PREFACE

THIS book was originally intended to be a new edition of the late Mr. Sweet's Dictionary of English Law: but there is so little of Mr. Sweet's work, and that little has been so much altered, that the author has felt justified in publishing the book over his own name.

In a work of this size, dealing with the whole vast subject of English law, many things are necessarily omitted which would be inserted if more space were available. Thus, for instance, cases are not cited as a rule; for the citation of cases, unless done thoroughly, is useless; and thorough citation would have doubled the size of the work.

In the edition of Cowel's Law Dictionary which was published in 1727, the title page sets out that the book is "very much Augmented and Improved by the addition of many Thousand Words found in our Histories, Antiquities, Cartularies, Rolls, Registers, and other Manuscript Records"; and down to our own time law dictionaries have really been, to a large extent, glossaries of barbarous Latin, Norman-French, Early English and Anglo-Saxon words. But the only persons who want such glossaries are the few experts who actually refer to records such as those mentioned by the editor of Cowel; and these persons will not turn to a law dictionary for a little information as to matters with which such a book is not properly conversant. All archaic words have, therefore, been omitted, except in so far as they relate to the law.

No attempt whatever has been made to deal with Roman, Scottish, or Colonial law. This book is a dictionary only of English law: and as such it is published, in the hope that it will be found to fill a place—which would appear to be vacant—between the existing law dictionaries and the great encyclopædic work published over the name of the late Lord Halsbury.

The author knows only too well that there must necessarily be many defects in a book which covers so large a field and which has been written singlehanded. But it represents several years of work, and, for what it may be worth, it is offered, not merely to both branches of the legal profession, but also to those outside this country who are interested in English law, ancient as well as modern.

TABLE OF REGNAL YEARS OF ENGLISH SOVEREIGNS.

"In England, in the seventh, and so late as the thirteenth century, the year was reckoned from Christmas Day; but in the twelfth century, the Anglican Church began the year on the 25th of March; which practice was also adopted by civilians in the fourteenth century. This Style continued until the reformation of the Calendar by Stat. 24 George II. c. 23, by which the Legal year was ordered to commence on the 1st of January, in 1753. It appears, therefore, that two calculations have generally existed in England for the commencement of the year; viz.:—

"1. The HISTORICAL year, which has, for a very long period, begun on the 1st of January.

"2. The CIVIL, ECCLESIASTICAL, and LEGAL year, which was used by the Church, and in all public instruments, until the end of the thirteenth century, began at Christmas. In and after the fourteenth century, it commenced on the 25th of March, and so continued until the 1st of January, 1753.

"The confusion which arose from there being two modes of computing dates in one kingdom must be sufficiently apparent; for the Legislature, the Church, and Civilians, referred every event which happened between the 1st of January and the 25th of March to a different year from Historians.

"To avoid, as far as possible, the mistakes which this custom produced, it was usual to add the date of the Historical to that of the Legal year, when speaking of any day between the 1st of January and the 25th of March, thus:—

January 30, $164\frac{8}{9}$ { i.e. the CIVIL and LEGAL year, i.e. the HISTORICAL year;

January 30, 1648-9.

"This practice, common as it has long been, is nevertheless frequently misunderstood; and even learned and intelligent persons are sometimes perplexed by dates being so written. The explanation is, however, perfectly simple, for the lower or last figure always indicates the year according to our present computation.

"In SCOTLAND, the year was ordered to commence on the 1st of January instead of the 25th of March, 1600, by a proclamation dated the 17th of December, 1599; but the Old Style continued to be used until altered in 1752, pursuant to the Stat. 24 George II."—Nicolas's Chronology.

"Public documents in England, from the time of Richard the First, down to the present day, have been usually dated with the year of the reign of the sovereign, and not with the year of our Lord. (We must, however, except the years following the death of Charles the First, until the restoration of Charles the Second [1648-9 to 1660], when the name of the sovereign giving place to 'The Keepers of the Libertie of England by Authority of Parliament,' during the first five years, and afterwards, 'Oliver Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland and Ireland and the Dominions thereto belonging,' the year of our Lord, the month and the day of the month were the only dates given). Consequently, to be able to determine the year of our Lord, for any year of a sovereign's reign, we must have a chronological list, showing the first and last date of the reign of each sovereign.

"In the early years of the English history, after the Norman Conquest, it appears that the reign of the sovereign did not commence until some act of sovereignty had been performed; the commencement of the reign being sometimes reckoned from the day of the coronation, of which practice there is evidence amongst the memoranda taken from the 'Black Book' of the Exchequer, under the date '16 November,' where the years of the reign of Henry III. have been counted from his coronation. It is obvious, however, that the dates given in the 'Public Records' for the commencement and determination of each sovereign's reign must alone be recognised, to the exclusion of all other systems, when our object is to verify written dates to be met with in the Legal Records. A question concerning the date of the accession of the sovereign was taken into consideration in the first year of the reign of Elizabeth in Michaelmas Term, when the Judges, Chief Baron, Attorney General, and Solicitor General formed several resolutions in relation to the statute (1 Edw. VI. c. 7) for the discontinuance of certain offices on the demise of the king; the first being that 'the king who is heir or successor may write and begin his reign the said day that his progenitor or predecessor died.'"—BOND, Handybook of Rules and Tables for Verifying Dates, 1873.

Of the two dates standing opposite to each year of a reign in the following Table, the first is the commencement and the second the end of the regnal year. In using this Table, it is necessary to observe that it is calculated according to the Common and Historical year, viz., from the 1st of January; but, as the Civil, Ecclesiastical and Legal year for a long period, began on the 25th of March, all dates between the 1st of January and the 25th of March belong according to the Civil computation, to one year earlier than the Historical year.

For example:—From the 1st of January to the 25th of March, in the first year of the reign of William the Conqueror, was in the Civil year, 1066, instead of 1067. For the same reason, Edward III.'s reign is sometimes said to have begun on the 25th of January, 1326, instead of the 25th of January, 1327; Henry V.'s on the 21st of March 1412, instead of the 21st of March, 1413; Edward IV.'s on the 4th of March, 1460, instead of the 4th of March, 1461 and the same remark, mutatis mutandis, applies to the commencement of the reigns of Edward VI., James I., Charles II., James II., William and Mary, and Queen Anne, according to whether the Historical or Civil year be alluded to.

Note.—In the 3rd, 5th, 8th, 11th, 14th, and 16th years of John, several days of the month of May, in two succeeding years of our Lord, occurred in the same year of that King's reign; thus:—

Anno 3	Ascension Day	1201 (3 May),	to Ascension Day	1202 (22 May).
5	—	1203 (15 May),	—	1204 (2 June).
8	—	1206 (11 May),	—	1207 (30 May).

16	—	1214 (8 May),	—	1215 (27 May).

Consequently every day from the 4th to the 22nd of May, 1201, and from the 4th to the 22nd of May, 1202, both inclusive, occurred in the first year of King John; and no document dated from the 4th to the 22nd of May, 1 John, can be assigned with certainty to the right year of our Lord; and in a similar manner with respect to certain days in the other years above mentioned.

LAW DICTIONARY.

A 1—ABA

A 1, used, but without statutory sanction, in Lloyd's Register (see LLOYD'S) of shipping to indicate that a vessel has been built to Lloyd's highest class. The period for which the symbols A 1 are applicable is indicated by a prefixed number. Thus a vessel classed 18 A 1 will be allowed to remain in the A 1 class for eighteen years without re-survey.

A.B. See ABLE-BODIED SEAMAN.

A and B lists. When a limited company is wound up, all present members are liable, in so far as their shares are unpaid, to contribute towards the discharge of the liabilities of the company (Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, s. 123). Such members form the A list. If their contributions are insufficient, then all who have been members within one year before the date of the winding-up order may be required to contribute to such extent as their shares were unpaid (ib.). Such past members form the B list. Members include not merely actual shareholders but also others, as to whom see s. 24. The A list is made out as soon as may be after the winding-up order (see s. 163 (1)), but the B list is not made out until it has been shown that the liabilities cannot be discharged by the A list. See CALL; CONTRIBUTORY.

Ab abusu ad usum non valet consequentia. From the abuse of a thing you can draw no conclusion as to its legitimate use. The maxim is cited at 1 A. & E. 116.

Abactor, one who stole and drove away cattle in herds, not merely one by one.

Abandonment of Action. This can now be effected only by serving before trial a notice of discontinuance under Ord. XXVI., or by allowing at trial a verdict or judgment for the defendant to be recorded.

Abandonment of Canal. An unnecessary or derelict canal may be abandoned under a warrant issued by the Board of Trade pursuant to the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888, s. 45.

Abandonment of Cargo; Claim; Ship. In marine insurance "there is a constructive total loss where the subject-matter insured is reasonably abandoned on account of its actual total loss appearing to be unavoidable or because it could not be preserved from actual total loss without an expenditure which would exceed its total value when the expenditure had been incurred" (Marine Insurance Act, 1906, s. 60). "When there is a constructive total loss the insured may . . . abandon the subject-matter insured to the insurer" (ib., s. 61) by giving notice of abandonment to the insurer in any way which clearly indicates his intention within a reasonable time (s. 62), and thereupon the insurer is entitled to take over the interest of the insured in whatever may remain of the subject-matter insured (s. 63).

Abandonment of Domicile. See DOMICILE.

Abandonment of Railway. In the case of any railway company authorised before 1867, the making or carrying on of the whole or any part of its undertaking may be abandoned under a warrant of the Board of Trade issued pursuant to the provisions of the Abandonment of Railways Act, 1850, as amended and extended by the Railway Companies Act, 1867, ss. 32-35; but in the case of any railway company authorised after 1867, parliamentary powers are necessary for any abandonment.

Abandum, anciently this meant anything abandoned, sequestrated, or proscribed.

Ab antiquo, from old times.

Abatement. This expression, according to the context, means either termination or reduction.

Abatement of Annuities. See ANNUITIES.

Abatement of Civil Proceedings. Formerly almost every change of interest after the commencement and before the termination of proceedings caused an abatement or termination, which, however, was curable, where the right of action survived, by REVIVOR, SCIRE

FACIAS, or SUGGESTION (q.v.); but now Ord. XVII., r. 1, provides that "a cause or matter shall not be abated by reason of the marriage, death, or bankruptcy of any of the parties, if the cause of action survive or continue and shall not become defective by the assignment, creation or devolution of any estate or title pendente lite; and whether the cause of action survives or not, there shall be no abatement by reason of the death of either party between the verdict or finding of the issues of fact and the judgment, but judgment may in such case be entered, notwithstanding the death."

Abatement of Criminal Proceedings. Criminal proceedings are not abated, that is to say, are not terminated, either by the death of the prosecutor, who in theory acts for the Crown, or by the death of the Sovereign (see DEMISE OF THE CROWN). Any warrant or summons remains in force notwithstanding the death of the judge or justice who issued it or his ceasing to hold his office; but this rule does not apply to any summons or warrant issued by a justice in Ireland

Abatement of False Lights. Under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 667, if the general lighthouse authority, which (ib., s. 634) in England is the Trinity House, serves notice requiring that any light liable to be mistaken for the light from a lighthouse shall be screened or extinguished, then, if, within seven days, such notice be not complied with the authority may enter and extinguish the light at the expense of the person served with the notice, and recover from him the expense of so doing, and he is liable to a penalty not exceeding £100.

Abatement of Freehold. In the law of real property, where one died seised of land and a stranger entered upon the land before the entry of the heir, such entry was known as abatement, and the person so entering was known as an abator. The heir could, of course, recover the land from the abator by action. Intrusion, it should be noted, was where a stranger entered to the prejudice of the reversioner or remainderman, while disseisin was to forcibly or fraudulently put out of possession a person seised of the freehold.

Abatement of Legacies. This takes place when legatees receive none or only a part of their legacies, although what was devised to them remains and had not been adeemed (see ADEMPTION) before the testator's death.

As to the division of legacies into general, specific, and demonstrative, see LEGACIES.

If the assets are insufficient, general legacies, other than those given in payment of a debt due to the legatee or in consideration of the legatee abandoning any right or interest, abate proportionately between themselves, unless the intention is clear that any particular legacy shall be paid in full; but this rule does not operate in favour of a residuary legatee, even though no residue will be left after payment of the other general legatees.

Specific legacies take priority of general legacies, and are liable to abatement only if the assets are insufficient for the payment of debts.

Demonstrative legacies are not subject to abatement (unless the assets are insufficient for the payment of debts) until the fund out of which payment is directed becomes exhausted, in which case they are liable to abatement in common with general legacies as regards so much as is payable out of the assets other than such fund.

If a testator, whose estate consisted both of pure and impure personalty, gave a legacy to a charity without directing it to be paid out of his pure personalty, the legacy had to abate in the proportion which the impure personalty bore to the whole residuary personal estate (thus, whole estate, £1,500; pure personalty, £1,000; amount of legacy, £300; amount payable to charity, £200), because the charity could not participate in the impure personalty, owing to the provisions of the Charitable Uses and Mortmain Act, 1888, and of the earlier enactments replaced by that Act; but now, under the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891, the charity can participate in the impure personalty, and no abatement occurs. See MORTMAIN.

Abatement of Nuisance. To abate a nuisance is to remove or put an end to it. Nuisances are divided into public nuisances and private nuisances, as to which see NUISANCES. A public nuisance may be abated by anyone to whom it does a special injury, but only to the extent necessary to prevent such injury. Thus, anyone may remove an obstacle placed on a public highway, if such removal is necessary to enable him to pass along the highway. A private nuisance may be abated by anyone aggrieved. If, for instance, A builds on his land a wall which stops ancient lights on adjoining land, the owner of the adjoining land may enter on A's land and pull the wall down. But this must be done without committing a breach of the peace, and without doing more damage than is unavoidable.

Abatement of Purchase Money. This takes place where, a vendor, having misdescribed property which he has contracted to convey, the agreed purchase money is reduced by way of compensation for the part of the property which the vendor is unable to convey. Thus, where a vendor agreed to sell 186 acres as freehold, but two acres were in fact held only from year to year, specific performance (see SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE) of the contract, in so far as it could be carried out, with compensation, was ordered.

Abatement, Pleas in. Such pleas showed that in criminal proceedings the prosecutor, or in civil proceedings the plaintiff, had committed some informality which prevented him from succeeding. They have for long been obsolete as regards criminal proceedings, and they were abolished as regards civil proceedings by Ord. XXI., r. 20.

Abator, one who effected an abatement (q.v.). See ABATEMENT OF FREEHOLD.

Abbreviatio Placitorum, a collection of cases decided in the superior Courts from the reign of Richard I. down to the commencement of the Year Books (q.v.). It was compiled early in the seventeenth century from the Rolls, or records of the proceedings of the Courts, and was printed in 1811 by the Record Commission, with an introduction, in which it is attributed to Arthur Agarde, Deputy Chamberlain of the Exchequer, and other keepers of the records.

Abbrochement, buying up food or other wares so as to commit the offence of engrossing, forestalling, or regrating. See those titles.

Abdication. Notwithstanding the cases of (1) Edward II., who assented to the succession, in his lifetime, of his son Edward III.: (2) of Richard II., who executed a deed of resignation, whereupon Henry of Lancaster claimed the Crown and was accepted as King by the Houses of Parliament; and (3) of James II., upon whose flight it was declared by the Bill of Rights (1 Will. & M. sess. 2, c. 2) that he had abdicated the government and that the throne was thereby vacated, it would appear that at present the abdication of the Sovereign can be effected only by Act of Parliament.

Abduction. Apart from certain obsolete enactments (see, for instance, the Statute of Westminster II., 13 Edw. 1, c. 34), the abduction or carrying away of women or girls is now punishable only under the Offences against the Person Act, 1861, and the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885.

It is felony:—

(1) Where any person from motives of lucre takes away or detains against her will any woman of any age who has any interest in any property, or even any presumptive expectation of property as heiress or next-of-kin, with intent to marry or carnally know her, or to cause her to be married or carnally known (Act of 1861, s. 53).

(2) Where any person, with like intent, fraudulently allures, takes away, or detains any woman under twenty-one, similarly entitled to property, out of the possession and against the will of her parent or other lawful custodian (ib.).

(3) Where any person, with like intent, by force takes away or detains against her will any woman of any age (Act of 1861, s. 54).

Any person convicted of offence (1) or (2) is incapable of taking any interest in the property of the woman, whose property, if there has been a marriage with the convict, will be settled by the Court of Chancery (Act of 1861, s. 53).

It is a misdemeanour:—

Where any unmarried girl under sixteen is unlawfully taken out of the custody of her parent or lawful custodian against the will of such parent or custodian (Act of 1861, s. 55).

Where any unmarried girl under eighteen is taken as last above mentioned with intent that she shall be unlawfully and carnally known (Act of 1885, s. 7).

It is a felony unlawfully by force or fraud [practised either on the child or any other person] to lead or take away or decoy or entice away or detain any child under the age of fourteen with intent to deprive the parent or other lawful custodian of the possession of the child, or to steal any article belonging to such parent or guardian which is in or upon the person of the child, or with like intent to receive or harbour such child with knowledge that it has been so led or taken away or decoyed or enticed away or detained (Offences against the Person Act, 1861, s. 56). This offence is sometimes described as abduction. The term is also sometimes applied to the common law misdemeanour of forcibly stealing or carrying away any person of either sex or of any age, more properly described as assault and false imprisonment, which, when there is a removal beyond seas, comes within the Habeas Corpus Act, 1679, s. 11; and the term is also sometimes used to describe the statutory misdemeanour committed by anyone who by abduction or duress interferes with the free exercise by a voter of his franchise at any parliamentary or municipal or local government election.

The removal of a ward of Court out of the jurisdiction of the Court—sometimes described as abduction—is a contempt of Court punishable by committal. See CONTEMPT OF COURT.

Abearance, behaviour. Formerly a recognisance to be of good abearance meant the same thing as a recognisance to be of good behaviour.

Aberdeen Act, the popular title for the Entail Provisions Act, 1824, which was passed in order "to authorise the proprietors of entailed estates in Scotland to grant provisions to [i.e., to provide thereout for] the wives or husbands and children of such proprietors."

Aberemurdrum. In the laws of Canute and of Henry I. this meant wilful murder, as distinguished from manslaughter and chance-medley. See those titles.

Abettors, Abet. See ACCESSORIES; PRINCIPALS IN THE SECOND DEGREE.

Abeyance. This term denotes the condition of an inheritance which has no present owner. It is now used chiefly in connection with peerages (see PEERAGE); but it is also used in the law of real property, as regards which there are abeyance of the fee simple and abeyance of the freehold. Thus, the fee simple of the glebe of a church is in perpetual abeyance, for it is not in the patron, in the ordinary, or in the incumbent, although the freehold is in the incumbent. But again, the freehold of the glebe is in abeyance after the death of one incumbent and until another incumbent takes possession; and again, where A, being seised in fee of lands, makes a lease to B for life, with remainder to the heir of B, the fee simple is in abeyance during the life of B.

Abigevus, the same as abactor (q.v.).

Ab initio. When an authority or licence is given to anyone by the law, and he abuses it, he becomes a trespasser ab initio, that is to say, from the beginning, and everything done by him in purported exercise of such authority or licence becomes wrongful; but where the authority or licence is given otherwise than by the law, and is abused by the person to whom it is given, then such person is not a trespasser ab initio and is liable only for the abuse (see the Six Carpenters' Case (1611)). This rule of the common law was formerly of importance as determining the cause of action, but since the Judicature Acts it affects only the question of the measure of damages; and the Distress for Rent Act, 1737, s. 19, provides that in respect of any wrongful act done in levying a distress for rent justly due the person aggrieved can recover only for the special damage sustained by him.

Abishering; Abishersing. According to Spelman, these words are errors for mishering, mishersing, which themselves were legal terms of which lawyers did not know the meaning.

Abjuration. At common law this was an oath to leave the realm for ever, taken by a person who had claimed sanctuary (see SANCTUARY). Sanctuary was abolished by the statute 21 Jac. 1, c. 28, s. 7, and this oath thereupon ceased to be used.

Abjuration was one of the penalties imposed on Popish Recusants (q.v.) by the statutes 35 Eliz. c. 2, and 3 Jac. 1, c. 4.

By the statute 13 & 14 Will. 3, c. 16, it was provided that to every person entering any public office there should be tendered an oath, known as the oath of abjuration, to the effect that he renounced the title of the pretended Prince of Wales (the son of James II.) to the English throne. This enactment is repealed.

Abjuratio et Juramentum Latronum. (The abjuration and oath of thieves.) The form of oath which a thief or other felon had to take when he had fled into sanctuary and proposed to escape punishment by abjuring the realm. It is printed in the Statutes of the Realm, Vol. I., p. 250, among the "Statutes of Uncertain Date," but not in the "Statutes at Large."

Able-bodied Seaman. A seaman is entitled to be rated A.B., that is to say, as an able-bodied seaman, when he has served at sea three years before the mast; but service in a decked fishing vessel counts only to the extent of two years, and, in addition to such service, there must be at least one year of service in a trading vessel (Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 60; Merchant Shipping Act, 1906, s. 58). See also SEAMAN.

Ablution. In ecclesiastical law this is the ceremonial cleaning, after the Communion Service, of the chalice and paten, by pouring into them, and then drinking, wine and water so as to consume what remains of the consecrated elements. It is not illegal when done after the Benediction; but it is illegal if done before the Benediction or, at any time, with prayers and gestures.

Abode. There is no strict or definite rule as to what is a man's abode, that is to say, his habitation or place of residence. It is a question rather of fact than of law. A man's house or other residence in which he lives with his family and sleeps at night is always his place of abode. But, apart from that, the test is whether there has been such a degree of inhabitancy as to constitute residence in the ordinary sense of the word. Thus, where a man has a town house and a country house, it is entirely a question of fact, depending on the use made of them, whether he has two places of abode or only one.

The word "abode" is, however, sometimes capable of being used in a sense contrary to its ordinary meaning. Thus, in 1835 it was held that where a solicitor was required to give his "place of abode" in a notice of action he could give his place of business, though he certainly did not reside there. And under s. 150 of the Public Health Act, 1848, a notice which had to be served at "the owner's or occupier's place of abode" was held to have been well served by service at his place of business though he did not reside there.

Abolition. Anciently, this meant leave given by the Crown or the Court to abandon criminal proceedings.

Abominable Crime. This is the term used in the Offences against the Person Act, 1861, s. 61, to describe the crimes of sodomy and bestiality, both of which are felonies. Any attempt to commit either of these crimes is a misdemeanour (ib., s. 62). Solicitation or incitement to commit either of these crimes is an indictable misdemeanour at common law. A wife may obtain a divorce from a husband guilty of either crime (Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, s. 27). As to accusing or threatening to accuse, for purposes of blackmail, any person of such offences, see INFAMOUS CRIME and MENACES.

Abortion. In law, this means the confinement of a pregnant woman at anything short of the full term, that is to say, her miscarriage. To procure abortion is unlawful, unless it is done in good faith in order to save the life of the woman.

It is a felony where any pregnant woman unlawfully administers to herself any noxious thing or uses any other means with intent to procure her own miscarriage; or where any person unlawfully administers to or causes to be taken by any woman, whether pregnant or not, any noxious thing with intent to procure her miscarriage or uses any instrument or other means with like intent. It is a misdemeanour where any person supplies or procures any noxious thing, or any instrument or thing, knowing that it is intended to be unlawfully used with intent to procure the miscarriage of any woman, whether pregnant or not.

About. See MORE OR LESS.

Abridge. In the old common law system of pleading, to abridge meant to make a declaration or count shorter by severing some of the substance of it.

Abridgment. A bona fide abridgment, involving intellectual labour and judgment so as to produce substantial condensation, has been held not to amount to infringement of a copyright book, other than a novel, with regard to which it has been held that such abridgment is an infringement. But the decisions to this effect were all given prior to the Copyright Act, 1911, s. 2 of which enumerates the acts which do not constitute an infringement; and the making of an abridgment is not included amongst those acts.

Abridgments (of the Laws of England). The term "abridgment" was used by early writers of eminence to describe digests of the laws of England. Such digests were later described sometimes as abridgments and sometimes as digests. Those of most authority are:—

Statham's Abridgment, published in the reign of Edward IV. It contains cases from the Year Books and other authorities down to 1461, arranged according to subjects. It was the first printed English law book. An English translation was published in 1916.

Fitzherbert's Grand Abridgment, first published in 1514, and containing a digest of the Year Books down to 1506, together with some cases from Bracton's Note Book. The best edition is that of 1565, in 2 vols., folio.

Brooke's Grand Abridgment, first published in 1568, founded on Fitzherbert, and, like it, a digest of the Year Books. The best and most easily consulted edition is that of 1573.

Rolle's Abridgment of Cases and Resolutions of the Law, temp. Car. II., published in 1668.

Viner's Abridgment: a General and Complete Abridgment of Law and Equity, in 24 vols., folio, published first in 1741-51, and again in 24 vols., 8vo, 1791-94, with a supplement in 6 vols., 8vo, 1799-1801.

Comyn's Digest of the Laws of England, in 5 vols., folio, first published in 1762. The author had died in 1740. The fifth and last edition was published, in 8 vols., 8vo, in 1822.

Bacon's New Abridgment, published in 1736. The 7th and last edition, in 8 vols., 8vo, was published in 1832.

Cruise's Digest of the Laws of England respecting Real Property, in 7 vols., 1804-7. The 4th and last edition was published, in 7 vols., 8vo, in 1835.

There were other abridgments of little note.

It will be seen that the abridgments, as time went on, gradually assumed, as regards certain portions of the law, a quasi-encyclopædic character approximating to that of such works as Halsbury's Laws of England and the Encyclopædia of the Laws of England.

Abroad, Offences Committed. The English Courts have jurisdiction to try prisoners accused of offences committed outside England in the following cases, in addition to those mentioned under COLONIAL GOVERNORS.

(1) Treason and misprision of treason committed outside the United Kingdom by a British subject.

(2) Treason-felony wherever committed.

(3) Offences against the Explosives Act, 1883, committed outside the King's dominions by a British subject.

(4) Offences against the Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870, committed in any part of the King's dominions.

(5) Offences against the Official Secrets Act, 1911, committed in any part of the King's dominions or by British subjects elsewhere.

(6) Misdemeanours by British subjects in public employment outside Great Britain, committed anywhere.

(7) Murder or manslaughter, or being accessory to murder or manslaughter, committed on land outside the United Kingdom.

(8) Murder or manslaughter, or being accessory to murder or manslaughter, where the injury from which death results is inflicted at sea or at any place outside England but death occurs in England.

(9) Offences by British subjects in India.

(10) Offences against the Dockyards, etc., Protection Act, 1772, or the Incitement to Mutiny Acts, 1797, s. 6, and 1812.

(11) Offences against the Slave Trade Act, 1824, s. 9 (Slave Trade Act, 1843).

(12) Offences against the Merchant Shipping Acts, 1894 to 1907.

(13) Bigamy committed anywhere by a British subject.

(14) Perjury and forgery punishable under the Commissioners of Oaths Act, 1889, committed anywhere (Perjury Act, 1911, s. 8; Forgery Act, 1913, s. 14).

(15) Perjury committed before a naval court martial (Perjury Act, 1911, s. 8).

(16) Offences against the Foreign Marriages Act, 1892 (Perjury Act, 1911, s. 8).

(17) Receipt, or possession, in England of property stolen, etc., outside the United Kingdom (Larceny Act, 1916, ss. 33 (4), 39 (1)), but not the larceny, etc., of such property.

(18) Receiving in England property stolen in any other part of the United Kingdom (Larceny Act, 1916, s. 39 (3)).

(19) Larceny, receiving, robbery, burglary, housebreaking, demanding money with menaces, threatening to publish with intent to extort, false pretences, corruptly taking a reward (and being accessory to or abetting such offence) committed in any part of the United Kingdom (Larceny Act, 1916, s. 39 (1)).

A British ship (see BRITISH SHIP) on the high seas is in point of law a part of the United Kingdom. See BIGAMY.

Absence Beyond Seas is absence from the United Kingdom and the adjacent islands belonging to His Majesty. Under the Statutes of Limitation it was formerly a disability in a plaintiff which entitled him to an extension of time after his return, but this is so no longer (see the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, s. 10, and the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, s. 4).

In the case of a person against whom a claim exists in respect of a simple contract or tort being absent beyond seas at the time of the right of action accruing, the plaintiff may bring his action within the time limited for that purpose after the defendant's return (see the statute 4 & 5 Anne, c. 16, s. 19, and the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, ss. 11, 12).

Absence beyond seas at one time entitled an intending appellant to the House of Lords to an extension of the year usually allowed for appealing, but not to more than five years in the whole; no standing order to this effect is now in force. See LIMITATION; DISABILITIES.

Absence for Seven Years. A person marrying a second time whose husband or wife has been absent from such person for seven years at the date of such marriage and has not been known by such person to be living during that time, does not commit bigamy (Offences against the Person Act, 1861, s. 57); but the second marriage will, of course, be invalid if the husband or wife was in fact alive at the time of its celebration. See BIGAMY.

If a person has not been heard of for seven years, and the circumstances are such that, if alive, he would have been heard of, then at the end of those seven years he will be presumed to be dead, but no presumption will arise as to the date of his death. In some cases death will be presumed long before the expiry of seven years; if, for instance, a man was last seen practically in articulo mortis, or was last seen advancing with his regiment under heavy fire, or was last seen on the deck of the Lusitania just before she sank.

Absence of Accused. In treason and felony, the accused must be present both at the preliminary enquiry and at the trial. If he fails to appear at the trial, the trial cannot proceed; but the process of outlawry may, theoretically, be resorted to. See OUTLAWRY.

In indictable misdemeanours the accused must be present at the prelimary enquiry; but his presence at the actual trial is not absolutely necessary.

As regards offences punishable on summary conviction, the justices may proceed ex parte on proof of proper service of the summons; but this course is inexpedient and is seldom adopted.

Absentees, Parliament of, the popular name for a parliament held in Dublin in May, 1610: see 4 Inst. 354.

Absoluta sententia expositore non indiget (2 Inst. 533). Coke, after quoting, in the original Latin, the Statutum De Tallagio Non Concedendo, c. 1 (25 Ed. I., in the Statutes of the Realm), says: "These words are plain without any scruple, absolute without any saving. Absoluta sententia expositore non indiget," the meaning of which in the context is, "When you have plain words capable of only one interpretation, no explanation of them is required."

Absolute. A rule or order which is complete and becomes of full effect at once is termed absolute. Such rule or order is to be distinguished from a rule or order nisi, which does not become absolute until some party, who was not before the Court when the rule or order nisi was made, has had the opportunity of appearing and showing cause why it should not be made absolute. If such cause is shown, the rule or order nisi is discharged, that is to say, becomes of no effect; but if such cause is not shown, the rule or order becomes absolute. The distinction between the two kinds of order arises, for instance, on applications for writ of mandamus, certiorari or habeas corpus. See DECREE; ORDER; NISI.

Absque hoc. See WITHOUT THIS.

Absque impetitione vasti. Without impeachment of waste (q.v.).

Absque tali causa, the Latin form of the words "without the alleged cause," used in the replication de injuria. See INJURIA.

Abstract of Indictment. It is customary for the clerk of the Court or the prosecutor to prepare for the use of the judge an epitome or abstract of every indictment presented to the Court.

Abstract of Title, a chronological statement of the instruments (see INSTRUMENT) and events under which a person is entitled to property. Every contract for the sale of land implies the right to an abstract unless such right is expressly excluded. In the case of a mortgage, an abstract is also given. A proper abstract will show, without reference being made to any other source of information, the history of the title so far as is material, and also all incumbrances to which the property may be subject.

Upon any sale or mortgage of land, any vendor or mortgagee or his solicitor fraudulently concealing any material instrument or any incumbrance is guilty of misdemeanour (for which, however, he cannot be prosecuted without the leave of the Attorney-General or Solicitor-General) and is also liable to an action for damages (Law of Property Amendment Act, 1859 (s. 24)).

Abundans cautela non nocet (11 Rep. 6), (There is no harm done by great caution).

Abuse of Distress. This takes place where, for instance, animals or chattels lawfully distrained are worked or used. Such working or using renders the person distraining liable to an action for conversion.

Abuse of Process. Under Ord. XXV., r. 4, the Court may stay or dismiss any action shown by the pleadings to be frivolous or vexatious, and may, in the case of a defence, order the defence to be struck out where it discloses no reasonable answer and order that judgment be entered accordingly.

It is an abuse of the process to set up in any way a case which has already been decided by a Court of competent jurisdiction. But where the decision is that of a foreign court, the English Court may decline to act under the rule: (1) where it is not clear that such foreign judgment was final, or (2) where it is alleged to have been obtained by fraud. The Court will act under the rule only where the vexatious or frivolous character of the case is clear.

The Court is not bound by the letter of the rule. It can always, in appropriate cases, act under its inherent jurisdiction to protect itself from abuse of its own process. It can, by evidence extraneous to the pleadings, first satisfy itself that the proceedings are in fact frivolous or vexatious, and then it can act under the rule. Moreover, in cases where a litigant has persistently abused the process of the Courts, it can prohibit further applications by him unless he has first obtained the leave of the Court or a master. This power is now the subject of express enactment; for under the Vexatious Actions Act, 1896, the Court may, upon the application of the Attorney-General, order that no legal proceeding shall, without the leave of the Court, be instituted in any Court by a person proved to have habitually and persistently instituted vexatious proceedings. This enactment does not apply to criminal proceedings. See VEXATIOUS; BILL OF PEACE.

Abuttals, or Abutals, the bounds of land; the parts at which it abuts on other lands.

Accedas ad 'curiam. Anciently this was a writ by which a tenant could remove his case from the Court Baron into the Court of Common Pleas, and also the name for the writ of false judgment (q.v.), when it was directed to the old County Court (q.v.).

Acceleration. This is said to take place where an estate or interest in remainder or expectancy falls into possession sooner than it otherwise would by reason of the particular estate or preceding interest being or becoming void. Thus, if A devises land to B with remainder over to C and B attests the will, the remainder over takes effect at once, and is said to have been accelerated. The doctrine would appear to apply to personalty as well as to real estate.

Acceptance. This, in its widest sense, is the act of assenting to an offer; in other words, the expression of a unity of intention with the person making the offer. (See AGREEMENT).

In the law of bills of exchange, acceptance is where the drawee of a bill (or in certain cases some other person) writes his signature across the bill, with or without the word "accepted" or other words. (See PRESENTATION). He thereby engages to pay the bill when due (see the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, ss. 17-19).

An acceptance may be either general or qualified (ib., s. 19). A general acceptance is one without qualification or limitation (ib.) A qualified acceptance is either conditional, where the acceptor inserts in the acceptance words which make his liability to pay dependent on the happening of some event, or the like, or partial, where he accepts for part of the amount of the bill; or local, making the bill payable at a particular place, and not elsewhere; or one making the bill payable on a date different from that appearing on the bill, or by some one or more of several drawees (ib.).

When a bill has been dishonoured by non-acceptance or protested for better security, any person may accept it for the honour of the drawer or of any of the indorsers, and thereby engage to pay the bill himself at maturity, if it is then presented to the drawee or acceptor and dishonoured. Except where there is a "reference in case of need" (q.v.), it seems that a bill can only be accepted for honour after it has been protested, and hence such an acceptance is sometimes called an acceptance supra protest. The acceptor for honour, if he pays the bill, has a right of action against the party for whose honour he accepts and against all whom that party might have sued (see the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, ss. 65-68). See PROTEST.

Acceptance of Service. This is effected in proceedings in the High Court, where a solicitor, with the authority of the defendant, accepts service of a writ of summons, by writing on it words to the following effect: "I accept service of the writ on behalf of the defendant A B, and undertake to enter an appearance for him thereto in due course." If such appearance is not entered, the solicitor is liable to attachment. See Ord. IX., r. 1: Ord. XI., r. 18. Acceptance of service is not permissible in divorce proceedings.

Acceptor, a person who accepts a bill of exchange. See ACCEPTANCE.

Access. When there is question of the legitimacy of a child of a married woman, the child will be held to be legitimate unless it can be clearly shown that the husband had not access to the wife, that is to say, opportunity for marital intercourse, during such time as admitted of his being the father.

As regards land, the right to access is that possessed by a landowner to go on to an adjoining highway from his land, and vice versa, without obstruction.

As to access of light, see ANCIENT LIGHTS; EASEMENTS.

As to the access of air, see AIR.

Accessio cedit principali. This maxim embodies the doctrine of accession (see ACCESSION) and means that an accessory thing when annexed to a principal thing, thereby and thereupon becomes part of, and the property of the owner of, the principal thing.

Accession, strictly speaking, is where a thing which belongs to one person becomes the property of someone else by reason of its becoming added to or incorporated with a thing belonging to the latter. This takes place in the case of alluvion (q.v.), dereliction (q.v.), the addition of buildings, plants, etc. to the soil, the erection of fixtures, etc.

Blackstone includes under accession what is more correctly called specificatio, which takes place where a person makes a new thing (species) out of materials belonging to another, and thereby acquires the ownership of them, subject to making compensation to the former owner for their original value. He also includes under accession the acquisition of young animals born in confinement; this is more correctly called accretion (q.v.). See COMMIXTURE; CONFUSION; FIXTURES; SPECIFICATIO.

Accession of the Sovereign. Upon the death of a sovereign, his heir instantly and automatically becomes the sovereign. This has been the settled law since the reign of Edward IV., and it is expressed by the maxim "The King never dies." Neither the proclamation of a new sovereign nor the subsequent making by him of the declaration required by the Accession Declaration Act, 1910, is in any way necessary to his becoming King to all intents and purposes; but failure to make the declaration would terminate the reign.

Accessorium non ducit, sed sequitur suum principale (Co. Litt. 152 (a)), the incident shall pass by the grant of the principal, but not the principal by the grant of the incident. Thus, rent is incident to the possession and will pass by a grant of the reversion; but the reversion will not pass by a grant of the rent generally. Compare QUAE ACCESSIONUM, ETC.

Accessorium non trahit principale (1 Poth Oblig. 477), an accessory thing does not carry with it the thing to which it is accessory. Thus the release of a surety is not the release of his principal; although the release of the principal is a release of the surety also.

Accessorium sequitur principale, an accessory thing goes with the thing to which it is accessory.

Accessorius sequitur naturam sui principalis (3 Inst. 139). (An accessory is of the same nature as the principal offender). "The accessory cannot be guilty of petit treason where the principal is guilty but of murder," says Coke, ubi supra.

Accessory. There are no accessories in treasons or misdemeanours. In treason, all are deemed principals who would be deemed accessories either before or after the fact if the crime were felony. In misdemeanours, no offence is committed by those who, if the offence were felony, would be accessories after the fact, unless the facts disclose conspiracy to defeat the ends of justice or some other substantive offence; but in misdemeanours, all who would be accessories before the fact, if the crime were felony, are deemed principals and are punishable as such.

In felonies, those concerned in the crime, otherwise than as principals, are divided into accessories before the fact and accessories after the fact. An accessory before the fact is one who directly or indirectly procures by any means the commission of any felony but who is not actually or constructively present at, and aiding in, the commission of the felony. Accessories before the fact are liable to whatever punishment is assigned by law to the felony and may be convicted though the principal felon has not been arrested or convicted or even though he has been acquitted. An accessory after the fact is one who, with knowledge that a felony has been committed and not being the wife of the felon, in any way secures or attempts to secure the escape of the felon, whether by harbouring him or otherwise. An accessory after the fact to any felony is (in the absence of an express enactment to the contrary) himself guilty of felony and may be convicted whether the principal felon shall or shall not have been previously convicted or shall or shall not be amenable to justice.

In offences punishable on summary conviction, there are in point of law no accessories; but any person who aids, abets, counsels or procures the commission of any such offence is liable to the same punishment as a person who commits the offence (Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, s. 5).

Accident. In strictness, an occurrence cannot be called an accident unless it is due neither to design nor to negligence. So, in Courts of equity the use of the word "accident" has always been confined to such an unforeseen event, misfortune, loss, act, or omission as is not the result of any negligence or misconduct by the party applying for relief (Story, 78).

Formerly, there were many cases of accidental losses which were recognised as giving a claim to relief in equity but not at law; thus, if a deed or negotiable security were lost, equity would enforce the plaintiff's rights under the document on his giving, if necessary, a proper bond of indemnity to the defendant. A similar jurisdiction was given to the common law Courts, so far as relates to negotiable instruments, by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, s. 87; see now also s. 70 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, which also by s. 69 gives the holder of a bill which he has lost the right to obtain a duplicate on giving indemnity. So, if an annuity was directed by a will to be secured by an investment in public stock, and an investment was accordingly made, sufficient at the time for the purpose, but afterwards the stock was reduced by Act of Parliament so that it became insufficient, equity would decree the deficiency to be made up out of the residuary estate. Since the Judicature Acts, of course, relief is given in such cases in all the divisions of the High Court (see the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 24).

In the criminal law, an effect is said to be accidental when the act by which it is caused is not done with the intention of causing it, and when its occurrence, as a consequence of such act, is not so probable that a person of ordinary prudence ought, in the circumstances in which it is done, to take reasonable precautions against it (Stephen, Dig. of Crim. Law, art. 210).

In the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, and also in the Notice of Accidents Acts, 1894 and 1906, the word is used to describe events which are the result of negligence. In policies of assurances against accidents, the word covers events caused by the negligence as well of the assured as of other persons; and, where an employer is assured against liability to pay compensation to workmen injured by accident, the word means such occurrence as will render the employer liable under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906. Where, for instance, a boy standing on a bridge over a railway intentionally throws a stone at the engine of a passing train and injures the driver, there will be held to have been an accident within s. 1 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906.

Accidents, Notice of. When an accident occurs in the construction, use, working, or repair of any railway (including any siding joining a railway, but not belonging to the railway company; see the Railway Employment (Prevention of Accidents) Act, 1900, s. 13 (2)), tramroad, tramway, canal, bridge, tunnel, or other work authorised by any local or personal Act, or in the use or working of any traction engine or other engine or machine worked by steam in the open air, or in any employment in respect of which the Board of Trade has made an order under s. 2 (2) of the Notice of Accidents Act, 1894, notice of the accident must be sent by the employer to the Board of Trade within six days from the date of the accident if the accident causes to any person employed as above either loss of life or such bodily injury as causes him to be absent one whole day (Notice of Accidents Act, 1894, ss. 1, 2 (2), sch.; Notice of Accidents Act, 1906, s. 6).

The Notice of Accidents Act, 1906, also provides for notice of accidents in mines or quarries (s. 2) other than mines specified in the Coal Mines Act, 1911, s. 1 (Coal Mines Act, 1911, s. 126, sch. 4), or on railway sidings used in connection therewith (s. 3), or in factories and workshops (s. 4), and enables the Secretary of State to require notice not merely of accidents, but also of dangerous occurrences (s. 5).

As to notice of accidents and dangerous occurrences in the mines specified in s. 1 of the Coal Mines Act, 1911, see ss. 80 and 81 of that Act.

As to notice of accidents by explosion or fire in or about any explosives factory, magazine, or store, see the Explosives Act, 1875, s. 63.

As to the notice to be given by a workman, accidentally injured, as a condition precedent to his obtaining compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, see s. 2 of that Act. The same Act provides, by s. 12, that every employer in any industry to which the Secretary of State may direct, that the section shall apply shall send an annual return of the compensation paid by him under the Act.

Accollade. This is the dubbing or touching on the shoulder with the flat of a sword, which takes place when knighthood is conferred.

Accommodation Bill. An accommodation bill (in the popular sense) is one drawn by A B on C D and accepted by the latter without consideration, that is to say, without receiving value therefor, merely for the benefit of A B (see the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 28 (1)). On such a bill, C D is liable to a holder for value, and it is immaterial whether such holder took the bill knowing it to be an accommodation bill (ib., s. 28 (2)). But, owing to the want of consideration, A B cannot sue C D on the bill, whereas C D is entitled to be indemnified by A B against the liability of him, C D, on the bill.

The term, in its wider and more accurate sense, includes any bill to which there is an accommodation party, that is to say, a person who has signed the bill as drawer, acceptor, or indorser, without receiving value therefor and for the purpose of lending his name to some other person (Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 28 (1)). When one person does this in consideration of another doing the same for him, the bills are called mutual accommodation bills.

Accommodation Works. When a railway company takes land compulsorily it is bound to construct all gates, bridges, fences, etc., necessary to make good any interruption to the use of the lands through which the railway passes (see Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 68). These are known as accommodation works.

Accomplice, a term used, without statutory authority, chiefly in connection with evidence in criminal cases, to denote any person who, either as a principal or as an accessory (see PRINCIPAL; ACCESSORY), has been associated with another person in the commission of any offence, whether treason, felony, or misdemeanour. The evidence of an accomplice is admissible. But it is the duty of a judge to advise the jury not to convict upon such evidence without corroboration. If, however, the jury, before the enactment of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, chose to disregard such advice, their verdict could not be disturbed, for there is no positive rule of law to the effect that a prisoner cannot be convicted upon the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice. But now it is the practice of the Court of Criminal Appeal to quash any conviction obtained on the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice.

Accord and Satisfaction. This is a defence to an action consisting of two parts—one being an agreement that the debtor shall do or pay, and that the claimant shall accept, something in satisfaction of the cause of action—this is the accord; and the other being the actual execution of such agreement—this is the satisfaction.

There must be satisfaction as well as accord; that is to say, the agreement must have been carried out.

The mere payment and acceptance, in full discharge, of a sum smaller than an undisputed debt is not satisfaction, and the balance can be sued for; but if something other than mere money, such, for instance, as a negotiable instrument, is given in satisfaction, then the sufficiency of the satisfaction will not be enquired into. And an agreement with a debtor by a number of creditors, where each, in consideration of the agreement of the others, agrees to take less than his debt, is effective. See ARRANGEMENT BETWEEN DEBTORS AND CREDITORS. The accord need not be in writing.

Account, Action of. At common law an action lay against a receiver or bailiff, or against a merchant by another merchant in respect of dealings between them as merchants, for not rendering a proper account of profits. Under 4 & 5 Anne, c. 3 (otherwise cited as 4 Anne, c. 16), s. 27, one joint tenant or tenant in common may bring an action of account against the other for receiving more than his just share of the rents and profits of the land. But, instead of bringing these obsolete common law actions, a plaintiff in either division of the High Court may now indorse his writ, under Ord. III., r. 8, with a claim for an account; and then, after the time for appearance has expired, an order for proper accounts will be made under Ord. XV., r. 1, unless the defendant satisfy the Court or Judge that there is some preliminary question to be tried, such as the question whether the plaintiff is entitled to an account or the question whether the defendant has not already fully accounted. In a suitable case the account may be taken as provided by the Arbitration Act, 1889, s. 14; but it is generally taken as prescribed in Ord. XXXIII., rr. 3-9.

Even though no claim for an account is indorsed on the writ, the Court or a Judge may at any time, under Ord. XXXIII., r. 2, direct any necessary accounts to be taken.

Accountable Receipt. This is an acknowledgment of the receipt of money, or of any chattel, to be accounted for by the person receiving it. Forgery of an accountable receipt is felony (Forgery Act, 1913, s. 2 (2) (a)), such a receipt being a "valuable security" within the meaning of that section (ib., s. 18).

Accountant-General. The Accountant-General of the Court of Chancery was an officer created by the statute 12 Geo. 1, c. 32, who formerly received and lodged in the Bank of England all moneys paid into that Court. The Accountant-General of the Court of Exchequer, an officer also created by statute, used to perform similar duties in that Court. The Chancery Funds Act, 1872, abolished both offices and substituted the Paymaster-General (q.v.). By virtue of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Funds, etc.) Act, 1883, all moneys in Court in any division of the High Court are now under the control of the Paymaster-General (q.v.). In the High Court of Justice in Ireland an officer of that Court, known as the Accountant-General, performs (or, down to a year ago, used to perform) functions analogous to those of the Paymaster-General in England.

Accountant to the Crown. This means anyone who has received money for the Crown and is accountable therefor. Formerly, the Crown had a lien upon all lands and goods of the accountant as from the time when he became such accountant. But now, while the lien of the Crown as against goods still remains, the Land Charges Act, 1900, s. 2, enacts that no Crown debt of whatever date shall operate as a charge on land, or on any interest in land, unless and until a writ or order enforcing it has been registered pursuant to the Land Charges Registration Act, 1888, s. 8. The remedy of the Crown by writ of extent (see EXTENT) remains otherwise in full force. Crown debts take priority of all other debts. See DEBT.

Account Duty. This is the popular title of the duty imposed by the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, s. 38 (as amended by the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, s. 11, and the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, s. 59 (1)), upon personal property above the value of £100 passing at death by way of donatio mortis causa, joint investment, voluntary settlement, or under a policy of insurance kept up for a donee, or passing by voluntary disposition within three years before death. It was meant to apply to property which was not subject to probate duty. The rate of the duty varied with the value of the property from 2 per cent. to 3 per cent. The duty is not payable, in respect of deaths since 1st August, 1894, upon any property upon which estate duty (q.v.) is payable (Finance Act, 1894, s. 1, Sch. I. (1)). Nearly all property subject to account duty is subject also to estate duty. There are, however, a number of cases (as to which see Hanson, Death Duties (6th ed.), pp. 76-78) in which estate duty is not payable, and in some of which account duty still is payable.

Account, Settled. A settled account is a statement in writing of the accounts between two parties, one of whom is under a duty to account to the other, which both of them have agreed to and accepted as correct. It must show clearly either what balance is due from one to the other or that no balance is due. It is an admission of liability by the party against whom the balance appears; the law implies that he has promised to pay such balance; and on this implied promise he may be sued.

The plea of a settled account is a good defence to an action for an account, and, if coupled with an allegation that the balance appearing on the account has been paid, it is also a good defence to an action for money received by the defendant for the use of the plaintiff. The plaintiff may, however, in reply allege that the account is so affected by error (which he must specify) or by fraud that he ought not to be bound by it. Whether the account shall be set aside, or whether only leave will be given to the plaintiff to "surcharge and falsify" (that is to say, to add items in his favour which were omitted, and to strike out items against him which were wrongly inserted) is a matter entirely in the discretion of the Court. If fraud be proved, the account will be wholly set aside; but if only errors are proved, the account will not be wholly set aside unless there are a large number of errors, except in the case of parties in a fiduciary relationship (such as solicitor and client), when a less degree of error will lead to the account being taken as if there had never been a settlement. When one party is permitted to surcharge and falsify, the other may do so too.

As to reopening an account between a moneylender and his client, see MONEYLENDERS.

Account stated. This is an admission of a sum of money being due from one person to another, from which a promise to pay is implied in law. It differs from a settled account (see ACCOUNT, SETTLED), inasmuch as it applies to transactions with regard to which no person is under a duty to account to another, and with regard to which, therefore, the action for an account will not lie. The account, unlike a settled account, which must be in writing, may be stated either orally or in writing, and in any form. Thus, an I.O.U. is evidence of an account stated. An account stated is not necessarily binding. It may be shown to have been given in mistake, or for a debt in respect of which there has been a failure of consideration, or for a debt the consideration for which was illegal, or for a debt for which the person making the admission was not liable; and under the Infants Relief Act, 1874, s. 1, all accounts stated with infants are void.

An account stated is a distinct cause of action. When it is sued on as such it must be alleged with particulars in the statement of claim; but when it is merely relied on as evidence or admission in any other cause of action it is not to be alleged in the pleadings (R.S.C., Ord. XX., r. 8).

Accounts and Inquiries. Under R.S.C., Ord. XXXIII., r. 2, the Court or a judge may, at any stage of the proceedings in any cause or matter, direct any necessary enquiries or accounts to be made or taken, notwithstanding that it may appear that there is some special or further relief sought for, or some special issue to be tried as to which it may be proper that the cause or matter should proceed in the ordinary manner.

Under this rule the whole of the cause or matter cannot be sent to chambers to be tried there. It merely authorises, before trial, accounts and enquiries which would otherwise have been directed at the trial. When the provisions of the rule are applied after judgment, only such accounts and enquiries can be directed as are necessary for working out the judgment.

Under Ord. XV., r. 1, where the writ of summons is indorsed for an account under Ord. III., r. 8, or where the indorsement of the writ involves taking an account, then if the defendant fails to appear, or does not after appearance satisfy the Court that there is some preliminary question to be tried, an order for the proper accounts will be made. An order under this rule, unlike an order under Ord. XXXIII., r. 2, usually takes the place of the judgment.

These rules extend to the King's Bench Division; but that division, having no machinery for taking accounts, will, as a rule, transfer to the Chancery Division an action in which the taking of accounts appears necessary.

An application for an order under Ord. XV. is made by summons. Under Ord. XXXIII., the application is made either by summons, or, if there has been a summons for directions in the action, by motion on notice under such summons. Except in cases within Ord. LV., r. 15 (a) (which relates to trustees, etc.) the order may be made by a master or a district registrar. In a case coming within Ord. 55, r. 15 (a), it must be made by the judge.

Accounts and enquiries are usually prosecuted in chambers before a master, but, where the Court so directs, they may be prosecuted before a district registrar.

Accounts, Falsification of. Clerk, officer or servant or person acting as such (1) wilfully, and with intent to defraud, destroying, altering, mutilating, or falsifying any account, etc., belonging to or in possession of his employer, or received by him for his employer, or (2) wilfully and with like intent making or concurring in making, or being privy to making, any false entry in, or omitting or altering any material particular from or in such account, etc., is guilty of misdemeanour (Falsification of Accounts Act, 1875, ss. 1, 3; Larceny Act, 1861, s. 117).

Any director, officer, or contributory of a company being wound up, destroying, mutilating, altering, or falsifying any book, etc., or making or being privy to the making of any false or fraudulent entry in any book, etc., belonging to the company, with intent to defraud or deceive, is guilty of misdemeanour (Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, s. 216).

The Larceny Act, 1861, ss. 82, 83, 84, makes it misdemeanour for directors, etc., of any public company or body corporate to keep fraudulent accounts, or wilfully to destroy books, etc., or to publish fraudulent accounts relating or belonging to such company or body. No person guilty of an offence under these sections can refuse to answer any question in any proceedings by any person aggrieved or in bankruptcy; but he is protected from having his answer used in criminal proceedings against him as and to the extent set forth in s. 85 of the Larceny Act, 1861, and in the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 166.

Accredit. In international law, this is to furnish a diplomatic agent with papers, called credentials or letters of credit, which certify his public character. An ambassador, for instance, furnished with such papers is said to be accredited.

Accretion; Accrual; Accrue; Accruer. I. A right is said to accrue when it vests in a person, especially when it does so gradually or without his active intervention, e.g., by lapse of time, or by the determination of a preceding right. Thus the Statute of Limitations, 1833, contains provisions for ascertaining when the right to be barred is deemed to have first accrued, i.e., vested in the person entitled to exercise it; so, by the Apportionment Act, 1870, periodical payments in the nature of income are to be considered as accruing (i.e., the right to the payment is to be considered as arising) from day to day (see APPORTIONMENT). Hence a debt owing is opposed to a debt accruing—the former being a debt payable immediately, the latter a debt payable at a future time (debitum in præsenti solvendum in futuro). The fact of a right accruing is called its accrual.

II. When a fund, share, estate, security, or other property is increased by additions which take place ipso jure or ipso facto, the additions are said to accrue either to the original fund or to the person entitled to it. The most important cases of this are (1) when property is increased or added to by an act of nature—as in the case of the young of animals, which belong to the owners of the parents, and in the case of alluvion (q.v.) and dereliction (q.v.); (2) where property is increased or added to by the act of the party, but not by a mode of acquisition recognised by law, as in the case of encroachment (q.v.) by a tenant; (3) when a fund is increased by additions which arise from the rule accessorium sequitur principale (q.v.): this is called accretion, and the additions themselves are called accretions—e.g., the additions to a charitable fund from the increase in the rents of the land of which it originally consisted, the savings of a married woman's separate estate, etc.; (4) when A, not being seised of Blackacre, grants it to B, and afterwards becomes seised of it, whereupon it instantly passes to B; (5) when property is divisible among several persons so that, on a certain event happening, one of them is excluded from participation and the others take the whole: the share of that one is said to accrue to the others, and the fact of its doing so is called its accruer—thus, if £300 is given by will to three minors, A, B, and C, with a proviso that if any one of them dies under twenty-one his shares shall go to the survivors on A's death under age his share accrues to B and C, who (if they both attain twenty-one) will thus take £150 each, of which £100 is their original and £50 their accrued share; the clause containing this proviso is called a clause of accruer. The operation of the clause does not extend to the accrued shares unless that intention appears, so that if B also died under age, C would only take B's original share of £100 in addition to his own £150, and the testator would die intestate as to B's accrued share of £50. This result is always guarded against in well-drawn instruments by making the clause expressly extend to accrued shares. See JUS ACCRESCENDI; SURVIVORSHIP; ACCESSION; ALLUVION.

Accumulation. This is the putting by of dividends, rents, and other incomes, and converting them into principal by investing them, and again investing the income arising from the new principal, and so on.

Prior to 28th July, 1800, there was nothing to prevent a settlement, whether by will or deed, of property so that the income should accumulate for a life or lives in being and twenty-one years afterwards (see PERPETUITY), the effect of which was that accumulation might well last for, say, a hundred years.

But the Accumulation Act, 1800 (commonly called the Thellusson Act), prohibits the settlement, whether by deed or will, of any property in such manner that the income shall be accumulated for any longer period than one only of the following periods:—(1) The life of the settlor; (2) the term of twenty-one years from the death of the settlor; (3) during the minority or respective minorities of any person who shall be living or en ventre sa mere at the death of the settlor; and (4) during the minority or respective minorities of any person or persons who, if of full age, would be entitled to the income directed to be accumulated.

The Act directs that, so far as the direction to accumulate shall be void for excess, the income shall belong to the person or persons "who would have been entitled thereto if such accumulation had not been directed."

The Act expressly excepts from its operation:—(a) Provisions for the payment of the debts of the settlor or of any other person; (b) provisions for raising portions for children either of the settlor or of any person taking any interest under the settlement; (c) directions touching the sale of wood or timber.

The Act did not originally extend to Scotland, but it was applied to "heritable property" in Scotland by the Entail Amendment Act, 1838, s. 41. It has never been applied to Ireland.

The Accumulations Act, 1892, forbids the settlement or disposition of any property, real or personal, so as to accumulate the income "for the purchase of land only" for any longer period than during the minority of a person who, if of full age, would be entitled to the income.

Where property is held by trustees in trust for an infant contingently on his attaining twenty-one or some less age, the trustees are, under s. 43 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, to accumulate for him so much of the income as is not required for his maintenance (q.v.); and in any settlement made since 1881 no accumulation clause is inserted to provide for such a case. But in other cases accumulation can take place only where it is expressly directed.

Accumulative Judgment, Sentence. See CUMULATIVE JUDGMENT, SENTENCE.

Accusare nemo se debet; Accusare nemo se debet nisi coram Deo (Hawke, 222). (No one is bound to accuse himself except to God.) This means that an accused person is always entitled to plead not guilty, and also that a witness is not bound to answer any question or to produce any document where, in the opinion of the Court, the answer to the question or the production of the document would tend to expose the witness, or apparently his or her wife or husband, to any criminal charge or to any penalty or forfeiture. But a witness cannot refuse to answer on the ground that his answer would tend to establish that he owes a debt, or is otherwise liable to civil proceedings. See ADMISSION (IN CRIMINAL CASES).

Accusation of Crime. A conspiracy to accuse a person falsely of crime is a common law misdemeanour.

As to accusations of crime, see ABOMINABLE CRIME; ADVOCATE; DEFAMATION; MALICIOUS PROSECUTION; MENACES; PRIVILEGE.

Accusator post rationabile tempus non est audiendus, nisi se bene de omissione excusaverit (Moor. 817). (An accuser is not to be heard after a reasonable time, unless he can account satisfactorily for the delay.) The maxim is to be found in Bracton, who wrote about 1250, and it was cited in the Star Chamber in 1612 upon the hearing of a charge against sundry persons who were charged with conspiring to bring a charge of murder sixteen years after the death of the man alleged to be murdered. The maxim is not of general application in English law. Except where a time limit for prosecution is fixed by express enactment, no delay is a bar to a prosecution. But the evidence of a witness who, without satisfactory explanation, fails for a long time to disclose his knowledge of a crime, will naturally be regarded with suspicion.

Accustomed Rent. Where a power of leasing was created, it was formerly usual to require the reservation of the "accustomed rent" or of the "ancient and accustomed rent," instead of the "best" or "most rent." When this was done it meant the rent reserved at the creation of the power, or, if there was then no rent, the last preceding rent.

Ac etiam. The statute 13 Car. 2, st. 2, c. 2, s. 1, provided that no greater bail than £40 was to be required from any person arrested upon any writ, bill, or other process issuing out of the Court of King's Bench or Common Pleas, unless the true cause of action was set forth in such process. The particulars of the cause of action in processes, such as Bills of Middlesex Writs, etc., for the recovery of debts over £10 came to be introduced by the words Ac etiam (and also); and the words were used to describe the clause introduced by them.

Acknowledgment. This term is used in several Acts of Parliament relating to the limitation of time for actions. It means an admission in writing that a debt is due, or that some claim or liability is still in existence. If it be a valid acknowledgment within the meaning of the statute applicable to the matter in question, it prevents the statute from running, i.e., it prevents the cause of action from becoming unsustainable. To make an acknowledgment efficacious it must not only be in proper terms, but it must also be made by the proper person, to the proper person, and with the proper (if any) formalities.

What is an acknowledgment within the various statutes, is a question of construction to be determined by the Court in each case. There are, however, some general rules on the subject. Thus, an acknowledgment under the Civil Procedure Act, 1833 (as to specialties), need not amount to a promise to pay, while, under the Statute of Frauds Amendment Act, 1828 (as to simple contract debts), the acknowledgment must contain, either expressly or impliedly, not only an admission of the debt, but also a promise to pay accordingly. These words in a letter: "I wish I could comply with your request, for I am very wretched on account of your account not being paid; there is a prospect of an abundant harvest, which must turn into a goodly sum, and considerably reduce your account; if it does not, the concern must be broken up to meet it; my hope is, that out of the present harvest you will be paid"— were held to be a sufficient acknowledgment to revive a debt under the Statute of Frauds Amendment Act, 1828. In the case of the statutes relating to debts, part payment on account of principal or interest amounts to an acknowledgment, so as to prevent the statute from running.

The word "acknowledgment" is also used in connection with wills and certain mortgages.

If a will is not signed in the presence of the witnesses, the testator must acknowledge his signature in their presence (Wills Act, 1837, s. 9). It is not necessary that he should say in express words to the witnesses, "That is my signature": it is sufficient if it clearly appears that the signature was existent in the will when it was produced to the witnesses, and was seen by them when they did, at the testator's request, subscribe the will.

If a mortgagee of copyholds by conditional surrender has not been admitted, and the mortgage is paid off, the practice is to enter on the Court rolls a memorandum, called an acknowledgment of satisfaction, stating that the debt has been paid. This is treated as sufficient evidence of the discharge of the mortgage and as vacating the surrender. See TITLE DEEDS.

Acknowledgment Money, a sum of money formerly paid by copyhold tenants of certain manors on the death of the lord in acknowledgment of their new lord. It was distinct from the fine, which, in some exceptional cases, is still paid on the death of the lord.

Acknowledgment of Deeds. All deeds purporting to dispose of any estate or interest in the land of a woman married before 1st January, 1883, or of her reversionary interest in personal property, must, unless she is entitled thereto for her separate use or her title thereto has accrued since that date, be executed by her husband, as well as by her, and must be acknowledged by her in accordance with the Fines and Recoveries Act, 1833, and s. 7 of the Conveyancing Act, 1882, and the rules made thereunder.

Neither the concurrence of the husband nor any acknowledgment is required, except as stated above (Married Women's Property Act, 1882).

The acknowledgment is made by the wife before a judge or a commissioner appointed for the purpose, who examines her separately and apart from her husband as to her knowledge of, and consent to, the contents of the deed. If she then acknowledges that she has freely and voluntarily executed the deed, a memorandum setting forth the fact of her separate examination as above, and of her acknowledgment, is then indorsed on the deed by the judge or commissioner. See FINE; REVERSIONARY.

A communi observantia non est recedendum (Co. Litt. 229). (Common usage is not to be departed from.) This maxim merely expresses the conservatism of the common law. "Commonly a new invention doth offend against many rules and reasons of the common law," says Lord Coke (Co. Litt. 379). Compare MINIME MUTANDA, ETC., PERICULOSUM EST, ETC.; OMNIS INNOVATIO, ETC.

Acquiescence. This takes place when a person, with full knowledge of his own rights and of any acts which intringe them, has, either at the time of infringement or after infringement, by his conduct led the persons responsible for the infringement to believe that he has waived or abandoned his rights. It is frequently associated with the word laches (meaning slackness) in the phrase "laches and acquiescence."

Thus, if one is induced by fraud to enter into a contract and subsequently discovers the fraud, he will be held to have acquiesced in, and so to have confirmed, the contract, if he fails for a number of years to bring proceedings to have the contract set aside and is guilty of laches; and, if the acquiescence occurs while the act complained of is in progress, and if the person acquiescing is at the time fully aware of his rights, he cannot afterwards be heard to complain of the act. See ESTOPPEL; VIGILANTIBUS, ETC.

Acquietandis Plegiis, a writ which formerly lay for a surety against a creditor who refused to acquit (q.v.) him after the debt was satisfied.

Acquietare, to acquit (q.v.).

Acquit, the English for acquietare, which meant quietum reddere (to make quiet). It was originally in general use as meaning to discharge from pecuniary liability; now it is used as an equivalent for "find not guilty."

Acquittal. This term applies to offences tried on indictment, and means discharge from prosecution upon a verdict of not guilty, or on a successful plea of pardon or of autrefois acquit or autrefois convict (q.v.). Acquittal is a bar to any subsequent prosecution for the same offence. Whether it is a bar or not to another, and a different, charge depends on whether the evidence necessary to support a conviction on the second prosecution would have been sufficient to support a conviction on the first.

In the old books, the term is also used in a special sense to denote an obligation by a lord to his tenant. In some cases, where land was held of a mesne lord, he was bound to protect his tenant from any claims by lords paramount arising out of the services due to them by the mesne lord; this was called acquittal. See HOMAGE.

Acquittance, a written acknowledgment of the payment of a sum of money or debt due. It cannot be pleaded, but can only be given in evidence, unless it is under seal, in which case it is called a release. An acquittance is an answer to an action for the sum of money or debt. Forgery of an acquittance is felony under the Forgery Act, 1913, s. 2 (2) (a) (s. 18 (1), sub "valuable security").

Acreage. The imperial or standard acre contains 4,840 square yards (Weights and Measures Act, 1878, s. 12). This is the only acre known to the law. Customary acres are the Welsh acre, containing 9,680 square yards; the Irish acre, containing 7,840 square yards; and the Scotch acre, containing 6,150⅖ square yards. In any will, contract for sale, conveyance, or other instrument, the word "acre" will be taken to mean the statutory acre unless a customary acre is clearly indicated, and no evidence extrinsic to the will, etc., will be admitted to show that a customary acre was in fact intended.

A contract for the sale of land by the customary acre is probably lawful.

Acrobat. See CRUELTY TO CHILDREN. DANGEROUS PERFORMANCES.

Acta exteriora indicant interiora secreta (8 Rep. 146). (External actions show internal secrets); that is to say, a man's intentions are to be inferred from his acts.

Act in Pais. This means literally an act in the country. See IN PAIS.

Actionare, i.e., IN JUS VOCARE (q.v.).

Actiones nominatae. Anciently this meant the approved forms of writs. See ACTION ON THE CASE.

Action of a Writ. This was the term used for a pleading showing that the plaintiff had issued a writ which was not appropriate to the cause of action alleged. See ACTION ON THE CASE; compare PLEA TO THE ACTION.

Actio. non (Actionem non). The technical name of the commencement of a plea in bar, down to Hilary Term, 1834. Before 1733 (see FRENCH) these words were part of the Latin form which had for long been in use. Compare SI ACTIONEM; see Stephen, Pleading (5th ed.), p. 435.

Actio non datur non damnificato (Jenk. Cent. 69). (No one who is not damnified has a cause of action.)

Action on the Case. At a very early stage in English law, writs were framed for the more obvious causes of action. Each had its appropriate formula of complaint or claim. As time went on, this list came to be regarded as an exhaustive catalogue of the causes of action known to the law of England. If there was no writ with a formula to fit the case of an injured person, then that person had no remedy. The Statute of Westminster II., 13 Edw. 1, c. 24, was passed in 1288 in order to put an end to this state of affairs. It enacted that when a writ was found in Chancery (where original writs were prepared for suitors by the clerks) but in a like case (in consimili casu), falling under the same right, and requiring the same remedy, no writ was to be found, the clerks should agree in making a new writ, or, if they could not agree, they were to refer the matter to Parliament. Any writ framed under this power was known as a writ in an action on the case.

An action on the case was one brought to recover damages for a loss or injury resulting, not directly, but indirectly or consequentially, from the act complained of. Thus, trespass was one of the old causes of action. If a man threw a log into a highway and hit a person there, that injured person might maintain an action of trespass in respect of the injury sustained, because it resulted directly from the act complained of; but if, while the log was lying where it had been thrown, a person fell over it and was injured, he could only bring an action of trespass on the case, because the injury resulted only indirectly from the act complained of. Parliament from time to time itself provided new writs; but down to 1875 a plaintiff's writ had either to be in one of the ancient forms, or in a form authorised by statute, or in consimili casu with one of the ancient forms. An action on the case was thus one which used to lie in the absence of any more appropriate form of action. All forms of action are now abolished by the Judicature Acts; but the term "action on the case" is still used to describe an action which would have been so described before these Acts.

Action, Prejudicial. In the time of Bracton, the actio præjudicialius was a proceeding so called because it had to be disposed of before the hearing of a pending action. Thus, if it were pleaded that a plaintiff, claiming as heir of his father's lands held by a younger brother, was in fact a bastard, then the question of pedigree had to be decided before the original action could proceed.

Actions. As will be seen under ACTION ON THE CASE, a plaintiff down to 1875 could sue only in one or other of certain forms of action. If he selected the wrong form of action, he necessarily failed, even though he could clearly have succeeded on a different writ. Now all forms of action are abolished. The plaintiff merely states the facts on which he relies, and claims the relief which he desires.

Immediately before 1875 the following were the several actions known to the law (I.) on contract, which were (a) covenant, being on a deed alone; (b) assumpsit, being on a simple contract only; (c) debt, being either on a deed or on a simple contract; (d) scire facias, being on a judgment; (e) account; and (f) annuity: (II.) on tort, which were (g) trespass, quare clausum fregit, to real property, and trespass, de bonis asportatis, to goods; (h) case; (i) trover; (j) detinue; and (k) replevin: and (III.) the mixed action of ejectment.

Before the Judicature Acts, "action" or "action at law" generally meant a proceeding in one of the common law Courts, as opposed to a suit in equity. The frame of the writ, and the pleadings in each case, depended on the nature of the right to be enforced and was extremely technical. In early times, actions were divided into criminal and civil, criminal actions being appeals and other proceedings in the name of the Crown. In modern times, however, "action" always meant a civil action. In this sense, actions were divided into real, personal, and mixed:—real (or feudal) actions being those for the specific recovery of lands or other realty; personal actions, those for the recovery of a debt, personal chattel, or damages; and mixed actions, those for the recovery of real property, together with damages for a wrong connected with it. By the Real Property Limitations Act, 1833, s. 36, all real and mixed actions were abolished, except the writs of right of dower, dower, quare impedit, and ejectment (see those titles).

Actions were also divided into local and transitory, according as they were founded on such causes of action as necessarily referred to some particular locality (as in the case of trespasses to land) or not; but this distinction no longer exists (see VENUE). Another now obsolete distinction is between a feint, faint, or feigned action—that is, one in which the words of the writ were true, yet, for certain causes not appearing on the writ, the plaintiff had no right to recover what he claimed—and a false action, or one in which the words were false or untrue. If a person recovered land against a tenant in tail by a feint or false action, after the death of the tenant in tail his issue could recover the land back again.

Actions and Matters in the High Court. Before the Judicature Acts, there were actions at common law, suits in Chancery, causes in Admiralty, and citations in Probate. R.S.C., Ord. I., r. 1, provides that all such proceedings are now to be known as actions.

The terms "cause," "suit," and "action" are defined as follows in the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 100: "'Cause' includes any action, suit, or other original proceeding between a plaintiff and a defendant, and any criminal proceeding by the Crown; 'suit' includes an action; 'action' means a civil proceeding commenced by writ or in such other manner as may be prescribed by rules of Court, and does not include a criminal proceeding by the Crown; 'matter' includes every proceeding in the Court not in a cause."

It will, therefore, be seen that all civil proceedings in the High Court are now divisible into actions and matters. See WRIT OF SUMMONS; PENAL ACTIONS.

Actionum genera maxime sunt servanda (Lofft. Max. 160) (Every action must be in the proper form). This maxim applied to the rules governing the forms of action before the Judicature Acts. See ACTION ON THE CASE.

Actio personalis moritur cum persona (Noy, Max. 20). (A personal action dies with the person.) At the present time this maxim is limited to actions of tort and does not apply to personal actions founded on contract. The maxim now means that rights of action arising out of torts are in general destroyed by the death of either the injured or the injuring party. Thus an action for libel, slander, false imprisonment or assault, cannot be brought after the death of either party. But an action may be maintained by the personal representatives of a deceased person in respect of an injury to his property during his lifetime; and an action lies against them for wrongs committed by him in respect of his property. So also, under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846 (Lord Campbell's Act), an action can be maintained by the personal representatives of a deceased person whose death was caused by the wrongful act, neglect, or default of another; and under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, the right of a dependant of a deceased workman to make a claim and bring proceedings under that Act passes to the personal representative of a sole dependant who has died without making a claim. It may be stated generally that, in the event of the death of the injured person, the maxim applies only in the cases of torts to the reputation of the injured person and of torts to the person of the injured person which did not cause his death, whereas, in the case of the death of the injuring person, the right of action survives only where there was injury to property.

Actio quaelibet it via sua (Jenk. Cent. 77). (Every action follows its prescribed course.) This maxim is used with reference to a case, tried in the year 1409, where the question was whether the now obsolete writ de libertate probanda was properly delivered to a sheriff before the return of another equally obsolete writ de nativo habendo.

Act of Attainder. See ATTAINDER.

Act of Bankruptcy. A debtor commits an act of bankruptcy:—

(a) If he makes an assignment of any of his property for the benefit of his creditors generally.

(b) If he makes a fraudulent transfer of any part of his property.

(c) If he makes any disposition of any part of his property which amounts to a fraudulent preference.

(d) If, with intent to defeat or delay his creditors, he leaves, or stays out of, England or departs from his dwelling-house or otherwise absents himself, or begins to keep house (q.v.).

(e) If execution has been levied against him under process in any action in any court or in civil proceedings in the High Court and the goods have either been sold or held by the sheriff for twenty-one days: but if an interpleader (q.v.) summons is taken out, the time between its issue and the date on which the sheriff is ordered to withdraw or on which the summons is disposed of, is not counted as part of the twenty-one days.

(f) If he files a declaration of inability to pay his debts or presents his own petition in bankruptcy.

(g) If a creditor who has obtained any final judgment or order against him duly serves him with a bankruptcy notice, and he does not comply with such notice or satisfy the Court that he has a cross-claim equal to or exceeding the sum due under such judgment or order.

(h) If the debtor gives notice to any creditor that he has suspended, or is about to suspend, payment of his debts (Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 1).

Act of God. This means an event which happens independently of human action; such as death from natural causes, storm, earthquake, etc. The expression is used in the law of real property; there a tenancy in tail after possibility of issue extinct is said to be created by the act of God, for it cannot be created by any act of man, such as a divorce, and can be created only by the death of the husband or wife of the tenant in tail: but it is now used chiefly in the law of insurance and with reference to contract and tort.

In the law of insurance, the insurer is not liable to indemnify the insured against the act of God; and the same rule applies to a common carrier.

As regards the law of contract, the act of God is a defence to an action for breach of contract only when the occurrence relied on as an act of God is one which was in fact not provided for by the contract. Thus, where a lessee of land covenants to leave the timber thereon in as good a plight at the end of the lease as it was at the beginning, and the timber is destroyed by a storm, the lessee is not bound by his covenant.

In the law of torts, a person may be held not liable for damage caused indirectly by his agency but directly by the act of God. Thus, where a man made a reservoir by damming a stream and used all proper and reasonable care in making and maintaining the dam, he was held not liable for injury to the land of another when the dam was burst by extraordinary rainfall.

When the law creates a duty, and the party bound to perform it is prevented from so doing by the act of God, he is not liable for its non-performance.

Act of Indemnity, an Act passed to legalise transactions which, when they took place, were illegal, or to exempt particular persons from pecuniary penalties or punishments for acts done in the public service which technically were breaches of the law. Such Acts have been passed from time to time to justify the action of military authorities in exercise of martial law (q.v.) or to relieve peers from penalties for having inadvertently voted in the House of Lords without having taken the oath: and for many years preceding the abolition of tests (q.v.) for municipal offices, an Act of Indemnity was passed annually to relieve dissenters who had accepted office.

Act of Oblivion. This is the popular title of the statute 12 Car. 2, c. 11, which, except as regards certain persons named therein, gave a general indemnity for all illegal acts done during "the late interruption of government," i.e. from the beginning of the rebellion against Charles I. to the restoration in 1660 of Charles II.

Act of Parliament. Acts of Parliament are generally, and until 1911 were invariably, made by the Sovereign with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons in Parliament assembled. Now, under the Parliament Act, 1911, an Act can be passed by the Sovereign and the Commons without the concurrence of the Lords, in the circumstances set forth in the Act.

The royal assent to a bill is given either by the King personally or by commission. If given by commission, assent can be given only to the bills named in the schedule to the commission. Assent is signified by the words, "Le Roy le veult," or, in the case of money bills, by the words "Le Roy remercie ses bons sujets, accepte leur benevolence, et ainsi le veult." In the now almost inconceivable event of the royal dissent, the words, "Le Roy s'avisera" would be used.

An Act comes into force on the day that it receives the royal assent, unless some other date is expressly provided. The day on which an Act comes into force includes the whole period from the end of the last preceding day. Acts are either public or private. All Acts passed since 1850 are to be deemed public Acts, and are to be judicially noticed as such, unless the contrary is expressly provided by the Act (Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 9), the effect of which is that they need not be pleaded or proved.

Public Acts are divided into general Acts, which affect the whole community or a considerable part of it; local Acts, which relate to a particular area; and personal Acts, relating to the incorporation of trading bodies, etc.

Since 1868, local and personal Acts have been printed in a series of volumes separately from the general Acts and from private Acts, and Roman figures are used to indicate the number of the chapter (e.g. 20 & 21 Vict. c. xci.), whereas in general Acts Arabic figures (e.g., 44 & 45 Vict. c. 9) are used.

Private Acts relate to the affairs of individuals. They are divided into (a) those that are printed for sale, and (b) those that are not printed for sale. Private Acts which have been printed for sale are proved by the production of a King's printer's copy, or of a copy printed otherwise under his Majesty's authority, or under the authority of his Majesty's Stationery Office. Private Acts which have not been printed for sale are proved by an exemplification (q.v.) transcript (q.v.), or copy of the original from the Record Office or Clerk of the Parliaments (q.v.).

There is also a class of Acts which may be placed midway between public and private Acts, namely, those which contain clauses required to be inserted in private Acts of frequent occurrence. For the sake of uniformity, and to avoid the necessity of repeating such clauses in each private Act, the clauses are set out in a general Act, so that when a private or special Act relating to the matter in question is passed, the general Act is incorporated with it. Thus the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts, 1845, 1860 and 1869, contain the "provisions usually inserted in Acts authorizing the taking of lands for undertakings of a public nature," such as provisions for ascertaining the value of land purchased under compulsory powers, for payment of the purchase-money into Court where the parties entitled to it are under disability, etc. Other Acts of a similar nature are the Companies Clauses Acts, 1845 and 1863, the Railways Clauses Acts, 1845 and 1863, the Commissioners Clauses Act, 1845, the Harbours, Docks and Piers Clauses Act, 1847.

A private Act which is not judicially noticed must be pleaded in any proceeding in which it is relied on as grounding either a claim or a defence.

Act of Settlement, the short title of the statute 12 & 13 Will. 3, c. 2, which enacted that, after the death of William III. and of the Princess Anne (afterwards Queen Anne) and in default of issue of either of them, the crown should descend to Sophia, Electress of Hanover and the heirs of her body, being Protestants.

The other more important provisions of the Act were:—

(a) That the sovereign shall be a member of the Church of England as by law established and shall vacate the throne on becoming or marrying a Roman Catholic.

(b) That judges should hold office during good behaviour and be paid fixed salaries, but might be removed from office on the address of both Houses of Parliament.

(c) That no pardon under the Great Seal of England should be pleadable to an impeachment (q.v.), that is to say, should prevent anyone from being impeached.

The provision as to judges has been, in effect, re-enacted by the Judicature Act, 1875, s. 5, and was, therefore, subsequently repealed The Lord Chancellor, who was never in point of law a judge, has been specifically excepted from s. 5 of the Judicature Act, 1875.

Act of State. This is an act done by the sovereign power of a country or its agent, within the limit of the power vested in it. Such an Act cannot be questioned or made the subject of legal proceedings in any Court of law. See COLONIAL GOVERNORS.

Act of Supremacy. This is the popular title of the statute 1 Eliz. c. 1, passed in 1558 to establish the supremacy of the Crown in ecclesiastical matters. It prescribed for all spiritual and temporal officers a supremacy oath, for which another was substituted by the statute of 1 Will. & M. c. 8, s. 12. The substituted oath was continued by the statute 21 & 22 Vict. c. 48, s. 1; and it was finally replaced by the oath prescribed by the Promissory Oaths Act, 1868, s. 2, which, in accordance with the Clerical Subscription Act, 1865, must be taken by every clergyman before ordination or institution, and by every bishop or archbishop before confirmation (see CONGÉ D'ELIRE).

Act of Uniformity. This is the popular title of the statute 14 Car. 2, c. 4, passed in 1662 to regulate public worship.

Act of Union. As regards Wales, this term may be applied to the statute 27 Hen. 8, c 26, passed in 1536, by which Wales was for the first time incorporated with and united into England and was made subject to the English law. The earlier Statutum Walliæ, 12 Edw. 1 (1284), had made Wales only feudally subject to the English kings and had not entirely abrogated Welsh law.

As regards Scotland, the term means the Union with Scotland Act, 1706, 5 Anne, c. 8.

As regards Ireland, the term means the Union with Ireland Act, 1800.

Acton Burnel, Statute of. This statute (4 Edw. 1) is also known as the Statutum de Mercatoribus. It was passed in 1283 by the King and his council, in the assembly known as the Parliament of Shrewsbury (or Acton Burnel), after its provisions had been discussed by certain representatives of the Commons who had been summoned to the assembly. The Commons, however, had no part in the actual passing of the statute. The statute was intended to give merchants a speedy remedy for the recovery of their debts; but this was not effective until the enactment of the statute of 13 Edw. 1, c. 18 (Westminster II.) known as the Statutum Mercatorum. The Statute of Acton Burnel established the Statute Merchant (q.v.). The later CARTA MERCATORIA (q.v.) applied to foreign merchants.

Actor, a term, borrowed from the Roman law, which formerly was used to denote the person who had the active claim in a judicial proceeding, e.g. a plaintiff, or a claimant, or a demandant under the old practice. So, in an action of replevin, although the person who actively claimed the distress (the distrainor) was in point of form the defendant, he was regarded as actor equally with the plaintiff who was in possession of the goods distrained and merely resisted the defendant's claim for their return.

Actor sequitur forum rei (Branch, M. 4). (A plaintiff must sue in the jurisdiction to which the defendant is subject.) But this maxim is subject to many qualifications.

Actore non probante absolvitur reus. (When the plaintiff does not prove his case, judgment is for the defendant; when the prosecution does not prove its case, the accused is acquitted.) Reus in old law Latin meant, in civil proceedings, the defendant, and, in criminal proceedings, the accused.

Actori incumbit onus probandi (4 Rep. 71 b). (The burden of proof is on the plaintiff or prosecution.) But the burden may shift during the course of the proceedings. See BURDEN OF PROOF.

Actori incumbit probatio (Hob. 103). (He who affirms must prove.) This burden of proof is on the plaintiff or the prosecution.

Actual Bodily Harm. This expression occurs in s. 47 of the Offences against the Person Act, 1861. It includes any hurt or injury, whether permanent or otherwise, which interferes with the health or comfort of the person assaulted. It need not amount to "grievous bodily harm," which is dealt with in ss. 11, 18, and other sections of the same statute.

The expression is also used in the Children Dangerous Performances Acts, 1879 and 1897. See BODILY HARM.

Actual Entry. A person has made an actual entry on land as soon as he has any part of his body thereon. If actual entry be prevented by violence or fear of violence, he makes an entry in law by approaching as near as he can and then making his claim; and by so doing he is held to have made an actual entry. Actual entry converts a seisin in law into a seisin in deed. See SEISIN.

Actual Military Service. A soldier on actual military service may, under the Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 2), s. 22, and the Wills Act, 1837, s. 11, make a nuncupative or other informal will (see WILLS), even though he is under the age of twenty-one (Wills (Soldiers and Sailors) Act, 1918, s. 1). It would seem that a female nurse in the employment of the War Office is within these enactments. Actual military service does not mean only service in the army. It means service in or connected with operations of war.

Actual Possession. When any person, whether himself or by an agent, enters, in assertion of his right, into possession of lands to which he is entitled, the law immediately vests the actual possession in him. If two persons, each in the exercise of his alleged right, enter, then whichever of them may be entitled to possession is in actual possession and the other is a trespasser.

Actual Total Loss. Defined by s. 57 of the Marine Insurance Act, 1906.

Actuary. In ecclesiastical law, this means the registrar of the Lower House of Convocation. See CONVOCATION.

Ordinarily, an actuary means one who is skilled in calculating the value of life interests, reversions, policies of assurance, annuities, etc. The Institute of Actuaries was formed in 1848 and was incorporated by royal charter in 1884.

Actus curiae neminem gravabit (Jenk. Cent. 118). (The act of the Court hurts no one): which means that the Court will remedy any inconvenience caused to suitors by its rules of procedure.

Actus Dei nemini facit injuriam (Lofft. M. 102). (The law holds no man responsible for the act of God.) As to the application of this maxim, see ACT OF GOD. In 5 Rep. 87 a, Lord Coke said: "The death of the defendant is the act of God, which shall not turn to the prejudice of the plaintiff."

Actus Dei nemini nocet. (No one is to be prejudiced by the act of God.) But this maxim is not of universal application. Thus, where a prisoner was on trial for a capital offence and one of the jury became incapacitated by illness so that the jury had to be discharged, it was argued that the prisoner ought not to be put on trial again, but a fresh jury was empanelled and convicted the prisoner: see 4 Taunt. 412.

Actus inceptus cujus perfectio pendet ex voluntate partium revocari potest: si autem pendet ex voluntate tertiae personae vel ex contingenti, revocari non potest (Bac. Max. Reg. 20). (A transaction begun, but not completed, may be cancelled if its completion depends on the mutual consent of the parties; but it cannot be cancelled if its completion depends on the consent of a third party or on a contingency.)

Actus judiciarius coram non judice irritus habetur: de ministeriali autem a quocunque provenit ratum esto (Lofft. Max, 458). (When an act is done without or in excess of jurisdiction, the act will be invalid if it is a judicial act, but, if it is a ministerial act, the question as to whether it is valid or invalid depends on circumstances.)

Actus legis nemini est damnosus (2 Inst. 287.) (An act in the law shall prejudice no man.)

Actus legis nemini facit injuriam. (Bac. Abr. Trespass (B)). (No man is wronged by an act of the law.) See Co. Litt. 379 a, [1894] 3 Ch. 175.

Actus legitimi non recipiunt modum (Hob. 153.) This maxim occurs in the report of the "Great Case of the Commendam" argued in the Exchequer Chamber in 1612; . . . "The acts of Presentation, Institution and Induction are all authorities given by Law, and must be executed according to the form prescribed by Law and cannot be modified; for Actus legitimi non recipiunt modum." The maxim means that when the doing of anything in a particular manner is sanctioned by the law, then the thing cannot be done in a different way. A sentence of death by hanging will not justify electrocution.

Actus me invito non est meus actus. (What I do is not my act at all when my will does not concur.) This means, for instance, that an act cannot be criminal unless the will of the person who does the act freely concurs in the doing of the act, and that a will, deed, or contract is invalid if made under compulsion. But as regards deeds or contracts, compulsion does not include compulsion by the law.

Actus non facit reum, nisi mens sit rea (3 Inst. 107.) (The intent and the act must both concur to constitute a crime.) But the concurrence which is necessary varies in different cases. Thus, if A unlawfully and of malice aforethought fires at B with intent to kill him, but misses B and kills C, A is guilty of the murder of C, even though A had no intention whatever to kill C. And where a publican supplies drink to a drunken person he is guilty of an offence even though he did not know that the person was drunk; for the enactment creating the offence absolutely forbids a publican to supply drink to any person who is in fact drunk. Compare IN CRIMINALIBUS, ETC.: VOLUNTAS IN, ETC.

Ad colligenda bona. See GRANT.

Adcredulitare. In Anglo-Saxon times, this meant to purge oneself of an accusation by oath; compare ADLEGIARE.

Ad damnum, that part of the old declaration—now statement of claim (q.v.)—which commenced with the words "to the damage, etc.," was called the breach and sometimes the breach ad damnum.

Ad diem, on the day [appointed].

Addition. This means, in law, the address and occupation or rank of a person, as given in a deed or other legal document after his name.

Address for Service. Where the plaintiff in an action (if he appears in person), or his solicitor (if he appears by solicitor), resides or carries on business at a place more than three miles from the Courts of Justice, the writ of summons (if issued out of the Central Office) must be indorsed with a proper place, to be called his address for service, not more than three miles from the Courts, where writs, notices, summonses, orders, etc., may be left for him; and where the writ is issued out of a district registry, it must be endorsed with a like address within the district (Ord. IV., rr. 1, 2, 3; which—see rule 4—apply also to any document, other than a writ, which originates proceedings). So also, a memorandum of appearance, if entered at the Central Office, must state an address for service within three miles of the Courts of Justice, or, if entered at a district registry, an address for service within the district; see Ord. XII., rr. 10, 11.

Ad ea quae frequentius accidunt jura adaptantur (2 Inst. 137). (The laws are adapted to these cases which more frequently occur.) If a case occurs which is not provided for by a statute, it must be dealt with according to the law existing before the statute was passed.

Compare JUS CONSTITUI, ETC.

Ademption. This means the complete or partial extinction or withholding of a legacy (but not of a devise of real estate) by some act of the testator during his life other than revocation by a testamentary instrument, or otherwise, as is provided by the Wills Act, 1837.

As to the several kinds of legacies, see LEGACY. A general legacy, if given to a child by a parent or by one in loco parentis, is liable to ademption if, and in so far as, a portion is given to the child subsequently to the execution of the will; but a general legacy to a stranger is not liable to ademption unless it is declared to have been given in discharge of some moral obligation and such obligation is subsequently discharged in whole or in part before the death of the testator, in which latter case the law will presume that the testator did not desire to discharge the obligation more than once.

Specific legacies are adeemed if the specific thing bequeathed ceases to belong, and does not again come to belong, to the testator before his death.

Demonstrative legacies are not liable to ademption by reason of the fund out of which payment is directed not being assets of the testator at his death, unless such fund is declared to be the only fund for payment. If given to a child, they are probably liable to ademption in so far as a portion has been subsequently paid to the child. And if given to a stranger in discharge of a moral obligation, they are liable to ademption if and in so far as such obligation has been discharged during the lifetime of the testator.

As to ademption by satisfaction, see SATISFACTION.

Ad feodi formam, to fee farm.

Ad filum. See AD MEDIUM FILUM.

Ad idem. Parties to a contract are said to be ad idem when each of them has a distinct intention in common with the other or others. Unless they are ad idem there is no contract.

Ad inquirendum, to enquire. There were a large number of writs ad inquirendum, which were used to make enquiry regarding matters relating to causes pending in the King's courts, such, for instance, as the writ ad inquirendum si mulier legitime copulata matrimonio (to make enquiry whether the woman is lawfully married) directed to a bishop.

Adiratus. In the time of Bracton, this meant pecuniary compensation for stolen goods.

Adjective Law. In jurisprudence, this means so much of the law as relates to practice and procedure; whereas substantive law means the law which is administered by the Courts. The terms were first used by Bentham.

Adjoining Owners. Every owner of land is entitled to receive from the adjoining land such support for his land as is sufficient while it is in its natural state, that is to say, while it is without buildings on it; and an action lies if land collapses by reason of being deprived of such support.

The owner of land is under no obligation so to fence it as to keep out his neighbour's cattle. The owner of cattle is under a duty to keep them from trespassing.

The owner of land which is overhung by trees growing on his neighbour's land is entitled, without notice, if he does not trespass on his neighbour's land, to cut the branches so far as they overhang, though they have done so for more than twenty years; and if his crops are damaged by such overhanging, he can recover damages from his neighbour.

No action lies for injury to a man's cattle in consequence of their eating the branches of trees growing on his neighbour's land, unless the branches project over the land of the man whose cattle are injured. And an owner of land who neglects to cut thistles growing thereon in such time as to prevent them from seeding is not liable for damage caused by the seeds being blown on to his neighbour's land.

Where the boundary between the lands of different owners consists of a hedge and a ditch, it will, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, be presumed that the ditch, if artificial, belongs to the man on whose land is the hedge; but if the ditch is a natural watercourse, it is doubtful whether such presumption arises.

Adjournamentum est ad diem dicere seu diem dare (4 Inst. 27). (Adjournment is to appoint a day or give a day). This is a mere definition of the adjournment, as distinguished from the prorogation, of Parliament.

Adjournment. This means a putting off to another day. It usually is to some fixed day, but the adjournment may be sine die, that is to say, indefinite.

Either House of Parliament can adjourn a debate or adjourn a sitting: a Court can be adjourned; the hearing of a case can be adjourned; and the term is also used in connection with public meetings, meetings of companies, etc.

Adjudication is the judgment or decision of a Court. The term is principally used in bankruptcy proceedings, the adjudication being the order which declares the debtor to be bankrupt. See BANKRUPT; BANKRUPTCY.

Adjudication Stamp. Under s. 12 of the Stamp Act, 1891, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue may be required by any person to decide what, if any, stamp duty is chargeable upon any written document, and shall either stamp it with a stamp denoting that no duty is chargeable or assess the duty; and in the latter case the document may be stamped with a particular stamp denoting that it is duly stamped. Any stamp affixed in pursuance of this enactment is termed an adjudication stamp.

Adjuncts. See DELEGATES.

Ad jura regis, a writ which lay for a clerk against anyone who sought to eject him from a living to which he had been presented by the King.

Adjustment, in the law of marine insurance, is the operation of settling and ascertaining the amount which the assured, after allowances and deductions are made, is entitled to receive under the policy, and of fixing the proportion which each underwriter is liable to pay. Similarly, adjustment of average is the process of calculating the values at which the articles which are to contribute are to be taken. The rule now adopted in England is to value the goods sacrificed, as well as the goods saved, at their selling price, if the ship arrives at her port of destination, and the valuation is made there; but if she puts back to her lading port, and the average is adjusted there, the invoice or cost price is taken, no other being well ascertainable. (See AVERAGE.) When the port of destination is a foreign port, the adjustment which is made there is known as foreign adjustment.

Ad largum, at large (q.v.).

Adlegiare. In Anglo-Saxon times this meant to clear oneself of an accusation by oath; compare ADCREDULITARE.

Admeasurement. Admeasurement of dower was a writ—now obsolete—brought by an heir against the widow of an ancestor who was alleged to withhold more land for her dower than she was entitled to. In such a case, the person aggrieved was entitled to have her proper share of the land ascertained by the sheriff.

Admeasurement of pasture was a writ—now also obsolete—brought by one commoner against another commoner alleged to have put more beasts on the common than was lawful. In this case a jury was summoned to ascertain the rights of the parties and of the commoners generally.

It is not clear that either of these writs has ever been abolished.

Dower (q.v.) is now of little practical importance. As regards common, the modern substitute for the writ of admeasurement would be an action for damages. See SECUNDA SUPERONERATIONE.

Ad medium filum viae (or aquae). Where the boundary between the lands of different owners is a road or a non-tidal river, each of such owners is presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, to own the road or river up to an imaginary line or thread (filum) drawn along the centre of the road (via) or river (aqua), subject, in the case of the road, to the rights of the public and of local authorities in respect of its use and maintenance as a highway. But, although a railway is, in point of law, a highway, this rule does not apply where the boundary is a railway.

Where a road or a non-tidal river is the boundary between two counties, parishes, etc., each is presumed to have control up to the middle line.

Ad melius inquirendum, a writ by which in certain cases a further inquisition or inquiry is directed, if the first has been unsatisfactory. It was formerly the means by which the holding of a second inquest by a coroner was directed; but now recourse is had to an order of the Court under the Coroners Act, 1887, s. 6 (1) (a). The writ may at any time be awarded by the Lord Chancellor or on the fiat of the Attorney-General, under the Escheat Procedure Act, 1887, and the rules made thereunder, in any case of escheat.

Admensuratione, de, the writ of admeasurement (q.v.) of dower.

Administration. This means the getting in and distribution of the assets (q.v.) of a deceased person by the executor or administrator of such person or by the Chancery Division. An executor acts under a grant (q.v.) of probate; and an administrator acts under a grant of letters of administration. It also means the carrying out of the duties imposed by a trust. If any person is sentenced to death or penal servitude, the Crown may appoint a person to manage the property of the convict until he or she shall die or receive the royal pardon or have suffered the full punishment under such sentence or any commutation thereof (see the Forfeiture Act, 1870, ss. 6, 7, 9-20). What is done under such appointment may be termed administration.

The body of ministers now known as the Cabinet was formerly, and sometimes still is, colloquially known as the Administration.

Administration Action or Matter. This is an action or matter in the Chancery Division to secure the due administration of the estate of a deceased person: it is instituted either by some person, such as a creditor, seeking to enforce his rights, or by a trustee, or executor, or administrator who feels that he cannot safely act except under the directions of the Court. It is commenced either by writ of summons (q.v.) or by originating summons. Procedure by writ of summons is more expensive than that by originating summons, and where a plaintiff proceeds by the former method in a case where the latter is available, he may be ordered to pay the costs of the difference. As to the cases in which an originating summons can be taken out, see R. S. C. Ord. LV., rr. (3), (4), and notes thereto in the Annual Practice; and as to who is to be served with the summons, see r. 5 of the same order.

Administration Bond. This is the bond, with (unless securities are dispensed with) one or more sureties, which must be given, in double the amount under which the assets of a deceased person are sworn, by any person (other than the Solicitor to the Treasury, or the Solicitor for the Duchy of Lancaster, acting for the Crown) to whom letters of administration are granted (see the Court of Probate Act, 1857, ss. 81, 82). No such bond is required from an executor.

Administration, Letters of. This is the authority which an administrator, or administratrix, receives from the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division to administer (see ADMINISTRATOR) the estate of a deceased person. See GRANT.

Administrative Business. Certain of the business transacted by justices at quarter sessions prior to the enactment of the Local Government Act, 1888, is in s. 3 of that Act set forth and described as "administrative business" and was by the same section transferred to county councils. This is the business referred to in s. 46 of the same Act as administrative business.

The part of the business of the Chancery Division which relates to the execution of the trusts of deeds and wills is known colloquially as administrative business.

Administrative County. This means the area for which a county council is elected (Local Government Act, 1888, s. 100).

Administrative Vestries. The London Government Act, 1899, s. 34, enacts that, for the purposes of that Act, the expression means "a vestry having the powers of a vestry elected for a parish specified in Schedule A to the Metropolis Management Act, 1855."

Administrator. The person to whom letters of administration (q.v.) are granted is known as an administrator. The real as well as the personal property of the deceased now vests in the administrator (see EXECUTOR). He is appointed where the deceased either has died intestate or has named no executor in his will, or where there is a will but no executor named in the will is able or willing to act, in which last-mentioned case the administrator obtains a grant with the will annexed (cum testamento annexo). See GRANT.

The person appointed by the Crown to administer the estate of a convict (see ADMINISTRATION) is also known as an administrator.

Administratrix, a woman to whom letters of administration have been granted. See ADMINISTRATOR; ADMINISTRATION.

Admiral. In early times there was an officer entrusted by the Crown with the charge of the seas. He was known as custos maris or as locum tenens regis super mare. At the time of the Crusades the title of admiral—derived from Arabic words—came to be applied to him. He had a deputy known as the vice-admiral of the coast. In the reign of Edward I. there seem to have been admirals for each of the four seas (q.v.). None of these officers, down to the reign of Edward III., seem to have exercised any judicial functions. They were admirals only for naval purposes. But in the reign of Edward III. we find the Court of the Admiral established. The Court was held before the lieutenant or deputy of the admiral or, afterwards, of the Lord High Admiral, or of the commissioners for executing the office of the Lord High Admiral. The civil jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court, which finally became the High Court of Admiralty in England, is, since 1875, vested in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division (q.v.). of the High Court, while the former criminal jurisdiction of the Court is now vested in the various Courts for the trial of indictable offences. The admiral had by 1408 developed into the "admiral of the fleet and admiral of England, Ireland, and Acquitaine"; and later we find that he has become the Lord High Admiral. Since the restoration of Charles II., the only Lord High Admirals have been James Duke of York; the Earl of Pembroke, under William III.; Prince George of Denmark, under Queen Anne; and the Duke of Clarence, assisted by a council, under George III. Since 1827 the Lord High Admiral has disappeared, but the council has remained in the form of the commissioners for executing the office of the Lord High Admiral. The office had first been put in commission in 1632, and since the Revolution of 1688 it has been continuously in commission, except during the short periods for which there has been a Lord High Admiral.

In ancient times the Crown sometimes made grants to persons designated admirals, under which they exercised admiralty jurisdiction, within specified areas, independently of the Lord High Admiral. Under these grants, no rights now remain except rights to what would otherwise be droits of Admiralty (q.v.) found within their jurisdiction; and even this does not include droits consisting of enemy goods found within such jurisdiction on an outbreak of war, nor, it would seem, other droits unless actually ashore or aground.

The word "admiral" is now used only to describe naval officers of high rank, the first being admirals of the fleet, after whom come admirals, vice-admirals, and rear-admirals. (See VICE-ADMIRALTY COURTS.)

Admiralty, The. This means "the Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom [see ADMIRAL] for the time being or the commissioners for the time for executing that office" (Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 12 (4)). The commissioners are known as the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and consist of the First Lord (always a member of either the House of Lords or the House of Commons), who ranks as a principal Secretary of State and is always a member of the Cabinet (q.v.) and who is responsible to the Crown and to Parliament for the Navy and the Royal Marines, four naval officers, known as the "Sea Lords," and a Civil Lord. These six commissioners, together with a Parliamentary Secretary, who, like the First Lord, is always a member of one House of Parliament or the other, and a Financial Secretary, form the Admiralty Board which administers and controls the Navy and the Royal Marines.

Admiralty Action. This expression includes every action which may be tried in the Admiralty Division, whether, while the Admiralty Court existed, such action was triable only in that Court or either in that Court or in the Common Law or Chancery Courts.

The Admiralty Court had exclusive jurisdiction as to salvage; life salvage; bottomry; necessaries supplied to foreign ships.

The Admiralty Court and the Common Law or the Chancery Courts had concurrent jurisdiction as regards collision; damage to person or property caused by ships; damage to cargo carried in any foreign ship to any English port; towage; wages and pilotage earned by master seamen or pilots; disbursements by a master; mortgage, in actions by mortgagees of a ship if she is under process of the Court; questions as to the title to ships or their ownership or management.

The distinctive process of the Court of Admiralty was the process in rem, under which the property which had given rise to the cause of action was arrested and held by the Court to satisfy the plaintiff. The Court had inherent power to exercise jurisdiction in personam in certain cases of injury to person or property on the high seas and also where, as in the case of a vessel which is sunk, there was no res available.

As to process in rem, see ARREST. Certain Admiralty actions and matters are within the jurisdiction of some of the County Courts where the amount involved does not exceed a certain sum: see the County Courts (Admiralty Jurisdiction) Act, 1868, and the County Courts (Admiralty Jurisdiction) Act, 1869.

Admiralty Division. This is a division known as the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division of the High Court. As its name indicates, it deals with probate and divorce as well as with admiralty matters. As regards admiralty matters, it has all the jurisdiction formerly exercised by the High Court of Admiralty (see ADMIRAL). Since its creation in 1875 under the Judicature Acts, it has received jurisdiction in cases under the Slave Trade Act, 1873, and under the Pacific Islanders Protection Acts, 1872 and 1875. By the Judicature Act, 1891, s. 4, the jurisdiction in prize of the Admiralty Court, which had vested in the High Court in 1875, was assigned to the Division; all business within the jurisdiction of the High Court under the Mail Ships Acts, 1891 and 1902, has, by rules made under those Acts, been assigned to it; by the R. S. C. (Merchant Shipping), 1894, r. 1, the jurisdiction of the High Court under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, with the exception of that under ss. 28 and 30 and under s. 504 (as amended and extended by subsequent enactments) was assigned to the Division; and, under r. 3 (1) of the same rules, the Admiralty Registrar exercises all jurisdiction under s. 197 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894.

Admiralty, Droits of. When a state of war exists, enemy goods seized in English ports go to the Crown as droits of Admiralty.

Subject to the rights of the Lord Warden and Admiral of the Cinque Ports, and of lords of manors, and of certain persons (see ADMIRAL) who held under Crown grant Admiralty rights within defined parts of the coast, the Lord High Admiral (see ADMIRAL) formerly had custody of all ships, boats or cargoes found derelict upon the high seas and of all flotsam (q.v.), jetsam and lagan, which, subject to their not being claimed by an owner and to the rights of salvors, were condemned by the Court of Admiralty as droits of Admiralty. This jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty is now vested in the Admiralty Division; but is now not exercised, as the things to which it relates (included in the term "wreck" in s. 510 (1) of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894) are now, under s. 518 of that Act (as extended by s. 72 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1906), if found or brought within the territorial waters of the United Kingdom, dealt with under ss. 523-5 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, which provide that such things, if unclaimed by the owner or by a holder of a Crown grant or by a lord of the manor, shall be sold and the net proceeds paid to the Crown.

Admission. This, in ecclesiastical law, is where the bishop, upon examination of a person presented to a benefice within his diocese, approves of him as a fit person. It is sometimes used as meaning not merely such approval, but also the institution (q.v.) of the person approved of.

Admission (in Criminal Cases). This means any statement by an accused person admitting the offence with which he is charged, or admitting any fact tending to prove that he is guilty. It also means any assent, whether by words or conduct, given by the accused to any statement made in his presence relating to any material fact which is within his knowledge. No statement made by a prisoner is admissible against him if it was made as the result of any inducement, threat, or promise emanating from a person in a position of authority over the accused as regards the offence charged, and relating to that offence. Any assent by the prisoner to any statement made in his presence is also inadmissible if obtained by means of any such inducement, threat, or promise.

A free and voluntary statement made, not in reply to questions, by an accused person to a police officer is admissible, whether made before, on, or after arrest. If a statement is made after the accused has been cautioned, that is to say, after he has been told that he need not say anything and that anything which he does say may be used against him, it is admissible, whether made before, on, or after arrest, even though it is made in reply to questions by a police officer.

The fact that an accused person did not contradict a statement made in his presence is not admissible unless the circumstances were such that the accused might reasonably be expected to contradict the statement if the statement were untrue. To make such statement admissible, it must, in fact, be shown that the prisoner, by his silence, conduct, or demeanour, or by any words which he used, practically admitted the truth of the statement, or of some part of it.

Admissions (in Civil Proceedings). This means the facts which either party to an action admits, or is taken to have admitted, in the course of the pleadings.

All allegations in the pleadings which are not specifically denied are taken to have been admitted (Ord. XIX., r. 13). If money is paid into Court, without a denial of liability, under Ord. XXII., there is taken to be an admission that something, not exceeding the amount paid in, is due. Under Ord. XXXII., any party can call upon the opposite party to admit any document or fact which is material: and, in general, no party will be allowed the costs of proving any such document or fact unless the opposite party has been called upon to admit it. Under Ord. XXX., r. 7, the judge may direct a defendant to admit matters which are not really in dispute. Admissions may also be obtained by means of answers to interrogatories (q.v.). Where admissions of fact have been made, the plaintiff may at any stage apply for and obtain such judgment as he may be entitled to thereon (Ord. XXXII., r. 6).

Admit; Admittance. The lord of a manor is said to admit a person as tenant of copyhold lands forming part of the manor when he accepts him as tenant of those lands in place of the former tenant, e.g. on the surrender, devise, or death intestate of the former tenant: in the last case, it is called admittance on descent. In theory, the lord admits the surrenderee, devisee, or heir as a favour, and hence in the enrolment of an admittance on the court rolls it is stated that the surrenderee "prays to be admitted"; but, in fact, the lord is bound to admit the new tenant if his claim is in accordance with the custom of the manor; and hence an admittance in such cases is opposed to a voluntary admittance, which takes place where the lord makes a voluntary grant. (See SURRENDER; GRANT.) Admittance may be either express or by implication. Express or formal admission is generally performed by the steward of the manor delivering a rod, straw, glove, or other symbol representing the seisin of the land, to the new tenant; and the admittance is then enrolled on the court rolls. Formerly, admittances could only be made in court, i.e. in the customary court of the manor (see COURT BARON), but (see the Copyhold Act, 1894) this is no longer the case. Admittance by implication is where the lord does some act showing an intention of accepting the new tenant (e.g. by receiving rent from him), or where the admittance of one tenant operates as the admittance of another; thus the admittance of a particular tenant may operate as the admittance of a tenant in remainder. (See COPYHOLD; FINE.)

Admittendo clerico, De, a writ to compel the bishop to admit a clerk to a benefice: it lay for one who had recovered in the Common Pleas the right of presentation against the bishop.

Admittendo in Socium, De, a writ under which gentlemen of position were associated with the judges in the holding of assizes.

Admonition is the first and lightest form of ecclesiastical censure, and is in the nature of a warning, which, if not obeyed, may be followed by a severer censure, e.g. suspension (q.v.). (See MONITION; CENSURE.)

In the Army an offender may be "admonished": see REPRIMAND.

Ad officium justiciariorum spectat, unicuique

coram eis placitanti justitiam exhibere (2 Inst. 451). (It is the duty of those who discharge judicial functions to render justice to everyone who comes before them), either as plaintiff or as defendant.

Adopt. To adopt a contract is to accept it as binding, notwithstanding some defect which entitles the party to repudiate it. Thus, when a person affirms a voidable contract or ratifies a contract made by his agent beyond his authority, he is said to adopt it. So a company may be formed for the purpose of adopting a contract entered into on its behalf. (See TRUSTEE; AFFIRM; RATIFY; VOIDABLE.)

The adoption of children is not known to English law, that is to say, a person cannot by any declaration put a stranger in the same position as a natural-born child. The only relation resembling it in our law is that between a child and a person in loco parentis to it. (See IN LOCO PARENTIS.)

Adoptive Act. This means an Act of Parliament depending either on the vote of some public body or on that of a particular number of voters. An Act of the first class is the Public Improvements Act, 1860, which a parish council is empowered to adopt by the Local Government Act, 1894, s. 7 (1); and the Public Libraries Acts, 1892 to 1901, which may be adopted by a majority of the voters in any urban district or in any parish which is not within an urban district, are examples of the second class.

Ad proximum antecedens fiat relatio, nisi impediatur sententia (Jenk. Cent. 180) (Relative words refer to the last antecedent unless the meaning of the sentence would be impaired by such construction.) The antecedent noun to which a relative is to be taken as referring is, in fact, the last noun which can be made the antecedent so as to give a meaning to the sentence. This is the general rule. But, even in the best writers, the context not infrequently shows clearly that the rule must be departed from if the real meaning of a sentence is to be gathered; and analogous departures from the rule have sometimes to be made in order to ascertain the true meaning of written instruments and even of statutes.

Ad quaestionem facti non respondent judices; ad quaestionem juris non respondent juratores (Co. Litt. 295). (As regards cases tried by a judge and jury, the judge does not decide questions of fact and the jury do not decide questions of law.) Thus, where the question is whether a deed is or is not valid, it is for the jury to decide whether the deed was duly sealed and delivered and whether any interlineations or erasures appearing on the face of it were effected before delivery, while, subject to the findings of the jury on such points, it is for the judge to decide whether the deed is sufficient in law. So also it is for the jury to decide as to the meaning of technical words or phrases, other than those specifically known to the law, used in any written instrument; but, subject to the finding of the jury on that point, it is for the judge to construe the instrument, and the jury must accept his construction thereof. In either civil or criminal proceedings for libel, the judge, if satisfied that the writing complained of is capable of bearing the meaning imputed, should inform the jury accordingly; but he must leave it to the jury to decide whether it does or does not bear that meaning.

But there are exceptions to the rule. Thus, questions as to reasonable cause, though strictly matter of fact, are for the judge to decide.

As regards actions, such as Chancery actions and many common law actions, which are tried by a judge without a jury, the judge must decide questions of fact as well as of law; and this applies also to proceedings in the County Court.

Compare JURATORES SUNT, ETC.; VEREDICTUM, ETC.

Ad quod damnum. A writ called by this name was formerly issued to a sheriff before the Crown granted a right to hold a fair, market, etc., within the bailiwick, or area, for which the sheriff acted. It directed the sheriff to inquire what damage might be done by such grant. The writ was also used before a licence was given by the Crown to alienate lands in mortmain; and the licence did not issue unless a return ad damnum nullius was made so as to show that no man would be injured. The writ was also issued before a licence to make or divert a road was given.

The writ is now wholly obsolete.

Ad terminum qui preterit, a writ of entry which lay for a lessor and his heirs when a lease had been made for a term of years or for a life or lives, and, after the expiration of the lease, the lands were withheld from the lessor or his heirs by the tenant or by some other person. The writ was abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36.

Adulteration. This term means generally the mixing with any substance intended to be sold of any ingredient which is dangerous to health or which makes the substance something other than that as which it is sold or intended to be sold.

When adulterated food is dangerous to human health, and is sold with knowledge of that fact, the vendor commits an indictable offence; and if the adulteration and sale involve a false pretence, he may be indicted for obtaining money by false pretences, or for the common law misdemeanour known as a cheat.

The adulteration of meal flour or bread is specially dealt with in the Bread Act, 1836, s. 37, and, as regards the area within ten miles of the Royal Exchange, London, by the London Bread Act, 1822, 2 Geo. 4, c. cvi.; that of beer, in the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885, s. 8; that of tea and coffee, in the Adulteration of Tea and Coffee Act, 1724; and there are many other Acts dealing specially with particular cases of adulteration of articles intended for human consumption or the ingredients of such articles. But the law of most practical importance as regards such adulteration is now to be found in the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, which are the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875; the Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879; the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899; the Margarine Act, 1887; and the Butter and Margarine Act, 1907.

The Adulteration of Seeds Acts, 1869 and 1878, deal with the adulteration of seeds; and the Fertilizers and Feeding Stuffs Act, 1906, which deals with the adulteration of the articles mentioned in its title, is another instance of an Act which provides penalties for the adulteration of things other than those intended for human consumption.

Adultery. This means sexual intercourse between a married man or married woman and any person other than his or her wife or husband. Adultery by the husband is a ground for judicial separation (q.v.) and, when either incestuous or combined with other matrimonial offences, for dissolution of marriage. Mere adultery by the wife is a ground for dissolution of marriage, and it also (Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857), entitles the husband, if he thinks fit, to present a petition against the wife and the adulterer claiming only damages against the adulterer.

Under the first Statute of Westminster (1285), 34 Edw. 1, st. 1, c. 34, a wife forfeits her dower (q.v.) by her adultery unless condoned, by subsequent cohabitation, by the husband. Upon the adultery of the wife, the husband's common law liability to supply her with necessaries ceases. It is a good defence to a charge (made under the Vagrancy Act, 1824, s. 3) of neglecting to maintain her; and, unless condoned, to an application against the husband (under the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868, s. 33) for an order that he shall maintain her; and also, unless he has condoned, connived at or conduced to the adultery, to a summons against him by the wife for maintenance under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, s. 6. If an order has been made under the last-mentioned Act, it may (ib. s. 7) be revoked either upon proof of subsequent adultery by the wife or upon proof of such antecedent adultery as would have been an answer to the application for the order, if it appears either that such antecedent adultery was not within the knowledge of the husband when the order was made or that he was prevented by some sufficient cause, such as illness, from appearing on the hearing of the original application and proving such adultery.

Adultery has always been one of the offences with regard to which the ecclesiastical Courts had a jurisdiction. That jurisdiction still exists, but is now obsolete. Chapter 10 of the Acts of Parliament for 1650 made adultery a felony, without benefit of clergy, and punishable with death: but this Act, which does not seem to have been put in force, was of no effect after the Restoration.

Advanced Member (or Borrowing Member), a member of a building society who has borrowed money from the society on mortgage.

Advanced Note. This is a note given by the master of a ship to a seaman who has signed on, promising to pay to the order of such seaman a sum not exceeding one month's wages if the seaman goes to sea pursuant to his agreement (Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 140). This enactment applies only to seamen shipped in ports in the United Kingdom; and, as regards seamen shipped elsewhere, it would appear that no advance note can be given in contravention of the Piracy Act, 1721, s. 7, which provides that no master shall pay to any seaman, while beyond seas, above half the wages due at the time of payment.

Advancement. In wills and settlements containing limitations in favour of children on their attaining twenty-one, power—known as a power of advancement—is generally given to the trustees or guardians to apply, for the advancement or benefit of each child during its minority, part of the capital or share of the property to which it will become entitled on attaining twenty-one. The money might, for instance, be wanted to pay a premium on articles. The Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 43, does not give a power of advancement; and where such a power is desired, it must still be expressly given by a clause in the settlement. See MAINTENANCE; ACCUMULATION.

The Statute of Distribution provides that, in dividing the estate of an intestate, every child " who shall be advanced by the intestate in his lifetime by portion " shall only receive so much of the estate as, with the portion advanced, will make his share equal to those of the other children. An " advancement by portion " within the meaning of the statute is a sum given by a parent to establish a child in life (as by starting him in business), or to make a provision for the child (as on the marriage of a daughter). (See HOTCHPOT.)

The equitable doctrine of advancement is that, if a purchase or investment is made by a father, or person in loco parentis, in the name of a child, a presumption arises that it was intended as an advancement (that is, for the benefit of the child), so as to rebut what would otherwise be the ordinary presumption in such cases of a resulting trust in favour of the person who paid the money. (See TRUST.) The doctrine also applies to a purchase made in the name of a wife. And it has been held to apply to the case of a purchase by a godmother in name of a godson, even though she was not in loco parentis.

The presumption of advancement is raised in favour of the following persons:—A legitimate child; an illegitimate child; a grandchild (father being dead); a wife; a wife's nephew. But the presumption has not hitherto been extended to the following cases:—An illegitimate grandchild; a kept woman; the child of a widow, when the widow is the purchaser.

In all these cases, the question whether the presumption of advancement arises or does not arise, depends altogether on the relationship existing between the parties; the presumption may be rebutted or corroborated by extrinsic or parol evidence.

Ad ventrem inspiciendum, the same as the writ VENTRE INSPICIENDO, DE (q.v.).

Adventure. The sending of goods abroad in a ship, under the charge of a super-cargo or other agent, who is to dispose of them to the best advantage for the benefit of the owners thereof. The term has fallen into disuse.

Adventure, Bill of, a paper signed by the owner or master of a ship in which it is stated that certain goods shipped in her, in the name of such owner or master, are in fact the property of another person and are shipped at the risk of such other person, to whom such master or owner thereby undertakes to account for the proceeds. Bills of adventure are now obsolete.

Adverse Possession. This is an occupation of realty inconsistent with the right of the true owner; in other words, where a person possesses property in a manner in which he is not entitled to possess it, and without anything to show that he possesses it otherwise than as owner (that is, with the intention of excluding all persons from it, including the rightful owner), he is in adverse possession of it. Thus, if A is in possession of a field of B's, he is in adverse possession of it, unless there is something to show that his possession is consistent with a recognition of B's title.

Adverse possession is of two kinds, according as it was adverse from the beginning, or has become so subsequently. Thus, if a mere trespasser takes possession of A's property, and retains it against him, his possession is adverse ab initio But if A grants a lease of land to B, or B obtains possession of the land as A's bailiff, or guardian, or trustee, his possession can only become adverse by some change in his position. In the case of a lessee, his possession becomes adverse (i) if he discontinues payment of rent, or (ii) if he pays rent to a person claiming the land adversely to the rightful owner, and does not afterwards pay any rent to the rightful owner; in the latter case the rule only applies if the rent amounts to 20*s*. or upwards. In the case of persons other than lessees, the rule seems to be that possession is never considered adverse if it can be referred to a lawful title, and that where a person obtains possession by a permissive or fiduciary title, or by his own agreement, or by judgment of law, he and all claiming under him are presumed to hold possession according to that right.

Adverse possession not only entitles the adverse possessor, like every other possessor, to be protected in his possession against all who cannot show a better title, but also, if the adverse possessor remains in possession for a certain period of time, produces the effect either of barring the right of the true owner, and thus converting the possessor into the owner, or of depriving the true owner of his right of action to recover his property (see LIMITATION; PRESCRIPTION); and this although the true owner is ignorant of the adverse possessor being in occupation.

Adverse witness. This is defined to be a witness whose mind discloses a bias hostile to the party examining him; it is not a witness whose evidence, being honestly given, is adverse to the case of the examinant. An adverse witness may, with the leave of the Court, be cross-examined by the counsel calling him. See WITNESS.

Advertisements. Although at one time some doubt was entertained whether a strict contract could be entered into by advertisement, for want of privity between the person advertising and the person who closes with the advertisement, still it is now settled that a good contract arises thereby. Thus, where the makers of a remedy against influenza offered by advertisement £100 to anyone who contracted influenza while using the remedy, they were held liable to one who in fact contracted influenza while using the remedy. In case there should not be any contract, an action of tort would lie for a fraudulent advertisement producing damage.

Under the Larceny Act, 1861, s. 102, anyone publicly advertising a reward for the return of any property which shall have been lost or stolen, suggesting that no questions will be asked, or offering to repay to any pawnbroker or other the amount advanced on the security of the property, forfeits the sum of £50 for every such offence, to be recovered by anyone suing therefor. And the printer and publisher are also liable, but in their case (Larceny (Advertisements) Act, 1870) the action is to be commenced within six months, and only after the sanction of the Attorney-General or Solicitor-General to its institution has been obtained.

The use of large hoardings for advertisements may be regulated, in urban districts with a population of over 5,000, under the Advertisements Regulation Act, 1907; and the display of advertisements which are injurious to the amenities of ancient monuments may be restrained under that Act as applied by the Ancient Monuments Consolidation and Amendment Act, 1913, s. 19.

The Advertising Stations (Rating) Act, 1889, makes land rateable if used only for advertising purposes, according to its value for such purposes.

Advertisements of Queen Elizabeth. These are certain articles or ordinances drawn up by Archbishop Parker and some of the bishops in 1564, at the request of Queen Elizabeth, the object of them was to enforce decency and uniformity in the ritual of the Church. The Queen subsequently refused to give her formal sanction to these advertisements, and left them to be enforced by the bishops under their general powers.

Advice, Letter of, a letter from one merchant or banker to another in which notification is given of some business transaction in which both are engaged, such as the consignment of goods or the drawing of bills of exchange.

Advice of Court. Under Ord. LV., r. 3, executors and administrators, as well as trustees under any deed or instrument, and any person claiming to be interested in the estate of a deceased person, or as cestui que trust (q.v.) under such deed or instrument, may apply for the determination of any question arising in the administration of the estate or trust. The application is made by originating summons returnable in the chambers of a judge of the Chancery Division. An opinion of the Court, given upon such summons, would appear to completely protect anyone acting thereon.

Advice on Evidence. When the pleadings have closed in an action in the High Court, all the papers in the case are usually sent to counsel for him to advise as to the evidence which is necessary to support his client's case. The reasonable costs of obtaining such advice are to be allowed on taxation of costs (Ord. LXV., r. 27 (15)).

Ad vitam aut culpam. An office is said to be held ad vitam aut culpam when it is held during the life of the officer or until he misconducts himself in such manner as to justify his removal from office. Such an office is, in fact, held by the officer quamdiu se bene gesserit, that is to say, as long as he conducts himself properly.

Advocate. This means generally one who pleads the cause of another in a judicial tribunal. In English law, it means one who does so in a professional capacity. There are now no practitioners in the English Courts who can accurately be described as advocates. Formerly, however, members of the College of Advocates (q.v.) were accurately and always described as advocates.

The professional advocates now known to the English law are barristers and solicitors, as to whom, and their respective rights of audience, see BARRISTER; SOLICITOR.

In Scotland all counsel are called advocates. See ADVOCATES, FACULTY OF.

Advocate, Crown. This was the popular description of the Admiralty Advocate, (always a member of the College of Advocates (q.v.)), who was the second law officer of the Crown in the Court of Admiralty, the first being the Advocate-General (q.v.). The office has been vacant for many years.

In Malta the chief law officer is called the Crown-Advocate.

Advocate-General. His Majesty's Advocate-General (colloquially known as the King's Advocate) was the principal law officer of the Crown in the College of Advocates (q.v.), and in the Admiralty Court (while it existed as a separate Court), and in the Ecclesiastical Courts. The office has never been formally abolished; but it has not been filled since 1872. Until the College of Advocates (q.v.) was abolished in 1857, the Advocate-General was always chosen from amongst the members of that body.

In the Indian Presidencies, the chief law officer is known as the Advocate-General. In Mauritius, he is called the Procureur and Advocate-General.

Advocate, King's. See ADVOCATE-GENERAL. In Sierra Leone, Lagos and Cyprus, the chief law officer is called the King's Advocate.

Advocate, Lord, the chief law officer of the Crown in Scotland, corresponding generally to the English Attorney-General.

Advocates, College of. This was a society of men associated for the practice of the civil and canon law. In 1567 some of them purchased the site of what was afterwards known as Doctors' Commons and erected thereon houses for the Admiralty and Ecclesiastical Courts and residences for judges. The Archbishop of Canterbury always selected from the college the judges of the Archiepiscopal Courts. The society was incorporated in 1768 by royal charter. In 1832 the college consisted of the president, who was always the Dean of the Arches (see ARCHES, COURT OF) for the time being, and the fellows. The fellows were elected from those who had been admitted as advocates in pursuance of the rescript of the Archbishop of Canterbury. Any person seeking admission as an advocate was required to be a Doctor of Laws in an English university. No person admitted as an advocate was permitted to practise as such until after a year from the date of his admission. Down to 1857, when the College of Advocates was abolished in pursuance of the Court of Probate Act, 1857, ss. 116, 117, members of the college had the exclusive right to practise in the Ecclesiastical and Admiralty Courts. After 1857, advocates were permitted to practise in all Courts, while barristers were admitted to the then newly-created Probate and Divorce Courts; and, after 1859, barristers were admitted to practise in the Admiralty Court.

