was the son of a wealthy Janissary at Ruscuḳ, born about 1750 He distinguished himself in the war with Russia under Mustafā III, and acquired in these years the surname of bairakdār After the war he lived on his estates near Ruscuḳ, and acquired the semi-official position of aʿyān of Hezārgrād and later of Ruscuḳ With other aʿyāns he took part in an action against the government at Adrianople, but became finally a reliable supporter of the government Having already received the honorary offices of kapïdjï bashï and of mīr akhor, he was, in 1806, promoted to the rank of Pasha of Silistria and at the same time was appointed ser-ʿasker on the Danube frontier against the advancing Russian army This made him one of the most influential men in Rūm-ili He had become a zealous supporter of Selīm III's reform policy and, after that sultān's deposition, it was to him that the enemies of the new reactionary government turned In June 1808 he was joined by the dismissed kāʾim-makām of the grand vizierate in Constantinople, Taiyār Pasha, from Ruscuk they went to Adrianople, where they joined forces with the grand vizier Čelebi Mustafā Pasha So the entire Rumelian army marched against the capital, where they dictated their will to sultān Muṣtafā IV (July 23) On July 26 Bairakdār (or ʿĀlemdār as he was called officially) was appointed commander in chief and on July 28, after having taken by force the sultān's seal from the weak grand vizier, he marched with his troops to the palace of the sultān, under the pretext of bringing back the holy standard of the prophet At first he was allowed only to enter the first court of the serāy, while sultān Mustafā — who had been absent — returned in haste from the seaside As Bairakdār had made known his intention of restoring Selīm III to the throne, Mustafā had just time to have his predecessor killed But immediately afterwards he was himself deposed and Bairakdār now recognized Mahmūd II [q v] as sultan

After this began the short personal regime of Bairakdār Mustafā Pasha as grand vizier He had a number of the supporters of the former sultān executed, arranged a magnificent funeral for Selīm III and began to form a corps of troops called this time nizāmīʾ ʿasker At the same time he summoned a great imperial conference in the capital, to which all the high-placed officials of the empire were invited Many of them answered the appeal and subscribed to the extensive programme of reforms which the grand vizier laid before them in a solemn meeting in the first days of October and which was also approved of by a fatwā of the muftī But the precipitation with which the new measures were taken in hand and the tactless procedure in the abolition of long established abuses, made him ever more unpopular The influential ʿulamāʾ were also alienated by the exaggerated reforming zeal His only support were his Rumelian troops and a small number of friends, such as Begdjī Efendi and Rāmiz Pasha, together with Kādī Pasha of Karamān who had remained in the capital after the imperial conference Matters came to a head on November 14, 1808, in the last days of Ramadān 1222, by a rebellion of the Janissaries The night following that day they surrounded the grand vizier's residence and set the quarter on fire Bairakdār, surprised by the fire, saw no way of escape, he hid himself in a tower of his palace, where his body was found three days afterwards, after the fire was quenched The rumour had been spread that Bairakdār had escaped, which had caused much uncertainty

The grand vizier was buried in the fortress of Yedi Kule, where his bones were dug up in 1911 during railway works, they were transported to the mosque of Zeineb Sultān

Bibliography Djewdet Pasha, Taʾrīkh, 2nd ed, VIII, Shānī Zāde, Taʾrīkh, I, Mehmed Thüreiyā, Sidjill i ʿothmānī, IV 460, Zinkeisen, Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches, VII 555 sqq, Afdal al-Din, ʿAlemdār Muṣṭafā Pasha, in T O E M, II, III, IV (with portrait on II 528)

(J H KRAMERS)

MUṢṬAFĀ PASHA BUSHATLÎ, the last hereditary wazīr of Scutari (hence often called ISHKODRALÎ), the son of the celebrated Kara Mahmūd Pasha Bushatlî [q v], succeeded his uncle Ibrāhim Pasha about 1810 and received the rank of wazīr in 1812 In 1820 the sandjak of Berat and in 1824 those of Ohrid and Elbasan were put under his government and he received the title of Serʿasker Nevertheless like his father he aimed at greater independence and when Mahmūd II's reforms threatened to deprive him of his hereditary rights and privileges, he became strongly hostile to the Sultān and maintained friendly relations with the Serbian prince Miloš, the discontented Bosniaks (cf 1, p 757) and the Egyptian Muhammad ʿAlī (cf J Deny, Sommaire des archives turques du Caire, p 264 and 553) He therefore maintained quite a passive attitude in the Russo-Turkish war (1828) and only towards the end of it, in May 1829, did he appear with his Albanians on the Danube (Vidin, Rahovo), then went on to Sofia and Philippopolis, but without taking any active part in the fighting

On the conclusion of peace the Porte (beg of 1831) demanded of Mustafā Pasha that he should hand over the districts previously held by him (Dukakin, Debar, Elbasan, Ohrid and Trgovište) to the grand vizier Reshīd Mehmed Pasha (on him cf Sidjill i ʿothmānī, II 391) and carry through certain reforms in Scutari itself Mustafā Pasha resisted and with the financial and moral support of prince Miloš, led an army in the middle of March 1831 against the grand vizier He was joined by the other Pashas of northern Albania and old Serbia who objected to reforms The rebels had at first certain successes including the occupation of Sofia but they were completely routed at Prilep by the regular troops led by the grand-vizier (beginning of May) Mustafā Pasha hurried back to Scutari via Skoplye and Prizren and shut himself up in the fortress When he surrendered on Nov 10, 1831 after six months' siege, he was pardoned on Metternich's intercession and taken to Constantinople

Fifteen years later he again held various governorships, chiefly in Anatolia (from 1846), then in the Herzegovina (1853) and lastly in Medīna where he died on May 27, 1860

Bibliography Kāmūs al-Aʿlām, II 982, ʿAbd al-Rahmān Sheref, Taʾrīkh i Dewlet i ʿothmānīye, II 331–332, Mehmed Thureiyā, Sidjill-i ʿothmānī, IV 477 (full account of his career), Dr Mih Gavrilovic, Miloš Obrenovic, III (1827—1835), Belgrad 1912, p 91—96, 102—114, 124—126, 332—350, 361, Drag M Pavlovic, Pokret u Bosni i u Albany i protivu reforama Mahmuda II, Belgrad 1913, chap VIII and IX, Jorga, Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches, V 356 and 379 (brief) (FEHIM BAJRAKTAREVIĆ)

MUṢṬAFĀ PASHA KÖPRÜLÜ [See KÖPRÜLÜ]

MUṢṬAFĀ PASHA LALA, a famous military commander in the Ottoman history of the XVIth century The date of his birth is not given He was a native of Şokol, the same Bosnian locality from which came the grand vizier Sokollı [q v], and began his service in the imperial seray He rose in rank under the grand vizier Ahmad (1553—1555), but was not in favour with the latter's successor Rustam Pasha, who made him in 1556 lālā to prince Selīm with the object of ruining him The outcome of this nomination was the contrary of what was expected, Mustafā became the chief originator of the intrigues by which Selīm came into conflict with his brother Bāyazīd and which ended with Bāyazīd's execution in Persia [cf SELĪM II] After these events Rustam Pasha managed to relegate the intriguer in administrative functions to different parts of the empire, for eight years he was wālī in Damascus Nor was the grand vizier Sokollı favourably disposed to Mustafā, but in the beginning of 1569 Sultān Selīm II called back his former lālā as kubbe weziri in the capital Very soon afterwards Sokollı appointed him ser-ʿasker in the Yaman, Mustafā went to Cairo to take charge of his command, but here he became involved in serious disputes with the wālī Sinān Pasha on the equipment of his army The end was that Sinān was appointed in Mustafā's stead and the latter had to return to Constantinople Sultān Selīm's protection saved him from death and in the beginning of the following year he was appointed again ser-ʿasker of the army destined for the conquest of the island of Cyprus Lala Mustafā Pasha led this memorable campaign with complete success, Nicosia was taken in July 1570, while Famagusta surrendered in August 1571 With the surrender of this town is connected the brutal and cruel execution of the Venetian commander Bragadino After his return he became a serious candidate for the grand vizierate, should Sokollı disappear from the scene His only rival was Sinān Pasha When in 1577 the war with Persia broke out [cf MURĀD III] both were appointed ser-ʿasker, but, on account of Sinān's arrogant character, the latter's appointment had to be withdrawn In April Lala Mustafā began his campaign in Georgia, fought the memorable victory of Čaldīr (August 1578) and took Tiflis besides a number of other towns These military glories did not bring him to the ambition of his life After Sokollı's assassination, Rustam's son-in law Ahmad Pasha had been made grand vizier and, on the latter's death in May 1580, it was Sinān [q v] who got the sultān's seal Lala Mustafā died in October of the same year and was buried in the court of the mosque at Ayyūb Apart from the unquestionably important events in which he played a prominent part, Lala Mustafā Pasha has a particular importance in Ottoman historiography because the historian ʿĀlī [q v] had been attached to his person as scribe since the beginning of his career Therefore his able, but intriguing and reckless character is known better than that of many other Turkish statesmen or generals By his marriage with the grand-daughter of the last Mamlūk Sultān Kānsū Ghūrī he was a very wealthy man, who, notwithstanding his reputed avarice, founded several mosques (as in Erzerūm) and many buildings of public utility in the different places where he resided as governor

Bibliography The chief Turkish source is, as has been said, ʿĀlī, not only in his Kunh al-Akhbār, but also in a treatise entitled Nādirat al-Mahārib, describing the war between Selīm and Bāyazīd (MS unknown, cf Babinger, G O W., p 132) and in his Nuṣrat-nāme, which gives a description of the Georgian campaign Other sources are the works of Pečewī and Solaḳ Zāde Western contemporary sources are the Diary of Gerlach, the Letters of Busbeck and, especially for the conquest of Cyprus, the Italian historical descriptions

(J H KRAMERS)

MUṢṬAFĀ PASHA RASHĪD [See RASHĪD]

MUSTAHABB [See SHARĪʿA]

MUSTAʿIDD KHĀN, MUHAMMAD SĀḲĪ, born about 1061 (1650), was brought up as an adopted son by Muhammad Bakhtāwar Khān, whom he faithfully assisted in various capacities After the death of his patron he passed into the service of Awrangzēb In the reign of Shāh ʿĀlam Bahādur Shāh I (1118—1124 = 1707—1712), he became the secretary of ʿInāyat Allāh Khān, son of Mirzā Shukr Allāh, the minister of Bahādur Shāh, and by his desire Mustaʿidd Khan composed the history of the reign of Awrangzēb, entitled Maʾāthir-i ʿĀlamgīri Part I is a mere abridgement of Mīrzā Kāzim's history of the first ten years of the emperor's reign, part II contains the history of the last forty years of ʿĀlamgīr's reign (edited in the Bibliotheca Indica, Calcutta 1870—1871)

He died at the age of seventy five at Dihlī in 1136 (1723)

Bibliography Khāfī Khān, Muntakhab al-Lubāb, II 211, Maʾāthir-i ʿĀlamgīri, p 253, 255, 407, 462, Ouseley, Critical Essay, p 42, Rieu, Cat Br Mus, p 270ᵃ, Ethé, Ind Office Cat, Nº 365, and Elliot-Dawson, History of India, VII 181 (M HIDAYET HOSAIN)

AL-MUSTAʿĪN BI 'LLĀH, ABU 'L-ʿABBĀS AHMAD B MUHAMMAD, an ʿAbbāsid caliph His father was a son of the caliph al-Muʿtasim, his mother a slave girl named Mukhārik of Slav origin After the death in Rabīʿ II 248 (June 862) of al Muntasir the praetorians appointed his cousin Ahmad caliph under the name al-Mustaʿīn The choice aroused discontent in Sāmarrā and unrest broke out among those who supported al-Muʿtazz [q v] which was only put down after much bloodshed by the Turkish soldiers When al-Mustaʿīn was recognised as caliph he confirmed the governor of Baghdād, Muhammad b ʿAbd Allāh b Ṭāhir [q v], in office He bought all the property of al-Muʿtazz and his brother al-Muʾayad and then had them arrested The Turks wanted to put them to death but they were protected by the vizier Ahmad b al-Khasīb who soon afterwards fell into disgrace and was banished to Crete In 249 (863) trouble broke out as a result of a defeat of the army by the Byzantines, the rebels were however scattered by the vizier Utāmish and the two Turkish generals Wasīf and Bogha Junior Utāmish was soon afterwards murdered at the instigation of the latter As the caliph no longer felt safe in Sāmarrā he went to Baghdād in Muharram 251 (Feb 865) Al Muʿtazz was then taken by his supporters out of his prison in Sāmarrā and a war broke out which ended in Dhu 'l-Hidjdja 252 (Jan 866) in the abdication of al-Mustaʿīn [cf BAGHDĀD] By the arrangement made the latter was to live in Medīna in future, but he was detained in Wāsit and murdered in Shawwāl 252 (Oct 866) at the age of 35 See also the article MUHAMMAD B ʿABD ALLĀH B ṬĀHIR

Bibliography Ibn Kutaiba, Kitāb al-Maʿārif, ed Wüstenfeld, p 200, Yaʿḳūbī, ed Houtsma, II 603—610, Tabarī, III 150 sqq,

Masʿūdī, Murūdj, ed Paris, VII 323—371, IX 46, 52, Ibn al-Athīr, ed Tornberg, VII 75 sqq, Ibn al-Tiḳṭaḳā, al-Fakhrī, ed Derenbourg, p 329—332, Muhammad b Shākir, Fawāt al-Wafayāt, I 68 sq, Ibn Khaldūn, al-ʿIbar, III 283 sqq, Weil, Gesch d Chalifen, II 378 sqq, Muir, The Caliphate, its Rise, Decline and Fall[3], p 534 sqq, A Muller, Der Islam im Morgen- und Abendland, I 528, Le Strange, Baghdad during the Abbasid Caliphate, see index

(K V ZETTERSTÉEN)

AL-MUSTAKFĪ BI 'LLĀH, ABU 'L-KĀSIM ʿABD ALLĀH, ʿAbbasid caliph, son of al-Muktafi and a slave girl After the Amīr al-Umarāʾ Tuzun had deposed the caliph al Muttakī, he chose al-Mustakfī as his successor on the same day in Safar 333 (Sept–Oct 944) The new caliph was only a tool in the hands of Tuzun and his successor Abū Djaʿfar b Shīrzād Baghdād began to suffer from a constant famine and neither food nor money could be raised for the troops When the Būyid Ahmad b Abī Shudjāʿ approached [cf MUʿIZZ AL-DAWLA], the caliph had to declare himself ready to recognise the Būyids as the legitimate rulers in all the provinces conquered by them, and in Djumādā I 334 (Dec 945) Ahmad entered Baghdād and was given by the caliph the title of honour Muʿizz al-Dawla and the fullest power in all secular matters But the new ruler suspected that the caliph was in communication with the enemies of the Būyids so he had him blinded (on 22nd Djumādā II or Shaʿbān 334 = Jan 29 or March 946) and deposed Al Mustakfī died in Rabīʿ II 338 (Sept–Oct 949)

Bibliography Masʿūdī, Murūdj, ed Paris, VIII 376—411, IX 48, 52, Ibn al Athir, ed Tornberg, VIII 314 sqq, Ibn al-Tiktakā, al-Fakhrī, ed Derenbourg, p 388—390, Ibn Khaldūn, al-ʿIbar, III 418 sqq, Weil, Gesch d Chalifen, II 694 sqq, A Muller, Der Islam im Morgen- und Abendland, I 568 sq, Muir, The Caliphate, its Rise, Decline, and Fall[3], p 577 sqq, Le Strange, Baghdad during the Abbasid Caliphate, p 118, 194 sq

(K V ZETTERSTÉEN)

AL-MUSTAʿLĪ BI 'LLĀH ABU 'L-KĀSIM AHMAD B AL-MUSTANSIR, ninth Fātimid Caliph, born 20th Muharram, 467 [Sept 16, 1074] (so in all the best sources and in al-Mustansir's letter to Ahmad b ʿAlī al Sulaihī, quoted in Idrīs, VII 152), the youngest son of his father At this time it was generally assumed in the Ismāʿīlī organization that the eldest son, Nizār (born 437), would, in accordance with custom, succeed his father in the imāmate, although no formal investiture with the wilāyat al-ʿahd appears to have been made The influence of the all powerful wazīr Badr al-Djamālī, however, and of his son al-Afdal, was thrown into the scale in favour of Abu 'l-Kāsim and al-Mustansir's consent obtained to the marriage of Abu 'l-Kāsim with Sitt al Mulk, the daughter of Badr (the statement in al Fārikī [ap Ibn al Kalānisī, ed Amedroz, p 128] that he was the son of Badr's daughter is evidently a misunderstanding) According to the tradition of the Mustaʿlian Ismāʿīlīs [see BOHORĀs], Abu 'l-Kāsim was invested with the succession at the time of this marriage, in another version (Ibn Muyassar, p 66 sq) al-Mustansir confided his nomination of Abu 'l-Kāsim to his own sister, who divulged it after his death On the death of al-Mustansir on 18th Dhu 'l-Hidjdja, 487 (Jan 10, 1094), the Shīʿite ʿId al-Ghadīr, al-Afdal secured the accession of al-Mustaʿlī without serious difficulty The subsequent revolt of Nizār [see NIZĀR B AL-MUSTANSIR] at Alexandria failed owing to the opposition of the army, and al-Mustaʿlī's succession was generally recognized, except by the Ismāʿīlīs of Persia [see AL HASAN B AL-SABBĀH]

Throughout his reign the actual power was entirely in the hands of al-Afdal [q v] At first some successes were gained in Syria, Ḥamīya (Apamea) made a voluntary submission in 489, and Tyre was recovered from a rebel governor in 490 A project of alliance with the Saldjūkid Ridwān of Aleppo against Damascus in the same year fell through On the appearance of the Crusaders in Syria (490 = 1097) an Egyptian embassy was sent to open negotiations with them, and in 491 (July–Aug, 1098) Jerusalem was recaptured from the Ortukids Sukmān and Il-Ghāzi The advance of the Crusaders in the following year took al-Afdal by surprise, Jerusalem was again lost, and the defeat of the Egyptian army near ʿAskalān (14th Ramadān, 492 = Aug 5, 1099) definitely established them in possession Two years later (17th Safar, 495 = Dec 12, 1101) al-Mustaʿlī died and was succeeded by his son al-Mansūr (al Āmir bi-Aḥkām Allāh)

The personal character of al Mustaʿlī is highly praised by his Sunni contemporary Ibn al-Kalānisī, later writers speak of him as a fanatical Shiʿite, and it would seem that the Fātimid organization and propaganda was intensified in his reign Idrīs refers especially to his close relations with the daʿwa in the Yaman, represented by al-Malika al Hurra and her dāʿī Yahyā b Lamak b Mālik al-Hamādī In the capable hands of al-Afdal, order and good government were maintained, and Egypt continued to enjoy prosperity, except for a famine in 492 or 493, due to the influx of Syrian refugees

Bibliography The fullest sources are Ibn al-Kalānisī (ed Amedroz), p 128—141, and Ibn Taghrībirdī (ed Popper), II, part 2, p 298—325, the chronology of the latter is defective, Ibn al Athīr (x 161—224), Djamāl al-Dīn al-Halabī (Brit Mus Or 3685, foll 74b—77a), Ibn Muyassar (ed Massé), p 34—40, and the other sources mentioned under the article AL-AFDAL add little of importance The Mustaʿlian Ismāʿīlī tradition is given in ʿUyūn al-Akhbār of the dāʿī Idrīs b al-Hasan [d 872] (MS in possession of H F al-Hamdani), VII 151—175 — For relations with the Crusaders Gesta Francorum (ed Bréhier), p 86, 96, 208—216, Fulcher Carnotensis, I 19, II 10—12, Hagenmayer, Epistulae et Chartae, Innsbruck 1901, p 151, 286 The general European literature is given in the articles FĀTIMIDS and AL-MUSTANSIR

(H A R GIBB)

AL-MUSTANDJID BI 'LLĀH, ABU 'L-MUẒAFFAR YŪSUF, ʿAbbāsid caliph, born on 1st Rabīʿ II 510 (Aug 13, 1116), son of al-Muktafī and a Greek slave girl named Nardjis or Tāʾūs After his father's death on 2nd Rabīʿ I 555 (March 12, 1160) al Mustandjid succeeded him as caliph While al-Muktafī was dying and hope of his recovery had been abandoned, the mother of his son Abū ʿAlī endeavoured to dispose of the future caliph who had already been selected heir apparent in 542 (1147) After winning over several emīrs for her plot, she armed her slave-girls with daggers to murder the heir-apparent when he entered his father's apartment Al-Mustandjid however heard of the plot and had the instigator and her son arrested A few years after his accession the Mazyadīs were expelled [q v] The end of the Fātimids also fell within his reign although the ʿAbbāsids were only officially recognised as caliphs of Egypt under his successor al-Mustadīʾ In 562 (1166—1167) Shimla, lord of Khūzistān, invaded the ʿIrāk and demanded from the caliph the grant of a portion of the lower Euphrates territory as a fief The caliph however sent an army against him Shimla's nephew, Kīlīdj, was routed and Shimla returned home Al-Mustandjid died on 9th Rabīʿ II 566 (Dec 20, 1170) When he was very ill, his physician arranged with his chamberlain Adud al Dīn [q v] and the emīr Kutb al-Dīn Kaimaz to give him a bath to hasten his end The caliph refused to agree, he was nevertheless shut up in the bath until he died

Bibliography Ibn al-Athīr, ed Tornberg, xi 81, 169 sqq, Ibn al-Tiktaḳā, al Fakhrī, ed Derenbourg, p 425—428, Ibn Khaldūn, al-ʿIbar, p 522 sqq, Hamd Allāh Mustawfī i Kazwīnī, Taʾrīkh-i Guzida, ed Browne, i 365—367, Weil, Gesch d Chalifen, iii 307—336, Houtsma, Recueil de textes relatifs a l'histoire des Seldjoucides, ii 223, 289, 291—294

(K V ZETTERSTÉEN)

AL-MUSTANṢIR BI 'LLĀH, ABŪ DJAʿFAR AL-MANṢŪR B AL-ZĀHIR, ʿAbbāsid caliph, like his father whom he succeeded on the 14th Radjab 623 (July 11, 1226), he is described as a just and devout man and was generally liked although he played no great part in politics He acquired Irbil by a legacy in 630 (1232—1233) and eight years later his lands were increased by the acquisition of the town of ʿĀna which he bought from its previous owner About this time the Mongols began to threaten the lands of Islām Čingiz-Khān [q v] had died in Ramadān 624 (Aug 1227) but his sons continued his campaigns of conquest In 635 (1237—1238) the Mongols were defeated by the caliph's troops, the strongest defender of Islām however was Djalāl al-Dīn, Shāh of Khwārizm [q v] Al-Mustansir died on 20th Djumādā I or 10th Djumādā II 640 (Nov 15 or Dec 5, 1242) According to Ibn Khaldūn however, he did not die till the following year The al Mustansirīya university founded by him in Baghdād bears his name

Bibliography Ibn al-Athīr, ed Tornberg, xii 299, Ibn al-Tiktaḳā, al-Fakhrī, ed Derenbourg, p 445—446, Ibn Khaldūn, al-ʿIbar, iii 535 sq, Hamd Allāh Mustawfī-i Kazwīnī, Taʾrīkh-i Guzida, ed Browne, i 370 sq, Weil, Gesch d Chalifen, iii 453—469, Le Strange, Baghdad during the Abbasid Caliphate, p 194 sq, 266 sqq, 337 sq

(K V ZETTERSTÉEN)

AL-MUSTANṢIR BI 'LLĀH, ABŪ TAMĪM MAʿADD B ʿALĪ AL-ZĀHIR, eighth Fāṭimid Caliph, born 16th Djumādā II, 420 (July 2, 1029) (according to Idrīs, on 16th Ramadān = Sept 29), succeeded his father al Zāhir [q v] 15th Shaʿbān 427 (June 13, 1036), and died 18th Dhu 'l-Hidjdja 487 (Jan 10, 1094), after the longest recorded reign of any Muslim ruler and one which, besides being marked by the most violent fluctuations of fortune, was of critical importance in the history of the Fāṭimid Ismāʿīlī movement

Internal history During the childhood of al-Mustansir the authority remained at first in the strong hands of his father's wazīr Abu 'l-Kāsim al-Djardjarāʾī On his death (7th Ramadān 436 = March 28, 1045) it was seized by the evil genius of al Mustansir's reign, his mother, who was a Sūdānī slave, and her former master, the Jewish merchant Abū Saʿd al-Tustarī When Abū Saʿd was assassinated in 439 (1047), after an outbreak of rioting between the Turkish and Berber troops, his place as the queen-mother's agent was taken by his brother Abū Nasr Hārūn (see however the documents published by Mann [Bibl]) and the ḳādī Abū Muhammad al Hasan al-Yāzūrī, who eventually accepted also the wazīrate (7th Muharram 442 = June 1, 1050) and held it for eight years [cf AL-YĀZŪRĪ] Meanwhile there was considerable unrest and perhaps also economic unsettlement in the country If a statement in al-Makrīzī (i 82 [99], ed Wiet, ii 4 [67]) is to be believed, the kharādj of the Egyptian provinces amounted only to one million dinārs in the time of al-Yāzūrī, but this may have been exceptional, though it is plain from other sources that the government had already been forced to the familiar expedient of confiscations and indemnities The Delta was disturbed by Arab risings, the most serious of which, that of the Banū Kurra, was put down only with great difficulty by Nāsir al-Dawla (see below) with the Tayy and other Arab troops at Kōm Sharik in 443 (1051) (cf Ibn al-Sairafī, p 42 sq, Ibn al-Athīr, ix 396 sq and for the date Ibn al-Kalānisī, p 85) At the capital there was an increasing state of tension between the Turkish and Berber troops and the enormous bodies of Sūdānī slaves raised by the Caliph's mother (cf Makrīzī, i 94 [ed Wiet, ii 45] and p 335, detailed but probably unreliable figures also in Nāsir i Khusraw, ed Kaviani, p 66) In striking contrast to this is the magnificence of the court and prosperity of Misr-Fustāt as described by Nāsir i Khusraw [q v] There can be little doubt that the source of much of this prosperity, apart from the manufacture and supply of luxuries to the court, is already to be sought in the commercial relations between Egypt and the Indian Ocean on the one hand (cf Nāsir i Khusraw's account of ʿAidhāb) and Constantinople on the other The general insecurity deepened after the execution of al-Yāzūrī, who was the last wazīr to attempt to control the situation He was followed by a rapid succession of puppets in office, many of whom, despite the pompous titles duly recorded by Ibn al-Sairafī, held the position for no more than a few days at a time

The Fāṭimid Caliphate was now destined to pass in a few shattering years through the same agony as the ʿAbbāsid Caliphate at Baghdād had suffered in the early part of the previous century The breakdown of the civil administration and subsequent exhaustion of the treasury gave a free hand to the military, and the sinister policy of the Caliph's mother brought matters speedily to a head In a pitched battle at Kōm al-Rīsh (close to Cairo) in 454 (1062) (sometimes confused with the previous battle at Kōm Sharik) the Turkish and Berber troops led by Nāsir al-Dawla Ibn Hamdān, a descendant of the Hamdānids of Mōsul, defeated and drove the Sūdānīs into the Saʿīd, but the struggle continued for some years and the blacks were not finally routed and driven out until 459 (1067), thereafter they were confined to the Saʿīd, which suffered severely from their plundering and devastations Nāṣir al-Dawla in turn quarrelled with the Turks, and, defeated in battle by a force commanded by al-Mustanṣir in person (461 = 1068—1069), appealed to the Saldjūkid Alp-Arslān [q v] Without waiting for his help, however, he regained control of Cairo and the Delta with the aid of the Arabs and Lawāta Berbers, reduced al Mustanṣir (it is said) to the state of a pensioner on a hundred dīnārs a month, assumed the title of Sultān al-Dawla, and attempted, but unsuccessfully, to restore the ʿAbbāsid khutba In Radjab 465 (March 1073) he and all his house were killed by the rival Turkish faction, led by Ildeguz, under whom the Caliph fared little better Meanwhile the constant anarchy and remorseless plundering of the country by the troops brought agriculture to a standstill (although the Nile floods seem to have been uniformly good) The result was a famine which lasted from 459 to 464 (1067—1072) and became progressively more severe During these years the country was a prey to the utmost misery, the royal city and palaces were looted, and Fusṭāṭ was twice plundered and even burned by Nāṣir al Dawla Large numbers of the population, including even the Caliph's own family, sought refuge in Syria and ʿIrāk (for the depopulation and shrinkage of Fusṭāṭ cf Makrizī, I 5, ed Wiet, I 12, on the fate of the royal library see also Olga Pinto, Le Biblioteche degli Arabi, Rome 1928, p 25—26) The Sunnī historians dwell on this famine with some complacence, regarding it as the retribution for the impious attack of al Basāsīrī on the ʿAbbāsid Caliphate (see below), and circumstantial stories are related of the extreme destitution to which al Mustanṣir himself was reduced That these must be accepted with some reserve is clear from such passages as Ibn Taghribardī, II/II 186, 18—19

At length in 465 (1073) al-Mustanṣir, taking courage of despair, secretly invited the governor of ʿAkkā, the Armenian general Badr al Djamālī, to assume supreme control in Egypt Badr accepted the commission, on condition of bringing his own troops with him, and sailing from ʿAkkā in the winter, reached Cairo on 28th Djumādā I, 466 (Jan 29, 1074) His rapid and energetic movements took the Turks by surprise, and he put to death the whole body of their leaders, together with a large number of Egyptian notables and officials For his further military and administrative measures, by which he restored order and relative prosperity in Egypt (the total revenue of Egypt and its remaining Syrian possessions, which in 466 had amounted to 2,800,000 dīnārs, rose by 483 to 3,100,000 dinārs Makrizī, I 100, ed Wiet, II 68, cf Abū Sālih, fol 7b—9a) see the article BADR AL-DJAMĀLĪ The alliance between general and caliph was cemented by the marriage of Badr's daughter to al-Mustanṣir's youngest son Ahmad, the future Caliph al-Mustaʿlī [q v] The Fātimid Caliphate was saved but, like its ʿAbbāsid rival, at the cost of abandoning its temporal authority to a series of military commanders, entitled umarāʾ al djuyūsh, from whose control it never afterwards succeeded in emancipating itself

Al-Mustanṣir is described in contemporary sources as upright and amiable in character, and just and equitable in his dealings, but as a ruler his personality is entirely obscured by the successive wazīrs and generals who kept him virtually a prisoner The statements of the later anti Fāṭimid writers must, of course, be entirely discounted, the Fātimid sources, on the other hand, praise his sagacity and infallibility (ʿiṣma) as Imām

External relations The empire to which al Mustanṣir succeeded was beyond any doubt the most powerful Muslim state of its time It extended from Ifrikiya and Sicily to Mecca and Central Syria, and maintained an active propagandist organization in ʿIrāk, Persia and Khurāsān (see the following section) Within a few years of his accession its territories were still further expanded by Anūshtagin's conquest of Aleppo in Shaʿbān 429 (May 1038) [cf the articles FĀṬIMIDS and HALAB] and extension of his authority even across the Euphrates, on the one hand, and on the other by the conquests of ʿAlī al Sulaihī in the Yaman, after establishing himself at Masār in the same year (cf SULAIHĪ, also H F al-Hamdani, in Journal of the Royal Central Asian Society, 1931 p 505 sqq, and in J R A S, 1932, p 126 sqq) After the deaths of Anūshtagin and the wazīr al-Djardjarāʾī, who in spite of their rivalry zealously maintained the interests of the dynasty, the power and prestige of the Egyptian court steadily declined The Arab tribes in Syria, though defeated in the field, remained unsubdued, and the Caliph had to be content with the little more than nominal allegiance of the Mirdāsids [q v] at Aleppo At Damascus, the rivalries between the Berber and Turkish troops and the hostility of the citizens reduced the governors to impotence The disturbed state of Syria was the more disastrous that it made it impossible for the Fātimid government to give effective support to the amīr al-Basāsīrī (q v, see the list of war material and subventions sent from Egypt Ibn Taghribardī, p 177) in his attempt to oppose the advancing Saldjūk power, with the result that his occupation of Baghdād and proclamation of al Mustanṣir in 459 (1058—1059) was speedily brought to an end The subsequent military and economic disorders in Egypt allowed a free hand to the Turkmen (Ghuzz) bands, who had appeared in Northern Syria as early as 447 (1055), though it was not until 463 (1071) that the first Saldjūkid armies entered Northern Syria and the Ghuzz bands under Atsiz [q v] occupied Palestine and began to harass Damascus In many of the other towns and districts of Syria the authority was seized by local chiefs, such as the kādis Ibn ʿAmmār (q v, also G Wiet, in Mem Henri Basset, p 279 sqq) at Tarābulus and Ibn Abī ʿAkil at Tyre, though both of these acknowledged the spiritual authority of the Fātimid Caliph (cf also the account of the foundation of the castle of Saikhad by Hassān b Mismār al Kalbī in 466 [1073—1074], quoted from Sibt b al Djawzī in Ibn Taghribardī, p 253) The menace of the Saldjūkids became more substantial after the arrival of Tutush [q v] in 470 (1077—1078), but the latter never actually organized a full campaign against the Fātimids On the contrary, the offensive was taken by Badr, who succeeded in restoring Egyptian control on the coast as far as Tyre, Sidon and Djubail in 482 (1089), but not in recovering the interior of Palestine and Damascus (lost in 468), in spite of a certain revulsion of feeling in Syria in favour of the Fātimids It is difficult to know how much weight to lay on the story (Ibn Taghrībardī, p 272—273) that Tutush at one time proposed to ally himself in marriage with Badr

The success of the Saldjūkids also affected the position of the Fātimids in Arabia In 462 (1069) the ʿAbbāsid Caliph was acknowledged in the Holy Cities, and after a brief return to the Fātimid obedience between 467 and 473 the Hidjāz passed definitely to the ʿAbbāsid cause In the Yaman, the Sulaihids in the interior and the Zuraʿids in the important commercial centre of ʿAden maintained the suzerainty of the Fātimids, the latter until the Ayyūbid conquest by Tūrānshāh in 569 (1173) [cf the art SALADIN]

Meanwhile the Fātimid empire had been similarly shorn of its possessions in the West About 435 (1043–1044) al-Muʿizz b Bādīs [q v], the Zirid lieutenant of the Fātimid Caliph in Kairawān, began a series of repressive measures against the Shīʿites of Ifrīkiya, in 440 he seems to have made the first overt gesture of independence, and in 441 superseded the Fātimid coinage, but it was not until 443 (1051) that he formally renounced the Fatimid suzerainty and obtained an investiture from the ʿAbbāsid Caliph According to the traditional account (already fully developed in Ibn al Sanafi), the wazīr al Yāzūrī in revenge launched against him the nomad bands of the Banū Hilāl (q v, the tribes mentioned in the Egyptian sources are Zughba, Riyah, al-Athbadj, and ʿAdiy), who had been a cause of much trouble to the government in the Saʿid and were now given a free hand to plunder the territories of the Zirids [cf TUNISIA, vol iv 851a] As Wustenfeld has already indicated (p 234 n), the story as it stands is open to serious objections, and there can be little doubt that it has been amplified by popular legend The westward movement of the Hilāl tribes began as early as 440, and there is no reason to reject the account of Ibn ʿIdhārī that it was al-Muʿizz himself who invited the Arab tribes, then in Barka, to enter Ifrīkiya as his djund (since he was not on good terms with the Sanhādja), and that they, having set out in response to his invitation, began to plunder on their own account and already before the close of 443 had inflicted a severe defeat on his troops The two traditions are not, however, mutually exclusive and may be reconciled by supposing that the Banū Hilāl were transported in the first instance to Barka (the governor of which had thrown in his lot with al Muʿizz), and that their advance into Ifrīkiya was facilitated, for opposite reasons, by both al-Muʿizz and the wazīr (cf also Ibn al-Athīr, ix 387—388) During the first years of his reign, the son and successor of al-Muʿizz, Tamīm (453—501 = 1061—1107), temporarily returned to the Fātimid allegiance (Lane Poole, p 138 n 1), but with the conquest of Sicily by the Normans in 463 (1070) Barka became the western limit of the Fātimid state

The diplomatic relations of al-Mustansir with non-Muslim states covered a wide field In 429 (1038) the existing treaty with the Byzantine Emperor was renewed and relatively cordial relations established If Nāsir-i Khusraw (ed Kaviani, p 67) is to be trusted, the Egyptian government was in communication in 439 (1047) also with the Georgians, the Dailamites, the Khākān of Turkistān and even the rādjā of Dihlī, all of whom shared with Egypt a common hostility to the Saldjūkids and the Ghaznevids The friendly relations with Constantinople, however, were broken off in 446 (1054), when the Empress Theodora demanded an offensive alliance against the Saldjūkids Egyptian troops were despatched on an unsuccessful expedition against al-Ruhāikīya, the Empress retaliated by opening negotiations with the Saldjūkids, and al-Mustansir seized the treasures of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre (al-Kumāma) This breach with Constantinople had important consequences for the future of Egypt, since to it may perhaps be ascribed the opening up of direct commercial relations with the Italian trading cities, though documentary evidence on the point is lacking (cf Heyd, Histoire du Commerce du Levant, i 105, 124)

Religious Conditions The wide expansion of the Fātimid power under al-Mustansir is reflected also in the religious situation Propaganda on behalf of the Fātimids is synonymous with the dissemination of the official state religion of the Fātimids, the Ismaʿili-Shiʿite faith Not only in Egypt and other lands in actual subjection to the Fātimid authority, but in all quarters of the Islāmic world, we learn of missionaries (duʿāt), who during the long reign of al Mustansir struggled, in part with great success, to secure recognition of his claim to be the religious Imām In the East, in Persia, and especially in Shīrāz, at the court of the Būyid prince Abū Kalidjār [q v], we can trace the activities at least since 429 (1037—1038) of the dāʿī Abū Nasr Hibat Allāh b Mūsā al-Muʾayyad fī Dīn Allāh [see AL-MUʾAYYAD], doubtless the most prominent personality of his time in the Ismāʿilī daʿwa He endeavoured to win over the court and the Dailamite troops to the Fātimid cause, but was forced to leave his post in 439 (1047—1048) as the result of pro-ʿAbbāsid intrigues In the first part of his autobiography (see Bibl) al-Muʾayyad gives a detailed account of his activity, and in particular publishes his correspondence with an unnamed Sunnī from Khurāsān, in which he explains the religious and political principles of his mission To what an extent the power of the Fātimids and the success of their emissaries in ʿIrāk and Persia was feared at Baghdād is shown by the fact that several times and latterly in 444 (1052), there was published a document, to which the ʿAlids also subscribed, with the object of declaring false the claim of the Fātimids to descent from ʿAlī At the same time the Fātimid cause gained also new ground in the Yaman After the political power of the Fātimids had been reduced there to a minimum in the course of the fourth century, it now acquired in the Sulaihid ʿAlī b Muhammad a powerful supporter He and his successors regarded themselves not only as political but also as religious representatives of the Fātimid Imām in the Yaman The voluminous correspondence between the Sulaihid rulers and al-Mustansir, which is still preserved, collected in a separate work (Kitāb al-Sidjillāt wa 'l-Tawkiʿāt wa 'l-Kutub li-Mawlānā al-Mustansir bi 'llāh, MS Sch Or St, many of these letters are also reproduced in Idrīs, vol vii [see Bibl]), deals, along with political questions, in the first place with the position of the daʿwa in the Yaman and in the Fātimid state

In Egypt itself, soon after the accession of al-Mustansir, the doctrines of the moderate official Ismāʿīlīya were threatened by the appearance of extremists related to the Druzes [q v] A pretender, al-Sikkīn, together with his associate al-ʿĀnī, gave himself out as the returned Caliph al-Hākim, but was promptly unmasked (Idrīs, vi 296) Al-Mu'ayyad, who came to Cairo in 439 and won the goodwill of Mustansir, was entrusted with the leadership of the religious mission as Dā'ī 'l Du'āt (it should be remarked, however, that al Yāzūrī during his wazirate also held the title of dā'ī 'l-du'āt, cf Ibn al-Ṣairafī, p 40) In the reopened seminary in Cairo, where the du'āt of the various countries received instruction, he gave his lectures and gathered into his hands the strings of the whole da'wa He appears to have exercised a special influence over the development of the da'wa in the Yaman, as the future Yamanite dā'ī Lamak b Mālik was numbered amongst his pupils From Persia the newly-converted Ismā'īlī Nāṣir-i Khusraw [q v] came to Egypt, to find his master in him At the same time al-Mu'ayyad seems also to have played an important political role In his autobiography he quotes numerous letters which he wrote to al Basāsīrī and other generals of the Fatimids in Syria and Mesopotamia In particular it was at his instigation that the khuṭba for the Fāṭimids was introduced into the prayer at Baghdād in 450 (cf Ibn Muyassar, p 8, 1, 10, 6–7) In his poems he eulogizes the Imām al-Mustansir in a similar manner to Nāṣir i Khusraw Other Ismā'īlī authors of this period were the poet Ḥasan b Mahbūb, the dā'ī Aḥmad b Ibrāhīm al Nīsābūrī, and the author of the Kitāb al Madjālis al-Mustansiriyya (lectures in which the imāmate of al Mustansir is demonstrated with the aid of the Ismā'īlī ta'wīl), which are ascribed by the Fāṭimid tradition to Badr al-Djamālī — For the Fāṭimid propaganda in Transoxania see also Barthold, *Turkestan*², G M S, p 304—305

Bibliography Ibn al-Ṣairafī, al-Ishāra ilā man nāla 'l-Wizāra, ed A Mukhlis, Cairo 1924, p 57—77, Ibn al Kalānisī, Dhayl Ta'rīkh Dimashk, ed Amedroz, p 84—128, Nāṣir i Khusraw, Safar Nāma, ed Kaviani, Berlin 1341, p 54—82, transl Schefer, Paris 1881, p 110—162, Abū Ṣālih, ed Evetts, fol 9a, 24a–b, 33a, 51a, Djamāl al Dīn al Halabī, Ta'rīkh al-Duwal al-Munkaṭi'a, British Museum Or 3685, fol 68a—74b, Gotha No 1555, fol 152b—158a, Ibn al-Athīr, al Kāmil, ed Tornberg, ix 304—x 161, Ibn 'Idhārī, ed Dozy, i 285—292 298 sqq, Sibt b al-Djawzī, Mir'āt al-Zamān, vol xii, Paris 641 [not consulted], Ibn Muyassar (? Mīsar), Akhbār Miṣr, ed Masse, Cairo 1919, p 1—43, Ibn Khallikān, transl de Slane, iii 381, Ibn Taghribirdī, al-Nudjūm al Zāhira, ed Popper, ii/ii 168—296, al-Makrizī, al-Khiṭaṭ, ed Būlāk, i 99—100, 335—336, and other passages, Ibn Hammād, Akhbār Mulūk Banī 'Ubaid, ed Vonderheyden, p 59, Idrīs b al-Ḥasan (d 872), 'Uyūn al-Akhbār, vi 292—vii 150, al-Mu'ayyad fi 'l Dīn, al-Sīra al Mu'ayyadiyya (Autobiography) (the latter two in MSS in the collection of H F al-Ḥamdanī) — The section dealing with religious conditions is also based on other unpublished MSS in the same collection — F Wustenfeld, Gesch der Fat Caliphen, p 227—271, S Lane-Poole, Hist of Egypt in the Middle Ages, p 136—161, J Mann, The Jews in Egypt and Palestine under the Fatimid Caliphs, Oxford 1920—1922, i 75—83, ii 79—80, 376—377, and the articles quoted above

(H A R GIBB and P KRAUS)

MUSTA'RIB(A) (A), "arabicised", the name of one of the groups into which the Arab genealogists divide the population of Arabia The first is the 'arab 'āriba, the original Arabs of pure stock, they numbered nine (some say seven) tribes which are regarded as the descendants of Aram b Sām b Nūh [q v] and the first settlers in Arabia 'Ād, Thamūd, Umayyim, 'Abīl, Tasm, Djadīs, 'Imlik, Djurhum and Wabār These are extinct except for a few remnants incorporated in other tribes The second group comprises the muta'rriba [q v] who are not pure blooded Arabs They are regarded as descendants of Kahtān (the Yoktān of the list of nations in Gen x 25 sq) and live in southern Arabia The third group is called musta'riba, this name is also applied to tribes who were not originally Arabs, they trace their descent from Ma'add b 'Adnān, a descendant of Ismā'īl [q v] All the north Arabian tribes are included among the musta'riba, so that the Banū Kuraysh to which Muḥammad belonged is one of them, his genealogy is in this way traced back to Abraham and he thus thought he could prove his connection with the Biblical prophets The old term musta'riba, for tribes not originally of Arab descent, obtained a new meaning after the conquest of Spain It was applied to the Christian Spaniards who adopted Islām, the word musta'riba was corrupted to Mozarab [q v]

Bibliography Caetani, Annali dell' Islām, i, § 43, do, Studi di Storia Orientale, i 306, sq, Caussin de Perceval, Essai sur l'Histoire des Arabes, i 6 sqq, C Ritter, Arabien, i 57, al-Suyūṭī, Muzhir, 1st Naw', Tādj al-'Arūs, i 371, cf Lane, Lex, s v

(IIsf LICHTENSTADTER)

AL MUSTARSHID BI 'LLĀH, ABŪ MANṢŪR AL-FADI, 'Abbāsid caliph, born in 486 (1093—1094), son of al-Mustazhir and a slave girl Al-Mustarshid, who was proclaimed his father's successor after the latter's death on 16th Rabī' II 512 (Aug 6, 1118), was the first caliph since the occupation of Baghdād by the Būyids who was not content with spiritual supremacy but also endeavoured to revive the caliph's authority in temporal matters The Saldjūk sultān had died before al Mustazhir (Dhu 'l-Ḥidjdja 511 = April 1118) and his son Maḥmūd [q v] was appointed his successor His uncle Sandjar and his brother Mas'ūd both rebelled against the new sultān and the turbulent Mazyadī Dubays b Ṣadaka [q v] was raising trouble in the 'Irāk and had also quarrelled with the caliph The latter defeated him in 517 (1123) and after al-Mustarshid had repelled a regular attack on the capital he was able to adopt a more independent attitude to the Saldjūks But as his increasing power aroused the misgivings of the governor of Baghdād, the latter in Radjab 520 (July–Aug 1126) went to Sultān Maḥmūd and asked him to put a limit to the caliph's powers Maḥmūd agreed and attacked the capital while al-Mustarshid sent an army against Wāsiṭ in order to seize this town The attempt failed however, towards the end of the year Maḥmūd entered Baghdād and al Mustarshid could not hold out indefinitely but had to make peace, whereupon the sultān appointed 'Imād al-Dīn Zangī governor of Baghdād and all the 'Irāk But in Djumādā II 521 (July 1127) the latter was given the governorship of al-Mawṣil and after Maḥmūd's death (525 = 1131) the succession was again disputed In 526 Dubays and Zangī undertook a campaign against Baghdād but were defeated by the caliph at the end of Radjab (June 1132) and in the same year Masʿūd [q v] had to give him complete control of Baghdād and the surrounding country After some time he attacked the sultān but was taken prisoner in Ramadān 529 (Jan 1135) and murdered in Dhu 'l-Kaʿda of the same year (Aug 1135) [cf the art DUBAIS B ṢADAKA]

Bibliography Ibn al Athīr, ed Tornberg, x—xi, see index, Ibn al-Ṭiktakā, al-Fakhrī, ed Derenbourg, p 406—415, Muhammad b Shākir, Fawāt al-Wafayāt, ii 124 sq, Ibn Khaldūn, al-ʿIbar, iii 495 sqq, Hamd Allāh Mustawfī-i Kazwīnī, Taʾrīkh i Guzīda, ed Browne, i 361 sqq, Weil, Gesch d Chalifen, iii 212–253, Muller, Der Islam im Morgen- und Abendland, ii 127 sqq, Muir, The Caliphate, its Rise, Decline, and Fall, new ed, p 583 sqq, Houtsma, Recueil de textes relatifs a l'histoire des Seldjoucides, ii 104, 120, 152, 160, 174—178, Le Strange, Baghdad during the Abbasid Caliphate, p 195, 259, 275 (K V ZETTERSTÉEN)

MUSTASHĀR (A), councillor, Turkish pronunciation musteshār, meaning "general secretary to a ministry" or "under secretary of state" The word which means literally "one who is consulted" comes from the same root as mushīr [q v] which properly means "he who gives advice" Sāmī Bey regards the word musteshār as a synonym of the old Turkish inal — The office was called musteshārī or more simply musteshārlīk

Like the title mushīr, that of musteshār was created by Mahmūd II There were at first two musteshār in the grand-vizierate, one for foreign and the other for home affairs The latter was later replaced by a Minister of the Interior who had in his turn a musteshār The number of musteshār gradually increased but some less important departments had muʿāwin "assistant, deputy" (in 1296 for example there were muʿāwin in the finance and police departments) The office has been retained under the present republic and each ministry or wekālet has its musteshār, that of national defence has three (for army, navy and air force)

The chief judge of Istanbul used to have a musteshār According to Lutfī Efendi, the post of musteshār of the Navy was created in 1253 (v, p 91) and that of musteshār of the sadreyn or of the two kazaʿker in 1262 (viii, p 127) On the honorary grades of musteshār cf the same author, vi, p 66, cf also p 103, line 8 from below

Musteshār is also the name given to the "councillors" of Turkish or foreign embassies or legations The title of mustashār awwal borne by the ambassador himself, sent by the Sultān of Morocco to Stambul in 1197, is inexplicable to us (cf Djewdet Pasha, edition 1309, ii, p 251, cf Recueil de Memoires Orientaux de l'Ec des Langues Orientales à Paris, 1905, p 6)

As to the term mushāwir, a synonym of the preceding and from the same root, it is applied to technical advisers, whether foreigners or not, hukūk mushāwirī "legal adviser"

Bibliography Cf the various Ottoman calendars The historians Ahmed Djewdet and Lutfī, following their predecessors, give no details of the administrative organisation (J DENY)

AL-MUSTAʿṢIM BI' ALLĀH, ABŪ AḤMAD ʿABD ALLĀH B AL-MUSTANSIR, the last ʿAbbāsid caliph of Baghdād, born in 609 (1212/3) After the death of his father in Djumādā I or II 640 (Nov /Dec 1242) he was raised to the caliph's throne but he had neither the talent nor the strength to avert the catastrophe threatening from the Mongols, he allowed himself to be guided by bad councillors who were not agreed among themselves but working against one another In 683 (1255/6) the Mongol Khān Hūlāgū [q v] demanded that the Muslim rulers should make war on the Ismāʿīlis The caliph did not trouble about this and in Rabīʿ I 655 (March/April 1257) a Mongol embassy came to Baghdād and demanded that al Mustaʿṣim should raze the defences of the city and appear in person before Hūlāgū for further negotiations or send a deputy As the caliph refused to meet these demands, Hūlāgū threatened him with war After another message in which al-Mustaʿṣim tried to intimidate Hūlāgū, the latter set out against the ancient city of the caliphs On the way he met another embassy, offering him an annual tribute but this effort to appease the cruel foe was useless and by Muharram 656 (Jan 1258) the Mongols were at the gates of Baghdad Preparations for the siege advanced rapidly and after all attempts to resume negotiations had failed against the relentless Hūlāgū, al-Mustaʿṣim had to surrender on 4th Ṣafar (10th Feb) and the city was sacked Ten days later Hūlāgū had the caliph with some of his relations put to death [cf the art BAGHDĀD]

Bibliography Ibn al Ṭiktakā, al-Fakhrī (ed Derenbourg), p 448—458, Muhammad b Shākir, Fawāt al-Wafayāt, i 237—239, Ibn Khaldūn, al-ʿIbar, iii 536 sqq, Rashīd al Dīn (ed Quatremere), i 228 sqq, Hamd Allāh Mustawfī-i Kazwīnī, Taʾrīkh-i Guzīda (ed Browne), i 371–373, Weil, Gesch d Chalifen, iii 470–478, Le Strange, Baghdad during the Abbasid Caliphate, see index, A Muller, Der Islam, i 640, ii 228 sqq, Muir, The Caliphate, new ed, p 590 sqq (K V ZETTERSTÉEN)

MUSTAWFĪ, an official in charge of government accounts Under the Turkish systems, e g under the Ghaznawids and Saldjūks, the title was borne by a functionary of high rank who was at the head of the dīwān concerned with keeping the tally of public income and expenditure Under the Nizām al Mulk the office of the mustawfī was second only to that of the vizier (Bundārī, ed Houtsma, p 100) and appears to have corresponded to the dīwān al-zimām or dīwān al azimma, the "Bureau of (Financial) Control" of the ʿAbbāsids (Tabarī, iii 522), although the Saldjūks also had a dīwān of this name tenable by the mustawfī himself (Bundārī, p 58) The qualities requisite in him were such as to fit him for the vizierate itself (ibid, p 96), and indeed there were duties which were common to the two offices so that the same man could act as the nāʾib in both (ibid, p 129, last line) The vizierate might be refused by a powerful mustawfī holding all the reins of government in his hands and reluctant to expose himself to the dangers inherent in the nominally more exalted office (ibid, p 136, 141) But no officer was safe from a capricious or greedy monarch and the mustawfī Safī al-Dīn suffered death and the confiscation of a large part of his property at the hands of Sultān Masʿūd (ibid, p 171) It is probable that the actual title of the State mustawfī was mustawfi 'l-mamlaka or something similar (ibid, p 31), the ordinary mustawfī, or accountant, holding a subordinate position (ibid, p 31, 3)

Under the Mongols the title was given to the superintendents of provincial finances (e g Hamd Allāh Mustawfī and his great grandfather, cf E G Browne, Lit Hist of Persia, III 87), and under the Timūrids, Safawids and Kādjārs, the mustawfi 'l-mamālik filled the office of a secretary of state in charge of the public treasury accounts while the ordinary mustawfī was one of the lesser officers of the court (R du Mans, Estat de la Perse en 1660, ed Schefer, Paris 1890, p 26, 178 sq , A Olearius, Voyages and Travels, London 1669, p 274, Sir J Malcolm, History of Persia, London 1815, II 437, R G Watson, History of Persia, London 1866, p 16 sq) Mustawfi 'l-mamālik might however, under the latest Kādjārs, be a title personal to a particular individual, who might be the Minister of the Interior (as in 1890) or even Prime Minister (as in 1910)

In Egypt, under the Fātimids and Mamlūks, the mustawfī might be the head of a dīwān (as of the dīwān al-djaish) or hold a less exalted, but still important, position as financial controller in such matters as the ikta'āt, or military fiefs (cf Makrīzī, Khitat, Būlāk 1270, II 193, middle and p 227, under nazr al djaish) The ordinary mustawfī was a minor official of the status of a clerk employed under a shādd, or overseer, in land-surveys or crop estimation or else in a government office such as the depot of the government grain monopoly (op cit, ed Wiet, II, ch 32, p 23—25)