Barristers have latterly been permitted to appear in the Ecclesiastical Courts that are still held: but the Archbishop still has power to appoint advocates for such Courts.

Advocates, Faculty of. This is the body which has the exclusive right of appointing advocates or members of the Scottish Bar. It corresponds to the four Inns of Court (q.v.) in England and to King's Inns (q.v.) in Ireland.

Advocatione decimarum, De. See INDICAVIT.

Advow, Avow, or Avouch. Under the feudal system, a tenant had to call upon his lord to defend his right if it were impugned. This was called advocare or voucher à garantie, that is to say, to vouch. The tenant, by calling on the lord to advow, recognised the lord as feudal superior; and so avower, or a calling to avow, came to mean that the person avowed was admitted to be the feudal superior; and subsequently the words advocare, avow, or avouch, came to be used as descriptive of the action of the person performing the duty of defending the right impugned.

Advowson, the right of presentation to a church or benefice: and he who has the right to present is called the patron or patronus, sometimes also advocatus, and sometimes defensor. Advowsons are of two kinds: (1) Appendant, and (2) In gross. An advowson appendant means an advowson which is, and which has been from the first, and has since continued to be, appended or annexed to a manor, so that, if the manor were granted to anyone, the advowson would go with it as incident to the estate. An advowson in gross signifies an advowson that belongs to a person but is not annexed to a manor; so that an advowson appendant may be made an advowson in gross by severing it by deed of grant from the manor to which it was appendant. An advowson in gross cannot again become appendant. Advowsons are also either (1) presentative, or (2) collative. An advowson is termed presentative when the patron has the right of presentation to the bishop or ordinary, and also to require of him to institute his clerk, if he finds him qualified. An advowson is termed collative when the bishop and patron happen to be one and the same person, so that the bishop, not being able to present to himself, performs by one act (which is termed collation) all that is usually done by the separate acts of presentation and institution. An advowson was termed donative when the king, or a subject under express licence of the Crown, had founded a church or chapel, and by a single donation in writing placed the clerk in possession, without presentation, institution, or induction. In the case of a donative advowson, the benefice upon each avoidance (q.v.) was filled by a gift or donation from the patron to the clerk without the bishop having anything to do with the matter: but the Benefices Act, 1898, s. 12, converted every donative advowson into a presentative advowson as from 1st January, 1899. Again, advowsons are either advowsons of rectories or advowsons of vicarages; the former having been created in very early times, almost contemporaneously with the creation of the manor itself; the latter having grown up more gradually, and as a consequence of the monasteries appropriating to themselves the tithes of the churches, and delegating to a locum tenens (vicar) the duties of the rector. The stipend of the vicar, which was at first precarious and inadequate, was settled at an adequate amount, and also secured to him, by the Acts 15 Rich. 2, c. 6, and 4 Hen. 4, c. 12; whence at the present day a vicarage is in general as valuable a living as is a rectory.

The transfer of advowsons is now regulated by the Benefices Act, 1898, s. 1.

An advowson, being the right of presentation in perpetuum, as often as a vacancy arises, is considered real estate, while a right of presenting once only, or a single presentation, is considered personal property only.

See NEXT PRESENTATION; JUS PATRONATUS.

Aedificare in tuo proprio solo non licet quod alteri noceat (3 Inst. 201). (No man is permitted to erect on his own land any building which interferes with the rights of another man.) Thus, an action lies against a man who, by building on his own land, obstructs the ancient lights (q.v.) of another man.

Aedificatio solo, solo cedit. (What is built on the land is to be regarded as having become part of the land.) "Passing the land or ground, the structure or building thereupon passeth therewith" (Co. Litt. 4*a*). But the rule is not of universal application. Thus glasshouses erected by a market gardener on land of which he is tenant are removable by him as being trade fixtures. See also OMNE QUOD, ETC.

Aenicia Pars. See ENITIA PARS.

Aequitas est correctio justae legis qua parte deficit quod generatim lata est (Plow, 375). (Equity is a correction of a just law, in so far as it is defective because of its comprehensiveness.) Plowden, writing in 1571, introduces the maxim by saying: "And Catline [apparently Sir Robert Catlin, Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, 1559-1574] says that Aristotle defines equity thus." But what Aristotle knew about the relations existing in England between equity and law does not appear in Plowden or elsewhere.

Aequitas est perfecta quaedam ratio quae jus scriptum interpretatur et emendat; nulla scriptura comprehensa, sed solum in vera ratione consistens (Co. Litt. 24b). (Equity is, as it were, a complete code, unwritten and based on right reason alone, which interprets and amends the law.)

Aequitas est quasi equalitas (Co. Litt. 24b). (Equity is, so to speak, equality.) That is to say, it divided benefits and burdens when justice required that this should be done, but law did not provide for its being done.

Aequitas factum habet quod fieri oportuit. (Equity regards as done that which ought to have been done.) Thus, where a man who has contracted to sell realty dies without completing the sale, the purchase money, when the sale is subsequently completed, will form part of his personal estate.

Aequitas nunquam contravenit legi. (Equity never acts in contravention of the common law.) But equity, though adhering to the letter of this maxim, did not follow its spirit. Thus equity claimed the right to restrain a plaintiff who had recovered a judgment in the common law courts from acting on his judgment, if the judgment, in the opinion of equity, was inequitable.

Aequitas sequitur legem (Gilb. Ch. 136). (Equity follows the law.) This meant that equity did not claim to override the common law. But it claimed and exercised the right to prevent a man from acting on his legal rights when, in the view of equity, it was unconscientious for him to do so.

Aequum et bonum est lex legum (Hob. 224). (That which is equitable and good is the law of laws.) But this is not to say that a man may act in contravention of the laws merely because he thinks that his legal action is equitable and good, and similarly the maxim Lex injusta non est lex does not justify the violation of a law which a man considers unjust. Such maxims were never uttered with any intent to set up what is sometimes popularly called "the unwritten law."

Aerial Navigation. This was originally regulated by the Aerial Navigation Acts, 1911 and 1913, and by the Air Navigation Act, 1919. These three Acts were collectively known as the Air Navigation Acts, 1911 to 1919 (Act of 1919, s. 3 (1)). They were all repealed by s. 20 (2) of the Air Navigation Act, 1920, which, along with the Air Navigation Order, 1921 (made 10th August, 1921), now contains the whole law on the subject. The Act of 1911,

s. 1 (1), had empowered the Secretary of State to regulate the use of aircraft so as to prevent their being a danger to individuals on the ground, and the Act of 1913, s. 1 (1), had empowered him to prevent their being used so as to be a danger from a military point of view. These powers, with many others, are provided by the Act of 1920.

Aestimatio capitis, the worth of a head; also known as pretium hominis, or the price of a man. It was the penalty payable for various injuries in Anglo-Saxon times. The payment varied according to the rank of the injured person.

Aetate probanda, Writ de, a writ under which, up to the abolition of wards and liveries by the statute 12 Car. 2, c. 2, enquiry was made as to whether a tenant in chief, holding of the King by chivalry, was of full age to receive his lands into his own hands.

Affectus punitur licet non sequatur (9 Rep 57*a*). (A man is punished for what he attempts to do, even though he fails to do it.) But the maxim is of limited application. A man is not liable to the same punishment for attempted murder as for murder.

Affeerors, officers, usually two but sometimes four in number, who were sworn by the steward of the Court of a manor or hundred to assess the pecuniary penalties imposed by the Court, if the amount of such penalties was not fixed by custom. They were sometimes known as taxatores.

Affeerors seem also to have been employed to assess the damages in cases brought in the inferior Courts.

Affidavit. An affidavit is a written statement in the name of a person, called the deponent, by whom it is voluntarily signed and sworn to or affirmed. See OATH; DEPOSITION; COMMISSIONER. It is usually made in an action or other judicial proceeding (see DECLARATION); and in that case the affidavit consists of the title (q.v.), the body (which contains the statement, and is generally divided into paragraphs), the signature of the deponent, and the jurat (q.v.). As to false swearing in affidavits, see FALSE SWEARING.

Affidavits are of infinite variety, but many are known by short names which do not always explain themselves. The following are the principal:—

When the evidence on the trial of an action is taken by affidavit, the plaintiff files his affidavits in chief; the defendant then files his affidavits in answer to the plaintiff's evidence; and the plaintiff files his affidavits in reply to the defendant's affidavits. On interlocutory applications, evidence is usually given by affidavit. In either case, each party is, as a general rule, entitled to cross-examine the witnesses of the opposite party. See ANSWER; DEPONENT.

When an order is made against a party to an action requiring him to make discovery on oath of the documents in his possession or power relating to the matters in question in the action, he is bound to file an affidavit specifying the documents which he has at that time, or formerly had, in his possession or power, and stating that he has not and never had any others (see Ord. 31, rr. 12, 13). This affidavit is called in the King's Bench Division an affidavit of discovery, and in the Chancery Division an affidavit of documents. See DISCOVERY; PRODUCTION; PRIVILEGE; TRAVERSE.

The party against whom discovery is sought may, in lieu of being ordered to file an affidavit, be ordered to deliver to the opposite party a list of the documents which he has or has had (ib., r 13A).

Where, in a common law action, extra expenses have been incurred which do not appear upon the face of the proceedings, such as witnesses' expenses, fees to counsel, attendances, court fees, etc., an affidavit as to these may be required to enable the master to allow them on taxation. This is called an affidavit of increase. It is not to be made unless the master so requires.

An affidavit showing that a person sought to be committed for non-payment of a judgment debt has the means to pay it, is called an affidavit of means.

In probate practice, where probate is desired of a will containing alterations, etc., not evidenced by the signature of the attesting witnesses, or when there otherwise arises any question as to whether the will has been altered since execution, an affidavit is required stating that the will is in the same state as when found at the decease of the testator or as when executed. This is called an affidavit of plight and condition. Where the will has been mislaid and then found, the affidavit is called an affidavit of finding.

In testamentary causes in the Probate Division, the plaintiff and defendant must each file an affidavit stating whether or not any script is in his possession or under his control. In a defended action, the time for filing is fixed by the registrar on the summons for directions. In an undefended action the plaintiff must, unless otherwise directed, file his affidavit before the case is entered for trial. See SCRIPT.

When a married woman is entitled to pro-

the subject of administration proceedings, it will not be delivered to her unless she and her husband make an affidavit that no settlement or agreement for a settlement of her property has been made; for if such a settlement existed, the property might have to be delivered to the trustees of it.

An affidavit proving the service of a writ, notice, or other document, is called an affidavit of service. See SERVICE.

The use of the term affidavit is confined to civil proceedings. The corresponding term for criminal proceedings is information or deposition. The word "deposition" (q.v.) is, however, sometimes used in connection with civil proceedings. See DEBT AND DANGER.

Affidavit Office, an office in the Court of Chancery dealing with matters indicated by its name, the business of which was transferred to the Clerks of Records and Writs (q.v.) by s. 29 of the Court of Chancery Act, 1852.

Affidavit to hold to bail. The Judgments Act, 1838, s. 2, provided that, if, in any action in which the defendant was liable to be arrested, an affidavit was made showing a cause of action of not less than £20 and that the defendant was about to leave the country, a judge might order that the defendant should be held to bail in an amount not exceeding the amount of the cause of action. This affidavit was known as an affidavit to hold to bail. The enactment above mentioned was repealed by s. 20 of the Bankruptcy Repeal and Insolvent Court Act, 1869, as s. 6 of the Debtors Act, 1869 (q.v.), had been passed to replace it.

Affiliation, the process whereby a single woman, or a married woman living apart from her husband, obtains from a Court of summary jurisdiction an order, known as an affiliation order, that a man adjudged by the Court to be the father of her bastard child shall pay for the maintenance of the child a weekly sum not exceeding ten shillings (Affiliation Orders (Increase of Maximum Payment) Act, 1918) until the child shall reach the age of thirteen or (if the Court see fit) sixteen (Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872, s. 5). The Affiliation Orders Act, 1914, provides for the payment of the money through an officer of the Court, unless the applicant, with the approval of the Court, requires it to be paid to her personally. See CORROBORATION.

Affinity is relationship by marriage; that is, the relationship between a husband and his wife's kindred, and between the wife and her husband's kindred. Affinity is a bar to marriage within the prohibited degrees. See CONSANGUINITY; MARRIAGE. The degrees of affinity within which marriage is void are set out in the table annexed to the Book of Common Prayer. That table has statutory authority, and remains in force, except in so far as it is affected by the Marriage (Prohibited Degrees of Relationship) Acts, 1907 and 1921. See DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER.

Cum duae cognationes, inter se divisae, per nuptias copulantur, et altera ad alterius fines accidit, inde dicitur affinitas (Co. Litt. 157*a*). (There is said to be affinity when two families, previously unconnected, are connected together by a marriage, so that each family approaches the confines of the other.) This is not a maxim. It is merely a somewhat ponderous definition of affinity.

Affirm. This word is used in three senses. With regard to contracts, where a contract is voidable, if the party at whose option it is voidable elects to waive his right and to carry out the contract as if it had been valid he is said to affirm it; and if the contract is void for fraudulent misrepresentation, the party defrauded may call on the other party to make good his representation and to perform the contract. With regard to Courts, a Court of Appeal is said to affirm the judgment of a Court below if it upholds that judgment. With regard to statements made in or for the purpose of any judicial proceeding, whether civil or criminal, in the witness-box or in informations, depositions, or affidavits, and with regard severally to all places and all purposes where an oath is required, any person who declares either that the taking an oath is contrary to his religious belief or that he has no religious belief, is allowed to substitute an affirmation for the usual oath and is said to affirm (Oaths Act, 1888). Making a false affirmation is punishable as false swearing (see the Perjury Act, 1911, s. 15 (2)).

Affirmanti non neganti incumbit probatio (Halk. Max. 9). (He who relies on any fact as part of his case must prove it; the party who denies the fact is not required to disprove it.) But the maxim is not of universal application. Thus, the onus of proving negligence lies in general on the party alleging it. But where, for instance, a ship in motion collides with a ship at anchor, the collision itself is generally prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the ship in motion, and it is for her to prove that she was not guilty of negligence. Compare ACTORI, ETC.; EI QUI, ETC.

Afforare, to value or set a price on.

Afforatus. This word is stated to mean appraised or valued, and to have been used of things sold in fairs or markets. In ancient charters, it is used of fines and penalties the amount of which was definitely fixed.

Afforciare. This meant literally to add to, increase, or make stronger. Bracton, writing about the year 1250, uses the word as meaning the addition of further jurors to the original jurors if the original jurors disagreed, in order eventually to get twelve jurors to agree to a verdict. A jury and its functions were then wholly different from what they are now. The jurors were men who decided, not upon the evidence of witnesses examined before them, but upon their own knowledge of the facts; so that the afforcement of the jury was really an expedient for getting a sufficient weight of evidence, or, rather, a sufficient number of witnesses, on one side or the other.

Afforest, to convert ground into a forest (q.v.) in the legal sense.

Affray, a common law misdemeanour which consists of the fighting of two or more persons in a public place to the terror of his Majesty's subjects. Prosecutions for the offence are obsolete. Persons guilty of affray are also guilty of some other offence, such as riot (q.v.), assault (q.v.), or unlawful assembly (q.v.), with which they are in practice charged.

Affreightment, a contract, made either by a charterparty (q.v.) or by a bill of lading (q.v.), by which a shipowner agrees to carry goods in his ship for reward.

African Company. This was the popular title of the Royal Africa Company, incorporated by royal charter in 1672. It was given a monopoly of the trade of the West Coast, and also, subject to the right of the Crown, authority to govern the possessions acquired by it along the coast. In 1698 its trade monopoly was abolished by statute. As the result of two Acts, passed respectively in 1750 and 1752, the Company of Merchants Trading to Africa, which was forbidden to engage in trade, replaced the Royal Africa Company for administrative purposes; and it also was known as the African Company. It, in its turn, was abolished by the West Africa Act, 1821, which vested its possessions in the Crown.

After-acquired Property. See MARRIED WOMEN'S, ETC.; SEPARATE ESTATE.

Agard, the Norman-French for award. See NULLUM ARBITRIUM.

Age. In the criminal law a child under seven cannot commit any offence, and a child between the ages of seven and fourteen commits an offence only if it be shown that he acted with knowledge that he was doing wrong. A boy under fourteen can in no circumstances be guilty of rape, or of assault with intent to commit rape. No limit to the age at which parentage is possible has ever been fixed in the case of a man, nor for that matter in the case of a woman; but in the case of a woman, the Courts will assume that childbearing is impossible when her age and also the facts point clearly to that conclusion.

See CARNAL KNOWLEDGE; INFANTS.

Age Prier or Prayer. When an action was being brought against one under age for lands which he had by descent, he could move the Court to stay the action until he attained full age. This application (known as age prier) was generally granted; it was known as far back as the reign of Edward I.

Agency; agent. An agent is a person who acts on behalf of another person (the principal). The status of an agent, or the relation between him and his principal, is called agency. See PRINCIPAL AND AGENT. The general rule is that whatever a person can do in his own right he may appoint an agent to do for him; but an agent, executor, trustee, etc., cannot himself delegate his office, because the power which he possesses is not in his own right. See DELEGATUS NON POTEST DELEGARE; MINISTERIAL; SUBSTITUTION.

As regards third persons, agency is merely a mode by which a person can do acts through the medium of another person. An act done by an agent within the scope of his authority binds the principal in the same manner as if the principal himself had done it; thus, if I authorise A to buy goods for me, and A does so, I am liable to pay for them.

As regards the principal and the agent inter se, agents are of two kinds—gratuitous and remunerated. In the case of a gratuitous agency, the principal cannot compel the agent to enter on the agency, that is, to act as his agent, unless the contract is under seal; but a gratuitous agent who acts as such is liable for gross negligence. Compare BAILMENT. A gratuitous agent, when formally appointed, is commonly called an attorney (q.v.). Where the agent is entitled to be paid for his services, the agency consists of a contract by the agent to perform the services and by the principal to pay him for them. On the other hand, the principal is entitled to demand an account from his agent.

Agents employed for the sale of goods or merchandise are called mercantile agents, and are of two principal classes—brokers and factors (q.v.). A factor is sometimes called a commission agent, or commission merchant; but in practice the latter terms seem to be frequently used to denote an agent who purchases goods for his principal, while "factor" generally means an agent for sale. A commission agent stands in the relation of vendor (as well as agent) to his principal, because the persons from whom he buys the goods sell to him and not to his principal.

As regards the extent of the agent's authority, he is either general or special. A general agent is one who is empowered to act for his principal in all business of a particular kind (e.g., to conduct a business or branch of a business, or purchase goods of a particular kind from time to time), or one who, though only appointed by his principal to do a particular act, is by occupation an agent, such as a banker or a horse-dealer. A special agent is one who is authorised to do a particular act (e.g., to buy a horse, execute a deed, or the like), and whose ordinary occupation is not to do such acts. In the case of a general agent, the principal is bound by all acts done by him within the scope of his ordinary employment, whether such acts were warranted by his private instructions or not, while in the case of a special agent the principal is only bound if the agent acts according to his particular commission or authority. See DEL CREDERE; POWER OF ATTORNEY; AUTHORITY; RATIFICATION; ULTRA VIRES; WARRANTY.

An agent is not permitted to acquire any benefit or profit for himself in the course of, or by reason of, his agency, unless his principal knows and approves of his so doing; and he must account to the principal for all profits made by him quâ agent, unless the principal waives his right. As to the receipt of actual bribes by an agent, see CORRUPTION.

See SECRET PROFITS.

In criminal law, where one person with criminal intention, causes another to do, without criminal intention, an act which would be a crime on his part if it were done with criminal intention, then the former is guilty of the crime committed and the latter is the innocent agent.

As to frauds by agents, see FRAUD.

In the practice of the House of Lords and Privy Council in appeals, solicitors and other persons admitted to practise in those Courts in a similar capacity to that of solicitors in ordinary Courts are technically called "agents."

Agency Terms. These embody whatever is the arrangement as to remuneration which is made between a country solicitor and the London solicitor who acts as the town agent of the country solicitor.

Agentes et consentientes pari poena plectentur (5 Rep. 80a). (Those who do an act and those who consent to its being done are visited with the same penalty.) In the criminal law this maxim is not of universal application; it applies to some offences, but not to others. In the case from which it is cited it is used to show how the rights of the various parties to a transaction carried out for the purpose of barring an entail were effected by the transaction.

Agents-General. New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, Queensland, Tasmania, and Western Australia are each represented in London by an official known as an Agent-General. These colonies, as the constituent parts of the Commonwealth of Australia, are further represented by the High Commissioner of the Commonwealth; and the Union of South Africa, the Dominion of Canada, the Dominion of New Zealand, and Newfoundland, are each represented by a High Commissioner. These Agents-General and High Commissioners are each accredited to the Colonial Secretary, who presents them to the King. They represent their respective Governments in much the same way as ambassadors and ministers represent foreign States.

Aggravated Assault. The Offences against the Person Act, 1861, s. 43, empowers justices to deal summarily with any assault upon a child or a woman which "is of such an aggravated nature that it cannot in their opinion be sufficiently punished under the provisions hereinbefore contained" (in s. 42) "as to common assaults and batteries." Such an assault is popularly known as an aggravated assault. See ASSAULT.

Aggravation, Matter of. As regards a pleading, this means matter which only tends to increase the amount of damages and does not itself constitute a ground for action.

Agist; Agister; Agistment. Agistment is where a person takes in and feeds or depastures horses, cattle or similar animals upon his land for reward. An agister is, therefore, a bailee for reward, and is liable for the cattle if he uses less than ordinary diligence (e.g. if he leaves a gate open, or if he places a horse in a field where it is likely to be attacked by a bull). An agister has no lien on the animals which he agists, unless there is an express agreement to that effect. As to distraint of agisted cattle, see DISTRESS.

Agitatio animalium in foresta. See DRIFTS OF THE FOREST.

Agreement. Agreement, in its widest sense, is where two or more persons concur in expressing a common intention with the view of altering their rights and duties. An agreement of this kind has no legal effect when existing by itself, but is an essential part of every true contract, gift, payment, conveyance and compromise, and of every voluntary variation or discharge of a contract or other obligation. Thus, in a formal deed of conveyance, the introductory recital always refers to the agreement in pursuance of which the conveyance is executed, meaning not the preliminary contract of sale but the mutual assent of the parties at the time the deed is executed.

When analysed, the essential marks of an agreement are these: there must be at least two persons; they must definitely intend the same thing; they must communicate this intention to one another; and the object of their intention must be such as will, when carried out, alter their legal position, e.g. by producing the transfer of property or the creation or extinction of a right. The communication of intention may be formal or informal, simple or complicated, but it may always be reduced to the elements of a proposal made by one party and accepted by the other; so that until a proposal is absolutely accepted there is no agreement. See PROMISE.

In its narrower and popular sense, "agreement" has the same meaning as "contract," especially "contract not under seal"; thus an agreement for a lease is a contract to grant a lease. "Agreement" and "contract," however, are sometimes opposed to one another, "contract" generally denoting an arrangement complete in itself, while "agreement" may denote a part of an arrangement. Thus, in a sale of a house, "contract of sale" denotes the whole arrangement between the vendor and purchaser, while each clause binding either of the parties to do a specific thing is an agreement, e.g. a clause binding the vendor to put the property in repair before the sale is completed. See MUTUALITY; CONTRACT.

Agricultural Children, the term popularly applied to children engaged in agricultural work. An attempt to provide for their better education was first made by the Agricultural Children Act, 1873, which, in spite of its title, does not contain the phrases "agricultural children" or "agricultural child." The Act was repealed by s. 52 of the Elementary Education Act, 1876: the latter Act and the various other Elementary Education Acts now deal with such children.

Agricultural Gang. A "gangmaster" is any person, whether male or female, who hires children under thirteen, young persons over sixteen and under eighteen, or females over the age of eighteen, with a view to their employment in agricultural labour on lands not in his own occupation; and an "agricultural gang" means a body of any of such persons under the control of a gangmaster: see s. 3 of the Agricultural Gangs Act, 1867, which is the Act relating to the management of such gangs.

Agricultural Holdings Acts. The Agricultural Holdings Acts, 1908 and 1913, and Part II. of the Agriculture Act, 1920 (collectively entitled the Agricultural Holdings Acts, 1908 to 1920), form a code which confer on an outgoing tenant of a holding many advantages (out of which he cannot contract himself) with regard to (1) Compensation for improvements; (2) Compensation for disturbance; (3) Compensation for damage by game; (4) Fixtures erected by him; (5) Distress; (6) Length of notice to quit; (7) the cultivation of his holding and various other matters.

The term "holding" means any "land held by the tenant which is either wholly agricultural or wholly pastoral, or in part agricultural and as to the residue pastoral, or in whole or in part cultivated as a market garden, and which is not let to the tenant during his continuance in any office, appointment, or employment held under the landlord" (Act of 1908, s. 48).

The term includes any land so used, even though there is held along with it other land not so used (Act of 1920, s. 24), but only where both parcels of land are held on a contract of tenancy commencing after the commencement of the Act of 1920 (ib.).

The effect of the Agricultural Holdings Acts cannot be given fully here; reference for certain details may be made to ANIMALS, LIABILITY FOR; COMPENSATION FOR DISTURBANCE; COMPENSATION FOR IMPROVEMENTS; CUSTOM; DISTRESS; FIXTURES; MARKET GARDENS; NOTICE TO QUIT.

Agricultural Labourers. See MINIMUM WAGE.

Agricultural Wages Board. See MINIMUM WAGE.

Agriculture and Fisheries, Ministry of. The Board of Agriculture was created by the Board of Agriculture Act, 1889, s. 1, which also provided that a President of the Board might be appointed. The powers and duties of the Board of Trade as to fisheries were transferred to it by the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries Act, 1903, which provided that the Board of Agriculture should in future be known as the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries. The Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries Act, 1919, s. 1, repealed s. 1 of the Act of 1889, and substituted the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries for the Board and a Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries for the President of the Board. The Minister is not disqualified from sitting in Parliament (Act of 1889, s. 8). He must be a member of the Privy Council (ib., s. 1 (2)). His salary is £2,000 a year (ib., s. 5 (2)). He may appoint two secretaries, one of whom is not disqualified from sitting in Parliament (ib., s. 5; Board of Agriculture and Fisheries Act, 1909).

Under the Act of 1889, s. 2 (1) and sch. 1, there were transferred to the Board (1) the powers and duties of the Privy Council under the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Acts (now replaced by the Diseases of Animals Acts, 1894 to 1914 (q.v.), and the Destructive Insects Act, 1877 (which, along with a further Act of 1907, is known as the Destructive Insects and Pests Acts, 1877 and 1907 (q.v.)); (2) the powers and duties of the Land Commissioners for England under all Acts relating to Allotments, Commons, Copyhold, Drainage and Improvement of Land, Enclosure, Metropolitan Commons, Tithe Rent-charge, Agricultural Holdings, Conveyancing, Glebe Land, Settled Land, and Estates of Universities, Colleges, and Public Schools, and under all other Acts, whether public or private; (3) all powers and duties which were vested in the Commissioners of Works by the Survey Act, 1870. The Dogs Act, 1906, s. 2, gave the Board certain powers, in addition to those under the Diseases of Animals Acts, as to dogs (q.v.). The Markets and Fairs (Weighing of Cattle) Act, 1891, gave the Board certain powers (some of which had previously been exercised by the Local Government Board) as to markets and fairs (q.v.).

Under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908, s. 15, the Board was empowered to grant to a landlord of a holding, in respect of which he had paid compensation for improvements to a tenant, a charge on the holding for the amount paid; and under the Agricultural Act, 1920, s. 29, this power extends to a payment made as compensation for disturbance.

Under the Merchandise Marks (Prosecutions) Act, 1894, s. 1, the Board might exercise, with regard to cases relating to agricultural or horticultural produce or (Board of Agriculture and Fisheries Act, 1903, s. 1 (8)) the produce of any fishing industry, the powers given by the Merchandise Marks Act, 1891, to the Board of Trade in respect of prosecutions for offences under the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887.

Such statutory powers and duties of any public department as may appear to his Majesty to relate to agriculture or forestry or (Board of Agriculture and Fisheries Act, 1903, s. 1 (3)) to the industry of fishing might be transferred to the Board by Order in Council (Act of 1889, s. 4). The policy of the Legislature was, in fact, to assign all such matters to the Board. Thus the administration of the Maintenance of Live Stock Act, 1915, and of the Corn Production Act, 1917, was entrusted to the Board; and now the Administration of the Agriculture Act, 1920, is entrusted to the Ministry, which, under s. 1 of the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries Act, 1919 (see ante), replaces the Board for every purpose mentioned above.

Aid by Verdict. Under the old common law practice certain defects as regards forms in the indictment or the pleadings, which would have been fatal upon demurrer (q.v.), were said to be aided or cured by the verdict, that is to say, the opposite party could not take objection to them after the verdict, because he had "pleaded over" (or taken no notice of them) instead of demurring. Other defects might, however, be of so serious a character that the Court, even after verdict, would on application stay or arrest the judgment on the ground that the whole proceedings had been vitiated; and in such case there was no aid by verdict, and in criminal proceedings this still applies. See JEOFAILS.

Aid Prayer. In real actions (abolished in 1832) this meant a petition in Court by which the tenant might call for the assistance, to help him to plead, of some other person. Thus, a tenant for life might call for the assistance of the reversioner or remainderman, and an incumbent might call for the assistance of the patron or ordinary. The person of whom aid was prayed was joined as a party, and helped to defend the action.

Aids. These were originally, in theory at any rate, voluntary payments from feudal tenants to their lords, but gradually the lords came to demand them as of right. In the reign of Henry II. Glanville says that the lord was entitled to the aid for paying the relief due to his own overlord, the aid for knighting the lord's eldest son, and the aid for marrying the lord's eldest daughter. The aids payable to the King as feudal overlord were specified in Magna Charta. All these feudal aids were abolished by the statute 12 Car. 2, c. 24; but parliamentary taxes continued to be called aids down to 1688.

Aiel, a grandfather. A writ of aiel was a real action which lay for the recovery of lands of the heir's grandfather which had been seized on the day of his death, and which had been abated by a stranger. See ABATEMENT OF FREEHOLD; BESAIL; COSINAGE.

Air. At common law, every landowner is entitled to the enjoyment of air passing to and from his land over the land of another landowner. But this right does not entitle a landowner to claim that another landowner shall not use his land in the ordinary way, as by building on it, and so obstructing the passage of air to or from adjoining land, unless an easement (q.v.) to the air has been acquired which gives the person possessing such an easement the right to prevent any such use of adjoining land as will interfere with the enjoyment of the easement. A right to the absolutely uninterrupted flow of air to or from adjoining land cannot be acquired. If land is conveyed for a specific purpose, the person who conveys the land will not, indeed, be permitted so to use land which remains in his possession as to interfere with the use for such purpose of the land which he has conveyed; and so, where land is granted with a stable on it, the grantor will be restrained from interrupting the passage of air so as to render the stable useless. But, except in such a case, an owner of land cannot be prevented from erecting buildings which, for instance, interfere with the access of air to a windmill on adjoining land, or which cause chimneys on adjoining land to smoke. But an easement can be acquired which gives a right to the passage of air into or out of a defined aperture, such as a window or ventilating opening; and an owner of adjoining land can be restrained from using his land so as to interfere with such right. Such an easement can be acquired by prescription (q.v.). The right to pure air is a natural right. In the absence of an easement, pollution of air in such a degree as to injure health or property is an injury for which an action lies; but if the pollution is such as merely to cause inconvenience or discomfort, the circumstances of each case will determine whether there is or is not a right of action. Thus a dweller in towns cannot expect the same freedom from smoke and smell as one dwelling in the country. See LEX NON FAVET, ETC.

Air Board, a body constituted for the management of the air forces of the Crown under the New Ministries and Secretaries Act, 1916. All its former powers, duties, etc., were transferred to the Air Council by the Air Forces (Constitution) Act, 1917, s. 8 (3).

Air Council. See AIR FORCE.

Air Force. The Air Force (Constitution) Act, 1917, provided for the establishment, administration and discipline of the Air Force. The force is under the administration of the Air Council, consisting of a Secretary of State (q.v.) and such other persons as may be appointed pursuant to the Act (s. 8). The force is subject to the Army Act, with the necessary alterations (s. 12). The Secretary for Air is responsible for the Air Force, as the Secretary for War is for the Army, and as the First Lord of the Admiralty is for the Navy.

Air-Gun. See GUN.

Air Navigation. See AERIAL NAVIGATION.

Airway, an inlet for air in a mine; malicious injury or obstruction is dealt with by s. 28 of the Malicious Damage Act, 1861.

Aisle. This term means a nave, choir, or transept of a church

An aisle which from time out of mind has belonged to a particular house and has been maintained and repaired by the owner of that house, is part of his freehold, and the ordinary (q.v.) cannot interfere with it or dispose of it. If anyone, as owner of a house, has thus a right to the exclusive use of an aisle, he may convey it to another person to be held independently of the house.

If the owner of a house builds a new aisle to a parish church, the exclusive right to use the aisle for worship or burial may be given to him, by faculty of the ordinary annexing the aisle to the house during the possession of the house by such person and his family.

Akermannus, a villein who had to plough his lord's demesne.

Alabama Case. The Alabama was built at Liverpool, during the American Civil War, for use by the Confederate States as a warship. She left British waters without being equipped with her guns, which were put into her at the Azores. She subsequently destroyed a number of merchant ships belonging to the Northern States. The United States Government, which had ineffectually endeavoured to induce the British Government to prevent her leaving British waters, subsequently claimed damages for her depredations from the British Government; and ultimately, under the Treaty of Washington, concluded May 8, 1871, between the two Governments, the amount of damages was fixed at £3,229,166 by an international tribunal at Geneva. It was agreed in the treaty that the tribunal should be bound by the following rules:—

"A neutral government is bound—(1st) To use due diligence to prevent the fitting out, arming or equipping, within its jurisdiction, of any vessel which it has reasonable ground to believe is intended to cruise or carry on war against a power with which it is at peace; and also to use like diligence to prevent the departure from its jurisdiction of any vessel intended to cruise or carry on war as above, such vessel having been specially adapted, in whole or in part, within such jurisdiction, for warlike use; (2nd) Not to permit or suffer either belligerent to make use of its ports or waters as the base of naval operations against the other, or for the purpose of the renewal or augmentation of military supplies or arms, or the recruitment of men; (3rd) To exercise due diligence in its own ports and waters, and as to all persons within its jurisdiction, to prevent any violation of the foregoing obligations and duties."

These rules have since been part of international law.

Alb; Albe. A white linen vestment reaching to the feet. In the Established Church the use of this vestment would appear to be illegal: but controversy still rages round it.

Alba firma. When quit-rents, payable to the Crown by copyholders or freeholders of manors, were reserved in silver, or white money, they were anciently called white-rents or blanch-farms or redditus albi, in contradistinction to rents reserved in work, grain, etc., which were called black maile or redditus negri. Lands subject to white-rents were said to be held per albam firmam.

Alderman. The name is borrowed from the Anglo-Saxon ealdorman (literally, an elder), (q.v.). The alderman as we now know him is either the alderman of the City of London (q.v.)—who is in a class by himself—or one of the council which governs the municipal affairs of a borough (q.v.), or the county alderman, as to whom see COUNTY COUNCIL. The county alderman dates only from 1888. The alderman of a town or city is the modern representative of the aldermen who, along with mayors and town councillors, have formed the governing bodies of municipalities for the last seven hundred years.

Alderney. One of the Channel Islands (q.v.).

Aleatory Contract, an expression used in the civil law to describe what the English law terms a wagering contract. See WAGER.

Ale-taster, an officer, also known as an ale-conner, ale-founder, or ale-kenner, anciently appointed at a court-leet to see to the quality of ale within the lordship. In the City of London, at any rate down to the middle of the eighteenth century, four such officers were annually appointed by the liverymen.

Alfred, Dooms of. Compiled about the end of the ninth century. The preface to them reads as follows: "I, then, Alfred, King, gathered these together, and commanded many of those to be written which our forefathers held, those which to me seemed good; and many of those which seemed to me not good I rejected them, by the counsel of my Witan, and in other wise commanded them to be holden; for I durst not venture to set down in writing much of my own, for it was unknown to me what of it would please those who should come after us. But those things which I met with, either of the days of Ine my kinsman, or of Offa King of the Mercians, or of Æthelbryght, who first among the English race received baptism, those which seemed to me the rightest, those I have here gathered together, and rejected the others." See Thorpe, Ancient Laws of England, 2 vols., 1840; Turk, Legal Code of Alfred the Great, 1893; Attenborough, Laws of the Earliest English Kings, 1922.

Alia enormia (other wrongs). Declarations (corresponding to what is now termed the statement of claim) in the action of trespass, after stating or alleging the specific wrongs or injuries complained of, usually concluded with the general words, "and other wrongs to the plaintiff then did, &c."; and this conclusion was frequently called, in the language of pleading, the allegation of alia enormia.

Alias. When a person who goes by several names is indicted, he is described in the indictment as "A B, otherwise C D, otherwise E F," etc. Formerly, when pleadings, etc., were in Latin, this was expressed alias dictus ("otherwise called"); and hence such a person is said to go by several aliases or false names.

Alias Writ. This was a second writ, issued after a former one had proved ineffectual. If the alias also failed, a third writ might have been sued out, which was called a pluries. These writs derived their respective names from the words occurring in their respective forms, viz., "Sicut alias praecipimus," "Sicut pluries praecipimus." Both forms of writ were abolished by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 10, and the same statute in its 9th section enacted that the plaintiff in any action might, at any time during six months from the issuing of the original writ of summons, issue one or more concurrent writ or writs. And now under Ord. VI., r. 1, the plaintiff, at the time of issuing the original writ or within twelve months thereafter, may issue one or more concurrent writ or writs (i.e., copies of the original writ, even the date being the same) with a seal containing the word "concurrent" impressed on each copy. A writ for service within the jurisdiction may be issued concurrently with one for service out of the jurisdiction, and vice versa (Ord. VI., r. 2). The concurrent writ is in force only so long as the original is in force, but may be renewed like the original writ.

Alibi. A prisoner or accused person is said to set up an alibi when he alleges that at the time when the offence with which he is charged was committed he was "elsewhere," that is, in a different place from that in which it was committed. If proved, it is, of course, a complete answer to the charge.

Alien. At common law an alien is a subject of a foreign State who was not born within the allegiance (q.v.) of the Crown. But now such a person may become a British subject (q.v.) by naturalization (q.v.), and a British subject may become an alien by alienage (q.v.) or by expatriation (q.v.); and at present "the expression 'alien' means a person who is not a British subject" (British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914, s. 27 (1)).

The Acts which now, and for the first time, enable the Government to control aliens effectively are the Aliens Restriction Act, 1914, and the Aliens Restriction Amendment Act, 1919. The first of these Acts (s. 1) empowers the King to make provision by Order in Council:—for prohibiting aliens from landing in the United Kingdom either at all or except as the Order may direct; for prohibiting the exit of aliens from the United Kingdom either altogether or except as the Order may direct; for the deportation of aliens from the United Kingdom; for regulating their places of residence; for the registration of aliens; for the punishment of breaches of such Order; for arrest and search; and "for any other matters which appear necessary or expedient for the safety of the realm." The section limited the exercise of this power to times of war, imminent national danger, or great emergency: but the Act of 1919, s. 1 (1), gave the Crown power to issue the Order in Council at any time whatsoever within one year from 23rd December, 1919: and s. 1 (1) of the Act of 1919 has been kept in force by the Expiring Laws Continuance Acts of 1920 and subsequent years, so that it has become quasi-permanent. The Act of 1919, s. 2 (1), also provided that any Order in Council made under the 1914 Act must contain provisions as to the nationality to be ascribed to aliens.

In pursuance of these enactments, the Aliens Order, 1919, and the Aliens Order, 1920 (which revoked the Order of 1919 as from 12th April, 1920), have been made.

Alien ami; Alien ennemi. The subject of a foreign State is known to the law as an alien ami while this country is at peace with that State. While a state of war exists between this country and that State he is known as an alien ennemi, and he cannot sue in an English Court unless by virtue of an Order in Council or of a duly authorised licence or unless he comes within the realm in some capacity, such as that of an envoy, which puts him within the King's peace.

Alienage. A British subject can lose his British nationality either by expatriation (q.v.) or by a declaration of alienage—that is to say, by declaring that he abandons his status of a British subject (q.v.)—under the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914, ss. 14, 15.

Alienatio licet prohibeatur, consensu tamen omnium in favorem quorum prohibita est potest fieri (Co. Litt. 98*a*). (Although alienation be prohibited, yet it may take place with the consent of all the persons in whose interests it is prohibited.) This maxim is both good law and good sense, and requires no explanation.

Alienatio rei prefertur juri accrescendi (Co. Litt. 185*a*). (The law favours the alienation rather than the accumulation of property.) This is illustrated by the rule under which the right of one joint tenant to take the whole subject of the joint tenancy on the death of the other is defeated if the joint tenant who first dies has disposed of his share during his lifetime. Other illustrations are the rule against perpetuities (q.v.), and the restriction of accumulation (q.v.).

Alienation. This is the power of the owner or tenant to dispose of his interest in real or personal property. With reference to personal property, the power appears to have always existed, subject only to certain difficulties in the mode of the alienation; but with reference to real property, the power was only slowly and gradually acquired. For,

I. As to Voluntary Alienation,—

Originally no estate of freehold was alienable by the tenant without the consent of the lord of whom he held; and in fact all estates in land were at first only life estates. See ESTATE. By the time of Henry II., however, the power of alienation was permitted to the tenant over lands acquired by purchase, to the extent of defeating his heirs of their succession, or of part thereof. Gifts in frankmarriage and in frankalmoign (see these titles) were the earliest of these partial modes of alienation. Subinfeudation was the other mode of alienation which was most common (see that title); and, as the heir of the subinfeudor became entitled to the rent or services in lieu of the land, that equivalent (being most probably a substantial equivalent) may have hastened the development of the ancestor's power over the expectant interests of his heir. For, at any rate as early as the reign of Henry III., the power of the ancestor to destroy the expectation of his heirs, whether collateral or lineal, had become absolute.

The process of subinfeudation infringed also on the right of the lord, rendering it more precarious and also more difficult to levy the services to which he was entitled as landlord in chief; and accordingly it was attempted by Magna Charta, c. 32, to check the practice of subinfeudation. But the practice was not effectually checked by that enactment; and a new mode of grant also about that time came into use, being to a man and his heirs, or to whomsoever he might assign the land—words which expressly conferred upon the tenant a power of alienation. In consequence of this last-mentioned mode of grant, and the power of alienation which it carried with it, the lord was still more prejudiced in his interests, and in particular in his reversion or right to resume the lands upon the determination of the issue of his grantee. This change to the disadvantage of the lord is commonly assigned to the feebleness and distractions of the reign of Henry III., and it is said to have also been fostered by the crusading spirit of the age.

At length it was enacted by the statute Quia Emptores, 18 Edw. 1 (or Statute of Westminster III.), c. 1, that every freeman might, without his lord's consent, sell his entire lands, or any portion thereof, the purchaser to hold the lands of the same chief lord that his vendor previously held. In this manner alienation by deed inter vivos became complete.

The power of alienation by will grew up later. Putting on one side certain limited customary powers of devise, lands could not originally be devised by will at all, excepting in an indirect and circuitous manner. The method resorted to was to convey the lands by deed inter vivos to some third person to hold the same to such uses as the person conveying should mention in his will. This process was checked for the future by the Statute of Uses, 27 Hen. 8, c. 10; but, the process having been long in use, the power of testamentary disposition over lands could not be withheld altogether, and accordingly it was partially restored by the stat. 32 Hen. 8, c. 1, which enabled a tenant to dispose of the entirety of his socage tenures and two-third parts of his knight-service tenures; and the statute 12 Car. 2, c. 24, having converted all knight-service into socage tenures, the power of alienation by will was, by a side wind, made absolute.

II. As to Involuntary Alienation,—

Originally lands were not liable to be taken in payment of debts, but since the reign of Henry III., when estates of inheritance first became general, the liability has been gradually imposed by statute. By the statute 13 Edw. 1, c. 18, one moiety of a debtor's legal fee simple lands became liable during his life upon judgment debts by means of the writ of elegit; by the Statute of Frauds, 29 Car. 2, c. 3, s. 10, one moiety of his equitable fee simple lands became also liable in like manner; and by the Judgments Act, 1838, the entirety of the fee simple lands, whether legal or equitable, of the debtor were rendered liable upon judgment. See JUDGMENT DEBTS. After the decease of the debtor, his legal fee simple lands were at first liable if and so far as he had either charged them with the payment of his debts or specially bound his heir with such payment; by the statute 3 Will. & Mary, c. 14, the word "heir" was extended so as to include devisee of the lands; by the Statute of Frauds, 29 Car. 2, c. 3, his equitable fee simple lands were made liable to the same extent as if they had been legal; and, finally, by the Administration of Estates Act, 1833, all his lands (whether legal or equitable or of whatever tenure) were rendered liable for his debts of all kinds.

An estate tail, although of inheritance, is not liable for debts after the decease of the debtor; but it is liable during his life in case of his bankruptcy, and also upon a judgment duly executed against him, in either case to the same extent that he (the debtor) himself could, without the assistance of any other person, alienate the same.

Alienation in Mortmain. This means the alienation (q.v.) of lands or tenements to any corporation (q.v.), sole or aggregate, and whether ecclesiastical or temporal.

Alieni juris, under the mastership of another. In the Roman law it meant one under the potestas or power of a father or master as opposed to a person sui juris, that is to say, a person not subject to such authority. In the English law it is not, however, used as opposed to the expression sui juris (q.v.) or at all.

Alimony (alimonia). That allowance which is made to a woman for her support out of her husband's estate when she is under the necessity of living apart from him. This provision is allowed the wife during the pendency of a suit for divorce or for judicial separation between her and her husband, as well to provide the wife with the means to obtain justice as for her ordinary subsistence. When there has been a sentence of divorce or of judicial separation, alimony becomes a permanent allowance, and is continued during the whole period of separation. Upon an application for alimony, the Court requires on the part of the husband a statement both of his casual and of his certain income to be set forth. The wife, although the guilty party, has been allowed alimony, or a provision by way of alimony, subject to conditions. As a rule, alimony is fixed at about one-third of the joint incomes of husband and wife if there are not, and a larger amount if there are, children to be supported by the wife.

Alio intuitu, with a motive other than the ostensible and proper one, as when a man brings an action for the purpose merely of advertisement.

Aliquid conceditur ne injuria remaneat impunita, quod alias non conceditur (Co. Litt. 197*b*). (Something is conceded, which would otherwise not be conceded, lest an injury should be left unpunished.) Coke introduces the maxim by saying: ". . . in every case where a man is wronged and endammaged . . . he shall have remedie."

Aliquis non debet esse judex in propria causa quia non potest esse judex et pars (Co. Litt. 141). (No man ought to be a judge in his own cause, because he cannot act as a judge and at the same time be a party.) This maxim is of importance chiefly as regards justices, who are disqualified from acting judicially in any case in the subject-matter of which they have any pecuniary interest, no matter how small. In the High Court the rule is rigidly observed. Thus a judge will not try a case on which he, as counsel, had advised before his elevation to the Bench; and it has been held that the decree of a Lord Chancellor in favour of a company must be set aside merely on the ground that he was a shareholder in the company. Compare NEMO POTEST, ETC.; NEMO DEBET, ETC.; BIAS.

Aliud est celare, aliud tacere. (Silence is not the same thing as concealment.) This maxim is merely a quotation from Cicero, De Officiis, lib. 3, c. 12; and Cicero, in his turn, had merely quoted a remark made by Diogenes. It applies to the sale of goods, with regard to which, when there is no warranty either express or implied, the buyer has no remedy against the seller, unless there be fraud. If there be no warranty, the seller is entitled to be silent as to defects. But he is not entitled to take steps to conceal defects for the purposes of the sale: that would be fraud.

Aliud est possidere, aliud esse in possessione (Hob. 163). (It is one thing to possess and another thing to be in possession.) The maxim was used of one who, by "a canonical title or allowance or commission," held a cure of souls, and so was "in a sort of possession," but did not "possess" as a tenant possessed land. The maxim is of no present application.

Alkali Works. The Alkali Works Regulation Act, 1906, regulates—

(1) Alkali works, that is to say (s. 27 (1)), every works for (a) the manufacture of sulphate of soda or sulphate of potash, or (b) the treatment of copper ores by common salt or other chlorides whereby any sulphate is formed, in which muriatic acid gas is evolved.

(2) All works of whatever description in which a liquid is produced containing either acid or any other substance capable of liberating sulphuretted hydrogen from alkali waste, or the drainage thereof (s. 3 (1)).

(3) Sulphuric acid works, as defined in Sch. I. (1) (2).

(4) Muriatic acid works, as defined in s. 6 (2), Sch. I. (8).

(5) The following works:—Chemical manure, gas liquor, nitric acid, sulphate of ammonia, muriate of ammonia, chlorine, sulphide, alkali waste, Venetian red, lead deposit, arsenic, nitrate and chloride of iron, bisulphide of carbon, picric acid, sulpho-cyanide, bisulphite, paraffin oil, tar, and zinc (Sch. I.).

(6) Cement works in which aluminous deposits are treated for the purpose of making cement (s. 8 (1)).

(7) Smelting works in which sulphide ores are smelted or calcined (s. 8 (1)).

Such works must be registered (s. 9). The owners of such works other than Nos. 6 and 7 may, subject to the approval of the Minister of Health, make rules for workmen, imposing fines not exceeding £2 for breaches thereof (s. 15).

The Act contains provisions for the purpose of preventing the discharge of noxious or offensive gases into the air, and generally for the purpose of preventing nuisance. Reference must be made to the sections dealing with the various classes of works.

Allegans contraria non est audiendus (4 Inst. 279; Jenk. Cent. 16). (He who makes statements mutually inconsistent is not to be listened to.) "You cannot blow hot and cold" with regard to the same transaction; and so, where a man has made a representation on the faith of which another has acted, then the man who made the representation will not be allowed to contradict it. The doctrine of estoppel (q.v.) is largely founded on this maxim. So also, a witness who contradicts himself on cross-examination is discredited.

Allegans suam turpitudinem non est audiendus (4 Inst. 279). (A person alleging his own infamy is not to be heard.) This does not mean that in criminal prosecutions the evidence of an accomplice (q.v.) is not admissible; because it is. Nor does it mean, as regards any witness, that he shall not be allowed to give evidence which discredits himself. What it does mean is that no one shall be allowed to set up a claim based on his own wrongdoing.

Allegari non debuit quod probatum non relevat (1 Ch. Cas. 45). (That which would be irrelevant if proved, ought not to be heard.) That is to say, it ought not to be alleged in any pleading or affidavit, nor in any speech of counsel.

Allegatio contra factum non est admittenda. (Where a man has entered into a solemn engagement under his hand and seal as to certain facts he shall not be permitted to deny any matter which he has so asserted.) See ESTOPPEL BY DEED. This maxim is almost identical in meaning with the maxim Nemo contra, etc. (q.v.).

Allegation. Generally, this means any statement of fact made in any proceeding, as, for instance, in an affidavit or pleading.

In the ecclesiastical law, any pleading after the first (which is called the libel) is termed an allegation. The answer to the libel—or charge—is termed a responsive allegation; if the plaintiff replies to the responsive allegation, his reply is called a counter allegation or responding application; and when a party objects to evidence adduced by the other party, he is said to give an exceptive allegation.

Allegiance is the tie or ligamen which binds the subject to the King, in return for that protection which the King affords the subject. It consists in a true and faithful obedience of the subject due to his sovereign, and is commonly said to be of four kinds—natural, acquired, local, and legal.

Natural allegiance is that which is due from all men born within the King's dominions immediately upon their birth. A person born in the British dominions of alien parents, but who is a subject of a foreign State, may divest himself of this natural allegiance by making a declaration of alienage (q.v.). Acquired allegiance is that obtained by naturalization or denization (q.v.). Local allegiance is that which is due from every alien only so long as he continues within the dominions of the English Crown. Legal allegiance is so called "because the municipal laws of this realm have prescribed the order and form of it": it is created by the oath of allegiance, which has to be taken on various occasions—e.g. by the great officers of the Crown on assuming office. It does not seem to add anything to the duties of ordinary allegiance. To the class of legal allegiance may also be referred that due from the children born abroad of natural-born British subjects, of which, however, they may divest themselves by a declaration of alienage (q.v.).

Allegiance is also used with the sense of locality, as where a person is said to be born within the allegiance of the Crown, meaning within the British dominions.

Formerly allegiance meant also the fealty (q.v.) due by feudal tenants to their lords. See BRITISH SUBJECT.

Allegiare. In the Anglo-Saxon this meant to proceed by course of law.

Aller sans jour. For the Court to order a plaintiff Aller sans jour the result was the same as the order Eat sine die (q.v.).

Alleviare, formerly used as meaning to pay an accustomed fine to a lord.

All Fours. See NULLUM SIMILE, etc.

All Hallows=All Saints (q.v.). See HALLAMAS.

Allocate. This was a writ authorising the making of certain allowances or discounts to accountants to the Exchequer. See LIBERATE.

Allocation, formerly used as meaning an allowance upon an account in the Exchequer: more recently used in Chancery practice as meaning the appropriation to particular persons or purposes of funds under the control of the Court.

Allocatione facienda, De, a writ which anciently lay for an accountant to the Crown for the allowance to him of such sums as he had lawfully expended in his office. It was directed to the Lord Treasurer and the Barons of the Exchequer.

Allocato comitatu. When a writ of exigent (q.v.) had not been served or complied with, the writ of allocatu comitatu was anciently allowed before the old County Court (q.v.).

Allocatur. What is now known as the certificate of the taxing master, or other official empowered to tax costs, was formerly known as the allocatur.

Allocutus. When a prisoner is convicted of treason or felony on indictment, the Court is bound to demand of him what he has to say as to why the Court should not proceed to judgment against him: this demand is called the allocutus, and is entered on the record. There is no allocutus in misdemeanour.

It is upon the allocatus that a female prisoner, who has been found guilty of a capital charge, may plead that she is quick with child. Upon it also any prisoner may move the Court in arrest of judgment, that is to say, show cause why sentence should not be passed. Such motion might formerly be grounded on some such defect in the indictment as vitiated the proceedings; but, in view of the power of amending the indictment which the Court now possesses (see AMENDMENT), little reliance can be placed on any such ground nowadays.

Allodial or Alodial Lands; Allodium. This means lands not held of any lord or superior, in which, therefore, the owner has an absolute property and not a mere estate. No subject in England can hold lands allodially; and the highest estate known to the law is an estate in fee simple, which, however, is for all practical purposes equivalent to absolute ownership. It would appear that, prior to the Conquest, the lands known as boclands (q.v.) or book-lands were allodial lands.

Allodium was the ancient name for allodial lands, feodum, on the other hand, meaning lands held of a lord in consideration of certain services to be rendered. See FEE.

Allonge. This is a slip of paper annexed to a bill of exchange for endorsements when there is no room for them on the bill. It is mentioned in the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 32 (1).

Allot; Allotment. To allot is to indicate that a portion of property held by a number of joint owners is in future to belong exclusively to a specific person called the "allottee." Thus a partition of land is effected by allotting to each owner his share in severalty.

In the law of companies, to allot shares, debentures, &c., is to appropriate them to the applicants or persons who have applied for them; this is generally done by sending to each applicant a letter of allotment, informing him that a certain number of shares have been allotted to him, and he is then called an allottee. An allotment of shares pursuant to an application for them constitutes, with the application itself, an agreement binding both on the applicant and on the company, the application being an offer to take their shares and the allotment an acceptance of the offer.

In the law of merchant shipping, an allotment of wages is where a seaman stipulates, by the agreement of service, for the periodical payment of any part of his wages either to a savings bank or to a near relative, such as a wife, parent, child, etc: this is done by an allotment note (Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, ss 141, 142; Merchant Shipping Act, 1906, s. 61; Merchant Shipping (Seamen's Allotment) Act, 1911).

An inclosure of land under the General Inclosure Act, 1845, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118, is carried into effect by the land being allotted in accordance with the order or Act authorising the inclosure and the rights of the persons interested. "Allotment," in that Act, signifies not only the act of allotting the land, but also the portion of land allotted; the allotments are named from the purposes for which they are made, e.g. allotments for exercise and recreation, allotments for labouring poor, allotments to the lord, commoners, etc. See INCLOSURE.

The Small Holdings and Allotments Act, 1908, Part II. (which is the part relating to allotments), deals with only such small plots of land as are for what used to be described as "the labouring poor," and which do not, except where a larger holding is specially sanctioned, exceed five acres (s. 27 (3)). Such plots of land or allotments, which must each be cultivated as a farm or garden (ib.), may be provided by the parish council (acting through the county council), or by the urban district or borough council (s. 39 (7)), or in London by the London County Council (s. 36), for "persons belonging to the labouring population resident" in the parish, district, or borough (s. 23 (1)). Land for allotments may be rented or purchased, by the council concerned, at a rent or price which may reasonably be expected to be covered by the rents to be paid by allotment holders; and if land cannot be acquired by agreement, it may be acquired compulsorily (s. 25—see also the Land Settlement (Facilities) Act, 1919, s. 17, and the Allotments Act, 1922, s. 8). As to the determination of allotment tenancies, see the Small Holdings and Allotments Act, 1908, s. 30 (2), and the Allotments Act, 1922, s. 1; as to compensation to outgoing tenants of allotments,

. 47, and the Act of 1922, ss. 2, 5, 6. See QUARTER RATING; SMALL HOLDINGS COMMISSIONERS; COMPENSATION.

Allotment Warden. By the General Inclosure Act, 1845, s. 108, when an allotment for the labouring poor of a district has been made on an inclosure under the Act, the land so allotted is to be under the management of the incumbent and churchwarden of the parish, and two other persons elected by the parish, and they are to be styled "the allotment wardens" of the parish. See INCLOSURE.

Land under such management may now be transferred to the council of the parish, urban district, or borough in which it is situated (Small Holdings and Allotments Act, 1908, s. 33 (1)).

Allow; Allowance. In procedure, to allow is to admit the validity of something contended for by one of the parties. Thus when a claim against an estate in administration is made out, it is allowed, and a taxing master allows costs which have been properly incurred.

In criminal cases the expression "allowance" is used to describe payments made to witnesses for the defence as well as for the prosecution (see the Costs in Criminal Cases Act, 1908, c. 15).

In lunacy practice, payments made by the Court to persons having moral, as distinguished from legal, claims upon a lunatic are known as allowances.

As regards the coinage, "allowance" is synonymous with "remedy" (q.v.).

All Saints, Feast of, the 1st of November. See FEASTS.

"All the estate." Until the Conveyancing Act, 1881, came into operation on 1st January, 1882, it was the rule to insert in every conveyance a short clause which purported to convey "all the estate, right, title, interest, claim and demand" of the grantor, lessor, etc., in the property conveyed. This clause, which was known as the "all the estate clause," was even then regarded as unnecessary and inoperative. Now it is always omitted in reliance on s. 63 of the Act, which provides that, unless a contrary intention be expressed, every conveyance executed after the Act became operative shall be effectual to convey all the estate, etc., which the party conveying has power to convey.

Alluvion. This is where sand and earth are washed up by the sea or a river so as to make an addition to existing land. If this is done suddenly and to a considerable extent, the new land belongs, in the case of the seashore, to the Crown. Whether the increase be perceptible or imperceptible, it belongs, in the case of a non-tidal river, to the owner of the existing land; and if it be imperceptible, the increase, in the case of the seashore, also belongs to him.

In international law, where a river forms the boundary between the territories of two nations, the middle line of the river is always the line of demarcation between their respective territories, no matter how the position of that middle line may change in consequence of the river receding from one bank and encroaching on the other bank.

Almaine Merchants, the Hanse (q.v.). Almaine was a form of Allegmand or Allegmane.

Almoner, or Almer. The Lord Almoner, who is usually a bishop, is an officer of the Royal Household. His function is theoretically the distribution of the royal alms. In practice, he merely carries out the ceremonial distribution of the royal alms on Maundy Thursday, the day preceding Good Friday.

Alnage, the duty levied on wool by the aulnager or alnager: abolished by the statute 11 & 12 Will. 4, c. 20.

Alnager. See AULNAGER.

Altar. What in Canon 82 of 1603 is described as the "table for the celebration of the holy communion"; is termed the altar in the Coronation service, and also in certain modern statutes, such as the Church Building Act, 1819, s. 6, and the Church Building Act, 1832. As regards churches other than those in which public worship is conducted in accordance with Evangelical or Low Church views, the use of the word "altar" has become almost universal. Down to the middle of the last century, the decided cases were to the effect that the table or altar must be capable of being moved by manual labour and that, therefore, a solid stone structure, such as is used in Roman Catholic churches, was illegal; but these decisions would appear to require reconsideration in view of subsequent decisions upon matters bearing on the question though not directly deciding it.

The canons and the rubric appear to have contemplated the use of only one communion table or altar in each church; but in some cathedrals and large churches more than one has always been used, and in recent years faculties have been granted for the use of a second altar or communion table in a side chapel of other churches.

Altar Cloth. The cloth covering the altar or communion table is, according to Canon 82 of 1603, to be "a fair white linen cloth" during the communion service, and at other times "silk or other decent stuff." The "silk or other decent stuff" may legally be of different colours at different seasons of the year; but the use of embroidered linen and lace is not a compliance with the direction to use "a fair white linen cloth."

Altarage; Altaragium. This includes not only offerings made upon the altar but also all profits receivable by the priest by reason of the altar, such as surplice fees and other minor offerings. Where altaragium is mentioned in old endowments, it includes small tithes (q.v.), if such inclusion is supported by usage, but not any other tithes.

Alteration. An instrument is said to be altered when any erasure or addition is made in it so as to alter its sense or effect; thus, if a seal is added to an instrument originally not under seal, so as to make it purport to be a deed, that is an alteration.

An alteration is said to be material when it affects, or may possibly affect, the rights of the persons interested in the document. Thus, if the date of a cheque is altered, that is a material alteration, because the legal obligations of the drawer may be affected by it, e.g., if the bank fails before it is presented. A material alteration invalidates the instrument even as against innocent strangers. So, the addition of a seal to an instrument is a material alteration. As a general rule, a material alteration, when made by the misfeasance or laches of the party for whose benefit the instrument was made, invalidates it, even as against innocent strangers; and so does an alteration made by a stranger, having the custody of the instrument, but not otherwise. See VOID.

An immaterial alteration does not appear to have any effect in avoiding the instrument, even if made by a party to it.

Alterations in wills are disregarded by the Court in granting probate, unless they are authenticated by the signatures of the testator and witnesses, or unless the fact of their having been made before execution can be proved (Wills Act, 1837, s. 21). Alterations in deeds, on the other hand, are presumed to have been made before execution unless the contrary is proved. See FAC SIMILE.

Alterius circumventio alii non praebet actionem (Dig. 50, 17, 49). (No action can be based upon a successful fraud.) Compare "Allegans suam," etc.

Alternativa petitio non est audienda (5 Rep. 40*a*). (An alternative petition cannot be heard.) This means, as regards civil proceedings, that claims for relief which involve a blowing hot and cold with regard to the one transaction will not be entertained on the common law side; but alternative claims for relief (q.v.) may be made on the Chancery side; and this was so even when this maxim was cited to the King's Bench in 1593.

As to alternative counts in indictments, see ALTERNATIVE COUNTS.

Alternative Counts. An accused person cannot be charged with more than one distinct offence in the same count of an indictment. But an indictment may be divided into separate clauses, known as counts; and in each count a separate offence may be charged as stated below. The Indictments Act, 1915, now consolidates and amends the pre-existing law as to indictments. The First Schedule to the Act contains rules which must be read with the sections; and the combined effect of the Act and the rules is that charges for any number of felonies (including treason-felony), or of misdemeanours, or of felonies and misdemeanours, may be joined in the one indictment, each, of course, being charged in a different count, if those charges are founded on the same facts, or form, or are, a part of a series of offences of the same or a similar character; and, where a felony is tried along with a misdemeanour, the jury is sworn and the accused has the same right of challenge as if all the offences in the indictment were felonies (s. 4; r. 3); but where, before or at any stage of the trial, the Court is of opinion that it is desirable that there should be a separate trial of any one or more of the counts, the Court may order such separate trial (s. 5 (3)).

As to treason, there may in the one indictment be different counts each charging a different kind of treason.

Amabyr, or Amvabyr, variants of "amober" (q.v.). The right to this payment out of certain lands was held by the Earls of Arundel, who, however, released it to their tenants in 1556.

Amalfi, Laws of. A code of maritime law, which was framed during the Middle Ages at the port of Amalfi, near Naples. It remained in force throughout the Mediterranean down to the end of the sixteenth century. Sir Travers Twiss' edition of the Black Book of the Admiralty, vol. iv., gives the code and an English translation.

Amalgamation. This takes place where two incorporated companies or societies become united by one of them being merged in the other. The amalgamation of two companies registered under the Companies Act, 1862, or under the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, is effected under s. 192 of the Act of 1908, by one of them going into voluntary liquidation and authorising the liquidators to transfer or sell its property or business to the other company in consideration of shares in the latter company to be distributed among the members of the company which is being wound up.

Life, fire, or accident assurance companies can amalgamate only with the sanction of the High Court (on application to the Chancery Division) and on complying with various formalities (Assurance Companies Act, 1909, ss. 13, 14). Industrial and provident societies may amalgamate by special resolution (Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893, ss. 51, 57).

Ambassadors are diplomatic agents residing in a foreign country as representatives of the States by whom they are despatched. In the strict sense of the word, an ambassador can be despatched only by certain States of superior power and dignity, but, in its modern use, the word also includes resident ministers, however they may be styled, who are despatched by any independent State. There is no express rule of law exempting an ambassador from criminal proceedings: if the facts justified such proceedings, the remedy would be to request his government to recall him or to order him to leave the country. But under the Diplomatic Privileges Act, 1708, ambassadors and their domestic servants are privileged from all arrest on civil process, and from all such process; and persons prosecuting or executing any such process of imprisonment against any ambassador or, without his leave, against his domestic servant are guilty of a misdemeanour. See CHARGÉ D'AFFAIRES; EXTRATERRITORIALITY; ALIENAGE.

Amber, a dry measure of four bushels. It was used generally during the Saxon period and in London down to the 13th century.

Ambigua responsio contra proferentem est accipienda (10 Rep. 68). (An ambiguous defence is to be interpreted against the party who delivers it.) This maxim is an application to a particular case of the maxim Ambiguum placitum, etc. (q.v.).

Ambiguis casibus semper praesumitur pro rege (Lofft. 248). (In cases to which the Crown is a party, the Crown is to be given the benefit of any doubt which may arise.) But this maxim cannot now be regarded as of general application. In criminal proceedings, when there is any doubt about facts, the prisoner is entitled to "the benefit of the doubt."

Ambiguitas verborum latens verificatione suppletur, nam quod ex facto oritur ambiguum verificatione facti tollitur (Bac. Max. Reg. 25). (A latent ambiguity in the words of a written instrument may be explained by evidence; for it arose on evidence extrinsic to the instrument and it may therefore be removed by other similar evidence.) See AMBIGUITY.

Ambiguitas verborum patens nulla verificatione excluditur (Lofft. 249). (A patent ambiguity in the words of a written instrument cannot be cleared up by evidence extrinsic to the instrument.) See AMBIGUITY.

Ambiguity, a double meaning. In the law as to written instruments, there are two kinds of ambiguity. A patent ambiguity is one which is apparent on the face of the instrument, as where a blank is left. A latent ambiguity is one, not apparent on the face of the instrument, which is proved by extrinsic evidence, as where a testator bequeaths property to his cousin John Jones, and it is proved that he had two cousins so named. It is commonly said that evidence extrinsic to the instrument is admissible to explain a latent but not a patent ambiguity. That statement of the law is rather too wide. As regards latent ambiguities, it is correct. As regards patent ambiguities, it is also correct as to the extreme case of a blank; for if a testator bequeaths property to "——," evidence cannot be given as to what his intention must have been. But in order to construe, if construction be possible, a will importing a patent ambiguity, the Court may receive extrinsic evidence of facts known to the testator, and so place itself in the testator's position and ascertain the meaning of the words used by him.

Ambiguum placitum interpretari debet contra proferentem (Co. Litt. 303 b). (An ambiguous pleading is to be interpreted against the party who delivers it.) But now under R. S. C. Ord. XIV., r. 29, the Court can order such a pleading to be struck out or amended only, however, if it be held to be embarrassing: and the mere fact that it contains allegations which are inconsistent or which are stated alternatively does not make it embarrassing.

Ambulatoria est voluntas defuncti usque ad vitae supremum exitum (Dig. 34, 4, 4). (The will of a deceased person is ambulatory until the latest moment of life.) That is to say, a testator can always revoke or alter his will except in certain cases of joint or mutual wills mentioned under WILL. Coke's version is VOLUNTAS TESTATORIS EST, ETC. (q.v.).

Ameliorating or Ameliorative Waste. This consists of acts which, though technically waste (q.v.), really effect an improvement.

Amendment. This means the correction of some error or omission, or the curing of some defect, in judicial proceedings.

As regards criminal proceedings, the amendment of indictments is now governed by the Indictments Act, 1915. Where before, or at any stage of, the trial it appears to the Court that the indictment is defective, the Court shall make such order for amendment as it thinks fit, unless such amendment cannot be made without injustice, and may make such an order as it thinks fit regarding the costs of such amendment (s. 5 (1)); and, where the indictment is so amended, a note of the order for amendment is to be endorsed on the indictment, which is then to be treated as if it had been found by the grand jury in the amended form (s. 5 (2)).

As regards appeals to quarter sessions from convictions or orders of Courts of Summary jurisdiction, the Quarter Sessions Act, 1849, s 3, empowers quarter sessions to make any necessary amendment in the statement of the grounds of appeal, subject to such terms as to costs and postponement as the Court thinks fit; where the order appealed against is bad for want of proper form, quarter sessions can amend the informality, subject to such terms as to costs as the Court thinks fit (ib., s. 7); and the decision of quarter sessions as regards such matters is final (ib., s. 9).

Upon the return to a writ of certiorari (q.v.), the King's Bench Division can amend an order of a Court of Summary Jurisdiction which is bad for want of form (ib., s. 7).

As regards amendments in civil proceedings in the High Court "the Court or a judge may, at any stage of the proceedings, allow either party to alter or amend his endorsement or pleadings, in such manner and on such terms as may be just, and all such amendments shall be made as may be necessary for determining the real questions in issue between the parties" (Ord. XXVIII., r. 1). This order applies to amendments which the judge or a master may of his own motion think fit to make in order to determine the real questions in issue; and it applies also to amendments which a party may desire to make in his own pleadings. Without coming to the Court, the plaintiff may himself amend his statement of claim once (ib., r. 2), and a defendant who has set up a counterclaim or pleaded a set-off, may himself amend such counterclaim or set-off (ib., r. 3). The remaining rules of the order set out in detail the practice relating to such amendments as are within the rules above mentioned. The general effect of the order is that either party may, either with or without the leave of the Court, make any amendment which is reasonably necessary in order to bring his case properly before the Court.

As regards amendments which a party desires to make, against the will of his opponent, in the pleadings or proceedings of his opponent, he may apply, under Ord. XVI., r. 11 and under Ord. XVII., r. 2, to have parties either added or struck out; and he may apply to have a pleading struck out because it is scandalous, unnecessary, or embarrassing (Ord. XIV., r. 27), or because it discloses no cause of action (Ord. XXV., r. 4).

In the County Court, the judge is given wide powers of amendment (under the County Courts Act, 1888, s. 87), which effectually prevent the possibility of any failure of justice on merely technical grounds.

As regards Courts of Summary Jurisdiction, "No objection shall be allowed to any information, complaint or summons for any defect therein in substance or form" (Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, s. 1), the one thing really needful being that the accused shall know what he is charged with: so no provision is made for amendment. An order made in such a Court can, however, be amended up to the time that it is acted on or lodged with the clerk of the peace.

When a case is stated for the opinion of the King's Bench Division, under the Crown Cases Act, 1848, or by justices under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857, or the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 33, the Court may send it back for amendment if it is defectively stated (Act of 1848, s. 4; Act of 1857, s. 7; Act of 1879, s. 33).

Amends, Tender of. This means an offer to pay a sum of money by way of satisfaction for a wrong alleged to have been committed.

The Limitation Act, 1623, s. 5, provides that in actions for trespass to land it shall be a good defence to plead that the defendant makes no claim to the land in question, and that the trespass was by negligence or involuntary, and that before action brought a tender of sufficient amends for the trespass was made.

The Distress for Rent Act, 1737, s. 20, provides that no tenant or lessee of lands can recover in any action for irregular distress by the landlord or lessor if tender of [sufficient] ore the action was brought.

As to the defer of tender of amends, see also PUBLIC AUTE IES.

With a defence setting up a tender before action, the sum of money alleged to have been tendered must be brought into Court (Ord. XXII., r. 3).

In an action of replevin (q.v.) to an avowry of damage feasant (that is to say, upon the defendant admitting that the cattle in question had been distrained but alleging that they had been trespassing upon and injuring his land) the plaintiff might plead a tender of sufficient amends either before the cattle were distrained (which made the taking unlawful) or before they were impounded (which made the detention unlawful).

A mensa et thoro, literally, from board and bed. Prior to the enactment of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, a decree in the Ecclesiastical Courts for a divorce a mensa et thoro had the same effect as a decree for judicial separation (q.v.) had after the passing of that Act In the Ecclesiastical Courts a decree for the complete dissolution of marriage was known as a decree for a divorce a vinculo matrimonii, as to the modern equivalent of which see DIVORCE.

Amerciament or Amercement; Amerce. An amerciament was, in the ancient law, a pecuniary punishment for an offence in respect of which the offender stood in the court of his lord, whether the King or a subject, at the mercy (a merci, in misericordia) of the lord. The amount of an amercement appears to have been originally arbitrary: but gradually the amount became fixed by custom in many cases; and, after Magna Charta, the law was that a freeman should, except where the amount was fixed, be amerced only according to his means, being assessed or affeered (see AFFEERORS) by his peers, no amercement to be made for a small fault; and if the amercement were made elsewhere than in a court of record, a remedy in respect of its amount was provided by the writ moderata misericordia. The Court which decided that an amercement was payable was said to amerce; and their decision was indicated by the writing, in the roll of the Court, of the words, Ideo est in misericordia. The Court might be a Court Leet, a Court Baron, or any Court of record (q.v.).

Amerciaments were made, not only on individuals, but on counties, hundreds, and towns, such amercements being made by the superior Courts and being affeered by the coroners. The same practice prevailed with regard to amerciaments on sheriffs or officers of the superior Courts. Amerciaments so made were known as amerciaments royal.

Amerciaments also applied to judicial proceedings. A suitor, for instance, was "in mercy" if he failed in his suit, and a jury was "in mercy" for making a false presentment. Such amercements, being a source of revenue to the Crown, were levied at almost every stage of proceedings. The law and the practice as to them is exceedingly obscure. As the late Mr. Justice Stephen, in his History of the Criminal Law, remarks:—"How long this system lasted or by what precise steps it fell into disuse, would take more trouble to discover than the discovery is worth"

The distinction between an amerciament and a fine (q.v.) was that, except where the Courts were restrained by custom or legislation, an amerciament was entirely in the discretion of the Court, while a fine was fixed and certain. This distinction led to the amerciament being described by the old writers as a more merciful punishment than a fine. Amerciaments have long been obsolete in this country. But their meaning has been judicially considered so recently as Nottingham Corporation, In re [1897] 2 Q B. 502. And the adherence of American law to the common law is illustrated by the fact that in some of the States a sheriff is still punishable by amercement in certain cases of misconduct by him.

American Law. In the United States, the State of New York adopted as its law the law of England as it existed on April 19, 1775, thereby adopting both the common law and the statutes in force in England on that day. All the other original States and the States subsequently admitted to the Union did substantially the same thing, except the State of Louisiana, the law of which is based on the Code Napoleon. The law so adopted is to this day the law of the various States, except in so far as it has been modified by legislation or judicial decisions. American decisions cannot, however, be quoted as binding on English Courts; and it is doubtful whether they can properly be cited even by way of illustration.

Ami, a friend. See AMY.

Amictus; Amice; Amesse, the innermost of the vestments worn by Roman Catholic priests when celebrating Mass. In the ecclesiastical law, its use is illegal.

Amicus Curiae, a friend of the Court, that is to say, a person, whether a member of the Bar not engaged in the case or any other bystander, who calls the attention of the Court to some decision, whether reported or unreported, or some point of law which would appear to have been overlooked.

Amittere legem terrae, to lose the law of the land, that is to say, to incur infamy (q.v.).

Ammobragium. Anciently this meant the service or payment by which land was held of a superior.

Amober, a payment anciently made to a lord on the marriage of the daughter of a tenant. In the time of Coke it still existed in Wales. See AMABYR.

Amortisation; Amortise. Amortisation means the alienation of lands in mortmain (q.v.); and in modern usage it means paying off the bonds, stock, etc., of a State or corporation. To amortise is to do either of these things.

Amotion. In its older use this meant the removal from office of a member of a corporation by the vote of his brother corporators. This was the only means by which, prior to the enactment of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1835, a corporator could be removed from office. That statute and subsequent statutes provided for removal in, for instance, cases of bankruptcy or prolonged absence; but there are many cases outside these provided for in the statutes in which a corporator would clearly be unfitted to hold office, and in any such case the only means of removing him is by amotion. The power of amotion is inherent in every corporation unless taken away by statute: and there has been no such taking away of the power. It may be observed that a corporator who dishonestly uses his office to procure advantage for himself may be amoved: but a corporator who is habitually drunk may not.

The word "amotion" also applies to the removal from office, under the Colonial Leave of Absence Act, 1782 (popularly known as Burke's Act), of colonial officers or judges. That Act empowers the Governor and Council of a colony to remove from office, subject to appeal to the King in Council, any official holding office during the pleasure of the Crown. It was passed before any colony had responsible government; and it is doubtful whether it applies to modern self-governing colonies. But, for practical purposes, it is now of importance only as regards colonies without responsible government. In a colony without responsible government, the Governor, under his commission, may, independently of his powers under the Act, suspend a judge—and of course any other official—until the pleasure of the Crown is taken through the Colonial Office.

Amoveas manus. This is a writ issuing from the King's Bench Division and commanding the restitution to a person of property belonging to him which is in the possession of the Crown: as where judgment is given against the Crown in proceedings by extent (q.v.), or where in former times the property of an outlaw was seized, and the outlawry was afterwards reversed. It is now rare: see TRAVERSE.

Under the old practice on petitions of right (q.v.), where the decision was against the Crown, the judgment was called judgment of amoveas manus, because it directed that the king's hands should be amoved from the property, and possession restored to the suppliant: the modern judgment in such a case merely specifies the relief to which the suppliant is entitled, but has the same effect as a judgment of amoveas manus formerly had, the peculiarity of it being that it transfers the seisin or possession of the property to the suppliant, without any execution issuing (Petition of Right Act, 1860, s. 10). See PETITION OF RIGHT.

Amnesty. A pardon for offences granted by an Act of Parliament which, contrary to the usual practice, is originated by the Crown instead of by the House of Commons. Illustrations are the Act of Oblivion (q.v.) and the statutes 7 Geo. 1, c. 29, and 20 Geo. 2, c. 52. Formerly an amnesty, or general pardon for antecedent offences, was sometimes granted by the Crown alone.

Amsterdam, Ordinances of. See WISBY, LAWS OF.

Amy, old French for ami. See ALIEN AMI. The prochein amy of an infant meant his next friend.

An, Jour, et Waste, year, day and waste (q.v.).

Anaesthetics. See VIVISECTION.

Ananias. To describe a person as an "Ananias" is libellous: to do the same of a newspaper may also be libellous, or may mean merely that it is an innocent conduit-pipe for false news.

Anatomy. The dissection of human corpses for the purpose of medical study is regulated by the Anatomy Act, 1832, which provides that it can be carried out only in a place licensed and periodically inspected as provided by the Act.

Ancestor. This means any person from whom real property is inherited. It is to be noted that, while no man can be the ancestor in the ordinary sense of the word of any pro-

1, 1834, a son may, under the Inheritance Act, 1833, be the ancestor, in the legal sense of the word, of his own father. Before that Act, a lineal ancestor, in the ordinary sense of the word, could not be heir to any of his issue, whether a child or a more remote descendant.

Anchor, an obsolete form of " anker " (q.v.).

Anchorage. This is a toll payable by vessels which anchor in a port, or on ground proved or legally presumed to have once been part of a port.

Anchors. The Anchors and Chain Cables Act, 1899, makes provision for the proper testing of chain cables and of all anchors exceeding 168 pounds in weight.

The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 290, specifies the anchors to be carried by emigrant ships; ss. 538-540 contain provisions to marine-store dealers who deal in, amongst other things, anchors and cables; and s. 543 provides for the marking of anchors by the makers.

Ancienne Coutume de Normandie. See GRAND COUSTUMIER.

Ancient Demesne. Manors of ancient demesne are the manors which were in the actual possession of the Crown during the reigns of Edward the Confessor and William the Conqueror, and which in Domesday (q.v.) are styled terrae regis or terrae regis Eduardi. Lord Coke calls them " the ancient demesnes of the Crown of England." The socage (q.v.) tenants of these lands are commonly known as tenants in ancient demesne, and one of the peculiarities of their tenure was that, prior to the enactment of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 56, they could sue or be sued on questions affecting their lands only in the Court of Common Pleas (see CONSUETUDINIBUS ET SERVICIIS) or the Court of Ancient Demesne of the manor. Their lands pass by common law conveyance, independently of the lord. In addition to the socage tenants, there are customary freeholders holding not at the will of the lord: their lands pass by surrender, deed or admittance, their tenure thus having some characteristics of freehold as well as of copyhold tenure. And there are also copyholders of base tenure who hold at the will of the lord by copy of Court roll; but only the socage tenants can properly be described as tenants in ancient demesne.

The entry in Domesday is conclusive as regards the question whether a particular manor is or is not ancient demesne; but the question as to whether lands are part of a particular manor of ancient demesne is for a jury.

The copyholders of an ancient demesne form the customary court. Like other copyholders, they merely occupy part of the lord's demesne and do not hold of the manor. The Court of Ancient Demesne (corresponding to the Court Baron (q.v.)) is constituted of the tenants in ancient demesne properly so called. See ENFRANCHISEMENT; RIGHT CLOSE.

Ancient Lights. " When the access and use of light to and for any dwelling-house, workshop or other building shall have been actually enjoyed therewith for the full period of twenty years without interruption, the right thereto shall become absolute and indefeasible . . . , unless it shall appear that the same was enjoyed by some consent or agreement expressly made or given for that purpose by some deed or writing " (Prescription Act, 1833, s. 3). A right to light so acquired is known as an ancient light; and before 1833 the term applied to light enjoyed for so long a time that the memory of man ran not to the contrary.

The owner of an ancient light may increase the size of windows through which he has enjoyed the light or open new windows. But he will acquire no right to light for so much of an existing window as is an enlargement, or for a new window, until a new period of twenty years has run; and at any time within such period the owner of adjoining land may erect a screen which prevents the access of light to the enlargement or new window and may so prevent a further right being added to the existing right. A fortiori, when there are no windows in the side of a building which faces adjoining land, the owner of such land can erect a screen which prevents the acquisition of any right; and such a screen can of course be erected to prevent the acquisition of a right to light for any building newly erected. See ENCROACHMENT.

Ancient Messuages are houses or buildings erected before the time of legal memory, that is, before the reign of Richard I., although practically any house is an ancient messuage if it was erected before the time of living memory and its origin cannot be proved to be modern. Ancient houses frequently have rights of common (e.g. common of estovers) attached to them and to houses built in their stead on the old site, and the easements of light and support were formerly confined to ancient houses, but now the provisions of the Prescription Act, 1833 (q.v.), and the modern rules applied by analogy to cases not within the Act, have made the doctrine unimportant. See LOST GRANT.

Ancient Monuments. The general public cannot acquire a right to visit a public monument or other object of interest upon private property merely because they have been, for no matter how long a time, permitted to visit it, nor can any public right of way be to such monument or object merely because they have been permitted to pass along a path or road to it.

The Ancient Monuments Consolidation and Amendment Act, 1913, was passed in order to provide for the protection and preservation of a large number of ancient monuments specified in the schedule to the repealed Ancient Monuments Protection Act, 1882, and also of any monument or other thing (other than a place used for ecclesiastical purposes) which is of historic, architectural, traditional, artistic, or archæological interest. It provides for the acquisition by the Commissioners of Works or a local authority (which means the Common Council of the City of London and county and borough councils) of ancient monuments: for ancient monuments being placed by the owners under the guardianship of the commissioners or of a local authority; for the protection of ancient monuments which are in danger of damage or destruction, or which the owners desire to have preserved by a local authority; for public access to ancient monuments; for penalties on persons injuring ancient monuments; and for preventing the display of advertisements in a manner detrimental to ancient monuments.

The malicious destruction or damage of any monument in any church or other place of public worship or in any public place is a misdemeanour punishable on indictment under the Malicious Damage Act, 1861, s. 39, and the offender is also liable to a civil action for damages (ib.). The defacing of tombs in churches would appear to be also a misdemeanour at common law.

Cleopatra's Needle is specially protected by the Monuments (Metropolis) Act, 1878, s. 4, which provides that anyone who injures or disfigures, or who posts bills, or makes any writing or other mark on the obelisk shall be liable to a penalty of £5, recoverable summarily.

Ancient Rent. See ACCUSTOMED RENT.

Ancients. Certain members of the Inns of Court were formerly called ancients. Thus, in Gray's Inn, the society at one period consisted of benchers, ancients (who were the older barristers), barristers and students. In the Inns of Chancery (all of which have long ceased to exist) and in the Middle Temple all members except students seem to have been at one time termed ancients. The term "ancient" was much older than the term "barrister," which latter term is found for the first time in the Black Book of Lincoln's Inn, Trinity Term, 1455. Certain of the senior barristers in the Middle Temple are still called ancients, but only for dining purposes.

Anderson's Act, the popular title of the Betting Act, 1874.

Angel; Angelet. See GOLD COINS.

Angliae jura in omni casu libertati dant favorem (Fortescue, c. 42). (The laws of England are in every case favourable to liberty.)

Anglo-Saxon Laws. The earliest form of redress for injuries suffered, was personal revenge. This gradually became limited by the idea of payment (wergeld) in lieu of personal revenge. The first English code of laws, or dooms as they were called, was that of Ethelbert, King of the Kentings, compiled about the year 600. Payment in compensation for injuries (bot) varied according to the rank of the person injured, or to the nature of the injury. For each of the four front teeth, six shillings; for a thumb struck off, twenty shillings, and so on. The scale provides for injuries to every part of the body even differentiating between a black bruise not covered by clothes (thirty "scaells") and one covered by clothes (twenty "scaells"); "Bot" for slaying a man varied from six to eighty shillings. If a freeman lay with another freeman's wife he paid for it with his "wergeld," and provided another wife with his own money. In addition to "bot," "wite" had also in some cases to be paid to the King as punishment.

Later collections of dooms are Ine's, Offa's, Alfred's, Edward the Elder's, Athelstan's, Edmund's, Edgar's and Ethelred's.

The courts of justice were, the Sheriff's Tourn, which met every six months for criminal cases under the Shire Reeve, who presided over the landowners, the Hundred Court, which met every four weeks for civil cases, and the Witenagemote (q.v.).

There were four forms of proof: Compurgation, ordeal, witnesses and charters, that is to say, documents.

Aniens; Aniente, old French for "void."

Animals. See CRUELTY; HORSE BREEDING; VIVISECTION.

Animals, Diseases of. The Diseases of Animals Act, 1894 (as amended by the Diseases of Animals Acts, 1896 and 1903, as dogs by the Dogs Act, 1906, s. 2, as further amended respecting the shipment of horses by the Diseases of Animals Act, 1910, and by the Exportation of Horses Act, 1914, and as further extended by the Poultry Act, 1911), gives the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries, and certain local authorities, wide power with regard to certain diseases amongst animals, and has been extended so as to enable the Ministry to deal, both under the Acts and under statutory orders (which it is empowered to make) not merely with disease, but also with such matters as the proper transportation of horses and poultry. A very large number of acts or omissions in contravention of the Acts, or of the statutory orders, are punishable upon summary conviction.

Animals ferae naturae are such as are of a wild and untameable disposition, such as deer, fish, etc. Independently of the statutory provisions, known as the game laws, applicable to these animals, they are exceptions from some general rules of law: thus a man can have no complete ownership in them, although he may have the possession of them; and, therefore, as soon as they cease to be in his actual possession, anyone else may seize and keep them. A man may, however, have a qualified ownership in animals ferae naturae, either by taming and confining them (or, as it was anciently termed, per industriam), or by having the privilege of keeping them in a forest, park, or other franchise (q.v.), for in either of those cases no other person can lawfully take them so long as they remain in confinement. Again, on the death of a man, the deer in his park, the rabbits in his warren, the doves in his dove-house, and the fish in his pond, pass with the realty and do not, as in the case of domestic animals and other chattels, pass with the personalty.

At common law animals ferae naturae which are fit for human food are the subject of larceny if they either are in confinement or have actually been tamed; but at common law there can be no larceny of such animals as a lion or a gorilla, even though they are tame or kept in confinement.

Under the Larceny Act, 1861, s. 21, anyone stealing any bird, beast or other animal ordinarily kept in a state of confinement or for any domestic purpose, not being the subject of larceny at common law, was declared to be guilty of larceny. This however still, for instance, left it no offence to steal a lion. But now, under the Larceny Act, 1916, s. 1 (3), everything which has value and is the property of any person is capable of being stolen: and that covers the case of a lion kept in a cage, or of crocodiles in a tank.

Animals, Liability for. The owner or the person having the care of domestic animals which are ordinarily kept in confinement (such as horses and cattle) is liable, if they are allowed to stray, for damage which is, but he is not liable for damage which is not, the natural and probable consequence of their straying. Although no man is under a duty to fence his land against cattle driven along a highway adjoining his land, yet, apart from negligence, the owner of cattle which are being lawfully driven is not liable for damage done by their straying off the highway. Under the Highways Act, 1864, s. 25, it is an offence, punishable summarily, to allow horses, cattle, swine, sheep or goats to stray or be on the highway; but an owner of cattle, fowls, etc., who allows them to stray from his land upon an adjoining highway is not liable in damages for any accident which results from their being on the highway. Under the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, s. 24, cattle straying on the highway may be impounded.

The owner, etc., of domestic animals not ordinarily dangerous, such as dogs (but see below), cattle or horses, is not liable for injuries viciously inflicted by them on human beings, unless in a case where he had knowledge that the particular animal in question was dangerous to human beings. As to dogs, the owner, whether he knew the dog to be dangerous or not, is not liable if the injured person is a trespasser; but he is liable for injuries done by them to cattle, horses, mules, asses, goats, sheep and swine, even where he has no knowledge of there being any mischievous propensity (Dogs Act, 1906, ss. 1, 7), and the damages claimed may, if not exceeding £5, be recovered before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction (ib., s. 1 (3)); and, for the purposes of the above-mentioned sections, the occupier of the house, or, in the case of lodgings, part of a house, in which the dog is permitted to be, is to be deemed the owner of the dog (ib., s. 1 (2)).

One who keeps a wild animal ordinarily dangerous, such as a lion, is bound to keep it safely and the fact that it escaped without negligence on his part is no defence to an action for any injury or damage done by it. But the owner of such an animal is not liable for injury which another person brings on himself, as, for instance, by putting his hand through the bars of a cage. As to BEES, see that title.

Keeping swine so as to be a nuisance to any person is an offence punishable summarily under the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 47: and the keeping of any animal so that it is injurious to health is a nuisance which may be dealt with summarily under that Act (ib., s. 91). Under a bye-law of the London County Council, made July, 1898, under the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 23, and the Local Government Act, 1888, s. 16, no person may, within the administrative county of London, keep any noisy animal which is a serious nuisance to neighbouring residents; and after the expiration of a fortnight from the service of a notice signed by three householders resident within hearing of the animal the owner of the animal is liable to summary proceedings. Except where a local Act, or a bye-law made under statutory powers, is in force, there is, however, no means of dealing summarily with the nuisance caused by a noisy animal, and recourse must be had to the remedies indicated under NUISANCES.

If a man keeps unusually large numbers of game, such as pheasants or rabbits, on his land, or if he permits his domestic fowl to wander, he is liable at common law for damage done by any of them on the land of another.

Where the crops of a tenant are damaged by deer, pheasants, partridges, grouse, or black game, which neither he nor anyone (other than the landlord) claiming under him has the right to kill, he can, where the damage exceeds one shilling per acre, recover compensation from the landlord by arbitration in default of agreement as to the amount (Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908, s. 10). See RATS AND MICE.

Animo, with the intention: used, for instance, in the expression animo furandi (with intent to steal).

Animus, an intent or intention.

Animus cancellandi, the intention of cancelling. Used in connection with wills.

Animus et factum, the combination of the intention with the act. This is required for a change of domicile; and also for the effectuating of most other legal acts.

Animus furandi, the intention of stealing. This intention, which may be, and generally is, inferred from acts, is necessary to constitute the offence of larceny.

Animus hominis est anima scripti (3 Bulstr. 65). (The intention of man is the soul of what he writes.) This maxim applies to the interpretation of deeds. It really means that deeds should, if possible, be construed so as to give effect to the expressed intention of the parties.

Animus manendi; Animus morandi, the intention of remaining. The phrase is applied in connection with change of domicile.

Animus non revertendi, the intention of not returning. Animals accustomed to go and return—e.g. pigeons in a dovecote—continue the property of their owner until they lose the animus revertendi, or intention of returning; and they are said to lose that intention when they in fact finally cease to return.

Animus quo, the intention with which.

Animus recipiendi, the intention of receiving.

Animus revertendi. See ANIMUS NON REVERTENDI.

Animus revocandi, the intention of revoking. Used of wills.

Animus testandi, the intention of making a will.

Anker, an obsolete measure of capacity which contained ten of the old wine gallons, equivalent to eight and one-third imperial gallons.

Annates. This means one year's whole profits of a spiritual preferment. It is also used as synonymous with first fruits or primitae, that is to say, the first year's whole profits of every spiritual preferment, which down to the reign of Henry VIII. were payable to the Pope; under the statutes 23 Hen. 8, c. 9, and 25 Hen. 8, c. 20, they became part of the revenues of the Crown. Under the statute 7 Eliz. c. 4, and various subsequent statutes, benefices of less clear value than £50 a year were discharged from them; in 1703 they were transferred to the Commissioners of Queen Anne's Bounty (q.v.), by the statute 2 Anne, c. 11.

By Order in Council made November 27, 1852, pursuant to Queen Anne's Bounty Act, 1838, s. 19, annates or first fruits were commuted for an annual payment of one per cent. on the annual value of the living.

See FIRST FRUITS, COURT OF; TENTHS.

Annexation. This takes place when a State, either by occupation or by conquest, adds to its territory other territory which previously had not belonged to it. There is no rule of international law that contractual obligations which had been incurred by a conquered State, before the outbreak of the war which resulted in annexation, pass upon annexation as a matter of course to the conquering State; the rule, in fact, being that the extent to which, if at all, such obligations are adopted by the conquering State is entirely in the option of the conquering State. Thus, where land has been ceded before the outbreak of war by the conquered State to a private individual, the after annexation, be compelled by any legal process to recognise the grant.

Annua pensione, De. Anciently, when one of the King's chaplains had no ecclesiastical emolument, the King could by means of this writ demand for the chaplain from an abbot or prior any annual pension which was due to the Crown by the abbot or prior.

Annuity. This is a yearly payment of a certain sum of money granted to another in fee, or for life, or for a term of years, and charging the person of the grantor, although it may also be made to charge his real estate, in which latter case it is most commonly called a rent-charge. An annuity in fee—that is to say, a perpetual annuity—may be limited either to the heirs or the executors of the grantee: when it is limited to the heirs of the body of the grantee it is an annuity in fee simple conditional, for the statute De Donis (see ESTATE TAIL) does not apply.

The Apportionment Act, 1834, first made annuities apportionable. Under the statute 53 Geo. 3, c. 141, annuities for lives granted by way of the repayment of money lent required to be inrolled in Chancery; but now, under the provisions of the Judgments Act, 1855, s. 12, and the Judicature (Officers) Act, 1879, s. 5, they require to be merely registered in the Central Office of the Supreme Court. Annuities may also be regarded as legacies payable, not in mass at one time, but by instalments every year or aliquot part of a year; therefore the word "legacies" in general comprises the word "annuities."

If an annuity is given simpliciter, it is an annuity for the life only of the annuitant; or, in the case of joint annuitants, for the life of the longest liver of them. Where, however, an annuity is given to A in general terms, and the gift is accompanied with a direction to provide for the same out of the proceeds of property, that is a perpetual annuity, unless the direction is mere surplusage, e.g. merely directs payment out of the "general effects" of the testator; and, of course, the testator may, by express words, give a perpetual annuity.

Sometimes an annuity is payable only out of income, and sometimes it is a charge on the corpus itself of the estate, in which latter case the annuitant may, if the income is insufficient, require a sale of a sufficient part of the corpus, and will even be entitled to a prospective order for the necessary successive future sales. An indefinite trust to receive rents for payment of an annuity is a charge of the annuity upon the corpus, and a direction to purchase an annuity for A entitles A to have the purchase-money paid over to him or her, although the testator may have directed the contrary; and if the intended annuitant is dead, his personal representatives will be entitled to the purchase-money, although the purchase-money is to consist of the proceeds of land sold.

An annuity will abate with general legacies unless the annuity is given as a specific interest in land, when it will only abate with the other specific legacies.

When an annuity is given by will, the first payment thereof is to be made, in the absence of express directions otherwise directing payment, one year after the testator's death, or if successive interests for life and in remainder are given by way of annuity out of a sum of money directed to be placed out to answer it, then two years from the testator's death. The annuity in this latter case is merely interest on a legacy; and the legacy is itself not payable for a year.

Annuity, Action of. This, down to 1875, was one of the prescribed forms of action (see ACTIONS). It was for the recovery of an annuity (q.v.) issuing out of lands.

Annul. To annul a judicial proceeding is to deprive it of its operation, either retrospectively or only as to future transactions. Thus, annulling an adjudication in bankruptcy puts an end to the proceedings, without invalidating any act previously done by the official receiver or trustee, and makes the property of the bankrupt revert to him, subject to such terms, if any, as the Court deems fit (Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 29).

Annunciation, Feast of, the 25th of March, popularly known as Lady Day. It is one of the customary quarter days (q.v.). See FAST DAYS; FEASTS; OLD LADY DAY.

Annuo reditu, De, a writ which anciently lay for the recovery of a yearly rent.

Annus, dies et vastum, year, day, and waste (q.v.).

A non posse ad non esse sequitur argumentum necessarie negative, licet non affirmative (Hob. 336). (From the fact that a thing cannot be done you necessarily draw the conclusion that it is not done; but from the fact that a thing has not been done you are not justified in concluding that it cannot be done.)

Ansel, Ansul. See AUNCEL.

Answer. In ordinary actions in the High Court an answer is an affidavit in answer to interrogatories; it is like any other affidavit in form, and it requires to be filed; if it is longer than ten folios it must (Ord. XXXI., r. 9) be printed. The answer necessarily follows the terms of the interrogatories, either giving information asked for, or admitting or traversing (denying) the allegations impliedly contained in them. If the party interrogated fails to answer, or fails to answer fully, he may be required to answer viva voce (Ord. XXXI., r. 11).

A petition (not being a petition for an order of course) in the Chancery Division is "answered" in the name of the senior registrar (Ord. LXII., r. 18) except in the case of petitions presented in the district registries of Liverpool or Manchester, when they are "answered" by the local registrar (R. S. C., May, 1887, r. 2). A petition is "answered" by writing on it a fiat or memorandum appointing the day on which it is to be heard. See FIAT.

In matrimonial suits in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division, an answer is the pleading by which the respondent puts forward his defence to the petition.

In the Ecclesiastical Courts, the defendant is said to answer the libel (q.v.) when he gives in an allegation (q.v.). But in all civil causes in those Courts, the plaintiff is also entitled to what are called the personal answers of the defendant, which are answers on oath to the several articles of the libel.

Under the old Chancery practice, an answer by a defendant was, in ordinary cases, not only an answer to the plaintiff's interrogatories, but also a pleading, inasmuch as it contained the defendant's statement of his case; hence, in complicated cases, answers were frequently divided into two parts, one containing the defendant's statement, or the facts on which he relied, and the other giving his answers to the interrogatories. If no interrogatories were delivered, the defendant might put in a voluntary answer, containing such facts as he thought material to his case. A plaintiff's answer to a concise statement and interrogatories (q.v.) was similar to a defendant's answer to interrogatories, except that it was confined to giving the discovery required. Every answer had to be signed by counsel, sworn by the party, and filed. See now STATEMENT OF DEFENCE.

Under the old Admiralty practice, the defendant's first pleading (which is now termed his statement of defence) was called his answer.

Antecedent Debt. The same as PAST DEBT (q.v.).

Antejuramentum, the preliminary oath which each party anciently had to take before any trial or purgation. The accuser swore that he would prosecute; the accused swore that he was innocent. See Leg. Hen. 1, c. 66.

Ante litem motam, before litigation was in contemplation. See LIS MOTA.

Antenatus, a child born before the marriage of its parents. In England or Ireland subsequent marriage does not legitimate the antenati, but it does in Scotland and in most Continental countries. A child legitimated in Scotland, or elsewhere, by subsequent marriage inherits real estate in Scotland, though not in England or Ireland; but in England and Ireland, as well as in Scotland, he succeeds to personal estate. Such legitimation can take place only where the parents were at the time of the birth domiciled in a country the law of which permits legitimation per subsequens matrimonium. See MERTON, STATUTE OF; MATRIMONIUM, ETC.

Anthrax, a disease of animals (see ANIMALS, DISEASES OF) which is communicable to human beings

The Anthrax Prevention Act, 1919, s. 1, empowers the King, by Order in Council, to prohibit the importation into the United Kingdom of goods infected or likely to be infected with anthrax. Such an order was made on 9th February, 1920, in respect of shaving-brushes manufactured in or exported from the empire of Japan. It is entitled the Anthrax Prevention (Shaving Brushes) Order, 1920.

Anticipation. In conveyancing, anticipation is the act of assigning, charging, or otherwise dealing with income before it becomes due. A clause restraining anticipation is generally introduced into a settlement of property on a woman, in order to protect her from the influence of her husband by preventing her from depriving herself of the benefit of the future income. Such a restraint cannot be imposed in the case of anyone except a woman, and the restraint only exists so long as she is married. Under the Conveyancing Act, 1911, s. 7, a judge of the Chancery Division may bind the interest of a married woman, notwithstanding that she is so restrained, if she consents and if it appears to be for her benefit that her interest should be bound. And when a married woman institutes any legal proceeding, the Court before which such proceeding is pending may order the costs of the opposite party to be paid out of property subject to a restraint on anticipation (Married Women's Property Act, 1893, s. 2). See RESTRAINT ON ALIENATION.

In patent law, a person is said to have been anticipated when he patents a contrivance already known within the United Kingdom.

Antiqua Statuta, the ancient collective name of all statutes, including the Statutes of Uncertain Date, passed before the reign of Edward III.; also termed Vetera Statuta. Both terms mean the Old Statutes. Compare NOVA STATUTA.

Apices juris non sunt jura (Co. Litt. 283, 304). (The extremes of law make bad law.) Coke describes such apices as "curious or nice exceptions tending to the overthrow or delay of justice." Compare the maxim Summum jus, summa injuria, and the aphorism "Hard cases make bad law." Coke cites this maxim along with QUI HAERET, ETC.

Apology. When an action is threatened or brought against a person for a libel published in a newspaper or other periodical publication, he may plead that it was inserted without actual malice, and without gross negligence, and that an apology for the libel has been published (Libel Act, 1843, s. 2); but such plea is to be treated as a nullity unless the defendant also pays a sum of money into Court as amends to the plaintiff (Libel Act, 1845). The fact that money has been paid into Court is not to be mentioned to the jury (Ord. XXII., r. 22).

Any person sued in an action for defamation may prove in mitigation of damages that he has made or offered an apology to the plaintiff (Act of 1845, s. 1).

Apostasy. This is a total renunciation of Christianity by one who has been educated in or professed that faith within this realm. It is punishable by incapacity to hold any office, and, for the second offence, by incapacity to bring any action or to be guardian, executor, legatee, or grantee and by imprisonment for three years (9 Will. 3, c. 35, s. 1); but prosecutions for the offence are now unknown.

Apostato capiendo, De, a writ which anciently was directed to the sheriff to empower him to seize, and hand over to the abbot or prior one, who, having entered an abbey or monastery, had left it and was wandering about the country.

Apothecaries' Weight, a weight in which twenty of the 7,000 grains which make the imperial standard pound go to one scruple, three of such scruples make one drachm, and eight of such drachms make one ounce. The apothecaries' ounce, therefore, like the ounce troy, contains 480 grains. This weight also comprises the fluid ounce and the fluid drachm, which, in the case of distilled water at 62 deg. Fahr., weigh respectively 437.5 and 54.66 grains. As to the use of apothecaries' weight, see AVOIRDUPOIS.

Apothecary. An apothecary is one who prepares and sells drugs prescribed either by himself or by others; whereas a qualified medical practitioner under the Medical Acts, not being an apothecary, may prepare and sell only drugs which he himself has prescribed, and a chemist may supply drugs but may not prescribe them. An apothecary must hold the certificate, that is to say, the licence, of the Society of Apothecaries, London, which was incorporated by royal charter in 1617 and is now regulated by the Apothecaries Act, 1815, and by the Apothecaries Act Amendment Act, 1874. No person is to practise as an apothecary, or as an assistant to an apothecary, unless holding the society's certificate (Act of 1815, ss. 14, 17); and no person can recover for work done or drugs supplied as an apothecary unless he proves that he is certified (ib., s. 21), but under the Medical Act, 1886, s. 6, any medical practitioner, registered under the Medical Acts, may recover for medical services rendered or drugs, etc., supplied. Any person, practising as an apothecary or as an assistant-apothecary without the society's certificate, is liable to forfeit £20 if he acts as an apothecary, and £5 if as an assistant, such penalties being recoverable by civil action (Act of 1815, s. 20); and any person falsely pretending to be an apothecary is liable on summary conviction to a penalty of £20 (Medical Act, 1858, s. 40). The Society must publish a list of licentiates each year (Act of 1815, s. 23) and may strike off the list anyone convicted in England or Ireland of any felony or misdemeanour, or in Scotland of any crime or offence, or who has been adjudged by the General Council (q.v.) to have been guilty of infamous conduct (Act of 1874, s. 4); and any person so struck off ceases to be a certified person.

Apothecaries who are registered as medical practitioners pursuant to the Medical Act, 1858, s. 15, are exempt from service in parish offices or in the militia (ib., s. 35) or on juries, including coroners' juries (Juries Act, 1870, s. 9). See WARDEN.

Apparent Easements. See EASEMENTS.

Apparitor, an officer of the Ecclesiastical Courts whose duty it is to summon defendants and witnesses to appear and, generally, to execute the proper orders and decrees of the Court. During the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries the term was used as the name of an officer of a civil Court who performed functions analogous to those of the ecclesiastical apparitor.

Appeal. In its widest sense, this means any proceeding taken to rectify an erroneous decision of a Court by bringing it before a higher Court. In this sense it includes appeal by way of case stated (q.v.), or by way of certiorari (q.v.). But the term is more properly used of appeals made eo nomine under various statutes and the rules made thereunder. Of such appeals there is so large a number, and the procedure with regard to them varies so much, that no attempt can be made to deal exhaustively with them in a work of this kind.

In the Supreme Court of Judicature, every appeal from a judgment or order of the High Court to the Court of Appeal (q.v.) is in the nature of a rehearing (q.v.), and is brought by a simple motion in the Court of Appeal, asking that the judgment or order complained of may be reversed, discharged, or varied (R.S.C., Ord. LVIII). Appeals can also be brought on interlocutory proceedings in chambers, from the master, chief clerk, or district registrar, to the judge in chambers. In the King's Bench Division, an appeal lies from the judge in chambers to the Divisional Court, and thence to the Court of Appeal, while, in the Chancery Division, the judge in chambers may either direct the matter to be argued before him in Court (after which an appeal lies to the Court of Appeal) or may give leave to appeal direct to the Court of Appeal.

Appeals to the House of Lords are brought by petition of appeal, which is lodged by the appellant at the Parliament Office and is presented to the House at its next meeting by the Lord Chancellor or Clerk of the Parliaments, after which an order requiring the respondent to lodge his printed case is issued and served on him. If he intends to contest the appeal, he enters an appearance, and the appellant gives security for costs. Each party then lodges a printed case stating the facts and reasons in his favour, and an appendix is also prepared containing printed copies of the documents and other evidence used in the Court below. See also APPELLATE JURISDICTION ACTS.

Appeal of Death. This is identical with appeal of felony (q.v.).

Appeal of Felony. This, after the Norman Conquest, was an accusation of felony made by a private individual, as distinguished from an accusation of felony made by indictment of a grand jury or by coroner's inquisition; and under the statute 3 Hen. 7, c. 46, an appeal of felony might be brought against an alleged murderer, even after he had been acquitted by a jury. The person charged had the right to trial by battle, which took place between him and the accuser, or, in certain cases, the representative of the accuser, the combatants being each armed with a leather shield and a cudgel forty-five inches long, and having to fight for a day or until one of them gave in. So crude a method of determining the innocence or guilt of an accused person not unnaturally become obsolete. But so recently as 1817 an appeal of felony was brought against one Thornton for murder after he had been acquitted by a jury; and Thornton, when called on to plead, pleaded as follows, "Not guilty, and I am ready to defend the same with my body," at the same time throwing his glove on the floor of the Court. The Court thereupon allowed the claim so made for trial by battle; but the accuser declined to accept the challenge, and Thornton was discharged. This case led to the enactment of the statute 59 Geo. 3, c. 46, which abolished all appeals of felony and trials by battle.

In appeals of felony other than of mayhem (q.v.), if the appellant was successful, the other party suffered the punishment to which he would have been liable if originally convicted; in appeals of mayhem, the successful appellant received damages.

The king's pardon was no bar to an appeal of felony.

Appearance. In the primary sense of the word, the parties to a proceeding or application (e.g., a petition, motion, summons, etc.) are said to appear on it when they are present before the Court, judge, etc., when it is heard. A party appears either in person or by his counsel or solicitor.

In the secondary sense of the word, appearing or entering an appearance is a formal step taken by a defendant to an action after he has been served with the writ of summons: its object is to intimate to the plaintiff that the defendant intends to contest his claim; or, in a friendly action, to take part in the proceedings in the action. See DEFAULT. In some cases persons may appear who are not defendants to the action, e.g. persons desiring to intervene in probate and admiralty actions (see INTERVENTION) or in actions for the recovery of land, and persons cited to appear. See CITATION; COUNTERCLAIM.

Appearance is effected by delivering to the proper officer of the Court a memorandum giving the title of the action, stating that the defendant appears in person or by his solicitor, as the case may be, giving the address of himself or his solicitor (see ADDRESS FOR SERVICE) and also a duplicate memorandum for sealing (Ord. XII., rr. 8, 10, 11), and by, on the same day, giving notice of his appearance to the plaintiff (ib. r. 9).• Special forms of appearance are used in actions for the recovery of land: thus, any person appearing in such an action may by his appearance limit his defence to a part of the property (ib., rr. 28, 29).

Where a defendant desires to object to the regularity of the proceeding by which the plaintiff seeks to compel his appearance, he may, by leave of a master, enter a conditional appearance or an appearance under protest, and then apply to the Court to set aside the plaintiff's proceeding; or (ib. r. 30) he may, without entering an appearance, move to set aside the service of the writ.

As to appearance generally, see the rules of Ord. XII. which are not mentioned above.

If a defendant does not appear the plaintiff may in some cases sign judgment, and in other cases proceed with his action. See JUDGMENT.

"Appearance" had a peculiar meaning in bailable process (see BAIL), where, to effect a complete appearance, the defendant was required to give bail to the action, that is, to provide two sufficient sureties who entered into a recognisance to the effect that if judgment were given against him he should either satisfy the plaintiff or render himself to prison; the ordinary kind of appearance was called "common appearance" by way of distinction. Bailable process having been abolished in ordinary actions, this kind of appearance now only exists theoretically in proceedings in the Mayor's Court (see FOREIGN ATTACHMENT), where, if the defendant wishes to dissolve (that is, put an end to) an attachment of his property, he must appear according to the custom, either by putting in bail, by rendering himself to prison, or by payment into Court of the debt or the value of the property attached; when he has done one of these things his appearance is said to be perfected.

Appellate Jurisdiction Acts, 1876, 1887, and 1913. These statutes regularised and put into modern form the procedure of the House of Lords as a Court of Appeal. The appellate jurisdiction of the Lords dates back to, at any rate, the thirteenth century, but until 1876 it was not the subject of any Act of Parliament.

Under s. 3 of the Act of 1876, an appeal lies to the House of Lords from any judgment or order of the Court of Appeal. No such appeal can be heard unless there are present at least three of the Lords of Appeal, that is to say, of the following persons: (1) The Lord Chancellor; (2) the six Lords of Appeal in Ordinary (q.v.); (3) peers who have been Lord Chancellor of Great Britain or Ireland, or judge of one of the superior Courts in Great Britain or Ireland (Act of 1876, ss. 5, 25). There is nothing in law to prevent any other peer from sitting and voting on an appeal, but during the hundred years before 1876 other peers had taken no part in the appeal proceedings of the House; and since 1876 the same practice has been observed, except once in 1883, when a somewhat eccentric peer persisted in adjudicating on one particular case, with regard to which, however, his interposition was harmless, as he voted with the one Lord of Appeal who dissented from the judgment of the three other Lords of Appeal who were sitting.

Appeals to the House of Lords from the High Court of Appeal for Ireland, which is created by the Government of Ireland Act, 1920, are governed by s. 49 of that Act.

Appendant and Appurtenant. These words are used to describe a hereditament which is annexed to another hereditament, the latter hereditament being the principal hereditament and the hereditament which is annexed thereto being the adjunct or accessory. A grant of the principal will carry the adjunct without any express mention of the latter. Things appendant can be claimed only by prescription (q.v.), while things appurtenant can be claimed either by prescription or by express grant. The principal and the adjunct cannot, where the adjunct is a thing appendant, be both incorporeal or both corporeal, but this rule does not always apply where the adjunct is a thing appurtenant. The principal and the adjunct must be such that they can suitably be enjoyed together; so that common of estovers (q.v.) cannot be appurtenant to land without a house, nor common of pasture to a house without land.

Once a thing appendant has been separated from the principal so as to be held in gross, or independently, it can never become appendant again, though it may be re-annexed to the principal so as to become appurtenant.

Appendix. In the practice of the House of Lords and Privy Council in appeals, the appendix is a printed volume containing the material documents or other evidence used in the Court below and referred to in the cases of the parties. See APPEAL; CASE.

Applicatio est vita regulae (2 Bulstr. 79). (Application is the life of a rule.) Lord Coke said in the case where the maxim is found: "We all here agree in the principles, but we differ in the application; and applicatio est vita regulae."

Apply; Liberty to Apply. In the Chancery Division, all orders which are not of a final character necessarily carry with them liberty to apply to the Court; but where the order is final, application under it can be made in a summary manner, and without setting the case down again, only if the order directs that the parties shall be at liberty to apply to the Court or in chambers; and no application made under such direction will enable the Court to deal with any matters other than those which arise in the working out of the order.

Appointment, Power of. This means a power, given by deed or will, to appoint persons, or a person, to take an estate or interest in property, whether real or personal.

An appointment takes effect as if the estate limited by the power had been created by the instrument which conferred it. Thus, if A conveys land to such uses as B shall appoint, and B appoints to himself for life, with remainder to his eldest son in tail, this has the same effect as if A had originally conveyed the land to B for life, with remainder to B's eldest son. But with regard to the rule against perpetuities, there is a distinction between general and particular powers, for under a general power the donee can appoint in any manner he pleases, while under a particular power (that is, a power to appoint to one or more of a limited number of persons) no estate can be created if it would have been invalid in the original deed by reason of its infringing the rule against perpetuities. See PERPETUITY.

An appointment to one or more of the objects of a particular power, to the exclusion of the others, is called an exclusive appointment.

Formerly an appointment of a merely nominal share of the property to one of the objects (in order to escape the rule that an exclusive appointment could not be made unless it was authorised by the instrument creating the power) was considered illusory and void in equity, but this rule has been abolished by the Powers of Appointment Act, 1874, s. 1. An appointment is excessive when it is made to persons not objects of the power, or for a greater estate or interest than is permitted by it, or subject to conditions unauthorised by it.

In bankruptcy, creditors are entitled to property which the bankrupt might have appointed to himself (Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 38 (2) (b)), that is to say, over which he had a general power of appointment.

Apportionment. This word applies to rents, annuities, and common.

First, as applied to rents, it denotes a division of the rent in certain proportions; and as to rents-service, these (although originally and in their own nature indivisible) have been divisible since the statute of Quia Emptores (q.v.), and as to rents-seck and rents-charge (the distinction between which has been abolished by the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1730, and the Law of Property Amendment (Lord St. Leonards') Act, 1859, s. 10), the release of part of land subject to a rent-charge does not release the other part when it is intended that the other part should remain unreleased. By the Distress for Rent Act, 1737, s. 15, rents secured on leases are made apportionable between a landlord (tenant for life) deceased and the succeeding remainderman or reversioner—an apportionment which was extended to all rents by the Apportionment Act, 1834, and the Apportionment Act, 1870. Secondly, as applied to annuities, these were made apportionable by the Apportionment Act, 1834, and by the Apportionment Act, 1870. Section 2 of the last-mentioned Act is as follows:—"From and after the passing of this Act [Aug. 1, 1870], all rents, annuities, dividends, and other periodical payments in the nature of income (whether reserved or made payable under an instrument in writing or otherwise) shall, like interest on money lent, be considered as accruing from day to day, and shall be apportionable in respect of time accordingly." Thirdly, as applied to common, upon a purchase by the commoner of part of the land over which his right of common exists, the right may be apportioned, and it makes no difference, apparently, that the right of common is that of common sans nombre, as to which see COMMON.

At common law a condition of re-entry in a lease was said not to be apportionable by act or agreement of the parties: that is, if the lessor granted a licence to the lessee to do the act forbidden by the condition, or waived a breach already committed, the condition was gone for ever, although the licence or waiver was expressed to be limited to a particular act or to a part of the land. This absurd rule was abolished by the Law of Property Amendment Act, 1859, ss. 1, 2, and the Law of Property Amendment Act, 1860, s. 6; and now also, under s. 3 of the Act of 1859, conditions of re-entry on non-payment of rent are apportioned on severance of the reversion, while under the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 12, all conditions contained in leases made after 1881 are also apportionable on a severance of the reversion.

By the common law there was no apportionment of rent in respect of time, rent not being regarded as accruing due de die in diem. Accordingly, if the lessor was an owner in fee simple, or (being owner for a limited estate) had a power of leasing, then upon his death in the interval between two days of payment, his executors were not entitled to any part of the rent in respect of the accrued portion of the interval, but the rent for the entire interval went to the person who took the reversion, whether as heir-at-law, devisee, or remainderman. And if the lessor was tenant for life, or for any other limited estate, and had no power of leasing, upon his death in the interval between two days of payment, his executors were not entitled to any part of the rent in respect of the accrued portion of the interval, and neither was the reversioner entitled to that part of the rent, but that part ceased to be payable at all by the tenant to anyone.

However, by statute rents have been made apportionable, the principal statutes being the following:—

By the Distress for Rent Act, 1737, s. 11, when any tenant for life, not having a power of leasing, dies on or before the day on which the rent is payable by his lessee, the executors of such tenant for life are entitled to the whole or a proportion (as the case may be) of the rent in respect of the accrued interval or accrued portion thereof; and it has been held that the statute extends to a tenant in tail. The statute did not, however, extend to land tax or quit rents; neither were such rents apportionable in equity; and it was doubtful if it extended to tenancies pur autre vie. Accordingly, the Apportionment Act, 1834, was enacted and provides that rents reserved and made payable on any demise or lease of lands, tenements, or hereditaments which have been and shall be made, and which leases or demises determined or shall determine on the death of the person making the same (although such person was not strictly tenant for life thereof) or on the death of the life or lives for which such person was entitled to such hereditaments, shall, so far as respects the rents reserved by such leases and the recovery of a portion thereof by the person granting the same, his or her executors or administrators (as the case may be), be considered as within the provisions of the Distress for Rent Act, 1737; and that all rent service reserved on any lease by a tenant in fee or for any life interest, or by any lease granted under any power (being in each case a lease granted after the 10th of June, 1834), and all rents-charge and other rents, annuities, pensions, dividends, moduses, compositions, and all other payments of every description in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland made payable or becoming due at fixed periods under any instrument (being an instrument that came into operation after the said 10th of June, 1834), should be apportioned so and in such manner that, on the death of any person interested in the said respective payments, or on the determination otherwise of the interest of such person therein, he or she, and his or her executors, administrators or assigns, should be entitled to a proportion thereof, according to the time which should have elapsed from the commencement or last period of payment thereof respectively (as the case may be) including the day of the death or other determination of the interest of such person, subject nevertheless to all just allowances and deductions in respect of charges thereon respectively, the remedies for the recovery of such proportion to become available when the entire amount is become payable, and not before; such remedies to lie and be directed against the person or persons who (but for the Act) would have been entitled to receive and to retain the entirety of the said respective payments.

By the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1851, s. 1, when the lease or tenancy, being at a rack rent, shall determine by the death or cesser of the interest of the landlord entitled for his life or for any uncertain interest, instead of claims to emblements, the principle of an apportionment of rent is introduced, the tenant, in substitution for his claim to emblements, being allowed to hold on till the end of the current year of his tenancy, upon the terms of the old holding, whereupon he goes out without any notice to quit either given or received.

By the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 119, and under the Church Building Act, 1854, s. 1, the principle of apportionment of rent is also adopted when part only of the land comprised in the lease or underlease (as the case may be) is required for the purposes of the works authorised by those Acts respectively.

By the Apportionment Act, 1870, s. 2, supra, the principle of apportionment was extended to the cases of rents, annuities, dividends, and other periodical payments in the nature of income reserved or made payable otherwise than by an instrument in writing, with the like remedies for the recovery of the proportionate payment. This Act does not apply to rent, annuities, and other payments in the nature of income which have accrued due before the happening of the event by reason of which it is proposed to apply the Act, and the Act therefore does not apply to rent payable in advance. But the Act applies not only as between two classes of receivers, such as tenant for life and remainderman, but also as between receiver and payer; so that where a tenancy is determined during, say, the middle of a quarter, rent is payable by the tenant down to the actual time of determination, unless the determination is due to the wrongful act or default of the landlord.

Apportionment of Contract. A contract is said to be apportionable when the acts required to be done under it are so distinct that, if one is performed without the others, the party performing it has the right of enforcing the contract pro tanto against the other party. Thus, if A enters into a contract to supply machinery to B for a certain price, and to keep it in order for a yearly payment, A becomes entitled to recover the price of the machinery as soon as he delivers it, without waiting for the performance of the rest of the contract. See DIVISIBLE CONTRACTS; ENTIRE; SEVER.

Apposal, the duty performed by the apposer, (q.v.).

Apposer, an officer of the Exchequer who examined the accounts of the sheriffs.

Appraisement. See COMMISSION.

Appraisers. See VALUATION AND APPRAISEMENT.

Apprentice. This is a person, whether an infant or an adult, or male or female, who binds himself to serve and learn for a definite time from a master, who on his side covenants to teach his trade or calling to the apprentice. Formerly there were, for instance, surgeons' apprentices, but now apprenticeship is customary only in the case of tradesmen or artificers. The contract of apprenticeship may be either oral or in writing if for a period not exceeding a year, but for any longer period it must be in writing. If, as is generally the case, the apprentice is an infant, he is entitled to avoid the contract when he comes of age, but if he wishes to do so he must act within a reasonable time. No action lies against an infant apprentice for breach of his apprenticeship agreement, and a parent therefore usually covenants for him; but the apprentice must execute the agreement.

Apprentices ad Legem, apprentices to the law. This, down to about the year 1455, was the term used to describe those who had been called to the Bar but who were not servientes ad legem (serjeants at law). About the year 1455 all who had been called to the Bar but who were not serjeants began to be described as "utter barristers," and subsequently they came to be known as barristers (q.v.). This distinction between barristers who were serjeants at law and those who were not continued down to our own time. See SERJEANT; see also KING'S COUNSEL.

Approbation des Loix. This is the popular title of the Approbation des Loix, Coustume et Usages de l'Isle de Guernezey, differentes du Coustumier de Normandie, d'ancienneté observés en ladite Isle.

It purports to set out the laws, usages, and customs of Guernsey as they existed in 1580, and as confirmed in 1581 by Queen Elizabeth sitting in Council. Whether this is or is not the case, the Approbation is the principal authority on the law of Guernsey. It deals with both civil and criminal law, and, as the full title indicates, it shows the points regarding which the law of Guernsey differed from that of Jersey. See CHANNEL ISLANDS; GRAND COUSTUMIER; PRECEPTE D'ASSIZE.

Appropriare communiam. Anciently this meant to enclose and appropriate to private use land which had been common.

Appropriate; Appropriation. In the primary sense of the word, to appropriate is to make a thing the property of a person. Thus, to appropriate a thing which is publici juris is to obtain a right to the exclusive enjoyment of it, so that the appropriator becomes the owner.

Where a person is entitled to goods or moneys which form part of a larger quantity and are not earmarked, and afterwards the goods or moneys to which he is entitled are separated from the rest and set apart for him, they are said to be appropriated. Thus, if A sell to B 1,000 bricks, to be selected and taken away by B from a certain stack, then, as soon as B has selected and taken away 1,000 bricks, they are appropriated to him, and the sale, which before was executory, is now complete.

When moneys or goods are appropriated (that is, set apart) for the purpose of securing the payment of a specific debt or class of debts, they are said to be specifically appropriated for that purpose. Thus, where A draws a bill of exchange on B and remits to

B a bill of lading, draft, or other document of title as security for the repayment of the bill, and B accepts the bill on that footing, the bill of lading is specifically appropriated to the payment of the bill of exchange. The consequence of such a specific appropriation is that the goods represented by the bill of lading are applicable exclusively to the payment of the bill of exchange, in whosoever hands the latter may be, and that when the bill has been satisfied, the goods represented by the bill of lading (or what remains of them after payment of the bill) revert to A, the original owner. Hence, if B becomes bankrupt before the goods are applied in payment of the bill, and a balance remains after payment of it, the balance belongs to A.

To appropriate also means to distribute. The property in goods or lands of a deceased person is in the executor or administrator, and it is his duty to appropriate them, that is, to distribute them among the persons entitled (legatees or next-of-kin, devisees or heir) according to their rights.

As to appropriation of payments, if A borrows from B a sum of £50 on the 1st January and another sum of £50 on the 1st July, and on the 1st December pays him £50, saying that it is in satisfaction of the debt incurred on the 1st July, he is said to appropriate the payment to that debt. The question whether a payment is appropriated by the debtor is important in many ways; thus, if A owes B two sums, one of which is barred by the Statute of Limitations, while the other is not, and A makes a payment to B without appropriating it (which is called a general payment), then B may appropriate it to the statute-barred debt, although he could not recover it by action. The general rule is that the debtor may appropriate the payment at the time; that if he fails to do so the creditor may do so; and that if they both fail to do so, the law will appropriate the payment to the earliest debt. Where a payment might be, but is not, appropriated, it is called an indefinite payment. As to appropriation generally, see CLAYTON'S CASE.

Appropriation of supplies is the mode by which parliament regulates the manner in which the public money voted in each session is to be applied to the various objects of expenditure (e.g. the army, navy, civil service, &c.), and the Appropriation Act is an annual Act passed for the purpose.

In ecclesiastical law, appropriation is where a benefice is perpetually annexed to a spiritual corporation, either aggregate or sole, as the patron of the living. In such a case, the cure of souls is generally given to a clerk who, from being in effect the deputy of the appropriator or patron, is called the vicar (vicarius): he is instituted and inducted in much the same way as a rector, but he has only a portion of the emoluments of the living—generally a part of the glebe and a particular share of the tithes. In some appropriated churches the officiating minister is a perpetual curate. See DISAPPROPRIATION; IMPROPRIATION; TITHES.

Appropriator, a spiritual corporation to which a benefice is annexed. See APPROPRIATE.

Approvement. This means, with regard to common, the inclosure of part of a common by the lord of the manor, sufficient being left for the commoners. This right of approvement can now be exercised only with the consent of the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries (Law of Commons Amendment Act, 1893). In the criminal law it meant becoming an approver (q.v.).

Approver. Anciently this meant one who, when indicted and arraigned for treason or felony, confessed, before pleading, the charge against him, took an oath to reveal all treasons and felonies within his knowledge, and accused his accomplices. No one could be an approver who was attainted or incapable of taking an oath or unable to wage battle. Approvement has long been obsolete; but a criminal who turns "King's evidence" (q.v.) is still known in Ireland as an approver—unless he is abusively described as an informer.

Aquage. Anciently this meant a toll paid to a man for the right of getting water through a watercourse across his land. See EWAGE.

Arbitramentum aequum tribuit cuique suum (Noy., M., 248). (A just arbitrament awards to each one his right.) Used by Noy about 1630 of an arbitrator's award.

Arbitration. This means the determination of disputes by the decision of one or more persons, called arbitrators. Practically every question which might be determined by civil action may be referred to arbitration. The law on the subject has been codified by the Arbitration Act, 1889, which deals with (1) references by consent out of Court, and (2) references by order of the Court.

With regard to references by consent out of Court:—An agreement to refer a dispute to arbitration is called a submission, which by s. 27 of the Act is defined as meaning "a written agreement to refer present or future differences to arbitration, whether an arbitrator is named therein or not." No particular form is obligatory, and the agreement need not be under seal, but, unless the matter in dispute does not exceed £5 (Stamp Act, 1891, sch. 1), the agreement must bear a sixpenny agreement stamp. A submission is irrevocable except by leave of the Court or a judge (s. 1), and if legal proceedings are instituted in contravention of the submission the defendant may, but only before delivering pleadings or taking any other step in the proceedings, apply to the Court to stay them (s. 4), while if either party refuses to go to arbitration the arbitration can proceed ex parte. The first schedule to the Act contains a number of provisions as to the manner in which an arbitration is to be conducted; and s. 2 of the Act provides that every submission, unless a contrary intention is expressed therein, shall be deemed to include those provisions.

As to references by order of the Court:—S. 13 of the Act provides that, subject to any rules of Court and to the right to have any particular case tried by a jury, the Court or a judge may refer any question arising in any cause or matter (other than a criminal proceeding by the Crown) for inquiry or report to any official or special referee, whose report may be adopted wholly or in part by the Court or judge and, if so adopted, may be enforced as a judgment or order to the same effect. The report in this case is not conclusive. But by s. 14 it is provided that (a) if all parties agree, or (b) if such investigations are required as cannot, in the opinion of the Court, conveniently be made except by a referee or arbitrator, or (c) if the question in dispute is wholly or in part a matter of account, then the whole cause or matter, or any question or issue of fact arising therein, may be sent, not for a mere report but for trial before a special arbitrator or referee agreed on by the parties or before an official referee or officer of the Court.

A number of statutes incorporate this Act, while others, such as the Allotments and Small Holdings Act, 1908, 8 Edw. 7, c. 36, provide for arbitration in accordance with a special procedure set forth in each Act. See REFEREE; UMPIRE.

Arbitratione facta, De. A writ which anciently lay to stay an action the subject of which had been settled by arbitration.

Arbitrium est judicium (Jenk. 137). (The award of an arbitrator is the same thing as a judgment.)

Arbor dum crescit; lignum cum crescere nescit (2 Bulst. 82). (A tree while growing is called a tree, but it is called timber when it has become incapable of further growth.)

Archaionomia. See LAMBARD.

Archbishop, is the chief of all the clergy within his province (q.v.). He has two concurrent jurisdictions, one as ordinary or bishop within his own diocese, the other as superintendent throughout the whole province: by virtue of the latter he has the inspection of the bishops of that province as well as of the inferior clergy, or, as the law expresses it, the power to visit them. See VISIT. He confirms the election of the bishops and afterwards consecrates them; and, when so directed by the King's writ, he calls the bishop and clergy of his province to meet him in convocation. He is also superior ecclesiastical judge within his province (see ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS), and a spiritual lord of Parliament. See PARLIAMENT. There are two archbishops, namely, of Canterbury and York, of whom the former is the superior, being called the Primate of all England. See PRIMATE.

See also BISHOP; LAMBETH DEGREES.

Archdeacon, is a dignitary of the Church, having an ecclesiastical jurisdiction immediately subordinate to, but independent of, the bishop. A diocese is frequently divided into several archdeaconries. The archdeacon visits the clergy (see VISITATION), and has a Court for hearing ecclesiastical causes. See DIOCESAN COURTS.

Archdeaconry, the area over which an archdeacon has jurisdiction.

Archery. When the long-bow, which was the national weapon, was in process of being supplanted first by the cross-bow (q.v.) and then by the musket, statutes, such as the 33 Hen. 8, c. 9, and 4 & 5 P. & M. c. 2, were passed in order to promote the use of the long-bow.

Arches, Dean of the. This was the ancient judge of the Court of Arches (q.v.), who exercised what was known as the peculiar jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Canterbury, that is to say, jurisdiction over "peculiar" districts, which were exempt from the jurisdiction of the bishop in whose diocese they are situated. The Official Principal was the officer who exercised the metropolitan jurisdiction of the archbishop. The two offices gradually became blended together, and ultimately the Dean of the Arches ceased to be appointed; but the Official Principal continued to exist and to exercise both jurisdictions, and was popularly known as the Dean of the Arches. Between 1836 and 1850 nearly all the peculiar jurisdictions were abolished, so that practically only the metropolitan jurisdiction remains. By the Public Worship , provision was made for the appointment of a barrister, in actual practice for ten years, as judge of the Court of Arches and ex officio Official Principal. This judge must be, and his office determines if he ceases to be, a member of the Church of England. See COURT OF ARCHES.

A rescriptis valet argumentum (Co. Litt. 11). (An argument from the rescripts is sound.) The maxim is applied, at the reference given above, to original writs in the register. These were the ancient writs, as to which see ACTION ON THE CASE.

Argent du Roi. KING'S SILVER (q.v.).

Argentum Dei (God's money). Anciently this meant earnest money (q.v.). To this day in Holland earnest money is known as Goos penning (God's penny). Compare Denarius Dei (q.v.).

Arguendo, in the course of his argument.

Argumentative. This word is used in two senses.

In the old common law pleading, a plea was said to be argumentative and was not allowed if a material fact was stated, not directly, but by inference only. Thus, to allege that E. B. was seised for life would be to deny by implication, but by implication only, that the reversion belonged to him in fee, and, therefore, to avoid argumentativeness, a direct denial that the reversion belonged to him was added.

In the more modern sense, an affidavit is said to be argumentative if it contains, not merely allegations of fact, but arguments as to the bearing of those facts on the matter in dispute such as should be left to be advanced when the matter comes before the tribunal. Such affidavits are prohibited by Ord. XXXVIII., r. 3.

Argumentum a communiter accidentibus in jure frequens est (Gothofred ad D., 44, 2, 6). (An argument from the fact that such and such a thing commonly happens is frequent in the [civil] law.) This corresponds more or less to our own maxim, "Ad ea quae frequentius accidunt jura adaptantur" (q.v.).

Argumentum a divisione est fortissimum in jure (6 Rep. 60; Wing, 71). (The argument by division is the most effective known to the law.) Thus, where one claimed common ratione commorant and resident it was held, as there were only four kinds of commons—viz., common appendant, appurtenant, in gross, and by reason of vicinage—and as common ratione commorant and resident was none of the four, and as argumentum a divisione est fortissimum in jure, therefore the claim was untenable.

Argumentum a majori ad minus negative non valet; valet e converso (Jenk. 281). (You cannot argue in the negative from the greater to the less, but you can argue in the negative from the less to the greater.) The maxim was applied to a contention that the King could not recover single damages because he admittedly could not recover double damages.

Argumentum a simili is good in law (Co. Litt. 191). (An argument from a like case is good in law)—that is to say, a case on all fours with the case before the Court can be quoted as an authority. Compare Nullum simile, etc.

Argumentum ab auctoritate plurimum valet in lege (Co. Litt. 254). (An argument based on a decided case is of the greatest weight in the law.) Coke introduces the maxim by observing, "Here it appeareth that our booke cases are the best proofes what the law is."

Argumentum ab impossibili plurimum valet in lege (Co. Litt. 92). (An argument deduced from the fact that a thing is impossible is of much weight in the law.) Coke, in connection with this maxim, quotes the further maxim, "Lex non cogit impossibilia" (q.v.).

Argumentum ab inconvenienti plurimum valet in lege (Co. Litt. 66). (An argument based on inconvenience is of great weight in the law.) Coke, after quoting the maxim, goes on to say:—"Non solum quod licet sed quod est convenions est considerandum. Nihil quod est inconveniens est licitum," that is to say, "We must consider not only whether a thing is lawful, but also whether it is convenient. Nothing which causes inconvenience can be sanctioned." Thus, if an instrument is capable of alternative interpretations, and it can be shown that the adoption of a particular interpretation will lead to great inconvenience, then that will tend to show that such interpretation is not in accordance with the true meaning of the instrument. But if the instrument is capable of only one interpretation, that interpretation must be adopted without regard to any inconvenience which may be caused by this being done.

Arles; Erles, ancient names of earnest money (q.v.).

Arm of the Sea. See FORESHORE.

Arma dare, to knight: used in Norman times.

Arma in armatos sumere jura sinunt (2 Jus. 574). (It is lawful to use arms against persons who are armed.) This maxim, which is from the Roman law, cannot be accepted without qualification for the purposes of English law. It is, however, lawful to use arms if and in so far as the use of arms is necessary to prevent the commission of a forcible or atrocious crime, such as murder, robbery, or rape, or for the dispersal of dangerous rioters, or for the purpose of preventing the escape of a felon.

Arma libera, free arms, a lance and a sword given to a servant in Norman times when he was made a freeman.

Armiger, an esquire (q.v.).

Armistice, a temporary, but for the time being a total suspension of hostilities by agreement between the governments of the belligerents. It is to be distinguished from a truce arranged for some local purpose—such as the burial of men killed—between military commanders on either side.

Armorial Bearings. These, as known to the law, include any armorial bearing, crest or design, by whatever name called, and whether registered in the College of Heralds (q.v.) or not (Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1869, s. 19), and an annual licence duty must be paid, of £2 2s. if they are displayed on a carriage (other than a licensed hackney carriage), and of £1 1s. if they are otherwise used (s. 19). But the duty is not enforced in the case of (1) devices used by shopkeepers as trade-marks; (2) devices used as arms by corporations or companies or the officials thereof; (3) devices used by members or officers of a club or society which itself is licensed to use them. The licence is one of the LOCAL TAXATION LICENCES (q.v.).

"If any person without the authority of His Majesty uses in connection with any business, trade, calling or profession the Royal Arms (or arms so nearly resembling them as to be calculated to deceive) in such manner as to lead to the belief that he is duly authorised to use the Royal Arms" he is liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding £20 (Patents and Designs Act, 1907, s. 90 (2)); and the unauthorised use of the Royal Arms may be restrained by injunction (Trade Marks Act, 1905, s. 68).

Arms. This expression includes, for legal purposes, not only military weapons, but anything, such as clubs or stones, with which a hurt may be caused.

The carrying of arms in time of peace is prohibited by the statute 2 Edw. 3, c. 3; but the penalty is imprisonment during the King's pleasure and forfeiture of armour, so that the statute does not apply to modern conditions. As to the present law, see FIREARMS.

Army. See MUTINY ACT.

Army Brokerage Acts, The. The collective title given by the Regimental Exchange Act, 1875, s. 3, to the statutes of 1557 and 1809; mentioned under PUBLIC OFFICES, SALE OF.

Army Council. This body was created by letters patent, dated 6th February, 1904, to take over the administrative duties connected with the Army which before that date had been exercised by the Commander-in-Chief (q.v.), and the Secretary of State for War. It consists of the Secretary of State for War—who is empowered to specially reserve to himself any business which he pleases—a civil member (who is the Parliamentary Under Secretary of State), a finance member, and four military officers of high rank. The Army Council does all things connected with the Army which are not done by the Inspector-General of the Forces (q.v.).

Army Reserve. See RESERVE FORCES.

Arpen; Arpent, a French measure of land which was in use here for a considerable time after the Norman Conquest. It contained a hundred square perches and varied, with the length of the perch, from about an acre and a third to about five-sixths of the present statute acre.

Arraiers, officers who anciently equipped soldiers with arms and armour; referred to in the statute 12 Rich. 2., c. 6. They were concerned with the arraiatio peditum, or arraying of infantry soldiers, mentioned in a patent of 1307; the knights and other mounted men provided their own equipment.

Arraign; Arraignment. To arraign a prisoner is to call him to the bar of the Court to answer the matter charged against him in an indictment.

Arrangements between Debtors and Creditors. A man who is unable to pay his debts may arrange with his creditors, either privately or in the Bankruptcy Court, for discharge of his liabilities by partial payment. If he arranges privately, he does so under the Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1914, which amends and codifies the law on the subject. If, however, he has got into the Bankruptcy Court, it is for his creditors to consider whether he shall be adjudged a bankrupt or whether a scheme of arrangement shall be accepted (Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 13); and if he proposes a scheme to which the requisite majority of the creditors assent (ib., s. 16 (2)), the Court may either approve or refuse to approve of the scheme (ib., s. 16 (11)), except in certain cases where the Court must refuse to approve (ib., s. 16 (9), (10)). If it shows that approval was obtained by fraud, or if the scheme breaks down, the debtor may be adjudged bankrupt (ib., s. 16 (16)).

Under the Railway Companies Act, 1867, ss. 6-22, when a railway company is unable to meet its engagements with its creditors, a scheme of arrangement may be effected through the Chancery Division, if the requisite assent is obtained from the creditors.

A compromise or arrangement between any company registered under the Companies Acts and its creditors or members may, if approved by the requisite majority of creditors or members, be sanctioned by whatever Court has authority to wind the company up, that is to say, as the case may be, the High Court, the Chancery Courts of the counties palatine of Lancaster and Durham, or the County Court (Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, ss. 120, 285, 131).

Array. This signifies ranking or setting forth in order. A challenge to the array, as applied to juries and as distinguished from a challenge to the polls, signifies an exception or objection against all the persons arrayed or empanelled on a jury on account of some partiality or default of the sheriff or his under-officer who arrayed the panel

Array, Commission of. From the end of the twelfth century until the reign of Elizabeth, writs (known from the time of Edward I. as commissions of array) were from time to time issued to authorise the persons to whom they were directed to "elect," that is, impress, men for military service. These commissions of array were eventually superseded by commissions of lieutenancy (q.v.). These writs were issued under the authority of the Assize of Arms (1181) and other ancient Acts for the defence of the realm. They purported to be issued in order to raise men for the defence of the country against invasion, and for that purpose their issue was legal; but they were really used in order to raise forces for wars in Scotland and in France, and their issue for the latter purpose was not legal.

Arrectatus. See ARRETTED.

Arrenatus. In the Rolls of Parliament, 21 Edw. 1, the word is used as meaning "accused."

Arrent; Arrentation. To arrent lands in a forest meant to grant a licence to enclose them with a hedge and ditch, upon payment of a yearly rent; and arrentation was the issue of such licences. See the Ordinance of the Forest, 34 Edw. 1.

Arrest. To arrest a person is to restrain him of his liberty by some lawful authority. Arrest is usually made by actual seizure of the defendant's person, but any touching, however slight, of the person is sufficient for this purpose. And arrest is not confined to corporal seizure: where the officer entered the room in which the defendant was, and locked the door, telling him at the same time that he arrested him, the Court held it to be a good arrest. And if the officer say, "I arrest you," and the party acquiesce, or afterwards go with him, this is a good arrest.

Arrest in civil proceedings is now rare; the principal instances are where a person is attached for contempt of Court (see ATTACHMENT) and the cases specified in the Debtors Act, 1869 (q.v.), ss. 4, 5, 6, and where a contributory is arrested under the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, s. 176.

Formerly, arrest in civil proceedings was of two kinds—on mesne and on final process. At common law, arrest on mesne process was originally intended to compel the defendant to appear in an action, but it afterwards became the means of compelling him to give bail (q.v.). Arrest on mesne process in Chancery was to compel a defendant to put in an appearance or answer to a bill of complaint. Arrest on mesne process was abolished by the Judgments Act, 1838, in all cases except that of a defendant suspected of intending to abscond, and was modified in that case also by the Debtors Act, 1869 (q.v.). Arrest on final process was a mode of execution, that is, of enforcing a judgment: the writ used was called a capias ad satisfaciendum (q.v.). But now this remedy has been much restricted, and is available only in the cases mentioned in the Debtors Act, 1869 (q.v.).

In Admiralty actions in rem, a ship or cargo is arrested by nailing or fixing the original warrant on the mainmast, or (if there be only one mast) on the mast for a short time and afterwards substituting a copy for the original (R. S. C., Ord. IX., r. 12).

Any peace officer (that is to say, any justice, constable, sheriff or coroner) may arrest for felony, or for the attempt to commit a felony, or on reasonable suspicion of felony. A private person has the same right of arrest, except that, in order to justify arrest, he must prove that a felony has actually been committed. A peace officer may also arrest for breach of the peace committed in his view or a renewal of which he reasonably apprehends. For other offences, that is to say, for misdemeanours or for offences triable summarily, there is no power of arrest without warrant, unless where the power is given by statute. In any case where a warrant is necessary, the warrant should be in the possession of the person effecting the arrest.

Arrest of Inquest. An obsolete pleading showing cause against the holding of an inquisition (q.v.).

Arrest of Judgment. In criminal cases the accused may at any time between conviction and sentence move in arrest of judgment (that is to say, move that judgment be not pronounced) because of some defect in the indictment which is more than a mere formal defect and which has not been amended or cured by verdict (see AID BY VERDICT). The motion was always made without merits and on purely technical grounds; and the Indictments Act, 1915, which codifies and simplifies the law as to indictments, now makes it difficult to succeed on any such motion.

The Court can, of its own motion, arrest judgment if of opinion that no offence in law is disclosed by the indictment. Arrest of judgment is no bar to a fresh indictment.

In connection with the question of arrest of judgment, particular attention should be directed to s. 5 (1) of the Indictments Act, 1915, the precise effect of which is not yet settled by authority and which makes it conceivable, though improbable, that, in some circumstances at least, an indictment may be amended even after verdict.

Under the old common law practice, where a defendant might have taken, but did not take, some objection of substance to the plaintiff's pleading by demurring to it, and a verdict was found for the plaintiff, the defendant might then take the objection by moving in arrest of judgment, and, if the objection was well founded, judgment would not be entered for the plaintiff. As a judgment on a verdict is, under the present practice, only entered by order of the judge or Court (see Ord. XXXVI., r. 39), this procedure is now inapplicable. See MOTION FOR JUDGMENT.

Arrestandis bonis ne dissipentur, De, a writ to prevent a man's goods being made away with by one who had seized them and who, in modern phraseology, was not a mark for damages. It authorised the sheriff to seize them and to hold them pending an order of the king's justices.

Arrestando ipsum qui pecuniam recepit, De, a writ which anciently lay for the arrest of one who had taken the king's prest-money and had then failed to go on military service. See PREST for a more drastic remedy.

Arresto facto super bonis mercatorum alienigenorum, De, a writ which anciently lay for a denizen (q.v.) to seize the goods of aliens within the kingdom by way of reprisal for the seizure of his goods in another country.

Arretted. To say of a man that he was arretted meant that he was accused: to say that a folly was arretted to a man meant that it was imputed to him. The Latin form was arrectatus.

Arrura, a day's ploughing. Tenants frequently held upon the service of doing a certain number of arrurae in each year for the lord.

Arsenic. The sale of arsenic is specially regulated by the Arsenic Act, 1851, of which ss. 1 and 2 contain restrictions practically identical with those contained in the Pharmacy Act, 1868, s. 17 (see POISONS, SALE OF), except that a sale to an unknown purchaser must take place in the actual presence of the person who introduces him and that no arsenic may be sold to a person under twenty-one. Arsenic must, before sale, be discoloured with soot or indigo, unless sold for a purpose for which discoloration would render it useless (s. 3); if sold without discoloration, not less than ten pounds may be sold (ib.), but nothing in the Act applies to sale in a medicine duly prescribed or to sale in the course of wholesale dealing (s. 5).

Arson. At common law it was felony, punishable with death, to burn the house of another wilfully and of malice aforethought, the offence being termed "arson"; while to burn one's own house and thereby to cause damage to other houses, was a misdemeanour.

The various possible kinds of incendiarism are now punishable under the Malicious Damage Act, 1861, which by various sections makes them felony, punishable by penal servitude for various terms. Under the Dockyard Protection Act, 1772, s. 1, any person setting fire to any of his Majesty's dockyards, arsenals or ships, or to any stores or materials kept therein is punishable with death: but, under the provisions of the Judgment of Death Act, 1823, the Court, if it think fit, may record sentence instead of pronouncing it: these offences against the Act of 1772 are also punishable with death upon conviction by court-martial of an offender triable by such Court (Naval Discipline Act, 1866, s. 34).

Arsura, the testing of money by fire, used in Domesday in the form ad asuram.

Art Unions. The Art Union Act, 1846, associations—known as art unions—for the distribution by lot of works of art, or of sums of money to be expended in the purchase of works of art, shall be deemed legal provided that they shall have been incorporated by royal charter. But for this enactment, such associations would be illegal, inasmuch as they are clearly within the statutes prohibiting lotteries.

Arthel; Ardel. Under a custom existing in Wales, a person accused of, for instance, larceny, could "cast an ardel," that is to say, produce one to vouch for him; and the effect of this was to cause a discontinuance of the proceedings. The statute 26 Hen. 8, c. 6, s. 5, abolished the custom. Compare ASSACH.

Articled Clerk, is a clerk under articles (i.e. heads and particulars) of an agreement to serve a solicitor in consideration of being initiated into the routine and mystery of the profession. No one solicitor may have more than two articled clerks at any one time (Solicitors Act, 1843, s. 4), but a firm of, say, three partners may have as many as six such clerks among them, viz., two to each partner, provided each is bound separately to one of the partners only, and not generally to all. Where the clerk is (as usually happens) at the date of the articles under age, his parent or guardian is usually made a party to the articles as well as himself.

See SOLICITOR.

Articles are clauses of a document, and hence the word "articles" sometimes means the document itself: e.g. articles of agreement, articles of partnership, etc.

In criminal proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Courts, the first plea is called the articles, because it runs in the name of the judge, who "articles" and "objects" the facts charged against the defendant.

Articles of Association. See ASSOCIATION, MEMORANDUM OF.

Articles of Religion. See ARTICLES, THE THIRTY-NINE.

Articles of War. The King's Regulations (for the Navy), 729, define the Articles of War as "the printed sheets containing so much of the Navy Discipline Act as relates to the punishment of offences," and directs that they are to be displayed on each ship and to be read to the ship's company every quarter. The Act referred to in the definition is the Navy Discipline Act, 1866, as amended by subsequent legislation.

In the Army there are, strictly speaking, no Articles of War, the ordinances which formerly were known by that name being now replaced by so much of the Army Act as relates to the punishment of offences. That portion of that Act is popularly known, for Army purposes, as the Articles of War, and consists of ss. 4-44 inclusive and is (see King's Regulations for the Army, 461) to be read on parade at the head of every unit once in every three months.

Articles of the Eyre. In the system of the eyre, these articles, as Mr. Bolland puts it, "formed, in effect, a long catechism demanding information on every sort of matter where a possible answer might afford ground for extracting an amercement from somebody, for forcing somebody to pay a fine to the King to avoid worse things." This "catechism" had to be answered by the "dozen" or twelve men of each hundred, who had to disclose to the justices in eyre "every breach of the law, both civil and criminal—that had happened since the last eyre," to again quote Mr. Bolland. See CAPITULA ITINERIS; PLEAS OF THE CROWN.

Articles of the Peace. A person is said to exhibit articles of the peace when he complains on oath to the Lord Chancellor, the High Court, an Assize Court, Quarter Sessions or a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, that he fears, with reasonable cause, that another person will do or cause to be done bodily harm to him or to his wife or child or burn his house; and the Court, if satisfied that there are reasonable grounds of fear, is bound to require sureties for the peace. Down to 1879, the law was that the defendant could not give evidence or call witnesses to answer or controvert the statements made by the complainant, who could, however, be cross-examined; and this is still the law where the complaint is made otherwise than to a Court of summary jurisdiction. Now, however, under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 25, when the complaint is made to a Court of summary jurisdiction, the same procedure is followed as on any other complaint, and the complainant and defendant and witnesses may be called and examined and cross-examined in the ordinary way; and s. 26 of the same Act provides that, if the defendant be ordered to give security to keep the peace and fails so to do, he may be imprisoned for not more than six months by a petty sessional Court or than fourteen days by any other Court of summary jurisdiction.

Before 1879, there was no limit to the period of imprisonment which could be ordered by any court in default of security being given, but it was unusual to order any imprisonment exceeding one year; and the law is still the same except as regards a Court of summary jurisdiction.

The complaint should usually be made locally. Thus, in 1759, the Court of King's Bench refused to entertain a complaint from Cornwall, and said that the complainant should go to a local justice. And the tendency now is to hear such complaints before a Court of summary jurisdiction. Since 1879, the practice under which a justice could send the complaint on to Quarter Sessions has become obsolete, and no complaint has been heard since that date before the High Court or a judge of Assize. It was anciently said that only the superior Courts could require a peer or peeress to give security: but this would not appear to be now good law.

This jurisdiction to bind to the peace on complaint is to be distinguished from the jurisdiction to require sureties for good behaviour (q.v.) and from the jurisdiction of Courts and justices to bind to the peace on their own motion or as part of the punishment authorised by various statutes, as to which see SURETIES OF THE PEACE.

Articles, The Thirty-nine. The Thirty-nine Articles of Religion were agreed on by Convocation in 1562 and were promulgated by authority of Queen Elizabeth. They were ratified by Convocation in 1571, in which year s. 1 (now repealed) of the statute 13 Eliz. c. 12, required that all ecclesiastical persons should subscribe to them, while s. 2 (still in force) of the same Act enacted that ecclesiastics maintaining doctrines in contravention of them should be deprived.

Subscription to the articles is still obligatory—under the Clerical Subscription Act, 1865, on the clergy; under Canon 127 of 1603, on chancellors, commissaries and officials of the Ecclesiastical Courts; and, under the statute 14 Car. 2, c. 4, s. 13, on "any governor or head of the colleges of Westminster, Winchester, and Eton."

Articuli ad Novas Narrationes, a treatise on the pleadings given in the Novae Narrationes (q.v.), to which it is generally appended. It probably dates from the first part of the fifteenth century.

Articuli cleri, the name of an ancient statute 9 Edw. 2, st. 1, relating to the liberties and franchises of the clergy. Lord Coke applied the name to the petitions presented to the Star Chamber by Archbishop Bancroft in 1605.

Articuli Inquisitione super statutum Winton. (Articles of Enquiry upon the Statute of Winchester). An enactment printed under these titles in the Statutes of the Realm (Vol. 1, p. 245), s. v. Statutes of Uncertain Date, and in the Statutes at Large as 34 Edw. 1. See WINCHESTER, STATUTE OF.

Articuli super Chartas, the title of the statute 28 Edw. 1, confirming Magna Charta and the Charta de Foresta, without the saving clauses which were contained in the Confirmatio Chartarum, 25 Edw. 1.

Artificial Person. This means a corporation, company, or other body of men which, for certain purposes, is regarded by the law as being a natural person.

A rubro ad nigrum, literally, from the red to the black. Statutes were written or printed in black, but the titles were in red; and to argue a rubro ad nigrum was to deduce the meaning of the statute from the title.

Ascension Day, the Thursday next following the fifth Sunday after Easter (q.v.). Also known as Holy Thursday. See FAST DAYS; FEASTS.

Ash Wednesday, the first day of Lent (q.v.).

Ashbourne Act, the popular title of the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1885.

Asportation; Asportavit. In the law of larceny, asportation was the "carrying away," without which the common law offence of larceny was not committed. Asportavit means "did carry away." Before 1733 (see FRENCH) it was necessary that the indictment for larceny should contain the averment that the prisoner "cepit et asportavit." See CEPIT; TAKE AND CARRY AWAY; LARCENY.

Assach; Assath, a Welsh custom under which in certain cases the accused could clear himself by the oath of three hundred men: abolished by the statute 1 Hen. 5, c. 6. Compare ARTHEL.

Assart. This, in the ancient forest laws, meant to stub up trees and bushes in a forest (q.v.) so that they could not grow again, thus making what had been covert for the deer into land fit for use as arable or pasture land. The act of doing this was known as an assart: and land which had been assarted was called assart. A man could, by a writ of ad quod damnum, sue out a licence to assart; and if the licence was granted, an annual rent, called an assart rent, was usually reserved. But if a tenant of forest land assarted without licence, the land assarted reverted to the king until it had been redeemed by a fine.

Assart Land. At Rotherfield, in Sussex, assart means copyhold which ordinarily descends to the eldest son, or, in default of sons, to the eldest daughter. But if a tenant be admitted first to bond land (q.v.) and afterwards to assart land, then the youngest son, or, failing a son, the youngest daughter, takes the assart land as well as the bond land. If, on the other hand, the tenant be admitted first to assart land and afterwards to bond land, then the eldest son or, failing a son, the eldest daughter, takes all the lands.

Assault. Strictly speaking, an assault, as regards civil proceedings, is an unsuccessful attempt to do harm to the person of another, as by menacing with a stick a person who is within reach of it, although no blow be struck. If a blow is struck, the act is a battery; but in legal proceedings for an alleged battery, in order that, if the plaintiff or prosecutor failed to prove the battery, he might still prove the assault, the act complained of would be described as an assault and battery; and hence in popular language the term "assault" has come to be treated as synonymous with battery. An assault is a tort (q.v.), giving rise to a right of action for damages.

In the criminal law, an assault is either a threat, made otherwise than by words, of using force to another, accompanied by a real or apparent ability to carry out the threat at once, or an attempt to use such force. If any force be used, the assault at once becomes a battery.

The more serious forms of assault are indictable offences under the Offences against the Person Act, 1861, and are punishable with various terms of imprisonment or penal servitude. Courts of summary jurisdiction can deal with less serious cases—known as common assaults—under ss. 42, 43, of that Act, or, if they relate to children under sixteen, under s. 12 of the Children Act, 1908; but offences under the last-mentioned section are also triable on indictment.

Under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, s. 4, when a husband has been convicted summarily under s. 43 of the Act of 1861 of an aggravated assault on his wife, or shall have been sentenced on indictment for assault to a fine exceeding £5 or to imprisonment exceeding two months, the wife may be granted a separation order either by the Court before whom he was convicted or on application to a Court of summary jurisdiction.

Assaults on peace officers can be dealt with summarily under s. 38 of the Act of 1861, or under the Prevention of Crime Act, 1871, s. 12.

Consent is no defence in criminal proceedings where the act charged is or tends to a breach of the peace or is dangerous; and consequently there can be no consent to a prize-fight. See CHASTISEMENT.

Assay. This anciently meant the testing of the quality of bread, wine, beer, etc., and the accuracy of weights and measures (see TENTATES PANIS); but that use of the word is now obsolete. It now means the testing of gold and silver plate and of the coinage in order to ascertain whether they are up to the standard specified by law. See COMBUSTIO; PYX.

Assayer. (I.) "An officer of the Mint appointed by the statute 2 Hen. 6, c. 12" (Termes de la Ley) to assay silver.

(II.) An officer of the king's household who tasted all food before it was served to the king: see Household Ord. Edw. 2, pars. 26, 37, 48, 49, 50.

Assembly, Unlawful. This means the common law misdemeanour consisting of an assembly of three or more persons either with intent (formed whether before or after they assembled) to commit by open force a crime (which, however, the assembly neither commits nor makes a motion towards committing) or else with intent to carry out any common purpose, whether lawful or unlawful, in such a manner as to give just ground to apprehend a breach of the peace. The distinction between an unlawful assembly and a rout or a riot will appear from a reference to the definitions of the two latter terms.

Assensio mentium. This means the mutual consent which is necessary for the purpose of a valid contract.

Assent, Royal. See ACT OF PARLIAMENT. The royal assent has not been withheld since the year 1707.

Assent of Executor. The title of a legatee or devisee is not complete until the executor has assented to the legacy or devise. The assent may be express or implied; almost any language or conduct acknowledging the right of the legatee or devisee, or from which it appears that there is nothing to prevent the legatee or devisee from having his legacy or devise, amounts to an assent.

After the assent, a legatee's title to a legacy is complete, and if the legacy is specific he may bring an action to recover the property bequeathed; but in the case of pecuniary legacies, his only remedy is an action for the administration of the testator's estate. If assent be unreasonably withheld, the Chancery Division will compel the executor to give his assent.

With regard to a devise, if, after the expiration of one year from the death of the testator, his executors have failed to convey the land to a devisee, then the Court may compel the executors to convey (Land Transfer Act, 1897, s. 3 (2)).

Assessed Taxes. This expression strictly means taxes, such as the land tax, the inhabited house duty, and property or income tax, the amount or rate of which is assessed or fixed in each case; but it is also used to mean the taxes levied in respect of male servants, carriages, and armorial bearings. See EXCISE; LOCAL TAXATION LICENCES.

Assessment; Assess. To assess damages, or the value of property or some other unascertained sum, is to fix its amount. Thus, where judgment by default is obtained in an action for detention of goods or pecuniary damages, the value of the goods or the amount of the damages must be ascertained before the judgment can be executed. Assessment is effected by a writ of inquiry (see INQUIRY, WRIT OF), under Ord. XIII., r. 5, or under Ord. XXVII., r. 4, or by reference to a master or an official referee under Ord. XXXVI., r. 57.

Rates and taxes in respect of land and houses are calculated with reference to the estimated value of the property, which is arrived at by a process called assessment. For the purpose of levying poor rates and other local taxes, the guardians of every union or parish appoint from among themselves an assessment committee, who revise the valuation lists of the rateable hereditaments in each parish prepared by the overseers (see the Union Assessment Acts, 1862-1880). In London the valuation so arrived at is also made use of for the purposes of the inhabited house duty and the property or income tax in respect of land, &c. (Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869). In other places the mode of assessment for these taxes depends on the Acts relating to them. See INCOME TAX; INHABITED HOUSE DUTY.

Assessment for the purposes of a covenant by a tenant to pay "all taxes, rates and assessments," means periodical payments of a nature similar to that of rates and taxes and does not include, for instance, an exceptional burden imposed by a local authority in respect of permanent improvement to the property; nor does it mean tithe rentcharge.

Assessor. This is a person called in to assist a Court in trying a question requiring technical or scientific knowledge. In Admiralty business it is the practice of the High Court and the Court of Appeal (following the practice of the Court of Admiralty) to call in assessors in cases involving questions of navigation or seamanship: they are called "nautical assessors," and are always Brethren of the Trinity House. Under the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 56 and Ord. XXXVI., rr. 7 and 43, and Ord. LXVIII., r. 1, the High Court or the Court of Appeal may call in the aid of one or more assessors in any action or matter; and by the Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1876, provision is made for the appointment and attendance of the archbishops and bishops of the Church of England as assessors of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in ecclesiastical appeals. There are other enactments by which the employment of assessors is authorised in various Courts. Assessors are also employed in various inquiries of a judicial character, e.g. in Courts of Survey and investigations by Wreck Commissioners under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, ss. 484, 466 (3), (4).

An assessor differs from a referee (q.v.) in having no voice or power in deciding questions, his duties being confined to assisting the deliberations of the Court.

Assets. This means property available for the payment of the debts of a person or corporation. The term is sometimes applied to the property of a living person, e.g. a bankrupt or a married woman whose property has been acquired by her husband, and to the extent of which he is liable for her debts or liabilities contracted before marriage. It is, however, more often applied to the property of a deceased person, or of a partnership or company which has ceased to carry on business and is being wound up.

The assets of a deceased person are of various kinds, according as they consist of real or personal estate belonging absolutely to the deceased, or of property over which he had merely a power of appointment. Real assets are the lands, or other real property of the deceased, which are liable for payment of his debts, whether he has devised or charged them for that purpose or not (see the Administration of Estates Acts, 1833 and 1869). The distinction between the various classes of assets is of importance with reference to the order of their administration where the residuary estate is insufficient for payment of all the debts. Another division of assets is into legal and equitable. Legal assets comprise everything which an executor takes virtute officii, and with which he would have been charged in an action at law by a creditor, while equitable assets are such as could only be reached by the creditor in a Court of equity. Thus, personal estate, including leaseholds, is legal assets; and so also is real estate since the Land Transfer Act, 1897, while equitable interests in or trusts of chattels, etc., are equitable assets. The distinction was of importance with reference to the estates of persons who died before the 1st January, 1870, because, in the event of such a person leaving an insolvent estate, his debts were payable out of the legal assets in a different order from equitable assets. In the case of any person dying on or after the 1st January, 1870, his debts, whether by specialty or simple contract, are paid pari passu out of the assets without priority one over another, and there is therefore no distinction between legal and equitable assets in such cases (Administration of Estates Act, 1869).

The order in which the assets of a deceased person are applied in paying his debts, so as to exhaust one class of assets before coming on another, and so as to pay one class of debts in preference to another if the assets are not sufficient for the payment of all, is called the order of administration. Thus, if a testator dies leaving as residuary personal estate sufficient to pay all his debts, they are paid out of that residue, so as to leave the legacies and real estate untouched. If the residue be not sufficient, his real estate devised for payment of debts will be taken before his real estate descending to his heir, and so on. If his whole property be not sufficient for the payment of all his debts, it will be applied, first, in payment of his Crown debts in full, then the residue in or towards payment of his judgment debts, and the ultimate residue, if any, in paying a proportion of his other debts.

The following is the order in which the various classes of assets are taken or exhausted in succession:—(1) Personal estate not specifically bequeathed; (2) real estate devised or ordered to be sold for payment of debts; (3) real estate descended; (4) real estate charged with payment of debts; (5) general pecuniary legacies; (6) land comprised in a residuary devise, real estate specifically devised, and personal estate specifically bequeathed; (7) property over which the testator had a general power of appointment which he had exercised.

And the following is the order of administration of assets as regards debts:—(1) Crown debts; (2) debts to which priority is given by statute; (3) judgments against deceased, duly registered in the Land Registry; (4) judgments against personal representatives; (5) recognisances and statutes (see Williams on Executors (11th ed.), p. 779); (6) special and simple contract debts, and unregistered judgments against deceased; (7) voluntary bonds and covenants.

A judgment has no priority against an executor, administrator, or heir, unless a writ, execution, or order for the purpose of enforcing it is registered in the Land Registry (Land Charges Act, 1900, s. 2 (1)); and, therefore, an executor who pays contract debts in priority to an unregistered judgment incurs no liability to the judgment creditor. Judgments obtained against the personal representatives of a deceased debtor do not require registration, and are paid according to their priority in point of time.

In bankruptcy, and in the winding up of companies, all debts are payable pari passu, except that, in bankruptcy, certain debts in respect of rates and taxes and clerks' and servants' wages and salaries, and for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, and for contributions under the National Insurance Act, 1911, and debts due by the bankrupt as an officer of a friendly society or trustee savings bank, are payable, pari passu amongst themselves, in priority to all other debts (Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 33); and except that in the winding up of a company, practically the same debts are preferred as are preferred in bankruptcy (Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, s. 209; National Insurance Act, 1911, s. 110).

Assets by descent are lands which descend to an heir charged with the debts or obligations of his ancestor. The term was originally used in the law of warranty (q.v.) to signify land which descended to an heir of equal value to land as to which his ancestor had entered into a warranty; thus, if A was heir to his mother, subject to his father's estate by the curtesy, and the father aliened the land with warranty and died, this warranty did not bar A's title to the land without assets in fee simple, that is, unless land in fee simple of equal value descended to him from his father. The term "assets by descent" was afterwards applied where a man died leaving debts by specialty in which his heirs were bound, in which case his heir was liable to pay the debts, so far as he had assets by descent, that is, to the value of the land which descended to him. Now that all the land left by a deceased person is liable for his debts, the term "assets by descent" has been supplanted by "real assets." See ASSETS; ALIENATION.

Assign; Assignment. "Assign," like "grant" (q.v.) is a general word signifying a transfer of property: thus, we speak indifferently of granting or assigning a reversion in land. An assignment is the act of assigning, or the instrument by which it is done.

In a conveyance to "A, his heirs and assigns," or "A, his executors, administrators, and assigns," etc., the word "assigns" is in reality mere surplusage, because the estate or interest passes without it (see WORDS OF LIMITATION). In a covenant by "A, his heirs and assigns," the word "assigns" includes all those who take either immediately or remotely from or under A, whether by conveyance, devise, descent or other act of law, e.g. as assignee from A's heir, or as heir to A's assignee, and so on (see COVENANT); and whether they take the fee simple, or merely a limited interest, e.g. by lease.

In its more special sense, to assign is to transfer personal estate, or chattels real, or certain rights in real or personal estate. The term is especially applied to leases, terms of years, estates for life in land or personal property, and to choses in action, and incorporeal chattels. The word "assign" is the proper technical operative word, but any expression showing an intention to make a complete transfer will constitute an assignment. An assignment by way of sale is an absolute assignment for money: an assignment by way of mortgage is one made as security for a debt or the like– e.g. a bill of sale (q.v.).

Assignments of leases and terms of years must be by deed (Statute of Frauds, s. 4; Real Property Act, 1845, s. 3); assignments of choses in action and incorporeal personal property do not, as a rule, require to be by deed. In the case of policies of life and marine insurance, notice of the assignment must be given to the insurance company; in the case of patents or designs, the assignment, whether it be of the patent, etc., or merely of an interest therein, may be registered, and the person registered as owner of the patent, etc., has, subject to any rights appearing from the register to be vested in any other person, absolute power to deal with the patent, etc. (Patents and Designs Act, 1907, s. 71). The effect of s. 36, and Sch. 2 of the Copyright Act, 1911, is to abolish the registration of copyright. See ASSIGNMENT OF CHOSES IN ACTION.

Assignatus utitur jure auctoris (Halk. Max. 14). (An assignee is clothed with the right of his principal)—that is to say, acquires such right as the principal had, provided, of course, that such right was capable of assignment. But it is to be observed the assignee acquires the liabilities as well as the rights of his principal with regard to the subject-matter of the assignment. Compare QUI IN JUS, ETC.

Assignee (I.) is a person to whom an assignment is made, and the term is therefore usually applied to personal property: it is, however, sometimes applied to realty; thus, we speak of the assignee of a reversion. See ASSIGNMENT; ASSIGN.

(II.) In the old bankruptcy law, assignees filled a place similar to that now occupied by trustees (q.v.). By the statute 6 Geo. 4, c. 16, the estates of bankrupts were administered by persons chosen by the creditors, and to whom the bankrupt's property was assigned by the commissioners for that purpose; they were, hence, usually called assignees, or creditors' assignees. By the statute 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 56, official assignees were introduced: they were permanent officials who, before their appointment, must have been engaged in commerce, etc., and one of them acted in each bankruptcy jointly with the creditors' assignees Assignees have no place in the present law of bankruptcy.

Assignment of Action or Matter. Under R. S. C. Ord. IX., r. 5, every action or matter in the Chancery Division is assigned by ballot to one of the judges of that division. But those judges have been divided into pairs, and to each pair chambers have been attached. And by Ord. IXA., each judge of each pair has full jurisdiction over every cause or matter which has been assigned to the other judge of the pair.

Assignment of Breach. See BREACH.

Assignment of Choses in Action. Formerly choses in action were not assignable at law except in a few cases (e.g. bills of exchange); but choses in action arising from contract (such as debts) were assignable in equity. It was, however, necessary for the assignee to give notice of the assignment to the debtor, trustee or stakeholder, in order to prevent him from paying the money to the original creditor (the assignor) or some subsequent assignee. Thus if A owed B a debt and B assigned it to C, the assignment was not complete as between C and A until notice of it had been given to A; and C took the debt subject to any prior equities (e.g. an agreement between A and B by which the debt was affected). Such assignments of choses in action were called equitable assignments. Now, by the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25 (6), an absolute assignment in writing of a legal chose in action is effectual at law as well as in equity, provided notice in writing is given to the debtor, trustee, etc. See CHOSE.

. In ordinary cases, before a widow can take possession of any of her husband's land as tenant in dower (q.v.), her part must be assigned to her, either by agreement between her and the heir, or by the sheriff in execution of a judgment obtained by her.

Assignment of Errors. See ERROR.

Assignment of Waste. Common of estovers and turbary is sometimes limited to those parts of the waste (q.v.) which are assigned, that is, pointed out by the owner from time to time for the purpose. See VIEW AND DELIVERY.

Assisa cadera. At the time of Bracton this meant a non-suit (q.v.).

Assisa cadit in perambulationem. The jury declaring their ignorance of the boundaries in a question of disputed boundaries, the judge would order a perambulation, with a view to ascertain the boundary; hence this phrase.

Assisa continuanda, De, a writ mentioned by Bracton. It was addressed to the judge of assize for the continuation of a cause, when material facts could not be proved unless the cause were, in modern phraseology, adjourned.

Assisa de Ponderibus et Mensuris. (The Assize of Weights and Measures). An enactment printed under these titles in the Statutes of the Realm (Vol. I., at p. 204), under Statutes of Uncertain Date, and in the Statutes at Large as 31 Edw. I. It sets out the various weights and measures which were to be used. It provides that "the English penny, which is called the sterling, round without clipping, shall weigh thirty-two grains of wheat dry in the midst of the ear; twenty pence make an ounce; twelve ounces make a pound; and eight pounds make a gallon of wine." And it then sets out a very large number of other weights and measures, such as "a diker of gloves consisteth of ten pairs." See COMPOSITIONE, ETC.

Assisa de utrum. This writ, which was called also assisa jurum utrum, lay for a parson against a layman, or for a layman against a parson, for lands or tenements, as to which it was doubtful whether they were lay-fees or free-alms. It was abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36. It was practically obsolete even when the Termes de la Ley (q.v.) was written.

Assisa panis et cerevisiae. This was the power of assising (at the time the judges on circuit assised) the weight of bread and the measures of beer. The statute 51 Hen. 3, for fixing the price of bread and ale, was so called (see the Statutes of the Realm, Vol. I., p. 200).

Assisa proroganda, De, an ancient writ, addressed to the judges of assize, for the stay of proceedings on the ground that a party to them was on the king's business.

Assisa vertitur in juratam. An assise was taken either "in modum assisae" or "in modum juratae," in which latter case it was said to fall into a jury (cadere in juratam). The difference between the two forms of assise appears to have been this:—(1) In nature—the very matter alleged by the plaintiff as his ground of claim was traversed in the assisa, while in the jurata some fresh point was stated which went to destroy that ground of claim; and (2) in consequence—the jury could not be attainted for false verdict in the jurata, whereas in the assisa they might be attainted, or, to put it in another way, the assisa could not, while the jurata could, return a general verdict. The jurata developed out of the assisa, between which and the modern jury it was the connecting link.

Assise or Assize anciently signified a legislative enactment. Some old statutes and ordinances are still so called, e.g., the Assise of Bread, the Assise of Clarendon, the Assise of the Forest, etc.

An assise passed in the reign of Henry II. provided for the trial of questions of seisin and title to land by a recognition or enquiry of sixteen men sworn to speak the truth (see ASSISE, GRAND); hence the proceedings, and the jurors themselves, became known as the assises. Some assises were called from the objects for which they were brought (such as the assise of common of pasture, to recover seisin of a common of pasture), but more often from the occasions which gave rise to them, e.g., the assises of novel disseisin, mort d'ancestor, etc.: see those titles.

Magna Charta provided that assises of novel disseisin and mort d'ancestor should be taken only in the shires where the land lay, and for this purpose justices were sent into the country once a year; hence they were called justices of assize. Afterwards, the Statute of Nisi Prius (13 Edw. 1, c. 30) enacted that the justices of assize should try the issues in ordinary actions in the counties in which they arose and return the verdict to the Court at Westminster. Hence, trials of civil actions before judges on circuit are said to take place at the assizes (see CIRCUIT; NISI PRIUS), where also are held trials under commissions of "oyer and terminer" and "gaol delivery" (q.v.). The assizes, therefore, are for criminal as well as civil business. The judges also sit under a commission of the peace. See JUSTICES OF THE PEACE. The jurisdiction of the Courts created by commissions of assize, of oyer and terminer, and of gaol delivery, is now vested in the judges of assize. The judges of assize are appointed by special commission from the Crown, and are hence also called commissioners of assize; they must be selected from the judges of the High Court and the Court of Appeal, or from the King's counsel.

All England (including Wales), except Middlesex, is divided into seven circuits (q.v.) for the purposes of assizes. Assizes are held four times a year, there being the winter, Easter, summer, and autumn assizes. At the winter and summer assizes both civil and criminal business is taken on all circuits. Assizes at which there are no prisoners for trial are known as "maiden assizes."

On the Easter circuit, criminal business only is taken at Leeds, but both civil and criminal business is taken at Manchester and Liverpool. On the autumn circuit, both civil and criminal business is taken at Swansea, Leeds, Liverpool, Manchester, and Birmingham; but only criminal business is taken elsewhere.

The effect of the Assizes and Quarter Sessions Act, 1908, is that, where up to five days before the commencement of the assizes or quarter sessions there is no case requiring a jury to be disposed of thereat, then the assizes or quarter sessions need not be held unless other business has to be transacted.

See CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

Assise, Grand. During the first hundred years succeeding the Norman Conquest, when a writ of right (q.v.) was issued against a feudal tenant, he had to defend his right to the land in question by battle in the Court of his lord. The fight might be between paid fighters or champions (q.v.), who thus were the predecessors first of the serjeant and then of the modern barrister. In the reign of Henry II. the tenant was given the right to "put himself on the assise," which meant that a writ of peace, otherwise known as the writ de magna assisa eligenda, was issued to the sheriff, whose duty it was thereupon to stay all proceedings in the Court of the lord and to constitute the Grand Assise by nominating four knights, who in their turn elected twelve other knights, the sixteen so chosen being called precognitors. The precognitors had to find whether the tenant or the claimant who impugned the tenant's title had the greater right to the land, and their verdict was returned either to the justices in eyre (q.v.) or to the King's Court at Westminster. The Grand Assise gradually fell into disuse; but it was abolished only by force of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36, which enacted that no writ of right should be issued after 31st December, 1834; and in 1835, and again in 1838, the case of Davies v. Lowndes (in which the writ had been issued before 1835) was tried in the Court of Common Pleas before a Grand Assise and the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, the Grand Assise consisting of "four knights, girt with their swords, and the other twelve recognitors.' See 1 Bing. (N. C.) 599.

Assise of Arms, an ordinance passed in 1181 by Henry II., whereby he revived the ancient fyrd or national militia.

Assise of bread. See ASSISA PANIS.

Assise of Darrein Presentment, or last presentation, was a real action which lay where a man (or his ancestor under whom he claimed) had presented a clerk to a benefice, who was instituted, and afterwards, upon the next avoidance, a stranger presented a clerk, and thereby disturbed the real patron. It was abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36, having been previously superseded in practice by the action of quare impedit (q.v.).

Assise of Mort d'Ancestor. This was a real action which lay to recover land of which a person had been deprived on the death of his ancestor by the abatement or intrusion of a stranger. See ABATEMENT. It was abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36.

Assise of Novel Disseisin. This was a real action which lay to recover land of which a person had been recently disseised. It was abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1863, s. 36. It was called assisa novae disseisinae because the judges on circuit tried only questions of disseisin which were new, that is, which had arisen since the last eyre (q.v.). See DISSEISIN; OCCUPANT.

Assise of Nuisance, a writ which anciently lay against a man to redress or remove a nuisance which he had created to the freehold of another, whether the latter held for life, in tail, or in fee simple.

Assise of the Forest, an ordinance or statute relating to the king's forest.

Assise, Petty. This was a proceeding before justices in eyre (q.v.) to obtain a remedy for loss of seisin or possession. There were various petty assises, there being the assises of darrein presentment, of mort d'ancestor, and of novel disseisin, and others.

Assise Rents are the established rents of the holders of a manor, because they are

SISUS.

Assises de Jerusalem, a code compiled for the government of the city of Jerusalem after its conquest by the Crusaders, and subsequently adapted for use in the kingdom of Cyprus.

Assistance, Writ of. This writ was originally used by the Court of Chancery to enforce an order for the possession of land; but its use for that purpose is now obsolete, a writ of possession issued under R. S. C., Ord. XLVII., r. 2, being now substituted; and the writ of assistance is now issued only under R. S. C., Ord. LXXII., r. 2, for the purpose of putting a receiver or other person into possession of specific chattels, such as securities or documents, when the circumstances are such that the procedure specifically provided by the other rules of Court would be futile.

Assistant Judge of Middlesex Sessions. The Middlesex Sessions Act, 1844, s. 8, provided for the appointment by the Home Secretary of assistant and deputy-assistant judges of Middlesex Sessions (see MIDDLESEX), both of whom were paid. The great diminution of the size of the county of Middlesex which was caused by the creation of the County of London in 1888, made it unnecessary to have paid judges for the Middlesex Sessions: and the effect of the Local Government Act, 1888, ss. 42 (ii.), 126, was to repeal s. 8 of the Act of 1844 as from the date (which in fact was 1896) upon which the last of the judges appointed under the Act of 1844 should cease to hold office.

Assisus, land let for a fixed rent. The terra assisa of a lord was what he had let to tenants, as distinguished from the terra dominica, or land which he kept in his own hands. See ASSISE; RENTS.

Assizes. See ASSISE; ASSIZE.

Assizes Relief Act, 1890, is an Act under which, when any person has been committed for trial, or has been bailed when charged with an indictable offence which is triable at Quarter Sessions, the persons bound over to prosecute and give evidence shall be bound over to appear at the next practicable Quarter Sessions, and the accused person shall not be tried at any intervening Assizes unless the High Court shall specially so direct.

Associates. These were officers of the common law Courts, who were appointed by and held office at the pleasure of the Chief Justice or Chief Baron of each Court, and who were paid by fees down to 1852. By the Common Law Courts Act, 1852, their tenure of office was made to be during good behaviour. Salaries were substituted for fees, and provision was made for pensions; but the appointment was still left in the hands of the chief judges. By the Supreme Court of Judicature (Officers) Act, 1879, s. 8, the then existing associates of the Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer Divisions were made masters of the Supreme Court. Section 8 of the Act of 1879 was repealed by the S. L. R. Act, 1894, and since then the duties of associates have been performed by clerks of the Associates Department of the Crown Office Department of the Central Office of the Supreme Court.

The former duties of associates were to keep the records of the Court, to attend Nisi Prius sittings, make out the list of cases, conduct the jury ballot, note the judgment, make up the postea (or certificate of the result of trial), and deliver the record to the proper party. They performed generally the clerical and administrative functions connected with their respective Courts: and the duties of their successors are, subject to alterations made by rules of Court, still much the same.

The Clerk of Assize (q.v.) performed and still performs on circuit duties analogous to those of an associate.

Association, the writ of association was used to associate a person or persons with another in the performance of various functions. See, for instance, ADMITTENDO IN SOCIUM.

Association, Memorandum of; Articles of. Any seven or more persons (or, in the case of a private company, any two or more persons) may by subscribing their names to a memorandum and otherwise complying with the statutory requirements as to registration, form an incorporated company with or without limited liability (Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, s 2). Whatever be the kind of company which is formed, the memorandum must state (a) its name, (b) whether the registered office is to be in England, Ireland, or Scotland, and (c) its objects; and every subscriber must subscribe it, if it has a share capital, with the number of shares he takes (ib., ss. 3, 4, 5). The Act (ss. 3, 5) contain further provisions applicable to the case of each particular kind of company.

Articles of association are regulations for the management of a company. See ss. 10-13, 285 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, which gives in Table A a specimen set of articles applicable to the case of a company limited by shares.

Assumpsit. This word, meaning "he promised," was the name, before the Judicature Acts (see ACTIONS), of the action which lay to recover damages for breach of simple contract, that is to say, of a contract, either express or implied, not under seal. Claims in actions of assumpsit were divided into indebitatus (or common or money counts) and special counts. The indebitatus counts most frequently used were in respect of debts for goods sold and delivered or bargained and sold, work done, money lent, paid or received, interest, and on account stated—where, in fact, a simple contract had resulted in a money debt. The special counts were used where damages were sought for the non-performance of the contract, and also occasionally where it was desirable to set out the terms of the contract.

Assumpsit was an action on the case (q.v.). It has been abolished by the Judicature Acts.

Assurance; Assure. "Assure" and "assurance" are the old words for "convey" and "conveyance" (q.v.). They are still used in this sense as regards the "covenant for further assurance," which is implied in every conveyance at the present day. See COVENANT.

"Assure" and "assurance" are also equivalent to "insure" and "insurance" (q.v.). In statutes, and in conveyances and other instruments, the words "assure" and "assurance" are generally used with reference to life insurance, while the words "insure" and "insurance" are generally used with reference to fire, marine, accident, and other kinds of insurance. See INSURANCE.

Aster; Homo aster, used by Britton as meaning a resident. Compare ASTRUM.

Astrarius hæres, an heir-apparent to whom, during the life of an ancestor, a dwelling which the heir would have got upon the death of the ancestor was conveyed by deed.

Astrum, in the reign of Edward I. this meant a house.

Asylum. This means primarily a place in which there is safety from pursuit. See SANCTUARY.

Its more important and general meaning is a place, whether public or private, for the reception and treatment of the insane. The law as to such places is to be found in the Lunacy Acts, 1890 to 1911. But it is to be noted that, for the purposes of those Acts, the term "asylum" is defined to mean "an asylum for lunatics provided by a county or borough or by a union of counties and boroughs" (Act of 1890, s. 341), so that houses licensed under those Acts for the reception of lunatics, and hospitals and workhouses into which lunatics are received, are not asylums for the purposes of those Acts. It is also to be observed that the persons who may be received into asylums or other places sanctioned by the Lunacy Acts are lunatics, which (Act of 1890, s. 341) means idiots or persons of unsound mind. Idiots, along with imbeciles, feeble-minded persons and moral imbeciles are defined by s. 1 of the Mental Deficiency Act, 1913, as being defectives for the purposes of that Act, and may be detained in institutions pursuant to that Act; but an institution used for the detention of idiots under the Act of 1913 is not an asylum merely because it is so used.

See also CRIMINAL LUNATIC ASYLUMS.

Asylums Board. The Metropolitan Asylums Board (otherwise known as the Metropolitan Asylums Managers) was constituted by order of the Poor Law Board, made 15th May, 1867, pursuant to the Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867, s. 8. That order has been amended by various orders under the Act of 1867 and subsequent amending Acts. The Board is entrusted with the organisation of the arrangements for dealing, in the administrative county of London, with insanity and infectious disease amongst the poor.

The Lancashire Asylums Board is entrusted with the management of four pauper lunatic asylums in Lancashire. It was constituted by the Lancashire County Council pursuant to the Lancashire County (Lunatic Asylums and other Powers) Act, 1891 (54 Vict. c. xx.).

Athelstan, Laws of (Circa. 930). Six series of these are extant. The first deals with payment of tithes and church dues. The second, third, fourth, and fifth are concerned mainly with the administration of justice. The sixth deals chiefly with London gilds. See ATTENBOROUGH; Laws of the Early English Kings (1922), p. 122.

A tempore cujus contrarii memoria non existet. (From a time where there is no memory to the contrary.) See MEMORY.

Atia, ill will; hatred. See ODIO ET ATIA.

At large, used formerly in various combinations, such as "common at large" (which was synonymous with "common (q.v.) in gross"), "verdict (q.v.) at large" (or special verdict), etc.

Attachiamenta bonorum. At a remote period this was a distress of the goods and chattels of a man for debt or where he was security.

Attachiamenta de spinis et bosco, the right of forest officers to take thorns and brushwood for their own use.

Attachiators, bailiffs. They levied, for instance, attachiamenta bonorum (q.v.).

Attachment. To attach a person is to arrest him under a writ called a writ of attachment: to attach property it to seize it or place it under the control of a Court.

Attachment of the person is of two kinds, that employed in ordinary cases of disobedience to an order, judgment, etc. or other contempt of Court committed in the course of a suit, and that employed where no suit is pending. The former kind is one mode of enforcing obedience to the orders of the High Court of Justice, such as injunctions, orders for discovery and production, and certain judgments. The writ is issued by leave of the Court or a judge on notice to the person concerned (Ord. XLIV., r. 2), and directs the sheriff to arrest him. The contemnor then remains in prison until he has cleared his contempt or is discharged. An attachment to enforce a mere money demand can only be issued in the cases mentioned in the Debtors Act, 1869, s. 4; e.g. against a defaulting trustee, and in such cases no person can be imprisoned for more than a year (ib.). The Court has a discretion to refuse the attachment (Debtors Act, 1878). See also COMMITTAL. The other kind of attachment is issued to punish disobedience to the King's writs, contempt of Court, disobedience to the rules or awards of a Court, abuse of the process of a Court, forgeries of writs, etc. Its peculiarity, says Hawkins, in his Pleas of the Crown, is that it " may be awarded by the discretion of the justices upon a bare suggestion, or of their own knowledge, without any appeal, indictment, or information." If it is awarded on the complaint of a private person, the procedure is governed by Ord. XLIV.

Attachment of property is of importance in two cases—attachment of debts, and attachment in the Mayor's Court.

Attachment of debts is a proceeding employed in actions in the High Court where a judgment for the payment of money has been obtained against a person to whom money is owing by another person; in such a case the judgment creditor, on application ex parte at chambers, may obtain an order that all debts owing or accruing from that person (who is called the garnishee) to the judgment debtor shall be attached to answer the judgment debt. The effect of this order is to bind the debt (unless it be exempted by statute from attachment) in the hands of the garnishee as soon as he is served with the order, so that he cannot deal with it until the judgment creditor's claim is disposed of on an application by the judgment creditor that the garnishee shall show cause why the garnishee should not pay to the judgment creditor so much of the debt due to the judgment creditor as is necessary to satisfy the judgment debt and costs (Ord. XLV., rr. 1, 2). If the garnishee does not dispute the debt, he may pay the amount into Court. In the County Court there is an analogous procedure: see County Court Rules, Ord. XXVI. See WAGES.

As to attachment in the Lord Mayor's or City of London Court, see FOREIGN ATTACHMENT.

As to the obsolete reattachment, see that title.

Attachment of the Forest, the lowest of the three Courts formerly held in the king's forests. The Justices in Eyre's Seat was the highest, and the next was the Swainmote.

" Attachment of Privilege is where a man by virtue of his privilege calls another to that Court whereto he himself belongs, and in respect thereof is privileged, there to answer some action; or it is a power to arrest in a place privileged " (Jacob, ed. of 1739). Under the ancient law certain persons had the privilege of being sued only in a particular Court. Thus attornies of the Court of Common Pleas could be sued only therein. Compare the maxim Actor sequitur, etc.

Down to the enactment of the statute 8 & 9 Wm. 3, c. 26, privilege from arrest for debt was claimed for the Savoy, Mitre Court, Whitefriars, and other places in London. See PRIVILEGED PLACE.

Attainder was that extinction of civil rights and capacities which formerly took place when judgment of death or outlawry was recorded against a person who had committed treason or felony. The two principal consequences were the forfeiture and escheat of the land and goods belonging to the criminal (see ESCHEAT; FORFEITURE), and the corruption of his blood, by which was meant that he became incapable of holding or inheriting land, or of transmitting a title by descent to any other person. These consequences of attainder were mitigated by various Acts of Parliament; and finally the Forfeiture Act, 1870, wholly abolished attainder, corruption of blood, forfeiture, and escheat for treason or felony, preserving them, however, in the case of outlawry.

Attainder was also produced by Acts of Parliament known as Bills of Attainder, the first of which was passed in 1459. See BILL OF PAINS AND PENALTIES.

Attaint. A person was said to be attaint when he was under attainder (q.v.). Compare CONVICT.

At attaint or writ of attaint was anciently a proceeding "to enquire whether a jurie of twelve men gave a false verdict, that so the judgment following upon it may bee reversed, and the partie restored to all that he hath lost." For this purpose a jury of twenty-four (called the grand jury) was summoned by a writ of attaint to try the validity of the verdict of the first, or, as it was called for distinction, the petty jury, and if the second jury's verdict was contrary to the first, not only was the first verdict set aside, but the first jury lost all civil rights and became liable to other punishments. Proceeding by attaint was abolished by the County Juries Act, 1825, s. 60. At the present day, when a verdict in a civil case is suspected of being false or erroneous, a motion is made for a new trial. See TERRIS LIBERANDIS.

Attempt. This means the doing of some overt act for the purpose of committing some offence. It is not invariably necessary that it should be possible for the accused to commit the offence in question. Thus a man may be convicted of attempt to steal when, with intent to steal, he puts his hand into an empty pocket; but, on the other hand, a boy under fourteen, being incapable in law of committing rape, cannot be convicted of an attempt to commit that offence.

At common law, it is a misdemeanour to attempt to commit treason or any felony or misdemeanour; but, in practice, offenders are prosecuted under various enactments which make attempts to commit various offences punishable with various terms of imprisonment or penal servitude either as felony or misdemeanour; and the Criminal Procedure Act, 1851, s. 9, enacts that any person charged with either a felony or a misdemeanour may, if the evidence proves only an attempt, be convicted of the attempt.

Attendant Term. See TERM.

Attentat. In the ecclesiastical law, this means anything wrongfully done by a judge in a matter pending an appeal from his decision.

Attermine, to allow time for the payment of a debt.

Attest; Attestation. To attest is literally to witness any act or event, but the term is now exclusively applied to the signature or execution of a document. When A executes a deed in the presence of B, and B signs his name on the document as a token of his having witnessed A's execution, B is said to attest the execution.

As to the attestation of wills, see that title.

Attestation Clause. This means the statement that a will has been duly witnessed by two witnesses, as required by the Wills Act, 1837, s. 9, which is always appended to a will drafted by a professional or other competent person. The shortest satisfactory form reads: "Signed by the above-named testator in the joint presence of us who in his presence and that of each other have hereunto subscribed our names as witnesses."

Attested Copy (of a document). This expression is sometimes used to mean an examined copy (q.v.) on which a certificate of its correctness is written by the person or persons by whom the copy was examined. But as regards an examined copy such certificate is of no effect; for the fact of examination must be proved by oral evidence before an examined copy can be admitted as evidence.

Attorn, to make attornment (q.v.).

Attornato recipiendo, De, a writ which anciently lay to the sheriff in the county court or to the steward of a hundred-court to compel him to permit the attorney—that is to say the representative—of a suitor to appear. See the statute 20 Hen. 3, c. 10.

Attorney. This, said an old writer, "is an ancient English word, and signifieth one that is set in the turne, stead, or place of another; and of these some be private . . . and some be publike, as attorneys at law."

A private attorney is a person appointed by another to act in his place or represent him for a certain purpose: the document by which the appointment is made is called a power or letter of attorney. See POWER OF ATTORNEY.

Attorneys at law were formerly persons admitted to practise in the superior Courts of common law: they conducted proceedings in those Courts for suitors who did not appear in person. In practice every attorney was also a solicitor (q.v.), and was called an attorney only in formal proceedings in the common law Courts. Now, by the Judicature Act, 1873, s 87, the expression "attorney" is abolished, and the title "Solicitor of the Supreme Court of Judicature" is substituted. See COMMON PLEADER.

Attorney-General is the principal counsel of the Crown. He is appointed by patent and holds at the pleasure of the Crown. As counsel, he is bound to conduct prosecutions and other legal proceedings on behalf of the Crown, if required to do so. He also acts as representative of the Crown in matters connected with charities and patents, and in criminal proceedings instituted by government. He is paid £7,000 a year and fees, but is precluded, since rivate clients. His political as well as legal, for he is almost invariably a member of the House of Commons, and is appointed to his office on the advice of the Government for the time being: there is therefore a change of Attorney-General on every change of Government. In the House of Commons, he answers questions on legal matters of public interest and has charge of Government measures relating to legal subjects.

The Prince of Wales has an attorney-general. There is also an attorney-general of the County Palatine Court of the County Palatine of Lancaster (q.v.).

In most of the Crown colonies, and in all the self-governing colonies, the chief law officer is styled the Attorney-General.

See LAW OFFICERS; QUEEN.

Attornment. Attornment is the agreement of the owner of a particular estate in land to become the tenant of a person who has acquired the estate next in reversion or remainder, or the right to the rent or other services by which the land is held. Thus if A, being entitled to land in fee simple, grants a lease of it to B, then B is A's tenant. If, however, A conveys his remainder to C, in this case B does not stand in the relation of tenant to C, unless he agrees or consents to become his tenant; and this consent is called an attornment. It may be either express (in deed) or implied (in law); thus if the tenant, after notice of the grant of the reversion, pay his rent to the grantee, this is a good attornment in law. By the Distress for Rent Act, 1737, s. 11, attornments made by tenants to strangers claiming title to the estate of their landlords are null and void and their landlord's possession is not affected thereby, unless such attornments are made with the privity and consent of the landlord, or in pursuance of a judgment or order. Formerly attornment was necessary in most cases to perfect the grant of a reversion or remainder, so that the grant was ineffectual until it was given. Now, however, by the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1709, s. 9, such grants are effectual without the attornment of any of the tenants, and the grantee of a reversion may sue or distrain on the tenants for the rent if he has given them notice of the grant.

Where a mortgage of land or buildings is executed with the intention that the mortgagor shall remain in possession, it was formerly usual to insert in the mortgage a clause of attornment by which the mortgagor attorns tenant to the mortgagee at a rent equal to the yearly interest on the debt, or sometimes in excess of the interest so as to go towards reduction of the principal. The chief advantage of this was to give the mortgagee a power of distress if the interest (or principal) was not paid. But under the Bills of Sale Acts, 1878 and 1882, an attornment clause is, except in the cases mentioned below, inoperative to enable a mortgagee to recover rent by distress; and such a clause should not be used unless it contains no power of distress and unless it expressly sets forth that the rent is not recoverable by distress; and, if used in that form, it enables the mortgagee to recover the land expeditiously under R. S. C., Ord. III., r. 6, and Ord. XIV., r. 1. But in the cases of debentures, and of mortgages of property situated abroad, an attornment clause with power of distress can still be used.

Attraction, Doctrine of. This is the name of a rule that if a barony in fee becomes vested in the tenant in tail male of an earldom, the descent of the barony thereafter follows the descent of the earldom, the barony being attracted by the earldom and being inseparable from it. In England this doctrine was rejected in 1640, when, in the Grey de Ruthin Case, it was held by the House of Lords that, where an earldom becomes extinct, the barony will nevertheless descend to the heir general; and it was again, and finally, rejected in 1668 in the case of the claim to the barony of Fitzwalter, the last holder of which was also an earl who had died without heir to the earldom but leaving an heir to the barony. In Scotland, however, the doctrine is believed to prevail.

Auction; Auctioneer. Sales by auction of land are subject to the Sale of Land by Auction Act, 1867, which makes it unlawful, in every case where a sale is stated to be without reserve, for the vendor to employ a person to bid at the sale (s. 5); but the vendor may, in the particulars or conditions of sale, reserve the right to bid and employ a person (colloquially known as a "puffer") to bid accordingly (s. 6). The Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 58 (3) (4), contains similar provisions with regard to the sale of goods. At common law, the employment of a puffer made a sale by auction void in all cases. An auctioneer is required to take out a licence, for which a duty of £10 is payable annually, under the Auctioneers Act, 1845, except for the sale of distress under £20 or for certain sales by order of a Court for sums not exceeding £20 (ib., s. 5) and for the sale of fish on the seashore where the fish has been landed (Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1870).

In addition to the ordinary auction, there is the Dutch auction, in which the property is put up first at an obviously excessive price and is then offered at gradually decreasing prices until a price is reached with which someone closes. There is also the auction by inch of candle, in which the sale remains open while the candle continues to burn and the property is knocked down to whoever makes the last bid before the candle goes out. Jacob, writing in 1739, speaks of the last-mentioned form of auction as ordinary amongst merchants: it is now obsolete except in a few places where it is used for the letting of the property of a charity.

Where an auction is held with confederates of the seller who pose as bona fide bidders but who really make only sham bids in order to induce other persons to purchase, there is said to be a "mock auction." There is then a conspiracy to defraud, and everyone engaged in it is guilty of an indictable offence.

See DUMB BIDDINGS; KNOCK-OUTS; VALUATION AND APPRAISEMENT.

Auctionarii, used in the reign of Edward I. as meaning retailers or brokers.

Aucupia verborum sunt judice indigna (Hob. 343). (Quibbles are beneath the dignity of a judge.)

Audi alteram partem (Hear the other side)—an injunction which means that no man should be condemned unheard or without having had an opportunity of being heard.

Audience Court. See COURTS OF AUDIENCE.

Audiendo et terminando, De. This was a writ, or rather a commission, anciently issued upon the occasion of an insurrection or a great riot, authorising certain named persons to restore order and to punish the guilty parties. Although the translation of the words is precisely the same as that of Oyer and Terminer, (q.v.) the two commissions were always distinct.

Audita querela, in the old common law practice, was a writ given in order to afford a remedy to the defendant in an action where matter of defence (such as a release) had arisen since the judgment, and on which the defendant applied to the Court, whence the name audita querelâ defendentis "the defendant's complaint having been heard." The proceeding by audita querelâ is abolished, the present practice being to apply for a stay of execution or other relief against the judgment (R. S. C. Ord. XLII., r. 27).

Auditor of the Receipts, an officer of the Exchequer who supervised the tellers and in the time of Coke "saw every teller's money locked up in the Treasury." He was abolished by the statute 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 15, s. 1.

Auditors of the Imprest. When Jacobs wrote in 1749, these were officers of the Exchequer who audited the imprest-money (q.v.) and the expenses of the army, the navy, the customs, the mint, etc.

Augmentations, Court of. The property of the religious houses, having been forfeited to the Crown by the statute 27 Hen. 8, c. 28, the statute 27 Hen. 8, c. 27 (which obviously was passed after c. 28) created a court ("commonly to be called the Courte of Thaugmentacions of the Revenues of the Kinges Crowne"), the function whereof was to see that the King was "well truely and justely aunswered and paied" in the matter of the property of the religious houses. The statute 7 Edw. 6, c. 2, empowered the King to, inter alia, dissolve the Court, but its existence was in fact terminated only by letters patent of Mary, issued pursuant to the statute 1 Mar. sess. 2, c. 10, which transferred to the Exchequer the management of such of the abbey lands as had been retained by the Crown. The valuable records of the Court were preserved in the Augmentation Office until they were finally transferred to the Public Record Office.

Augusta legibus soluta non est (1 Bl. Com. 219). (The wife of the emperor is subject to the laws.) Used to indicate the legal position of a queen consort.

Aula Regis. After the Conquest this was the King's Court or Curia Regis. From it all the Courts of Justice have emanated; likewise the High Court of Parliament and the Privy Council.

See COMMON PLEAS; EXCHEQUER; KING'S BENCH; CONSILIUM MAGNUM.

Aulnager; Alnager; Alneger; Alnagenor. This was an officer, first appointed in the reign of Edward III., whose duty it was to measure all woollen cloth made for sale, in order to ascertain the duty payable to the Crown. In the time of Coke the office was divided into those of the original aulnager, the measurer, and the searcher. All three were abolished by the statute 11 & 12 Will. 4, c. 20.

Aume; Awm, a measure of Rhenish wine containing forty gallons: mentioned in the statutes 1 Jac. 1, c. 23 and 12 Car. 2, c. 4.

Aumone, alms. Tenure in aumone was the same as tenure in frankalmoign (q.v.).

Auncel weight; also known as ansel or ansul weight. A method of weighing which was prohibited by the statutes 25 Edw. 3, c. 5, s. 9, and 8 Hen. 6, c. 5, s. 1, as being fraudulent.

Nothing is known as to what precisely it was. The explanations given by the various writers of legal dictionaries are based upon what are now recognised as being absurd etymologies; and they are quite worthless. See Murray, sub verb.

Aures, literally "the ears." Fleta mentions aures, or the cutting off of ears, as a Saxon punishment for theft and other crimes.

Aurum Reginæ, the QUEEN-GOLD (q.v.).

Austurcus; Osturcus, the goshawk. Unus austurcus was occasionally the rent reserved for lands in early times.

Auter. See AUTRE.

Authority. A person is said to be authorised or to have an authority when he is in such a position that he can act in a certain manner (defined by the authority) (a) without incurring the liability to which he would be exposed in the absence of the authority; and (b) so as to produce the same effect as if the person granting the authority had himself done the act. Thus, if I authorise A to sell goods for me, and he does so, he incurs no liability for so doing, and confers a good title on the purchaser. See AGENT; WARRANTY.

With reference to the mode of its creation, an authority may be either express (as in the above instance), implied (or inferred), implied in law, customary (e.g. the right of a lord of a manor to make grants of land in the manor), or statutory, etc. See FACTORS ACT.

With reference to its extent: an authority may be general, to act in all the principal's affairs, or special, concerning some particular object (e.g. to buy a particular piece of land); it may be limited by certain instructions as to the conduct he is to pursue, or unlimited, i.e., leaving his conduct to his discretion. See AGENCY.

A mere, bare, or naked authority is an authority which exists only for the benefit of the principal, and which, therefore, the agent must execute in accordance with his directions, as opposed to an authority coupled with an interest where the person vested with the authority has a right to exercise it, partly or wholly, for his own benefit. Thus, an authority to collect debts, given by the owner of a business on his assigning it to a purchaser, is an authority coupled with an interest, because the purchaser, by purchasing the business, has acquired the right to obtain the benefit of it. A mere authority is revocable by the grantor at any time; one coupled with an interest is not. See POWER.

In the law relating to public administration, an authority is a body having jurisdiction in certain matters of a public nature. Thus, sanitary authorities have powers in relation to the public health; of a similar nature are prison authorities, local authorities for the execution of various Acts of Parliament, all of which have only a local jurisdiction. Lighthouse authorities, on the other hand, are divided into general lighthouse authorities (e.g. the Trinity House) (Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 634) and local lighthouse authorities (ib.).

Decisions and the opinions of text-book writers of repute are known amongst barristers as "authorities."

Autre Droit. An executor or administrator entitled as such to property, and not in his own right (i.e., in son droit), is said to be entitled in autre droit, i.e., in right of his testator, or of the beneficiaries entitled under the testator's will.

Autre vie. A tenant for life is commonly entitled for his own life; if he should be entitled for the life of a third person, he is said to be a tenant pur autre vie, that is to say, for the life of another person. See TENANT FOR LIFE.

Autrefois acquit (= "formerly acquitted") is a plea in bar to a criminal prosecution, to the effect that the prisoner has been already tried for the same offence before a Court of competent jurisdiction and has been acquitted. Such a plea, if true, is a good defence. The rejection of a bill of indictment by a grand jury is not an acquittal, nor is a refusal of informations by justices.

Autrefois attaint (= "formerly attainted") is a plea in bar to a prosecution. Formerly if a man was attainted of treason or felony, he could not be indicted for another felony while the attainder remained in force, because he was considered dead in law. But by the Criminal Law Act, 1827, s. 1, attainder was made no bar to an indictment except for the same offence; and by the Forfeiture Act, 1870 (see ATTAINDER) attainder was abolished except in case of outlawry; so that in effect the plea of autrefois attaint is now obsolete.

Autrefois convict (="formerly convicted") is a plea in bar to a criminal prosecution, by which the prisoner alleges that he has been already tried and convicted for the same offence before a Court of competent jurisdiction. Such a plea, if true, is a good defence.

Auxiliary jurisdiction was the jurisdiction exercised by equity "in aid" (i.e., in auxilio) of the common law, principally by helping a plaintiff at law to the evidence necessary to support his action at law. It is completely obsolete since the Judicature Acts.

Auxilium, an AID (q.v.).

Avage, a payment formerly made annually by tenants of the Manor of Writtel for swine sent by them to feed in the woods of the lord.

Avail of Marriage, the same as value of marriage: see MARRIAGE, VALUE OF.

Avenage. Anciently this meant the payment of oats as rent for land.

Avenor, an officer of the royal household who provided oats for the stable; see the statute 12 Car. 2, c. 8.

Aventure. Anciently this meant death by accident pure and simple, as where a man falls overboard; compare INFORTUNIUM, HOMICIDE PER, in which case the act of some person other than the deceased is a contributing cause.

Aver. This meant (1) a beast of the plough, and (2) money or other forms of wealth.

Aver; Averment. In pleading, to aver is to allege, and an averment is an allegation. The primary meaning of aver was to verify or prove to be true (e.g. to aver a writ) from the old French averer from Latin ad and verus, true. See DIVISIBLE AVERMENTS.

Avera. Used in Domesday as meaning a day's work of a ploughman.

Average. In the ordinary sense of the word, average is where goods on board a ship, or part of the ship herself, are lost or damaged. Simple, petty, or particular average is where any damage is done to the cargo or vessel by accident or otherwise, but not for the general benefit of the ship and cargo, such as the loss of an anchor or cable, the starting of a plank, the turning sour of a cargo of wine, "which are all losses which rest where they fall"; that is to say, the loss in each case is borne by the owner of the thing damaged or lost, or the person who has insured him (see MEMORANDUM). The term "average," however, is usually applied to cases of general (or gross) average, which is a highly important branch of maritime law. General average is where any loss or damage is voluntarily and properly incurred in respect of the goods or of the ship for the general safety of the ship and cargo; in this event the law provides that an equitable adjustment and distribution of the loss shall be made between all the parties interested, each contributing his share. The simplest and oldest case of general average occurs where goods are thrown overboard in a storm for the purpose of saving the ship and the rest of the cargo; here the several persons interested in the ship, freight and cargo must contribute rateably to indemnify the person whose goods have been sacrificed against all but his proportion of the general loss (see JETTISON). So, where a ship was, in the course of her voyage, run foul of by another ship, owing to the violence of the wind and weather, and was damaged, and the master was in consequence obliged to cut away part of the rigging, the expenses of repairs were held to be a general average. See ADJUSTMENT; CONTRIBUTION.

Average also denotes some petty charges, such as towage, beaconage, etc., which the owner or consignee of goods shipped on board a vessel is bound to reimburse the master or shipowner. It is generally stipulated for in the bill of lading (q.v. and PRIMAGE).

Anciently it meant a service due by a tenant to his lord. The nature of the service is not clear. It is stated by some authorities to have been the service of working with beasts of burden for the lord.

Average of Cornfields. Anciently this meant the stubble.

Average Penny, apparently the same as AVER-PENNY (q.v.).

A verbis legis non est recedendum (5 Rep. 118).—(You must not vary the words of a statute.) The meaning of this maxim appears from the context:—"And the judges said that they ought not to make any construction against the express letter of the statute; for nothing can so express the meaning of the makers of the Act as their own express words, for index animi sermo [q.v.]. And it would be dangerous to give scope to make a construction in any case against the express words, when the meaning of the makers doth not appear to the contrary; and when no inconvenience will thereupon follow; and therefore in such cases a verbis legis non est recedendum." Compare QUOTIENS IN VERBIS, ETC.

Aver-corn, corn payable as rent in ancient times.

Averia, cattle.

Averiis captis in withernam, De. Where a man had unlawfully distrained cattle and taken them out of the county where they had been distrained, so that they could not be replevied (that is to say, recovered by replevin (q.v.)), then this writ lay for the owner of the cattle so distrained and authorised the sheriff to take for him other cattle belonging to him who had illegally distrained. See CAPIAS; EXECUTIONE FACIENDA IN WITHERNAM.

Averiis Repleviandis, De, a writ which anciently lay for the replevin of cattle.

Averium, the best beast formerly due as a heriot (q.v.) on the death of a tenant.

Aver-land, land which tenants were bound to plough and manure for the use of their lord

Averment. See AVER.

Aver-penny. Anciently this was an annual rent or payment in commutation of average, in the sense of a burden or service.

Averrare. Anciently this meant to carry the goods of the lord: it seems to have been a service due by some tenants.

Aver-silver, apparently the same as aver-penny (q.v.).

A vinculo matrimonii. See DIVORCE.

Avisage = AVAGE.

Avoid, to avoid a transaction is to make it void. A person is said to avoid a contract by setting up, as a defence in a legal proceeding taken to enforce it, some defect which prevents it from being enforceable: thus, if an action is brought against a person on a contract either void or voidable by him, he avoids it by setting up that defence; similarly if he brings an action to have a voidable contract, settlement, etc., declared void.

As to the former law regarding the avoidance of voluntary conveyances of land, see SETTLEMENT; FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE.

Avoidance has a general application in law, and denotes setting aside or avoiding or vacating: e.g., the avoidance of a fraudulent conveyance is the setting such conveyance aside; the avoidance of a benefice is the vacating thereof; and so on.

The word is chiefly used in connection with benefices, as in the Simony Act, 1713, s. 2, which prohibits the acquisition by a clerk for money of "the next avoidance of or presentation to any benefice."

A bond is said to be conditioned for avoidance when it contains a condition providing that it shall be void on a certain event. (See BOND; CONDITION; VOID.)

Avoirdupois, a corruption of avoir de pois (to have weight). Another form was averde-pois. It meant either the ancient weight, which contained sixteen ounces, or else merchandise sold by that weight. Compare TROY WEIGHT.

See, for instance, the statutes 27 Edw. 3, c. 10, 2 Rich. 2, c. 1, etc., as to the ancient avoirdupois weight. It was regarded as the weight most favourable to the purchaser. Thus, the statute 24 Hen. 8, c. 3 (repealed by the statute 33 Hen. 8, c. 11), which fixed the maximum price of beef and pork at one halfpenny per pound, provided that the weight "called Haberdepayes" should be used "for true serving of the buyers." All measures which are multiples (i.e., the stone, the hundredweight, and the ton) or subdivisions (i.e., the ounce, the dram, and the grain) of the imperial standard pound are avoirdupois weight (Weights and Measures Act, 1878, s. 14); and that weight must be used for the sale of all articles, except precious metals and precious stones, which may be sold by the ounce troy or any decimal part thereof, and drugs sold by retail, which may be sold by apothecaries' weight (ib., s. 20).

Avow; Avowant; Avowry. See REPLEVIN.

Avowterer; Avowtry, ancient forms of "adulterer" and "adultery" respectively.

Avulsion, the cutting off of land from the property to which it belongs, as may conceivably happen if a river changes its course. In such a case the ownership of the land remains unchanged: compare ALLUVION.

Award. See ARBITRATION.

Away-going Crop is one which has been sown or planted during a tenancy, but is not ready for gathering until after its expiration. Sometimes the outgoing tenant has the right, either by agreement or by custom, to cut and take away the crop when it is ripe; sometimes the incoming tenant is bound to buy the crop of him at a valuation. See EMBLEMENTS.

Ayel = AIEL (q.v.).

B

B list. See A AND B LISTS.

Back-bear. See STABLE-STAND.

Back-berende; Back-berand. A thief was said in Bracton's time to be back-berende when he actually had the stolen goods on his back. See CONFESSAND.

Back-freight. When goods are shipped to a port but cannot be delivered there for reasons for which the shipowner is not responsible, and the master has therefore to bring the goods either back to the port from which they were shipped or to some other suitable place, then the shipowner is entitled to receive from the owner of the goods freight for the carriage of the goods from the port to which they had been shipped. Such freight is back-freight. It is not, however, payable where the shipowner knows when he receives the goods that the delivery of them would be illegal.

Backgammon. This "and the other games now played with the backgammon tables" are the only games played with dice which the Gaming Act, 1839, does not prohibit.

Backing a warrant is where a magistrate or official duly authorised indorses a warrant which has been issued by a magistrate of another district or jurisdiction, in order that it may be executed within the jurisdiction of the magistrate or official making the indorsement. As between the various parts of the British Islands (q.v.), this is done under the Indictable Offences Act, 1848, ss. 11—15, the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, s. 3, the Petty Sessions (Ir.) Act, 1851, ss. 27, 29, the Petty Sessions (Ir.) Act. 1867, s. 1, and the Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1851, s. 18; and as between the British Islands and other parts of the King's dominions, it is done under the Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881, s. 3, as extended by the Fugitive Offenders (Protected States) Act, 1915.

A bench warrant (q.v.) may be executed in any part of England without being backed.

Backside. In the law this formerly meant the rear premises of a house. The statute 33 Hen. 8, c. 36, speaks of "houses, with the curtilage, backside and gardeine adjoining."

Backwardation. In the law of the Stock Exchange this means a percentage paid by a seller of stock, deliverable upon a certain date, for the privilege of delaying delivery until some other date. Compare CONTANGO.

Bacon. Francis Bacon was born on the 22nd January, 1560—1, entered as a student at Gray's Inn about 1577, was called to the bar in 1582, entered Parliament in 1586, was made a kind of Queen's Counsel, under Elizabeth, and King's Counsel under James I.; was created Solicitor-General in 1607, Attorney-General in 1613, Privy Councillor in 1616, Lord Keeper in March, 1616—17, and Lord Chancellor in January, 1617—18. In 1618 he was created Baron Verulam, and in 1620 Viscount St. Albans. In the following year he was accused of corruption in his office; and, on his confession, he was deprived of the Great Seal, fined and imprisoned. He was afterwards pardoned, but his health had begun to fail, and he died on the 9th April, 1626. His principal legal works are the "Reading on the Statute of Uses," and some Essays on law reform, but they are insignificant compared with his philosophical writings.

Bagatelle. See BILLIARDS.

Bail (Admiralty). In Admiralty proceedings, where a ship or other property has been arrested (see ARREST), the owner may generally have it released on giving bail to an amount equal to the value of the property. The bail is given by two persons as sureties, who execute a bond called a bail-bond, by which they consent that, if the owner of the property shall not pay, with costs, such sum as may be adjudged against him, execution may issue against them for an amount not exceeding the sum named in the bond (R. S. C., App. A., Pt. II., No. 13). A solicitor's undertaking, under Ord. 29, r. 12, to give bail has been treated as equivalent to bail.

Bail (in civil proceedings other than Admiralty). This means security that a person concerned in civil proceedings will obey the requirements of the Court, and his consequent release or immunity from arrest quoad the proceeding in question. It is also used to mean the sureties who give the security.

Formerly bail played an important part of every action at law. There were several kinds of bail, of which the principal are the following: viz. (1) Bail below, or Bail to the sheriff; (2) Bail above, Special Bail, or Bail to the action; (3) Bail in error; and (4) Common Bail. Bail below, or to the sheriff, was such as a defendant put in when arrested upon a writ of capias ad respondendum (q.v.). This he did by entering into a bond to the sheriff with sufficient sureties conditioned for his appearance within the period required by the writ: the sheriff was compelled by statute to accept this bond—known as a bail-bond—and to discharge the defendant out of custody. Bail above, special bail, or bail to the action, were persons whom the defendant procured to become his sureties for the ultimate payment of the debt and costs in the action, in the event of judgment passing against him, or as an alternative that he should surrender himself to prison. They were termed bail to the action because they were responsible for the defendant's abiding by the event of the action and obeying the judgment of the Court therein, in contradistinction to bail to the sheriff, who only undertook that the defendant should appear according to the exigency of the writ and provide bail to the action. If the plaintiff excepted, that is to say, objected, to the sureties as insufficient, they had to justify (q.v.). The undertaking of the sureties, or bail above, was drawn upon a piece of parchment by the defendant's attorney, and was technically termed the bail-piece. Bail in error were sureties whom a party prosecuting a writ of error (q.v.)—commonly called the plaintiff in error—was required to find, and who undertook that the plaintiff in error should prosecute his writ of error with effect, and that in case the plaintiff failed so to do, or the judgment in the Court below was affirmed, he should pay all the debt, damages, and costs adjudged upon the former judgment, and all costs and damages to be awarded by reason of the delay of execution on such former judgment. Common bail signified an appearance.

This learning is now only of antiquarian interest. Arrest on mesne process (q.v.) has been abolished except in cases within the Debtors Act, 1869, s. 6, which provides that where the plaintiff, in any action in the High Court in which before 1st January, 1870, the defendant would have been liable to arrest (on a capias), proves at any time before final judgment to a Judge that he has a good cause of action to the amount of £50 and (1) that the defendant is about to quit England and (2) that the absence of the defendant will materially prejudice the plaintiff's case, the Judge may order the defendant to be arrested and imprisoned for not more than six months unless he give security that he will not leave England without leave of the Court: but in penal actions it is not necessary to prove that the plaintiff will be prejudiced by the absence of the defendant, and the security will be to the effect that the sum recovered in the action shall be paid. See R. S. C. Ord. 69. In cases within the Act of 1869 arrest may also take place on a writ of ne exeat regno, under which the defendant will be restrained from leaving the kingdom until he gives security for the amount of the debt.

What in s. 213 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, is described as bail may be required from the defendant in an action by a landlord for the recovery of land from a tenant overholding; and if bail be not forthcoming to cover the costs and damages, judgment will be for the plaintiff: but in view of the facilities afforded to a plaintiff by Ord. 3, r 6, and Ord. 14, this section of the Act of 1852 is seldom availed of. Bail or security is also required on the removal of certain actions from inferior Courts into the High Court; but such bail is of a rather different kind from that with which this article is conversant. See REDDIDIT SE.

Bail (in criminal proceedings). An accused person is said at common law to be admitted to bail when he is released from the custody of officers of the law and is intrusted to the custody of persons known as his sureties, who are bound to produce him to answer, at a specified time and place, the charge against him and who, in default of so doing, are liable to forfeit such sum as is specified when bail is granted. A contract, whether by a person bailed or by a third party, to indemnify a surety is void as being against public policy and, moreover, constitutes an indictable misdemeanour.

No person may be admitted to bail for treason except by order of a Secretary of State or of the King's Bench Division, or of the Vacation Judge (Indictable Offences Act, 1848, s. 13). When anyone is charged with murder or manslaughter on a coroner's inquisition and is committed for trial on the warrant of the coroner or (Coroners Act, 1892) deputy coroner, justices have no power to bail; but the King's Bench Division—which can grant bail for any offence—may bail the accused, and, where the charge is manslaughter, the coroner or deputy coroner may himself grant bail (Coroners Act, 1887, s. 5 (2)). Except in these cases, it is discretionary with a justice to admit to bail any person committed (Indictable Offences Act, 1848, s. 23; Costs in Criminal Cases Act, 1908, s. 1) or remanded (Indictable Offences Act, 1848, s. 21) for any indictable offence. Upon committal for trial (Bail Act, 1898, s. 1) or upon remand (Indictable Offences Act, 1848, s. 21) the justice may require only one surety or may dispense with sureties and release the accused upon only his own recognizance (q.v.). Although justices have the wide discretionary power above stated, they should, in exercising it, have regard to the gravity of the charge, the strength of the evidence, the character or demeanour of the prisoner and the punishment which may be inflicted. It is improper for a justice to grant bail in case of murder, and in such case the accused should be left to apply to the King's Bench Division, which again will grant bail for murder only in a very exceptional case. There is no appeal from the decision of the King's Bench Division on an application for bail; but in case of misdemeanour, the accused, after he has been committed for trial, but not while on remand, has an absolute right to bail from the King's Bench Division (Habeas Corpus Act, 1679, s. 2), and if a justice refuses bail when committing for trial in misdemeanour he must inform the accused of his right to apply to the King's Bench (Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, s. 23).

When a justice grants bail, it is for him to fix the amount and the number of sureties and to decide as to the sufficiency of the sureties. The solicitor for the accused ought not to be a surety. Excessive bail ought not to be required (Bill of Rights, 1 Will. & Mary, sess. 2, c. 2).

Where bail is granted with sureties, the recognizances of the sureties may be taken separately and either before or after the recognizances of the person who is being bailed (Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, s. 24). This enactment applies to bail for all offences, whether indictable or non-indictable.

A justice issuing a warrant for the arrest of any person may, by endorsement on the warrant, direct such person to be released when arrested upon his entering into such recognizance as is specified in the indorsement; and in such case the officer in charge of any police station to which such person is brought shall release him on his entering into such recognizance, the sureties, if any, thereto to be approved by such officer (Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, s. 21).

Justices may adjourn the hearing of a charge of a non-indictable offence and may, if they do not permit the accused to go at large, commit him in default of his entering into recognizances, with or without sureties, to appear at the further hearing (Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, s. 16; Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 20 (xi)), or at any further hearing (Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, s. 19); and it is to be noted that the power given by s. 19 of the Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, applies also to indictable offences.

The Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, s. 22, enacts that "On a person being taken into custody for an offence without a warrant, a superintendent or inspector of police or other officer of police of equal or superior rank or in charge of any police station, may, in any case, and shall, if it will not be practicable to bring such person before a Court of summary jurisdiction within twenty-four hours after he was so taken into custody, inquire into the case; and unless the offence appears . . to be of a serious nature, discharge the person upon his entering into a recognizance, with or without sureties, for a reasonable amount to appear before some Court of summary jurisdiction at the time and place named in the recognizance. . ." Under this enactment the police in general are given power to take bail. But under other Acts, not of general application, the police previously were, and still are, empowered to release prisoners on bail. In places where the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, is in force—the Act is an adoptive Act (q.v.)—a superior officer of police may, if he thinks it prudent, under s. 17 of that Act, admit to bail persons arrested without warrant when they cannot conveniently be brought before a justice. In cities and towns to which the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, applies, a person arrested without warrant for a petty misdemeanour while no Court of summary jurisdiction is sitting may, under s. 227 of the Act, be released by the police upon recognizance, with or without sureties, to appear within two days: and similar powers are possessed by the London Metropolitan Police (Metropolitan Police Act, 1829, s. 9; Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, s. 70), and by the City of London Police (City of London Police Act, 1839, 2 & 3 Vict. c. xciv.).

Where a constable, in pursuance of s. 19 (1) (a) (b) of the Children Act, 1908, arrests without warrant, the person arrested is to be released on bail by the officer in charge of the police station to which he is brought, unless such officer believes that his release would tend to defeat the ends of justice or to cause injury to the child or young person against whom the offence is alleged to have been committed (ib., s. 19 (2)). Under s. 94 of the same Act, a person apparently under the age of sixteen who has been arrested on any charge may, and, except in circumstances stated in the section, must, be released on bail, with sufficient security from the parent or guardian, if no available Court of summary jurisdiction is sitting.

Bail-bond. See BAIL (ADMIRALTY); BAIL (IN CIVIL PROCEEDINGS OTHER THAN ADMIRALTY).

Bail Court. An auxiliary court of the Court of Queen's Bench, at Westminster, wherein points connected more particularly with pleading and practice were argued and determined. It was also known as the Practice Court.

Bailee. A person to whom goods are entrusted for a specific purpose without any intention of transferring the ownership to such person. See BAILMENTS.

A bailee who fraudulently converts to his own use, or to the use of any person other than the owner, anything capable of being stolen (see LARCENY), which he possesses as bailee, is guilty of stealing (Larceny Act, 1916, s. 1 (1)), and such stealing is a felony (ib., s. 2).

Bailiff. This, in the strict sense of the word, is an officer concerned in the administration of justice in a certain district. Formerly persons having the franchise (q.v.) of executing legal process within a liberty or other district appointed their own bailiffs for that purpose; but now "bailiff" usually signifies a sheriff's officer or person employed by the sheriff to serve writs and make arrests and executions. The sheriff being responsible for their acts, his bailiffs are annually bound to him in a bond with sureties for the due execution of their office, and thence are called l bailiff is a particular person appointed by the sheriff to execute legal process at the request of the person who has obtained it. The sheriff is not liable for the acts of his special bailiff.

Under the Law of Distress Amendment Act, s. 7, no person can act as a bailiff to levy any distress for rent unless he holds a certificate from a County Court.

The County Courts Act, 1888, ss. 33, 34, provides that for every County Court there shall be a high bailiff, to be appointed by the Judge and removable by the Lord Chancellor; The high bailiff may appoint and dismiss at pleasure assistant bailiffs, for whose acts he is to be responsible, as a sheriff is for the acts of his bound-bailiffs; and the high bailiff is to attend sittings of the Court when required by the Judge and is, himself or by his assistant bailiffs, to serve all summonses, orders, warrants, etc., of the Court.

Bailiff also sometimes denotes "a servant that hath administration and charge of lands, goods and chattels to make the best benefit for the owner," as Coke puts it; such a servant in the case of land is frequently known as a steward.

In the municipal system of the Cinque Ports, a bailiff was one of the officers who exercised administrative functions in conjunction with the jurats (q.v.).

Bailiff-errant. See OUTRIDER.

Bailiwick. This means the area under the jurisdiction of a sheriff; or, more literally but less usually, the area within which a bailiff has jurisdiction. Anciently it meant generally the district in which any officer concerned with the administration of justice had authority.

Bailments. Bailment is a contract by which goods are delivered by one person (the bailor) to another person (the bailee) for a certain purpose, upon an express or implied promise by the bailee to return them to the bailor, or to deliver them to someone designated by him, after the purpose has been fulfilled. The bailee is bound to take a certain amount of care of the goods while in his possession, and the amount of care may be expressly fixed by the contract. Where there is no express agreement as to this, one of the following rules, founded on the presumable intention of the parties, is applied: (1) Where the bailment is for the benefit of the bailor alone, the bailee is liable only for gross negligence; (2) where it is for the benefit of the bailee alone, he is bound to use the very strictest diligence; (3) where it is for the benefit of both bailor and bailee, the bailee is only bound to use ordinary and average diligence.

Bailments are of six kinds: the classification being of importance from the different nature of the bailee's liability in each case. The first sort of bailment is, a bare naked bailment of goods, delivered by one man to another to keep for the use of the bailor; and this is called a depositum. The second sort is, when goods or chattels that are useful are lent to a friend gratis, to be used and to be eventually returned by him; and this is called commodatum, because it is for the convenience or advantage of the bailee. The third sort is, when goods are left for hire with the bailee to be used by him; this is called locatio et conductio, and the lender is called locator and the borrower conductor. The fourth sort is, when goods or chattels are delivered to another as a pawn, to be security to him for money borrowed of him by the bailor; and this is called in Latin vadium, and in English a pawn or pledge (q.v.). The fifth sort is, when goods or chattels are delivered to be carried, or something is to be done about them for a reward to be paid by the person who delivers them to the bailee who is to carry them or to do the thing about them; and this is sometimes called locatio operis faciendi. The sixth sort is, when there is a delivery of goods or chattels to somebody who is to carry them or do something about them gratis, without any reward for such work or carriage; and this is called mandatum. The general rule is, that in the first case the bailee is only answerable for gross negligence, that in the second case he is bound to use the strictest care and diligence, that in the third and fourth cases he is only bound to use ordinary care, and so in the fifth case, unless he is a common carrier (q.v.), and that in the sixth case the bailee is answerable only for gross negligence. See NEGLIGENCE; FACTOR.

Bail-piece. See BAIL (IN CIVIL PROCEEDINGS OTHER THAN ADMIRALTY).

Baines' Acts. The Criminal Procedure Act, 1848 (repealed except as regards Ireland), and the Quarter Sessions Act, 1849. So called because Mathew Talbot Baines, Q.C., M.P.—1847-1859—was mainly responsible for their enactment.

Baiting Animals. This consists of setting one animal to attack another which is tied to a stake or peg (as in bull-baiting) or so confined that it cannot get away (as in badger-baiting). It is now always CRUELTY TO ANIMALS (q.v.).

Bakehouse. For the purposes of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, bakehouses are defined, by Schedule 6, Pt. 2 (23) thereof, to be "places in which are baked bread, biscuits, or confectionery from the baking or selling of which a profit is derived." A bakehouse is a workshop for the purposes of that Act unless it is a non-textile factory (ib., s. 149 (1)), and it is a non-textile factory for the purposes of the Act when any mechanical power is used within it or within its close or curtilage or precincts (ib.). Whether it be a workshop or a factory, it is subject to a multiplicity of provisions, under the Act of 1901 and other Acts, for the purpose of enforcing cleanliness, ventilation, and conditions which make for the health of those employed and the wholesomeness of the bread, etc., which is baked.

Balance Order. This is the usual and proper means of enforcing payment of calls (q.v.) in the winding up, whether voluntary or compulsory, of a company. It is obtained on summons in Chambers by the liquidator (Company (Winding-up) Rules, 1909, r. 87) under s. 166 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, in the case of a compulsory winding up, and under s. 193 of the same Act in the case of a voluntary winding up. It may be enforced in the same manner as a judgment to the same effect (R. S. C., Ord. 42, r. 24).

As to the order in which members of a company are liable for calls, see A AND B LISTS; CONTRIBUTORIES.

Balk. A strip of untilled land used formerly as a boundary between tilled land in different ownership or between portions of the land of the one owner. It seems to have meant the same thing as a meer or boundary. It is doubtful as to whether there is any presumption as to balks being the property of the owners of lands divided by them. They were frequently waste (q.v.) of a manor.

Ballast. This now means anything, whether water, stones, metal or sand, inside a vessel, or lead or iron, inside or outside, used to keep her in proper trim and from capsizing; but anciently it meant "gravel or sand to poise ships and make them go upright," and any person removing ballast, in the ancient sense, from any port, harbour or haven or the shore thereof, or throwing ballast into any such place, is liable to a penalty of £10 under the Harbours Act, 1814, ss. 11, 14; see also the Harbours Clauses Act, 1847, s. 73. For the purposes of the Thames Conservancy Act, 1894, 57 & 58 Vict. c. clxxxvii., ballast is, by s. 3 of that Act, defined as including "every kind of gravel, sand and soil and every commodity or thing commonly used for the ballasting of vessels."

Balliage. See PACKAGE.

Ballivo amovendo, De. A writ which anciently lay for the removal of a bailiff of a liberty or a hundred who had not the property qualification required by the Statute of Westminster II.—the bailiff here referred to was of course an officer entrusted with the performance of judicial functions.

Ballot; Ballot Box; Ballot Paper. This originally meant a system of voting for or against a candidate for membership of a society by means of little balls, one of which is white (for acceptance) and the other black (for rejection), put into a box so that the vote recorded by any particular person is known only to himself; and in the case of candidates for an office it meant voting by writing the name of a selected candidate on a piece of paper which was rolled into a ball and thrown into a receptacle. It has, however, come to be used more widely as meaning any system of voting under which the vote given by each voter remains secret. Such a system was introduced for the purpose of Parliamentary elections (other than those for universities) by the Ballot Act, 1872. Under this Act each voter is given a paper called a ballot paper, bearing the names of the candidates: he puts a cross secretly opposite the name of the candidate for whom he desires to vote; and then he puts the paper into a box called the ballot box. The system has since been applied to the election of representative bodies, from county councils down to school boards.

Section 3 of the Act of 1872 provides heavy penalties for a variety of such things as may be done for the purpose of interfering with the proper conduct of the ballot at Parliamentary elections; and like penalties are provided by other Acts governing the other elections to which the ballot has been applied.

Ballot and Sale Society. A building society (q.v.) in which the right to receive an advance from the funds of the society is determined alternately by a ballot of the members and by putting up the right to auction. The Building Societies Act, 1894, s. 12 (1), provides that no building society established after the 25th August, 1894, shall ballot for advances; and ballot and sale societies are, therefore, now comparatively rare.

Banc, or Banco, Sitting in. The sittings in banc, or in banco, were those which, before the Judicature Acts came into force, were held at Westminster by the Judges of the King's or Queen's Bench, the Common Pleas, and the Exchequer for the purpose of determining questions of law. These sittings were held not only during term but on certain appointed days after term. When sitting in banc, the Judges dealt only with questions of law, while, when sitting at Nisi Prius or on circuit, they dealt only with questions of fact. Four Judges usually sat together in banc, while at Nisi Prius or on circuit Judges sat singly.

The business of the Courts in banc was transferred by s. 41 of the Judicature Act, 1873, to the Divisional Courts established pursuant to that Act; but by s. 17 of the Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1876, much of the business which had been transferred to the Divisional Courts was transferred to a single Judge. See APPELLATE JURISDICTION ACTS; RETURN DAYS.

Bancus superior; Bancus publicus. The Upper Bench; the Public Bench. The Court which is ordinarily known as the King's Bench was known by the above names during the Protectorate. Thus Style's Reports (1645-1655), published in 1658, are described on the title-page as " . . . Reports begun in the now Upper Bench Court at Westminster in the beginning of Hilary Term 21 Caroli and continued to the end of Michaelmas Term 1655. . . ."

Banishment. This imported a loss of country. It might arise from a quitting and forsaking of the realm upon abjuration (q.v.); or it might be ordered under an Act of Parliament, such, for instance, as the statute 39 Eliz. c. 4, s. 4, which provided for the banishment of dangerous rogues; or the Roman Catholic Relief Act, 1829, s. 34, which provided for the banishment of Jesuits. After the disuse of abjuration (q.v.) the law was that " no subject shall be exiled or banished his country whereby he shall perdere patriam but by authority of parliament " (Co. Litt. 133a). Exile and banishment were synonymous.

The term " banishment " does not seem to have been used in statutes since 1829. Thus the Aliens Act, 1848, empowered certain non-judicial high officials to order aliens to " depart this realm " and provided for their punishment if found within the realm in contravention of such order; and under the Aliens Act, 1905, s. 3 (1), the Home Secretary may, in certain circumstances, order an alien " to leave the United Kingdom and . . . remain out of the United Kingdom." But any such order has this in common with a sentence of banishment, that in neither case does this country concern itself with where the person concerned may live provided only that he goes and keeps out of the realm. Transportation (q.v.) was of quite a different nature from banishment.

Bank; Banker. A banker is a person who receives the money of his customers on deposit, and pays it out again in a manner agreed on between them, e.g. by cashing cheques or drafts (q.v.) drawn on him by the customer. In the meantime he employs the money by lending it at interest, discounting bills, etc. The relation between banker and customer is that of debtor and creditor (with a superadded obligation arising out of the custom of bankers to honour the drafts of customers), not of trustee and cestui que trust or of principal and agent, and consequently money lying with a bank for six years, without any drawing by the customer or allowance of interest by the bank, becomes in law the property of the bank: but this right is never availed of by bankers. Some banks are also banks of issue, that is, they issue promissory notes payable to bearer on demand (see BANK NOTE); of these the Bank of England (q.v.) is the most important.

The Money-Lenders Act, 1900, s. 6, enacts that a banker is not a money lender for the purposes of that Act; and the Money-Lenders Act, 1911, 1 & 2 Geo. 5, c. 38, s. 2, provides (1) that no person may be registered as a moneylender under any name implying that he carries on the business of a banker; and (2) that any moneylender issuing any statement implying that he carries on a banking business shall be liable to a penalty as if he were unregistered.

As to frauds by bankers upon customers, see the Larceny Act, 1916, s. 20 (1) (iv). As to embezzlement by servants of the Bank of England or the Bank of Ireland, see s. 19 of that Act; and as to embezzlement by servants of other banks, see s. 17 (1) of the same Act.

Bank-book. A book, more generally known as a pass-book, in which a customer's account is kept for him by his banker. When such a book passes backwards and forwards between the bank and the customer it becomes evidence of an account stated (q.v.) and settled. The term " bank-book " is sometimes applied to what is more properly described as a banker's book (q.v.), that is to say, one of the books, kept in the bank, in which transactions with customers generally are recorded.

Bankers' books, Evidence of. The Bankers' Books Evidence Act, 1879, provides as follows:—a copy of any entry in a banker's book is made prima facie evidence of the contents of the entry and of the matters recorded therein, the book being first proved to have been a banker's book at the time of the entry being made therein, the proof thereof being the affidavit or oral evidence of some partner in, or officer of, the bank (ss. 3, 4); and the copy being first proved to be correct, such latter proof being by the affidavit or oath of some person who has examined the copy with the entry (s. 5); and henceforward the bank cannot be compelled to produce its books in Court (s. 6); but the Court may order inspection thereof by any party to an action (s. 7), or to a prosecution or an arbitration (s. 10). Such order may be made either by the High Court of Justice (or any Judge thereof) or by the County Court Judge, or by a magistrate before whom criminal proceedings are being taken; and it may be made in England with reference to a bank in Scotland.

Entries in the books of the Bank of England may be proved by examined copies (q.v.) as well as in manner provided by the Act of 1879.

Bank Holidays. By the Bank Holidays Act, 1871, Easter Monday, the Monday in Whitsun week, the first Monday in August and the 26th December, if a week-day, and such other days as might be from time to time specially appointed by royal proclamation, were made holidays in and for Scotland; and for purposes connected with bills of exchange and promissory notes the days appointed for the business of all banks in England were to be holidays in Scotland. It will be noted that the Act did not affect the hours of business generally; but from the first there was a tendency to make each Bank Holiday a general public holiday. The Holidays Extension Act, 1875, provided that where the proper 26th December was a Sunday, the Monday observed by them. [illegible] should be a Bank Holiday, and made Bank Holidays public holidays in docks, customs houses, inland revenue offices and bonding warehouses. In all towns the fixed bank holidays are now universally observed as holidays by all the working classes.

Bank Notes. A bank note is a promissory note, made by a banker, payable on demand, and intended to be used as money. Bank of England notes are a legal tender in England for all sums over £5, except by the Bank or its branches (Bank of England Act, 1833, s. 6). In case a bank note is lost or stolen, or is otherwise improperly obtained, the Bank of England is bound to cash it for any holder who is not shown to have come by it dishonestly; but the Bank may delay payment of a stopped note for such reasonable time as is necessary for enquiries.

The issue in England of notes of less value than £5 is prohibited by the Bank Notes Act, 1826, s. 3; and the statute 9 Geo. 4, c. 65, provides that any person circulating in England any Irish or Scotch notes of less value than £5 shall be liable to a penalty of not less than £5 and not exceeding £20, recoverable summarily.

By the Country Bankers Act, 1826, any banking corporation (or partnership, although consisting of more than six members) was enabled to issue its own bills or notes, payable on demand or otherwise, at any places in England exceeding sixty-five miles from London; and this provision was continued by the Bank of England Act, 1833, which also provided that within London and the sixty-five miles' radius banks of deposit (but not of issue) might be established. Banking firms consisting of not more than six persons (Bank of England Act, 1833, s. 2) might be licensed to issue notes within sixty-five and beyond three miles from the City of London (Bank Notes Act, 1828, s. 1). The Bank of England had a monopoly of issuing notes within the three-mile radius (ib., s. 1). By the Bank Charter Act, 1844, it was provided that in future it should not be lawful for any banker to draw, accept, or make, or issue any bill or [illegible] didate for whom bearer on demand, subject to [illegible] he puts the par[illegible], that any banker who, on [illegible] box [illegible] May, 1844, was lawfully issuing his own notes might continue to issue them, but if he once thereafter discontinued doing so, his right should be incapable of revival and subsequent exercise; and the amount of his note issue was not to be increased. The last-mentioned proviso applies only to bills or notes payable to bearer on demand. Under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 49, s. 12, partnerships for banking might be constituted of any number of persons not exceeding ten, and this enactment, though repealed by the Companies Act, 1862, s. 205, was re-enacted by that section and again by s. 286 and Schedule 6, Part 2, of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, which replaces the Companies Act, 1862. Under s. 4 of the Companies Act, 1862, a partnership consisting of more than ten persons could be formed for the purpose of carrying on the business of banking if it were registered as a limited company; and that enactment, although repealed by s. 268 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, has been re-enacted by s. 1 (1) of the latter Act. Under the Companies (Consolidation)

Act, 1908, s. 251, the liability of a bank of issue registered as a limited company is unlimited as regards its notes. See RE-ISSUABLE NOTES; and compare CURRENCY NOTES.

Bank of England. A corporation established by charter of the Crown, granted 27th July, 1694, under the authority of the Bank of England Act, 1694. The charter was continued by the Bank Charter Act, 1844, s. 27, which makes the charter determinable by twelve months' notice upon vote or resolution of the House of Commons, subject to repayment of all monies due from the public to the Bank. A supplemental charter to regulate the internal affairs of the Bank was granted by the Crown on 19th August, 1896, under the authority of the Bank Act, 1892, s. 7. The Bank assists the Government in all the great operations of finance, and is its appointed agent for managing the National Debt. Its advances to the Government are controlled by the Bank of England Act, 1819, which requires the previous authority of Parliament to all advances or loans; but that Act does not affect purchases by the Bank of lawfully authorized exchequer bills or bonds, or advances upon such bonds. In 1826 the Country Bankers Act, 1826, s. 15, authorized the establishment of branches of the Bank of England, but other sections of the same Act largely curtailed the monopoly previously possessed by the Bank (see the Bank of England Act, 1800, s. 15) The Bank, however, is still the only bank whose notes are legal tender, and it has the exclusive privilege of issuing notes in the City of London or within three miles thereof (Bank Notes Act, 1828, s. 1).

The Bank of England is required to purchase, at the rate of £3 17s. 9d. per ounce of standard gold, all gold bullion which may be offered to it, and to make payment in notes (Bank Charter Act, 1844, s. 4), and may require any such bullion to be melted and assayed at the expense of the person tendering it (ib.).

Bank Post-bill. A species of bill, payable generally seven days after date, which is issued by the Bank of England and the Bank of Ireland for the transmission of money by post.

Bankrupt. This is defined by the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 2, as meaning, "any person whose estate is vested in a trustee or assignee under the law for the time being in force relating to bankruptcy." A receiving order does not divest a debtor of his property: it merely protects it. An adjudication is what vests the debtor's estate first in the Official Receiver, and subsequently in the trustee in bankruptcy, under the present law.

No person can be adjudged a bankrupt unless he, at the time when any act of bankruptcy (q.v.) was done or suffered by him, was (a) personally present in England or (b) ordinarily resided or had a place of residence in England or (c) was carrying on business in England either personally or by an agent or manager or (d) was a member of a firm or partnership carrying on business in England (Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 1 (2)). A foreigner can be made a bankrupt only if he comes within this section: but if he comes within this section only as regards presence or place of residence in England, but not otherwise, a bankruptcy petition cannot be presented against him, as will be seen from s. 4 (d) of the Act.

A married woman carrying on a trade or business, whether separately from her husband or not, can be made a bankrupt (ib., s. 125 (1)) as if she were a feme sole (q.v.); and so also can the wife of a convict, or a convict himself.

Under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 32, anyone who is adjudged bankrupt is disqualified for being elected to or sitting or voting in either House of Parliament and for a number of public offices and bodies; and such disqualification exists until his adjudication is annulled or until he gets his discharge from the Court with a certificate that his bankruptcy was caused by misfortune without any misconduct by him. The Bankruptcy Act, 1890, s. 9, adds the county council to the list of bodies enumerated in s. 32 of the Act of 1883, and provides that no disqualification under either the Act of 1883 or that of 1890 shall exceed a period of five years from the date of any discharge from bankruptcy.

When a member of the House of Commons is adjudged bankrupt, his seat becomes vacant if the disqualification is not removed within six months from the date of the adjudication (Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s 33).

The Consolidated Regulations of the four Inns of Court provide that an undischarged bankrupt is not to be admitted as a student of any Inn, and that every student must, before his call to the Bar, make a declaration to the effect that he is (inter alia) not an undischarged bankrupt; but bankruptcy after call does not prevent a barrister from practising.

Under the Solicitors Act, 1888, s. 16, the Solicitors Act, 1906, s. 1, and the Solicitors Act, 1922, s. 6, the registrar of solicitors may in his discretion refuse to issue a certificate to any solicitor who is an undischarged bankrupt. Such refusal prevents the solicitor from practising.

See UNDISCHARGED BANKRUPT.

Bankruptcy. I. is the name given to a variety of judicial or quasi-judicial proceedings, having for their main object the distribution of the property of an insolvent person among his creditors. Formerly, the term "bankruptcy" was also applied to companies (7 & 8 Vict. c. 111): the process of administering the property of an insolvent company is now called winding-up (q.v.). The law of bankruptcy is founded on the principle that when a man becomes insolvent the property then remaining to him rightfully belongs to his creditors and ought to be distributed rateably among them towards satisfaction of their claims, the debtor himself being released from future liability in respect of his debts upon giving all the aid in his power towards the realisation and distribution of his estate for the benefit of his creditors and fulfilling the other conditions prescribed by the law for his discharge. This is effected in two manners, either by bankruptcy, in the strict sense of the word (infra), or by arrangements between the insolvent and his creditors, which form part of the law of bankruptcy, in the wide sense of the word. (See ARRANGEMENT.)

II. Bankruptcy, in the strict sense, denotes proceedings taken to make a person bankrupt, and to administer his property for the benefit of his creditors. A bankruptcy consists of the commission of an act of bankruptcy (q.v.) followed by an adjudication: but, as regards the title of a trustee in bankruptcy to a debtor's property, the bankruptcy of the debtor commences at an earlier date, as to which see the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 37 (1).

The law as to bankruptcy is now to be found in the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, which (see s. 168 (2)) applies to proceedings under the Bankruptcy Acts, 1883-1913, as if they had been commenced under it; but s. 131 provides that the enactments set out in Sched. IV. to the Act shall apply to proceedings in bankruptcy which had been commenced before 1884.

Originally the bankruptcy law was a branch of criminal law, being directed solely to the object of preventing fraudulent traders from escaping from their creditors. But by statutes passed in Queen Anne's reign provision was made for relieving bankrupts from their debts; and by the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, the distinction between traders and non-traders, who had hitherto not been subject to the bankruptcy law, was to that extent abolished. The distinction between bankruptcy and insolvency still exists on the Continent. (See INSOLVENCY; BANKRUPT; BANKRUPTCY COURTS; BANKRUPTCY NOTICE; TRADER; DEBTOR; CREDITOR; MUTUAL CREDITS; PROTECTED TRANSACTIONS; REPUTED OWNERSHIP; CERTIFICATE; RECEIVING ORDER; PETITION; DISCHARGE; SETTLEMENT.)

Bankruptcy Courts. The Courts having jurisdiction in bankruptcy are the High Court and the County Courts other than those excluded by order of the Lord Chancellor (Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 96). The jurisdiction of the High Court is exercised through one of the Judges thereof specially assigned by the Lord Chancellor (s. 97). The petition is to be presented in the High Court only if the debtor has resided or carried on business within the London Bankruptcy District for the greater part of the six months preceding the presentation of the petition, or if he is not resident in England, or if the petitioning creditor cannot ascertain his residence: in other cases the petition is to be presented to the County Court of the district in which the debtor has resided or carried on business for the longest period during such six months (s. 98). The London Bankruptcy District includes the City of London and the Liberties thereof and the County Court districts of Bloomsbury, Bow, Brompton, Clerkenwell, Lambeth, Marylebone, Shoreditch, Southwark, Westminster and Whitechapel (s. 99, Sched. III.) But the Judge of the High Court can, for cause shown, transfer any bankruptcy from the County Court to the High Court or vice versa (Bankruptcy Rules, 1915, r. 18); and a County Court Judge can, for cause shown, transfer a bankruptcy from his Court to another County Court (r. 19). See LONDON COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

Bankruptcy Notice. This is a notice, forms of which are given in the APPENDIX OF FORMS (Nos. 6 and 7) annexed to the Bankruptcy Rules, 1915. Such notice may be issued by a person who has obtained in any Court a final judgment or order for any amount, whether in the High Court or in the County Court; and non-compliance with the requirements of the notice is an act of bankruptcy (q.v.) (Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 1 (1) (g), s. 2). This is the most common foundation of bankruptcy. But a receiving order (q.v.) will not be made on the notice unless a bankruptcy petition be presented by a creditor or by creditors whose debt, or the aggregate of whose debts, amounts to £50 (s. 4 (1) (a)).

Banneret, Knight. These were knights (q.v.) created on the field of battle, and stated to be called bannerets because the points were cut off their pennons so as to turn the pennon into a banner. The higher class were created by the King or the Prince of Wales, if either of them was on the field; the lower class were those created by the commander of the army, if neither the King nor the Prince was present. Knights banneret were sometimes created by letters patent: William De La Pole was so made a banneret in 1339. No bannerets seem to have been created since the year 1500.

Bannimus. Formerly this meant the exhibition in some public place of the sentence of expulsion of a member of the University of Oxford. The term was not, however, known to the law.

Bannire; Banniare. To summon before a Court, where the summons was from the Court and not from an adversary (Leg. Hen. I., c. 10).

Bannire ad placita (or ad moliendum). To summon tenants to the lord's court or to grind corn at his mill. The word bannire is one of the derivatives of bannus, or ban, which meant, amongst other things, a summons.

Bannitus. In the time of Edward III. this meant an outlaw or a banished man.

Banns of Marriage. A proclamation in church of an intended marriage. The word "banns" is derived from bannus or bannum, which anciently was used as meaning a proclamation. The Marriage Act, 1823, contains the existing law as to banns of marriage. They are, in the normal course, the preliminary to marriage in churches or chapels of the Church of England; but the Archbishop of Canterbury may by special licence, and any archbishop or bishop may by ordinary licence, dispense with some or all of the three publications required by statute, or the superintendent registrar's certificate may be substituted for them. See LICENCE.

Bannus. Anciently this meant a summons issued by a Court.

Baptism. Article 25 of the Thirty-nine Articles declares: "There are two Sacraments ordained by Christ our Lord in the Gospel, that is to say, baptism and the supper of the Lord." Article 27 directs that baptism shall take place while children are young. Canon 81 of 1603 directs that there shall be in each church or chapel a stone font in which alone baptisms are to take place. The rubric directs that for every male child there shall be two godfathers and one godmother, and for every female child two godmothers and one godfather. Under Canon 29 no parent may be godfather for his own child and all godparents must be communicants. The rubric directs that the clergyman shall dip the child in the water "discreetly and warily"; but if the godparents certify—as they are now always taken to do—that the child is weak, then water is merely poured upon it.