Bibliography In addition to works cited in the article, see Quatremère, Hist des Sultans mamlouks de Makrizi, I/i , p 202 sq , Mīrzā Muhammad Kazwīnī, Mukaddama to Djuwainī, Ta'rīkh i Djahān-gushā (in G M S), I/xi (L)

(R Ievy)

MUSTAWFĪ [see Hamd Allāh]

AL-MUSTAZHIR BI 'LLĀH, Abu 'l-'Abbās Ahmad b al-Muktadī, 'Abbāsid caliph After the death of his father in Muharram 487 (Feb 1094) the young al-Mustazhir succeeded him, about this time the power of the Saldjūks was beginning to be weakened by internal dissensions [cf BARKIYĀRŪK] The Assassins, who had already appeared on the scene in al Muktadī's reign, were able to take advantage of the situation and fighting this dangerous sect soon became one of the most important tasks of the sultāns and caliphs The Crusades also began at this time In Sha'bān 492 (July 1099) Jerusalem was taken and in the following years numerous fugitives reached Baghdād who urged Sultān Muhammad to take part in the struggle He therefore sent an army under the emīr Mawdūd against the Crusaders in 505 (1111/12) Al Mustazhir, who is hardly ever mentioned in the political history of this period, died on 16 Rabī' II 512 (Aug 6, 1118) at the age of 41

Bibliography Ibn al-Athīr (ed Tornberg), X 154 sqq , Ibn al-Tiktakā, al-Fakhrī (ed Derenbourg), p 403—406, Ibn Khaldūn, al 'Ibar, III 480 sqq , Hamd Allāh Mustawfī i Kazwīnī, Ta'rīkh-i Guzīda (ed Browne), I 360 sq , Weil, Gesch d Chalifen, III 138 sq , Muir, The Caliphate, its Rise, Decline, and Fall, new ed , p 582 sq , Houtsma, Recueil de textes relatifs à l'histoire des Seldjoucides, II 83, 95, 119, 261, 265, Le Strange, Baghdad during the Abbasid Caliphate, see index

(K V Zetterstéen)

MUSULMAN [See Muslim]

MU'TA, a town in the centre of a fertile plain in the land east of Jordan, east of the southern end of the Dead Sea, about two hours' journey south of Kerak, celebrated for the defeat of the Muslims there in Djumādā I of the year 8 According to the Arabic account, the reason why Muhammad sent 3,000 men to this region was that an envoy whom he had sent to the king (presumably the imperial commandant) of Bosrā had been murdered by a Ghassānid, but the real reason seems to have been that he wished to bring the (Christian or pagan) Arabs living there under his control If the story is correct that he chose three leaders for the expedition, Zaid b Hāritha [q v] and if he fell his cousin Dja'far b Abī Tālib [q v] and if he also fell the poet 'Abd Allāh b Rawāha [q v], he must have fully recognised the hazardous nature of the enterprise, but the tendency of the stories to describe the dangers of the expedition and the overwhelming nature of the opposing force as very great in order to put the unfortunate result of the battle in a better light is quite evident In Hassān b Thābit (xxi , cf cxlviii) we are only told that the three leaders above mentioned fell in succession When the Muslims arrived in Ma'ān in eastern Edom, they learned that no less than 100,000 Byzantine soldiers and Beduins — a much exaggerated figure which Ibn Hishām doubles — had assembled in Ma'āb Musil (Arabia Petraea, I 29) locates this Ma'āb, which according to Tabarī, I 2108, was not a town but a camp (fustāt), at Ladjdjūn, a place near a spring with traces of an old Roman camp But Abu 'l-Fidā' identifies it with al Rabba which he describes as a village on the site of the former capital of the district, i e Rabbot Moab or Areopolis (P Thomsen, Loca Sancta, p 25, Brunnow, M N D P V, 1895, p 70 sq with photographs, Musil, op cit, p 370 sqq , 381) According to the Arab story, it was the emperor Heraclius himself who assembled this great army in Ma'āb, which is of course not true When the Muslims heard this, we are told, they lost courage and wanted to wait until the Prophet could send them reinforcements but 'Abd Allāh b Rawāha was able to fill them with such enthusiasm for a possible martyr's death that they marched on the imperial army According to Ibn Hishām, the latter met them at a village belonging to Balkā' called Mashārif, but this must be a misunderstanding as this term means the Syrian fortresses on the edge of the desert At the sight of the great force of the enemy, they withdrew to the south but fighting began at the village of Mu'ta and they were routed When the three leaders named by Muhammad had fallen in the order indicated, they wanted Thābit b Aikān to take command but he gave it to Khālid b al Walīd who succeeded in saving the rest of the force, this was the first occasion on which his military talents benefitted the Muslims, how he did it, we do not know as the stratagem related by Wāķidī, p 312 is not to be taken seriously Besides the Muslim account, we have a Byzantine one, the earliest in the history of the Prophet, by the historian Theophanes, whose version bears the stamp of veracity According to him Muhammad sent four chiefs to the land east of Jordan against the Christian Arabs there They went to a village named Mucheon, which de Goeje, Mémoire sur la conquête de la Syrie[2], p 6 sqq , takes to be a copyist's error for Ma'āb, while Musil, op cit, p 153, identifies it with Khirbet al Mahna which lies in a broad depression, in order to fall upon the Arabs on a feastday (ἡμέρᾳ τῆς εἰδωλοθυσίας αὐτῶν, which seems to indicate a heathen rather than a Christian population) but the vicarius Theodoros there learned of their plans and rapidly collecting the garrisons of the fortresses, fell upon the Muslims at Mu'ta and defeated them Three of the leaders and most of the force were killed and Chaledos who was called the "sword of God", alone succeeded in escaping The tombs of the martyrs who fell there used to be pointed out at Mu'ta, where a mausoleum was built over them

Bibliography Ibn Hishām, ed Wustenfeld, p 791 sqq, Tabarī, ed de Goeje, i 1610 sqq, Wāḳidī, transl Wellhausen, Ibn Sa'd, ed Sachau, II/i 92 sqq, cf III/II 82, 14, IV 22 sqq, Caetani, Annali dell' Islām, II 80—88, Mas'ūdī, B G A, VIII 327, Theophanes, ed de Boor, I 335, Lammens, Le Berceau de l'Islam, p 176, Ya'kūbī, B G A, VII 326, Mukaddasī, B G A, III 178, Yākūt, Mu'djam, ed Wüstenfeld, IV 677, Abu 'l-Fidā', ed Reinaud and de Slane, p 247, Musil, Arabia Petraea, I 152, Probst, Die geogr Verhältnisse Syriens u Palastinas nach Wilhelm v Tyrus (Das Land der Bibel), 1927, I 73 (FR BUHL)

MUT'A (A), temporary marriage (according to the Arab lexicographers "marriage of pleasure"), a marriage which is contracted for a fixed period on rewarding the woman

I Before Islām According to Ammianus Marcellinus, XIV 4, 4, temporary marriage was in use among the Arabs already in the fourth century A D, but this can hardly be a reference to mut'a as the woman brings a lance and tent to the man and can leave him if she likes after the period has elapsed It is also doubtful if there is a distinct mu'ta character in the marriage of Hāshim with Salma bint 'Amr, whom he married during a temporary stay in Yathrib and left with her family there after the birth of her child (Caetani, I 111, § 92) From the passage Aghānī, XVI 63 (matti'ūnī biha 'l-latīa) as well as from Muslim traditions it may be concluded that mut'a was known in the Djāhilīya If we remember that the same kind of temporary marriage as the mut'a was known in Erythraea (Conti Rossini, Principi di diritto consuetudinario, Rome 1916, p 189, 249) it seems to me certain that mut'a is an old Arabian institution (Temporary marriage is also found among other peoples cf Wilken, p 21 sq, Westermarck, History of Human Marriage, London 1925, III 267 sq, cf also the ἄγραφος γάμος in Egypt, to which Griffini, p 327 calls attention, in a demotic document there is a reference to such a marriage for five months cf Mitteis-Wilcken, Grundzuge der Papyruskunde, II/i, p 203 sqq)

II In the Kur'ān there is undoubtedly a reference to this form of marriage in the Medīna sūra IV 28, although the orthodox explanation of this passage as early as the first century refers it to the ordinary nikāh, after giving a list of the classes of women with whom marriage is forbidden, it goes on "And further you are permitted to seek out wives with your wealth, in modest conduct but not in fornication, but give them their reward (udjūr) for what you have enjoyed of them (istamta'tum) in keeping with your promise" After istamta'tum, Ubaï b Ka'b and Ibn 'Abbās read the words ilā adjalin musamman "for a definite period" (Tabarī, Tafsīr, V 9), a reading which naturally has not found its way into Sunnī circles but is often added in Shī'a books

III The traditions are contradictory on the question of mut'a According to some, it was in use in the time of the Prophet and he was even said to have practised it (matta'ahā Tabarī, Annales, I 1775, 1776, cf Caetani, II 478, N° 17 and 19) In return for a robe or a handful of dates one could take an unmarried woman (uyyām) for a period of cohabitation (Muslim, Nikāh, tr 13, 17, Tayālisī, N° 1637) Especially when a man came to a strange town he could marry a woman there for the period of his stay so that she could look after him (Tirmidhī, Nikāh, bāb 28)

On the other hand, according to one tradition related by 'Alī, it was forbidden by the Prophet on the day (or in the year) of Khaibar (Bukhārī, Maghāzī, bāb 38, Dhabā'ih, bāb 28, Nikāh, bāb 31, Muslim, Nikāh, tr 31—34, Nasa'ī, Nikāh, bāb 71 ["on the day of Hunain" must here be a mistake for Khaibar], Said, bāb 31, Ibn Mādja, Nikāh, bāb 44, Tirmidhī, Nikāh, bāb 28, At'ima, bāb 6, Mālik, Nikāh, II 41, Ahmad b Hanbal, I 79, 103, 142, Tayālisī, N° 111, Zaid, Madjmū', N° 718)

According to other traditions, he is said to have permitted it for a short time on particular occasions In this connection we have a group of traditions which goes back to Sabra b Ma'bad, the various accounts of this, some long, some short, which supplement one another are in part given without date (Muslim, Nikāh, tr 20, 26, Nasā'ī, Nikāh, bāb 71, Abū Dāwūd, Nikāh, bab 13, Ahmad b Hanbal, III 404), in part referred to the conquest of Mecca (Muslim, Nikāh, tr 21, 24, 25, 27, 28, Dārimī, Nikāh, bāb 16, Ahmad b Hanbal, III 404, 405), and in part to the farewell pilgrimage (Ibn Mādja, Nikāh, bāb 44, Dārimī, Nikāh, bāb 16, Abū Dāwūd, Nikāh, bāb 13, Ahmad b Hanbal, III 404 sq) Their substance is as follows The Prophet permitted mut'a, Sabra therefore went with a companion to a woman and each offered her his cloak She chose the younger with the shabbier cloak and slept three nights with him, thereupon the Prophet forbade it According to the stories associated with the farewell pilgrimage, the woman wished mut'a only for a fixed period so that ten days or nights was agreed upon, but the Prophet forbade it after the first night, saying "Whoever of you has married a woman for a period, shall give her what he promised and ask nothing of it back and he shall separate from her, for God has forbidden this up to the day of resurrection" (For the conclusion cf also the fragments of this in Muslim, Nikāh, tr 23, 30)

According to a second group of traditions, which goes back to Djābir b 'Abd Allāh and Salama b al-Akwa', the Prophet permitted mut'a for three days on a campaign (Bukhārī, Nikāh, bāb 71, Muslim, Nikāh, tr 14, 15, Ahmad b Hanbal, IV 47, 51, according to Muslim, Nikāh, tr 19 and Ahmad b Hanbal, IV 55, this was in the year of Awtās, i e shortly after the capture of Mecca) In Bukhārī we have at the end "The partnership of the two parties lasted three nights, and if they agreed to extend it they did so, and if they wished to separate, they did so" A prohibition is given only in two versions in this group

According to other traditions, mut'a was first forbidden by the caliph 'Omar at the end of his caliphate (Muslim, Nikāh, tr 16—18, Ahmad b Hanbal, iii 304, 380 and iii 325, 356, 363, where there is a reference to the two kinds of mut'a, i e tamattu' on the pilgrimage and mut'at al-nisā') 'Omar threatened the punishment of stoning so that he regarded mut'a as fornication (Ibn Mādja, Nikāh, bāb 44, Mālik, Nikāh, tr 42, Tayālisī, N° 1792) Cf the angry exclamation of Ibn 'Omar when he was asked about mut'a "By Allāh, we were not immodest in the time of the Prophet of Allāh nor fornicators" (Ahmad b Hanbal, ii 95, 104)

What then is at the bottom of these contradictory traditions? While Wellhausen regards mut'a as simply prostitution and not an old Arabian custom, Caetani points out that the traditions agree in connecting mut'a with an entrance of the Prophet into Mecca and sometimes even with the hadjdj and that a three days' duration is a feature of the mut'a, taking account of other considerations, he concludes that mut'a in the pagan period was religious prostitution on the occasion of the Meccan festival However tempting this explanation may be, there is a complete lack of evidence for any religious prostitution in Mecca With Wilken and Robertson Smith, we must rather regard mut'a as the survival into Islām of an old Arabian custom The Prophet gives this custom sanction in the Kur'ān and also practised it himself The traditions, if examined carefully, only mention two cases of prohibition by the Prophet Khaibar and Mecca As both these are later than the above Kur'ānic passage (years 3—5, according to Noldeke-Schwally, i 198) this prohibition would be quite possible But since on the other hand the caliph 'Omar prohibited mut'a, which there is no reason to doubt, we might regard the tradition of prohibition as representing later views, which, as is often the case, are put back to the time of the Prophet

IV Attitude of the fukahā' 'Ibn Abbās (d 68) was an ardent champion of mut'a (Bukhārī, Nikāh, bāb 31, Muslim, Nikāh, tr 18, Tayālisī, N° 1792, Rāzī, Mafātih al Ghaib, Cairo 1324, iii 195) In Mecca and the Yaman, according to Ibn Rushd (Bidāya, Cairo 1339, ii 54), he also had followers, but before his death he is said to have been converted to the opposite view (Tirmidhī, Nikāh, bāb 28, Rāzī, loc cit) In later times, people still spoke derisively of a marriage by a fetwā of Ibn 'Abbās In the second half of the first century in Mecca, fetwās were still given permitting mut'a (Muslim, Nikāh, tr 29) The Kur'ān commentators Mudjāhid (d 100), Sa'īd b Djubair (d 95), and al-Suddī (d 127) also referred the above verse of the Kur'ān to mut'a Suddī says that it is a marriage for a fixed period and that it should be concluded with the permission of the walī and with two witnesses, that after the expiry of this period the man has no longer any claim on the woman and that the two parties cannot inherit from one another (Tabarī, Tafsīr, v 8) With the second century, the contrary view begins to predominate, although individuals like 'Amr b Dīnār (d 126), Ibn Djuraidj (d 150) and the Zaidī sect of the Djārūdīya permit mut'a (Ibn Rushd, loc cit, van Arendonk, Opkomst etc, Leyden 1919, p 72, note 9), al-Thawrī (d 161), Ibn al-Mubārak (d 181) (Tirmidhī, Nikāh, bāb 28) and all the Sunnī schools of law as well as the Zaidīs (al-Nātik bi 'l-Hakk, Tahrīr, Berlin MS, Glaser 74, fol 53b) consider mut'a forbidden Its recognition was now limited to the Shī'a And if the caliph Ma'mūn tried to introduce mut'a again, this was certainly due to his Shī'ī tendencies (Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, ii 218)

At the same time, we still have in the second century the opinions of a period of transition According to Zufar (d 158), the marriage concluded under the form of mut'a was valid as a marriage but its limitation in time was invalid (Sarakhsī, Mabsūt, v 153, cf also Bukhārī, Hiyal, bāb 4) According to al-Hasan b Ziyād al Lu'lu'ī (d 204), the mut'a was valid if the partners could not survive the time fixed, e g 100 years or more (Sarakhsī, loc cit)

But in spite of their refusal to recognise mut'a, the Sunnīs made concessions by which mut'a gained a footing in another form It became the practice not to insert a definite period in the contract, any agreement made outside the contract was not affected by the law Al-Shāfi'ī (Umm, v 71) for example, declared a marriage valid when it was concluded with the unuttered resolution (niya) to observe it only for the period of stay in a place or for a few days only, so long as this was not expressly stipulated in the contract Similarly if agreement to this effect (murāwada) had been previously made and even if made on oath, but he describes such an agreement as makrūh There are also traces in later literature of a decision by Mālik by which he permitted mut'a (Sarakhsī, v 152, Badā'ūnī, Muntakhab al-Tawārikh, ed Lees, ii 208 sqq) although only the contrary is recorded in the Muwatta' and Mudawwana (iv 46)

A good exposition of the two opposite points of view is given from the Sunnī side by Kāsānī (d 587), Bada'i' al-Sana'i', Cairo 1327, ii 272—274 and in Rāzī, op cit, iii 193—198 and from the Shī'ī side by 'Alam al Hudā al-Murtadā, Intisār, Teheran 1315, p 60—65 The Sunnīs refer the verse above mentioned from the Kur'ān to regular marriage and declare the adjr to be mahr, while the Shī'is base their view on this verse and consider the traditions of prohibition not to be abrogatory and do not consider 'Omar authoritative for a prohibition The Imāmis even go so far as to say "The believer is only perfect when he has experienced a mut'a" (al Hurr al-'Āmilī, v 69, 2)

V The teachings of the Imāmis 1 Form Mut'a is an irrevocable (lāzim) contract which, like every contract, comes into existence through kabūl and īdjāb It may be concluded with the words nikāh, tazwidj or tamattu', but must always contain a precise statement of the period (adjal) and a definite recompense (adjr or mahr) This recompense may be the dowry usual in other marriages or a handful of corn, a dirham or such like The period may vary from a day to months or even years Witnesses are not necessary, nor need it be concluded before the kādī, if the partners are capable of using the formulae correctly If the mahr is not given, the contract is invalid If the period is not given, according to some it is a regular marriage if the word tamattu' was not used at the end of the ceremony, in the latter case the contract is again invalid

2 The two partners must naturally fulfil the usual conditions for the conclusion of an agreement The woman must further be unmarried and chaste (ʿafīfa) and if possible ought to know about mutʿa, i e be a Shīʿī, and can only contract a temporary marriage with a Muslim According to Ibn Bābūye (d 381) and al-Mufīd (d 413), mutʿa with an unbeliever is forbidden, even with a member of the possessors of a scripture (kitābiya) The nawāsib (extreme Khāridjīs) are included among the unbelievers According to most Imāmīs (and Tūsī also) however, mutʿa with a Christian or Jewish woman is permitted but makrūh with a madjūsīya Mutʿa with a slave girl is only admitted with the consent of her master Usually the woman contracts the marriage without a walī, only a virgin (bikr), according to some, requires her father s consent (Abu 'l-Ṣalāh, d 82, Ibn Bābūye, d 381, Ibn al-Barrādj, d 481, cf Hillī, III 92) The man may in this way take other wives in addition to his four legal wives, especially on journeys He must not, however, take two sisters at the same time, not even during the ʿidda

3 The mutʿa ends on the expiry of the period agreed upon It cannot be prolonged by arrangement between the two parties, a new temporary marriage with a new mahr must rather be contracted at the end of the period Divorce is impossible, according to some, however, liʿān and ẓihār are permitted

4 There is no obligation on the man to provide food and home for the woman The two partners cannot inherit from one another, but according to some, inheritance may be provided for in the contract The ʿidda after the expiry of the mutʿa is two periods or 45 days, i e the ʿidda of a slave-girl There is, however, disagreement whether on the man's death the period of waiting is the usual one for a wife or that for a slave The children go with the father

VI Modern practice Although these Shīʿī views have a certain amount of moral support, the mutʿa in many cases can only be described as legalised prostitution It is true that in Persia such marriages are made for very long periods, e g 99 years, but the Persian, when on a journey, temporarily marries in any place where he is stopping for some time and in the towns and caravanserais mollahs and other brokers offer a wife to each new arrival To make this business more profitable, the ʿidda period is evaded by concluding a second temporary marriage with the same man after the expiry of the first, for in the case of such a marriage the ʿidda is not necessary This marriage and a woman of this kind is called in Persia sīghe (lit "form" i e of the contract) Cf Olearius [1637], Muscowit u pers Reyse, Schlesswig 1656, p 609, Chardin [1673], Voyages, Paris 1811, II 222—223, 225—227, Polak, Persien, Leipzig 1865, I 207 sq , E G Browne, A year amongst the Persians, Cambridge 1927, p 505 sq , H Norden, Persien, Leipzig 1929, p 148, 167, and the romance of the traveller James Morier, The adventures of Hajji Baba of Ispahan, 1824, part III , chap 6—8

The constantly quoted story (first in Wilken, p 19) of Alex Hamilton (A new account of the East Indies, Edinburgh 1727, I 51) that at the beginning of the XVIIIth century temporary marriages were publicly negotiated in Sounan (= Sanʿā') in South Arabia and concluded before the kādī, is a very improbable one, for Hamilton knew only the coast-towns from his own observation and wrote his account of his travels later from memory He seems to be confusing them with conditions in Persian towns, and he makes mistakes on other matters

In Mecca, in modern as well as ancient times (for the middle ages cf Lisān al-ʿArab wa mutʿat al tazwīdj bi-Makka minhu), temporary marriages were concluded among the Sunnīs but nothing is said of this in the marriage contract or this would make it invalid, everything necessary is arranged previously by word of mouth On the conclusion of the contract, the man utters the ṭalāk formula with a time limit Such agreements are as a rule kept (Snouck Hurgronje, Mekka, II 156, do, Verspr Geschriften, VI 150) The same artifice is used in such cases as Shāfiʿī indicated long ago (cf above)

Bibliography Early History G A Wilken, Matriarchat, Leipzig 1884, p 9—25, W Robertson Smith, Kinship and Marriage, London 1903, p 82 sqq , Wellhausen, Die Ehe bei den Arabern, in N G W Gott , 1893, p 464 sq , Caetani, Annali, Milan 1910, III 894—903, Griffini in Zaid, Corpus iuris, Milan, 1919 p 324—332 — In addition to the usual works on Fikh and tradition al-Mufīd (d 413 = 1022), Mukniʿa, Tabriz 1274, p 77 sqq , commentary thereon Tūsī (d 459 = 1067), Tahdhīb al Ahkām, Teheran 1318, II 183 sqq , al-Muhakkik (d 676 = 1277—1278), Sharāʾiʿ al-Islām, transl Querry as Droit musulman, Paris 1871, I 689 sqq , Ibn al-Mutahhar al Hillī (d 726 = 1326), Mukhtalaf al Shīʿa fī Ahkām al-Sharīʿa, Teheran 1323—1324, IV 8—14, al-Hurr al-ʿĀmilī (d 1099 = 1688), Wasāʾil al-Shīʿa, Teheran 1288, V 68—76, ʿAlī b Muhammad ʿAlī al-Tabātabāʾī (written in 1192 = 1778), Riyād al-Masāʾil, Teheran 1267, II 133—141 — Tornauw, Moslem Recht, Leipzig 1855, p 80, P Kitabgi Khan, Droit musulman schyite Le mariage et le divorce, Lausanne 1904, p 79 sqq , R K Wilson, Anglo Muhammadan Law, London 1912, p 452—458, Juynboll, Handleiding, Leyden 1925, p 193 sq , Goldziher, Vorlesungen, Heidelberg 1910, p 238

(HEFFENING)

AI MUTAʿĀLĪ [See ALLĀH, II]

MUTAʿARRIB(A) (A) "arabicised", the term applied to the descendants of Kahtān (the Biblical Yaktān) who were regarded by the genealogists as "having become Arabs" in contrast to the supposed native "pure" Arab tribes like ʿĀd, Thamūd, etc They settled in South Arabia and adopted Arabic from the "pure" Arabs The latter had learned it through Djurhum, the only man who spoke Arabic in Noah's ark (all the rest spoke Syriac), and his son-in law Aram b Sām b Nūh was the ancestor of the ʿĀd and Thamūd etc From South Arabia, their main centre, tribes of the Banū Kahtān migrated to the north, so that there are in Northern Arabia also tribes whose genealogies make them belong to the Banū Kahtān [cf the article MUSTAʿRIB(A) where the literature is given] (ILSE LICHTENSTADTER)

MUTADĀRIK, name of the sixteenth metre in Arabic prosody, added to al Khalīl b Ahmad's list by al-Akhfash al-Awsat [q v] It is also called mukhtaraʿ, muhdath, khabab, shakik, muntasik, darb al-khail, rakd al-khail, ṣawt al-nākūs It does not seem to have been used by the poets before Islām or of the first century A H.

It has four feet to the hemistich and two ʿarūd and four darb

1st ʿarūd { Fāʿilun fāʿilun faʿilun faʿilun
faʿilun faʿilun faʿilun fāʿilun
Fāʿilun fāʿilun faʿilun
faʿilun faʿilun fāʿilātun
2nd ʿarūd { Fāʿilun fāʿilun faʿilun
faʿilun faʿilun fāʿilān
Fāʿilun fāʿilun faʿilun
faʿilun faʿilun fāʿilun

Fāʿilun may change to faʿilun (faʿlun =) fiʿlun

(Moh Ben Chfneb)

AL-MUʿTAḌID BI 'LLĀH, Abu 'l ʿAbbās Ahmad b Talha, ʿAbbāsid caliph, son of al-Muwaffak, co regent with the caliph al-Muʿtamid [q v], and a Greek slave named Dirār Al Muʿtadid was already the real ruler in the two last years of al-Muwaffak's life and after the death of al-Muʿtamid in Radjab 279 (Oct 892) he ascended the throne The new caliph who had inherited his father's gifts as a ruler and was distinguished alike for his economy and military ability is one of the greatest of the ʿAbbāsids in spite of his strictness and cruelty On the accession of al-Muʿtadid the Tūlūnid Khumārawaih [q v], wearied of the long war, concluded peace and gave the caliph his daughter in marriage While the Khāridjīs in Mesopotamia were weakened by internal dissensions, al Muʿtadid in 280 (893—894) undertook an expedition against the rebel Banū Shaibān and brought them to obedience In the next two years the allies of the Khāridjī chief Hārūn b ʿAbd Allāh were defeated and in 283 (896) the latter fell into the hands of Husain b Hamdān, and was sent to Baghdād where the caliph had him crucified The influence of the Hamdānids now began to increase in Baghdād The Dulafids [q v] who had given the caliphs much trouble were soon finally conquered After al-Hārith b ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz called Abū Lailā had been defeated and slain in Dhu 'l Hidjdja 284 (Jan 898) near Isfahān, al-Muʿtadid had the other Dulafids imprisoned and the family now disappears from history The Sāmānids increased their power at the expense of the Saffārids and the ʿAlids In 287 (900) the Saffārid ʿAmr b al Laith [q v] was captured and brought to Baghdād In the same year the ʿAlid Muhammad b Zaid, lord of Tabaristān, occupied Djurdjān marched against Khurāsān but was defeated by the Sāmānid general Muhammad b Hārūn and died of his wounds while Ibn Hārūn took possession of Djurdjān and Tabaristān in the name of the Sāmānids About the same time the governor of Armenia and Ādharbāidjān Muhammad b Abi 'l-Sādj endeavoured in combination with his freedman Wasīf to conquer Egypt The latter however was taken prisoner by the caliph's troops and as the most influential men in Tarsus had promised their help, al Muʿtadid had them arrested and the fleet there burned Muhammad was however allowed to retain his post but died soon afterwards of the plague The Karmatians [q v] now appeared on the scene and in the same year the Karmatian leader al Djannābī [q v] inflicted a complete defeat on the caliph's troops Al Muʿtadid died in Baghdād on 22 Rabiʿ II, 289 (April 5, 902) at the age of 40 or 47 According to some he was poisoned — Cf also the art Ismāʿīl b Bulbul

Bibliography Tabarī (ed de Goeje), iii 2131 sqq, ʿArīb (ed de Goeje), see Index, Masʿūdī, Murūdj (ed Paris), viii 112—213, ix 47, 52, Kitāb al-Aghānī, see Guidi, Tables alphabetiques, Ibn al-Athīr (ed Tornberg), vii 234 sqq, Ibn al-Tiktakā, al-Fakhrī (ed Deren bourg), p 348—350, Muhammad b Shākir, Fawāt al Wafayāt, i 45 sq, Ibn Khaldūn, al-ʿIbar, iii 346 sqq, Weil, Gesch d Chalifen, ii 433, 460, 476 sqq, Muir, The Caliphate, its Rise, Decline, and Fall, new ed, index, Le Strange, Baghdad during the Abbasid Caliphate, see index, A Muller, Der Islam, i 531

(K V Zetterstéen)

AL MUʿTAḌID BI 'LLĀH, Abū ʿAmr ʿAbbād b Muhammad b ʿAbbād, the most important and most powerful sovereign of the ʿAbbādid dynasty [q v] who reigned over the little kingdom formed by his father Abu 'l Kāsim Muhammad b ʿAbbād, with Seville [q v] as his capital, at the time of the break up of the Umaiyad caliphate of Spain and the rise of the reyes de taifas (mulūk al-tawāʾif), in the course of a reign of nearly 30 years (433—460 A H = 1042—1069 A D), he very considerably increased his territory by making himself the champion of the Spanish Arabs against the Berbers in Spain whose numbers, already very large in the tenth century, had been much increased since the period of the ʿĀmirid dictators

When he succeeded his father, the new king of Seville, who was then 26, following the usual practice of the period, assumed the title of hādjib, and a little later the lakab of al Muʿtadid bi 'llāh by which he is best known Gifted with real political ability, he was not long in revealing his character, that of an autocratic ruler, ambitious and cruel and little scrupulous in the means which he used to achieve his ends As soon as he came to the throne he continued the war begun by his father against the petty Berber ruler of Carmona [q v], Muhammad b ʿAbd Allāh al Birzālī, then against the latter's son and successor Ishāk At the same time, al-Muʿtadid was extending his kingdom in the west between Seville and the Atlantic Ocean It was with this object that he attacked and defeated successively Ibn Taifūr, lord (sāhib) of Mertola, and Muhammad b Yahyā al-Yahsubī, lord of Niebla (Ar Labla) [q v] who in spite of his Arab descent had had the audacity to ally himself with the Berber chiefs In face of these successes of the king of Seville, the other mulūk al-tawāʾif who distrusted him formed a kind of league into which entered the princes of Badajos [q v], Algeciras [q v], Granada [q v] and Malaga [q v] This soon became a war between the ʿAbbādid of Seville and the Aftasid [q v] of Badajoz al-Muzaffar [q v], it was to last for many years in spite of the efforts at mediation by the Djahwarid ruler of Cordova which only achieved their end in 1051 Down to this year, while harassing the frontiers of the kingdom of Badajoz, al-Muʿtadid displayed other activities in succession he defeated Muhammad b Ayyūb al-Bakrī, lord of Huelva [q v] and of Saltes [q v] (whose son was the famous geographer), the Banū Muzain, lords of Silves [q v], and Muhammad b Saʿīd Ibn Hārūn, lord of Santa Maria de Algarve [q v], and annexed their territories To justify these annexations, al-Muʿtadid used a very crude pretext he alleged that he had found the unfortunate Hishām II, who had really died in obscurity a few years before, and would go on till he had restored to him his former empire subdued and

pacified in its integrity In order not to be exposed to the cruelty of the king of Seville, the majority of the petty Berber chiefs settled in the mountains of the south of Andalusia acquiesced in this make-believe and paid homage to the ʿAbbādid and to the Commander of the Faithful miraculously restored to aid the cause of al-Muʿtadid but at the same time carefully concealed by him It was labour lost for them One day the ʿAbbādid invited to his palace in Seville all these petty chiefs with their suites and put them to death by asphyxiating them in baths the openings in which he walled up In this way he took Arcos [q v], the capital of the principality of the Banū Khizrūn, Moron [q v] defended by the Banū Dammar, and Ronda [q v], capital of the Banū Ifran (1053)

This aroused the wrath of the most powerful Berber ruler in Spain, Bādis b Habbūs the Zīrid [q v] who ruled in Granada and who alone seemed able to resist al-Muʿtadid The latter however found that fortune favoured him in this war and a little later took Algeciras from the Hammūdid al-Kāsim b Hammūd He next tried to seize Cordova and sent an expedition against it in charge of his son Ismāʿīl, the latter tried to profit by the occasion to rebel and create for himself a kingdom with Algeciras as capital This rash plan cost him his life, which his father took with his own hand, just as before him ʿAbd al Rahmān III and al-Mansūr b Abī ʿĀmir had inflicted the supreme penalty on their unworthy sons This was the beginning of the political career of al Muʿtadid's other son Muhammad al-Muʿtamid [q v] who was to succeed him on his death, by his father's orders he went with an army to support the Arabs of Malaga, who had rebelled against the tyrannical ruler of Bādīs, the despotic Berber of Granada But the latter routed the Sevillan army and al-Muʿtamid in sorry state reached Ronda from which he sought and received the pardon of his terrible father The latter had long before repudiated the fiction of the pseudo-Hishām which he no longer needed He was now by far the most redoubtable and the most feared of the Spanish rulers He had no enemies but the Berbers, Muslims like himself but much further removed from his social ideal of a Spaniard than his Christian neighbours in the north In another land he might have been called "Berberoktonos" But the bitterness of his hatred cast a shadow over his last days it was not without fear that he followed events in the western Maghrib, hitherto the fief of Muslim Spain, at least in the sub-Mediterranean zone The irresistible advance of the Almoravids [q v] following Yūsuf b Tāshfīn through all Morocco would not find the straits of Gibraltar an insurmountable obstacle for long Al-Muʿtadid realised this very well Death at least prevented him from seeing his kingdom, entirely built up by his own energy and bold initiative, pass in a few weeks into the hands of invaders, brethren of these Berbers of Spain whom he had detested and in part destroyed

Bibliography All the texts of Arabic historians relating to the ʿAbbādids (particularly Ibn Hayyān apud Ibn Bassām, Dhakhīra, Ibn Khaldūn, Ibn al-Abbār, Makkarī) have been published by R Dozy in his Scriptorum arabum loci de Abbadidis, Leyden 1846 Add also Ibn ʿIdhārī, al-Bayān al-mughrib fī Akhbār Mulūk al-Andalus wa 'l-Maghrib, vol III, ed E Lévi-Provençal, Paris 1930, and appendices (cf indices), Ibn al-Khatīb, Iʿmāl al ʿIlām fī man buyiʿa kabl al-Ihtilām min Mulūk al-Islām, part relating to the history of Spain, ed E Lévi Provençal, Rabat 1934 (in the press) Cf also Dozy, Histoire des Musulmans d'Espagne, new ed, Leyden 1932, index, A Prieto Vives, Los reyes de taifas, Madrid 1926, A González Palencia, Historia de la España musulmana, Barcelona 1929, p 73—75 (E Lévi-Provençal)

MUTAFARRIKA (A), name of a corps of guards, who were especially attached to the person of the Ottoman Sultān in the ancient Turkish court The name is also applied to a member of the guard Their occupations were similar to those of the Čawush [q v], not of military character, nor for court service only, but they were used for more or less important public or political missions Like the Cawush, the Mutafarrika were a mounted guard In later times there were two classes, the gedikli or sīʿāmetli Mutafarrika, and the fiefless Their chief was the Mutafarrika Aghasī In course of time their number constantly increased, at the end of the XVIIth century the maximum was fixed at 120 (G O R ², III 890, after Rāshid), but in the beginning of the XIXth century von Hammer gives the number 500 for the total The Porte needed sometimes to lay stress on the importance of the office to make them acceptable as extraordinary envoys by foreign governments (G O R ², III 929, after Rāshid)

Among those who have occupied this rank was the well known first Turkish printer Ibrāhīm Mutafarrika

Although different explanations of the title mutafarrika are given, the most probable interpretation is, that these functionaries were not given a special duty but formed originally a corps used for "different matters" This is still the use of the word in modern Turkish

Bibliography J von Hammer, Des osmanischen Reiches Staatsverfassung und Staatsverwaltung, Vienna 1815, II 55, 105, Ricaut, Histoire de l'Etat Present de l'Empire Ottoman, Paris 1670, p 338 (J H Kramers)

AL-MUTAKABBIR [See Alī āh, II]

MUTAKALLIM [See Kalām]

MUTAKĀRIB, name of the fifteenth metre in Arabic prosody, it contains four feet to the hemistich There are two ʿarūd and six darb

1st ʿarūd
Faʿūlun faʿūlun faʿūlun faʿūlun
faʿūlun faʿulun faʿūlun faʿūlun
Faʿūlun faʿūlun faʿūlun faʿūlun
faʿūlun faʿulun faʿūlun faʿūl
Faʿūlun faʿūlun faʿūlun faʿūlun
faʿūlun faʿulun faʿūlun faʿal
Faʿūlun faʿūlun faʿūlun faʿūlun
faʿūlun faʿulun faʿūlun fal

2nd ʿarūd
Faʿūlun faʿūlun faʿal
faʿūlun faʿulun faʿal
Faʿūlun faʿūlun faʿal
faʿūlun faʿulun fal

Outside of the darb, the foot faʿūlun often loses its n and becomes faʿūlu, used as the first ʿarūd, it further undergoes the following changes faʿūl and (faʿul =) faʿal According to al Khalīl, the foot which precedes the darb cannot suffer any change The first foot of the first hemistich of the first line of a piece of verse may become (ʿūlun =) fiʿlun and (ʿūlu =) fiʿlu (Moh Ben Cheneb)

MUTAKĀWIS, term in prosody, cf the art KĀFIYA

MUʿTAMAD KHĀN, MUHAMMAD SHARĪF, was born in an obscure family in Persia, but coming to India, he attained high honours in the reigns of Djahāngīr and Shāh Djahān He received in the third year of Djahāngīr a military command and the title of Muʿtamad Khān (the trustworthy Lord) Subsequently he joined prince Shah Djahān in his campaign in the Deccan as a bakhshī (paymaster) On his return to court, in the 17th year of Djahāngīr's reign, he was entrusted with the duty of writing the Emperor's memoirs He attained a higher rank in the service of Shāh Djahān and was appointed mīr bakhshī (adjutant-general) in the 10th year of the new reign He died in 1049 (1639) He is the author of a history called Ikbāl Nāma i Djahāngīrī, in three volumes 1 the history of Akbar's ancestors, 2 Akbar's reign (MSS in the India Office Library and in the Bankipore Library), 3 the reign of Djahāngīr (printed in the Bibliotheca Indica, Calcutta 1865 and in Lucknow, A H 1286)

Bibliography Maʾāthir al Umarāʾ, iii 431, Tuzuk i Djahāngīrī, p 352, J R A S, N S, iii 459, Elliot-Dowson, History of India, vi 400, Rieu, Cat Br Museum, i 255, Ethe, Cat of the India Office Library, p 121 and Morley, Catalogue, p 120

(M HIDAYET HOSAIN)

AL MUʿTAMID ʿALA 'LLĀH, ABU 'L-ʿABBĀS AHMAD B DJAʿFAR, ʿAbbāsid caliph, son of al-Mutawakkil and a slave girl named Fityān from Kūfa He ascended the throne on the deposition of al-Muhtadī in Radjab 256 (June 870) He had no ability as a ruler, but relied on the vizier ʿUbaid Allāh b Yahyā b Khākān and left most of the affairs of government in the hands of his brother Abū Ahmad al Muwaffak In Shawwāl 261 (July 875) he designated his son Djaʿfar al-Mufawwid as his successor and governor of the western provinces and al-Muwaffak as his successor and governor of the east The able al-Muwaffak soon became the real ruler and gradually restored order in the empire again while the caliph himself exercised no influence Already in the reign of al Muhtadī a dangerous rising had broken out among the Zandj the negro slaves in the lower Euphrates valley, but it was not till 270 (883) that its leader ʿAlī b Muhammad [q v] was conquered by al Muwaffak Some time after the accession of al Muʿtamid — according to the usual statement in 259 (873) —, the dynasty of the Tāhirids was overthrown by Yaʿkūb b al-Laith [q v] and soon afterwards the Sāmānids appeared in Transoxania On the death of Yaʿkūb in 265 (879) his brother ʿAmr [q v] submitted to the caliph and received the eastern provinces as a fief About the same time Ahmad b Tūlūn [q v] made himself independent in Egypt and after his death (270 = 884) his son Khumārawaih waged a desperate struggle against the ʿAbbāsid caliphate In al Mawsil and the surrounding country the Khāridjis continued their destructive career, but were finally subdued Peace was also often disturbed by ʿAlid rebels and there was also the war with the Byzantines The Paulicians who had stood by the Muslims faithfully were repeatedly defeated by the emperor Basil and in 263 (876) the latter retook the fortress of Luʾluʾa near Tarsus which al Muʿtasim had taken It was not till 270 (883) that the Muslims were able to inflict a complete defeat on the Byzantines The war was however continued After the death of al-Muwaffak in 278 (891) the caliph had to proclaim the latter's son al-Muʿtadid [q v] as his successor instead of Djaʿfar al-Mufawwid In the following year al-Muʿtadid left Sāmarrā and moved the capital to Baghdād again Here he died in Radjab 279 (Oct 892) at the age of 48 or 50 According to some he was poisoned by al-Muʿtadid

Bibliography Ibn Kutaiba, Kitāb al-Maʿārif (ed Wustenfeld), p 200, Yaʿkūbī (ed Houtsma), ii 619—624, Tabarī, iii, see Index, Masʿūdī, Murūdj (ed Paris), viii 38—112, ix 47, 52, Kitāb al-Aghānī, see Guidi, Tables alphabetiques, Ibn al-Athīr (ed Tornberg), vii 156 sqq, Ibn al-Tiktakā, al-Fakhrī (ed Derenbourg), p 341—348, Ibn Khaldūn, al ʿIbar, iii 303 sqq, Weil, Gesch d Chalifen, ii 422 ssq, Muir, The caliphate, its rise, decline, and fall, new ed, p 544 sqq, Muller, Der Islam im Morgen- und Abendland, i 531, 539, Le Strange, Baghdad during the Abbasid Caliphate, p 193, 195, 229, 247—249, do, The Lands of the Eastern Caliphate, p 36, 55

(K V ZETTERSTÉEN)

AL MUʿTAMID ʿALA 'LLĀH, the lakab by which the third and last member of the dynasty of the ʿAbbādids [q v] of Seville in the xiith century is best known, his real name was MUHAMMAD B ʿABBĀD AL-MUʿTADID [q v] B MUHAMMAD B ISMĀʿĪL IBN ʿABBĀD While still a boy — barely 13, having been born in 431 (1040) — he was placed by his father in nominal command of an expedition against Silves (Ar Shilb [q v]), then in the possession of Ibn Muzain, and this town was taken by assault as was Santa Maria d'Algarve soon after (Ar Shantamarīyat al-gharb, now Faro [q v]) which was held by Muhammad b Saʿīd Ibn Hārūn [q v] (444 = 1052) The young ʿAbbādid prince was then appointed by his father governor of these two towns His elder brother Ismāʿīl having been executed in punishment for his rebellion (455 = 1063, cf AL MUʿTADID), Muhammad al-Muʿtamid became heir presumptive to the throne of Seville A little later, the army which he was leading to the help of the Arabs of Malaga, who had rebelled against the tyranny of Bādis b Habbūs, the Berber ruler of Granada of the Zirid [q v] dynasty, was routed by the latter and al-Muʿtamid had to take refuge in Ronda [q v] to which his father, at first very angry at his failure, finally sent him his forgiveness When the powerful ruler of Seville died in 461 (1069), his son succeeded to a considerably extended kingdom which included the greater part of the southwest of the Iberian peninsula

A whole series of more or less romantic episodes is associated with the reign and life of al-Muʿtamid If we may believe several authors of the Muslim west, an individual called Ibn ʿAmmār, vizier and poet, exerted a very considerable influence during the greater part of the career of this prince from his governorship of Silves Al-Muʿtamid's relations with a young slave girl al Rumaikīya, gifted with considerable poetic talent, has also been the subject of much literary embellishment It was from the surname of this young woman Iʿtimād, that al-Muʿtamid is said to have adopted his which comes from the same root She became his favourite wife and presented him with several sons As to Ibn ʿAmmār, exiled by al-Muʿtadid, he was recalled on the accession of his patron to Seville from which he went at his own request to be governor of Silves before being appointed grand vizier

In the second year of his reign, al-Muʿtamid was able to annex to his kingdom the principality of Cordova [q v], over which the Djahwarids had been ruling, in spite of the efforts of the king of Toledo, al-Maʾmūn [q v] The young prince ʿAbbād was appointed governor of the old capital of the Umaiyads But at the instigation of the king of Toledo, an adventurer named Ibn ʿUkāsha was able in 468 (1075) to take Cordova by surprise and put to death the young ʿAbbādid prince and his general Muhammad b Mārtīn Al-Maʾmūn took possession of the town where he died six months later Al-Muʿtamid whose paternal affection had been wounded and pride insulted tried for three years vainly to reconquer Cordova He was not successful until 471 (1078), Ibn ʿUkāsha was put to death and the part of the kingdom of Toledo between the Guadalquivir and the Guadiana conquered by the armies of Seville Nevertheless at this time it took all the skill of the vizier Ibn ʿAmmār to conclude peace by paying double tribute with Alfonso VI of Castille when he sent an expedition against Seville

This was just the time when through the energy and tenacity of the Christian princes taking advantage of the feuds which were setting the Muslim rulers of the taifas against one another, the reconquista, which had received a check and then a setback from the last Umaiyads, resumed its advance on the south of the Peninsula In spite of their successes, of which the Muslim chroniclers make a great deal, it must not be forgotten that by the middle of the vth (xi^th^) century, many Muslim dynasties of Spain were being forced to seek on payment of heavy tribute the temporary neutrality of their Christian neighbours Shortly before the taking of Toledo, which had far reaching effects, by Alfonso VI in 478 (1085), al-Muʿtamid began to be involved in serious difficulties On the imprudent advice of his vizier Ibn ʿAmmār, al-Muʿtamid tried to add to his kingdom, after the principality of Cordova, that of Murcia [q v], which was ruled by a prince of Arab origin, Muhammad b Ahmad Ibn Tāhir In 471 (1078), Ibn ʿAmmār went to the Count of Barcelona, Ramon Berenguer II, and asked him for assistance to conquer Murcia in return for a payment of 10,000 dīnārs, until this sum was paid al-Rashīd, a son of al-Muʿtamid, was to remain as hostage After animated negotiations which ended in the payment of a sum three times as large to the Count of Barcelona, Ibn ʿAmmār resumed his plan of conquering Murcia and soon succeeded in doing so with the help of the lord of the castle of Bilḏj (now Vilches), Ibn Rashīḳ In Murcia however, Ibn ʿAmmār soon rendered himself obnoxious to his master by assuming the attitude of an independent ruler and on al-Muʿtamid's reproaching him he replied by insults to the king of Seville, his wife and his sons Betrayed by Ibn Rashīḳ, he had to take refuge in Murcia and then successively in Leon, Saragossa and Lerida Returning to Saragossa, he endeavoured to assist its ruler al-Muʾtamin Ibn Hūd [cf SARAGOSSA] on his expedition against Segura, but he was taken prisoner and handed over to al-Muʿtamid, who in spite of the bonds of friendship which had so long linked them together, slew him with his own hand

In the meanwhile, Alfonso VI was no longer concealing his designs on Toledo, the siege of which he began in 473 (1080) Two years later, when he sent a mission to enforce payment of the annual tribute due to him from al-Muʿtamid, its members were insulted and the Jewish treasurer Ibn Shalib who accompanied it was put to death because he had refused to accept debased money He therefore invaded the kingdom of Seville, sacked the flourishing towns of Aljarafe (Ar al-Shaiaf, q v), advanced through the district of Sidona (Ar Shadhūna, q v) as far as Tarifa [q v] where he uttered his celebrated remark expressing his pride at having reached the utmost limits of Spain

The capture of Toledo by Alfonso VI dealt a serious blow to Islām in Spain The king of Castille soon demanded of al Muʿtamid that he should surrender those of his lands which had formed part of the kingdom of the Dhu 'l-Nūnids (a part of the modern provinces of Ciudad-Real and Cuenca) Throughout Muslim Spain, his demands which increased every day, made the position very serious In spite of their reluctance, the Muslim rulers in Spain, led by al Muʿtamid, were forced to seek the help of the Almoravid sultān Yūsuf b Tāshfin [cf ALMORAVIDS] who had just conquered the whole of Morocco in an irresistible advance It was decided to send him an embassy consisting of the vizier Abū Bakr b Ẓaidūn and the kādīs of Badajoz, Cordova and Granada An agreement having been reached, not without difficulty, Yūsuf b Tāshfīn crossed the Straits of Gibraltar and on the 22nd Radjab 479 (Oct 23, 1086) inflicted on the Christian troups the disastrous defeat of Zallāka [q v] not far from Badajoz We need not recall here how Yūsuf b Tāshfīn recalled to Africa, could not follow up his victory as the Muslim rulers of Spain had hoped, who through the influence exercised by the Spanish fakihs on the Almoravid, soon lost all prestige in his eyes After his departure the Christians began again to harass Muslim lands, to such an extent that al-Muʿtamid had this time to go in person to Yūsuf b Tāshfīn in Morocco to ask him to cross the Straits once more with his troops Yūsuf consented and landed at Algeciras in the following spring (482 = 1090) He laid siege to the fortress of Aledo but without taking it, then stimulated by popular feeling and the advice of the faḳīhs, he came to the conclusion that it would be more advantageous for him to wage the ḏjihād in Spain on his own account and proceeded to dethrone and dispossess the princes who had sought his intervention With this object he sent an army to invade the kingdom of Seville under Sir b Abī Bakr, who at the end of 1090 took Tarifa, then Cordova where one of al Muʿtamid's sons, Fath al Maʾmūn, who was in command of it, was killed, Carmona, then Seville, which was captured in spite of a heroic sortie by al-Muʿtamid The latter was taken prisoner by the Almoravid and sent with his wives and children first to Tangier, then to Meknes and a few months later to Aghmāt [q v], near Marrākush There he led a miserable existence for several years until his death at the age of 55 in 487 (1095)

The sad end of al-Muʿtamid touched all his biographers, who are particularly numerous and expatiate on his natural gifts, poetical talents, generosity and chivalrous spirit He is one of the most representative types of the enlightened Spanish Muslims of the Middle Ages, patrons of letters and scholarship, liberal and tolerant, but living in an atmosphere of luxury and ease little compatible with the care of a kingdom with frontiers open to envious neighbours on all sides Not so great a ruler as his father al-Muʿtaḍid, al-Muʿtamid is however a much more attractive figure, perhaps just on account of his misfortunes He is entitled to a place among the great figures of Spanish Islām, alongside of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān III, al Ḥakam II, al-Manṣūr b Abī ʿĀmir and at a later date Isān al-Dīn b al-Khaṭīb

Bibliography Ibn Bassām, al Dhakhīra, iv , Ibn al-Abbār, al Ḥullat al siyarāʾ (ed Dozy, Notices), ʿAbd al-Wāḥid al-Marrākushī, al-Muʿdjib, ed Dozy, transl Fagnan, Ibn al-Khaṭīb, Iḥāṭa, do , I māl al-Iʿlām, ed Lévi Provençal, Ibn ʿIdhārī, al-Bayān al-mughrib, iii , ed Levi-Provençal, al-Fatḥ Ibn Khākān, Kalāʾid al-ʿIḳyān and Maṭmaḥ, Ibn Khaldūn, ʿIbar, iv , and Histoire des Berbères, transl de Slane, ii , al-Ḥulal al-mawshiya, Tunis, Ibn Abī Zarʿ, Rawḍ al-Ḳirṭās, ed Tornberg and in Fās, etc — The majority of the references to al Muʿtamid have been collected by R Dozy, Scriptorum arabum loci de Abbadidis, Leyden 1846 Cf also the long discussion of al-Muʿtamid by Dozy in Bk IV of his Histoire des Musulmans d'Espagne, new ed , Leyden 1932, vol iii , A González Palencia, *Historia de la España musulmana*², Barcelona 1929, p 77 sqq E Lévi Provençal, Inscriptions arabes d'Espagne, Leyden-Paris 1931, A Prieto Vives, Los reyes de taifas (mainly numismatic), Madrid 1926 — The life and touching end of al-Muʿtamid have just been put on the stage in Cairo He is also discussed in numerous monographs — mostly at second hand — composed in recent years in the east (mainly in Egypt) on the Muslim past of Spain

(E Lévi Provençal)

MUTAMMIM b NUWAIRA, a poet, contemporary with the Prophet He was the brother of Mālik b Nuwaira [q v], chief of the Banū Yarbūʿ, a large clan of the Banū Tamīm Mutammim owes his fame to the elegies in which he lamented the tragic death of his brother Mālik and these poems have made the latter's name immortal The Arabs said there was nothing comparable to these elegies, overflowing with emotion They regarded their author as the type of brotherly devotion

Mutammim does not seem to have played any prominent part before the Hidjra He was eclipsed by the striking personality of his brother, to whose qualities he never hesitated to pay homage He is represented as having been of unprepossessing appearance, one-eyed and short in stature The Bakrī chief al-Hawfazān eulogized the humanity with which Mutammim treated him during his captivity Falling in his turn into the hands of the Banū Taghlib, Mutammim was delivered by a stratagem devised by his brother He seems to have adopted Islām at the same time as his brother Like the latter, he is numbered among the "Companions" although we never find him in direct relations with the Prophet He escaped from the disaster in which Mālik was overwhelmed, a few fragments of other poems suggest he did not write elegies exclusively

But after the death of Mālik he devoted himself to celebrating his memory and demanding vengeance for his death Refused by the Caliph Abū Bakr, he thought he might have more success on the accession of ʿOmar He hurried to Madīna where he was very well received by ʿOmar The latter listened with delight to his elegies, regretted that he himself had not the gift of poetry so that he might worthily celebrate his brother Zaid who had fallen in the wars of al-Yamāma, but he refused to reverse Abū Bakr's decision and limited himself to dismissing Khālid b al Walīd, a step which probably owed something to the poetical exortations of Mutammim

After this, tradition says that the poet became almost blind through weeping, and that he wandered over the many routes of Arabia, uttering his complaints everywhere He found himself abandoned by his wives who became tired of his incurable sadness and wandering life He left two sons Dāwūd and Ibrāhim, also poets He survived ʿOmar if, as Ibn Khallikān says (ed Wustenfeld, N° 792), he is really the author of an elegy on the death of this caliph

Bibliography The principal references are given in Noldeke, Beitr zur Kenntniss der Poesie, p 95—152, Brockelmann, G A L, i 39, Cl Huart, Litterature arabe, Paris 1903, p 43, Mufaddaliyāt, ed Lyall, N° ix lxvii, lxviii , Buhturī, Ḥamāsa, photo ed Leyden, p 138, 331, 341, 371, Kitāb al-Aghānī, xiv 66—76, Ibn Kutaiba, Kitāb al-Shiʿr, ed de Goeje, p 192—6, Ibn al-Athīr, Usd al-Ghāba, iv 398—9, Ibn Ḥadjar al-ʿAskalānī, al-Iṣāba, Cairo, vi 40—1, Caussin de Perceval, Essai sur l'histoire des Arabes, iii 368—369