Baptism by a clergyman may, in case of necessity, take place in a private house; and, in case of emergency, a layman or a woman may baptize: but the normal and proper place and time of baptism is in a church or chapel on a Sunday or holy day.

The Baptismal Fees Abolition Act, 1872, provides that no fee may be demanded for the celebration of baptism or the registration thereof.

As to the registration of baptism, see PARISH REGISTER.

Bar. A bar is a partition across a Court of justice. In the Houses of Lords and Commons, the bar forms the boundary of the House, and therefore all persons, not being members, who wish to address the House, or are summoned to it, appear at the bar for that purpose; thus, in arguing appeals in the House of Lords, the counsel stand at the bar.

In the ordinary Court, the bar is a more or less imaginary barrier separating the bench and the front row of counsel's seats from the rest of the Court; only King's counsel and barristers holding patents of precedence are allowed within the bar, together with solicitors (as officers of the Court) and parties litigant who appear in person, while junior or utter barristers and the general public remain without the bar.

Hence, "bar" has acquired the secondary sense of "Court" in such phrases as the "case at bar," "disclaimer at the bar," meaning "in Court," and the tertiary sense of the whole body or profession of barristers. The operation of being admitted to practise as an utter barrister is described as being "called to the bar," while King's counsel are called within the bar, that is, invited by the Judges to take their seat in the front row. The one certificated conveyancer known to still survive is said to be below the bar. (See BARRISTER.)

A trial at bar is a trial by a jury before a full Court (i.e. three or four Judges), instead of before a single Judge at nisi prius. Trial at bar was originally the normal mode of trial; but as it made it necessary to bring up the jury and witnesses from the locus in quo to Westminster, the practice of trial at nisi prius was introduced. (See NISI PRIUS.) Trials at bar in civil cases have long been practically obsolete; but they are still held occasionally in criminal cases of importance.

Bar also signifies a metaphorical barrier or obstacle. Thus, in the old law, a fine with proclamations levied by a tenant in tail was said to be a bar to the estate tail, because it took away the right of the issue in tail. (See FINE.) So a judgment is a bar to another action for the same right, and a debt or right is barred by the Statutes of Limitation when the time for the enforcing it has gone by; this is sometimes called an absolute bar, as opposed to a presumptive bar, which arises from laches or lapse of time otherwise than under the statutes. In pleading, anything is a bar which is an answer to the plaintiff's claim; as to pleas in bar, see PLEA.

In the old books "bar" frequently means a "plea in bar," and is so called "because it barreth the plaintiff of his action." Bars in this sense were formerly divisible into many kinds, e.g. bars to common intent, bars to special intent, bars at large, bars material, etc., but these are all now obsolete.

Bar at Large. See COMMON BAR.

Barbed Wire. If an occupier of land erects barbed fencing on his own land, but not so as to fence it from adjoining land or from a highway, he will not be liable for damage resulting therefrom. If, however, he erects the fencing so that damage may result thereby to an adjoining owner or to persons or animals using a highway, he is liable for such damage as may result therefrom to such adjoining owner or to persons or animals lawfully using such highway. A barbed-wire fence adjoining a highway may be a public nuisance and indictable as such. But indictment is a cumbrous and expensive remedy; and the Barbed Wire Act, 1893, provides that an order for the removal of barbed wire which is a nuisance to a highway may be obtained from a Court of summary jurisdiction. Barbed wire is a nuisance to a highway when it is dangerous to persons or animals lawfully using such highway (ib., s. 2); and a highway means any way along which the public have a right to pass, and includes not only a highroad but also a footpath, a bridle-path or a driftway (a way for cattle), and need not necessarily be a thoroughfare.

"Barbers and Chirurgians." The statute 32 Hen. 8, c. 42, entitled "Concerning Barbers and Chirurgians," after reciting that there were then in the City of London two distinct companies of surgeons exercising the science of surgery, the one company being called the Barbers of London and the other the Surgeons of London, and that while the Barbers had been incorporated by letters patent under the Great Seal in 1462, the Surgeons had never been incorporated, proceeded to enact that the two companies should be formed into one company of Barbers and Surgeons, and provided that barbers should not within one mile of the City of London practise "surgery, letting of blood, or any other thing belonging to surgery, drawing of teeth only excepted," and that, on the other hand, surgeons within the same radius should not "exercise the feat or craft of barbary or shaving" and should have shop signs. By letters patent which passed the Great Seal in 1629, it was, amongst other things, provided that two of the governors of the company were to be surgeons and that ten freemen of the company were to be appointed examiners in surgery and to be empowered to issue certificates, without which no one could practise as a surgeon within seven miles of the City of London. In 1745 the statute 18 Geo. 2, c. 15, after a preamble which recited the matters mentioned above, and which also recited that the surgeons had found "their union with the barbers inconvenient in many respects and in no degree conducive to the progress or improvement of the art of surgery," enacted that as from 1st June, 1745, the company should be dissolved and that such of its members as were surgeons should form a body corporate called "The Master Governors and Commonalty of the Art and Science of Surgeons." That body is now represented by the Royal College of Surgeons.

Bar Committee. In December, 1883, a body known as the Bar Committee, consisting of forty-eight barristers, was elected at a general meeting of the bar "to collect and express the opinions of the members of the bar on matters affecting the profession and to take such action thereon as may be expedient." This body acted until 1894, when it was replaced by the Bar Council (q.v.). The expenses of the Bar Committee were defrayed out of voluntary contributions. It laid the foundations of the code of professional etiquette which, until 1918, used to appear in the Annual Practice, Pt. II.; and the rules as to retainers which form part of that code are it's work.

Bar Council. This is the popular description of the "General Council of the Bar," which in 1894 replaced the Bar Committee without any statutory sanction. The Bar Council consists of (1) Ex-officio members, namely, the Law Officers for the time being and former Law Officers while in actual practice at the bar; (2) elected members, namely, forty-eight practising barristers, of whom not less than twelve must be seniors and not less than twenty-four must be juniors, and not less than six must be of at least ten years' standing at the bar. (3) Additional members, namely, such practising barristers, not exceeding six, as the Council may appoint. The rules provide also for nominated members, namely, sixteen practising barristers, of whom four may be appointed by the Masters of the Bench of each of the four Inns of Court: but no such members have hitherto been nominated.

The Council is supported out of funds (about £1,000 a year) contributed by the four Inns of Court.

The Council answers questions and makes rules as to the etiquette and practice of the bar: but these rules are made without statutory sanction and bind no one outside the profession. It has no disciplinary power: but it can and does from time to time bring instances of misconduct under the notice of the benchers of the Inn of which the barrister implicated is a member. The Bar Council is recognised by the Judges and by the Inns of Court as representative of the bar; and it has also come to be recognised by the Crown and by Parliament. Thus the charter granted by the Crown to the University of Liverpool in 1903 provides that one member of the governing body of the university shall be nominated by the Bar Council; and the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907 (7 Edw. 7, c. 23, s. 18 (2)), provided that the Council should appoint one member of the committee with the advice and assistance whereof rules were to be made for the purposes of that Act.

Bar Fee. Down to 1815, when proceedings against persons charged with any indictable offence resulted otherwise than in a verdict of guilty, such persons could obtain their discharge only on payment of certain fees (known as bar fees) for such discharge, to "clerks of assize, clerks of the peace, clerks of the court or their deputies or other officers of the courts of assize or sessions" (55 Geo. 3, c. 50, s. 4). But in 1815 it was enacted that such persons should be discharged without payment of any such fee (ib.); such fees were abolished (ib., s. 5); and any such officer exacting such fees was declared to be guilty of misdemeanour and to be incapable of holding his office (ib., s. 9). But this Act had not dealt with other fees exacted by such officers from such persons as are therein mentioned "for their appearance to the indictment or information, or for allowing them to plead thereto, or for recording their appearance or plea, or for discharging any recognizance taken from any such persons or any surety or sureties for them" (Gaol Fees Abolition Act, 1845), and it was not until 1845 that it was made unlawful to demand or take such other fees (ib.). The fees dealt with in these two Acts were known as bar fees and had been payable from time immemorial.

Cowel, writing in 1607, states on the authority of Crompton (Just. of Peace, fol. 158), that a fee of twenty pence payable to the sheriff by anyone acquitted of felony was known as a bar fee. There is no statutory authority for such a fee and any sheriff or officer of a sheriff taking or demanding it would therefore now be liable to the penalties provided by the Sheriffs Act, 1887, s. 29.

Bare Trustee. A person who holds trust property in trust for the absolute benefit and at the absolute disposal of other persons who are of full age and sui juris (q.v.) in respect of it, and who has himself no present beneficial interest in it, and no duties to perform in respect of it except to convey or transfer it to persons entitled to hold it. (Halsbury, Vol. 24, p. 86.)

Bargain and Sale. At common law a bargain and sale was a contract, whether oral or in writing, for the sale of any estate or interest in land, or of chattels, followed by payment of the agreed price. The expression is commonly applied only to bargains and sales of estates or interests in land. Before the enactment in 1536 of the Statute of Uses (27 Hen. 8, c. 10) the Court of Chancery held that as soon as a bargain and sale of land had been completed, the bargainor or vendor was seised of (or held) the land to the use (that is to say, for the benefit) of the bargainee or purchaser, so that the bargainor became a trustee for the bargainee. The Statute of Uses executed the use in favour of the bargainee, that is to say, gave him the same estate or interest in the land as the bargainor had before the bargain and sale. The effect of this was that land might be conveyed secretly. To prevent that result, the Statute of Enrolments (27 Hen. 8, c. 16) was passed almost immediately after the Statute of Uses, and enacted that no bargain and sale of any freehold interest in lands should be effectual unless it were made by deed and unless such deed were enrolled within six months of its date in one of the Superior Courts at Westminster or elsewhere as is provided in the Act. Such enrolment (or putting of the deed on the records of the court) etc., made the deed open to inspection; and this was an unpopular result. But the Statute of Enrolments applied only to freeholds. There was nothing in it to require the enrolment of any deed effecting a bargain and sale of an estate or interest less than freehold. So the method of conveyance by lease and release (q.v.) became general; and bargain and sale became obsolete as a means of conveying land, except in the case of executors selling copyholds under a direction contained in a will and of a freeholder mortgaging for a term of years, in both of which cases bargain and sale is still the appropriate method of conveyance.

Since the enactment in 1677 of the Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3) it has, of course, been necessary that the bargain or agreement forming part of a bargain and sale of lands shall be in writing.

Bargainor; Bargainee. See BARGAIN AND SALE.

Barleycorn. An old customary measure of length: it was one-third of an inch.

Barmaster. An officer of the Barmote Court (q.v.), who may appoint a deputy, and who is himself appointed by letters patent under the seal of the Duchy of Lancaster. He has various administrative duties. He has to mark out "meers," which correspond more or less to what in modern mining phraseology are called claims. He has to measure all ore before it can be disposed of or sold. And he has to make returns of the quantity of ore produced in mines employing not more than twelve persons underground.

Barmote Court. Courts known as the Great Barmote Courts and the Small Barmote Courts administer the mineral laws and customs relating to lead mining in the districts of Derbyshire known respectively as the King's Field or Fee of High Peak and as the King's Field in the soke and wapentake of Winksworth. These Courts date from time immemorial. The Barmote Courts of High Peak are now regulated by the High Peak Mining Customs and Mineral Courts Act, 1851, and by rules (see S. R. & O. Rev. 1904, VI. Inferior Courts, E., p. 47) made 30th May, 1859, in pursuance of that Act; and those of Winksworth are now regulated by the Derbyshire Mining Customs and Mineral Courts Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. clxiii.). The judge for each district is termed the steward, who must be a barrister of five years' standing or a solicitor of seven years' standing. The officers are the barmaster and the deputy barmaster. The Great Barmote sits, or may sit, twice a year, and the Small Barmote sits as it may be required.

The business transacted before the Great Barmote is the swearing of what is known, for the purposes of the Acts above mentioned, as a grand jury and for bills and cross-bills of directions. Bills and cross-bills of directions are forms of actions as to mining rights. One of the functions of the grand jury is to view lead mines which are in litigation before the Court.

The Small Barmote has jurisdiction—which is not exclusive—as regards the lead mines, in title, trespass and debt.

Barnard's Act, Sir John. The popular title of the Stock Jobbing Act (q.v.).

Barnard's Inn. See INNS OF CHANCERY.

Baron. This in the old books, means husband. Thus "baron and feme" meant husband and wife.

Anciently, barons of London and barons of the Cinque Ports meant merely freemen of London or of the Cinque Ports (q.v.). Subsequently (see COMBARONES) a baron of the Cinque Ports came to mean a member of Parliament for any of the Cinque Ports.

Before the Judicature Acts judges of the Court of Exchequer were called barons and the chief judge of that Court was styled the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer. The judges who held those titles at the time of the enactment of the Judicature Acts continued to retain them until they ceased to hold office: but, as they dropped out, the titles ceased to be used. These barons of the Court of Exchequer were the lineal descendants of the barons of the Exchequer (see EXCHEQUER), who were entrusted with the collection of the royal revenue at a time before the Court of Exchequer had assumed its purely judicial form. Alexander de Swereforde (see RED BOOK OF THE EXCHEQUER) was one of these earlier barons. As to barons in the peerage, see BARONY.

Baron of the Coif. This expression is used in the statute 19 & 20 Vict. c. 86, which was passed in 1856 to abolish the office of cursitor baron of the Exchequer. It means a baron of the old Court of Exchequer: he had to be a serjeant-at-law. See COIF; EXCHEQUER; SERJEANT.

Baronet. A hereditary dignity—which is practically an hereditary knighthood—entitling the holder to be styled Sir John Smith (or as the case may be) and his wife to be styled Lady Smith, or, more formally, Dame Smith. Baronets originated in 1611, when James I.

gave the dignity to any knight or esquire with land worth £1,000 a year who was of good repute and was prepared to pay £1,080 to the Exchequer in three annual instalments. James introduced baronets into Ireland in 1619. Charles I. introduced the order into Scotland in 1625, the Scotch baronets being at first termed baronets of Nova Scotia, in connection with the colonization of which they were created. Baronets created in England and Scotland since 1707 are baronets of Great Britain; and all baronets created since 1801 are baronets of the United Kingdom.

Down to the end of the reign of Charles I., the limitation was usually to the heirs male of the grantee; but since then, the limitation has been to heirs male of his body, except in a few cases where the limitation has been to, for instance, a nephew of the grantee and then to the heirs of the body of the nephew; and baronetcies never descend, like some peerages, in the female line. A baronetcy has only once been conferred on a woman: but there have been several cases in which a widow has been given the rank and title of a baronet's widow.

No privilege or duty has ever attached to the dignity; and until 1910 there was no official register of baronets. But under a Royal Warrant of February 8, 1910, a registrar has been appointed, and no person will in future be officially described as a baronet unless his name appears on the roll of baronets kept by the registrar.

Barony. This is the rank of a baron, who is of the lowest rank in the peerage.

A writ of summons to Parliament, followed by an actual sitting therein, created a barony, and this was the only means of creating a barony used down to 1388. In that year a barony was for the first time created by letters patent; and that is now the only method employed.

Baronies created by writ descend to the heirs of the original baron, and are consequently occasionally held by females. Baronies by letters patent descend in accordance with the limitation set forth in the patent, which makes them descendible usually to the heirs male of the body of the grantee but sometimes to a near relative, such as a daughter, nephew or brother of the grantee, and then to the heirs male of the body of such daughter, nephew or brother.

Baronies were occasionally also created by charter or by Act of Parliament. See HONOURABLE; PEERAGE.

Barratry. This has, in English law, three distinct meanings: (1) In ecclesiastical law it means simony (q.v.). (2) In the law of merchant shipping, it means certain forms of misconduct and fraud, as to which see BARRATRY (IN MARINE INSURANCE). (3) At common law it means the offence committed by a common barrator, that is to say, one who habitually moves, excites or maintains suits or quarrels, whether at law or otherwise.

Barratry, in the third sense, is a misdemeanour at common law. Indictments for the offence are almost obsolete. See MAINTENANCE.

Barratry (in Marine Insurance). This, which is also known as "barratry of masters and mariners," includes every wrongful act wilfully committed by the master or crew of a ship to the prejudice of the owner or, as the case may be, the charterer. Running away with the ship, sinking her, deserting her or stealing the cargo will clearly be barratry: and so also will many other acts if they are done wilfully and are illegal and cause loss to the owner or charterer; but, in English law, no mere negligence or default, no matter what loss may be caused thereby, will constitute barratry. Barratry is one of the perils of the sea generally insured against in policies of marine insurance, and a shipowner is commonly exempt under the bill of lading from liability to the charterer in respect of any act of barratry.

Barrier. This, in the law of coal mines, is a wall of coal left between two mines. In the absence of an agreement, easement or custom to the contrary, every mine owner may work up to the boundary of his land, although his doing so may cause injury to his neighbour, e.g. by letting water into his neighbour's mine; but he is liable for injury caused by negligence or malice. In practice, it is usual for a mine owner to work to the boundary on the dip of the coal bed, and to leave a barrier of his own mineral on the rise, so as to prevent the water of the adjacent mine on a higher level from flooding his mine. If the "upper owner" (that is, the owner of the adjacent mine on the rise) trespasses on the barrier so as to let the water through, he will be liable not only for the trespass, but also for the consequential injury. See also BOUNDARIES.

Barrister. This means a member of one of the four Inns of Court (q.v.) who has been called to the bar by his Inn. That makes him a barrister, and gives him, along with other barristers, the exclusive right of audience in the High Court. His professional conduct is under the control of the benchers of his Inn. His fees are an honorarium, and no action lies to recover them, nor can any security be taken for them; but, on the other hand, he is not liable for negligence or non-attendance. He enjoys numerous privileges (which, however, he is assumed to exercise only for the benefit of his client), e.g., he may compromise the case; nor is he exposed to any action for libel or slander in consequence of words written or spoken by him in the conduct of his case; but he is liable to be punished for contempt of Court even for words professedly spoken in the discharge of his functions as advocate, and if he is guilty of gross misconduct, whether by words or otherwise, as an advocate, he can be disbarred, or removed from the list of barristers by the Benchers (q.v.) of his Inn, who can also disbar for conduct otherwise than as an advocate which in their opinion makes him unfit to be a barrister. He is privileged from arrest on civil process while attending Court or going circuit. See APPRENTICII AD LEGEM; BANKRUPTCY; BAR; DRAFTSMAN.

Barton. In a private Act of 1548 (2 & 3 Edw. 6, c. 12), "demeane or barton lands" are treated as synonymous terms: but the word "barton" may mean also the manor-house itself, or outhouses or foldyards.

Bas Chevaliers. "Low or inferior knights—as distinguished from banerets, the chief or superior knights. Hence we now call our simple knights, Knights Bachelors, i.e., Bas Chevaliers." So wrote Jacob in 1739, on the authority of the Glossary to Kennett's Parochial Antiquities, published in 1693. But "bachelor" was originally written "bacheler"; bacheler is old French; and bacheler is derived from the Low Latin baccalaurius. Bishop Kennett apparently knew none of these things. His bas chevalier is a purely fictitious person, invented to afford a plausible source for the word "bachelor."

Base Courts. Under this description came the various inferior courts, not being courts of record, which formerly exercised jurisdiction. The court baron was the most important. They had been obsolescent even before the enactment of the County Courts Act, 1867, s. 28, which provided that no action which could be brought in the County Court should be brought in any inferior court not being a court of record.

Base Estate. The interest in lands of a tenant who held by base tenure (q.v.).

Base Fee. A base or qualified fee is an estate which has some qualification subjoined thereto, and which must cease or be determined whenever such qualification is at an end. As in the case of a grant to A. and his heirs, "tenants of the manor of Dale"; in this instance, whenever the heirs of A. cease to be tenants of that manor, the grant is entirely defeated. So when Henry VI. granted to John Talbot, "lord of the manor of Kingston-Lisle, in Berks," that he and his heirs, "lords of the said manor," should be peers of the realm by the title of Barons of Lisle; here John Talbot had a base or qualified fee in that dignity, and the instant he or his heirs quitted the seigniory of that manor, the dignity was at an end. These estates are fees, because it is possible that they may endure for ever in a man and his heirs; yet as that duration depends on certain collateral circumstances which qualify and debase the purity of the donation, it is therefore called a base or qualified fee. In a more limited sense, a base fee is used to denote a fee simple derived out of a fee tail, which has been barred by one whose power extends only to bar his own issue, heirs in tail; in this case, so long as such heirs in tail or their issue endure, the fee simple endures, but it determines when they become extinct. A base fee, in the more limited sense, is most commonly created where a tenant in tail in remainder executes and enrols a disentailing deed but does not get the consent thereto of the tenant for life in possession, who is known as the protector of the settlement.

Base Tenure. This anciently meant a tenure under which land was held by base services, as to which see SERVICES.

Basel. Hollingshed, writing in 1577, states that in 1158 Henry II. abrogated "certaine peeces called basels." Upon the strength of this the compilers of legal dictionaries have described the basel as a coin. As a matter of fact, the word seems to have been an error for "baseling," or piece of base coin.

Basket Tenure. A tenure such as that mentioned under CANESTELLUS (q.v.).

Bass's Act. A popular title of the Metropolitan Police Act, 1864. See STREET MUSICIAN.

Bastard. This means primarily a child born out of wedlock. He is not legitimated by the subsequent marriage of his parents (see ANTE-NATI). Upon an order of affiliation (q.v.) the putative father becomes liable to a limited extent to support his child; but otherwise the mother must support it until it attains the age of sixteen years or, if a female, until it marries under that age (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, s. 71). The custody of the child belongs also of right to the mother, notwithstanding the father is able and willing to maintain it better, though it seems that the wishes of the child itself will be consulted; but after the mother's death the father is entitled to the custody of the child.

A child born under the cloak of wedlock also is a bastard, notwithstanding the maxim Pater est quem nuptiae demonstrant, if it is proved that the husband of the mother had no access or possibility of access to her during the required period of generation.

At common law a bastard takes no property through his parents, whether as heir-at-law or as next-of-kin. As regards real property, there was formerly an exception in the case of a bastard eigné (see MULIER): and with regard to personal property, where a man domiciled in England (but originally of a domicile which permits legitimation of ante-nati (q.v.) dies leaving a son who is a bastard according to English law, such son, if he had been legitimated per subsequens matrimonium prior to the acquisition of an English domicile by the father, will take as next-of-kin of the father.

No one other than a legitimate descendant of a bastard can take as heir-at-law or next-of-kin of the bastard.

A bastard has no surname except such as he acquires by reputation or except such as he chooses to adopt (see SURNAME). He has such Christian name as he may be baptised or registered by: but no person may be registered as his father save at the joint request of such person and of the mother (Births and Deaths Registration Act, 1874, s. 7).

A bastard cannot be compelled to support either of his parents.

The fact that a bastard has relations is recognised by the law as to marriage, which prohibits marriage between a bastard and anyone with whom marriage would be unlawful if he had been born in wedlock. The fact is also recognised by the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, s. 13, which gives him the same right of compensation in respect of the death of a parent or grandparent, and gives a parent or grandparent the same right of compensation in respect of his death, as would exist if he were not a bastard. The Punishment of Incest Act, 1908, puts a bastard on the same footing, for the purposes of that Act, as a person who is born in wedlock. Any such statutory recognition of the connection of a bastard with his relations is quite modern. There is no trace of it in the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846 (Lord Campbell's Act).

Bastardy Bond. Under the statute 18 Eliz. c 3, a justice, upon the oath of a woman with child of a bastard, could require the reputed father of such bastard to enter into a recognizance (popularly known as a bastardy bond) with sufficient securities to indemnify the parish against the cost of maintaining such bastard, and could commit him in default of his so doing. The Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, s. 70, abolished this procedure.

Baston. Used formerly as meaning a warden of the Fleet or of the Marshalsea and possibly of other prisons. The practice, which was stopped in the case of the Marshalsea by the decision of Coke, reported at 2 Bulst. 148 (see DELICATUS DEBITOR, ETC.), had been expressly prohibited as regards the Fleet by the statute 1 Rich. 2, c. 12.

Bates's Case. Decided that a Turkey merchant importing currants into England from the Levant was liable to a tax or imposition laid on by the King (James I.) without the sanction of Parliament, the restraints of the early statutes and ordinances on the King's taxation not extending to foreign commerce. This case is sometimes called the Case of Impositions. The Bill of Rights (q.v.) overruled the decision.

Bath, Order of the. In the Middle Ages knights were created either by mere accolade (q.v.) or by an elaborate ceremonial of which bathing formed part. Those made by accolade were called Knights of the Sword. The others were called Knights of the Bath. Knights of the Bath are stated to have been made for the first time in 1399 and for the last time in 1661. When George II. wished to found a new order of knighthood in 1725, it was decided to call the new order "The Most Honourable Order of the Bath." The mediaeval Knights of the Bath had never been an order: but the new order of 1725 purported to be a revival of a formerly existing Order of the Bath. Down to 1847 it was purely military; but in that year civil members were admitted. There are now normally fifty military, and twenty civil, Knights Grand Cross (G.C.B.); one hundred and twenty-three military, and eighty civil, Knights Commanders (K.C.B.); and six hundred and ninety military, and two hundred and fifty civil, Companions (C.B.). There are also honorary members of the several classes: and there is power to increase the numbers in each class.

The Bath ranks as the fourth of the Orders. See KNIGHTHOOD, ORDERS OF.

Bathing. The public generally has no right, at common law or otherwise, to use the foreshore (q.v.) for the purpose of bathing therefrom in the sea, whether the foreshore be the property of the Crown or of private persons: but such right may be acquired by prescription (q.v.) for the owners or occupiers of particular houses or for the inhabitants of particular areas. But at common law it is a misdemeanour to bathe unclothed near or in sight of any place along which the public habitually pass as of right or by permission; and no right so to bathe can be acquired in any way. Regulations as to bathing, whether in the sea or in inland waters, may be made by local authorities under the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, s. 69, and under the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1907, s. 92.

Baths and Washhouses. The Baths and Washhouses Acts, 1846 to 1899 (in connection with which see the Local Authorities (Treasury Powers) Act, 1906), enable local authorities to provide public baths and washhouses. Of this group of Acts, the 41 & 42 Vict. c. 14, s. 2, authorises the construction of swimming-baths, and s. 5 thereof authorises the use of such baths for purposes of healthful recreation, which, under others of the Acts (62 & 63 Vict. c. 29, as regards places other than London, and 59 & 60 Vict. c. 59 as regards London), may include music and dancing if a licence therefor is granted and if no money be taken at the door. These Acts are adoptive. See ADOPTIVE ACT.

Battery. See ASSAULT.

Battle, Trial by. In the criminal law this was the most common means employed for a couple of centuries after 1066 to bring a felon to justice. See APPEAL OF FELONY; COMPURGATION; ORDEAL.

As to trial by battle in writs of right, see ASSIZE, GRAND.

Trial by battle also applied to civil proceedings in the action of debt down, in practice, to about 1250. See COMPURGATION.

All trial by battle was abolished by the statute 59 Geo. 3, c. 46. See APPEAL OF FELONY.

Bawdy House. See BROTHEL.

Bazaar. The Shops Act, 1912, s. 19 (2), provides that nothing in that Act shall apply to "any bazaar or sale of work for charitable or other purposes from which no private profit is derived."

Beach. See FORESHORE.

Beacon; Beaconage. After reciting that "by the destroyeng and taking awaye of certain steeples woods and other marks standing upon the mayne shores adjoinyng to sea costes . . . as beakons and markes of auncyent time accustomed for seafaring men" many ships had been lost, the statute 8 Eliz. c. 13 empowered the Trinity House to erect such "beakons markes and signes for the sea" as they deemed necessary, and enacted that "no steples trees or other thinges" then "standing as beakons or markes for the sea" should be removed if required by royal letters patent to be preserved.

A beacon was, in fact, originally anything used as a leading mark but not erected in order that it might be so used, and subsequently it was a structure erected for the purpose of being used as a leading mark. The first lighthouse was erected at Caister, in Norfolk, in 1600 under the 8 Eliz. c. 13, it being held that the Act extended to lighthouses.

"Beacon" also anciently meant a pile of readily inflammable material, used as a means of giving notice of invasion; and sums of money levied for the maintenance of such beacons were known as beaconage.

Beadle. A common law parish officer whose office dates from time immemorial. He is chosen by, and holds office at the pleasure of, the vestry; he gives notice to parishioners of the meetings of the vestry and attends the meetings; and he generally summons jurors for coroners' inquests. In some of the wards of the City of London he is sworn in as a constable: but except in such case he has none of the powers of a constable.

A servant employed to maintain order in a church is also known as a beadle; but this is what may be described as a merely honorary title.

Bearer. The Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 2, enacts that "'bearer' means the person in possession of a bill or note payable to bearer," and that "'bill' means bill of exchange and 'note' means promissory note." When the benefit of a security or document of title can be claimed by any person who presents it for that purpose, it is said to be a document to bearer. For instance, if a cheque is drawn thus: "pay the bearer," or "pay A. B. or bearer," or "pay cash or bearer," etc., the banker may pay it to anyone who presents it, unless its negotiability is restrained. See CHEQUE.

"Bearer" is used in the statute 4 Edw. 3, c. 11, with apparently much the same meaning as maintenor (q.v.).

Beasts. According to Manwood, the buck, doe, fox, marten and roe were "beasts of chase," the hart, hind, boar and wolf were "beasts of the forest" or "beasts of venary," and the hare, coney, pheasant and partridge were "beasts and fowls of the warren."

Beatus ille qui multos attornatos dociles habet (Blessed is he who hath many tame attornies—that is to say, many solicitors—each of whom he leads, as it were, upon a little string). The maxim, which is of obscure origin, applies more especially to members of the Bar.

Beau-pleader. The Statute of Marlbridge, 52 Hen. 3, c. 11, enacted that neither in the circuit of justices, nor in counties, hundreds or courts baron, should any fine be taken for fair pleading, that is to say, as is explained in Fitzherbert Nat. Brev., fol. 270, for not pleading fairly. The writ of beau-pleader, prohibiting the demanding of any such fine, lay to the sheriff upon the statute. See FINE NON CAPIENDO PRO PULCHRE PLACITANDO.

Bed (of river). The bed of a tidal river is presumptively the property of the Crown up to the point reached by the tide. As to a non-tidal river, see AD MEDIUM FILUM VIAE.

The bed of a tidal river may belong to a subject under a grant from the Crown, or it may be vested by statute in commissioners So also the bed of a non-tidal river may belong, whether by grant or otherwise, to one of two landowners whose lands adjoin it or to a person who owns no adjoining land. The owner of the bed of a river may erect on it any structures which he might erect on it if it were dry land, but, in the one case as in the other, he must not interfere with his neighbours' rights; so that no one can erect any structure in a river which interferes with the flow of water over such parts of the bed as are owned by others, and, if the river be navigable, he can do nothing which will interfere with navigation.

Where a river gradually and imperceptibly changes its bed, the medium filum changes with it: but if the change is sudden and perceptible, or from the old channel to an entirely new channel, the line of demarcation between adjoining owners is the medium filum as it existed before the change.

No matter how a navigable river may change its bed, the right of navigation enures in the new bed, but subject to any obstruction therein by structures which before the change did not obstruct navigation.

Bedchamber Question. This was a question, raised for the first time in 1839 when Sir Robert Peel was sent for by the Queen to take office in succession to Lord Melbourne; and the question was simply this,—whether the ladies of the royal household (more especially where the sovereign was a queen) were to go out with the out going ministry, upon the ground that their near relationship to that ministry was likely to thwart, or render insecure or unstable, the acts of the incoming ministry. The Queen herself was opposed to the change, and Sir Robert Peel refused to accept office in consequence; but in 1841, when Sir Robert Peel took office, the question was decided in the way he had contended for in 1839.

Bedel. A variant of the word "beadle." Bedels are macebearers at the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge.

Bederepe = Bedrip (q.v.).

Bedford Level. This is the name of a district in the Eastern Counties, formerly known as the Great Level of the Fens, the draining of which was begun in 1634 by Francis Earl of Bedford. The principal statute relating to the district is the 15 Car. 2, c. 17 (popularly known as the Bedford Level Act), passed in 1663, s. 6 whereof initiated a system under which all leases, grants or conveyances of or relating to the lands in the Level—other than leases in possession for not more than seven years—are to be registered in the Bedford Level Register. The operation of the Bedford Level Act as regards registration has been restricted by the North Level Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. cix.), s. 45, and by the Middle Level Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. clxxxviii.), s. 45. A lease which requires registration is not rendered void by non-registration. It is, however, postponed to a subsequent registered assurance and the lessee is not entitled to the special privileges conferred by the Bedford Level Act.

See EAU-BRINK, which relates to a part of the level.

Bedrip. A service upon which some tenants formerly held. It consisted in reaping the lord's corn for one, two, or three days. Jacob, writing in 1749, speaks of it as not being wholly obsolete then.

Beer. "The expression 'beer' includes ale, porter, spruce beer, black beer, and any other description of beer, and any liquor which is made or sold as a substitute for beer and which on analysis of a sample thereof at any time is found to contain more than two per cent. of proof spirit" (Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, s. 52).

Bees. Bees are feræ naturæ and, as in the case of other animals of that class, there can be no property in them until they are captured. Thus, if bees swarm on a tree there is no property in them until they have been got into a hive. If they are got into a hive, they become the property of the man on whose land they had swarmed. Reclaimed bees—that is to say, bees in a hive—are the subject of larceny at common law. If bees leave a hive, they continue to be the property of their owner so long as he can see them and follow them. There is no express decision as to whether, apart from negligence, the owner of bees is liable for damage resulting from their sting. In an Irish case decided in 1901 the owner of bees was held liable for personal injuries caused to a horse which had been stung by the bees when the owner smoked out a number of hives to get honey: but the jury in that case found that the bees were kept by the defendant negligently, in unreasonable numbers, and to the danger of persons on adjoining land, and that on the occasion in question he had not taken honey from the hives with reasonable care, skill and prudence. The jury further found that these particular bees were of a dangerous and mischievous nature and accustomed to sting mankind and domestic animals: but that finding can scarcely be regarded as an authority regarding the nature and habits of bees; and it is submitted that the owner of bees kept in a proper place and skilfully managed is not liable for damage done by them, for it is a matter of common knowledge that bees do not generally attack without provocation.

Beggar. Any person begging, or placing himself to gather alms, in any public place or procuring any child so to do, is punishable as an idle and disorderly person (q.v.) (Vagrancy Act, 1824, s. 3). Any person wandering abroad and endeavouring to obtain alms is liable to the like punishment (ib., s. 4).

The offence of causing, procuring or allowing a child or young person to beg or by any means to induce the giving of alms is now punishable under the Children Act, 1908, s. 14.

Strikers making in an orderly way a collection for strike funds are not guilty of an offence under s. 3 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824.

Begging Letter. Where a person endeavours to obtain charitable contributions by means of false or fraudulent pretences contained in a letter, he is liable for a first offence to be convicted as a rogue and a vagabond under the Vagrancy Act, 1824, s. 4 (ii). After a first conviction as a rogue and a vagabond, a person writing or using any such letter may be committed to quarter sessions, there to be dealt with as an incorrigible rogue (ib., s. 5). (See VAGRANCY.) If any person actually obtains money, etc., by means of such a letter he is guilty of a misdemeanour under the Larceny Act, 1916, s. 32 (1); and if the facts merely prove an attempt, he commits a common law misdemeanour. The facts are held to prove only an attempt if the recipient of the letter parts with money (1) although he knows the statements made therein to be false, or (2) on the strength, not of the statements in the letter, but of some test applied by himself.

Behring Sea Award Act, 1894. This statute confirmed the award, as set out in the schedule, made 15th August, 1893, by the arbitrators to whom, in pursuance of a treaty between this country and the U.S.A., various questions respecting the taking and preservation of the fur-seal in the North Pacific had been referred for decision. This award, however, left open certain other points which finally came before the Tribunal of the Hague (q.v.).

Belligerent. This means a nation or party of persons carrying on war according to the law of nations, as distinguished from irregular combatants who have no rights under the law of nations.

Bello parta cedunt Reipublicae. (What is acquired in war belongs to the Crown.) This maxim is quoted by Sir William Scott (afterwards Lord Stowell), judge of the Admiralty Court, at 5 Rob. 181, as illustrating the doctrine that all naval prize belongs primarily to the Crown, and by Lord Brougham, L.C., at 5 Russ. & My. 56, as illustrating the like doctrine with regard to military prize.

Bench. The Justices of the Court of Common Pleas were anciently known as justiciarii de banco or justices of the bench, and, down to the time of the Judicature Acts, they were technically known as "Justices of the Bench at Westminster."

The term is now used to denote either judges or magistrates collectively or a single judge or magistrate. A barrister is said to be raised to the bench when he is made a judge. A magistrate or magistrates, and a judge or judges, are spoken of as "the bench" when sitting in the discharge of judicial functions. In the phrase "bench and bar," the word "bench" denotes the judges collectively as distinguished from barristers collectively.

The bench of an Inn of Court consists of the benchers (q.v.).

Benchers, or Masters of the Bench. The governing body of each of the four Inns of Court consists of the benchers. Judges of the High Court are invariably benchers of their respective Inns; the other benchers may be either King's counsel or barristers below that rank; but no person can as of right claim to be a bencher, and each existing body of benchers can at their discretion invite to the bench of their Inn any member of the Inn whom they in their uncontrolled discretion may select. Benchers have complete control of the property of their Inn. Subject only to an appeal to the Lord Chancellor and the Judges of the High Court, sitting as a domestic tribunal and not as a Court of Justice, the benchers have an absolute discretion as to the admission of students, as to calls to the bar, as to disbarring, and also as to disbenching a member of their own bench.

The Courts will not entertain any action as to any matter in dispute between benchers and a member of their Inn; nor will they in any action investigate the propriety of the decision of the benchers as regards any such matter, the policy of the law being that, as regards any such matter, the only appeal from the decision of the benchers is to the domestic tribunal above-mentioned.

Bench Warrant. This is a warrant issued by a Court of record for the arrest of a person against whom an indictment for treason, felony or misdemeanour has been found, or against whom articles of the peace (q.v.) have been exhibited, if such person does not appear to answer the indictment or articles. It is not generally issued before the last day of assizes or quarter sessions. It is signed at assizes by one of the judges and at quarter sessions by two of the justices; and in either case this is done while the Court is sitting.

Such a warrant can be executed, without being backed, in any part of England. A person arrested thereon is brought into the jurisdiction of the Court from which the warrant issued and is there detained in gaol until trial or until he is bailed.

In cases where a bench warrant could issue, it is now usual to obtain instead a warrant under the Indictable Offences Act, 1848, s. 3, or else to have recourse to the procedure under the Crown Office Rules, 1906, rr. 32, 75, 76.

Where an order of committal for contempt of court has been issued to a tipstaff and the tipstaff cannot find the person named in the order, a judge of the High Court may issue a warrant also known as a bench warrant directed to the tipstaff "and all constables and other peace officers whom it may concern."

Benedicta est expositio quando res redimitur a destructione (4 Rep. 26). (Blessed is the exposition by which anything is saved from destruction.) This maxim is quoted in the King's Bench decision, given at 4 Rep. 26, that the copyholders' court—or customary court baron—might be held even where there were no free tenants.

Benefice; Beneficium. This, in its wider sense, means any ecclesiastical promotion or spiritual living whatsoever. Ordinarily, however, it denotes what is technically called "a benefice with cure of souls," that is, the office and emoluments of a rector or vicar of a parochial church, including the cure of souls, and, in the case of a rector, the freehold of the parsonage house, the glebe, the tithes and other dues, or, in the case of a vicar, a proportion of these emoluments. See ADVOWSON; APPROPRIATION; CURATE; QUARE IMPEDIT; USURPATION: and see also the Benefices Act, 1898. As to deprivation of benefice, see DEPRIVATION.

For some time after the Norman Conquest beneficia meant also lands given by feudal superiors to their followers upon consideration of their swearing fealty and performing military service; but subsequently such lands came to be known as feuds (q.v.).

Beneficial Owner. Under the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, s. 7, any person who in any conveyance conveys and is expressed to convey as beneficial owner or any person who is expressed to direct as beneficial owner another person who conveys, thereby by implication imports into the conveyance a number of covenants for title which before the Act were explicitly set out. Those covenants were for right to convey, for quiet enjoyment, for freedom from incumbrance and for further assurance and so forth. See COVENANTS.

Beneficiaries are persons for whose benefit property is held by trustees, executors, etc. (See TRUST.) The word is now largely used instead of the older cestuis que trust.

Beneficio primo ecclesiastico habendo, De. A writ to the same effect as the writ PRIMO BENEFICIO, DE (q.v.).

Benefit Building Society is the old-fashioned name for what is now more commonly called a building society (q.v.).

Benefit (or privilege) of Clergy. This formerly signified certain privileges or exemptions which the clergy alone enjoyed. It had its origin in the pious regard paid by Christian princes to the Church in its infant state. The exemptions which were granted to the Church were principally of two kinds: (1) Exemption of places consecrated to religious duties from arrest on criminal charges, which was the foundation of sanctuaries; (2) Exemption of the persons of clergymen from criminal process before the secular judge in a few particular cases, which was the true original meaning of the phrase "benefit of clergy." In England, however, a total exemption of the clergy from secular jurisdiction could never be thoroughly effected, though often sought by the clergy; and therefore, though the ancient benefit of clergy was allowed in some capital cases, yet it was not universally allowed. And in some particular cases the custom was for the bishop or ordinary to demand the clerks to be remitted out of the king's courts as soon as they were indicted; concerning the allowance of which demand there was for many years great uncertainty, till at length it was finally settled, in the reign of Henry VI., that the prisoner should first be arraigned, and might then claim his benefit of clergy by way of declinatory plea; or after conviction by way of arresting judgment. But afterwards other persons were placed upon the same footing with the clergy with respect to this privilege. After 1487 persons who claimed their clergy were branded on the thumb, in case of homicide with an M and in case of theft with a T; but the branding was not infrequently done with a cold iron. After the branding the accused, as from 1576, might be either discharged or imprisoned in the civil court for one year only. The effect of the extension of the benefit of clergy was to some extent counteracted by statutes making various offences punishable without benefit of clergy. It was formerly required that those who claimed benefit of clergy should be able to read, and the benefit did not extend to women; but in 1547 peers, even though unable to read, were given an equivalent privilege; and privilege of clergy was extended to women, partially in 1622 and fully in 1692. By 5 Ann. c. 5, it was enacted that benefit of clergy should be granted to all those who were entitled to ask it, without requiring them to read. After that, persons convicted of manslaughters, bigamies, and simple or grand larcenies, etc. (but not, it should be noted, of treason), were asked what they had to say why judgment of death should not be pronounced upon them; and they were then told to kneel down and pray the benefit of the statute, which was given as of right. In 1779 branding was practically abolished. Privilege exempting from punishment for crime was ultimately abolished altogether, as regards all persons other than peers, by the Criminal Law Act, 1827, s. 6, and as regards peers by the Felony Act, 1841.

Benefit of clergy was so thoroughly imbedded in our common law that in the United States of America, which had taken over the common law as the foundation of their legal system, it was necessary to provide, by paragraph 30 of the Act of Congress of 30th April, 1790, that benefit of clergy should not be allowed to anyone convicted of an offence punishable with death.

See NECK VERSE.

Benevolences. These were a mode of early taxation, falling principally, if not exclusively, on the wealthier classes; they purported to be voluntary loans, but were in fact forced contributions not intended to be repaid. Strong sovereigns resorted to them: but the statute 1 Rich. 3, c. 2, declared them illegal, in spite of which Richard III. levied them subsequently and so did Henry VII. Benevolences were afterwards attempted to be levied as an anticipation of the lawful revenue, i.e., subject to a promise of repayment out of the next or some other subsequent subsidy. The statute of Richard III. had been declared illegal by Henry VII.'s lawyers, as being that of a usurper. Eventually in 1628, by the Bill of Rights, the statute of Richard III. was in effect restored. See BILL OF RIGHTS.

Benevolent Societies. These are societies formed "for any benevolent or charitable purpose" (Friendly Societies Act, 1896, s. 8 (3)). They cannot divide funds among the members (ib., s. 15), or hold land exceeding one acre in extent (ib., s. 47 (3)). Otherwise they much resemble friendly societies (q.v.), and are subject to the provisions of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896.

Benevolentia regis habenda. We read that such a one gave the king a thousand marks pro benevolentia regis habenda (to obtain the king's good will, that is to say, the king's pardon).

Benignæ faciendæ sunt interpretationes et verba intentioni debent inservire. (Liberal interpretation should be the rule, and the words should be made to carry out the intention.) This maxim is cited at p. 430 of Broom's Maxims as giving the principle on which a will should be construed. It seems to be a variant of the maxims at Co. Litt. 36.

Benignæ sunt faciendæ interpretationes, cartarum propter simplicitatem laicorum ut res magis valeat quam pereat (Co. Litt. 36). (On account of the simple minds of laymen, charters must be interpreted liberally, so that the intention may be carried out rather than defeated.) A like rule applies to all written documents, except, of course, where there is a rigid rule that only a particular meaning can be given to particular words.

Benignior sententia in verbis generalibus seu dubiis est præferenda (4 Co. 15). (The most favourable construction is to be placed on general or doubtful expressions.) The maxim is cited in a judgment of the King's Bench as supporting the proposition that words which are mere vulgar abuse are not actionable, even though in their literal meaning they are clearly slanderous.

Bentham. Jeremy Bentham was born in London in 1748, was educated at Westminster and Oxford, entered at Lincoln's Inn in 1773, travelled in Russia and the east of Europe, and died on the 6th June, 1832. His works fill eleven octavo volumes; the principal legal ones are the Fragment on Government, Principles of Morals and Legislation, Judicial Evidence, and numerous writings on codification and law reform; many of his suggestions have been carried into effect; most of the others are impracticable.

Bequeath; Bequest. To bequeath property is to leave it by will, and a bequest is a gift by will; the terms are applied only to personal property. A residuary bequest is a gift of the residue of the testator's personal estate, namely, of what is left after payment of debts and legacies, etc. See RESIDUE; LEGACY; LEGATEE; DEVISE.

A specific bequest (not a specific legacy) is where a testator bequeaths to a person all his property of a certain class or kind, e.g., all his pure personalty.

An executory bequest is the bequest of a future, deferred, or contingent interest in personalty. See EXECUTORY INTEREST.

Berghmaster; Berghmoth; Berghmote. These are variants of BARMASTER; BARMOTE (q.v.).

Bermuda Company. See COMPANIES, CHARTERED.

Berne Convention. This was an international convention drawn up at Berne in 1886. The parties to it ultimately were Great Britain, France, Belgium, Germany, Spain, Switzerland, Italy, Norway, Tunis, Liberia and Hayti. The object of the convention was to create an international union for the protection of literary and artistic copyright. On 25th June, 1886, the International Copyright Act, 1886 (49 & 50 Vict. c. 33), was passed in order to enable the British Government to give effect to the provisions of the convention; and on 9th September, 1886, Great Britain signed the convention.

The Berne Convention was modified by a further convention, known as the Revised Berne Convention of 1908, or as the Berlin Convention, drawn up at a conference of the Powers at Berlin in 1908. Great Britain signed this revised convention on 13th November, 1908. The law of copyright, as it then stood, was not in accordance with the provisions of the revised convention; and accordingly it became necessary to enact the Copyright Act, 1911, as to which see COPYRIGHT.

Berton = Barton (q.v.).

Berwick-upon-Tweed. During the Middle Ages this town enjoyed a quasi-independence under what would now be called the suzerainty of Scotland originally and of England subsequently. It was represented in the Scottish Parliament by two members from 1476 to 1479: but as from 1482 down to 1885 it sent two members to the English Parliament. It is not part of the county of Northumberland; but it is part of England; and the Wales and Berwick Act, 1746, s. 3, provides that in all Acts, whether passed before or after 1746, the expressions "the Kingdom of England," and "that part of Great Britain called England," shall include Berwick-upon-Tweed.

Besail. A father of a grandfather. A writ of besail was a real action which lay for the recovery of lands of which the father of the heir's grandfather had been seised on the day of his death and which had been abated by a stranger. See ABATEMENT OF FREEHOLD; AIEL; COSINAGE.

Beset. The Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, s. 7, provides that anyone commits an offence who watches or besets the house or other place where another person resides or works or happens to be or the approach to such house or place. This is still law: but so also is the Trade Disputes Act, 1906, s. 2, which provides that it shall be lawful for one or more persons—there is no limit to the number—acting in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute, to attend at or near a house or place where a person resides or works or carries on business or happens to be, if they so attend merely for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information or of peacefully persuading any person to work or abstain from working.

Betterment. A betterment or improvement charge is one levied on increased value of property resulting from improvements effected by a local authority. When such a charge is authorised by statute, the statute fixes what is called an improvement area: provides machinery under which the increased value of all lands and premises within the area may be ascertained; and then authorises a charge at such-and-such a rate per cent. on, for instance, half of the increased value so ascertained. (See, for instance, the London County Council (Tower Bridge Southern Approach) Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. cxxx.).)

Betting. This is merely a form of wagering contract under which money or money's worth is made payable on the result of some uncertain event, such, for instance, as a horse race, a football match, or a boxing contest.

Betting is no offence at common law and it is still no offence to bet at a race-meeting. But betting in streets or public places is punishable under the Street Betting Act, 1906, and also under various local Acts; and the sending to persons under twenty-one of letters, etc., for the purpose of inducing them to bet is punishable under the Betting and Loans (Infants) Act, 1892.

As to houses used for betting, see BETTING HOUSES.

As to wagering contracts in connection with life or marine insurance or on the Stock Exchange, see INSURANCE; INTEREST; WAGERING POLICY.

The Ready Money Football Betting Act, 1920, was passed in order to prevent the writing, printing, publishing, or circulating in the United Kingdom of advertisements, circulars, or coupons of any ready money football betting business. See GAMING; WAGERING; WELSHING.

Betting House. The keeping of a betting house was no offence at common law, unless it was so kept as to be a public nuisance. But the Betting Act, 1853, s. 1, provides that no house or place may be used for betting, and that the use of any house or place for betting is a common nuisance. The "rings" or enclosures on racecourses are not places within the meaning of this Act. Section 2 declares that any house or place kept for betting shall be deemed to be a common gaming house within the meaning of the Gaming Act, 1845; which, as will be seen from GAMING, provides heavy penalties for keeping a common gaming house. The Act of 1853 also, by s. 3, provides a summary punishment for the offence.

The Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, s. 79 (2), provides a summary punishment for any holder of a justices' licence using his premises in contravention of the Betting Act, 1853, or suffering them to be so used.

Publishing or exhibiting any advertisement, etc., in connection with a betting house is an offence punishable summarily under the Betting Act, 1853, s. 7, and the Betting Act, 1874, s. 15.

Beyond Seas. See ABSENCE BEYOND SEAS.

Bias. This means, with regard to the bowl used in bowling, the shape which prevents the bowl from running straight. With regard to anyone acting in a judicial capacity, it means anything which tends or may be regarded as tending to cause such person to decide a case otherwise than on the evidence. No justice, and no judge, can adjudicate in any case in which he has a pecuniary interest, no matter how small. Thus a judge will not try a case affecting a company in which he is a shareholder; and if a justice, through inadvertence or otherwise, is even one of several justices who adjudicate on such a case any decision of the bench will be quashed. Moreover, no one can act in a judicial capacity if his previous conduct gives ground for believing that he cannot act with an open mind. And so, where two justices, who were members of a county council, took an active part in carrying at the council a resolution that one of the council's officers should apply at petty sessions for an order empowering him to enter upon certain lands, and subsequently persisted in adjudicating on his application, the order of the Court was set with costs against both justices. The general principle is that a judge or justice must be not merely fair but above suspicion of unfairness. See INTEREST, DISQUALIFICATION FOR; ALIQUIS NON, ETC.

Bicycle. See CYCLING.

Bidding Prayer. Canon 55 of the Canons of 1603 directs that before the sermon there be offered up a prayer for the King, for all spiritual and temporal authorities, for all Christian peoples, etc. This is known as the bidding prayer.

Bigamis, Statutum de. The statute 4 Edw. 1, c. 5, see BIGAMY.

Bigamy. In ecclesiastical law this meant any second marriage whatsoever. Even in English law a man who was a bigamus, or person who had married either a widow or two wives, was excluded from benefit of clergy by the statutes 4 Edw. 1, c. 5 and 18 Edw. 3, c. 2; but this exclusion was removed by the statute 1 Edw. 6, c. 12, s. 16. Now, except in the case dealt with under ABSENCE FOR SEVEN YEARS, bigamy is committed by any person who, being married, marries any other person during the life of the former wife or husband, whether the second marriage takes place in England or elsewhere (Offences against the Person Act, 1861, s. 57); but that enactment does not apply to any second marriage contracted elsewhere than in England or Ireland by any person other than a British subject (ib.). The section also goes on to declare that it does not apply where the bond of the first marriage has been dissolved by divorce or where the first marriage has been declared void by a Court of competent jurisdiction; but such declaration appears superfluous, as in neither of such cases can the alleged offender be any longer described as "being married."

A person, not being married, who contracts a bigamous marriage with knowledge that the other party is married, is punishable as a principal in the second degree.

As regards bigamy, marriage means a monogamous marriage which is recognised either by the law of England or by the law of the country where the marriage takes place. A man does not commit bigamy if he marries while he has a quasi-wife living whom he has married after the manner of a savage tribe with whom marriage is far from being monogamous. The fact that the first marriage is void—as in the case of marriage with a deceased wife's sister down to 1907—is a defence; but the fact that the first marriage is voidable—as for impotence—is no defence.

The husband or wife of any person charged with bigamy may be called as a witness either for the prosecution or the defence and without the consent of the person charged (Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, s. 28 (3)), but neither the husband nor the wife is a compellable witness either for the defence or for the prosecution, and he or she, if called, should be so informed before being sworn. When the first marriage has been proved, the second "wife" or "husband" is, however, a compellable witness.

A bigamous marriage which has been consummated is, in the case of either a husband or a wife, a ground for a decree of divorce a vinculo (Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, s 27), and if a wife petitions for a divorce on such grounds she is a competent witness to prove the first marriage.

Bilanciis deferendis, De. A writ directing that scales should be taken at such and such a port to weigh wool which was being exported.

Bilinguis. This, in the law, meant a jury composed partly of Englishmen and partly of aliens. Such a jury was properly described as a jury e medietate linguae and was popularly known as a "party jury." Under various statutes it was anciently used in civil actions between Englishmen and aliens. Under the Juries Act, 1825, s. 47, the Court before whom an alien was indicted for felony or misdemeanour was empowered to direct, if the alien so required, the sheriff to empanel a jury consisting as to one half of aliens if so many aliens were available: but since 1870 an alien is tried as if he were a natural-born British subject: see now the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914, s. 18. See CARTA MERCATORIA.

Bill primarily means a letter or writing. In addition to the kinds of bill described under subsequent titles, the word has the following meanings in law:—

In parliamentary practice, bills are incomplete Acts of Parliament. When a bill has passed both Houses of Parliament and received the Royal Assent, it becomes an Act of Parliament (q.v.). Bills, like Acts, are divided into public and private, but bills which, though they are local in their nature, are yet of public interest (e.g., bills affecting Crown property or the Metropolis, etc.), were sometimes called hybrid bills, and are introduced as public bills. A bill of attainder is a bill formulating an accusation against a peer, or other high personage, in a matter of public importance, declaring him to be attainted and his property to be forfeited. It resembles an impeachment (q.v.), except that it may be introduced in either house and that it requires no evidence in the judicial sense. Such bills have become obsolete.

In criminal procedure, an indictment is presented to the grand jury under the name of a bill, and is not technically an indictment until so found by the jury. See INDICTMENT.

"Bill" also signified formerly the draft of a patent for a charter, commission, dignity, office or appointment; such a bill was drawn up in the Attorney-General's Patent Bill Office and submitted by a Secretary of State for the signature of the Sovereign, after receiving which it was called the King's, or Queen's, Bill; it was countersigned by the Secretary of State and sealed by the Privy Seal (q v.), and then the patent was prepared and sealed. But now all these formalities have been done away with. A warrant under the sign manual, countersigned by the Lord Chancellor or by a Secretary of State or by two of the Treasury Commissioners, is a sufficient authority for passing any document under the Great Seal (Great Seal Act, 1884, s. 1). Such a warrant must be prepared in manner provided by the Crown Office Act, 1877. The use of the Privy Seal is wholly abolished (Great Seal Act, 1884, s. 3).

Bill of Complaint; Bill in Chancery; Bill in Equity. Under the practice of the Court of Chancery, before the Judicature Acts (q.v.), an ordinary suit was commenced by filing or exhibiting a bill of complaint, which was a printed document in the form of a petition, addressed in ordinary cases to the Lord Chancellor, containing a statement of the plaintiff's case, and concluding with a prayer asking for the relief which he filed the bill to obtain. A bill, therefore, consisted of four parts:—(1) The title, giving the description of the Court and the names of the plaintiffs and defendants; (2) the address to the Lord Chancellor; (3) the statement or stating part; and (4) the prayer. The bill was signed by the counsel who had settled it. The bill by which a suit was commenced was called an original bill, as opposed to an amended bill (see AMENDMENT). The bill was served on the defendant as a writ is under the new practice. It therefore combined the functions of a writ of summons and a statement of claim (q.v.).

The bill being the first step in a suit, the word "bill" was often used as synonymous with "suit"; and in this sense bills were of three kinds, original, in the nature of original, and not original. A bill was called original when it related to matters not already before the Court, and either prayed relief or was filed for some subsidiary purpose. Bills praying relief were of infinite variety according to the right or equity sought to be maintained; bills having special names were interpleader and certiorari bills (see those titles); bills quia timet, to prevent an anticipated loss or injury; and bills of peace, to establish a right which might otherwise be made the subject of repeated litigation. These kinds of bills were, however, rare in practice. Bills not praying relief were of two kinds—(1) bills to perpetuate the testimony of witnesses (see PERPETUATION OF TESTIMONY); (2) bills of discovery (see DISCOVERY), of which the principal parts were the stating part, containing the statement of facts; the charging part, alleging that the defendants set up a certain defence and charging or asserting matter to avoid it (see AVOIDANCE); and the interrogating part, in which the essential statements were repeated in the form of interrogatories.

Anciently an ordinary suit in Chancery was called a suit by English bill, by way of distinction from suits on the common law side of the Court, which were conducted in Norman French or Latin (Mitford, 8). (See CHANCERY; ENGLISH INFORMATION.)

Bills in the nature of original bills, and bills not original had ceased to be of practical interest long before the Judicature Acts, they included supplemental bills, filed to supply defects or omissions in original bills; bills of revivor, to revive abated suits (see REVIVOR); and bills of review, filed to obtain the reversal or alteration of a decree made in a former suit between the same parties.

Where a person filed a bill claiming relief, but did not know whether the real facts would support his case and intended to find out by interrogatories facts on which to found his claim, the bill was called a fishing bill. See SUIT; ACTIONS AND MATTERS; CHANCERY; INFORMATION; PLEADING.

Bill of Costs is an account of fees, charges and disbursements by a solicitor in a legal business. As to costs generally and their taxation, see those titles. It may here be mentioned that the Court has jurisdiction under the Solicitors Act, 1843, s. 37, to make an order for the delivery by a solicitor of a bill of costs against his client; this is necessary where the solicitor claims a lien on a fund or on papers in his possession, so that they cannot be dealt with until his costs have been paid. Also under the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1870, a solicitor may make an agreement in writing with his client as to his remuneration by a gross sum, percentage, salary or otherwise; such an agreement, however, is liable to be reviewed by a taxing master. In the absence of any such agreement, no action may be commenced by any solicitor or his personal representative for the recovery of any fees, charges or disbursements until the expiration of a clear calendar month after the bill of costs therefor has been delivered to the person to be charged (Solicitors Act, 1843, ss. 37, 48) unless special leave be given by a judge of the High Court to commence the action earlier because of the insolvency, etc., of the proposed defendant (Legal Practitioners Act, 1875, c. 79). A claim for the amount of a bill of costs may be endorsed on the writ, and final judgment may be applied for under Ord. 14. Any judgment recovered will be for the bill of costs subject to taxation.

Bill of Cravings. This was the list of expenses incurred by a sheriff for judges' lodgings, executions, etc., during his year of office: he had to furnish it when passing his accounts. See QUIETUS.

Bill of Credit. More usually termed a letter of credit (q.v.). See also CIRCULAR NOTE.

Bill of Debt; Bill Obligatory. This was a writing by which a merchant acknowledged himself to owe such-and-such a sum to another and promised payment at a certain place on a certain date. It might or might not be under seal. It was virtually a bill of exchange. See Com. Dig. " Merchant," f. 2.

Bill of Entry. This is a certificate given by importers of goods to the customs authorities. It sets out particulars of the goods and states the port, etc., from which they have been imported. See the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, Sch. B. The term is also applied to the certificate given to the customs authorities by an exporter of goods from a British port.

Bill of Exceptions. Under the old common law practice, if a judge at the trial of an action misdirected the jury on a point of law, or improperly received or rejected evidence, he might be required to seal a bill of exceptions, which was a document containing a statement of the objections taken by the party aggrieved. The bill was then argued before the Court of Error; and if the objections were held to be well founded there was a trial de novo. Bills of exceptions have been abolished, as regards actions in the superior Courts by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 148, and as regards inferior Courts of civil jurisdiction by R. S. C., 1875, Ord. 58, r. 1. The same result is now obtained by a motion for a new trial, as regards actions in the superior Courts, and, as regards decisions of inferior Courts of civil jurisdiction, by appeal as provided in R. S. C. Ord. 59, rr. 9-18.

Bills of exceptions never lay in criminal cases, the corresponding remedy in such cases down to 1907 being a writ of error (q.v.).

Bill of Exchange is an unconditional written order from A. to B., directing B. to pay C., or (Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 7 (1)), C. and D. jointly or alternatively, or the holder of an office for the time being, a certain sum of money therein named, either on demand or at sight, or at any certain period after date or after sight. (See Days of Grace.) A. is called the drawer, B. the drawee, and C. the payee; sometimes A., the drawer, is himself the payee. The holder of a bill may treat it as a promissory note (q.v.) if the drawer and drawee are the same person (ib., s. 5 (2)). When B., the drawee, has, by accepting the bill, undertaken to pay it, he is called the acceptor. (See Acceptance.)

If a bill is made payable to C. without more, that makes it payable to " C. or order " (Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 8 (4)), unless it contains words indicating that it is not transferable (ib., s. 8 (1)). Usually, however, a bill is made payable either to " C. or order," or to " C. or bearer." Whether the bill is made payable to " C." or to " C. or order," C. can transfer the bill by a written order to pay to someone else (D.), who, after the bill has been delivered to him, becomes the holder of it (ib., s. 31), and can transfer it to E., and so on. This order is generally written on the back of the bill, and is called an indorsement, C. being then the indorser, and D. the indorsee. If the bill is payable to " C. or bearer," C. can transfer it to D. by merely delivering it to him (ib., s. 31 (2)). A bill payable to order may be converted into a bill to bearer if the payee or indorsee indorses it in blank, that is to say, without specifying an indorsee (ib., s. 34 (1)); but after a bill has been indorsed in blank any holder may convert the blank indorsement into a special indorsement by writing above the indorser's signature a direction to pay the bill to or to the order of any person (ib., s. 34 (4)). (See Indorsement.) " Holder " is a general word applied to anyone in actual or constructive possession of a bill, and entitled to recover and receive its contents from the parties to it, viz., the acceptor, drawer, and indorsers.

The legal effect of drawing a bill is a conditional contract by the drawer to pay the bill if the drawee dishonours it, either by failing to accept it or, having accepted it, by failing to pay it at maturity. The effect of accepting a bill is an absolute contract by the acceptor to pay the bill. The effect of indorsing a bill is a contract by the indorser to pay his immediate or any succeeding indorsee, or the bearer, in case of the acceptor's default. But if the bill is not presented for payment at the proper time, all the antecedent parties, except the acceptor, are discharged from liability, and the liability of an acceptor may be qualified by the terms of his acceptance (Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 19), but the payer of a bill may treat a conditional indorsement as if it were unconditional (ib., s. 33).

When the drawee of a bill fails to accept it on its being presented to him for that purpose, it is said to be dishonoured by non-acceptance; when the acceptor of a bill fails to pay it on presentment at the proper time, it is said to be dishonoured by non-payment. As a general rule, it is incumbent on the holder of a bill which has been dishonoured to give prompt notice of the fact to the antecedent parties, otherwise they will be discharged from all liability.

When a bill is made payable at a certain time (e.g., thirty days after date or sight), on that time arriving the bill is said to be at maturity or due. After that time it is said to be overdue or afterdue. The negotiability of an overdue bill is qualified to the extent that it can only be negotiated subject to any defect of title affecting it at maturity (Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 36 (2)). (See NEGOTIABLE; EQUITY.)

Bills of exchange, like promissory notes and a few other instruments, differ from other simple contracts, first, in their negotiability, and secondly, in being presumed to have been given or transferred for valuable consideration until the contrary is proved. A bill which originally was negotiable remains negotiable unless it is restrictively indorsed pursuant to s. 35 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (ib., s. 36).

As to ACCOMMODATION BILLS, see that title.

Bills of exchange are either inland or foreign. Inland bills are those which are both drawn and payable within the limits of the British Islands; all others are foreign bills. Any holder of a bill may treat it as an inland bill unless the contrary appears on its face (Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 4 (2)). Foreign bills differ from inland bills principally in being frequently drawn in sets or parts, and in requiring to be protested on dishonour in order to charge the drawer. (See PROTEST.) Exemplars or parts of a bill are separate copies, each part being numbered and referring to the other parts, but all the parts are signed by the drawer and are otherwise identical with one another. All the parts together make a set, and the whole set constitutes but one bill, so that the payment of one part extinguishes all. The object of drawing a bill in parts is to guard against loss and to facilitate negotiation.

The Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (to which reference should be made for more detailed information), codifies and in some respects alters the pre-existing law as to bills. As to lost bills, see ACCIDENT. See BANK HOLIDAY; EQUITY; FAST DAY; INDORSE.

Bill of Health is a document given to the master of a ship by the consul of the port from which he comes, describing the sanitary state of the place. It may be a clean, suspected, or foul bill. The first is given where no disease of an infectious or contagious kind is known to exist; the second where, though no such disease has appeared, there is reason to fear it; and the last, when such a disease actually exists at the time of the ship's departure. The latter subjects the ship to the full period of quarantine.

Bill of Indemnity. See ACT OF INDEMNITY.

Bill of Lading. Where a ship is not chartered wholly to one person, but the owners offer her generally to carry the goods of any merchants who may choose to employ her, or where, if chartered to one merchant, he offers her to several sub-freighters for the conveyance of their goods, she is called a general ship. In these cases the contract entered into by and with the owners, or the master on their behalf, is evidenced by the bill of lading. This is a document which is signed and delivered by the master to the shippers on the goods being shipped. In practice, when goods are shipped an acknowledgment is given by the mate, known as the "mate's receipt." This is afterwards exchanged by the captain or the broker of the ship for the bill of lading. Several parts, that is to say copies, of the bill of lading are commonly made out; one or more of these is sent by the shipper of the goods to the person for whom they are intended (the consignee), one is retained by the shipper himself, and another is kept by the master for his own guidance.

A bill of lading specifies the name of the master, the port and destination of the ship, the goods, the consignee, and the rate of freight.

A bill of lading is a negotiable instrument, and the property in the goods which it represents is transferred by its indorsement and delivery, subject to any rights of stoppage in transitu, liability to freight, etc.

Bill of Middlesex. The Court of King's Bench had no jurisdiction in purely civil actions; but they managed to acquire it by means of the Bill of Middlesex. A writ known by that name was issued to the sheriff of Middlesex commanding him to arrest the defendant for an imaginary trespass (in which the Court had jurisdiction) and to bring him before the Court. When he was brought before the Court, he was proceeded against for any cause of action. If the defendant was not to be found in Middlesex, the sheriff made a return of non est inventus; whereupon the Court issued the writ of latitat (q.v.), reciting the Bill of Middlesex and the sheriff's return, and commanding the sheriff of some other county to arrest the defendant. In course of time the Bill of Middlesex was never in fact issued when the defendant resided elsewhere than in Middlesex; and in such a case the writ of latitat, reciting the issue of an imaginary bill, was issued forthwith. The writ of latitat then came to be known as a Bill of Middlesex.

This procedure was abolished by the statute

[illegible] known as the Uniformity of Process Act.

Bill of Pains and Penalties. A bill introduced, generally in the House of Lords but sometimes in the House of Commons, for the punishment of a particular person without trial in the ordinary way. A bill of attainder (q.v.) always imposed the penalty of death: a bill of pains and penalties inflicted a less penalty. The person against whom a bill either of attainder or of pains and penalties was introduced could defend himself before each House by counsel and witnesses: but the procedure upon either of such bills was in other respects the same as on ordinary bills. A bill of attainder was introduced only in cases of alleged treason or felony: a bill of pains and penalties could be introduced not only for treason or felony but also in other cases of conduct tending to grave public mischief. Both bills of attainder and bills of pains and penalties expressed the united judgment of the Crown, the Lords and the Commons; whereas in an impeachment (q.v.) the Commons were merely the accusers and the Lords were the sole judges.

The last bill of pains and penalties was that against Queen Caroline in 1820. The Titles Deprivation Act, 1917, was, however, much in the nature of a bill of pains and penalties. That Act empowered the King to appoint a committee of the Privy Council to enquire as to, and report the names of, any persons enjoying any dignity or title as a peer or British prince who during the then war had borne arms against the King or the King's allies or had adhered to the King's enemies; after the report of the committee had lain for forty days on the table of each House of Parliament without either House disapproving thereof any person named therein was to lose his peerage or dignity; but—and this marks a departure from the former practice of making children suffer for the wrongdoing of their parents—any successor of any peer so deprived of a peerage may be restored to the peerage if he satisfies the committee that he is well disposed and has incurred no disability under the Act; and—which again is a departure from former practice—nothing in the Act affects the title of any person to estates or other property.

Under this Act a number of peers, including, for instance, Viscount Taaffe, were deprived of their peerages.

Bill of Particulars. A bill of particulars, or, as it was frequently termed, a particular of plaintiff's demand, was a statement in writing of what the plaintiff sought to recover in his action. It's object was to furnish the defendant with a better or more specific statement of the plaintiff's cause of action than was to be collected from the declaration or summons. The bill of particulars differed from the declaration (q.v.), inasmuch as the one disclosed the nature and legal effect of the plaintiff's claim, the other its component ingredients.

R. S. C Ord. 19, r. 6, gives the cases in which particulars must now be stated in the pleadings; r. 7 of the same Order provides machinery for obtaining further and better particulars. As to statement of particulars after interlocutory judgment has been signed, see Ord. 13, r. 5.

Bill of Peace. Formerly, where the same question had been frequently litigated in the same manner (as where repeated actions of ejectment had been brought for the same land), or where it was likely to be contested in a multiplicity of suits (as where the tenants of a manor had a dispute with the lord), a bill might have been filed in Chancery to restrain the vexatious or unnecessary litigation by perpetual injunction: this was called a bill of peace. Now the evil at which a bill of peace was aimed is provided against by R. S. C., Ord. 16, r. 9, dealing with representative actions, and Ord. 25, r. 5, dealing with declarations of right: and where frivolous applications are repeatedly made to impeach a judgment, an injunction may be obtained to restrain further applications in the matter by the same parties. See ABUSE OF PROCESS.

Bill of Proof. In a proceeding for foreign attachment (q.v.) it was a rule that the garnishee could not raise the defendant's want of title as a defence to the attachment, and, therefore, he could not show that the property to be attached really belonged to a third person: the real owner, however, was permitted to do this by what was called a bill of proof, which was a claim by him to be admitted to prove that the property was his; thus, if the defendant delivered to the garnishee goods belonging to A., and the plaintiff issued an attachment against them, A. had to file a bill of proof in order to show his right to the goods; having filed his bill, he was called the approver. The plaintiff appeared to the bill of proof, and the approver delivered the probation, which was in the nature of a declaration, and set forth the approver's title; the plaintiff then pleaded and the issue was tried as in ordinary cases, the approver being in the position of plaintiff for the purpose of the trial of the issue.

Bill of Review; Bill of Revivor. See BILL OF COMPLAINT.

Bill of Rights. The statute 1 Will. & Mary, stat. 2, c. 2, is so termed because it declares the true rights of British subjects. The short contents of it are as follows: After reciting the various unconstitutional and illegal acts of the preceding Stuart reigns, it goes on to enact as follows:—

(1) The suspending power, when exercised by the Crown without the assent of Parliament, declared illegal;
(2) The dispensing power, as of late exercised, declared illegal;
(3) Levying money by prerogative prohibited;
(4) The subjects have a right to petition the Crown, and all commitments for so petitioning declared illegal;
(5) Raising or maintaining a standing army within the kingdom in time of peace declared illegal, if done without the assent of Parliament;
(6) Freedom of speech in Parliament secured;
(7) Excessive bail, excessive fines, etc., etc., discouraged; and
(8) The Protestant succession to the Throne provided for. (See now ACT OF SETTLEMENT.)

Bill of Sale is a deed assigning personal property.

A bill of sale of ordinary chattels by way of absolute assignment is not very common, except in cases where the thing sold is of some importance, as where a sheriff sells goods under an execution.

A bill of sale is the usual, and in the case of registered ships the only, mode of transferring ships; a bill of sale of a registered ship, under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, is to be in the form given in the Act, or as near thereto as possible (s. 24), specifying the number and date of registry, the description of the ship, etc.; it is under seal and (s. 26) must be registered. Formerly bills of sale of ships were divided into two kinds,—the grand bill of sale, which conveyed the ship from the builder to the purchaser or first owner, and the ordinary bill of sale by which any subsequent transfer was made; but these terms are not now used.

The most usual kind of bill of sale, and that to which the term is in practice applied, is a bill of sale of chattels (e.g., furniture, horses, stock-in-trade, etc.) by way of mortgage to secure a debt, being an assignment with a covenant for reconveyance on payment of the debt, similar in most respects to a mortgage of land. It is with reference to these instruments that the Bills of Sale Acts are of importance; they were passed to prevent frauds "committed upon creditors by secret bills of sale of personal chattels, whereby persons are enabled to keep up the appearance of being in good circumstances and possessed of property" which really belongs to someone else. The Bills of Sale Act, 1878, provides in effect that unless a bill of sale, given (see s. 4) as security for money, together with an affidavit verifying its execution, is filed in the Central Office of the Supreme Court within seven days from its execution, it shall be void against the trustee in bankruptcy or liquidation of the grantor, against his assignees for the benefit of his creditors, and against his execution creditors, so far as regards any of the goods which remain in his actual or apparent possession. But this still left an unregistered bill of sale valid as between grantor and grantee. The Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882 (which—see s. 4—relates only to bills of sale given as securities for money), now provides by s. 8 that a bill of sale given as security for money shall be wholly void unless it sets forth the consideration for which it was given and unless it is registered; by s. 9, that such a bill must be in the form given in the schedule to the Act; by s. 4, that such bill must have annexed to it a schedule of the property comprised therein; by s. 10, that such bill must be attested by a credible witness in substitution for the solicitor required by s. 10 (1) of the Act of 1878; by s. 7, that seizure of the property comprised in such bill can be made only on default in payment of the sum secured or the non-observance of covenants and agreements, or on bankruptcy, distress, fraudulent removal, failure to produce receipts, etc., or execution; and by s. 12, that any such bill given in consideration of a less sum than £30 shall be void. The Act of 1882 (see s. 3) does not apply to bills given otherwise than by way of security for money.

Except as against the grantor, a bill of sale (unless it be of growing crops, fixtures, etc.) is void if the grantor was not at the time of its execution the "true owner" of the chattels comprised therein (Act of 1882, ss. 5, 6) "True owner" means either the legal or the equitable owner.

The Act of 1878, like the earlier Acts which it replaced, was passed for the protection of creditors: the Act of 1882, on the other hand, was passed for the protection of persons giving bills of sale.

Bills of sale comprising the same chattels have priority in the order of the date of their registration (Act of 1882, s. 10).

Bill of Sewers. The popular title of the statute 23 Hen. 8, c. 5, which, it may be noted, dealt with large schemes of drainage and with the prevention of floods, and had nothing to do with sewers in the modern sense.

Bill of Sight. The importer of goods, if unable to make a perfect entry thereof, may, in order to get them landed, make an entry by "bill of sight" in the form No. 4 in Sch. B. to the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876. See ss. 58-62 of that Act. See ENTRY.

Bill of Stores. A document for the entry duty free into the United Kingdom of dutiable goods which have been exported therefrom within the five years preceding their re-importation. See the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1879, s. 6.

Bill of Sufferance. A licence issued by the customs to a merchant under the repealed statute 14 Car. 2, c. 11, authorising him to trade between English ports without paying customs.

Bill Quia Timet was a proceeding in the old Court of Chancery,—which subsequently represented by the action in the nature of a bill quia timet,—brought for the purpose of anticipating and providing against an apprehended liability, or for the purpose of anticipating and preventing an apprehended wrongful act. Such an action could be maintained only where the plaintiff proved imminent danger of a substantial kind, or proved that the apprehended injury, if it happened, would be irreparable. Injunction is now the remedy.

Bill to Establish Will. This was a proceeding in the Court of Chancery, having for its object to establish the validity of wills of real estate as against the heir-at-law. The devisee was plaintiff, or with his consent the heir-at-law might be plaintiff. This kind of proceeding fell into disuse after the Court of Probate Act, 1857, s. 62, had enacted that where a will disposing of real as well as of personal estate is proved in solemn form, or is established by a decree in contentious proceedings, the probate shall be conclusive proof of the validity of the will as against the heir, devisee or other person interested in the realty if (ib., s 63) he had been cited or made a party or if he had derived title through a person so cited or made a party (ib., s. 63). Now, under the Land Transfer Act, 1897, s. 1, probate will be granted of a will dealing with real estate only.

Bills in Eyre. These were processes by which civil proceedings were instituted before the Eyre (q.v.). They were usually written in Anglo-French (a few are in Latin), and set out without technicalities the facts alleged by the complainant. There were no prescribed forms. They could be used in any state of facts—unlike writs, which are rigidly confined to particular matters or to those that were in consimili casu—and any remedy which the facts required could be obtained upon them. Upon these bills there was an equitable jurisdiction foreshadowing the later jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery.

Bills of Mortality. These were weekly returns of deaths in the parishes of the city of London. They began in 1592. In 1605, 1626, and 1636 the area to which they related was increased. The area which finally was "within the Bills of Mortality" was selected as that for various Acts relating to paving and building. The bills ceased in 1842, as the modern system of registration of births and deaths was then in operation and had made them unnecessary.

Bill-sticking. Sticking a bill on the property of another without his consent is actionable. So also is sticking a bill over one already posted, unless the second bill be posted in exercise of a right; and, moreover, the sticker of the second bill may be summarily convicted, under the Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, s. 14 (1), of malicious injury if the damage does not exceed £20.

In the metropolitan police district, it is an offence, punishable on summary conviction with a fine not exceeding 40s., to paste bills on the property of another; and a constable may arrest without warrant if the offence is committed in his view (Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, s. 54 (10)). Elsewhere there is no general Act, but there are many local Acts dealing with the subject.

As to bill-sticking in London on lamp-posts, buildings, etc., formerly belonging to metropolitan boards and vestries, but now transferred to the metropolitan boroughs which have replaced those bodies, see the Metropolis Management Amendment Act, 1862, s. 90; as to bill-sticking on letter-boxes, etc., see the Post Office Act, 1908, s. 62; as to sticking bills which are indecent, see INDECENT ADVERTISEMENTS; and as to the rating of hoardings, etc., used or let for the display of bills, see the Advertising Stations (Rating) Act, 1889.

Billet; Billeting. For the purposes of the Army Act, Part III., to billet means to quarter soldiers and their horses in the house of a subject; and a billet means the document authorising such quartering. Colloquially, a billet means the house in which soldiers are quartered. Under the Army Act, only licensed premises, inns and livery stables can be used for billeting.

Billeting had been declared illegal by the statutes 3 Car. 1, c. 1 and 31 Car. 2, c. 1. When a standing army had been authorised by Parliament in 1689, billeting was legalised by various Mutiny Acts which are now represented by the Army Act, as re-enacted and sometimes (as in 1913) amended by the Army (Annual) Act.

The Navy Billeting, etc., Act, 1914, provides that when the naval reserves have been called out, officers and men of His Majesty's naval forces may be billeted in manner provided by the Army Act, Part III., as regards officers and men in the Army.

Billiards and Bagatelle. Every house, room or place, other than premises comprised in a publican's licence, where a billiards table, bagatelle board or instrument used in any game of the like kind, is kept for public playing requires a billiards licence, and any person keeping such house, etc., without such licence is liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding £10 or, at the discretion of the Court, to one month's imprisonment, or may be indicted for keeping a common gaming house (Gaming Act, 1845, s. 11; Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, s. 52).

Billiards licences, which run for a year from each 5th April, are granted and renewed at the annual licensing sessions or any adjournment thereof and may be transferred at the transfer sessions (Gaming Act, 1845, s. 10). There is no appeal from a refusal of justices to grant or, it would seem, to renew or transfer a licence. It would seem (see the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, s. 3) that the whole body of justices and not merely the licensing justices are the licensing authority; but in practice the matter is left to the licensing justices. Applicants for billiards licences must give the same notices as applicants for licences for the sale of intoxicating liquors (Licensing Act, 1872, s. 75). A publican requires no billiards licence. Every holder of a billiards licence is liable to the same penalty as if he kept an unlicensed billiards room, unless he keeps displayed a notice "Licensed for Billiards" (Gaming Act, 1845, s. 11). Any holder of a billiards licence who violates any of the conditions thereof or permits gaming, and any publican, being the holder of a billiards licence, who permits play on any public billiards, etc., table, or keeps open the room containing such table, between 1 a.m. and 8 a.m. or on Sunday, Christmas Day, Good Friday, or any day of public fast or thanksgiving, and any publican who permits play at any time when wine, spirits or beer cannot be sold on his premises, is liable on summary conviction to a penalty of £10 for a first offence and of £20 for any subsequent offence (Gaming Act, 1845, ss. 12, 13; Licensing Act, 1872, s. 75; Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, s. 79).

A billiards licence forbids the consumption of any exciseable liquor in a licensed billiards room; but beer is not such a liquor The holder of a billiards licence permits gaming if he allows billiards or bagatelle to be played for money or money's worth.

The police have an unlimited right of entry into licensed billiards rooms, and any refusal to admit the police is punishable as a breach of the conditions of the licence (Gaming Act, 1845, s. 14). A corresponding right exists as regards any public billiards room on a publican's premises (ib.).

Bind. See STICK OF FELS.

Bind Days. See PRECARIAE.

Binding Tuesday. See HACK-TIDE.

Birds. Birds, like other animals, are classified at common law as (1) domestic and (2) wild or ferae naturae.

Wild birds, but only to the extent stated at ANIMALS, FERAE NATURAE, as well as domestic birds, are the subject of larceny at common law, and where the stealing of house pigeons is not larceny at common law it is punishable under the Larceny Act, 1861, s. 23. The unlawful wounding, maiming or taking of birds ordinarily kept in confinement or for any domestic purpose is punishable under the Malicious Damage Act, 1861, s. 41; but it is to be observed that if a man kills trespassing fowls or pigeons in the honest belief that such killing is necessary to protect his crops or other property, he commits no offence.

Wild birds are in law classified as SWANS, GAME, other WILD BIRDS, all of which see. Other titles relating to birds are: ANIMALS, FERAE NATURAE; ANIMALS, LIABILITY FOR; CLOSE SEASONS; CRUELTY TO ANIMALS; POISONED GRAIN OR FOOD.

Birretum; Birettus. Ancient names of the cap or coif worn by judges, sergeants-at-law, which still survives in the "black cap" (q.v.). The words are cognate forms of "biretta," the cap worn by Roman Catholic, and nowadays by Anglican, clergymen.

Birth, Concealment of. "If any woman shall be delivered of a child, every person who shall by any secret disposition of the dead body of the child, whether such child died before, at, or after its birth, endeavour to conceal the birth thereof " shall be guilty of a misdemeanour (Offences against the Person Act, 1861, s. 60).

To constitute the offence it must be proved: (1) That the woman has been delivered of something more than a fœtus incapable, at the time of delivery, or being born alive; (2) that a body has been found and has been identified as that of the child to whom the charge relates—unless in a case where the identification of the body is shown to have been impossible by reason, for instance, of its having been cremated; (3) that there was some definite act of concealment as distinguished from mere denial of the birth or mere abandonment of the body; and (4) that the child was dead when concealed.

The section above cited goes on to say: " If any person tried for the murder of a child shall be acquitted thereof, it shall be lawful for the jury . . . to find, in case it shall so appear in evidence, that the child had recently been born, and that such person did, by some secret disposition of the body of such child, endeavour to conceal the birth thereof," whereupon the accused may be sentenced as for concealment of birth. It will be noted that such finding of a jury is with regard to " the body," not " the dead body," of the child. Such finding is also punishable if a jury acquit of infanticide (Infanticide Act, 1922, s. 1 (4)). See INFANTICIDE.

Birth, Notification of. In areas where provisions of the Notification of Births Act, 1907, have been put in force either by the Ministry of Health (s. 3) or by the local authority with the consent of the Ministry (s. 2) every birth which takes place after the twenty-eighth week of pregnancy must, within six hours after the birth, be notified, whether the child be born alive or born dead, to the local medical officer of health, by the father if he at the time of the birth is actually residing in the house where it takes place or by any person in attendance upon the mother at or within six hours after the time of the birth.

The Act is adoptive (q.v.), and applies only where it has been put in force as above indicated.

Birth, Proof of. The effect of the Births and Deaths Registration Act, 1836, ss. 35, 37, and 38, the Births and Deaths Registration Act, 1837, s. 8, and the Births and Deaths Registration Act, 1874, ss. 1-8, 32, 38, is as follows:—The fact and date and (if the Registrar-General had directed that the place of birth should be entered) the place of birth within England or Wales, the Christian name and sex of the person born, the names of the parents, the rank or profession of the father, are conclusively proved by a copy of the entry in the register-book of births, certified by the registrar or registering officer before the book is filled up; or by the superintendent registrar after the book has been filled up and is in the custody of the superintendent registrar; or by a certified copy, sealed with the seal of the general office of registry after the book has been sent to that office; provided that such entry is signed by an informant within the meaning of the said Acts and, in the case of births since 1874, is signed by the superintendent registrar if the registration took place more than three and not more than twelve months after the birth, or is made with the authority of the Registrar-General if the registration took place more than twelve months after birth.

Such a copy of the entry does not, however, prove anything with regard to the person whose birth is in question until that person has been proved to be the person registered in the entry.

Births, Registration of. See REGISTRATION.

Bishop. A bishop is an ecclesiastical dignitary. His office is the first of the three orders comprised in Holy Orders (q.v.), the others being those of priest and deacon. He is the chief of the clergy within his diocese, subject to the archbishop of the province in which his diocese is situated; most of the bishops are also members of the House of Lords (q.v.). Every bishop, and also every archbishop, is elected by the dean and chapter of the bishopric on the nomination of the Crown, the election being a mere form. No man under thirty can be made a bishop (3 & 4 Edw. 6, c. 12; 5 & 6 Edw. 6, c. 1; 14 Car. 2, c. 4). See CONGÉ D'ÉLIRE; LETTERS MISSIVE.

The principal powers and duties of a bishop consist in ordaining priests (q.v.) and deacons (q.v.), licensing curates, consecrating churches, and visiting the clergy in his diocese. (See VISITATION.) He is an ecclesiastical judge, but his principal jurisdiction is exercised by his chancellor (q.v.). He also has certain duties under the Church Discipline Act, 1840, and the Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874 (q.v.).

The term " suffragan bishop " (suffragari, to help) appears to have two meanings. Properly, it means a bishop consecrated to supply the place of the bishop of a see, when absent therefrom: the duties of the suffragan being purely spiritual and confined to the conferring of orders, confirming, etc. The statute 26 Hen. 8, c. 14, created certain sees of suffragan bishops, and made provision for their appointment; and the Suffragans Nomination Act, 1888, empowers the Crown to change the sees of existing suffragans and to make towns other than those mentioned in the statute of Hen. VII. sees for additional suffragans. In addition to regularly appointed suffragans, former bishops of dioceses in England or the colonies frequently act as quasi-suffragans. In a less proper sense, all the provincial bishops are sometimes, with respect to the archbishop, called his suffragans. See ORDINARY; ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS; DEAN AND CHAPTER.

From very ancient times it had been the custom, when a bishop had become incapacitated through age or infirmity, to appoint a coadjutor bishop to assist him, but up to 1869 this was done without statutory authorisation. The Bishops' Resignation Act, 1869, ss. 3-14, provides for the appointment of a bishop coadjutor in the case of any archbishop or bishop who is incapacitated by reason of permanent mental infirmity, and enacts that the coadjutor to a bishop other than the Bishop of London, Durham or Winchester, shall have the right of succession to the bishop's see, and that the coadjutor to an archbishop, or to the Bishop of London, Durham or Winchester, shall have the right of succession to the see of any bishop or archbishop who may be translated to the see of the bishop or archbishop for whom the coadjutor had acted, or failing such translation shall have the right of succession to the see of the archbishop or Bishop of London, Durham or Winchester for whom he had acted. The same Act, by s. 2, provides for the resignation of any archbishop or bishop incapacitated by age or mental or physical infirmity. See BISHOPRICS.

Bishoprics. The Church of England is divided into the two provinces of Canterbury and York. The province of Canterbury comprises the bishoprics of Canterbury, London, Winchester, Bath and Wells, Chichester, Ely, Exeter, Hereford, Lichfield, Lincoln, Norwich, Rochester, and Salisbury, all of which had existed before the reign of Henry VIII.; those of Gloucester, Bristol, Peterborough and Oxford, founded in that reign; and the following dioceses founded since 1874—St. Albans (Bishopric of St. Albans Act, 1875); Truro (Bishopric of Truro Act, 1876); Southwell (Bishoprics Act, 1878); Southwark (Bishoprics of Southwark and Birmingham Act, 1904); Birmingham (ib.); Chelmsford (Bishoprics of Sheffield, Chelmsford, and for the County of Suffolk Act, 1913; S. R. & O., 1914, No. 145); St. Edmondsbury and Ipswich (Bishoprics of Sheffield, Chelmsford, and for the County of Surrey Act, 1913; S. R. & O., 1914, No. 146); and Coventry (Bishoprics of Bradford and Coventry Act, 1918; S. R. & O., 1918, No. 1172).

The Welsh bishoprics of St. Davids, Llandaff, Bangor and St. Asaph had from the year 1115 and down to the time when the Welsh Church Act, 1914, came into force in 1920, been part of the province of Canterbury; but under that Act they have ceased so to do. See WELSH CHURCH.

The province of York comprises the bishoprics of York, Durham, Carlisle, and Sodor and Man, all of which existed before the reign of Henry VIII.; Chester—which was erected in that reign; and the following dioceses erected since 1835—Ripon (Ecclesiastical Commissioners Act, 1836); Manchester (ib.); Liverpool (Bishoprics Act, 1878); Newcastle (ib.); Wakefield (ib.); Sheffield (Bishoprics of Sheffield, Chelmsford, and for the County of Suffolk Act, 1913; S. R. & O., 1914, No. 147); and Bradford (Bishoprics of Bradford and Coventry Act, 1918).

Bishops, Case of the Seven. A celebrated trial in 1688 of Archbishop Sancroft and six bishops, which arose out of the accused petitioning the king against an order of his directing to be read in all the churches a certain declaration of indulgence—previously declared illegal in Parliament. The action resulted in the acquittal of the bishops, and established the right of the subject to petition, and also asserted but did not finally establish the right of the jury to return a general verdict in prosecutions for libel, that is to say, to find, not merely whether the alleged libel had been published by the accused, but whether the alleged libel was or was not a libel. The right of the jury to so find was finally established in 1792. See FOX'S LIBEL ACT; PETITION, SUBJECT'S RIGHT TO; BILL OF RIGHTS.

Black Act. The popular title of the statute 9 Geo. 1, c. 22 (repealed in 1827), which was passed for the punishment of persons who with blackened faces had been destroying the deer in Waltham (now Epping) Forest, robbing warrens and fishponds, and cutting down trees, etc. It made such acts felony without benefit of clergy, and provided for the payment of compensation to persons whose property had been injured. See WALTHAM BLACKS.

Black Book of the Admiralty. This is a volume in which "the ancient statutes of the Admiralty" are engrossed in old French on vellum. It is believed to have been commenced in the reign of Edward III. and to have been completed in the reign of Henry VI. It was preserved in the Registry of the former Admiralty Court; but it disappeared about 1808 and was not recovered until 1873. It is now in the Admiralty Registry of the Supreme Court. It was edited in four volumes by Sir Travers Twiss in 1871-1876 as No. 55 of the Rolls Series.

Black Book of the Exchequer. Like the Red Book of the Exchequer (q.v.), this book appears to have been compiled, probably before 1215, by Alexander de Swereforde. It sets out many cartae, or charters, and other matters contained in the later Red Book. The original is in the Public Record Office. It was edited in 1728 by Thomas Hearne. A second edition appeared in 1774. So much of the book as relates to the Treasury of the Receipt is the Liber Niger proper; the part relating to the King's Remembrancer's department is called the Liber Niger Parvus.

Black Cap. This is a square cap worn over the wig by a judge of the High Court when passing sentence of death and on State occasions. See BIRRETUM.

Black Game. The dark coloured birds, also known as blackcock, found, like grouse (which are of a reddish colour), on land covered with heather. They are included in the term "game" (q.v.).

Blackleg. To call a man a blackleg, meaning thereby a man who habitually wins money (at cards, etc , or betting) by dishonest practices, is actionable. But it is not actionable, in the absence of proof of special damage, to call a man a blackleg, meaning thereby a man who continues to work or accepts work at a factory, etc., in which there is a strike, or who has refused to join a trade union, or who has otherwise made himself obnoxious to a union.

Black List. This is a popular title of a list, kept by the police, of habitual drunkards against whom orders have been made, under the Licensing Act, 1902, s. 6, to the effect that they shall not obtain any intoxicating liquor in any licensed premises or in any club during the currency of the orders.

In the wider popular sense the expression means any list of persons which indicates them as persons with whom business dealings are undesirable. The list of defaulters on the Stock Exchange is such a list. So also is Stubbs' Gazette and other similar periodical publications which are issued in order to protect traders by communicating to them the names of persons to whom, by reason of their having been adjudicated bankrupt or having had judgments recorded against them, it would appear unsafe to give goods on credit. The publication of such lists is not actionable if the words used are true and if they do not convey some thing which is false and if the list is published bona fide for the purpose of informing persons whose business makes knowledge of the facts important to them.

Trade unions frequently publish lists of men who have taken the place of strikers or who have otherwise come into collision with the union; and employers who have formed a ring for the purpose of keeping up prices have sometimes published a list of traders who have sold at less than the price fixed by the ring Such lists are in the nature of black lists. The publication of such lists may or may not be actionable even though the facts stated are true. It is certainly actionable if it is done, not merely in order to give to the members of the union or the ring information as to the facts, but in order to hold up the offending workman or firm to public odium.

Blackmail. Originally this was equivalent to niger redditus, rent payable in cattle, labour or produce, as distinguished from rent payable in corn. See ALBA FIRMA.

Subsequently it meant the toll levied by freebooters along the Scottish border from persons exposed to their depredations who were willing to pay for immunity from plunder. The paying or receiving of blackmail was made felony without benefit of clergy by the statute 43 Eliz. c. 13, s. 1.

At present, it means the attempt to obtain money, etc., by threats of injury to person or property, or by threats to accuse of any offence punishable with death or with not less than seven years' penal servitude, or of rape or attempt to commit rape or of any infamous crime (q.v.); or by threats of exposure of some discreditable incident alleged, whether truly or falsely, to have occurred in the life of the person against whom the threat is made, or of some other person, whether living or dead. Such offences are now dealt with in the Larceny Act, 1916, ss. 29, 31.

Black Rod. Jacob wrote in 1739: "The Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod is Chief Gentleman Usher to the King: He belongs to the Garter and hath his name from the Black Rod, on the top whereof sits a lion in gold, which he carrieth in his hand. He is called in the Black Book, fol. 255, Lator virgae

The keeper of a boarding-house is under no obligation to receive and lodge in his house and entertain any person whether a traveller or not; he has no lien upon the goods of boarders for any money due in respect of the boarding; he is not liable to a boarder for goods lost or stolen within his house unless there is negligence either upon his part or on the part of a servant to whom he has delegated the duty of taking reasonable care of the goods of the boarder, by which negligence is meant the omission to take such care as a reasonable owner would take of his own goods. As regards each of these points the keeper of a boarding-house differs from an innkeeper (q.v.).

An agreement to board at a boarding-house need not be in writing.

The use of a house as a boarding-house is an infringement of a covenant not to use except as a private residence.

Board of Control. See COMMISSIONERS IN LUNACY as to the origin of this body. The board is charged with the general superintendance of matters relating to the supervision, protection and control of persons mentally defective (Mental Deficiency Act, 1913, s. 21), but this does not affect the powers with regard to lunatics exercised by the Lord Chancellor or the Commissioners in Lunacy or the judge or masters in lunacy or by any other persons. The powers and duties of the Commissioners in Lunacy were, however, transferred to the board as from 1st April, 1914, by s. 65 (1) of the same statute. Those duties are: To visit asylums (Lunacy Act, 1890, s. 187) and licensed houses (ib., s. 191) and make rules for the management thereof (ib., s. 226), to see patients (ib., s. 194), grant licences for private asylums in the counties of London and Middlesex, in every place within seven miles of the Cities of London and Westminster and the borough of Southwark, and in certain other places in Surrey, Kent and Essex (ib., s. 208, Sched. III.), and to report to the Lord Chancellor and to Parliament (ib., s. 162).

Board of Education. See EDUCATION, BOARD OF.

Board of Green Cloth. This was more formally called the Counting House of the King's Household (Domus Computus Hospitii Regis). It was, as Jacob wrote in 1739, "for daily taking the accounts of all expenses of the household, making provisions and ordering payment of the same; and for the good government of the King's household servants and paying the wages of those below stair"; and that is still a substantially accurate description of its functions. It consists of the Lord Steward, the Treasurer, the Comptroller and the Master of the Household, with their clerical assistants.

Anciently it had further functions: (1) To keep the peace within the verge (q.v.); (2) To make provision for the household according to the laws and statutes of the realm; (3) To maintain courts of justice within the verge. But the duty of keeping the peace within the verge is now performed by such constables of the Metropolitan Police as are sworn, pursuant to the Metropolitan Police Act, 1833, s. 7, to act as constables within the royal palaces or ten miles thereof. Making provision for the royal household according to the laws and statutes of the realm meant exercising the royal right of purveyance (q.v.), which is now obsolete; and the only remnant of any separate jurisdiction now existing with regard to the royal palaces is to be found in the "verge coroner," or coroner of the King's household, who continues to be appointed by the Lord Steward, pursuant to the Coroners Act, 1887, s. 29, with exclusive jurisdiction to hold inquests on bodies lying within any of the King's palaces or any house where His Majesty is "demurrant and abiding" in person or within the curtilage (q.v.) of any such palace or house. The royal palaces in London are made parts of the various Metropolitan Police Court Districts formed by the Orders in Council (made pursuant to the Metropolitan Police Courts Acts, 1839 and 1840), of which a list is given in Appendix XIX. to the 1893 Index of Statutory Rules and Orders.

Board of Health. Under the Public Health Act, 1848, the Local Government Act, 1858, and other Acts amending those Acts, local boards of health were constituted for the better securing the public health, and who for that purpose exercised certain powers as to sewers, drains, buildings, slaughter-houses, etc.

The Acts of 1848 and 1858 were repealed by s. 343 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and with them went the boards of health, whose functions are now performed by the machinery provided by the Act of 1875.

Board of Trade. This is defined by the Harbour Transfer Act, 1862, s. 2, and by the Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 12 (8), as "the lords of the committee of the Privy Council appointed for the consideration of matters relating to trade and foreign plantations."

Before 1782 there existed a body known as the Board of Trade and Plantations (see PLANTATIONS). This body was abolished by the Civil Service and Secret Service Money Act, 1782 (22 Geo. 3, c. 82), s. 1, and its functions were transferred by s. 15 to such committee or committees of the Privy Council as His Majesty should appoint to act during pleasure. Such a committee was appointed by Order in Council of 11th September, 1782. Such of its functions as related to the plantations have long since been transferred (see SECRETARY OF STATE) to other departments. The committee, as regulated by the Order of 1782 and subsequent Orders in Council, still exists in theory: but it never meets, and its functions are discharged by the president (known as the President of the Board of Trade), who, in fact, is the Board of Trade, and by the Parliamentary Secretary.

The President of the Board is appointed by warrant under the sign manual (Board of Trade (President) Act, 1826) and must take the oath of allegiance and official oath (Promissory Oaths Act, 1868, s. 5). He receives a salary of £5,000 a year (Board of Trade Act, 1909), which does not disqualify him for membership of the House of Commons (Board of Trade (President) Act, 1826). He is always a member of one House of Parliament or the other and a member of the Cabinet.

Before 1867 there was a vice-president of the Board, a permanent official with a salary of £2,000 a year, appointed pursuant to the statute 57 Geo. 3, c. 66. His office was abolished by the Board of Trade (Parliamentary Secretary) Act, 1867, which provided that he should be replaced by an officer to be called the Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Trade, capable of being a member of Parliament and receiving a salary of £1,500 a year.

The Overseas Trade Department (Secretary) Act, 1918, s. 1, provides that the Board of Trade may, in conjunction with the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, appoint a secretary to be called the Secretary of the Department of Overseas Trade (Intelligence and Development), to discharge the functions of a Parliamentary Secretary both to the Board and to the Secretary of State. He is to be paid not more than £2,000 a year (ib.) and may be a member of the House of Commons (ib.).

The functions of the Board were originally consultative: but they gradually became almost entirely administrative. The first step in the process took place in 1840, when the Board—which then was still called the " lords of the committee of Her Majesty's Privy Council appointed for Trade and Foreign Plantations "—was by the Railway Regulation Act, 1840 (3 & 4 Vict. c. 97), empowered to exercise various administrative functions with regard to railways. Subsequently it was entrusted, under a very large number of statutes, with administrative powers as to railways, merchant shipping, patents, weights and measures, bankruptcy, joint stock companies, gas, electric light, harbours, lighthouses, etc. Except agriculture—which had a board of its own—there was, down to 1916, scarcely an industry with which the Board of Trade was not directly or indirectly concerned. Upon the establishment in 1916 of the Ministry of Labour (q.v.) a number of the powers and duties of the Board of Trade were transferred to that body.

All the powers and duties of Government departments—including those of the Board of Trade—with regard to (a) railways; (b) light railways; (c) tramways; (d) canals, waterways and inland navigation; (e) roads, bridges and ferries and vehicles and traffic thereon; and (f) harbours, docks and piers, are vested in the Ministry of Transport (q.v.) pursuant to the Ministry of Transport Act, 1919, s. 2. See OFFICE OF PROFIT.

Bocland; Bockland; Bookland. Before the Norman Conquest this meant land held of the king by book or charter, as opposed to folcland (q.v.) or laenland (q.v.). The custom of conveying land by written documents was of Roman origin and had been introduced into England by the Church. The bocland was folcland granted by the king with the consent of the witan (q.v.). At first such grants were made only to ecclesiastical bodies or, as would now be said, to ecclesiastical corporations, but subsequently they were made to laymen. Grants to laymen were expressed to be made for some religious purpose: but this was a mere matter of form. At first there seems to have been something in the nature of what in later times would have been called livery of seisin: but before the Conquest the lands passed by force of the book alone. The most usual estate in bocland corresponded to our fee-simple: but occasionally it was what corresponded to a renewable lease for a life or lives. Bocland could be alienated inter vivos or disposed of by will, or mortgaged or put in settlement. These terms were not used, and merely indicate the nature of the dealings which were permissible. After the Conquest bocland disappeared and with it the right of dealing with land much as land is dealt with at present.

Bodily Harm. This, without more, seems sometimes to mean any injury which is merely technical or trivial, as distinguished from the more serious injury termed "actual bodily harm" (q.v.), or the still more serious injury termed "grievous bodily harm," which is mentioned in, for instance, the Offences against the Person Act, 1861, s. 11; but, as in s. 35 of the same Act, it can include actual bodily harm or grievous bodily harm. There is, however, no statutory definition of any of the three expressions.

Bodily harm may be the indirect result of the conduct of the accused, as where the accused entered a house at night and threatened to break open the bedroom of a woman, who, in consequence of his threat, jumped out of the window and was injured.

Body of Deed. This means the operative part of a deed as distinguished from the part containing recitals.

Boilary; Boilery. A place where things such as sugar or brine are boiled in the process of manufacturing them.

Boilers. Under the Boiler Explosions Acts, 1882 and 1890, notice of the explosion of any boiler, other than a boiler used for the king's service or exclusively for domestic purposes, must within twenty-four hours of the explosion be sent to the Board of Trade, who may enquire into the matter. Failure to report is punishable summarily with a fine not exceeding £20 (Act of 1882, s. 5).

The Act of 1882 (s. 2) defines a boiler as "any closed vessel used for generating steam or into which steam is admitted for heating, steaming, boiling, or other similar purposes."

A boiler used to heat offices or business premises upon which the owner does not reside and also to supply hot water for the purpose of cleaning the offices and for the household purposes of a resident caretaker has been held to be used "exclusively for domestic purposes."

Boiling to Death. Under the statute 22 Hen. 8, c. 9, this was the punishment of murder by poison: but seventeen years afterwards the statute 1 Edw. 6, c. 12, enacted that murder by poisoning should be punishable in the same manner as other murder: and this has ever since been the law.

Boldon Book or Bolden. A survey or account of the county of Durham, compiled in 1183 at Boldon, a village near Sunderland, by order of Hugh Pudsey, nephew of King Stephen. The original has disappeared; but two copies, dating from about 1400, are in the possession of the cathedral authorities at Durham, and another copy of later date is in the Bodleian Library. The book was edited, with a translation and notes, by Mr. W. Greenwell in 1852 as No. 25 of the Surtees Society's Publications.

Bolts, Boltings. These were arguments of cases, in the halls of the Inns of Court, by students and barristers before courts consisting of an ancient, or bencher, and two barristers. They, like the moots (q.v.), were for educational purposes: but the bolts, unlike the moots, were conducted in private. Bolts are now obsolete. They were also held in the Inns of Chancery.

Bombardment. Continuous artillery fire upon a town or place for the purpose of destroying it.

There were supposed to be various rules of international law to the effect that only fortified places were to be bombarded and that even in them churches, hospitals, asylums, libraries, etc., were, if possible, to be spared: but these rules have proved of little value.

Bonæ fidei possessor in id tantum quod ad se pervenerit, tenetur (2 Inst. 285). (A possessor in good faith is only liable for that which has come to his hands.) This maxim is of no general application. It is cited by Coke only as being the ground of the provision "chescun respoigne de sun tens" (everyone shall answer for his time) contained in the Statute of Gloucester, c. 1, and relating to the assise of novel disseisin.

Bona fides—"good faith"; bonâ fide—"in good faith," that is, honestly, without fraud, collusion or participation in wrong-doing. The phrase "want of good faith" is chiefly used not so much to denote that kind of fraud which makes a contract or other transaction voidable as between the parties to it, as to denote that kind of collusion or knowledge which disentitles the party to set up a claim against a person who would otherwise be liable to him. Thus the general rule is that a person who takes a negotiable instrument (q.v.) in good faith for valuable consideration can sue the person liable on the instrument, notwithstanding a defect in the title of the person from whom he acquired it: if, however, he had notice of the defect in the title, then he would not have taken the instrument in good faith, and would be unable to sue on it.

The phrase "bonâ fide" is often used ambiguously: thus the expression "a bonâ fide holder for value" may either mean a holder for real value as opposed to a holder for pretended value, or it may mean a holder for real value without notice of any fraud, etc.

Bona fides non patitur, ut bis idem exigatur. (Good faith does not suffer the same thing to be exacted twice.) This is a maxim of the civil law which is quoted by Broom in connection with the maxim nemo debet bis vexari, etc.

Bona gestura. Good behaviour.

Bona notabilia. Before the creation of the Probate Court by the Court of Probate Act, 1857, wills were proved before the bishop of the diocese in which the property of the deceased was situated: if the deceased had bona notabilia, or chattels to the value of one hundred shillings, in two or more distinct dioceses, then the will was proved before the metropolitan of the province comprising the dioceses, or, if the dioceses were comprised partly in one province and partly in the other, then before the metropolitan of each province. Now, under ss. 3 and 4 of the Act, bona notabilia have ceased to be known to the law.

If a person, while on a journey, happened to die outside the diocese in which he lived, what he had with him up to the value of £5 was not bona notabilia.

Bona vacantia. Goods in which no one claims a property but the king; such as royal fish, shipwrecks, treasure trove, waifs, strays, etc. Where a person dies possessed of personal property, intestate, and leaving no next-of-kin, the Crown becomes entitled to all such property. Chattels, real or personal, vested in a person as a mere trustee upon private trust which has failed are as a general rule held by him as trustee for the Crown. This title of the Crown is in virtue of its prerogative, and in this respect differs from the title of the Crown to land by escheat.

Bona waviata. Waifs (q.v.).

Bond is a contract under seal to pay a sum of money, or a sealed writing distinctly acknowledging a debt, present or future; and when this is all, the bond is called a single bond—simplex obligatio—which is rarely met with now. A double or conditional bond is where a condition is added that if the obligor does or forbears from doing some act the obligation shall be void. Formerly such a condition was sometimes contained in a separate instrument called a defeazance (q.v.). The person who binds himself is called the obligor, and the person in whose favour the bond is made is called the obligee. The bond usually consists of (i) the obligation or operative part, by which the obligor binds himself to pay the money; (ii) any recitals which may be necessary to explain the nature of the transaction; and (iii) the condition, which sets out the acts on the performance of which the bond or obligation is to cease to be of effect. Thus in an ordinary sureties' bond for the payment of a debt, the obligation binds the sureties to pay a sum double the amount of the debt, and hence called the penalty: the recitals then explain the circumstances under which the bond is given, and the condition declares that in the event of the debtor paying the debt with interest, etc., on a certain day, the obligation shall be void, that is, the sureties shall no longer be liable for the debt.

Voluntary bonds are bonds given without valuable consideration. As to administration, bail, bottomry, Lloyd's, post obit, resignation and replevin bonds, see those titles.

Formerly the common law rule was that on non-performance of the condition of a bond on the day fixed the penalty was absolutely forfeited and recoverable by the obligee in full; but Courts of Equity gave relief against penalties on payment of the sum or damages actually due or sustained; and by the statutes 1 & 5 Anne, c. 16 and 8 & 9 Will. 3, c. 11, the obligee was prevented from recovering even at law more than the sum or damages actually due or sustained. At the present day a bond merely amounts to a covenant to pay a sum of money, and is adopted partly because the form is sanctioned by antiquity, and partly because it is sometimes more flexible than an ordinary covenant. A debt on a bond, like any other specialty contract, has no priority over simple contract debts in the administration of the estate of anyone who has died since 31st December, 1869 (Administration of Estates Act, 1869); a like rule obtains in bankruptcy; and at the present day almost the only advantages which a bond has over an ordinary contract to pay money are that in the case of a bond the period within which to bring an action is twenty years (Civil Procedure Act, 1833, s. 3) instead of six, and that a bond executed after 31st December, 1881, binds not only the personal but also the real estate of the obligee unless an intention to the contrary is expressed (Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 59). But, on the other hand, a claim on a bond cannot form the subject of a special endorsement under R. S. C., Ord. 3, r 6.

Bonds are void if executed for a purpose which is illegal or immoral or against public policy, as, for instance, bonds to procure or to prevent marriage, or in consideration of future as distinguished from past cohabitation, or in restraint of trade.

Forgery of a bond is felony (Forgery Act, 1915, s. 2 (1) (b)); and so also is the larceny of a bond (Larceny Act, 1916, ss. 1, 46). The term "bond" is also applied to instruments of indebtedness issued by companies and governments to secure the repayment of money borrowed by them. Sometimes the bond is in the form of a promissory note (in which case it may also be called a debenture (q.v.)): sometimes it consists of an undertaking to pay the principal and interest, secured by a mortgage or hypothecation of the property of the company or government; sometimes a mortgage of this kind is contained in a trust-deed or a "general bond" by which the property is conveyed to trustees for the bondholders. A bond issued by a government cannot be the subject of an action against the government. See LLOYD'S BONDS; BREACH.

Bonded Warehouse. A secure place approved by the Commissioners of Customs and Excise, for the service of the public, for the deposit of dutiable goods upon which duty has not been paid.

Bond-land. In some places in Sussex, this means copyhold which descends to the youngest son as distinguished from soke-land; that is to say, copyhold which descends to the eldest. In some manors, such as Wadhurst, Framfield and Mayfield, where a tenant holds both bond-land and soke-land, both lands descend in whatever manner the lands to which he was first admitted are descendible, unless he was admitted to both together, in which case both descend as soke-land, that is to say, to his eldest son.

Boni judicis est ampliare jurisdictionem (Chanc. Prec. 329). (It is the duty of a good judge to extend his jurisdiction.) This maxim, as above quoted, is erroneous. The order of a superior Court which usurps jurisdiction will be reversed on appeal; and if an inferior Court pursues a like course, its order will be set aside upon certiorari or upon appeal. Lord Mansfield (1 Burr. 304) says that justitiam should be substituted for jurisdictionem: and this would make the maxim entirely in accordance with the dictum of Lord Abinger (9 M. & W. 318) that "the maxim of the English law is to amplify its remedies, and, without usurping jurisdiction, to apply its rules to the advancement of substantial justice."

Boni judicis est judicium sine dilatione mandare executioni (Co. Litt. 289*b*). (It is the duty of a good judge to order judgment to be executed without delay.) This maxim is cited by Coke only in connection with civil proceedings.

Boni judicis est lites dirimere ne lis ex lite oritur; et interest reipublicæ ut sit finis litium (4 Rep. 15). (A good judge disposes of cases once for all in order that one lawsuit may not arise out of another; and it is in the public interest that decisions should be final.)

Bonis non amovendis. A writ which formerly lay to the sheriff commanding not to permit one against whom a judgment had been obtained, and who had brought a writ of error (q.v.), to remove his chattels pending the decision of the Court.

Bono et malo, De. Writs of gaol delivery thus entitled were anciently issued for each particular prisoner who was awaiting trial at the assizes; but they have long been superseded by the general commission of gaol delivery (q.v.).

Bonus judex secundum æquum et bonum judicat, et æquitatem stricto juri præfert (Co. Litt. 24). (A good judge decides according to justice and right, and prefers equity to strict law.) "I commend the judge," observed Lord Hobart, "that seems fine and ingenious, so it tend to right and equity; and I condemn them that either out of pleasure to show a subtle wit will destroy, or out of incuriousness or negligence will not labour to support, the act of the party by the art or act of the law" (Hob. 125).

Book of Common Prayer. See PRAYER BOOK.

Book of the Council, The. One of the Cottonian MSS. in the British Museum. It is a record from 1421 to 1435 of the minutes of the Privy Council. It is printed in No 31 of the Record Commission Series and commences at p. 286 of vol. 2 thereof: for further particulars, see vol. 7, p. 1 of No. 31, and Baldwin's King's Council, p. 391.

Boon-days. The days upon which a tenant was required to perform the service of bedrip (q.v.).

Booty of War. Movable property captured by one belligerent from another. Formerly private property on land might be captured as booty of war, just as private property on sea can still be captured as prize (q.v.); but only military arms, equipment and stores are now liable to capture as booty of war. Booty of war goes to the Crown under the prerogative right. See CAPTURE.

Bordage. The tenure by which a bordarius (q.v.) held of his lord.

Bordarius. In Domesday this means a cottager.

Border Warrant. A warrant issued by a sheriff in Scotland for the arrest, within his jurisdiction, of any person alleged on the oath of another person resident in England to be indebted to such other person. The warrant is long obsolete.

Any constable appointed for any one of the border counties of England or Scotland respectively, that is to say, the counties of Northumberland, Cumberland, Berwick, Roxburgh or Dumfries, may execute within any such counties the lawful warrant of any sheriff, justice of the peace, or other magistrate, for the apprehension of any person accused or convicted of a criminal offence committed, or for the recovery of any goods alleged to have been stolen, within the county for which such constable has been appointed (Police (Scotland) Act, 1857, s. 11). The sheriff mentioned in this section is of course the Scottish sheriff, whose functions differ from those of the English sheriff.

Bordlands. The demesne retained by lords for household purposes. Borlands, says Bracton, are dominicum ad mensam, that is to say, "table demesnes." A home-farm is the modern equivalent.

Bordlode. The service, due by some tenants anciently, of carrying timber to the house of their lord.

Bordman; Bordmannus. The same as bordarius (q.v.).

Bord Service. A tenure under which tenants of the temporalities of a see sometimes held at a rent payable towards the support of the bishop's table.

Borough. This means a city or town with a corporation, consisting of a lord mayor, or mayor, aldermen, and councillors, who constitute the borough council. Every such town, except the City of London (q.v.), is subject to the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882. There are between three and four hundred boroughs in England. Any town may petition the King for a charter of incorporation, that is to say, a charter making it a borough; notice of the petition is given to the county council of the county and to the Ministry of Health; and the petition is referred to the Privy Council, who direct an enquiry at which evidence for and against the petition is taken. If the petition be approved, a charter of incorporation is granted, settling the constitution of the wards and the number of councillors. The town thereupon becomes a borough, with a common seal, the right to hold lands and the right to contract, sue and be sued by its name of the Mayor, Aldermen and Burgesses of ——.

The burgesses (q.v.) elect the councillors and two out of the three borough auditors. "A person shall not be qualified to be elected or to be a councillor unless he (a) is enrolled and entitled to be enrolled as a burgess; and (c) is seized or possessed of real or personal property or both to the amount or value, in the case of a borough having four or more wards, of £1,000, and in the case of any other borough, of £500, or is rated to the poor rate in the borough, in the case of a borough having four or more wards, on the annual value of £30, and in the case of any other borough of £15" (Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 11, as in part repealed by the Representation of the People Act, 1918, s. 47, Sched. 8).

The councillors hold office for three years, and one-third of their number retire annually. The councillors elect the mayor annually. They also elect the aldermen, whose term of office is for six years, and half of whom retire every three years. The mayor and the aldermen must be, or be qualified to be, councillors. If a councillor is elected an alderman, he vacates his seat as councillor. The other officers of all boroughs are the town clerk and the treasurer, elected by the councillors, and a third auditor who is appointed by the mayor.

There are over a hundred boroughs each of which has a separate court of quarter sessions. Each such borough has a recorder and a clerk of the peace, and, generally, a separate coroner.

No woman is now disqualified for any office in a borough by reason of her sex (Sex Disqualification (Removal) Act, 1919).

Metropolitan boroughs have replaced the vestries and district boards of the metropolis under the London Government Act, 1899, but, although called boroughs, they are governed by that Act and not by the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882.

As to boroughs, see also BURGESS; COUNTY; COUNTY BOROUGH; COMMISSION; RECORDER; WARDS.

Borough Council. The mayor, aldermen, and councillors of a borough.

Borough Courts. "Borough civil court means an inferior court of record for the trial of civil actions which by charter, custom or otherwise, is, or ought to be, holden in a borough, but does not include a county court." (Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 7.) There are about two hundred of these courts. They are regulated by ss. 175-188 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882; s. 175 provides that the recorder of each borough shall in most cases be the judge. These courts are now of little importance, the tendency being to transfer business from them to the County Court; only about twenty of them ever sit. Compare BOROUGH SESSIONS.

Borough English. This is a custom under which the youngest son inherits land to the exclusion of his elder brothers. The name appears to have arisen from a case from Nottingham, tried in 1327. That town consisted of the English borough (Burgh Engloys) and the French borough (Burgh Frauncoyes). It was brought under the notice of the court that in the English borough this custom prevailed, although in the French borough the ordinary rule of primogeniture existed. The custom would appear to have existed long before 1327; but the custom did not apply to lands of freehold tenure, with which alone the king's courts had been accustomed to deal. The custom affected lands held in socage (q.v.) or those of burgage (q.v.) tenure, both of which tenures have in the course of time become practically indistinguishable from freehold tenure, except in the rare cases in which particular lands are affected by the custom of Borough English. The custom is still occasionally found in rural manors.

In a special form of Borough English the land descended to the youngest of the sons of the whole blood to the exclusion of a younger son of the half-blood; but since the enactment of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1833, s. 9, the half-blood and the whole blood have had equal rights.

The custom had nothing whatever to do with the fabulous jus primæ noctis (q.v.).

Borough Fund. "The rents and profits of all corporate land, and the interest, dividends and annual proceeds of all money, dues, chattels and valuable securities belonging or payable to a municipal corporation, or to any member or officer thereof in his corporate capacity, and every fine or penalty for any offence against this Act (except where and so far as the application thereof is otherwise provided for) shall go to the borough fund." (Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 139.) S. 140 specifies, by reference to sched. 5, the payments which may be made out of the fund. Speaking generally, they are the administrative expenses of the borough, such as salaries of officers, &c. No payments may be made out of the principal moneys of the fund.

Borough (or Borrow) Head. See HEADBOROUGH.

Borougholder. This means sometimes borsholder (q.v.), and, at other times, one holding by burgage tenure.

Borough Reeve. See REEVE.

Borough Sessions. The popular title of the separate courts of quarter sessions held in many boroughs. See QUARTER SESSIONS; compare BOROUGH COURTS.

Borsholder. See HEADBOROUGH.

Borstal Institution. Borstal institutions are defined by the Prevention of Crime Act, 1908, s. 4, as "places in which young offenders whilst detained may be given such industrial training and other instruction, and be subject to such disciplinary and moral influences, as will conduce to their reformation and the prevention of crime." The first such institution was established in 1901 in part of the convict prison at Borstal, near Rochester; and this gave rise to the name.

Bote. The old writers use this as meaning estover, compensation, expiation, and repair. It is a form of the Anglo-Saxon bot. It occurs in various compounds such as brigbote, firebote, parkbote, manbote: see those titles.

Botiler of the King. A royal officer who, according to Fleta, had certain rights of getting wine for the use of the king out of every ship which came in laden with wine; see with regard to him the statute 25 Edw. III., stat. 5, c. 21. See BUTLERAGE.

Bottomry is an agreement entered into by the owner of a ship or his agent, whereby, in consideration of a sum of money advanced for the use of the ship, the borrower undertakes to repay the same with interest if the ship terminate her voyage successfully: it binds or hypothecates the ship and freight, or the cargo, for the performance of the contract, the debt being lost in case of the non-arrival of the ship. The instrument by which this is effected is sometimes in the shape of a deed-poll, and is then called a bottomry bill; sometimes in that of a bond. The instrument will be invalid if it appears to be intended as a security even in the event of the non-arrival of the ship. The most important case of borrowing money on bottomry is where the master of a ship is at a foreign port, and finds it absolutely necessary to obtain money to defray the expenses of supplies or repairs and can do so only by executing an instrument of hypothecation. The instrument must be for money to be advanced. It cannot be given to secure money which has been advanced already. And it can be given only where the owner, or more generally the master, has no other means of securing the money which is necessary for the completion of the voyage. The instrument, if valid, has precedence over all claims against the ship, freight or cargo, except for wages, or on a subsequent bottomry instrument, or a subse-

Queen Consort for Marriage. See NECESSARIES; RESPONDENTIA.

Bouche of Court. More popularly Bouche au Court. It was an allowance of provisions, wine and beer given by the king in mediæval times to the knights and others who attended him on military expeditions.

Bought and Sold Notes are documents which are usually delivered by brokers to their principals on the conclusion of a contract of sale and purchase, the bought note being delivered to the buyer, and the sold note to the seller. The notes should contain the names of both the contracting parties, the quantity of the article bought and sold, and the price if agreed upon. They should also substantially correspond with each other; for otherwise, where the same broker acts for both parties, the bought and sold notes do not constitute a binding contract, and where the same broker does not act for both parties, it will be a question for the jury by which note the parties intended to be bound. The notes constitute the original contract between the parties, and are the proper evidence, but not necessarily the only evidence, of it.

Every contract note for or relating to the sale or purchase of any stock or marketable security must be stamped as follows:

Where the value of the stock, etc., is £5 and does not exceed £100				6d.
exceeds		and does not exceed
£100	...	£500	...	1/-

(Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, s. 77).

The broker not making and transmitting or not stamping, as provided by s. 77, a contract note is liable to a fine of £20 and cannot recover at law any commission in respect of the transaction for which the contract note should be given and stamped (ib., s. 78). These provisions apply to contract notes for options, the stamps to be half of those above mentioned except where the option is a double option, in which case the stamps are to be at the full rate (ib., s. 79).

Boundaries. A boundary is that imaginary line which divides two pieces of land from one another. The line is generally, but not necessarily, marked or indicated on the surface of the land by a wall, fence, ditch, or other object. Where land belonging to a private person adjoins the sea or a public tidal river, the boundary is usually the line of medium high tide, while, in the case of a non-tidal or private stream, the boundary between the adjoining estates is presumed primâ facie to be the medium filum of the stream. Ditches and fences between adjoining estates are also presumed to be party boundaries, and to belong to the owners as tenants in common. The same rule generally applies to a party wall (q.v.).

Every owner of land is so far liable to keep up a fence or other material boundary that he is liable for a trespass if he allows his animals to stray on to the land of his neighbour. There are, however, cases in which a person is absolutely bound to keep up a fence, or the like, between his own and his neighbour's land; such a liability may arise by prescription. A tenant is also bound, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, to maintain the fences of the property demised to him, and if the demised land adjoins land belonging to himself, he is under an obligation to keep the boundaries distinct during the term.

Where there is a dispute between two adjoining owners as to the boundary between their lands, the question may, in a simple case, be determined by an action of trespass or recovery of land; but where the boundaries have been confused, so that it becomes necessary to establish old boundaries, to direct intermingled land to be separated, or an equivalent set out, or the like, the proper remedy is an action in the Chancery Division to ascertain the boundaries; and in such an action the Court now directs an inquiry at chambers instead of directing a commission to issue in accordance with the former practice. A landlord is also entitled to this remedy if the tenant has confused the boundaries of his own and the demised land.

If a mineowner trespasses on his neighbour's land by excavating beyond the boundary, he may be restrained by injunction; and for this purpose, in a case of suspected trespass by underground working, the Court will, if necessary, allow an inspection; that is, give the plaintiff leave to go on and into the land of the defendant and see whether he is really working under the plaintiff's land. See BARRIER.

As to the jurisdiction of the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries (q.v.) in respect of boundaries, see the Inclosure Acts, 1845 to 1878. The jurisdiction of the Board extends not only to land in process of enclosure under the Acts, but also to any land which belongs to separate owners but which is intermixed or inconveniently subdivided. This jurisdiction had originally been vested in the Inclosure Commissioners, from whom it passed to the Land Commissioners of England in 1882 and finally to the Board in 1889.