(H Lammens)

AL-MUTANABBĪ, "he who professes to be a prophet", the surname by which the Arab poet Abu 'l-Ṭayyib Aḥmad b al Ḥusain al-Djuʿfī is usually known (cf in Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt [Cairo 1310], i 36, two genealogies, which do not agree, going back to his great-grandfather) Abu 'l-Ṭayyib was born in Kūfa in 303 (915) in the Kinda quarter whence the ethnic al Kindī sometimes given him His family in very humble circumstances claimed descent from the Yamanī clan of the Djuʿf and he himself all his life was convinced of the superiority of the Arabs of the south over those of the north (cf al Wāḥidī, Sharḥ Dīwān al Mutanabbī, ed Dieterici, p 48—49, al-Yāzidjī, al-ʿUrf al-ṭayyib, p 29 [these two works will be quoted as Wāh and Yāz]) The boy received his early education in his native town and soon distinguished himself by his intelligence, his prodigious memory and his precocity as a poet He now passed under Shiʿī influences, perhaps Zaidī (cf ʿAbd al-Kādir al-Baghdādī, Khizāna, i 382, 12) which affected the development of his philosophy, a subject to which we shall return Circumstances were however to accelerate the speed of Abu 'l-Ṭayyib's religious development Towards the end of 312 (924), undoubtedly under pressure from the Karmaṭians [q v] who had just taken and sacked Kūfa, Abu 'l Ṭayyib and his family made a first stay of two years (cf al-Samʿānī, Ansāb, 506 b24, al-Badīʿī, al-Ṣubḥ al-munbī, i 6) in Samāwa, the region lying between the Sawād of Kūfa in the east and Palmyrene in the west The Banū Kalb who led a nomadic life in these desert steppes had been much cultivated by the Karmaṭian dāʿī's It is possible that the young poet at this time came into contact with some of these heretics It is however not very probable, in view of his youth, that this first contact had any definite effect upon him On the other hand, this stay among the Beduins certainly gave Abu 'l-Ṭayyib that profound knowledge of the Arabic language of which he was later so very proud

On returning to Kūfa, at the beginning of 315 (927), Abu 'l-Ṭayyib seems to have decided to devote himself entirely to poetry At this time he most admired the great panegyrists of the preceding century, Abū Tammām and al-Buḥturī [q v] Like them and like the majority of his contemporaries, he sees in poetry a sure means of attaining wealth and power He at once attached himself to a certain Abu 'l Fadl, of Kūfa, to whom he dedicated a short piece (Wāḥ , p 17—21, Yāz , p 10—11) Perhaps a convert to Karmaṭism, in any case a complete agnostic — the praises which he allows to be offered him show this —, this individual seems to have exercised a considerable influence on the religious and philosophical development of al-Mutanabbī (cf also Ḵẖizāna, i 382 below) Prepared by the Shīʿa atmosphere in which he had passed his childhood and by the relations he had had with the Karmaṭians in Samāwa, Abu 'l Ṭayyib in contact with this patron cast off religious dogmas which he regarded as spiritual instruments of oppression He then adopted a stoic and pessimistic philosophy, echoes of which are found throughout his work The world is made up of seductions which death destroys (cf Wāḥ , p 39, l 8—13, p 162, l 12—13, Yāz , p 23 and 97), stupidity and evil alone triumph there (cf Wāḥ , p 161, l 8—10, Yāz , p 97), the Arabs — representatives of a superior race in his eyes — are overwhelmed in it by cowardly and barbarous foreigners (cf Wāḥ , p 148, l 1–5, p 160, l 2–6, Yāz , p 87 and 96) In contact with this world with which he was out of harmony, the consciousness of his talent, which Abu 'l-Ṭayyib had, developed rapidly, his vanity increased to a degree which is almost inconceivable (cf Wāḥ , p 60, Yāz , p 34) His Arab particularism, as with all anti-Shuʿūbīs [cf SHUʿŪBĪYA], incited him to attack foreign oppressors (Wāḥ , p 58, l 30—31, Yāz , p 33) This is why, by a contradiction from which he is hardly ever free, al-Mutanabbī coveted all his life those riches and power which he scorned in his heart, while he stands out from the mass of his contemporaries by his rigid morality and austerity (cf al-Badiʿī, op cit , i 78—81)

At first however, Abu 'l-Ṭayyib thought only of conquering the world by his poetic gifts, and to find a more favourable field for his activity he left Kūfa towards the end of 316 (928), probably as a result of the town being again sacked by the Karmaṭians He was naturally attracted to Baghdād (cf al-Badiʿī, op cit , i 82—83) and there became the panegyrist of a compatriot of his, Muhammad b ʿUbaid Allāh al ʿAlawī (cf Wāḥ , p 6—7, Yāz , p 3—4) From there he went to Syria For two years he led the life of a wandering troubadour of the period (cf Mez, Renaissance des Islams, p 256) It is impossible to follow him in his wanderings for his Dīwān, our only guide, does not present his poems in a satisfactory chronological order Some pieces of the period are addressed to Beduin chiefs of the region of Manbiǧ [q v] (cf Wāḥ , p 24—25, 38—39, 66—67, Yāz , p 12—13, 22—23, 28—29), others are dedicated to men of letters of Tripolis (Wāḥ , p 88-89, Yāz , p 19–20), al-Lāḏhiḳīya (Latakia) (cf Wāḥ , p 116–135, Yāz , p 66–78) The poems of this period are hurriedly written and mediocre in quality, but traces of his real genius are already apparent With the exception of a marṯiya (lament) and some impromptu pieces they are all *ḳaṣīda*s on neo-classical lines The influence of Abū Tammām and al-Buḥturī preponderates

In the course of this period of experiment, Abu 'l Ṭayyib was irritated at not finding his merit recognised Gradually he looks forward to his dreams of domination being realised by violence (cf Wāḥ , p 138, l 3—7, Yāz , p 79) Finally he abandoned the work of a paid panegyrist and returning to al-Lāḏhiḳiya he began revolutionary propaganda, the nature of which has long been misunderstood According to Oriental writers (al-Badiʿī, op cit , i 25—30, Ibn al-Anbārī, Nuzhat al-Alibbāʾ, p 369), Abu 'l-Ṭayyib proclaimed himself a prophet in al-Samāwa, was taken prisoner by Ikhshīdid [q v] troops and then received his epithet of al-Mutanabbī Kratschkowsky (Mutanabbi i Abu l'Ala, St Petersburg 1909, p 9—11) does justice to these traditions, without however taking full account of some clear allusions in the Dīwān The latter contains pieces which prove beyond all possible doubt that a rebellion was led by al-Mutanabbī (cf Wāḥ , p 49–58, 86, Yāz , p 28–33, 50) This rising, as usual at this period, must have been political as well as religious The rising began in al-Lāḏhiḳiya and then extended to the western borders of Samāwa where the Banū Kalb constituted an element always ready to rebel Without adhering to Karmaṭism, al-Mutanabbī exploited its principles which found only too ready an echo among the marauding Beduins (cf Wāḥ , p 57, l 22—23, Yāz , p 32, allusion to the massacre of pilgrims by the Karmaṭian Abū Ṭāhir, in 317 = 930) The ambiguity of the utterances of the rebel, the opportunism of his doctrines and his conception of the imāmate on Karmaṭian lines, may have caused some misunderstanding of his preaching, since at this time any agitator was regarded as a Karmaṭian After some initial successes, al-Mutanabbī and his Beduins were defeated, he was captured and imprisoned at Ḥimṣ (towards the end of 322 = 933) After a trial and two years' imprisonment (Dīwān, Paris MS , N° 3092, fol 16ʳ), Abu 'l-Ṭayyib was condemned to retract his errors and set free From this adventure he gained only the epithet of al Mutanabbī and the conviction that poetry alone would lead him to the realisation of his ambitious dreams

The poems composed by Abu 'l-Ṭayyib immediately before and during his rebellion are distinguished by spontaneity of inspiration, by the liberty which the poet takes with poetic forms, by the vigour of the style, which has a much more personal character than in his first manner

As soon as al-Mutanabbī had returned to his profession of panegyrist, he naturally resumed his wandering life (beginning of 325 = 937) For several years he led a precarious existence and had to be content to sing the praises of citizens and minor officials of Antioch, Damascus, Aleppo etc who paid him very badly (cf Wāḥ , p 93—206, Yāz , p 51—131, Yākūt, Irshād, v 203) Little by little however, his fame grew At the beginning of 328 (939), we find him becoming court poet to the emīr Badr al-Kharshānī (the Badr b ʿAmmār of the Dīwān), governor of Damascus for the ex-amīr al umarāʾ Ibn Rāʾiḳ [q v], who had just taken possession of Syria Of Arab origin, Badr was regarded by al-Mutanabbī as the Maecenas for whom he had been waiting so long The panegyrics and occasional poems which are dedicated to this emīr reveal a sincere admiration for him and possess a sustained inspiration (cf Wāh , p 206—245, Yāz , p 132—163) These pieces and those that precede them, after Abu 'l-Tayyib's return to literature, constitute what might be called the third manner of the poet With the exception of a poem on hunting in the style of Abū Nuwās [q v] (cf Wāh , p 201—202, Yāz , p 128—129) and a number of impromptu poems of no particular interest, al-Mutanabbī wrote only kaṣīdas during this period He would seem then to have returned to his first manner, if the work of this period did not show considerable progress in form

The friendship between Badr and al Mutanabbi lasted only about a year and a half and as a result of intrigues of jealous rivals (cf Wāh , p 253, lines 13—16, Yāz , p 169), Abu 'l-Tayyib feeling no longer safe, sought refuge in the Syrian desert (cf Wāh , p 251—252, Yāz , p 168—169) There the idea of rebelling again took possession of him (cf Wāh , p 253—254, Yāz , p 170—171) Fortunately the departure of Badr for the ʿIrāk enabled him to leave his hiding place and resume his profession of panegyrist He now sang the praises of several individuals of second rank (cf Wāh , p 107—108, 284—348, Yāz , p 60—61, 194—241) Lastly he succeeded in establishing himself at the Hamdānid court in Aleppo where he became the official poet of the emir Sayf al-Dawla [q v] at the beginning of 337 (948)

From the literary point of view, the work of this period which runs roughly from the middle of 329 (940), date of the quarrel with Badr, to the beginning of 337 (948), marks his fourth manner, to which he remained faithful till his death It is characterised by a compromise between the pure neo-classical tradition and a freer form which the poet had adopted in the poems of the period of his rebellion Without rejecting the framework of the neo classical kaṣīda, he reduces the erotic prologue to a minimum, sometimes even replacing it by a philosophical and lyrical opening which breathes his dreams, disillusionments and angers

Al Mutanabbi stayed nine years with Sayf al-Dawla He was genuinely attached to this patron, who was in his eyes the personification of the ideal Arab chief, brave, magnanimous and generous Sayf al-Dawla in his turn recognised the worth of his panegyrist whom he overwhelmed with gifts and never treated with arrogance Al-Mutanabbī accompanied him on his expeditions and on returning to Aleppo sang of his exploits against the Byzantines and the Bedouins of the desert In the brief intervals of leisure between the campaigns of the Hamdānid, the poet shared in the leisure of the court of Aleppo, devoting himself to improvisation and writing panegyrics as occasion arose (cf Wāh , p 522—537, Yāz , p 376—395) or laments (marṯiya) on the deaths of relatives of Sayf al-Dawla (cf Wāh , p 388—389, 408—409, 577–578, Yāz , p 271–272, 286–287, 427–428) The difficult character of al-Mutanabbī and the repute which he enjoyed did not fail to gain him implacable enemies A few devoted friends like the poet al Babbaghāʾ [q v] tried, it is true, to defend him but their zeal could do nothing against the enmity of the hostile group led by the famous Abū Firās [q v] Sayf al-Dawla at first paid no attention to the attacks made upon his favourite When he grew wearied and his protection ceased, Abu 'l-Tayyib no longer felt his life safe, fled secretly from Aleppo with all his family and sought refuge in Damascus (end of 346 = 957)

Eastern critics generally are agreed that the poems composed by al-Mutanabbī during his stay with Sayf al-Dawla mark the highest point in his work Although there is a certain degree of exaggeration in this, it is certain that the poet, while continuing his fourth manner, reveals in the highest degree the mastery which he had acquired in his art during this period Much more than Abū Firas, with whom he is often contrasted, he was able to depict the glories of Sayf al-Dawla's campaigns against the Byzantines His verse, it is true, has not the charm of that of Abū Firās but it is fuller and more epic in style

From Damascus, Abu 'l-Tayyib went to Egypt to al-Fusṭāt [q v] where he obtained the patronage of the Ikhshīdid Kāfūr [q v] Al Mutanabbi's career now reveals the necessities to which poets in the fourth (tenth) century had to submit Deprived of moral and material independence Abu 'l-Tayyib was forced to sing the praises of a patron for whom in his heart he felt only contempt The panegyrics which he devoted to him barely conceal his regret at losing the favour of Sayf al Dawla They are somewhat forced and contain points against Kāfūr (cf al-Badīʿī, op cit, i 125—126) The poet perhaps only agreed to celebrate this patron because the latter had promised him the governorship of Ṣaydā (Sidon) (cf ibid, i 115) When he saw that these promises were not being fulfilled, he tried to gain the favour of another Ikhshīdid general, Abū Shujāʿ Fātik (ibid, i 131—132), but the latter dying in 350 (960) and relations with Kāfūr still being strained, al-Mutanabbi had once more to decide to fly On the day of the feast of sacrifice of this year, after writing a satire on Kāfūr, he left al-Fusṭāt secretly and crossing Arabia after great trials (cf al Badīʿī, op cit, i 139—140), he reached the ʿIrak, spent some time in Kūfa, then settled in Baghdād He perhaps thought of attaching himself to the famous Būyid vizier al-Muhallabi who had gathered a very brilliant court around him He had however to abandon hope of this in face of the hostility to him evinced by poets and scholars established at the court of al Muhallabi, such as Ibn al-Hadjdjadj [q v] and Abu 'l-Faradj al Iṣfahānī, author of the Kitāb al Aghānī During his stay here, as he had already begun to do in Egypt (cf Ibn al-Faradi, Taʾrīkh al Andalus, N° 453), al-Mutanabbi gave lectures in which he expounded to a group of friends the work he had done till that date (cf Dhahabi, Taʾrīkh al-Islām, Paris, N° 1581, fol 265a) The year 353 (964) was spent in this fashion The poet perhaps also visited Kūfa about this time (cf F Gabrieli, Vita di al-Mutanabbi, p 60, note 4) At the beginning of 354 (965) in any case, he left the ʿIrāk and went via al Ahwāz to Arradjān [q v] in Susiana where he received the patronage of the Būyid vizier Ibn al-ʿAmid [q v] Al-Mutanabbī devoted some panegyrics to him (cf Wāh , p 740—741, Yāz , p 564—565), then he left him to go to Shīrāz in Fārs where he rejoined the Būyid Sultān ʿAdud al-Dawla [q v] who had expressed a desire to have him at his court After addressing to the Būyid Sultān several panegyrics which are among his best work, Abu 'l-Ṭayib left Shīrāz for reasons not clearly known, perhaps simply out of nostalgia (cf Wāh, p 766, line 1—3, Yāz, p 589) He was returning by short stages from Persia to Baghdād when he was attacked by marauding Bedums near Dair al-ʿĀkūl [q v] at the end of Ramadān 354 (Aug 955) He and his son were killed in the fighting and all his baggage, including the autograph MSS of his Dīwān, was scattered (cf al Badīʿī, op cit, 1 227—239)

Even in his lifetime, al-Mutanabbī had been surrounded by ardent admirers who defended his work in its entirety against the attacks of detractors no less eager to run him down Among the latter however, the majority only criticised him as a poet because they objected to his character as a man The criticism was therefore not distinguished by impartiality and only reflects the opinions of a coterie It required the death of Abu 'l Ṭayib to produce a third class of admirers who were more clear-sighted than the first and sufficiently impartial not to fall into the exaggerations of the second (cf al-Djurdjānī, al-Wasāṭa, p 11—12, 45—46) It was the opinion of this new category that prevailed and when Mutanabbī's contemporaries had all disappeared, the literary public remained decidedly favourable to Saif al-Dawla's bard (except al ʿAskarī [q v] and Ibn Khaldūn) From the fifth (eleventh) century the name of al-Mutanabbī became a synonym for "great poet" His literary influence became one of the most considerable ever exercised on Arabic poetry Annotated by Ibn Djinnī [q v] and later by Abu 'l-ʿAlāʾ [q v], by al-Wāhidī, al-Tabrīzī, al-ʿUkbarī and Ibn Sīda [q v], to mention only the most eminent, the Dīwān of Abu 'l-Ṭayib throughout the middle ages and in modern times has been made accessible to scholars and literary men from Persia to Spain by learned men, often more zealous than intelligent Space does not permit us to estimate what later poetry owes to al-Mutanabbī We are content to point out that in different ways all Arab panegyrists have been influenced by Abu 'l-Ṭayib At the present day he is still one of the most read in North Africa, Syria and Egypt also hold him in very high esteem and many critics have devoted studies full of praise to him It seems however that in the last named country al-Mutanabbī attracts at least as much by the boldness of his philosophy and the ardour of his pro-Arab feelings as by his purely literary qualities

Bibliography Numerous biographies of al-Mutanabbī have been written by eastern authors, only five of these contain original matter These are 1 ʿAbd Allāh al-Isfahānī, Idāh al-Mushkil li-Shiʿr al-Mutanabbī, in the Khizānat al-Adab of ʿAbd al-Kādir al-Baghdādī (Cairo 1299), 1 382—389, 2 al-Thaʿālibī, Yatīmat al-Dahr (Damascus 1304), 1 78—162, passim, 3 al-Khaṭīb al Baghdādī, Taʾrīkh Baghdād (Paris MS, N° 2129), fol 105–106, reproduced in the Nuzhat al-Alibbāʾ of Ibn al-Anbārī (Cairo 1294), p 366—374 and in the Ansāb of al-Samʿānī (Leyden 1912), fol 506b, 4 Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt al-Aʿyān (Cairo 1310), 1 36—8, 5 al-Badīʿī, al-Subh al-munbī ʿan Haithiyat al-Mutanabbī (on the margin of the commentary of al-ʿUkbarī on the Dīwān of al Mutanabbī, Caire 1308), 1 5—245 — Al-Mutanabbī's work has been studied in the east, in addition to commentators, by Abu 'l-Hasan al-Djurdjānī, al-Wasāṭa bain al-Mutanabbī wa-Khuṣūmih (Saidā 1336), by al-Thaʿālibī, op cit, by Diyāʾ al-Dīn Ibn al-Athīr, al-Mathal al-sāʾir (Būlāḳ 1282) A list of commentators, but incomplete, is given in Hadjdjī Khalīfa, Lexicon, III 306—312 The most celebrated commentaries are those of al-Wāhidī, Mutanabbii carmina cum commentario Wahidii (ed Dieterici, Berlin 1861), of al-ʿUkbarī, al-Tibyān fī Sharh al-Dīwān (Cairo 1308), Nāsif al-Yāzidjī, al-ʿUrf al-ṭayib fī Sharh Diwān Abi 'l Ṭayib (Bairūt 1305) Orientalists have often studied the work of al Mutanabbī either in parts or as a whole Here we only give general studies Bohlen, Commentatio de Motenabbio (Bonn 1824), Hammer-Purgstall, Motenebbi, der grosste arabische Dichter (Vienna 1824), Brockelmann, GAL, 1 87—88, Nicholson, A Literary History of the Arabs (London 1923), p 304—313, F Gabrieli, La Vita di al Mutanabbi (RSO, XI), 27—42, do, Studi sulla poesia di al-Mutanabbi (Rendic della Accad dei Lincei, 1927), do, La Poesia di al Mutanabbi (Giornale della Soc asiat italiana, 1929), II/1, R Blachere, Le Poète arabe al Motanabbi et l'Occident musulman (R E J, 1929) p 127 sq, do, Motanabbi (monograph in preparation) (R Blachère)

MUTARĀDIF, term in prosody, cf the art Kāfiya

MUTARĀKIB, term in prosody, cf the art Kāfiya

MUTARRIZĪ, Abu 'l-Fath Nāsir b ʿAbd al Sayyid b ʿAlī b al Muṭarriz, grammarian adīb and jurist, was born in Khwārizm in Radjab 538 (1144) He was a pupil of al-Mawfik b Ahmad known as Akhṭab Khwārizm As he was born in the same province and in the year in which al-Zamakhsharī died, he was called Khalīfat al-Zamakhsharī, al Suyūṭī's assumption that he was a pupil of Zamakhsharī was deduced from this epithet and is of course wrong Al-Mutarrizī was an adherent of the Muʿtazila As a jurist of the Hanafī school he enjoyed particular prestige and his work al-Mughrib fī 'l Lugha, a dictionary arranged alphabetically, of terms used in tradition and of the legal terms of the jurists of the Hanafī school, was regarded by the scholars of this madhhab with the same respect as the Gharīb al-Fikh of al Azharī by the Shāfiʿīs For his son he compiled a lexicon of synonyms entitled al-ʿIknāʿ li mā huwiya taht al-Kināʿ, which the latter was to study after he had learned the Kurʾān by heart It is a kind of text book giving a comprehensive survey of the subject In al Mutarrizī's opinion the existing works on this subject were either too big or not full enough The work deals only with "good and usual" words, omitting the "bad and unusual" ones Modern and ancient linguistic usage are distinguished and verses often quoted in illustration His al Miṣbāh fī 'l-Nahw, which deals with the grammar of the Arabic language was also written for his son It was much used by students and often commented upon Super commentaries were added to the commentaries one of the latter was even translated into Turkish Al-Mutarrizī was also an expositor and prepared a commentary on the Makāmāt of Harīrī He also was a poet, among his efforts being a poem in which he set himself to use nothing but synonyms In 601 (1204) he was in Baghdād where he had disputations with the scholars of that city In Djumādā I of 610 (1213) he died in his native town

Bibliography W Ahlwardt, Verzeichnis der Handschriften Berlin, No 6946/7, 6968, Brockelmann, G A L, I 293, Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, ed Flügel, I 329, 384, II 33, V 582, 648, VI 62, 87, Suyūṭī, Bughyat al-Wuʿāt fī Ṭabakāt al-Lughawiyīn wa 'l-Nuḥāt, Cairo 1326, Yākūt, Irshād al-Arīb ilā Maʿrifat al-Adīb, ed Margoliouth, in G M S, VII 202

(ILSE LICHTENSTADTER)

MUTAṢARRIF [see SANDJAK]

AL MUʿTAṢIM BI 'LLĀH, ABŪ ISḤĀK MUḤAMMAD, an ʿAbbāsid caliph, born in 179 (795—796) or 180 (796—7), the son of Hārūn al-Rashīd and a slave-girl named Mārida In the reign of his brother al-Maʾmūn [q v] he took part in the fighting against the Byzantines in Asia Minor and received the governorship of Egypt After the death of al Maʾmūn in Radjab 218 (Aug 833) he ascended the throne and was soon afterwards acknowledged even by his nephew al-ʿAbbās b al Maʾmūn [q v] whom the troops had proclaimed caliph and the army also then paid him homage An ʿAlid pretender, Muḥammad b al Kāsim, was disposed of by the governor of Khorāsān ʿAbd Allah b Ṭāhir [q v] After concluding a truce with the Byzantine emperor Theophilus, al Muʿtasim sent an army commanded by the Arab general ʿUdjaif b ʿAnbasa against the Zott [q v] who had migrated from India in the Sāsānian period and settled in the swamps between Basra and Wāsiṭ They had been frequently used in their wars by the Muslims After the death of al-Maʾmūn however, they began to ravage and lay waste the country round as if it were hostile territory They submitted after seven months' fighting at the turn of the year 219—220 (834—835) and in Muḥarram 220 (Jan 835) they were brought in ships to Baghdād and banished by al-Muʿtasim to ʿAin Zarba [q v] In the same year he appointed Ḥaidar b Kāʾus, usually called al-Afshīn [q v], commander in chief in the war against Bābek [q v], but it was only after two years that he was victorious The intolerance of the caliph against all those who would not share the opinions of the Muʿtazila made him unpopular with the people and in addition there was the dissatisfaction of the citizens of the capital with the undisciplined Berber and Turkish mercenaries whom al Muʿtasim took into his service At the end of 220 (835) he therefore resolved to move his residence to a smaller place While his son Hārūn al Wāthik remained in Baghdād as governor, the caliph established himself first on the al-Kāṭūl canal and then in Sāmarrā three days' journey up the river Here in the course of the year 221 (836) there arose a splendid palace with numerous buildings for the troops [cf the art BAGHDĀD] Very soon afterwards the war with the Byzantines blazed up again The emperor Theophilus invaded Muslim territory on the Upper Tigris, captured Zibatra and wrought tremendous havoc in northern Syria and Mesopotamia In Djumādā I 223 (April 838) al-Muʿtasim himself took the field, accompanied by his ablest generals The huge force advanced in three columns the eastern army was commanded by al-Afshīn, the two divisions of the western one by al Muʿtasim and Ashnās Al-Afshīn very soon put the emperor to flight and in Shawwāl (Sept) of the same year Amorium after 55 days' siege passed through treachery into the hands of the caliph who had the town destroyed But the victory had no permanent results As winter was coming on, al-Muʿtasim had to retire, particularly as a conspiracy in favour of his nephew al-ʿAbbās b al Maʾmūn [q v] demanded urgent measures About the same time the ispahbad of Tabaristān Māziyār b Kārin rebelled, but the rising was suppressed by ʿAbd Allāh b Ṭāhir [q v] In 226 (840—841) or 227 troubles again broke out in Palestine where the Umayyads still had many supporters The leader, Abū Ḥarb al-Mubarkaʿ, claimed to be a descendant of the Umayyads and everywhere preached rebellion against the caliph until Radjāʾ b Ayyūb al-Ḥidārī, whom al-Muʿtasim sent against him, took him prisoner and brought him to Sāmarrā Al-Muʿtasim died on 18th Rabīʿ I 227 (Jan 5 842) in Sāmarrā By favouring the Turks and suppressing the Arab element he hastened the decline of the ʿAbbāsid empire Unlike al-Maʾmūn, he was comparatively uneducated That learning was not allowed to fall into oblivion in his reign is rather due to the chief kādī Aḥmad b Abī Duʾād [q v]

Bibliography Ibn Kutaiba, Kitāb al Maʿārif (ed Wustenfeld), p 199 sq, Yaʿkūbī (ed Houtsma), II 566—570, 574—584, Balādhurī (ed de Goeje), see Index, Aḥmad b Abī Ṭāhir Ṭaifūr, Kitāb Baghdād, VI (ed Keller), passim, Ṭabarī (ed de Goeje), III 757 sqq, 1164—1329, Masʿūdī, Murūdj (Paris), VII 102—145, IX 45, 51, 69, Kitāb al Aghānī, see Guidi, Tables alphabetiques, Ibn al-Athīr (ed Tornberg), VI 201 sqq, 310—376, Ibn Ṭiktaka, al Fakhrī (ed Derenbourg), p 316—324, Muḥammad b Shākir, Fawāt al-Wafayāt, II 270, Ibn Khaldūn, al ʿIbar, III 256 sqq, Weil, Gesch d Chalifen II 240 sqq, 295—336, Muller, Der Islam im Morgen und Abendland, I 520 sqq 537 sqq, Muir, The Caliphate, its Rise, Decline, and Fall[3], p 513 sqq, Le Strange, Baghdad during the Abbasid Caliphate, see Index, do, The Lands of the Eastern Caliphate, passim, Bury, Mutasim's March through Cappadocia, in Journal of Hellenic Studies, XXIX 120—129

(K V ZETTERSTÉEN)

AL MUʿTAṢIM, MUḤAMMAD B MAʿN B MUḤAMMAD IBN SUMĀDIH AL-TUDJĪBĪ, second ruler of the dynasty of Tudjībids [q v] of the kingdom of Almeria [q v], reigned from 443 to 484 (1051—1091) Gifted like his contemporary al Muʿtamid [q v] of Seville with a certain amount of poetic talent, he made his capital during his long reign one of the great centres of culture in the Peninsula But like the other mulūk al ṭawāʾif of Spain, he was for the most of his time at war with one or other of his neighbours He was without doubt implicated in the conspiracy fomented by the Jew Yūsuf against his master Bādīs, king of Granada [cf ZIRIDS] Later his forces took part with those of Yūsuf b Tāshfīn in the famous battle of Zallāka [q v] Like the other Muslim rulers of Spain he felt in the following year the weight of the Almoravid sultān's arm After unsuccessfully besieging the fortress of Aledo and inciting Yūsuf to act harshly against al Muʿtamid, whom he hated personally, he realised on his death-bed that his capital would be besieged by the Almoravids as Seville had been This is why he advised his son and successor Ahmad Muʿizz al-Dawla to seek an asylum with the lords of

Bougie [q v] Almeria was taken very soon afterwards by the Almoravids

Bibliography Ibn Bassām, al-Dhakhīra, Ibn al-Khatīb, Ihāta and Iʿlām, Ibn al-Abbār, al-Hullat al siyarāʾ, ed Dozy, p 172, 174, ʿAbd al-Wāhid al Marrākushī, al-Muʿdjib, ed Dozy, transl Fagnan, Ibn Idhārī, al-Bayān al-mughrib, III, ed Levi-Provençal, Dozy, Histoire des Musulmans d'Espagne, new ed, III, do, Recherches sur l'histoire et la litterature des Arabes d'Espagne[3], vol I (memoir on the Tudjībids) (E Lévi-Provençal)

AL-MUTAWAKKIL ʿAlā 'llāh, Abu 'l-Fadl Djaʿfar b Muhammad, an ʿAbbāsid Caliph, born in Shawwāl 206 (Feb–March 822), son of the caliph al-Muʿtasim and a slave girl from Khwārizm named Shudjāʿ He ascended the throne in Dhu 'l-Hidjdja 232 (Aug 847) on the death of his brother al-Wāthik His old opponent, the vizier Ibn al-Zaiyāt, soon fell a victim to the cruelty of the new caliph and a similar fate befell the Turkish general Itākh, although the latter along with Wasif had helped him to the throne The caliph dreaded his influence and had him thrown into prison where he died of thirst (Djumādā II 235 = Dec 849—Jan 850) From the religious point of view al-Mutawakkil was thoroughly orthodox Soon after his accession he forbade any disputation about the Kurʾān Those who had been arrested because they would not recognise the teachings of the Muʿtazila were released and in 235 (849—850) he revived and intensified the regulations for special dress for Jews and Christians which went back to the caliph ʿOmar The synagogues and churches recently built in Baghdād were taken down and the Muʿtazili chief kādi Ahmad b Abī Duʾād [q v] with his sons dismissed and the office of chief kādi given to the Sunnī Yahyā b Aktham The ʿAlids also fell under his ban In 236 (850—851) he had the mausoleum of al-Husain in Kerbelāʾ destroyed and pilgrimage to this place forbidden The provinces were frequently ravaged by rebels and foreign foes In Ādharbāidjān in 234 (848—849) Muhammad b al-Baʿith rebelled, he had earlier been taken prisoner and brought to Sāmarrā but had escaped, he established himself in the strong town of Marand The caliph's troops could do nothing against him until Bogha al Sharābī [q v] took command After a long siege the latter offered him a pardon, but when Ibn al Baʿith tried to escape he was seized and brought to Sāmarrā, where he soon died in prison When al Mutawakkil attempted to treat semi independent Armenia like a conquered province, a dangerous rising broke out there in 237 (851—852), which was suppressed in the following year, but only with difficulty, by Bogha al-Kabīr About the same time (238), the Byzantines landed in Egypt and plundered Damietta and in Asia Minor the war went on in the traditional fashion against the Byzantines When the Paulician sect was persecuted by the empress Theodora they went over to the Muslims in masses The Byzantines, however, succeeded in taking many prisoners Those who would not become converted were massacred, but when al-Mutawakkil who had moved his residence in Safar 244 (May—June 858) to Damascus but left it after only two months, sent Bogha with the Turkish cavalry against the Byzantines, the fortune of war turned Bogha fought with success against the enemy and in the following year the emperor Michael himself was defeated at Samosata In 246 (860—861) the Muslim generals took a considerable number of prisoners, but no permanent change in the situation was produced In Syria also trouble broke out Two governors in succession were driven out of Hims and only with the help of the troops from Damascus and al-Ramla was order restored (241 = 855—856) About the same time al-Mutawakkil sent an army under command of Muhammad b ʿAbd Allāh al Kummī against the rebel Bedja The latter were completely defeated but their leader ʿAlī Babā was pardoned In the reign of al Mutawakkil the dynasty of the Saffārids [q v] was established in Sidjistān To keep the people of Baghdād in check, he sent for the governor of Khurāsān, Muhammad b ʿAbd Allāh b Tāhir [q v], and when the turbulent praetorians made trouble he built a new residence at Djaʿfarīya in 245 (859—860) outside of Sāmarrā, which swallowed up enormous sums Poets and scholars were rewarded with princely munificence by this caliph The extravagance, capriciousness and cruelty of the caliph, however, made him hated, and finally he quarrelled with the commander of the Turkish bodyguard In Dhu 'l-Hidjdja 235 (July 850) he had arranged that his eldest son Muhammad al-Muntasir should succeed him and the two other sons Abū ʿAbd Allāh al Muʿtazz and Ibrāhīm al-Muʾaiyad were each to receive a governorship with a claim to the throne after al-Muntasir He began to favour al-Muʿtazz however, and thus aroused al Muntasir's discontent The latter conspired with a few others of the same sentiments and in Shawwāl 247 (Dec 861) al-Mutawakkil was murdered [s al Fath b Khākān]

Bibliography Ibn Kutaiba, Kitāb al-Maʿārif, ed Wustenfeld, p 200, Yaʿkūbī, ed Houtsma, II 591 602, Balādhurī, ed de Goeje, see index, Tabarī, ed de Goeje, III 1368 sqq, Masʿūdī, Murūdj, ed Paris, VII 189—289, IX 46, 51, 71, Kitāb al-Aghānī, see Guidi, Tables alphabetiques, Ibn al Athīr ed Tornberg, VII 21 sqq, Ibn al-Tiktakā, al-Fakhrī, ed Derenbourg, p 325—327, Muhammad b Shākir, Fawāt al-Wafayāt, I 103 sq, Ibn Khaldūn, al-ʿIbar, III 273 sqq, Weil, Gesch d Chalifen, II 347—372, Müller, Der Islam im Morgen- und Abendland, I 523 sqq, 538 sqq, Muir, The Caliphate, its Rise, Decline and Fall[3], p 526 sqq, Le Strange, The Lands of the Eastern Caliphate, p 54 sq, 78, 141, 355 sq (K V Zetterstéen)

MUTAWĀTIR (A), part act VI from w-t-r, "that which comes successively" It is used as a technical term in two senses

a In the theory of cognition it is applied to historical knowledge (khabar), if the latter is generally acknowledged, e g the knowledge that there is a city called Makka and that there has existed a king called Alexander

Definitions of the term show slight differences According to al Djurdjānī knowledge is mutawātir, when it is supplied by so many persons that either their number or their trustworthiness excludes doubt of its truth (Taʿrīfāt, ed Flugel, p 210, cf Sprenger, Dictionary of Technical Terms, p 1471)

According to Abū Hafs ʿUmar al-Nasafī († 537 = 1142) reports are mutawātir when handed down without deviation by persons who cannot be supposed to have plotted a lie Taftāzānī in his

commentary (p 33 sq) mentions two objections The first is, that Jews and Christians accept as mutawātir reports that are rejected by Muslims To this objection Taftāzānī simply replies that the possibility that these reports should be mutawātir, is excluded The second objection is, that the reports of every single reporter (āhād, q v) represent an opinion only and that an accumulation of opinions cannot be said to afford certainty To this Taftāzānī replies that often plurality has a power of which singleness is devoid, e g a cord made of hair

For the place of this source of knowledge within the theory of cognition, cf the Supplement, s v ʿIlm

b In prosody the term is applied to the rhyme in which one moving letter intervenes between the quiescents

Bibliography a ʿAbd al Kāhir al Baghdādī, Uṣūl al-Dīn, Stambul 1928, p 11 sqq, Wasīyat Abī Hanīfa, art 16, Abū Hafs ʿUmar al-Nasafī, ʿ*Akīda*, ed Cureton, p 1 sq, Abu 'l-Barakāt al-Nasafī, ʿ*Umda*, ed Cureton, p 1, Taftāzānī, commentary on Nasafī's ʿ*Akīda*, Stambul 1313, p 33 sqq, Lisān al-ʿArab, vii 137, Goldziher, Le livre d'Ibn Toumert, p 47 sqq, A J Wensinck, The Muslim Creed, index, s v b Freytag, Darstellung der arab Verskunst, Bonn 1830, p 303, 305, W Wright, Arabic Grammar, 3rd ed, new impression, Cambridge 1933, ii 355 (A J Wensinck)

MUTAWWIF, Meccan pilgrims' guide The word literally means one who leads the tawāf [q v] The task of the mutawwif is however by no means limited to assisting pilgrims from foreign lands, who entrust themselves to their guidance, to go through the ceremonies required at the circumambulation of the Kaʿba On the contrary they act as guides at the saʿy also and at all other ceremonies which are prescribed or only recommended for the ḥadjdj or ʿ*umra* [q v] The mutawwifs also cater very completely for the physical welfare of the pilgrims As soon as the pilgrims arrive in Djidda, their agents are ready on the arrival of the steamers to provide all the services they require from disembarkment to departure for Mecca In Mecca the mutawwifs or members of their families and servants take charge of the pilgrims During the whole of their stay they provide the pilgrims with lodging, service, food, purchases (necessary and unnecessary), attend them if they fall ill and in case of death take charge of what they leave behind them

The mutawwifs of course do not do all this for nothing They are appropriately paid for their trouble and see that, if the pilgrim is rich, their friends and relations also make something out of him Of the money which they themselves receive, they have to hand over a considerable part in the form of fees, presents etc to the shaikh of the gild and to the treasury, — another reason for getting as much as possible out of those entrusted to their care It is therefore no wonder that many pilgrims have complained bitterly about the covetousness of these particularly prominent representatives of the Meccan pilgrim industry Recently the fees for guides have been fixed by a legal enactment of the Ḥidjāz government (O M, xii [1932], 249)

Reference has already been made to the fact that the mutawwifs are organised in gilds, they are divided up into separate groups who sometimes have the right to exploit the pilgrims from a definite area only (e g Lower Egypt) All these groups together form the gild with a chief shaikh officially recognised at their head The gild is also very exclusive "Wild" (i e independent) guides (djarrārs) have to be content with the scanty pickings left over for them by the organised mutawwifs

Bibliography Snouck Hurgronje, Mekka, The Hague 1888 sq, ii 28–38, 98–101, 295 sqq, passim, Juynboll, Handbuch des islāmischen Gesetzes, Leyden—Leipzig 1910, p 150, Gaudefroy-Demombynes, Le pèlerinage à la Mekke, Paris 1923, p 200—204, F Duguet, Le pèlerinage de la Mecque au point de vue religieux, social et sanitaire, Paris 1932, p 70 sq, 82 sq, J L Burckhardt, Travels in Arabia, London 1829, i 354—360, for modern times E Rutter, The holy Cities of Arabia, New York—London 1928, i 80 sq, 113 sq, ii 139 sq, 143—148, Shakīb Arslān, al-Irtisāmāt al-latīf fī Kh̲ātīr al Ḥādjdj ilā Akdas Matāf, Cairo 1350, p 71—80 (R Paret)

AL-MUʿTAZILA is the name of the great theological school which created the speculative dogmatics of Islām The meaning of the name is clear from al-Masʿūdī, Murūdj, vi 22 the Muʿtazilīs are those who profess the doctrine of iʿtizāl, i e the doctrine of the manzila baina 'l-manzilatain[1] or the state intermediate between belief and scepticism, the fundamental doctrine of the school (see below) A tradition which emanates from the ahl al ḥadīth derives the name Muʿtazila from a schism which took place in the circle of al-Ḥasan al Baṣrī after laying down their doctrine of the manzila baina 'l manzilatain, Wāṣil b ʿAṭāʾ and ʿAmr b ʿUbaid are said to have separated (i tazala) from al-Ḥasan's circle to found an independent school or rather to have been expelled from it by the latter These traditions are not entirely without historical foundation but the interpretation of the name deduced from them is certainly wrong The Muʿtazilīs were proud of their name, which they certainly would not have been if it had been a nickname invented by their enemies We have here, as the variety of versions also shows, a tendencious invention of the ahl al-sunna wa 'l-djamāʿa anxious to rehabilitate al-Ḥasan and brand the Muʿtazilīs as heretics

Origins and political history There are quite definite indications that the Muʿtazila was of political origin and that it arose under the same constellation as the Shīʿī and Khārid̲jī movements The accession of ʿAlī (Dh̲u 'l-Ḥid̲jdja 35) is the great watershed in the currents of the history of Islam It is well known that several notable Companions of the Prophet refused to pay ʿAlī the homage which he demanded or offered it reluctantly The most frequently mentioned were Ṭalḥa and al Zubair but the names of many others have been preserved Saʿd b Abī Waḳḳās, ʿAbd Allāh b ʿOmar, Muhammad b Maslama, Usama b Zaid, Suhaib b Sinān and Zaid b Th̲ābit (al Ṭabarī, i 3072) Of these Ṭalḥa and al-Zubair openly rebelled against ʿAlī but the majority remained neutral The Medīnese in general followed the example of the latter and in Baṣra al Aḥnaf b Kais with 6,000 Tamīmīs and a group of Azdīs under Sabīa b Shaimān also stood aside from the quarrel (al-Ṭabarī, i 3169, 3178) In speaking of the latter the text uses the verb iʿtazala, which still has its proper sense of "to separate from", but which is already on the way to become a political term meaning "to take up a neutral attitude in the quarrel between ʿAlī and his adversaries" Now al-Nawbakhtī mentions (Kitāb Firak al-Shīʿa, ed Ritter, p 5) a party which on the accession of ʿAlī separated and followed Saʿd b Abī Wakkās, ʿAbd Allāh b ʿOmar, Muhammad b Maslama and Usāma b Zaid "These separated (iʿtazalū) from ʿAlī and refused either to fight against him or to take his side although they had paid homage to him and had received him favourably, they were called al Muʿtazila and are the ancestors of all the later Muʿtazila" The Muʿtazila as a theological school must therefore have been preceded by a political Muʿtazila, which determined its structure

This hypothesis seems to be confirmed if we analyse carefully what is recorded of the founders of the theological school According to a unanimous tradition, this school originated with two natives of Basra, Wasil b ʿAtāʾ [q v] and ʿAmr b ʿUbaid [q v] The period of their activity covers practically the reign of the caliph Hisham and his Umayyad successors, i e the years 105–131 (723—48) We have a good deal of quite early information about them, not always free from lacunae, but sufficient to enable us to grasp the leading ideas in their theological work (see Bibl) It is clear from all these traditions that the doctrine of iʿtizāl formed the starting point for the creation of the school, that Wāsil was the first to formulate it and that he later won over ʿAmr to his teaching This is how al-Khayyāt records the origin of the idea of iʿtizāl Muslims were agreed that he who committed a grave sin deserved the name of fāsik and of fādjir, but opinions varied as to the character of the individual who received these epithets The Khāridjīs said he was an infidel The Murdjiʾis said he was a believer in spite of his fisk and his fudjūr, al Hasan al-Basrī and his circle described him as a hypocrite (munāfik) Wāsil demonstrates that the description given in the Kurʾān of a believer and an infidel cannot be applied to a believer who has committed a grave sin, the latter is therefore neither believer nor infidel Now it is impossible to regard him as a hypocrite as al-Hasan wants to do, for a hypocrite must pass as a believer until his hypocricy is brought to light The only possible course then is to put the fāsik in a special category of those who are in an intermediate state (manzila baina ʾl-manzilataiⁿ) These same ideas are found in the conversation by which Wāsil is said to have won ʿAmr over to the doctrine of iʿtizāl (al-Sayyid al Murtadā, Amālī, i 114 sq = Ibn al Murtadā, al-Muʿtazilah, p 22 sq, source probably al Khayyāt)

There are political problems concealed behind these speculations The doctrine of manzila baina ʾl-manzilataiⁿ is not the result of interest in pure speculation, but arose out of an clearly defined opinion on the individuals who took part in the quarrels that raged round the caliphate of ʿAlī It is striking how much space is occupied by the question of ʿAlī, of Talha, of al-Zubair and of ʿĀʾisha in the rather scanty information which we possess regarding the theology of Wāsil and ʿAmr, we cannot doubt that here they were dealing with a central problem Wāsil and ʿAmr took neither side in the dispute (Kitab al Intiṣār, p 97—98) According to them, ʿAlī, Talha, al-Zubair and ʿĀʾisha were originally true and pious believers But the war which broke out among them divided them into two parties who could not both be right, one of these parties committed a sin but we do not know which We must therefore leave their cause to Him who knows it but in their relations with one another we cannot regard them as true believers in the strict sense of the word As a result if one of these individuals bears witness against another of the opposite party, we cannot accept this evidence, relatively to the one, the other is fāsik and vice versa (cf also Baghdādī, Kitāb al Farḳ, p 100) If we may believe the ahl al-hadīth, ʿAmr showed himself more severe than Wāsil, he is said to have refused to accept the deposition made by any member of these parties against any member of the community on any matter whatever (Taʾrīkh Baghdād, xii 178, al-Baghdādī, Kitāb al Farḳ, p 100), for he declared guilty (fussāḳ) per se both the parties engaged in the battle of the Camel It is therefore not surprising that Wāsil and ʿAmr have sometimes been confused with the Khāridjīs (verse of Ishāk b Suwaid al-ʿAdawī, al Djāhiz, Bayān, i 13)

However, the opinion of the leaders of the Muʿtazila on ʿAlī is based on quite a different foundation To understand the position correctly it is important to note that 1 Wāsil and the whole Muʿtazila were definitely enemies of the Umayyads and that 2 Wāsil adopted a somewhat ambiguous attitude regarding ʿOthmān and his murderers (Kitāb al-Intiṣār, p 97—98) This tacitly implies a declaration in favour of the ʿAlids, the first actors in the drama played at Mecca in the year 35 Indeed Wāsil was on somewhat intimate terms with the ʿAlids of Medīna (Ibn al Murtadā, al-Muʿtazilah, p 20), the Zaidiya revere him as one of their leaders, and Zaidī theology is essentially based on that of Wāsil This is true not only of the speculative theology, there is agreement also on political doctrines The Zaidīs do not say that the first caliphs Abū Bakr and ʿOmar were usurpers as the extreme Shīʿis do, Wāsil and with him the whole Muʿtazila regards the caliphate of Abū Bakr as legitimate (commentary of Ibn Abī Hadīd on Nahdj al-Balāgha, Cairo 1329, i 3), he left undecided the question of knowing who had the superior claim, Abū Bakr, ʿOmar or ʿAlī, but he credited ʿAlī with a superior claim to ʿOthmān This attitude, a little complicated as regards ʿAlī, and therefore prudent towards the extreme Shīʿis, at the same time unreservedly hostile to the Umayyads, can in my opinion only be interpreted in one way All these apparently dissimilar lines converge on a common centre the ʿAbbāsid movement It is precisely Wāsil's attitude which we must regard as characteristic of the partisans of the ʿAbbāsids The latter regarding themselves as the true ahl al-bait, it was evidently in their interest to lower somewhat the preponderating position attributed to ʿAlī by the extreme Shīʿis in order themselves to profit by the prestige enjoyed by the family of the Prophet, but on the other hand, they had every reason not to cut the links with the Shīʿis who were indispensable as allies to them It is obvious that in these circumstances it was particularly important for them to win over the relatively moderate Zaidī faction to their cause In a general way the teaching of Wāsil on al-manzila can only be perfectly understood if we see in it the theoretical crystallisation of the political programme of the ʿAbbāsids before their accession to power Everything leads us to believe that the theology of Wāsil and of the early Muʿtazila represents the official theology of the ʿAbbāsid movement This gives an unforced explanation of the fact that it was the official doctrine of the ʿAbbāsid court for at least a century It seems even probable that Wāsil and his disciples took direct part in the ʿAbbāsid propaganda In his kaṣida, mentioned below Safwān al Ansārī tells us that Wāsil had emissaries (duʿāt) in all parts of the Muslim world Safwān describes them as ardent believers and ascetics who were distinguished from other men in physiognomy and dress, they were the supports (awtād) of God in all lands and centres in which his commandments were made manifest and in which the art of disputation (with the enemies of the faith) flourished The period of this activity coincides exactly with that of the most intense ʿAbbāsid propaganda, in which all the forces working for the ruin of the Umayyads were co operating, it is impossible not to believe there was a connection between the two That Wāsil did actually extend his propaganda very far to the west is proved by the fact that there existed long after the fall of the Umayyads a Wāsilī community at Tāhert (Yākūt, i 815) numbering about 3,000 members who had allied themselves with the ʿIbādīs They had rebelled against Mansūr under Idrīs b ʿAbd Allāh al-Hasanī (al Shahrastānī, p 31, on these happenings see Tabarī, iii 561), they were therefore reckoned among the enemies of the first ʿAbbāsid caliphs It is interesting to note that the connection between Wāsil and the Khārijīs, supposed by Ishāk b Suwaid al-ʿAdawī to exist (see above) was here an actuality

The quarrels of Wāsil and his followers with Djahm b Safwān [q v] form a difficult problem which has not yet been solved On the one hand, Djahm's theology left distinct traces on that of the Muʿtazila, the doctrine of the created Kurʾān which was later to become a fundamental Muʿtazila thesis was probably formulated by Djahm and in the doctrine of the divine attributes there are coincidences on both sides which cannot be accidental On the other hand, there are many serious differences which are probably practical and political in their nature Djahm professed in the most extreme form the doctrine of predestination (djabr) All the actions of man are involuntary Wāsil maintained the opposite thesis of free will Now once again we have political problems hidden behind these theological controversies, the Umayyads in general preferred the dogma of predestination while the opposition accepted the dogma of free will in its widest interpretation, in Damascus, Ghailān al-Dimashkī, who figures among the fathers of the Muʿtazila (Ibn al Murtadā, al Muʿtazilah, p 15—17), was put to death by the caliph Hishām for holding the doctrine of free will (al-Tabarī, iii 1733)

Once the hypothesis of a definite connection between the Muʿtazila and the ʿAbbāsids is admitted, the question of the relations between the Muʿtazila founded by Wāsil and the early Muʿtazila of the period of ʿAlī presents itself in a new aspect It will be admitted that there is a striking resemblance between the attitude of these former companions of the Prophet and that of the ʿAbbāsids It is true that ʿAbd Allāh b al-ʿAbbās entered the service of ʿAlī after the death of ʿOthmān but his true sentiments were somewhat ambiguous, he was a great friend of ʿOthmān but a rather lukewarm partisan of ʿAlī and after the latter's death he placed himself at the service of the Umayyads His descendants did not remain at Medina, probably because the ʿAlids were their rivals there, after a stay in Damascus, his son went to Humaima near Adhruh and here a formal rapprochement took place in 98 between the ʿAbbāsids and the ʿAlids (Wellhausen, Das arabische Reich, p 312 sq) Before this event, we may regard the ʿAbbāsids as a kind of Muʿtazila in the old sense of the word

With ʿAmr b ʿUbaid a new element enters the Muʿtazila as founded by Wāsil ʿAmr originally was one of the ahl al-hadīth, brought up in the circle of al Hasan al-Basrī, he transmitted a large number of hadiths from his master and he is remembered as one of the muhaddithūn His conversion to the doctrine of iʿtizāl brought about a rupture between him and these circles, but with him a considerable section of the Kadarīs of the ahl al hadīth joined the Muʿtazila, thus reinforcing the more politically inclined Kadarīya, of which Wāsil was the champion Kadarī and muʿtazilī were soon to become synonymous terms ʿAmr seems to have been decidedly anti-ʿAlid (see above), in any case he preferred Abū Bakr to ʿAlī (Ibn Abī Hadīd on Nahdj al Balāgha, i 3) This attitude implies a certain predilection for ʿOthmān, which is foreign to Wāsil, indeed, a section of the old Basrīs, among them al Djāhiz, is said to have belonged to the party called al-ʿOthmānīya ʿAmr's point of view was of great importance for the development of the Muʿtazila After their final triumph, the ʿAbbāsids immediately dissolved the alliance with the Shiʿa, which had only been a political instrument for them As regards the extreme Shiʿa, the Rawāfid, the Muʿtazila unreservedly followed the direction of their new masters, but it is fairly evident that some of them did not decide to break so abruptly with the moderate Shiʿa It resulted in a schism One section remained faithful to the alliance with the moderate Shiʿa, this section was later to form a special Muʿtazila school in Baghdād But the Muʿtazilīs of Basra with ʿAmr at their head seem to have attached themselves without protest to the ʿAbbāsid cause ʿAmr even became the intimate friend of Mansūr and so to speak his spiritual father In the west, the Muʿtazilīs allied with the Khārijīs rebelled against the ʿAbbāsids (see above)

Let us sum up the characteristic features of the Muʿtazila at the beginning of the ʿAbbāsid period The Muʿtazila was 1 in general devoted to the cause of the ʿAbbāsid caliphs, only a faction being opposed to them, 2 decidedly hostile to the extreme Shiʿa, the Rāfida, 3 hostile to the Djahmīya, by which however it was a little influenced, 4 kadarī in reuniting several of the old factions of this name, 5 in serious disagreement with the ahl al-hadīth, who soon declared it heretical This position had a decisive influence in determing the structure of the Muʿtazila theology The beginnings of this theology go back to Wāsil and ʿAmr and are connected with the fight against the Rāfida The extreme Shīʿis had quite early assimilated a good number of non-Muslim beliefs, we need not doubt that Manichaeism played a part in them, in any case certain gnostic and dualist ideas had found a way into Islām through the intermediary of these Shiʿis These tendencies, very marked in Kūfa, were also represented at Basra, in the house of an Azdī who was a sumanī or Buddhist, Wāsil and ʿAmr had frequent meetings with ʿAbd al Karīm b Abi 'l ʿAwdjāʾ and Sālih b ʿAbd al-Kuddūs, who professed dualist doctrines (al-thanawīya, we should probably understand by this Manichaean views) and the poet Bashshār b Burd [q v] (Kitāb al Aghānī, iii 24) A serious schism broke up this curious madjlis This event decided the whole future of the Muʿtazila Henceforth the fight against zandaka and thanawīya is a cardinal point in the programme of the Muʿtazila Wāsil himself composed a refutation of Manichaeism which al-Bāhilī (c 300 A H) was still able to peruse (al Muʿtazilah, p 21) But they also found themselves compelled to combat these heresies in a positive fashion, to the doctrine of fire professed by Bashshār they offered a theology of earth, so to speak, a theology based on the natural philosophy of the time The poems of Safwān al Ansārī (al Djāhiz, Kitāb al-Bayān, i 16—19) afford us a specimen of this theology, here we have one of the fundamental documents for the history of Muʿtazila dogmatics It is not yet clear whence came the philosophy put at the service of theology but its general character is apparent, it is the philosophy of the alchemists, physicists of late antiquity, a kind of summa of the scientific principles which seem to have been accepted everywhere in Asiatic Hellenism Safwān perhaps gives us a hint as to the circles from which it came to the Muʿtazila, when he tells us that Bashshār called Wāsil and his friends Dayṣānis, this is in any case worth noting In a general way those who handed on this natural philosophy seem to have been the school called Dahrīya by Muslims The Muʿtazila fought these Dahris with a vigour which reveals the dependence on this heretical philosophy of which they were conscious The true founder of the dogmatic system of the Muʿtazila was Abu 'l-Hudhail Muhammad b al Hudhail al-ʿAllāf [q v] Abu 'l-Hudhail, his friends and pupils, continued on a large scale the polemic against Manichaeism, a polemic which is certainly not unconnected with the persecution begun by the ʿAbbāsids against the open or secret adherents of this religion On the other hand, he fought the Rāfida most vigorously, then represented by the very remarkable theologian Hishām b al-Hakam [q v], and it was through his disputes with the latter that he was led to study the books of the philosophers, which furnished him with a system of dogmatics, a little bold, but full of fertile new ideas Alongside of him there was a crowd of important theologians at Basra Muʿammar, an independent mind whose ideas have not yet been sufficiently analysed, Hishām b ʿAmr al Fuwatī and al-Asamm, adversaries of Abu 'l-Hudhail and several others Among the pupils of Abu 'l-Hudhail mention must first be made of Ibrāhīm b Sayyār al-Nazzām [q v] These theologians gave Muʿtazila dogmatics its essential character This theology is 1 apologetic it aims at defending the revelation of the Prophet, as a result it is 2 strictly Kurʾānic the sacred book is the only source of the theological denominations (asmāʾ) and of the precepts of religion (ahkām), it is 3 polemical it vigorously invaded the domains of other religions and other Muslim parties to fight them on their own ground, it is 4 speculative it has recourse to philosophical means to refute its adversaries and formulate its dogmas, consequently it is 5 intellectualist it envisages the problem of religion under the purely intellectual aspect Nothing could then be less justifiable than to regard the Muʿtazila as philosophers, free thinkers or liberals On the contrary, they are theologians of the strictest school, their ideal is dogmatic orthodoxy, philosophy for them is only an ancilla fidei, they are nothing less than tolerant What they created was Muslim scholasticism

Parallel to the school of Basra, a Muʿtazila school was founded in Baghdād by Bishr b al-Muʿtamir (q v, d 210 = 825–826) This school was pro-ʿAlid (ʿAlī preferable to Abū Bakr), and Bishr was persecuted by Hārūn al-Rashid But under Maʾmūn (q v, 198—218 = 813—833), a decidedly pro ʿAlid caliph, the school of Bishr gained a preponderating influence mainly through the theologians Thumāma b Ashras (d in 210 = 825–826) and Ibn Abī Duʾād (d in 240 = 854–855) This school particularly attacked those who held the doctrine of the uncreated Kurʾān [q v] This attack however had disastrous consequences for the Muʿtazila Abandoned by the caliph al-Mutawakkil (232—247) who adopted the doctrine of the uncreated Kurʾān, it rapidly fell from its influential position and soon found itself surrounded by implacable enemies In the second half of the third century, Ibn al Rawandī, a partisan of the Baghdād school, made a stir when he left the Muʿtazila for the most advanced Rāfida, a man of violent temperament, he criticised the Muʿtazila in a scathing way which did it much damage Towards the end of the third century, the Karmatian movement came on the scene, reinforcing the extreme Rāfida and causing trouble in every secular and spiritual sphere In the struggle against the Karmatians it is no longer the Muʿtazila who appear at the head of the defenders of orthodoxy but the ahl al-hadīth In the year 300, al Ashʿarī broke with the Muʿtazila of Basra, of which he had been a convinced supporter, to introduce speculative dogmatics among the ahl al-hadīth, who were soon to give its character to Sunnī theology

Among the Muʿtazila theologians of the third century we may mention the following At Basra the tradition of Abu 'l-Hudhail al ʿAllāf was propagated by a flourishing school represented by Yūsuf b ʿAbd Allāh al-Shahhām, Abū ʿAlī al-Aswārī and others ʿAbbād b Sulaiman was the pupil of Hishām al-Fuwatī Ibrāhīm b Ismāʿīl known as Ibn ʿUlaiya (d 218) was the pupil of al-Asamm The school of al-Nazzām developed certain special doctrines which the later Muʿtazila rejected (Fadl al-Hadathī and Ahmad b Hāʾit, Kitāb al-Intiṣār, p 222—223), but among the disciples of al-Nazzām we also find al-Djāhiz [q v] In the second half of the century, the most important Basra theologian was undoubtedly Abū ʿAlī Muhammad b ʿAbd al-Wahhāb al-Djubbāʾī [q v] In Baghdād we find in addition to the theologians already mentioned ʿIsā b Subaih al-Murdār, contemporary of Bishr b al Muʿtamir, then "the two Djaʿfars" Djaʿfar b Mubashshir (d 234) and Djaʿfar

b Harb (d 236), at a later date Muhammad b Shaddād al Miṣmaʿī Zurkān (d in 278) und Abu 'l-Husain ʿAbd al-Rahīm b Muhammad al Khaiyāt, the great authority on the history of the Muʿtazila (d at the end of the century) On the Muʿtazila of Syria we are not well informed, and only a little better on that of Egypt The first Muʿtazilī here was Ibn ʿUlaiya (cf above) who had disputations with al-Shāfiʿī, with him Hafs al-Fard came to Cairo, this last represented the official theology in Cairo during the miḥna of al-Wāthik Hafs was declared a heretic by al-Khaiyāt (Kitāb al-Intiṣār, p 133—134) — In Spain the Muʿtazilī teaching was disseminated by Abū Bakr Faradj al Kurtubī who had visited the east and studied there with al-Djāhiz, it was therefore al Djāhizīya — at bottom al-Nazzāmīya — that was known in Spain, very soon the Muʿtazila seems to have become undistinguishable from the Bāṭinīya (Asin Palacios, Abenmasarra y su escuela, Madrid 1914, p 21—22)

The fourth century saw the Shiʿa flourishing and ʿAbbāsid power disappearing, the favour of several Būyid governors now to some degree made good the loss of prestige which had been suffered by the Muʿtazila The schools continued their work and the Muʿtazila spread to the east At Basra, al Djubbāʾī had left a large number of disciples but his school was soon surpassed by that of his son Abū Hāshim [q v], representatives of the latter were among others Abū ʿAbd Allāh al-Husain b ʿAlī al-Basrī (d 369), Abu 'l Husain al Azrak (Ahmad b Yūsuf b Yaʿkūb) al Tanūkhī (d 377), a member of the well known al-Tanūkhī family, Abū Ishāk Ibrāhīm b ʿAiyāsh al-Basrī and his pupil the Kādī ʿAbd al Djabbār b Ahmad al Hamadhānī The latter, the most remarkable of the Basra theologians of the period, migrated in 360 to Rayy where he founded an influential school and died in 415 In Baghdād the school of Abū Bakr Ahmad b ʿAlī al Ikhshīdh (d in 320) dominated the whole century A very celebrated Baghdādī, Abu 'l Kāsim ʿAbd Allāh b Ahmad al-Balkhī al Kaʿbī, a pupil of al-Khaiyāt, founded a school at Nasaf, where he died in 319, among his pupils we find al-Ahdab Abu 'l-Hasan We also find the Muʿtazila in Isfahān, where Abū Bakr Muhammad b Ibrāhīm al Zubainī of the school of Abu 'l Hudhail had introduced Muʿtazila doctrines, at Kirmīsīn (school of Abū Hāshim), Guirgān, Nīshāpūr and in several other towns of Khuārāsān During the fifth century it was the theology of ʿAbd al-Djabbār which dominated at Basra, one of his pupils, Abū Muhammad al Hasan b Ahmad b Mattawaihi, handed down the great work on dogmatics of his master, al-Muḥīṭ bi 'l Taklīf, another theologian, Abū Rashīd Saʿīd b Muhammad al-Naisābūrī (d in 460), compiled a resumé of the questions disputed in the schools of Basra and Baghdād Several theologians of Baghdād are known, some of them must have belonged to the Zaidīya and generally speaking the Baghdād school becomes more and more merged in the Zaidīya The last great theologian of the Muʿtazila was al-Zamakhsharī [q v] (d in 538) but the schools continued to exist long after him, especially in the east It was probably the invasion of the Mongols that put an end to them, the Muʿtazila has however survived to our day in the Zaidīya

It was not speculative dogmatics alone that formed the subject of Muʿtazila activity Their part in the history of the exegesis of the Kurʾān is a very considerable one, it was they who introduced the strictly grammatical method There is a very close connection between them and the philological school of Basra, the representatives of which in general taught Muʿtazila doctrines (e g al-Asmaʿī) The exegetical works of the Muʿtazila, for the most part now lost, were utilised to a large extent by their adversaries, e g Fakhr al-Dīn al Rāzī — All questions of fikh were vigorously discussed in the Muʿtazila schools, the influence of the Muʿtazila on the uṣūl al-fikh and the madhāhib has still to be examined — Lastly the science of hadīth certainly received various stimuli from the Muʿtazila criticism of the ahl al-hadīth

Madhhab Muʿtazila theology is summed up under five principles (uṣūl) or fundamental doctrines which one must accept in their integrity to be recognised as a Muʿtazilī (al-Masʿūdī, Murūdj, vi 22) As these were probably in origin the principal points in the programme of Muʿtazilī propaganda, these usūl later became a kind of framework of speculative dogmatics

I Aṣl al-tawhīd the strictest profession of monotheism (against any kind of dualism), denial of all resemblance between Allāh and his creatures (against the anthropomorphisms of the muhaddithūn on the one hand and those of the Rāfida and Manichaeans on the other), the divine attributes recognised (against the Djahmīya) but deprived of their real existence they are not entities added to the divine being (this would be shirk, against the Sifātīya among the ahl al-hadīth) but identical with the being (Wāsil, Abu 'l Hudhail), allegorical interpretation of the anthropomorphisms of the Kurʾān, denial of the beatific vision, vigorous affirmation of a personal God and creator (against the Dahrīya), integral affirmation of the revelation of the Prophet but distinction between a natural theology and a revealed theology Problems discussed here 1 The nature of God and his attributes a omnipresence God is in all places, in the sense that he directs everything (Abu 'l-Hudhail, al-Djubbāʾī) — he is not in any place (general thesis), b perceptibility he is not perceived by the senses (thesis generally adopted) — he is perceived by the heart (Abu 'l Hudhail) — he has a hidden māhiya which will be perceived in another world with the help of a sixth sense which God will then create (Hafs al Fard and others, thesis declared heretical), c the attributes (eternal, names of the essence) identical with the essence (Abu 'l Hudhail, thesis generally adopted) — inherent in the essence through maʿānī (Muʿammar) — through aḥwāl (Abū Hāshim), expressing positive aspects (Abu 'l Hudhail and generally) — negative (knowledge negation of ignorance etc , al Nazzām) 2 The structure of the created world a starting point anthropology treated in a positive way (exact definition of religious duties) and negative (refutation of thanawīya) man is the empirical phenomenon which we see, the body (djism) which is composed of a certain number of indivisable entities (atoms) and which supports the accidents life, the senses, colours etc , nafs is muʿnā and distinct from rūh (Abu 'l-Hudhail) — man is composed of body (badan) and rūh (identical with nafs) which are mutually interpenetrant (mudākhala), the colours, senses, sensations, forms and spirits form different catagories of djawāhir (not accidents, not atoms), all that is living forms a single category (mudjānasa) (al-Nazzām) — man is an indivisible entity (djawhar) characterised by hayāt, ʿilm, kudra, the body is the instrument of this djawhar, the accidents (movement, rest, colours etc) are inherent in it through maʿānī which are inherent in other maʿānī etc in infinitum (Muʿammar) — man is bashar (ʿAbbād b Sulaimān) — the nafs is an instrument which the body uses, the rūh is an accident (Djaʿfar b Harb) — the rūh is a body and distinct from the life which is an accident (al-Djubbāʾī), b the physical world dead nature is distinct from that which is living in as much as nature acts through darūra while living beings act through their free will (ikhtiyār), for the rest, the one and the other category are of the same structure, the problems of physics being those of anthropology (substance, accidents, bodies, atoms etc), theory of zuhūr and kumūn formulated by al-Nazzām and which correspond to his theory of penetration (mudākhala) things are hidden one in the other, physical development consists in the hidden things becoming manifest (e g the fire hidden in the stone) 3 The relation between God and the created world a laisa ka-mithlihi shaʾun a rigorous distinction between kadīm and muhdath (no hulūl), b the activities of God, expressed by his attributes, have for their objects the things of the created world If these activities are eternal, the things ought to be so also, now these things are created i e put into existence after having been non-existent, several solutions of the problem "thing" is only what exists and before the reaction the thing was not thing which implies that divine knowledge is born with the things (Djahmī thesis adopted by Hishām al-Fuwatī) — before the creation things were posited (thābit) as non-existent in God's eternal knowledge but without the accidents which characterise them in existence (al Shahhām and others) — with these accidents (al Khayyāt, al-Kaʿbī and several theologians of Baghdād [school of maʿdūmīya]) God created all things at one time, one in the other and these things are manifested in the created world one after the other (al-Nazzām), c are the objects of divine knowledge and power limited? Yes (Abu 'l-Hudhayl) — no (the others), d divine power does not extend to the accidents (Muʿammar) — to the phenomena resulting spontaneously from human action (tawallud, see under aṣl al-ʿadl) 4 Revelation prophecy a prophet is maʿṣūm, i e free from grave sins, b the Kurʾān created, God creates the word in a substratum (lawh al-mahfūz, the Prophet, the bush etc) The Kurʾān is miraculous in composition and style — denied by al-Nazzām, distinction (which goes back to Wāsil) between muhkam, the precepts of the Kurʾān which are clear and without ambiguity and mutashābih, the precepts which are not immediately clear and evident, distinction between nāsikh and mansūkh

II Aṣl al-ʿadl God is just, all that he does aims at what is best for his creation (aṣlah), he does not desire evil and does not ordain it (amr and irāda identical) He has nothing to do with man's evil deeds, all human actions result from man's free will, man has a kudra and an istiṭāʿa kabla 'l-fiʿl, man will be rewarded for his good deeds and punished for his evil ones Problems discussed here 1 Divine power a can God commit an injustice? No al-Nazzām — yes, but he does not general thesis, b theodicy could God prevent evil? yes, for he possesses a store of hidden grace (lutf) which would be sufficient to destroy evil completely at once Bishr b al Muʿtamir and several Baghdād theologians — no, for he always does what is best and wisest for his creation general thesis 2 Human power created by God, physical evils, diseases etc are not subject to the human will, man's actions are movements, distinction between afʿāl al-kulūb and afʿāl al-djawārih, problem of tawallud stated by Abu 'l Hudhayl and particularly discussed in the school of Baghdād the effects of an action are attributed to him who performs it, and even after his death he remains responsible for it

III Asl al-waʿd wa 'l-waʿīd (or al asmāʾ wa 'l-ahkām) practical theology Problems here discussed a belief and unbelief belief consists in all the acts of obedience, obligatory or supererogatory, sins (maʿāṣi) are divided into grave (kabāʾir) and petty (saghāʾir), the following are kabāʾir tashbīh Allāh bi khalkihi, tadjwiruhu fi hukmihi and takdhibuhu fī khabarihi, radd al-idjmāʿ ʿan 'l-nabī, God of his grace may forgive ṣaghāʾir, he who is not a Muslim obeys God if he does something which God has commanded in the Kurʾān (tāʿa lā yurādu 'llāhu bihā) Abu 'l Hudhayl (thesis rejected by al-Nazzām and the Baghdād school), distinction between īmān bi 'llāh and īmān li 'llāh from Hishām al Fuwatī onwards, belief consists in avoiding kabāʾir i e acts regarding which God has laid down a threat (waʿīd) al-Nazzām, b al-asmāʾ wa 'l ahkām the good (al-hasan) is what God has ordained in the Kurʾān, evil (al kabīh) what he has forbidden Questions of fikh in general, c Tradition the authenticity of a tradition is only guaranteed by 20 believers one of whom is predestined to Paradise, there are in each generation 20 believers who are free from grave sins (maʿsūm) Abu 'l-Hudhayl and Hishām al Fuwatī, the tawātur does not necessarily presuppose believers, the Muslim community can agree upon what is an error or a mistake al-Nazzām and others

IV Asl al-manzila baina 'l-manzilatain 1 Problems of theocracy a the caliphate of Abū Bakr was legitimate but not based on a divine revelation general thesis, b superiority of Abū Bakr over ʿAlī (Abū Bakr superior to ʿOmar, the latter to ʿOthmān, the latter to ʿAlī) the old Basrīs and Thumāma, superiority of ʿAlī to Abū Bakr the Baghdādīs and some later Basrīs (al-Djubbāʾī towards the end of his life, ʿAbd al-Djabbār), neutral attitude (tawakkuf) on all that concerns the question of knowing who was entitled to the superiority Abū Bakr, ʿOmar or ʿAlī, ʿAlī superior to ʿOthmān Wāsil, Abu 'l-Hudhayl, Abū Hāshim 2 The problems of fāsik, the old problem being no longer a live one, petty sins (al-saghāʾir) were discussed under this head

V Asl al-amr bi 'l-maʿrūf wa 'l-nahy ʿan 'l-munkar programme of Muʿtazila activity before the coming of the ʿAbbāsids, the faith must be spread by the tongue, the hand and the sword, later this asl is little discussed, al-Asamm denies its obligatory character

Bibliography Steiner, Die Muʿtaziliten oder die Freidenker im Islam, Leipzig 1865, v Kremer, Gesch d herrschenden Ideen des Islams, Leipzig 1868, Houtsma, De stryd over het Dogma etc, Leyden 1875, Duncan B Macdonald, Development of Muslim Theology etc,

London 1903, Galland, Essai sur les Moʿtazelites, Paris n d (1906), Horovitz, Über den Einfluss der griechischen Philosophie auf die Entwicklung des Kalām, Breslau 1909, Horten, Die philosophischen Probleme der spekulativen Theologie im Islam, Bonn 1910, do, Die philosophischen Systeme der spekulativen Theologen im Islam, Bonn 1912, do, Die Modus-Theorie des Abū Hāschim, in Z D M G, lxiii (1909), 303–24, do, Die Lehre vom Kumūn bei Nazzām, ibid, p 774–792, do, Was bedeutet معنى als philosophischer Terminus?, ibid, lxiv (1910), 391–396, Goldziher, Aus der Theologie des Fachr al-Dīn al-Rāzī, Islam, iii (1912), 213–347, do, Vorlesungen über den Islam, 2nd ed, Heidelberg 1925, ch 3, Nallino, Di una strana opinione attribuita ad al Ǧāhiz intorno al Corano, in R S O, vii (1916–1918), 421–428, do, Sull' origine del nome dei Muʿtaziliti, ibid, p 429–454, do, Rapporti fra la dogmatica muʿtazilita e quella degli Ibāditi dell' Africa settentrionale, ibid, p 455—560, do, Sul nome di "Qadariti", ibid, p 461—466, Andrae, Die Person Muhammeds, Stockholm 1917, p 108—116, 139—145, v Arendonk, De Opkomst van het Zaidietische Imamaat in Yemen, Leyden 1919, introduction, Massignon, La passion d'al-Hallaj, Paris 1922, passim, Snouck Hurgronje, in Chantepie de la Saussaye, Lehrbuch der Religionsgeschichte[2], Tubingen 1925, i, p 722—738, Nyberg, introduction to the Kitāb al-Intiṣār (s below), do, Zu den Grundideen und zur Geschichte der Muʿtazila, in Ephemerides Orientales publ by O Harrassowitz, N° 31 (1927), 10–12, do, Zum Kampf zwischen Islam und Manichaismus, in O L Z, 1929, p 426—441, Pretzl, Die frühislamische Atomenlehre, in Isl xix (1931), 117—130, Stiothmann, Islamische Konfessionskunde und das Sektenbuch des Asʿarī, ibid, p 193—242, Wensinck, The Muslim Creed, Cambridge 1932, al Khayāt, Kitāb al-Intiṣār wa 'l-Radd ʿalā Ibn al Rawandī al mulhid / Le livre du triomphe, ed H S Nyberg, Cairo 1925, al-Ashʿarī, Makālāt al-islāmīyin, ed Ritter, Istanbul 1929–1933 (Bibliotheca Islamica, i, a—c), Kitāb al Fihrist, in W Z K M, iv (1890), p 217—235, al-Baghdādī, Kitāb al Farḳ, Cairo 1910, p 93–189, do, Usūl al-Dīn, Istanbul 1928, al-Saiyid al-Murtadā, Amālī, Cairo 1325, i 113—143, do, Kitāb al Shāfī fi 'l-Imāma wa 'l Nakd ʿalā Kitāb al-Mughnī li 'l Kādī ʿAbd al Ḏjabbār, lith Teheran 1301, Ibn Hazm, Kitāb al-Fisal, al-Shahrastānī, Kitāb al Milal, ed Cureton, p 29—60, al-Īdjī, Mawākif, Cairo 1327, viii 377—384, Saʿīd al Ansārī, Multakat Ḏjāmiʿ al-Taʾwīl li-Muhkam al Tanzīl, Shibli Academy Series, vol 14, London 1921 (fragments of the Tafsīr of the Muʿtazilī Abū Muslim Muh b Bahr al Isfahānī, d in 322, selections from the Mafātih of Fakhr al Dīn al-Rāzī), ʿAbd al Ḏjabbār, Tanzīh al-Kurʾān ʿan l Matāʿin, Cairo (al-Azharīya press) 1329, Abū Rashīd, Kitāb al-Masāʾil fi 'l-Khilāf baina 'l-Baṣrīyin wa 'l-Baghdādīyin, ch i, ed by Biram (Die atomistische Substanzenlehre aus dem Buch der Streitfragen etc, Berlin 1902), do, al-Muʿtazilah Being an Extract from the Kitābu-l Milal wa li-Nihal by al-Mahdī li-dīn Ahmad b Yahyā b al Murtadā, ed by T W Arnold, Leipzig 1902 also the works mentioned in the text (H S Nyberg)

AL-MUʿTAZZ BI 'LLĀH, ABŪ ʿABD ALLĀH MUHAMMAD (or AL-ZUBAIR) B DJAʿFAR, an ʿAbbāsid caliph, son of al-Mutawakkil and a slave-girl named Kabīha After al-Mustaʿīn had been forced to abdicate, al-Muʿtazz was proclaimed caliph on 4th Muharram 252 (Jan 25, 866) When he wanted to get rid of the two Turkish generals Wasīf and Bogha the younger, they got wind of his intentions and went back to Sāmarrā On the other hand, he succeeded in putting his brother and successor designate al Muʾayyad to death and throwing the third brother Abū Ahmad into prison In the following year Wasīf was killed by the troops when they mutinied for their pay and he attempted to appease them After the death in Dhu 'l-Kaʿda 253 (Nov 867) of the governor Muhammad b ʿAbd Allāh [q v], trouble broke out in Baghdād and in the following year Bogha was murdered at the caliph's instigation As the latter could not pay the troops they mutinied Al-Muʿtazz applied to his mother who possessed immense wealth, but she refused to help him and at the end of Radjab 255 (July 869) the cruel and faithless caliph was deposed He was put in a subterranean dungeon where he died of starvation in 3 days at the age of 24 In his reign the dynasty of the Tūlūnids was founded and Yaʿkūb b Laith [q v] was recognised as governor of Sidjistān The Khāridjīs sacked al Mawsil and in Asia Minor the Muslims were defeated by the Byzantines Cf also the articles AL-MUTAWAKKIL, AL-MUNTASIR and AL-MUSTAʿĪN

Bibliography Ibn Kutaiba, Kitāb al-Maʿārif, ed Wustenfeld, p 200, Yaʿkūbī, ed Houtsma, ii 593, 595, 603, 610—616, Tabarī, ed de Goeje, iii 1388 sqq, Masʿūdī, Murūdj, ed Paris, vii 193, 273, 304, 364 sqq, ix 46, 52, Kitāb al Aghānī, see Guidi, Tables alphabetiques, Ibn al Athīr, ed Tornberg, vii 32 sqq, Ibn al Tiktakā, al Fakhrī, ed Derenbourg, p 332—335, Muhammad b Shākir, Fawāt al-Wafayāt, ii 185, Ibn Khaldūn, al ʿIbar, iii 287 sqq, Weil, Gesch d Chalifen, i 355, 374, 385 sqq, Muir, The Caliphate, its Rise, Decline, and Fall[3], p 529 sqq, Muller, Der Islam im Morgen und Abendland, i 528 sq, Le Strange, Baghdad during the Abbasid Caliphate, p 171, 247, 311—313 (K V Zetterstéen)

MUTHALLATH, also MUTHALLATHA, plur always muthallathāt, triangle, it forms the first category of plane surfaces bounded by straight lines (al basāʾit al musattaha al mustakīmat al khutūt) (cf al Khwārizmi, Mafātīh, p 206) Following Euclid's Elements, i, Ὅροι 24—29, the Arab mathematicians classify triangles from two points of view either according to the sides (dilʿ, pl adlāʿ) into equilateral (al muthallath al-mutasāwī 'l adlāʿ, in Euclid τρίγωνον ἰσόπλευρον), isosceles (al-muthallath al mutasāwī 'l dilʿain, τρίγωνον ἰσοσκελές) and scalene (al-muthallath al-mukhtalif al-adlāʿ, τρίγωνον σκαληνόν), or according to the angles (zāwiya, pl zawāyā), into right-angled (al muthallath al kāʾim al zāwiya, τρίγωνον ὀρθογώνιον), obtuse angled (al-muthallath al munfarid al-zāwiya, τρίγωνον ἀμβλυγώνιον) and acute-angled (al-muthallath al-hādd al zāwiya [zawāyā], τρίγωνον ὀξυγώνιον)

In the equilateral triangle the base is called al-kāʿida, the apex al-raʾs, the sides al-dilʿān (see above), in the right-angled triangle the hypotenuse is called al kuṭr, i e "diameter" (because the hypotenuse represents the diameter of the circle described around the right-angled triangle), for the two sides the term al-dilʿān is generally used

Misāhat al muthallathāt as a technical term

means trigonometry (cf Dozy, Supplément, I 163a)

MUTHALLATHA (always with the feminine ending) is a technical term in astrology Astrology divides the zodiacal circle (mintaka [q v]) into four muthallathāt (Gr τρίγωνα, Lat trigona, triquetra), each of which includes three signs 120° apart These "are situated together in the trigonal plane" (tathlīth, Gr τρίγωνον, Lat aspectus trinus), the word tathlīth itself is frequently found as a synonym of muthallatha which comes from the same root (th-l-th) (cf Dozy, op cit, p 162b)

In star nomenclature Kawkab al-Muthallath is the constellation of the (northern) Triangle (in Eratosthenes Δελτωτόν, in Ptolemy Τρίγωνον) which is adjoined in the east by Perseus, in the north by Andromeda, in the west by Pisces and in the south by Aries According to Ptolemy (Almagest) and al Sūfī (ed Schjellerup, p 123 sq), it consists of three stars of the third magnitude and one of the fifth The star at the apex (α Trianguli) is an astrolabe star and is called Ra's al Muthallath The latter name is found in Libros del saber de astronomia del rey D Alfonso X de Castilla in the corrupted form "alcedeles"

Bibliography al-Khwārizmī, Kitāb Mafātih al-ʿUlūm, ed G van Vloten, Leyden 1895, Codex Leidensis 399, 1 Euclidis Elementa ex interpretatione al Hadschadschadschi, Copenhagen 1893—1932, vol 1, ʿAbd al-Rahmān al-Sūfī, al Kawākib wa 'l-Suwar (Description des etoiles fixes), ed H C F C Schjellerup, St Petersburg 1874 (WILLY HARTNER)

AL-MUʿTĪ [See ALLĀH, II]

AL-MUTĪʿ LI 'LLĀH, ABU 'L KĀSIM AL-FADL, an ʿAbbāsid caliph, son of al Muktadir [q v], brother of al-Rādī and of al-Muttakī [q v] Al-Mutīʿ was a bitter enemy of al-Mustakfī [q v] and therefore went into hiding on the latter's accession and after Muʿizz al-Dawla [q v] had become the real ruler, al-Mutīʿ is said to have taken refuge with him and incited him against al-Mustakfī After the deposition of the latter in Djumādā II or Shaʿbān 334 (Jan or March 946) al-Mutīʿ was recognised as caliph His reign marks a very unfortunate period in the history of the ʿAbbāsids The caliph himself had not the slightest authority, the power was in the hands of Muʿizz al-Dawla and after his death (356 = 967) in those of his son Bakhtiyār The Fātimids were growing more and more powerful and the Sāmānids also declined to recognise al Mutīʿ as the legitimate suzerain The Hamdānids were weakened by their wars with the Būyids and the Fātimids In Baghdād the Sunnīs and Shīʿīs were fighting one another and several Shīʿī usages were introduced by the Būyids who had ʿAlid sympathies At last the weak and sickly caliph was forced by the Turks to abdicate in favour of his son ʿAbd al Karīm al-Tāʾiʿ (13th Dhu 'l-Kaʿda 363 = August 5, 974) Al Mutīʿ died in Muharram 364 (September—October 974) in Dar al-ʿĀkūl

Bibliography Masʿūdī, Murūdj (ed Paris), I sq, IX 48, 52, Ibn al-Athīr (ed Tornberg), VIII 315, 338 sqq, Ibn al Tiktakā, al-Fakhrī (ed Derenbourg), p 390 sq, Muhammad b Shākir, Fawāt al-Wafayāt, II 125, Weil, Gesch d Chalifen, III 1 sq (K V ZETTERSTÉEN)

MUṬLAḲ (A), part pass IV from t-l-k, "to loose the bond (kaid) of an animal, so as to let it free" (e g Muslim, Diihād, trad 46, Abū Dāwūd, Diihād, bāb 100) The term is also applied to the loosening of the bowstring (Bukhārī, Diihād, b 170), of the garments, the hair etc Thence the common meaning absolute, as opposed to restricted (mukaiyad), and further the accusative muṭlakan "absolutely" The use of the term is so widely diffused, that a few examples only can be given

In grammar the term mafʿūl mutlak denotes the absolute object (cognate accusative), i e the objectivated verb of the sentence, such as "a sitting" in the sentence he sat a sitting

In the doctrine of the roots of fikh the term is applied to the mudjtahids of the heroic age, the founders of the madhhabs who are called mudjtahid mutlak, an epithet which none after them has borne [cf IDJTIHĀD]

In dogmatics the term is applied to existence, so that al-wudjūd al mutlak denotes Allah, as opposed to His creation, which does not possess existence in the deepest sense

In ontology the term is also applied to existence (wudjūd) in connection with the question of the nature of the latter Here al-wudjūd al mutlak is opposed to al-wudjūd al mahmūl li 'l mawdūʿ See the art MANIIK, supra p 259b

In other surroundings the term has the meaning "general" as opposed to khāss, cf the definition in Djurdjānī's Taʿrīfāt Mutlak denotes the one without specification Cf further the Dictionary of the Technical Terms

On the meaning of rawi mutlak in prosody, cf Freytag, Darstellung d arab Verskunst, Bonn 1830, p 311

Bibliography de Sacy, Grammaire arabe, second ed, I, Paris 1831, p 298, Wright, A Grammar of the Arabic Language, 3rd ed, new impression, Cambridge 1933, II 54 sqq, M S Howell, A Grammar of the Classical Arabic Language, Allāhābād, 1883, I 139—142, Juynboll, Handleiding tot de kennis van de mohwet, Leyden 1925, p 24, Snouck Hurgronje in Z D M G, liii 140 sqq (Verspr Geschriften, II 385 sqq), Horten, Die speculative und positive Theologie im Islam, Leipzig 1912, Anhang I and II, s v, al Idjī Mawākif, Constantinople 1239, p 184 sq, al Djurdjānī, Taʿrifāt, ed Flugel, p 233, Muh Aʿlā al Tahānawī, Dict of the Technical Terms, Calcutta 1862, p 921—924 (A J WENSINCK)

AL-MUTTAKĪ II 'LLĀH, ABŪ ISHĀK IBRĀHĪM, an ʿAbbāsid caliph, son of al-Muktadir [q v] and a slave-girl named Khalūb In Rabiʿ I 329 (Dec 940) he succeeded his brother al-Rādī [q v], by this time the caliphate had sunk so low that five days passed after the death of al Rādī before steps were taken to choose his successor Al-Muttakī at once confirmed the Amīr al Umarāʾ Bedjkem [q v] in office, after his death however, the Turks and Dailamīs in the army began to quarrel with one another Abū ʿAbd Allāh al-Barīdī [see AL-BARĪDĪ] seized the capital but could only hold it a few weeks He was driven out by the Dailamī chief Kūrtegīn who however was soon overthrown by Ibn Rāʾik [q v] When Abū ʿAbd Allāh sent his brother Abu 'l Husain with an army against Baghdād, the caliph and Ibn Rāʾik escaped to al Mawsil to the Hamdānids (Djumādā II 330 = Feb—March 942) After the assassination of Ibn Rāʾik the Hamdānid Abū Muhammad al-Hasan was appointed Amīr al Umarāʾ and received the honorific title of Nāsir al-Dawla The occupation of Baghdād offered him no difficulty, the Turkish general Tuzun rebelled a little later and Nāṣir al-Dawla had to evacuate the capital which was entered by Tuzun in Ramaḍān 331 (June 943) as Amīr al-Umarā'. Al Muttakī soon found himself forced to seek the protection of the Ḥamdānids again and at the beginning of the following year (autumn 943) he fled to al-Mawṣil Then he settled in al Rakka but when Tuzun made peace with Nāṣir al Dawla, al-Muttakī appealed for help to the Ikhshīdid of Egypt, the latter came to al-Rakḳa in Radjab 332 (March 944), the negotiations however were unsuccessful and finally the caliph put his trust in Tuzun, who after assuring him of his loyalty by the most sacred oaths had him blinded (Safar 333 = Oct 944) Al Muttakī was then declared to have been deposed He died in Sha'bān 357 (July 968)

Bibliography Mas'ūdī, Murūdj, ed Paris, viii 344—376, ix 48, 52, Ibn al Athīr, ed Tornberg, viii 275 sq , Ibn al-Ṭiktakā, al Fakhrī, ed Derenbourg, p 385—388, Ibn Khaldūn, al-'Ibar, iii 409 sqq , Weil, Gesch d Chalifen, ii 680 sqq , Muller, Der Islam im Morgen- und Abendland, i 566 sqq , Muir, The Caliphate its Rise, Decline, and Fall[3], p 575 sqq , Le Strange, Baghdad during the Abbasid Caliphate, p 56, 195 (K V Zetterstéen)

AL-MUTTAKĪ AL-HINDĪ, author of several works in Arabic, whose real name was 'Alī b Ḥusām al-Dīn 'Abd al-Malik b Kādī Khān al Shādhilī al Kādirī, was born at Burhānpūr in Gudjarāt of a respectable family of Djawnpūr [q v] He first joined the Čishtī order, as a disciple of 'Abd al Karīm b Shaikh Bādjan at Burhānpūr and afterwards went to Multān where he read with Ḥusām al Dīn al-Muttakī, after whom he is called al Muttakī He spent the remaining portion of his Indian life at Aḥmadābād during the reign of Bahādur Shāh, but left India for Mecca after Humāyūn defeated Bahādur Shāh in 941 (1534) He spent his last days in Mecca where he lived for thirty years more, during which he read with Ibn Ḥadjar al 'Askalānī and others and entered the Kādirī and Shādhilī orders His high spiritual life and learning led many people to become his murīd (spiritual disciple) He died a highly respected saint and scholar in Mecca 975 (1567) at the age of ninety He is the author of the following works

1 al-Burhān fī 'Alāmāt Mahdī ākhir al Zamān, an account of the Mahdī and of his coming at the end of the world,

2 al-Burhān al-djalī fī Ma'rifat al-Walī,

3 Talkhīs al Bayān fī 'Alāmāt Mahdī ākhir al Zamān,

4 Djawāmi' al Kalim fi 'l Mawā'iz wa 'l Ḥikam, a collection of sentences on morals,

5 Hidāyat Rabbī 'inda Fakad al Murabbī,

6 al-Ḥikam,

7 Kanz al 'Ummāl fī Sunan al Akwāl, a combined edition of Suyūṭī's Djāmi' al-Masānīd or Djāmi' al-Djawāmi' or al Djāmi' al kabīr, newly arranged according to chapters (printed in Ḥaidarābād 1312),

8 al Mawāhib al-'aliya fi Djam' al Ḥikam al-kur'āniya wa 'l hadīthiya,

9 Minhadj al-'Ummāl fī Sunan al-Akwāl, an abridgement of Suyūṭī's well known alphabetically arranged work al Djāmi' al saghir containing a collection of traditions from authentic sources, newly arranged according to chapters together with a supplement,

10 Mukhtaṣar al-Nihāya, an abridgment of Djazarī's dictionary of traditions entitled al Nihāya fi Gharīb al-Hadīth,

11 Nizam al-Mi'yār wa 'l-Mikyās li-Ma'rifat Marātib al-Nās, a short tract on the classification of man

Bibliography 'Abd al Ḥakk al-Dihlawī, Akhbār al Akhyār, p 249, Āzād al-Bilgrāmī, Subhat al-Mardjān, p 43, Fakīr Muḥammad al Lāhōrī, Hadā'ik al Ḥanafiya, p 382, Ṣiddīk Ḥasan al Kannūdjī, Abdjad al-'Ulūm, p 895, Rieu, Persian Cat, p 356, and Brockelmann, G A L, ii 384 (M Hidayet Hosain)

MUWALLAD (A) means properly one born of non-Arab parents but brought up among Arabs This is how it is usually to be translated in the Ḥadīth (e g Mālik, Nikāḥ, bāb 42) Later it was used to distinguish from the new convert the children of converts, who were brought up in Islām The common translation "renegade" is wrong as is the adoptado of Pedro de Alcala In theory they had equal rights with the old Muslims but the caliph 'Omar in the interest of the state's finances ordered that they should pay the land-tax (khardj) while the old Muslims only paid a tenth of the yield The muwalladūn were of special importance in Muslim Spain, especially from the time of 'Abd al Raḥmān II, when conversions to Islām became more and more numerous Some even retained their old family-names (Banū Angelino, Banū Sabarico) This section of the population among whom were often crypto-christians (Christiani occulti) played the largest part in the frequent revolutions against Muslim authority in Spain

The post classical poets were called muwalladūn in contrast to the Islāmiyūn, their language was no longer considered a model of grammar, lexicography and prosody The boundary between the two lies about the end of the first century Among best known muwalladūn were al-Buḥturī, al-Mutanabbī and, according to some, also al Farazdak and Djarīr

Bibliography The dictionaries, v Kremer, Culturgeschichte, ii 154, Dozy, Histoire des Musulmans d'Espagne, ed Levi Provençal, Leyden 1932, i 283 sqq , E Lévi Provençal, L'Espagne musulmane, Paris 1932, p 18 sq (Heffening)

MUWASHSHAH, Muwashshaha or Tawshīh, an ode or poem intended to be sung, is so called by comparison with the wishāḥ, which is a double belt ornamented with pearls and rubies or a band of leather studded with pearls which a woman wears across her body from the shoulder to the opposite hip, thus going round the body The muwashshah is composed of two parts one of which contains complete lines and the other hemistiches

The muwashshah, which belongs to the "seven kinds or branches" (funūn) considered to be post classical, is composed according to the rules of the purest syntax

The muwashshah is divided into "stanzas", the technical name of which is not exactly settled, they are usually called djuz' or bait In its most perfect form, it usually begins with one or two lines, a sort of prelude to the actual poem, this prelude is called madhhab, ghuṣn or maṭla', we also sometimes find the taṣrīʿ, if it is a distich, the first hemistiches of each verse rhyme together and the two second hemistiches also If A be the rhyme of the first hemistich and B that of the second, the maḏhhab or ghuṣn is of the following form

After the maḏhhab or ghuṣn come the stanzas proper called djuz' or bait

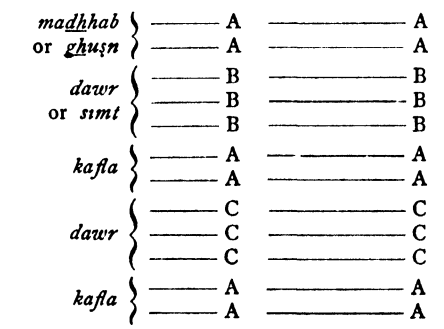
The djuz' or bait contains two parts the first consisting of a varying number of hemistiches with the same or alternate rhymes, which however are never those of the maḏhhab or ghusn This first part is called dawr or simt The second part which is exactly like the maḏhhab or ghusn, both as regards number of lines and rhymes, is called kafla or kufl The stanza therefore presents the following form

The rhyme or rhymes of the dawr or simt vary from one stanza to another, but those of the kafla are always the same as those of the maḏhhab or ghusn The kafla is a sort of refrain which does not fail to make an impression on the listeners by the repetition of the same sounds and rhythms

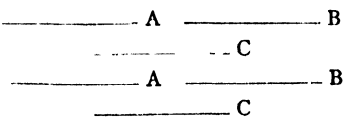
These are the most usual models of the muwashshah, but the poets, not being bound by hard and inflexible rules, have, each according to his temperament, exercised their imagination considerably in this genre

Thus Ibn Sanāʾ al-Mulk composed a poem in which the first foot of each hemistich is fāʿilun and has the same rhyme as the hemistich of which it forms part This is the scheme



etc

The blind poet of Tudela shortened the hemistiches which gives a more lively rhythm



It would be wearisome to give all the forms of stanzas which are found in the muwashshah

From the point of view of metre, very great variety is found Martin Hartmann recognised 146 which may go back to the 16 classical metres Three other types which are found do not seem to be derived from any well defined form

mafʿūlātu new type mutafāʿilatun type approaching the khabab
mustafʿilatun mustafʿilun
a type which might be connected with dū bait

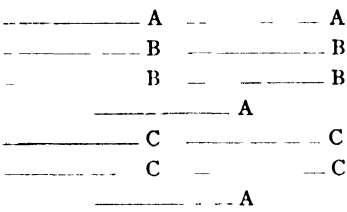
From the historical point of view, Freytag thinks that the muwashshah belongs to an old type which has now disappeared There is certainly no doubt that the pre Islāmic poets composed poems similar to the muwashshah, these are known as musammat, we find here again the word simt applied to the longest part of the stanza or couplet of the muwashshah

The musammat began with an opening line with taṣrīʿ, then came four hemistiches rhyming together on a different rhyme from the first line, next came a fifth hemistich rhyming with the first and completing the stanza A new stanza followed with four hemistiches not rhyming with those of the first stanza, it ended with a hemistich rhyming with the opening line Here is the scheme



Imru 'l-Kais is said to have composed a piece of this nature but it does not seem to be genuine

The inventor of the muwashshah is said to have been Mukaddam b Muʿāfā, a poet at the court of ʿAbd Allāh b Muḥammad al Marwānī who ruled in Spain (275—300 = 888—913) He was followed by Ibn ʿAbd Rabbihi, author of al-ʿIkd al-farīd Their muwashshah are however believed to be lost

The first to shine in this genre was ʿUbādat al-Kazzāz, a poet of al Muʿtasim b Ṣumādih, prince of Almeria Al-Aʿlam al Batalyawsī records that he heard Abū Bakr b Zuhr say "All the composers of muwashshah are simply children beside ʿUbādat al-Kazzāz" In the opinion of all men of letters no contemporary writer could rival ʿUbādat al-Kazzāz in the days of the mulūk al-ṭawāʾif

After him comes Abū ʿAbd Allāh Irfaʿ Raʾsah, the court poet of al-Maʾmūn b Dhu 'l-Nūn, prince of Toledo In the time of the Almoravid dynasty there flourished a group of poets among whom may be mentioned the blind poet of Tudela, Ibn Baḳī, Abū Bakr b al-Abyad, Abū Bakr b Bādja

In the time of the Almohads the most famous

composers of muwashshah were Muhammad b Abu 'l-Fadl and Ibn Hayyūn At a later period we have Ibrāhīm b Sahl al Isrā'īlī, a poet of Seville and of Ceuta, Ibn Khalaf al-Djazā'irī (of Algiers), Ibn Khazar of Bougie, the vizier and celebrated man of letters, Lisān al-Dīn b al-Khatīb

Eastern poets have followed those of Spain One of them, Ibn Sanā' al Mulk al Misrī (551—608 = 1156—1212), acquired a reputation in both east and west

As to the subjects of the muwashshah they are the same as those of the traditional kasidas, but as they are composed with the definite object of being sung to the accompaniment of stringed instruments they are usually love-poems

On the musical origins of the muwashshah see the article TIK

Bibliography Ibn Khaldūn, Prolegomenes, transl de Slane, Paris 1868, iii 422, ʿAbd al-Wāhid al-Marrākushī, al-Bayān, Leyden 1881, p 63, transl Fagnan, Algiers 1893, p 77, Ibn Abshīhī, Mustatraf, Būlāk 1292, ii 258, al-Muhibbī, Khulāsat al-Athar, Cairo 1284, i 108, Ibn Rashīk, al ʿUmda, Cairo 1325 (1907), i 118, Muhammad Diyāb, Ta'rīkh Ādāb al-Lughat al-ʿarabīya, Cairo n d, i 129, Muhammad Ialʿat, Ghāyat al-Arab fī Sinā' Shiʿr al ʿArab, Cairo 1316 (1898), p 93, Muhammad al-Damanhūrī, Hāshiya ʿala 'l Kāfī, Cairo 1316, p 36, Ahmad al-Hāshimī, Mizān al-Dhahab fī Sinaʿat Shiʿr al-ʿArab, Cairo n d, p 132, ʿAbd al Hādi Nadjā al-Abyārī, Sullūd al-Mutālīʿ li Suʿūd al-Matālīʿ, Būlāk 1283, i 381, Djabrān Mikhā'īl Fūtiya, al-Bast al shāfī fī ʿIlmai 'l Arūd wa 'l-Kawāfī, Beirūt 1890, p 103, I Cheikho, ʿIlm al-Adab, Beirūt 1908 (6th ed), p 422, Bistāmī, Muhit al Muhīt, Beirūt 1870, p 2252 (sub w sh h), Ibn Khallikān, transl de Slane, London 1843—1871, i, introd p xxxv, Freytag, Darstellung der arabischen Verskunst, Bonn 1830, p 421, Martin Hartmann, Über die Muwassah genannte Art der Strophengedichte bei den Arabern (Extr from the Actes du Xème Congr des Orient, Genova 1894), Leyden 1896, do, Das arabische Strophengedicht, I Das Muwassah, Weimar 1897, H Gies, Ein Beitrag zur Kenntniss siebzn neuerer arabischer Vers arten, Leipzig 1879, p 17, Hammer-Purgstall, art on the muwashshah and the zadjal, in JA, 1839, 1849, A F von Schack, Poesie und Kunst der Araber in Spanien und Sicilien, Berlin 1865, Guyard, in JA, 1876, Grangeret de Lagrange, Anthologie arabe, Paris 1828, p 200, W Lane, transl of the 1001 Nights, ii 288, note 52, Ibn Bassām, al Dhakhīra, note on the muwashshah in Revue de l'Acad ar de Damas, 1922, p 380

(MOH BENCHENEB)

AL-MUẒAFFAR, the honorific lakab by which the second of the ʿĀmirid dictators of Muslim Spain is best known, the son of the celebrated al-Mansūr [q v], ABŪ MARWĀN ʿABD AL-MALIK IBN ABĪ ʿĀMIR AL MAʿĀFIRĪ He was invested with the office of hādjib by the caliph Hishām II, on the death of his father, on 28th Ramadān 392 (Aug 10, 1002) and ruled as absolute master the territory of al-Andalus until his death of angina as he was setting out on an expedition against Castille on 16th Safar 399 (Oct 20, 1008)

The relatively short period of the *hādjib*ate of ʿAbd al-Malik al-Muzaffar was until quite recently almost unknown for lack of documents and in his Histoire, Dozy had to pass it over almost in silence in spite of its importance in the history of the early xith century in Spain I have been able in the course of recent years to fill this gap, thanks to the discovery of accounts of the hādjibate of al Muzaffar in the Dhakhīra of Ibn Bassām and the Bayān of Ibn ʿIdhārī and the unpublished chapter devoted to him by Ibn al-Khatīb in his Iʿmāl al-Iʿlām The result is the discovery that the septennium of ʿAbd al-Malik was for Muslim Spain a period of peace and prosperity, a regular golden age, just on the eve of the first upheavals which preceded the collapse of the Umaiyad caliphate, the chroniclers compare this period to the first week of a marriage (sābiʿ al-ʿarūs, cf Dozy, Suppl Dict Ar, i 626—627)

Al Mansūr had actually left his son and successor an empire not only completely pacified and solidly organised but also enjoying an economic prosperity hitherto unprecedented ʿAbd al Malik aimed at following scrupulously the line of conduct laid down for him in his father's last wishes to preserve and justify the popularity of the ʿĀmirid régime by peace at home and the continual harassing of the Christian foe beyond the marches (thughūr) Every year of Muzaffar's rule was therefore marked by a summer expedition (sā'ifa) or a winter one (shātiya), in 393 (1003) he led his armies against Catalonia (bilād al-Ifrandj), laid waste the country round Barcelona and destroyed 35 strongholds before returning to Cordova, in 395 (1005) an expedition was led against Castille by the hādjib, in the following year his objective was the town of Pampeluna [q v], which he seems to have approached but not reached, in 397 (1007) took place, against Catalonia, the expedition known as the "victorious" (ghazāt al naṣr) ʿAbd al-Malik forced his way into Clunia and carried off a vast booty This triumph earned for him from the nominal sovereign the title of "Victor" (al-Muzaffar) which henceforth replaced his previous lakab of Saif al-Dawla In the course of the winter of 398 (1007—1008) there was an expedition which ended in the capture of a castle of San Martin which has not been identified The last expedition undertaken by him as mentioned above came to nothing but at least enabled him to die like his father on the way to wage war on the infidel

At home al-Muzaffar maintained intact the strong administrative organisation which dated from the reign of ʿAbd al-Rahmān III [cf UMAIYADS, ii] which al-Mansūr had maintained intact, while removing from it the representatives of the Arab aristocracy On his accession to office, he won the good graces of the Cordovans by reducing taxes by a sixth He was easily able to dispose of several conspiracies against him He left to his brother ʿAbd al Rahmān Sancho a heritage which the latter might easily have preserved if he had not at once exasperated his subjects against him by displaying a hateful partiality and attempting to arrogate to himself the caliphate completely

Bibliography Ibn Bassām, al-Dhakhīra, vol iv (my own MS), Ibn ʿIdhārī, al-Bayān al-mughrib, vol iii, ed E Lévi-Provençal, Paris 1930, p 3—37, and transl in the new edition by the same of the Histoire des Musulmans d'Espagne of R Dozy, Leyden 1932, iii 185 sqq, Ibn al-Khatīb, Iʿmāl al-Iʿlām fī man būyiʿa kabl al-Ihtilām min Mulūk al-Islām, the part referring to the history of Spain, ed E.