Bound-bailiff. See BAILIFF.

Bounds. In the law of mines, the trespass committed by a person who excavates minerals underground beyond the boundary of his land is called working out of bounds. The person on whose land the trespass is committed may bring an action for damages in one of the common law Divisions of the High Court, or an action in the Chancery Division for an injunction and an account of the minerals taken: and, whichever course he adopts, he may obtain an inspection under R. S. C., Ord. 50, r. 3. See BOUNDARIES; BARRIERS.

Bounty. This word occurs in—

(I.) Bounty money, payable to the officers and crew of a King's ship (a) for matters connected with engagements with pirates; (b) for seizures under the Slave Trade Acts; (c) for seizures under the customs laws; and (d) for services in connection with merchant shipping.

Bounty money is to be distinguished from prize money (q.v.); prize salvage (q.v.), and salvage money (q.v.).

(II.) Bounty, or money, formerly paid as an inducement to enlist in the Navy or Army.

(III.) Bounties, or moneys, formerly paid to encourage imports or exports.

(IV.) The royal bounty, or grant, made in the case of the birth of triplets, or any larger number of infants, in wedlock at the one birth.

(V.) Queen Anne's Bounty (q.v.).

Bovata terræ. An oxgang (q.v.).

Bovill's Act. This was the popular title of the Petition of Right Act, 1860, and also of the statute 28 & 29 Vict. c. 86 (repealed and replaced by the Partnership Act, 1890). Sir William Bovill, M.P. 1857-1866 and Chief Justice of the Common Pleas 1866-1873, was largely concerned with the passing of both of the Acts which bear his name.

Bow-bearer. An officer of the forest whose duty it was to prosecute, at the Court of Attachment, offenders against the forest laws.

Bowkett Society. See BUILDING SOCIETY.

Bowling. The statute 33 Hen. 8, c. 9, s. 11, provided that artificers and servants should not play at "bowles or any other unlawful game" except at Christmas and then only in their master's house or presence, and that no person should play at "bowles" except in his garden or orchard. This enactment, which does not seem to have been enforced, except possibly immediately after it became law, was repealed by the Gaming Act, 1845, s. 1. Bowling is now, of course, a lawful game.

Bowyers. One of the City Companies. It was on their petition that the enactment against, amongst other things, bowling (q.v.) was passed. They made bows and arrows, which even in the sixteenth century were of military importance.

Boxing. A boxing contest with gloves, fairly conducted under recognised rules, is not illegal, and homicide in the course of such a contest is not manslaughter unless it results from a foul blow or one struck with the intention of causing serious injury. But a contest in which the men have to fight on until one is incapacitated from further fighting by exhaustion or blows is not a legal contest, and the fact that gloves are worn is immaterial, for in such case the contest is virtually a prize-fight (q.v.).

The holding of boxing contests, no matter how fairly conducted, is a nuisance, restrainable by injunction, if they attract large crowds and substantially affect the amenities of the neighbourhood in which they are held.

Boycotting. This means the system under which the life of a man is made unendurable and impossible by an organised refusal to have any dealings whatsoever with him. Theoretically boycotting is the spontaneous outcome of the feelings of the individuals concerned in applying it to any particular person; but in practice it is the effect of a well-grounded fear that anyone refusing to take part in the boycott will himself be boycotted or suffer injury to his person or property.

The system originated in the West of Ireland in 1880, the first victim being a land agent named Boycott.

As to the legal aspect of the matter, see COMBINATION; CONSPIRACY.

Bracery. An abbreviated form of embracery (q.v.).

Bracton. Henricus de Bracton is the author of a work entitled De Legibus et Consuetudinibus Angliæ, written during the reign of Henry III. He is said to have been a judge under that king. The work itself is a systematic exposition of the English law, being to some extent an adaptation of Azo's Summa to the Institutes of Justinian. It is a work of great historical interest, and is still occasionally cited on obscure questions of law. The only complete editions until recent times were the folio of 1569 and the quarto reprint of 1640; a new edition, with an English translation, was published, 1878-1883, in six volumes, as part of the Rolls Series, by Sir Travers Twiss.

Professor Vinogradoff discovered in the British Museum a manuscript containing the materials from which Bracton composed his great work. These are notes of actual cases decided by the King's judges made, in all probability, from the official records themselves. The manuscript was edited by Professor Maitland and published in three volumes in 1887, under the title Bracton's Note Book. See BRITTON; GLANVILLE.

Branding. As to branding in connection with benefit of clergy and brawling, see those titles.

Under the statute 1 Edw. 6, c. 3—popularly known as the Statute of Vagabonds—any men and women who could work and would not work, and who had no income sufficient for their support, were to be "marked with a whott iron in the brest the marke of V," and to be adjudged a slave for two years, and to be made to work by "beating, cheyninge or otherwise." If such slave ran away, he or she was to be branded "on the forhed or the ball of the cheke with an hote iron with the signe of an S," and to be adjudged a slave for ever; and for a second running away the punishment was death as a felon. This statute was repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1863, but it had been obsolete for hundreds of years. Under the statute 6 & 7 Will. & M., c. 17, s. 3, persons dealing in dippings or filings from the current coin of the Realm were liable, amongst other things, to be branded in the right cheek with a hot iron with the letter "R." But that enactment was repealed by the statute 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 34, s. 1; the punishment of branding had been obsolete for long before then.

The so-called branding of deserters from the army and navy was in fact tattooing.

Brawling. This means creating a disturbance in a consecrated building or consecrated ground, and was originally applied only where such building or church belonged to the Church of England. The common law took no cognizance of the matter, and down to 1551 it was dealt with under the canon law. Under the statute 5 & 6 Edw. 6, s. 4, if any person, by words only, quarrelled, chided or brawled in a church or churchyard [of the Church of England], the ordinary (i.e. the bishop) was to suspend him, if a layman, ab ingressu ecclesiæ, and if a clerk in Holy orders, from the ministration of his office during pleasure; if any person in a church or churchyard proceeded to smite or lay violent hands upon another, he was excommunicated ipso facto; and, under s. 3, if he struck the person with a weapon, or drew any weapon with intent to strike, he was, on conviction by a jury, to have one of his ears cut off, or if he had no ears, to be branded with the letter "F" in his cheek, in addition to being excommunicated; but s. 3 of the Act was repealed by the statute 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 1. (See EXCOMMUNICATION.) By the Ecclesiastical Courts Jurisdiction Act, 1860, the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts over laymen for brawling was taken away, and all riotous, violent or indecent behaviour in any church or recognised place of religious worship, or in any churchyard or burial ground, was made a misdemeanor, punishable on summary conviction by fine or imprisonment. Nonconformists had, however, already been protected from brawling by the Places of Religious Worship Act, 1812, s. 12, which provided that disturbance of any religious service of Protestant Dissenters should be punishable on conviction at quarter sessions with a fine of £40; and under the Religious Disabilities Act, 1846, s. 4, the Act of 1812 had been extended to all meetings, assemblies or congregations whatsoever, of persons lawfully assembled for religious worship and the preachers, etc., officiating.

Breach is the invasion of a right or the violation of a duty. The word is used in a literal sense in such phrases as "breach of close," which is an old-fashioned name for the tort of breaking a man's close—in other words, trespassing on his land, more generally called trespass quare clausum fregit (see TRESPASS), also in "pound-breach" and "prison-breach" (see these titles).

More usually "breach" is applied to the violation of an obligation. Breach of a contract, promise or covenant is the failure to perform it (see PERFORMANCE); it converts the right under the contract, etc., into a right to obtain a remedy for the breach, generally a right of action (see REMEDY). What may be called a constructive breach is an act of the promisor which disables him from performance, or a refusal to perform before the time of performance arrives; as, if A. contracts to convey land to B at a future time, and, before the time arrives, conveys it to C., then B. may at once sue A. for breach of his contract.

Breach of promise of marriage gives rise to a right of action for damages, unless the breach was justifiable, e.g. if the man, after making the promise, discovers that the woman is unchaste. The parties to such an action are competent to give evidence in it, but the plaintiff's testimony must be corroborated by some other material evidence. (Evidence Further Amendment Act, 1869, s. 2.) A promise to marry made by a person who is married and known by the promisee to be married is void as being against public policy, but an action can be maintained on a promise made by a person who is married but who is not known by the promisee to be married. A promise made by an infant is voidable, and to enable the plaintiff to sue there must be a new promise after the defendant has attained full age. It would appear that the fact that the defendant is unfit for marriage is no defence, although it goes in mitigation of damages.

An action for breach of promise can be brought only in the High Court (County Courts Act, 1888, s. 56), unless both parties agree to have it tried in the County Court (ib., s. 64).

Down to 1754 the remedy—or one of the remedies—for breach of promise of marriage, where the proposed defendant was still unmarried, was by a suit in the Ecclesiastical Courts for specific performance of the contract by a celebration of marriage in facie ecclesiæ (see MARRIAGE); but the statute 26 Geo. 2, c. 33, s. 13, enacted that no such suit should be brought in respect of any contract of matrimony, whether per verba de præsenti or per verba de futuro, entered into after 25th March, 1754. That Act was repealed and replaced by the Marriage Act, 1823, 4 Geo. 4, c. 76, which (see s. 27) contains a similar enactment. The action of breach of promise, as we know it, though always available in point of law, practically dates from 1754. The article Breach of Promise in Jacob (1739) deals at considerable length with the cases in which an action lay for breach of a promise; but it does not refer to any action based upon a breach of a promise to marry. The King's Bench had, however, decided in 1674 that such an action lay.

Under the statute 8 & 9 Will. 3, c. 11, s. 8, in an action on a bond for non-performance of any covenant or condition, the plaintiff may assign (that is, specify) as many breaches as he pleases, and the jury shall assess the damages on such breaches as shall be proved at the trial, or if he obtains judgment in default of appearance, he suggests as many breaches as he likes, and a writ of inquiry issues to assess the damages. (See R.S.C. Ord. 13, r. 14 and notes thereto, and WRIT OF ENQUIRY.) The judgment will be entered up for the whole penalty, but is only allowed to be executed to the extent of the damages assessed; it stands as a security for further breaches, and if there shall afterwards be any further breaches, upon a scire facias by the plaintiff on the judgment, suggesting the further breaches, then the further damages will be assessed.

Breach of Privilege. Contempt of the High Court of Parliament, whether relating to the House of Lords or to the House of Commons, is a breach of privilege. Both branches of the Legislature act on the same grounds, both declare what are and what are not breaches of their privileges, when the question is raised, and both punish, by commitment or otherwise, as the Courts of law and equity do for contempt of court. Resistance to the officers of the Houses of Parliament has, in almost all cases, been treated as a breach of the privileges of Parliament. The presence of strangers is a breach of privilege, though permitted on sufferance; and, formerly, to take a note of any of the proceedings was a high act of contempt, although now the representatives of the Press are not only allowed to be present for that purpose but have a gallery to themselves in each House, and every accommodation is afforded them.

Breach of the Peace. Breaches of the peace are offences against public order. They are commonly divided into actual, constructive and apprehended.

Actual breaches of the peace include riotous and unlawful assemblies, riots, affrays, forcible entry and detainer, etc. (See those titles.)

Constructive breaches of the peace include the offences of sending challenges and provoking to fight, going armed in public without lawful occasion in such a manner as to alarm the public, etc. These are misdemeanours, punishable with imprisonment and other penalties.

An apprehended breach of the peace is where one man threatens another with bodily injury, or with injury to his wife or children, or where a man goes about with unusual weapons or attendance, to the terror of the people, or publishes an aggravated libel of another. In such a case the offender may be summoned before a justice of the peace, and bound over to keep the peace. (See ARTICLES OF THE PEACE). This may also be done in certain cases where a person has been convicted of a misdemeanor or felony, mainly under five Acts passed in 1861, the 24 & 25 Vict., cc. 96-100.

Breach of Trust is where a trustee does an act which is unauthorised or forbidden by the terms of his trust, or where he omits to do an act which the trust required him to do. Thus, in general, a trustee commits a breach of trust when he employs trust funds in his own business, or when he invests trust funds in securities not authorised either by law or by the instrument creating the trust, or when he fails to call in and convert into money such parts of the trust property as are of a fluctuating or deteriorating kind.

A breach of trust is in the nature of a tort, and entitles the cestui que trust who has been injured to compel the trustee to make good the loss caused by it. There is even something penal in the relief given in some cases of breach of trust: thus where a trustee has employed trust funds in his own business, and has thereby made a profit, the cestui que trust is entitled to it, although the trust estate has not been injured. But where a trustee, although he has committed what is in law a breach of trust, nevertheless satisfies the Court that he has acted reasonably and honestly, and that he ought fairly to be excused, he may, under the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896, s. 3, be relieved from liability; and under the Trustee Act, 1888, s. 8, a trustee (or a person claiming through a trustee) against whom a claim is made in respect of trust property may, in the circumstances stated in that section, rely on the Statute of Limitations as a defence. Before these two enactments a trustee was liable for any breach of trust; and time never ran in his favour.

A cestui que trust is entitled to an injunction to restrain his trustee from committing a threatened breach of trust.

Where a breach of trust amounts to a fraudulent misappropriation or disposition of the trust property, it is a misdemeanour, punishable with not more than seven years' penal servitude (maximum); the fiat of the Attorney-General is required before the prosecution can be instituted; and if the prosecutor is a person who has taken any civil proceedings against the trustee, the sanction of the Court or judge before whom such civil proceedings have been had or are pending is also required (Larceny Act, 1916, s. 21).

Bread. The manufacture and sale of bread is governed in the metropolis by the statute 3 Geo. 4, c. cvi. (generally known as the London Bread Act, 1822), and elsewhere by the Bread Act, 1836. Both Acts, except as regards the numbers of the sections, are practically the same. The substances of which bread may be made are enumerated in s. 2 of each Act; s. 12 of the Act of 1822, and s. 10 of the Act of 1836 provide that all bread made otherwise than of wheaten flour must be marked with the letter "M"; making bread of prohibited ingredients is punishable summarily under s. 10 of the Act of 1822 and s. 8 of the Act of 1836. These sections apply only to bread for sale. The adulteration of corn meal or flour, or the selling flour of one kind of grain as flour of another kind of grain, is punishable summarily under s. 11 of the Act of 1822 and s. 9 of the Act of 1836.

All the above enactments are now amended by the Bread Acts Amendment Act, 1922, which provides that nothing in them shall be deemed to prohibit the use of self-raising flour.

All bread, except French or fancy bread (q.v.), must be sold by weight, and sale in any other manner is punishable summarily (s. 4 of each Act). The weighing need not be at the time of sale, but must have reference to the sale. Sellers of bread must have scales, etc., in their shops (Act of 1822, s. 8; Act of 1836, s. 6), and failure so to do is punishable summarily (ib., ib.). Sellers must, outside London, have scales, etc., with all delivery vans, and failure so to do or failure to weigh bread bought from the van is punishable summarily (Act of 1836, s. 7); but in London the corresponding section 9 of the Act of 1836 applies only to a van, etc., drawn by a horse, mule or ass.

Bread is, of course, within the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts. See ADULTERATION; FOOD; FRENCH BREAD.

Breaking Bulk. At common law there could be no larceny of goods which had originally been lawfully obtained by a person who subsequently wrongfully converted them to his own use, unless such conversion was preceded by some new act of taking. In the case of a bailee there would be such a new taking where he wrongfully broke bulk, that is to say, took some things from a package entrusted to him, or otherwise separated some part of the goods from the bulk. The Larceny Act, 1861, s. 3, made the question as to whether bulk had or had not been broken immaterial. That section is now repealed; but the Larceny Act, 1916, s. 20, has the same effect.

Bressumer. "A wooden beam or metallic girder which carries a wall" (London Building Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. ccxiii.), s. 5 (7)).

Brevagium. Stated by Blount to have been "a payment in bran which tenants anciently made to feed their lord's hounds." But dogs do not eat bran.

Breve. A writ. See, for instance, RECTO. The word breve literally means a short thing. "Breve ita dicitur," says Bracton, "quia rem de qua agitur et intentionem petentis, paucis verbis breviter enarrat." (A writ is so called because it states briefly and in a few words the matter to which it relates and what the plaintiff wants.) The Norman-French for breve was brief (q.v.).

Breve judiciale non cadit pro defectu formæ (Jenk. Cent. 43). (A judicial writ does not fail through defect of form.) See WRIT.

Breve perquirere. To purchase a writ, that is to say, to pay the prescribed fee for the issue of the writ.

Brevet Rank. This is conferred by a commission authorising an officer to have, outside his own regiment, the rank immediately above that held by him in his own regiment. It, however, gives no right to higher pay. Brevet rank is not given to officers below the rank of captain or above that of lieutenant-colonel.

Brevia magistralia. Writs in consimili casu. See ACTION ON THE CASE. The term is used by Bracton.

Brevia placitata. A legal treatise dating from about 1260

Brevia testata. After grants by parol only had been superseded by written memorandums of conveyance and investiture, it became customary, as Coke tells us, to note on the memorandum the names of the persons who had heard it read without having actually signed it as witnesses. Memorandums with such notes thereon were known as brevia testata.

Breviate. During part of the seventeenth century it was customary to prefix to every bill introduced into Parliament a memorandum (known as a breviate or brief) of the contents of the bill. At present any member introducing a bill may prepare an explanatory memorandum—called simply a memorandum—which, subject to the approval of the officials of the House, will be circulated with the bill. See, for instance, the thirty-page memorandum prefixed in 1922 to the three hundred pages of the Law of Property Bill.

Brevibus et rotulis liberandis, De. A writ which formerly lay to command an outgoing sheriff to hand over to his successor all writs and records in his possession.

Brewster Sessions. A popular name for the "general annual licensing meeting." See LICENCE.

Briber; Bribour. This meant anciently one who offered a bribe, one who took a bribe, and also one who was a petty thief.

Bribery. Giving or offering any gift or reward to any person holding any judicial or other public office for the purpose of influencing the conduct of such person in his office, or the receiving by any such person of any such gift or reward, is bribery at common law. So also are the bribery or attempted bribery of a juryman, and the buying or selling of public offices.

The Public Bodies Corrupt Practices Act, 1889, deals with the bribery of the members, officers or servants of county councils and similar bodies. As to the bribery of persons other than public officers in order to influence them in their duties, see CORRUPTION.

Bribery at elections—whether parliamentary, municipal or local government—is a corrupt practice (q.v.). The offence is defined by the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854, ss. 2, 3. See also the Representation of the People Act, 1867, s. 49.

Bridges. A bridge of public utility dedicated to and accepted by the public is a public bridge, and at common law is repairable by the county unless the duty of repairing is imposed by statute or otherwise on some other body or on some person.

The management of every bridge over which a main road passes passed to the county council under the Local Government Act, 1888, ss. 3, 11 (1), except in the case of bridges for which urban authorities became responsible (ib., s. 11 (2)).

Any public body or any person neglecting the duty of repairing a public bridge is at common law liable to indictment.

Malicious injury to public bridges so as to make them dangerous or impassable is a felony punishable with a maximum sentence of penal servitude for life (Malicious Damage Act, 1861, s. 33).

Bridgemasters. These were persons, chosen by the citizens, who had the care of London Bridge and received certain fees and emoluments. Bridgemasters were also found in other corporate towns.

Bridle-path; Horseway; Packway. This is a way along which either a particular person or the public at large have the right to lead or ride a horse. It is to be distinguished from a driftway (q.v.). The one way may, however, be both a bridle-path and a driftway.

Brief. A brief is a document containing the materials or instructions furnished by a solicitor to a barrister to enable him to represent the client on the trial of a criminal case or of an action, or on the hearing of a petition, motion, summons or other application. Strictly speaking, the "brief" includes all the documents supplied to counsel, such as copies of pleadings, affidavits, correspondence, etc.; but in a more technical sense the "brief" is that document which is drawn up by the solicitor in the form of a narrative or explanatory comment on the case. The brief is the authority of the barrister to appear for the client. It is endorsed with the title of the Court and of the action or matter in which it is delivered, with the name of the solicitor and of the barrister, and with the proper fee.

Formerly, certain orders were obtainable as a matter of course on production of a brief purporting to contain instructions to counsel to apply to the Court for the order required, and indorsed with counsel's hand, i.e., signature, although the matter was never mentioned to the Court at all; these were hence called hand-briefs: they are quite obsolete. It is possible that a brief to counsel originally consisted merely of the writ with the Norman French name for it on the back. In early times the pleadings were oral. See BREVIATE; BREVE.

Brief al evesque. This was a judicial writ which formerly lay in the action of QUARE IMPEDIT (q.v.) directing a bishop to remove an incumbent.

Brigbote. The liability to contribute to the cost of maintaining bridges, etc., which in Anglo-Saxon times attached to land. See TRINODA NECESSITAS.

Bristol Bargain. "What is usually termed a Bristol Bargain is twenty pounds per annum for seven years for one hundred pounds" [lent], said the Master of the Rolls in James v. Oades (1700), 2 Vern. 402. There the loan was made on obviously good security, and the Court declared void, as being "against conscience" an agreement to pay £40 per annum for eight years in consideration of a loan of £200, all that the lender was allowed being £200 with simple interest at 6 per cent. The bargain described by the Court as a Bristol Bargain would give the lender about 11 per cent. The bargain which the Court set aside would give the lender about 15 per cent.

Bristol, Red Book of. A treatise dealing with the law merchant (q.v.), and containing a copy of the laws of Oleron (q.v.). The original, the author of which is unknown, appears from the handwriting to have been written in the fourteenth century: it was edited and published in 1900 by Mr. F. B. Bickley.

British Empire, Order of. This order (the full title of which is The Most Excellent Order of the British Empire) was founded 21st June, 1917, and includes both men and women. The classes for men are: Knights Grand Cross (G.B.E.); Knights Commanders (K.B.E.); Commanders (C.B.E.); Officers (O.B.E.); and Members (M.B.E.). Those for women are: Dames Grand Cross (G.B.E.); Dames Commanders (D.B.E.); Commanders (C.B.E.); Officers (O.B.E.); and Members (M.B.E.).

The order was divided into a military division and a civil division in December, 1918. The various ranks take precedence next after the corresponding ranks of the Royal Victorian Order: see VICTORIAN.

British Museum. This consists not only of a museum but also of a national library, to which, under the Copyright Act, 1911, c. 46, as amended by the Copyright (British Museum) Act, 1915, a copy of every book, other than trade advertisements and similar publications, must be sent within one month of publication.

The British Museum is governed by various Acts, the principal of which is the statute 26 Geo. 2, c. 22. The books of the museum are available to the public in the Reading Room, admission to which is by a reader's ticket. The precise right, if any, of members of the public to obtain such tickets is not the subject of any judicial decision; nor is it clear whether an action will lie against the trustees, in whom the museum and its contents are vested, if they place in the library for the use of readers publications containing defamatory matter.

British North Borneo Company. See COMPANIES, CHARTERED.

British Pharmacopœia. This is "a book containing a list of medicines and compounds and the manner of preparing them, together with the true weights and measures by which they are to be prepared and mixed, and containing such matters and things relating thereto as the general council shall think fit" (Medical Act, 1858, s. 54). The general council is the council established by the Act (s. 3). (See GENERAL COUNCIL.) It is illegal to compound any medicine of the British Pharmacopœia except according to the formularies thereof (Pharmacy Act, 1868, s. 15) unless they are patent medicines (s. 16); but this prohibition does not apply to any legally qualified medical practitioner or legally qualified veterinary surgeon (Pharmacy Act, 1869, s. 1).

A copy of the Pharmacopœia purporting to be printed by the publisher for the council is evidence (Medical Council Act, 1862, s. 3).

Where the standard for the composition of a drug is fixed by the British Pharmacopœia, that standard should be accepted by the Court unless and until it is proved that some other standard is correct.

British Ship. See SHIP.

British South Africa Company. See COMPANIES, CHARTERED.

British Subject. The expression "British subject" means a person who is "a natural-born British subject, or a person to whom a certificate of naturalization has been granted, or a person who has become a subject of His Majesty by reason of any annexation of territory" (British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914, s. 27 (i); British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1918, s. 2 (6)).

"The following persons shall be deemed natural-born British subjects, namely, (a) any person born within His Majesty's dominions and allegiance; and (b) any person born out of His Majesty's dominions whose father was, at the time of that person's birth, a British subject, and who fulfils any of the following conditions, that is to say, if either—(i) his father was born within His Majesty's allegiance; or (ii) his father was a person to whom a certificate of naturalization had been granted; or (iii) his father had become a British subject by reason of any annexation of territory; or (iv) his father was at the time of that person's birth in the service of the Crown; or (v) his birth was registered at a British consulate within one year, or, in special circumstances, with the consent of the Secretary of State, two years, after its occurrence, or in the case of a person born on or after the 1st day of January, 1915, who would have been a British subject if born before that date, within twelve months after the 1st day of August, 1922; and (c) any person born on board a British ship, whether in foreign territorial waters or not: provided that the child of a British subject, whether that child was born before or after the passing of this Act, shall be deemed to have been born within His Majesty's allegiance if born in a place where by treaty, capitulation, grant, usage, sufferance, or other lawful means His Majesty exercises jurisdiction over British subjects: provided also that any person whose British nationality is conditional upon registration at a British consulate shall cease to be a British subject unless within one year after he attains the age of twenty-one or within such extended period as may be authorised in special cases by regulations made under this Act—(i) he asserts his British nationality by a declaration of retention of British nationality, registered in such manner as may be prescribed by regulations made under this Act, and (ii) if he is a subject or citizen of a foreign country under the law of which he can, at the time of asserting his British nationality, divest himself of the nationality of that foreign country by making a declaration of alienage or otherwise, he divests himself of such nationality accordingly. (2) A person born on board a foreign ship shall not be deemed to be a British subject by reason only that the ship was in British territorial waters at the time of his birth. (3) Nothing in this section shall, except as otherwise expressly provided, affect the status of any person born before the commencement of this Act" . . . (British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914, s. 1, as amended by the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1918, s. 2 (1), and by the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1922, s. 1). The Act of 1914 was passed 7th August, 1914, and came into operation (see s. 28 (3)) 1st January, 1915.

Before 1st January, 1915, (1) a person was not a British subject merely because he had been born on board a British ship in foreign territorial waters; (2) not merely the child, but also the grandchild, born aboard, of a natural-born British subject (see the repealed British Nationality Act, 1772) was a British subject; (3) the child, born abroad, of a naturalized British subject was not a British subject, there being no enactment to cover the point; and (4) the naturalization of an alien ipso facto (see the repealed Naturalization Act, 1870, s. 10 (5)) naturalized any child of such alien who during infancy became resident with him or her in the United Kingdom. This statement of the differences between the law as it was before 1st January, 1915, and the present law is not exhaustive: for further information see Chitty's Statutes, Vol. I.

Britton is the name given to a work on English law written in the reign of Edward I. by an author whose identity has not been clearly established. The work is in Norman French, and claims to be promulgated with the authority of the king. It is founded to a great extent on Fleta (q.v.), and to a less extent on Bracton (q.v.); the arrangement, however, is quite different from that of either of those treatises, being based on the remedies appropriate to the various rights rather than on the rights themselves. The best and most recent edition of Britton is that of 1865, edited for the Clarendon Press by F. M. Nicholls.

Broad. See SILVER COINS.

"Broad Arrow." The use of the "broad arrow" as a mark for Government property is sanctioned by the Public Stores Act, 1875, s. 4 and Sched. The "broad arrow" is a mark showing the feather and barb of an arrow with a very short intermediate shaft.

Broadmoor Act. The popular title of the Criminal Lunatic Asylums Act, 1860, under which Broadmoor Asylum was established for the reception of criminal lunatics.

Brocage; Brokerage; Marriage Brokerage Contracts. These terms mean contracts made to procure marriages for reward. Any such contract is wholly void. The procurement of marriage can never be a good consideration; and any instrument executed for any such consideration will be set aside.

Brochia. Bracton (lib. 2, c. 2) speaks of a tenant holding by the tenure of providing for the king at certain places and times one man and one horse "et saccum cum brochia." It would appear that the saccus (or sack) was for the transport of dry provender or provisions, and that the brochia was a vessel to contain fluids.

Broker. A broker is an agent for the purchase and sale of goods, being employed by an intending vendor to find a purchaser, or by an intending purchaser to find a vendor. His remuneration consists of a commission or payment (called brokerage) proportionate to the price of the goods sold. A broker differs from a factor (q.v.) in the following respects:—He generally contracts in the name of his principal, while a factor may buy and sell either in his own name or in that of his principal; he is merely a negotiator between the parties, and is therefore not entrusted with the possession or control of the goods, while a factor is. Stockbrokers are an exception to these rules.

A broker, known to be acting as such, is not in general personally liable on a contract, unless he signs a written memorandum with his own name, nor can he sue in his own name on the contract; but an insurance broker is an exception to this rule, to the extent that he can always sue in his own name for the premiums.

In the criminal law, a broker who fraudulently misappropriates money or property belonging to his employer is guilty of a misdemeanour. (Larceny Act, 1916; s. 20.)

Brokers in the city of London had formerly to be admitted by the Lord Mayor and aldermen, and to pay to the city a yearly fee of forty shillings (statute 6 Anne, c. 68), which was increased in 1817 to £5 (statute 57 Geo. 3, c. lx.), and the Lord Mayor and aldermen had a certain control over them. Such admission, payment of fees, and control were abolished in part by the London Brokers' Relief Act, 1870, and altogether by the London Brokers' Relief Act, 1884.

A person employed to levy a distress for rent (see BAILIFF) is popularly known as a broker. See PASSAGE BROKER.

Bronze Coinage. See COPPER COINS.

Brooke's Abridgment. See ABRIDGMENTS.

Brothel. This means a house or part of a house or a room used for purposes of fornication by men and women resorting thereto. It is synonymous with "common bawdy-house" and "house of ill-fame," and it comes within the category of disorderly houses. A brothel is a place used for immoral purposes; but every place used for immoral purposes is not a brothel. Thus, where premises are used for the purpose of fornication by one woman only; or where premises are for the use of a kept mistress only, there is no brothel. The keeping of a brothel is a misdemeanour at common law.

The Disorderly Houses Act, 1751, contains provisions intended to facilitate prosecutions upon indictment for the common law misdemeanour; but it was not until 1885 that provision was made for summary proceedings.

The Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, s. 13 (as amended by the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1912, s. 4, and the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1922, s. 3), provides that "any person who (1) keeps or manages or acts or assists in the management of a brothel, or (2) being the tenant, lessee, or occupier, or person in charge of any premises, knowingly permits such premises, or any part thereof, to be used as a brothel, or for the purposes of habitual prostitution, or (3) being the lessor or landlord of any premises, or the agent of such lessor or landlord, lets the same or any part thereof with the knowledge that such premises or some part thereof are or is to be used as a brothel, or is wilfully a party to the continued use of such premises or any part thereof as a brothel" shall be liable on summary conviction to fine or, at the discretion of the Court, to imprisonment, or to both fine and imprisonment. But this enactment left a landlord, etc., with no means of getting rid of a tenant merely because that tenant kept a brothel. The Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1912, s. 5, provides means by which a tenant, etc., may be summarily got out if such tenant, etc., has been convicted of an offence under s. 13 (2) of the Act of 1885, and further provides that a landlord, etc., failing to avail himself of such means shall be deemed to have aided and abetted the commission of any subsequent such offence during the continuance of the tenancy unless he proves that he took all reasonable precautions against the occurrence of such subsequent offence. The section also provides that if the landlord, etc., does determine a tenancy in pursuance of it, but subsequently accepts the tenant as a new tenant, then any future offence under s. 13 of the Act of 1885 shall be deemed to have been committed during the former tenancy unless the landlord, etc., proves that he took all reasonable precautions to prevent a recurrence of the offence.

Any holder of a justices' licence convicted of permitting his licensed premises to be used as a brothel forfeits his licence (Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, s. 77 (3)), and is disqualified for life from holding a justices' licence (ib., s. 35 (4)). This is a re-enactment of s. 15 of the Licensing Act, 1872.

No justices' licence can be issued for any premises in respect of which the licences of two persons (neither of whom was licensed for the premises on 10th August, 1872) have been forfeited within two years; the disqualification to continue for one year from the date of the last forfeiture. (Act of 1910, s. 36.) The holder of a justices' licence who permits his licensed premises to be used as a brothel may be summarily convicted under this Act (ib., s. 77), but only a pecuniary penalty can be imposed.

The detention of any female against her will in any premises in order that she may be unlawfully and carnally known, or in any brothel, is a misdemeanour with a maximum punishment of two years' imprisonment (Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, s. 8); and there is detention where, in order to make her stay, a female's own clothing is withheld or where she is threatened with proceedings if she takes clothing which has been supplied to her (ib.).

Allowing a child or young person between fourteen and sixteen to reside in or frequent a brothel is a misdemeanor punishable with a maximum of six months' imprisonment and a fine of £25. (Children Act, 1908, s. 16.)

Brougham's Acts. The multitudinous activities of Lord Brougham included a prominent part in procuring the enactment of a number of statutes known popularly as Brougham's Acts. The most important were:—

(1) The statute 51 Geo. 3, c. 23, now repealed and replaced by other enactments, which for the first time made slave trading a felony.

(2) The Privy Council Appeals Act, 1832, and the Judicial Committee Act, 1833, which created the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council (q.v.).

(3) The Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, and the Fines and Recoveries Act, 1833, both of which effected important reforms in the law of real property.

(4) The statute 13 & 14 Vict. c. 21, which was repealed and, with additions, substantially re-enacted by the Interpretation Act, 1889.

(5) The Evidence Act, 1851, which made parties to any action competent and compellable witnesses therein.

(6) The Marriage (Scotland) Act, 1856, as to which see GRETNA GREEN.

Brutum fulmen. A threat to which effect cannot be given.

Bubble Act. The popular title of the statute 6 Geo. 1, c. 18 (repealed in 1825), which was enacted to render illegal and void the methods used for the purposes of the South Sea Bubble.

Buckstalls. See DEER HAYES.

Budge of Court. A former popular corruption of Bouche of Court.

Buggery. This in the common law is the synonym for sodomy, as to which see ABOMINABLE CRIMES.

Building Lease. A lease, generally for a term of ninety-nine years, at a rent known as a ground rent, under which the lessee covenants to erect certain specified buildings on the land demised by the lease, and to insure and keep in repair such buildings during the term. At the expiration of the term the buildings become the property of the lessor. The ground rent is fixed at such a figure that the lessee, after paying it and after providing for the return of his capital at the end of the term, will make a reasonable rate of profit on the capital.

Building Societies. A building society is one established for the purpose of raising, by the subscriptions of some of its members, a stock or fund for making advances to others of its members upon security of freehold, copyhold or leasehold estate, by way of mortgage (Building Societies Act, 1874, s. 13). The advances are generally, but not necessarily, made to enable the members to acquire the property which they mortgage to the society. Theoretically, therefore, the members are of two classes: the borrowing members being those who have obtained advances from the society, and the investing members those who have not, and who therefore simply participate in the profits arising from the interest paid by the borrowers. Provision is generally made by the rules of the society for determining, in case of competition, the members to whom the available funds of the society are to be advanced from time to time. In many cases, however, so-called building societies are little or savings banks, all the available funds being lent to strangers.

A building society formed before 2nd November, 1874, was formed under the Building Societies Act, 1836: since 1874 it is formed under the Building Societies Acts, 1874 to 1894, and is regulated by rules registered with the Registrar (Act of 1874, ss. 3, 16, 17). A society formed under the Building Societies Acts, 1874 to 1894, or which existed before 2nd November, 1874, and has been registered under those Acts, is a corporation (Act of 1874, s. 9; Act of 1875). Unincorporated societies, that is to say, societies formed under the Act of 1836, and not registered under the Act of 1874, are governed by the Act of 1836 and the earlier Acts incorporated therewith: all other societies are governed by the Acts of 1874 to 1894. The number of unincorporated societies is now very small.

Building societies are of two principal kinds: terminating societies and permanent societies. A terminating society is one which by its rules is to terminate at a fixed date, or when a given result has been attained (Act of 1874, s. 5). The general plan of these societies has been thus briefly described:—"A certain number of persons form themselves into a society, of which they become members by subscribing for a certain number of shares. Upon each share a certain periodical subscription of uniform amount is payable throughout the whole duration of the society, the object being to continue the society until the members' subscriptions, being invested, shall amount to a fund large enough to give every member a sum fixed by the rules at the commencement. Thus it may be proposed to close the society when there are funds sufficient to give to the members seventy pounds in respect of each share held by them, and the monthly subscription will be 7*s*. 6*d*. . . . When by means of these subscriptions the society has in hand a sum of (say) seventy pounds, it will be advanced to one of the members upon mortgage of land or house property, and the member will thenceforth pay an increased subscription (perhaps 13*s*. 6*d*.) so long as the society lasts. There are two varieties of the terminating society, called Bowkett and Starr-Bowkett Societies, from the names of their originators": these two varieties differ from one another, but in each the making of advances is determined by ballot, and under s 12 (1) of the Act of 1894 no such ballot may take place in any society established after 25th August, 1894, so that no Bowkett or Starr-Bowkett society can now be formed.

A permanent society, as its name implies, may last for ever (Act of 1874, s. 5). In a society of this kind, shares are issued upon which the various members make payments, either in one sum, when the share is said to be "paid up," 'or by periodical or other sums; the interest is either allowed to accumulate until the share has reached the full value prescribed by the rules, or else paid out yearly to the member, as he may prefer. Advances are made to borrowing members or strangers, repayable by small periodical instalments, extending over a fixed term of years. See DISSOLUTION; FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETIES; BALLOT AND SALE SOCIETY.

Bull. See PAPAL BULL.

Bum-bailiff. A popular corruption of "bound bailiff." See BAILIFF.

Burden of Proof. See PROOF.

Burgage. Littleton (Co. Litt. 108, 109) expressly says that this tenure was simply socage as applied to towns: Coke lets this pass; and this version has, until recently, been generally accepted. But it is completely wrong. The best definition of burgage tenure is to be found in an admirable article contributed by Mr. De Hemmeon to the Law Quarterly Review, vol. 26, at pp. 215-230, 331-348. There (p. 216) he says that it was "a form of free tenure peculiar to boroughs, where a tenement so held might be alienated by gift, sale, or devise to a degree regulated only by the custom of the borough, unburdened by the incidents of feudalism and villenage, divisible at pleasure, whose obligations began and ended in the payment of a nominal quit-rent usually to an elected officer of the borough": and he adds that even such payment was made "only at a very early period of burghal history." Burgage tenure was, in fact, very much the same as modern tenure in fee simple. The great medieval lawyers knew little of the tenure: pleas relating to it nearly always held in the borough courts, and not before the King's judges. Many tenements held by burgage tenure were subject to a great variety of customs, of which the most remarkable was that called Borough English (q.v.), but these customs attached to lands of burgage tenure, not because the lands were so held, but because the lands happened to be within a borough where the custom prevailed.

Burgess. A person who is registered on the burgess roll of a borough.

A man is entitled to be registered if he is of full age and not subject to any legal incapacity, and (a) is on the last day of the qualifying period occupying as owner or tenant any land or premises in the borough; and (b) has during the whole of the qualifying period so occupied any land or premises in the borough, or, if the borough is not a county borough, in any administrative county in which the borough is wholly or partly situate; a man who himself inhabits any dwelling-house by virtue of any office, service or employment is, if the dwelling-house is not inhabited by his employer, to be deemed to occupy the dwelling-house as tenant; and unfurnished lodgings are to be deemed a dwelling-house (Representation of the People Act, 1918, s. 3, Sch. 6 (2)). The qualifying period is six months ending 15th January or 15th July, both days included; but, in the case of a person who is a naval or military voter who has been serving at any time during the six months and has ceased to serve, the period is one month (s. 6) A woman is entitled to be registered (a) where she would be entitled to be registered if she were a man and (b) where she is the wife of a man entitled to be registered in respect of premises in which they both reside and where she is thirty years of age and is not under legal incapacity; and a naval or military voter who is registered in respect of a residence qualification which he would have had but for his service shall be deemed to be resident in accordance with the qualification (s. 4 (3)).

"Burgess" formerly meant also a member of Parliament who sat for a city or borough, while county members were known as knights of the shire.

Burgess Roll. This contains the names of the voters who are entitled to vote at the election of councillors for a borough (q.v.), and who are eligible for the corporate offices.

Burghbote. The liability to contribute to the cost of maintaining the walls, etc., of fortified towns which in Anglo-Saxon times attached to land. See TRINODA NECESSITAS.

Burghbreche. Used in the laws of Canute as meaning a fine imposed on a town for a breach of the peace by the inhabitants thereof.

Burgheriche. Used in Domesday; said to mean a breach of the peace in a town.

Burghmote; Burgemotus. A court, or meeting, of the burgesses of a town for the transaction of civic business.

Burglary, by the common law, is where a person breaks and enters any dwelling-house (q.v.) by night, with intent to commit a felony therein, whether such felonious intent be executed or not. The "breaking" is either actual (as where the person makes a hole in a door or opens a window), or in law (as where he obtains an entrance by threats or fraud, or by collusion with someone in the house). Night is the interval between 9 p.m. and 6 a.m. (Larceny Act, 1916, s. 46 (1)).

A person who breaks out of a dwelling-house by night is guilty of burglary if he entered it by day with intent to commit a felony, or if he committed a felony therein before breaking out (ib., s. 25). "Breaking" is necessary to constitute burglary; but mere entry into a dwelling-house in the night with intent to commit felony is punishable with penal servitude not exceeding seven years (ib., s. 27).

Burglary is punishable with penal servitude for life as a maximum punishment (ib.).

Coke says that "this word burglar is derived of these two words, viz., burgh, signifying an house, and laron, signifying a thief, as it were an house-thief," but Murray rejects this derivation, and points out that the word is an Anglicised form of the thirteenth-century burglator, the origin of which is obscure. See HOUSEBREAKING.

Burial. At common law, every person may be buried in the churchyard of the parish where he dies, unless he was within certain ecclesiastical prohibitions (e.g., not having been baptized), and provided that the rites of the Church of England are observed. But no person is entitled to be buried in the church itself without the consent of the incumbent, unless such a right exists by prescription, as belonging to a manor-house or other messuage The right of burial may be enforced by mandamus or information, or by the ecclesiastical punishment of suspension. The common law rule, that every burial in a parochial churchyard must be celebrated according to the rites of the Church of England, has been abolished by the Burial Laws Amendment Act, 1880, which provides that a deceased person may be buried within the churchyard or graveyard of a parish or ecclesiastical district or place without the Church of England service for the burial of the dead, provided proper notice of the intended burial is given to the incumbent; the burial may take place either without any religious service, or with any Christian and orderly religious service. The Act only extends to burial grounds in which the parishioners or inhabitants of the parish or ecclesiastical district have rights of burial, and it expressly enacts that it shall not authorise the burial of any person in any place where such person would have had no right of interment if the Act had not passed, nor authorise the burial of any person in a burial ground vested in trustees, without the performance of any express condition on which, by the terms of the trust deed, the right of interment may have been granted.

Under the Interments (Felo de se) Act, 1882, any person found guilty of felo de se is to be interred within such churchyard, etc., as he might at common law have been interred in if the verdict of felo de se had not been found; the interment is to be made in some one of the ways authorised by the Act of 1880; but the rites of Christian burial are not authorised.

Fees on burial are due only by custom in each place, and not by the general law.

The principal statutes relating to burials are the Cemeteries Clauses Act, 1847, regulating the making and management of cemeteries by companies incorporated for that purpose; the Burial Act, 1852, making provision for closing burial grounds in the metropolis for the protection of the public health; the Burial Act, 1853, extending those provisions to other cities and towns; and the Burial Act, 1857, as to burial grounds for paupers.

The statutes 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85, and 16 & 17 Vict. c. 134 (as amended by the Burial Act, 1855), and the eleven other Acts which, along with these three, make up the Burial Acts, 1852 to 1900, also contain enactments for providing a new burial ground in any parish where the existing burial ground is insufficient or dangerous to health: in such case a burial board is appointed by the vestry, with power to purchase land for a burial ground, and to borrow money for that purpose, the expenses being charged on the poor rate.

The Public Health (Interments) Act, 1879, empowers local authorities to acquire, construct and maintain cemeteries, subject to the provisions of the Cemeteries Clauses Act, 1847, and the Public Health Act, 1875. See MORTUARY.

The Consecration of Churchyards Acts, 1867 and 1868, and the Places of Worship Sites Act, 1873 (as amended by the Places of Worship Sites Amendment Act, 1882), contain provisions for voluntary grants and sales of land for the purposes of burial grounds, including gifts of land by limited owners, such as tenants for life.

As to the registration of burials, see REGISTRATION.

As to cremation, see that title.

Burn-beating. Denshiring (q.v.).

Burning to Death. Down to 1790, this was the punishment of women for high treason or for petty treason. Petty treason included the murder of a husband by his wife, the murder of a master or mistress by a servant, and several coinage offences. This punishment was abolished by the statute 30 Geo. 3, c. 48, and in practice it had rarely been actually inflicted, the custom being to strangle the woman before she was burned. Compare HIGH TREASON.

Burning to death was anciently the punishment of heresy (q.v.), at first under the common law writ de comburendo haeretico, which was finally abolished by the statute 29 Car. 2, c. 9, and afterwards under various statutes passed between 1381 and 1555, all of which were repealed by the statutes 1 Edw. 6, c. 12, s. 3, and 1 Eliz. c. 1, s. 6.

Burseholder. Borsholder.

Bushel. A measure of capacity containing eight imperial gallons (Weights and Measures Act, 1878, s. 15).

Business Day. Any day which is not (1) Sunday, Good Friday or Christmas Day; (2) a bank holiday; (3) a day of public fast or thanksgiving (Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 92) all of which days are non-business days.

Business Names, Registration of. The Registration of Business Names Act, 1916, s. 1, makes it necessary to register under that Act: (a) Every firm having a place of business in the United Kingdom and carrying on business under a business name which consists of anything except the surnames, with or without the Christian names or initials, of the individuals, or the corporate names of the corporations, composing the firm; (b) every individual having a place of business in the United Kingdom and carrying on business under a business name which consists of anything except his surname with or without his Christian name or initials; (c) every individual or firm having a place of business in the United Kingdom who or a member of which has changed his name, except in the case of a woman changing her name on marriage. "Business" includes profession (s. 22). A penalty of £5 per day for any period of non-registration is provided (s. 7), and a penalty not exceeding £20 or imprisonment not exceeding three months may be imposed for the making of any false statement in any statement required by the Act (s. 9). Every firm or individual required to be registered must set out on all business letters, etc., the true name or names of the person, persons or corporations trading under the business name (s. 18). There are various ancillary provisions, for information regarding which reference should be made to the Act.

Busones. Used by Bracton (lib. 3, tract 3, c. 1) in the phrase busones comitatus, that is to say, the influential landowners of the county.

Bustard. A large edible bird, running up to forty pounds in weight, formerly abounding upon the open heaths which were common in England. Since about 1838 no bustards, except an occasional stray bird from the Continent, have been found in this country. Bustards are included in the term "game" for the purposes of the Night Poaching Act, 1828, s. 12, and the Game Act, 1831, s. 2; but when the Poaching Prevention Act, 1862, was passed it was not deemed necessary to include them in the definition of game contained in s. 1 of that Act. Under the Game Act, 1831, s. 3, the close season for them is from March 1st to September 1st.

Butcher. See SLAUGHTER-HOUSES. If he boils blood, bones or tripe, his business is an offensive trade (q.v.).

Butlerage. See PRISAGE; BOTILER, ETC.

Butt. A cask for wine, beer or cyder containing from 108 to 140 gallons. This measure is not known to the law.

Butter. "The word 'butter' shall mean the substance usually known as butter, made exclusively from milk or cream or both, with or without salt or other preservative, and with or without the addition of any colouring matter" (Margarine Act, 1887, s. 3). Compare MILK-BLENDED BUTTER.

Bye-laws are rules made by some authority (subordinate to the Legislature) for the regulation, administration or management of a certain district, property, undertaking, etc., and binding on all persons who come within their scope. Thus every Act of Parliament incorporating a railway company gives it power to make bye-laws for the regulation of its line, subject to the sanction of the Board of Trade. Municipal corporations have a similar power.

The homage (q.v.) of the customary court in some manors has, by custom, the right of making bye-laws for the regulation of the common, e.g., the draining and fencing of the land, stinting the number of cattle, etc.

Cab. The London Cab Act, 1896, s. 3, enacts that in that Act the expression "cab" shall mean any hackney carriage within the meaning of the Metropolitan Public Carriages Act, 1869. The London Cab and Stage Carriage Act, 1907, s. 6 (1), declares that in that Act the expression "cab" has the same meaning as the expression "hackney carriage" has in the Act of 1869, and (ib., s. 6 (2)), that the expressions "cab," "hackney carriage," and "stage carriage" include vehicles propelled by mechanical power. The Act of 1869, s. 4, enacts that in that Act "hackney carriage" shall mean any carriage for the conveyance of passengers which plies for hire within the limits of that Act and is not a stage carriage; and it also enacts that in the Act "stage carriage" shall mean any carriage for the conveyance of passengers which plies for hire in any public road, street or place within the limits of the Act, and in which the passengers or any of them are charged to pay separate and distinct, or at the rate of separate and distinct, fares for their respective places or seats therein.

Cabinet. All that need here be said of the Cabinet is that it is entirely unknown to the law, being merely a committee formed, without legal sanction, from certain members of the Privy Council holding for the time being the highest political offices. See PRIME MINISTER.

Cables. See ANCHORS.

Cachet. See SIGNET.

Cadaver. A dead human body. Coke (3 Inst. 203), with the recklessness in the matter of etymologies which characterised his time, states the word cadaver is formed of the first syllables of the words caro data vermibus (flesh given to the worms). This, of course, is nonsense.

Cade. An obsolete measure of herrings and sprats. As regards herrings, it contained sometimes five hundred and sometimes seven hundred and twenty. As regards sprats, it contained a thousand.

Cadet. The younger son of a landed gentleman. Afterwards, in the early part of the eighteenth century, applied to the volunteers who, without regular commissions, served in capacity of officers. Now applied only to boys undergoing military or naval instruction as a preliminary to their being given commissions in the Army or made midshipmen in the Navy.

Cadit quæstio. (The matter admits of no further argument.)

Cæteris paribus. (Other things being the same.) Thus where A. is to be selected in preference to B. for an office cæteris paribus, it means that A. is to be preferred to B. if both are equally qualified.

Cairns' Act. The popular title of the Chancery Amendment Act, 1858, which was introduced by Mr. Cairns, afterwards the first Lord Cairns, who in 1858 was solicitor-general and a member of the House of Commons. It for the first time enabled the Court of Chancery to award damages in addition to, or in substitution for, a decree for specific performance, or in addition to, or in substitution for, an injunction in, for instance, an action to restrain interference with ancient lights. The Act is now replaced by the provisions of the Judicature Act, 1873, ss. 16, 24, and except in so far as it had been applied to the County Palatine of Lancaster (Statute Law Revision and Civil Procedure Act, 1883, s. 7) it was therefore repealed as to England (ib. s. 3), in 1883.

The Partition Act, 1868, which also was introduced by Mr. Cairns, is also popularly known as Cairns' Act.

Cairns' Act, Lord. The popular title of the Land Transfer Act, 1875. See LAND REGISTRIES.

Cal—. See KAL—.

Calceto reparendo, De. A writ which lay for the repair of the calcetum (q.v.).

Calcetum. A highway which was paved or metalled.

Calefagium. An obsolete right to take fuel, whether in a royal forest or in a manor.

Calendar. The Acts regulating the calendar throughout the whole of the King's dominions are the Calendar (New Style) Act, 1750, and the Calendar Act, 1751. Those Acts substituted the Gregorian Calendar (or New Style) for the Julian Calendar (or Old Style).

The effect was to cut out of the year 1752 the eleven days between the 2nd and the 14th September. Owing to the increasing error of the Julian Calendar those eleven days would be thirteen if the change were made now. Thus the 25th December of the Julian Calendar is now the 7th January of the Gregorian: see, for instance, Old Christmas Day. A further part of the reform was the provision that no hundredth year except the years 2,000, 2,400, and so on, should be a leap year. See NEW YEAR'S DAY.

Calendar, in criminal Procedure, is a list of prisoners to be tried at the assizes or Central Criminal Court, and of the offences with which they are charged, which is prepared for the use of the presiding judge by the governor of a prison (Prison Act, 1865, s. 62).

Call. This is a demand made upon a shareholder in a company to pay a certain portion of the amount which he, as such shareholder, is liable to pay. There are two kinds of calls—(i) those made in respect of the unpaid portions of the capital of a company in order to raise money for carrying on its business (directors' calls); and (ii) those made to pay the debts of a company when it is being wound up (liquidators' calls). In the case of a limited company, liquidators' calls cannot be made beyond the amount (if any) unpaid on each share; but in the case of an unlimited company, liquidators' calls depend entirely on the amount of the debts and the number of solvent shareholders.

In the case of companies under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1917, all calls due from members are specialty debts (Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, ss. 14, 125). See A & B LISTS; CONTRIBUTORY.

Calling the Plaintiff. It was once usual for a plaintiff, when he or his counsel perceived that he had not given evidence sufficient to maintain his issue, to be voluntarily nonsuited, or to withdraw himself, whereupon the crier was ordered to call the plaintiff: and if neither he nor anybody for him appeared, he was nonsuited, the jurors were discharged, the action was at an end, and the defendant recovered his costs. The phrase was synonymous with nonsuiting the plaintiff.

Calling upon the Prisoner. See ALLOCUTUS.

Callis. Anciently this meant the king's highway.

Call of the House. This took place when, by order of the House of Commons, every member was required to attend the House on a particular day. There has been no such "call" since 1836.

Calves-head Roll. See ROLL OF THE TEMPLE.

Calvin's Case is the case of Calvin v. Smith, reported in 7 Coke's Reports, p. 1. It decided that persons born in Scotland after the accession of James I. to the English Crown were natural-born subjects of England for all purposes of descent, inheritance, etc.: it is hence sometimes called the case of the post-nati.

Camera, In. A case is said to be heard in camera when it is heard privately, the public being altogether excluded.

No criminal case can be tried in camera, whether the case be tried summarily or on indictment (see INCEST); but it is to be observed that justices may, if they think fit, conduct in camera the preliminary investigation of any indictable offence whatsoever.

Under the Children Act, 1908, s. 115, there is power to exclude from the hearing of any criminal charge, or from any proceedings preliminary to such hearing, all children, not being infants in arms or witnesses or messengers, clerks or other young persons who are present in the course of their employment. Under s. 114 there is power, on any proceedings relating to an offence against or to any conduct contrary to decency or morality, to exclude, during the taking of the evidence of a child or young person, all persons not directly concerned in the case except bonâ fide newspaper reporters. For the purpose of these enactments, a child is a person under the age of fourteen years, and a young person is a person aged fourteen years and under the age of sixteen years (s. 131).

In civil cases it would seem to be now settled law that only the Chancery Division can in general hear cases in camera. It is the practice of that Division to take in camera matters affecting wards of court and lunatics, and also, by consent, family disputes. With or without consent, the Division can also hear in camera any case, such as one relating to a secret trade process, in which publicity would defeat the object of the action. The Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division has no power to order that any matrimonial suit, including a nullity suit, be heard in camera, even if the parties consent, on grounds of public decency, the power of the Division to order a hearing in camera being confined to cases in which a party would be deterred from applying to the Court if the hearing were in public or where for other reasons a hearing in camera is necessary to secure the due administration of justice. It would appear that, like the two Divisions above mentioned, the King's Bench Division can also order a hearing in camera in any case in which such a hearing is necessary in order to prevent a failure of justice.

Interlocutory proceedings in chambers are, and always have been, conducted in private. With regard to such proceedings, R. S. C., Ord. 37, r. 1, merely means that oral evidence, as opposed to evidence on affidavit, is, in the absence of consent, to be taken.

Camera Stellata. The Star Chamber (q.v.).

Camisia. The alb (q.v.).

Campana Bajula. The mediaeval name of the hand-bell used at Mass, which, as Cowell explains, was "innocently retained amongst us by sextons, parish clerks, and public criers."

Campartum. A share or part of land. Long obsolete, but represented, in another sense, by CHAMPERTY (q.v.).

Campbell's (Lord) Act. This is the popular title of the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, under which, and the amending Act, the Fatal Accidents Act, 1864, provision is made for compensating the families of persons killed by accident. For the purposes of these Acts, the death must have resulted from the act, neglect, or default of the defendant or his servants, such act, neglect, or default being of a kind which, if death had not ensued, would at common law have entitled the injured person to recover damages in respect thereof. The action is for the benefit of the wife, husband, parent, or child of the deceased person, and may be instituted by his or her executor or administrator; but in case the executor or administrator does not, within six months of the death, institute the necessary action, then any of the persons beneficially interested, whether legally, or even morally only, in the result of the action may institute the same. The damages recoverable are strictly compensatory and cannot be given in respect of the mental sufferings, etc., of the surviving relatives; but (Fatal Accidents (Damages) Act, 1908) in assessing damages no sum payable on the death of the deceased under any policy of assurance is to be taken into account. It should be noted that only the legitimate relatives of the deceased can recover damages under these Acts. See BASTARD.

The first Lord Campbell, who in 1846 was a peer and a cabinet minister, had much to do with the passing of the Act of 1846. That Act, it may be noted, broke down, as regards the matters with which it dealt, the common law rule embodied in the maxim actio personalis moritur cum persona (q.v.).

Campbell's (Lord) Libel Acts. The Libel Acts, 1843 and 1845, are sometimes called Lord Campbell's Libel Acts. He procured the passage of both through Parliament. As to the effect of the Acts on civil proceedings for libel, see APOLOGY. As to their provisions in connection with criminal proceedings for libel, see JUSTIFIABLE. The Obscene Publications Act, 1857 (as to which see OBSCENE), deals with what are in law obscene libels, and is sometimes grouped with the Acts of 1843 and 1845 under the popular title applied to those Acts.

Campertum. A cornfield.

Camp-fight. This meant the fighting of two or more combatants in a field, or set place for fighting, after trial by battle (q.v.) had been ordered, in which case it was once legal, or after a deliberate challenge on some private quarrel, in which case it was never legal. (See DUEL.) It was distinct from mere chance medley (q.v.). See also CHAMPION.

Campus Maii. According to the old books, this was a muster of the people for the purposes of national defence which took place annually on the 1st of May during the Anglo-Saxon period. See Leg. Edw. Conf. c. 35.

Canals. The principal Acts relating to canals are the Canal Offences Act, 1840, which provides for the appointment of constables for duty on canals; the Canal Tolls Act, 1845; the Canal Carriers Acts, 1845 and 1847; the Railway and Canal Traffic Acts, 1854 and 1888, relating to the traffic and management of canals; the Malicious Damage Act, 1861, ss. 31 et seq.; the Canal Boats Acts, 1877 and 1884, regulating the use and registration of canal boats as dwellings and the education of children living in canal boats; the Canals Protection (London) Act, 1898, which makes provision for the fencing of dangerous places on canals within the county of London; the Telegraph (Construction) Act, 1911, relating to the carrying of telegraphic lines across canals; the Larceny Act, 1916, s. 15, which covers larceny from boats on canals; and the Ministry of Transport Act, 1919, s. 2, which transferred to the Ministry of Transport all powers and duties as to canals which had previously been vested in any other Department. See ABANDONMENT OF CANAL.

Cancel; Cancellation. Literally, to cancel an instrument is to draw lines across it, or across some part of it, such as the signatures of the parties, with the intention of indicating that it is no longer in force; thus bankers commonly cancel cheques when they have been paid. A deed is usually cancelled by striking out the signatures and tearing off the seal. (See ALTERATION.) Cancellation of a will, even by the testator, does not revoke it, unless it is accompanied by a declaration executed by the testator in the manner in which wills are required to be executed (see the Wills Act, 1837, s. 20).

Cancellation of instruments is sometimes directed by a Court. Thus, when a person has entered into a contract for the sale of land, and the purchaser refuses to pay the money, the vendor may bring an action against him to deprive him of his right under the contract; time is given by the Court for payment of the money, and if the time expires without the money being paid, the contract is cancelled by the decree or judgment of the Court, and the vendor becomes again the owner of the estate. The Chancery Division also frequently cancels instruments which have answered the end for which they were created, or instruments which are void or voidable, in order to prevent them from being vexatiously used against the person apparently bound by them.

Cancellaria curia. The ancient name of the Court of Chancery.

Candidate. "The correct sense of the word 'candidate' is a person offering himself to the suffrages of the people" said Lord Ellenborough, speaking in 1813 of a parliamentary election: and the definition is still practically accurate. See the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, s. 63, which declares that a person is a candidate for the purposes of that Act if, after the issue of a writ, it is declared that he intends to stand for the constituency. And the definition applies to the multiplicity of elections which now take place. Thus the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 77, declares that "'Candidate' means a person elected, or having been nominated or having declared himself a candidate for election to a corporate office."

Candlemas. The Feast of the Purification (q.v.). Formerly the superior Courts did not sit on this day, which was one of the Grand Days (q.v.): and in the Inns of Court it was celebrated with "sumptuous entertainments, accommodated with music and almost all kinds of diversions." In parts of England, agricultural tenancies date from it.

Canes opertiæ. Dogs of which the fore-claws had not been cut, as distinguished from dogs of which the fore-claws had, under the forest laws, been cut to disable them from running after the deer.

Canestellus. Low Latin for a basket. In the RED BOOK OF THE EXCHEQUER (q.v.), fol. 137, it appears that Johannes de Listone held a manor by the service of making "canestellos" for the king.

Canfara. The ordeal (q.v.) by red-hot iron.

Canna. A rod or rood, whether as a measure of land or of distance.

Canon in ecclesiastical law means either (i) any rule of the jus canonicum contained in the Decretum Gratiani; or (ii) a rule of ecclesiastical conduct promulgated by the Convocation of the Church of England, whether it has legal force or not. Thus, the canons of 1603 have no legal force. See CANON LAW; CONVOCATION.

The word is also sometimes used to denote a rule of civil law, as in the expression "the canons of descent." See DESCENT.

The word also means an ecclesiastical dignitary, as to whom see DEAN AND CHAPTER.

Under the Ecclesiastical Commissioners Act, 1840, s. 23, a number of "honorary canons" selected by the bishops from amongst the "deserving clergymen" of their dioceses are attached to the cathedral churches. An honorary canon, as such, has no emolument and no place in the chapter. See MINOR CANON.

Canon Law is a body of Roman ecclesiastical law, compiled from the opinions of the ancient Latin fathers, the decrees of general councils, and the decretal epistles and bulls of the Holy See. About the middle of the 12th century the confusion and obscurity of the ecclesiastical law induced a monk of Bologna, called Gratianus, to codify the existing materials down to the year 1139; his work was known as the Concordantia Discordantium Canonum, afterwards as the Decretum Gratiani, and included not only the decrees, epistles, etc. themselves, but also a commentary of his own, known as the Dicta Gratiani. The subsequent decrees (Decretales extravagantes) were collected from time to time, especially in the five Compilationes antiquæ, until the inconvenience of these collections led Gregorius IX. to have a new collection prepared, hence known as the Decretales Gregorii IX., in five books. A sixth book (Liber Sextus) was added by Boniface VIII. in 1298, and another by Clement V. in 1313. The two later collections, namely, the Extravagantes Joannis XXII. and the Extravagantes communes (which were added by Joannes Chappuis to his edition of the canon law published in 1500), were not official like the preceding collections. The Decretum Gratiani, and the five subsequent collections, together form the Corpus Juris Canonici.

Besides these pontifical collections, which, before the Reformation, were received as authentic in this island, as well as in other parts of Christendom, there is also a kind of national canon law, composed of legatine and provincial constitutions, and adapted only to the exigencies of this Church and kingdom. The legatine constitutions were ecclesiastical laws, enacted in national synods, held under legates from the popes in the reign of King Henry III., about 1220 and 1268. The provincial constitutions are principally the decrees of provincial synods of Canterbury, from the reign of Henry III. to that of Henry V., and adopted by the province of York in the reign of Henry VI. It was enacted in 1533 by the statute 25 Hen. 8, c. 19, that a review should be had of the canon law, and that, till such review should be made, all canons, constitutions, ordinances and synodals provincial, being then already made, and not repugnant to the law of the land or the king's prerogative, should still be used and executed. And, as no such review has yet been made, upon this enactment now depends the authority of the canon law in England, while all canons made since its date have no legal force, so far as the laity are concerned. See ECCLESIASTICAL LAW.

Canonical Obedience. In ecclesiastical law, this means the obedience due, under the canons or the Church, by those in priests' orders to the bishop, and by bishops to the archbishop: but there is much controversy as to what precisely such obedience is. It certainly is not implicit obedience. Thus in the case of one in priest's orders it means obedience to such orders as a bishop is by law empowered to give; and it does not include obedience to commands given with regard to matters not expressly covered by the ecclesiastical law.

Canonical obedience to the dean is due from the inferior members of the chapter.

A bishop is entitled to canonical obedience, not only from his clergy but also from all laymen on the foundation of his cathedral church. Such obedience is expressly promised by even the bell-ringers of St. Paul's whenever a new Bishop of London is installed.

Cantred; Cantres; Cantredus; Cantredum. A division of a county meaning the same thing as "hundred" (q.v.). It is sometimes said to have applied only to the Welsh counties, with reference to which it is used in the statute 28 Hen. 8, c. 3; but it would seem to have been used as interchangeable with "hundred" as regards some at least of the English shires, especially Essex and Sussex.

Canute, Laws of. A code promulgated at Winchester, with the consent of the Witan (q.v.) apparently between 1028 and 1035 by King Canute, known to modern purists as Cnut. It is divided into three parts, one dealing with ecclesiastical matters, another with secular matters others than those appertaining to the forest, and the third with the forest law. The laws are contained in the Ancient Laws and Institutes of England, as given in No. 2, published 1840, of the Record Commission Series; the first two parts are given in the original Anglo-Saxon, with a translation, and the third part, entitled Constitutiones de Foresta, in Latin. Liebermann, the leading authority on Anglo-Saxon law, suggests that the "Constitutiones de Foresta" are a forgery, compiled about 1184: and he is almost certainly right in so thinking.

Canvasser. As regards municipal elections, a "canvasser" "means any person who solicits or persuades, or attempts to persuade, any person to vote or to abstain from voting for a candidate at an election." (Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 77; Municipal Corporations (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act, 1884, s. 34)). The definition is practically the same for all elections.

Cape. An obsolete writ concerning lands or tenements. It might, according to circumstances, be the grand cape or cape magnum, the petit cape or cape parvum, or the cape ad valentiam.

Capias ("that you take") is the generic name for several writs directing the person to whom they are addressed to arrest the person therein named. They are, or were, usually directed to the sheriff, and are, or were, of the kinds mentioned in the seven titles next following.

Capias ad audiendum judicium. In some cases it is necessary that the defendant in a criminal prosecution should be present in court when judgment is pronounced against him, and, therefore, if he is at large when the verdict of guilty has been given, a writ of capias may be issued for the purposes of bringing him up to receive judgment: this writ appears to be called a capias ad audiendum judicium.

Capias ad respondendum is a writ which may be issued for the arrest of a person against whom an indictment for a misdemeanour has been found, in order that he may be arraigned (q.v.). In practice, however, a justice's warrant is always used (see WARRANT), except where it is desired to make the defendant an outlaw (q.v.). Under the old practice in common law actions, before 1832, the capias ad respondendum was the writ by which an ordinary action was commenced; the defendant was not actually arrested on it, but was merely required to appear and put in common bail, unless the cause of action amounted to a certain sum, in which case he might be arrested or be compelled to put in special bail. See BAIL; VENIRE FACIAS; DISTRINGAS.

Capias ad satisfaciendum, or ca. sa., is a writ for the arrest of the defendant in a civil action when judgment has been recovered against him for a sum of money and has not been satisfied. The sheriff generally returns to this writ: cepi corpus et paratum habeo—i.e. that he has taken the body of the debtor, and has it ready; or that the debtor is so ill that he cannot remove him without danger to his life; or he may return non est inventus—i.e. that the debtor is not found within his bailiwick. Imprisonment for debt having been abolished by the Debtors Act, 1869 (q.v.), in all except a few cases, the writ of capias ad satisfaciendum is now practically unknown, for, in the cases where it is still theoretically available under that Act, it has in practice been superseded either by an order of committal or a writ of attachment. See ATTACHMENT; COMMITTAL.

Capias extendi facias is a writ of execution issuable against a debtor to the Crown, and commands the sheriff to "take" or arrest the body, and "cause to be extended" the lands and goods of the debtor. See EXTENT.

Capias in withernam was a writ formerly used in cases where the defendant in an action of replevin had obtained judgment for the redelivery of the goods, and the sheriff has returned elongata (q.v.). The capias in withernam commanded the sheriff to take other goods of the plaintiff to the value of the goods replevied, and deliver them to the defendant to be kept by him until the latter goods were returned. The practice is now obsolete.

Capias pro fine was a writ issued for the arrest of one who had been fined for an offence against a statute. The writ authorised his imprisonment until the fine was paid.

Capias pro fine (or misericordia) were words formerly inserted in the judgment in certain actions where it was for the plaintiff.

Capias utlagatum is a writ for the arrest of an outlaw. As outlawry has been abolished in civil cases, this writ is now only available in criminal proceedings, and even in those it is obsolete. (See OUTLAWRY.) A general capias utlagatum is against the person only, and commands the sheriff to arrest the defendant and produce him in court on a certain day; a special capias utlagatum is against the person, lands and goods, and commands the sheriff not only to arrest the defendant, but also to hold an inquisition as to his goods and lands, and to take possession of them on behalf of the king. In criminal cases this is also called a capias utlagatum cum breve de inquirendo.

Capiatur. Judgment quod capiatur was a judgment in which appeared the words capias pro fine (q.v.).

Capita, Distribution per. In the distribution of the personal estate of a person dying intestate, the claimants, or the persons who, by law, are entitled to such personal estate, are said to take per capita when they claim in their own rights as in equal degree of kindred, in contradistinction to claiming by right of representation, or per stirpes, as it is termed. Thus, if the next of kin be the intestate's three brothers, A, B, and C, here his effects are divided into three equal portions and distributed per capita, one to each; but if A (one of these brothers) had been dead and had left three children, and B (another of these brothers) had been dead and had left two; then the distribution would have been by representation, or per stirpes, as it is termed, and one-third of the property would have gone to A's three children, another third to B's two children, and the remaining third to C, the surviving brother. See PER STIRPES.

Capital Felonies. Down to only a little more than a century ago, all felonies except mayhem and petty larceny were in theory capital, that is to say, punishable with death, but in many cases the person convicted was allowed benefit of clergy and in others the punishment of death was not invariably inflicted, transportation being frequently substituted.

Now the only capital felonies are:—(1) Murder, for which sentence of death must be passed by the judge (Offences against the Person Act, 1861, ss. 1-3) unless the convict be under sixteen (Children Act, 1908, s. 103). (2) Assault with attempt to murder or act endangering life committed in connection with attempted piracy (Piracy Act, 1837, c. 88). (3) Destruction, or attempted destruction, of royal arsenals, dockyards, magazines, stores or ships (Dockyards, etc., Protection Act, 1772, s. 1).

On conviction under the Acts of 1837 and 1772, sentence of death, instead of being pronounced, may be merely recorded, this being done at the Central Criminal Court under the Central Criminal Court Act, ss. 1, 3-7, and elsewhere under the Judgment of Death Act, 1823, ss. 1, 2; and the effect of recording is the same as if sentence had actually been passed and the offender reprieved (q.v.) in open court. The person against whom sentence is recorded may subsequently be executed if such a course be deemed proper; or, which is more probable, his sentence may be commuted to one of penal servitude or as the Crown may deem fit.

But sentence of death for any offence may neither be passed nor recorded in the case of any person under sixteen (Children Act, 1908, s. 103).

Treason is also punishable with death.

Capital Punishment. Under the law affecting all persons, other than those in the military and naval services of the Crown, the only offences punishable with death are the capital felonies (q.v.) for which the punishment is death by hanging, and treason (q.v.), the punishment of which is the same (Treason Act, 1814, s. 1; Forfeiture Act, 1870, s. 31) unless the Crown sees fit to alter the sentence to beheading (Treason Act, 1814, s. 2).

The enactment that sentence of death shall not be passed on or recorded against any person under the age of sixteen (Children Act, 1908, s. 103) applies to treason and, apparently, to cases tried before courts martial.

In the case of murder, the execution must take place within the prison where the offender is confined at the time of execution (Capital Punishment Amendment Act, 1868, s. 2). Execution for the other felonies still punishable with death must, it would seem, take place in public: but it is unlikely that any future execution will, in fact, be carried out elsewhere than in a prison.

Under the Navy Discipline Acts, 1866 and 1884, and under the Army Act, sentence of death may be passed by courts martial on offenders serving in the Navy and Army respectively for the offences and in the circumstances specified in those Acts.

Capite, Tenure in. In capite, in chief, or en chef, means "directly," "immediately," sine medio, sans mesne. Hence "tenure in capite" primarily means the tenure of very lord and very tenant (q.v.), or the relation between a tenant and his immediate feudal superior, as opposed to a mesne tenure (see MESNE); but the phrase was always applied especially to land held directly of the Crown, and at the present day it is used exclusively in that sense. (See TENURE.) 2. Tenure in capite, however, even when confined to the Crown, is an ambiguous expression. Formerly land might be held directly of the king in three manners. First, it might have been originally granted to the tenant by the king in his capacity of king or lord paramount; this was called tenure ut de corona; secondly, an honour, castle or manor held by a private person might come into the hands of the crown (e.g. by escheat), so that the persons holding lands of the honour became tenants of the king in his capacity of lord of the honour: this was called tenure ut de honore; thirdly, if A held land of B, a private person, in gross, and B's seignory escheated to the crown, then A became tenant of the king, not in his capacity of king, but as if he were an ordinary mesne lord: this was called tenure ut de persona. These distinctions were formerly important, for tenure ut de corona involved many burthensome incidents which tenants of the king by tenure ut de honore and ut de persona were free from, because they did not become tenants of the king by their own free will. (See LIVERY.) Originally each of these tenures was called a tenure in capite, but about Henry VIII.'s reign the term in capite ceased to be applied to tenure ut de honore and ut de persona, and became appropriated to tenure in capite ut de corona, and it is this tenure to which the Act 12 Car. 2 refers when it abolishes tenure in capite. At the present day, therefore, there is no distinction between tenures of the Crown.

Capitula escaetrie. (Articles of the office of escheator.) An enactment printed under these titles in the Statutes of the Realm (Vol. 1, pp. 238-41) s.v. Statutes of Uncertain Date. It is not in the Statutes at Large. It sets out in great detail the matters into which an escheator was to inquire in order to see what he could claim for the Crown.

Capitula itineris. (The Articles of the Eyre) (q.v.). Printed amongst Statutes of Uncertain Date in the Statutes of the Realm (Vol. 1, p. 233-8); not in the Statutes at Large.

Capitula ruralia. Chapters or assemblies of the rural deans and the parochial clergy of every deanery. They were formerly held at first every three weeks, and afterwards every month. Another name was KALENDÆ (q.v.).

Capitulations. These are agreements, concluded between Christian States on the one hand and Mahommedan and other non-Christian countries on the other hand, under which certain immunities and privileges are secured to subjects of the Christian State while in the territories of the non-Christian State. The first capitulations were those between France and the Porte in 1535; and during the reign of Elizabeth capitulations in favour of English subjects were made between her and the Porte. In the middle of the last century first China and then Japan concluded capitulations with the United States of America and with most of the European Powers. The capitulations with Japan have now come to an end. The justification for capitulations is the absence of any system of law under which persons accustomed to Western legal institutions can reasonably be required to be tried; and Japan has now a legal system which cannot be regarded as uncivilised. The essence of capitulations is that the subjects of the State in whose favour they have been concluded form an extra-territorial (q.v.) community in no way subject to the criminal law of China (or whatever may be the particular Eastern State in question). See FOREIGN JURISDICTION.

Capituli agri. Headlands: the lands at the upper ends of the ridges of a tilled field. Compare CAUDA TERRÆ.

Caption. This now means the formal heading of an information, deposition, affidavit, recognizance, or indictment, stating before whom the information, etc., was taken or made.

When a justice takes, under the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1867, s. 6, the deposition of a person dangerously ill and not likely to recover, the caption of the deposition must set out the particulars specified in the section.

"Caption" formerly meant arrest or seizure under civil process.

Capture is, in some cases, a mode of acquiring property. Thus, everyone may, as a general rule, on his own land, or on the sea, capture any wild animal, and acquire a qualified ownership in it by confining it, or absolute ownership by killing it. See ANIMALS FERÆ NATURÆ.

In international law, the strict rule is that when two nations are at war with one another, the movable property of the individual subjects of each nation is liable to capture by the other. In modern times, however, this rule has generally been subject to two qualifications. First, that the capture must be effected by persons holding a commission or authority from their Government; secondly, private property on land is exempt from capture; and, thirdly, that the property, other than ships or cargo, of those subjects of the enemy who are within the dominions of the other State at the time of the declaration of war is exempt from capture, except by way of reprisals. It follows from the first qualification that persons seizing an enemy's property on the high seas without a commission are guilty of piracy.

Capture is either by land or by sea. Property captured by an army on land is called "booty of war" (q.v.), and belongs to the Crown; but it has long been usual to grant it to the captors as a reward for their services. Questions of booty (e.g. as to the persons among whom it should be distributed) are commonly referred by the Crown to the High Court of Justice in its admiralty jurisdiction, pursuant to the Admiralty Court Act, 1840, s. 22.

Property captured at sea (called "prize") belongs to the Crown if captured by one of the King's ships, and used to belong to the capturing vessel if captured by a privateer. The practice of privateering having been abolished in 1856 as between the principal European nations by the Treaty of Paris, questions of prize can now arise only in cases of capture by the King's ships. At the outbreak of a war requiring the services of the Navy, it has been customary for the Crown to issue a proclamation bestowing the proceeds of maritime capture upon the takers—that is, upon the officers and crews who have made or assisted in the capture; but the property in the prize does not pass to the captors until it has been condemned by a competent Prize Court. The High Court of Justice, in its admiralty jurisdiction, is the Court for deciding questions of prize in this country. See further on this point, the titles CONDEMNATION; PRIZE COURT.

Captors, whether of booty or of prize, are of two classes, actual and constructive, or joint. When a prize is taken at sea there is usually no doubt as to who is the actual captor, namely, the ship to which the prize strikes its flag. But it is important to observe that, even so, the phrase "actual captors" includes many others besides those who actually have taken part in the capture. The whole of the ship's crew may not be on board the ship at the time of the capture; or the prize may have been taken out of sight of the ship, and at a great distance from it, by a boat's crew detached from the ship. But in all these cases it is the ship, and not a part of the ship, that is held to take the prize. The whole of the ship's crew share, and are deemed actual captors. In the case of booty, a similar principle is applied by drawing the line between division and division, treating the division of an army as analogous (for this purpose) to a ship of war, so that when booty has been captured by any portion of a division, that division is, in the first instance, to be regarded as the actual captor. Joint or constructive captors are those who have assisted, or are taken to have assisted, the actual captors. But it is not every kind of assistance which constitutes a joint capture; for the leaning of the Courts is against claims by joint captors except in the two cases of association and co-operation; association takes place when two or more ships or divisions of an army are associated under the same immediate commander; co-operation is where the joint captors have assisted the actual captors by conveying encouragement to them or intimidation to the enemy. In the case of naval prize, the rule used to be that the joint captor must be in sight both of the prize and the actual captor to substantiate her claim; but this rule never applied to booty; and now it would appear that there is joint capture as between two ships or two divisions which are so intimately connected—by, for instance, wireless telegraphy—that they act as a single unit. Each case in fact must be judged on its own grounds, subject to the rule that services, to base a claim of joint capture, must have a direct and immediate effect in influencing the capture.

Where a capture is effected by his Majesty's naval or military forces in conjunction with an ally, the capture is said to be conjunct, and is divided between the allied forces (Naval Prize Act, 1865, s. 35): see also PRIZE BOUNTY.

Caput anni. New Year's Day.

Caput baroniæ. The chief seat or residence of a nobleman. Formerly, in the case of baronies by writ of summons, a caput baroniæ, upon failure of heirs male, descended to the eldest daughter instead of going to all daughters as co-parceners.

Caput lupinum. Literally, a head like a wolf's. An outlawed felon, being without the king's peace, was not entitled to the protection of the law and might be killed as if he were a wolf: but this extreme view seems to have been acted on only at a very early stage of the common law.

Caputagium = CHEVAGIUM (q.v.).

Carat. A weight used for diamonds and other precious stones. From, at any rate, the sixteenth century down to the eighteenth century it consisted of four grains (q.v.). Later, it consisted of three and one-sixth grains. Now what is known generally as the carat is the metric carat of 200 milligrammes (consisting of 3.864 grains—approximately $3\frac{1}{8}$ grains), the use of which, and of other metric carat weights, was sanctioned by Order in Council (1913—No. 1118) made October 14th, 1913, pursuant to the Weights and Measures Act, 1878, s. 8, and the Metric System (Weights and Measures) Act, 1897.

Anything made in whole or in part of gold is taken as being divided into twenty-four parts: and if the coin or other article in question consists of twenty-two parts of gold to two parts of alloy it is termed "twenty-two carat"—our gold coins (q.v.) are of this fineness—while if it is eighteen parts gold and six parts alloy it is termed "eighteen carat"; and so on as the proportions vary.

Formerly the term "carat" was loosely used as meaning a weight which was one twenty-fourth of an ounce troy or one twenty-fourth of a pound troy. See TROY WEIGHT.

— Carcer ad homines custodiendos, non ad puniendos, dari debet (Co. Litt. 260). (A prison should be used for the custody, not the punishment of persons.) This would, however, seem from the context to have been said where the prison was for persons arrested upon civil process.

Cards. See GAMING.

Cardwell's Act. A popular title of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854.

Cargo. Goods shipped for carriage. The master of the vessel is the agent of the shipowner for the purpose of conveying the cargo safely to its port of destination, and so earning freight; but he is the agent of the owner of the cargo, where the latter cannot practically be communicated with, for the purpose of taking care of goods, checking their deterioration, and generally doing (under circumstances of danger to the goods) whatever their owner would prudently do. He may, as agent of the owner of the cargo, hypothecate it, as a means of preserving it and getting it to its port of destination; and he may, as agent of the shipowner, do the like whenever he would be authorised to hypothecate the ship (see titles BOTTOMRY; RESPONDENTIA; HYPOTHECATION), but in the latter case the cargo is only an indemnity, and the ship and freight, as being the primary liability, are compellable to reimburse the cargo any damages sustained by its owner from the hypothecation. Upon arrival of the goods at their port of destination, the carrier or master delivers them to the consignee or to his order, being first paid freight and not having sooner received notice of stoppage in transitu; in case the master has received such last-mentioned notice, his duty is to refuse delivery to anyone but the consignor, the latter paying freight. Both the consignor and the master are (severally) liable for a wrongful stoppage in transitu; hence the master should in a proper case interplead. See INTERPLEADER.

Carle. In the time of Domesday this meant a ceorl (q.v.). Compare the Anglo-Saxon HASCARLE (q.v.).

Carnal Knowledge. "Carnal knowledge means the penetration to any the slightest degree . . . by the male organ of generation" (Offences against the Person Act, 1861, s. 63). The definition applies to rape and other criminal sexual intercourse.

The unresisted carnal knowledge of a girl under thirteen is felony, punishable with a maximum sentence of penal servitude for life, and the attempt to commit the felony is a misdemeanour, punishable with a maximum sentence of two years' imprisonment. (Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, s. 4); see also INDECENT ASSAULT.

The unresisted carnal knowledge or attempted carnal knowledge of a female idiot or imbecile of any age, with knowledge of her condition, is a misdemeanour punishable with a maximum sentence of two years' imprisonment (ib., s. 5 (2)). So also is the unresisted carnal knowledge or attempted carnal knowledge of a girl between thirteen and sixteen (ib., s. 5 (1)); but the offender must be prosecuted within nine months of the alleged offence, and, if he be under twenty-three and charged for the first time with such offence, it shall be a defence that he had reasonable cause to believe the girl to be over sixteen. (Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1922, s. 2.)

A householder keeping a girl on his premises in order that she may be carnally known is guilty of felony if the girl is under thirteen, and of misdemeanour if she is under sixteen (Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, s. 6), and proof that he had reasonable cause to believe her to be sixteen is no defence. (Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1922, s. 2.)

To cause or encourage (whether by permitting association with prostitutes, etc., or otherwise) the unlawful carnal knowledge of a girl under sixteen is a misdemeanour punishable with a maximum of two years' imprisonment. (Children Act, 1908, s. 17; Children Act (1908) Amendment Act, 1910, s. 1.)

Caroome; Caroon. Formerly used in the City of London as meaning a licence generally or, more especially, a licence from the Lord Mayor to keep a cart.

Carrier. A carrier is a person who has received goods for the purpose of carrying them from one place to another for hire, either under a special contract or in the course of his business of a common carrier. A carrier who receives goods under a special contract is a bailee, and, in accordance with the general rules governing contracts of bailment, he is bound to use ordinary and average care in conveying the goods entrusted to him. See BAILMENT.

A common carrier is one who, by profession to the public, undertakes for hire to transport from place to place, either by land or water, the goods of such persons as may choose to employ him. Instances of common carriers are: the proprietor of a common stage coach or waggon, and the owner or master of a general ship. A railway company is not a common carrier of passengers, and is a common carrier only of those goods which it is bound by statute to carry, or which it professes to carry without express stipulations limiting its liability. The peculiarity of a common carrier of goods is, that he is bound to convey the goods of any person who offers to pay his hire and that he is an insurer of goods entrusted to him, that is, he is liable for their loss or injury, in the absence of a special agreement or statutory exemption, and unless the loss or injury was caused by the act of God or the King's enemies. In this respect a common carrier is an exception to the general rule that bailees for reward are only liable for ordinary negligence. See BAILMENT; CARRIERS ACT; RISK NOTE.

Carriers Act, The. This is the popular title of the Carriers Act, 1830, 11 Geo. 4 and 1 Will. 4, c. 68. Its object was to modify the common law rule that a common carrier was liable for goods lost or injured in his custody, unless he could prove a special contract to the contrary. Its principal provisions are—(1) that no carrier by land is to be liable for loss of or injury to certain valuable descriptions of property (coin, jewellery, pictures, etc.) beyond the value of £10, unless their value was declared at the time of delivery; (2) that any carrier may require an increased rate of charge for such articles over the value of £10 by a notice affixed in his receiving house, and all persons delivering such articles are bound by the notice, without proof of its having come to their knowledge. The Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, s. 7, contains further provisions limiting the liability of railway companies, canal companies, and railway and canal companies for loss or injury to horses, cattle, etc.

Carrucata. See CARUCATE; PLOUGH.

Carrying Costs. A verdict is said to carry costs when the party for whom the verdict is given becomes entitled to the payment of his costs as incident to such verdict. Where the damages given by a verdict were under forty shillings, the party obtaining such verdict was usually not entitled to his costs, and such a verdict was therefore said not to carry costs; but the judge might certify for costs. And now (except in an action under the Slander of Women Act, 1891—as to which see SLANDER), under R.S.C. Ord. 65, r. 1, every verdict carries costs, unless the judge for good cause certifies refusing the successful party his costs; and this rule holds good even when only farthing damages are recovered in an action for libel or slander. See SLANDER.

Carta de Foresta. This was a charter disafforesting many forests which had been unlawfully made, and generally mitigating the severity of the forest law. It was granted 6th November, 1217. (See Stubbs' Select Charters (9th ed.), p. 344, for a copy of the text.) The title Carta de Foresta is also applied to a statute of 25 Edw. 1, in the Statutes of the Realm. In the Statutes at Large the earlier statute 9 Hen. 3 is entitled the Charta Forestæ.

Carta de non ente non valet (Co. Litt. 36). (A charter concerning a thing not in existence is of no avail.) This is one of many maxims relating to charters which Coke has collected from Fleta and Bracton, and has set out on the page above mentioned.

Carta Mercatoria. This charter (also known as the Statutum de Nova Custuma) was granted by Edward I. in 1303 to certain foreign merchants. In return for certain customs duties it gave them extensive rights of trading, free from pannage and other municipal dues, and the right to a jury e mediatate linguæ in all pleas other than such as were capital. The charter is given at pp. 205-209 of Vol. II., Pt. I. of No. 12 of the Rolls Series.

The earlier statute of Acton Burnel (q.v.) applied only to English merchants.

Carta non est nisi vestigium donationis (Pl. Com. 160). (The deed is but the covering of the grant, that is to say, the grant, rather than the deed, is the really important thing.) This, however, is a quotation from Bracton, in whose time the deed was less important than it afterwards became. Compare QUI HAERET, ETC.

Cartarum super fidem, mortuis testibus, ad patriam, de necessitudine, recurrendum est (Co. Litt. 36). (Where the witnesses are dead the validity of charters must of necessity be decided by a jury)—or what corresponded more or less to a jury in the days of Fleta and Bracton.

Cart-Bote. See BOTE.

Cartel Ship. A ship sailing during a state of war under a safe-conduct which protects her from molestation or capture when voyaging for the purpose of the exchange of prisoners under a cartel.

Cartels are agreements between States as to the exchange of prisoners during war.

Cartis reddendis, De. A writ which anciently lay against one who illegally refused to deliver up charters of feoffment.

Cartway; Carriage-way. A track which is open to wheeled vehicles. Like a footway (q.v.) or a horseway (q.v.), it may be public or private.

Carucage. A tax anciently levied upon land. In the reign of John it was at the rate of three shillings on every carucate; but in the reign of Henry III. it was used as meaning a tax of two marks (about twenty-six shillings of the period—see SILVER COINS) on every knight's fee.

Carucate; Carvage; Carve. As much land as could be ploughed in one year with one plough (caruca). This ancient measure meant in different places anything from sixty to one hundred and twenty acres.

Case is (i) an abbreviation for "trespass on the case," as to which see ACTION ON THE CASE; TRESPASS. It also signifies (ii) a written statement of facts for the opinion of counsel; (iii) in House of Lords Privy Council practice, a statement prepared and printed by each party to an appeal, showing the facts on which he relies, and containing references to the evidence contained in the appendix (q.v.); the cases, therefore, correspond to some extent to the pleadings in an ordinary action, but differ from them in being prepared independently, for neither party sees his opponent's case until his own has been lodged; (iv) a written statement by an inferior Court or judge, raising a question of law for the opinion of a superior Court, as, for instance, the CASE STATED BY JUSTICES (q.v.; and see SPECIAL CASE). Under the British Law Ascertainment Act, 1859, any Court in His Majesty's dominions may remit a case to one of the superior Courts in any other part of His Majesty's dominions, desiring it to pronounce its opinion on a question as to the law administered by it; and under the Foreign Law Ascertainment Act, 1861, the superior Courts in His Majesty's dominions may remit a case to a Court of any foreign State with which His Majesty may have made a convention for that purpose, to ascertain the law of such State. See CROWN CASES RESERVED.

Case Stated by Justices. Under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857, s. 2, after the hearing and determination by a justice or justices of the peace (including Metropolitan Police and stipendiary magistrates) of any information or complaint under their summary jurisdiction, either party to the proceedings, if dissatisfied with the determination as being erroneous in point of law, is entitled to require the justices or magistrate to state and sign a case, setting forth the facts and the grounds of the determination, for the opinion of a Divisional Court of the High Court of Justice. But where a later statute makes the decision of justices final, they have no jurisdiction to state a case.

A case may be stated from a dismissal as well as from a conviction.

The application to state the case must be made in writing and must be made within three days after the determination of the case (ib.); and it must be served on each of the justices who adjudicated, either personally or by leaving it at his residence. Service on the clerk or on some only of the justices is not sufficient.

Cash. This means either the actual coin which for the time being is in circulation, or (except in the case of the Bank of England) Bank of England notes, or (Currency and Bank Notes Act, 1914, s. 1 (1)) currency notes—popularly known as Treasury notes—for one pound and ten shillings.

Cassetur billa (let the bill be quashed) was an entry made on the record in a proceeding in the Mayor's Court (see FOREIGN ATTACHMENT) when the plaintiff withdrew his action before the defendant demanded the declaration or bill. The proceeding was also used in actions in the superior Courts commenced by bill when the plaintiff found that his action was misconceived and wished to commence a fresh one.

Cassetur breve. (Let the writ be quashed.) In the old common law practice, when the defendant in an action pleaded a sufficient plea in abatement, and the plaintiff could not deny it or demur, and did not wish to amend his declaration, he might enter on the roll a judgment that the writ be quashed, in order that he might be enabled to commence a new action. In practice, the prayer of judgment that the writ be quashed, and award that it be so, were copied on paper and delivered to the defendant's attorney or agent, the same as a pleading, and very often no entry was made on the roll or judgment signed. Under the present practice the plaintiff in such a case would give notice of discontinuance (q.v.).

Castigatory. See CUCKING-STOOL.

Casting an Essoin. The technical term for making the application known as an essoin (q.v.).

Casting Vote. This means the deciding vote which certain persons are empowered to give in the event of an equality of votes, so that there may be a majority of votes. Only the returning officer at an election or the chairman at various meetings ever has power to give a casting vote; and the question as to whether such chairman, etc., can give such a vote depends entirely on the provisions of the statute applicable to the matter, the only exceptions to this rule being the Speaker of the House of Commons and the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, who, apart from statute, have the right to a casting vote, which is always with the "Ayes," and the chairmen of the various committees of the House who also have casting votes, which they give as they think fit.

The question of a casting vote arises neither in the House of Lords nor in any of the committees of that House, the rule being that on an equality of votes the "Noes" have it.

No casting vote can be given in the event of an equal division of the members of any court.

Castle-yard, or Castleward, was a form of tenure by knight-service, the duty of persons holding land by such a tenure being "to ward a tower of the castle of their lord, or a doore or some other place of the castle, upon reasonable warning, when their lords heare that the enemies will come, or are come in England." See KNIGHT'S SERVICE; TENURE.

Casual Ejector. Down to 1852, the nominal defendant, Richard Roe, in an action of ejectment was called the casual ejector, because by a legal fiction he was supposed casually, or by accident, to come upon the land or premises and turn out the lawful possessors. See EJECTMENT.

Casual Pauper. In the Poor Law this means "any destitute wayfarer or wanderer applying for or receiving relief" (Pauper Inmates' Discharge and Regulation Act, 1871, s. 3). See the Casual Poor Act, 1882, which provides that a casual pauper shall not discharge himself from the casual ward (the place provided for him by the poor law) before 9 a.m. on the second day following his admission (or, if he has been already admitted during the month, on the fourth day following his admission) nor before he has done the prescribed work.

Casual Poor. There is no statutory definition of this term: it is, however, used as meaning, with reference to any parish or union, a pauper, not being a wayfarer, who has neither an original nor a derivative settlement therein. The Casual Poor Act, 1882, its title notwithstanding, deals only with casual paupers (q.v.) and not with any separate class of poor.

Casu consimili. (In the like case.) A writ of entry granted where a tenant by the curtesy or tenant for life aliened in fee or in tail, or for another's life. It was brought by the person entitled to the reversion against the party to whom the tenant had so aliened to the prejudice of the person entitled to the reversion. It derived its name from the circumstance of the clerks in Chancery having by common consent framed it after the likeness of a writ termed casu proviso, in pursuance of the authority given them by the statute 13 Edw. 1. It was abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36. See ACTION ON THE CASE.

Casu proviso. A writ given by the Statute of Gloucester (q.v.), c. 7, to a reversioner when a tenant in dower had aliened in fee or for life or in tail. It was abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36.

Casus belli. As between nations, this means some act justifying war.

Casus fortuitus non est sperandus; et nemo tenetur divinare (4 Rep. 66). (No reliance is to be placed on the happening of an event which may or may not happen; and, if it does happen, no one is bound to foresee that it will happen.)

Casus omissus. A matter which should have been, but has not been, provided for in a statute or in rules made under statutory authority.

Casus omissus et oblivioni datus dispositioni communis juris relinquitur (5 Rep. 37). (A point not covered [by statute law] must be decided in accordance with the common law.) "A casus omissus," observed Buller, J., "can in no case be supplied by a Court of law, for that would be to make laws."

Cat. The popular title of the cat-o'-nine-tails with which criminals sentenced to whipping are whipped if they are over sixteen years of age. It is also used for the punishment of convicts and other convicted prisoners who commit breaches of discipline. It must be of a pattern approved by the Home Secretary. The approved pattern consists of a wooden handle about eighteen inches long, to which are attached nine tails or pieces of rope with several knots on each. See WHIPPING.

Catalla. Chattels (q.v.). The term applied originally only to cattle, and from it that word is derived.

Catallis captis nomine districtionis, De. An obsolete writ under which the doors and windows of a house within a borough could be taken by way of distress for rent issuing out of the house.

Catallis felonum, De. (Of the chattels of felons.) An enactment printed under these titles in the Statutes of the Realm (Vol. I.,

p. 230), and also in the Statutes at Large (Vol. IX., App. p. 29), as of uncertain date.

Catallis reddendis, De. A writ which anciently lay against a bailee (q.v.) who had refused to deliver up the bailment (q.v.) to the owner thereof. This writ was replaced by the writ of detinue, and the latter continued in use up to the coming into force of the Judicature Acts.

Cat and Mouse Act. A popular title of the Prisoners (Temporary Discharge for Ill-health) Act, 1913.

Catascopus. An ancient synonym for archdeacon.

Catching Bargain is a bargain for a loan or payment of money made on oppressive, extortionate, or unconscionable terms, between a person having money and another person having little or no property immediately available but having property in reversion or expectancy. Relief against the unreasonable part of such a bargain is generally granted to the borrower. (See EXPECTANT HEIR.) Formerly, the rule was, that mere inadequacy of price was a sufficient ground for rescinding a sale or other dealing with a reversion; but this rule has been abolished, and it is now a question in each case whether there has been fraud or unfair dealing. (Sale of Reversions Act, 1867.)

Under the Moneylenders Act, 1900, s. 1, in any proceedings by a moneylender to recover money lent or to enforce any agreement or security, the Court may, if the transaction took place after the 31st October, 1900, reopen the transaction and give relief if satisfied that the bargain made was harsh and unconscionable.

Catchland. When Cowell wrote in 1607, there were in Norfolk some lands as to which it was not known to what parish they belonged. The tithes issuing out of them in any year belonged for that year to such incumbent, apparently of the adjacent parishes, as was able first to seize them. These lands were locally known as catchlands.

Catchpole; Cachepolus; Cacherellus. A bailiff.

Cathedra stercoralis. See CUCKING-STOOL.

Cattle. Derived from catalla (q.v.), and anciently used as synonymous with chattels. For long it has, however, been restricted in its meaning so as to apply only to animals. Some of the following animals are in various statutes brought within the definition of cattle: Bulls, cows, oxen, steers, bullocks, heifers, calves, sheep, lambs, horses, asses, goats, pigs. There is, in fact, no general definition of the term.

Cattle Gate; Beast Gate; Pasture Gate. A walk or pasture for one head of cattle. Cattle gates are most common in the northern counties. They are mostly of copyhold (q.v.) tenure, the ownership being in the lord of the manor subject to the right of the cattle-gate owner to pasture upon it.

Cattle Insurance Societies. Defined by the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, s. 8 (2), as "societies for the purpose of insurance to any amount against loss of neat cattle, sheep, lambs, swine, horses, and other animals by death from disease or otherwise." If existing before 1st January, 1897, that Act applies (ib., s. 101 (1)); if formed after that date they may be registered under the Act (ib., s. 8). See FRIENDLY SOCIETY.

Cauda terræ. The end of a ridge of arable land.

Causa causans. The immediate cause: the last link in the chain of causation. It is to be distinguished from causa sine qua non, which means some preceding link but for which the causa causans could not have become operative.

Causa ecclesiæ publicis causis æquiparatur (Co. Litt. 341). (The cause of the Church is on the same footing as public causes.) Compare SUMMA RATIO, ETC.

Causa matrimonii prælocuti. A writ of entry which lay where a woman had given lands to a man, with the intent that he should marry her, and he afterwards refused to marry her. The writ did not lie where a man, with like intent, had given lands to a woman and she afterwards refused to marry him. It was abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36.

Causa mortis. Because of death. See DONATIO MORTIS CAUSA.

Causa proxima. The immediate cause.

Causa proxima non remota spectatur (Bac. Max. Reg. 1). (The immediate, not the remote cause, is to be considered.) This maxim was formerly used in connection with policies of marine insurance. The principle enunciated in it is now expressly set out in s. 55 of the Marine Insurance Act, 1906.

Causæ dotis, vitæ, libertatis, fisci, sunt inter favourabilia in lege (Jenk. Cent. 281). (Causes of dower, life, liberty, revenue, are among the favourable things in law.) The law is inclined to favour one claiming dower, life, liberty, or money due to the public.

Causam nobis significes quare. When the mayor of a town failed to give seisin (q.v.) of lands to a grantee of the king, this writ was anciently issued requiring him to show cause for his failure to give seisin.

Cause. Before the Judicature Act, 1873, "cause" was the generic term for ordinary civil proceedings, whether at law or in equity, and therefore included actions and suits, but not statutory proceedings in equity commenced by petition, motion, summons, &c., which were and are known as "matters." Since the Judicature Acts came into operation, the word "cause" has practically been superseded by "action." See ACTIONS AND MATTERS IN THE HIGH COURT.

In the Ecclesiastical Courts, causes are divided into plenary and summary. Plenary causes are those in which the order and solemnity of the law has to be observed exactly so that if there be the least infringement or omission of that order, the whole proceedings are annulled; and in these there must be a contestation of suit, a term to propound all things, and a term to conclude. Summary causes are those in which such order is dispensed with. See LITIS CONTESTATIO.

Cause Book. The books at the Central Office of the Supreme Court in which (Ord. 5, r. 13) are recorded the filing of the copies of writs of summons. These copies are left with the officers to whom the writs are presented for the purpose of having them sealed (ib., r. 12). In them there are also entered (Ord. 61, r. 20) the date of every order, judgment, or certificate in every cause or matter.

Cause Lists. These are lists in which the several actions and matters for hearing in the Divisions, and Courts of Divisions, of the Supreme Court are set down in succession as presented for entry in the lists.

The Daily Cause List is published each evening during the sittings and shows the cases set down for hearing in the Supreme Court on the following day. Similar cause lists are published for the House of Lords, the Privy Council, and the Mayor's and City of London Court.

Cause of Action means the fact or combination of facts which give rise to a right of action. Thus in the case of a simple tort (e.g. an assault or trespass), the cause of action is the wrongful act; in the case of a breach of contract, the cause of action consists of two things, the making of the contract and breach of it, and each of these may be more or less complicated. The phrase is of importance chiefly with reference to the Statutes of Limitation and the jurisdiction of certain Courts. Thus, if A. incurs a debt while he is abroad, the cause of action is not complete, and therefore the Statute of Limitations does not begin to run until he brings himself within the jurisdiction of the English Courts. Again, the jurisdiction of a Court is frequently limited to cases where the "cause of action" arises within a certain district or county. Here the phrase may mean either the cause of action in the proper sense of the word (called for distinction the "whole cause of action"), or the act on the part of the defendant which completes the cause of action, e.g. the breach of a contract.

"Cause of action" formerly sometimes meant a person having a right of action. Thus, where a legacy was left to a married woman, and she and her husband brought an action to recover it, she was called in the old books the "meritorious cause of action."

Caution; Cautioner. Under the Land Transfer Act, 1875, ss. 53, 54, regulating the registration of land, any person interested under any unregistered instrument, or interested as a judgment creditor, or otherwise howsoever, in any land or charge registered in the name of any other person, may lodge a caution with the registrar to the effect that no dealing with such land or charge be had until notice has been served on the cautioner or person who has lodged the caution. And by s. 60 of the same Act, any person claiming such an interest in any land not already registered as entitles him to object to any disposition thereof being made without his consent may lodge a caution with the registrar to the effect that the cautioner is entitled to notice of any application for the registration of the land.

A caution on land is like a notice in lieu of distringas (q.v.), generally known as a stop-order, on stock; it gives the cautioner no interest in the land, but merely entitles him to a notice, so as to enable him to take proceedings (e.g. obtain an injunction or issue execution) before any dealing with the land, by which his right might be barred, can take place. See INHIBITION.

In ecclesiastical law, a caution is a security for the performance of a duty, and is said to be of three sorts: (1) cautio fidejussoria, as where the person binds himself with sureties to do something; (2) cautio pignoratitia or realis, as where he engages goods or mortgages land for the performance; and (3) cautio juratoria, where he takes a corporal oath to perform the duty.

Cautione admittenda. A writ which anciently lay against a bishop who held an excommunicated person in prison for contempt notwithstanding that such person had offered sufficient caution or security to obey the orders and commandments of the Church for the future. It may be noted that nowadays a bishop has no power to imprison even an excommunicated person who refuses to find security for his future behaviour.

Caveat; Caveator. A caveat is an entry made in the books of the offices of a registry or Court to prevent a certain step being taken without previous notice to the person entering the caveat (who is called the caveator).

In probate practice, a caveat is entered in the caveat books by a person who wishes to oppose the issue of a grant of probate or letters of administration (Contentious Probate Rules, r. 7) and has a sufficient interest to entitle him to do so. (See INTEREST.) It is a notice to the officers of the registry requiring them to let nothing be done in the goods of the deceased, that is, to let no grant be issued, without a "warning" to the caveator; it remains in force for six months only, unless renewed (ib., r. 8), and its effect is to stop all proceedings for the purpose of obtaining a grant of probate or administration in respect of the goods of the deceased until the caveat is "subducted," that is to say, withdrawn, or expires, unless a "warning" is taken out When anyone applying for a grant finds himself stopped by a caveat, he can take out a "warning" (ib., r. 11), that is to say, a notice requiring the caveator to cause an appearance to be entered for him within six days. If no such appearance is entered the caveat can be "cleared off" (under r. 67 of the Non-Contentious Probate Rules), that is to say, made of no effect. If the caveator appears and refuses to consent to a grant or to "subduct" his caveat, the applicant for the grant must either take out a summons requiring the caveator to show why the caveat should not be cleared off, or, if anything more than the question of interest arises, he must commence a probate action against the caveator.

In Admiralty practice, where the owner of a ship or cargo, etc., knows that an action is about to be instituted and wishes to avoid having such ship, etc., arrested, he may enter a caveat against the issue of a warrant for the arrest of such ship, etc. (Ord. 29, r. 11), if he files an undertaking to enter an appearance and give bail in any action against such ship, etc. (ib., r. 12); and if, notwithstanding the caveat, any person, without good reason, causes such ship, etc., to be arested, then such person is liable to be condemned in damages and costs (ib., r. 18). In any case in which a solicitor desires to prevent the release of any property under arrest, he shall file in the registry a notice, and thereupon a caveat against the release of the property shall be entered in the Caveat Release Book (ib., r. 8), so as to prevent the release of the property without notice to him. A person entering a caveat without sufficient reason is liable for costs and damages (ib., r. 10). A caveat remains in force for not more than six months (Ord. 64, r. 15).

In ecclesiastical practice, a caveat is entered in a spiritual Court to prevent a licence, dispensation, faculty, institution, or the like, from being granted without the knowledge of the party who enters the caveat.

Caveat actor. He who does any act does it at his own peril; but apart from negligence, contract or malicious intention, this is not a rule of the common law. Thus, where a man shooting pheasants fired at a bird and hit with a pellet a beater who was not in the line of fire, and who was hit only because the pellet had glanced off a tree, it was held that the man who fired the shot was not liable in damages for the injury to the beater.

Caveat emptor. (Let the buyer beware.) At common law this maxim meant, with regard to sales of chattels, that when a buyer of goods had required no warranty he took the risk of quality upon himself, and had no remedy if he had chosen to rely on the bare representation of the vendor, unless he could show that representation to have been fraudulent. To this rule there were many exceptions. Thus, if a chattel was made or supplied to the order of the purchaser, there was an implied warranty that it was reasonably fit for the purpose for which it was ordinarily used, or for the special purpose intended by the buyer if that purpose had been communicated to the vendor. At common law also, on a sale of an ascertained specific chattel by an innocent vendor, he did not thereby impliedly warrant the title to it, though to this rule there were so many exceptions that the law was in practice governed by the exceptions rather than by the rule. See WARRANTY.

The law on both points is now embodied in sections 12 and 14 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893.

Section 14 enacts:—

"Subject to the provisions of this Act and of any statute in that behalf, there is no implied warranty or condition as to the quality or fitness for any particular purpose of goods supplied under a contract of sale, except as follows:—

"(1) Where the buyer, expressly or by implication, makes known to the seller the particular purpose for which the goods are required, so as to show the buyer relies on the seller's skill or judgment, and the goods are of a description which it is in the course of the seller's business to supply (whether he be the manufacturer or not), there is an implied condition that the goods shall be reasonably fit for such purpose; provided that in the case of a contract for the sale of a specified article under its patent or other trade name, there is no implied condition as to its fitness for any particular purpose.

"(2) Where the goods are bought by description from a seller who deals in goods of that description (whether he be the manufacturer or not), there is an implied condition that the goods shall be of merchantable quality; provided that if the buyer has examined the goods, there shall be no implied condition as regards defects which such examination ought to have revealed.

"(3) An implied warranty or condition as to quality or fitness for a particular purpose may be annexed by the usage of trade.

"(4) An express warranty or condition does not negative a warranty or condition implied by this Act unless inconsistent therewith."

Section 12 enacts:—

"In a contract of sale, unless the circumstances of the contract are such as to show a different intention, there is—

"(1) An implied condition on the part of the seller that, in the case of a sale, he has a right to sell the goods, and that, in the case of an agreement to sell, he will have a right to sell the goods at the time when the property is to pass;

"(2) An implied warranty that the buyer shall have and enjoy quiet possession of the goods;

"(3) An implied warranty that the goods shall be free from any charge or encumbrance in favour of any third party, not declared or known to the buyer before or at the time when the contract is made."

Caveat emptor; qui ignorare non debuit quod jus alienum emit (Hob. 99). A purchaser must be on his guard; for he has no right to remain in ignorance of the fact that what he is buying belongs to someone other than the vendor. He must, in fact, investigate the title to lands which he is buying. See ALIUD EST CELARE, ETC.

Caveat venditor. (Let the seller beware.) This is a maxim of the civil law.

Caveat viator. (Let the traveller beware.) This is not law. In the imaginary case of the owner of a yard with dangerous holes in it who allowed the public to pass through the yard, Baron Alderson, in 1855, said "caveat viator," meaning thereby that anyone passing through the yard did so at his own risk. But, in view of later decisions, it may now be taken that in such circumstances the owner of the yard would be liable for injuries caused by the dangerous state of the yard.

Cavers. Persons guilty of offences, relating to mines in Derbyshire, which are dealt with in the BERGHMOTE.

Celibacy (of the Clergy). Before the Reformation, this was obligatory under the canon law, and was enforced by various Acts of Parliament. The effect of the statutes 2 & 3 Edw. 6, c. 21, and 5 & 6 Edw. 6, c. 12, was to make the marriage of all persons in Holy orders lawful for all purposes. Both of these Acts were repealed in 1553 by the statute 1 Mary (sess. 2), c. 2; and in deference to the well-known views of Queen Elizabeth, they remained repealed until they were revived in 1603 by the statute 1 Jac. 1, c. 25. But the 32nd Article (1562) had meanwhile declared: "Bishops, priests and deacons are not commanded by God's law either to vow the estate of single life or to abstain from marriage: Therefore it is lawful for them, as for other Christian men, to marry at their own discretion, as they shall judge the same to serve better to godliness." That, since 1562, has been the law of the Church; and since 1603 it has also been the law of the land.

Cellar. For the purposes of the Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55) (which does not apply to London), the term "cellar" includes any vault or underground room, and no cellars may be used as a dwelling unless so used on 11th August, 1875 (s. 71). A cellar is used as a dwelling if anyone passes the night therein (s. 74). Other provisions as to the construction and use of cellars are contained in ss. 26, 47 (2), 72, 73 and 75 of the same Act, in the Towns Improvement Clauses Act, 1847, ss. 73, 113, 114, and in the Police Clauses Act, 1847, s. 28 (all of which Acts, by virtue of the Public Health Act, 1875, ss. 160, 171, apply to all urban districts), and in the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, s. 35, which last-mentioned Act is an adoptive (q.v.) Act.

The use of cellars as bakehouses is governed by the Factory Act, 1901, s. 101, the most important provision of which is that no cellar may be used as a bakehouse unless it was so used on 17th August, 1901.

Celluloid. As to provisions for the prevention of fire in premises where raw celluloid is stored, see the Celluloid and Cinematograph Act, 1922.

Cenegild. Compensation payable in the Anglo-Saxon period to the relatives of a man who had been killed. It was payable by the person who had caused the death in question.

Cenninga. Before the Conquest this was a notice served by a buyer upon the seller of things informing the seller that the thing had been claimed by a third party, and requiring the seller to appear and show that he had the right to sell.

Censaria. Anciently this meant a tenement let at a non-variable rent.

Censer; Censure. Anciently in certain manors in the counties of Devon and Cornwall every person living in the manor was obliged to pay one penny per annum to the lord after he attained the age of sixteen. The money so paid was known as censure, and the persons paying it were known as censers.

Censorship. See PRESS.

Censuarius. The same as gavelman (q.v.).

Censure, in ecclesiastical law, is a spiritual punishment and consists in withdrawing from a baptized person (whether belonging to the clergy or the laity) a privilege which the Church gives him, or in wholly expelling him from the Christian communion. The principal varieties of censures are admonition, penance, suspension, excommunication, sequestration, deprivation, degradation: see those titles.

Census. The numbering of the inhabitants of Great Britain, which first took place in 1801, and which has been taken every tenth year since then. Up to and including 1911 this was done under a special Act passed in contemplation of each census, the last of such Acts being the Census (Great Britain) Act, 1910. The Census Act, 1920, makes any further Census Acts unnecessary; for it provides that the King may by Order in Council from time to time direct that a census be taken of Great Britain or of any part thereof; but this is subject to the proviso that at least five complete years must have elapsed between one census and the next census and that the Order cannot be made until a draft thereof has been before Parliament for at least twenty days without an address against it being passed by either House. See MONMOUTHSHIRE.

Census of Production. The Census of Production Act, 1906, directed that a census of production should be taken in the year 1908 (s. 1) under the superintendence of the Board of Trade (s. 2) from returns to be furnished by the employers of labour specified in the schedule to the Act (s. 3), such returns to show, in respect of the year 1907, the nature of the trade or business, the output thereof, the number of working days, the number of persons employed, the power used or generated, and such other matters, except the amount of wages, as might be necessary for the purpose of enabling the quantity and value of production to be ascertained (s. 3).

By virtue of an Order in Council made 28th October, 1912, under the authority of section 1 of the Act of 1906, another census of production was taken in 1913 in respect of the year 1912.

The effect of the Census of Production Act, 1917, is that the Board of Trade, without in any way being supervised or controlled by Parliament, as they were under the Act of 1906, can now direct a census of production or a partial census of production, to be taken as often as they think fit, provided that they do so by an order dated at least one year before the commencement of the year in which the census is to be taken.

Centenarii. Jacob, and the copyists of Jacob, state that centenarii were petty judges or under-sheriffs: and this is stated upon the authority of 1 Vent. 211. But the only thing at all resembling centenarii upon the page of Ventris in question is a report relating to the "trover de duabus centenis plumbæ ure" (trover of two hundredweight of lead ore).

Central Body. A body constituted for the whole of the administrative county of London under the Unemployed Workmen Act, 1905, s 1, for the same purposes as the Distress Committees (q.v.), which are subordinate to it.

Central Criminal Court. The Old Bailey Sessions, which from time immemorial had exercised criminal jurisdiction over approximately the same area as that now within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court, were abolished by the Central Criminal Court Act, 1834, which substituted for them the Central Criminal Court. The Central Criminal Court is a Court having jurisdiction to try all offences committed within the City of London, the county of Middlesex, and certain suburban parts of Essex, Kent and Surrey. The judges or commissioners are the Lord Mayor of London, the Lord Chancellor, the judges of the High Court, the Dean of Arches, the aldermen of London, the Recorder and Common Serjeant of London, the judge of the City of London Court, and other persons appointed by the Crown (Central Criminal Court Act, 1834, s. 1). Commissions of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery (q.v.) are issued to the Court, under which any two or more of the judges hold sessions in the City of London, or its suburbs, at least twelve times a year, to "inquire of, hear, determine and adjudge" all treasons, felonies and misdemeanours committed within the district of the Court (ss. 2, 15). Under the Central Criminal Court Act, 1856, s. 1, the King's Bench Division may order any indictment or inquisition for an offence committed out of the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court to be tried in that Court, and under the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Act, 1883, s. 50, the High Court may, at the instance of the Attorney-General, order certain indictments for corrupt practices to be tried in the Central Criminal Court. The Court also has jurisdiction in respect of offences committed on the high seas, formerly within the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty (Central Criminal Court Act, 1834, s. 22). Under the Winter Assizes Act, 1876, s. 5, and the Spring Assizes Act, 1879, s. 2, the jurisdiction of the Court may be extended by Order in Council to any neighbouring county, or part of a county, in the months of November, December, January, March, April and May.

See PALMER'S ACT; DEATH WARRANT; LONDON SESSIONS.

Central Office. The Central Office of the Supreme Court of Judicature was established in 1879 under the Judicature (Officers) Act, 1879, in order to consolidate the offices of the masters and associates of the Common Law Divisions, the Crown Office of the Queen's Bench Division, the Record and Writ Clerks', Report, and Enrolment offices of the Chancery Division, and a few others. The Central Office is divided into the following departments, and the business and staff of the office are distributed accordingly:—(1) Writ, Appearance and Judgment; (2) Summons and Order; (3) Filing and Record; (4) Taxing; (5) Enrolment; (6) Judgments and and Married Women's Acknowledgments; (7) Bills of Sale; (8) King's Remembrancer; (9) Crown Office; and (10) Associates. See the titles of the various officials and title MASTERS OF THE SUPREME COURT.

Century. Occasionally used anciently as a synonym of hundred (q.v.) in the sense of a territorial division.

Ceorl; Churle. A poor freeholder or freeman in Anglo-Saxon times; he might become a theyn, and therefore practically an eorl, by possessing six hides of land (600 acres) with a church and mansion of his own.

Cepi corpus. When a writ of capias (q.v.) or attachment (q.v.) is directed to the sheriff for execution, he is commanded to return it within a certain time, together with the manner in which he has executed it. If the sheriff has taken the defendant, and has him in custody, he returns the writ, together with an indorsement on the back stating that he has taken him, which is technically called a return of cepi corpus.

Cepit. (Did carry away.) Until 1753 (see FRENCH) an indictment for the common law offence of larceny had to contain the averment that the prisoner cepit et asportavit See ASPORTATION; TAKE AND CARRY AWAY, LARCENY.

Cerage; Ceragium. An ancient payment, made twice a year, for the purpose of defraying the cost of wax candles in a church. Popularly known as waxscot.

Certa debet esse intentio, et narratio, et certum fundamentum, et certa res quæ deducitur in judicium (Co. Litt. 303). (The intention, the declaration, and the cause of action ought to be clear, and so ought the point which the court is asked to decide.) The maxim relating to the requirements of good pleading.

Certainty. This, in the terminology of the old practice before the Judicature Acts, was a "plain, clear and distinct setting down of things so that they may be understood." As to what was necessary for such understanding, there was much learning. Now, in pleading, the rule, as laid down by Lord Justice Bowen, is that there must be "as much certainty and particularity as is reasonable, having regard to the circumstances." But now pleadings, although they must be precise, must also be concise: and conciseness was not a characteristic of the old practice. See UNCERTAINTY.

Certificando, De. A writ which anciently lay to compel one to certify.

Certificando de recognitione stapulæ. An obsolete writ commanding the Mayor of the Staple (q.v.) to certify to the Lord Chancellor a statute staple (q.v.) taken before the mayor.

Certificate. A certificate is a statement in writing by a person having a public or official status concerning some matter within his knowledge or authority. The principal varieties of certificates relating to legal matters are the following:—

Analyst.—Under the Fertilizers and Feeding Stuffs Act, 1906, s. 3 (5), the certificate of the analyst to whom an article has been duly sent for analysis pursuant to the Act is evidence of the facts stated therein, unless the defendant requires that the analyst be called. The Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, s. 21, dealing with analysts' certificates as to drugs and as to articles intended for human consumption, is to the like effect.

Associate.—Where at the trial of an action at nisi prius, or at the assizes, the judge directs judgment to be entered, the associate gives a certificate to that effect, which is produced to the officer in charge of the judgment book when judgment is entered. (R. S. C., Ord. 36, r. 42). As to the former practice, see POSTEA.

Charge.—When the proprietor of land registered under the Land Transfer Act, 1875, creates a charge on it, the proprietor of the charge is entitled to a certificate of charge under the seal of the office (s. 22); if he transfers the charge, the transferee is entitled to a fresh certificate (s. 40). It is primâ facie evidence of its contents (s. 80). See CHARGE.

Counsel.—In common law practice, when a summons at chambers is argued by counsel, it is necessary to obtain the certificate of the judge or master that it was a case requiring the services of counsel: otherwise the successful party will not be allowed the costs of counsel's attendance. On the Chancery side, the attendance of counsel at chambers is always certified unless it is expressly disallowed.

Death.—See REGISTRATION OF DEATHS.

Discharge.—A bankrupt intending to apply for his discharge must produce to the registrar a certificate from the official receiver specifying all his creditors of whom the receiver has had notice (Bankruptcy Rules, 1915, No. 227).

Dismissal.—Where a person is charged before justices of the peace with a common or aggravated assault or battery, and they consider the offence not proved, or find the act to have been justified or so trifling as not to merit punishment, and they accordingly dismiss the complaint, they are bound to give the defendant a certificate of dismissal, which operates to release him from all other proceedings, civil or criminal, for the same cause (Offences against the Person Act, 1861, ss. 44, 45).

Incorporation. When a company is registered under the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, the registrar is bound to give a certificate stating that the company is incorporated, and (if the fact be so) that it is limited (Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, s. 16 (1)). Such certificate is conclusive evidence that all the requisitions of the Act in respect of registration have been complied with and that the registration is valid (s. 17).

Land.—A land certificate is a certificate under the seal of the Land Registry, containing a copy of the registered description of a certain piece of land on the register, the name and address of the registered proprietor, and other particulars (Land Transfer Act, 1875, s. 10). It is primâ facie evidence of the matters contained in it (s. 80).

Master.—When a question in an action or suit in the Chancery Division is referred to chambers (as where accounts or inquiries are directed, or a receiver is ordered to be appointed, or a conveyance or other instrument is directed to be settled in chambers), the result of the proceedings is stated in the master's certificate, which is in the nature of a report to the Court of the matters referred to him. In administration actions, certificates may be either general or separate. A general certificate embraces the result of all the proceedings taken at chambers under the judgment or order; a separate certificate comprises the result of only some one or more of them. Separate certificates are made in cases where it is not desirable to wait till the whole proceedings are completed. Thus, in an action for the administration of the estate of a deceased person, where there are debts remaining unpaid, a certificate of their amount is taken at the earliest possible moment, in order that they may be paid. When a party interested thinks the certificate wrong, he may apply to the judge, within a certain time, to vary or discharge it (R. S. C., Ord. 55, r. 70).

Mortgage.—Under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, ss. 39-43, the owner of a registered ship may obtain a certificate of mortgage, enabling the person named in it to raise money by mortgage of the ship to a limited amount. The form and object of certificates of mortgage are similar to those of certificates of sale, infra.

Paymaster-General.—The paymaster-general, upon a request signed by or on behalf of any person claiming to be interested in any funds in Court standing to the credit of an account specified in such request, may, in his discretion, issue a certificate of the amount and description of such funds (S. C. Funds Rules, 1915, r. 96).

Registration or Registry.—When an Act of Parliament requires any document or fact to be registered, it generally provides for the delivery by the registrar of a certificate stating that the registration has been effected. Such a certificate is usually primâ facie evidence of the facts stated in it. To this class belong the certificates of charge and incorporation and land certificates mentioned in this article.

Sale.—Under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, ss. 39-44, the registered owner of a ship may apply to the registrar for a certificate of sale, which contains a description of the ship, a list of registered mortgages, etc., and an appointment by the owner of a person to sell the ship on his behalf, with any limitations as to the price, place and time at which the sale is to be made which the owner may desire to impose. The object of obtaining a certificate of sale is to enable the owner to sell his ship out of the country where its port of registry is situate. See MORTGAGE, supra.

Sheriff.—When a writ of inquiry (q.v.) has been executed, but the sheriff thinks that the defendant ought to have an opportunity to set the execution aside, he may endorse on the writ a certificate to that effect, which will prevent the plaintiff from signing final judgment until the defendant has had time to move.

Solicitor.—No person can practise as a solicitor unless he holds a certificate duly stamped (see the Stamp Act, 1891, ss. 43-48). For a solicitor practising within ten miles of the General Post Office, London, the annual stamp duty is £9; for other solicitors it is £6; but in each case only half-duty is payable for the first three years.

Special Jury.—Where an action is tried by a special jury, the party at whose instance it is so tried has to bear all the expenses caused by that mode of trial, and is not allowed, upon taxation of costs, any more or other costs than he would have been entitled to if the cause had been tried by a common jury, unless the judge, within a reasonable time after the verdict, certifies that it was a proper cause to be tried by a special jury (Juries Act, 1825, s. 34).

Veterinary Inspector.—Under the Diseases of Animals Act, 1894, s. 267, a certificate of the veterinary inspector under that Act is conclusive evidence of the fact that an animal is or was infected with the disease specified in the certificate.

See ORIGIN. As to share certificates, see SHARE.

Certificate, Trial by. A mode of trial which is now practically obsolete; it was resorted to in cases where the fact in issue lay out of the cognizance of the Court, and the judges, in order to determine the question, were obliged to rely upon the solemn averment or information of persons in such a station as afforded them the clearest and most competent knowledge of the truth. Thus, when a custom of the city of London was in issue, it was tried by the certificate of the mayor and aldermen certified by the mouth of their recorder; and this is still the case. So, in the action of dower, when the tenant pleaded in bar that the demandant was never "accoupled" to the alleged husband in lawful matrimony, and issue was joined upon that, the Court used to award that it should be tried by the diocesan of the place where the parish church in which the marriage was alleged to have been had was situated, and that the result should be certified to them by the ordinary at a given day. Now, if the like point were raised in an action brought to recover dower, it would be decided upon the evidence in the action.

The modern substitute for trial by certificate is a reference to arbitration (q.v.), by order of the Court.

Certificatio assisæ novæ disseisinæ. In the time of Bracton this "certification of an assise of novel disseisin" was a means of obtaining what would now be called a new trial of a matter which had been decided by the assise of novel disseisin. It was obtained upon the writ of certificate, as to which, F. N. B., 421.