Lévi-Provençal, Rabat 1934 (in print), p 97 sqq, al-Makkarī, Nafḥ al-Ṭīb (Analectes), ed Leyden, index, Ibn Ḵhaldūn, ʿIbar, iv, E Lévi-Provençal, L'Espagne musulmane au Xème siecle, Institutions et vie sociale, Paris 1932, index

(E Lévi-Provençal)

AL-MUẒAFFAR B ʿALĪ [See ʿIMRĀN B SHĀHĪN]

AL MUẒAFFAR ʿOMAR B AIYŪB [See AIYŪBIDES, HAMĀ]

MUẒAFFAR AL-DĪN, fifth Shāh of Persia of the Kadjār [q v] dynasty, was born on March 25, 1853 He was Shāh Nāṣir al Dīn's second son, the eldest son Ẓill al Sultān being of lower birth by his mother As crown prince Mu zaffar al-Dīn had been some time governor of Ādharbaidjān (a description of him as crown prince in Curzon, Persia and the Persian Question, i 413) After his father's assassination Muzaffar al-Dīn was enthroned on June 8, 1896 With this new reign the rivalry between England and Russia for commercial and political influence in Persia became ever more apparent The sympathy of the high officials, which was divided between the two powers, and the economic and military strength of the country was since long too weak to enable Persia to follow an independent policy Under the relatively strong rule of Nasir al Dīn popular discontent with the increasing misery had been suppressed, the new Shah, however, though well intentioned, did not possess the character of a strong ruler and, besides, did nothing to check the extravagancy of the court His financial difficulties made Persia the debtor of Russia, in 1898, 1900 and 1901 considerable loans were given by Russia, guaranteed by large parts of the custom receipts, the collecting of the custom duties being administered by Belgian officials A good deal of the borrowed money was used for the expensive journeys to Europe undertaken by the Shāh in 1900, 1902 and 1905 In the meantime, the condition of the people became more and more miserable, headed by some influential merchants and some high ecclesiastics they protested against the heavy taxes and the tariffs as fixed in the commercial agreements with Russia and England of 1903 The growing discontent took several forms, some wished to call in the Turkish Sultān as Caliph and at other times there were outbursts against the Bābī's in Yazd and Isfahān Besides there were special grievances against several high officials, amongst them the chief Belgian inspector of taxes In December 1905 a popular movement took place in Teherān, with the aim of obtaining the deposition of the then grand vizier ʿAin al Dawla (since 1903) An ever increasing number of merchants, mulla's and citizens took refuge (bast) in the shrine of Shāh ʿAbd al ʿAzīm At last the Shāh promised ʿAin al-Dawla's dismissal and some reforms, but in the course of the following year none of these promises were fulfilled So in 1906 the discontentment reached again a culminating point, directed this time by some more or less secret patriotic associations In July large crowds of the people of the capital went with the mullas to Kum, to take refuge in the sanctuary there, at the same time the British Legation accorded asylum to a considerable number of merchants and citizens The results were that on July 30 ʿAin al-Dawla was dismissed and that on August 5, all the demands of the protesting people were granted, including a constitution The ecclesiastical leaders returned from Kum There followed some friction with the government about the elections and other matters, but at last, on October 7, 1906, the first Persian Madjlis or National Assembly was opened by the Shāh The new Madjlis had to face immediately some difficult problems and showed from the beginning its determination not to be a mere toy in the hands of the court party Progress was hampered, however, by dissensions amongst clerical and non clerical members of the popular party, while there were disturbances in Tabrīz, owing to the tyranny of the crown prince Muhammad ʿAlī The Constitution (Ḳānūn i Asāsī, q v) was ratified by the Shāh only on December 30, 1906 Muzaffar al Dīn himself died on January 8, 1907 after a long illness, leaving his country to the eventful reign of Muhammad ʿAlī Shāh

Bibliography E G Browne, The Persian Revolution of 1905—1909, Cambridge 1910, p 98 sqq

(J H Kramers)

MUẒAFFARIDS, a Persian dynasty Their ancestors came from Arabia and had settled in Khurāsān at the time of the Muslim conquest, where they lived for several centuries On the approach of the Mongols, the emir Ghiyāth al-Dīn Hādjdjī, with his three sons Abū Bakr, Muhammad and Manṣūr, retired to Yazd The two first named entered the service of the Atābeg of Yazd, ʿAlāʾ al Dawla, and when Hūlāgū [q v] marched on Baghdād, Abū Bakr followed him with 300 horse After the capture of Baghdād he was sent with an army to the Egyptian frontier Here he fell in an encounter with the Arab tribe of Khafādja whereupon his brother Muhammad succeeded him as a vassal of the Atābeg of Yazd while Manṣūr remained with his father in the little town of Maibudh near Yazd Manṣūr had three sons, Mubāriz al-Dīn Muhammad, Zain al-Dīn ʿAlī and Sharaf al Dīn Muzaffar, the latter of whom became the ancestor of the dynasty of the Muzaffarids Appointed governor of Maibudh by Yūsuf Shāh, ʿAlāʾ al-Dawla's son and successor, he cleared the hills of the robber bands from Shīrāz and when Yūsuf Shāh, who had put to death the envoys of the Īlkhān Arghūn had to take to flight and went to Sīstān, Muhammad followed him but left him on the way and went to Kirmān where he was kindly received by Sultān Djalāl al-Dīn Sūrghatmush Kara Khitāi (685 = 1286—1287) After some time he returned to Yazd and was presented to Arghūn who took him into his service He was also on good terms with Arghūn's successors Gaikhātū and Ghāzān The latter appointed him amīr-i hazāra "commander of a thousand", and after the accession of Uldjāitū (703 = 1303–1304) he was given custody of the roads from Ardistān to Kirmānshāh and from Herāt and Marw to Abarkūh Muzaffar died on 13th Dhu 'l-Kaʿda 713 (March 1, 1314) He was succeeded by his 13 year old son Mubāriz al-Dīn Muhammad who is described as brave and devout but at the same time cruel, bloodthirsty and treacherous He continued to live at the court of Uldjāitū, on the latter's death in Shawwāl 716 (Dec 1316) and the accession of his son Abū Saʿīd he returned to Maibudh Along with the lord of the southern coast of Persia, the emir Kaikhusraw b Mahmūd Shāh Indjū, he very soon fell upon the Atābeg of Yazd, Hādjdjī Shāh, and succeeded in taking the town from him (718 or 719 = 1318 or 1319) A short time after this event the people of Sistān, the Nikūdars, arose in rebellion, Muhammad attacked them and their leader Nawrūz was defeated and slain The rebels however gathered together again and Muhammad had to fight no less than 21 battles before they were finally suppressed After the death of Abū Saʿīd (736 = 1335–1336), complete chaos began and pretenders arose in different parts of the wide empire The emīr Abū Ishāk b Mahmūd Shah Indjū endeavoured to take the town of Yazd but was driven back After some time Muhammad took this province from the Mongol governor in Kirmān, Malik Kutb al Dīn In the end however, Abū Ishak succeeded in taking Shīrāz and had the khutba read and coins struck in his name In Safar 748 (May—June 1347) he set out to subjugate Kirmān and laid waste Sirdjān, but returned when he heard that Muhammad was ready to offer vigorous resistance to his advance One of the viziers of Abū Ishak then undertook a campaign against Kirmān but was defeated, whereupon Abū Ishāk put himself at the head of a new army and marched on Kirmān to take vengeance on Muhammad But this effort also failed, Abū Ishāk was completely defeated and had to take to flight In 751 (1350—1351) he went to Yazd and began to besiege the town but returned, having achieved nothing In spite of all his failures however, Abū Ishāk never lost heart In the following year he sent a new army under the emir Beg Djakāz to Kirmān and when the latter met Muhammad on the plain of Pandj Angusht in Djumādā I 753 (June—July 1352) a battle resulted Djakāz was defeated Muhammad to follow up his victory, went to Shīrāz and laid siege to it On the 3rd Shawwāl 754 (Nov 1, 1353), the governor had to surrender and Abū Ishāk fled to Isfahān In the following year Muhammad took the oath of homage to the ʿAbbāsid caliph in Egypt Isfahān was now besieged But as Muhammad had also to deal with other rebels the siege was somewhat prolonged Resistance was in the end overcome and the town had to surrender At the same time Abū Ishāk fell into his hands and was at once executed (21st Djumādā I 757 or 758 = May 22, 1356 or May 11, 1357) After Muhammad had defeated all his enemies and become undisputed lord of Fārs and the ʿIrak, an envoy appeared from the ruler of the Golden Horde, Djānī Beg Khān b Uzbeg Khān, who announced that the Khān had taken Tabrīz and wanted to appoint Muhammad yasāwul "Marshal" Muhammad gave the envoy an arrogant and unfriendly answer, but when he heard soon afterwards that Djānī Beg had returned home and left the emir Akhī Djūk in Tabrīz he decided to take the town Soon afterwards the news of Djānī Beg's death arrived, Muhammad at once set out and met Akhī Djūk at Miyāna in Ādharbāidjān The latter was defeated and Muhammad entered Tabrīz But as a large army was approaching from Baghdād he dared not risk remaining but decided to begin to retreat In Ramadān 759 (Aug 1358) he was surprised and taken prisoner by his own son Shāh Shudjāʿ [q v] who believed himself suppressed and ill-treated by his father, in concert with some other relatives Muhammad was blinded and kept in prison for several years until his death at the end of Rabīʿ I 765 (Jan 1364) at the age of 65 He was succeeded by Shāh Shudjāʿ who shortly before his death appointed his son Zain al ʿĀbidīn ʿAlī his successor in Shīrāz and gave his brother ʿImād al-Dīn Ahmad b Muhammad the governorship of Kirmān As soon as Zain al-ʿĀbidīn had begun to reign his cousin Shah Yahyā b Sharaf al Dīn Muzaffar set out from Isfahān to attack him Fortunately however, the threatened war was averted by a friendly agreement, but Shāh Yahyā could not stay long in Isfahān, he was driven out by the turbulent and fickle inhabitants and fled to Yazd whereupon Zain al-ʿĀbidīn appointed his maternal uncle Muzaffar i Kāshī governor of Isfahān In 787 (1385—1386) an envoy from Timūr arrived in Kirmān bringing assurances of his peaceful and friendly intentions and Sultān Ahmad hastened to offer his humble homage to the powerful conqueror In Shawwāl 789 (Oct — Nov 1387) it was reported that Timūr had invaded the ʿIrāk and that Muzaffar i Kāshī had given him the keys of the towns and fortresses whereupon Zain al-ʿĀbidīn left Shīrāz and went to Baghdād while Shāh Yahyā endeavoured to procure suitable gifts to pacify Timūr and ordered that a sufficient sum should be paid out to maintain his army But when Timūr's officials appeared in Isfahān to take the money, they were attacked and killed by the citizens In consequence the Mongols carried out a dreadful massacre among the people of Isfahān, in which 200,000 were said to have perished Timūr then went to Fārs and confirmed Sultān Ahmad as lord of Fārs, the ʿIrak and Kirmān, whereupon he returned to Samarkand When Zain al-ʿĀbidīn had left Shīrāz, he met his cousin Shāh Mansūr b Sharaf al-Dīn Muzaffar at Shūstar and was at first welcomed, then suddenly attacked and imprisoned Shāh Mansūr was now able to occupy Shīrāz without opposition, while Shāh Yahyā retired to Yazd After the former had established himself securely in Shīraz, Zain al ʿĀbidīn was released by his jailers and brought to Isfahān where the people welcomed him In the meanwhile he had been persuaded by Shāh Yahyā to combine with Sultān Ahmad to take vengeance on Shāh Mansūr The plan failed however, the allies were defeated and Shāh Mansūr seized the whole of the ʿIrak When Zain al-ʿĀbidīn wanted to escape to Khurāsān, he was treacherously seized by the governor of al-Rayy and brought to Shāh Mansūr who at once had him blinded The latter then tried to form a coalition against Timūr In 795 (1393) however, Timūr left his winter quarters in Māzandarān and marched on Shūstar After storming Kalʿa i Sefīd which was considered impregnable he marched on Shāh Mansūr's capital and a battle was fought near Shīrāz Although Shāh Mansūr's chief emīr abandoned him with most of his troops, the battle lasted till far into the night The undismayed Muzaffarid fought with desperate courage, but finally fell in the melée, after fighting his way to Timūr and giving him two cuts with his sword, which however the strong helmet of the Mongol leader averted Shāh Mansūr's relations then submitted, nevertheless Timūr a week later (Radjab 795 = May 1393) had all the Muzaffarids executed

Bibliography Mahmūd Kutbī in Hamd Allāh Mustawfī i Kazwīnī, Tārīkh i Guzīda (ed Browne), i 613—755, Defrémery, Memoire historique sur la destruction de la dynastie des Mozafferiens, in J A, ser iv, vol iv, v, Howorth, History of the Mongols, iii 693—

716, Müller, Der Islam im Morgen- und Abendland, II 264 sq, 296 sq, Lane-Poole, The Mohammadan Dynasties, p 249 sq, do, Duwel-i islāmīye (transl Khalīl Edhem), p 395 sq, E de Zambaur, Manuel de genealogie et de chronologie, Hanover 1927, p 254

(K V ZETTERSTÉEN)

MUZĀWADJA, a term in rhetoric (badīʿ) which means the association of two things in the relation of condition (sharṭ) and result (djazāʾ) and then employing the same combination for two other things in the same conditions Here is an example from the Dīwān of al-Buhturī (Cairo 1329, p 317)

Idhā ʾhtarabat yawman fa fādat dimāʾuhā
tadhakkarat al kurbā fa fādat dumūʿuhā

"When they (the horsemen) are one day fighting and their blood flows in profusion, they remember their bonds of kinship and their tears flow abundantly" The poet associates fighting with recalling bonds of kinship in the two parts of the conditional statement, then he completes the first by adding their blood flows in profusion and the second by saying their tears flow abundantly

Bibliography al Kazwīnī al-Khatīb, Talkhīs al Miftāh, Cairo 1322, p 354, Ibn Hudjdjat al Hamawī, Khizānat al-Adab, Cairo 1304, p 435, Garcin de Tassy, Rhetor et prosod des lang de l'Or Mus, Paris 1873, p 87

(MOH BENCHENEB)

AL MUZDALIFA, a place roughly half way between Minā and ʿArafat where the pilgrims returning from ʿArafat spend the night between the 9th and 10th Dhu ʾl-Hidjdja, after performing the two evening salāts On the next morning they set off before sunrise and climb up through the valley of Muhassir to Minā Other names for this place are al-Mashʿar al harām, from Sūra II 194 and Djamʿ (cf Lailat Djamʿ Ibn Sʿad, II/1 129, 6), but Djamʿ, according to another statement, comprises the whole stretch between ʿArafat and Minā, both included, so that Yawm Djamʿ (Kitāb al-Aghānī, VI 30, 11) is explained as the day of ʿArafat and Aiyām Djamʿ as the days of Minā The rites associated with the night of Muzdalifa go back to the old pagan period, which the Arabs themselves recognise when they make Kusaiy introduce the kindling of the sacred fire in this night and say that guiding of the departure for Minā is a privilege of the family of Adwān

The sacred place in Muzdalifa was the hill of Kuzah [q v] Even after Muhammad in deliberate contrast to the pagan practice had declared all Muzdalifa to be mawkif [cf HADJDJ, I, c], this hill retained its ancient sanctity According to Azraḳī, there was a thick round tower upon it on which the Muzdalifa fire was kindled, in the time of Hārūn al-Rashīd it was a fire of wood, later it was illuminated with wax-candles In the Muslim period a mosque was built about 400 yards from the tower, of which Azraḳī gives a detailed description while Muḳaddasī speaks of a place of prayer, a public fountain and a minaret Burton also mentions a high isolated tower at Muzdalifa but the illumination in the night of Muzdalifa now takes place on the mosque

Bibliography Ibn Hishām, ed Wustenfeld, p 77, Ibn Saʿd, ed Sachau, I/1 41, II/1 125, 129, Tabarī, ed de Goeje, I 1105, 1755, Azraḳī, ed Wüstenfeld, p 36, 130, 411 sq 415 sqq, B G A, I 17, II 24, III 76 s Bakrī, ed Wüstenfeld, p 243 sq, 509 sq, Yāk ed Wüstenfeld, IV 519 sq, Burckhardt, Rei in Arabien, p 412 sq, Burton, Personal N rative of a Pilgrimage to el-Medinah and Mecc III, 1856, Snouck Hurgronje, Het Mekkaans Feest, p 154—158, Wellhausen, Reste ara schen Heidentums, p 81 sq, 120, Juynb Handbuch des islamischen Gesetzes, p 157

(FR BUHL)

MUZDAWIDJ means among philologists t use of two terms in which the form one is changed to make it resemble th of the other For example in this hadīth (I Mādja, Sunan, Cairo 1313, II 246) irdjiʿ ma'zūrāt ghair ma'djūrāt, "return home lad with sin and not with rewards", the word ma zūrāt from the root w z-r has been changed i ma'zūrāt to give it the same form as ma djūr It is similar in the phrases (cf Lisān, XIX 35 ghadīyāt wa ʿashiyāt, ghudaiyānāt wa-ʿushaiyā bi 'l ghadāyā wa 'l-ʿashāyā "mornings and evenin in which the form of the first word has b adapted to that of the second

The muzdawidj, among rhetoricians, consists establishing a kind of alliteration between t adjacent words having the same form, the sa metrical quantity and the same rhyme (rawī), e in this verse of the Kurʾān (XXVII 22) djiʾtuka min Sabaʾin bi-nabaʾin "I have brou thee news from Saba'" where we have the rese blance between Sabaʾin and nabaʾin We may g as another example this hadīth (Ibn al-At Nihāya, Cairo 1911, IV 291 under h y-n) muʾminūna hainūna lainūna "Believers are pea able and mild in character" and the phrase (Lisān, XVII 280, 331) hainun lainun, haiyin laiyinun

The object of the muzdawidj among poet to make the hemistichs of a poem rhyme toget two by two As a rule, it is only used in didac urdjūzas (like the Alfiya of Ibn Mālik), al-ʿAm however, in his Kashkūl (Cairo 1302) has usec with the wāfir and ramal metres (p 76, 78, 83) Persian and Turkish, it is called mathnawī (masna and composed in the metres ramal, hazadj and mu kārib In this kind of composition, it is necess that the last foot of the two hemistichs sho be alike Among the Arabs there is a kind poem in the radjaz metre (and sometimes sc verses follow strictly the sarīʿ metre) called m dawidjāt (a collection of them was published Cairo in 1299), they consist of strophes of hemistichs in which the first four hemistichs rhy together and the fifth have a common rhy Sometimes the strophe has only four hemistic the first three rhyming together and the fou rhyming jointly as in al-Iʿlām bi-Muthallath Kalām of Ibn Mālik (Cairo 1329) and Nail Arab fī Muthallathāt al-ʿArab of Hasan Kowa al-Khalīlī (Būlāk 1301)

Bibliography Djurdjānī, Taʿrīfāt, C stantinople 1307, p 142, Muhammad ʿAli ʿAlī al-Tihānawī, Kashshāf Istilāhāt al-Fun Constantinople 1317, I 199, 672, Muhamr b Kais al-Kāzī, al-Muʿdjam fī Maʿāyīr Asl al-ʿAdjam, Leyden 1909, p. 390, Garcin Tassy, Rhétorique et prosodie des langues l'Or Musul, Paris 1873, p 375

(MOH BENCHENEB

AL-MUZZAMMIL, title of sūra lxxiii, taken from the first verse "O thou wrapped up", viz Muhammad, who wrapped himself up in his garment or was wrapped up by others For explanations of the allusion cf Sale's note as well as the commentaries on the Kur'ān Variants of al-muzzammil, which stands for al mutazammil, are al-muzammal, al-muzammil (Baidāwī)

Bibliography Besides the works mentioned in the art, cf Noldeke-Schwally, Geschichte des Qorāns, i, Leipzig 1909, p 98

N

AL-NABA', title of sūra lxxviii, taken from the opening verses "Concerning what do the unbelievers ask questions of one another? Concerning the great news" According to the commentaries the great news alluded to is the resurrection, the subject of lively discussions among the Meccans

Bibliography The commentaries and translations of the Kur'ān, Noldeke Schwally, Geschichte des Qorāns, i, Leipzig 1909, p 104

NABATAEANS, an Arab people who lived in ancient times in Arabia Petraea — As early as the seventh century B C the Nabayāti are mentioned by Assurbanipal (Keilinschr Bibl, ii 216 sqq) Whether the Nebayōth of the Old Testament are to be identified with them is uncertain (against the identification Noldeke in Schenkel's Bibellexicon, s v Nabataer, for it amongst others Musil, Arabia Deserta, New York 1927, p 492) The Nabataeans were never completely subjected either by the Assyrians, or the Medes, Persians or the Macedonian kings (Diodor ii 48) In 312 B C Antigonos sent two expeditions against them without success They were then a nomadic people of shepherds and traders, with a few natural fortresses like Petra, Bosrā, Salkhad, al Hidjr which served as depots for their arms and riches Living round the Dead Sea they exploited from time to time the remunerative asphalt deposits on its eastern shore They were often on friendly terms with their neighbours, e g with the Jews under the Maccabees and especially with the Salamians (Arab Sulaim, cf Yākūt, Mu'djam, ed Wustenfeld, ii 594, s v Birma), with whom according to Stephanos Byzantios and the testimony of the Nabataean inscriptions, they were in close alliance (cf SUʿAIM B MANṢŪR and B Moritz, Salamis, in Pauly-Wissowa's Realenzykl, vol i A, col 1824 sq) The capital of the kingdom, called Nabātu in the inscriptions, was Petra on the Djabal Hārūn, according to Noldeke (Z D M G, xxv 259 sq) Hebrew Sela', Arab Hisn Sal' in the Wādī Mūsā in the hills of al-Sharā (Yākūt, Mu'djam, iii 117, 13, Mushtarik, p 252, 2), while Musil (Arabia Petraea, ii/1 337, note 2, on p 318) identifies this with Ksēr es Sel' The ruins reveal a peculiar mixture of Nabataean and Hellenistic architecture while they have yielded remarkably few Nabataean inscriptions (on these see Dalman, Petra und seine Felsheiligtumer, 1908, do, Neue Petra-Forschungen, 1912, Bachmann, Watzinger, Wiegand, Petra, 1921, A B W Kennedy, Petra, its History and Monuments, 1925)

The Nabataean kingdom comprised the lands of southern and eastern Palestine as well as Idumaea and Peraea, from 88 B C also Hawrān, twice (85 B C and c 34—62 A D, perhaps also in the interval, cf Mommsen, Rom Gesch, v 476, note 3), Damascus also belonged to it [cf i, p 903] In the southwest it stretched over the ancient Midian as far as the coast of the Red Sea where 'Obodat I founded the town of Hawarā (Steph Byz, s v Ἀΰαρα, probably = Λευκη κωμη, now perhaps al-Hawrā'), in the interior as far as al 'Ula (Dedan) and al-Hidjr [q v] on the frontier of the Hidjāz The Nabataeans also penetrated into the nome of Arabia in the eastern Nile delta as an inscription from Tell el Shughāfiye in the Wādī Tūmilāt shows (Clermont-Ganneau, Les Nabateens en Egypte, in Recueil d'Arch Or, viii [1924], p 229—257) A number of their kings can be dated with approximate exactness Hāritat (Aretas) I 169 B C, Hāritat II c 110—96, 'Obodat (Obodas) I c 90, Rabb'ēl Rabilos) I c 87, Haritat III (Ἀρέτας Φιλέλλην) c 86–62, ['Obodat II c 62–47 ?], Mālik (Malichos) I c 47—30, 'Obodat II (III ?) before 25 — ^ 9 B C, Hāritat IV Rāhem-'ammeh (Φιλόπατρις) c 9 A D — 40 A D, Mālik II 40—70/71, Rabb'ēl II Σωτήρ 70/71—106 A D [Mālik III, 106 A D ?, cf Clermont Ganneau, Recueil, viii 247] The real founder of their power is said to have been king Erotimos, who is probably the same as Hāritat III whose reign fell in the period of decline of the Seleucid empire (E Taubler, in Klio, x 251—253) As "allies", the Nabataeans were able to maintain to some extent their independence of the Romans At a very early date, like the Palmyrans, they attained through their trade the position of monopolists in Near Asia At the beginning of the Roman empire they dropped their nomadic life and became peacefully settled Just as in the east they have left their inscriptions particularly on the trade-routes followed by their caravans, e g from Petra to Damascus and Tadmor, to Forat at the mouth of the Euphrates, to Gerha (Arab al-Djar'ā'u near al-Katīf), to the Sinai peninsula and Egypt and to Gaza, so we find in the Roman empire epigraphic traces of Nabataean merchants as far as Upper Egypt (Dendera), in Miletus, Rome and Puteoli In 106 A D the emperor Trajan conquered Petra and made the most important part of the Nabataean kingdom the Roman Provincia Arabia The remainder of the territory left to the Nabataeans in the desert suffered economic ruin about 200 A D when the Palmyrans gradually obtained control of the remunerative carrying trade

The king, who was assisted by a vizier, the highest official (Greek ἐπίτροπος), with the title "brother", had under him a number of shaikhs (ἐθνάρχαι) of the separate tribes (φυλαί), we also find the titles eparchos and strategos The high social position of women is noteworthy, they could possess property independently and dispose of it as they liked (Noldeke in Euting, Nabat Inschr, p 79 sq), the coins often bear portraits of the queens (Kammerer, Petra et la Nabatene, Paris 1929, p 377, Brit Mus Cat of Greek Coins Arabia etc, London 1922, Plates I and II)

Our only source for Nabataean law is their epitaphs, the threats of punishment in which are based on a formula of the Greek law of property and contract which elsewhere is only found in tomb-inscriptions in Asia Minor (B Keil, Hermes, xliii [1908], p 567—572)

As nomads, simple in their customs and rarely owning slaves, the Nabataeans, as a trading people, had a great respect for wealth The mention in inscriptions of physicians, wise men and poets, shows a certain level of intellectual culture Whether circumcision was practised among them is uncertain (Kammerer, op cit, p 375 sq)

The Nabataean pantheon is known to us mainly from tomb and votive inscriptions The principal god was Dūsharā [cf DHU 'L-SHARA], the principal goddess Allāt [cf AL-LĀT], the goddesses Manūthu (= Aram Menāwātā, cf MANĀT), Kaisha, Mutabi and Hubal [q v] are also mentioned Their kings were perhaps worshipped as gods after their deaths (cf C I S, ii 354)

As Noldeke was the first to emphasise, the Nabataeans were pure Arabs as their names show, but in written intercourse they used Aramaic, the usual written and business language of Nearer Asia Many aramaisms thus entered their language in the north of the country (like kabrā, nafshā, arnā) Arab writers therefore even used the term "Nabataean" for "Aramaic", in the southern Higrā (al-Hidjr) on the other hand, the Nabataean Arabic retained its greatest purity, the Arabic script developed out of the Nabataean cursive at the close of the ancient period [cf ARABIA, d]

In the Muslim period the Arabs called those inhabitants of Syria and of the ʿIrāk, who were neither shepherds nor soldiers, "Nabataeans" (Ibn al-Kalbī in Yākūt, Muʿdjam, iii 634), a term also applied in a somewhat contemptuous tone to the Aramaic-speaking peasants (Noldeke, in Z D M G, xxv 124) When then we find "Nabataeans" (Nabīt, Nabt etc) mentioned in Malatya as well as on the Djaihān, in Syria, on the Khābūr and in the ʿIrāk, in ʿOmān and Bahrain, the name is not to be taken in the ethnographical sense (Noldeke, op cit, p 125) As the grammarians of the ʿIrāk paid special attention to the "Nabataean" language of the Aramaic country people, by "Nabataeans" was frequently meant the inhabitants of the ʿIrāk and especially of the Batāʾih (Noldeke, op cit, p 127)

The inhabitants of the district of Hismā in the most northern part of the Hidjāz, once the Djudhām [q v], now the Huwaitāt [q v], are regarded as the descendants of the Nabataeans [cf ARABIA, a]

Bibliography Noldeke, in Z D M G, xxv, 1871, p 122—128, J Euting, Nabatäische Inschriften, Berlin 1885, do, Sinaitische Inschriften, Berlin 1891, do, Tagbuch einer Reise in Inner-Arabien, ii, Leyden 1914, p 293 (Index), C M Doughty, Travels in Arabia Deserta, ii, Cambridge 1888, p 638 (Index), C I S, II/i, 1889, p 181 sqq, II/ii, 1907, p 1 sqq, Clermont-Ganneau, Recueil d'Arch Or, vol i—viii, passim, H Vincent, Les Nabateens, in Revue Bibl, vii, 1898, p 567—588, Schurer, Geschichte des judischen Volkes, i [4], Leipzig 1901, p 726—744, Dussaud and Macler, Mission dans la region desertique de la Syrie moyenne, Paris 1903, G A Cooke, A text book of North-Semitic inscriptions, Oxford 1903, p 214—262, do, art Nabataeans, in J Hastings' Encyclopaedia of Religion and Ethics, ix, Edinburgh 1917, p 121 sqq, Dussaud, Numismatique des rois de Nabatene, in J A, 1904, p 189—238, Brunnow and v Domaszewsky, Provincia Arabia, i—iii, 1904—1909, E Littmann, Nabataean Inscriptions, in Public of an American Archaeol Exped to Syria in 1899—1900, part iv, New York 1905 Semitic Inscr, p 85—97, do, Nabat Inscr, in Public of the Princeton Archaeol Exped to Syria in 1904—1905 and 1909, division vi, section A, Leyden 1914, Musil, Arabia Petraea, II/i (Edom), Vienna 1907, p 159—161, 337, do, Arabia Deserta, New York 1927, index, p 614, Head, Historia nummorum[2], Oxford 1911, p 810 sq, G F Hill, Brit Mus Cat, Greek Coins of Arabia, London 1922, Jaussen and Savignac, Mission archeologique en Arabie, i—iii, Paris 1909—1922, W W Tarn, Ptolemy II and Arabia, in Journ of Egypt Archaeol, xv, 1929, p 9—25, A Kammerer, Petra et la Nabatene, Paris 1929, J Cantineau, Le Nabateen, i—ii, Paris 1930—1932, J H Mordtmann, Ein Nabataer im Salaelande, in Klio, xxv, 1932, p 429 sq (E HONIGMANN)

NABĪ (A), prophet, borrowed from Hebr nābī or Aram nebiʾā, is found in the Kurʾān from the second Meccan period in the singular and plural nabīyūn, in the Medina period we find also the broken plural anbiyāʾ Lists of the nabīyūn are given in Sūra vi 83 sqq, iii 34, iv 161 sqq, further information about them is given in several passages of Sūra xix and in xvii 57 The list consists exclusively of names from the Old and New Testaments (if we leave out Idrīs in Sūra xix 57, whose name Muhammad had however also learned from a Christian source, see above ii, p 442–450, Horovitz, Koran Untersuch, p 88 sq), while messengers of God (rasūl [q v], plur rusul, mursalūn) had also been sent to other peoples of the past — e g Hūd or Sālih —, according to the Kurʾānic idea "prophets" had appeared only among the Ahl al-Kitāb [q v] Only a minority of the individuals called prophets in the Kurʾān are so described in the Bible, and Yūnus b Mattai [q v] is the only one of the anbiyāʾ of the Kurʾān who appears among the literary prophets of the Bible Muhammad himself did not claim the name nabī until he was in Medīna when he was addressed as the Prophet (yā ayyuha 'l-nabī) and, as finally closing the series of prophets, is called their "seal" (khātam) When Muhammad in Sūra vii 156 and 158 is called al nabī al-ummī, this is to distinguish him as the prophet who has arisen among the heathen, the Jews called the heathen ummōt hāʿōlam ("peoples of the world") and also recognised prophets who had arisen among them among these they included e g Balaam and Job This Jewish name for the heathen became the al-ummīyūn of the Kurʾān (Sūra lxii 2, iii 19, 69), that

ummīyūn refers to the heathen is quite clear from Sūra iii 19, where they are contrasted with those who have received the scripture When Sūra ii 73 refers to the ummīyūn min Ahl al-Kitāb, the reference is most probably (with Wellhausen, Skizzen, iv 13, note 2) to originally pagan Arabs who had adopted Judaism The derivation of ummī from Hebrew ummōt hā-ʿōlam therefore fits all the Kurʾānic passages, while that most generally adopted from Hebrew ʿam hā ārēṣ "people of the country", a term for Jews who did not know the Jewish law, would at best fit only Sūra ii 73, but even for this passage is not absolutely essential

The post-Kurʾānic ideas about the prophethood of Muhammad are discussed in the article MUHAMMAD (cf also Tor Andrae, Die Person Muhammeds in Lehre und Glaube seiner Gemeinde, Stockholm 1918) The accounts of the other prophets which found a way into Islām in the post-Kurʾānic period are collected in the works on the Kiṣaṣ al-Anbiyāʾ These, however, are not confined to the prophets proper who appear in the Kurʾān by name or anonymously, and to other figures of Jewish and Christian Biblical and post-Biblical tradition, but deal also with the history of such personalities as Djurdjīs and Bulukyā to whom there is not the slightest reference in the Kurʾān

Bibliography Wensinck, in Acta Orientalia, ii 173 sqq, Lidzbarski, De propheticis quae dicuntur legendis, Horovitz, in Z D M G, lv 519 sqq, do, Koranische Untersuchungen, Berlin and Leipzig 1926, p 44 sqq

(J HOROVITZ)

NĀBĪ, YŪSUF, an Ottoman poet, Yūsuf Nābī came from Urfa (Ruhā, hence Ruhāwī, not Rūhānī as one often finds) From there he came in the reign of Muhammad IV to Stambul and became a favourite of the grandvizier Kara Mustafā He held a post as kiaya, made the pilgrimage after Kara Mustafā's death and later settled in Aleppo When the governor there, Muhammad Baltadji [q v], became grandvizier, he took Nābī to Stambul and gave him the post of superintendent of the department of the Anatolian chief accountant (Anadolu muhāsebedjisi) Later he gave up this office for another and died aged about 90 on 3rd Rabiʿ I 1124 (April 10, 1712) He was buried in Skutari in the Karadja Ahmad cemetery near the Miskīnler monastery, the inscription on his tombstone is given by Saʿd al Dīn Nuzhet, Mezārlar Kitābeleri, Stambul 1932, p 11

Nābī wrote several historical works in a florid style which was considered classical in his time and even later, such as an account of the conquest of Kameniec in Podolia (1083 = 1672) called Taʾrīkh i Wekāʾiʿ i Kamınca, Fethnāme i Kamınča or simply Taʾrīkh i Kamınca He also wrote in prose and verse a description of his pilgrimage to the holy places (1089 = 1678, the work was written only in 1093 = 1682) entitled Tuhfat al Haramain His very popular Dīwān with supplement earned him the title of "king of poets" In his Khairī-nāme, usually called Khairiye, he gives his son Abu 'l-Khair moral admonitions and advice His letters (Munshaʾāt) were at one time highly esteemed and are of some historical value He continued Waisī's Siyar in a Dhail i Siyar-i Waisī Printed works Dīwān, Būlāk 1257 and Stambul 1292, Dhail-i Siyar-i Waisī, Būlāk 1248, Khairiye in Conseils de Nabi Efendi à son fils Abou 'l-Khair, publiés en turc avec la traduction française et des notes par M Pavet de Courteille, Paris 1857, Taʾrīkh i Kamınca, Stambul 1281, Sūrat-i Hudjdjat-i Ṭıflāniye, s l (= Stambul, about 1870), deals with questions of pedagogics, Tuhfa, Stambul 1288, Tuhfat al Haramain, s l [Stambul] 1265 For further information see F Babinger, G O W, p 237—239

Bibliography Cf F Babinger, G O W, p 239, where it should be noted that there is also a MS of Dhail-i Siyar-i Waisi in London, Brit Museum, Add 7863 (cf Rieu, Cat of Turk Mss, N⁰ 37) and in Heidelberg, Univ-Library, Cod or, N⁰ 439 (copy of the year 1175 A H), Tuhfat al-Haramain in Paris, coll Cl Huart, Stambul, Hamīdiye, N⁰ 400—401, and the Khairiye in Agram, Ak der Wiss, coll Babinger, N⁰ 826, i On the printed copy of the Taʾrikh i Kamınca cf J A, 1868, i 471 sqq — On a Nābī zāde Nazīm Bey cf Brūsalī Muhammad Tāhir, ʿOthmānlī Muʾellifleri, ii 467 sqq

(FRANZ BABINGER)

NABĪ YŪNUS [See NĪNAWĀ]

NABĪDH (A), a comprehensive designation for intoxicating drinks, several kinds of which were produced in early Arabia, such as mizr (from barley), bitʿ (from honey Bukhārī, Maghāzī, bāb 60, Ashriba, bāb 4, Adab, bāb 80, or from spelt Ahmad b Hanbal, iv 402), fadīkh (from different kinds of dates Bukhārī, Ashriba, bāb 3, 21)

Grapes being scarce in Arabia, it is said that in al-Madīna "wine" was usually prepared from kinds of dates, exceptionally from grapes (Bukhārī, Ashriba, bāb 2, 3, Muslim, Ashriba, trad 3, 6) This may be true Yet even these traditions betray a tendency connected with the question whether the prohibition of wine included that of intoxicating drinks Generally speaking hadīth favours the affirmative answer and is consequently anxious to point out that the khamr which was prohibited by Muhammad included nabīdh

The question was difficult in so far as these kinds of drinks were intoxicating to degrees which partly depended upon the duration of the process of fermentation This appears e g from the copious traditions in which ʿĀʾisha relates how nabīdh was prepared for Muhammad and at what time the beverage was done away with [cf KHAMR], as well as from the traditions in which the previous prohibition of certain vessels (hantam, muzaffat, etc) was abrogated and all kinds of vessels declared allowed, provided the drinks prepared in them were not intoxicating (Muslim, Djanāʾiz, trad 106, Ashriba, trad 63—65, 67—75 etc) A series of traditions which could be adduced by the Hanafites in favour of their view, according to which nabīdh is not included in the prohibition of wine, is to be found in al-Nasāʾī's collection, Ashriba, bāb 48 Cf further the art KHAMR

Side by side with milk and honey nabīdh was also the beverage that was offered to the pilgrims in Makka The institution, al-sikāya (also the name of the building, close to Zamzam, where the distribution took place), was an office held by the ʿAbbāsids (Ahmad b Hanbal, Musnad, i 372, Muslim, Hadjdj, trad 347, Abū Dāwūd, Manāsik, bāb 90) The descriptions by Ibn Saʿd († 230 = 845) and al-Azraḳī († 244 = 858) give the impression of referring to the present state of things, in the time of al-Mukaddasī († about 1000 A D) the institution had already passed into desuetude For details, cf the work of Gaudefroy-Demombynes.

Bibliography cf the Bibliography of the article KHAMR, further Fatāwā ʿAlamgīrī, Calcutta 1251 (1835), VI 607, Santillana, Il "Muḫtaṣar" , Milan 1919, II 739 sqq , Ibn Ḥadjar al-Haitamī, Tuḥfa, Cairo 1282, IV 118 sqq , Abu 'l-Kāsim al-Muhaḳḳik, Kitāb Sharāʾiʿ al-Islām, Calcutta 1255, p 522, Querry, Recueil de lois conc les musulmans schyites, Paris 1872, II 237 sqq , Th W Juynboll, Handleiding tot de kennis van de moh wet, Leyden 1925, p 173, Snouck Hurgronje, Het mekkaansche Feest, Leyden 1880, p 169 (Verspr Geschr , I 111), Gaudefroy-Demombynes, Le pelerinage à la Mekke, Paris 1923 (Annales du Musee Guimet, Bibl d'etudes, N° 23), p 71 sqq , al-Azraḳī, ed Wüstenfeld, p 335 sqq

(A J WENSINCK)

NĀBIGHA AL-DHUBYĀNĪ, a famous poet of the pre-Muhammadan period His real name was Ziyād b Muʿāwiya and he belonged to the tribe of Dhubyān He probably flourished in the second half of the century which preceded Muhammad and died shortly before the beginning of Islām Caussin de Perceval (Histoire des Arabes, 2nd ed , II 502) puts the date of his birth in 535 A D and Father Cheikho (Poetes arabes chrétiens, p 640) dates his death in 604 A D These dates however can only be conjectural

The surname Nābigha has been variously interpreted by Arab writers According to some, our poet was so called because in one of his verses he uses the verb nabagha "She stopped among the Banū Kain b Djasr and they felt the effects of our attacks" But this verse is apocryphal and the process recalls that used to justify the etymologies of Muhalhil and of Mutalammis [q v] According to others, he was so called because he did not write poetry until he reached manhood or more simply because in Nābigha poetry "flows from the spring"

We know nothing about his family, his noble birth asserted by the Kitāb al-Aghānī (IX 162) and Ibn Kutaiba (ed de Goeje, p 74) is doubtful and we know nothing definite about his childhood and youth

At some date which it is impossible to ascertain definitely, Nābigha was admitted to the court of the Lakhmid princes [cf LAKHM] of al-Hīra, vassals of Persia, in the reigns of the kings al Mundhir III and al Mundhir IV in particular this Christian semi Persian, semi Arab city had become an important literary centre and the focus of a brilliant culture

Our poet sang the praises of these two sovereigns and received gifts from them but his fortunes reached their zenith in the reign of Nuʿmān Abū Kabūs whose boon companion and favourite singer he became The poet lived on intimate terms with the king in the lap of luxury and opulence Such favour could not fail to excite the envy and jealousy of the other courtiers hence his enemies, notably Murra b Saʿd, resolved to break the king's attachment to him The trick attempted by his enemies was a crude one and the king was not deceived by it the attack on the poet failed

Far from being discouraged, Murra patiently awaited another opportunity to avenge himself this soon appeared According to the Kitāb al-Aghānī, Nābigha, who had free access to the palace of Nuʿmān, one day unexpectedly entered the apartments of queen Mutadjarrida, famous for her beauty Taken by surprise, she dropped her veil, showing to the delighted eyes of the poet "a part of her statue like body" By the time she could replace it, it was too late Struck to the heart, Nābigha composed in honour of this "beauty" his famous poem which begins with the line "Go and leave Maiya in all haste " (Derenbourg, Dīvān, XIV) Unfortunately he was imprudent enough to recite it to his enemy Murra who hastened to report it to Nuʿmān The latter in his anger decided on the poet's ruin

According to another tradition, one evening when Nābigha was seated beside the queen in company of the king and another poet, Munakhkhal al-Yashkurī, Nuʿmān asked Nābigha to describe Mutadjarrida to him Nābigha at once obeyed and recited the poem which he had composed shortly before Munakhkhal, who was said to be the queen's lover, exclaimed "Since, this description is that of an eye-witness", and the poet's days were now numbered Warned by his friend, the chamberlain ʿIsām, the poet hurriedly fled and sought refuge with the princes of Ghassān

These stories, on the whole little probable, seem to have been invented to explain Nābigha's disgrace In his book Fī 'l Adab al ḏjāhilī (Cairo 1927, p 332), Tāhā Husain disputes their authenticity and acutely points out that nothing in poem VIII "It has reached me, mayest thou avoid the censure etc " supports these stories He supposes on the other hand, relying on this kasīda, that the princes of Ghassān won the good graces of Nābigha at some time by their largesse and the poet showed his gratitude by singing their praises, this having come to the ears of Nuʿmān, the latter took umbrage and decided on the ruin of his favourite

Nābigha was by no means unknown to the Ghassānids, phylarchs of Byzantium and rivals of al-Hīra He had been very well received by the princes al-Hārith b Abū Shammār and al Hārith al-Asghar The former at the poet's request had released a large number of the Banū Asad taken prisoner at the battle of Halīma, the latter, also at Nābigha's request, had released a number of the Banū Asad and Banū Fazāra after the battle of ʿAin Ubāgh This leads us to say a word about Nābigha's political activities

The poet in the course of the wars of his tribe never lost interest in his fellow tribesmen and their allies, we have mentioned his interventions on their behalf with the Ghassānids, during the celebrated war of Dāhis between ʿAbs and Dhubyān, it was his constant care to maintain the alliances contracted with the Banū Asad and Banū Tamīm In the reign of the Ghassānid Nuʿmān b Hārith Abū Karib, he had once more to intercede on behalf of the Banū Dhubyān defeated in the battle of Dhū Ukui, later, in view of his devotion to his patron and his love for his own tribe, he appealed to Nuʿmān to abandon his war on the Banū Dhubyān allied with the Banū Hunn As a result of refusing to listen to him, the king was defeated

At the court of Ghassān, Nābigha was overwhelmed with favours by ʿAmr b Hārith and later by his successor Nuʿmān He celebrates the former's generosity in a kasīda full of gratitude (Derenbourg, III) and his elegy on the death of Nuʿmān (Derenbourg, XXIV) is characterized by deep emotion

In spite of his luxurious life, Nābigha felt his heart and his thoughts turning towards al Hīra and its king Therefore on the death of Nuʿmān b Hārith Abū Karīb he decided to return to al Hīra to attempt to regain the favour of the son of al-Mundhir

Learning that Nuʿmān was ill, he set out accompanied by two Fazārīs, Manthūr b Zabbān and Saiyār b ʿAmr, friends of the prince, when they arrived at al Hīra, Nuʿmān had recovered Hearing of the arrival of his two friends, he had a tent of leather pitched for them and sent them a woman singer to entertain them He himself often came to visit them One evening at a party the singer sang Nābigha's poem "O abode of Maiya" (Diwān, 1), the prince delighted exclaimed "That is an excellent poem!" The Fazārīs thereupon seized the opportunity to intercede on behalf of Nābigha and the generous prince forgave the poet A little later Nuʿmān was put to death by order of the Sāsānian king Kisrā Parwīz for having refused to give him one of his relatives as a wife Nābigha lamented his patron and retired to his tribe We do not know when he died

Before giving an estimate of Nābigha as a poet, we have still to discuss his religion Derenbourg makes him a monotheist, and in support of his opinion quotes a number of verses in which the poet speaks of God, of the feast of palms, of the cross of Zawiā' On the other hand, Cheikho thinks he was a Christian We find, he says (Christianisme en Arabie avant l'Islam, Bairūt 1923, p 429—430), in the poems of Nābigha evidence of his belief in God, of his religion and piety, but the arguments are not numerous or of great cogency a vague mention of God, of David and his son Solomon, of priests present at the obsequies of Mundhir, of the cross of Zawiā' As a matter of fact, Nābigha was a pagan and there is nothing Christian in his poems The allusions in his poems, even if we accept them as authentic, are in reality only rather faded memories of the Christian ceremonies which the poet had witnessed at al Hira, and Ghassān and a distant echo of the religious ideas current in the peninsula at this period As to the word Allāh, it is undoubtedly the result of a substitution for al Lāt [q v] made at a later date by some Muslim purist

Nābigha al-Dhubyānī holds a high position among the poets of ancient Arabia, he is unanimously placed "in the first rank of poets"

In our opinion he possesses in a high degree the two qualities which make a great poet sensitiveness and imagination To sincerity of feeling, he adds splendour of imagery and freshness of expression In him ideas and words, feeling and turn of phrase, matter and form are in perfect harmony His satires are often bitter, ironical and scathing

He is also an artist who skilfully uses all resources, all effects and all artifices His verse is compact, solid and uniform and readily impresses itself on the memory with the idea which it expresses Of course it is not without its faults we find a few weaknesses and examples of lack of care

Tāhā Husain (al-Shiʿr al-ǧāhilī, Cairo 1926) has recently raised the question once more of the authenticity of the poems of Nābigha and other pre-Islāmic poets Rejecting all that has been handed down about it he regards the old poetry as apocryphal The discussion of this question however, as can readily be understood, lies outside the scope of this article

Bibliography Kitāb al-Aghānī, 2nd ed, Cairo, IX 154 sqq, Ibn Kutaiba, ed de Goeje, Leyden, p 74 sqq Ǧamharat Ashʿār al-ʿArab, Būlāk 1308, al-Baghdādī, Khizānat al Adab, Būlāk 1299, I 287 sqq, al ʿAbbāsī, Maʿāhid al-Tanṣīs, Cairo 1316, Suyūtī, Muzhir, Cairo 1325, Abkarius Iskandar Agha, Tazyīn Nihāyat al-ʿArab, Bairūt 1867, F E al-Bustānī, Kawāyā, N° 30, Bairūt 1931, Ibn Sallām, Tabakāt, Cairo n d, Derenbourg, Le Diwan de Nabigha, Paris 1869, Cheikho, Poetes arabes chrétiens, Bairūt 1890, Ahlwardt, Six diwans, London 1870, Khams Dawāwīn, Cairo, several editions, Cheikho, Le Christianisme et la litterature chretienne en Arabie avant l'Islam, Bairūt 1923, vol III, Caussin de Perceval, Essai sur l'histoire des Arabes, 2nd ed, Paris 1902, vol II, Sylvestre de Sacy, Chrestomathie, 1st ed, vol III, do, Anthologie grammaticale, p 435, Lyall, Translations of ancient Arabian Poetry, London 1885, p 95 sqq, Brockelmann, G A L, I 22, Nicholson, Literary History of the Arabs, 2nd ed, London 1914

(MAURICE CHEMOUL)

NABOB [See NĀ'IB]

NĀBULUS, a town in central Palestine, the name of which is derived from that of Flavia Neapolis built in honour of Vespasian Its Old Testament predecessor was Shechem, which however lay more to the east, on the site of the present village of Balāta (the name is explained by S Klein, in Z D P V, xxxv 38 sq, cf R Hartmann, ibid, xxxiii 175 sq, as "platanus", from the evidence of the pilgrim of Bordeaux and the Midrash Gen rb, c 81, § 3) According to Eusebius, the place where the old town stood was pointed out in a suburb of Neapolis The correctness of this identification of the site of Shechem has now been completely proved by Sellin's excavations, and this also explains how the old name did not as usual drive out the late Greek one In the time of the Arab writers, the name Shechem was long forgotten and what they tell us refers to Neapolis Nābulus

Nābulus is in a long valley (running from east to west) formed by two chains of hills, on the south side Garizim, Arabic Djabal al-Tūr or al-Kiblī (2,900 feet high), on the north side Ebal, Arabic Djabal Eslāmīya or al-Shamālī (3,140 feet high) G Holscher (Z D P V, xxxiii 98) refers the older name of Neapolis Mabartha (Mamortha) in Pliny and Josephus (i e "crossing", maʿbarta) to the low saddle running right across the valley The town with its 22 springs is unusually rich in water, which is heard running everywhere and produces a very luxuriant vegetation Where the road from the south turns westwards into the valley there is a well with the ruins of a church Unanimous tradition since the fourth century A D locates here Jacob's well and it is undoubtedly the same as is mentioned in John IV 5 About a thousand yards to the north is a building where tradition locates Joseph's grave

In the post-exilic period Shechem belonged to the territory of the mixed people of the Samaritans whose capital it became after they had built on the hill of Garizim (the Samaritan text of Deut XXVII 5 has this name instead of Ebal) a temple as a rival to that of Jerusalem They were continually at strife with the Jews and in the end John Hyrcanus

in 129 B C destroyed Shechem and its temple At a later date this always turbulent people was equally hostile to the Romans, which caused Vespasian to attack them on Garizim when a large number were slain Christianity gradually spread in the country and Neapolis became a bishopric The result was that the Samaritans now turned their arms against the Christians and treated them with great cruelty After a deadly raid by them, the Byzantine emperor Zeno (474—491) had them driven from Garizim and built a church there They wrought still greater havoc in the time of Justinian who punished them with great severity and destroyed their synagogues while he rebuilt the churches This finally broke their spirit, many of them fled to Persia while others became Christians Their part had been played by the time when Nābulus with many other towns fell into the hands of the Muslims

The notices of the Arab authors about the town are very scanty They know that it was inhabited by Samaritans [cf AL SĀMIRĪ] and some add that, according to the Jews, they are found nowhere else, but it should be noted that Balādhurī (ed de Goeje, p 158) speaks of Samaritans in Filastīn and Urdunn Ya'kūbī mentions (p 328), Nābulus a town near two sacred hills with a population of Jews, foreigners and Samaritans Below the town is a subterranean city, hewn out of the rock Mukaddasī says "Nābulus lies in a valley between two hills, is rich in olive-trees and a stream flows through it The houses are of stone and there are mills there, the mosque in the centre has a beautiful paved courtyard" In the Crusading period Nābulus is mentioned as unfortified On Jan 23, 1120, an assembly of prelates and secular notables was held here with the object of improving the morals of the Christians Idrīsī mentions the well of Jacob where Christ had the conversation with the woman of Samaria, a fine church had then been built on the spot The Jewish traveller Benjamin of Tudela (1160—1173) records that there were no Jews in Nābulus, but about 100 Kutaeans (Samaritans) who offered burned offerings on the altar on Garizim at the passover and on other feast-days His contemporary 'Alī al-Harawī says the Samaritans are very numerous He, as does Yākūt, always writes Garizim as Kazirim, a corruption which we already have in the "Agazaren" of the pilgrim of Bordeaux A terrible earthquake in 1202 added to the miseries inflicted on the town by the continual wars between Franks and Muslims Under the great Mamlūk Sultān Baibars [q v] it finally passed into possession of the Muslims Yāḳūt remarks on the wealth of water and fertility of the district, here, he says, is the hill on which according to the Jews, Abraham wanted to sacrifice Isaac (not Ishmael as the Muslims say) When praying, the Samaritans turn towards Garizim Dimashkī says that Nābulus is like a palace surrounded by gardens, he mentions the pilgrimages of the Samaritans to Garizim where they sacrificed lambs The Muslims had a fine mosque in the town, where the Kur'ān was recited day and night According to Khalīl al-Zāhirī (d 872=1467), the area included 300 villages

The people of Nābulus retained their unfriendly character and fondness for rebellion so that the town was less visited by pilgrims Only the modern period has brought order and greater security, but even now the dislike of the Samaritans to strangers as spectators during their passover sacrifices may give rise to trouble

Bibliography Sellin, in Z D P V, xlix 2295 sq, l 205 sqq, 265 sqq (on the excavations in the ancient Shechem), Holscher, ibid, xxxiii 98 sqq, R Hartmann, ibid, xxxiii 175, P Thomsen, Loca sancta, p 93, 108 sq, Robinson, Palastina, iii 336 sqq, Guerin, Samarie, i 390 sqq, Ya'kūbī, in B G A, vii 32, Istakhrī, ibid, i 58, Mukaddasī, ibid, iii 174, Idrīsī, ibid, viii 122 (text, p 4), I e Strange, Palestine under the Moslims, p 512, Sir George Adam Smith, Historical Geography of the Holy Land, index, s v Nablus, The Itinerary of Rabbi Benjamin of Tudela, ed A Asher, 1840, i 66—68, Yākūt, Mu'djam, ed Wustenfeld, iv 724, Dimashkī, ed Mehren, p 200, Rohricht, Gesch d Konigreichs Jerusalem, p 146, 205, 411, 684 and passim, Riopst, Die geogr Verhaltnisse Syriens und Palastinas nach Wilhelm von Tyrus, i 55 sq (Fr Buhl)

AL-NĀBULUSĪ [See 'Abd al-Ghanī]

NADHĪR (A, plural nudhur, Sūra liii 57), used as a nomen agentis from n dh r iv, with the meaning of warner, sometimes also as an infinitive, e g Sūra lxvii 17 The plural nudhur is also found in the sense of an infinitive, e g Sūra lxxvii 6 The term occurs frequently in the Kur'ān, it is even said to be synonymous with rasūl, its opposite is bashīr, mubashshir Nadhīr as well as bashīr are applied to the prophets, the former when they are represented as warners, the latter as announcers of good tidings (cf Sūra xvii 106, xxv 58, xxxiii 44, xlviii 8 mubashshiran wa nadhīran) As an epithet it is used especially in connection with Noah, the great warner before the Deluge, and with Muhammad himself who thereby receives the stamp of a second Noah (cf Sūra xxvi 115, l 51, lxxi 2 with Sūra xxix 49, xxxv 21, xxxviii 70, lxvii 26) Sometimes Muhammad emphasises his being only a warner (Sūra xlvi 8), or his being the first warner who was sent to his people (Sūra xxviii 46, xxxiv 43)

The term is found in hadīth apart from the common use, known from the Kur'ān, in the curious expression nadhīr 'uryān (Bukhārī, Rikāk, bāb 26, I'tisām, bāb 2, Muslim, Fadā'il, trad 16) with which Muhammad denotes himself The tradition runs as follows "Myself and my mission are like a man who went to some people saying I have seen the army (of the enemy) with my eyes and I am the naked warner" Several anecdotic stories are told by the commentators in explanation of this expression It is also said by some of them, that in early Arabia a man who saw an approaching danger, stripped himself of his clothes and wound them around his head in order to warn his tribespeople — The meaning Nazirite which in several dictionaries is given to the term nadhīr in the first place does not occur in the Kur'ān, nor in hadīth, nor in Lisān al-'Arab nor in Tādj al-'Arūs, it is, however, used in translations of the Bible

Bibliography Lisān al-'Arab, vii 54 sqq, Tādj al-'Arūs, iii 561 sq, Ibn al-Athīr, Nihāya, iv 136, Kastallānī, ix 305, Nawawī's commentary on Muslim's Sahīh, Cairo 1283, v 71 (A J Wensinck)

NADHR, vow, was taken over into Islām from the pre-Muhammadan Arabs and underwent modification by the new religion The idea of dedication is associated with the root n-dh r which is also found in South Arabic, Hebrew and Aramaic and to some extent in Assyrian An animal could be the object of dedication among the Arabs For example, they dedicated by nadhr certain of their sheep etc, for the ʿatīra feast in Radjab (Lisān al-ʿArab and Djawharī, s v), the dedication which was expressed in solemn formulae signified that the animals were removed from the mundane sphere and placed in the sacred one

As a rule, a sacrifice was dedicated in order to obtain good fortune in a particular respect The promise to dedicate an animal when the herd had reached the number of a hundred (op cit) had an effect on the prosperity of the animals because the word anticipated the fact According to the story, ʿAbd al-Muttalib similarly dedicated a son to be slain beside the Kaʿba if he should have ten sons and they grew up (Ibn Hishām, p 97 sq) but for his nadhr 100 camels were substituted — A childless woman could also vow if she had a son to dedicate him to the sanctuary (ibid, p 76, perhaps this story is a literary borrowing) According to the hadīth of Maimūna bint Kardam, her father promised to sacrifice 50 sheep if he had a son (Yākūt, i 754, Abū Dāwūd, Aimān, bāb 19, Ibn Mādja, Kafārāt, bāb 18) If a child was sick, its mother could dedicate it by a vow as ahmas (from humis) if it recovered (Azraḳī, p 123,8 sqq) Escape from every difficulty was sought by a nadhr During a battle a camel used to be dedicated as a sacrifice (Wākidī-Wellhausen, p 39) The traveller in the desert used to make a vow on account of the danger (see the verse in Iane and Lisān al-ʿArab, s v) In distress at sea one promised offerings to God or a saint or vowed to do something oneself, such as fasting (Sūra x 23, xxix 65, Abū Dāwūd, Aimān, bāb 20, see also Goldziher, Muh Stud, ii 311) During a drought ʿOmar vowed to taste neither samn, nor milk nor meat till the rain fell (Ṭabarī, ed de Goeje, i 2573,12 sq)

Even if a sacrifice were promised, the vow also affected the person concerned, as we see from the fact that he had his hair shorn not only on the hadjdj but also, for example, when sacrificing after a journey (Ibn Hishām, p 15, 749, Wākidī-Wellhausen, p 324, 381, 429 sq, Bukhārī, Hadjdj, bāb 125), for the cutting of the hair ended, as in the case of the Israelite Nazirite, the state of consecration The vow therefore had always more or less the character of a self dedication This aspect was often quite prominent Ordinary sacred duties such as participation in the hadjdj were assumed as a consecration by nadhr (Sūra xxii 30) at which special obligations were assumed e g to go to the sanctuary on foot, or barefooted (Bukhārī, Djazāʾ al-Said, bāb 27, Tirmidhī, al Nudhūr wa ʾl Aimān, bāb 17) The sacred condition of iʿtikāf was assumed as a nadhr, thus before his conversion ʿOmar vowed to make a nightly iʿtikāf in the Meccan sanctuary (Bukhārī, Maghāzī, bāb 54, Aimān, bāb 29) Such a vow to separate oneself from everyday life in some special way was very frequent among the ancient Arabs, for Labīd (p 17,17) compares an antelope buck alone among the bushes to one fulfilling his vow (kāḍī ʾl nudhūr)

This isolation had the definite object of spiritual concentration and strengthening the soul and thereby influencing the deity Abstinence was therefore practised in preparation for great deeds, especially in war The Arabs "touched no perfume, married no woman, drank no wine and avoided all pleasures when they were seeking vengeance, until they attained it" (Hamāsa, p 447, v 5 schol), avoidance of wine (Hamāsa, p 237, v 4 sqq) and women (Kitāb al-Aghānī, xv 161, 2nd ed, p 154) is specially mentioned These abstentions like the hadjdj rites and the iʿtikāf are also the objects of a nadhr The form of this vow is for example "wine and women are harām to me until I have slain 100 Asadīs" (Aghānī, viii 68, 2nd ed, p 65) A definite term may be fixed, such as drinking no wine for 30 days in order to obtain vengeance (Kais b al-Khatīm, ed Kowalski, iv 28) Forms of abstention are not to eat meat, not to wash the head, so that the djanāba is not removed (Aghānī, ix 149, 2nd ed, p 141, xiii 69, 2nd ed, p 66, Ibn Hishām, p 543, 980, Hudhailiten, ed Wellhausen, N° 189), not to anoint oneself (Wākidī-Wellhausen, p 201) Refraining from meat, wine, ointment, washing and sexual intercourse are mentioned together (Aghānī, vi 99, 2nd ed, p 97, viii 68, 2nd ed, p 66, Ibn Hishām, p 543, Wākidī Wellhausen, p 73, 94) There is also evidence of complete fasting (Wāḳidī-Wellhausen, p 105, 402) The abstentions, the offering and the deed to be done form the content of the nadhr It is said nadhartu ʿalā nafsī and nadhartu mālī (Djawharī and Lisān al-ʿArab, s v) as well as nadhara damᵃ fulān (ʿAntara, p 21, 84, Kais al Rukaiyāt, p 52, 5) After a wish has been fulfilled a vow of gratitude may also be taken (Wākidī, p 290)

The consecration placed the person making the vow in connection with the divine powers, the nadhr was an ʿahd (Sūra ix 76, xxxiii 27, xlviii 10), whereby he pledged himself A neglect of the nadhr was a sin against the deity (Imraʾ al Kais, p 51, 10) The sacred obligation of living made this a nadhr or (synonymous) nahb, which one should fulfil (ḳaḍā), instead of wandering aimlessly (Sūra xxxiii 23, Wākidī, p 120, Iabīd, p 41,1, Kumait, Hāshimīyāt, ed Horovitz, p 4, 48) The importance of the binding pledge gradually becomes more prominent (cf Lisān al-ʿArab, where nadhara is explained by awdjaba, ironically Asmaʿīyāt, p 7,2), the emphasis on the material dedication gradually became less The abstinences mentioned receive their importance on the one hand from works meritorious to the deity, on the other from the unpleasant deprivations, by which the person taking the vow disciplines himself Both points of view are seen in the examples quoted The releasing of slaves or divorcing of wives often form the subject of a kind of vow by which a man pledges himself under certain conditions A man may also vow to sacrifice all his camels if he is lying (Hamāsa, p 667, v 3) The strict obligation inherent in the nadhr makes it closely related to the oath [see KASAM]

One can also bind one's family by a vow A mother swears not to comb her hair or to seek shade until her son or daughter fulfils her wish (Aghānī, xviii 205, 2nd ed, p 205, Ibn Hishām, p 319, ii 90) The strength of this kind of "conjuration" is based on the relationship between the two partners If a dying man vows that his tribe shall slay 50 to avenge him, this binds the tribe (Hamāsa, p 442 sq) There thus arose in Islām the problem of how far unfulfilled vows had to be fulfilled by the descendants (Muslim, Nadhr, trad 1, Bukhārī, Wasāya, bāb 19, cf Goldziher, Ẓāhirīten, p 80)

In Islām the vow and the oath are treated together In the Kur'ān it is prescribed that unconsidered expressions (laghw) in an oath may be broken and expiated (Sūra ii 225, v 91) The context shows that the reference is to vows of abstinence, especially relating to food and women Sūra ii 226—227 in continuation says that those who bind themselves by īlā' not to touch a woman should either break the vow after 4 months or pronounce the formula of divorce The breach of the oath then requires the kaffāra The ẓihār formula is absolutely forbidden (Sūra lviii 1—5, cf xxxiii 4), it is a great sin in the eyes of the law, while the īlā' is not a sin (see Juynboll, Handbuch, p 284 sqq , Sachau, Muh Recht, p 13, 68 sqq) The "release from the oath" promised in Sūra lxvi 2 refers to a vow of continence The same kaffāra holds for a broken vow as for an oath It is probable in this case that we have Jewish influence (cf Mishna, Nedārīm) but the principle of releasing oneself from a vow by doing something else is certainly also originally Arab But with Islām comes the view that nudhūr are useless because they cannot influence God (Bukhārī, Aimān, bāb 26, Kadar, bāb 6, Muslim, Nadhr, trad 2) Thus we find hadīths which urge the fulfilment of vows as well as those that forbid them Following hints in the hadīths, we find a systematic division into vows of piety (nadhr al tabarrur), which are intended to acquire merit by a pious deed (ṭā'a), and vows by oaths which, since they are conditioned, serve to incite, prevent or strengthen The latter are called nadhr al ladjādj wa 'l-ghadab They are deprecated but must be treated like oaths Their matter must not be sinful, according to some, such a vow is invalid, according to others, it is valid but must be broken Their matter must not already be an individual duty (wādjib 'aini) The person taking the vow must, like him taking an oath, be mukallaf and be acting of his own free-will

Bibliography J Wellhausen, *Reste arabischen Heidentums*², Berlin 1897, p 122 sqq , W Robertson Smith, Religion of the Semites, ed S A Cook (1927), p 332, 481 sqq , Th W Juynboll, Handbuch des islamischen Gesetzes, Leyden 1910, p 268 sq , Khalil b Ishāk, Mukhtasar, transl I Guidi (1919), p 371—383, Johs Pedersen, Der Eid bei den Semiten, Strassburg 1914, index, s v Gelubde, W Gottschalk, Das Gelubde nach alterer arabischer Auffassung, Berlin 1919, the hadīth-material quoted here and A J Wensinck, Handbook of Early Muhammadan Tradition, s v Vow (Johs Pedersen)

AL-NADĪM, Abu 'l-Faradj Muhammad b Abī Ya'kūb Ishāk al-Warrāk al-Nadīm al Baghdādī, Arabic bibliographer, compiled the Fihrist in 377 (987—988) Little is known about his life According to a statement which goes back to Ibn al-Nadjdjār's (d 643 = 1245) Dhail Ta'rīkh Baghdād (see Flügel's edition, p xii , note 2), he died in 385, according to another statement (see Ibn Hadjar al 'Askalānī, Lisān al-Mizān, v 72) probably 388 (? the figure is damaged in the Haidarābād edition) Both dates are in contradiction to the fact that in the Fihrist events of 392 (p 87, 6) and "after 400" (p 169, 13) are mentioned, unless these are additions by another hand A clue to the date of his birth is given from his account (p 237, 6) of a meeting with a learned man in the year 340, this suggests 325 as the latest date for his birth Nothing is known of his family There is no reason to connect him with Ishāk b Ibrāhīm al-Mawsilī al-Nadīm (d 235 = 849) or with Yahyā b al-Nadīm, a pupil of al-Balādhurī (d 279 = 892) His father was a bookseller (warrāk) (p 303, 24, 318, 6, 351, 14) Whether the epithet al-Nadīm "table companion", i e member of the circle of a caliph or other great man, refers to the father or to a remoter ancestor is unknown It is not impossible that it refers to the author of the Fihrist himself, against this however is the fact that he is usually quoted as Ibn al-Nadīm That Baghdād, if not his birthplace, was at least his place of abode is evident from passages, like p 337, 26, 349, 17 (see below) and the frequent mention of Baghdādīs among his acquaintances (p 132, 6, 219, 25, 236, 12, 266, 2) He several times mentions a stay in Mōsul (p 86, 12, 160, 2, 190, 2, 265, 23, cf also p 283, 2) We know nothing of other journeys by al-Nadīm (Dār al-Rūm, p 349, 14 is the name of the Latin quarter in Baghdād as V v Rosen has shown) His teachers and authorities also point to Baghdād He most frequently quotes the authority of the grammarian al-Sīrāfī (d 368) (all the quotations can be found in the latter's Akhbār al Nahwiyīn al-Basriyīn) Personal relations are indicated by p 56, 13 and the mention of his sons (p 31, 23, 45, 11, 62, 23) Al-Nadīm also studied under Ibn al-Munadjdjim (p 144, 11) He gives traditions heard from Muhammad b Yūsuf al-Nākit (p 24, 14, 25, 8) He also gives traditions from Abu 'l Faradj al Isfahānī (p 141, 17 = *Kitāb al-Aghānī*³, i 5 sq) and from Abu 'l-Fath b al-Nahwī (p 145, 25) celebrated for the reliability of his transcripts (p 145, 25) He also mentions as his teacher Abū Sulaimān al Mantikī (p 241, 14) whom we know from Abū Hayyān's Mukābasāt He was friendly also with the logician Ibn al-Djarrāh (p 244, 6, 245, 12) and with the Christian philosopher Ibn al-Khammār (p 245, 12) and with Yahyā b 'Adī (p 264, 8) This circle of friends is very much in keeping with al Nadīm's friendly nature, the breadth of his intellectual interests, his intelligent interest in other religions and his tolerance, which finds expression in Makāla's 5 and 9 of his work That he was a Shi'ī and Mu'tazilī did not escape his biographers (cf Goldziher, in Z D M G , xxxvi 278 sqq), thus he uses khāssī and 'āmmī in the sense of Shi'ī and Sunnī respectively, calls the Sunnī traditionists al-Hashwīya (p 231, 12), claims many of their leaders for the Zaidīya (p 178, 9, 25), says that al Shāfi'ī was a man of decidedly Shi'ī outlook (p 209, 18) and praises al-Wākidī (p 98, 20) as a Shi'ī Shi'īs were numerous among his friends (p 139, 27 and p 154, 25) and acquaintances (p 178, 6, 190, 2, 11, 197, 11, 198, 4) Al-Nadīm like his father was a bookseller This is nowhere expressly stated but is evident from the whole plan of his work in which he faithfully records not only scientific literature but also the numerous dīwāns of contemporary poets and the vast mass of anonymous light literature, love stories, fairy tales and books of adventure, indeed even works of a popular nature neglected alike by scholars and bibliophiles, books on good manners, cookery books, books on poison, books dealing with hunting and sport, down to collections of farces, books on magic and on prophecy, in brief everything that was on the Baghdād book market in the fourth

(tenth) century That he was a bookseller is also indicated by the frequent particulars about the size of the books dealt with (cf especially, p 159, 18), about copies in the hand of famous scholars, about the demand for books (p 70, 5, 8, 77, 14, 79, 23) and about the book trade (p 271, 5, 359, 20) He several times mentions other booksellers (p 264, 8, 299, 4, 355, 12)

The Fihrist exists in two recensions (on the manuscripts, see Z D M G, lxxxiv 111 sqq and the literature there given, to these may now be added a fragment in Tonk and a private manuscript in Medīna) Both were made in the year 377 (987) The longer contains ten makālāt, of which the first six deal with the literature of Islām (1 Kurʾān, 2 grammar, 3 history etc , 4 poetry, 5 dogmatics, 6 law), while the last four deal with non-Islāmic literature (7 philosophy and "ancient sciences", 8 light literature, 9 history of religion, 10 alchemy) The shorter version contains only the four last makālāt of the longer one, i e the Arabic translations from the Greek, Syriac, Persian and Sanskrit and the other literature based on these models It is mentioned by Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa (Stambul, ii 211) under the title Fawz al-ʿUlūm The two recensions have in common an introductory section on the various forms of writing — A survey of the contents of the Fihrist follows the preface (see also Flugel, in Z D M G, xiii 190 sqq) The arrangement there given is strictly adhered to in the book The special quality of the book and its value lies in the fact that it gives the Arabic literature of the first four centuries in a bibliographical arrangement while the biographical method is the only one used in other contemporary sources Al Nadīm, it is true, as a rule treats of his subjects in biographical sketches but it is the list of works of the author that is the main thing Sometimes a branch of literature is treated purely bibliographically under its various branches (e g the literature of Kurʾānic exegesis, p 33, 20—37, 11, also p 87, 88, 170, 171) This arrangement was necessary with the anonymous literature, especially in the eighth makāla (p 305 sqq) A further step towards treatment from the point of view of the literary historian is found in the brief introductions and surveys (e g on the pre ʿOthmānic recensions of the Kurʾān, p 26 sqq, on the beginnings of Arabic grammar, p 40 sqq) In the last four makālāt, such sections (e g on the origins of philosophy, of medicine, of alchemy, the beginning of the translated literature, the origin of the "1 000 tales") are so extensive that they have the character of a regular history of literature to a much greater degree than the more bibliographical first six makālāt The ninth makāla occupies a special position, it is a treatise on the history of religion in which the bibliographical element is not at all prominent — The sources used by al-Nadīm are mainly of a literary nature He prefers to use works in copies from the hand of reliable copyists He comparatively rarely quotes personal authority — Although a younger contemporary of al-Nadīm's, al-Wazīr al-Maghribī (d 418 = 1027), prepared an improved edition of the work, it seems at first to have had only slight influence The earliest author to make considerable use of the first four makālāt (in al-Maghribī's edition) was Yāḳūt (d 626 = 1228) (see Bergsträsser, in Z S, ii 185) He claims to have consulted a copy in al-Nadīm's own hand, as does the lexicographer al Saghānī, d 650 (1252) (see Khizānat al-Adab, iii 83 pu) Ibn al-Kifṭī (d 624 = 1226) and Ibn Abī Usaibiʿa (d 668 = 1269) copied much from the Fihrist In later times it is only occasionally quoted, e g by al-Dhahabī (d 748 = 1347) and Ibn Ḥadjar al-ʿAskalānī (d 852 = 1448) and lastly by Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa (d 1067 = 1656) and al-Khafādjī (d 969 = 1561) — Al-Nadīm also wrote a Kitāb al-Awsāf wa 'l-Tashbīhāt (Fihrist, p 12, 2) which has not come down to us

Bibliography Das Kitāb al-Fihrist mit Anmerkungen hrsg v G Flügel, 2 vols , Leipzig 1871—1872, reprinted Cairo 1348 (also contains the text of the Leyden fragments published by Houtsma, in W Z K M, iv 217 sqq) A new edition is in preparation for the Bibliotheca Islamica — The earlier literature is given in the preface and in the notes to Flugel's edition — Yākūt, Irshād al Arīb, ed Margoliouth, vi 408, Ibn Ḥadjar al-ʿAskalānī, Lisān al-Mizān, Haidarābād 1331, v 78, Brockelmann, G A L, i 147, J Fück, Eine arab Literaturgeschichte aus dem 10 Jahrhundert (Z D M G, lxxxiv 11 sqq), H Ritter, Zu den Handschriften des Fihrist (Isl, xvii 15 sqq) Considerable sections of the Fihrist are dealt with separately in the following works A Muller, Die griechischen Philosophen in d arab Überlieferung, Halle 1872, Suter, Das Mathematikerverzeichnis im Fihrist (Abh z Gesch d math Wiss, vi, 1892), do, ibid, x, 1900 and xiv, 1902, M Steinschneider, Die arabischen Übersetzungen a d Griech (s Z D M G, l 371 sqq), Kessler, Mani, Berlin 1889, i 331 sqq , Berthelot, La chimie au moyen-âge, Paris 1893, iii 26 sqq (JOHANN FÜCK)

NADĪM, AḤMAD, an Ottoman poet, born in Stambul, the son of a judge named Muḥammad Bey who had come from Merzifun His grandfather (according to Gibb, H O P, iv 30) was a military judge named Muṣṭafā Aḥmad Rafīḳ mentions as his great-grandfather Kara-Čelebi-zāde [q v] Maḥmūd Efendi who also was a military judge The genealogy given by Aḥmad Rafīḳ is however wrong because he confuses Karamānī Muḥammad Pasha [q v] with Rūm Muḥammad Pasha The statement that Aḥmad Nadīm is descended from Djalāl al Dīn is therefore simply the result of confusion Little is known of his life He was a muderis, later on intimate terms with Aḥmad III and his grandvizier Dāmād Ibrāhīm Pasha [q v] He probably got his lakab al-Nadīm from this friendship Latterly he held the office of librarian in the library founded by his patron Dāmād Ibrāhīm Pasha On hearing of the end of Ibrāhīm Pasha and the deposition of the sultān, Nadīm lost his life at the beginning of October 1730 (Rabīʿ I, 1143) in a horrible way, while escaping from the mob leaving the grand-vizier's palace he fell from the roof and was killed He was buried in Ayās Pasha in Pera beside the historian Findiklīlī Silāhdār Muḥammad Agha

Aḥmad Nadīm is regarded as one of the greatest of Ottoman poets, who is still appreciated for his pure language, free from foreign additions. Many literary historians have discussed his merits as a poet (cf the specimens collected by Gibb, H O P, iv 30 sqq) His collected poems (Dīwān, printed Būlāk, n d , a more recent critical edition with introductions by Aḥmad Rafīḳ Bey and Muḥammad Fu'ād Bey appeared in 1338—1340 in Stambul, there are manuscripts of the Dīwān in Europe in Munich, London and Vienna) enjoys great popularity Nadīm translated into Turkish the history of Munedjdjim bashi Ahmad Efendi (cf F Babinger, G O W, p 234 sq, cf thereon J A, ser 7, xiii 272), he was also one of the Turkish translators of ʿAmi's history (cf F Babinger, G O W, p 259 sqq, the edict relating to this is in Ahmad Rafik, Hicri onikinci asirda Istanbul hayati, 1100—1200, Stambul 1930, p 84 sq) but the MS seems to be lost

Bibliography Ahmad Rafik's preface to the new edition of the Dīwān, Sidjill i ʿothmānī, iv 549 (very superficial, here his grandfather is said to have been a certain Sadr Muslih al Dīn and his father the judge Muhammad), Brūsalī Muhammad Fu'ād, ʿOthmānlī Mu'ellifleri, ii 453 sq, J von Hammer Purgstall, G O D, iv 310 sqq (who does not appreciate him highly), Gibb, H O P, iv 30 sqq

(Franz Babinger)

NĀDIR SHĀH, king of Persia (1147—1160 = 1736—1747)

Origins Nādir b Imām kuli b Nadhr kuli belonged to the Kīlīkli clan of the Turkoman tribe of the Afshārs, of which a section had settled in northern Khurāsān, and was born on the 28th Muharram 1100 (Oct 22, 1688) at Kūbkān Entering the service of Tahmāsp II, he was called Tahmāsp-kuli Khān but after his coronation his original name was improved to Nādir, "the rare one" At an early date Nādir distinguished himself in the incessant fighting with the Turkomans of Nasā, the Čamishgazak Kurds of Khabūshān (Kūčān), the Ozbeks, the Tatars of Marw and even against his Afshār fellow tribesmen The little nucleus around Nādir consisted of his Afshār relatives, some Kurds of Daragaz and Abiward, and 300—400 families of Djalāyir Turkomans with their chief Tahmāsp kuli Wakil

Fighting in Khurāsān During the Afghān invasion of Persia, Mashhad was occupied by Malik Mahmūd, a scion of the Sistān family Nādir fought against Malik Mahmūd at first on his own initiative When the Safawid Tahmāsp II, driven from his other lands, arrived in Khurasān, Nādir very cleverly supplanted the commander in chief Fath ʿAlī Khān Kādjār and on 16th Rabiʿ II (Dec 22) captured Mashhad with the help of treachery Henceforth it became his headquarters There were already signs of a breach between Nādir and Tahmāsp II at this time

The Shāh urged Nādir to set out against his enemies the Ghilzā'ī Afghāns but Nādir wished first of all to dispose of the nearer enemy, the Abdālī Afghāns of Herāt, but the campaigns of 1728 (against the Abdālī and the Turkomans) had no success Nādir however was able to extend the sphere of his activities, he ousted from Astarabād and Māzandarān the governors appointed by Tahmāsp and came into conflict with the Russians and the Ghilzā'ī Afghāns

The Abdālī In the meanwhile trouble had broken out in Herāt between Allāh yār Khān and Dhu 'l-Fikār Khān Nādir re established Allāh-yār Khān but transplanted many tribes to Khurāsān (1141 = 1727)

The Ghilzā'ī At this time Ashraf Ghilzā'ī laid siege to Simnān while his general Saydāl had gone to Bistām On the 6th Rabiʿ I (Nov 27, 1729), Nādir defeated the Afghāns on the banks of the river Mihmāndūst This victory he followed up by others

Nādir in S W Persia Tahmāsp appealed to Nādir to complete the deliverance of the country Leaving Shīrāz and crossing Lūristān, Nādir arrived in Burūdjird where the Shāh sent him a crown set with precious stones and a commission (ʿahd nāma) as wālī of all Khurāsān along with Māzandarān, Yazd, Kirmān and Sīstān (cf also ʿAlī Hazīn, p 189) Tahmāsp also gave his sister Gawhar-shād to Nādir and betrothed his other sister Fāṭima-sultān to Ridā-kuli Mīrzā

The Ottomans who then occupied the whole of western Persia and the greater part of Transcaucasia were reluctant to leave Persia Nādir occupied Nihāwand, defeated the Turks at Malāyir, retook Hamadān and on the 27th Muharram 1143 (Aug 13, 1730) Tabrīz was retaken

Nādir returns to the east Nādir learned in Tabrīz that Dhu 'l-Fikār Abdālī having driven Allāh yār Khān from Herāt was fighting Nādir's brother Ibrāhīm Khān under the walls of Mashhad Nādir at once set out for Khurāsān, crossing the steppe of the Yomut Turkomans and towards the end of Rabiʿ II (Nov 1730) was at Mashhad where he reviewed 56,000 families of the tribes transplanted from other provinces

On the 4th Shawwāl (April 12, 1731) Nādir was 3 farsakhs from Herāt In the month of August the Abdālī restored Nādir's candidate Allāh-yār Khan but the latter regaining contact with his tribe now rebelled It was not till Ramadān 1, 1144 (Feb 27, 1732) that Herāt was taken

Failure of Tahmāsp II Taking advantage of the absence of his commander-in-chief, the Shāh resumed the initiative in the military operations and in Djumadā II 1143 (end of Dec 1730) set out against the Ottomans Fearing the return of Nādir the Ottomans on Jan 10, 1732 signed a preliminary treaty at Baghdād by which the Persians returned only the lands south of the Araxes Later on Jan 21—Feb 1, 1732 the Shāh's representatives signed at Rasht a treaty with the Russians by which the latter bound themselves to evacuate the lands south of Sālyān (on the Kur) while the return of Bākū and Darband was made dependent on the reconquest of Transcaucasia by the Persians

Deposition of Tahmāsp II Nādir was indignant at the peace with the Turks signed after a defeat Setting aside the Shāh's authority, Nādir Shāh denounced the treaty and appointed his own governors everywhere Tahmāsp was deported to Khurāsān and his son ʿAbbās III, an infant in the cradle, proclaimed king on the 17th Rabiʿ I 1145 (July 7, 1732)

First campaign against the Ottomans Having punished the Bakhtiyāris and the Kurds, Nādir occupied Zohāb and besieged Baghdād (Jan 1733) Ahmad Pāshā made the negotiations drag on until the army commanded by Topal ʿOthmān Pāshā had time to come to Mesopotamia On 6th Safar 1146 (July 19, 1733) Nādir Shāh lost the battle fought on the Tigris and returned to Hamadān via Bahrīz and Mandaldjīn (Mandalī)

Arriving there on 22nd Safar (Aug 4) Nādir set out again for Zohāb on the 22nd Rabiʿ II (Oct 2) and then attacked Memish Pāshā who had occupied the pass of Agh darband (1st Djumādā II = Nov 9, 1733) Then Topal ʿOthmān Pāshā with the bulk of his army intervened in the battle but lost it and had his head cut off The Ottomans hastened to abandon Ādharbāidjān By the 15th Radjab (Dec 22) Nādir was already on his way to Persia via Baghsāy (Bā kusāyč), Bayāt, Bayān and Shūshtar

Mahmūd Balūč The reason of this hurried move was the rebellion raised by Mahmūd Khān Balūč in S W Persia Mahmūd Khān was quickly driven from the pass of Shūlistān and on 27th Sha'bān (Feb 1, 1734) Nadir reoccupied Shīrāz

Campaign in Transcaucasia In Isfahān Nādir received the Turkish ambassador 'Abd al-Karīm Efendi and informed him that the retrocession of Transcaucasia was a sine qua non of peace On the other hand, prince S D Golitsine was received at Isfahān on May 20–31, 1734 and thereafter by Nādir's order accompanied him everywhere (his itinerary in Lerch Schnese) On the 12th Muharram 1147 (June 17, 1734) Nādir left Isfahan for Ādharbāidjān and as the Turks did not reply, Nadir began by attacking the Daghestān chief [Ghāzī-Kumūk] Surkhāy whom the Porte had appointed governor of Shīrwān Lahmāsp Kuli Djalāyir defeated the Daghestānians near Dawa-batan (in the district of Kabala) while Nādir to cut off the retreat penetrated into the heart of the extremely difficult region of Ghāzī Kumūk In spite of the exploits of the Abdālī the success gained in Daghestān was only partial for Surkhāy had escaped to the north

On 6th Djumādā II (Nov 3, 1734) Nādir was before the walls of Gandja, which was defended by 'Alī Pāshā The siege necessitated considerable works and prince Golitsine procured Russian engineers for Nādir On March 21, 1735 a treaty was signed at Gandja by which Russia and Persia became practically allies

On 1st Muharram 1148 (May 26, 1735) Nādir went first to Kars but the encounter with 'Abd Allāh Pāshā Koprulū-zāde took place near Erīwān on the plain of Baghāwaird, on 26th Muharram (June 18, 1735) the Ottomans were defeated Gandja there upon capitulated on the 17th Safar (July 8) and Tiflis on 22nd Rabī' I (Aug 13)

Nādir returns to Daghestān Via Tiflis [q v], from which 6,000 families were transferred to Khurāsān, Nādir attacked the Lezgī of Djār and Tala (north of the Alazan) The Khān of the Crimea Kaplan Girāy, who had in the meanwhile advanced as far as Darband and had placed his nominees everywhere, withdrew to the Crimea and Nādir endeavoured to pacify Daghestān but Surkhāy still evaded capture

Nādir proclaimed king On 13th Ramadān (Jan 27, 1736) Nādir came to Mughān [q v] where in the meanwhile the governors and notables of the province had assembled It was explained to them that Nādir, having liberated Persia, wished to retire to Khurāsān and that the delegates were free to put the government in the hands of Tahmāsp II or 'Abbās III "who were alive" Nādir finally accepted the crown but on condition that the Persians abandoned the Shī'a practices introduced by Ismā'īl I which were "contrary to the beliefs of Nādir's ancestors" The Persians were to form a fifth orthodox madhhab, placed under the patronage of the Imām Dja'far Sādik A document to this effect was sealed by the assembly The five clauses of the treaty to be proposed to Turkey were next drawn up 1 the Turks were to recognise the new Dja'farī rite, 2 the latter was to be given a place of prayer (rukn) at Mecca, 3 Persia was to send an amīr al-hadjdj every year through Syria, 4 prisoners should be exchanged and 5 ambassadors were to be exchanged after mutual approval of the appointments The formal coronation of Nādir took place on Thursday, 24th Shawwāl 1148

Kandahār This principality in which Husain Khān, brother of Mahmūd, still asserted himself remained the only black spot on the horizon Leaving Isfahān on 2nd Shawwāl (Feb 3, 1737), Nādir was before Kandahār before Nawrūz 1149 (March 1737) and had a new town built on the site of his camp (Surkha Shīr) which was called Nādirābad

Kandahār capitulated on the 2nd Dhu 'l-Ka'da 1150 (March 23, 1738) The citadel was dismantled

Expedition into India So far Nādir's military expeditions had been dictated by a desire to reestablish the old frontiers of the Safawid empire The expedition to India was provoked solely by the attraction of ill-guarded provinces and by the desire to replenish the treasury exhausted by repeated campaigns Ghaznī was occupied on the 22nd Safar 1151 (June 11, 1738), Kābul on 12th Rabī' I (June 30), Djalālabād on 8th Djumādā II (Sept 17) From the neighbourhood of the latter town, the prince Ridā-Kuli was sent back to Persia to act as regent, he and his brother Nasr Allāh were given crowns

Going via Sarčōba Nādir avoided the Khaibar Pass and took prisoner Nasīr-Khān, governor of Pēshāwar On 15th Ramadān (Dec 27) Nādir left this town He next took Lahore and reappointed the local governor Zakarīyā-Khān (a Khurāsānian) (Nasir-Khān also was restored to his post) Leaving Lahore on 26th Shawwāl (Feb 6, 1739) Nādir learned that Muhammad Shāh had reached Karnāl and was in a place between the jungle and the river He succeeded in cutting Muhammad Shāh off from his capital and hastened to attack the reinforcements which Sa'ādat-Khān (a Khurāsānian) was bringing from the province of Oudh Thus began the decisive battle of 15th Dhu 'l Ka'da 1151 (Feb 24, 1739) in which the commander-in-chief Khān Dawrān was mortally wounded and Sa'ādat-Khān captured Nādir and Muhammad Shāh entered the capital where Nadir's name was inserted in the khuṭba and coins struck in his name On the 15th Dhu 'l-Hidjdja (March 26, 1739) a rumour spread that Nadir had been assassinated and the populace massacred 3,000—7,000 of his soldiers Next morning Nādir went to the mosque and gave the signal for the massacre of the inhabitants On 26th Dhu 'l Hidjdja (April 6) Nasr Allāh Mirzā was married to a Mughal princess On 3rd Safar 1152 (May 12, 1739) a great council was held in Dihlī in the course of which Nādir replaced the crown on the head of Muhammad Shāh but the latter had in return to cede to Nadir all the provinces north of the Indus The amount levied by Nādir cannot be estimated According to Ānandrām, who was attached to the vizier's office, it amounted to 6,000,000 rupees in specie and 500,000,000 in jewels and precious stones, including the Kōh-i Nūr diamond and the Peacock throne Large sums were distributed among the soldiers and the people of Persia exempted from taxation for three years

Nādir left Dihlī and reached Kābul on 1st Ramadān (Dec 12) Now took place one of the most remarkable of his expeditions He suddenly turned back to reduce the lord of Sind Khudā-yār Khān 'Abbāsī (a native of Siwī, cf Malcolm, op cit, ii 88) and going via Bangash, Lārkāna and Shahdādpūr penetrated into the desert south of the Indus and took Khudā-yār prisoner, he had shut himself up in ʿUmarkot (north of Thar and Parkar in the province of Bombay) Having organised his Indian possessions in three provinces Nādir returned to Nādir-abād (via Sīwī and Shāl) on 7th Ṣafar (May 5, 1740)

Nādir in Turkestān Nādir returned to Herāt on 10th Rabīʿ I (June 5) and after a fortnight devoted to festivities set out for Balkh which he reached on 7th Djumādā I (July 31) Arriving before Bukhārā on 19th Djumādā II (Sept 22), Nādir treated Khān Abu 'l Faid kindly and renewed his investiture by crowning him with his own hands The Oxus was proclaimed the frontier and the Khān had to supply Nādir with 20,000 Özbegs and Turkomans, which indirectly left in the hands of the conqueror the control of the internal affairs of Bukhārā

On the 16th Radjab (Oct 7), Nādir had set out for Khwārizm The fleet followed the army The Khān II Bars of Hazārasp retired to his fortress of Khanḳāh which surrendered on 24th Shaʿbān after bombardment Finally Khīwa, the capital of the kingdom, also capitulated By 4th Shawwāl (Dec 23) Nādir had returned to Čārdjūy and entered Mashhad at the end of Shawwāl

Nādir sets out again for Transcaucasia While in India, Nādir had learned of the death of his brother Ibrāhīm Khān who had been killed by the Lazgī rebels of Djār and Tala To punish them, Nādir left Mashhad and on his way learned that the Abdālī troops who had been sent in advance had already ravaged Djār, Djawukh (?) and Akzibīr, but the pacification of Daghestān was by no means complete

An incident that followed marks the turning-point in the career of Nādir Shāh On the 28th Safar (May 15, 1741) near Kalʿa-yi Awlād (Māzandarān) an unknown man concealed in the brush wood shot at Nādir, wounding him slightly Connecting this with events in Daghestān Mahdī Khān says that the crime was committed by a slave of the son of Dilāwar Khān Tāimanī [q v] but suspicion very soon turned upon the prince Ridā-Kulī who had besides not behaved well during his regency He was sent for the time to Tihrān while Nādir continued his march via Kazwīn, Karadjadagh, Bardaʿ and Kabala

In June 1741, for the third time, Nādir entered Daghestān and remained there a year and a half The shamkhāl of Tarkhū, the usmī of the Kara-Kaytaḳ and Surkhāy Khān of the Ghāzī Kumūk came over to Nādir but new difficulties kept cropping up Relations with Russia became somewhat strained for the Russian representatives suspected Nādir of designs on the northern Caucasus As a precaution the Russians in May 1742 concentrated 42,000 men at Kizlar (s Butbow, 1 220) Cares were undermining the health and character of Nādir At the beginning of Dec 1742 when the camp was at Bashlu the heir to the throne Ridā-Kulī, denounced by the author of the attempt on Nādir in Māzandarān, was blinded after a form of trial Nādir himself was thoroughly upset by this incident Rebellion was now threatening everywhere (in Khwārizm and in Balkh)

Third campaign against the Turks In Dhu 'l-Kaʿda I 1742, the Turkish ambassador brought from Constantinople a letter from the Sulṭān refusing to recognise the fifth madhhab Nādir then reminded the Sulṭān that the whole of Persian territory had not been regained from Turkey and added that he soon would take the field to make his own terms

Nādir left Daghestān on the 16th Dhu 'l-Hidjdja (Feb 7, 1742) and came to Kirkūk (14th Djumādā II = Aug 5, 1742) which capitulated as did Irbil On the 26th Radjab (Oct 5) Nādir arrived near Mawsil but the siege of this fortress was unsuccessful and on 2nd Ramadān (Oct 20) he retreated to Kirkūk and Khanāḳīn Friendly relations were established with Ahmad Pasha of Baghdād Nādir with his wives made the pilgrimage to the Shiʿī and Sunnī sanctuaries of Mesopotamia and on the 24th Shawwāl 1156 (Dec 12, 1743) summoned a great assembly of ecclesiastics at Nadjaf The document drawn up by Mahdī Khān summing up the discussions confirmed the renunciation by the Persians of the "heresy of Shāh Ismāʿīl", while the ʿulamāʾ of Mesopotamia and Transcaucasia recognised the claims of Djaʿfar al-Sadīk and declared the special features (furūʿāt) of the Persian beliefs compatible with Islām The Sunnī theologian ʿAbd Allāh b Husain al-Suwaidī, Kitāb al Hudjdjadj al-kaṭʿiya li'ttifāḳ al-Firak al-Islāmīya, Cairo 1324, also gives a very interesting summary of this dispute, cf Ritter, Isl, xv, 1926, 1 106 and the detailed account by Prof A E Schmidt, Iz istorii sunnitsko shiitskikh otnoshenii in the ʿIkd al Djumān (Barthold Festschrift, Tashkent 1927, p 69–107)

Rebellions The strange abandonment of the campaign in Mesopotamia is to be explained by the new risings in the east Much more important was the rising in Fārs led by the beglerbegi Takī Khān, a great favourite of Nādir He was ultimately captured and castrated In Astarābād the Kādjārs rose against the oppression of the governor's son (Hanway, Hist Account, 1 192) Nādir had to send his nephew ʿAlī Kulī to Khwārizm Finally the Ottomans of Kars disseminated in Ādharbāidjān letters from the new pretender Safī Mīrzā (Muhammad ʿAlī Rafsindjānī) and then refused to begin an exchange of prisoners

Fourth Campaign against the Turks In the meanwhile the Porte equipped a new army (150,000 horse and 40,000 janissaries) which advanced on Erzerum and Kars under the command of the former vizier Yegen Muhammad Pāsha while ʿAbd Allāh Pāshā Djebedjī's army went via Diyārbakr and Mawsil On the 21st Radjab (Aug 20) came the news of the victory won by Nasr Allāh Mīrzā over ʿAbd Allāh Pāshā's army (near Mawsil) and at the same time Yegen Muhammad Pāshā died leaving his army in complete disorder Nādir again won a brilliant victory (on the very scene of his first victory in 1735) but then, quite unexpectedly, wrote to the Sultān saying he was abandoning the first two clauses of Mughān Personal fatigue may explain why Nādir could not exploit his success

On Sept 4, 1746, peace was signed with the Turkish envoys and on 10th Muharram 1160 (Jan 22, 1747) the Shāh's representatives (Mustafā Khān Shāmlu and the historian Mahdī Khān) set out for Constantinople with the ṣulh nāma Nādir renounced his famous religious clauses in favour of the Sultān, "the Khalīfa of the people of Islām and the glory of the Turkoman race" By the treaty the frontier was restored to that of the time of Murād IV [cf TABRĪZ] but in a platonic fashion, Nādir expressed the wish to receive one of the provinces which had belonged to the "Turkoman Sultāns"

On the 10th Muharram, Nādir left for Kirmān marking his route by piles of skulls erected everywhere After the Nawrūz, Nādir returned to Mashhad and devoted himself to "spilling the blood of the innocents" His conduct was now clearly abnormal In an epilogue to his history written after the death of Nādir, Mahdī Khān records the denunciations, executions and extortions carried out by the agents of the treasury and the ruin of the country, which had however begun before the Indian expedition (Otter, Residents russes, Hanway, i 230) The Shī'ī opposition must also have been intensified in view of the frankly Sunnī turn which Nādir's "Khurāsānian" policy had taken

The rising in Sīstān, which brought matters at a head was provoked by the activities of the tax collectors who were demanding a contribution of 300,000 tumāns from the province 'Alī Kulī Mīrzā, nephew of Nādir, put himself at the head of the rebels Even Lahmāsp Kulī Khān Djalāyir, the most faithful prop of the throne, wanted to proclaim one of Nadir's sons as king The troubles spread to Khurāsān and the Kurds of Khabūshān raided the royal stables at Rādkān Nādir marched on them but on the eve of 11th Djumādā II 1160 (June 20, 1147) he was assassinated in his camp near Fathābād by the Kādjār and Afshār chiefs in conspiracy with the bodyguard Father Bazin was a witness of the disorder which broke out in the camp after the assassination On the 27th Djumādā II (July 5, 1752) 'Alī Kulī Mīrzā came from Herāt and was proclaimed king All the royal princes were massacred

The treasure amassed by Nādir was soon scattered to the winds, the country, utterly exhausted, was in the throes of crisis Nādir's attempts to compose religious difficulties had failed completely, but Persian territory and its periphery were cleared of enemies But for Nādir Shāh, Persia would probably not exist, even in its present bounds

Bibliography Muhammad Muhsin, mustawfī of Nādir, Zubdat al-Tawārīkh, Brit Mus, Or 3498, fol 184a (where Nādir is mentioned as Nā'ib i Ulkā-yi Abīward) — fol 190, Mahdī Khān Astarābādī, Ta'rīkh i Nādirī, a valuable work by the official historiographer (numerous MSS and oriental lithographs uncritically edited), the French translation Histoire de Nadir Chah by W Jones, London 1770 — source of the majority of the later works — completely out of date, Mahdī Khān Astarābādī, Durra-yi Nādira, lithographed at Bombay 1280 (1863), Muhammad Kāzim (wazīr of Marw), Nādirnāma, of this recently discovered work only volumes ii (327 pages folio years 1736–1743) and iii (251 pages folio end of the reign are in the retreat of the Persians from Turkestān) are in the Asiatic Museum of Leningrad, cf Barthold, Izv Akad Nauk, 1919, p 927, and Zap, xxv, p 85 (according to Barthold, this work "by the wealth of its data far surpasses all the other sources not even excepting Mīrzā Mahdī, it will undoubtedly become the fundamental source for the study of the reign")

Shaikh 'Alī Hazīn, Ta'rīkh-i Ahwāl, ed and transl by Belfour, I 1831, p 162—288 (to the year 1154 = 1742, pro Safawid), Khwādja 'Abd al-Karīm Khān Kashmīrī, Bayān al-Wāki', English transl. by F Gladwin, The memoirs of Khojeh Abdulkurreem, Calcutta 1788 (the events before 1739 are omitted in the translation), French transl by Langlès, Voyage de l'Inde à la Mekke, Paris 1797 (transl from the English with further abbreviations), Abu 'l-Hasan b Muhammad Amīn, Mudjmil al-Ta'rīkh-i ba'd-Nādirīya, ed O Mann, Leyden 1891, p 9—21 (death of Nādir), Rādī al-Dīn Tafrashī, History of Persia between 1136 and 1193, Br Mus Add 6787, fol 185—218 on Nādir, cf fol 186b—204, Hasan Fasā'ī, Fārs-nāma-yi Nāsirī (a few documents issued by Nādir)

Indian sources Elliot-Dowson, The History of India, 1877, viii, W Irvine, Later Mughals (1719–1739), 1922, ii Cf also the letter from Nādir announcing his victory in India, Br Mus, Egerton 1004, fol 115—125, Nizām al-Dīn Siyālkōtī, Shāhnāma-yi Nādirī (a poem on the invasion of India, written in 1162), Br Mus, Add 26285 (fol 1—130), letter from Père Saignes (v i), Tamburi Artin (v i), king Iraklī (v i)

Turkish sources Hammer, G O R, chap lxiv —lxvi and lxviii —lxix, cf the edition of 1831, vol vii and viii, 2nd ed, vol iv, French transl, vol iii (from the chronicles of Subhī and of 'Īsī, but especially based on Mahdī Khān and Hanway) Cf the list of 6 Turkish accounts of the campaigns against Nādir in Babinger, G O W, p 289, and ibid, 'Abd al-Razzāk Newres, Tebrīziye-i Hekīm-oghlu 'Alī Pāshā (campaign of 1143 = 1730), Mehmed Rāghib Pāshā, Tahkik we-Tewfīk (negotiations of 1149 = 1736), Sirri, account of the campaign of 1157 = 1744, Nu'mān Sālih-zāde, Tedbīrāt-i pesendide (journey to Hamadān with Ahmad Pasha Kesriyeli in 1160 = 1747)

Armenian sources The Catholicos Abraham of Crete, Mon histoire et celle de Nadir, transl from Armenian by Brosset, Collection d'historiens arméniens, ii, 1876, p 259—338 (eyewitness of the battle of Eghaward and of the election of Nādir in 1736, interesting details on the organisation of the army etc), Akop, Vardapēt of Shamākha, Shaholakan, this MS collection composed in 1743 contains a brief chronicle of the years 1722—1736 (visit of Nādir to Ečmiadzin, battle of Eghaward), cf Ter Avetisian in Bull Kavkaz Istor -Arkheol Institt, I eningrad 1929, N0 5, p 13, Tamburi Aruthiun, Tahmasp kulu khanîn tevarikhi yazîlmîz Istambollu Tamburi Arutunden osmanlî eltisi ile yoldjulughunda Adjemistan tarafları ina (popular Turkish in Armenian characters), Venice 1800, French transl by Yacoub Artin pacha, Journal de Tambouri Aroutine sur la conquête de l'Inde par Nadir Schah, 1735—1740, in Bull de l'Institut Egyptien, 1914, premier fascicule, p 168—232

Georgian and Caucasian sources Essai sur les troubles actuels de Perse et de Georgie, 1754, p 88 and passim, Brosset, Histoire de la Georgie, ii/1, p 129—136 (Nādir's coming to Tiflis), ii/2, p 354—370, Borgé, Akti sobranîye Kawkaz arkheogr komiss, i, Tiflis 1866, p 73—74 three firmāns of Nādir, Butkow, Materiali dlia nowoy istorii Kawkaza (1722—1803), St Petersburg 1869, cf detailed index; Kozubski, Bibliografiya Daghestana, appended to the Annuaire du Daghestān de 1905

Russian sources W. Bratishčow, Izvestiye

o proisshedshikh mezhdu Shahom Nadirom i Reza Kuli mirzoyu pechalnïkh proisshestviyakh v Persii 1741—1742, St Petersburg 1763, 84 pp 16°, J J Lorch, Nachricht von der zweiten Reise nach Persien, in Busching's Magazin, 1776, vol x, p 365–476, Yuzefovič, Dogovorï Rossii s Vostokom, St Petersburg 1869, p xi—xv and 185–207, S M Solowiew, Istoriya Rossii, vol xix —xxii

Contemporary European sources [the works which have not been accessible to me are marked *] Voyages de Basile Vatace en Europe et en Asie (rhymed narrative in modern Greek ed and transl by Legrand) in Nouveaux melanges orientaux, Ecole des Langues Orientales, Paris 1886, p 185—295 Vatace also wrote a Ἱστορία τοῦ σιὰχ Ναδίρ of which there is a synopsis in [Δημήτριος Φιλιππίδης,] Ἱστορία τῆς Ῥουμανίας, 8°, Leipzig 1816, as an appendix to vol ii, p 3—22 (of no importance), Voulton, Verdadeira e exacta Noticia de Thamas Kouli khan da Persia no Imperio do Gram Mogôr, escrita na lingua Persiana em Delhy en 21 IV 1739 e mandada a Roma por Mons Voulton, Lisbon 1740, transl into English by L Lockhart, in Bull of the School of Oriental Studies, iv, 1926, p 223—245, *Le Margne, Vida de Thamas Kouli-Kan, Madrid 1741 (probably a translation), J Spilman, A journey through Russia into Persia in 1739, to which is annexed a summary account [p 51—60] of the rise of the famous Kouli Kan, L 1742, *[Anonymous], The compleat History of Thamas Kouli kan, I (Persian Empire), II (Indostan), 1742, J Fraser, The History of Nadir Shah, London 1742, [Le P du Cerceau], Histoire de Thamas Kouli kan Sophi de Perse, Amsterdam (Arkstée and Merkus) 1740, 2 vol, (Barbier, Dictionnaire des ouvrages anonymes, 1873, ii 736, attributes this work to the Jesuit du Cerceau, author of the Histoire de la derniere revolution de Perse, Paris 1728, based on the narrative of Krusinski), [Anonymous], A genuine history of Nadir Cha with a particular account of his conquest of the Mogul's country, translated from the original Persian MS into Dutch by order of J A Sechterman, president of the Dutch factory at Bengal, and now done into English (this comes down to 1739 and differs from the preceding work), [A de Claustre], Histoire de Thamas Kouli kan, nouveau roi de Perse, ou histoire de la dernere revolution de Perse arrivee en 1732, Paris 1742, republ in 1758 (this compilation by the Lyons priest de Claustre is quite different from the work of du Cerceau, cf Barbier, o l, ii 736) The accounts of the Jesuit fathers are collected in vol iv of the Lettres edifiantes ecrites des Missions Etrangeres, new ed, Paris 1780 (the arrangement of this edition is different from that of the original edition) Relation historique des revolutions de Perse sous Thamas Kouli kan, jusqu'à son expedition dans l'Inde, tiree de differentes lettres écrites de Perse par des Missionaires jesuites, p 169—230 (= 1st ed, vol 25, p 311), lettre du P Saignes (Chandernagor, Feb 10, 1740, on the invasion by Nādir), p 230—264 (= 1st ed, vol 25, p 402), Frère Bazin, Memoires sur les dernières années du règne de Thamas Kouli Kan, p 277—322 (= 1st ed, vol 9, p 14), do, Les révolutions qui suivirent la mort de Thamas Kouli-Kan, p 322—353 (= 1st ed, vol 9, p 83), *[Anonymous], Histoire de Thamas Kouli-Kan, roi de Perse, new ed with supplement, Milan 1747 (reissue of Claustre's work ? ?), Otter, Voyage en Turquie et en Perse (1734—1739), Paris 1748, La Mamye-Clairac, Histoire de Perse depuis le commencement de ce siecle, 3 vol, Paris 1750, J Hanway, A historical account of the British trade on the Caspian sea, 1753, s index, do, The revolutions of Persia, London 1753, ii, p 1—103, containing the history of the celebrated usurper Nadir Kouli from his birth in 1687 till his death in 1747, I di Santa Cecilia, carmelitano scalzo, Palestina, Persia, Mesopotamia, Rome 1753, ii 152, 157, 161—162, 217, iii 39, Col Gentil, Abrege historique des souverains de l'Indoustan, 1772 (MS of the Bibl Nat, Fr 24219)

General surveys Sir J Malcolm, History of Persia, 1815, p 33—108, C R Markham, A general Sketch of the History of Persia, I 1874, p 298—318, Muller, Der Islam im Morgen- und Abendlande, 1887, ii 379—382, C Horn in the Grundriss d Iran Philologie, ii 587—592, Sir P Sykes, A History of Persia, 1915, ii 331—369, F G Browne, A Liter History of Persia, iv 132—138 (following Hanway) All these are obsolete or defective A thesis on Nādir for a doctorate of London is in preparation by I Lockhart Cf also R Stuart Poole, The Coins of the Shahs of Persia, Brit Mus, 1887, p xlix, lxix 72–84 (60 pieces described), R B Whitehead, The Coins of the Durranis and of Nādir Shāh, Oxford 1933, General Kishmishev, Pokhodï Nadir Shaha v Herat, Kandahar, Indiyu sobltiya v Persii posle yego smerti, Tiflis 1889 (Nādir's campaigns from the soldier's point of view, cf Zap, vi, 1892, p 351), Sir Mortimer Durand, Nadir Shah, London 1908 (a novel, with several contemporary illustrations), do, Nadir Shah, in J R A S, 1908, i 286—298 (general sketch), Sa'īd Nafīsī, Akhirin yādigār-i Nādir-shāh, Tihran, Madjalla-yi Shark, 1300, 31 pages (story in dramatic form) The career of Nādir Shāh impressed the imaginations of the peoples whom he conquered In addition to Indian and Persian panegyrics there is a poem in the Gūrānī dialect (spoken in Kurdistān) on Nādir Shāh and Topal 'Othmān Pāshā and a Daghastānian song collected in the district of Ghunib on the highlanders' fight against Nādir (cf Daghestanskii sbornik, Makhač Kal'a, 1927, iii p 51—53) In Europe of the xviiith century it was seriously discussed whether Nādir Shāh was a European adventurer there are also several contemporary works in French, German and Portuguese, the subjects of which are the deeds real or imaginary of Nādir Shāh like L'espion de Thamas Kouli kan dans les cours de l'Europe by the Abbé Rochebrun, Cologne 1746 etc (V Minorsky)

NADIR (Naẓīr al-Samt or al-Naẓīr κατ' ἐξοχήν), the bottom, the pole of the horizon (invisible) under the observer in the direction of the vertical, also the deepest (lowest) point in the sphere of heaven The nadir is the opposite pole to the zenith [q v]

The word naẓīr (from nazara, "to see", "to observe") originally (and generally) means the point diametrically opposite a point on the circumference of a circle or the surface of a sphere, we find mukābal as a synonym of nazīr in this general meaning [cf also MUKĀBALA]

(WILLY HARINER)

NAḌĪR (BANU 'L-), one of the two main Jewish tribes of Madīna, settled in Yathrib from Palestine at an unknown date, as a consequence of Roman pressure after the Jewish wars Al-Ya'kūbī (II 49) says they were a section of the Djudhām Arabs, converted to Judaism and first settled on Mount al-Nadir, whence their name, according to the Sīra Halabīya (Cairo, III 2) they were a truly Jewish tribe, connected with the Jews of Khaibar This seems the more probable, but a certain admixture of Arab blood is possible, like the other Jews of Madina they bore Arabic names, but kept aloof from the Arabs, spoke a peculiar dialect, and had enriched themselves with agriculture, money-lending, business in armour and jewels

They were clients of the Aws, siding with them in their conflicts with the Khazradj, and entering with them into the compact with Muhammad known as the Constitution of Madīna in I A H Their most important chief at this time was Huyayy b Akhtab, whose daughter Safīya became Muhammad's wife in 7 A H For a list of Muhammad's worst enemies among the Banu 'l-Nadir see Ibn Hishām, Sīra, p 351—352

Their fortresses were half a day's march from Madina, and they owned land in Wādī Buthān and Buwaina, their dwelling places were south of the city

The Banu 'l Nadīr seem to have been in (commercial ?) relations with Abū Sufyān before the battle of Uhud In 4 A H, in Rabī' I, owing to difficulties about the Banu 'l Nadīr's contribution to certain blood-money which was being collected from the whole Muslim community in Madina, Muhammad, who had personally negotiated the matter with their chiefs, became convinced of their enmity towards himself and suspected them of intending to kill him He decided to get rid of such dangerous neighbours, and ordered them through Muhammad b Maslama al-Aws to leave the city within ten days, under penalty of death, allowing them to take with them all their movable goods, and to return each year to gather the produce of their palm groves

The tribe, having no hope of help from the Aws, agreed to leave, but 'Abd Allāh b Ubayy al-Khazradji, chief of the munāfikūn, persuaded them to resist in their fortresses, promising to send 2,000 men to their aid Huyayy b Akhtab, hoping the Banū Kuraiza would also help them, prepared to resist, in the face of opposition from moderate elements in the tribe