Certified copy is a copy of a document, signed and certified as a true copy by the officer to whose custody the original is entrusted. By the Evidence Act, 1851, s. 14, it is enacted that whenever any book or other document is of such a public nature as to be admissible in evidence on its mere production from the proper custody, any copy thereof or extract therefrom shall be admissible in evidence in any Court of Justice, etc., provided it purport to be signed and certified as a true copy or extract by the officer to whose custody the original is entrusted. See COPY.

Certiorari (in ordinary cases) is a writ directed to an inferior Court of record, commanding it to "certify" to the King in the High Court of Justice some matter of a judicial character. It is used to remove civil causes from inferior Courts of record into the High Court (e.g., from a County Court or the Mayor's Court), where it is desirable that they should be tried in the superior Court, or to remove an indictment from an inferior criminal Court (e.g., quarter sessions) into the Central Criminal Court or the King's Bench Division, or from the Central Criminal Court into the King's Bench Division, in order the better to consider and determine the validity of the indictment and the proceedings thereon, and to prevent a partial (i.e., biased) and insufficient trial. The inferior Court obeys the writ by transmitting the record of the proceedings (or, in some cases, a transcript of it) to the superior Court. The writ is also used to bring up for the purpose of being quashed orders, alleged to be erroneous, of courts of summary jurisdiction; and in such cases the writ, if applied for within six months (Crown Office Rules, r. 21), will lie (1) where there has been want or excess of jurisdiction when the inquiry before justices began or during its progress; (2) where in the exercise of jurisdiction there has been error on the face of the adjudication; (3) where there has been an abuse of jurisdiction, as by disregard of the essentials of justice or of the conditions regulating the functions and duty of the Court; (4) where the Court is shown to have been disqualified by reason of likelihood of bias or interest, and (5) where there has been fraud.

Where a peer or peeress is indicted of treason or felony, the indictment is removed into the House of Lords, or (if it is not sitting) into the Court of the Lord High Steward, by writ of certiorari.

Cert money; Certum letæ. This was head-money payable anciently by the inhabitants of certain manors to the lord, and sometimes to the hundred, in order to secure the certain holding of the court leet.

Certum est quod certum reddi potest (9 Co. 47). (That which is capable of being made certain is to be treated as certain.) Thus every estate for years must have a certain beginning and a certain end; but where there is lease for three lives in being and twenty-one years thereafter, it is held that the term of twenty-one years has a certain beginning, because, though the date of its commencement is at first unknown, that date becomes certain upon the dropping of the last life.

Cerura. Anciently this meant a mound, fence or enclosure.

Cervisarii. This is said to have meant, in Anglo-Saxon times, tenants who paid a rent known as "drinclean."

Cess; Cesse. An assessment or tax, mentioned in the statute 22 Hen. 8, c. 3. The word is still used in Ireland in the combination "county-cess," which means a rate levied for the administrative expenses of a county.

Cessante causâ, cessat effectus (Co. Litt. 70). (When the cause ceases, the effect ceases.) See CESSANTE RATIONE LEGIS, ETC.

Cessante ratione legis, cessat ipsa lex (Co. Litt. 70). (The reason of the law ceasing, the law itself ceases.) Coke cites the maxim as illustrating the rule of law that, where the king granted lands to a body corporate to be held by knight's service, homage, wardship, then marriage and relief were not due in respect of the land while held by such body, but became due if such body aliened the land to an individual.

Cessante statu primitivo, cessat derivativus (8 Co. 34). (The original estate ceasing, that which is derived from it ceases.) Thus a lease for years by a tenant for life will determine upon his death unless it be made under a statutory power or with the consent of the remainderman.

Cessat executio. The suspending or stopping of execution. If, in an action of trespass against two persons, judgment was given against one, and the plaintiff took out execution against him, the writ would abate as to the other, because there had to be a cessat executio until it was tried against the other defendant; but that is not now the case.

Cessavit was an action which lay where a man who held lands by rent or other services neglected or ceased to perform his services for two years together. The action enabled the plaintiff to recover the land itself, unless the tenant tendered the arrears of rent (if any), and damages before judgment, and gave security for the future performance of the services. The action was abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36.

Cessavit de cantaria. Under the Statute of Westminster II. c. 41, this writ lay for one who had made over lands to any clerk or any religious house for religious or charitable purposes, if such purposes were not carried out within two years.

Cesse. A tenant of land was said to cesse when he neglected or ceased to perform the services due to the lord. See CESSAVIT.

Cesser. The cesser of a term, annuity, or the like, takes place when it determines or comes to an end. The expression is chiefly used with reference to long terms of a thousand years, or some similar period, created by a settlement for the purpose of securing the income, portions, etc., given to the objects of the settlement. (As to these, see SETTLEMENT.) When the trusts of a term of this kind are satisfied (as where it was created to secure an annuity, and the annuitant has died), it is desirable that the term should be put an end to, and with this object it was formerly usual to provide in the settlement itself that as soon as the trusts of the term had been satisfied, it should cease and determine; this was called a proviso for cesser. Now, however, by the operation of the Satisfied Terms Act, 1845, every term of years ceases and determines ipso facto as soon as its trusts are satisfied. See TERM.

Cessio bonorum, in Roman law, was where a debtor surrendered his property to his creditors in lieu of execution against his body. It did not release the debtor from his debts if he afterwards acquired property from which he could pay them without leaving himself in want. The principle of cessio bonorum has been adopted in many continental countries as a mode of giving relief to insolvent debtors, and was formerly a mode of effecting arrangements with creditors in English law. A cessio bonorum is now an act of bankruptcy (q.v.). See INSOLVENT.

Cession, in jurisprudence, signifies transfer or alienation; but it is not a term of English law in this sense. In ecclesiastical law, cession is where a person loses a benefice by accepting a new benefice or preferment, contrary to the Pluralities Acts, 1838 and 1850.

Territory is sometimes acquired by cession, as distinguished from conquest and occupation; and when so acquired, it is customary by some public instrument to define the new allegiance and also the laws under which the territory is henceforward to be governed. The old laws remain until altered by the new sovereign authority.

Cessor. Anciently this meant one who failed to perform a legal duty, and who thereby rendered himself liable to legal proceedings; see Old N. B. 136.

Cestui que trust. This means a person for whom another is trustee. The modern synonym is beneficiary.

Cestui que use. This, in the old law of real property, was a person to whose use (that is, for whose benefit) lands or other hereditaments were held by another person. The modern equivalent is the cestui que trust. See USE.

Cestui que use is a corruption of cestui à que use = "he to whose use." See CESTUI QUE VIE.

Cestui que vie. Where a person is entitled to an estate or interest in property during the life of another, the latter is called the cestui que vie.

Cestui que vie is a corruption of cestui à que vie = "he for whose life:" Compare the phrase "que estate" in the title PRESCRIPTION.

Cestui Que Vie Act, 1707. The popular title of the statute 6 Anne, c. 18, which was passed "for the more effectual discovery of the death of persons pretended to be alive to the prejudice of those who claim estates after their death." See PRODUCTION.

Chacea. Anciently this meant (1) some area for hunting, larger than a park and smaller than a forest; (2) the right to hunt within a certain area; (3) a drove-way (q.v.).

Chafewax; Chaffwax. An officer of the Court of Chancery, whose duty it was to chafe, or heat, and affix the wax used to seal writs, commissions and other instruments. It appears from the Reports of the Committees of the House of Commons, (1803), Vol. 13, p. 250, that in 1798 the office was held under patent by "a Major in the Militia" jointly with "a Captain on Half-Pay," who between them received about £460 a year in salary and fees, out of which they paid £20 a year to each of two clerks, who did the actual work. The office was abolished by the second of the Court of Chancery Acts, 1852, s. 23.

Chaff-cutting Machines. See the Chaff Cutting Machines (Accidents) Act, 1897, s. 23.

Chain. A measure of length consisting of twenty-two yards (Weights and Measures Act, 1878, s. 11).

Chaldron; Chaldern; Chalder. A customary measure formerly used for coals, and still used for coke. The London chaldron of coal weighs about thirty cwt., the Newcastle chaldron weighs about fifty-three cwt.

In law the chaldron is a measure of capacity, containing thirty-six bushels, and each bushel contains eight gallons (Weights and Measures Act, 1878, s. 15). Coal must now be sold by weight only, except where, by the written consent of the purchaser, it is sold by boatload or by waggons or tubs delivered from the colliery into the works of the purchaser (s. 20).

Challenge of Jurors. This is an objection to persons returned to be jurors in a civil or criminal proceeding. It is of two kinds—to the array, or to the polls.

A challenge to the array is an exception to the whole jury in respect of some partiality or default of the sheriff or other officer. It must specify the grounds on which it is made, and it must be in writing. Some causes of challenge to the array are called principal challenges, because if they are true they must be allowed, while others are called challenges for favour, because they show some grounds that imply a probability of favour or partiality, but are left to the discretion of the triors. A challenge to the array may be made in civil as well as in criminal cases.

Challenges to the polls (that is, to particular jurors) are made orally and are of five kinds: (1) A peremptory challenge is where the objecting party may challenge without showing any cause; this is only allowed in trials for treason or felony, in favorem vitæ, and is restricted to thirty-five jurors in the former generally (Treason Act, 1695, s. 2), and twenty in treason affecting the person of the sovereign (Treason Acts, 1800 and 1842), or in felony (Juries Act, 1825, s. 29). The following kinds of challenges are called by way of distinction "challenges for cause": and they may be made to any extent by any prisoner charged with any indictable offence; (2) Propter honoris respectum, as where a lord of Parliament is empanelled on a jury; (3) propter defectum, for some want or default in the individual juror, e.g., persons not having qualification, idiots, and (Juries Act, 1870, s. 8), aliens neither domiciled nor naturalized; (4) propter affectum, for suspicion of partiality, which is either (a) a principal challenge, as where the juror is of kin to either party, or has an interest in the cause, etc.; or (b) a challenge to the favour, where there is merely a probability of bias; (5) propter delictum, for some crime or misdemeanour.

Challenges are tried and determined by triors appointed by the Court, or, in some cases, by the Court itself, or by persons who have been already sworn on the jury. See ELISORS.

The Crown, although it can challenge for cause, has no peremptory challenge; but it may order any person to "stand by," and need not show cause against any such person unless it appears, after the panel has been called over, that without him a full jury cannot be constituted.

Challenge to Fight. It is a misdemeanour, punishable with fine and imprisonment, to challenge any person to fight a duel, or to endeavour to provoke him to send a challenge.

Chamber-clerks. This is the legal title of the personal officers of the judges. In the case of the Lord Chief Justice and of the Master of the Rolls, these officers are a secretary, a principal clerk and a junior clerk, whose annual salaries respectively are £500, £400 and £200; each ordinary judge of the Court of Appeal has a principal clerk, whose salary is £400; and every other judge of the Supreme Court has a junior clerk, whose salary is £200. All such officers are appointed by, and hold office at the pleasure of, the judges to whom respectively they are attached (Judicature Act, 1873, s. 79).

Chamber-deacons; Chamberdekyns. The statute 1 Hen. 5, c. 8, enacted that "All Irishmen and Irish Clerks, Beggars called Chamber-deacons" should be banished out of the realm "except such as be graduates in the Schools [i.e., the universities] and Serjeants and Apprentices of the Law and such as be Inheritors in England, and religious persons professed, and except the Merchants born in Ireland of good name and their Apprentices now living in England and them with whom the King will dispense."

The chamber-deacons seem to have been impecunious Irish scholars who frequented the universities and the Inns of Court.

Chamberlain of the City of London. From time immemorial this officer has been the treasurer of the City. Anciently he acted as banker, and so made a profit. Now he lodges all moneys with the Bank of England, and his only emolument as Chamberlain is a salary of £2,000 a year. The office is in the gift of the corporation. The Chamberlain keeps the roll of freemen and presents those distinguished persons on whom the freedom of the City is to be conferred. He is also treasurer of the Commissioners of Sewers (q.v.) of the City of London. He has a court, known as the Chamberlain's Court, in which, as well as in the police courts, disputes between masters and apprentices may be determined.

Chamberlain of the Exchequer. See TALLY.

Chamberlain, Lord. An officer of the royal household, who, amongst other functions, appoints the various royal tradesmen and the professional men who attend the household. He performs no political functions, but he is nominated by the Prime Minister for the time being and goes out of office with the ministry. Outside the royal household he has the control of theatres (q.v.) in London. He is quite distinct from the Lord Great Chamberlain.

Chamberlain, Lord Great. This is an hereditary office dating from the year 1133. It has descended through co-heiresses to the Earl of Ancaster, the Marquis of Lincolnshire and the Marquis of Cholmondely, who together have the right of appointing a deputy. In default of their agreeing, the King may appoint. The Marquis of Lincolnshire is at present the deputy.

The office is unpaid. The duties consist of certain ceremonial attendances at a coronation, of the care of the Houses of Parliament, and of introducing peers and bishops on their first taking their seats in the Lords.

Chambers. Attached to the various Divisions of the High Court are rooms called chambers, in which the judges and their deputies, the masters, or, in the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division, the registrars, sit to transact business which does not require to be done in Court, or can be more conveniently disposed of in chambers. The proceedings in chambers are private, only the parties or their solicitors and counsel being admitted. Judges may exercise in chambers all such jurisdiction as is authorised by rules of court (Judicature Act, 1873, s. 39; Judicature Act, 1875, s. 17). The rules bearing on the matter are Ord. 54, as regards chambers generally, and Ord. 55 as regards chambers in the Chancery Division. In the chambers of the King's Bench Division the masters, and in the chambers of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division the registrars, have the same jurisdiction under Ord. 54, r. 12, as a judge has in chambers, except as regards the matters specified in that rule. In the chambers of the Chancery Division, the masters have power to hear and determine such matters as the judges may order (Ord. 55, r. 15), but trustee matters may not be dealt with by a master (ib., r. 15A); any party is, however, entitled to demand that any question be decided by the judge personally. An appeal lies to the Court of Appeal against an order made in chambers of the Chancery Division, but only where the judge certifies that he does not desire to hear further argument; and in the absence of such certificate the proper course is to move the judge in Court to set the order aside. (See the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 50.) In the King's Bench Division, appeal from an order of a master in chambers is to a judge in chambers (Ord. 54, r. 21), and appeal from an order of a judge in chambers is to a Divisional Court (Ord. 54, rr. 23, 24), unless the order relates to practice and procedure, in which case appeal is to the Court of Appeal (Judicature Act, 1894, s. 1).

Chambers of the King; Regiæ cameræ. Inlets of the sea included within the territorial waters of the realm.

Champarty, or Champerty. This is a species of maintenance (q.v.) which consists in the purchasing of an interest in the thing in dispute, with the object of maintaining and taking part in the litigation. It is not champerty if the parties have a common interest; and a moral interest, as that of a parent in a child, suffices: nor is it champerty simply to mortgage the property in litigation with a view to raise the requisite funds.

Champerty is a common law misdemeanour, but prosecutions are rare.

Any bargain which "savours of champerty" is void, as being against the policy of the law. And so the Courts will not uphold any bargain under which A is to assist B in recovering property by an action and to receive a share of such property as may be recovered.

Champertors. An obsolete term meaning persons who are guilty of champerty (q.v.).

Champion. In trial by battle (q.v.), clerks, infants, children, and those over sixty years of age were from the first allowed to employ "champions," who fought in their stead; and subsequently the right to employ champions was extended to all litigants. Down to the enactment in 1275 of the Statute of Westminster I. (3 Edw. 1, c. 41), the champion was obliged to swear to his belief in the truth of the case set up by his principal, and, if it could be proved that he had sworn falsely, he was liable to lose a hand or a foot. See APPEAL OF FELONY; ASSIZE, GRAND.

Champion, The King's. An hereditary officer who holds by virtue of the tenure of the Manor of Scrivelsby, in Lincolnshire. Since 1377 the manor and the office have been held by the Dymoke family. The duty of the king's champion was to ride, in full armour, into Westminster Hall during the banquet which was formerly held there upon the occasion of a coronation and, through a herald, to challenge to single combat anyone who denied the king's title to the crown. The king then drank to the champion and sent him a gilt cup of wine. The champion drank the wine and retained the cup. This ceremony was performed at the coronation of Richard II. in 1377 and at all subsequent coronations, except those of the first two Georges, down to and including that of George IV., on which last-mentioned occasion it was performed by the eldest son of the champion, as deputy for the champion, who himself was in Holy orders.

Chancel is that part of a church which was originally set apart for the clergy to perform their religious offices; it answers to the choir in a cathedral or collegiate church. The rector or lay impropriator is bound to repair the chancel, and in return he is entitled as of common right to the chief seat in it, unless some other parishioner has it by prescription. Chancel is derived from cancelli, a lattice-work partition between it and the body of the church.

Chancellor. A chancellor is a judicial officer of a king, a bishop, or other high dignitary, or of a university.

The Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain

is "created by the mere delivery of the king's great seal into his custody, whereby he becomes, without writ or patent, an officer of the greatest weight and power of any now subsisting in the kingdom, and superior in point of precedency to every temporal lord. He is a privy councillor by his office, and, according to Lord Chancellor Ellesmere, prolocutor (or speaker) of the House of Lords by prescription. To him (under the crown) belongs the appointment of all justices of the peace throughout the kingdom. Being formerly usually an ecclesiastic (for none else were then capable of an office so conversant in writings), and presiding over the royal chapel, he became keeper of the king's conscience, visitor (in right of the king) of all hospitals and colleges of the king's foundation, and patron of all the king's livings under the value of twenty marks per annum in the king's books. He is the general guardian of all infants, idiots and lunatics, and has the general superintendence of all charitable uses in the kingdom." So Blackstone wrote a hundred and fifty years ago; and what he wrote need be varied only by saying that the duties mentioned in the last sentence are now entrusted to other judges. The Lord Chancellor was formerly the principal judge of the Court of Chancery, and is still president of the Court of Appeal and of the Chancery Division of the High Court, though he rarely sits except in the House of Lords. He acts as president of the House of Lords when it sits as a Court of Appeal. He is therefore, of course, a barrister—although in law there is nothing to prevent a layman from being Lord Chancellor, —and, as a rule, has previously either been Attorney- or Solicitor-General or held some judicial office. He is also a cabinet minister, and has charge in the House of Lords of all legal measures brought forward by the Government. He continues to be a member of the Court of Appeal after he vacates office, but he is under no obligation to sit in that Court (Judicature Act, 1891, s. 1). His salary is £10,000 a year and his retiring allowance is £5,000 a year. He vacates his office by mere delivery to the King of the Great Seal.

The Lord Chancellor nominates the judges of the High Court, except the Lord Chief Justice, who is nominated by the Prime Minister; and he appoints, and for inability or misbehaviour can remove, all County Court judges except those for districts within the Duchy of Lancaster (County Courts Act, 1888, ss. 8, 15). The Lord Chancellor cannot be a Roman Catholic (q.v.); but he need not be a member of the Church of England; and there is apparently nothing in the law—whatever there may be in constitutional practice—to prevent his being a Jew (q.v.).

The Chancellor of the Duchy and County Palatine of Lancaster is an official of the Crown as owner of the Duchy of Lancaster. He is really a politician who is appointed to the office in order that he may draw a salary of £2,000 a year, although he is nominally the judge of the Chancery Court of the County Palatine (see CHANCERY) and of the Duchy Court of Lancaster (q.v.). The judicial duties of the former Court are performed by the Vice-Chancellor, and the latter Court no longer sits, though it has never been actually abolished. The Chancellor appoints, and may remove for inability or misbehaviour, County Court judges for districts within the duchy (County Courts Act, 1888, ss. 8, 15); and within the duchy he appoints justices upon the recommendation of the lord lieutenant.

The chancellor of a bishop or diocese is a judicial officer who acts as the delegate of the bishop in hearing ecclesiastical causes, etc. The office generally includes in it two other offices—that of official principal (q.v.), and that of vicar-general (q.v.).

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (q.v.) was an officer originally appointed to act as a check on the Lord Treasurer, and was a judge of the Court of Exchequer sitting as a Court of Equity. The office, however, has long ceased to belong to the Exchequer in the modern sense of the word, and has become part of the Treasury. The judicial functions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer were formally abolished by the Judicature Acts, having long been practically obsolete. He now acts only as what in other countries would be called the Finance Minister. He is always a member of the Cabinet and is the minister responsible for the management of the financial affairs of the nation.

Chancellors of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge are elected by the masters of arts of those universities. They are generally persons of rank or of distinction. Their functions are mainly honorary. Through his vice-chancellor the Chancellor of the University of Oxford still exercises judicial functions. See UNIVERSITY COURTS.

The word "chancellor" is derived from cancellarius, a clerk, said to be so called from his sitting ad cancellos, at the railing which separated the judges from the public. Compare BAR.

Chance-medley is where a man is assaulted in the course of a sudden brawl or quarrel, and, after he has declined any further combat, kills his adversary in self-defence. It is a variety of excusable homicide. Coke paraphrases "chance-medley" as "homicide per infortunium"; but others say that the term is a corruption of chaude meslée, a hot fight; and Mr. Murray derives it from the Anglo-French "chance medlée, mixed or mingled chance or casualty." See HOMICIDE.

Chancery. Before the Judicature Act, 1873, came into operation on 1st November, 1875, the Chancery consisted of two Courts, and a number of offices. The court of equity, or the equity side of the Court of Chancery, which is generally meant by the expression "Court of Chancery," was the principal Court in which that part of the law of England known as "equity" (q.v.) was enforced. It consisted of four judges of first instance, namely, the Master of the Rolls (q.v.), and three vice-chancellors (q.v.), and a Court of Appeal, consisting of the Lord Chancellor and two Lords Justices (q.v.). Not only did the law administered in the Court of Chancery differ from that recognised in the Courts of Common Law, but it had also a different procedure. See SUIT; BILL OF COMPLAINT; PETITION; MATTER.

By the Judicature Acts the Court of Chancery was merged in the Supreme Court of Judicature, and its practice was altered (see ACTIONS AND MATTERS); but its judges of first instance now form a separate Division of the High Court, namely, the Chancery Division, which retains most of the business which was formerly within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery; and in many of its details the practice in Chancery proceedings remains the same as before. The Chancery Division also retains many of the various offices and officers attached to the Court of Chancery, while others have been abolished. See ACCOUNTS AND ENQUIRIES; CERTIFICATE; EQUITY; INQUIRY; MASTERS IN CHANCERY; RECORD AND WRIT CLERK.

The common law court and offices of the Chancery are much more ancient than the equity court, the jurisdiction of the latter having been originally an encroachment, and hence in old books the equitable jurisdiction of the Court is called its extraordinary jurisdiction. The most important part of the common law side of the Court of Chancery was its offices, especially the Petty Bag Office, the Hanaper Office and the Enrolment Office, the two former of which were concerned in issuing or sealing original writs, writs of error, parliamentary writs, letters patent, commissions to inquire as to lunatics, charities, &c., while in the Enrolment Office, as its name implies, deeds, etc., were enrolled or entered on record. The Court on this side of the Chancery had jurisdiction in matters relating to the business of the offices—e.g. in proceedings by scire facias to repeal letters patent, to enforce recognisances, in traverses of offices, and inquisitions, etc. See PETTY BAG OFFICE; SCIRE FACIAS; ENROLMENT; HANAPER.

By the Judicature Act, 1873, the Court of Chancery, as a common law court, and its offices, were transferred to the Supreme Court of Judicature. By the Judicature (Officers) Act, 1879, the Enrolment Office was consolidated (with others) into the Central Office of the Supreme Court, and the Petty Bag Office was abolished.

The Chancery Court of the County Palatine of Durham still exists. The "Chancellor of the County Palatine of Durham and Sadberghe," or Chancellor of Durham, is the judge. The Court has jurisdiction within the area of the ancient county palatine, which includes the modern county; see the Durham (County Palatine) Act, 1836. Its jurisdiction is concurrent with that of the High Court. Its procedure is now regulated by the Palatire Court of Durham Act, 1889, which (s. 11) gives a right of appeal to the Court of Appeal and thence to the House of Lords.

The Court of Chancery of the County Palatine of Lancaster is a Court having a local jurisdiction in equity. Its local jurisdiction is the same as that of the High Court (Chancery of Lancaster Act, 1890, s. 3). It consists of a vice-chancellor, with a registrar and other officers, forming a Court of first instance, from which an appeal formerly lay to the "Court of Appeal in Chancery of the County Palatine of Lancaster," consisting of the Chancellor of the Duchy and the Lords Justices of the Court of Appeal in Chancery; but this appellate jurisdiction was transferred to the Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court by the Judicature Acts, 1873 and 1875, and there is also an appeal to the House of Lords (Chancery of Lancaster Act, 1890, s. 4).

The Chancery Court of York is the ecclesiastical Court of Appeal for cases decided in the diocesan Courts within the province of York. The judge is called the official principal of the Court; he is also official principal of the Court of Arches (q.v.) (Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874, s. 7).

The Chancery was originally an office for the issue of writs, including the original writs by which all common law actions were commenced in ancient times (see OFFICINA JUSTITIAE). It was the business of the clerks in the Chancery to "hear and examine the petitions and complaints of suitors, and give them a remedy by the king's writ fitted to their case." The Chancellor being keeper of the king's seal also had the sealing of all charters, letters patent, and other public instruments; hence when any question arose on a charter, patent, commission, etc., proceedings were taken before the Chancellor; this was the origin of its common law jurisdiction. As to its equitable or extraordinary jurisdiction, see EQUITY; SUBPŒNA; COMMISSION OF REBELLION.

Chancery Master. See CHIEF CLERKS.

Chancery Orders. These were orders issued from time to time by the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Keeper, or the Commissioner of the Great Seal for the regulation of the procedure of the Court of Chancery. They were issued in a rudimentary form as early as the reign of Richard II., and in a more complete form during the chancellorship of Bacon and his various successors down to the coming into force of the Judicature Acts. They are now entirely replaced by the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883.

Chandos Clause. The popular title of s. 20 of the Representation of the People Act [The Reform Bill], 1832. It gave the parliamentary franchise in counties (1) to persons possessed of premises of the annual value of not less than £10 held for the unexpired residues of terms which were originally not less than sixty years, or of premises of the annual value of not less than £50 held for the unexpired residues of terms which were originally not less than twenty years, and (2) to tenants paying a yearly rent of not less than £50.

The insertion of the section was moved by the Marquis of Chandos, M.P., eldest son of the Duke of Buckingham.

Channel Islands. These islands (of which the most important are Alderney, Guernsey, Jersey and Sark) form part of the British Islands (Interpretation Act, 1889). They have codes of laws peculiar to themselves, based upon the ancient laws of Normandy: and they are not bound by any British Act of Parliament unless expressly mentioned therein. The Crown claims the right to legislate by means of Orders in Council without consulting the local legislature. See APPROBATION DES LOIS; GRAND COUSTUMIER; PRÉCEPTE D'ASSIZE.

Chapels belonging to the Church of England are of the following kinds: A chapel of ease is one which is used only for the ease of the parishioners in prayers and preaching, while the sacraments and burial are received and performed at the mother church; the curate of such a chapel is generally removable at the pleasure of the parochial minister. A parochial chapel is one which has the privilege of administering the sacraments (especially baptism), and the office of burial. A free-chapel is one which is exempt from the jurisdiction of the bishop of the diocese, having been erected either by the Crown, or by the Crown's licence, with that exemption. Private chapels are such as noblemen and other persons have, at their own private charge, built in and near their own houses, for them and their families to perform religious duties in. The minister is called a chaplain, and is nominated by the owner of the chapel. There are also chapels built or endowed under Acts of Parliament, especially under the Church Building and Church Extension Acts; the principal of these are (i) district chapelries or chapels to which districts have been assigned by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; such chapels have perpetual curates, with tithes, and exclusive cure of souls, and differ from churches in little more than name; (ii) consolidated chapelries, which differ from district chapelries chiefly in being formed out of portions of many parishes; (iii) chapels to which an endowment, without a district, has been granted by the Commissioners. See PROPRIETARY CHAPELS.

Chaplain. This, simpliciter, means a clergyman who conducts divine service in a chapel. There are, however, many kinds of chaplains, such as the chaplains-in-ordinary to the King, who perform divine service in the chapel of St. James's Palace; and chaplains, such as Army and Navy chaplains, prison chaplains, and lunatic asylum chaplains, whose position is dealt with by various statutes.

Formerly various private persons were authorised by various statutes (such as the 22 Hen. 8, c. 13; the 25 Hen. 8, c. 16, and the 33 Hen. 8, c. 28) to retain in their service chaplains in numbers varying from six for a duke down to one for the Attorney-General. Such chaplains enjoyed various privileges regarding the holding of plural livings. See ST. JOHN'S, ETC.

Chapter. See DEAN AND CHAPTER.

Character. Evidence as to the character of a party to a judicial proceeding is not, in general, admissible, unless the nature of the proceeding is such as to put his character in issue. In an action for seduction, or in a prosecution for rape or attempted rape, evidence may be given as to the character of the woman for chastity. A prisoner may call witnesses to speak to his character in reference to the charge against him, and the prosecutor may then adduce evidence of his general bad character, but he cannot go into particular instances of misconduct, except (1) in the case of a prisoner charged with felony not punishable with death, in which case, if the prisoner calls witnesses as to character, the prosecutor may, in answer thereto, give evidence of his conviction for a previous felony (Previous Conviction Act, 1836), and except (2) in the case of a prisoner charged with any offence under the Larceny Act, 1861, in which case, if the prisoner calls evidence of good character, the prosecutor may prove any previous conviction, whether summarily or on indictment (Larceny Act, 1861, s. 116); and except also (3) in the case of any prosecution under the Coinage Offences Act, 1861, or earlier Acts as to the coinage, in which case, if the prisoner calls evidence of good character, the prosecution may prove any previous conviction under any such Act (Coinage Offences Act, 1861, s. 37).

Evidence is also admissible to show that a witness is unworthy of credit, such evidence being that of persons who swear that from their knowledge of the witness they believe him to be unworthy of credit on his oath. If a witness is asked whether he has been convicted of felony or misdemeanor, and denies or refuses to answer, the opposite party may prove the conviction (Criminal Procedure Act, 1865, s. 6). In order to impeach the character of a witness under cross-examination he may be asked and required to answer—unless he can claim privilege—any question which affects his veracity, accuracy or credibility with regard to the matter of fact under investigation, no matter how damaging to his character his answer may be. When a prisoner gives evidence under the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, he is not to be asked any question tending to show that he is of bad character unless he has personally or by his advocate asked questions of the witnesses for the prosecution tending to show that he is of good character, or has himself given evidence that he is of good character, or unless he has attacked the character of the prosecutor or the witnesses for the prosecution or unless he has given evidence against any other person charged with the same offence (s. 1).

Charge. A charge, in its general sense, is an obligation or liability. Thus we speak of a district being chargeable to maintain its own highways, and of a pauper being chargeable to the parish.

More frequently, however, charge is applied to property, and signifies that it is security for the payment of a debt or performance of an obligation. It is a general term, and therefore includes mortgages, liens, writs of execution, etc., but is also applied in a restricted sense to cases where the security has no special name, and where there is not necessarily a personal debt. Thus, if the owner of land agrees that it shall be security for a debt or obligation by himself or another person, that will charge the land; the principal effect of such a charge is to entitle the grantee to take proceedings to obtain a sale of the property charged. See HYPOTHECATION.

Land charges, that is to say, moneys expended upon land under statutory authority and charged thereon, are void against a purchaser for value of the lands unless such charges are registered in the register of land charges which is kept at the Land Registry (Land Charges Registration and Searches Act, 1888; Land Charges Act, 1900).

Where a person by his will charges his real estate with the payment of any debts or legacies, the executors or trustees may raise such debts or legacies by sale or mortgage of the lands. If he has devised them for his own benefit subject to the charge, then in the case of copyholds (Land Transfer Act, 1897, s. 1 (4)), or where the testator died before 1st January, 1898, of other real estate (ib., s. 25), the devisee (Law of Property Amendment Act, 1859, s. 14) (if he accepts the devise), and in the case of real estate other than copyholds, where the testator died after 31st December, 1897, the personal representatives (ib., ss. 1, 25) must satisfy the debts or legacies, and for this purpose the personal representative may sell, and the devisee sell or mortgage, the land.

"Charge" is also applied to equitable assignments by way of security. (See ASSIGNMENT; ASSIGNMENT OF CHOSES IN ACTION.) Thus, if A, being entitled to a payment in futuro of £500 from B, and being indebted to C for £200, gives C an order on B to pay him £200 out of the £500, this is an equitable assignment, and would be called a "charge" on the £500 in B's hands, because its operation is to secure the payment of C's debt.

Under the Solicitors Act, 1860, s. 28, where a solicitor is employed to prosecute or defend any proceeding in a court, the court may make a declaration that the solicitor is entitled to a charge upon the property recovered or preserved by the proceeding, and the charge is effectual against all persons, except bonâ fide purchasers of the property for value without notice; but if the declaration affects land it will apparently be void against such a purchaser unless it is registered in the Register of Writs and Orders (q.v.).

Under the Land Transfer Act, 1875, s. 22, the registered proprietor of freehold or leasehold land may charge it with the payment of money, with or without a power of sale, by executing an instrument of charge in the statutory form, and by having the charge entered on the register. It has most of the incidents of an ordinary mortgage (ss. 23-27). The proprietor of the charge is entitled to a certificate of charge (s. 22).

Under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908, s. 15, when a landlord pays to his tenant compensation in respect of improvements effected by the latter on the land, he may obtain from the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries (q.v.) a charge of the amount on the land, the effect of which is to make the land liable for the repayment of the amount by instalments to the landlord, his executors, administrators and assigns, so that where he is merely a limited owner (e.g. a tenant for life) the amount will be repaid to him or his personal representatives if his estate comes to an end before the time when the improvement in respect of which the compensation was paid is taken to be exhausted. This time varies with the nature of the improvement.

In an action for an account in the Chancery Division, a person was formerly said to be charged with sums which he admitted, or was proved to have received. When he brought in an account showing receipts and payments by him, he was said to charge himself with the receipts, and to discharge himself by the payments. See CHARGE AND DISCHARGE.

In criminal law, a charge is an accusation, made by a summons, warrant, information, indictment or the like. (See those titles.)

Under the old Chancery practice, before 1875, charges were allegations in a bill of complaint intended either to substantiate the general statement of the plaintiff's case, or to avoid a defence which he anticipated that the defendant would set up. See BILL OF COMPLAINT.

The term "charge" is also applied to the instruction given by a judge to a grand jury before they consider the bills sent up to them, to the summing up or address which the judge delivers to a petty jury before they retire to consider their verdict and to the address which a bishop or archdeacon delivers to the clergy on a visitation. As to rentcharges, see RENT; and as to tithe rentcharge, see TITHE.

Charge and Discharge. Before the Judicature Acts came into operation on 1st November, 1875, this was the form in which an account was taken before a Master in Chancery.

Chargé d'Affaires is a diplomatic agent, differing from an ambassador or minister in being accredited to the minister, not the sovereign, of the foreign state where he resides, and in representing a minister and not the sovereign of his own state.

Charging Order. Under the Judgments Act, 1838, ss. 14-16, and the Judgments Act, 1840, when judgment has been recovered in an action, a judge at chambers may make an order that any government stock, funds or annuities, or any stock or shares in a public company in England, standing in the name of the judgment debtor in his own right, or in the name of any person as trustee for him, shall stand charged with the payment of the judgment debt. The effect is to prevent the transfer of the stock, and to give the judgment creditor all the remedies which he would have been entitled to if the charge had been made in his favour by the judgment debtor, but he cannot enforce it until six months from the date of the order.

As to so-called charging orders under the Solicitors Act, 1860, see CHARGE.

See DISTRINGAS, NOTICE IN LIEU OF; STOP ORDER.

Charitable Trusts Acts, 1853 to 1914. These Acts were passed to constitute a board of commissioners called the Charity Commissioners, with powers for inquiring into the nature, objects, condition and management of charities, and for giving advice and directions, and making orders for the administration of charity property, and for authorising leases, sales, and exchanges of charity lands. A mode of applying to the Chancery Division in matters relating to charities, by petition or summons, in a summary way, is also provided. The Acts do not apply to unendowed charities. See CHARITY; SCHEME; ENDOWED SCHOOLS; OFFICIAL TRUSTEES OF CHARITABLE FUNDS AND CHARITY LANDS; WAR CHARITIES.

"Charitable Uses." This expression is defined by s. 13 (2) of the Charitable Uses and Mortmain Act, 1888.

Charitable Uses Act, 1735, is the statute 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, which prohibited gifts to charities of land, or moneys arising from or to be laid out in land, unless made in accordance with the provisions of the Act. It is commonly, but inaccurately, known as the Mortmain Act. Except as regards s. 5, which enacts (by reference to the repealed s. 4) that colleges at Oxford or Cambridge, and the colleges of Eton, Winchester and Westminster, shall not hold more advowsons than are equal to one moiety of their fellows or, where there are no fellows, of their foundation scholars, plus any advowsons annexed to the headships of such colleges, the whole Act was repealed by the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888, s. 13, as to which see MORTMAIN.

Charity. When a person gives money or property for the benefit of the public, or a section of the public, this constitutes a charitable gift, and the donor is called the founder of the charity. In practice, however, the term is usually applied to institutions of a permanent character, such as hospitals, schools, etc. The object must be public, and therefore gifts for the erection or repair of private tombs or monuments (so-called private charities) are not charities in the proper sense of the word. Instances of proper charities (sometimes called public charities) are gifts for the relief of aged, poor and sick persons, for the relief of the donor's poor relations, for education, for the repair of bridges, towards payment of the national debt, etc. When a charity has to be administered with reference to the tenets of a particular religion (e.g. where its purpose is education in those tenets, or where its objects must be persons holding those tenets), the charity is said to be ecclesiastical, as opposed to a lay or eleemosynary charity, which is not restricted with reference to any particular religion. An endowed charity is one which possesses property from which it derives income, and which was originally given to it for the purpose of being kept as a source of income; a charity, therefore, which is supported wholly or partially by voluntary subscriptions is (wholly or partially) an unendowed charity; and neither money arising from voluntary subscriptions, nor property given to a charity in such a way that it might legally be applied as income, is converted into an endowment merely by being set apart or invested for the purpose of being applied to some defined and specific object connected with the charity. See CHARITABLE TRUSTS ACTS; FABRIC LANDS; MORTMAIN; INFORMATION; SCHEME; CY-PRÈS; VISITOR.

Charity Commissioners. See CHARITABLE TRUSTS ACTS.

Charta de Foresta. A charter of the forest, by which many forests unlawfully made, or at least many precincts added by unlawful encroachments, were disafforested. It was confirmed by the Statute of Marlborough (52 Hen. 3, c. 5), passed in 1267.

Charta de una parte. Literally a one-sided charter. It means a deed poll (q.v.), which is in fact a unilateral instrument.

Chartæ libertatum. The charters of liberties. They were the Charta de Foresta and Magna Charta.

Charter formerly meant any deed relating to hereditaments, especially deeds of feoffment, but it is now always used in the sense of a royal charter, which is a grant by the Crown, in the form of letters patent under the Great Seal, to persons therein designated, of jura regalia (q.v.) or other franchises, liberties, property, rights, powers, privileges or immunities. At the present day the most usual instances of charters are those creating universities and other corporations. See LETTERS PATENT; CORPORATION; SURRENDER.

Chartered Companies. See COMPANIES, CHARTERED.

Charterer. This, of course, ordinarily means one who charters a ship. Anciently in Cheshire it seems to have meant a holder of charterland (q.v.).

Charterland. Bocland (q.v.).

Charter-party is a written agreement by which a shipowner lets an entire ship, or a part of it, to a merchant for the conveyance of goods, binding himself to transport them to a particular place for a sum of money which the merchant undertakes to pay as freight for their carriage. The principal stipulations in an ordinary charter-party refer to the places of loading and delivery, the mode and time of paying the freight, the number of laying days (that is, the time allowed the freighter for loading and unloading), and the rate of demurrage (q.v.).

The agreement is construed liberally, upon the maxim ut res magis valeat quam pereat: but if the words are clear the Court will not reject or explain away a stipulation, however harsh or oppressive in the event. Also, usage is admissible to explain mercantile terms and phrases, but not to contradict or vary the written instrument itself. However, a custom not repugnant to anything in the writing may be annexed to it. And with reference to what mistakes shall avoid the contract and what stipulations amount to conditions precedent, and generally as to all other matters of construction, the rules applicable to other contracts apply to charter-parties also.

The agreement may be dissolved—(1.) By consent before breach without any new consideration, and after breach upon terms. If the original agreement is by deed, the agreement for dissolution must be by deed also; on the other hand, if the original agreement is in writing not under seal, the agreement for dissolution may be either in like writing or by word of mouth, and that notwithstanding the original contract may require by statute to be in writing. (2.) By an unreasonable delay in the commencement of the voyage, at least when a particular day is fixed for the sailing, and time is (as it usually is) of the essence of the contract; or (3.) By act of law, rendering the performance impossible, without any fault of the parties; e.g., by the outbreak of a war or a general interdiction of commence, but not by a mere embargo, nor even by a blockade, although duly notified.

A charter-party must be stamped with a sixpenny impressed stamp (Stamp Act, 1891, ss. 1, 2, Sch. I). If first executed outside the United Kingdom, it may be stamped without penalty if stamped within ten days of its receipt in the United Kingdom and before being executed by any person therein (s. 50).

After execution in the United Kingdom, it may within seven days of the first execution thereof, be stamped on a penalty of four shillings and sixpence, and after seven days but within one month after the first execution, it may be stamped on a penalty of ten pounds, but it cannot be stamped afterwards (s. 51). It cannot be used in legal proceedings unless it is stamped. Under s. 15 (3) (b) of the Act, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue may mitigate or remit the penalties mentioned above.

Carta partita means an instrument or deed cut in two, and apparently the shipowner's copy and the merchant's copy were originally written on the same sheet of paper or parchment, which was then cut in two, in the same manner as an indenture (q.v.).

Chartis reddendis, De. A writ which anciently lay against one who had charters of feoffment entrusted to his keeping and who refused to deliver them.

Chase is a district of land privileged for wild beasts of chase, with the exclusive right of hunting therein. It resembles a forest (q.v.), except that it has no peculiar laws or courts. A chase belonging to the Crown is called a chase royal; a chase in the hands of a subject (whether by royal grant or by prescription) is sometimes called a free (or frank) chase; it is a franchise (q v.), and may belong either to the owner of the land over which the right of chase exists, or to another person.

Chastisement. At common law parents and teachers can inflict reasonable corporal punishment upon children and young persons; and the right is expressly saved by s. 37 of the Children Act, 1908. At common law also, a master may inflict reasonable corporal punishment upon an apprentice for misconduct; but this right is now rarely exercised. The master of a ship has a like right with regard to seamen, and it has never been abrogated by statute; but, in view of the statutory provisions which now exist for the punishment of misconduct by seamen, the exercise of the right would appear to be unjustifiable except in abnormal circumstances. A husband has no right whatever to inflict corporal punishment on his wife, and it may be said generally that, except as stated above, no corporal punishment can be legally inflicted unless it is expressly authorised by statute. See WHIPPING.

Chastity. See SLANDER.

Chattels is a term used to denote any kind of property which, having regard either to the subject-matter or the quantity of interest therein, is not freehold. Any estate in lands and tenements which does not amount to freehold is consequently a chattel, but inasmuch as it concerns or "savours" of the realty, it is called a chattel real, to distinguish it from things which have no concern with land, viz. mere moveables and rights connected with them, all of which are called chattels personal. Chattels real include estates for years, at will, by sufferance, wardships, and various interests of uncertain duration. See ESTATE; INTEREST.

The term "chattels personal" is generally applied to tangible things, such as furniture, jewels, animals and the like Choses in action (q.v.) and incorporeal personal property, such as copyrights, patent rights, and the like, are not generally included in the term "chattels." See CATALLA; PERSONAL PROPERTY.

Chaud-medley. See CHANCE-MEDLEY.

Chauntry was a church or chapel endowed with lands or other yearly revenues for the maintenance of one or more priests, to sing mass daily for the souls of the donors and such others as they appointed. Chauntries were abolished by the statutes 37 Hen. 8, c. 4, and 1 Edw. 6, c. 14, and their lands given to the Crown.

Cheap Trains. Under the Cheap Trains Act, 1883, s. 2, fares at a rate not exceeding one penny per mile are exempted from railway passenger duty, and the duty is reduced in the case of urban traffic generally. S. 3 empowers the Board of Trade to compel railway companies to provide proper third-class accommodation and to provide proper trains to carry workmen to and from their work between 6 p.m. and 8 a.m., at fares which the Board consider reasonable.

Cheat. This, in the criminal law, is a generic term for the act of fraudulently obtaining the property of another by any deceitful practice not amounting to felony, but of such a nature that it directly affects or may directly affect the public at large. Thus, selling by a false weight or measure, even to a single person, is a cheat, while selling short measure or weight (no false weights or measures being used) is not, because it only affects the person actually defrauded. So, maiming oneself in order to have a pretext for begging is a cheat.

Every cheat is a misdemeanour at common law. Most common law cheats are now misdemeanours by statute, and as a rule, a cheat is now charged only in such cases as have not been the subject of enactment.

Checkweigher. The persons employed in a coal mine who are paid according to the weight of the coal cut by them may, at their own cost, appoint a "check-weigher" to watch the weighing in their interest (Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, s. 13), and also a deputy check-weigher (Coal Mines (Weighing of Minerals) Act, 1905). Interference by the mine-owner with such appointment, or with the exercise of the necessary functions of these weighers, is an offence punishable summarily (Coal Mines (Check-Weighers) Act, 1894).

Cheese. "In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires . . . the expression 'cheese' means the substance usually known as cheese, containing no fat derived otherwise than from milk . . . " (Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899, s. 25). Compare MARGARINE-CHEESE.

Chelsea Hospital. This institution was founded towards the end of the seventeenth century for the relief of invalid soldiers. The original intention was that the men relieved should reside in the hospital, but almost from the first a system of out-pension was adopted, and under this system pensions are paid to men in all parts of the Empire, while but comparatively few are maintained in the hospital. The hospital has since its foundation been the subject of many Acts of Parliament, of which those still in force are enumerated in the Chronological Table and Index of the Statutes.

The functions of the Commissioners who administer the affairs of the hospital are, since 1916, in a large measure, vested in the Minister of Pensions (q.v.).

Chemical Manures. The manufacture of chemical manures is at least likely to cause a nuisance. It is therefore subject to various restrictions, as to which see ALKALI WORKS and OFFENSIVE TRADES.

Chemists and Druggists. As distinguished from an apothecary (q.v.), a chemist is one who sells drugs and medicines but does not prescribe them. He, in fact, sells what he is asked for, not what he thinks the purchaser ought to use.

The Acts regulating the business of chemists are: the Pharmacy Act, 1852; the Pharmacy Act, 1868; the Pharmacy Act, 1869; and the Poisons and Pharmacy Act, 1908.

Anyone may lawfully sell drugs, other than the poisons which are within the Acts, provided that he does not, unless authorised under the Acts, use the title of pharmaceutical chemist, the title of pharmaceutist, or any name, title or sign implying that the person using, assuming or exhibiting it is either registered under the Pharmacy Act, 1852, or a member of the Pharmaceutical Society (Pharmacy Act, 1852, s. 12), or use the title of chemist and druggist, the title of chemist, the title of druggist, the title of pharmacist, the title of dispensing chemist, or the title of dispensing druggist (Pharmacy Act, 1868, ss. 1, 15). Under these sections he may not use any of those titles, or sell poisons which are within the Acts, unless he is a person who, under the Acts, is entitled to use some one or other of those titles. The prohibition as to the sale of poisons which is contained in those sections does not, however, apply to any legally qualified medical practitioner, who, in order to obtain his diploma, has passed an examination in pharmacy (Pharmacy Act, 1869, s. 1), or to any legally qualified apothecary, or to dealing in patent medicines, or to wholesale dealing in poisons (Pharmacy Act, 1868, s. 16), or to the carrying on, by the personal representatives of a deceased qualified person, the business of such person by means of a person who is duly qualified (ib., Poisons and Pharmacy Act, 1908, s. 3 (2)), or to poisons dispensed by any legally qualified veterinary surgeon for animals under his care (ib., Pharmacy Act, 1869, s. 1), or to poisonous substances sold under licence from the local authority for agricultural and horticultural purposes (Poisons and Pharmacy Act, 1908, s. 2).

The poisons which are within the Acts are those specified in the schedule to the Poisons and Pharmacy Act, 1908, but the Pharmaceutical Society may, with the approval of the Privy Council, from time to time resolve that the schedule be amended by removing poisons from or adding poisons to it (Pharmacy Act, 1868, s. 2; Poisons and Pharmacy Act, 1908, s. 1).

The Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain —in this article called the Pharmaceutical Society—which is the body entrusted with the examination, registration and control of chemists and druggists and of pharmaceutical chemists, was incorporated in 1843 by a royal charter, since modified and confirmed by the Pharmacy Act, 1852, s. 1. It was granted a supplementary charter in 1901. It consists of members and student-associates (Pharmacy Acts Amendment Act, 1898, s. 2). All persons registered as chemists and druggists, under the Pharmacy Act, 1868, s. 5, are eligible as members (ib.).

Omitting, as practically extinct, certain classes of persons who before 1868 had possessed various obsolete qualifications, a "chemist and druggist" is a student-associate who has been examined and certified to be qualified, and who thereupon has been registered under the Pharmacy Act, 1868, s. 10, as a "chemist and druggist." Under the by-laws of the Pharmaceutical Society, s. 7 (13), made pursuant to the Pharmacy Act, 1852, s. 1, a "pharmaceutical chemist" is, and since 1868 has been, a person who is registered as a "chemist and druggist," and who has passed the prescribed examination for registration as a "pharmaceutical chemist." The precise business of a pharmaceutical chemist, as distinguished from that of a chemist and druggist, is nowhere defined by statute; and there is nothing to prevent a duly qualified chemist and druggist from dispensing prescriptions. "Pharmaceutical chemists" and "chemists and druggists" are the only two classes known to the Acts. The titles, other than "pharmaceutical chemist," mentioned in s. 12 of the Pharmacy Act, 1852, are merely popular variants of that title; and the titles, other than "chemist and druggist," mentioned in ss. 1 and 15 of the Pharmacy Act, 1868, are also mere popular variants of the title "chemist and druggist."

The Privy Council may direct that there be erased from the register the name of any pharmaceutical chemist or chemist and druggist, who has been convicted of any offence which in the opinion of the Council makes him unfit to be on the register (Pharmacy Act, 1868, s. 26).

The Pharmacy Act, 1868, s. 17, provides a penalty, recoverable summarily, of £5 for a first, and of £10 for any subsequent breach of the provisions of that Act and the earlier Acts as to the sale of poisons; and under s. 15 of the same Act a penalty of £5, recoverable in the County Court, is provided for breaches of other provisions of the same Acts, all of which provisions, it is to be noted, cannot be set out in a work such as this. See POISONS, SALE OF.

Cheque. A cheque is a bill of exchange (q.v.) drawn on a banker, payable on demand (Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 73). The person making the cheque is called the drawer, and the person to whom it is payable is called the payee.

Except as otherwise provided in ss. 73-82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, the provisions of that Act regarding a bill of exchange, payable on demand, apply to a cheque (s. 73). Thus, it is a negotiable instrument, unless its negotiability is qualified or restrained; it may be made payable to order or bearer; and the liability of the drawer resembles that of the drawer of a bill. But there are several enactments applying to cheques and not to bills. Thus (s. 74), the drawer of a cheque is not discharged by the holder's failure to present in due time, unless he has sustained actual prejudice from the delay, in which case he is discharged to the extent of such damage; again (Stamp Act, 1853, s. 17), a banker who pays a cheque to order on a forged indorsement of the payee's name is not liable to his customer for the amount; and (Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, ss. 76-82), the negotiability of a cheque may be restrained by means not applicable to bills of exchange.

The negotiability of a cheque may be restrained by crossing it. When the cheque bears across its face the words "and Company," or any abbreviation thereof, between two parallel transverse lines, or bears across its face two parallel transverse lines, either with or without the words "not negotiable," it is said to be crossed generally, and when it bears across its face the name of a banker, either with or without the words "not negotiable," it is said to be crossed specially, and to be crossed to that banker (s. 76). The holder of a cheque which is uncrossed may cross it either generally or specially; if it is crossed generally he may cross it specially; and whether it is crossed generally or specially he may add the words "not negotiable" (s. 77). When a cheque is crossed generally, the banker on whom it is drawn must not pay it across the counter, but can only pay it to another banker

(s. 79 (2)); in other words, the holder of such a cheque cannot obtain payment of it unless he, or some one who is willing to lodge the cheque for him, has an account with some banker. When a cheque is crossed specially, the banker on whom it is drawn can pay it only to the banker to whom it is crossed (ib.); in other words, the holder of that cheque cannot obtain payment of it unless he, or some one who is willing to lodge the cheque for him, has an account with the banker to whom it is crossed. When a cheque bears the words "not negotiable," in addition to the crossing, the holder of it cannot give a transferee a better title than he has himself (s. 81).

Chester. Chester was a county palatine (q.v.), from the time of William the Conqueror, and had palatine courts down to 1830. The Law Terms Act, 1830, by s. 13 extended to the county of Chester and to Wales the jurisdiction of the courts at Westminster, abolished by s. 14 the Court of Session and the Court of Exchequer of the County Palatine of Chester, as well as the Court of Great Session in Wales, transferred the jurisdiction of those courts to the Court of Chancery in London and the Court of Exchequer at Westminster respectively, and enacted by s. 19 that assizes should be held in Cheshire and Wales as in the rest of England. This left Lancaster and Durham the only parts of the country with palatine courts. See WALES; PLEAS OF THE SWORD; PRINCE OF WALES.

Chester (Herald). See HERALDS.

Chevage; Chevagium. An annual poll-tax payable anciently by certain persons to a superior; thus, Jews paid it to the king, and villeins to their lord.

Chief Baron of the Exchequer. The judge who presided in the Court of Exchequer, which under the Judicature Act, 1873, ss. 3, 16, became part of the Supreme Court and under s. 34 was consolidated with the King's Bench Division. Upon the death in 1880 of Chief Baron Kelly, the office was abolished. The powers formerly possessed by the Chief Baron of the Exchequer are now exercised by the Lord Chief Justice (Judicature Act, 1881, s. 25).

Chief Clerks. Eight of these officials were appointed in 1852. (See MASTERS IN CHANCERY.) Under the Court of Chancery Officers Act, 1867, s. 1, each of the four judges to whom chief clerks were attached was given an additional chief clerk. The Judicature Act, 1873, s. 77, transferred the chief clerks to the Supreme Court. In 1897 the title of Master of the Supreme Court was conferred on them by order of the Lord Chancellor. But they have no independent jurisdiction such as the old Masters in Chancery had, or such as the Masters of the King's Bench Division still have. The duties of these Chancery Masters—as they are for convenience sometimes called—are regulated by R.S.C., Ord. 55; rr. 15-18; see also rr. 65, 71 of that Order.

Before the reform effected early in the nineteenth century, there was the Chief Clerk or Prothonotary of the King's Bench. The office was held in 1798 by Lord Stormont and one John Way, under grant from Lord Mansfield to them, and the survivor of them, for life. The actual work was done by clerks; and, after they were paid, there was £1,200 a year for Way and something over £4,000 a year for Lord Stormont. See Common Committees Reports, 1803, Vol. 13, p. 233.

Chief Justice in Eyre of the Forest. See FOREST.

Chief Justice of the Common Pleas. The judge who presided before the Judicature Act, 1875, in the Court of Common Pleas, and subsequently in the Common Pleas Division. Lord Chief Justice Coleridge was the last holder of the office. Upon his being appointed Lord Chief Justice of England in 1881, the Common Pleas Division was merged in the King's Bench Division. The Lord Chief Justice of England now exercises the powers formerly possessed by the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas (Judicature Act, 1881, s. 25).

Chief Justice of England. The full title of this high judicial officer is the Lord Chief Justice of England. He presides in the King's Bench Division; and he represents not merely the Chief Justice of the ancient Court of King's Bench, but also the Chief Baron of the Exchequer (q.v.) and the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas (q.v.), the jurisdiction of all three of those courts being now exercised by the King's Bench Division (q.v.).

Chief Pledge. The statute 20 Hen. 6, c. 8, empowered the "conestable, tythingman, or chief plegge de chescun ville" to aid the owner of goods in resisting illegal purveyance. The "chief pledge" was the same as the head-borough (q.v.).

Chief Registrar in Bankruptcy. See CLERK OF ENROLMENTS.

Chief-rent; Quit-rent. A quit-rent is a small fixed annual rent payable by the copyholders or freeholders of a manor. When paid by a freeholder it is sometimes called a chief-rent.

The Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 45, and the Copyhold Act, 1894, provide for the redemption of quit-rents.

Where a quit-rent has, without acknowledgment being given, remained unpaid for twelve years, the right to recover the rent is barred and the rent is extinguished under the Statutes of Limitation. See ALBA FIRMA; BLACKMAIL.

Chief, Tenants in. See CAPITE.

Child; Children. As a technical term, in legal instruments, "child" is always construed to mean a legitimate, as opposed to an illegitimate, child (see BASTARD). Hence, where a testator, having married a woman by whom he had had illegitimate children, but no legitimate children, left his property to "my children by her," it was held that the illegitimate children could not take. If the testator had used words sufficient to identify the children as personæ designatæ, that is to say, as being the persons referred to, the gift would have been effectual in their favour.

For the purposes of the Children Act, 1908, the expression "child" is defined by s. 131 of that Act as a person under fourteen years of age. See also BROTHEL; CARNAL KNOWLEDGE; CRUELTY TO CHILDREN; DRUNKENNESS; INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL; FACTORIES; PROSTITUTE.

Child-bearing. See AGE.

Child Stealing. See ABDUCTION.

Child-wyte. A fine or composition payable to the lord of a woman who had been seduced and got with child. See FORNICATION.

Chiltern Hundreds, Stewardship of. The Chiltern Hundreds are the hundreds of Stoke, Desborough, and Burnham in Bucks. The Stewards of the Chiltern Hundreds anciently had functions to perform and received some emolument. But the office has long been a sinecure and altogether unpaid. It is in the gift of the Crown. Now the Succession to the Crown Act, 1707 (6 Anne, c. 41), s. 25, provides that "if any person being chosen a member of the House of Commons shall accept of any office of profit from the Crown during such time as he shall continue a member, his election shall be . . . void"; (though, if the office be one which a member can hold, he may be re-elected), and, as the warrant appointing a Steward of the Chiltern Hundreds grants "all wages, fees, allowances," it is held, by what is about the last surviving legal fiction, that a member accepting the stewardship has accepted an "office of profit from the Crown." Acceptance of the Stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds, or of some analogous office, such as the Stewardship of the Manor of Northstead, or Hempholme in Yorkshire, or of the Manor of East Hendred, has since about 1750 been the recognised means of resigning membership of the House of Commons. Up to then there had been no means of resignation; but now this means is always available, except in the rare case of a member with regard to whom it is clear that he ought to be expelled; in which case the Chancellor of the Exchequer will refuse an application for the Chiltern Hundreds. A steward holds office until the next steward is appointed. See OFFICE OF PROFIT.

Chimin. This is a corruption of the French chemin. Anciently, it meant either a public highway or a right possessed by one man to pass through the land of another.

Chiminage. A toll anciently levied on those passing through a royal forest. It was also known as pedagium.

Chimney-money. Also known as hearth-money. It was a duty, at the rate of two shillings a year for "every firehearth and stove," imposed by the statute 14 Car. 2, c. 10, s. 1, on all houses except (see ss. 16, 17) those of the very poor. That statute was repealed by the statute 1 Will. & Mary, sess. 1, c. 10, s. 1.

Chimneys. The construction of chimneys is regulated, in London by the London Building Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. ccxiii.), ss. 64-67, and outside London by the Chimney Sweepers Act, 1840, s. 6, and the by-laws made under the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 157 (2).

The emission from chimneys of black smoke in such quantity as to be a nuisance is dealt with, as regards London, by the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, s. 24, and as regards the rest of England by the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 91 (7).

Setting fire to chimneys, outside London, in order to clear out the soot, is punishable with a penalty of not more than £5, recoverable summarily (Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, s. 31; Public Health Act, 1875, s. 171).

The occupier of a house in which a chimney catches fire is liable in London, whether he has or has not been negligent, to a penalty of not more than twenty shillings (Metropolitan Fire Brigade Act, 1867, s. 23), and outside London he is liable to a penalty of not more than ten shillings, unless he can show that neither he nor any servant of his has been guilty of negligence (Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, s. 31; Public Health Act, 1875, s. 171).

Chimney-sweepers. Any chimney-sweeper employing in connection with his business any child under ten elsewhere than at his house or place of business (Chimney Sweepers Regulation Act, 1864, s. 6), or bringing with him into any house for the purposes of his business any person under sixteen (s. 7), is liable to a penalty not exceeding £10 (s. 8); and proof of age lies on the defendant (s. 10). Any person sending into a chimney (for the purpose of cleaning it or extinguishing fire therein) any person under twenty-one is liable to a penalty not exceeding £10 or to imprisonment not exceeding six months (Chimney Sweepers and Chimneys Regulation Act, 1840, s. 2; Chimney Sweepers Regulation Act, 1864, s. 9). Any person convicted under any of the sections above mentioned may be deprived of his certificate for the residue of its currency, or, if he does not hold a certificate, he may be disqualified from getting one for any period not exceeding one year (Chimney Sweepers Act, 1875, s. 20). Any person who, in order to obtain employment as a chimney-sweeper, knocks at houses from door to door, or uses a bell or any noisy instrument, or rings at a door-bell to the annoyance of inhabitants, is liable to a penalty not exceeding ten shillings for the first, and not exceeding twenty shillings for any subsequent offence (Chimney Sweepers Act, 1894, s. 1).

The Chimney Sweepers Act, 1875, ss. 5-14, provides for the issue of chimney-sweepers' certificates. A certificate must be taken out by any chimney-sweeper who employs a journeyman, assistant or apprentice (s. 9). It costs half-a-crown (s. 10) and is current for one year from the date of issue (s. 11). Any chimney-sweeper required to have a certificate but trading without one, or failing to produce it on demand to any person for whom he offers to sweep or to any justice or constable, is liable to a penalty of not more than ten shillings for a first offence, and of not more than twenty shillings for any subsequent offence (ss. 15, 17); and any chimney-sweeper failing to give, upon the like demand, his name and address is liable to a penalty of not more than ten shillings (s. 16).

Chirograph; Chirographer. A chirograph anciently signified a deed of two parts which were written on the same paper or parchment, with the word chirographum in capital letters between the two parts: the paper or parchment was then cut through the middle of the letters, and a part given to each party. If the cutting was indented, the deed was an indenture.

When fines of land were in use, the last step in the process of levying a fine was the chirograph, which was an engrossment of the substance of the whole matter, beginning Hæc est finalis concordia, and was retained by the purchaser as one of his title-deeds. It was conclusive evidence of the fine. The officer who made the engrossment was called the chirographer. See FINE.

Compare SYNGRAPH.

Chirographum apud debitorem repertum præsumitur solutum (Halk. 20). (When a person is in possession of a document under which he is bound to pay money, then a presumption arises that he has paid the money.) See the observations of Eldon, L.C.J., at p. 374 of 1 Stark.

Chivalry. See COURT OF CHIVALRY; GUARDIAN; KNIGHT-SERVICE.

Chop-church. One of "those secular priests who drove a trade or made an advantage by exchanging of their benefices" (Par. Antiq. Glossary).

Chose. A chose is a chattel personal (see CHATTEL); and is either in possession or in action.

Choses in possession are moveable chattels, —such as furniture, horses, and generally all goods and merchandise.

A chose in action is a right of proceeding in a Court of law to procure the payment of a sum of money (e.g., a bill of exchange, a policy of insurance, an annuity, or a debt), or to recover pecuniary damages for the infliction of a wrong or the non-performance of a contract. Originally the term was applied only to a right of action in the strict sense, that is, the right to bring an action at law, but subsequently it was extended to the right of taking proceedings in equity; thus the right to take proceedings to recover a legacy, or to recover a trust fund which has been misapplied by the trustee, is an equitable chose in action. The distinction is still of importance, as the provisions of the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25, relating to assignment of choses in action are limited to legal choses in action.

In addition to what is said under ASSIGNMENT OF CHOSES IN ACTION it may be also said that before the Judicature Acts the rule that choses in action, with some exceptions, were not assignable at law was evaded by allowing the assignee to sue in the name of the assignor. And it should be noted that an assignment not covered by s. 25 (6) of the Judicature Act, 1873, remains subject to the former rules; therefore, an absolute assignment of an equitable chose in action, or an assignment of a legal or equitable chose in action, by way of charge, is effectual only in equity. As, however, the High Court is bound to give relief in all cases in which relief would, before the Judicature Acts came into operation, have been given by a Court of Equity (ib., s. 24), the distinction between the two kinds of choses in action (that is to say, those assignable at law and those assignable only in equity) is not of practical importance, except, perhaps, with reference to the Division of the Court in which relief should be sought.

Choses in action are of two classes, those which are immediately reducible into possession (see REDUCTION INTO POSSESSION), and those which are reversionary, such as a reversionary interest in Consols. The latter class were formerly of importance, from the fact that a reversionary chose in action belonging to a married woman could not be disposed of by her or the husband, or both together. Now, however, a woman married after 31st December, 1882, can dispose of any reversionary interest in personalty as if she were a feme sole. As to women married before 1st January, 1883, see ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF DEEDS.

Patents, copyrights, trade marks and similar rights, are generally classed as incorporeal personal property. See PERSONAL PROPERTY.

Chrismatis denarii. See QUADRAGESIMALS. The words chrismatis denarii mean the chrism pennies, the payment being for the chrism consecrated about Easter.

Christian Burial. This means interment in consecrated ground or in a consecrated building. See BURIAL.

Christian Name. In strictness, this means the name given to every person on his or her baptism. Now, in view of the fact that many persons in the country are not baptised and have acquired only by registration the names prefixed to their surnames, the term has acquired a meaning which is perhaps better expressed by the American term "front-name." A Christian name cannot be changed; in this it differs from a surname (q.v.).

Christianitatis Curia. A Court Christian (q.v.).

Christianity. Lord Hale said in 1676, "Christianity is parcel of the law of England"; which was true at that date. Chief Baron Kelly in 1867 said: "There is abundant authority for saying that Christianity is part and parcel of the law of the land"; which in 1867 was true to only a limited extent. The Sovereign and the Lord Chancellor must be Christians; the bishops—or some of them—are still ex-officio members of the House of Lords; and the Church of England is not as yet disestablished. But the law is not so clearly on the side of Christianity as it was two hundred years ago. See, for instance, BLASPHEMY.

Christmas Day. The 25th of December. It is an ecclesiastical festival. From the first it has been recognised as a public holiday; but, in point of law, there is, apart from statute or rules made under statutory authority, no difference between it and other days. The killing or taking of game on Christmas Day is prohibited by the Game Act, 1831, s. 3. That enactment does not apply to Good Friday (which always occurs in the close season for all game); but every other enactment, and every statutory rule, applying to Christmas Day applies also to Good Friday. On both these days premises licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquor must be closed during the same hours as on Sunday (Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, s. 54, sch. 6); both days are bank holidays (q.v.) in England, and (Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, s. 35) are holidays in factories and workshops; for the purposes of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, both days are on the same footing as Sunday (see ss. 14, 92); on both days the offices of the Supreme Court are closed (R. S. C., Ord. 63, r. 6); no Admiralty instrument except a warrant may be served on either day (ib., Ord. 67, r. 12); both days are excluded from the computation of any period less than six days allowed for doing any act (ib., Ord. 64, r. 2); on both days County Court Offices are closed (Co. Ct. R., Ord. 1, r. 3); no County Court process (except a summons in rem or an Admiralty warrant) can be served or executed, and no County Court process need be issued on either day, but both days count in the computation of the days required for service (ib., Ord. 54, r. 19). In London, police regulations may be made for the regulation of traffic during divine service on either day or on Sunday (Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, s. 51). See OLD CHRISTMAS DAY.

Church. A building consecrated for divine service according to the rites of the Church of England, and having an incumbent for the cure of souls within the parish in which the church is situated. Churches are divisible into—(a) what are commonly called parish churches, or churches belonging to original parishes; and (b) churches belonging to new parishes, formed by the separation or subdivision of original parishes under the provisions of the early Church Building Acts (q.v.) and the Acts relating to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners (q.v.). See PARISH; also CHANCEL; CHAPEL; FABRIC LANDS.

Church Assembly. See NATIONAL ASSEMBLY OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

Church Briefs. KING'S BRIEFS (q.v.).

Church Building Acts, 1818 to 1884. These are a series of nineteen Acts, for a list of which see the Short Titles Act, 1896, Sch. II. They were passed in order to provide additional churches in populous parishes. The administration of the Acts was at first entrusted to the Church Building Commissioners appointed under s. 7 of the Act of 1818 (58 Geo. 3, c. 45), from whom it was transferred in 1857 to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners (q.v.) by the Act of 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 55).

Church Discipline Act, 1840, is the statute 3 & 4 Vict. c. 86, containing regulations for trying clerks in Holy orders charged with offences against ecclesiastical law, and for enforcing sentences pronounced in such cases. See DEPRIVATION; PUBLIC WORSHIP REGULATION ACT.

Church of England. See BISHOP; BISHOPRIC; CLERGY; CONVOCATION; NATIONAL ASSEMBLY.

Church-rate is a rate levied by the churchwardens of a parish for the repair of the church. Formerly such rates appear to have been recoverable in the Ecclesiastical Courts; but now, under the Compulsory Church Rate Abolition Act, 1868, s. 1, the payment of them is voluntary, except where they are levied under local Acts of Parliament, either (a) in lieu of tithes or for other good consideration (s. 5); or (b) to pay off money borrowed on the security of church-rates (s. 3).

Church-scot. In Anglo-Saxon times the householders of the parish each gave, for the support of the parish priest, a contribution of corn, known by the name of the Anglo-Saxon equivalent for the modern scot (q.v.). Later, the payment, from the fact of its being made in corn, came to be known as Church-seed, it being "quasi," says Coke, "semen Ecclesiæ"; and still later it was sometimes called hearth-money (q.v.). It was in addition to, and not in substitution for, tithe.

Churchwardens, at common law and in the ecclesiastical law, are parochial officers for several purposes, and are to inspect the morals and behaviour of the parishioners, as well as to take care of the goods and repairs of the church. They are a quasi corporation for the purpose of the custody of the ornaments of the church, and to sue for trespass upon the property of the church, but, except in London, they are not a corporation for the purpose of holding or acquiring land. See CORPORATION.

Apart from the common law churchwarden, there are churchwardens whose office has been created and whose duties are regulated by a number of statutes passed during the last hundred years to facilitate the building of churches and the formation of new parishes. See OVERSEERS.

Churchyard. By the common law, the rector of a church has the freehold in the churchyard, subject to the rights of the parishioners. See BURIAL.

Churl. See CEORL.

Cider. The fermented juice of apples. An excise duty, known as the "cider duty," whether it be upon cider or on perry, at the rate of fourpence per gallon is charged upon all cider or perry consumed in this country (Finance (New Duties) Act, 1916, s. 5), and a customs duty at the like rate is charged upon all imported cider or perry (Finance Act, 1916, s. 8). No excise or customs duties had previously been payable upon either cider or perry. See INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

Cinematograph. There is no statutory definition of this word. The New English Dictionary, under "Kinematograph," defines it as a "contrivance by which a series of instantaneous photographs taken in rapid succession can be projected on a screen with similar rapidity, so as to give a life-like reproduction of the original moving scene." An exhibition of pictures by such an apparatus, for the purposes of which inflammable films are used, shall not be given unless the regulations made by the Home Secretary are complied with or, save in the excepted cases, elsewhere than in premises licensed for the purpose (Cinematograph Act, 1909, s 1). An exhibition given gratis by a cinematograph-film dealer to possible purchasers, all of whom are specially invited, is not an exhibition within the meaning of the Act, which therefore does not apply. Nor (see s. 7 (4)) does the Act apply to an exhibition, to which the public are not admitted, given in a private house. Under s. 7 (2) a licence need not be taken out in respect of premises used occasionally, and on not more than six days in any one year, provided that the conditions prescribed in that sub-section are complied with. And under s. 7 (3) a licence need not be taken out in every county in which a moveable structure is used for cinematograph exhibitions; provided that the structure is licensed in some county and that the other conditions prescribed by the sub-section are observed.

Licences, lasting for one year from date of issue, are issued by county councils or councils of the counties of boroughs, who may delegate their powers to such persons, including justices in petty sessions, as they please (ss. 2, 5, 6).

Using a cinematograph on premises in contravention of the Act is punishable summarily with a fine of not more than £20 and a further fine not exceeding £5 for each day that the offence continues, and the licence (if any) may be forfeited (s. 3).

The police and officers appointed for the purposes of the Act have a right of entry into premises believed to be used for cinematograph exhibitions, and any obstruction of their entry is punishable summarily with a fine not exceeding £20 (s. 4).

The regulations made under the Act are those of February 18, 1910 (S. R. & O., 1910, No. 189), and of May 20, 1913 (S. R. & O., 1913, No. 566).

Certain customs duties are imposed on cinematograph films by the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1915, s. 12.

The Celluloid and Cinematograph Act, 1922, makes (as the title sets out) " provision for the prevention of fire in premises where raw celluloid or cinematograph film is stored."

Cinque Ports are the five harbours of Hastings, Romney, Hythe, Dover and Sandwich. Extensive privileges were conferred on these ports by our early sovereigns, particularly by William the Conqueror and King John; Admiralty of the Cinque Ports, 1891, which are substantially the same as the Admiralty Rules of the Supreme Court. It sits in the church of St. James's, Dover, unless, by consent of parties, a case is heard elsewhere. It hears appeals from the commissioners (Cinque Ports Act, 1821, s. 4), and its decision is final (s. 5) Appeal also lies to it from any decision in an Admiralty matter, of a County Court within its jurisdiction (County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868, s. 33), but its appellate jurisdiction is almost obsolete, the concurrent right of appeal to the High Court being generally availed of.

Circuits are divisions of the country for judicial business. For the purpose of holding assizes (q.v.), the country is divided into seven circuits, namely, the Northern, North-eastern, Midland, South-eastern, Oxford, Western, and North and South Wales, the last being divided into two divisions. The county of Surrey is not included in any circuit, but commissions for the discharge therein of civil and criminal business are issued not less than twice a year.

County Court circuits were created by the County Courts Act, 1846, s. 2, and these circuits were continued by s. 3 of the County Courts Act, 1888, which, however, by s. 4, empowers the Crown to alter them. As its name implies, a County Court circuit is a chant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 511); and his jurisdiction as Admiral of the Cinque Ports (Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 256).

The commissioners within the Cinque Ports are persons nominated by the Lord Warden to determine certain questions as to salvage and claims for services to ships, by pilots or others, within the jurisdiction of the Cinque Ports (Cinque Ports Act, 1821, s. 15). As to the limits of the jurisdiction, see the Cinque Ports Act, 1821, s. 18.

The Admiralty Court of the Cinque Ports seems to have as extensive a jurisdiction in Admiralty matters within its local limits as the High Court of Justice. Its procedure is governed by the Rules of the Court of first action; or where A sued B on a liability against which B had a guarantee or indemnity by C, and B brought an action against C on his guarantee or indemnity, instead of C defending the original action against B. Formerly circuity of action was the rule and not the exception, but now the provisions of the Judicature Acts relating to counter-claim, citation (q.v.), and other proceedings may be said to have abolished circuity of action as far as is practically possible.

respective jurisdictions of the temporal and ecclesiastical Courts in certain matters.

Citation is the operation of calling upon a person who is not a party to an action or proceeding to appear before the Court in that action or proceeding.

In an action in the High Court, where a defendant claims to be entitled to relief (e.g. contribution or indemnity) against any person not a party to the action, he may, by leave, issue a notice to that effect, stating the nature of the claim, and requiring him to enter an appearance in the action; the notice is filed, and a sealed copy of it is served on the person, together with a copy of the statement of claim in the action (R. S. C. Ord. 16., r. 48). This is called citation or notice by defendant to third party. If the third party fails to appear, he cannot dispute the validity of any judgment obtained against the defendant citing him (ib., r. 49). If he appears, it is the duty of the party citing him to apply to the Court for directions as to the mode of having the question in the action determined (ib., r. 52). See THIRD PARTY.

In divorce practice, a citation corresponds in some respects with the writ of summons in ordinary actions; it is a document directed to the respondent or co-respondent, and commanding him to appear within a certain time after service; it cannot be extracted or issued until the petition has been filed; and after being served it is filed in the registry (Divorce Rules, 8-14).

In probate actions, citation is employed in order to give notice of the proceedings to persons whose interests are or may be affected by them, so as to give them an opportunity of appearing and taking part in the proceedings if they wish to do so. This is called citation to see proceedings. The person issuing a citation is called the party citant, and the person to whom it addressed the citee.

Formerly citation was also a mode of commencing a suit in the Probate Court: such citations were of various kinds, the principal being citations by an executor to the next of kin, etc., to see a will proved in solemn form: by a legatee to an executor to prove the will, or to bring in a probate to be revoked, &c. Under the present practice such suits or actions are now commenced by writ of summons.

Under the old Admiralty practice, where a ship, cargo, etc., was already under arrest in a cause and a second cause was instituted against it, the plaintiff in the latter issued, instead of a warrant, a citation in rem, commanding the marshal to cite all persons interested to enter an appearance; it was served in the same way as a warrant. Under the present practice a writ of summons in rem is issued. In an Admiralty action in personam the defendant was formerly cited to appear by a citation in personam; this is now done by a writ of summons in the ordinary form.

In the ecclesiastical courts generally, the issue of a citation is the usual mode of commencing a suit. It is a judicial act by which the defendant is commanded to appear in the suit. See DECREE; VIIS ET MODIS.

Citation (or Admonition) ad instantiam partis. Obsolete processes which issued out of the ecclesiastical courts: see the statute 22 & 23 Car. 2, c. 9.

Citation, Statute of. The popular title of the statute 23 Hen 8, c. 9, under which no man may be cited, except for a spiritual offence or heresy, before any ecclesiastical court outside the diocese in which he dwells.

City is a borough which has or has had a bishop, or which by letter patent has been created a city by prerogative of the Crown, as has been done during the last twenty years in the cases of Sheffield, Bradford, Hull, Leeds, Nottingham and Cardiff.

City of London Court was a Court having a local jurisdiction within the City of London. It was to all intents and purposes a County Court, having the same jurisdiction and procedure (County Courts Act, 1888, s. 185); and the judge was appointed by the Crown (Local Government Act, 1888, s. 42 (14)). It had exclusive jurisdiction in Admiralty matters within the City (County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868, s. 2). See MAYOR'S AND CITY OF LONDON COURT.

Civil is opposed (i) to ecclesiastical; (ii) to criminal. As to civil death, see DEATH.

The "civil law" is an old-fashioned term for the Roman law, derived from the title Corpus Juris Civilis.

Civil Bill Court. An Irish Court with a jurisdiction analogous to that of the English County Court. The County Court judge presides; and he is also ex officio the chairman of, and in practice the sole judge at, quarter sessions. This is still so as regards Northern Ireland: the law as to Southern Ireland is unsettled at present.

Civiliter mortuus. Civilly dead. See DEATH.

Civil List. Each sovereign since George II. has at his or her accession surrendered to the nation the hereditary revenues (the profits of Crown lands (see DEMESNE, etc.)); and thereupon Parliament has made pecuniary provision for each sovereign for the period of his or her reign. This is done by an Act giving the sovereign an annual sum, known as the Civil List, for the support of the royal dignity and household. The Civil List Act, 1837, while providing for Queen Victoria, did not prospectively make provision for her husband and children; and this necessitated application to Parliament, resulting sometimes in undesirable debates, when she married and as her children married or came of age. The Civil List Act, 1901, provided not merely for King Edward, but for his children and for Queen Alexandra, so as to make further application to Parliament unnecessary; and the Civil List Act, 1910, is similarly framed. It fixes the Civil List at the yearly sum of £470,000 (s. 2); it gives to Queen Mary, in the event of her surviving the King, an annuity of £70,000 (s. 3); in the event of the marriage of the Prince of Wales, his wife is given an annuity of £10,000 to be increased to £30,000 if she survives him (s. 4); and it gives to each of the King's younger sons an annuity of £15,000 on his attaining twenty-one, and to each of the King's daughters an annuity of £6,000 on her attaining the same age or marrying (s. 5). The annual sum of £470,000 payable to the King is to be appropriated as follows:—(i) Their Majesties' privy purse, £110,000; (ii) Salaries of household and retired allowances, £125,800; (iii) Expenses of household, £193,000; (iv) Works, £20,000; (v) Royal bounty (q.v.), alms, and special services, £13,200; (vi) Unappropriated, £8,000 (s. 6; Sch.).

It will thus be seen that the King has only a little over £100,000 a year to dispose of as he pleases. No part of the annual sum of £470,000 payable to the King is, however, subject of income tax or super-tax, the King not being bound by any statute unless as expressly provided therein, and there being no such provision in any of the statutes relating to income tax. But it would appear that the other annuities granted by the Act are liable to income tax and super-tax: as to a queen consort or a queen dowager, see, however, QUEEN. By the Princess Louise Annuity Act, 1871 (34 Vict. c. 1), there was granted to the Princess Louise an annuity of £6,000 "free from all taxes, assessments and charges," and it was held in 1913 that, by reason of that exemption, the annuity was free of income tax and super-tax. But no such words are used in the Civil List Act, 1910, and there is nothing which warrants the importation of them into that Act. The Duke of Connaught and of Strathnairn Establishment Act, 1878, is the last Act granting an annuity to a member of the Royal Family in which those words occur.

Civil List Pensions. These are pensions of small amount, rarely exceeding in any case £200 a year, payable out of an annual sum of £1,200 charged upon the Consolidated Fund by the Civil List Act, 1837, s. 5. They can be granted by the Crown only "to such persons as have just claims on the royal beneficence, or who by their personal services to the Crown, by the performance of duties to the public or by their useful discoveries in science, and attainments in literature and the arts, have merited the gracious consideration of their sovereign and the gratitude of their country" (ib. s. 6). By the Civil List Act, 1910, s. 9 (1), these provisions are made to apply during the present reign and for six months afterwards; and under them pensions are frequently granted, not merely to such persons as are described therein but, on the ground of straitened circumstances, to the widows and daughters of such persons. The Civil List Act, 1910, s. 9 (1), expressly provides that such pensions shall not be charged on the sum paid for the Civil List, out of which such pensions had, up to the reign of William IV., been in fact paid, as is indicated by their name.

Civil Side. The legal business of the assizes is arranged according to the natural division of such cases as are merely civil, in which the disputes of subjects (citizens) as to property are decided, and those of a criminal nature, when men are charged with offences against the welfare of society at large. In the county-hall or court in which the trials take place, it is very usual for one side or portion of the building to be appropriated to the hearing of cases of the former character, and the other side or portion to the hearing of those of the latter character. And hence the phrase has become common that the judge is either sitting "on the civil side" or "on the criminal side," meaning thereby that he is either presiding at Nisi Prius or trying a prisoner, as the case may be. It is now customary for two judges to attend circuit together, and then one of them sits on the "civil," the other on the "criminal side."

Claim, generally, is the assertion of a right. See CONTINUAL CLAIM; STATEMENT OF CLAIM.

In administration actions and proceedings in the Chancery Division, and in winding-up (q.v.), persons who consider themselves to have rights against the assets in course of administration have to send in claims in the shape of formal notices to the executor or administrator, or to the liquidator.

In bankruptcy, persons who have claims against the estate of the bankrupt have to make them by proving their debts. See DEBT and PROOF.

At the end of the complete specification (q.v.) of an invention, there must be a clear statement of what the patentee claims to have invented. This is technically known as the claim, or as the claims if it be claimed that more than one thing has been invented.

See COURT OF CLAIMS.

Claimant is a person who makes a claim (q.v.) in an administrative proceeding.

The plaintiff in the old action of ejectment was called the claimant.

Claim of Liberty. Anciently this was a suit or petition to the king in the Court of Exchequer to have liberties and franchises confirmed there by the Attorney-General.

Clam, vi, aut precario. By stealth, violence, or supplication.

Clamea admittenda in itinere per attornatum. Anciently this was a writ commanding the justices in eyre (q.v.) to admit by attorney the claim of one who, by reason of his being on the king's service, could not appear personally.

Clarencieux King-at-Arms. See HERALDS.

Clarendon, Constitutions of. A series of enactments passed at Clarendon in 1164 by what was termed a parliament, although it was really more in the nature of a great council. These Constitutions enacted in substance that the king's courts should try all contested rights of advowson and presentation; ecclesiastics should obey the King's summons; appeals from the archbishop should be to the king alone; all disputes regarding lands between ecclesiastics and laymen should be tried by the king's justices; all pleas of debt, even though they were affected with trusts, should be determined in the king's courts; and other provisions of a similar character.

Clash. See CLOSH.

Class. Gifts by will to classes of persons, e.g. to the children, nephews, brothers, etc., of the testator or of another person, frequently give rise to the questions—at what time are the members of the class who are to share in the gift to be ascertained and at what time are their interests to be treated as vested. Rules of construction have been adopted by the Court, but they are too complicated to be stated here. See INQUIRY.

Classification. In Chambers in the Chancery Division, where, upon the hearing of the summons to proceed with the accounts and enquiries directed by a judgment or order, it appears to the judge (or master) that any of the parties form a class having the same interest (e.g. residuary legatees), he may require them to be represented by one solicitor, in order to prevent the expense of each of them attending by separate solicitors, and may give directions as to which of the parties are to attend on each of the accounts and inquiries directed by the judgment (R. S. C., Ord. 55, r. 40). This is termed "classifying the interests of the parties attending," or, shortly, "classifying" or "classification."

Clause Rolls. See CLOSE ROLLS.

Clauses Acts. The popular collective title of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, which apply to, for instance, every railway company unless, and in so far as, they are excluded or varied by the special Act (q.v.). See RAILWAY.

The title is also applied to other Acts of a like kind. See ACT OF PARLIAMENT.

Clausula generalis de residuo non ea complectitur, quæ non ejusdem sint generis cum iis quæ speciatim dicta fuerint (Lofft. 419). (A general clause of residuum does not include things not of the same kind with those which have been specially named.) Compare INCLUSIO, etc.

Clausula generalis non refertur ad expressa (8 Co. 154). (A general clause does not refer to things expressly provided for.)

Clausula vel dispositio inutilis per presumptionem vel causam remotam ex post facto non fulcitur (Bac. Max. Reg. 21). (An unnecessary clause or disposition is not upheld by a remote presumption or a cause arising after the event.)

Lord Bacon explains clausula vel dispositio inutilis "when the act or words do work or express no more than the law by intendment would have supplied"; and such a clause or disposition is not supported by any subsequent matter "which," as Bacon puts it, "may induce an operation of those idle words or acts."

Clausulæ inconsuetæ semper inducunt suspicionem (3 Co. 81). (Unusual clauses always excite suspicion.) This was said of a clause setting out—in an unusual way—that a deed was executed bona fide.

Clausum fregit. See CLOSE.

Clausum paschæ. The Sunday next following Easter Sunday.

Claves insulæ. The ancient title of the Keys (q.v.) of the Isle of Man.

Clay's (Sir W.) Act. The former popular title of the Compound Householders Act, 1851.

Clayton's Case is the leading authority on appropriation of payments in a current account, e.g. that of a banker. In that case Devaynes, the partner in a banking firm, died on the 29th November, 1809, leaving a considerable estate, and the surviving partners carried on the business on their own account until July, 1810, when they became bankrupt. At the death of Devaynes, Clayton had a balance of £1,713 on his cash account with the firm. Between the death of Devaynes and the bankruptcy, the payments made to Clayton by the surviving partners largely exceeded the £1,713, and the payments so made amounted to £1,260 within a few days after Devaynes' death, and before they had received any money whatever from Clayton. But their subsequent receipts largely exceeded the payments, and at the date of the bankruptcy the balance due on the account exceeded the amount of the balance due at Devaynes' death. In these circumstances, Clayton claimed against the estate of Devaynes the £1,713, after deducting the dividends received by him in the bankruptcy of the surviving partners. But it was held that in an account of this kind, in the absence of an express appropriation by the creditor, the first sum paid in is the first one drawn out; in other words, that the first payment by the banker must be set against the first receipt, and so on: consequently, no part of the £1,713 remained due by the estate of Devaynes, because it had been drawn out by Clayton.

The rule in Clayton's Case does not apply where a person in a fiduciary position, e.g. a trustee, has paid money held by him in that character to his general account, and mixes it with his own money; for in such a case, when he withdraws money from the account for his own purposes, he is deemed to withdraw it from that part of the fund which belonged to him, so as to leave the trust money intact.

Clearance. The clearance of a vessel is a certificate issued by the Customs officials to the effect that she has complied with the Customs requirements and is at liberty to put to sea. The doing of the acts necessary for the obtaining of such certificate constitutes the "clearing" of the vessel.

Clear Days. The meaning of this expression depends on the context. Thus, where anything is to be done three clear days before a certain date, it means that three complete days are to elapse between the doing of the thing and the date named; whereas, if a thing is to be done three days before a certain date, only two complete days need elapse between the doing of the thing and that date. But where an order directs anything to be done within ten clear days, it means that such thing is to be done at latest on the tenth of the ten complete days after the order is made; and the effect of the order would be the same if the word "clear" were omitted.

Cleopatra's Needle. See ANCIENT MONUMENTS.

Clergy. The clergy of the Church of England consist of bishops (q.v.), priests (q.v.), and deacons (q.v.).

At common law no priest or deacon could be a member of the House of Commons. This disqualification was confirmed by the House of Commons (Clergy Disqualification) Act, 1801. No one in Holy orders can be a councillor, an alderman, or the mayor of a borough (Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, ss. 12 (1) (b), 14 (3), 15 (1)). But where a clergyman executes a deed relinquishing his profession he ceases to be subject to either of the disqualifications above mentioned (Clerical Disabilities Act, 1870; Local Government Act, 1882, ss. 7 (1), 242, Sch. 9 (Pt. II.); Municipal Corporations Act, 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76), s. 28). Under the Local Government Act, 1888, s. 2 (2) (a), any minister of religion may become a councillor or alderman of a county council; and he may also be elected a member of any parish council, district council, or board of guardians (Local Government Act, 1894, ss. 23 (1), 31 (1)), or of any London borough council (London Government Act, 1899, s. 2 (5)).

A clergyman is not bound at common law to serve in any public office, and he is specially exempted from serving on juries by the Juries Act, 1870, s. 8. But if he takes advantage of the Clerical Disabilities Act, 1870, he becomes in point of law a layman for every purpose whatsoever.

No clergyman who holds any benefice or is licensed to perform ecclesiastical functions may farm land to a greater amount than eighty acres, without the leave of the bishop, or take any land on a lease of more than seven years to farm it (Pluralities Act, 1838, s. 28), or trade in any way except as a shareholder (s. 29), or as a schoolmaster (s. 30). If he contravenes these enactments, he may, for a first offence, be suspended for not more than a year, and for a second offence to be suspended for any period, and for a third offence be deprived (s. 31); and moreover he is to forfeit forty shillings per acre for each year in respect of any land farmed in excess of the area allowable under s. 28 (s. 28).

At common law it was illegal for a clergyman to engage in trade, and therefore any contracts made by him qua trader were void. Any such contract is now, of course, void not only at common law but as being in contravention of the Pluralities Act, 1838.

Clerico admittendo. A writ anciently directed to a bishop directing him to admit to a benefice a clerk presented thereto by the party who had sued out the writ.

Clerico capto per statutum mercatorum. A writ anciently issued for the delivery out of prison of a clerk imprisoned for a breach of a statute merchant.

Clerico convicto commisso gaolæ in defectu ordinarii deliberando. A writ anciently issued for the delivery to his ordinary of a clerk who had been convicted of felony, and committed to gaol by reason of benefit of clergy not having been claimed.

Clerico infra sacros ordines constituto non eligendo in officium. A writ which anciently issued to restrain anyone from making a clerk in Holy orders serve in a public office. See CLERGY.

Clericus non connumeretur in duabus ecclesiis. A clerk is not to be given two churches—an ancient prohibition of pluralities.

Clerk; Clericus. Anciently this meant anyone, whether a priest or a deacon, who was in Holy orders. It also meant a secular priest, that is to say, one who did not belong to a religious order, as distinguished from a priest who belonged to a religious order.

It was also used as part of the title of anyone performing what would now be called clerical duties; and when, in such a case, the Latin word is used, it may be taken that the office dates from before the Reformation.

Clerk Controller of the King's House. An officer of the king's household who performed functions analogous to those of the officer of the royal household now known as the Comptroller. See the statute 33 Hen. 8, c. 12.

Clerk Marshall of the King's House. An officer of the Court of the Marshalsea (q.v.).

Clerk of Affidavits. An official of the former Court of Chancery who filed all affidavits sworn therein. His office was abolished, as from 28th October, 1852, by the Court of Chancery Act, 1852, s. 29, which describes it as the Affidavit Office of the Court of Chancery.

Clerk of Arraigns. An assistant of the Clerk of Assize (q.v.).

Clerk of Assize. This is the principal officer attached to the assizes. No person can be appointed to the office unless he has been for three years in actual practice either as a barrister, a special pleader or conveyancer, or a solicitor, or unless he has been for three years a subordinate officer of a clerk of assize on circuit (Clerks of Assize, &c., Act, 1869, s. 3). The appointment is made by the senior judge going the circuit for the summer and winter assizes (Judicature Act, 1884, s. 21) The clerk of assize takes charge of and reads the commission, and performs on the civil side duties analogous to those of a master (q.v.) or associate (q.v.), the corresponding duties on the Crown side being performed by the clerk of arraigns.

Clerk of Dispensations and Faculties. In 1798 this office in the Court of Chancery was held by Mr. Apsley Bathhurst, son of Lord Bathhurst, who, when Lord Chancellor, had appointed him. After paying £70 to a deputy and some other expenses, he drew a clear income of about £380 a year from the office. The duties were connected with the confirmation and registration of ecclesiastical faculties, various degrees in Arts, etc. See Commons Committees Reports (1803), Vol. 13, p. 269.

Clerk of Enrolments was the chief officer of the Enrolment Office (q.v.). His office was created by s. 3 of the Court of Chancery Act, 1842, and was abolished by the Supreme Court of Judicature (Officers) Act, 1879, s. 14 and Sch. I. (Pt. II.).

See SIX CLERKS.

There was also a Clerk of Enrolments to the Court of Bankruptcy. His office was created by the statute 5 Geo. 2, c. 30, s. 41, and was abolished by the statute 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, s. 74. The latter enactment transferred the duties of the office to the Chief Registrar in Bankruptcy, who himself was in time abolished by the statute 15 & 16 Vict. c. 77, s. 3.

Jacob, writing in 1749, states that there was in the Court of Common Pleas a Clerk of Enrolments whose duty it was to "inroll and exemplify all fines and recoveries, and return writs of entry, summons and seisin." He seems to have been represented in 1798 by the Clerk of Warrants, Inrolments and Estreats. See Commons Committees Reports (1803), Vol. 13, p. 290.

Clerk of Reports. An official of the former Court of Chancery. His office was abolished by the Court of Chancery Act, 1852, s. 29.

Clerk of the Acts. A former official of the Navy Office whose duty it was to record all orders, &c., of the Lord High Admiral or of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty.

Clerk of the Appeals. An office of the old Court of Chancery which had ceased to exist before 1798, presumably because it was worth only about £2 a year. See Commons Committees Reports (1803), Vol. 13, pp. 205, 265.

Clerk of the Bails. An official of the former Court of King's Bench who filed all the bail-pieces (q.v.) taken in that court. His office has long since been abolished.

Clerk of the Briefs. An officer (receiving about £150 a year) of the Court of Chancery. His duties seem to have been much the same as those of the Secretary of the Briefs (q.v.). See Commons Committees Reports (1803), Vol. 13, p. 264.

Clerk of the Check. Anciently this was an officer of the royal household who was responsible for the arrangements as to the duties, etc., of the yeomen of the guard and other yeomen employed about the court. See the statute 33 Hen. 8, c. 12.

An officer of the same name was employed at Plymouth in connection with the navy. See the statute 19 Car. 2, c. 1.

Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. This officer is appointed under the Royal Sign Manual and performs the duties formerly performed by the Clerk of the Hanaper (q.v.) (Great Seal (Offices) Act, 1874, s. 8), so far as any such duties still exist. He performs the duties (other than those connected with the administration of justice) which before 1874 were vested in the Clerk of the Petty Bag (q.v.), including all duties and powers with regard to letters patent and writs passed under the Great Seal (Great Seal (Offices) Act, 1874, s. 5), or having the wafer Great Seal attached to them (see Crown Office Act, 1877, ss. 4, 5, and the rules made thereunder). He is Clerk of the Court of the Lord High Steward. See PATENT OFFICE.

Clerk of the Custodies of Lunatics and Idiots. An official of the former Court of Chancery, whose office was abolished, and whose duties were transferred to the Commissioners of Lunatics, by the statute 5 & 6 Vict. c. 84, s. 10.

Clerk of the Declarations. An officer of the old Court of King's Bench whose duty it was to file declarations (q.v.) to causes therein pending. His office was abolished by the Superior Courts (Officers) Act, 1837, s. 2.

Clerk of the Deliveries. A former officer of the Tower of London who recorded all issues of stores, ammunition, etc.

Clerk of the Errors; Clericus errorum. In each of the Courts known as the King's Bench, the Exchequer and the Exchequer Chamber, and the Common Pleas, there was formerly an official known as the clerk of the errors, each of whom performed various functions in connection with proceedings in error (q.v.). They were all abolished by the Superior Courts (Officers) Act, 1837, ss. 1, 2.

Clerk of the Escheats; Clericus extractorum. Formerly there was an official of the Exchequer to whom the escheats (q.v.) were delivered each term out of the Lord Treasurer's Remembrancer's Office. See REMEMBRANCERS.

Clerk of the Essoins. An officer of the former Court of Common Pleas who kept the Essoin (q.v.) Rolls. He was abolished by the Superior Courts (Officers) Act, 1837, s. 2.

Clerk of the Hanaper. This was formerly an officer on the common law side of the Court of Chancery who, in the days when every action was commenced by an original writ issuing from the Chancery, registered the fines that were paid on every writ, and saw that the writs were sealed up in bags, in order to be opened afterwards and issued: these writs and the returns to them were originally kept in a hamper (in hanaperio). It was also the duty of the Clerk of the Hanaper to take an account of all patents, commissions and grants that passed the Great Seal. By the Court of Chancery Act, 1852, the duties of the office were transferred to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery (q.v.), and by the Judicature Act, 1873, ss. 16, 77, they, or such of them as still existed, were transferred to the Central Office of the Supreme Court. See CLERK OF THE CROWN; COMPTROLLER.

Clerk of the House of Commons is one of the chief officers of the lower house. He is appointed by the Crown as under-clerk of the Parliaments to attend upon the Commons. He makes a declaration on entering upon his office to make true entries, remembrances and journals of the things done and passed in the house. He signs all orders of the house, indorses the bills sent or returned to the Lords, and reads whatever is required to be read in the house. He has the custody of all records and other documents.

Clerk of the Juries; Clericus juratorum.

An officer of the former Court of Common Pleas who, at common law, performed various functions in connection with juries in civil cases. His office was abolished by the Superior Courts (Officers) Act, 1837, s. 2.

Clerk of the King's Great Wardrobe. An officer of the royal household who anciently kept an inventory of the king's wardrobe. See the statute 1 Edw. 4, c. 1.

Clerk of the King's Silver; Clericus argenti regis. An officer of the former Court of Common Pleas. He was concerned with fines (q.v.) levied in that court and with the obsolete writ of covenant (q.v.).

Clerk of the Markets; Clericus mercati hospitii regis. Anciently this was an officer of the royal household who had custody of the standard weights and measures, and saw that correct weights and measures were used throughout the realm. The Crown used, however, frequently to grant to boroughs charters empowering the corporations themselves to hold Courts of the Clerk of Markets. This ousted the jurisdiction of the Clerk of the Markets within the borough; and, moreover, the repealed statute 16 Car. 1, c. 19, provided that the Clerk of the Markets should act only within the "verge" (q.v.), and that head officers should act in corporations.

The functions of the Clerk of the Markets and all Courts of the Clerk of the Markets which they used to hold, have become entirely obsolete as the result of the enactment of the various statutes regulating weights and measures (q.v.).

Clerk of the Nihils; Clericus nihilorum. An officer of the former Court of Exchequer who enrolled all sums "nihiled" by sheriffs upon writs of estreat (q.v.). In 1798 the office was worth about £15 a year (see Commons Committees Reports (1803), Vol. 13, p. 271). See NIHIL.

Clerk of the Ordnance. A former officer of the Tower of London whose duty it was to record all orders which concerned military arms and stores.

Clerk of the Paper Office. An officer of the former Court of King's Bench who was concerned with special pleadings and demurrers. These he made up into books. His office was abolished by the Superior Courts (Officers) Act, 1837, s. 1, Sch. A, his duties being transferred by s. 5 of that Act to one of the Masters of the Queen's Bench appointed under that Act. See PAPER OFFICE; MASTER OF THE KING'S BENCH.

Clerk of the Papers. An officer of the former Court of Common Pleas who discharged various functions in connection with the Fleet Prison. He is mentioned at p. 304 of the Commons Committees Reports (1803).

Clerk of the Parliaments. This is one of the chief officers of the House of Lords. He is appointed by the Crown, by letters patent. On entering office he makes a declaration to make true entries and records of the things done and passed in the parliaments, and to keep secret all such matters as shall be treated therein. Under the Acts of Parliament (Commencement) Act, 1793, he indorses on every Act the date on which it receives the royal assent.

Clerk of the Patents. A chancery official, holding under letters patent and acting by a deputy, who was concerned with letters patent under the Great Seal. He was abolished by the Lord Chancellor's Pension Act, 1832, s. 1.

Clerk of the Peace; Clericus pacis. Anciently it would have been sufficient to say that this is an officer appointed by the Custos Rotulorum (q.v.), to keep the county records and to assist the justices of the peace in quarter sessions, not only in drawing indictments, entering judgments, issuing process, etc., but also in administrative business.

But the Local Government Act, 1888, transferred the administrative business to the county council, and s. 83 converted the clerk of the peace into clerk to the county council, except in the county of London. Vacancies since 1888 are filled by the joint committee of the county justices and the county council (ib.), and the committee can, for sufficient reason, remove any clerk of the peace appointed since 1888 (ib.). A deputy to the clerk of the peace may be appointed and removed by the committee (ib., Recorders, Stipendiaries and Clerks of the Peace Act, 1906, s. 1).

In all boroughs having a court of quarter sessions the clerk of the peace is appointed to hold office during good behaviour by the town council, and is removable by the recorder (Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 164 (1), (2), (3), (4); Local Government Act, 1888, s. 119).

A deputy to the clerk of the peace may be appointed and removed in a borough by the clerk himself (Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 164 (3)), or, in the event of the clerk's incapacity, by the borough council (Recorders, Stipendiaries and Clerks of the Peace Act, 1906, s 1); and in counties the deputy may be appointed (Local Government Act, 1888, s. 83 (4), or removed (6 Edw. 7, c. 46, s. 1) by the joint committee.

It is not illegal, but it would be grossly improper, for a clerk of the peace to appear professionally before his court.

The clerk of the peace, except in a borough (where the town clerk keeps many of the records), is responsible for all the records. On the administrative side, he is the chief officer of his council. At quarter sessions he discharges functions analogous to those performed by the clerk of assizes (q.v.). at assizes.

Clerk of the Pells; Clericus pellis. An officer of the Exchequer whose duty it was to enter all moneys received from the tellers (q.v.) in a parchment roll called the Pellis receptorum, and to enter all payments in another roll called the Pellis exituum. Long after the days of parchment rolls the Clerk of the Pells continued to be an officer of the Exchequer. His office was abolished only in 1834 by the statute 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 15, s. 1. See PELLS, ETC.; COMPTROLLER.

Clerk of the Petty Bag; Clericus parvæ bagæ. An officer of the Court of Chancery whose duty it used to be to record the return of all inquisitions out of every shire; to make out patents of customers, gaugers, controllers, and aulnagers; all congés d'élire for bishops; the summonses of the nobility, clergy, and burgesses to Parliament, etc. (33 Hen. 8, c. 22). The office was abolished by the Supreme Court of Judicature (Officers) Act, 1879, s. 14 and Sch. (Pt. II.). See PETTY BAG; CLERK OF CROWN IN CHANCERY; LAW SOCIETY.

Clerk of the Pipe; Clericus pipæ. An officer of the Exchequer who anciently kept the Pipe (q.v.) Roll, and also passed the accounts of the sheriffs. In 1798, the office was held, under patent from the Crown, by Lord William Bentinck for his life. He did nothing whatever except draw the £630 a year which remained after he had paid the two secondaries (q.v.) and the six attornies who did the actual work (Commons Committees Reports (1803), Vol. 13, p. 310). The office was abolished by the Fines Act, 1833, s. 41, which recited that some of the duties had been, or by that Act were being, transferred to other offices, and that the other duties were obsolete. See INGROSSATOR, ETC.; QUIETUS; SURPLUSAGE.

Clerk of the Pleas; Clericus placitorum. An officer of the former Court of Exchequer in whose office all officers of that court claimed their privilege (q.v.) to sue or be sued in that court. In his office were also prosecuted actions at law by such other persons, not being officers of the Court of Exchequer, as were indebted to the king; and this, by a legal fiction was held to include everyone. He had under him many clerks who were all attorneys of the Court of Exchequer (q.v.). He (like the Clerks of the Rules, of the Supersedeas, of the Treasury, of the Warrants, infra) was abolished by the Superior Courts (Officers) Act, 1837, s. 1, Sch. (A).

Clerk of the Rolls. Described by Jacob (1749) as an officer of the former Court of Chancery who searched for deeds and made copies thereof. Possibly he is the "Clerk of Records in the Rolls Chapel" mentioned at p. 265 of the Commons Committees Reports (1803), Vol. 13.

Clerk of the Rules. An officer of the former Court of King's Bench who drew up rules (q.v.) and orders in that court.

Clerk of the Sewers. This was what would now be termed the secretary of the Commissioners of Sewers (q.v.).

Clerk of the Signet; Clericus signeti. An officer whose duty it was to attend on his majesty's principal secretary, who always had the custody of the privy signet (q.v.), as well for the purpose of sealing his majesty's private letters, as also grants which passed his majesty's hand by bill signed; there were four of these officers, appointed under the statute 27 Hen 8, c. 11. Their offices were abolished by the statute 14 & 15 Vict. c. 82, s. 3.

Clerk of the Supersedeas. An officer of the former Court of Common Pleas who made out writs of supersedeas (q.v.).

Clerk of the Treasury; Clericus thesaurii. An officer of the former Court of Common Pleas. He kept the records of that court, made exemplifications of them, and received all fees due for searches. He held office at the pleasure of the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas. In 1798 the Chief Justice himself held the office and executed it through his clerk. See Commons Committees Reports (1803), Vol. 13, p. 300.

Clerk of the Warrants; Clericus warrantorum. An officer of the former Court of Common Pleas who entered all warrants of attorney (q.v.), enrolled indentures of bargain and sale (q.v.) acknowledged in that court, and estreated into the Exchequer all fines, etc., which became due to the king in that court. See CLERK OF ENROLMENTS.

Clerks in Court. These were officers of the Court of King's Bench who until 1844 conducted the business of that Court on the Crown side. Their offices were abolished by s. 1 of the statute 6 & 7 Vict. c. 20; and that statute, by s. 14, admitted attorneys and the solicitors of several public boards to practise on the Crown side in their place.

Clerks of Indictments are officers attached to the Central Criminal Court and to each circuit. They prepare and settle indictments against offenders and assist the clerk of arraigns (q.v.).

Clerks of the Privy Seal; Clerici privati sigilli. These were four officers who formerly were part of the staff of the Lord Privy Seal (q.v.). They dealt with such documents as were sent from the Privy Signet (q.v.) to the Privy Seal, and which were to be passed to the Great Seal (q.v.), and they also used the Privy Seal in connection with loans to the Crown. They were abolished by the statute 14 & 15 Vict. c. 82, s. 3.

Clerks of Records and Writs were officers formerly attached to the Court of Chancery, whose duties consisted principally in sealing bills of complaint and writs of execution, filing affidavits, keeping a record of suits, and certifying office copies of pleadings and affidavits. They were three in number, and the business was distributed among them according to the letters of the alphabet. (See REFERENCE TO RECORD.) By the Judicature Acts, 1873, 1875, they were transferred to the Chancery Division of the High Court. By the Judicature (Officers) Act, 1879, they were transferred to the Central Office of the Supreme Court, under the title of Masters of the Supreme Court, and the office of clerk of records and writs was abolished. See CENTRAL OFFICE; MASTER OF THE SUPREME COURT; SIX CLERKS.

Clerks of Seats. These are officers in the Principal Registry of the Probate Division who discharge the duty of preparing and passing the grants of probate and letters of administration, under the supervision of the registrars. There are six seats, the business of which is regulated by an alphabetical arrangement, and each seat has four clerks. They have to take bonds from administrators and to receive caveats against a grant being made in a case where a will is contested. They also draw the "acts," that is, a short summary of each grant made, containing the name of the deceased, amount of assets and other particulars.

Clifford's Inn. See INNS OF CHANCERY.

Clink. See PRIVILEGED PLACES.

Clito. This, in Anglo-Saxon times, meant a son of the king.

Clocks. See WATCHES.

Clog on Equity of Redemption. It is a well-settled rule of law that no mortgage deed may contain any provisions which impede the right of the mortgagor to exercise his "equity of redemption" (q.v.) within a reasonable time, and that any such provision (known as a "clog on the equity of redemption") is void. Thus provisos against redemption for twenty and thirty years have been disallowed; but, on the other hand, provisos against redemption for such periods as seven or five years are usual and will be upheld.

Close. In the law of real property, "close" signifies a piece of land, and a trespass on a man's land was formerly described as a breach of his close, or trespass quare clausum fregit. "For," says Blackstone, "every man's land is in the eye of the law enclosed and set apart from his neighbour's; and that either by a visible and material fence, as one field is divided from another by a hedge, or by an ideal, invisible boundary, existing only in the contemplation of the law, as when one man's land adjoins to another's in the same field." See BOUNDARIES; TRESPASS.

In procedure, "close" signifies conclusion. Thus the close of the pleadings is where the pleadings are finished, that is, when issue has been joined. See PLEADING; ISSUE.

Close Rolls and Close Writs. Certain letters of the King sealed with his Great Seal and directed to particular persons and for particular purposes, and not being proper for public inspection, are closed up and sealed on the outside. They are thence called writs close (literæ clausæ), and are recorded in the close rolls in the same manner as others are in the patent rolls (literæ patentes), or open letters.

Close Seasons. The periods of the year during which it is forbidden to kill or take game, freshwater fish, sea fish, oysters, or as the case may be. The annual close season varies for different kinds of game, but the period 1st March to 1st August is included in the close seasons for all kinds of game, except hares (q.v.). The period may vary according to the mode of capture adopted; thus, the time during which salmon are protected from capture by nets is always longer than the time during which it is forbidden to take them with rod and line. In addition to the annual close time, there is also, in the case of salmon netting, a weekly close season, which is normally from noon on Saturday to 6 a.m. on Monday. Most kinds of game cannot be killed on Christmas Day or on Sunday, and the Wild Birds Protection Acts, 1880 to 1908, protect most species of birds between 1st March and 1st August; but these two periods of exemption are not technically close seasons.

Closh. The "newly-imagined games called closh, kailes, half bowl, hand in and hand out, and queck board" were prohibited, under a penalty of two years' imprisonment, by the statute 17 Edw. 4, c. 3, which began by reciting that it was unlawful to play dice, quoits or football, but enacted no penalties in respect of these last three games.

"Closh" (also called "clash") seems to have been something like the modern croquet; kailes (or kayles) was ninepins; half bowl was roly-poly; hand in and hand out was some kind of ball game; and queck board would seem to have been some game played upon a chequered board or chess board.

The prohibition of these games was in order to prevent men from being diverted from the practice of archery, as appears clearly from the statute.

Clough. An allowance of two pounds on every hundredweight which was formerly given under the lex mercatoria when goods were bought wholesale by weight.

Clove. An ancient measure of cheese equivalent to eight pounds. See the statute 9 Hen. 6, c. 8.

Club. A club is a voluntary association of persons for social purposes, and sometimes also for purposes of a literary or political nature, or the like. A club is not a partnership. In some clubs the expenses are borne by a contractor, who receives the subscriptions of the members, and makes his profit out of the difference: these are called proprietary clubs.

A club is regulated by the rules agreed to by the members and for the time being in force, and therefore if a member is expelled from a club by a decision which has been arrived at bona fide in accordance with the rules and in a judicial manner, without caprice or improper motive, the Court cannot interfere. In a proper case, however, the Court will grant an injunction to prevent a member from being deprived of the benefits of the club.

In proprietary clubs it was unlawful even before 1902 to supply intoxicating liquor to members unless the proprietor held a licence for the sale of intoxicating liquors. Down to 1902 the sale of liquor to members in a club which was not a proprietary club was not in any way regulated by the law; but in 1902 the sale of liquors in all clubs was regulated by the Licensing Act, 1902, ss. 24-28. Those enactments have been repealed and are replaced by the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, ss. 91-98. Under ss. 91 and 92 of the Act of 1910, every club in which liquor is sold must be registered with the clerk to the justices of the petty sessional division in which the club is; under s. 95 a club which is not properly conducted may be struck off the register; and under s. 93 the sale of intoxicating liquor in an unregistered club is punishable on summary conviction with a fine not exceeding £50, or with imprisonment not exceeding one month or with both, and, if intoxicating liquor is kept for sale or supply in any unregistered club, every officer and member of the club is liable to a penalty of not more than £5 unless he can show that the liquor was so kept without his knowledge.

Coadjutor. The coadjutor of an executor was the same thing as an overseer (q.v.). In the old writers, coadjutor signifies one who disseises a person of land to the use (that is, for the benefit) not of himself, but of another. It now is used only as meaning an assistant to a bishop (q.v.).

Coal. All coal must be sold by weight only unless the purchaser consents in writing to sale by boat, load, waggon, or tubs, delivered from the mine into the premises of the purchaser (Weights and Measures Act, 1889, s. 20 (1)). A consignment note, in the prescribed form, must be sent with any quantity exceeding two hundredweight which is sent by vehicle (s. 21).

It would seem that coke is not coal for the purposes of these enactments.

Coal Mines. The law as to coal mines was codified by the Coal Mines Act, 1911, which, out of the pre-existing legislation on the subject, left unrepealed, or unrepealed as regards coal mines, only a few sections of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, which had itself been a codifying Act, the two sections which constitute the whole of the Coal Mines (Checkweighers) Act, 1894, the Coal Mines (Weighing of Minerals) Act, 1905, and the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1908 (popularly known as the Eight Hours Act). The Coal Mines Act, 1911, has been amended as regards s. 14 by the Coal Mines Act, 1914, and as regards s. 9 by the Police, Factories, Etc (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1916, s. 10; and the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1908, has been changed by the Coal Mines Act, 1919, into what is a Seven Hours Act.

In addition to these permanent enactments, there is the Coal Mines (Minimum Wage) Act, 1912, which is in form a temporary Act, kept alive only by the annual Expiring Laws Continuance Acts.

The effect of the enactments at present in force is that miners have a minimum wage, a low maximum number of working hours, women and children and young persons cannot be employed at all below ground, while on the surface their employment is strictly regulated, and most elaborate arrangements are made for the safety and well-being of all persons working in coal mines. See CHECKWEIGHER.

Coal Note. The statute 3 Geo. 2, c. 26, s. 7, provided that any person buying out of any vessel in the port of London must pay for it either in cash or by a promissory note containing the words "Value received in Coals." Any person giving or receiving a promissory note for coals so bought which did not contain those words was liable to a penalty of £100 (ib., s. 8). Notes drawn in accordance with the statute—which was repealed by the S. L. R. Act, 1867 were known as coal notes.

Coal-whippers. These were labourers who discharged colliers in the port of London with a primitive arrangement of a basket or other receptacle, a block and a rope. Under the statutes 6 & 7 Vict. c. ci., and 9 & 10 Vict. c. 36, and the Coal-whippers (Port of London) Act, 1851 (which were of temporary operation and collectively covered only the period from 23rd August, 1843, to 31st December, 1856), it was unlawful for any person to act in the port as a coal-whipper unless registered as such at the office of the registrar appointed under the Acts.

Coast Blocade. This was the name of an arrangement for preventing smuggling during the Napoleonic Wars. It was carried out by men commanded by naval officers and under naval discipline, who operated from centres known as "blocade stations" and consisting of the Martello Towers along the Kent and Sussex coasts. It was discontinued in 1831.

Coast-guard. The force now known as the Coast-guard represents the various forces which from time to time were used to prevent (i) invasion and (ii) smuggling. From the thirteenth century down to 1660, the defence of the coast devolved upon the maritime counties: in 1660 it passed to the militia (q.v.), in whose hands it remained, theoretically at least, until 1857. From early times there were customs officers to prevent smuggling; by 1822 there had grown up an anti-smuggling organisation which consisted of (1) revenue cutters, (2) riding officers (drawn from cavalry regiments), and (3) the "preventive water-guard" (composed of men in the navy under the command of naval officers).

These three bodies were, by Treasury order, consolidated in 1822 into a body known as the Preventive Service, which was under the command of a Comptroller-General, who himself was subordinate to the Customs Commissioners. In 1829 the Preventive Service became, by Treasury minute, the Revenue Coast-guard, and the riding officers became the Mounted Guard. In 1831 the Mounted Guard was given up, and the Admiralty managed the rest of the service for the Customs Commissioners. By the Coast-guard Service Act, 1856, the Customs Commissioners were eliminated, and the Admiralty was left in exclusive control.

The Coast-guard is now supposed to prevent smuggling and to defend the coasts. But the number of men employed—the number authorised by the Act of 1856 was 10,000—and the number of coast-guard stations have been much reduced, and the importance of the force has diminished.

Cocaine. See DRUGS, DANGEROUS.

Cochering; Coshering. The right claimed by the ancient Irish chieftains to quarter themselves and their dependants upon their tenants.

Cocket. A parchment document sealed by the Customs which formerly was given to the owner of customed goods as evidence of the payment of the duties. Anciently it was known as Literæ de Coketto or Literæ Testimoniales de Coketto.

Cock-fighting. This is illegal. The enactment at present in force on the subject is the Protection of Animals Act, 1911, s. 1 (1) (a).

Co-creditors; Co-debtors; Co-owners. See JOINT.

Code; Codification. The term "code" is used in various senses. In the Corpus Juris Civilis it is used to signify a consolidation of the statute law, namely, a collection of enactments arranged systematically, with all obsolete and inconsistent enactments omitted. In modern times the term is more commonly used to signify a new enactment containing legislative rules of law relating to a particular subject (e.g. civil law, criminal law, procedure, evidence or the like). Such a code differs from that of Justinian in being expressed in new language, instead of being a mere re-arrangement of existing enactments.

A code differs from a digest (q.v.) in consisting of abstract rules of law: a digest, in the proper sense of the word, is a collection of concrete cases.

Codification is the process of converting the law of a country, or a portion of it, into a code, whether that law consists of statutes, or case-law, or customs, or all three. Codification is in theory a formal process, as opposed to legislation: that is, the codifier takes the law as he finds it, without reference to its expediency, and merely puts it in a more convenient shape; in practice, however, codification is impossible without introducing amendments of the law, in matters of detail at least.

The most celebrated modern codes are those of Napoleon. Several codes have been promulgated in India, and a code of the criminal law has frequently been under discussion in this country. We have, however, not got farther than the codification of particular branches of the law by means of such statutes as the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882.

Codicil. A codicil is an instrument executed by a testator for adding to, altering or explaining a will previously made by him. It is in law part of the will, and the will and codicils (if more than one) make but one testament. A codicil must be executed with the same formalities as a will (Wills Act, 1837, ss. 1, 9). Before the Wills Act, 1837, a testator could make a nuncupative (or word of mouth) disposition of property undisposed of by his written will, and such a disposition was called a nuncupative codicil. Nuncupative testamentary dispositions have been abolished by the Wills Act in all but a very few cases. See WILL.

In Roman law codicilli meant an informal or "unsolemn" testamentary disposition, as opposed to a testamentum, which appointed a hæres or executor, and was executed with formalities (Just. Inst. ii., 25). It is said by old writers that in English law also "codicil" meant an "unsolemn last will," not containing the appointment of an executor, but whether this is really so, or whether these writers merely copied the passages on codicils from Justinian, is not clear.

Cofferer of the King's Household. An official immediately subordinate to the Controller of the King's Household (q.v.). He paid all wages in the household and accounted to the Exchequer. See the statute 39 Eliz c. 7.

Cogitationis pœnam nemo meretur (2 Inst Jur. Civ. 658). (No man deserves punishment for a thought.) But although the general rule of our law is that a man cannot be punished for a mere intention to which no effect is attempted, yet the mere "imagining" of the death of the king is treason.

Cognitionibus mittendis. An obsolete writ which anciently was directed to a justice of the Common Pleas or other person who had taken a fine (q.v.) but had not certified it, requiring him to certify the fine.

Cognizance; Cognizee; Cognizor. See CONUSANCE; FINE; NOTICE.

Cognovit. Where the defendant in an action in the King's Bench Division of the High Court has no defence, he may give the plaintiff a written confession of the action, upon condition that he shall be allowed a certain time for the payment of the debt or damages, the amount of which is generally agreed upon. This is called a cognovit (cognovit actionem) It impliedly authorises the plaintiff's solicitor to do everything necessary to obtain judgment against the defendant if he fails to comply with the conditions on which time is given. That part of the document which contains the terms on which the defendant is to be allowed to discharge the plaintiff's claim is called the defeasance: it must be written on the same piece of paper as the cognovit (Debtors Act, 1869, s. 26). The cognovit must be attested by a solicitor, whose duty it is to inform the defendant of its nature and effect (ib., s. 24), and it must be filed within twenty-one days after execution, or it will be void (ib., s. 26). Cognovits are not of frequent occurrence since 1869, as they, like warrants of attorney (q.v.), have been in practice superseded by orders of the Court (made by consent) for the entry of judgment or for the issue of execution at a future date. Such an order is subject to the provisions as to filing which are contained in the Debtors Act, 1869, s. 26.

Before 1856 a cognovit given after plea was known as a cognovit actionem relicta verificatione.

Cohæredes sunt quasi unum corpus, propter unitatem juris quod habent (Co. Litt 163). (Co-heirs are regarded as one person on account of the unity of title which they possess.)

Coif was a white silk cap which serjeants-at-law were supposed to wear in Court, as "a badge that they were graduates in law": in practice it was merely a patch on the wig. See BARON OF THE COIF; EXCHEQUER; SERJEANT.

Coin. See COUNTERFEIT COIN; COPPER; GOLD AND SILVER; UTTER.

Coke. Edward Coke was born 1st February, 1551-2, called to the bar in 1578, became recorder of London, 1591-2, Solicitor-General, 1592, member and speaker of the House of Commons, 1593, Attorney-General, 1594, was knighted on the accession of James I., made chief justice of the Common Pleas, 1606, of the King's Bench, 1613; from which office he was removed in 1616, in consequence of his resistance to the King and Court of Chancery: he was again returned to Parliament in 1621, and died on 3rd September, 1633.

His principal works are—(1) the so-called Institutes of the Laws of England, in four parts, consisting of the celebrated Commentary on Littleton's Treatise on Tenures, a commentary on many old Acts of Parliament, a treatise of Pleas of the Crown, and an account of the various courts; (2) thirteen volumes of reports; and (3) a volume of law tracts, published after his death, including the "Compleat Copyholder."

Coliberts. These were tenants, mentioned in Domesday, holding neither on a free tenure nor on a servile tenure, but on a tenure of an intermediate kind.

Collateral is, literally, that which is "by the side of," or distinct from, a certain thing. Thus, collateral consanguinity is the relationship between persons who are descended from the same ancestor (brothers, cousins, etc.), as opposed to lineal consanguinity, which exists between persons of whom one is descended from the other (father and son, grandfather and grandson, etc.). See CONSANGUINITY; DESCENT.

A collateral security is one which is given in addition to the principal security. Thus, a person who borrows money on mortgage (which is the principal security) may deposit shares with the lender as collateral security. Property comprised in a mortgage which is expressed to be collateral to another mortgage is not necessarily entitled to exoneration by the property comprised in the other mortgage. Thus, where A mortgaged to B freehold land, and also on the same day, and as part of the same transaction, mortgaged to B leaseholds as "collateral security" for the same advance, it was held that the leasehold security was not "collateral" in the sense of secondary, and that accordingly the debt was payable rateably out of the two securities, and not primarily out of the freeholds.

A collateral assurance, agreement, etc., is one which is independent of, but subordinate to, an assurance or agreement affecting the same subject-matter. Thus, where A agreed to take a lease of B's land, but finding, on examination, that it was overrun with rabbits, declined to sign the lease unless B would promise to destroy the rabbits, which B did, but no term to that effect was inserted in the lease, which provided that A should preserve the game on the land and reserved the right of sporting to B, it was held that the agreement by B to destroy the rabbits was collateral to the lease, and could, therefore, be taken advantage of by A, although it had not been inserted in the lease.

In the law of evidence, a collateral issue is a question which is not immediately or mediately a matter in dispute in the proceeding. Thus, it is not allowable to adduce evidence as to particular acts of misconduct by a witness with the view of discrediting his testimony, because that would raise a collateral issue.

In the old books, when a bond, recognisance, or the like, was entered into to secure the performance of some act, such as to execute a conveyance, build a house, etc., it was called a bond to do a collateral act, as opposed to a bond for the payment of money, apparently because in the latter case the act and the penalty are both of the same nature.

As to collateral warranty, see WARRANTY.

Collaterates et socii. An ancient title of masters in the Court of Chancery.

Collatio bonorum. In the Roman law this corresponded to what is known in our law as bringing into Hotchpot (q.v.).

Collation is the ceremony by which a bishop admits and institutes a clerk to a church or benefice in his (the bishop's) own gift, whether as patron or by lapse (q.v.): it is equivalent to the two acts of presentation and institution, which are necessary in cases where the patron and the bishop are different persons. Where the benefice is in the bishop's own gift, it is sometimes called a collative advowson. See ADVOWSON.

Collation of Seals. In ecclesiastical law, this anciently took place when, on the same libel (q.v.), one seal was set upon the reverse of another seal.

Collatione facta uni post mortem alterius. A writ anciently issued to the justices of the Common Pleas commanding them to issue another writ to a bishop directing him to admit a certain clerk (q.v.) to a benefice in the place of another who had been presented by the king but who had died before admittance.

Collatione heremitagii. A writ whereby the king anciently gave to a clerk (q.v.) the keeping of a hermitage.

Collative Advowson. See ADVOWSON.