The siege lasted about a fortnight, help from the munāfikūn was not forthcoming, and when the Muslims began to cut down their palms the Banu 'l-Nadir surrendered Muhammad's conditions were much harder than formerly, their immovable property was forfeited, and nothing left them but what they could take away on camels, arms alone excepted After two days' bargaining the tribe departed with a caravan of 600 camels, some went to Syria, others to Khaibar

The Banu 'l-Nadīr's booty Muhammad did not divide in the usual manner, the land was distributed among the muhādjirūn, so as to relieve the Anṣār of their maintenance, part of it the Prophet kept for himself

Sūrat al-Hashr (lix) was revealed upon the expulsion of the Banu 'l-Nadīr

From Khaibar the exiles planned with the Kuraish the siege of Madina in Dhu 'l-Ka'da 5 A H The treasure of the Banu 'l-Nadīr was captured by Muhammad in Khaibar in 7 A H

Bibliography Caetani, Annali dell' Islam, I A H, § 38, 39, 58, 4 A H, § 10—14, Ibn Hishām, Sīra, p 652—661, Noldeke, Geschichte des Qorāns, p 153, Yākūt, Mu'djam, ed Wustenfeld, I 662—663, 756, Wensinck, Mohammed en de Joden te Medina, p 22, 33 sqq, 156 sqq, R Leszynski, Die Juden in Arabien, Berlin 1910 (V VACCA)

AL NADJAF (MASHHAD 'ALĪ), a town and place of pilgrimage in the 'Irāk 6 miles west of al Kūfa It lies on the edge of the desert on a flat barren eminence from which the name al Nadjaf has been transferred to it (A Musil, The Middle Euphrates, p 35)

According to the usual tradition, the Imām al-Mu'minīn 'Alī b Abī Tālib [q v] was buried near Kūfa, not far from the dam which protected the city from flooding by the Euphrates at the place where the town of al-Nadjaf later arose (Yākūt, Mu'djam, ed Wustenfeld, IV 760), also called Nadjaf al-Kūfa (Zamakhsharī, Lexicon geographicum, ed Salverda de Grave, p 153) Under Umayyad rule the site of the grave near al-Kūfa had to be concealed As a result it was later sought in different places, by many in al-Kūfa itself in a corner above the kibla of the mosque, by others again 2 farsakhs from al-Kūfa (al-Istakhrī, ed de Goeje, B G A, I 82 sq, Ibn Hawkal, ibid, II 163) According to a third story, 'Alī was buried in al-Madīna near Fātima's grave (al-Mas'ūdī, Murūdj al-Dhahab, ed Barbier de Meynard, VIII 289), according to a fourth, at Kasr al-Imāra (Caetani, Annali dell' Islām, X, 1926, p 967 sq, A H 40, § 99) Perhaps then the sanctuary of al-Nadjaf is not the real burial-place but a tomb held in reverence in the pre-Islāmic period, especially as the graves of Adam and Noah were also shown there (Ibn Battūta, Tuhfa, ed Defrémery and Sanguinetti, I 416, G Jacob in A Noldeke, Das Heiligtum al Husains zu Kerbelâ, Berlin 1909, p 38, note 1) It was not till the time of the Hamdānid of al-Mawsil Abu 'l-Haidjā' [see 'ABD ALLĀH B HAMDĀN] that a large kubba was built by him over 'Alī's grave, adorned with precious carpets and curtains and a citadel built there (Ibn Hawkal, op cit, p 163) The Shī'ī Būyid 'Adud al Dawla [q v] in 369 (979–980) built a mausoleum, which was still in existence in the time of Hamd Allāh Mustawfī, and was buried there, as were his sons Sharaf and Bahā' al-Dawla Al-Nadjaf was already a small town with a circumference of 2,500 paces (Ibn al-Athīr, ed Tornberg, VIII 518, Hamd Allāh Mustawfī, Nuzhat al-Kulūb, ed Le Strange, p 32 in the year 366 = 976—977). Hasan b al-Fadl, who died about 414 (1023–24) built the defensive walls of Mashhad 'Alī [(Ibn al-Athīr, IX 154) The Mashhad was burned in 443 (1051—1052) by the fanatical populace of Baghdād but must have been soon rebuilt The Saldjūk sultān Malikshāh and his vizier Nizām al-Mulk who were in Baghdād in 479 (1086–1087) visited the sanctuaries of 'Alī and Ḥusain (Ibn al-Athīr, X 103) The Īlkhān Ghāzān (1295–1304), according to Hamd Allāh Mustawfī, built in al-Nadjaf a Dār al-Siyāda and a dervish monastery (khānkāh) The Mongol governor of Baghdād in 1263 led a canal from the Euphrates to al Nadjaf but it soon became silted up and was only cleared out again in 1508 by order of Shāh Ismāʿīl This canal was originally called Nahr al-Shāh (now al-Kenāʾ) (Lughat al-ʿArab, Baghdād, II, 1930—1931, p 458) This Shiʿī Safawid himself made a pilgrimage to the mashhadān of Kerbelāʾ and al-Nadjaf Sulaimān the Magnificent visited the holy places in 941 (1534—1535) A new canal made in 1793 also soon became silted up, as did the Żerī al-Shaikh and al-Haidarīya canals, the latter of which was made by order of ʿAbd al-Hamīd II In 1912 iron pipes were laid to bring water from the Euphrates to al Nadjaf (Lughat al-ʿArab, II 458 sq, 491) A considerable part of the ʿIrāk with Baghdād, al-Nadjaf and Kerbelāʾ was temporarily conquered by the Persians in 1623

According to the Arab geographers, al-Hīra lay on the eminence of al-Nadjaf (al-Yaʿkūbī, Kitāb al-Buldān, ed de Goeje, B G A, VII 309) Massignon thinks (M I F A O, XXVIII 28, note 1) that al Hīra lay on the site of the present al-Nadjaf, while Musil (The Middle Euphrates, p 35, note 26) places the centre of the ruins of al-Hīra S E of the tell of al-Knēdre which lies halfway between al Kūfa and al Khawarnak Ibn Battūta entered Mashhad ʿAlī which he visited in 726 (1326) through the Bāb al Hadra gate which led straight to the Mashhad He describes the town and sanctuary very fully According to al Yaʿkūbī (loc cit) the ridge on which al Nadjaf stands once formed the shore of the sea which in ancient times came up to here For the number of its inhabitants and its architectural beauty, Ibn Battūta reckoned the town among the most important in the ʿIrāk It has now about 20,000 inhabitants (Persians and Arabs), has a Shiʿī college and celebrated cemetery in the Wādī al Salām Near al-Nadjaf were the monasteries of Dair Mār Fāthiyūn (Yākūt, Muʿdjam, II 693) and Dair Hind al-Kubrāʾ (Yākūt, II 709), also al-Ruhba (5 hours S W of the town, Yākūt, II 762, Musil, The Middle Euphrates, p 110, note 61) and Kasr Abī 'l-Khasīb (Yāḳūt, IV 107) The lake of al Nadjaf marked on many older maps has long since completely dried up (Nolde, Reise nach Innerarabien, p 105)

Bibliography Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, ed Tornberg, index, vol II, p 808 (Mashhad ʿAlī), 817 (al-Nadjaf), al-Tabarī, ed de Goeje, Indices, p 784, Abu 'l-Faradj al-Isfahānī, Kitāb al-Aghānī, Būlāḳ 1323, II 116, V 88, 121, VIII 161, IX 117, XI 24, XXI 125—127, al-Istakhrī, B G A, I 82, Ibn Hawkal, B G A, II 163, al-Maḳdisī, B G A, III 130, Ibn al-Faḳīh, B G A, V 163, 177, 187, Ibn Rusta, B G A, VII 108, al-Yaʿkūbī, B G A, VII 309, Abu 'l-Fidāʾ, ed Reinaud, p 300, transl Guyard, II/II 73, al-Idrīsī, Nuzha, III 6, Ibn Djubair, ed de Goeje, p 210, Yāḳūt, Muʿdjam, ed Wüstenfeld, IV 760, al-Bakrī, Muʿdjam, ed Wüstenfeld, p 164, 302, 354, 364, 573, Ibn Battūta, Tuhfa, ed Defrémery-Sanguinetti, I 414—416, Hamd Allāh Mustawfī al-Kazwīnī, Nuzhat al-Kulūb, ed Le Strange, p 9, 31, 165 sq, 267, Niebuhr, Reisebeschreibung nach Arabien u a umliegenden Ländern, Copenhagen 1778, II 254—264 (inscriptions 263), J B L J Rousseau, Description du pachalik de Bagdad, Paris 1809, p 75—77, Nolde, Reise nach Innerarabien, Braunschweig 1895, p 103—111, M v Oppenheim, Vom Mittelmeer zum Persischen Golf, Berlin 1900, II 137, 274, 281, G I e Strange, The Lands of the Eastern Caliphate, Cambridge 1905 [repr 1930], p 76—78, A Noldeke, Das Heiligtum al-Husains zu Kerbelâ, Berlin 1909 (= Turk. Bibl, XI), passim, H Grothe, Geographische Charakterbilder aus der asiatischen Turkei, Leipzig 1609, p XIII and table LXXV—LXXIX with illustr 132—134, 137, L Massignon, Mission en Mesopotamie (1907—1908), Cairo 1910, I 50b—51b, II 88, note 1, 114, 138, note 3 (= M I F A O, XXVIII, XXXI), G L Bell, Amurath to Amurath, London 1911, p 160, 162, St H Longrigg, Four Centuries of Modern Iraq, Oxford 1925, index, p 372 (Najf), A Musil, The Middle Euphrates, New York 1927, p 35, note 26 (= American Geographical Society, Oriental Explorations and Studies, N° 3) (E HONIGMANN)

BANŪ NADJĀH, a dynasty of Abyssinian Mamlūks at Zabīd [q v] from 412 to 553 (1022—1158) When the last Ziyādī [q v] had been put to death in the vizierate of the Abyssinian Mardjān by one of his Mamlūk governors Nafīs, the other Nadjāh came forward to avenge him After desperate fighting, Nafīs was slain and Nadjāh in Dhu 'l-Kaʿda 412 (Feb 1022) entered Zabīd where he had the vizier built alive into a wall in exact revenge for the Ziyādī As his rival Nafīs had already done, Nadjāh assumed the insignia of royalty, struck his own coins and inserted his own name in the khutba after that of the ʿAbbāsid caliph The latter found himself forced to recognise him under the title al-Muʾayyad Nāsir al-Dīn His kingdom extended over al-Tihāma, while the highlands beyond remained divided up among petty chiefs When among the latter the Sulaihīs [q v] came to considerable power, their relationships with the Banū Nadjāh decisively affected the history of the latter The first Sulaihī ʿAlī is said to have had this first Nadjāh poisoned about 452 (1060) through a slave girl sent him as a present In the confusion that followed, ʿAlī occupied Zabīd itself and Nadjāh's sons fled to the island of Dahlak [q v] While the eldest Muʿarik committed suicide, the other two resolved to regain their lands Saʿīd al-Ahwal and Abu 'l-Tāmī Djaiyāsh, whose lost work al Mufīd fī Akhbār Zabīd was the foundation for ʿUmāra's work (in Kay, see Bibl) Saʿīd made his preparations in a place of concealment in Zabīd and had Djaiyāsh come later, the two then came out openly, fell upon and killed ʿAlī al Sulaihī, who was on a campaign against Mecca, probably in 473 (1081) Zabīd at once recognised Saʿīd as its lord, he had appealed less to the Sunnīs against the Shiʿīs than to the racial feeling of the numerous Abyssinian soldier slaves (anā radjulun minkum wa 'l-ʿizzu ʿizzukum Djaiyāsh in ʿUmāra, p 63, 3—4) But Asmāʾ, the widow of ʿAlī al-Sulaihī who was kept a prisoner in Zabīd, persuaded her son al-Mukarram to relieve the town (475 = 1082—1083) The Nadjāh again escaped to Dahlak In 479 (1086) Saʿīd again returned as ruler but in 481 (1088) was put to death at the instigation of the Sulaihī queen al-Saiyida, the wife of al-Mukarram Djaiyāsh escaped to India with his vizier Khalaf b Tāhir, said to have been an Umaiyad, returned to Zabīd disguised as an Indian, plotted with his compatriots and easily regained power in 482 (1089) With his death in 498 or 500 (1105—1106) disruption set in He himself had had domestic difficulties He executed the kādī Ibn Abī ʿAkāma whose ancestor had come to the country with the first Ziyādī, his former helper Khalaf had to seek refuge in flight A certain degree of strain in his relations with his brother Saʿīd is already evident from Djayyāsh's account and there were fierce family feuds among his descendants His son Fātik I, the son of a girl bought in India, had to defend himself against his half brothers Ibrāhīm and ʿAbd al Wāhid and died young in 503 (1109—1110) The latter's infant son al Mansūr was set aside by his uncles, who were quarrelling with one another, and fled to Sayyida, whose favourite al-Muẓaffar b Abi 'l Barakāt brought him back in 504 (1110—1111) as vassal of the Sulaihīs

On account of the new ruler's minority, events repeated their course under the Ziyādīs The Mamlūk Anīs was Mansūr's vizier and he even assumed royal honours When he attained his majority Mansūr disposed of him by murdering him with his own hand in 517 (1123) after inviting him to the palace Mansūr however was at once poisoned at the instigation of the next vizier Mann Allāh In the following year, the latter defeated under the walls of Zabīd Nadjīb al-Dawla, whom the Fātimids had sent as the Sulaihī power was weakening to restore their suzerainty in the land Mann Allāh had made the boy Fātik II nominal king, the son of Mansūr and a slave girl singer ʿAlam who had been purchased from Anis's estate This woman (d 545 = 1150) endeavoured with great skill to preserve the rights of her house against the encroachments of the viziers and played among the Nadjāh a part similar to that of Sayyida among the Sulaihī In particular she equipped and led regular caravans of pilgrims and thus unconsciously furthered the rise of ʿAlī b Mahdī who was finally to drive her own family from power Mann Allāh in 524 (1130) was killed in his harem through a plot of ʿAlam's His successors were the Mamlūks Ruzaik and then al-Muflih Against the latter ʿAlam put forward her favourites Surūr and Ikbāl, who were however not on good terms In their quarrels the various parties several times brought the petty Arab princes who lived around it against Zabīd Ikbāl had Fātik II poisoned (531 = 1137) As he had no heirs, he was followed by his cousin Fātik III b Muhammad b Fātik I b Djayyāsh The government had been in the hands of Surūr since 529 (1135) His career of indefatigable activity was ended in a mosque in Zabīd on the 12th Radjab 551 (Sept 1, 1156) by an assassin, a "khāridjī" envoy of ʿAlī b Mahdī When the Zaidī Imām al-Mutawakkil Ahmad b Sulaimān was summoned to help them by the Abyssinians, he made it a first condition that Fātik should be deposed and he himself recognised as lord of Zabīd The troops agreed to this but the victory lay with ʿAlī b Mahdī [q v and the article MAHDĪ] On 14th Radjab 554 (Aug 2, 1159) he entered Zabīd

The Banū Ziyād and the Banū Nadjāh continually brought over shiploads of Abyssinian slaves to recruit their troops and thus continued that mixture of races, which already existed before Islām and is still very marked in the Yaman plains These Mamlūks however became a great danger for the Ziyādis and also for the Nadjāh themselves. Djayyāsh had attempted to counteract them with a bodyguard of Turkish Oghuz [cf GHUZZ] But they were not suited to the climate, in particular it was impossible to establish a colony of them there permanently as their children, if they did not die, remained weaklings The Abyssinian admixture was still further increased by the many slave girls, who, particularly when they became mothers, exerted some political influence The enormous harems of the notables created the most complicated family relationships For example the settlement of the estate of the vizier Ruzaik became a notoriously difficult case in the law of inheritence which occupied the ablest fukahā' for years until finally a very aged Hadramawtī found a solution in accordance with the Sharīʿa

Bibliography S the article ZABĪD, esp Kay, also Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt al-Aʿyān, Būlāk 1299, i 153, Husain F Hamdānī, The Life and Times of Queen Sayyidah Arwā the Sulaihid of the Yemen (J C A S, xviii, 1931, p 505—517), E de Zambaur, Manuel de généalogie et de chronologie, Hanover 1927, p 117—118 (R STROTHMANN)

AL NADJĀSHĪ, designation in Arabic of the king of Abyssinia It is a loanword from Aethiopic ነጋሢ "king, prince" etc In Arabic it is sometimes used as a proper noun, sometimes as a nomen appellativum The word is also genuine Arabic, but as such it has the meaning of driver of game It does not occur in the Kur'ān In Hadīth it is the designation of the king of Abyssinia, just as Kaisar [q v], Kisrā [q v] and al Mukawkas [q v] are the designations of the rulers of Rūm, Fāris and Misr In their totality they represent the Great Powers which in the time of Muhammad surrounded the territory of Islām On the fresco in the hall of the castle of Kusair ʿAmra [cf ʿAMRA], dating from the middle of the viiith century A D, al Nadjāshī appears as the fourth of these Powers, the place of the Mukawkas being taken by Roderick the Visigoth

In the Sīra the Nadjāshī occupies a place of some importance, chiefly in connection with the two hidjra's to Abyssinia, with Muhammad's letter persuading him to embrace Islām, with his conversion from Christianity to Islām and with his equipping two ships in behalf of the return of the emigrants to Arabia, amongst whom was Umm Habība, who was to marry Muhammad (A H 7)

These traditions have been critically examined by Grimme, Caetani and Mis Vacca Grimme denied the historical foundation of the traditions concerning Muhammad's letters to the Great Powers Caetani submitted the question to an elaborate enquiry Mrs Vacca reduces the traditions to the following historical facts a the return of Djaʿfar b Abī Tālib from Abyssinia in 7 A H, when Muhammad was besieging Khaibar, b the expedition of ʿAmr b Umaiya in A H 6 in order to reconduct the emigrants from Abyssinia to al-Madīna, c vague traditions concerning the emigration from Makka to Abyssinia To these groups several episodes agglomerated, viz to a the story that Umm Habība, Abū Sufyān's daughter and widow of ʿUbaid Allāh b Djahsh, was asked in marriage by Muhammad and provided with a marriage-gift of 400 dīnārs by the Nadjāshī, to b the story of Muhammad's letter to the Nadjāshī, his embracing Islām and his becoming the intermediary of the conversion of ʿAmr b al-ʿĀs

In Hadīth the Nadjāshī is also mentioned in connection with the story that his death in Ramadān 9 A H was proclaimed, without previous intimation, by Muhammad, who held on the musallā [q v] a funeral service in behalf of this fellow Muslim As his proper name is given Ashama or Adhama b Abhar

The title al Nadjāshī is also given in Arabic literature to later kings of Abyssinia, as may be seen from this article

Bibliography Complete bibliography of the passages in the Sīra in Caetani, Annali dell' Islām, cf index in vol II/II, further esp A H 6, § 45—55, the passages in Hadīth in Wensinck, A Handbook of Early Muh Tradition, s v Nadjāshī and Abyssinia, further H Grimme, Mohammed, I, Munster i W 1892, p 123, V Vacca, Le ambascerie di Maometto ai sovrani, in R S O, x 87 sqq, I ammens, L'âge de Mahomet, in J A, ser x, vol xvii, esp p 244 sq, M Weisweiler, Buntes Prachtgewand (Muh b ʿAbd al-Bākī al-Bukhārī al Makkī, al-Tīrāz al mankūsh fī Mahāsin al-Hubūsh), Hanover 1924, p 48 sqq, Noldeke, Geschichte der Perser und Araber zur Zeit der Sasaniden, Leyden 1879, p 190 sqq, do, Neue Beitrage zur semitischen Sprachwissenschaft, Strassburg 1910, p 59

(A J WENSINCK)

AL NADJĀSHĪ, KAIS B ʿAMR AL-HĀRITHĪ, an Arab poet of the seventh century A D, lived at first in Nadjrān [q v] and quarrelled with ʿAbd al-Rahmān, son of Hassān b Thābit [q v], because the latter had addressed in song a married female relative of Nadjāshī in Medīna After an exchange of lampoons with his opponent from his native place, he met him at the annual fair at Dhu 'l-Madjāz and again in Mecca when ʿAbd al Rahmān not only proved inferior as a poet but suffered bodily injury, so that his aged father had to interfere on his behalf Nadjāshī had a second conflict with Ibn Mukbil, the poet of the Banū ʿAdjlān, he was so unbridled in his defence that the caliph ʿOmar punished him with imprisonment after procuring an opinion on his verses from Hassān and al Hutaʾa After ʿOthmān's assassination, al-Nadjāshī appeared in Kūfa as one of ʿAlī's poets, and for the latter exchanged political lampoons with Muʿāwiya's poets at the battle of Siffīn But his disorderly life lost him the favour of ʿAlī and after a drinking bout in Ramadān he was given the thrashing prescribed by law and put in the pillory After a conflict with Kūfan notables, in which he expressed his wrath at this punishment in satirical verses, he was expelled by ʿAlī and went over to Muʿāwiya He then went back to his native country Yaman and died in Lahdj in the year 40 (669), in which year he wrote a lament on the death of Hasan

Bibliography Zubair b Bakkār, al Muwaffakiyāt, ed Schulthess, in Z D M G, liv 421—474, Ibn Kutaiba, Kitāb al Shiʿr, ed de Goeje, p 183—190, quoting from it ʿAbd al-Kādir al-Baghdādī, Khizānat al-Adab, iv 368, Ibn Hadjar al ʿAsḳalānī, al Iṣāba, iii 1200, al-Dīnawarī, Kitāb al Akhbār al-tiwāl, p 171, 185, 198, other verses in Nasr b Muzāhim, Wakʿat Ṣiffīn, Bairūt 1921, see Z S, iv 18, Rescher, Abriss der arab Literaturgeschichte, i 114

(C BROCKELMANN)

MĪR ʿABD AL-ʿĀL NADJĀT, a Persian poet, born about 1046 (1636—1637), the son of a Husainī Saiyid Mīr Muhammad Muʾmin of Isfahān Little is known of his life Only this much is certain, that he, like many other Persian poets of this time, worked in the offices of different Persian dignitaries For example he was a mustawfī [q v] with Ṣadr Mīrzā Habīb Allāh, later occupied the same office in Astarābād and ended his career in 1126 (1714) after being for many years munshī with the Safawid princes Shāh Sulaimān (1667—1694) and Shāh Sultān Husain (1694—1722) He owes his fame mainly to a long poem Gul u-Kushtī ("Wrestling") which he finished in 1112 (1700—1701) and which deals with the theme of the zūr khāna [q v] still very popular in Persia As the Persian athletes still form a special closed corporation they use a special language (a kind of slang) which is full of the technical terms of their art and is not intelligible to the outsider Nadjāt used these technical terms very skilfully in his poem which makes it very difficult for laymen to understand This produced several commentaries on his work, of which those of Ārzū, Ratan Singh Lakhmī (printed Lucknow 1258) and Gobind rām (lith Morādābād 1884) are the best known Of Nadjāt's contemporaries some did not approve of his peculiar style and thought his poem degraded the poet's art with its vulgar expressions and low humour As a matter of fact, Nadjāt's tone differs considerably from the traditional lofty style of Persian court poetry and approaches the language of the Persian middle classes, this makes his work of considerable importance for the history of the Persian language Besides the poem, we only know of a collection of lyrics by Nadjāt of which there are manuscripts in several libraries (see below)

Bibliography H Ethé, in G I Ph, ii 312, 314, Sachau and Ethé, Catalogue of the Persian MSS in the Bodleian Library, Oxford 1889, N° 1162—1165, V Ivanow, Concise descriptive Catalogue of the Persian MSS in the Curzon Collection, in A S B, Calcutta 1926, N° 284, 285, A Sprenger, A Catalogue of the Library of the King of Oudh, Calcutta 1854, N° 409, J Aumer, Die persischen Hdschr der K Hof- und Staatsbibliothek in Munchen, Munich 1866, N°. 26, Ouseley, Catalogue, No 258, Rieu, Catalogue, N° 821b, Edwards, Catalogue, p 579

(E BERTHELS)

NADJĀTĪ BEY, properly ʿĪsā (Nūh, also given, is not certain), the first great Turkish lyric poet of the pre-classical period, one of the founders of the classical Ottoman poetry Born in Adrianople (Amasia and Kastamūnī are also given), the son of a slave, obviously a Christian prisoner of war for which reason he is called ʿAbd Allāh, the name given to every one, he was adopted by a well-to-do lady of Adrianople, received a good education and was trained by the poet Sāʾilī In spite of the fact that his non Turkish origin was generally known, he was regarded as their equal in every way by the Turks in keeping with their democratic ideas He early came to Kastamūnī and there began his poetic career and soon gained a great reputation His poems are said here and there to bear traces of the Kastamūnī dialect Coming to Constantinople, he at once gained the favour of Sultān Mehmed II by a ḳasīda on winter, in 886 (1481)

he celebrated the accession of Bāyazīd II in a ḳaṣīda and was rewarded by an appointment as secretary in the Dīwān He gained such favour with the Sultān that he was appointed secretary to his eldest son ʿAbd Allāh and was given the title of bey when the prince went to Karamān as governor (muteṣarrif) After the prince's early death (888 = 1483) Nadjātī returned to Constantinople with an elegy on the death of the prince which showed deep emotion After a long interval in which he wrote a great deal but was in continual need, through the influence of Muʾaiyad-Zāde [q v] he became mushāndjī to Bāyazīd's younger son Mahmūd when the latter went to Sārūkhān in 910 (1504) Nadjātī wrote his finest verse while on the staff of this prince, this was the happiest period of his life Mahmūd also died prematurely in 913 (1507) in Manissa, the capital of Sārūkhān, and Nadjātī again lost his patron He returned with a beautiful elegy to Constantinople and finally retired from the service of the court on a modest pension He took a house on the Wefā Maidānī where many friends gathered round him, especially his pupils, the poet and tezkereǧī Edirneli Sehī and the poet Sunʿī Nadjātī died on the 25th Dhu 'l Kaʿda 914 (March 17, 1509) He was buried near his own house, at the monastery of Shaikh Wefā and a tombstone was put up by Sehī for him

He left a Dīwān which he had collected on the advice of Muʾaiyad Zāde and dedicated to prince Mahmūd There is also attributed to him a mesnewī, which is not otherwise known, entitled Munāzara i Gul u Khosrew, also quoted as Laila u Medjnūn and Mihr u Māh Even more uncertain seems to be the existence of the mesnewī mentioned by Sehī Gul u Sabā Nadjātī is also mentioned as a translator of Persian works but his pupil Sehī says nothing of this He is said to have translated for prince Mahmūd the Kīmiyā-i Seʿādet of Imām Ghazālī (the Persian version of the Arabic Ihyāʾ) and the Djāmiʿ al Hikāyāt (properly Djawāmiʿ al-Hikāyāt wa-Lawāmiʿ al Riwāyāt) from the Persian of Djamāl al Dīn al-ʿAwfī

His Dīwān which is still unprinted, gives Nadjātī a very prominent place in Ottoman literature, the Dīwān was regarded as a model for all Ottoman poets Nadjātī, whom Idrīs Bidlīsī in his Hesht Bihisht calls Khosrew i Shuʿarāʾ-i Rūm and others Malik al-Shuʿarāʾ and Tūsī i Rūm (= the Firdawsī of Asia Minor), was regarded as the best poet of Rūm He does not, it is true, reach the heights that Nesīmī does but he surpasses all his predecessors, of whom Ahmad Pasha and Zātī were the greatest, in originality and creative power Only Bākī and Fuzūlī have surpassed him The problem to be solved by Ahmad Pasha, Nadjātī and Zātī was to incorporate completely into Turkish the matter borrowed and translated from Persian literature, which was still felt to be foreign, to adapt Turkish to Perso-Arabic metres and to domesticate fully the Arabic and Persian vocabulary This was a great achievement for the time Nadjātī brought about a great change in the literature as regards outlook, feeling and language In him the age of Sultān Bāyazīd is most clearly reflected Although he is not to be claimed as a very great poet, he was the king of the gild of poets of his time, who started a great literary movement Nadjātī combined a thorough knowledge of Persian with a masterly command of Turkish In the number of his ghazels he far surpasses Bākī His work as a poet of kasidas was original and stimulating He was specially celebrated for his skill in the use of the proverb

Bibliography Hādjdjī Khalīfa, ed Flügel, II 511, III 317, V 285, 347, Latīfī, Tezkere, 1314, p 325—330, Sehī, Hesht Bihisht, 1325, p 75—77, Sidjill-i ʿothmānī, IV 541, Brusalī Mehmed Tāhir, ʿOthmānlī Muʾellifleri, II 435, F Reshīd, Taʾrikh-i Edebiyāt-i ʿothmānīye, I 188—200, do, Terādjim-i Ahwāl i meshāhīr, 1313, p 3—16, Ibrāhīm Nedjmī, Taʾrīkh-i Edebīyāt Dersleri, 1338, I 69—73, Shihāb al Dīn Sulaimān, Taʾrikh-i Edebiyāt-i ʿothmānīye, 1328, p 52—58, Kopruluzāde Mehmed Fuʾād and Shihāb al-Dīn Sulaimān, ʿOthmānlī Taʾrikh-i Edebiyātī, 1332, p 243—247, Muʿallim Nādjī, Esāmī, 1308, p 317, Hammer, G O D, I 162—178, Gibb, H O P, II 93—122, Smirnov, Ocerk istorii Tureckoj literatury, St Petersburg 1891, p 476, do, Obrazcovyya proizvedeniya Osmanskoj literatury, St Petersburg 1903, p 445—448, Rieu, Catalogue, 1888, p 171a, Flugel, Katalog, I 624, Basmadjian, Essai sur l'histoire de la litterature turque, Constantinople 1910, p 44—45

(Th Menzel)

NADJD [See Nedjd]

NADJDA B ʿĀMIR [See Khāridjites]

AL-NADJDJĀR, AL-Husain B Muhammad Abū ʿAbd Allāh, a Murdjī and Djabarī theologian of the period of al-Maʾmūn, a pupil of Bishr al Marīsī whose views were combatted by Abu 'l Hudhail al-ʿAllāf and al Nazzām He probably lived in Bamm where he was a weaver According to him, the divine attributes are identical with the essence and express its negative aspects Vision of God is only possible through a divine act which transforms the eye into the heart by giving it the power of recognition The word of God is created, accident when it is read, body when it is written God who knows from all eternity all worldly things, wills them all, good as well as evil, faith as well as unbelief God has a hidden essence (theory of māhiyā), there is in him a hidden fund of grace (lutf) which would suffice to bring all the infidels back to him Problems of the body and accidents atom = accident, the body then consists of a conglomerate of accidents (= Dirār) which are in juxtaposition without interpenetrating one another (against the mudākhala of al-Nazzām), momentariness of the accidents This orientation of the problem is due to the theocentric tendencies of al Nadjdjār All that takes place in the world comes from the incessant and unrestrained activity of God beside whom there is neither reality nor agent God creates the actions of man He gives his assistance to every good action and shows his desertion of every bad one, this assistance and desertion constitute the faculty of doing which accompanies the action (al-istitāʿa maʿa 'l-fiʿl against the Muʿtazila) The activity of man consists in his appropriation of the divine will (kasb) Man carries out one action only by one istitāʿa the secondary effects (al-muwalladāt) do not depend on man but on God (against the Muʿtazila theory of tawallud) Faith consists in the knowledge of God, of his apostles and his commandments and in the profession of this knowledge by the mouth Faith consists of several qualities (khiṣāl) each of which is an act of obedience (ṭāʿa), complete faith is the sum of all ṭāʿāt Faith may increase but not diminish, it can be completely lost only through unbelief He who commits a heinous sin and dies impenitent is doomed to hell from which he will emerge however, unlike the complete infidel Al-Nadjdjār denied the punishment of the tomb (ʿadhāb al-kabr), probably as a result of his determinism — Al-Nadjdjār like his master Bishr represents the reformed and modified Djahmīya The influence of Muʿtazila theology on this school is manifest, on the other hand, the Muʿtazila itself, especially that of Baghdād, seems to have received certain quite important stimuli from his school in spite of its opposition to it Several of al-Nadjdjār's doctrines are found at a later date in al-Ashʿarī — The Nadjdjārīya flourished in Rayy and Gurgān It was divided into three schools 1 the Burghūthīya, the followers of Muhammad b ʿĪsā Burghūth, 2 the Zaʿfarānīya, the followers of a certain Abū ʿAbd Allāh b al-Zaʿfarānī, 3 the Mustadrika, a reforming party which taught paradoxical doctrines on the divine word

Bibliography al-Fihrist, ed Flugel, p 179 (with a list of his writings), al-Mukaddasī, BGA, iii 37—38, 126, 365, 394—395, al Samʿānī, Ansāb, fol 554a, al Khayyāt, Kitāb al-Intisār, ed Nyberg, s index, al Ashʿarī, Makālāt al Islāmīyīn, ed Ritter, s index, al Baghdādī, Kitāb al-Farḳ, Cairo, p 195–198, 201, al-Shahrastānī, Kitāb al-Milal, ed Cureton, p 61—63 (H S Nyberg)

Muʿallim NĀDJĪ, properly ʿOmer, an important Ottoman author, poet, critic and man of letters, who occupies a special and somewhat hybrid position in the history of the Turkish moderns and has given his name to a whole literary period Born in 1266 (1850) in Constantinople, the third son of a master saddler ʿAlī Agha (not Bey, as some literary historians say), he lost his father at the age of seven The widow Fātime al Zehrā, who was descended from a muhādjir who had come to Constantinople from Rumelia, went to Varna to her brother, the Kalayʿdjī Ahmad Agha The latter in spite of his limited means, made it possible for ʿOmer to be educated at the medrese and ʿOmer's elder brother Sālim gave him considerable assistance ʿOmer devoted himself at first to calligraphy and for his levhas used the makhlas Khulūsī A certain Khōdja Hāfiz aroused in him a fondness for poetry and he took the makhlas Nādjī for his poems (from a passage in the Mukhayyalāt of ʿAzīz ʿAlī Girīdī) He also tried to obtain the title of hāfiz His training in the medrese left a permanent influence on him It was long before he decided to put off the turban and the djubbe The spirit of the mollā and a certain intolerant fanaticism however never left him

In 1284 (1867) Nādjī received an appointment as second master in the Rushdīye school in Varna At an inspection the then mutesarrif of Varna, Kurd Saʿīd Pasha (later Foreign Minister, President of the Council of State and several times an ambassador), made the acquaintance of the intelligent young teacher He took him into his service as secretary, when he was moved to Tulča just before the outbreak of the Russo-Turkish war in 1877, thence he was moved to Tirnowo and later to ʿOsmān Pazarī Nādjī accompanied the much travelled Pasha on his moves and journeys After a brief stay in Constantinople, he went to Yeñi Shehir Fenāri (= Larissa in Thessaly) where Nādjī made the acquaintance of the poet and Mewlewī ʿAwnī Bey, who had a very good knowledge of Persian Nādjī who acted as secretary to the court and judge of investigation had here finally to lay aside the turban When Saʿīd Pasha set out on a nine months' tour of inspection in Asia Minor, the Euphrates and Erzerūm, Nādjī again accompanied him He recorded his impressions in the poem Shām i Gharībān he had abondoned himself with other congenial wits to a life of dissipation at Tawk Pazarī, both earlier and after his return to Constantinople The transfer of the Pasha as wālī of the Aegean islands to Chios, where Nādjī acted as mumayyiz saved him from this Here he was able fully to develop his literary leanings Already in 1292 he had published poems and articles in Vatan in the Tuna newspaper of which some were even reprinted by the Constantinople paper Basiret, such as his Bir Muʿallimīñ Shāgirdānīna Khitābī From Chios he began his association with Ahmad Midhat Efendi who was then editing the Terdjumān i Hakīkat, from his contributions in poetry and prose, which appeared in the Terdjumān over the pseudonym Ahmad Masʿūd and Masʿūd i Kharābātī, a close friendship arose which proved of decisive influence on his future career When Saʿīd Pasha went as ambassador to Berlin, Nādjī declined to go with him, which was much to be regretted in the interests of his literary development He therefore resigned his post in the Foreign Ministry and devoted himself entirely to authorship Midhat gave him the editorship of the newly formed literary section of his paper At the suggestion of Midhat, whose son in-law he had become, he learned French although he was now over 30 When he left the Terdjumān for literary reasons, he undertook the editorship of the Seʿādet newspaper

By his great literary and critical activity, he gained an influence which can hardly be estimated high enough on the intellectual life of Turkey in his time, not least through his position as lecturer on Turkish literature at the Mekteb i Sultānī in Galata Serai and in the law school He became celebrated under the name Muʿallim (teacher) of which he was particularly proud In 1307 (1889) he was appointed by imperial irāde Turkish historiographer, Taʾrīkh-nuwīs i Āl i ʿOsmān, as a reward for his historical poem Ertoghrul Ghāzī But he did not live to do anything serious in this field except an introduction which survives in MS He died on 27th Ramadān 1310 (April 14, 1893), at the age of 43 from heart failure and was buried in the garden of the turbe of Sultān Mahmūd

As a literary figure, Nādjī revealed two aspects On the one hand, he was a fanatical admirer of the old literature out of which he had developed and for which he endeavoured to revive the taste of his milieu by every means, by his modest poetic talent and considerable skill in versification, on the other hand, he seemed in sympathy with the moderns but in view of his convinced belief in the decadence of western culture he had little real understanding of them

Nādjī's services to Turkish prose are undeniable Over 50 years ago he was already writing the prose of the future, a model, clear, simple, style in the language of a master who could not be surpassed Two years before Sezāyī's celebrated Kucuk Sheiler (1309) with its complicated prose, Nādjī gave a classic specimen of simple prose, in his ʿÖmeṙiñ Codjuklughu (1307) which was only properly appreciated and imitated at a much later date In it we find the first suggestions of Turkish realism

The forms not cultivated by the old writers, the story and the drama, he did not, it is true, entirely omit, but apart from autobiographical sketches and a translation from Zola, he wrote no stories and he was a failure as a dramatist In theory, it seemed sufficient to him and his followers to put French stories of crime into the orta oyunu form in order to produce regular Turkish "dramas" Here also he approximated to the moderns but did not reach their level or ability

As a poet and artist he is weak He lacks fervour and creative fancy He lacks that depth of feeling which carries one away, with him everything is trivial and superficial, and he never feels or expresses anything deeply His prose style is simple and easy, the sentences short, the mode of expression concise and clear

His main importance lies in his wide influence as a teacher, which he exercised not so much in the actual class room as through his whole literary activity

As a critic he confines himself to externals and goes no further

Nādjī's prolific versatility is best shown by a list of his works He wrote on many subjects and frequently lacked the time for adequate preparation

Of his poetical works, the most celebrated is the collection Ateṣh-pāre (1300, 2nd edition 1303), which contains 52 poems in the new western manner The best in it are Tewḥid, Kebūter Kuzu, Shām i Ghariben, Nisbin djewāmde bir Wādī, Tezarruʿ, Sedjdjāde, Awdjī — Next come two collections of ghazels in the old style Sheʿīre, 1301 and Furūzān, then three historical poems Hamiyet yakhod Mūsā b Ebi 'l-Ghazān, a description of heroic deeds in Granada in the time of the last king Abū ʿAbd Allāh al-Saghir, Zāt al Nitā lain, the heroic conduct of Esmā, daughter of Abū Bakr, at the siege of Mecca with regard to her son ʿAbd Allāh b Zubair, Ghāzi Turtoghrul Bey, cf above, first printed after his death in Khazine i Funūn, 1310, ii, N° 11, 12 On the Ishʿār-i Shāhane-i ʿosmānīye written in conjunction with A Midhat cf ʿAli Emirī, in I O L, v, N° 27, 1330, p 131, other poetical works are Terdjīʿ Bend or Terkīb Bend, an imitation of Rūhī i Baghdādī and Ziyā Pasha, Takti yakhod ʿArūz Numūnesi, Mesnewī i Muʿallim Nādjī and a collection of fugitive pieces edited by Shaikh Wasfi after Nādjī's death Wādigār-i Nādjī, 1314

Of his prose works the best known and most important is Sunbule (1299 and 1307) The first part contains poems like Kucuk bir Muzhike, which is very important for the development of the Turkish poem, and translations from the French The second part ʿÖmeṙiñ Codjuklughu, gives in unaffected style intimate memories of his childhood up to the age of eight and has several times been translated into German by A Merx, Aus Muallim Nadschi's Sunbule Die Geschichte seiner Kindheit, Berlin 1898, into Russian Vl Gordlevskij, Dètstvo Omara. Aftobiografiteskiye ocerki, Moscow 1914, and into Czeck Jan Rypka, Omarovo Dětstve až do jeho osmého roku, in Bibl Světovo Knihovo, Prag — Memories of his student days were published in the Terdjumān i Hakīkat and entitled Medrese Khāṭreleri, 1302, to the same year belongs Shemendofer Seyāhatī (Medjmūʿa-i Ebu 'l Ziyā, N° 41), also Yazmīsh bulundum, 1301 (letters and verses in simple language), Khurde Furūsh (verses and sayings of Arab and Persian men of letters, 2 parts) — A strongly personal note marks his Demdeme (the title is chosen in allusion to Ekrem's Zemzeme), a criticism of Menmenli Zāde Fāhir's Takdīr-i Elhān, but it is primarily directed against Ekrem and his pronouncements on the stupidity of writing ghazels, it was so personal that its continuation was officially forbidden — Equally vigorous is the criticism of the newspaper Mīzān and its owner Murād Bey in Nādjī's Mudāfaʿa nāme — Translations and commentaries are found in Sāʾibde soz, 1303 (first published in Imdād el Medād verses of the Persian poet Sāʾib-i Tebrīzī with commentary), Sānihāt el ʿArab (over 1,000 Arabic maxims with notes), Sāmihāt el-ʿAdjem (Persian maxims) — Religious in content are Iʿdjāz i Kurʾān, 2nd ed, 1308 (translation of the treatise by Fakhr al Dīn al Rāzī on the Fātihā Esrār i ʿaklīye in the Mefātih el Ghaib, first appeared in the Terdjumān), Taʿlim i Kurʾān, Muʿammā i ilāhī (on the Hurūf-i mukattaʿa at the beginning of certain Sūras), Khulāsāt al-Ilhlās, 1304, the commentary on Sūra cxii (Ikhlās) translated from the Tefsir-i Tebrī, Imsāl i ʿAlī, sayings of the caliph ʿAlī (Kitāb-khāne-i Ebu 'l-Ziyā, N° 1), Hikem al-Rifāʿī (sayings of Sayyid Ahmad al Rifāʿī), Newādir el-Ekābir (wise sayings of Muslim celebrities), ʿUbaidīye, 1305 (Persian originals and translations), Muterdjim, 1304 translations from Arabic, Persian and French, Muhammed Muzafer Medjmūʿasī, 1306 literary essays based on a collected volume in MS by an otherwise unknown M Muzaffar 1279, Numūne i sukhan (an able selection from celebrated authors) — His correspondence Mektūblarim, 1303 and 1311 (correspondence with his friends and pupils), Mukhāberāt we Muhāwerāt, 1311 (correspondence with A Midhat), Shoile boile (correspondence with Shaikh Wasfi), Intikād, 1304 (correspondence with Beshīr Fuʾād on V Hugo) — Works on literary criticism Muʿallim a collection of expositions of his critical theory which had appeared in the Terdjumān and were regarded in their days as of fundamental importance, Medjmūʿa i Muʿallim, 1305—1306 a collection of the literary lectures which he had given in the Sultānī and the Law School (58 in number, N° 1—3 even reached a third edition), Istilāhāt i edebīye, 1307 and 1314, his celebrated masterpiece on literary history, really only concerned with style, also Mekteb i Edeb, 1320 — His important lexicographical works include Kāmūs i ʿosmānī, 1308, only 5 parts, first appeared in the Muruwwet, Lughāt-i Nādjī = Lughāt i ʿosmānīye, 1317 Nādjī only wrote the text as far as art Fetwā, p 832, the remainder p 833—1426 was prepared by his friend Mustedjāb-zāde Ismet Bey — The biographical works ʿOsmānlī Shāʿirleri, 1307, 2 parts (biographies of 13 Ottoman poets), Esāmī, 1308, about 850 somewhat arbitrarily chosen biographies in the style of the old Tezkere's — His only drama Hedī (Hāzım Bey yakhod Hedī), 1326, Terez Rakın, the translation of Zola's Therese Raquin, a promised translation of Fénelon Terbiyet-i Benāt never appeared

The four parts of his much used Taᶜlim-i Kirāᵓet, from 1300 on, were largely responsible for the development and spread of Nādjī's style in the widest circles The first part reached the 31st edition by 1320

Announced but never published were the following Ahenk-i millī, Musāmehāt i Rāghib (on Kodja Rāghib), Ferāᵓid-i taᵓrikhiye, Terdjemeden Terdjeme

Nādjī was a contributor to a number of papers and magazines the Terdjumān-i Hakikat, the Seᶜādet, Wakit, the periodicals Āfāk, Gendj Kalemler, Medād el-Imdād, Codjuk Baghcesi etc

With Nādjī neo classicism came to an end although his followers, especially ᶜAlī Kemāl, made several attempts to revive it again in the Ikdām against H Djāhid and in the Sabāh against Djenāb Shihāb al Dīn The movement did not get beyond these efforts, for his followers were as little able as Nādjī himself to produce works of permanent value The present generation has advanced quite out of Nādjī's world

Bibliography Ismāᶜil Hakkī, ᶜOsmānlī Meshāhīr-i Udebāsī, part I Muᶜallim Nādjī, Istanbul 1311, Mehmed Djelāl, ᶜOsmānlī Edebiyāt Numūneleri, 1312, p 558–559, Lughāt-i Nādjī, 1317, p 1310—1312 (full biography s v Nādjī), Husain Djāhid, Ghaughalarîm, 1326 Muᶜallim Nādjī Goultusi, p 17—34, Ibrāhīm Necmi, Taᵓrikh-i Edebiyāt Dersleri, 1338, II 257—266, Ismāᶜil Habib, Turk Tedjeddud i Edebiyātî Taᵓrikhi, 1340, p 373—395, Ismāᶜil Hikmet, Turk Edebiyātî Taᵓrikhi, Baku 1925, p 545–586, Mehmed Thuraiyā, Sidjill i ᶜosmānī, IV 352, Sāmi, Kāmūs al-Aᶜlām, VI 4541, P Horn, Turkische Moderne, Leipzig 1902, p 41—43, F Kúnos, Oszman-torok nyelvkonyv, Budapest 1905, p 60—61, K J Basmadjian, Essai sur l'histoire de la Litterature Ottomane, Constantinople 1910, p 199—202, Vl Gordlevskij, Ocerki po novoj osmanskoj literaturě, Moscow 1912, p 62—64, Fischer-Muhieddin, Anthologie, 1919, p 5—6, Menzel, Die Turkische Literatur, in Hinnebeg's Kultur der Gegenwart, I, part III, 2, Leipzig 1925, p 306—308

(Th Menzel)

NADJIS (A), impure, opp tāhir, cf TAHĀRA According to the Shāfiᶜī doctrine, as systematised by al-Nawawī (Minhādj, I 36 sqq, cf Ghazālī, al-Wadjīz, I 6 sq), the following are the things impure in themselves (nadjāsāt) wine and other spirituous drinks, dogs, swine, maita, blood and excrements, milk of animals whose flesh is not eaten

Regarding these groups the following may be remarked On wine and other spirituous drinks cf the artt KHAMR and NABĪDH — Dogs are not declared impure in the Kurᵓān, on the contrary, in the description of the sleepers in Sūra XVIII the dog is included (verses 17, 21) In Hadīth, however, the general attitude against dogs is very strong, as may be seen in the art KALB Goldziher considers this change due to an attitude of conscious contrast (mukhālafa) to the estimate of dogs in Parsism It must not, however, be forgotten that the Jews also declared dogs impure animals, just as swine The latter are already declared forbidden food in the Kurᵓān (Sūra XVI 116, VI 146, V. 4, II. 168) — As to maita, cf the article — Blood is mentioned in the Kurᵓān (Sūra XVI 116, VI 146, V 4, II 168) as prohibited food As to the religious background of this prohibition cf the art MAITA — As for excrements and several kinds of secretions of the body, the theory and practice of Jews and Christians sufficiently explain the attitude of Islām in this respect It must also be admitted, though data are very scarce, that in early Arabia religious impurity included some of these things — Details are to be found in the large legal works of each of the madhhabs (cf Bibl)

Of the differences of the schools regarding this subject the most important only may be mentioned Spirituous drinks are not impure according to the Hanafīs [cf NABĪDH] Living swine are not impure according to the Mālikīs — The Shiᶜa adds to the things mentioned above the human corpse and the infidels The human corpse was one of the chief sources of impurity according to Jewish ideas (cf already Numbers, ch XIX) A current in early Islām tending to follow the Jewish customs in ceremonial law was very strong, the Shiᶜī view regarding the human corpse may be a residuum of it — The impurity of infidels is based upon Sūra IX 28, where the polytheists are declared to be filth (nadjas) The Sunnī schools do not follow the Shiᶜa in the exegesis of this verse

The nadjāsāt enumerated above cannot be purified, in contradistinction to things which are defiled only (mutanadjdjis), with the exception of wine, which becomes pure when made into vinegar, and of hides, which are purified by tanning On purification cf the artt TAHĀRA, GHUSL, WUDUᵓ

Bibliography al Fatāwā al-ᶜĀlamgīrīya, I, Calcutta 1828, p 55—67, al Marghīnānī, Kifāya, I, Bombay 1863, p 15 sqq, 41, Khalīl b Ishāk, Mukhtasar, Paris 1318 (1900), p 3 sqq, transl I Guidi, I, Milan 1919, p 9–12, al Ghazālī, al-Wadjīz, Cairo 1317, I 6 sq, al-Nawawī, Minhādj al-Tālibīn, I, Batavia 1882, p 36 sqq, al-Ramlī, Nihāya, Cairo 1304, I 166 sqq, Ibn Hadjar al Haitamī, Tuhfa, Cairo 1282, I 71 sqq, ᶜAbd al Kādir b ᶜOmar al Shaibānī, Dalīl al-Tālib, with comm by Marᶜī b Yūsuf, Cairo 1324—1326, I 11 sqq (Hanbalī), Abu 'l-Kāsim al Muhakkik, Sharāᵓiᶜ al-Islām, Calcutta 1255, I 92 sqq, A Querry, Recueil de lois concernant les musulmans schyites, Paris 1871, p 42 sqq, al Shaᶜrānī, Mizān, Cairo 1279, I 123–128, Th W Juynboll, Handleiding tot de kennis v d mohammedaansche wet, Leyden 1925, p 56, 165 sq, Goldziher, Die Zāhiriten, p 61 sqq, do, Islamisme et Parsisme, in R H R, XLIII 17 sqq, do, La misāsa, in R A, 1908, N° 268, p 23 sqq, A J Wensinck, Die Entstehung der muslimischen Reinheitsgesetzgebung, in Isl, V 62 sqq, do, Handbook of Early Muh Tradition, s v Dogs (A J Wensinck)

NADJM AL-DĪN KUBRĀ, the founder of the order of the Kubrawīya or Dhahabīya, is one of the most striking personalities among the Persian Sūfīs of the XIIth—XIIIth century A D A large number of popular legends are associated with his name, many of which are not yet forgotten at the present day in Central Asia His importance for the development of Sūfism is very considerable and in the long series of his pupils we find many distinguished representatives of Sūfī

teaching Nadjm al-Dīn, whose full name was Ahmad b ʿUmar Abu 'l-Djannāb Nadjm al Dīn al-Kubrā al Khīwakī al Khwārizmī with the honorific title al-Ṭāmmat al-kubrā (the "greatest visitation" Sūra lxxix 34) and Shaikh-i Walī tarāsh (the Shaikh who prepares saints) was born in the town of Khīwak in Khwārizm in 540 (1145), spent his youth in travel during which he met in Egypt the famous Shaikh Rūzbihān al-Wazzān al Misrī He became his murīd and under the supervision of the Shaikh went through a course of most rigid ascetic discipline The youth won the favour of his teacher who gave him his daughter to wife and adopted him as a son Nadjm al Dīn spent some years in Egypt where two sons were born to him One day he heard the lectures on the sunna given by Imām Abū Nasr Hafda in Tabrīz highly praised He at once went off to Tabrīz and studied there under the direction of this theologian who lived in the Khānkāh Zāhida in the Sarmaidān quarter There Nadjm wrote his first theological treatise, a kind of inaugural dissertation entitled Sharḥ al-Sunna wa 'l-Masālih During a disputation which arose out of this work he made the acquaintance of the Shaikh Bābā Faradj Tabrizī under whose influence he decided to give up the study of theology and devote himself entirely to the contemplative life of the mystic Bābā Faradj regarded all learning as something superfluous, in his view true knowledge could only be obtained through divine illumination Nadjm al Dīn soon recognised that he could hardly come any nearer his goal by this route He turned to Shaikh ʿAmmār-i Yasīr who advised him to train as a complete Sūfī in the school of Ismāʿīl Kasrī Nadjm al Dīn received his second khirka at the hands of the latter, a so called khirka i tabarruk ("khirka of blessing") After his return to his first teacher Shaikh Rūzbihān the latter found that he had thoroughly grasped all the depths of Sūfī learning and recommended him to transfer his activities to his native land of Khwārizm Nadjm al-Dīn settled there with his family, built a khānkāh and founded the order of the Kubrawīya or Dhahabīya His teaching met with great success and he soon found himself surrounded by pupils among whom were the most distinguished Sūfīs of the xiiith—xiiith century such as Madjd al Dīn Baghdādī (the Shaikh of the famous poet Farīd al-Dīn ʿAttār), Saʿd al Dīn Hamawī, Bābā Kamāl Djandī, Shaikh Radī' al-Dīn ʿAlī Lālā, Saif al-Dīn Bakharzī, Nadjm al-Dīn Rāzī and many others Bahā' al Dīn Walad, the father of the great Djalāl al-Dīn Rumī, is also said to have been his pupil, but this is hardly possible Nadjm al-Dīn met his death on 10th Djumādā I 618 (July 13, 1226) at the taking of Khwārizm by the Mongols All his biographers are agreed that the Shaikh had gone out to meet the enemy in the open field and met a martyr's death with weapon in hand The Institute for Oriental Research in Leningrad possesses a manuscript in Eastern Turkī entitled Shaikh Nadjm al-Dīn Kubrā ny Shahīd kīlīp Shahr i Khwārizm-ni Kharāb kilghanīnīñ Bayānī (How Shaikh Nadjm al Dīn was martyred and the town of Khwārizm destroyed) It is a kind of historical novel dealing with the last days of Khwārizm and its fall Nadjm al-Dīn appears in it as the protector of the city against the Mongols By his power he makes Khwārizm invisible to the enemy and it only falls into the hands of the conquerors after the Shaikh decides to surrender it It is possible that this book is a version of a Persian biography of Nadjm al-Dīn called Tuhfat al Fukarā' and mentioned by Hādjdjī Khalīfa (i 234)