Collecting Societies. A collecting society is a friendly society (q.v.) or branch, whether registered or unregistered, which receives contributions by means of collectors at a greater distance than ten miles from the registered office or principal place of business of the society. This definition is contained in s. 1 of the Collecting Societies and Industrial Insurance Companies Act, 1896, to which reference should be made for further information regarding such societies.

Collective Title. Between 1829 and 1912 twenty-three Acts dealing with the police of the Metropolis were passed. Apart from special statutory provision, the only accurate way in which all these Acts could be referred to in another Act or in a legal document would be by setting out the short title (q.v.) which each of them has either under the Short Titles Act, 1896, or under a section contained in every one of them which was passed after 1896. But the whole group can now be properly referred to for all purposes as the Metropolitan Police Acts, 1829 to 1912, by force of the Short Titles Act, 1896—which gave the first sixteen of them the collective title of the Metropolitan Police Acts, 1829 to 1895—and by force of provisions contained in such of them as were passed after 1896.

This system of collective titles had been adopted as regards many groups of Acts before 1892. It was applied by the Short Titles Acts, 1892 and 1896, to many other groups which up to then had no collective title. Each latest Act of a group of Acts now invariably gives a collective title to the whole group. Such collective titles are only for convenience in citation: they do not mean that all the Acts of a group are to be construed as one.

Collective Works. See the Copyright Act, 1911, s. 35.

College. A college "always supposeth a corporation," said Holt, C.J., in Philips v. Bury (1694), 2 T. R. 353. That is still the law. Schools and various educational institutions frequently describe themselves as colleges: but that does not in law make them colleges unless they are in fact incorporated.

A college is a corporation created for the promotion of learning and, in many cases, for the support of persons who devote themselves to learning. The colleges which make up the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, the colleges of Eton and Winchester, and bodies created for professional purposes, such as the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons, and the College of Heralds, are what are known to the law as colleges. All of them are incorporated. Those of them—such, for instance, as the colleges of Oxford and Cambridge—which exist for, amongst other purposes, the support of persons who devote themselves to learning are charitable corporations. See CHARITIES.

A college may be created by royal charter, which is the most usual method of incorporation, or by persons acting under royal licence or under the Companies Act, 1908, ss. 17, 19, 20.

College of Arms. See HERALDS.

Collegiate Body. This is a synonym of college (q.v.).

Collegiate Church; Collegiate Chapter. A collegiate church is one built and endowed for a society or body corporate, consisting of a college or chapter with a dean, or president and canons, or prebendaries. Before the Reformation there were many of these bodies, all consisting of secular clergy as distinguished from clergy belonging to the religious orders. Those now existing are Westminster, Windsor, Wolverhampton, Heytesbury, Southwell and Middleham.

Colligenda bona. See GRANT.

Collision. Cases of damage caused by the collision of ships form an important part of the Admiralty jurisdiction of the High Court and County Courts. These cases are subject to peculiar rules, regulating the liability of the respective vessels and their owners, and the procedure to be adopted. Thus, if the collision is caused by the negligence of both vessels, each is liable to make good the loss or damage in proportion to the degree in which she was in fault (Maritime Conventions Act, 1911, s. 1), and the liability of each vessel is limited according to its size (Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 503). If two vessels, A and B, come into collision, both being equally to blame, causing loss or injury to A to the extent of £500, and to B to the extent of £1,000, half the loss of A would be deducted from half the loss of B so that A would pay B £250, while if A was in fault to the extent of 80 per cent., she would be liable for 80 per cent. of the damage to the extent of £1,000 suffered by B—that is to say, A would be liable for £800—and B would be liable for only 20 per cent. of the damage to the extent of £500 suffered by A—that is to say, B would be liable for £100—so that A would pay B £700. See PRELIMINARY ACTS; LIMITATION OF LIABILITY.

Colloquium, in the old common law pleading in cases of slander, was that part of the declaration which alleged that the words complained of were spoken of and concerning the plaintiff, or of and concerning the plaintiff in the way of his trade and profession.

Collusion is where two persons, apparently in a hostile position, or having conflicting interests, by arrangement do some act in order to injure a third person or deceive a Court. Thus, where a person brings an action for penalties against a company by arrangement with them, for the purpose of protecting them against other actions by hostile persons for the same penalties, the judgment is held to have been obtained by collusion. The effect of collusion is to vitiate the transaction in which it is employed.

A person taking interpleader proceedings for his own protection is bound to make an affidavit that there is no collusion between him and either of the adverse claimants (R. S. C., Ord 57, r. 2 (b)).

In suits for dissolution of marriage, collusion was formerly used in the sense of connivance and conspiracy to commit the offence complained of; but it now means a conspiracy in presenting or prosecuting the petition in the suit, as where the respondent agrees with the petitioner to assist in obtaining a decree. Collusion is a bar to such a suit. See INTERVENTION.

Colonial Governors. Under the statute 11 & 12 Wm. 3, c. 12, governors guilty of oppression, or other crimes or offences in their colonies, may be tried in the King's Bench or by special commission; and they may be sued in the courts of their own colony or dependency in respect of matters, such as private debts, not relating to their office. But they or any other governors are not liable in the courts of their own government for any acts done by them in their capacity of governors; and à fortiori, they are not liable in such cases where the legislature of the colony has passed an Act of indemnity. See ACT OF STATE.

Colonial Law. The Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881, provides for the apprehension of offenders within the United Kingdom escaping to the colonies, and vice versâ, and for their being sent for trial to the jurisdiction within which the offence was committed; and the Admiralty Offences (Colonial) Act, 1849, provides for the trial in the colonial courts of offenders upon the seas afterwards coming within the colonial jurisdiction; and the Courts (Colonial) Jurisdiction Act, 1874, provides for the punishment that may be inflicted on conviction.

Colonial Office. The Government department of which the Secretary of State for the Colonies is the head. See SECRETARY OF STATE.

Colonies. As a general rule, a colony acquired by discovery and occupation is to be governed by the laws of England; and if acquired by conquest, or by cession, then by its own laws, so far as they are not contrary to morality, and until this country sees fit to change them. But when the laws of England depend upon circumstances that are peculiar to England, and which do not apply to the colonies also, then these particular laws of England do not hold good even in colonies acquired by discovery or occupation, e.g., the law of mortmain has been held not to apply in the island of Grenada; and the law (now abolished) against aliens holding real property was held not to apply in India. The Crown may in the case of colonies acquired by conquest or cession grant them legislative assemblies; and in the case of colonies acquired by discovery or occupancy, it may sanction the constitution of local representative legislatures. And thereafter the Crown's power of legislation is at an end, as regards colonies of all kinds, which are thereafter governed by the acts of their own legislatures in conjunction with and subject to the acts of the Imperial legislature; but only such acts of the Imperial legislature extend to the colonies as expressly, or by reasonable implication, are intended so to do.

The Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865, provides that any colonial law that is repugnant or contrary to any Act of Parliament extending to the particular colony, or that is repugnant or contrary to any order made under the authority of the Act, is to be read subject to such Act or order, and is to be void to the extent of the repugnancy.

Colorado Beetle. The Destructive Insects Act, 1877, and the orders made thereunder, provide for the destruction and for the exclusion from the country of the insect known as the Colorado Beetle, which shortly before the passing of that Act had come into this country from America and had done much injury to crops.

Colour. Colour primarily signifies any appearance, pretext or pretence: thus, a person is said to have no colour of title when he has not even a primâ facie title.

Colour was formerly an important term in the language of pleading, but is now obsolete. It signified an apparent or primâ facie right, and the meaning of the rule that pleadings in confession and avoidance should give colour was that they should confess the matter adversely alleged to such an extent at least as to admit some apparent right in the opposite party, which required to be encountered and avoided (i.e. deprived of its effect) by the allegation of new matter. Colour was either implied or express.

Implied colour was as follows: Where, for instance, to an action of assumpsit the defendant pleaded in confession and avoidance that he did not promise within six years before the action brought, it was an absolute implied admission of the truth of the adverse allegation, that he had at one time made such promise as alleged, and that there was therefore an apparent right in the plaintiff and this right was avoided by relying on the lapse of time. Express colour (called in the old books " colour " simply) was a feigned matter, pleaded by the defendant in an action of trespass, from which the plaintiff seemed to have a good cause of action, whereas he had in truth only an appearance or colour of cause. Thus, if the defendant in an action of trespass quare clausum fregit wished to defend himself upon the ground that J. S., a third person, being seised in fee of the land in question, had demised it to him for a term of years, he was not allowed to plead those facts simply, because they would amount to a denial of any title to possession whatever in the plaintiff, and for such a denial a traverse (q.v.) was the proper plea; but as it was frequently advantageous for the defendant to set forth such facts in his plea, the old pleaders devised the expedient of inserting in the plea a fictitious allegation of some colourable but insufficient title in the plaintiff, which they at the same time avoided by the preferable title of the defendant. Thus, in the action of trespass above, the defendant would plead the demise by J. S. to himself, and proceed to aver that the plaintiff claimed under another demise from J. S., and that it was inoperative; this was called " giving colour," because it supplied the want of implied colour.

Express colour was abolished by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 64: implied colour, which had been known to the law for over five hundred years, disappeared when the Judicature Act, 1873, came into force.

Colourable is that which is in appearance only and not in substance what it purports to be.

Thus, where a person took a house, for which he paid rates and taxes, in a parish for the purpose of obtaining a qualification for certain privileges given to the parishioners of that parish, it was held that his qualification was good and not colourable; but that if he had not really taken the house, but had only got somebody to put up his name over the door, or something of that kind, then it would have been colourable and a sham.

Colourable imitation, as applied to trade marks (q.v.), is such a close or ingenious imitation as to be calculated to deceive ordinary persons. See also COPYRIGHT; PATENTS.

Combarones. Anciently this meant the Fellow Barons or Freemen of the Cinque Ports. In the eighteenth century a Baron of the Cinque Ports had come to mean a representative in Parliament of one of those ports, and combarons had come to mean the representatives generally of those ports in Parliament. See BARON.

Combat, Trial by. See BATTLE, TRIAL BY.

Combination of Workmen. At common law all combinations of workmen for the purpose of raising the rate of wages were unlawful, as being in restraint of trade and were held to be conspiracies. This rule has long, however, ceased to prevail. The repealed statute 22 Vict. c. 34, enacted in explanation of the earlier statute 6 Geo. 4, c. 129 (since repealed), that no workman, by reason merely of his combining with other workmen for the purpose of fixing the rate of wages, or for the purpose of peaceably and without threat or intimidation dissuading others from working with a view to fixing the rate of wages, should be deemed or taken to be guilty of the offence of molestation or obstruction; but the Act was not to authorise a workman to break his contract. The Trade Union Act, 1871, was a legal recognition of trade unions conducted on a similar principle; the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, and the common law as to conspiracy left in force by the enactments mentioned above, provided means of dealing with abuses by trade unions of the power which they possessed; but when this restraint upon their action was fully realised, the Trade Disputes Act, 1906, was passed in order (1) to free members of trade unions from civil liability for what was at common law an actionable conspiracy until then; (2) to absolutely prohibit actions of tort against trade unions; and (3) to legalise the form of intimidation known as peaceful picketing.

Combustio pecuniæ. What is now called assaying (see ASSAY) was anciently known as combustio pecuniæ, or melting down of money.

Comitatu commisso. An obsolete writ or commission to act in the office of sheriff.

Comitatu et castro commisso. A still older commission, not merely to act as sheriff, but also to take over charge of a castle.

Comitatus. A county.

Comity. The comity of nations (comitas gentium) is that body of rules which States observe toward one another from courtesy or mutual convenience, although they do not form part of international law.

Commander-in-Chief. Until 1793 the army was under the personal command of the King, his orders being given through the Secretary at War. In 1793 the office of Commander-in-Chief was created by patent, and thenceforward military appointments and promotions were in the hands of the Commander-in-Chief. The office of Commander had been created in order to remove the army from political influences: but after 1854 there was a system of dual control of the army by the Commander-in-Chief and the then newly created Secretary of State for War; and after 1870 the Commander-in-Chief became completely subordinate to the Secretary of State for War, who is the minister now responsible to Parliament for all matters connected with the army. In 1904 the office of Commander-in-Chief was abolished, his duties being divided between the Army Council (q.v.) and the Inspector-General of the Forces (q.v.).

Commandery. Anciently this meant a benefice held in commendam (q.v.).

It also means a manor or group of manors held by the Order of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, otherwise known as the Knights Hospitaller. All commanderies were forfeited to the Crown by the statute 32 Hen. 8, c. 20.

Commandite; Commanditaire. A société en commandite in French law is a partnership of which some of the members (the associés commanditaires) are mere lenders of capital to the firm, and are not responsible for any losses beyond the amount of their capital. The principle was introduced into English law by s. 1 of the Partnership Act, 1865 (commonly called Bovill's Act), and by s. 2 of the Partnership Act, 1890, which repealed and replaced Bovill's Act; and in mercantile language a persons who advanced money to a partnership under those Acts was called a commanditaire, but there were few such persons. An attempt had also been made by s. 4 of the Companies Act, 1867 (repealed by the Companies Act, 1908, s. 286, Sch. 6 (Pt. I.)), to apply what the legislature believed to be the principle of sociétés en commandite to English companies, but without success. (See COMPANY.) The Limited Partnerships Act, 1907, made the English law as to partnership very much the same as that existing in France under the sociétés en commandite; but partnerships under that Act have never been popular, a private company being found in general more satisfactory. See PARTNERSHIP; COMPANY.

Commendam is a benefice or ecclesiastical living which, being void, or to prevent its becoming void, is committed (commendatur) to the charge and care of some sufficient clerk, to be supplied until it may be conveniently provided of a pastor. Thus, formerly when a parson of a parish was made the bishop of a diocese, there was a cession of his benefice; but if the king gave him power to retain his benefice, he continued parson thereof, and was said to hold it in commendam. This was called a commendam retinere, as opposed to a commendam capere, which was where power was given to take a benefice in addition to one which the incumbent already had. Commendams were also divided with reference to their duration into semestris (six months), perpetua (for life), and limitata (temporary). Commendams were practically abolished by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners Act, 1836, s. 18, and the modern Acts against pluralities, except in the rare instances in which pluralities (q.v.) are still allowed.

Commendation, in feudal law, was where an owner of land placed himself and his land under the protection of a lord, so as to constitute himself a vassal or feudal tenant, Commendation, and the grant of beneficia or feuds, were the two principal modes by which the feudal system was established.

Commendatory. One who holds a church living in commendam (q.v.).

Letters commendatory meant letters of introduction, more especially when given by a bishop to one of his clergy travelling outside his diocese.

The commendatory prayer is the prayer by which the Anglican Church commends to the mercy of God a person at the point of death.

Commendatus. One who had commended himself to a lord. See COMMENDATION.

Commercial Cause. "Commercial causes include causes arising out of the ordinary transactions of merchants and traders; and amongst others, those relating to the construction of mercantile documents, export or import of merchandise, affreightment, insurance, banking and mercantile agency and mercantile usages." See the Annual Practice (1922), Pt. II., p. 2369. Such causes are transferred into what is known as the Commercial List, and in London, Liverpool and Manchester are tried in a simple and expeditious manner (ib., pp. 23, 68-71). An action becomes a commercial cause if a judge upon the hearing of the summons for directions (q.v.) transfers it to the list of commercial causes. This puts a stop to pleadings in the ordinary sense; but the judge at the same time can order the delivery of

" points of claim " (see STATEMENT OF CLAIM), and " points of defence " (see STATEMENT OF DEFENCE). Discovery by interrogatories and particulars is not, however, allowed. Anything in the shape of pleadings is in fact discouraged; and as each of the parties in these causes generally knows perfectly well the case which the other party proposes to make, they, under Ord. 34, r. 9, frequently go to trial without any substitute for pleadings.

Commercial Court. The court in which since 1895 commercial causes (q.v.) are heard is popularly known as the Commercial Court (Annual Practice (1922), Pt. II., p. 2368). There is, however, no court known to the law by that name. The Commercial Court is merely the result of the action of the judges in applying the existing Rules of Court in such a way as to provide a very satisfactory machine for disposing of commercial causes.

Commercium jure gentium commune esse debet, et non in monopolium et privatum paucorum quæstum convertendum (3 Inst. 56). (Commerce, by the law of nations, ought to be open to all, and not converted to monopoly and the private gain of a few.)

Commissary. This is an ecclesiastical officer who exercises jurisdiction in places of the diocese so far from the chief city that the chancellor cannot call the people to the bishop's principal consistory court without great trouble to them. See DIOCESAN COURTS.

Commissary Court. The ecclesiastical court of the diocese of Canterbury which corresponds to the consistory court (q.v.) of every other diocese. The jurisdiction of the Archbishop, as metropolitan, is exercised in the Court of Arches (q.v.) and not in his commissary court .

Commission. This is an order or authority to do some act.

In the law of contracts and agency, a commission is an authority to an agent to enter into a contract, especially one for the sale or purchase of goods: such a commission generally includes an engagement by the principal to remunerate the agent, and hence " commission " is sometimes used to denote the remuneration paid to an agent.

A del credere commission is an authority to an agent to negotiate sales of goods on behalf of his principal, the latter engaging to pay him a higher remuneration than usual in consideration of his guaranteeing the payment of the price by the persons to whom he may sell them.

Commission also signifies an authority given by the Crown, a Court, or the like, to a person or persons to do some act, especially to inquire into certain facts. When the commission creates a permanent office it is generally known by the description of the commissioners—such as the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, the Charity Commissioners, Railway Commissioners, etc. (See the various titles.) The following commissions are or were of a temporary nature:—

ADJUNCTS. See DELEGATES.

ANTICIPATION. Thus was a commission under the Great Seal to collect a tax or subsidy before it actually became due. Such commissions were, of course, illegal: when they were issued during the reign of Henry VIII there was little inclination to question the legality of anything done by the Crown, but during the Stuart period such commissions ceased to be issued. Now that power has passed from the Crown to the House of Commons, it is interesting to note that the House of Commons has imitated the methods of Henry VIII. It had been customary for many years before 1912 for the Ways and Means Committee of the House to pass a resolution assenting to certain taxes and for the tax-collecting authorities then to proceed to collect those taxes as if they had actually been imposed by an Act of Parliament. Such a course of procedure was manifestly illegal. It was declared to be illegal in 1913, whereupon the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act, 1913, was passed to give legal effect to the resolution of the House pending the passing of the bill imposing the taxes.

APPRAISEMENT AND SALE. Where property has been arrested in an Admiralty action in rem and ordered by the Court to be sold, the order is carried out by a commission of appraisement and sale; in some cases (as where the property is to be released on bail and the value is disputed) a commission of appraisement only is required. The commission of appraisement is directed to the marshal and commands him to reduce into writing an inventory of the property, to choose one or more experienced persons, to swear them to appraise the property according to its true value, and to file a certificate of the value signed by himself and the appraisers. The commission of sale (which is generally added to the commission of appraisement, though it may be separate) commands the marshal to sell the property by public auction for not less than the appraised price and to pay the proceeds into the registry (see Williams & Bruce (ed. 1902), pp. 313-320).

ARRAY. See ARRAY, COMMISSION OF.

ASSIZE. Commissions of assize are those issued to judges of the High Court or Court of Appeal, or to King's counsel, authorising them to sit at the assizes for the trial of civil actions. See ASSIZE; NISI PRIUS.

ASSOCIATION. This was a commission issued during the reign of Elizabeth to associate two or more learned persons with judges going circuit in Wales.

CHARITABLE USES. A commission issued out of Chancery to a bishop or other person to enquire into the application of the revenues of lands which had been given for charitable uses. See the statute 43 Eliz. c. 4.

DELEGATES. See that title.

EXAMINATION OF WITNESSES. When a persons whose evidence is required in a cause is out of the jurisdiction, or when his attendance in court ought for any sufficient cause to be dispensed with, a commission may be issued authorising a person or persons therein named to take his evidence on oath either by interrogatories or viva voce, or by both methods, and the depositions are read at the trial (R. S. C., Ord. 37, rr. 1, 5). See also EXAMINER; MANDAMUS; LETTERS OF REQUEST. When a cause has been referred to arbitration under the Arbitration Act, 1889, s. 15, the referee may make an order for the examination by a commissioner of witnesses who are abroad.

The County Court can make an order for the examination of any witness at any place in England or Wales before any person named in the order (County Court Rules, r. 18); but if the proposed place of examination is elsewhere, then an application must be made to the High Court (ib., r 33)

LUNACY. Commissions in lunacy are issued under the Great Seal. Before the Lunacy Regulation Act, 1853, a special separate commission, called a "commission in the nature of a writ de lunatico inquirendo," was issued in each case of alleged lunacy, requiring the person to whom it was directed to inquire concerning the state of mind of the alleged lunatic and to certify the result by inquisition (q.v.); but it was provided by the above Act (s. 39) that a general commission might be issued, directed to the Masters in Lunacy by name, and authorising them to enquire in each case of alleged lunacy referred to them by the Lord Chancellor in the same manner as if a commission had issued specially in the case; this superseded special commissions. The Lunacy Regulation Act, 1853, was repealed by the Lunacy Act, 1890, s. 342, but s. 112 of the latter Act reproduces s. 39 of the Act of 1853. (See MASTERS IN LUNACY.) As to the permanent Commissioners in Lunacy, see that title.

OYER AND TERMINER. See that title.

PARTITION. Formerly a partition was effected by issuing a commission to commissioners to divide the property, and on their return coming in the parties were ordered to execute mutual conveyances to carry out the division. See PARTITION.

PEACE. A commission of the peace is one by which the Crown appoints (or technically "assigns") a number of persons to act as justices of the peace (q.v.) within a certain district. The commission to county justices which was in use from 1590 to 1878 contained two assignments or appointments; by the first, the general power of preserving the peace was given to the justices jointly and severally; by the second, power to hold sessions (q.v.) was given to all the justices and to every two or more of them, of whom (in the original Latin quorum) one of certain named justices must be one. In more recent times it became the rule to name all the justices in the quorum clause, which therefore became nugatory. There is no reference to the quorum in the commission which has been used for counties since 1878. This new form was prescribed by rules (made under the Crown Office Act, 1877) which are to be found in the Statutory Rules and Orders Revised (ed. 1904), Vol. ii., "Clerk of the Crown in Chancery." Except as regards the quorum clause, it is substantially the same as the old form.

Before 1835 no commission of the peace was issued except for a county; and justices in boroughs derived their jurisdiction from prescription or charter. In the City of London, the Lord Mayor and aldermen still act as justices by prescription. But as regards all other boroughs, the Municipal Corporations Act, 1835, s. 107, abolished justices by prescription or charter, and s. 98 of the same Act provided for borough commissions of the peace. That Act was repealed and replaced by the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 5, and borough commissions of the peace are now issued under s. 156 of the Act of 1882. The form now in use is to be found in the rules which set out the form for counties. In the form for boroughs the first of the assignments used for counties is also used; but the second assignment is omitted, as borough justices may not act at any court of gaol delivery or quarter sessions (Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 158 (1)).

No commission of the peace is now affected by a demise of the Crown (Demise of the Crown Act, 1901, s. 1 (1)).

REBELLION. A commission of rebellion was the old method of compelling a defendant to a suit in Chancery to appear and answer the bill: it authorised the commissioners to attach, i.e. arrest him. The process was abolished in 1841.

REVIEW. A commission of review was occasionally issued to revise the sentence of the Court of Delegates. See DELEGATES.

SEWERS. See SEWER.

TRAILBASTON. See that title.

UNLIVERY. In an action in the Admiralty Division, where it is necessary to have the cargo in a ship unladen in order to have it appraised, a commission of unlivery is issued and executed by the marshal (see Williams & Bruce (ed. 1902), pp. 314-6).

WAR, TO TAKE UP MEN FOR. A commission formerly issued to press or force men into the king's service.

Commission-day is the opening day of the assizes at a particular town. See ASSIZE.

Commissioner means a person to whom a commission is directed by the Crown, or a Court, etc. The most important classes of commissioners, however, are those holding permanent offices. Amongst them are the following:—

Commissioners for Oaths are solicitors and other fit persons appointed by the Lord Chancellor to administer oaths (including affirmations and declarations) to persons coming before them (Commissioners for Oaths Act, 1889, ss. 1, 11) Formerly, when they were concerned only with affidavits, they were appointed under various Acts of Parliament according to the Court in which the affidavit was to be used; but since 1st November, 1875, all such commissioners can administer oaths in all causes and matters pending in the Supreme Court (Judicature Act, 1873, s. 82), and all commissioners for this purpose are appointed by the Lord Chancellor under the Judicature Act (ib., s 84). Commissioners for taking oaths in the Supreme Court may also take oaths in the ecclesiastical courts (Commissioners for Oaths Act, 1889, s. 1 (2)). A commissioner must not administer an oath to a person for whom he is acting as solicitor (ib., s. 1 (3)). The Lord Chancellor may revoke any commission (ib., s. 1 (1)); and this power applies to commissions granted before 1875.

The practice of the Lord Chancellor is to appoint only a solicitor who has been in continuous practice for six years, where such a solicitor is available; but in remote districts where such a solicitor cannot be found, a solicitor not coming within that description or some "other fit person" is occasionally appointed. The commission is in force only while the person appointed, if a solicitor, practises as such.

A commissioner is entitled to a fee of one shilling and sixpence for every oath, declaration, affirmation, or attestation, sworn, etc., before him, and to a further fee of one shilling for each exhibit (q.v.).

Any statutory declaration (q.v.) may be made either before a commissioner or (Statutory Declarations Act, 1835, s. 18) before a justice of the peace. The justice charges no fee. An affidavit cannot, however, be sworn or affirmed before a justice.

Commissioners for Taking Acknowledgments of Married Women are either special, that is, appointed for taking the acknowledgment in a particular case (as where the married woman is abroad), or perpetual (Fines and Recoveries Act, 1833, ss. 81, 83). See ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF DEEDS.

Commissioners in Bankruptcy. Formerly the jurisdiction over bankrupts' persons and estates was exercised by commissioners appointed by a commission issued by the Lord Chancellor under the Great Seal in each case; the Lord Chancellor exercising superintendence over the proceedings. By the statute 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 56, a court of bankruptcy consisting of four judges (exercising as a Court of Review the jurisdiction previously exercised by the Lord Chancellor) and six commissioners (who were permanent officials) was constituted; country commissioners were also appointed for time to time The proceedings in each case were commenced by a fiat, called a London or a country fiat according to circumstances, and issued out of Chancery, instead of by a commission. Under the statute 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, permanent district commissioners, attached to districts courts in the country, were appointed. Commissioners in bankruptcy were abolished by the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, ss 128, 130.

Commissioners in Lunacy. The original Commissioners in Lunacy were two in number, appointed by the Lord Chancellor under the now repealed statute 5 & 6 Vict. c. 84, ss. 1, 3, 13, 14, in order that commissions in lunacy (see COMMISSION—LUNACY) might be addressed to them. Under the repealed Lunacy Act, 1845, s. 2, they became Masters in Lunacy (q.v.), and the same Act, by s. 3, authorised the appointment by the Lord Chancellor of eleven new officials, to be known as Commissioners in Lunacy, three to be barristers and three to be physicians, the barristers and physicians to be salaried officials. The Lunacy Act, 1890, s. 150, enacted that there should continue to be Commissioners in Lunacy. The Lunacy Act, 1911, s. 3, authorised the appointment of two more paid Commissioners in Lunacy. The Mental Deficiency Act, 1913, s. 22, provided for fifteen commissioners in all, of whom twelve are paid; of the paid commissioners, four must have been practising barristers or solicitors of at least five years' standing, four must have been duly qualified medical practitioners of at least five years' standing; one at least of the unpaid and one at least of the paid commissioners must be a woman. The whole fifteen constitute the Board of Control (q.v.); and the Act further provides that the existing Commissioners in Lunacy should be members of the board.

Commissioners of Customs and Excise. The department which collects the customs and excise duties. They were originally the Commissioners of Customs, but by Order in Council dated 15th February, 1909, made pursuant to s. 4 of the Finance Act, 1908, the management of the excise was transferred to them, and they are now the Commissioners of Customs and Excise.

Commissioners of Inland Revenue collect the internal taxes (as opposed to the customs duties), such as the land tax, the house tax, the income tax, duties imposed in respect of the passing of property on death, and stamp duties (q.v.); but excise as well as customs duties are managed by the Commissioners of Custom and Excise. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue are the result of the consolidation, in 1849, of the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes with the Commissioners of Excise. There are at present four Commissioners of Inland Revenue; they are appointed by letters patent under the Great Seal, and hold office during the pleasure of the Crown (Inland Revenue Regulation Act, 1890, s. 1 (1)). Their offices are in Somerset House.

Commissioners of Patents. These were officers of a quasi-judicial character, acting under the repealed Patent Law Amendment Act, 1853, whose duty it was to investigate applications for patents, prepare letters patent, and issue warrants for having the letters patent sealed with the Great Seal, and keep the register of patents and assignments. Under the Trade Marks Registration Act, 1875 (now also repealed), they had the superintendence of the registry of trade marks.

They are now represented by the Comptroller-General of Patents, Designs and Trade Marks, as to whom, see s. 63 of the Patents and Designs Act, 1917.

Commissioners of Sewers. See SEWERS.

Commissioners of Woods, etc. The Commissioners of Woods, Forests and Land Revenues, and of Works and Public Buildings, are two boards appointed for the superintendence of the public property indicated by their titles. It includes the royal parks in and near London and the other royal demesnes given up by the Crown on the settlement of the Civil List. See CIVIL LIST; DEMESNE.

Commissioners Rogatory. Commissions by which evidence is collected for courts of one country by means of courts of another country. They are now largely superseded by Letters of Request (q.v.).

Commit; Commitment; Committal. A person is committed to prison when he is sent there by a court or judge, generally for a short period or for a temporary purpose.

In criminal law, when a person is accused of an offence triable only on indictment, the magistrate before whom he is examined, after hearing the evidence of witnesses, is bound either to discharge the accused or to commit him to prison to take his trial (commonly called committing him for trial), unless it is a bailable offence, in which case he may be admitted to bail (q.v.). This imprisonment is only for safe custody and not for punishment. The next step is the indictment (q.v.).

In civil proceedings, the principal instances of committal are those for punishment of contempt of Court (see CONTEMPT), and for non-payment of a judgment debt under the Debtors Act, 1869. Section 5 of that Act provides that any court may commit to prison for not more than six weeks any person making default in payment of a judgment debt if it is proved that he has, or since the date of the judgment has had, means to pay. This jurisdiction is exercised chiefly by the County Courts; in the High Court it is now exercised by the judge in bankruptcy (Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 107; Bankruptcy Rules, 1915, rr. 374-380).

Committee. In lunacy (q.v.) practice, a committee is a person to whom the custody of the person or the estate of a lunatic is committed or granted by the Lord Chancellor. The same person may be committee of the person and of the estate, or the two offices may be vested in two different persons, or either office may be vested in two or more persons, called joint committees. The committee represents the lunatic, but acts under the direction of the Master, Lords, Justices or Lord Chancellor having jurisdiction in the matter, in much the same manner as the guardians and trustees or executors act in an administration suit, the committee of the person being responsible for the comfort and well-being of the lunatic, and the committee of the estate being responsible for its proper management. As to the powers of the committee of the estate, see the Lunacy Act, 1890, s 120.

In parliamentary practice a committee is a sitting of one of the Houses of Parliament or of a number of its members for considering questions of detail; hence committees are distinguished as "committees of the whole House," and "select committees," consisting of certain members appointed by the House to inquire into and report on a particular matter for the information of the House, especially such matters as involve the examination of witnesses; e.g. a private bill or an inquiry into an aleged public abuse, or the like.

The principal function of committees of the whole House is to consider bills which have been read a second time and to amend them where necessary. In the House of Commons two committees of the whole House also sit at intervals throughout the session, one (called the Committee of Supply) for the purpose of considering how much money is required for the public expenditure, the other (called the Committee of Ways and Means) for providing that money by sanctioning the imposition of taxes and the application of public revenues. The recommendations of the latter are carried into effect by the Annual Appropriation Act. See APPROPRIATION.

There are also committees, called standing committees, nominated every session for purposes of parliamentary business, e.g. the Committee of Selection, appointed by the House of Commons to classify private bills and arrange for their consideration by select committees. A bill is sometimes referred to what is called a hybrid committee, consisting partly of members nominated by the House and partly of members nominated by the Committee of Selection. See BILL.

See also PRIVILEGES, COMMITTEE OF; JOINT COMMITTEE.

Committee of Adjustment. The regulations made 30th August, 1903, under the Regimental Debts Act, 1893, direct that the Committee of Adjustment referred to in that Act shall consist of three officers, and that, where practicable, the president of the committee shall not be below the rank of captain, or, where the deceased was an officer, below the rank of major. See REGIMENTAL DEBTS.

Committee of Inspection. At the first or any subsequent meeting (q.v.) of creditors, after a receiving order has been made, the creditors may appoint a committee, consisting of not more than five or less than three persons, each of whom is a creditor or the holder of a general proxy or of a general power of attorney from a creditor, for the purpose of superintending the administration of the bankrupt's property by the trustee (Bankruptcy, Act, 1914, s. 20 (1) (2)). The trustee can do certain things, such as mortgaging the bankrupt's property in order to pay debts, only with the consent of the committee (Bankruptcy Rules, 1915, r. 56), and is to have regard to its directions, but the creditors in general meeting may override such directions (Act of 1914, s. 79 (1)). Where the property is not likely to exceed £300 in value there is to be no committee of inspection (s. 129).

A committee of inspection may also be appointed by the creditors and contributories of a company which is being wound up (Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, s. 160 (1)); and if none be appointed, the Board of Trade may act as such (s. 160 (3)). See INSPECTOR.

Committitur Piece. An instrument written on parchment which up to 1869 was used for the purpose of charging a person already in the Queen's Bench Prison or, after 1862, in Holloway Prison, in execution at the suit of the same plaintiff who had caused his arrest for debt. Obsolete since the virtual abolition of arrest for debt by the Debtors Act, 1869.

Commixture. See CONFUSIO.

Commodatum. See BAILMENT.

Commodum ex injuria non oritur (4 Bing. 639). (No advantage [in law] arises out of a wrong.) Compare Jus ex injuria, etc.

Common. In the technical sense of the words, a common (or right of common) is the right of taking some part of any natural product of the land or water belonging to another man in common with him. Therefore, the right to take the whole of the product, or to exclude the owner from taking it, is not a common—though sometimes called a sole common—but an estate in land: "for it is against the nature of this word common; and it was implyed in the first grant that the owner of the soyle should take his reasonable profit there" (Co. Litt. 122a). Hence, also, a right of common cannot be claimed by custom, because, the number of claimants under a custom being indefinite, the subject of the right would be liable to be entirely destroyed. The only exception to this rule occurs in the case of copyholders, who may claim a right of common against their lord by virtue of a custom in the manor. The reason of this is, that copyholders are but tenants at will to their lord, and therefore cannot claim by prescription except in his name; as they could not claim a right in his name against himself, they would not be able to claim at all if they were not allowed to claim under a custom. Most rights of common may be created by grant at the present day, or may be claimed by prescription. See APPENDANT; LOST GRANT; PRESCRIPTION.

A common is an incorporeal hereditament, and a species of profit à prendre. See HEREDITAMENT; PROFIT.

A person having a right of common is called a commoner. See COMMONABLE.

Commons are of four principal kinds, viz., common of pasture, of estovers, of turbary, of piscary; the remaining rights are generally classed together as miscellaneous.

Common of pasture is the right of feeding one's beasts upon another's land; the most usual instances of this are: the right of the tenants of a manor to pasture their beasts on the waste, woodland, etc., of the manor; the right of pasture over royal forests possessed by persons owning land within the forest: and the reciprocal rights of pasture possessed by owners of shack-lands, lammas-lands, lot-meadows, etc. (infra and COMMONABLE). But any owner of land in fee simple may grant to another person the right of pasturing animals on his land, and the right of common so created may be either appurtenant or in gross.

Common of pasture is either appendant, appurtenant, because of vicinage, or in gross. Common at large is the same as common in gross. Common of pasture appendant is the right which every freehold tenant of a manor possesses to feed his cattle used in agriculture (i.e. horses, cattle and sheep) upon the lord's waste, provided they are levant and couchant on the tenant's freehold land. It is said to exist "of common right," because (as it is usually put) on every original feoffment of arable land to be held of the manor in socage, the law, without express words, presumed a grant of sufficient pasture in the waste for the beasts levant and couchant on the land. The more correct view appears to be that the right of common appendant is traceable to the village communities or vills which existed in England at the time of the Conquest. The right of common appendant cannot be created since the statute of Quia Emptores, 18 Edw. 1, st. 1, c. 1, that statute having prohibited the creation of new manors; and the land to which such a right is appendant must originally have been arable. See APPENDANT; LEVANT AND COUCHANT.

Common of pasture appurtenant is a right annexed to certain lands, by virtue of which the owner of those lands feeds cattle on the soil of another person; it differs from the right of common appendant (supra) in all the characteristics which arise from the connection of the latter with the socage tenure of ancient arable land in a manor: it may, therefore, be held by copyholders or by strangers to a manor, and may arise by grant or prescription since Quia Emptores, and is not necessarily confined to commonable beasts. See COMMONABLE.

Common of pasture appurtenant may be either simple or reciprocal: the former occurs where the owner of the waste has no pasture over the tenant's land in return, the latter where neighbours have a mutual right of turning out cattle to feed on each other's land. The simple right is usually exercised upon the waste of a manor by the tenants, and by strangers who can show a grant or prescribe: such strangers may be either individual landowners in the neighbourhood, or a whole body of tenants within an adjoining lordship. The reciprocal right is found in shack fields, and open meadows or common fields, which at certain seasons are open to the cattle of all the proprietors of allotments. Such a right may also be alternate as well as reciprocal, as where one township has common in another during one season, and the second has common in the first during the next, and so on.

Common because of vicinage (pur cause de vicinage, causâ vicinagii) is where the tenants of two adjoining manors, the inhabitants of two adjoining townships, or the owners of two contiguous pieces of land, have from time immemorial "intercommoned," i.e. allowed each other's cattle to stray and pasture on each other's land, or on a waste or open field lying between their lands. This kind of common is allowed by the law to exist in order to avoid the disputes which would arise on both sides if actions could be brought for trespass, or if distress damage feasant could be made whenever the cattle of one person stray over the undivided land of the other. Consequently, either party may put a stop to it by enclosing his land. The chief difference between this and the other kinds of common is, that a commoner pur cause de vicinage may not put his beasts into another's land, but must first put them into his own land, and then the beasts may stray and go into the other common without being distrained. See HORN WITH HORN.

Common of pasture in gross differs from the foregoing varieties of common in being unconnected in any way with the tenure or occupation of land. It may be created either (1) by the owner of a common appurtenant for a fixed number of cattle alienating the common without the tenement to which it belongs, or (2) by the owner of land granting to another man and his heirs the right to put beasts on the land of the grantor, with or without restrictions as to number and time of year. It is also said that a common in gross may be claimed by prescription in respect of mere inheritance. See PRESCRIPTION.

Common appendant, appurtenant, and in gross, are either certain by number, that is, for a certain number of beasts, or certain by levancy and couchancy (q.v.), or sans nombre (q.v).

The following rights of common differ from common of pasture in being limited to those parts of the land where the product is found, while common of pasture extends to every place across which the cattle may wander in search of food, although there may be no pasture there.

Common of estovers is the right of taking from the woods or waste lands of another person a reasonable portion of his timber or underwood for use in the commoner's tenement. As to the different kinds of estovers, see ESTOVERS. Common of estovers is either appurtenant, that is, annexed to land, or in gross, that is, existing independently of land. See supra, and IN GROSS.

Another species of common, often included under common of estovers, is the right to take, for use on the commoner's tenement, part of the wild herbage and brushwood (such as heath, furze, broom, fern, rushes, and, in some manors, hay) from the land of another.

Common of turbary in its modern sense is the right of taking peat or turf from the waste land of another for fuel in the commoner's house. It appears that formerly a distinction was drawn between peats (turbæ) from a peat-moss or boggy ground, and "flags" (French blêches, Latin blestiæ) or turves pared from the surface, and that strictly speaking common of turbary does not give a right to take "flags," that being destructive of the pasture. The right is, however, unimportant at the present day; it is analogous to common of estovers, and is therefore either appurtenant or in gross, but not appendant.

As to common of piscary, see FISHERY.

Common of digging, or common in the soil, is the right to take for one's own use part of the soil or minerals in another's land; the most usual subjects of the right are sand, gravel, stones and clay. It is of a very similar nature to common of estovers and of turbary (supra, and see DOLE; TINBOUNDING).

In some parts of the country a right of taking wild animals (such as conies or wildfowl) from the land of another has been found to exist; in the case of wildfowl it is called a common of fowling.

As to apportionment of commons, see APPORTION. See also SANS NOMBRE; LEVANCY AND COUCHANCY; SURCHARGE; PAWNAGE.

Common is sometimes used to denote certain rights which resemble rights of common in the strict sense (supra), in giving a person the right of taking the profits of land in common with others; they nevertheless differ from rights of common in some essential point. Thus the right of the lord of a manor to take profits from the waste of the manor in common with the tenants is not strictly a right of common, because the waste is vested in him, and no one can have common in his own land. See PASTURE; SEIGNORIAL.

So cattle-gates or stints, the rights of pasture of the inhabitants of a parish or other similar class over lammas-lands, etc., are not rights of common, though frequently so called, but shares in the vesture of land, and therefore corporeal hereditaments.

Common also signifies a piece of land subject to rights of common. As to the enclosure and regulation of commons under the Commons Acts, see INCLOSURE.

Commonable in its widest sense is applied to a thing over, by, or in respect of which a right of common may be exercised. Thus commonable land is land subject to a right of common; therefore under a grant of common of pasture, pasture-land only is "commonable," that is, may be used by the commoner. So a "commonable messuage" is a house to which a right of common is attached; and "commonable beasts" (in the primary sense of the phrase) are those animals which a commoner is entitled to put on the common; thus sheep are commonable beasts under an ordinary right of common of pasture, but not in royal forests. As the only commonable beasts in

The New Zealand Company was formed by royal letters patent, dated 12th February, 1841, for the purpose of colonising New Zealand, but was given no sovereign rights. The letters patent were supplemented by the statutes 9 & 10 Vict. c. 42 and 10 & 11 Vict. c. 112. The latter Act provided, by s. 19, that the company might relinquish its undertaking subject to certain conditions; and the company availed itself of this provision in 1850.

The British North Borneo Company was incorporated on 1st November, 1881, by royal charter granted to enable it to take over "absolute rights of sovereignty" in the northern portion—containing about 30,000 square miles—of the island of Borneo. The charter empowers it to trade, but it does not do so; it confines itself to administration and development, and is now the only chartered company which actually governs.

The British South Africa Company was incorporated by royal charter, dated 29th October, 1889, for the purpose of taking over proprietary rights in Rhodesia and administering the half-million, or thereabouts, of square miles contained therein. The company has still a large share in the administration of Rhodesia, but steps are being taken for the establishment of responsible government on the usual colonial model.

Under the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, s. 249, the two last-mentioned companies have been formed into limited companies, but this step has never been taken as regards the Hudson's Bay Company.

Companies, City. From about the year 1100 there existed in England associations known as trade or craft guilds (see GILD). From about the year 1300 admission to the freedom of the City of London was confined by royal charter to members of these guilds and their apprentices. In 1376 the guilds were given, by a vote of the citizens, the right to select the freemen who were to elect the members of Parliament for the city, and also the Lord Mayor and the sheriffs and corporate officials. In 1384 another vote of the citizens constituted the Court of Common Council, and provided that the council should consist of freemen; and in 1475 another vote declared that the guilds were to select as electors only persons who were members of the livery (who were above the freemen) of the guilds and also freemen of the city. The guilds had thus, without royal or statutory sanction, got into their own hands the control of all parliamentary and local elections in the City of London; and this control continued without any interference by the Legislature until 1725, when the statute 11 Geo. 1, c. 18, was passed to regularise it. Meanwhile the guilds had in many cases been transformed into companies by royal charters of incorporation, which began about 1325 and continued to be granted for a period of nearly three hundred years; and for all municipal purposes the companies took the place of the guilds. The Representation of the People Acts, 1832, 1867, and 1918, deprived the liverymen—that is to say, the companies—of what the Act of 1725 terms their "rights and privileges" as regards the parliamentary franchise, though under s. 17 of the Act of 1918 a freeman who is qualified in respect of a business qualification within the city can be registered on a separate list of liverymen in the register of parliamentary electors; but the companies have still indirectly the election of the Lord Mayor and other city officers in their hands.

There are at present twelve "great" companies and sixty-two others. The "great" companies and several of the others are wealthy corporations; their incomes are largely devoted to benevolent purposes.

The companies have long ceased to consist of persons employed in the trade denoted by the names (e.g., the Bowyers, that is to say, the Bowmakers' Company) they bear. Many of the members are not connected with the city at all. Patrimony (being the child of a member) and apprenticeship to a member are still qualifications for admission, but admission is mostly now by "redemption" or payment of an entrance fee.

The companies referred to above are those known as livery companies. There are two other city companies—the Watermen's (q.v.) Company and the Parish Clerks' Company—who never formed part of the city governing body; their members are not liverymen, and they are not livery companies.

See FREEDOM OF A BOROUGH.

Companion. A title of certain members of various Orders of Chivalry (see KNIGHTHOOD, ORDERS OF) and other Orders (q.v.).

Companions of Honour, Order of the. This Order was founded in 1917. It consists only of Companions (C.H.), who may be either men or women. They rank next after G.B.E.s (see BRITISH EMPIRE).

Company. A company is an association of persons formed for the purpose of some business or undertaking carried on in the name of the association, each member having the right of assigning his shares to any other person, subject to the regulations of the company.

An incorporated company is a corporation formed for the purpose of carrying on a business for profit. Such companies are incorporated either (1) by charter (q.v.); (2) by special Act of Parliament; or (3) by registration under one of the public general Acts relating to companies.

Unincorporated companies are associations of individuals not forming a corporation, but carrying on business under a corporate name, and having certain qualities resembling those of incorporated companies. To this class belong (1) companies formed under the Chartered Companies Act, 1837, which enables the Crown, without incorporating a company, to confer upon it, by letters patent, certain privileges, including the power of suing and being sued by a public officer (q.v.) and limited liability; (2) companies formed under private Acts of Parliament, generally with the power of suing and being sued by a director or other officer; (3) companies formed for banking under the County Bankers Act, 1826, and having certain privileges, such as that of suing and being sued by a public officer; (4) cost book companies (q.v.); (5) companies formed without the authority of a charter or Act of Parliament, and before 2nd November, 1862 (see the repealed Companies Act, 1862, s. 4), consisting of a large number of members, with transferable shares, and a directorate for the management of the business. The question whether the last-mentioned class of unincorporated companies are illegal has been much discussed, but it would appear that they are not in fact illegal. To this class belong what are sometimes called scrip companies, in which the members simply hold scrip certificates, transferable by delivery. See SCRIP.

Companies are described as limited or unlimited, according as the liability of their shareholders is or is not limited. In the case of an unlimited company, each shareholder is liable to contribute to the debts of the company to the full extent of his property (see CALLS), but some insurance companies, though strictly speaking unlimited, are practically limited by the insertion in each policy of a clause, restricting the claim of the assured to the amount remaining unpaid-up on each share, which (see the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, s. 123 (1) (vi.)) is not against the law.

A company is limited either by the amount of the share which each member takes in the company, and beyond which he therefore cannot be compelled to contribute to the debts of the company (company limited by shares), or by the amount which each member undertakes by the memorandum of association (q.v.) to contribute to the assets of the company in the event of its being wound up (company limited by guarantee); the latter mode is used in the case of companies supported by annual subscriptions, or formed on the principle of mutual assurance. There is a hybrid kind of company in which the liability of the shareholders is limited (either by shares or by guarantee), while the liability of the directors or managers, or the managing director, is unlimited (Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, ss. 60, 61). Provision for the creation of such companies seems to have been considered desirable from a mistaken view of the nature of French sociétés en commandite; the provision is a dead-letter. See COMMANDITE.

A company formed for profit must, if the liability of its members is limited, have the word "limited" as the last word in its name (ib., ss. 3, 4, 63). When a company limited by shares has obtained the leave of the Court to reduce its capital, the words "and reduced" must be added and used as the last words of its name for a certain period to be fixed by the Court (s. 48). See REDUCTION OF CAPITAL.

A limited company may create a reserve capital as security for its creditors, by providing that a certain portion of its capital shall not be capable of being called up except in the event of the company being wound up (ss. 58, 59).

A bank of issue registered as a limited company is not entitled to limited liability in respect of its notes (s. 251).

Joint stock companies are those having a joint stock or capital which is divided into numerous transferable shares, or consist of transferable stock (s. 250). (See STOCK.) The term "joint stock" was originally applied to those companies which were formed without the authority of any statute; and afterwards to those formed under various Acts from 1825, including the Joint Stock Companies Acts of 1844, 1856 and 1857.

Companies are divided into public and private.

Before the enactment of the Companies Act, 1907, a "public company" was understood to be one which invited the public to subscribe for its shares, and a "private company" was understood to be one which did not; but there was no definition of the two terms, and both kinds of companies were subject to the same enactments. The Act of 1907 was repealed and replaced before it came into operation by the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908. A "public company" now means a company limited by shares, which, whether it does or does not invite the public to subscribe for its shares, is not a "private company" as defined by the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 (ib. s. 121). But public companies are still divisible into public companies which invite the public to subscribe for their shares and public companies which do not, the latter being popularly described as quasi-private companies, and being in fact such companies as up to 1907 were known as private companies. A quasi-private company has to comply with certain special requirements which do not apply to other public companies (see the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, ss. 72, 85, 89 (1)). But the distinctions between the two varieties of public companies are unimportant as compared with the distinctions between public companies generally and private companies. A private company means one which (a) restricts the right to transfer its shares: (b) limits the number of its members (exclusive of persons who are in the employment of the company and of persons who, having been formerly in the employment of the company, were while in such employment, and have continued after the determination of such employment to be, members of the company) to fifty; and (c) prohibits any invitation to the public to subscribe for any shares or debentures of the company (Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, s. 121 (1), as amended by the Companies Act, 1913, s. 1). Any two or more persons may form or carry on a private company (Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, ss. 2, 115), whereas it takes seven to form or carry on a public company (ib), and the two persons who may form the private company have merely to subscribe for at least one share each and to deliver to the registrar a memorandum of association signed by them, and the articles of association, and to pay the prescribed fees (ib), whereupon the certificate of incorporation is issued and the company can commence business at once (s. 87 (6)). A public company, on the other hand, can be formed and commence business only after compliance with a number of formalities. A private company must file annually with the registrar a list of its members (s. 26), but not the balance sheet required in the case of public companies (s. 26 (3)), and must also file a certificate that the number of its members is not in excess of the prescribed limit, and that the public have never been invited to subscribe for shares or debentures (Companies Act, 1913, s. 1 (3)). A private company need not make out the statutory report as to the position of the company which public companies must file with the registrar and send to the shareholders before the statutory annual meeting (Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, s. 65 (10)). The holders of the preference shares, debentures and debenture stock of a private company have no right to inspect the balance sheets, etc. (ib. s. 114 (2)). As to other privileges of a private company, see ss. 82 (2), 83, 85 (7), 72 (3).

The Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, as amended by the Companies Act, 1913, codifies the law as to companies and should be referred to for further information.

The law as to private companies and the manifold advantages of such companies are admirably set out in Palmer's Private Companies, a handbook intended primarily for laymen but most useful for lawyers.

See MEETING.

Comparison of Handwriting. By the common law it was not allowable to prove the handwriting of a party to a document by a comparison between it and other documents proved or assumed to be in his handwriting. This rule was practically abolished by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, ss. 27, 103, now repealed and replaced by the Criminal Procedure Act, 1865, s. 8.

Compensatio criminum. In the Ecclesiastical law, there was held to be a compensatio criminum—literally a compensation of offences—when both husband and wife were guilty of adultery, so that the offence of the one was set off against the offence of the other.

Compensation is a recompense or reward for some loss, injury or service, especially when it is given by statute. Thus, Acts for the construction of railways and other public works provide for the payment of compensation to the owners of land taken compulsorily for the purposes of the works, this being done by the incorporation of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, or such other general Act as applies to the works in question. So the Agricultural Holdings Acts (q.v.), provide for the payment of compensation to agricultural tenants for improvements (draining, manuring, etc.) executed by them on their holdings, and for disturbance; and the Criminal Law Act, 1826, and the Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1851, empower courts of criminal jurisdiction to award compensation to persons who have been active in the apprehension of prisoners charged with certain crimes. See also COMMON EMPLOYMENT.

In agreements between vendors and purchasers of real estate, it is usual to stipulate that errors, misdescriptions and omissions in the particulars of sale or description of the property, shall not avoid the sale, but be the subject of compensation. But such a stipulation will not protect the vendor in the case of a misdescription arising from fraud or gross negligence, or of such a nature that in the absence of it the purchaser would presumably not have entered into the contract at all.

As to the doctrine of compensation with reference to questions of equitable election, see ELECTION.

As to compensation to holders of licences for the sale of intoxicating liquors by retail, the renewal of whose licences is refused in order to reduce the number of licensed premises, see the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, ss. 19-21).

Compensation Authority. The body in which is vested the power to refuse the renewal of an old on-licence (q.v.) on any ground other than any of the grounds specified in Part 2 of the Second Schedule to the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910: see s. 18 of that Act. The compensation authority in a licensing district, being a petty sessional division, is quarter sessions; in a county borough, it is the whole body of borough justices; and in other boroughs, it is the quarter sessions of the county (s. 2). If it be the quarter sessions of a county it must, and in other cases it may, delegate its powers to a committee (s. 6). In a county, the one committee may represent both the compensation and the confirming authorities (s. 6). As to the functions of the compensation authority, see ss. 19-21. See CONFIRMING AUTHORITY.

Compensation for Disturbance. Under s. 11 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908, a tenant was entitled to compensation for unreasonable disturbance in pursuance of notice to quit by his landlord. That section is repealed by the Agriculture Act, 1920, which (s. 10) gives him a right to compensation for disturbance, unless (a) he is not farming according to the rules of good husbandry, or (b) has failed to comply with a notice to pay rent or to comply with a condition (consistent with good husbandry) of his tenancy, or (c) has committed a breach (incapable of remedy) of any such condition, or (d) has become bankrupt or has arranged with his creditors, or (e) has refused arbitration as to his rent, or (f) has refused to execute at his landlord's expense an agreement setting out the terms of the tenancy. The section provides that the compensation shall not be less than one year's rent, and may be anything not exceeding two years' rent which is proved to be the actual amount of the loss sustained; and it provides further that if a tenant leaves upon notice to quit given by him in consequence of the landlord's refusal to go to arbitration regarding the rent, then such tenant shall be entitled to compensation as if the landlord had served the notice to quit.

Compensation for Improvements. The effect of the Agricultural Holdings Acts, 1908 to 1920, as regards payment of compensation for improvements is as follows:—

Compensation is payable for the following improvements on an agricultural holding though the landlord has neither received notice of nor consented to them:—Chalking; clay-burning; claying; liming; marling; manuring with purchased manure; consumption on holding by horses not regularly employed thereon, or by cattle, sheep, or pigs, of feeding stuff not produced thereon, or of corn produced thereon; laying down, more than two years before the termination of the tenancy, temporary pasture with clover, grass, lucerne, sainfoin, or other seed, in so far as the value of the temporary pasture at the time of quitting exceeds the value of temporary pasture on commencement of the tenancy for which the tenant did not pay compensation (Act of 1908, Sch. I., Pt. III.); and, in the case of market gardens, planting of fruit trees or bushes permanently set out, planting of vegetable crops which remain productive for more than two years, or erecting or enlarging buildings for market-gardening purposes (Act of 1908, Sch. III.).

Compensation is payable for repairs (other than those which the tenant is bound to execute) to buildings necessary for working the holding only if notice was given to the landlord and he failed to execute them (Act of 1908, Sch. I., Pt. III.).

Compensation for drainage is payable only when notice of intention to drain has been given to the landlord, and when landlord and tenant have not agreed as to the amount (Act of 1908, Sch. I., Pt. II.).

Except where compensation is payable, as stated above, in the case of a market garden, no compensation is payable for the following improvements unless executed with the written consent of the landlord:—Any building work; formation of silos; laying down permanent pasture; making osier beds, water meadows or works of irrigation, or gardens; making or improving roads, or bridges, or works for the supply of water or water-power for domestic or agricultural purposes; making or removing permanent fences; planting hops, orchards, or fruit bushes; protecting young fruit trees; reclaiming waste land; warping or weiring of land; embankments and sluices against floods; erection of wire-work in hop gardens (Act of 1908, Sch. I., Pt. I.); provision of permanent sheep-dipping accommodation, or removal from arable land of bracken, gorse, tree roots, boulders, etc. (Act of 1920, Sch. I.).

Where compensation is payable, its amount is to be such sum as fairly represents the value of the improvements to an incoming tenant (Act of 1908, s. 1 (1)). In default of agreement between landlord and tenant as to the amount, the amount is to be fixed by arbitration (ib. s. 6).

Any contract by a tenant is void in so far as it purports to deprive him of the right to compensation (Act of 1908, s. 5); but, instead of compensation under the Acts, a tenant may agree to accept, in respect of drainage or of improvements for which the written consent of the landlord is required, such compensation as is agreed on between landlord and tenant, or in respect of improvements for which neither notice to nor the consent of the landlord is required, such "fair and reasonable" compensation as is agreed on between landlord and tenant (Act of 1908, ss. 2, 3 (1), 4, 5).

It is to be noted that the right to compensation for improvements is restricted in the case of a tenant about to quit. No compensation is payable for improvements, other than the application of purchased manure or the consumption on the holding (by horses not regularly employed thereon, or by cattle, sheep or pigs) of feeding stuffs not produced thereon, or of corn produced thereon, made (a) in the case of a tenant from year to year, within one year before he quits or at any time after he has given or received notice to quit, and (b) in the case of any other tenant, within one year of the expiration of the tenancy; but this does not apply where the tenant has served notice of intention to improve, and the landlord has not objected within a month after receipt of the notice, or, in the case of a tenant from year to year, where the tenant has begun the improvement during the last year of his tenancy and then, upon notice to quit subsequently given by the landlord, quits at the end of that year (Act of 1908, ss. 9, 48).

Competency; Competent. A person is said to be competent to testify, or a competent witness, when he is allowed by law to give evidence on a trial or other judicial inquiry. The question of a witness's competency may arise either with reference to his ability to give evidence generally (absolute incompetency), or with reference to a particular fact or inquiry (relative incompetency). Thus an idiot is not competent to give evidence at all; while neither a husband nor a wife is a competent witness as to whether they have or have not had sexual intercourse with each other.

Competency is of course a different thing from compellability. Thus an accused person, or the wife or husband of such person, is now in all cases a competent witness for the defence (Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, s. 1), but the accused cannot be examined except on his own application (ib.), nor can the wife or husband be examined except on the application of the accused, unless the charge be under one of the enactments mentioned in the Schedule to the Act (ib.), in which case the husband or wife is a compellable witness (s. 4).

See INTERESTED WITNESS.

Complaint. In proceedings before justices of the peace to obtain an order for the payment of money, the proceedings are commenced by a complaint, which is a statement of the facts of the case made by the complainant or person aggrieved, sometimes in writing, sometimes verbally, while the proceedings in criminal matters are commenced by an information (q.v.). As to bills of complaint, see that title.

Compos mentis. Of sound mind. Generally used as part of the phrase non compos mentis (q.v.).

Composition, in its widest sense, is an arrangement between two or more persons for the payment by one to the other or others of a sum of money in satisfaction of an obligation to pay another sum differing either in amount or mode of payment. "Composition" also signifies the sum so agreed to be paid. See ARRANGEMENTS BETWEEN DEBTORS AND CREDITORS; COMPOUND.

In the law of tithes any owner of land may claim exemption from tithes in respect of that land by reason of a real composition, which is an agreement made between him and the incumbent, with the consent of the ordinary and the patron, that the land shall for the future be discharged from payment of tithes by reason of some land or other real recompense given in lieu and satisfaction thereof (Tithe Act, 1832, s. 2).

Composition Deeds. Now Deeds of Arrangement. See ARRANGEMENTS BETWEEN DEBTORS AND CREDITORS.

Compositione Ponderum et Mensuram, De. The same as the ASSISA DE PONDERIBUS, ETC. (q.v.).

Compound. To compound for a debt is for a debtor and creditor to agree that the creditor shall accept a composition or smaller sum in discharge of the original debt, e.g., on the ground of the debtor's inability to pay the whole. See COMPOSITION; ACCORD AND SATISFACTION.

In criminal law, to compound a felony is to enter into an agreement, for valuable consideration, not to prosecute a person for felony, or to show him favour in a prosecution, as where a person takes back goods which have been stolen from him upon agreement not to prosecute. It is a misdemeanour (q.v.). It is also a misdemeanour to compound an action or information under a penal statute without leave of the Court (18 Eliz. c. 5). See STIFLING.

Compound Householder. By the Poor Relief Act, 1819, s. 19, reciting that the payment of poor's rates was greatly evaded by houses being let out in separate apartments or for short terms, it was enacted that it should be lawful to rate the owners of such houses instead of the occupiers. As the effect of this was to keep the names of the occupiers off the rate-books and thus deprive them of their municipal and parliamentary franchise, the Compound Householders Act, 1851, and the statute 21 & 22 Vict. c. 43, enacted that such occupiers should have the same privileges as if they were themselves rated to the relief of the poor, provided that the rates were paid either by them or the owner. Such persons were called "compound householders." The Compound Householders Act, 1851, and the Act which had repealed and replaced the statute 21 & 22 Vict. c. 43, were repealed by the Representation of the People Act, 1918, Sch. 8, and the last-named Act has created new franchises, both parliamentary and municipal, in no way dependent on the payment of rates.

Compound Settlement. See SETTLEMENT.

Compromise is where the parties to a dispute dispose of it by agreement between themselves, whether legal proceedings have been commenced or not. See ACCORD AND SATISFACTION; COMPOUND.

Where proceedings have been commenced, a compromise may be agreed on and may provide that it may be made a rule of Court (q.v.) so as to terminate the proceedings.

A compromise of an action cannot be set aside on a summons in that action. It can be set aside only in a fresh action, or, where an action to enforce it has been instituted, on a counterclaim in such action.

Compromissarii sunt judices (Jenk. Cent. 128). (Arbitrators are judges.)

Compter or Counter. The debtors prison anciently attached to the court of the mayor or sheriffs of a borough. In the City of London there were two—the Poultry Compter, demolished in 1817, and the Giltspur Street Compter, which was closed in 1854. The latter had in 1791 taken the place of the Wood Street Compter, which had in 1555 replaced the Bread Street Compter.

Comptroller; Controller. The Comptroller in Bankruptcy was an officer whose duty it was to receive from the trustee in each bankruptcy his accounts and periodical statements showing the proceedings in the bankruptcy, and also to call the trustee to account for any misfeasance, neglect, or omission in the discharge of his duties (Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 51)

In the former Court of Chancery there were officers known as Controllers of the Hanaper, whose offices were abolished by the Court of Chancery Act, 1842. They took all documents which had been sealed by the Clerk of the Hanaper (q.v.), and entered them in a book. There were also Controllers of the Pipe (q.v.) and of the Pell (q.v.), who like the Pipe and the Pell, have disappeared.

There are still several comptrollers. There are, for instance, the Comptroller of the Chancery Court of the County Palatine of Lancaster, who checks the receipts and payments of the moneys of suitors in that Court; the Comptroller and Auditor-General of the Exchequer and Audit Department (q.v.); and the Comptroller-General of Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks, as to whom see the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, ss. 73-76; and there are several others. The title is sometimes spelled "controller," as in the case of the "Controller of the Stationery Office."

In connection with the households of the King and the other members of the Royal Family, there are many comptrollers. The most important is the Comptroller of the King's Household; he is a member of the and consignors of goods is provided for by s. 31 (the "conciliation clause") of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888; and the Conciliation Act, 1896, enabled bodies established or persons appointed for the purpose of settling disputes between employers and workmen to act under the direction of the Board of Trade, whose functions under the Act are now vested in the Minister of Labour (q.v.). No such body (conciliation board) or person (conciliator) can do more than bring the parties to the dispute together, and endeavour to get them to come to a settlement. See COUNCIL OF CONCILIATION.

Concilium. In proceedings on a writ of error in a criminal case, a rule directing the case to be put down in the paper for argument was obtained as soon as the joinder in error was filed. This rule was called a rule for a concilium (dies concilii, a day to hear counsel). Writs of error in criminal cases were abolished by the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, s. 20 (1). Before 1883 a similar rule was required in a civil action when issue had been joined in demurrer. See WRIT OF ERROR; JOINDER; DEMURRER.

Concilium magnum regni. The Great Council (q.v.).

Concionator. An old term formerly used to describe a common councilman of the City of London.

Conclude is to bar or estop (q.v.).

Conclusion is (i) an irrebuttable presumption or rule of law (see PRESUMPTION); (ii) an estoppel (q.v.).

In the old common law practice, that part of a pleading by which the party offered that the issue raised should be tried by a jury was called a "conclusion to the country." See COUNTRY.

Under the old Admiralty practice a party who had a right to plead further might, if he thought fit, file what was called a conclusion, by which he denied the statements in the preceding pleading, and prayed that the pleadings might be concluded. It answered to what is now called a joinder of issue (q.v.).

Concord, in the old books, signified an agreement for the compromise of a right of action arising out of a trespass. It also signified a part of a fine (q.v.).

Concurrent Jurisdiction. Used to be that portion of the law which was enforced (prior to the 1st of November, 1875) in the Courts of Equity equally with the Courts of Law, and in which equity assumed a concurrent jurisdiction chiefly upon the ground of the remedy at law being inadequate or adequate only in a circuitous way. Under the Judicature Acts, 1873-5, the entire jurisdictions of law and equity were made concurrent in name, but the old distinctions of substance were not affected by that merely nominal fusion. See EXCLUSIVE JURISDICTION; AUXILIARY JURISDICTION.

Concurrent Writ. See ALIAS WRIT. A concurrent writ is frequently issued for service out of the jurisdiction (Ord. 6, r. 2).

Concussionis, Crimen. The offence of extortion (10 Rep. 102), which in the Roman law (see Dig. 47, 13), was known as concussio.

Condemnation is where a Court of competent jurisdiction adjudges a prize or captured vessel to have been lawfully captured. The effect of a condemnation is to vest the property in the captor, unless the Court, either before or after condemnation, orders it to be sold or delivered up on bail, in which case the proceeds of sale or the appraised value takes the place of the property itself. The High Court of Justice, in its Admiralty jurisdiction, is the principal Court for deciding such questions in the British dominions. See CAPTURE; PRIZE COURTS.

Condemnation Money. The party who fails in a suit or action is sometimes said to be "condemned in" the action, whence the damages to which such failure has made him liable used to be frequently called "condemnation money." Thus, in proceedings to enforce a recognisance by writ of scire facias (q.v.), the persons who went bail for the defendant stipulated that, if he should be condemned in the action, he should pay the "condemnation money," or render himself into custody.

— Conditio beneficialis quæ statum construit, benignè, secundum verborum intentionem, est interpretanda; odiosa, autem, quæ statum destruit, strictè, secundum verborum proprietatem, accipienda (8 Co. 90). (A beneficial condition, which creates an estate, ought to be construed favourably, according to the intention of the words; but a condition which destroys an estate is odious, and ought to be construed strictly according to the letter of the words.)

Condition. A condition is a declaration or provision which makes the existence of a right dependent on the happening of an event, and the right is then called conditional, as opposed to an absolute right. Thus if A leaves a legacy in the following form: "I give £100 to B if he shall act as my executor," the legacy is conditional, because B's right to the £100 is dependent on the fulfilment of the condition, that is, on his acting as executor.

Conditions are either true or apparent. A true condition is where the event on which the existence of the right depends is future and uncertain ("I give Blackacre to A if B shall die without leaving children"). Apparent conditions, or conditions merely in form, are (i) where the event, though unascertained, is not future, but is either happening at the time the condition is created ("if A is now living"), or has already happened ("if A is dead"); (ii) where the event, though future, is not uncertain, either because it must necessarily happen ("I give Blackacre to A if B shall die"), or because its happening was always impossible (infra); (iii) where the condition is a mere repetition or expression or something implied by law from the nature of the right; as if an estate is given to A in tail, and if A's issue fail, then to B: here the words "if A's issue fail" do not create a condition, being merely an unnecessary expression of what is implied in A's estate tail, which can only last so long as he has issue.

With reference to their creation, conditions are either express or implied. An express condition (or condition in deed) is one, as Lord Coke puts it, "expressed by the partie in legall termes of law," as in the examples given above. An implied condition (or condition in law) is one "created by law without any words used by the partie," as Lord Coke said, whether the parties had it in their minds at the time or not; thus, in every policy of marine insurance, a condition or warranty that the vessel is seaworthy is implied in law See WARRANTY.

With reference to their effects, conditions are of various kinds. A condition precedent is one which delays the vesting of the right until the event happens; thus, if I give £100 to A if he shall act as my executor, A's right to the legacy is dependent on a condition precedent, because the performance of it must precede his receipt of the £100.

A condition subsequent is where the event is to destroy or divest an existing right; thus, if I give an annuity of £100 to C so long as she shall remain my widow, this creates a condition subsequent, because the performance of it is subsequent to the vesting of the right. Conditions are either possible or impossible. A condition may be impossible either ab initio or by matter subsequent, and in the latter case the impossibility may arise from the act of the person who is to perform the condition, of the person for whose benefit it is to be performed, of a stranger, by the act of God (e.g. death), by vis major, or by a combination of these. Impossibility is either physical ("If A go from the church of St. Peter in Westminster to the church of St. Peter in Rome within three hours"), logical ("I give my land to my executors if they shall sell it"), or legal, where the act required is legally inoperative ("If A shall make a valid will during his minority"). Conditions are independent when they must be performed without reference to one another, dependent, when one has to be performed before the other need be performed, and mutual, when one party need not perform his condition unless the other is willing and ready to perform his. A condition is illegal when its performance is forbidden by law ("If you kill such a man I will give you ten shillings"), or where it is against some maxim or rule of law (as if I make a conveyance to a man upon condition that he shall not alien the land, this condition is repugnant and against law, and the grantee takes the land absolutely). These divisions are important with reference to the effect of non-performance of the condition: thus, as a general rule, if a condition precedent is illegal or impossible, the right does not vest at all, while an illegal condition subsequent has no effect. Again, if a condition precedent, which was originally possible, becomes impossible by the act of the person intended to be benefited, the right vests as if the condition had been performed. As to conditions in restraint of marriage, see RESTRAINT OF MARRIAGE.

In the old writers, condition is used in the technical sense of a condition annexed to realty, which Coke defines as "a qualitie annexed by him that hath estate, interest, or right to the same, whereby an estate, etc. may either be defeated or enlarged or created upon an incertaine event." As to estates on condition, see ESTATE. Formerly, "condition" included both conditions in the strict sense, and what are now more commonly called conditional limitations, the distinction being that when a freehold estate is limited to cease on a condition, and the condition happens, the person in whose favour the condition is reserved must make an entry or claim, otherwise the estate continues; in the case of a conditional limitation, on the other hand, the estate determines ipso facto on the happening of the event, and the remainder or reversion takes effect in immediate possession. (See LIMITATION.) If, however, a leasehold estate is granted on condition, it determines ipso facto on breach of the condition without any entry being required, unless an entry is expressly stipulated.

Formerly, a condition was not assignable in any way, but by the statute 32 Hen. 8, c. 34, a condition annexed to a reversion passes on an assignment of the reversion.

As to the apportionment of conditions, see APPORTIONMENT.

Condition is also used as equivalent to restriction or stipulation—e.g., conditions of sale (q.v.). See WARRANTY.

The Land Transfer Act, 1875, s. 84 (as amended by the Land Transfer Act, 1897, s. 18, Sch. I.), provides for the registration, as annexed to registered land, of conditions that the land is not to be built on or put to a particular use, or of any other conditions running with or annexed to land, or of any restrictive condition capable of affecting assigns by way of notice. See COVENANT.

Conditional Acceptance. See ACCEPTANCE.

Conditional Fee. See FEE.

Conditional Limitation. See LIMITATION.

Conditiones quælibet odiosæ; maxime autem contra matrimonium et commercium (Lofft, 644). ([Restrictive] conditions are all of them objectionable, but more especially those which are in restraint of marriage and trade.)

Conditions of Sale. When property is to be sold by auction, the terms on which the purchaser is to take it are usually specified in a document called the conditions of sale, copies of which are distributed among intending bidders. In the case of land, houses, etc., the conditions are usually printed with the particulars of sale (q.v.); in the case of furniture, books, etc., they are usually printed at the beginning of the catalogue.

Conditions of sale of real property generally contain elaborate provisions as to the title which the purchaser is to accept, and the means by which it is to be proved. On the conclusion of the sale the purchaser signs a memorandum indorsed on the conditions, which thus form a contract of sale. Such contract is, however, subject to such of the provisions of the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, s. 2, and of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 3, as apply to the property comprised in the contract.

See TITLE; ABSTRACT.

Conditio præcedens adimpleri debet priusquam sequatur effectus (Co. Litt. 201*a*). (A condition precedent must be fulfilled before the effect can follow.)

Condonation is forgiveness of a conjugal offence, with full knowledge of all the circumstances. It usually consists of the resumption of marital relations; and its effect is to restore the offending person to the same position which he or she held before the offence was committed, so that the injured person cannot subsequently seek redress for it by proceedings for a divorce or judicial separation. See REVIVAL.

Conduct Money is money given to a witness to defray his expenses of coming to, staying at, and returning from the place of trial. A witness is entitled to decline to attend or be sworn until his expenses have been paid or tendered to him. This applies to civil proceedings either in the High Court (5 Eliz. c. 9) or in the County Court (County Courts Act, 1888, s. 111). A like rule applies to witnesses in cases with regard to which there is summary jurisdiction (Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, s. 7; Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, s. 29), but not to witnesses summoned to give evidence on the preliminary investigation of indictable offences (Indictable Offences Act, 1848, s. 16; Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, s. 29), or to a witness summoned to give evidence on the trial of an indictable offence, unless (Writ of Subpœna Act, 1805, ss. 3, 4) such witness has been served with a subpœna to attend in some part of the United Kingdom other than that in which the subpœna was served, that is to say, if, for instance, he is served in Ireland to appear in England, but not if he is served in one English county to appear in another English county. It should, however, be noted that the Costs in Criminal Cases Act, 1908, enables the Court before which an indictable offence is tried to order payment of the costs either of the prosecution, or of the defence, or of both.

Confederacy, in political and popular language, is a combination of persons for any purpose. In law it formerly had the technical meaning of a combination for maintenance, and was prohibited by the Ordinance of Conspirators (33 Edw. 1), while the term "conspiracy" was appropriated to combination for the promotion of false and malicious indictments. Now the term "conspiracy" has a wholly different meaning, and the term "confederacy" is unknown to the criminal law.

Conference is a meeting between a counsel and the solicitor who instructs him to discuss (with or without the client) a question arising out of the business in hand.

In parliamentary practice, says Sir Erskine May, "a conference is a mode of communicating important matters by one House of Parliament to the other, more formal and ceremonious than a message, and sometimes better calculated to explain opinions and reconcile differences. By a conference both Houses are brought into direct intercourse with each other, by deputations of their own members: and so entirely are they supposed to be engaged in it, that while the managers are at the conference, the deliberations of both Houses are suspended." The most usual occasion of a conference is where one House is unable to agree to the amendments made by the other in a bill pending in Parliament.

Confessand. Pleading guilty. The term was used in the Halifax Gibbet Law (q.v.), under which the accused could be convicted only when confessand, backberand (q.v.), or handberand (q.v.).

Confessio facta in judicio omni probatione major est (Jenk. Cent 102). (An admission made in judicial proceedings is of greater force than all proof.)

Confession. In civil procedure, a confession is a formal admission. Thus, where a defendant in an action alleges any ground of defence which has arisen after the commencement of the action (e.g., the bankruptcy of the plaintiff), the plaintiff may confess the defence, that is, admit its validity, by delivering a confession of defence, which is in the nature of a pleading. Under the practice before the Judicature Acts, this was called a confession of plea. Such a confession puts a stop to the action, and entitles the plaintiff to his costs up to the defence or plea confessed (Ord. 24, r. 3). Under the practice before the Judicature Acts, the defendant in an action of ejectment might confess the action, that is, admit the plaintiff's claim, and so entitle him to judgment, by delivering a notice to that effect. Under the present practice, the same result is obtained by the defendant abstaining from delivering a defence. See COGNOVIT; WARRANT OF ATTORNEY.

In criminal law, a confession is an admission of guilt, made either judicially, that is, in the course of a judicial proceeding, or not. Judicial confession may operate as an estoppel, and, if plenary, is sufficient to found a conviction, as where a prisoner pleads guilty; an extrajudicial confession, if made freely, is admissible as evidence, but never operates as an estoppel. See PLENARY; PLEA; APPROVEMENT; ADMISSIONS (IN CRIMINAL CASES).

Confession seems originally to have been applied especially to an admission by record. Thus a villein by confession was one who had confessed himself to be a villein in a Court of record. See NEIFE; and compare NATIVE.

Confession and Avoidance. A pleading is said to be in confession and avoidance when it confesses (i.e., admits) the truth of an allegation of fact contained in the preceding pleading, but avoids it (i.e., deprives it of effect) by alleging some new matter. Thus if the statement of claim alleges a breach of contract, the defendant may confess and avoid by admitting the breach and alleging that the plaintiff has waived it; so in an action for assault the defendant may plead that the assault was committed in self-defence; or if a defendant in an action on a covenant pleads a release, the plaintiff may reply in confession and avoidance that the release was obtained by fraud. See TRAVERSE.

Confession (to Priests). The Church of England does not recognise confession as a sacrament. But it recognises, as sanctioned by it, (1) public or general confession, which forms part of several of the services, and (2) private or particular confession, upon which being made the priest may in his discretion grant or withhold absolution. A priest, as part of the visitation of a sick person, is to "move" such person to make confession, which the priest must therefore hear; and it would appear to be the duty of a priest to hear the confession of any parishioner who desires that he should do so. The hearing of confessions by a priest continued to be common even after the Reformation and fell into disuse only about the end of the seventeenth century. The revival of the practice within the last eighty years has been in no way an infringement of any law.

The English law does not recognise the sacrament of confession as known to the Roman Catholic and Greek Churches; but in view of the fact that communications made in the course of such confession are never divulged, it is probable that the Courts will, of necessity, if for no other reason, hold that communications made in such confessions are privileged. See CONFIDENTIAL COMMUNICATIONS.

Confesso, Bill taken pro. Formerly this was an order made in the Court of Chancery when the defendant filed no answer (q.v.). It directed that the plaintiff should have such decree as he appeared from his bill of complaint (q.v.) to be entitled to get. It was in fact an order made in default of defence. See now DEFAULT.

Confessus in judicio pro judicato habetur, et quodammodo suâ sententiâ damnatur (11 Co. 30). In a civil proceeding a party who makes confession (q.v.) is held to have had the case decided against him and has, so to say, judgment given against him in accordance with his own decision.

Confidential communications, in the ordinary sense of the term, are communications between a party and his solicitor, or between the solicitor and the counsel, made during and with reference to judicial proceedings, or in anticipation or for the purposes of such proceedings. If in writing, they are privileged from production; if verbal, they are privileged communications; and the contents of written communications are privileged from discovery. (See DISCOVERY; PRODUCTION; PRIVILEGE.) The question whether communications made to spiritual advisers are privileged is one which has never been authoritatively decided, though there is (for obvious reasons) a strong leaning towards allowing the privilege, more especially in the case of communications made in the course of auricular confession; communications to medical advisers are not protected from disclosure. Communications between husband and wife are protected from disclosure, even after they are separated by divorce or death.

Confirmare est id quod prius infirmum fuit firmare (Co. Litt. 295*b*). (To confirm is to make strong that which before was weak.)

Confirmare nemo potest priusquam jus ei acciderit (10 Co. 48). (No one can confirm a right before the right comes to him.)

Confirmatio cartarum. The statute 25 Edw. 1. See ARTICULI SUPER CARTAS.

Confirmatio est nulla ubi donum præcedens est invalidum et ubi donatio milla omnino nec valebit confirmatio (Co. Litt. 295*b*). (Confirmation produces no effect where the antecedent gift was void and not merely voidable; and where the preceding gift is a nullity, so also is the confirmation.) "A confirmation," says Coke, "cannot work upon an estate that is void in law."

Confirmation, in conveyancing, was defined by Lord Coke as "a conveyance of an estate or right in esse, whereby a voidable estate is made sure and unavoidable, or whereby a particular estate is increased." Thus where a person was disseised of land and executed a deed of confirmation to the disseisor, the estate of the latter became absolute. There is also said to be confirmation when a wife on attaining the age of twenty-one confirms (or ratifies) a settlement made during her minority. See ADOPT; AFFIRM; CONVEYANCE; RECTIFY.

Confirmation in the ecclesiastical law is, according to Lord Phillimore, "the rite of the Church whereby the faith of the baptised person is confirmed, and graces given to him to remain steadfast in that faith." As to the confirmation of a bishop, see CONGÉ D'ELIRE.

Confirmatio omnes supplet defectus, licet id quod actum est ab initio non valuit (Co. Litt. 295*b*). (Confirmation supplies all defects, though that which had been done was not valid from its beginning.) That is to say, in the words of Coke, "confirmation can make a voidable or defeasible estate good, though it cannot work upon an estate which is void in law."

Confirming Authority. The body which confirms, or refuses to confirm, licences for the sale of intoxicating liquor by retail. (See LICENCES (iv.)). In a county it may, and as regards the confirmation of new justices' licences it must, delegate its powers to a committee (Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, s. 6 (2)). See COMPENSATION AUTHORITY.

Confiscation, in international law, is where a state seizes property belonging to another state, or to its subjects, and appropriates it. Confiscation is the punishment for carrying contraband of war (q.v., and PRE-EMPTION); or for attempting to carry supplies to a place besieged or blockaded.

Forfeiture as a punishment for smuggling, etc., is sometimes called confiscation.

See BLOCKADE; SEARCH; CONDEMNATION; FORFEITURE.

Conflict of Laws. See INTERNATIONAL LAW.

Conformity, Bill of. Where the personal representative of a testator or intestate found that he could not safely administer the estate except under the direction of the Court of Chancery, he filed what was known as a bill of conformity, in order to have the estate administered under the direction of the Court. The present procedure is by way of writ of summons or originating summons. See ADMINISTRATION ACTION or MATTER.

Confrontation. In matrimonial suits in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division of the High Court (other than suits for dissolution), the petitioner, the respondent, or the co-respondent, may be ordered to attend in Court while the witnesses are giving evidence, so as to be confronted with them (i.e. pointed out to them) for the purpose of identification.

Confusion. In the Roman law, this was one of the recognised methods of accession (q.v.) or accessio. It denoted the admixture of liquids, as distinguished from the admixture of solid matters, the latter being known as commixture. Both terms have been adopted by our law.

Confusion of Boundaries. See BOUNDARIES.

Congé d'Accorder. Leave to agree. Upon the levying of a fine, when the parties appeared in court, a pleader anciently asked for permission to enter into the necessary composition by saying, "Sir Justice, Congé d'accord." The whole procedure is given in the Modus Levandi Fines (q.v.).

Congé d'Elire (permission to elect) is a licence from the Crown to the dean and chapter of a bishopric, allowing them to proceed to the election of a bishop; it is accompanied by a letter missive from the King, containing the name of the person whom he would have them elect, by virtue of which licence the dean and chapter are with all speed in due form to elect and choose the said person named in the letters missive, and none other, and if they delay their election above twelve days after such licence or letters missive to them delivered, the King shall nominate and present, by letters patent under the Great Seal, such person as he shall think convenient (25 Hen. 8, c. 20). After the election has taken place, the chapter certifies the Crown of the result, whereupon the Crown signifies the royal assent by letters patent to the Archbishop of York or of Canterbury as the case may be, and the Archbishop thereupon proceeds to confirmation of the election, and to consecration (q.v.) of the bishop-elect. The confirmation is a mere matter of form, the Archbishop having no jurisdiction to entertain objections to the election on the ground of the belief as to doctrines of the bishop-elect.

The congé d'élire, it will be noticed, operates through the dean and chapter. In the case of bishoprics created by statute during the last fifty years (see BISHOPRICS), it is always provided that the Crown shall appoint the bishop by letters patent until there is a dean and a chapter, but that after there is a dean and a chapter, the bishop shall be elected on congé d'élire.

A congé d'élire appears to be also used in the election of deans on some of the old foundations.

Congeable in the old books means lawful or allowable; "disseisin is properly where a man entreth into any lands or tenements where his entry is not congeable, and ousteth him which hath the freehold," etc.

Conjugal Rights. The right of husband and wife to the society of one another and to marital intercourse. See RESTITUTION OF CONJUGAL RIGHTS.

Conjuration. This meant personal conference with the Devil, or some other evil spirit, and endeavouring by prayers and invocations to get him to reveal some secret or do something. Under the statute 33 Hen. 8, c. 8, offenders were guilty of a capital felony. The Act of Henry VIII was repealed in 1547, and was not replaced until 1562, when the statute 5 Eliz. c. 16, practically re-enacted it. The Act of Elizabeth was repealed and replaced by the statute 1 Jac. 1, c. 12, which remained on the statute book until repealed by the Witchcraft Act, 1735, s. 3, which abolished trial for conjuration and similar offences; but under s. 4 of the Act of 1735, any person pretending to practise conjuration is liable to one year's imprisonment upon conviction on indictment. He would, however, more probably be dealt with now as a rogue and a vagabond under s. 4 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824.

The last trial under the Act of James took place in 1712; the accused was convicted but not executed.

Connivance is where a person knows that a wrongful act is being done, and either assists or, being under a duty to interfere, does not interfere to prevent it. Connivance may take the form of fraud or conspiracy (q.v.).

In the law of divorce, connivance is where a person has consented or acquiesced in an adultery committed by his or her wife or husband. It is a defence to a petition for dissolution of marriage presented by the conniving party. See ACCESSORY; CONDONATION; CONSPIRACY.

Consanguinity is relationship by descent, either lineally, as in the case of father and son, or collaterally, by descent from a common ancestor: thus, cousins are related by collateral consanguinity, being descended from the same grandfather or grandmother. The prohibited degrees of consanguinity, namely, those which (apart from recent legislation) prevent marriage between persons so related, are set forth in the Book of Common Prayer. See AFFINITY; NEXT-OF-KIN; HALF BLOOD; COSINAGE.

Conscience Clause. This was the popular title of s. 7 of the Elementary Education Act, 1870. It gave a child the right to attend an elementary school irrespective of any religious observance he did or did not practise, and whether he did or did not receive any religious instruction; and no child need remain in any school during the time that any religious observance took place or that any religious instruction was given. See now the Education Act, 1921, s. 72. Compare COWPER-TEMPLE CLAUSE; KENYON-SLANEY CLAUSE.

Consecrated Ground. This means ground consecrated for burial.

Consecration. This applies both to persons and things. As regards persons, there is the consecration of a bishop (see CONGÉ D'ELIRE), which must be effected, according to the form given in the Book of Common Prayer, by at least three bishops. As regards things, there is the consecration of churches and churchyards, for which no form is prescribed; but the forms given in Phillimore (2nd ed.), at pp. 1391 and 1397, are, and for over two hundred years have been, in general use. Where an addition is made to an existing churchyard, an instrument of consecration, signed by the bishop, has the same effect as actual consecration of such addition (Consecration of Churchyards Act, 1867, s. 1).

Consensus non concubitus facit matrimonium; et consentire non possunt ante annos nubiles (6 Co. 22). (Consent, and not coition, constitutes marriage; and the parties are not able to consent before marriageable years).

If infants intermarry while under the age of discretion, which is fourteen years for a boy and twelve for a girl, the marriage is voidable. If a person above and a person under the age of discretion intermarry, the former, as well as the latter, may elect to avoid the marriage when the latter reaches that age; for in contracts of matrimony both parties must be bound, or neither. At the common law, if the parties be of the age of discretion, no consent but their own is necessary to make their marriage valid. Under the Marriage Acts, the consent of a parent or guardian is usually required for the marriage of an infant who is not a widower or widow; but though a person whose consent is required can take steps to prevent the marriage, yet, if the marriage takes place, the absence of the consent does not invalidate it See MARRIAGE; MARRIAGE ACTS.

Consensus tollit errorem (Co. Litt. 126; 2 Inst. 123). (Consent takes away error.) That is to say, a party who acquiesces cannot afterwards take advantage of an error. See ACQUIESCENCE.

Consent. Where there is a protector (q.v.) of a settlement of entailed lands (see ESTATE TAIL), the tenant in tail cannot absolutely bar the entail without the consent of the protector; this consent may be contained either in the disentailing assurance or in a separate deed (Fines and Recoveries Act, 1833, s. 42). Where the Lord Chancellor is protector (which happens when the person who would otherwise be protector is a lunatic) the consent consists of an order authorising the disentailment (ib. ss. 48, 49).

In civil procedure, an order to which the parties consent cannot be appealed against; but if the consent of any party is obtained by fraud or the like, the order may be set aside: in such a case there is in truth no consent. And a consent may be withdrawn at any time before the order is perfected.

In the law there can be no consent to a battery, and a prize fight is therefore illegal.

Consent is no defence to a charge of unlawful carnal knowledge of a girl under sixteen, or to a charge of indecent assault upon either a boy or a girl under sixteen. See CARNAL KNOWLEDGE; INDECENT ASSAULT.

Consent-rule. This was the instrument by which the real defendant in the old action of ejectment (q.v.) undertook to confess (or admit) the fictitious lease, the fictitious entry, and the fictitious ouster, and relied only on his title to the lands.

Consequential. See DAMAGES.

Conservancy. See CONSERVATORS.

Conservator of the Truce and Safe Conducts (Conservator induciarum et salvorum regis conductuum). An officer appointed by royal letters patent to enquire into all offences committed upon the high seas against the King's truce and safe conducts out of the Cinque Ports. He was appointed during the reigns of Henry V. and Henry VI., when the alternative to actual war with France was a truce or suspension of hostilities, during which French merchants traded to the Cinque Ports. He had as associates two men learned in the law.

Conservators of rivers are commissioners or trustees in whom the control of a certain river is vested by Act of Parliament. It is often a question whether the Act gives the conservators the right of navigation or passage only, or whether it also vests in them the soil of the river and its banks. They generally have power to make locks, towing-paths and similar works, to levy tolls, and to make and enforce bye-laws for regulating the navigation and use of the river.

The conservancy of the river Thames is regulated by the Thames Conservancy Act, clxxxvii.), which repealed and consolidated the previous Acts.

Conservators of the Peace. Before the present system of appointing justices of the peace was invented, there were peculiar officers appointed by the common law for the maintenance of the public peace. Of these some had this power annexed to other offices held by them; others had it merely by itself. Those that were conservators of the peace virtute officii (including the Crown, the Lord Chancellor, the judges of the King's Bench Division, and the coroners and sheriffs within their respective jurisdictions) are still conservators of the peace. The other kind of conservators are superseded by the modern justices of the peace. Alternative assignations were custodes pacis and wardens of the peace.

Consideration. The consideration in a contract, conveyance, or other legal transaction is an act or promise by which some right, interest, profit, or benefit accrues to one party, or by which some forbearance, detriment, loss, or responsibility is given, suffered, or undertaken by the other, and in return for which the party who receives the benefit, or for whom the detriment is suffered, promises or conveys something to the other. Thus, in a contract of sale, the money paid or agreed to be paid by the purchaser is the consideration to the vendor, and the property sold is the consideration to the purchaser. So, if a person forgoes a legal right, as by forbearing to take proceedings, that is a detriment to him which may form a consideration for a payment or promise by the person against whom he might have enforced the right. The consideration is said to move from the party who produces the benefit or suffers the detriment of which it consists, and to move to the other party; every other person is said to be a stranger to it. Thus, where A, being indebted to B in £70, made an arrangement with C that C should pay the money to B, and that A in return should convey a house to C, in consideration of which C promised to pay the £70 to B, it was held, in an action brought by B to enforce C's promise, that B was a stranger to the consideration and therefore could not recover. Whether the person receiving the consideration derives any benefit from it, or whether it is adequate, is immaterial; thus, if a man who owns some goods allows another to weigh them, this, being an inconvenience or detriment suffered by him, is a good consideration for the other's promise to give them back in as good condition as before. The doctrine of consideration is of importance in many ways; thus, an action does not lie for breach of a contract not under seal, unless there is a consideration between the parties (see CONTRACT; VOLUNTARY); nor will specific performance of a gratuitous contract be enforced, even if it is under seal; and although no consideration is required for the validity of a complete declaration of trust or a complete transfer of any legal or equitable interest in property, yet an incomplete voluntary gift creates no right which can be enforced. Thus, if a person expresses his intention of voluntarily giving another an interest in property, but does not effect his intention by absolutely parting with it, no trust is created. See also VOLUNTARY.

In dealing with the various kinds of considerations, it will be convenient to assume that in each case the consideration forms part of a contract; that is to say, is in return for a promise, although, as already explained, it may form part of a conveyance.

With reference to its connection with the promise in regard to time, a consideration may be of various kinds.

A past or executed consideration is some act performed, or some value given before the making of the promise. Thus, if A does an act for B's benefit, and B afterwards promises to pay him £50 in return, the consideration for B's promise is executed. The question is of importance, because such a consideration is not sufficient to support the subsequent promise, unless a previous request can be shown or implied by law, as if B requested A to do the act, and afterwards promised him the £50; in such a case the same result is produced as if the promise had preceded the act. See REQUEST; PROMISE; CONTRACT.

The consideration and the promise may be simultaneous; that is, the promise may be given and the consideration executed at the same time; as where A pays B ready money in consideration for B's promise to deliver him goods at a future time.

The consideration may be executory; that is, to be performed at some future time. An executory consideration may be either an act which the promisee is bound to perform (in which case the contract consists of mutual promises; see PROMISE), or simply an act which he may do or not at his own pleasure: thus where A promises B that if he will sell goods to C, A will guarantee payment of the price; here B is not bound to supply goods to C, and until he does so he has no claim on A; but, as soon as he supplies goods to C, that a person injured thereby a right of action against the conspirators.

In criminal law a conspiracy is a misdemeanour (q.v.); some conspiracies, however, are subject to special punishments, e.g., a conspiracy to murder a person, the maximum punishment for which is ten years' penal servitude (Offences against the Person Act, 1861, s. 4). Combinations among workmen to raise the rate of wages were formerly conspiracies, being in restraint of trade, but this is no longer so (see COMBINATION). It has been said that, perhaps, few things are left so doubtful in the criminal law as the point at which a combination of several persons in a common object becomes unlawful.

Conspiratione, De. A writ which anciently lay against conspirators.

Constable, Lord High. This was in feudal times one of the great officers of State, the office being hereditary. He attended the king on his coronation and on military expeditions. In addition to his jurisdiction in the Court of Chivalry (q.v.), the Constable presided at trials by battle (q.v.). The last hereditary holder of the office was Edward Stafford, Duke of Buckingham, upon whose attainder in 1521 the office became forfeited to the Crown. After that date no appointment of a Constable was made, except on the rare occasion of a trial by battle, when a Constable was specially appointed for the particular trial only.

Constables are inferior officers of the peace of various kinds. High constables were appointed at the courts leet of the franchise or hundred over which they presided, or in default of such an appointment, then by the justices at their special sessions. Their duty seems to have been to keep the peace within the hundred: the office has been abolished (High Constables Act, 1869). The principal duty of petty or parish constables (who were appointed by the justices in petty sessions) was the preservation of the peace within their parish or township; they also had assigned to them the service of the summonses and the execution of the warrants of the justices of the peace. In practically every place they have been superseded by the establishment of a county police, who are under the superintendence of a chief constable appointed by the standing joint committee of the county justices and the county council (County Police Act, 1839, ss. 4, 28; County and Borough Police Act, 1856, s. 1; Local Government Act, 1888, s. 9).

In boroughs subject to the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, the constables are appointed by the watch committee of each borough (s. 191).

Special constables are persons appointed (with or without their consent) by the magistrates to act on particular occasions, as in the case of riots, etc. (see Special Constables Acts, 1831 and 1835; Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 196).

The word "constable" is the English form of the low Latin constabularius, from stabula, a stable, the first constables having been originally masters of the king's stables and afterwards commanders of troops in time of war or disturbance, especially on the borders of the kingdom.

Constablewick. The area within which a constable has authority to act. Used formerly in connection with high constables and petty constables. See CONSTABLE.

Constat. Formerly this meant a certificate as to matters on record given by the Clerk of the Pipe (q.v.) and the Auditors of the Exchequer (who, like the Clerk of the Pipe, have been long since abolished), for the purpose of certain proceedings in the Exchequer. It also meant the exemplification (q.v.), under the Great Seal of the inrolment, of any letters patent. See INSPEXIMUS.

Constat also means "it appears" but the use of the word, in this meaning, is unusual except in the phrase non constat (q.v.).

Constituent is a person who appoints another to do some act for him by power of attorney (q.v.). He is also called a principal (q.v.), the latter being the term which is now generally used.

Constitution. Anciently used as meaning a law or ordinance. See, for instance, CLARENDON, CONSTITUTIONS OF.

Constitutiones tempore posteriores potiores sunt his quæ ipsas præcesserunt (Later laws prevail over those which preceded them.) This is a maxim contained in the Digest 1, 4, 4. For the corresponding maxim of our law see Leges posteriores, etc.

Constructio legis non facit injuriam (Co. Litt. 183*a*). (The law construes [documents] so as not to work injustice.) This maxim modifies the maxim Verba cartarum, etc. (q.v.).

Construction is the process of ascertaining the meaning of a written document. "Construction of law" is a fixed or arbitrary rule, by which a result follows from certain acts or words without reference to the intention of the parties: thus, "if a tenant for life maketh a lease generally, this shall be taken by construction of law an estate for his own life that made the lease; for if it should be a lease for the life of the lessee, it should be a wrong to him in the reversion." Sometimes, however, "construction of law" simply means "implication": thus, said Coke, "if I grant to you, that you and your heires, or the heires of your body, shall distreine for a rent of forty shillings within my mannor of S., this by construction in law shall amount to a grant of a rent out of my mannor of S. in fee simple or fee tail." See IMPLICATION.

Constructive denotes that a right, liability or status has been created by the law without reference to the intention of the parties, as in the case of a constructive trust or constructive notice (see NOTICE; TRUST), or that a transaction or operation has not really taken place, but that something equivalent has. Thus, where delivery of goods is required, if the goods "be ponderous and incapable of being handed over from one to another, there need not be an actual delivery, but it may be done by that which is tantamount, for instance, by the delivery of the key of the warehouse in which goods are lodged, or of some other indicia of property, such as the bill of lading." This is called constructive delivery. So a chattel not fixed to land is sometimes for certain purposes considered as being annexed to it; and thus it was held so far back as 1614, where a miller "takes the millstone out of the mill, to the intent to pick it to grind the better, although it is actually severed from the mill, yet it remains parcel of the mill as if it had always been lying upon the other stone, and by consequence, by lease or conveyance of the mill, shall pass with it." This is called constructive annexation. See IMPLIED; QUASI-CONTRACT.

Constructive Fraud. See FRAUD.

Constructive Loss. See LOSS.

Constructive Notice. See NOTICE.

Constructive Trust. See TRUST.

Consuetudinarius. Anciently this meant a book setting out the customs of abbeys and monasteries.

Consuetudines Cantiæ. (The Customs of Kent.) A declaratory enactment, printed under these titles in the Statutes of the Realm (Vol. 1, p. 223), s.v. Statutes of Uncertain Date. It is not in the Statutes at Large. The English version of the statute (which of course was in barbarous French (q.v.)) concludes as follows:—"These be the Usages of Gavelkinde and of Gavelkinde Men in Kent, which were before the Conquest, and at the Conquest and ever since till now." It is attributed to the reign of Edward I. The most important of the customs were those as to the inheritance of land (see GAVELKIND) and as to escheat. There was no escheat of gavelkind lands in case of felony.

Consuetudines et Assise de Foresta. (The Customs and Assise of the Forest.) An enactment printed under these titles in the Statutes of the Realm (Vol. 1, p. 213), s.v. Statutes of Uncertain Date. It is quoted by Manwood as of 6 Edw. I.

Consuetudinibus et Serviciis. A writ of right close (q.v.), returnable in the old Court of Common Pleas down to 1833, against a tenant of a manor in ancient demesne (q.v.) who had "deforced" his lord of rent or services.

Consuetudo. "This word consuetudo hath in law divers significations: (1) For the common law, as consuetudo Angliæ; (2) for statute law, as contra consuetudinem communi concilio regni editam; (3) for particular customs, as gavelkind, borough English and the like; (4) for rents, services, etc., due to the lord, as consuetudines et servitia; (5) for customs, tributes or impositions, as de novis consuetudinibus levatis in regno, sive in terra, sive in aqua; (6) subsidies or customs granted by common consent, that is, by authority of Parliament, pro bono publico; and these be the antiquæ et rectæ consuetudines intended by" (2 Inst. 58) Magna Carta.

Consuetudo debet esse certa; nam incerta pro nullis habentur (A custom should be certain, for uncertain things are held as nothing). This maxim is merely a Latinized version of the fifth of the nine rules as to customs which are set out in Blackstone (Introd. s. 3).

Consuetudo est altera lex (4 Rep. 21). (A custom has the force of law)—where the custom applies.

Consuetudo est optimus interpres legum (2 Inst. 18). (Custom is the best interpreter of the laws.) See OPTIMUS LEGUM, ETC.

Consuetudo et communis assuetudo vincit legem non scriptam, si sit specialis; et interpretatur legem scriptam, si lex sit generalis (Jenk. Cent. 273). (Custom and common usage overcome the unwritten law, if it be special; and interpret the written law if it be general.) This, according to Jenkins, was in part the basis of the decision of all the judges when they decided—see 4 Rep. 77*a*—that the Common Council could, without a vote of the freemen, elect the magistrates of the city of London; but the earlier words Ex diuturnitate tempore omnia presumuntur esse solemniter acta (It has been done for so long that it is presumed to be done in a proper way) seem to give the real ground of the decision.

Consuetudo ex certa causa rationabili usitata privat communem legem (Co. Litt. 113*a*). (A custom grounded on a certain cause reasonably applied supersedes the common law.) Instances are the Customs of Kent (see CONSUETUDINES CANTIÆ) and Borough English (q.v.).

Consuetudo, licet sit magnæ auctoritatis, nunquam tamen præjudicat manifestæ veritati (4 Rep. 18). (A custom, though it be of great authority, should never, however, be prejudicial to manifest truth.) This maxim would appear to have been enunciated by the King's Bench as a ground for refusing to allow a plaintiff to maintain in that Court an action in which he sued the defendant for calling his wife a whore in London.

Consuetudo neque injuria oriri neque tolli potest (Lofft, 340). (No custom can be either established or abrogated by an unlawful act.)

Consuetudo regni Angliæ est lex Angliæ (Jenk. Cent. 119). (The custom of England is the law of England.) Compare CONSUETUDO EST ALTERA LEX.

Consuetudo semel reprobata non potest amplius induci (Dav. 33). (Once a custom has been disallowed it cannot be again set up.)

Consuetudo vincit communem legem (4 Rep. 21). (A custom overrides the common law)—where the custom exists.

Consuls are a class of diplomatic agents or representatives of a foreign country. Their customary functions are to give advice and assistance to citizens of the state they represent, and to uphold their interests by due representations in the proper quarter. They certify and attest acts and documents (see EXEQUATUR); act as commissioners for oaths (Commissioners for Oaths Act, 1889, s. 6; Commissioners for Oaths Act, 1891, s. 2), perform many duties in connection with merchant shipping, and can in certain conditions celebrate marriages (see MARRIAGE ACTS). In Mahommedan countries our consuls occupy a quasi-diplomatic position. In countries with which this country has concluded capitulations (q.v.) consuls, or consular officers, exercise a jurisdiction, depending upon the capitulation in question. See FOREIGN JURISDICTION.

Consuls are now of various kinds, there being (1) agents and consuls-general, and commissioners and consuls-general; (2) consuls-general; (3) consuls; (4) vice-consuls.

Consultation is a writ whereby a cause which has been wrongfully removed by prohibition out of an ecclesiastical court to a temporal court is returned to the ecclesiastical court. Consultation also signifies a meeting between counsel to discuss a question or to settle a document. See CONFERENCE.

Consultative Councils. The Ministry of Health Act, 1919, s. 4 (1), empowers the King "by Order in Council to establish consultative councils in England and Wales [see MONMOUTHSHIRE] for giving, in accordance with the provisions of the Order, advice and assistance to the Minister [of Health] in connection with such matters affecting or incidental to the health of the people as may be referred to in such Order."

Contango. In the law of the Stock Exchange this means a percentage paid by a buyer of stock, of which delivery is to be taken on a certain date, for being allowed to delay taking delivery until some other date. Compare BACKWARDATION.

Contemnor; Contempt. Contempt of Court is where a person who is a party to a proceeding in a Superior Court of Record fails to comply with an order made against him or an undertaking given by him, or where a person, whether a party to a proceeding or not, does any act which may tend to hinder the course of justice or show disrespect to the Court's authority. Thus it is a contempt of Court to attempt by threats to induce a judicial officer to depart from the course of his judicial duties; to attempt to prevent a party from conducting his case in a proper manner; or to publish, while a cause is pending, comments upon the evidence which are calculated to injure the parties' cases, or to create ill-feeling against the witnesses. It is also a contempt to remove a ward of Court from the custody of the person with whom such ward has been residing under the authority of the Court, or to marry a ward of Court without the sanction of the Court. A person committing a contempt of Court is called a contemnor. Contempt of Court is an offence punishable by fine or imprisonment or both. (See ATTACHMENT; COMMITTAL.) Moreover, where a party to a proceeding is guilty of contempt of Court, he cannot, as a general rule, make any application to the Court while he is in contempt, unless it is required for the purpose of his defence. The contemnor is said to clear or purge his contempt when he expresses his contrition and submits himself to the Court.

Inferior courts of record, such as Quarter Sessions and the Mayor's Court, have jurisdiction only with regard to contempt committed in the presence of the Court: the County Court, which also is an inferior court of record, has jurisdiction only in contempts coming within the County Courts Act, 1888, s. 162: and Courts of Summary Jurisdiction, which are not courts of record, would appear to have no means of dealing with contempt beyond an order for the removal of the offending person from Court.

Contemporanea expositio est optima et fortissima in lege (2 Inst. 11). (A contemporaneous exposition is the best and strongest in law): or, to put it less literally but more plainly, the best way to construe a document is to read it as it would have read when it was made.

Contempt of Parliament. Whatever obstructs or tends to obstruct the due course of proceeding of either House of Parliament, or grossly reflects on the character of a member of either House, or imputes to him what it would be a libel to impute to an ordinary person, is a contempt of Parliament, and thereby breach of privilege. Commitment with or without fine was the ordinary punishment inflicted when Parliament was more accustomed than it now is to deal with contempt; but a libel on either House may also be dealt with by prosecution in the Criminal Courts.

Contenement. The English rendering of contenementum. That word is used by Glanville (De Leg. Angliæ, ix., 8) in 1190 and in Magna Carta (c. 20) in 1215, apparently as meaning the land held by a feudal tenant. Later it came to be used in the sense attributed to it by Coke (2 Inst. 28): "the countenance which he has together with and by reason of his freehold."

Contentious. Probate business is divided into contentious and non-contentious, the former including actions for proving a will in solemn form or revoking a probate already granted, while the non-contentious business consists of the grant of probates and letters of administration in common form. See GRANT; PROBATE; WARNING.

Contestation of Suit, in an ecclesiastical cause, is that stage of the suit which is reached when the defendant has answered the libel by giving in an allegation (q.v.). If he confesses the libel, he is said to contest the suit affirmatively: if he denies it, he is said to contest the suit negatively, or he may give a qualified affirmative or negative by confessing the whole or part of the libel and adding other facts. See CONFESSION AND AVOIDANCE.

The term is a translation of litis contestatio, and is taken from the Roman law.

Contingency; Contingent. An estate, interest, right, liability, or obligation is said to be contingent when its existence depends on an uncertain event, which is called a contingency. Thus, if A. guarantees B. the payment of a sum by C. the right of B. to receive, and the liability of A. to pay, the amount guaranteed, are contingent on the default of the principal debtor, C. The term is chiefly used in conveyancing as applied to remainders (q.v.). Where an estate is limited with substitutionary or alternative contingent remainders (as to A. for life, and if he should leave issue male, then to such issue male in fee, but if he should die without issue male then to B. in fee), this is called a contingency with a double aspect.

Continual Claim. Under the old law, if a man had a right of entry on land he might prevent this right from being tolled or taken away by the person in possession dying seised of the land, if he made "continual claim" to the land, that is, if at intervals of a year and a day he either entered on the land, or, in case of threatened violence, went as near the land as he could and by word claimed the land to be his. The result of making continual claim was that if the person seised died within a year and a day after the claim, the claimant could enter on the heir, instead of being put to his action.

The doctrine of continual claim was abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, ss. 10, 11 See ENTRY.

Continuance. In the old common law practice, after issue or demurrer was joined in an action, as well as in some of the previous stages of the proceedings, a day was from time to time given and entered on the record for the parties to appear. The giving of this day was called a continuance, because thereby the proceedings were continued without interruption from one adjournment to another. The entry of continuances was abolished in 1833. See PUIS DARREIN CONTINUANCE; NOTICE OF TRIAL; MISCONTINUANCE.

Continuando. In an action of trespass before the Judicature Acts, when the trespass was of a continuing nature (e.g., spoiling or consuming a man's herbage with cattle), the declaration might allege the injury to have been committed by continuation from one given day to another, instead of the plaintiff being compelled to bring separate actions for each day's separate offence: this was called laying the action with a continuando.

Continuation Clause. The Stamp Act, 1891, s. 93 (2), provides that "no policy of sea insurance made for time shall be made for any period exceeding twelve months": but now the Finance Act, 1901, s. 11, provides that to a twelve months' policy there may be added a "continuation clause," that is to say, an agreement that if the ship is at sea or the voyage otherwise not completed on the expiration of the policy, the subject-matter of the insurance shall be covered until the arrival of the ship or for a reasonable time thereafter not exceeding thirty days.

Continuous Voyage. This is a doctrine propounded by the American Prize Courts during the American Civil War. It is to the effect that goods which would be contraband if carried to an enemy port can be dealt with as contraband even though they are being carried to a neutral port provided that they are intended to be forwarded either by land or by sea from the neutral port to an enemy country. The facilities now afforded for the carriage of goods overland by rail has made this doctrine a necessary part of the law of contraband (q.v.).

Contortionist. See CRUELTY TO CHILDREN.

Contraband of War, in international law, is the name given to such articles as may not be carried by a neutral to a belligerent, because they are calculated to be of direct service to him in carrying on war. The question whether certain goods (other than munitions of war, as to which there is no question) are or are not contraband depends partly on the practice of each nation, and partly on stipulations in treaties. See PRE-EMPTION; CONFISCATION.

Contract Note. The Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910 (10 Edw. 7, c. 8), s. 77, defines, and imposes stamp duties on, contract notes; the duties begin at sixpence where the value of the stock or marketable security is over £5 and under £100, and run up to a maximum of £1 where the value exceeds £20,000.

Contract of Sale. The Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 3, supplementing the provisions of the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, makes certain conditions incident to contracts for the sale of freehold and leasehold interests in land, unless the parties otherwise agree. These conditions consist mainly of provisions which before 1882 were inserted as a matter of course for the protection of the vendor in an ordinary contract of sale, and make it safer to enter into an "open contract" than was formerly the case. (See CONTRACT; TITLE.) The Act also provides for the completion of a contract of sale by the personal representatives of the deceased vendor. See DESCENT.

Contracts are of various kinds.

With reference to the modes of their formation, contracts are generally divided into three kinds: simple or parol contracts, specialty contracts or contracts under seal, and contracts of record.

Simple or parol contracts are of two kinds, according as they arise from agreement between the parties, or from implication of law.

A simple contract arising from agreement is where two (or more) persons agree that one of them is to do or not to do some particular thing in consideration of something done or to be done by the other. "Contract" therefore differs from "agreement" in the primary sense of that word in including, in addition to the unity of intention and the juridical nature of the subject-matter constituting a simple agreement, the incidents of one of the parties being bound to a future performance or forbearance, and of the other party doing or agreeing to do something in return. On the side of the party so bound to a future performance or forbearance, the expression of his willingness or intention to do it is called a promise (q.v.) and the performance or forbearance done or promised by the other party is called the consideration for his promise. Thus, if A. agrees with B. that he will sell B. goods, and B. pays him £5 in respect of them, this is a contract of sale: there is a unity of intention between the parties: A. promises to deliver the goods to B. in consideration of B.'s paying him £5. See PROMISE; REQUEST; CONSIDERATION.

Simple contracts created by agreement are divided, according to the manner in which the agreement appears, into express and implied. Thus, if A. says to B., "Will you sell me your horse for £50?" and B. says, "I will," this is an express contract; but if I order goods of a tradesman without promising to pay for them, my contract to do so is implied. (See EXPRESS; IMPLIED.) "Implied contracts" must not be confounded with "contracts implied in law" (infra), although the terms are sometimes used interchangeably.

Simple contracts are also divisible into contracts in writing and verbal contracts. Contracts are put into writing either voluntarily, or in pursuance of a rule of law, as in the case of bills of exchange and contracts falling within the Statute of Frauds (q.v.) and Tenterden's Act (q.v.). In either case the writing is the only admissible evidence of the contract, although extrinsic evidence is admissible for various purposes, e.g. to identify the parties and the subject-matter of the contract, or to show that it was made subject to usages of trade, etc.

Simple contracts arising independently of agreement, or contracts implied in law, exist in certain cases where an obligation is created by law for the purpose of setting the parties right —where one of them has suffered loss by doing something for the benefit of the other, or where one of them has wrongfully or by accident gained an advantage over the other. The following are the most important examples:— If A., being compelled by law, has paid money which B. is ultimately liable to pay, A. may recover it from B. under an implied contract to repay it; as if an executor has been compelled to pay legacy duty for which the legatee is ultimately liable. This is called an action for money paid by the plaintiff for the use of the defendant at his request. Where a person does something for another without having been requested by him to do it, and the latter adopts and takes the benefit of the act, the law implies a contract by him to pay the reasonable value of the other's services; this is called acceptance of an executed consideration. If A. wrongfully takes goods from B. and sells them, or has obtained money from B. by fraud, or by B.'s mistake or the like, B. may sue A. for the amount on an implied contract by A. to pay it to him; this is called an action for money had and received by the defendant for the use of the plaintiff. These forms of action seem to have been invented partly to give a remedy which would not otherwise have been available at common law, partly because the procedure in an action of assumpsit (q.v.) was often more convenient than that in an action of debt or tort.

A contract under seal, or specialty contract, is created by the execution of a deed binding the party or parties executing it to a future act or forbearance. (See DEED.) Such a contract necessarily involves the element of agreement, but it derives its legal effect solely from the formality of sealing and delivery, and not from the mere fact of agreement; it also involves the element of a promise (as opposed to a conveyance, appointment, etc.), and in these two points a contract under seal resembles a simple contract, but they differ in the important respect that no consideration is required to give validity to a contract under seal as between the parties to it. (See CONSIDERATION.) As regards its effects also, a contract under seal differs in some respects from a simple contract. See DEBT; COVENANT; ESTOPPEL; LIMITATION OF ACTIONS; MERGER.

Contracts of record are not really contracts at all, but are transactions which, being entered on the records of certain Courts called Courts of Record, are conclusive proof of the facts thereby appearing, and could formerly be enforced by action of law as if they had been put in the shape of a contract. They consist of judgments, recognizances and statutes staple. See those titles: also DEBT; WARRANT OF ATTORNEY; COGNOVIT; MERGER; LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

With reference to their nature, contracts are divisible into the following kinds:—

A personal contract is one which depends upon the existence, or the personal qualities, skill or services of one of the parties: such as a contract of marriage, or a contract to paint a picture. It follows from the nature of a personal contract that it cannot be assigned, and that it is discharged by the death of the party on whose personality it is founded.

A continuing contract is one for the performance of several acts from time to time: thus, a contract to maintain and repair railway waggons for seven years is a continuing contract.

When a contract has been performed by both parties, it is said to be executed, or when it has been performed by one of the parties, it is executed as far as he is concerned, but so long as something remains to be done by one of the parties, it is said to be executory as regards him. When applied to contracts of sale, "executed" and "executory" have peculiar meanings. See SALE.

With reference to their objects, contracts are of innumerable varieties,—such as contracts of agency, service, works, insurance, guarantee, contracts of debt (that is, contracts for the payment in future of money), and contracts of sale, that is, contracts by which one person agrees to sell, and the other to buy, certain property. (See SALE.) In the case of a sale of goods, the contract is generally restricted to the question of price, quality and time of delivery; but in the case of land, leaseholds, etc., the contract generally contains elaborate provisions (principally in the interest of the vendor) as to the investigation of the title, the delivery of the abstract and requisitions (q.v.), and the power of the vendor to rescind the contract if he cannot show a good title. When a person enters into a contract for the sale of land or leaseholds without making these stipulations, he is said to have entered into an open contract. See also VENDORS AND PURCHASERS; NECESSARIES; RESTRAINT OF MARRIAGE; RESTRAINT OF TRADE.

"Contract" is also sometimes used in a sense similar to that of "agreement" in its primary sense, namely, the common intention of two persons with regard to a certain subject. Thus the phrase "contract of sale" frequently denotes the ordinary transaction of A. delivering goods to B. and B. paying the price to A. at the same instant. Here there is no true contract, for "contract" implies a promise to be performed at a future time (supra). It is in fact merely a sale, not a contract of sale. See SALE; DISCHARGE; RELEASE; PERFORMANCE; SATISFACTION; DIVISIBLE CONTRACT.

Contra formam collationis. Before the dissolution of the monasteries this was a writ which lay against the abbot of a monastery, where lands had been given to the monastery for charitable purposes and had been alienated for other purposes. The writ was then available to the donor or his heirs for the recovery of the lands. It was based on the Statute of Westminster II., c. 41.

Contra formam feoffamenti. Anciently this was a writ which lay for the heir of a tenant of lands held under a charter of feoffment (q.v.), stipulating for certain suits and services, where the heir was afterwards distrained for services other than those specified in the charter.

Contra formam statuti. At common law it was necessary that an indictment for an offence created by statute, or dealt with by statute, should, after describing the offence in the terms of the statute, conclude with the words "against the form of the statute [or statutes] in that case made and provided." The Criminal Law Act, 1826, s. 24, made it immaterial whether the word "statute" or the word "statutes" was used, but still left it obligatory to use one word or the other. The Criminal Procedure Act, 1851, s. 24, while not expressly enacting that the words need not be used, had the effect of making them wholly superfluous, though the conservatism of draughtsmen resulted in their being used even after that Act was passed. Now, however, the Indictments Act, 1915, ss. 1, 2 (2), Sched. I., r. 4 (3), provides that the indictment shall "describe the offence shortly in popular language, avoiding as far as possible the use of technical terms . . . and if the offence is one created by statute, shall contain a reference to the section of the statute creating the offence," and the use of the words "against the form of the statute" has finally ceased.

Contramandatio placiti. A countermanding of plea. In the reign of Henry I. it meant giving a defendant further time to answer. See Leg. Hen. 1, c. 59.

Contramandatum. This, in the reign of Henry I., seems to have been something analogous to the present application to have a pleading struck out under Ord. 25, r. 4, as disclosing no reasonable cause of action. See Leg. Hen. 1, c. 59.

Contra negantem principia non est disputandum (Co. Litt. 343). (You cannot argue with a man who refuses to admit elementary principles.)

Contra non valentem agere nulla currit præscriptio (No prescription runs against a person unable to bring an action): and so in the case of a debt time begins to run against a creditor only as from the date upon which he had a right to institute proceedings.

Contra pacem. At common law, it was necessary to allege in an indictment that the offence was committed contra pacem Domini Regis (against the peace of our Lord the King): but the Criminal Procedure Act, 1851, s. 24, made this unnecessary, and the Indictments Act, 1915 (see CONTRA FORMAM STATUTI), makes it improper.

Contrectatio rei alienæ, animo furandi, est furtum (Jenk. Cent. 132). (The appropriation of property not one's own, with an intention to steal, is theft.)

Contribution. Where one person has sustained some loss which would have fallen upon others as well as upon himself, if it had not been diverted from them at his expense, or where a payment has been made out of one property when it might have been divided between it and another property, payment by the other persons or property of the proportion which they or it ought originally to have borne, is called contribution. The commonest instance of contribution by persons occurs in the case of co-sureties: thus if A., B. and C. make themselves liable for D. to the extent of £300, and A. is compelled to pay the whole amount, he is entitled to payment (or contribution) of £100 from B. and £100 from C. There is no right of contribution between wrongdoers. (See CONTRIBUTORY.) The other kind of contribution frequently occurs in the administration of the assets of a deceased person: thus if a testator directs his real estate (value £10,000) and his personal estate (value £5,000) to be applied in payment of his debts, which amount to £1,500, each contributes rateably, i.e., £1,000 is paid out of the real estate and £500 out of the personalty. So if several properties are subject to one mortgage, and on the death of the mortgagor they devolve on different persons, each property must contribute rateably towards payment of the mortgage debt according to its value.

A similar kind of contribution occurs in the case of general average, where several persons have to contribute, and the amount of each person's contribution depends on the value of the goods belonging to him in the ship. See AVERAGE; ADJUSTMENT; CONTRIBUTORY; MARSHALLING; EXONERATION; QUASI-CONTRACT; SUBROGATION.

Contributione facienda. Where tenants in common were bound to do some act, and one of them was left by the others to do that act, then this writ formerly lay for him against the others to compel them to make contribution. The remedy now would be by an action for money paid.

Contributive Value. Where an undertaking, such as a railway or a canal, has property in many parishes, part of the undertaking in one particular parish may be carried on at a loss as regards that particular parish and yet be a source of profit to the undertaking as a whole. If the parochial principle of rating is adhered to, such part will have no rateable value; whereas if the principle of contributive value be adopted, such part will have a rateable value. The question as to whether the principle of contributive value applies arises chiefly in connection with branch lines which act as "feeders" to the railway system of which they form part. For the many not easily reconcileable decisions on the point, see Ryde on Rating.

Contributory is a person who, on the winding-up of a company, is bound to contribute to its assets for the payment of its debts (Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, s. 124). One of the first duties of the Court or the liquidators after the winding-up has been definitely commenced is to settle the list of contributories, a process which involves that of ascertaining the liability of persons included in it. That liability may be enforced in certain cases by arrest: see s. 176.

Persons who are contributories in their own right are distinguished from those who are contributories as the representatives of or as being liable for the debts of others—such as the executors, trustees in bankruptcy, etc., of contributories in their own right.

Under the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, ss. 24, 123, as regards companies formed under the Act, every person who was a member at the commencement of the winding-up, and every person who had been a member within one year prior to that time, is liable to be put on the list of contributories, but no past member is liable to contribute in respect of any debts of the company contracted after the time at which he ceased to be a member, nor is he liable to contribute at all unless the existing members are unable to satisfy the contributions required of them. In order to carry out these provisions the list of contributories is divided into the A and B lists. See A AND B LISTS; CALL; BALANCE ORDER.

Contributory Negligence. See NEGLIGENCE.

Controller. See COMPTROLLER; COUNTER ROLL.

Contumace capiendo, De ("for arresting a contumacious person") is a writ which is or might be issued on a significavit (q.v.) from an Ecclesiastical Court for the enforcement of a decree pronounced by that Court. It issued formerly from the Petty Bag Office (q.v.), but now it issues from the Crown Office Department of the Central Office. It is addressed to the sheriff, and directs the arrest of the person who refuses to obey the decree. As to the writ see, further, the Ecclesiastical Courts Act, 1813, s. 1; the Ecclesiastical Courts Contempt Act, 1832, s. 1, and the Ecclesiastical Courts Act, 1840. See also CONTUMACY.

Contumacy is where any person having been duly cited to appear in an Ecclesiastical Court, or required to comply with the lawful order of any such Court, neglects or refuses to appear, or neglects or refuses to obey the order, or where any person commits a contempt in the face of the Court. (See the Ecclesiastical Courts Act, 1813.) Contumacy is punishable by imprisonment. (See CONTUMACE SAPIENDO, DE.) Upon such contumacy as consists in the non-payment of money payment whereof has been ordered by an Ecclesiastical Court, sequestration (q.v.) may be issued out of the High Court against the real and personal estate of the contumacious person (Ecclesiastical Courts Act, 1840).

Conusance. The primary meaning of conusance is acknowledgment. Thus, a fine sur conusance de droit was a fine founded on an acknowledgment of right (see FINE); so, in an action of replevin the conusance was a plea by which the defendant admitted that he took the goods for which the action was brought. See REPLEVIN.

Conusance also signifies jurisdiction. "Conusance of pleas" is a franchise granted to an inferior Court, giving it exclusive jurisdiction to entertain certain proceedings. Thus, the University of Oxford still has, and the University of Cambridge formerly had, conusance in certain personal actions. (See COURTS OF THE UNIVERSITIES.) When an action for a cause within the conusance of an inferior Court of record is brought in a superior Court, the inferior Court may put forward a claim of conusance, and, if the claim is allowed, the action is remitted to the inferior Court. In the High Court the claim is made by motion.

Conusance sometimes means judicial notice. See NOTICE.

Conventicle Act. The popular title of the statute 22 Car. 2, c. 1, which aimed at the suppression of conventicles or meetings for religious services other than those of the Church of England.

Conventione, De. A writ, also known as a writ of covenant, which formerly lay for the breach of any covenant.

Conventio privatorum non potest publico juri derogare (Wing. 201). (No private persons can make an agreement between themselves which derogates from the rights of the public.)

Conversion. I. In equity, conversion is the operation of changing the nature of property; it is either actual or constructive. Actual conversion is the act of converting land or other property into money by selling it, or of converting money into land by buying land with it. Conversion in this sense is frequently directed by wills and settlements, or ordered by a Court in administering an estate.

Constructive conversion is a fictitious conversion, which is assumed in certain cases to have taken place in order to carry out the intention of the parties. The constructive or equitable conversion of land into money (realty into personalty), and vice versa, takes place when an actual conversion has been directed or agreed to, but not actually carried out. The effect of this doctrine is that land directed to be sold is treated and devolves as if it were personalty, and vice versa; thus, if land is directed by a will to be sold and the proceeds to be paid to A., and A. dies before the sale, the land goes to A.'s personal and not to his real representatives. But where the trust or power of sale is discretionary or conditional, no constructive conversion takes place, and the property retains its original character until it is actually converted. Constructive conversion takes place from the death of the testator in the case of a will, and in the case of a deed from the date of execution. Sometimes a double conversion, as land into money and the money again into land, is directed. In this case the property is to be considered, in general, as in that state in which it is ultimately to be converted; in the case supposed, therefore, the property would be treated as land. "Conversion out and out," or conversion to all intents, is where the testator meant to give the produce of real estate the quality of personalty to all intents, that is, in any event, as opposed to conversion for the purposes of the will only; the distinction is of importance in the event of some of the dispositions of the property failing by lapse or otherwise. Thus, if a testator simply gives the proceeds of real estate to several legatees, and one of them dies in the testator's lifetime, his share goes to the testator's heir-at-law, while if the testator shows an intention that the real estate is to be considered as personalty, whether the expressed purposes of his will take effect or not, then the conversion is "out and out," and any lapsed share goes to the testator's next-of-kin; see further as to this doctrine under title RESULT.