Nadjm al-Dīn was a prolific writer and left a number of valuable treatises on different questions of Sūfism The greater part of his works are written in Arabic Hādjdjī Khalīfa gives the following list of his works 1 al Usūl al ʿashara (i 339) — a brief exposition of the ten fundamental principles of Sūfism (printed in Constantinople in 1256 with a Turkish commentary), 2 Risāla fi 'l Sulūk (iii 410—411) — or more correctly fi ʿIlm al-Sulūk, described in Ahlwardt N⁰ 3456, 3 Risālat al-Tarīk (iii 418) — in Ahlwardt, N⁰ 3272—3273 fi 'l Turuk (possibly identical with N⁰ 1), 4 Ta wālī ʿ al Tanwir (iv 171) — unknown to me, 5 Fawātih al-Djamāl in Persian — a treatise with this title is given in Flugel, Wiener Katalog, iii 332, except that the latter is described as in Arabic, 6 Luʾmat al-Laʾīm — or with the full title al-Khāʾif al-hāʾim min Luʾmat al-Laʾīm in Ahlwardt N⁰ 3087, 7 Hidāyat al Tālibīn — unknown, 8 Tafsīr — probably the great commentary on the Kurʾān entitled ʿAin al-Hayāt, whose first volume I discovered in the Public Library in Leningrad (see Islamica, vol i, fasc 2—3, p 272) Nadjm al Dīn is also known as a composer of Persian quatrains but it is still very difficult to decide whether the quatrains attributed to him are really his Twenty five of these poems were published in the Comptes-rendus de l'Academie des Sciences de Russie (1924, p 36)

The Sūfī writings of Nadjm al Dīn form a transition from the older Sūfism of the first theorists (the Nishāpūr school of the xth—xith centuries) to the later Sūfism of Ibn al-ʿArabī and his successors (Sadī al-Dīn Kunawī, Fakhr al-Dīn ʿIrākī) Like the earlier theorists Nadjm al Dīn likes to deal especially with the practice of Sūfism, the stations on the way to true knowledge Metaphysical questions however are also considered by him and his works with the writings of Ibn al-ʿArabī form the basis for the further development of philosophical theory in the xiiith century This is not the place to go fully into his conception of Sūfism, but it is not to be doubted that his teaching can hardly be neglected in a careful investigation of the history of the development of Sūfism

Bibliography Safinat al-Awliyāʾ (MS Inst Orient, N⁰ 581, fol 106a), Khazinat al-Asfiyā, Bombay, ii 258, Nafahāt al-Uns, ed Lees, p 480, Tarikh i Guzīda, ed Browne, p 789, Haft Iklim (MS Inst Orient, N⁰ 603bc, fol 462a), Madjālis al-ʿUshshāk, Bombay, p 84 sq , Riyād al-ʿArifin, p 143, Ātashkada, p 303, Tarāʾik al-Hakāʾik, p 48, 149, Madjālis al-Muʾminīn, fol 136b, Raverty, Tabakāt-i Nāṣirī, p 1100, Massignon, al-Hallādj, Bibliography, N⁰ 391, Brockelmann, G A L, i 440, Tadhkirat al Shuʿarāʾ, ed Browne, p 135—136, Browne, Literary History of Persia, ii 438, 489, 491—495, 508, 510 (E BERTHELS)

NADJRĀN, a district (Wādī) and town in northern Yaman, according to others (Ibn Khurdādhbih, B G A, vi 133, 248) in southern Nadjd or in the Hidjāz (Bakrī, Muʿdjam, p 575) The position and course of the Wādī has not been exactly ascertained It rises on the eastern slopes of the Yaman highlands, probably between 43°

nd 44° East Long, and runs, perhaps turning orth at first, mainly in a southeasterly direction ehind 18° and 17° N Lat finally disappearing n the great sand desert The distance from Sanʿā' q v] is put at 6—7 days' journey (E Glaser, kizze der Geschichte und Geographie Arabiens, 1 50), according to Philby's investigations (The Heart of Arabia, II 166 sq), it is seven days' reasonable caravan journey south of Sulaiyil The older idea that the course of the Wādī Nadjrān an N E (or that there was a more northerly twin Wādī Habūna) arose out of the erroneous idea irst finally corrected by Philby (op cit, p 165, 22) that the Wādī Dawāsir, with which the Wādī Nadjrān was wrongly thought to be connected, uns from S W to N E

The Wādī Nadjrān drains a wide area of northern Yaman and ʿAsīr (Hamdānī, Ṣifat Djazīrat al Arab, p 83, 110, 114, 247) It is, and was in ntiquity, celebrated for its fertility Of European ravellers only Joseph Halévy visited it, in the pring of 1870 He describes (Bull de la Soc de Geogr, series VI, vol XIII, p 478) the valley, ome 2 miles broad, as exceedingly fertile and vell cultivated with villages concealed in thick palm-groves Strabo (XVI 781) calls it a peaceful nd rich country To Muslim writers it is a miracle of fertility and wealth, even more so than the Yaman in general, its cereals, vegetables and ruits were unrivalled (Hamdānī, p 199 sq), there were also mines there (Balādhurī, Kitāb Futūḥ al Buldān, p 14) and the staple products of the Yaman, leather and cloth, were also made there To this day in less favoured parts of Arabia hey talk of the prosperity of this Wādī (Philby, op cit, II 226)

The population of the Wādī Nadjrān, according o Philby, is comparatively large, the majority belong to the tribe of Yām But several unelated tribes, often at enmity with one another, hare in the possession of this rich country It was so in the early Muslim period The Banu l-Hārith b Kaʿb, who appear in Hadīth as lords of Nadjrān, were not really such They belong o the large group of tribes Madhhidj, which was represented by other tribes also Their rivals were and are Hamdān tribes (Hamdānī, p 115, 9) among them Hāshid, important at the present day, subdivisions Yām etc) and Bakil (subdivisions Shākir etc), other tribes like al Azd, al-Afʿā etc should also be mentioned We have no reliable nformation about places with a settled population n the eastern part of the Wādī, Halévy visited village of Makhlaf which was afterwards put on the maps at hazard In the immediate vicinity was another village Ridjla, and an hour to the west Madīnat al Khudūd (see below) The Arab geographers mention villages (kurā) of Nadjrān and the names of some of them are given as well as those of districts, tributary wādīs, hills and springs

Through Nadjrān runs the very old caravan road from Hadramawt through the Hidjāz to the eastern Mediterranean [cf MAR'IB] Nadjrān was of some importance as the last station in the Yaman on a caravan route from the Yaman to al-Yamāma and thence to Bahrain and the ʿIrāk During Persian rule in the Yaman and later in the ʿAbbāsid period this road must have been of no less importance than the one just mentioned to Syria, which latter however owing to its importance in the early period of Islām is almost alone mentioned in Muslim literature (A Moberg, The Book of the Himyarites, p lxi, cf also M Hartmann, Die südarab Frage, p 496, 509) On the stations on the road see Ibn Khurdādhbih (B G A, VI p 152 sq and 193, A Sprenger, Post- und Reiserouten, p 134—139) A series of forts served to keep it safe (Sprenger, op cit, p 138, Hamadhānī, B G A, p 28, Yākūt, Muʿdjam, IV, p 541 s v al Mushakkar and thereon Lyall, Mufaddalīyāt, II, p 105) On the present importance of the road and of Nadjrān, see Philby, op cit, II 226 The road in those days probably went several days' journey across the desert to the Wādī Dawāsir, which was the first station on the other side, at the present day Sulaiyil [q v] corresponds to it This road via Nadjrān was certainly that which connected the Yaman at different times with the ancient Babylonia in the east, with Syriac Christian as well as with Iranian culture

Little is known of the town of Nadjrān Ptolemy mentions it as a metropolis Aelius Gallus attacked it and destroyed it (Strabo, loc cit, Pliny, VI 28 [32]) From this Glaser (loc cit, II 50, cf p 224) concludes that there was no town of Nadjrān after this but the existence of the town is proved in many ways for various later periods (see below) Now however, no town seems to bear the name Halévy thought he had found the ruins of the old town in Madīnat al Khudūd (see below), which he describes as considerable ruins on the south bank of the river bed Of the city wall roughly built of granite the south and west sides were less destroyed than the others A mosque, which still stood among the ruins, belonged, according to local tradition, to the early Muslim or even pre-Islāmic period (JA, ser VI, vol XIX, p 90 and 40) In remarkable agreement with this, Bakrī, Muʿdjam, p 80 says "Al Ukhdūd, which is mentioned in the Kurʾān, was in one of the towns of Nadjrān This city however is now in ruins and nothing is left of it but the mosque which ʿOmar b al Khattāb built"

On the history of Nadjrān we have only scanty and mainly legendary notes The name occurs several times in the South Arabian inscriptions there is one (C I S, IV, N° 363) reference to the "towns" of Nadjrān (ahgār N, cf above kurā N) This means the Wādī In the oldest inscription of north Arabia, the Namāra inscription of the year 328, the name is also found

In the tradition of the introduction of Christianity into the Yaman, Nadjrān plays a part in keeping with its importance for the communications between Yaman and Mesopotamia (see above) According to one reference (Histoire Nestorienne, ed Addai Scher, I 218 sq = Patrol Orient, IV 330), it was a merchant of Nadjrān who first spread Christianity there after he had been converted in al-Hīra Christianity is said to have received a further impetus in the time of Justinian from monophysite Christians who, expelled from Byzantine territory, came to al-Nadjrān also via Hīra (op cit, II/1 51 sq)

The Christian tradition of later persecutions of the Christians in South Arabia connected with Abyssinian invasions of the Yaman is widely disseminated, Nadjrān was the principal scene of these, first perhaps under Sharahbīl Yakkuf in the last third of the fifth century, notably under Dhū Nuwās, who died in 525 On this tradition which exists in many forms, Greek, Syriac and Ethiopic, see A Moberg, The Book of the Himyarites, p xxiv —lxiii, where the sources and other literature to be consulted are given

Arabic literature has also something to say about these happenings, especially in the annotations of the Kur'ānic exegists on Sūra lxxxv 4 sqq on the Aṣḥāb al-Ukhdūd But what there is of historical value in this Muslim tradition comes from Christian sources, only it is usually so distorted as to be almost unrecognisable What it records regarding the introduction of Christianity into Nadjrān by a certain Ḥaimiyūn or ʿAbd Allāh b al Ṯāmir is on the other hand a distortion of certain episodes in a Syriac Christian cycle of legends about the Persian martyrs Pethion and Yazdin and has really nothing to do with Nadjrān or Arabia (A Moberg, Über einige christliche Legenden in der islāmischen Tradition, p 5, 11 sq, 22, 30 and the references given) The name Madīnat al-Khudūd from the ancient Nadjrān is of course the result of the localisation of al-Ukhdūd in Nadjrān Hamdānī (op cit, p 67, 169) mentions in the same region a Balad or town of al-Ukhdūd, C van Arendonk mentions a hill Ukhdūd (De opkomst van het zaidietische Imamaat in Yemen, p 168)

It is not till the time of Muhammad and the early Caliphs that we have really historical references to the Yaman and even these have to be critically used We are told that Khālid was sent with 400 horsemen to the Banu 'l-Ḥārith b Kaʿb (and the Banū ʿAbd al-Madān Ibn Saʿd, II/i 112, 5) in Nadjrān and made them adopt Islām and send an embassy in homage to the Prophet (Ibn Hishām, p 958, Ibn Saʿd, I/ii 72) ʿAmr b Ḥazm was appointed ʿāmil in Nadjrān and ʿAlī was ordered to collect the ṣadaḳāt there (Wāḳidī Wellhausen, p 417 sqq, Ibn Saʿd, II/i 122) In addition to pagans and Jews there were many Christians there who formed, it seems, an autonomous community Muhammad received an embassy from them also and concluded a treaty with them which guaranteed the possession of their property and the free exercise of their religion in return for a fixed contribution on their part (Ibn Hishām, p 401 sqq, Ibn Saʿd, I/ii 84 sq, 35 sq) This treaty was confirmed by Abū Bakr and ʿOmar ʿOmar however at a later date drove the Christians and Jews out of the Arabian peninsula whereupon the Christians founded a new Nadjrān in the ʿIrāḳ, two days' journey south of Kūfa The details are variously recorded and it is not quite clear to what extent ʿOmar's orders were actually enforced Bakrī (op cit) says that the Jews and Christians in Nadjrān were not at all affected by the measure In any case, at a much later date (see just below), there were not a few Christians in Nadjrān and there are of course still many Jews in the Yaman In the year 40 A H Nadjrān was burned by Djarīra, ʿAlī's general (Tabarī, I 3452) The scantiness of the historical tradition, fantastic accounts of the wealth of the region and the remarkable liberty enjoyed by Christians in Nadjrān gave rise to legends and inspired poets The "material" which thus arose is very fully detailed and utilised in H Lammens, Le Califat de Yazid Ier (M F O B, V/ii, p 327—369)

In the end we find Nadjrān an important fortified town, often simply called al Ḥadjar (cf Hamdānī, p 86), mentioned in the accounts of the fighting which led to the creation of the Zaidī imāmate in the Yaman in the third century A H At this period there were still Christians and Jews there, who were obviously still an important element and enjoyed considerable consideration from their Muslim neighbours (van Arendonk, op cit, p 128 sq) On bishops of the Nadjrānians or in the Yaman in the ixth and xth century from Syrian sources see Moberg, The Book of the Himyarites, p liv

The tribes of Nadjrān submitted to Turkish rule as little as those of eastern and northern Yaman generally Nadjrān now belongs to the kingdom of Ibn Saʿūd

On other places Nadjrān see Yāḳūt, IV 751, 757 sqq, Hamdānī, p 85

Bibliography given in the article and in some of the works quoted there, on the history of especially Balādhurī, Futūḥ, p 64–68, Caetani, Annali dell' Islām, II/i, p 312 sq, 317 sqq, 321 sq, 349—353, IV 350–359

(A Moberg)

NAFAḲA [See Nikāḥ Ṭalāḳ]

AL NAFIʿ [See Allāh, II]

NĀFIʿ B AL-AZRAḲ AL Ḥanafī AL Ḥanzalī, Abū Rāshid, according to some sources, the son of a freed blacksmith of Greek origin (Balādhurī, ed de Goeje, p 56), chief of the extreme Khāridjites [q v], who after him are called Azrakites [q v] At first, after his secession to Ahwāz, Nāfiʿ joined ʿAbd Allāh b al-Zubair [q v] in Makka Soon, however, he and his followers turned their backs on the holy city and arrived before Basra, where they spread terror among the inhabitants, who left the town in multitudes Al-Muhallab, however, succeeded in driving them back to Persia They made a halt in Ahwāz, where they practised istiʿrāḍ, in accord with their doctrine The bloody battle of Dūlāb, fought against Muslim b ʿUbais, put an end to his life (64 or 65 = 683—684)

His special doctrine comprised the following points 1 secession (barāʾa) from the quietists (al-kaʿada), 2 examination (miḥna) of those who wanted to join his encampment, 3 declaring infidels those who did not perform hidjra to him, 4 declaring it allowed to kill the wives and children of opponents This is al Ashʿarī's enumeration, which differs slightly from that of al Shahrastānī (p 90)

Bibliography al Ashʿarī, Makālāt al Islāmiyyin, ed Ritter, Istanbul 1929, p 86 sqq, ʿAbd al Kāhir al Baghdādī, Kitāb al Farḳ bain al-Firaḳ, Cairo 1328, p 62—67, Ibn Ḥazm, Kitāb al-Fiṣal wa 'l-Milal wa 'l-Niḥal, Cairo 1321, IV 189, al Shahrastānī, ed Cureton, p 89—91, al-Ṭabarī, ed de Goeje, indices, s v, Ahlwardt, Anonyme arabische Chronik, p 78 sqq, 90 sqq, Balādhurī, ed de Goeje, p 56, Abū Ḥanīfa al-Dinawarī, ed Guirgass and Kratchkovsky, p 279, 282, 284, Masʿūdī, Murūdj, Paris ed, V 229, Yāḳūt, ed Wustenfeld, II 574, 623, al-Mubarrad, al Kāmil, ed Wright, index, s v (p 943), Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, ed Tornberg, index, s v, al Yaʿḳūbī, ed Houtsma, II 317, 324, M Th Houtsma, De strijd over het dogma in den Islâm, Leyden 1875, p 28 sq, Wellhausen, Die religiös-politischen Oppositionsparteien, in Abh G W Gott, N S, V 2, 1901, p 28 sq, 32, R E Brünnow, Die Charidschiten unter den ersten Omaiyaden, Leyden 1884, Caetani, Chronographia islamica, p 762, G Weil, Geschichte der Chalifen, index, s v

(A J Wensinck)

NĀFILA (A), plur nawāfil, part art fem I from n f-l, supererogatory work

1 The word occurs in the Kur'ān in two places Sūra xxi 72 runs "And we bestowed on him [viz Ibrāhīm] Isaac and Jacob as additional gift" (nāfilatan) In Sūra xvii 81 it is used in combination with the vigils, thus "And perform vigils during a part of the night, reciting the Kur'ān, as a nāfila for thee"

In hadīth it is frequently used in this sense "Forgiveness of sins past and future was granted him [Muhammad] and his works were to him as supererogatory works" (Ahmad b Hanbal, vi 250) — In another tradition it is said with reference to the month of Ramadān, that Allāh "writes down its wages and its nawāfil even before its beginning" (Ahmad b Hanbal, ii 524) Of peculiar importance, also in a different respect, is the following hadīth kudsī "When My servant seeks to approach to Me through supererogatory works, I finally love him And when I love him I become the hearing through which he heareth, the sight through which he seeth, the hand with which he graspeth, the foot with which he walketh" etc (al-Bukhārī, Riḳāḳ, bāb 38)

Finally the following tradition may be translated "Whoso performs the wudū' [q v] in this way [viz in the way described in the foregoing part of the tradition], receives forgiveness of past sins and his ṣalāt and his walking to the mosque are for him as a nāfila" (Muslim, Ṭahāra, trad 8, Mālik, Ṭahāra, trad 30) In the parallel tradition (Muslim, loc cit, trad 7), the term used is kaffāra "expiation" — This parallelism is an indication of the effect ascribed to supererogatory works in Muslim theology, viz the expiation of light sins (cf al-Nawawī on Muslim, Cairo 1283, i 308)

Further it must be observed that in theological terminology nāfila is often applied to those works which are supererogatory in the plain sense, in contradistinction to other works which have become a regular practice The latter are called sunna mu'akkada, the former nāfila or sunna zā'ida (cf infra, sub 2)

The place of supererogatory works in theology is further accurately defined in the Waṣīyat Abī Ḥanīfa, art 7 "We confess that works are of three kinds, obligatory, supererogatory and sinful The first category is in accordance with Allāh's will, desire, good pleasure, decision, decree, creation, judgment, knowledge, guidance and writing on the preserved table The second category is not in accordance with Allāh's commandment yet according to His will, desire" etc

The term for supererogatory works used here is not nāfila, but faḍīla

2 Nāfila is used in hadīth especially as a designation of the supererogatory ṣalāt (Bukhārī, 'Īdain, bāb 11, Tahaḏḏud, bāb 5, 27) Sometimes it appears in the combinations salāt al nāfila (Ibn Mādja, Ikāma, bāb 203) and ṣalāt al nawāfil (Bukhārī, Tahaḏḏud, bāb 36)

In fikh this terminology is often, but not always followed, the other term for the supererogatory salāts being salāt al taṭawwu' (e g Abū Ishāk al Shīrāzī, Kitāb al-Tanbīh, ed A W T Juynboll, p 26), a term that goes back to the Kur'ān (Sūra ii 153, 180, ix 80), and which occurs also in canonical hadīth (Abū Dāwūd has a Kitāb al-Taṭawwu' in his Sunan) The whole class of supererogatory ṣalāts is called nawāfil as well as sunan Nawāfil, as a general designation of supererogatory ṣalāts, covers three subdivisions The following juxta-positions may give a survey of the terminology

Nawāfil (Fatāwī 'Ālamgīrīya, i 156, Hanafī)	sunna	Nawāfil (Khalīl, transl, Guidi, p 95, Mālikī)	sunna
	mandūba		mu'akkada
	tatawwu'		mandūba
Sunan (Fagnan, Additions, p 23, Mālikī)	mu'akkada	Nawāfil (Ghazālī, Ihyā', i 174, Shāfi'ī)	sunna
	raghība		mustahabba
	nāfila		tatawwu'

It may be added that the term rawātib is used especially for the supererogatory salāts preceding or following the maktūba, they belong to the first subdivision

In Shi'ī fikh nawāfil is the widest term, by muraghghabāt the daily and non daily supererogatory prayers are designated

Bibliography Wasiyat Abī Ḥanīfa, Haidarābād 1321, p 8—10, Sell, The Faith of Islam, London 1888, p 199, Wensinck, The Muslim Creed, Cambridge 1931, p 126, 142 sqq, Th W Juynboll, Handleiding tot de kennis v d Moh wet, Leyden 1925, p 382 sq, al Ghazālī, Ihyā' 'Ulūm al-Dīn, Cairo 1302, i 174 sqq, al-Nawawī, Minhādj al-Ṭālibīn, Batavia 1882, i 121 sqq, Khalīl b Ishāk, Il Muḫtaṣar, transl I Guidi, i, Milan 1919, p 20, note 55, p 95, Fagnan, Additions aux dictionnaires arabes, Algiers–Paris 1923, s v, Abu 'l-Kāsim al-Muhakkik, Kitāb Sharā'i' al Islām, Calcutta 1255, i 25, 51, transl Querry, i 49 sq, 52 sq, 100 sqq Further the artt KHAṬĪ'A, ṢALĀT, III

(A J WENSINCK)

AL-SAIYIDA NAFĪSA, a mausoleum outside Cairo, south of the Mosque of Ahmad b Tūlūn in the direction of the sepulchral mosque of al-Shāfi'ī Among the female saints [cf WALI] in Cairo next to Saiyida Zainab bint Muhammad [q v] and "Sitt Sekina" (Sukaina) "Sitt Nefisa" takes a very prominent place In the official recitations of the Kur'ān, al-Saiyida Nafīsa, where the reading is held on Sundays, takes third place among them all, immediately after Imām al Shāfi'ī and Imām al Husainī (see Bergstrasser, in Isl, xxi [1933], 110 sq) The sanctuary is visited by both men and women, especially in the evening The door leading to the sarcophagus itself is only opened once a year The foundation contains a number of other buildings besides a mosque, including a library and Sūfī cells The land around it is a much sought after place of interment

Nafīsa was a daughter of al-Hasan b Zaid b al-Hasan [q v] She came to Egypt with her husband Ishāk al-Mu'tamin, a son of Dja'far al-Sādik [q v] She had a reputation for learning and piety Shāfi'ī frequently visited her to collect traditions, on his death, his body was brought to her house so that she might say the prayer for the dead over him She had children but her descendants soon died out She herself died in

Ramadān 208 (beg of 824) Legend credits her with great karāma [q v], for example as is told of several Egyptian, and not only Muslim saints, it is said that her prayers produced a great rising of the Nile in a single night In contradiction of a story that her husband wanted to take her body to the family burialplace in the al Bakī' [q v] cemetery in Medīna but was prevented by her devotees, is the general opinion that this is her tomb which she built with her own hands and in which she read the Kur'ān long before her death — Several rulers took part in the development of the sanctuary, 'Abbāsids and later Fātimids and Ottoman governors The cupola over the grave was restored by the caliph al Hāfiẓ in 532 (1138) and the mosque in 693—694 (1294—1295) by the Mamlūk al Malik al-Nāṣir Muhammad b Kalā'ūn

Bibliography Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt al-A'yān, Būlāk 1299, II 238 sq , Abu 'l Maḥāsin al-Taghrībirdī, al-Nudjūm al-zāhira, Cairo 1349, II 185 sq , al-Suyūṭī, Husn al Muḥāḍara, Cairo 1299, I 292 sq , Ibn Iyās, Badā'i' al Zuhūr, Būlāk 1311—1312, I 34 — On the history of the building cf the references in Makrizī, Sakhāwī, Djabartī etc and their continuation in 'Alī Mubārak, al Khiṭaṭ al-djadīda al tawfīkīya, Būlāk 1305—1306, V 133—137

(R Strothmann)

NAFS [1]) (A), soul Nafs, in the early Arabic poetry, meant the self or person, while rūḥ meant breath and wind Beginning with the Kur'ān nafs also means soul, and rūḥ means a special angel messenger and a special divine quality Only in post-Kur'ānic literature are nafs and rūḥ equated and both applied to the human spirit, angels and djinn

I The Kur'ānic uses Al Nafs and its plurals anfus and nufūs have five uses 1 In most cases they mean the human self or person, e g, III 54 "Let us call ourselves and your selves", also XII 54, II 20, 21 2 In six verses nafs refers to Allāh V 116*b* "Thou [Allāh] dost know what is in myself [says 'Īsā], but I do not know what is in Thyself (nafsika)", also III 27, 28, VI 12, 54 and XX 43 3 One reference, XXV 4 (cf XIII 17), is to gods "They [ālihа] do not possess for themselves (anfusihim) any harm or benefit at all!" 4 In VI 130 the plural is used twice to refer to the company of men and djinn "We have witnessed against ourselves (anfusinā)" 5 It means the human soul VI 93 "While the angels stretch forth their hands [saying,] Send forth your souls (anfus)", also I 15, LXIV 16, LXXIX 40, etc This soul has three characteristics a It is ammāra, commanding to evil (XII 53) Like the Hebrew nefesh the basal idea is "the physical appetite", in Pauline usage ψυχή, and in the English New Testament "flesh" It whispers (L 15), and is associated with al-hawā, which, in the sense of "desire", is always evil It must be restrained (LXXIX 40) and made patient (XVIII 27) and its greed must be feared (LIX 9*b*) b The nafs is lawwāma, i e, it upbraids (LXXV 2), the souls (anfus) of deserters are straitened (IX 119) c The soul is addressed as mutma'inna, tranquil (LXXXIX 27) These three terms form the basis of much of the later Muslim ethics and psychology It is noteworthy that nafs is not used in connection with the angels

B Rūḥ has five uses 1 Allāh blew (nafakha) of His rūḥ, a into Adam, giving life to Adam's body (XV 29, XXXVIII 72, XXXII 8), and b into Maryam for the conception of 'Īsā (XXI 91 and LXVI 12) Here rūḥ equates with rīḥ and means the "breath of life" (cf Gen II 7), the creation of which belongs to Allāh 2 Four verses connect rūḥ with the amr of Allāh, and the meanings of both rūḥ and amr are disputed a In XVII 87, it is stated "They ask thee [O Muhammad] about al-rūḥ, say al-rūḥ min amri rabbī, and ye are brought but little knowledge" b In XVI 2, Allāh sends down the angels with al rūḥ min amrihi upon whomsoever He wills of His creatures to say "Warn that the fact is, There is no God but Me, so fear" c In XL 15, Allāh "cast al-rūḥ min amrihi upon whomsoever He wills of His creatures to give warning" d In XLII 52 "We revealed (awhainā) to thee [O Muhammad] rūḥan min amrinā, thou knewest not what the book was, nor the faith, but We made it to be a light by which We guide whomsoever We will of Our creatures" Whatever meanings amr and min may have, the contexts connect al-rūḥ in a with knowledge, in b with angels and creatures, to give warning, in c with creatures, for warning, and in d with Muhammad, for knowledge, faith, light and guidance Therefore this rūḥ is special equipment from Allāh for prophetic service It reminds forcibly of Bezalel, who was "filled with the spirit of God in wisdom, in understanding and in knowledge" (Exodus XXXV 30, 31) 3 In IV 169, 'Īsā is called a rūḥ from Allāh 4 In XCVII 4, LXXVIII 38 and LXX 4, al rūḥ is an associate of the angels 5 In XXVI 193, al-rūḥ al amīn, the faithful rūḥ, comes down upon Muhammad's heart to reveal the Kur'ān In XIX 17, Allāh sends to Maryam "Our rūḥ", who appears to her as a well made man In XVI 104, rūḥ al-kudus sent the Kur'ān to establish believers Three other passages state that Allāh helps 'Īsā with rūḥ al-kudus (II 81, II 254 and V 109) This interrelation of service and title imply the identity of this angelic messenger, who may be also the rūḥ of 4 Thus in the Kur'ān rūḥ does not mean angels in general, nor man's self or person, nor his soul or spirit The plural does not occur

C Nafas, breath and wind, cognate to nafs in root and to rūḥ in some of its meanings, does not occur in the Kur'ān, but is used in the early poetry (F Krenkow, The Poems of Tufail and at Tirimmāh, London 1927, p 32) The verb tanaffasa (Sūra LXXXI 18) is derived from that meaning, while the only other Kur'ānic forms from the same radicals are falyatanāfasi 'l-mutanāfisūna (LXXXIII 26) and are derived in al-Tabarī, Djāmi' al Bayān, Cairo 1321, XXX 57, probably correctly, from nafisa, "he desired"

II The Umaiyad poetry first uses rūḥ for the human soul (Kitāb al-Aghānī, ed 1285, XVI 126, last line, Cheikho, Le Christianisme, Beirūt 1923, p 338) where the Kur'ān had used nafs as in N° 5 above

III Of the early collections of traditions, Mālik's al-Muwaṭṭa', Cairo 1339, I 126 uses nasama, which does not occur in the Kur'ān, and nafs (II 262) for the soul or spirit, while Ibn Hanbal's Musnad uses nasam (VI 424), nafs (I 297, II 364, VI 140) and nafs and rūḥ (IV 287, 296)

1) For the sake of convenience in this article rūḥ is treated as well

Muslim's al-Ṣaḥīḥ (Constantinople 1331), VIII 44, 162 sq and al-Bukhārī's al-Ṣaḥīḥ, Cairo 1314, IV 133, both use rūḥ and arwāḥ for the human spirit.

IV The Tādj al-ʿArūs (IV 260) lists 15 meanings for nafs and adds two others from the Lisān al-ʿArab, as follows spirit, blood, body, evil eye, presence, specific reality, self, tan, haughtiness, self-magnification, purpose, disdain, the absent, desire, punishment, brother, man It states that most of these meanings are metaphorical The Lisān (VIII 119—126) finds examples of these meanings in the poetry and the Kur'ān Lane's Lexicon faithfully reproduces the material (p 2827*b*) The lexical treatments of nafs disclose these facts 1 Any attribution to Allāh of nafs as "soul" or "spirit" is avoided 2 In man, a nafs and rūḥ are identified, or b nafs applies to the mind and rūḥ to life, or c man has nafsān, two souls, one vital and the other discriminative, or d the discriminative soul is double, sometimes commanding and sometimes forbidding

V The influences that affected the post-Kur'ānic uses of both nafs and rūḥ were the Christian and Neo-Platonic ideas of rūḥ with human, angelic and divine applications, and the more specifically Aristotelian psychological analysis of nafs These influences are clearly shown in the records of the religious controversies

A Al-Ashʿarī [q v] (H Ritter, Die dogmatischen Lehren der Anhänger des Islam von Abu 'l Hasan ʿAlī bin Ismāʿīl al Asʿarī, Istanbul 1929) reports the Rāfidīya doctrines of the incarnation of rūḥ Allāh in Adam and its transmigration through the prophets and others (p 6, 46), as well as the conflicting positions that man is body (djism) only, body and spirit, and spirit (rūḥ) only (p 61, 329 sqq) His creed of the orthodox (p 290—297) omits any statement about the nature of man

B Al-Baghdādī [q v] (al Fark bain al-Firak, Cairo 1328) records the same heretical doctrines about man's nature (p 28, 117 sqq , 241 sqq), says the transmigration theories were held by Plato and the Jews (p 254) and describes the incarnation beliefs of the Hulūlīya sects [cf HULŪL] among whom he includes the Hallādjīya (p 247) His position is "The life of Allāh is without rūḥ and nourishment and all the arwāḥ are created, in opposition to the Christian doctrine of the eternity of the Father, Son and Spirit" (p 325)

C Ibn Ḥazm [q v] uses nafs and rūḥ interchangeably of man's soul (Kitāb al Fiṣal fi 'l Milal, 5 parts, Cairo 1317—1321, V 66) He excludes from Islām all who hold metempsychosis views, among whom he includes the physician philosopher Muhammad b Zakarīyā' al Rāzī (I 90 sqq , IV 187 sq) He rejects absolutely the doctrine of some of the Ashʿarīya of the continual re creation of the rūḥ (IV 69) He taught that Allāh created the spirits of all Adam's progeny before the angels were commanded to prostrate to him (Sūra VII 171), and that these spirits exist in al Barzakh [q v] in the nearest heaven until the angel blows them into embryos (IV 70)

D Al Shahrastānī [q v] (Kitāb al Milal wa 'l-Niḥal, ed Cureton, part I , London 1842) in his description of the belief of the pagan Arabs concerning survival after death does not use the terms nafs or rūḥ, but says the blood becomes a wraith bird that visits the grave every hundred years One of his most important sections (p 203–240) deals with the orthodox and heterodox doctrines of al-rūḥ Al Hunafāʾ, or true believers, debate with al-Sābiʾa [q v], who are dualists, emanationists and gnostics His account of the views of the Sābiʾa faithfully reflects the doctrines of the Ikhwān al-Safāʾ (Rasāʾil, 4 vols , Bombay 1305), who taught that man is a whole compounded of a corporeal body and a spiritual nafs (I/II , 14), and that the substance (djawhar) of the nafs descended from the spheres (al aflāk) But al Shahrastānī rejects the Neo Platonic idea that human souls (nufūs) are dependent upon the souls of the superhuman spirit world (al nufūs al-rūḥānīyāt) (p 210, 224 sq), and the Hermetic doctrines that the nafs is essentially evil (p 236) and that salvation consists in the release of the rūḥ from material bodies (p 226 sq) He applies the term rūḥānī to all spirits, good and evil (p 213) His description of the nature of man (p 216 sqq) with three souls, vegetative, animal and human, each with its own source, need, place and powers, resembles that of the Ikhwān al Safāʾ (Rasāʾil, I/II , 48 sqq) Indeed, the Aristotelian analysis of the human soul as given in De Anima, and handed on by Alexander of Aphrodisias and Porphyry, had been adopted with little modification by the Muslim philosophers, such as al Kindī [q v], al-Fārābī [q v] each of whom wrote a Kitāb al Nafs, Ibn Sīnā [q v] who wrote two, and Ibn Miskawaih [q v], whose Tahdhīb al Akhlāk has the same immaterial (p 1) and functional (p 7) psychology for its ethical basis Al Shahrastānī achieved the long needed interpretation of the conflicting usages of nafs and rūḥ in the Greek and Christian heritage, and in the Kur'ān and Muslim tradition But the philosophers, even with his support, were not able to force the Greek psychology upon orthodox Islam The Mutakallims [s art KALĀM] and the great majority of Muslims broadened the Kur'ānic terminology, but retained the traditional views of the nature of the soul as a direct creation of Allāh having various qualities

VI Aristotle's principle of the incorporeal character of spirit had nevertheless found a permanent place in Muslim doctrine through the influence of Islām's greatest theologian, al-Ghazālī [q v] In al Tahānawī's Dictionary of the Technical Terms (ed Sprenger, Calcutta 1862) are extracts of the doctrines of al-Ghazālī on man's rūḥ and nafs He defines man as a spiritual substance (djawhar rūḥānī), not confined in a body, nor imprinted on it, nor joined to it, nor separated from it, just as Allāh is neither without nor within the world, and likewise the angels It possesses knowledge and perception, and is therefore not an accident (p 547 at top , cf Tahāfut al Falāsifa, Cairo 1302, p 72) He devotes the second section of al Risāla al-Ladunīya (Cairo 1327, p 7—14) to explain the words nafs, rūḥ and kalb (heart), which are names for this simple substance that is the seat of the intellectual processes It differs from the animal rūḥ, a refined but mortal body in which reside the senses He identifies the incorporeal rūḥ with al nafs al-muṭmaʾinna and al-rūḥ al-amrī of the Kur'ān He then uses the term nafs also for the "flesh" or lower nature, which must be disciplined in the interests of ethics

VII This position of al Ghazālī's was that of the theistic philosophers in general, as well as some of the Muʿtazila and the Shīʿa, but it has never dominated Islām The great analytical philosopher and theologian, Fakhr al-Dīn al Rāzī, could not bring himself to accept it In his Mafātīh al-Ghaib, v 435, commenting on Sūra xvii 85, he quotes as the opinion of al Ghazālī the statement that is in the latter's Tahāfut (p 72, cf also al Rāzī's Muhassal, Cairo 1323, p 164), but on p 434 (l 9 and 8 from below) of the Mafātīh he acknowledges the strength of the corporeal doctrine, and in his Maʿālim Usūl al-Dīn, on the margin of the Muhassal, p 117 sq, he definitely rejects as baseless (bātil) the view of the philosophers that the nafs is a substance (djawhar) which is not a body (djism) and not corporeal

VIII Al-Baidāwī's [q v] system of cosmogony and psychology is given in his Tawāliʿ al-Anwār (lithograph ed with commentary Abu 'l-Thanāʾ al-Isfahānī and gloss by al-Djurdjānī, Stambul 1305, p 285 sqq, Brockelmann, G A L, i 418, ii 111, printed Cairo 1323) He discusses 1 The classes of incorporeal substances, 2 the heavenly intelligences, 3 the souls of the spheres, 4 the incorporeality of human souls, 5 their creation 6 their connection with bodies and 7 their survival His cosmogony follows Allāh, because of his unity, created only one Intelligence (ʿakl) This Second Intelligence, that emanated first (al sādir) from Allāh, is the cause (ʿilla) of all other potentialities and is not body (djism), nor original matter (hayūlī) nor form (sūra) It is the secondary cause (sabab) of another intelligence with soul (nafs) and sphere (falak) There emanates from the second a third intelligence and so on to the tenth (p 288) who is the rūh of Sūra lxxviii 38 (cf al-Baidāwī's Anwār al Tanzīl, ed Fleischer, ii 383, l 4) whose effective influence is in the world of the elements and who is the producer of the spirits (arwāh) of mankind Below these intelligences are the high or heavenly angels, which the philosophers call al nufūs al-falakiya, and the low nufūs, which are in two classes earthly angels, in control of the simple elements and the earthly souls, such as the reasoning souls (anfus nātika) controlling particular persons In addition (p 285) there are the incorporeal substances, without effect or control, who are angels, some good (al kurūbiyūn) and some evil (al shayātīn) and the djinn, who are ready for both good and evil This is the classification he refers to in his comment on Sūra ii 28 (ed Fleischer, i 47, 25) His psychology resembles that of al-Ghazālī, whom he mentions (p. 294) For the incorporeality of the soul (tadjarrud al nafs) he presents five arguments from reason, four Kur'ān verses and one tradition His commentator remarks (p 300) that these prove only that the soul differs from the body He then argues that all nufūs are created when their bodies are completed The nafs (p 303) is not embodied in and is not close to the body, but is attached as the lover to the beloved It is connected with that rūh which comes from the heart and is generated of the finest nutritive particles The reasoning nafs produces a force that flows with that rūh through the body, producing in every organ its proper functions These functional powers are perceptive, which are the five external senses, and the five internal faculties of the sensus communis, imagination, apprehension, memory and reason, and the active (al-muharrika) which are voluntary (ikhtiyāriya) and natural (tabiʿiya, p 308)

IX The dominant Muslim doctrine concerning the origin, nature and future of al-rūh and al-nafs is most fully given in the Kitāb al Rūh of Ibn Kayyim [q v] (Haidarābād, 2nd ed, 1324) Of his 21 chapters Ibn Kayyim devotes the 19th to the problem of the specific nature of the nafs (p 279—342) He quotes the summaries given by al Ashʿarī (op cit, p 331—335), and by al-Rāzī (Mafātīh al-Ghaib, v 431—434) He denies al-Rāzī's statement that the Mutakallims consider man to be simply the sensible body, and says all intelligent people hold man to be both body and spirit The rūh is identified with the nafs, and is itself a body, different in quiddity (al-māhīya) from this sensible body, of the nature of light, high, light in weight, living, moving, interpenetrating the bodily members as water in the rose It is created, but everlasting, it departs temporarily from the body in sleep, when the body dies it departs for the first judgement, returns to the body for the questioning of Munkar and Nakīr, and, except in the cases of prophets and martyrs, remains in the grave foretasting bliss or punishment until the Resurrection He rejects (p 256) Ibn Hazm's doctrine that Adam's progeny are in al-Barzakh awaiting their time to be blown into embryos He presents 116 evidences for the corporeality of the rūh, 22 refutations of opposing arguments and 22 rebuttals of objections He represents traditional Islām

X The earlier Sūfīs had accepted the materiality of the rūh Both al-Kushairī [q v] (al-Risāla, with commentary of Zakariyāʾ al-Ansārī and gloss of al ʿArūsī, Būlāk 1290, ii 105 sqq) and al Hudjwīrī [q v] (Kashf al-Mahdjūb, ed Nicholson, London 1911, p 196, 262) call the rūh a fine, created substance (ʿain) or body (djism), placed in the sensible body like sap in green wood The nafs (al-Risāla, p 103 sqq, Kashf al-Mahdjūb, p 196) is the seat of the blameworthy characteristics All together make the man

In addition to the philosophical position of the immateriality of al-rūh that al Ghazālī had made orthodox, another interpretation of spirit developed which is essentially theosophical Ibn al ʿArabī [q v] (H S Nyberg, Kleinere Schriften des Ibn al ʿArabi, Leyden 1919, p 15, ii, 7 sqq) divides "things" into three classes Allāh, Who is Absolute Existence and Creator, the world, and an undefinable tertium quid of contingent existence that is joined to the Eternal Reality and is the source of the substance and the specific nature of the world It is the universal and common reality of all realities Man likewise is an intermediate creation, a barzakh (p 22, 42) between Allāh and the world, bringing together the Divine Reality and the created world (p 21, 42) and a vicegerent connecting the eternal names and the originated forms (p 96) His animal spirit (rūh) is from the blowing of the divine breath (p 95) and his reasoning soul (nafs nātika) is from the universal soul (al nafs al-kulliya), while his body is from the earthly elements (p 95 sq) Man's position as vicegerent (p 45 sq) and his resemblance to the divine presence (p 21) come from this universal soul, who has various other names, holy spirit (rūh al kudus), the first intelligence (p 51), vicegerent (khalīfa), the perfect man (p 45) and the rūh of the world of command (ʿālam al-amr), which al-Ghazālī held to be Allāh's direct creation (p 122, 1), In his Fusūs (lithograph ed with commentary by al-Kāshānī, Cairo 1309, p 12 sqq) he says that Allāh appears to Himself in a form which thus becomes the place of manifestation of the Divine essence This place receives a rūh, who is Adam, the khalīfa and the perfect man He discusses (Nyberg, op cit, p 129 sqq) the essence and properties of the rūh, quoting among others the view he says is "attributed" to al-Ghazālī which is in al-Tahāfut (as above) He finds the differences of doctrine harmless since all agree that the rūh is originated In his tractate on the nafs and rūh (M Asín Palacios, Tratado Acerca del Conocimiento del Alma y del Espíritu, in Actes du XIVème Congres international des Orientalistes, Paris 1906, iii 167—191) he describes how men may reach the distinction of "the perfect man" through the cultivation of the qualities of the rūh and the suppression of the nafs

Ibn al-ʿArabī's contemporary, the poet Ibn al Fārid (Nicholson, Studies in Islamic Mysticism, Cambridge 1921, chap iii), at times identifies his own rūh with that from which all good emanates (al-Tāʾiya al kubrā, on margin of Dīwān Ibn al-Fārid, Cairo 1319, ii 4 sq) and with the "pole" (kutb) upon which the heavens revolve (p 113, 115) Al-Kāshānī, the commentator of al-Tāʾiya, explains that this identity is with the greatest spirit (rūh al arwāh) and the greatest "pole" The compiler of the commentaries on the Dīwān states (ii 196) that incarnat' on (hulūl) and union (ittihād) with Allāh are impossible, but there is real "passing away" (janāʾ) and attainment (wasl) of the rūh and nafs in the nafs of Allāh, for His nafs is their nafs

ʿAbd al-Karīm al Djīlānī carries this position of existential monism on to straight animistic pantheism In al-Insān al-kāmil [q v] (Cairo 1334) the terms rūh al-kudus, rūh al arwāh and rūh Allāh stand for a special one of the aspects of the Divine Reality (al Hakk), not to be embraced under the command "be" nor created This spirit is the divine aspect in which stand the created spirits of all existences, sensible and intelligible (p 94) Existence itself subsists in the nafs of Allāh, and His nafs is His Essence (dhāt) Moreover, every sensible thing has a created spirit (rūh) (p 94) One of the aspects of the angel of Sūra xlii 52, who is named the command (amr) of Allāh, and who is an aspect of Allāh as above, is given to the rūh of Muhammad, which is identified as the rūh mentioned in the verse That angelic and divine rūh thereby becomes the Idea (hakīka) of Muhammad (p 95 sq) and he thereby becomes the "perfect man" (p 96, 131 sqq) The rūh which is the specific nature of the human nafs has five names animal, commanding to evil, instinctive (al-mulhama), reproving, and tranquil When the divine qualities actually describe the nafs, then the names, qualities and essences of the gnostic (ʿārif) are those of the One Known (Maʿrūf) (p 130 sq)

XI In geomancy (ʿilm al-raml) the first "house" (bait) of the ummahāt [cf MADAGASCAR, supra, iii 73b] is called nafs because it guides to problems concerning the soul and spirit of the inquirer, and to the beginning of affairs (Muhammad al-Zanātī, Kitāb al-Fasl fī ʿIlm al-Raml, Cairo n d, p 7, cf Henr Corn Agrippae, Opera, Leyden, n d, but early xviith cent, p 412 Nam primus domus personam tenet quaerentis)

Bibliography In addition to the references in the article see especially D B Macdonald, The Development of the Idea of Spirit in Islam, in Acta Orientalia, Oslo 1931, ix 307—351 (reprinted in M W, xxii [1932], 25—42, 153—168) upon which much of the present article is based, Muslim philosophical psychology goes back to Aristotle's De Anima (best ed by R D Hicks, Cambridge 1907), for the early metempsychosis beliefs see I Friedländer, The Heterodoxies of the Shiites etc, in J Am O S, xxviii 1—80, xxix 1—183, for the relation between Aristotle and Ibn Sīnā see S Landauer, Die Psychologie des Ibn Sînâ, in Z D M G, xxix [1875], 335—418, English translation by A E van Dyck, Avicenna's Offering to the Prince, Verona 1906, M Horten, Die philosophischen Systeme im Islam, Bonn 1912, T J De Boer, The History of Philosophy in Islam, London 1903 (E E CALVERLEY)

AL-NAFŪSA, in Berber INFŪSEN, name of a Berber tribe According to the common genealogical scheme (cf Ibn Khaldūn, Kitāb al-ʿIbar, i 107—117 of the text), the Nafūsa are one of the four branches of the large body of the Botr, whose name derives from their chief Mādghīs al-Abtar At present the dwelling place of the Nafūsa is south-west of Tripoli, on the plateau of the same name which from the frontier between Tunisia and Tripolitania tends eastward, and, if taken in the largest sense, comprises the regions of Nālūt, Fassāto and Yefren The inhabitants of these regions are generally called Nafūsa, although, in a genealogical sense, this name can be applied to some groups only Probably the name Djabal Nafūsa (in Berber Drār n Infūsen), which originally belonged to a part of the plateau, was extended to the large area between Wāzzen and Yefren on account of the fact, that of the tribes inhabiting it, the Nafūsa were of prominent importance This use of the name in its widest sense is also to be found in the book by Ibrāhīm b Slīmān al-Shammākhī "Castles and Ways of the Nafūsa plateau" (1302 = 1884—1885), in which all the territories of Yefren, Fassāto and Nālūt are described

The scarce data on the history of the Nafūsa, which we possess, are to be found, for the largest part, in Arabic sources In the Greek and Latin authors of pre-Islāmic times there is no single sure allusion to them The name occurring in Corippus' Johannis (second song, l 146 Quaeque nefanda colunt tristis montana Navusi), does not refer, in all probability, to a place or a tribe of Tripolitania, but rather of the Aurès (Awrās), its plateau or its neighbourhood The fact that Navus represents a form closely connected with Nafūsa, proves only that the name was widely spread among the Berbers, that it is old and may be probably connected with such words as ennefūs, fem tenefūst "right, to the right hand" in Augilin

In Islāmic times the name is recorded for the first time in connection with the capture of the town of Tripoli by ʿAmr b al ʿĀs (22 or 23) According to Ibn ʿIdhārī (i 2 sq, text) during the siege the inhabitants called to their aid the Nafūsa, who came to their aid At that time they were residing also in the vast plain of Djafāra, situated between the Djabal and the Sea, one of their chief towns, if not their capital, was Sabra on the coast (Roman Sabratha, formerly Phoenician), west of Tripoli, which by Ibn Khaldūn (Ibar, i 181, l 8, text) is called "the city of the Nafūsa" This town was taken by surprise and plundered by a body of cavalry sent by ʿAmr This raid was probably undertaken not only to continue the conquest farther westward, but also to punish the Nafūsa, whose territory ʿAmr had invaded in order to conquer it (cf al-Bakrī, p 9, 10, text), and which he had to abandon by order of the Caliph

According to some sources, the Nafūsa at that time were Christians, according to other reports, however, they were Jews Our latest local information makes it probable that Christianity had spread widely among them, though the conversion of single groups to Judaism is not excluded In fact traces of Byzantine basilicas have been found on the plateau, e g at Temézda, Itarmīsen etc, which are also mentioned in some sources and which must have been used by large numbers of the indigenous population

When the Arab had conquered North Africa, the Nafūsa of Sabra and of the coastal region retired, according to the common opinion, to the plateau, where they remained hostile towards the conquerors A fresh study of the Tripolitan population, however, makes it clear that a part of them must have stayed in their old dwelling-places where they intermarried with other tribes and, in course of time, became arabicised In fact there are tribes in the Western Djafāra and in Tripoli, the town and its surroundings (the regions of al-Sāhil, Iagiura, etc), that, according to the local genealogy, derive from the Nafūsa Apart from this ethnic tradition, there is the fact, recorded in several sources, that after the first case of intervention of the Nafūsa in the affairs of the town of Tripoli — which may have been partly due to a Christian opposition to the Muhammadan invasion — they wanted, under successive dominations, to make their presence felt and their influence preponderant in the north-western region of Tripolitania, so that the outlines of the history of the small, but strong and civilised Berber unit may be supposed to be the following Having its centre in the plateau, it intended to make felt, as often as possible, its dominion in the coastal region and thus keep the control of the main way of communication between Egypt and Ifrikiya, which ran along the coast and which was followed by the various expeditions to the Maghrib Even at present such aspirations may be stirred in the minds of the most cultivated of these populations, to such an extent that even some of them have reckoned with an eventual reoccupation of their old territories in Western Djafāra

The period in which the Nafūsa, according to the sources available to us, vigorous were most active and took a part in the events happening in North Africa, was that of the great Khāridjī [q v] revolts, which began in 122 (739—740) and did not cease before the IVth (xth) century, i e before the era of the Fātimids When the Wahbī doctrines began to spread among the North African populations in the second century A H, they embraced them and so joined the rebellious movement of the Berbers against the Arab conquerors, a movement which, prepared by several other causes, found also some support in the Khāridjī heterodoxy The Nafūsa embraced the Ibādī, i e the more moderate form of the Khāridjī doctrine, and remained ever faithful to it with heroic attachment. In alliance with other Berber tribes, either Ibādīs or other branches of the sect, they repeatedly made war upon the Arab governors of Ifrīkiya

In 140 (757—758), they elected as their imām, probably with the intention of founding an Ibādite principality — an intention which manifests itself also at other times — an Arab called Abu 'l-Khattāb ʿAbd al-Aʿlā' b al-Samh al-Muʿāfirī [q v], one of the missionaries of Ibādism in North Africa Under his command and in conjunction with other Berber groups, they occupied Tripolis, fought against the Ṣufrite [cf AL-ṢUFRIYA] Wafardjūma, who had sacked Kairawān where they had settled, and against the armies sent by the ʿAbbāsids to reconquer Ifrīkiya Finally, in 144 (761—762), Abu 'l-Khattāb and a large number of his followers perished near Tauorgha (Tāwurghā) in a great battle against the general Muhammad b al-Ashʿath al-Khuzāʿī, the governor of Ifrīkiya

Another notorious imām of the Nafūsa was a Berber Abū Hatim Yaʿkūb [q v], whose enterprises survive in oral tradition on the plateau, who speaks of his 375 encounters with the Arabs He was killed in battle in 155 (771—772)

When the Ibādī kingdom of the Rustamids [cf RUSTAM], which had Tāhert as its centre, had been founded, the Nafūsa did not elect an imām of their own any more, but formed a part of this kingdom under a governor who depended upon it Some of these governors, e g Abū ʿUbaida ʿAbd al-Hamid al-Djanāwuni (of Igennāwen), Abū Mansūr Ilyās (of Tendemmīra), are often praised by the Berbers of the Djabal, for their importance and ability in maintaining the interests of Ibādism, and also for their learning and piety

The Nafūsa were a valuable support of the kingdom of the Rustamids, of which they formed the eastern bulwark Being near the territory of the Aghlabides [q v], they shared to some extent the vicissitudes of this state which had arisen in Ifrīkiya in the beginning of the IXth century A D The town of Tripoli was in the possession of those princes, Western Djafāra, on the other hand, till near the Sea, and probably also part of Eastern Djafāra, was in the power or under the influence of the Nafūsa When Tripoli was beleaguered in 267 (880—881) by the Tūlūnid prince al-ʿAbbās, who, having revolted against his father Ahmad, sought to conquer Ifrīkiya at his own risks, the Nafūsa were called to aid, and, appearing without delay, they defeated the army of the invaders (according to other sources, their help was invoked by the inhabitants of Lebda) This fact, which reminds of the first siege of Tripoli by the Muslims, proves clearly the influence the Nafūsa possessed in northwestern Tripolitania and it accounts also for the severe blow dealt to them in 283 (896—897) by the Aghlabides, when Ibrāhīm II b Ahmad, who led an expedition from Tunis to Egypt, found his passage through the coastal region of Tripolitania barred by the Nafūsa The bloody battle of Mānū, which was followed by acts of terrible cruelty inflicted upon hundreds of Nafūsa prisoners, and which is narrated in a more or less anecdotical form in the Sunnī as well as in the Ibādī sources, is ascribed, ultimately, to the desire of the Caliph to punish the Nafūsa who were the principal support of the heretical state of Tāhert, or to the resentment of the Aghlabides at acts of enmity committed

Additions and Corrections

p 691b l 23, to be added 13 ʿId al-djawhar al thamin (extract in I Massignon, Recueil, p 171, note 1)

p 692a, l 29, to be added He has been buried at the feet of the poet Niyazi Misri at Kastro Lemnos), where his tomb was still shown in 1916 (cf I Massignon, Recueil p 164)

PRINTED IN HOLLAND