Retrospective conversion takes place where a person (e.g. a lessee) has an option of purchasing the land, and declares his option after the death of the owner (lessor); here the purchase-money goes to the personal representatives of the lessor, as if the option had been exercised during his lifetime.

II. At common law, conversion is that tort which is committed by a person who deals with chattels not belonging to him in a manner which is inconsistent with the rights of the lawful owner. Thus if a person in possession of goods belonging to another wrongfully refuses to deliver them up to him, or sells, disposes of, parts with or destroys them, he is guilty of a conversion. The remedy of the person injured is either by recaption (q.v.) or by action; if he merely claims damages, the judgment vests the property of the goods in the defendant; but the plaintiff may if he likes claim a return of the goods in specie, and a judgment to that effect is enforceable by writs of delivery, attachment and sequestration (Ord. 42, r. 6). See TROVER; DETINUE.

III. In the law of bankruptcy it is competent for solvent partners to make any arrangement which they think proper with respect either to the joint property of the firm or the separate property of the persons constituting it, and to alter the character of the property so as to convert joint into separate property, and vice versa; and every such agreement, if made bona fide, will bind their creditors, and in the event of bankruptcy, the property will be distributable as joint or separate estate according to the character which it then bears as between the partners themselves. (See JOINT.) Joint debts also may be converted into separate debts, and vice versa; thus if an action is brought against one partner alone for a joint debt, and judgment is obtained before the bankruptcy, the joint debt will be converted into a separate debt against that partner.

Convey; Conveyance. In the widest sense of the word a conveyance is a mode by which property is conveyed or voluntarily transferred from one person to another by means of a written instrument and other formalities. It also signifies the instrument itself. Conveyances are of three classes,—by matter of record, by matter in pais, and by special custom.

Conveyances by matter of record are such as are substantiated by a court of record. The only examples of this class in use at the present day are royal grants and vesting orders (q.v.). Fines and recoveries (q.v.) belonged to this class before their abolition.

Conveyances by matter in pais are such as only require the act or consent of the parties themselves, testified by the proper formalities. They are of three kinds, according as they operate by the common law, by the Statute of Uses, or under certain modern Acts of Parliament.

(i) Conveyances at common law are said to be original or primary when they transfer the property without reference to a previous conveyance, and derivative or secondary when they follow a previous conveyance and take effect with reference to it. To the former class belong conveyances by feoffment, gift (of estates tail), grant (of incorporeal hereditaments), lease, exchange, partition and assignment; to the latter class belong conveyances by confirmation, release, surrender and defeazance. See the various titles.

(ii) Conveyances under the Statute of Uses (q.v.) are those which derive their force from the stat. 27 Hen. 8, by which the use or beneficial interest in land is in certain cases converted in the legal possession and ownership. Conveyances of this kind are said to operate with transmutation of possession, where the possession of the land is first transferred by a conveyance taking effect independently of the Statute of Uses, and the statute then transfers the possession to the cestui que use. To this class belong the obsolete feoffment to uses and the modern deed of grant to uses, in each of which the land is conveyed to a feoffee or grantee, and either by the same or by a separate instrument (whether contemporaneous or subsequent) uses are declared in favour of other persons to whom the legal possession and ownership are transferred by force of the statute. Examples of such conveyances occur in a strict settlement, in which, down to 1883, power was usually given to the tenant for life (the husband) to grant leases for twenty-one years. This was done by conveying the land to certain persons (called the "trustees of the powers") to the uses of the settlement, and by giving the tenant for life a power to appoint the land by way of lease for any term not exceeding twenty-one years. (See POWER; "LEAD.") Conveyances are said to operate without transmutation of possession where nothing but the use passes until the statute takes effect; these include the bargain and sale, the covenant to stand seised, and the lease and release. See those titles.

(iii) Conveyances operating under modern statutes are releases under the now repealed statute 4 & 5 Vict. c. 21 (see LEASE AND RELEASE); deeds of grant under the Real Property Act, 1845, c. 106; assurances made by married women under the Fines and Recoveries Act, 1833, ss. 77 et seq. and under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882; and assurances by tenants for life under the Settled Land Act, 1882. There are also many others.

Conveyances by special custom are employed for alienating and dealing with copyhold lands and such customary estates as are holden in ancient demesne or in manors of a similar nature. The usual method is by surrender followed by admittance. See SURRENDER; ADMITTANCE; GRANT; BARGAIN AND SALE; USE; COVENANT.

In the narrower modern sense, "conveyance" signifies the instrument employed to effectuate an ordinary purchase of freehold land as opposed to settlements, wills, leases, partitions, etc., and "convey" means to effectuate such a purchase. But the words "conveyance" and "convey" have the much wider meanings given to them by the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, s. 2 (v), which declares that in that Act "conveyance, unless a contrary intention appears, includes assignment, appointment, lease, settlement and other assurance, and covenant to surrender, made by deed on a sale, mortgage, demise or settlement of any property, or on any other dealing with or for any property: and convey, unless a contrary intention appears, has a meaning corresponding with that of conveyance."

"Conveyance," in the sense of a transfer of property, seems to be a compartively modern term, the old word being "assurance" (q.v.). Coke used "conveyance" as signifying that part of a pleading which serves as an explanation or introduction to the material facts.

Conveyancer; Conveyancing. Conveyancing is that part of the lawyer's business which relates to the alienation and transmission of property and other rights from one person to another, and to the framing of legal documents intended to create, define, transfer or extinguish rights. It therefore includes the investigation of the title to land, and the preparation of agreements, wills, articles of association, private Acts of Parliament operating as conveyances, and many other instruments, in addition to conveyances properly so called.

"Conveyancer" now generally means a barrister who chiefly devotes himself to the practice of conveyancing or combines it with practice on the Chancery side (see DRAFTSMAN). Formerly it was not unusual for a member of one of the Inns of Court to obtain a certificate allowing him to practise as a conveyancer below the bar, that is, without being called to the bar. But this is practically obsolete, there being now (1922) only one such conveyancer in England. The certificate cannot be issued without the annual permission of the Benchers of the Inn (Solicitors Act, 1860, s. 124). It is issued by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue (ib.); expires on each 31st October (Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 48 (a)); and an annual duty of £9 during the first three years and of £4 10s. afterwards is payable if the conveyancer practises within ten miles of the G.P.O., London, the duties being £6 for the first three years and £3 afterwards if he practices elsewhere in England (ib., s. 1, Sch. I.). Any person, not being a barrister or solicitor, who practises conveyancing without a certificate is liable to a penalty of £50 (ib., s. 44). A certificated conveyancer can sue for his fees.

Conveyancing Counsel. By the Court of Chancery Act, 1852, s. 41, the Lord Chancellor was empowered to appoint not less than six barristers, who had practised as conveyancing counsel for ten years at least, to be conveyancing counsel of the Court of Chancery; and the opinion of any of them might be received and acted on by the Court or by a judge at chambers in the investigation of the title to an estate, or in the settlement of a draft conveyance, mortgage, etc. By the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 77, they were transferred to the Supreme Court. See, with regard to them, Ord. 51, rr. 2, 7, 9-13, Ord. 65, rr. 22, 27 (36).

Convict. Formerly a man was said to be convict when he had been found guilty of treason or felony, but before judgment had been passed on him, after which he was said to be attaint (q.v.). The term "convict" has, however, long had the popular meaning of a man who has been sentenced to death or penal servitude for treason or felony, and this use of the word has been adopted by the Legislature. See the Forfeiture Act, 1870, s. 6.

Conviction is where a person is found guilty of an offence. Convictions are either ordinary or summary. An ordinary conviction takes place in a criminal prosecution by indictment, etc., and may either consist of the prisoner's confession and plea of guilty, or of the verdict of guilty found by a jury. See VERDICT; JUDGMENT; SENTENCE.

A summary conviction is a judgment pronounced by one or more justices of the peace or other magistrates under the authority of a statute giving them criminal or penal jurisdiction—e.g., in cases of assaults. See JURISDICTION; QUASH.

Convocation. This is an assembly of the clergy. There are two Convocations—one for the province of Canterbury, the other for that of York, and each one consists of two houses, of which the archbishop and bishops form the upper house, the lower house consisting of deans, archdeacons, proctors representing the chapters, and proctors representing the parochial clergy. All deans and archdeacons are members of the Convocation of their province, and each chapter sends one proctor; in the province of Canterbury the beneficed parochial clergy in each diocese elect two proctors, while in the province of York the clergy in each archdeaconry elect two proctors.

Convocation is summoned by the archbishop of the province in pursuance of the King's writ.

Formerly the beneficed clergy taxed themselves in convocation, but they have not done so since 1663. Convocation has no power to bind the temporalty, but it seems that it may with the licence or authority of the Crown make constitutions and canons binding on the spirituality, provided they are not against the law of the land or the Crown's prerogative.

The constitution of the Church Assembly (q.v.) expressly declares that the establishment of that body is without prejudice to the powers of Convocation. It would, however, seem probable that in practice the Church Assembly will supersede Convocation.

Convoy consists of one or more ships of war sent by a country in time of war to protect and escort merchant ships belonging to that country. It was formerly a moot point whether neutral merchant vessels sailing with convoy were exempt from search (q.v.), and although the principle of that exemption was recognised at the close of the eighteenth century by most of the principal maritime powers, it was denied by Sir William Scott in the case of The Maria in 1798. In 1801, however, the principle was adopted by Great Britain, with certain restrictions, in a convention with Russia, but since 1812 Great Britain has refused to admit it.

In the law of marine insurance, warranty to sail with convoy is a stipulation in a policy of insurance on a ship that it will sail with convoy. It implies—(i) a convoy for the whole voyage, (ii) sailing orders from the officer in command of the convoy, and (iii) exertion on the part of the ship insured to keep with the convoy.

Co-operative Building Societies. A society may be formed under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893, ss. 4, 36, for the purpose of buying and selling land, with power to mortgage, lease or build upon land bought or taken on lease by it. Such societies are sometimes called co-operative building societies.

Coparcener; Coparcenary. Where lands descend on an intestacy to several persons as co-heirs, e.g., at common law to several daughters, or, according to the custom of gavelkind, to several sons, the persons so inheriting are called coparceners or tenants in coparcenary. In the former case they are called in the old books coparceners by the common law, and in the latter case coparceners by the custom.

Coparceners form one heir to their ancestor, and therefore they have one entire freehold in the land in respect of strangers so long as it remains undivided, but, as Coke puts it, "betweene themselves to many purposes they have in judgement of law severall freeholds; for the one of them may infeoffe another of them of her part, and make liverie. And this coparcenarie is not severed or divided by law by the death of any of them; for if one die, her part shall descend to her issue." Coparceners may also convey to one another by deed of release, in the same way as joint tenants. Coparceners could always compel one another to make partition (q.v.). On a partition by agreement, the part allotted to each coparcener in severalty descends in the same way as the undivided share to which he was entitled previously to partition; in other words, the partition does not make the coparceners purchasers of their several shares within the meaning of the Inheritance Act (q.v.). See JOINT TENANCY; TENANCY IN COMMON; SEVERALTY; ESTATE; DESCENT; PARTITION; ENITIA PARS; STATUTUM DE HIBERNIE, etc.

Copartner; Copartnership. See PARTNERSHIP.

Cope. See LOT AND COPE.

Copper Coins, Ancient. The copper coinage originated only in 1660, when the copper halfpenny and farthing were issued. They were replaced during the reign of James II. by tin coins, some of which appeared also during the reign of William and Mary. From 1694 to 1860 halfpennies and farthings, as well as the rarer issues of half-farthings and one-third farthings, were again of copper; from 1797 the copper penny was issued down to 1860: a copper two-pence was issued in 1797; and since 1860 the copper coinage has been superseded by a bronze coinage consisting of pennies, halfpence and farthings and also a rarely seen one-third farthing. The penny of the copper, etc., coinages has always been worth one-twelfth of the current shilling.

Copulatio verborum indicat acceptationem in eodem sensu (Bac. iv. 26). (The coupling of words shows that the meaning of the one is to be ascertained from the meaning of the other.) See EJUSDEM GENERIS.

Copy. A copy is a document which is taken or written from another, as opposed to an original. The principal sorts of copies used for the proof of documents are—(1) Exemplifications under the Great Seal; (2) exemplifications of a record under the seal of the Court where the record is; (3) office copies, or copies made by an officer appointed for that purpose and sealed with the seal of the office; (4) examined copies, or copies sworn to be true copies by persons who have compared them with the original, either by one person comparing the copy line for line with the original, or by reading the copy while another person reads the original; (5) copies signed and certified as true by the officer to whose custody the original is entrusted. See CERTIFIED COPY.

Photographic copies of documents in the possession of an adverse party may in a proper case be obtained by order of a master; but such copies, which are obtainable only for the purpose of preparing the case, cannot be produced as evidence of the original documents.

As to the rules governing the admissibility of copies in evidence, see EVIDENCE.

As to tenancy by copy of court roll, or tenancy by copy, as it is called in the old books, see COPYHOLD.

"Copy" in the old writers also signifies copyright (q.v.). The "right of copy" is the right to reproduce, from Latin copia, abundance.

Copyhold; Copyholder. Copyholds, or lands held by copyhold tenure, are lands, forming part of a manor, originally granted by the lord for tenancies at will merely, which however have by immemorial custom become converted into estates independent of the will of the lord in everything but name, and of various degrees of duration, according to the custom of the particular manor. Copyholds are so called because the evidence of the title to such lands consists of copies of the court roll of the manor, a book in which all dealings with the land are entered. (See ROLL.) Since 16th September, 1887, no new copyhold can be created without the consent of the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries (Copyhold Act, 1887; Copyhold Act, 1894, s. 81).

All copyhold land is therefore subject to two estates, namely, that of the lord, which is a freehold estate, and that of the tenant, which is a customary estate. (See TENURE; ESTATE.) Except that it gives rise to certain fines (q.v.) and other dues, the estate of the lord is almost purely nominal. See INTEREST.

The following consequences follow from the estate of the copyholder having been originally an estate at will only, and from the freehold being vested in the lord:—(1) That the minerals under and the timber on the land belong to the lord, so that the tenant cannot take them without a licence from the lord, while the lord cannot take them without the consent of the tenant, unless there is a custom enabling him to do so; (2) that all alienations of the tenant's interest in the land must be effected by the intervention of the lord (see GRANT; SURRENDER; ADMITTANCE), to whom a fine is generally payable (see FINE); and (3) that a copyholder cannot lease his land for a longer period than one year without a licence from the lord, unless there is a special custom enabling him to do so.

Subject to these restrictions, the ownership of a copyholder is practically as absolute as that of a freeholder. It is true that he holds his land nominally at the will of the lord, but he also holds it according to the custom of the manor, which overrides the will of the lord; if the tenant aliens or devises the land, or dies intestate, the lord is bound to admit the alienee, devisee or heir as tenant, and if he refuses he can be compelled by mandamus to do so. Copyholds are liable for the debts of the deceased copyholder if he had an estate beyond his own life (Administration of Estates Act, 1833); they are also liable to be taken in execution for his judgment debts under a writ of elegit (Judgments Act, 1838, s. 11); and they pass on his bankruptcy to his trustee for the benefit of his creditors (Bankruptcy Act, 1914, ss. 48, 167).

The custom of each manor determines the maximum degree of property which the copyholders may have in their customary tenements. Hence copyholds are generally divided into (a) copyholds of inheritance, which are alienable for an estate of inheritance or any less estate, but not for an estate tail, unless there is a custom to entail in the manor; if there is no such custom then a gift to a man and the heirs of his body will give him a customary estate of fee simple conditional at the common law (see FEE; TAIL): (b) copyholds for lives, which are alienable for one or more lives in a great variety of manners, but for no greater estate; when a copyholder for lives has a tenant right of renewal or of appointing his successor, his estate is almost the same as a customary fee, and he is hence called a quasi-copyholder in fee: (c) copyholds for years, which are alienable for terms of years, renewable or not according to the custom, but for no greater estate. See generally as to estates in copyholds, title ESTATE: also FREEBENCH; GRANT.

As to the rights of the lord to heriots, rents, fines, reliefs, forfeitures, etc., see those titles; also COMMUTATION. As to the enfranchisement of copyholds, see that title: see also ANCIENT DEMESNE: CUSTOMARY FREEHOLDS; DEMESNE; SEIZURE; TENANT BY THE VERGE; VILLENAGE.

Copyholds descend as realty unless there be a special custom such as borough English (q.v.) or gavelkind (q.v.).

Copyhold Commissioners were commissioners appointed under the Copyhold Act, 1841, ss. 1, 2. Their function was to carry into effect that Act; and they were subsequently entrusted with the administration of various subsequent Acts which, like the Act of 1841, had for their principal objects the compulsory commutation of manorial burdens and restrictions (fines, heriots, rights to timber and minerals, etc.), and the compulsory enfranchisement of copyhold lands. See COMMUTATION; ENFRANCHISEMENT.

By the Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 48, they (together with the Tithe and the Inclosure Commissioners) were entitled the Land Commissioners for England. All powers and duties of the Land Commissioners were transferred in 1889 to the Board of Agriculture, which is now the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries (q.v.).

Copyright. In the proper sense of the word, ve right of printing pies of a published right of preventing he infringement of this right is called piracy (q.v.).

Copyright is of two kinds,—by prerogative and by statute.

The Crown has the exclusive right of publishing certain books, of which the most important are the English translation of the Bible, the statutes, and reports of judicial proceedings. The privilege of publishing the Bible and some other books has been granted by the Crown to the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. The Crown's copyright is not now enforced.

The right of a subject to prevent others from multiplying copies of a published work (such as a book, painting, engraving, photograph, etc.) is a statutory one which was first created by the statute 8 Anne, c. 19.

The right now depends entirely on the Copyright Act, 1911, which enacts (s. 31) that "no person shall be entitled to copyright or any similar right in any literary, dramatic, musical, or artistic work, whether published or unpublished, otherwise than under and in accordance with the provisions of this Act, or of any other statutory enactment for the time being in force . . ." Up to the passing of this Act there had been a number of statutes dealing with copyright in various kinds of works. The Act of 1911 consolidated and amended the law, and (s. 36 and Sch. II.) repealed all the prior Acts under which copyright existed, leaving in force only two Acts (The Musical (Summary Proceedings) Copyright Act, 1902, and the Musical Copyright Act, 1906) providing for the seizure and destruction of pirated copies of music, and ss. 7 and 8 of the Fine Arts Copyright Act, 1862, which provides for the recovery of penalties for the infringement of copyright in artistic works. The Act of 1911 forms a complete code. Only its main provisions can be noticed here. It provides where and in what works copyright shall exist:—"Subject to the provisions of this Act, copyright shall subsist throughout the parts of His Majesty's dominions to which this Act extends for the term hereinafter mentioned, in every original literary, dramatic, musical and artistic work, if (a) in the case of a published work, the work was first published within such parts of His Majesty's dominions as aforesaid, and (b) in the case of an unpublished work, the author was at the date of the making of the work a British subject, or resident within such parts of His Majesty's dominions as aforesaid; but in no other works, except so far as the protection conferred by this Act is extended by orders in council thereunder, relating to self-governing dominions to which this Act does not extend, and to foreign countries" (s. 1 (1)).

The Act extends throughout His Majesty's dominions, but shall not extend to any self-governing dominion unless put in force therein, with or without modifications, by the local legislature (s. 25), who may afterwards repeal the Act or any part of it (s. 26).

The Act may be extended by Order in Council to British protectorates (s. 28), and this power has been largely used.

The Act defines copyright:—"For the purposes of this Act, copyright means the sole right to produce or reproduce the work, or any substantial part thereof, in any material form whatsoever, to perform, or in the case of a lecture, to deliver, the work or any substantial part thereof in public; if the work is unpublished, to publish the work or any substantial part thereof; and shall include the sole right (a) to produce, reproduce, perform or publish any translation of the work; (b) in the case of a dramatic work, to convert it into a novel or other non-dramatic work; (c) in the case of a novel or other non-dramatic work, or of an artistic work, to convert it into a dramatic work by performance in public or otherwise; (d) in the case of a literary, dramatic or musical work, to make any record, perforated roll, cinematograph film, or other contrivance by means of which the work may be mechanically performed or delivered, and to authorise any such acts as aforesaid" (s. 1 (2)).

The Act extends the periods during which copyright shall exist. Except as otherwise provided by the Act, the period is the life of the author and fifty years after his death; but after the expiration of twenty-five years, or, in the case of a copyright existing at the passing of the Act, thirty years from the death of the author of a published work, any person may publish the work on compliance with the prescribed formalities and on payment of a royalty of ten per cent. to the personal representative of the author (s. 3). In the case of photographs the period is fifty years from the making of the first negative (s. 21). Provision is made for such rights as are to be substituted for rights existing at the commencement of the Act in various works (s. 24, Sch. I.). The Act came into operation on 1st July, 1912 (s. 37).

These extensions of the period of copyright are of great importance. Immediately before the Act the period was, in the case of books, forty-two years or the author's life and seven years—whichever was the longer; in the case of paintings, the author's life and seven years after; in the case of engravings, twenty-eight years from first publication; and in the case of sculptures, fourteen years from first publication, with a further fourteen years if the sculptor was alive at the end of the first fourteen years.

No registration at Stationers' Hall is now necessary.

The Act may by Order in Council be extended to works published in foreign countries which make adequate provision for the protection of works entitled to copyright under the Act (s. 29), and to the works of persons not coming within s. 1 (1) supra (ib.).

Coraage. This word never existed except as an erroneous form of "cornage." But Blount, Cowel and Jacob all treat it as having a legitimate existence: and then proceed to say that it must have been an imposition of certain measures of wheat, "for corus tritici is a measure of wheat." Of such stuff were the old etymologies made.

Coram non judice (before one who is not the judge) is an expression used where a Court proceeds in a matter beyond its jurisdiction. The term was generally used in reference to proceedings before justices of the peace, the general rule being that if the want of jurisdiction appeared on the face of the proceedings they were void, and no act done in pursuance of them could be justified; but this rule has been modified by the Justices Protection Act, 1848, which (see s. 2) requires the conviction or order to be quashed before an action can be brought.

Cord. A cord of wood contains one hundred and twenty-eight cubic feet, being eight feet long, four feet broad, and four feet high. This measure is not now recognised by the law.

Co-respondent. Where a husband brings a suit against his wife charging her with adultery, the alleged adulterer must as a rule be made a party to the petition as a co-respondent (Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, s. 28). If the adultery is proved the Court may order him to pay damages to the husband (ib. s. 33). See ADULTERY; DISSOLUTION OF MARRIAGE.

Corium. The hide or skin. Anciently when a man was condemned to be whipped he was said corium forisfaccre (to forfeit his skin) or corium perdere (to lose his skin), and if he compounded for the whipping he was said corium redimere (to redeem his skin).

Cornage was a tenure by which land might formerly be held. Littleton says: "It is said that in the marches of Scotland some hold of the king by cornage, that is to say, to winde a horne, to give men of the countrie warning, when they heare that the Scots or other enemies are come or will enter into England; which service is grand serjeanty. But if any tenant hold of any other lord than of the king by such service of cornage, this is not grand serjeanty, but it is knight's service, . . . for none may hold by grand serjeanty but of the king only."

Cornage was abolished by the statute 12 Car. 2, c. 24, certainly so far as it constituted knight's service, and apparently also in the case of grand serjeanty, because the service of cornage could hardly be called an honorary service, which is the only kind of service excepted from the Act. (See TENURE; GRAND SERJEANTY.) The manor of Pusey in Berkshire was held by cornage under, it is said, a grant from Canute; and in 1684 the horn kept for the purpose of performing the services—it is inscribed "Pecote this horne to hold buy thy land"—was held to be an heirloom (q.v.) descending with the land.

Corn Production. See the Corn Production Act, 1917, as amended and continued (until Parliament should otherwise determine either by statute or by an address from both Houses) by the Agriculture Act, 1920, Pt. I. It was repealed by the Corn Production Acts (Repeal) Act, 1921.

Corn-rent. A rent payable in, or varying with, the price of corn. Under the statute 8 Eliz. c. 6, it is provided that in all leases by the universities of Oxford or Cambridge, or the colleges of Winchester or Eton, a third part of the rent reserved must be made payable in corn or, at the option of the lessee, in such sum of money as shall represent the market price of the corn immediately before the rent falls due.

Corn-returns. These are weekly and quarterly returns (published in the London Gazette by the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries) of the prices of home-grown wheat, barley and oats, and of the quantity of each sold in 190 towns. The returns are taken pursuant to the Corn Returns Act, 1882, ss. 4-9, which entrusted the matter to the Board of Trade. The powers of the Board of Trade in the matter were transferred to the Board of Agriculture by the Board of Agriculture Act, 1889, s. 4.

Cornutum cum Cornuto. HORN WITH HORN (q.v.).

Cornwall. The eldest son of the reigning sovereign is by inheritance Duke of Cornwall during the life of the sovereign. If the eldest son dies without leaving a son, the next surviving son of the sovereign succeeds; but if the eldest son dies leaving a son, the duchy reverts to the Crown, the rule being that unless the heir-apparent is a son of the reigning sovereign the duchy vests in the sovereign. Thus, George III. was not Duke of Cornwall while heir-apparent to his grandfather, George II. The duchy was created in 1367 by royal charter (which was sanctioned by Parliament), and was thereby endowed with seventeen royal manors. Six of these have been sold. The duchy property now consists of the remaining eleven manors, and of all mines and minerals under the whole seventeen manors, and (Cornwall Submarine Mines Act, 1858) of all mines and minerals in Cornwall under ground between high and low water marks, or under estuaries and tidal rivers, unless such mines, etc., be under ground which is part of a royal manor. When there is no Duke of Cornwall the revenues go to the Crown. They amount to about £70,000 net. See STANNARIES; TINBOUNDING.

Corodio habendo. A writ which anciently lay to compel payment of a corody (q.v.).

Corody; Corrody; Corredium was a sum of money or allowance of a house, chamber, meat, drink, clothing or other necessaries paid or allowed by an abbey or other house of religion to a servant of the Crown at the king's request; but the king was entitled to demand corodies only from abbeys, etc., whereof he was founder by right of his crown (see IN CAPITE). Corodies also seem to have been created by grants from one person to another, like annuities, but they are now all obsolete. (See HEREDITAMENT.) A grant of clothing alone should not be called a corody. A corody granted at the request of the king could be enforced by the writ de corodio habendo, which was not available in the case of other corodies. See PRECES PRIMARIÆ.

Coronatore eligendo, De. Up to the commencement (1st April, 1889) of the Local Government Act, 1888, this writ was issued to the sheriff of a county on the occurrence of a vacancy in the office of coroner, directing him to proceed to the election of a new coroner. The writ is now issued in a modified form to the county or the borough council.

Coronatore removando, De. This is the writ for the removal from office of a coroner on the ground of his inability or misbehaviour. It was formerly issued to the sheriff of the county, but now, like the writ de coronatore eligendo (q.v.), it is issued to the county or borough council. When the writ de removando is issued, the writ de eligendo accompanies it.

Coroner is an officer having both judicial and ministerial duties, the former including the duty of inquiring as to the manner of death of any person who is slain or dies in suspicious circumstances, or in prison (Coroners Act, 1887, s. 3). The inquest is held before at least twelve jurymen, super visum corporis (after viewing the dead body). If the jury return a verdict of murder or manslaughter against any person by name, the inquisition is equivalent to an indictment (q.v.), and it is the duty of the coroner to commit the accused for trial, unless (in case of manslaughter) he thinks fit to admit him to bail. He may also bind over any witnesses to appear at the trial. Another branch of the coroner's office is to inquire concerning treasure-trove (q.v.) (Coroners Act, 1887, s. 36). Coroners had formerly to inquire as to many other matters, but now they can hold no inquest except (ib. s. 36) as to treasure-trove or (ib. s. 44) in case of death, save in the City of London, where inquests may be held as to fires in the City north of the river (City of London Fire Inquests Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. xxxviii)). The coroner is also at common law a conservator of the King's peace and a magistrate by virtue of his appointment. His ministerial office is only as the sheriff's substitute in executing process where the sheriff is incapable of acting, as, for instance, where the sheriff is a party.

There are coroners for every county in England, most counties being divided into districts for the purpose; they are elected by the county council (Local Government Act, 1888, s. 50). There is also a coroner in every borough having a separate court of quarter sessions; he is appointed by the council of the borough (Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 171), and some franchises or liberties (such as lordships, universities, and the like) have their own coroners, being either persons acting as coroners ex officio (such as heads of corporation), or persons appointed by them; the right of acting as or appointing coroners in such places being derived from the Crown, they are sometimes called coroners by charter. The City of London, the Cinque Ports, the Dean and Chapter of Westminster, the University of Oxford and other public bodies have coroners of this description. To the same class belong the coroner of the King's household, otherwise known as coroner of the verge (see VERGE), and the coroners of the Admiralty. The coroner of the King's household is appointed by the Lord Steward for the time being, and has exclusive jurisdiction as to deaths within the limits of any palace or house (or the courts or gardens thereof) in which the King actually is (Coroners Act, 1887, s. 29). The coroners of the Admiralty had jurisdiction in matters arising on the high seas, or on creeks and public rivers, their jurisdiction in the latter cases being concurrent with that of the coroner of the county. The judge of the Admiralty Court was Coroner of the Admiralty; he appointed deputies or substitutes for particular districts, but since 1877 the President of the Admiralty Division has not been appointed Coroner of the Admiralty, the office being in abeyance.

Official coroners are the Lord Chief Justice of England, who, by virtue of his office, is supreme coroner over all England, and the judges of the High Court of Justice, who are also sovereign coroners.

A coroner may be removed from office for inability or misbehaviour by the Lord Chancellor (Coroners Act, 1887, s. 8 (1)) except in the Duchy of Lancaster, where the jurisdiction is with the Chancellor of that Duchy (ib. s. 39 (1)). The jurisdiction extends to all coroners (s. 30 (4)); independently of statute, it existed and still exists at common law (s. 35).

Corporal Oath. This was the old name for the form of oath taken while holding the Gospels in the land.

Corporation is a succession or collection of persons having in the estimation of the law an existence and rights and duties distinct from those of the individual persons who form it from time to time. Corporations are of three kinds.

A corporation sole consists of only one member at a time, the corporate character being kept up by a succession of solitary members. Corporations sole are always holders of a public office, the principal examples being the sovereign and ecclesiastical persons, such as bishops, parsons, etc.; the Solicitor for the Affairs of His Majesty's Treasury is a corporation sole of statutory creation (Treasury Solicitors Act, 1876, s. 1). The principal incident of such a corporation is that the property which the member holds by virtue of his office (but not his private property) passes on his death not to his real or personal representatives, but to his successor in office, as if he and the successor were the same person.

A corporation aggregate consists of several members at the same time. The most frequent examples are incorporated companies and municipal corporations. (See COMPANY; MUNICIPAL CORPORATION.) The chief peculiarity of a corporation aggregate is that it has perpetual succession (i.e. existence), a name, and a common seal by which its intention may be evidenced; that, being merely a creation of the law, it cannot commit a crime or enter into a personal contract or relation (see PERSONAL); and that the majority of the members have power to bind the minority in matters within the powers of the corporation.

There are also certain corporations which are partly sole and partly aggregate, namely, those in which the property and rights of the corporation are vested in one member as the head or representative of the others, as in the case (before the Reformation) of an abbot and his convent, or (at the present day) of the master of a hospital, who holds the property for the benefit of the poor brethren. These corporations are sometimes spoken of as "corporations aggregate of which the head only is capable" (that is, capable of taking land in succession), and sometimes as "corporations sole in auter droit."

Corporations are further divisible into ecclesiastical [spiritual], such as bishops, deans and chapters, etc., or lay. Lay corporations again are either civil—such as the sovereign, municipal corporations, and trading companies: or eleemosynary—such as colleges, hospitals, and other charitable corporations.

There are some aggregate bodies which are not complete corporations, and are therefore sometimes called quasi-corporations; such are churchwardens, who cannot hold land in succession, and have not a common seal.

With reference to the mode of their creation, corporations exist according to the common law or under a statute. The first class includes many corporations virtute officii—such as the Crown, bishops, parsons, etc.: and corporations existing by prescription (q.v.), by charter (q.v.), and by implication. An example of the last kind is where the Crown grants land to "the men of Islington" at a certain rent; this incorporates them, for otherwise the grant could not be fully carried into effect. Corporations created by statute may be divided into those incorporated by special Act of Parliament, as in the case of a railway company, and those created under a general Act, e.g. the Companies Act, 1862.

See VISITATION; DISSOLUTION; SEAL; ULTRA VIRES.

Corporation Profits Tax. This tax was first imposed by the Finance Act, 1920, ss. 52-56. It is an annual tax of 5 per cent. on the profits of all limited companies other than companies which carry on any gas, water, electricity, tramway, hydraulic power, dock, canal or railway undertaking. See also S. R. & O., 1920, No. 1466, made pursuant to s. 56 (7), as to assessment, collection and appeals.

Corporator. A corporator is a member of a corporation aggregate.

Corporeal. See HEREDITAMENT.

Corpse. The common law recognises no property in a corpse, which therefore is incapable of being stolen. A coffin, shroud, etc., can, however, be stolen; but the coffin, etc., must be described as the property of some living person.

Burial (q.v.) is the ordinary mode of disposing of a corpse; but cremation (q.v.) is not unlawful at common law and is now regulated by statute.

It is a misdemeanour at common law to dispose of a corpse in order to prevent an inquest being held; to prevent the lawful burial of a corpse; to disinter a corpse without lawful authority; for an undertaker to sell a corpse entrusted to him for burial; or for a person under a duty in law to bury a corpse to leave it unburied.

Corpus Christi. The statute 27 Hen. 6, c. 5, prohibits the holding of markets and fairs upon a number of feast days, amongst which is the "day of Corpus Christi," a feast day instituted in the thirteenth century in honour of the Blessed Sacrament. See FEASTS.

Corpus cum causa. This writ (more properly described as the writ of Habeas Corpus cum Causa) formerly issued out of the Court of Chancery to remove into the King's Bench both the body and the record of a man lying in execution upon a judgment of debt.

Corpus delicti. The facts which constitute an offence. It does not mean the body of a murdered man, or a thing which has been stolen, or anything else which has been the subject-matter of a crime.

Corpus humanum non recipit æstimationem (Hob. 59). (A human body is not susceptible of appraisement.) The maxim has no present application. It applied only in cases of arrest for debt.

Corpus juris canonici. See CANON LAW.

Corpus juris civilis is the body of Roman law contained in the Institutes, Digest, and Code compiled by order of Justinian, together with the Novellæ, or constitutions promulgated after the compilation of the Code. See the various titles.

Corrector of the Staple. A clerk of the Staple (q.v.), who recorded bargains made between merchants. See the statute 27 Edw. 3, stat. 2, cc. 22, 23, known as the Statute of the Staple.

Corroboration. No plaintiff in a breach of promise action can recover a verdict unless his or her testimony is corroborated by some material evidence in support of the alleged promise (Evidence Further Amendment Act, 1869, s. 2).

No affiliation order can be made unless the evidence of the mother of the bastard child in question is corroborated in some material particular (Bastardy Act, 1845, s. 8; Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872, s. 4).

No person can be convicted under ss. 2 and 3 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, of procuring women or girls upon the uncorroborated evidence of one witness (Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, ss. 2 and 3).

No person can be convicted upon the unsworn testimony of a child of tender years, unless such testimony is corroborated by other material evidence implicating the accused, of any offence under Part II. of the Children Act, 1908, or of any offence specified in Sched. I. to that Act (ib. s. 30), or of any offence under the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1904 (Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1904, s. 15).

No one can be convicted of high treason unless there be two witnesses, either both of them to the same overt act or one to one overt act and the other to another overt act of the same treason (Treason Act, 1695, ss. 2, 4); but this does not apply to treason directed against the person of the King (Treason Act, 1800; Treason Act, 1842, s. 1).

There is no enactment declaring that no person can be convicted of perjury if there be only one witness whose evidence is uncorroborated, but there is a well-established rule of law to that effect.

A jury ought not to convict upon the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice, and the judge should so inform them. There is, however, nothing in strict law to prevent them from convicting upon such uncorroborated evidence, but if they do the Court of Criminal Appeal will quash the conviction.

In divorce proceedings the Court will not act upon the uncorroborated evidence of either party.

The evidence of a claimant against the estate of a deceased person will not be acted on unless it is corroborated, either directly or indirectly, by proof of facts which give it an appearance of verisimilitude.

Corrody. See CORODY.

Corruption. Under the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1906, s. 1 (1), any agent corruptly accepting, obtaining, or attempting to obtain from any person any gift or consideration as inducement or reward for doing or forbearing to do, or for having done or forborne to do, any act, or for showing or forbearing to show favour or disfavour in relation to his principal's affairs or business, is guilty of an indictable misdemeanour; and so also is any person who knowingly gives to any agent, or any agent who knowingly uses with intent to deceive his principal, any false, erroneous, or defective receipt, account, or other document. No prosecution can be instituted under the Act without the leave of the Attorney-General or of the Solicitor-General (s. 2). The Act applies not only to private employees, but also (s. 1 (13)) to the servants of municipal bodies

Corruption of Blood. See ATTAINDER.

Corrupt Practice. This means (1) treating, (2) undue influence, (3) personation or the procuring thereof, (4) bribery, or (5) making a false declaration as to election expenses in connection with a parliamentary election (Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, s. 3; Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, ss. 3, 33 (7)), or a municipal election (Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 77; Municipal Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act, 1884, ss. 2, 21 (5)), or a county council election (Local Government Act, 1888, s. 75), or a parish or district council election or other election under the Local Government Act, 1894 (Local Government Act, 1894, s. 48 (3) (8)). As regards parliamentary elections it also means the incurring of election expenses, without the authority in writing of an election agent, by any person (Representation of the People Act, 1918, s. 34): and where the offence is committed by any body of persons, then every director or officer thereof shall be deemed to have committed it unless he proves that it was committed without his knowledge or consent (Representation of the People (No. 2) Act, 1922).

As regards parliamentary elections any corrupt practice, other than personation, is a misdemeanour, and personation is a felony (Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, s. 6); anyone convicted of any corrupt practice is disqualified for membership of the House of Commons and from voting at a parliamentary election for a period of seven years from his conviction (ib.); and anyone committing any corrupt practice at any municipal election (Municipal Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act, 1883, s. 2) or at a county council election (Local Government Act, 1888, s. 75), or at any election under the Local Government Act, 1894 (Local Government Act, 1894, s. 48 (3)) is guilty of the same offences and is subject to analogous disqualification. See ILLEGAL PRACTICES.

Corsepresent. A mortuary—in the sense of a death-offering. See MORTUARIES.

Corsned. In Anglo-Saxon times this was a piece of barley bread, weighing about one ounce, which an accused person, after certain quasi-religious invocations, was set to swallow. If he succeeded, he was held innocent: failure was proof of guilt.

Corus tritici. An ancient customary measure of wheat, consisting of eight bushels or one quarter: see Brac. lib. 2, c. 6.

Coshering. The Irish chieftains claimed the right—known as coshering—of quartering themselves and their retinues at the houses of their tenants.

Cosinage in the old books signifies consanguinity. A writ of cosinage was a real action which lay for the recovery of lands, etc., of which the heir's great-grandfather's father was seised on the day of his death, and which had been abated by a stranger. The writ was abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36. See ABATEMENT OF FREEHOLD; AIEL; BESAIL; MORT D'ANCESTOR; NUPER OBIT; TRESAYLE.

Cost Book. A cost-book mining company is a partnership formed for the purpose of working a mine under the local customs of the district where the mine is situate. Such companies are found chiefly in Devon and Cornwall and in the High Peak and Wirksworth districts of Derbyshire; but they have existed in other parts of the United Kingdom and in some of the Colonies. There are, however, few such companies now in existence. The shareholders appoint an agent, commonly called a purser, for the purpose of managing the affairs of the mine subject to the control of the shareholders. They write in a book, called the cost book, the agreement into which they have entered, and in the same book the purser inserts from time to time the receipts and expenditure of the mine, the names of the shareholders, their respective accounts with the mine, and transfers of shares. Each member may transfer or relinquish his share. As a general rule, the capital is not paid up in the first instance, but calls are made from time to time at meetings of the members when required. Cost-book companies in Devon and Cornwall are within the jurisdiction of the Stannaries Court (q.v.), which, since 1896, has been vested in the County Court, and in the High Peak and Wirksworth districts they are within the jurisdiction of the barmote (q.v.) courts of those districts. A cost-book company can be registered as a company under the Companies Acts.

Costera. Used in ancient patents as a synonym of maritima Angliæ (q.v.).

Costs. The term "costs" has two meanings. In one sense it denotes the charges which a solicitor is entitled to make and recover from the client or person employing him as his remuneration for professional services, such as legal advice, attendances, drafting and copying documents, conducting legal proceedings, etc. A solicitor's bill of costs is subject to special provisions as to taxation (q.v.), etc., with a view to the protection of the client.

The term "costs" also denotes the expenses which a person is entitled to recover from the other side by reason of his being a party to legal proceedings. They include court fees, stamps, etc., and also, where the party is represented by a solicitor, the reasonable charges and fees of the solicitor and counsel The amount of these costs is ascertained by the process of taxation (q.v.), which is regulated by certain principles of general application.

The costs of actions commenced in the High Court, which might have been commenced in the County Court, are regulated by the County Courts Act, 1919, s. 11, which enacts that: " . . . Where an action is brought in the High Court which could have been commenced in a County Court, then, if the plaintiff recovers less, in the case of an action founded on a contract, than £40, or, in the case of an action founded on tort, than £10, he shall not be entitled to any costs of the action, and if he recovers, in the case of an action founded on contract, a sum of £40 or upwards but less than £100, or, in the case of an action founded on tort, a sum of £10 or upwards but less than £50, he shall not be entitled to any more costs of the action than those to which he would have been entitled if the action had been brought in a County Court, and, where a plaintiff is entitled to costs on a County Court scale only, the taxing master shall have the same power of directing on what County Court scale and under what column in the scale costs are to be allowed, and of allowing any items of costs, as the judge would have had if the action had been brought in a County Court: Provided that (i) in any such action, whether founded on contract or tort, the Court, or a judge, or, where the action is tried before a referee or officer of the Supreme Court, that referee or officer, if satisfied that there was sufficient reason for bringing it in the High Court or that the defendant, or one of the defendants, objected to the transfer of the action to a County Court, may make an order allowing the costs or any part of the costs thereof on the High Court scale or on such one of the County Court scales and under such one of the columns in the scale as he may direct, and (ii) if in any action founded on contract the plaintiff within twenty-one days after the service of the writ, or within such further time as may be allowed by the Court or a judge, obtains an order under Order XIV. of the Rules of the Supreme Court that he shall be at liberty to sign judgment for a sum of £20 or upwards either unconditionally or, unless that sum is paid into Court or to the plaintiff's solicitor, he shall, unless otherwise ordered by the Court or a judge, be entitled to costs on the High Court scale."

Subject to this enactment, the rules as to costs in the King's Bench Division and the Chancery Division respectively are as follows:

In the King's Bench Division, the successful party in a case tried by a jury recovers his costs from his opponent, unless the judge for good cause otherwise orders (Ord. 65, r. 1). In all other proceedings in that Division costs are in the discretion of the Court or judge (ib.).

In administrative proceedings, e.g., actions for the administration of the estate of a deceased person, actions for the execution of trusts, proceedings to ascertain the construction of a will, and bankruptcy and winding-up proceedings, those parties who have properly or necessarily taken part in the proceedings (such as the executors, trustees and persons beneficially interested who have established their rights) commonly obtain their costs out of the estate or fund which is the subject of the proceedings.

In the Chancery Division, costs are always in the discretion of the Court (see Ord. 65, r. 1), there being no question of trial by jury. But the Court must exercise this discretion in a judicial manner. It cannot dismiss an action and order the defendant himself to pay the costs; and trustees, executors and mortgagees are entitled as of right to their costs.

In the Chancery Division the following varieties of costs require notice:—The costs allowed a successful litigant in ordinary cases are termed "costs as between party and party," and do not include all the expenses to which the party has been put. In certain cases the Court allows costs to be taxed upon a more liberal scale, so as to include many charges which would not be allowed in taxation as between party and party: these are called "costs as between solicitor and client," the most usual instance of their allowance being where a trustee or executor is a party to proceedings in his representative character, and there is a fund under the control of the Court out of which the costs can be paid. In some cases the Court goes even further, and directs the costs of a trustee, executor, or administrator to include "costs, charges and expenses" properly incurred by him, although not strictly costs in the action: these include such allowances as, for instance, the trustee would be entitled to in an account between him and his cestui que trust.

In the Court of Appeal, costs are in the discretion of the Court. The general rule of that Court is that the successful party is entitled to his costs; but in exceptional cases that rule is not followed.

The costs of the general or ordinary proceedings in an action or suit are called "costs in the cause" or "costs in the action." Costs of some interlocutory proceedings are not included in the "costs in the cause" unless so ordered. The costs of an interlocutory application are sometimes ordered to be the costs of one of the parties in any event; so that even if he loses the action he is entitled to set off the amount of those costs against the costs in the cause which he has to pay.

When a trial, motion or other step in an action is put off at the request of one of the parties, the Court usually requires him to pay the other party the costs which he has been put to in preparing for the trial or motion, and which are thrown away by the postponement. These are called "costs of the day."

Some old statutes expressly or impliedly gave a successful litigant in certain cases double or treble the amount which he would otherwise have been entitled to in respect of costs. These statutes were repealed by the Limitation of Actions and Costs Act, 1842, See CERTIFICATE.

Costs in the County Court are regulated by the County Courts Act, 1888, s. 113, which provides that, in the absence of a direction from the judge, costs follow the event, but leaves the judge full discretion in the matter. He must, however, exercise that discretion judicially and so cannot, for instance, deprive a successful defendant of his costs merely because the defendant has pleaded the Statute of Limitations.

See AFFIDAVIT; DIVES; HIGHER AND LOWER SCALE; IN FORMÂ PAUPERIS; PAUPER; SECURITY.

Costs de incremento. Costs of increase. An obsolete name for costs to which the affidavit (q.v.) of increase relates.

Costs in Criminal Proceedings. Under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, s. 18, and the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 54, justices have full power to order payment by the unsuccessful party of the costs of the other party in all cases governed by those Acts, whether such cases be criminal or civil. Before 1st January, 1909, there was no general enactment as to costs in cases triable on indictment. There were, however, many enactments as to the payment of costs in particular cases; but on the date above mentioned, when the Costs in Criminal Cases Act, 1908, came into operation, those earlier enactments were all repealed; and now the Act of 1908 provides by s. 1 that the Court before which any offence is tried on indictment, or a Court of summary jurisdiction which disposes summarily of any offence, triable on indictment as well as summarily, or justices who conduct the preliminary investigation of an indictable offence, may order that the costs of the prosecution or of the defence or of both be paid out of public funds; under s. 6 of the Act the Court before which anyone is convicted of an indictable offence may order him to pay the costs of the prosecution; and under the same section a prosecutor may in certain specified cases be ordered to pay the costs of the defence.

Cotarius. At the time of Domesday this was a cottager who held at a fixed rent with some personal services. His tenure was in socage (q.v.).

Coterellus. At the time of Domesday this was a serf, inhabiting a cottage, whose person, children and chattels were entirely at the disposal of his lord. He held in villenage (q.v.), and seems to have been the same as the cotsethus (q.v.).

Cotland; Cotsethland. Land held by either a cotarius (q.v.) or a coterellus (q.v.).

Cotman-land. At Rotherfield, in Sussex, this means copyhold which descends to the youngest son and, failing a son, to the daughters in equal shares.

Cotsethus. In the reign of Henry I. this was a cottager bound to labour for the lord. He was a serf. See FERDINGUS.

Cottage. This was defined by Coke as "a little house without land to it." But this definition can scarcely be taken as accurate. The cottager of feudal times could hold land (see COTLAND; COTARIUS; COTSETHUS), and for the purposes of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, Pt. 3, the word may include a garden of not more than half an acre, and not exceeding the estimated annual value of £3. For the purposes of the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, c. 16, the word means a house occupied as a dwelling by one of the labouring class. Perhaps "a little house," simpliciter, is the best definition.

Cottenham's Acts. This was the popular title of the statutes 10 & 11 Vict. c. 96 and 12 & 13 Vict. c. 74, which have been repealed and replaced by the Trustee Act, 1893.

Cotton Cloth Factories. The enactments dealing specially with such factories are now ss. 90-96 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901.

Cotton Marks. The registration of trade marks for cotton—"cotton marks"—is governed by the Trade Marks Act, 1905, s. 64 (as amended by the Trade Marks Act, 1914, s. 1). That section provides for the registration of such marks by "the keeper of cotton marks" in the Trade Marks Registry at Manchester; and s. 71 of the Act gives the Court of Chancery of the County Palatine of Lancaster co-ordinate jurisdiction with the High Court as regards actions relating to such marks.

Council. See CONSULTATIVE COUNCIL; CURIA REGIS; PENSION; SYNOD.

Council of Conciliation. By the statute 30 & 31 Vict. c. 105, power was given for the Crown to grant licences for the formation of councils of conciliation and arbitration, consisting of a certain number of masters and workmen in any trade or employment, having power to hear and determine all questions between masters and workmen which may be submitted to them by both parties, arising out of or with respect to the particular trade or manufacture, and incapable of being otherwise settled. They had power to apply to a justice to enforce the performance of their award. The members were elected by persons engaged in the trade.

The statute 30 & 31 Vict. c. 105 was repealed and replaced by the Conciliation Act, 1896, as to which see CONCILIATION.

Council of Judges. Under the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 75, an annual council of the judges of the Supreme Court is to be held for the purpose of considering the operation of the new practice, offices, etc., introduced by the Act, and of reporting to a Secretary of State as to any alterations which they consider should be made in the law for the administration of justice, and an extraordinary council may also be convened at any time by the Lord Chancellor. The Act is clear; and it would appear that the annual holding of the council is obligatory; but the only meetings of the council which have hitherto taken place were one held in November, 1880, to consider the advisability of abolishing the offices of the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas Division and the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer, and of consolidating the three common law divisions of the High Court, and another, held in June, 1892, to consider certain amendments of the Judicature Acts.

Council of the North. A Court instituted, under the royal prerogative, by Henry VIII., in 1537, to administer justice in Yorkshire and the four other northern counties. Under the presidency of Strafford, the Court showed great vigour, bordering (it is alleged) on harshness. It was abolished by the statute 16 Car. 1, s. 10, the same Act which abolished the Star Chamber.

Council of the West. A council (similar to the Council of the North) which Henry VIII. formed about 1540. It, however, was so unpopular in Devon, Cornwall, and other western counties that the Crown soon allowed it to fall into disuse. See 4 Inst. 246.

Council of Wales. The full title of this Court was the Court of the Council in the Marches of Wales (q.v.).

Council School. A school provided by the county councils and county borough councils which, under the Education Act, 1921, Part I., are the local education authorities. The term, like "provided school," is of popular origin.

Counsel is a general name for barristers, used especially in certain locutions. Thus, we speak of "instructing counsel," of "giving a brief to counsel," of "the plaintiff's counsel," and so on, meaning that the instructions or brief are given to a barrister: that the plaintiff in a certain case is represented by a barrister, etc.

As to "counsel's signature," see BRIEF.

Counsellor of State. Members of the Privy Council. See REGENCY.

Counsel to the Admiralty. See JUDGE ADVOCATE OF THE FLEET

Count. In criminal procedure, the statement of the indictment is divided into paragraphs called counts If the defendant is charged with several offences in any one count, the indictment is open to the objection of duplicity, or being double, but it may now be amended at any stage of the trial if this can be done without injustice (see AMENDMENT) If there be duplicity which is not amended, either the whole proceedings may be quashed by the court on motion, objection may be taken on demurrer, or there may be an appeal under the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907. It is to be noted that now, under s 4 of the Indictments Act, 1915, any number of offences, whether felonies or misdemeanours, may be charged in separate counts of the one indictment See ARREST OF JUDGMENT; DEMURRER

In civil procedure count originally meant the declaration in a real action In a personal action, if the plaintiff included several causes of action in the same declaration, each section of the declaration (q.v) was called a count It was usual to put at the end of a declaration a number of claims analogous to that arising out of the real cause of action (e g. in an action of debt the declaration concluded with claims for money paid by the plaintiff for the defendant at his request, for money received by the defendant for the use of the plaintiff, and for money found due from the defendant to the plaintiff on an account stated), and these were called common, or money, counts Count, says Lord Coke, "cometh of the French word conte, which in Latyne is narratio."

Counterclaim. If the defendant in an action has a claim against the plaintiff, which he might have asserted by bringing a separate action against the plaintiff, he may raise it in the existing action by adding to his statement of defence a statement of the facts on which he bases his claim, and of the relief which he claims against the plaintiff (Ord 19, r. 3) This is called a counterclaim, and (Ord 21, r. 10) it must be specifically stated to be made as such. If the defendant has a claim connected with the subject of the action against the plaintiff and another person (e g. a co-defendant or a stranger), he may set it up by counterclaim, in the latter case, the statement of defence has, in addition to the original title of the action, a new title setting forth the names of the persons against whom the counterclaim is set up (Ord. 21, r. 11); if any one of them is not a party to the action, he is served with a copy of the defence, indorsed with a notice to appear (Ord. 21, r. 12), and is thenceforth in the same position as if he had been sued in an independent action by the defendant (Ord. 21, r. 13), except that his statement in answer to the counterclaim is called a reply (see Ord 21, r. 14) and not a defence. The plaintiff may himself counterclaim in certain cases against a counterclaim.

If the counterclaim is of such a nature that it cannot be conveniently disposed of in the pending action, or is otherwise objectionable, it may be struck out, the defendant being left to bring a cross-action (Ord. 19, r. 3; Ord 21, r. 15).

The Court gives judgment both on the original claim and on the counterclaim, and if the balance is in favour of the defendant, judgment is given for the defendant for such balance or for such other relief as the defendant may be entitled to, as if he were plaintiff in an action against the original plaintiff in the pending action (Ord. 21, r. 17).

As to counterclaims in County Court actions, see County Court Rules, Ord 10, rr 2, 10-21 See SET-OFF.

Counterfeit coin is coin not genuine, but resembling or apparently intended to resemble or pass for genuine coin, and includes genuine coin prepared or altered so as to resemble or pass for coin of a higher denomination Making or importing counterfeit coin, whether to pass for coin current in any part of His Majesty's dominions, or to pass for gold or silver foreign coin, is felony (Coinage Offences Act, 1861, ss. 2, 7); exporting any such counterfeit coin (ib , s. 8), or making counterfeit foreign copper coin is a misdemeanour (ib., s. 14) See UTTER.

Countermand. To countermand is to recall or revoke: thus to countermand an authority is to revoke it. (See REVOCATION) Notice of trial in an action in the High Court may be countermanded by consent of the parties, or by leave of the Court or a judge (Ord. 36, r 19)

Counter-marque (or Mark). Letters of counter-mark were formerly issued by one nation as a refusal for the issue of letters of marque (q.v.) by another nation.

Counterpart. See LEASE; INDENTURE.

Counterplea. When the tenant in any real action (q v.) vouched anyone to warrant his title, there was said to be a counterplea. The expression was also used in other long obsolete legal proceedings.

Counter Roll. This was a roll or record kept by one official as a check on the acts of another official. Thus the Statute of Westminster I., c. 10, provided that the sheriffs should have counter rolls with the coroner of appeals, inquests, attachments and other matters dealt with by the coroners, as a means of ensuring that the coroners should be "honest, lawful and wise." The counter roll was known as the contra rotulus and the officer who kept it was called the contra-rotulator or controller.

Countess. See EARL.

Counting-house of the King's Household. Another name for the Board of Green Cloth (q.v.).

Countors (Contors). An ancient name for serjeants-at-law, applied to them because they dealt with counts (q.v.)

Country is used in certain antiquated expressions to signify (1) a jury, as in the expressions "trial by the country," and "conclusion to the country," which was the mode by which a plaintiff or defendant in pleading offered his case for trial by jury, (2) any place other than a Court, as in the expressions "maintenance in the country" (see MAINTENANCE), and a "deed in the country," as opposed to an alienation by record, that is, in Court. See IN PAIS, GO TO THE COUNTRY.

County or shire is a civil division of England and Wales, of which there have for the last four hundred years been forty in England and twelve in Wales.

Ordinary counties are sometimes called "counties at large," to distinguish them from "counties corporate" or "counties of cities or towns," which are certain cities and towns, some with more, some with less, territory annexed to them, and having, by virtue of various royal charters, the privilege to be counties of themselves and not to be comprised in any other county. (See COUNTY BOROUGHS.) Such are London, York, Bristol, and many others.

Yorkshire is divided into three divisions known as "ridings"; Lincolnshire is divided into three divisions known as "parts", both Suffolk and Essex have an "eastern division" and a "western division", and each of these ridings, parts and divisions has been since 1888 an "administrative county" for the purposes of local government (q.v.). So also is the county of London (created by the Local Government Act, 1888, s. 40 (1)), the Isle of Wight, the part of Northamptonshire known as the Soke of Peterborough, the part of Cambridgeshire known as the Isle of Ely, each of the shires other than Yorkshire, Lincolnshire, Suffolk and Essex, the part of Northamptonshire which is not included in the Soke of Peterborough and the part of Cambridgeshire which is not included in the Isle of Ely. There are thus sixty-two administrative counties. County boroughs (q.v.), of which there are about eighty, are also administrative counties. See also COUNTY PALATINE.

County Associations. These are associations in which the administration of the Territorial Army is vested as regards all matters other than training, embodiment or actual military service. As to their constitution and duties, see Part I. (comprising ss. 1-5) of the Territorial and Reserve Forces Act, 1907. See LORD LIEUTENANT.

County Borough. As from 1st June, 1888, every borough which either was a county of itself or had a population of not less than 50,000 was made a "county borough," and an administrative county for local government purposes, by s. 31 of the Local Government Act, 1888. The original county boroughs are the sixty-one specified in Sch. 3 to that Act. Any other borough having a population of not less than 50,000 may be made a county borough by order made by the Ministry of Health and confirmed by Parliament (s. 54), and under this power the number of county boroughs has been largely increased.

A county borough is practically exempt from the jurisdiction of the county council of the county in which it is situated. The mayor, aldermen and burgesses, acting by the council, have and are subject to all the powers, duties and liabilities of a county council (s. 31 (1)).

County Bridge. A bridge, situate in a highway, which is to be repaired and maintained by the council of a county, as distinguished from bridges to be repaired and maintained by other bodies or by some private person.

County Council. The Local Government Act, 1888, created for each of the sixty-two administrative counties (see COUNTY) an elective body, known as the county council, to take over the administrative business which up to then had been transacted by the justices in quarter sessions, except only the control of the police, which is now vested in a joint committee (q.v.) of the county council and of the county justices. Since 1888 the administration of a very large number of new Acts has been entrusted to the county council, whose powers are now much larger than those of the old quarter sessions. The county council consists of the chairman, aldermen and councillors. The councillors are elected for each of the electoral divisions—corresponding to wards in a borough—into which the county is divided pursuant to s. 51 of the Act They are all elected at the one time for a period of three years The councillors at their first meeting elect aldermen for a period of six years, half of the aldermen being elected every third year One-fourth of the total number of the council are aldermen The councillors and the aldermen elect the chairman, who holds office for one year. The aldermen are elected from amongst the councillors or those qualified to be councillors, and the chairman is elected from amongst the aldermen or councillors or the persons qualified to be aldermen or councillors The qualification is similar to that of a councillor in a borough (q.v.), except that peers or peeresses owning property in the county are qualified and that ministers of religion are not disqualified If a councillor is elected alderman his seat as councillor is vacated

County Court Judges. The number is not to exceed sixty, no person can be appointed other than a barrister of not less than seven years' standing, the appointment is made by the Lord Chancellor except it be for a district wholly within the Duchy of Lancaster, in which case the Chancellor of that Duchy appoints (County Courts Act, 1888, s 8); and a judge may be removed from office by the Lord Chancellor or the Chancellor of the Duchy (as the case may be) for inability or misbehaviour (ib , s. 15) The salary is £1,500 a year (ib , s 23) The Lord Chancellor, before appointing, must satisfy himself as to the health of the person whom he proposes to appoint (County Court Judges (Retirement, Pensions and Deputies) Act, 1919, s 2 (4)) A judge must now retire at seventy-two, unless the Lord Chancellor permits him to stay on up to an age not exceeding seventy-five (ib , s 1). Pensions are now regulated by s 2 and the schedule of the Act of 1919 In the event of the inability of unavoidable absence of a judge, a barrister, qualified for appointment as a judge, may be appointed as deputy under s 18 of the Act of 1888; and the remuneration of the deputy is provided for by s 21 of that Act and s 4 of the Act of 1919 See HONOUR

County Courts. The modern or statutory County Courts are local and inferior courts of record established throughout England by various Acts of Parliament (commencing with the repealed statute 9 & 10 Vict c 95) for the purpose of providing a cheap and summary mode of procedure in civil cases involving comparatively small amounts For this purpose the country is divided into districts, in each of which is held a County Court, presided over by a judge, who is assisted by a registrar and high bailiff (q v.). The ordinary process of the Court is by plaint and summons (q.v see County Court Rules, Ord. 5), but in some cases proceedings by petition, similar to those in use in the Chancery Division of the High Court and the Bankruptcy Court, are applicable (ib., Ord. 38).

The original jurisdiction may be said generally to extend to claims of debt or for damages (except for libel, slander, seduction or breach of promise) not exceeding £100 (County Courts Act, 1888, s 56; County Courts Act, 1903, s 3), to claims for the recovery of land the yearly value of which does not exceed £100 (Act of 1888, s 59; Act of 1903, s 3), and to claims for the administration of estates, execution of trusts, foreclosure and redemption of mortgages, specific performance, proceedings under the Trustee Acts and Trustee Relief Acts, and matters relating to the maintenance or advancement of infants, to the dissolution of partnerships, and to relief against fraud or mistake where the value of the estate, mortgage, property, etc , does not exceed £500 (Act of 1888, s 67); also to contentious business in probate and administration matters where the gross personal estate of the deceased is under £200 and the gross real estate is under £300 (Court of Probate Act, 1858, s 10).

With the consent of both parties any action assigned to the King's Bench Division can be tried in the County Court (Act of 1888, s 64)

In bankruptcy, County Courts have such jurisdiction as is mentioned under BANKRUPTCY COURTS.

By the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868, provision is made for assigning to convenient (s 2) County Courts jurisdiction in Admiralty matters, namely, claims for salvage, where the property salved does not exceed £1,000 or the claim £300, and for towage, necessaries, wages, collision, etc , where the claim does exceed £300 (s 3), but there is, with the consent of the parties, jurisdiction to any amount (ib)

Under dozens of special Acts (the Agricultural Holdings Acts, e g) the County Court has jurisdictions other than those above mentioned

The High Court has concurrent jurisdiction with the County Courts in matters within their ordinary jurisdiction, but in many cases where the County Courts have jurisdiction a plaintiff who brings an action in the Superior Courts, though he is successful, runs the risk of losing his costs (see COSTS), and such actions may be remitted to the County Court on the application of the defendant (see REMITTED ACTIONS). By the County Courts Act, 1888, s 7, provision is made for the exclusion of courts of local jurisdiction in cases in which the County Court has concurrent jurisdiction it is done as regards any particular court by Order in Council made upon petition

An appeal lies from the judgment of a County Court to a Divisional Court of the High Court of Justice (R S C., Ord. 59, r 1) except in workmen's compensation cases, in them it lies to the Court of Appeal (Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, Sch. II. (4)).

As to the power of the County Courts to commit for non payment of judgment debts, see County Court Rules, Ord 25, rr 25, 56, and as to contempt of Court, see CONTEMNOR

The old County Court (or shiremote) was presided over by the earl of the county, or in his absence by the sheriff, the "suitors" (that is to say, the freemen or landholders who were bound to attend the Court), were the judges The County Courts were the principal civil Courts until the system of assizes (q v) was introduced, after which they fell into such disuse, that almost the only business transacted in them was the proclaiming of outlawries (which is obsolete) and the election of sheriffs (which is now in other hands) They were not courts of record See SHERIFF

See COURTS OF REQUESTS, CITY OF LONDON COURT, COURT

County Districts. This includes every urban or rural district (q v) whether a borough or not (Local Government Act, 1894, s 21 (3)) The whole of each parish must be within the same county district unless the county council for special reasons otherwise directs (s 36 (1) (c) (ii)) The county council may, under s 57 of the Local Government Act, 1888, alter the boundaries of existing county districts and create new county districts See DISTRICT COUNCIL

County of London Sessions. See MIDDLESEX

County palatine is a county the owner of which formerly had jura regalia (q v) or royal franchises and rights of jurisdiction similar to those possessed by the Crown in the rest of the kingdom, thus he had the power of pardoning crimes and appointing judges and officers within his county Three counties palatine—Chester, Durham, and Lancaster—still exist, but they have long been united to the Crown, and assimilated in all important respects to the rest of the kingdom, though the county of Durham still has a separate Chancery Court (see the Palatine Court of Durham Act, 1889), and the Duchy of Lancaster still has some local Courts, as to which see DUCHY OF LANCASTER, also CHANCELLOR, CHANCERY, PALATINE COURTS, ELY, HEXHAM; PEMBROKE

County Rates. These are rates levied, formerly by justices at quarter sessions, but since 1888 by the county council, under the authority of the County Rates Acts, 1852 and 1856, in order to provide, along with income received from other sources, an income sufficient to meet the expenses of the county. The rate is levied according to either the poor law valuation or a valuation made by the assessment committee (q v.) of the county council All appeals against either a valuation or a rate are heard in quarter sessions

Court has the following meanings -(1) A place where justice is judicially administered, (2) the judge or judges who sit in a Court, and (3) an aggregate of separate Courts or judges, as when we speak of the Supreme Court of Judicature (q v), which never sits as a Court, being merely a name for the Court of Appeal and High Court of Justice

Courts are of two principal classes--of record and not of record A Court of record is one whereof the acts and judicial proceedings are enrolled for a perpetual memory and testimony, and which has authority to fine and imprison for contempt of its authority. Such were the superior Courts of common law before their abolition, and such are the modern High Court of Justice and Court of Appeal, and the County Courts, many of the ancient inferior Courts (infra) are also Courts of record

Courts are also divided into superior and inferior, superior Courts being those which are not subject to the control of any other Courts, except by way of appeal such are the Court of Appeal and the High Court of Justice The palatine common law Courts of Lancaster and Durham were also superior Courts, because the counts palatine had jura regalia within their counties and their Courts were therefore not subject to the control of other Courts

The inferior Courts include the County Courts, the Mayor's and City of London Court, the Ecclesiastical Courts, Borough Courts, Courts Baron, Courts Leet, and other local Courts. When an inferior Court refuses to exercise its jurisdiction it may be compelled to do so by mandamus, and if it exceeds its jurisdiction it may be restrained by prohibition See MANDAMUS, PROHIBITON.

A third class of Courts may be said to consist of the Courts which really are supreme, inasmuch as they are not subject to appeal to any other Courts, and whose decisions are therefore final These are the House of Lords and the Privy Council; the so-called Supreme Court of Judicature (supra) is not a supreme Court in this sense, being subject to the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords.

Lastly, Courts are divided into civil, criminal, and ecclesiastical. Those hitherto mentioned belong to the first class The criminal Courts include the High Court of Justice (in which is now vested the criminal jurisdiction of the Court of King's Bench and of the Courts of Assize under commissions of "oyer and terminer" and "gaol delivery," q.v.) the Central Criminal Court and the Courts of magistrates and justices of the peace. See the various titles

As to the Ecclesiastical Courts, see that title

See COURT OF SUMMARY JURISDICTION, INFERIOR COURT

Court Baron is a civil Court held in a manor, and is of two kinds:

A Court Baron, in the original sense of the word, is a Court in which the free tenants or freeholders of the manor are the judges, and the steward of the manor is the registrar. In it all suits concerning lands held of the manor might be, and in early times not unfrequently were, determined, but the jurisdiction to entertain any action has been practically abolished (see COUNTY COURT), and now such Courts are rarely held, except in those manors where the freeholders have a set of customs relating to fines, heriots, regulation of commons and the like.

A Customary Court Baron is one which, said Lord Coke, "doth concerne copiholders, and therein the lord or his steward is the judge" It is more properly described simply as a Customary Court The province of such a Court seems to be to deal with all matters concerning the rights of the copyholders between themselves (as where their consent is to be given to an enclosure of part of the waste), but more especially to register alienations of the copyhold land, all of which were originally transacted in the Customary Court and entered on the court rolls, whence the tenants are called tenants by copy of court roll At the present day, a Customary Court may be held without the presence of any copyholder, unless the business to be transacted requires the consent of the homage (q.v.) (Copyhold Act, 1894, ss 82, 83). The Customary Court is now almost obsolete

Like the Court Leet (q.v), the Court Baron is expressly kept alive by the Sheriffs Act, 1887, s. 40.

See HOMAGE; PRESENTMENT; ROLL; MANOR, HUNDRED COURT

It has been said that in the term Court Baron, "baron" means merely a freeman who holds land; but this seems inconsistent with the old names given to the Court, viz , court de baroun, curia baronis E. C militis manerii sui predicti, where "baron" clearly means the lord of the manor

Court Christian is the old name for an Ecclesiastical Court

Court for Crown Cases Reserved was the Court created by the Crown Cases Act, 1848, for the decision of questions of law arising on the trial of a person convicted of treason, felony of misdemeanour (e g , at the Central Criminal Court, the assizes or quarter sessions), and reserved by the judge or justices at the trial for the consideration of the Court For this purpose, the judge or justices stated and signed a case setting forth the question and the facts out of which it arose The jurisdiction before the enactment of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, was exercised by the judges of the High Court of Justice, or five of them at the least, their decision being final (Judicature Act, 1873, ss 47, 100) The jurisdiction was transferred to the Court of Criminal Appeal by the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, s. 20 (4). See CRIMINAL APPEAL

Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes was established by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, which transferred to it all jurisdiction then exercisable by any Ecclesiastical Court in England in matters matrimonial, and also gave it new powers. The Court consisted of the Lord Chancellor, the three chiefs and three senior puisne judges of the common law Courts, and the Judge Ordinary, who together constituted the "full Court." The Judge Ordinary heard almost all matters in the first instance By the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 3, the jurisdiction of the Court was transferred to the Supreme Court of Judicature; but the main effect of the transfer seems to be to have changed the name of the Court to that of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice, and the name of the Judge Ordinary to that of the President of the Division, for the practice of the Court remains much as before.

See PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Court Lands. The part of a manor kept by the lord for the use of his household. It corresponded to the modern home-farm.

Court Leet. The lords of a great number of manors have the privilege of holding a Court Leet, a criminal Court, which was held for the purpose of presenting small offences in the nature of a common nuisance, which required immediate attention and redress. It is a Court of record, the steward of the manor is the judge and the jury is formed from the inhabitants Originally it was a Court of criminal jurisdiction over the tenants and resiants (or persons resident within the manor) in all matters in which the sheriff's tourn had jurisdiction; it also had the "view of frank pledge" (see FRANK PLEDGE); but its whole jurisdiction has fallen into complete disuse in consequence of the enactment of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts It punished offenders not merely with amerciaments (q.v.), or fines, but also by means of the stocks, pillory and cucking-stool (q.v.) But, obsolete as it is, the Court Leet has been expressly kept alive, if only in a state of suspended animation, by the Sheriffs Act, 1887, s 40 The civil Court of the manor was the Court Baron (q v.). See COMMORANT; MANOR, PRESENTMENT; SHERIFF.

Court Martial is a Court convened by or under the authority of the Crown to try an offence against military or naval discipline, or against the ordinary law, committed by a soldier or sailor in his Majesty's service Courts martial proceed and pass sentence according to the Acts regulating the discipline of the Army and Navy respectively

Court of Admiralty. See ADMIRAL; ADMIRALTY ACTION, ADMIRALTY DIVISION

Court of Ancient Demesne, as its name implies, is a Court in which the freeholders of land in ancient demesne are the judges, in much the same way as the freeholders of an ordinary manor are the judges in a Court Baron (q v.) The two Courts closely resemble one another. See ANCIENT DEMESNE; MANOR

Court of Appeal. See SUPREME COURT

Court of Appeal in Chancery consisted of the Lord Chancellor and two Lords Justices of Appeal. When they all sat together they constituted the full Court; but generally the Lords Justices sat together as one Court and the Lord Chancellor alone as another Court The Court heard appeals from the Master of the Rolls and the Vice-Chancellors (q v) and from the London Bankruptcy Court, and also had jurisdiction in lunacy; and from its decisions in most cases an appeal lay to the House of Lords. The jurisdiction of the Court is now transferred to the Court of Appeal.

Court of Arches. An ecclesiastical Court, so called because originally held in the Church of St Mary-le-Bow (Sancta Maria de Arcubus). It exercised jurisdiction in, amongst other things, testamentary matters; but this jurisdiction was transferred by the Court of Probate Act, 1857, to the Court of Probate (now represented by the Probate Division). It was subsequently held in the hall belonging to the College of Civilians, commonly called Doctor's Commons, but in more recent times the office of the Court of Arches became annexed to, and was commonly discharged by, the judge of the Court of Admiralty, in his Court at Westminster and now under the Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874 (q v.), s 7 a special judge has been appointed for this portion of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction, which is exercised at the Church House, Westminster The Court as reconstituted is under the control of the King's Bench Division in case it exceeds its jurisdiction, or proceeds to affect the liberty or property of the subject otherwise than in accordance with law

Formerly proctors (q v) had the exclusive right to practise in the Court and advocates (q v) had the exclusive right of audience But now the Solicitors Act, 1877, s 17, gives solicitors a right co-ordinate with that of proctors, and barristers have now the same right of audience as that formerly possessed by advocates, who are now extinct

The Court of Arches is the Court of Appeal of the Archbishop of Canterbury, the judge thereof hears all appeals from bishops or their chancellors, or commissaries, deans and chapters, and archdeacons, and from his decision an appeal lies to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council except in cases under the Clergy Discipline Act, 1892 That Act, by s. 4, gives an appeal, at the option of the appellant, to either a Consistory Court or the Privy Council, and if the appeal is to a Consistory Court the decision of that Court on the appeal is final. The Court of Arches has also an original (or peculiar) jurisdiction over the thirteen peculiar parishes in London which belong to the Archbishop of Canterbury; but, upon receiving letters of request from any bishop, the Archbishop may assume original jurisdiction in any ecclesiastical matter arising elsewhere The peculiar jurisdiction has been much diminished by statute. See ARCHES, DEAN OF; COURT OF PECULIARS

Court of Chivalry, or Court Military, was a Court not of record, held before the Lord High

Constable and Earl Marshal of England, and the Court was also known as the Court of the Constable and Marshal To it was attached a prison, called the White Lyon, in Southwark (2 Nels Abr 935) It had jurisdiction, both civil and criminal, in deeds of arms and war, armorial bearings, questions of precedence, etc , and as a Court of honour It has long been disused See EARL MARSHAL; CONSTABLE, LORD HIGH, PRIVILEGES, COMMITTEE OF

Court of Claims. The title of the commission to enquire into all claims to perform services at the coronation of each sovereign The first Court of Claims was that appointed in connection with the coronation of Richard II The Court was originally held by the Lord High Steward But Henry IV was Lord High Steward when he became king; so that thereupon the office merged in the Crown From then until the accession of Henry VIII. the Court was held before commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Steward Henry VIII appointed commissioners, without reference to the Lord High Steward, to hold the Court, and this has ever since been done

Court of Honour of the Earl Marshal of England. A designation of the Court of Chivalry after the Earl Marshal (q.v) had become the sole judge

Court of Hustings is a Court in the City of London which existed before the Conquest, and is the oldest Court in the City. It originally had jurisdiction in all actions to any amount Subsequently, apparently in the thirteenth century, much of its jurisdiction was assigned to the Sheriff's Court and more to the Mayor's Court, only real and mixed actions and the action of replevin being left to the Court of Hustings and, later still, the Court was divided into the Court of Hustings for Pleas of Land, which once at least during the present century has sat to enrol a deed, and the Court of Hustings of Common Pleas, which has long been disused. The Lord Mayor, or an alderman who has "passed the chair"—that is to say, who has been Lord Mayor—and the sheriffs are theoretically the judges of the Court, but, when and if it sits, the recorder is in practice the judge See COMMON PLEADER

In Lyme Regis also there is a Court of Hustings which sits under the authority of a charter of Edward I. Procedure is similar to that of the superior Courts a hundred years ago. It has jurisdiction in debt (q v) and assumpsit (q v) to any amount It is still to some extent availed of but chiefly in cases in which there is no defence

Anciently there were also Courts of Hustings at Great Yarmouth, Lincoln, Norwich, Oxford, Winchester and York. See HUSTING

Court of Passage is an inferior Court of record, possessing a very ancient jurisdiction over causes of action arising within the borough of Liverpool Up to 1835 it was also called the Borough Court of Liverpool. It was formerly held before the mayor and bailiffs of the borough; but the Court of Passage Act, 1834 (4 & 5 Will 4, c xen), s 2, provided that the Court should not sit without a legal assessor, while s 8 provided that the attendance of the mayor and bailiffs was unnecessary; and now, under the Liverpool Court of Passage Act, 1893, c 37, s 6, the assessor is the presiding judge, and (s 8) has the powers of a judge of the High Court sitting at Nisi Prius or in chambers He must be a barrister of not less than seven years' standing (Court of Passage Act, 1834, s. 2; Liverpool Court of Passage Act, 1893, s 6).

The Court has jurisdiction in personal actions to any amount where any defendant resides or carries on business within the jurisdiction or, by leave of the Court, when any part of the cause of action arose therein, but no action under £20 can be commenced in the Court if the County Court has jurisdiction (Liverpool Court of Passage Act, 1893, s 2) The High Court has power to order certain actions of contract to be tried in the Passage Court (ib , s 3), and may in certain cases remit to it actions of tort (ib , s 4) The Court has jurisdiction in Admiralty similar to and co-extensive with that of the County Court of Lancaster at Liverpool (County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868, s 25).

This Court is a remarkable instance of the adaptation to the needs of a great modern city of a Court with an antiquated procedure which in remote times had served the needs of a village such as Liverpool was

Court of Peculiars, according to Blackstone, is a branch of and annexed to the Court of Arches (q v), and has jurisdiction over all those parishes dispersed through the province of Canterbury in the midst of other dioceses, which are exempt from the ordinary's jurisdiction, and subject to the metropolitan only.

It seems, however, to have been practically abolished by the Church Discipline Act, 1840, and the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction Act, 1847 See ARCHES, DEAN OF

Court of Pie Poudre (or of Piepowders). This is commonly said to be the Court of the Dusty Feet, but an alternative derivation makes it to be the Court of the Pedlars. It was a court which anciently decided summarily and on the spot disputes which arose in fairs and markets. Such courts are obsolete except in the single instance of the Bristol Court of Pie Poudre, which is still held before the recorder of that city

Court of Pleas at Durham was a Court of the County Palatine of Durham, having a local common law jurisdiction It was abolished by the Judicature Act, 1873, s 16, which transferred its jurisdiction to the High Court See COUNTY PALATINE, PALATINE COURTS

Court of Policies of Insurance. See POLICIES, etc

Court of Probate. The Court of Probate Act, 1857, provided that the voluntary and contentious jurisdiction and authority of all ecclesiastical, peculiar, manorial and other courts and persons in England having jurisdiction or authority to grant probate of wills or letters of administration should cease, and that such jurisdiction and authority should thenceforth be exercised in the name of Her Majesty in a court to be called the Court of Probate, consisting of a judge and a number of registrars. Under the provisions of the Judicature Act, 1873, ss 3, 16, the jurisdiction of the Court was transferred to the Supreme Court of Judicature, the principal effect of the transfer being to change the name of the Court to that of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice (q v), and to alter the practice in contentious business See CAVEAT, CITATION, PLEADING, PROBATE, PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION; WARNING

Court of Requests. See COURTS OF REQUEST

Court of Review was part of the old Court of Bankruptcy under the statutes 1 & 2 Will 4, c 56, and 5 & 6 Vict. c 122, and exercised a kind of supervision or appellate jurisdiction over the Commissioners in Bankruptcy (q.v) It was abolished in the year 1847

Court of Summary Jurisdiction. This means "any justice or justices of the peace, or other magistrates by whatever name called, to whom jurisdiction is given by, or who is authorised to act under, the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, whether in England, Wales or Ireland and whether acting under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, or any of them, or under any other Act, or by virtue of his commission or under the common law" (Interpretation Act, 1889, s 13 (11)) From this definition it necessarily follows that justices are a court of summary jurisdiction only when the procedure is governed by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts Thus justices holding the preliminary inquiry into an indictable offence are not a court of summary jurisdiction Compare PETTY SESSIONAL COURT

Court of the Clerk of the Markets. See CLERK OF THE MARKETS.

Court of the Constable and Marshal. The COURT OF CHIVALRY (q v)

Court of the Council of the Marches of Wales. Henry VII established a council at Ludlow to control the lords marchers (q v); and the statute 34 & 35 Hen 8, c 26, gave formal sanction to its existence and authority. In addition to exercising functions which were analogous to those of the Star Chamber (q v), it was in some cases a Court of Appeal from the Court of Great Sessions (q v) In 1569 Cheshire and Flintshire were exempted from its jurisdiction and in the reign of James I the judges resolved that it ought not to have jurisdiction in Shropshire, Herefordshire, Gloucestershire and Worcestershire. The statute 16 Car 1, c 10, s. 2 abolished the extrajudicial functions of the Court without touching its judicial functions The latter remained in abeyance until 1660 They were then revived and they continued to be exercised until the Court was finally abolished by the statute 1 Will. & M. c 27.

Court of the Duchy Chamber of Lancaster is a Court which may be held before the Chancellor of the Duchy or his deputy, and which has jurisdiction in all matters of equity relating to lands held of the Crown in right of the Duchy of Lancaster, these are said to include a large district of land within the city of Westminster The Court has never been abolished, but it has not sat within recent years The jurisdiction is not exclusive

Court of the Lord Steward of the King's Household. This was an ancient Court which at first existed for the purpose only of punishing felonies or other offences committed by the king's servants against any member of the King's Council The statute 33 Hen 8, c 12, s 3, enacted that all "treasons, murders, manslaughters and bloodshed" within any palaces or residences of the king should be tried before this Court; but, in order to prevent the Court being vexatiously set in motion for mere trivial matters, s. 6 provided that the Act should not extend to any nobleman or to any other person or persons who should strike his or their servants with "his or their hands or fists or with any small staff or stick for correction and punishment for any offence" so as to cause bloodshed, unless the servant who was struck died of the blow within a year and a day.

Section 3 of this Act was repealed by the statute 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s 1, and the jurisdiction of the Court was therefore taken away This Court is to be distinguished from the Court of the Lord High Steward (q.v), and also from the Court of the Marshalsea held before the Steward and the Marshal of the King's Household. See LORD STEWARD OF THE KING'S HOUSEHOLD; TOLZEY COURT.

Court of the Marches of Wales. See MARCHES.

Court of the Marshalsea. This Court existed by prescription from very early times Officially it was known as Placita coronæ aulæ hospitii domini Regis coram Seneschallo et Marschallo, it being held before the Seneschal, or Steward, and the Marshal of the King's Household. It was not in any way connected with the well-known prison of the Marshalsea (q v). It had jurisdiction only in cases in which one at least of the parties was a member of the household. Attempts on the part of the Court to intermeddle with matters outside its jurisdiction were checked by the statute 18 Edw 3, c. 27 It had jurisdiction within a radius of twelve miles of the residence for the time being of the king, and was a migratory Court. Ultimately, under Charles I., the Court came to sit permanently at Westminster along with the Palace Court (q.v.). The Court of the Marshalsea for long had merely a nominal existence, though the Palace Court was in full work; but both Courts were abolished by the statute 12 & 13 Vict c 101, s. 13 See STATUTO FACTO POUR SENESCHAL, etc.

Court of Wards and Liveries. This Court was established in 1541 by the statute 32 Hen. 8, c 46, for the purpose of providing the king with an effectual means of asserting his rights with regard to the incidents of tenure by knight service, wardships, liveries, relief and primer seisin, knighthoods, licences on alienation, and the value of marriages, etc and as the king was then the immediate lord of a large part of the kingdom, the exactions of his rights through this Court made it most unpopular. Through this Court the Crown also exercised its control over the persons and property of lunatics. The Court purported to be abolished by a resolution of the Long Parliament in 1645 and by an Act passed during the Protectorate in 1656; and it was formally abolished in 1660 by the statute 12 Car. 2, c. 24, which put an end to the feudal system. See KING'S WIDOW; MASTER OF THE WARDS.

Courts of Audience. These are ecclesiastical Courts, in which the two Primates once exercised in person a considerable part of their jurisdiction. They seem to be now obsolete, or at least to be used only on the rare occasion of the trial of a bishop.

Courts of Conscience. These were Courts for the recovery of small debts held by members of various corporations who, without the intervention of professional advocates, decided such cases as came before them They are all now superseded by other tribunals.

The Court of Conscience—otherwise known as the Court of Requests—of the City of London was perhaps the most important Under an Act—that is to say, a resolution—of the Common Council passed in 1517, the Lord Mayor and aldermen every month assigned two aldermen and four common councilmen to act as commissioners for the decision of all matters of debt between citizens and freemen of the city which were brought before them The number of commoners in the Court was by a subsequent Act of the Common Council increased to twelve. But the Court had no legal sanction. "Divers attornies and solicitors (for their own particular gain)," according to Stryke, got their clients to proceed elsewhere than in the Court, to the ruin of small debtors Therefore the Court received statutory sanction under the Act 1 Jac. 1, c 14, and was subsequently regulated by numerous Acts of Parliament, and ultimately by the statute (Loc and Pers) 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. xciv, in which the previous enactments are recited. The Court seems to have been a useful one—Stryke, writing in 1720, says that a case might be determined in it at a total cost of one shilling and eightpence—but it was abolished in 1847 by the statute (Loc. and Pers.) 10 & 11 Vict c. lxxi, and its business was merged in that of the Sheriff's Court of the City of London, which, under the County Courts Act, 1867, became known as the City of London Court (q v.), and was by virtue of the County Courts Act, 1888, s. 185, assimilated to the ordinary County Courts. From 1847 the old procedure under which cheap and rough-and-ready justice was administered by laymen who had no qualifications except knowledge of business and, presumably, common sense, had ceased to exist, and thenceforward litigants appeared before a paid judge and could be represented by professional advocates

Courts of Request were inferior Courts having local jurisdiction in claims for small debts, established in various parts of the kingdom by special Acts of Parliament The Court of Requests of the City of London is dealt with under COURTS OF CONSCIENCE: the other Courts of Requests were abolished in 1846, and the modern County Courts (q.v.) took their place.

There was also a minor court of equity called the Court of Requests, presided over by the Lord Privy Seal and the Masters of the Requests (similar to the Masters in Chancery), which entertained suits by poor persons It was virtually abolished in Queen Elizabeth's reign by a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench

Courts of Sewers. The Commissioners of Sewers (q v) sitting for the discharge of their functions They are not declared by any statute to be a Court, but in their commission they are described as the King's "justices," and the King's Bench has decided that they are a Court of record

Courts of Survey are Courts for the hearing of appeals by owners or masters of ships from orders for the detention of unsafe ships made by the Board of Trade or a detaining officer (q.v), under the Merchant Shipping Acts, 1894 to 1916 (Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s 459), or from a declaration of survey of a passenger steamer (ib , s 275; Merchant Shipping Act, 1906, s 75), that is to say, from a declaration as to her fitness for service, or from the refusal by an emigration officer of a certificate of clearance for an emigrant vessel (Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s 318) A Court of Survey consists of a judge and of two assessors, one appointed by the Board of Trade, and the other summoned by the registrar out of a list of persons provided for the purpose The judge is usually either a wreck commissioner, a stipendiary or metropolitan police magistrate, a county court judge, or other fit person approved by the Home Secretary; but in certain cases the Board of Trade may appoint a wreck commissioner to be the judge (Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s 487 (1) (2) (3)).

Covenant is a promise under seal, that is to say, a promise, agreement or contract contained in a deed or instrument sealed and delivered by the promisor, who is called the covenantor, the promisee being called the covenantee In any deed executed after 31st December, 1881, a covenant binds the heirs of the covenantor even though they be not mentioned (Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, s 59) A covenant, being a contract, is in many respects subject to the same rules as other contracts, as to these, see CONTRACT, CONDITION, PROMISE

Covenants are either express or implied. By an implied covenant (or covenant in law) is generally meant one created by the law irrespectively of the intention of the parties: thus, apart from statute, in a lease for years the word "demise" creates a covenant by the lessor for quiet enjoyment by the lessee (i.e. that he shall occupy the land free from eviction and disturbance by the lessor), unless the lease includes an express covenant to the same effect, and thus also, under the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, s. 7, where anyone conveys and is expressed to convey "as beneficial owner," or "as settlor," or "as trustee," or "as mortgagee," or as personal representative of a deceased person, or under an order of the Court, or as committee of a lunatic so found by inquisition, the effect, except in a lease, of his so conveying is that the covenants for title appropriate to the particular conveyance are implied and are not set out in the conveyance, as was necessarily done before the Act In the case, for instance, of a conveyance (other than a mortgage) for valuable consideration, the covenants so implied by the use of the words "as beneficial owner" are (1) for right to convey, that is to say, good title to convey, the lands, (2) for quiet enjoyment, that is to say, that they shall be quietly enjoyed under the conveyance; (3) for freedom from incumbrance, that is to say, that the lands are not incumbered except as expressly stated in the conveyance, and (4) for further assurance (q v) There are also implied covenants in the more accurate sense of the term: thus, the reddendum (q v) of a lease is an implied covenant by the lessee for payment of the rent. See EXPRESS, IMPLIED; TACIT

Covenants were formerly divided into real and personal A real covenant was one by which a man bound himself to pass or convey lands, etc , to another, so that the land itself could be recovered: e.g. a covenant to levy a fine or a warranty (q v); a personal covenant, on the other hand, merely gave the right to recover damages for non-performance. Real covenants no longer exist (Real Property Limitation Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 36)) A personal covenant may deal with any subject, e.g. the payment of a sum of money, the execution of work and labour, etc., or it may relate to or be connected with land. Covenants connected with land are divided into those which are annexed to an estate in the land, and collateral covenants. A covenant annexed to an estate in land, or a "covenant running with the land," is one the benefit or burden of which passes to an assignee of the estate when the owner assigns it: thus, if a lessee of buildings covenants to repair them, and assigns the lease, the covenant binds the assignee. So we speak of covenants being annexed to, or running with, a reversion: thus, a covenant to pay rent runs with the reversion, that is, every assignee of the reversion can enforce the covenant against the tenant. (See PRIVITY.) Some covenants, including implied covenants, run with the land whether assigns are mentioned in them or not, while others only do so where assigns are expressly mentioned. Opposed to covenants running with the land are collateral covenants or covenants in gross, namely, to do something not concerning the land demised or conveyed, thus, as if the lessee covenants for him and his assigns to build a house upon the land of the lessor which is no parcel of the demise, it does not bind the assignee. A covenant, however, though it does not run with the land, may be binding in equity upon every person who takes an assignment with notice of it: such a covenant is sometimes called a "covenant running with the land in equity." Practically speaking, a restrictive covenant (one which in some way restricts the use of the land) is the only covenant which runs with the land in equity. See BENEFICIAL OWNER, SEISIN, COVENANT FOR, SEVERAL.

Covenant, Action of. This was the action which down to 1875 lay where a party claimed damages for breach of covenant, that is to say, of a promise under seal. It was a well-established form of action by the end of the twelfth century. See COVENANT, WRIT OF, ACTIONS.

Covenant to stand seised is a conveyance adapted to the case where a person seised of land in possession, reversion, or vested remainder, proposes to convey it to his wife, child or kinsman. In its terms it consists of a covenant by him, in consideration of his natural love and affection, to stand seised of the land to the use of the intended transferee. Before the Statute of Uses this would merely have raised a use in favour of the covenantee; but by that Act this use is converted into the legal estate, and the covenant therefore operates as a conveyance of the land to the covenantee. It is now obsolete. See CONVEYANCE; STATUTE OF USES, CONSIDERATION.

Covenant, Writ of. At common law this was a writ which lay for one claiming damages for breach of covenant. It was formally abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36, but long before then it had fallen into disuse, the remedy latterly being either by action of debt (q.v.) in case the damages were liquidated, or by action of covenant (q.v.) if they were not; and now, as will be seen from ACTIONS, both of these forms of action have themselves been abolished.

The writ sued out for the purpose of levying a fine (q.v.) was usually the writ of covenant, but at an early period other writs were used.

See CLERK OF THE KING'S SILVER.

Coventry Act. The popular title of the now repealed statute 22 & 23 Car. 2, c. 1, which was passed in consequence of Sir John Coventry, M.P. for Weymouth, being set upon by a band of ruffians who slit his nose in order to mark their disapproval of a speech made by him in the House. It provided that any such assault should be felony without benefit of clergy.

Covert; Coverture. A married woman, during the continuance of the marriage, is called in Norman French a feme covert, because she is under the protection of her husband. Coverture means—(1) the condition of a married woman, or the fact of her being married, and (2) the continuance of the marriage. (See MARRIAGE.) If she becomes, and while she remains, a widow, she is said to be discovert.

Covert-baron. A married woman. See Blackstone, Com. I., 442.

Covin, says Coke, "is a secret assent determined in the hearts of two or more to the defrauding and prejudice of another". as, says the Termes de la Ley, "if a tenant for term of life, or tenant in tail, will secretly conspire with another, that the other shall recover against the tenant for life the land which he holds, etc., in prejudice of him in the reversion, or if an executor or administrator permit judgments to be entered against him by fraud, and plead them to a bond, or [if] any fraudulent assignment or conveyance be made, the party grieved may plead covin and relieve himself".

Covin, therefore, seems to have merely a negative effect, that is, it avoids the transaction of which it forms part, but does not give rise to a liability, as does conspiracy or fraud The term, however, is not now in use, some one or other of the terms "deceit," "fraud," "collusion," "conspiracy to defraud," being the modern equivalent

Covinous. Savouring of covin (q v)

Cowper-Temple Clause. The popular title of s. 14 (2) of the Elementary Education Act, 1870, which enacted that "no religious catechism or religious formulary which is distinctive of any particular denomination shall be taught in the school," the school being a public elementary school The Education Act, 1902, s 25 (2), Sch 3, applied this enactment to the schools provided by the education authorities established by that Act see also s 4 See now the Education Act, 1921, s. 28 (1)

Cran. This is a Scotch measure for fresh herrings It, or the quarter-cran, may legally be used for fresh herrings in any area (including the adjoining sea) of England and Wales in which the Cran Measures Act, 1908, is in force under an order made pursuant to s 11 (1) thereof by the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries The cubic capacity of the cran is four times that of the quarter cran (s 1 (1)) The Cran Measures Regulation, 1908, Order, dated 24th October, 1908 (Stat R & O , 1908, p 353), made under s 8, provides that the quarter-cran, if made of wood, shall be an oblong box of the following dimensions: length inside, 31 inches, depth inside, 7 inches, breadth inside, 14¾ inches The Act has been put in force in many maritime areas

Cranworth's Act, Lord. The popular title of the statute 23 & 24 Vict. c 145, which was also known as the Trustees and Mortgagees Clauses Act

Cravent. In trial of battle a combatant who acknowledged himself beaten did so by crying "cravent." Hence the colloquial "cry craven.'

Creamer. This is stated by various authorities to have formerly meant a foreign merchant, more especially one who had a stall in a fair or market, or a pedlar or huckster.

Credit; Credibility; primarily signifies belief in a person's trustworthiness

Thus, in the law of evidence, the objections which were formerly sufficient to make a witness incompetent are now in general only available as affecting his credibility, or his worthiness to be believed Such are—the fact of his having an interest in the result of the proceeding, the fact of his having been convicted of felony, of his being under the age of fourteen years, etc Credibility is a question for the jury. See Competency, Discredit

When a person agrees to postpone the payment of money to which he would otherwise be entitled, he is said to give credit, thus, if A sells goods to B and the price is to be paid at a future time, this is a sale upon credit. See Creditor, Debt, Letter of Credit, Mutual Credits

Creditor is a person to whom a debt is owing by another person, called the debtor. The creditor is called a simple contract creditor, a specialty creditor, a bond creditor, or a judgment creditor, according to the nature of the obligation giving rise to the debt (see Contract, Debt), and if he has issued execution to enforce a judgment he is called an execution creditor He may also be a sole or a joint creditor See Joint.

In the law relating to the administration of the assets of bankrupts, companies in liquidation, and persons dying insolvent, creditors claiming to share in the assets are divided into secured and unsecured In bankruptcy a secured creditor is a person who holds a mortgage, charge or lien on the property of the bankrupt (Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (4 & 5 Geo 5, c 59), s 167), and includes judgment creditors who have levied execution by seizure of property belonging to the bankrupt, or have obtained and served garnishee orders

In bankruptcy, a secured creditor is, for the purpose of petitioning for adjudication (ib , s. 1 (2)), proving his debt (s 32, Sch 2, rr 10, 11, 12), receiving dividends (ib), and voting (s 13, Sch 1, rr 10, 11), deemed to be a creditor only in respect of the balance due to him after realising or deducting the value of his security, unless he gives up his security to the official receiver or trustee If he does not comply with these rules he is excluded from all share in the dividends (s 32, Sch. 2, r 17). In order to prevent persons from under-estimating the value of their securities, it is also provided that the trustee or official receiver shall have power to purchase the security of any creditor at the value which he has set on it (s. 13, Sch. 1, r. 12; s. 32, Sch. 2, r. 13). If the creditor has realised it at a price exceeding his valuation, the sum so realised becomes the amended valuation (s. 32, Sch. 2, r. 16).

Unsecured creditors in bankruptcy are divided into those who are entitled to preferential payment and those who are not. See DEBT.

The Judicature Act, 1875, s. 10, provides that the rules of the bankruptcy law for the time being as to the respective rights of secured and unsecured creditors shall prevail and be observed in the administration by the Court of the assets of any person dying insolvent after the commencement of the Act. The principal effect of this section is to compel a secured creditor to deduct the value of his security and prove for the balance of his debt. It also has the effect of depriving a creditor of the right to interest on his debt from the date of the judgment or order of administration (which is treated as equivalent to an adjudication in bankruptcy), unless (Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 33 (8)) there is a surplus after payment of the debts.

The Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, s. 207, applies the rules of the bankruptcy law for the time being, as to the respective rights of secured and unsecured creditors, to the winding-up of an insolvent company just as the Judicature Act, 1875, s. 10, applies them to the administration of an insolvent estate.

In the law of bankruptcy and winding-up a petitioning creditor is a creditor who presents a petition for adjudication or winding-up. In bankruptcy, his debt must amount to £50, or if several creditors join in the petition the aggregate of their debts must amount to that sum (s. 4 (1) (a)). In winding-up, his debt must exceed £50 (Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, ss. 129, 130, 137).

As to frauds on creditors, see FRAUD; FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES.

Cremation. To burn a dead body is not an offence unless it be done in such circumstances as to create a public nuisance or for the purpose of preventing the holding of an inquest. Cremation had been, however, almost unknown in England until 1883, but from that date crematoria began to be erected and cremation became not unusual. It is regulated by the Cremation Act, 1902, which, by s. 7, empowers the Secretary of State to make regulations as to cremation, and by s. 8 makes it an offence, punishable summarily, to cremate except in accordance with the Act and with such regulations.

To make any false declaration for the purpose of getting a body cremated is an offence punishable on indictment (s. 8 (2)); and so also is the cremation, or the attempted cremation, of a body for the purpose of concealing the commission of any offence (s. 8 (3)).

Crescente malitiâ crescere debet et pœna (2 Inst. 479). (Where malice increases punishment ought also to increase.) Where there is merely malice in law the offence may well be less grave than where there is malice in fact. Compare MULTIPLICATA TRANSGRESSIONE, ETC.

Crime; Criminal Law. The word "crime" has no technical meaning in the law of England, but it is generally used to include all acts amounting to treason, felony or misdemeanour (q.v.). Crimes are violations of public rights and duties due to the whole community, considered as a community, in its social aggregate capacity.

Criminal law is that part of the law which relates to crimes and their punishment.

Crimen Falsi. Falsification. A common law offence, which in the thirteenth century meant the unauthorised sealing of writs or charters with the king's seal. Subsequently it was extended to mean various other offences involving fraud, such as forgery, perjury or subornation of perjury, suppression of evidence, barratry, or conspiracy to accuse of crime.

Crimen læsæ majestatis omnia alia crimina excedit quoad pœnam (3 Inst. 210). (Treason is punished more severely than any other crime.) Coke quotes the maxim from Bracton, who used crimen læsæ majestatis as meaning treason. Compare REUS LÆSÆ.

Criminal Appeal. The Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, created the Court of Criminal Appeal. Under the Criminal Appeal (Amendment) Act, 1908, the Court consists of the Lord Chief Justice and all the puisne judges of the King's Bench Division. Three, or any higher odd number, form a quorum. The Act of 1907 is the statute under which an appeal on the facts, as distinguished from the law (see COURT FOR CROWN CASES RESERVED) and against the sentence, was for the first time given to a prisoner convicted on indictment. Any person so convicted may appeal (1) on any question of law; (2) with the leave of the Court of Criminal Appeal or of the judge who tried him, on any question either of fact or of mixed law and fact, or on any other reasonable ground; and (3) against the sentence. The Court may increase as well as mitigate the sentence (s. 4). The Act and the Criminal Appeal Rules, 1908, made pursuant to s. 18 of the Act, form a complete code. In a case involving any point of exceptional importance either the Director of Public Prosecutions (q.v.) or the prosecutor or the defendant may, if they can obtain the certificate of the Attorney-General, appeal to the House of Lords (s. 1 (6)), but except in any such case the decision of the Court of Criminal Appeal is final. See SOLICITOR; VERDICT.

Criminal Conversation. Down to the enactment of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, the common law action for criminal conversation (known as crim. con.) lay at the suit of a husband to recover damages against an adulterer. The action was in form abolished by s. 59 of the Act, but in substance it still exists. See ADULTERY; CO-RESPONDENT.

Criminal Lunatic. "A criminal lunatic means any of the following persons:—(a) any person for whose safe custody during His Majesty's pleasure, His Majesty or the Admiralty is authorised to give an order, and (b) any prisoner whom the Secretary of State or the Admiralty has, in pursuance of any Act of Parliament, directed to be removed to an asylum or other place for the reception of insane persons" (Criminal Lunatics Act, 1884, s. 16). See INSANITY.

Criminal Lunatic Asylum. An asylum appropriated by warrant under the Royal Sign Manual for the reception of criminal lunatics (Criminal Lunatic Asylums Act, 1860, s. 1). Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum is such an asylum.

Crimp. One who for profit decoys or entraps seamen for the merchant service. The trade sprang up in connection with the Royal Navy during the wars with Napoleon. As regards the Royal Navy, crimping has for long been unknown; and sailors in the merchant service are now protected from crimps by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, ss. 110, 111, 112, 213-219.

Croft. A small close or plot of ground adjoining a house and used either for pasture or arable by the occupant of the house. In some places it was called a ham. The use of the word is obsolete in England. See TOFT.

Crofter. This term, which is unknown to English law, means in Scotland a farmer holding from year to year in a "crofting parish" at a rent not exceeding £30 per annum.

Cross-action. When A. brings an action against B, and B, before final judgment is given in that action, brings another action against A in respect of a claim arising out of the same subject-matter, this second action is called a cross-action. Formerly it was not uncommon in Chancery practice for the defendant in a suit to bring a cross-bill against the original plaintiff, either for discovery or for some relief which he could not obtain in the original suit. The suits were then generally consolidated and one judgment given in the two. On the common law side also, before the Judicature Acts, a defendant who had a cross-claim against the plaintiff could make it only by instituting a cross-action. Now, however, the procedure by counter-claim (q.v.) has almost superseded cross-actions on both sides of the Court. As to cross-actions against foreign Governments, see STATE.

Cross-actions are still the ordinary practice in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division in respect of damage by collision of ships (see R. S. C. Ord. 19, r. 3). See COLLISION; LIMITATION OF LIABILITY.

Cross-bill. See CROSS-ACTION.

Cross-bow. This in the sixteenth century was regarded as an undesirable substitute for the long-bow. See the statute 2 & 3 Edw. 6, c. 14 which restricted the use of cross-bows. See also ARCHERY.

Cross-examination. See EXAMINATION.

Cross Remainder. See REMAINDER.

Crossed Cheque. See CHEQUE.

Cross's Acts. The popular title of the Artizans and Labourers' Dwelling Improvement Acts, 1875 and 1879, which were introduced by Sir Richard Cross, then Home Secretary, who afterwards was raised to the peerage as Viscount Cross.

Crown; Half-crown. See GOLD COINS; SILVER COINS.

Crown Agents for the Colonies. These are the financial and commercial agents in the United Kingdom of the colonies which do not possess representative government, and of the protectorates controlled by the Colonial Office. They are responsible to the governments of the colonies for which they act, but they are appointed by the Colonial Secretary, who also exercises a general control over their actions. They occupy a position somewhat analogous to that of, for instance, the Agents-General who represent the several Australian States; but such Agents-General are appointed by their own Governments and are not controlled by the Colonial Office as are the Crown Agents.

Crown Cases Reserved. See COURT FOR CROWN CASES RESERVED.

Crown Debts. See DEBTS.

Crown Lands. See DEMESNE.

Crown Office. See CROWN OFFICE IN THE KING'S BENCH.

Crown Office in Chancery was one of the offices of the High Court of Chancery now transferred to the High Court of Justice. The principal official is the Clerk of the Crown (q.v.).

Crown Office in the King's Bench was the office in which all the ministerial business of the Court of King's Bench originally and afterwards of the King's Bench Division in respect of its prerogative and criminal jurisdiction was transacted. It has now been transferred, together with its principal officer, the King's Coroner (q.v.), to the Central Office (q.v.), and is known as the Crown Office simpliciter. In it is now transacted, not merely the business on the Crown side (q.v.) of the Court, but also the greater part of the ministerial business relating to most of the matters, other than actions, disposed of by a single judge of the King's Bench Division. But it is not concerned with proceedings in bankruptcy or on the revenue side, or with parliamentary and municipal election petitions.

Crown of India, Order of. The Imperial Order of the Crown of India was founded in 1878 for ladies of or connected with India. Members can add "C.I." to their names.

Crown Paper; Crown Paper Days. Before the Judicature Acts the Crown Paper was a list of the cases on the Crown side of the King's Bench; and Crown Paper Days were the days set apart for the hearing of those cases.

Crown Side. The prerogative and criminal jurisdiction of the King's Bench Division is said to be on the "Crown side."

Cruelty. In the law of divorce, cruelty may be said generally to be where the husband has so treated his wife and manifested such feelings towards her as to have inflicted bodily injury, to have caused reasonable apprehension of bodily suffering, or to have injured health. Acts of cruelty to children committed in the presence of the mother are sometimes called constructive cruelty to her. Cruelty by the wife towards the husband generally requires to be of an aggravated character in order to give him a right to a judicial separation. See DISSOLUTION OF MARRIAGE; JUDICIAL SEPARATION.

Cruelty to Animals. Cruelty to animals was not illegal at common law, although such cruelty, exercised by anyone other than the owner of an animal, gave a right of action to the owner of a domestic animal if, and in so far as, the animal was injured. But from the middle of the last century several Acts were passed making various kinds of cruelty to various animals offences punishable summarily. The whole of the law on the subject is now to be found in the Protection of Animals Act, 1911, which repealed several pre-existing enactments, and in the Protection of Animals Act (1911) Amendment Act, 1912, which merely substitutes the word "three" for the word "six" in s. 1 (1) of the Act of 1911. These Acts make cruelty of any kind to either domestic animals or animals kept in captivity an offence punishable on summary conviction.

The Diseases of Animals Act, 1894, s. 22, as amended by the Poultry Act, 1911, contains provisions which are calculated to prevent unnecessary suffering to animals; and so also do the Acts relating to vivisection (q.v.).

The Animals (Anæsthetics) Act, 1919, provides that horses, dogs, cats and bovines must be anæsthetized while any of a number of specified painful operations is being performed. The Act (see s. 5) does not apply to such experiments as are referred to under VIVISECTION. See COCK-FIGHTING; INJURED ANIMALS.

Cruelty to Children. Abandoning or exposing a child under the age of two years so as to endanger its life or health is an indictable misdemeanour (Offences against the Person Act, 1861, s. 27). Assaults of an aggravated nature upon children as well as upon females are punishable summarily with heavier penalties than assaults on other persons (ib., s. 43). The main enactment as to cruelty to children is now the Children Act, 1908, ss. 12-35, which by s. 12 (1) provides that "if any person over the age of sixteen years, who has the custody, charge or care of any child or young person, wilfully assaults, ill-treats, neglects, abandons or exposes such child or young person, or causes or procures such child or young person to be assaulted, ill-treated, neglected, abandoned or exposed in a manner likely to cause such child or young person unnecessary suffering or injury to his health (including injury to or loss of sight, or hearing, or limb, or organ of the body and any mental derangement) that person shall be guilty of a misdemeanour " triable either summarily or on indictment. That section reenacts with slight alterations s. 1 (still unrepealed) of the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1904. The Act of 1904, s. 2, prohibits street performances or street trading between 9 p.m. and 6 a.m. by a boy under fourteen or a girl under sixteen; prohibits also any performance for profit or any street trading by a child under eleven; and forbids the training of children under sixteen as acrobats, contortionists or circus performers, or for any dangerous performance.

See BEGGAR; CHILD; DANGEROUS PERFORMANCES; DRUNKENNESS; IN CAMERA; YOUNG PERSON.

Cry (or Cri) de pais. A hue and cry (q.v.) anciently raised by the country, or community, in the absence of a constable, that officer being the person who raised the hue and cry properly so called.

Cucking-stool. An engine used anciently for the punishment chiefly of scolds and quarrelsome women and also of brewers and bakers guilty of adulteration. It consisted of a chair into which the offender was fastened and which was then lowered into water, the water being sometimes of an unsavoury character, as appears from the fact that in Domesday the cucking-stool is called Cathedra stercoralis. Other names were tumbril or tumborella, trebucket and castigatory. It was one of the means of correction used by the court leet (q.v.). See SCOLD.

Cui ante divortium was an action by which a divorced woman could recover her lands if they had been aliened during the coverture by her husband, cui ante divortium ipsa contradicere non potuit (against whom she could not bring proceedings before the divorce). If he died before bringing the action, her heir could bring an action called a sur cui ante divortium. They were both abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36.

Cuicunque aliquis quid concedit concedere idetur et id sine quo res ipsa esse non potuit (11 Rep. 52). (The grantor of anything to another grants that also without which the thing granted would be useless.) Thus, if a man grant to another land which is surrounded by other land of the grantor, then there is impliedly granted also a right of way over such other land.

Cui in vitâ was an action by which a widow could recover her lands if they had been aliened during the coverture by her husband, cui in vitâ suâ ipsa contradicere non potuit (whom while he was living she could not sue). If she died before bringing the action her heir had an action called sur cui in vitâ.

They were both abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36. See DISCONTINUANCE.

Cuilibet in suâ arte perito est credendum (Co. Litt. 125). (One who is skilled in his profession is to be believed.) This merely means that expert evidence is admissible.

Cui licet quod majus non debet quod minus est non licere (4 Co. 23). (He who has authority to do the more important act should not be debarred from doing what is of less importance.) Compare MAJUS DIGNUM, etc.

Cujacius. Jacobus Cujacius (Cujas) was born at Toulouse in 1522, studied there under Ferrier, taught law from 1547, principally at Bourges, Turin and Paris, until his death at Bourges on 4th October, 1590. His principal works are notes and commentaries on the different portions of the Corpus Juris Civilis, on the Basilica, and on the Decretals; and the Usus Feudorum. Collections of his works have been published at Paris, Naples and other places.

Cujus est dare ejus est disponere (Wing. Max. 53). (He who gives anything can also direct how the gift is to be used.) The maxim was literally true with regard to feudal grants; and with regard to them another form was tenor est qui legem dat feudo (the tenor of the feudal grant is what regulates the grant). It is still true to the extent that a donor may attach to his gift any conditions which are not illegal or impossible.

Cujus est instituere ejus est abrogare. " We say, in general, he that institutes may also abrogate, most especially when the institution is not only by, but for, himself. If the multitude, therefore, do institute, the multitude may abrogate; and they themselves, or those who succeed in the same right, can only be fit judges of the performance of the ends of the institution " (Sidney on Government, p. 15).

Cujus est solum ejus est usque ad cœlum (Co. Litt. 4). (Whose is the soil, his is also that which is above it.) Coke might have added et ad inferos: for he who owns the soil owns not only everything above the surface but also everything underground, so that the making of a tunnel or of a tube railway, no matter at what depth, is a trespass upon any land beneath which it passes unless the tunnel, etc., is made under statutory powers.

Culagium. This anciently meant the laying up of a ship in dock for repair.

Culpâ caret, qui scit, sed prohibere non potest (D. 50, 17, 50). (He is free from fault who knows but cannot prevent.)

Culpa est immiscere se rei ad se non pertinenti (D. 50, 17, 36). (It is a fault for a man to meddle in a matter not pertaining to him.) This was a maxim of the Roman law.

Culprit. A prisoner at the bar who has pleaded not guilty. The clerk of the court, after the plea of not guilty, anciently said: "Qu'il paroit (may it appear so); how will you be tried?"; to which the reply of the prisoner was, "By God and my country" (q.v.). The words Qu'il paroit came to be corrupted into "culprit," and that word came to mean the prisoner.

Cultivation, Freedom of. Notwithstanding any custom (q.v.) of the country or agreement to the contrary, a tenant of an agricultural holding has full freedom of cropping and of disposing of the produce of arable land, but he must return to the holding the full equivalent manurial value of any crops removed from the holding in contravention of such custom or agreement; but this right of disposing of produce does not apply during the last year of the tenancy or, in the case of a tenant from year to year, to any time after he has given or received the notice to quit upon which he eventually quits; and if the rights of the tenant under this section are exercised in a way injurious to the holding the landlord can recover damages, to be fixed, in default of agreement, by arbitration, and can obtain an injunction (Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908, s. 26).

Cultura. Anciently this meant a plot of cultivated land.

Culvertage; Culvertagium. Anciently this meant the forfeiture to a lord of the lands of a tenant.

Cumberland Square. See HAYMARKET.

Cum duæ cognationes, etc. See AFFINITY.

Cum duo inter se pugnantia reperiuntur in testamento ultimum ratum est (Co. Litt. 112). (Where two clauses in a will are inconsistent, whichever of them comes the later in the will is to be acted on.)

Cum in testamento ambigue aut etiam per peram scriptum est, benigne interpretari debet et secundum id quod credibile est cogitatum credendum est (D. 34, 5, 24). (Where an ambiguous, or even erroneous, expression occurs in a will, it should be construed liberally and in accordance with what the testator probably meant.)

Cum par delictum est duorum semper oneratur petitor et melior habetur possessoris causa (D. 50, 17, 154). (When both parties are in fault the plaintiff must always fail, and the case of the person in possession is the stronger.) This is a maxim of the Roman law, but it applies also in our law; and so also, where money has been paid on foot of an illegal contract an action for its recovery will not lie.

Cum testamento annexo. See ADMINISTRATOR.

Cumulative signifies that two things are to be added together or taken one after another, instead of one being a repetition or in substitution of the other. Thus where a testator gives two legacies of unequal amount to the same person, even by the same testamentary instrument, they are in general cumulative, that is, the legatee takes both. So when two statutes provide different remedies, penalties or punishments for the same act or offence, it is a question of construction whether they were intended to be cumulative or whether it was intended that only one could be exercised or imposed in a given case.

Cuneus. A mint or place to coin money.

Cuntey-cuntey. A species of trial mentioned, but not described, by Bracton. It is stated by Jacob to have been a trial by jury: but in the time of Bracton (q.v.) trial by jury was a different thing from what we now have.

Curari. The same as urari (q.v.).

Curate. A temporary or stipendiary curate is a clerk in Holy orders who assists a rector or vicar, and is paid by him. In some cases the bishop may compel an incumbent to employ a curate. A perpetual curate officiates in a parish or district to which he is nominated by an impropriator or lay rector. A curate of the latter class seems now to be properly called a vicar. See also CHAPEL.

Curator sometimes means the same thing as "guardian." By the Forfeiture Act, 1870, where a person has been convicted of treason or felony the Crown is empowered to appoint an administrator, who looks after the property of the convict and hands it over to him or his personal representative on completion of the sentence or on pardon or death; and where no administrator of his property has been appointed, an interim curator of the property may be appointed by the justices of the peace of the place where the convict last resided. The interim curator has powers similar to those of an administrator, but can exercise some of them only with the sanction of the justices or a Court.

Curator bonis. This is a person appointed under Scotch, foreign or colonial law to exercise functions analogous to those which in England and in some of the colonies are exercised by the committee of a lunatic. A duly appointed curator bonis of a lunatic in Scotland has, as regards personal property in England of such lunatic, all the powers of a committee (Lunacy Act, 1890, s. 131 (3)); and under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 149, a lunatic may act by his curator bonis in an English bankruptcy, but the locus standi of the curator is gone once a committee is appointed according to English law.

Cure. See AID BY VERDICT.

Curfew; Curfeu. A bell which by order of the Conqueror was rung at 8 p.m. Thereupon everyone covered up his fire—fires were then on open hearths—and extinguished his lights. The obligation to do anything when curfew rang ceased in the reign of Henry I.; but even to the present day the curfew bell is rung in certain places at eight or nine o'clock every night.

Curia advisari vult. Literally "the Court wishes to be advised"; abbreviated to cur. adv. vult, which, when placed before the judgment in the report of a case, means that judgment was not delivered immediately.

Curia claudenda, De. An obsolete writ which lay to compel a man to fence his land. It might be sued in the Court of Common Pleas or before the sheriff in the old County Court.

Curia domini. The hall of the lord, in which all his tenants assembled for the manorial courts.

Curia ducis. The body which, while Normandy remained annexed to the English Crown, corresponded in Normandy to the Curia regis in England.

Curia palatii. See PALACE COURT.

Curia Parliamenti suis propriis legibus subsistit (4 Inst. 50). (The Court of Parliament is governed by its own peculiar laws.) This is quite true. There is no Court in this country which can revise any decision of Parliament.

Curia penticiarum. A Court at Chester, held by the sheriff in the pentice or penthouse, an ancient structure beneath the Church of St. Peter. The penthouse was demolished in 1806.

Curia regis. See AULA REGIS.

Curnock. An ancient customary measure of capacity, stated by Jacob, with a reference to Fleta, to have contained four bushels. That seems to have been correct as regards barley or oats, but for wheat it contained only three bushels, while for coal it varied from ten to fifteen.

Currency Notes. The legal description of what are popularly known as Treasury notes. They are issued pursuant to the Currency and Bank Notes Act, 1914, s. 1 (1), which enacts that: "The treasury may . . . issue currency notes for one pound and for ten shillings, and those notes shall be current in the United Kingdom in the same manner and to the same extent and as fully as sovereigns and half-sovereigns are current and shall be legal tender in the United Kingdom for the payment of any amount."

Cursing. This was no offence at common law. Under the statute 21 Jac. 1, c. 20, it was made punishable with a fine of one shilling or with the stocks (q.v.) in default of payment. The Profane Oaths Act, 1745, repealed the Act of James and made each oath or curse punishable with a fine of one shilling for a day labourer, soldier or seaman, of two shillings for every other person under the rank of gentleman, and of five shillings for every person of or above the rank of gentleman, the penalties to be doubled for a second offence and trebled for a third offence. The Act does not seem to apply to women; but it applies to cursing or swearing anywhere, though not to obscene language. It is seldom enforced.

The use, to the public annoyance, of profane or obscene language in any street is punishable summarily, in the Metropolitan Police District, under the Metropolitan Police Courts Act, 1839, s. 12, and in all urban sanitary districts and in certain rural districts under the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, s. 28.

Cursing, etc., in any street, public place or land adjoining such street or place may also be an offence under bye-laws made pursuant to s. 28 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, and the Local Government Act, 1888.

Cursitor Baron of the Exchequer. This was one of the members of the old Court of Exchequer. His duties, as enumerated in Manning's Exchequer Practice, at p. 322, were occasionally numerous and important, but purely ministerial; and he exercised no judicial functions. He was not a Baron (q.v.) of the Exchequer in the ordinary sense. The last holder of the office, to which he was appointed in 1824, was Mr. George Bankes. Then, and until his death in 1856, he was a member of the House of Commons. He was cursitor baron until his death; but that did not prevent him from at the same time holding many important political offices. Towards the end of the existence of the office there were in fact practically no duties attached to it, the duty of examining the accounts of the sheriffs—which was the only one of importance remaining in 1834, having been taken out of the hands of the cursitor baron by the Fines Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 99), s. 2; and when Mr. Bankes died, the statute 19 & 20 Vict. c. 86 at once abolished the office and provided that anything which might have been done by the cursitor baron should be done by the Court of Exchequer, or by any officer thereof, or by any "baron of the coif" (q.v.). It appears from the Commons Committees Report (1803), Vol. 13, p. 307, that in 1798 the office was worth a little under £400 a year.

Originally the barons (or judges) of the Court of Exchequer were not lawyers, but officials connected with the fiscal side of the Exchequer who had been raised to the bench; but the Chief Barons from about the year 1400 were lawyers, who, for a period of a hundred years, were also Chief Justices of the Common Pleas. From 1579, however, the barons, like the other judges, were serjeants-at-law and ranked in every way with the judges of the King's Bench and the Common Pleas; and it was found necessary to have on the bench with the barons someone who had some knowledge of fiscal matters: so the cursitor baron was appointed for the first time in 1610.

Cursitors (clerici de cursu) were clerks in the Chancery office whose duties consisted in drawing up those writs which were of course de cursu, whence their name. These "writs of course" were the writs known as original writs (see WRIT), and were abolished by the statute 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 82, s. 10, which transferred to the clerks of the Petty Bag Office the "few remaining duties" of the cursitors. (See PETTY BAG.) On two out of the four circuits which made up the Courts of Great Session for Wales (see WALES), there were minor officials known as cursitors (Commons Committees Reports, (1803), Vol. 13, p. 206).

Cursus curiæ est lex curiæ (3 Buls. 53). (The practice of the Court is to be regarded as the law of the Court.) This was said by Croke, J., in 1615. Lord Coke in the next line of the report declares "This is an invention of the devil designed to crush the souls of men"; but he seems to have referred to the Star Chamber procedure.

Of course, no practice of the Court can be upheld if it be without or in excess of jurisdiction or contrary to natural justice or to express enactment.

Cursus scaccarii. The course of the Exchequer, that is to say, the procedure of the Exchequer as a Court concerned with the recovery of moneys due to the king. See 15 M. & W., at p. 693.

Curtesy. Where a man marries a woman seised of land in fee-simple or fee-tail, and has by her issue born alive capable of inheriting the land as heir to her, notwithstanding the issue may afterwards die, yet if the husband survives the wife he shall hold the land during his life. Coke explains that "he is called tenant by the curtesie of England, because this is used in no other realme but in England onely." If land is given to a woman and the heirs male of her body, and she marries, and has issue a daughter and dies, the husband is not tenant by the curtesy, because the daughter by no possibility could inherit her mother's estate in the land.

Where a married woman is entitled to an equitable estate of inheritance to her separate use and does not dispose of it by deed or will, the husband is entitled to equitable curtesy.

By the custom of gavelkind a man may be tenant by the curtesy without having any issue.

And by the special custom of some manors the widower of a deceased female copyholder is entitled to a customary curtesy.

Copyhold enfranchised under the Copyhold Act, 1894, is, except in the case of a husband married before the enfranchisement, subject only to such curtesy as applies to freeholds (s. 21).

Under the Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 58 (1) (viii.), a tenant by the curtesy has the power of a tenant for life.

Curtilage is a court-yard adjoining a messuage, "i.e., a little garden, yard, field or piece of void ground, lying near and belonging to the messuage." By the grant of a messuage in a deed the curtilage passes without being expressly mentioned.

Curtiles terræ. Court lands (q.v.).

Custagium; custantia. Anciently this meant costs.

Custode admittendo; Custode removendo. Writs which anciently lay for the appointing or removing of a guardian.

Custodes. See WARDENS.

Custodes Judæorum. These were judges of the Exchequer, although they were not termed Barons, who were first appointed in 1198 for the purpose of deciding cases affecting Jews, which would otherwise have come before the ordinary Courts; and they constituted the Exchequer of the Jews (q.v.).

Custodes libertatis Angliæ authoritate Parliamenti. (The Guardians of the Liberties of England by the Authority of Parliament.) This was the title of writs of summons from the execution (30th January, 1649) of Charles I., up to the proclamation (16th December, 1653) of Oliver Cromwell as Protector. The statute 12 Car. 2, c. 3, provided that writs so entitled, and those afterwards entitled in the names of the Protector, before 5th May, 1660, were not for that reason invalid.

Custodes pacis. Conservators of the peace (q.v.).

Custodiam Lease. Anciently this meant a grant by the king, under the Exchequer Seal, by which Crown lands were demised or granted to some person as custodian or lessee thereof.

Custodian Trustee. Under the Public Trustee Act, 1906, s. 4, the Public Trustee, or any banking or insurance company or other body corporate entitled (by rules made under that Act) to act as custodian trustee, may be appointed custodian trustee of any trust; and the appointment may be made (a) by the Court, (b) by the creator of the trust, or (c) by the person having power to appoint new trustees.

The custodian trustee holds the trust property as if he were sole trustee, but, except as regards that matter, the appointment of a custodian trustee does not in the least affect the power and duties of the ordinary trustees. His chief function is to act as a "safe deposit" for title deeds, share certificates, etc.

Custody. Where the owner of a moveable thing gives it to his servant to keep until he wants it back, the servant is said to have the custody of it and the master retains the possession. But if a thing is delivered by a stranger to a servant on behalf of his master, then the servant has the possession and not the mere custody of it.

See EMBEZZLEMENT.

Custom. A custom is a rule of conduct which a given class of persons observe spontaneously or by tacit consent.

Customs are of two classes, namely, those which form part of the law of England, and those which operate by modifying contracts entered into by private persons.

Customs which form part of the law of England are commonly divided into three kinds, namely, general, local or particular, and personal.

General customs, or customs of the realm, are the universal rule of the whole kingdom, and form the common law in its stricter and more usual signification; such are the rules as to the inheritance of land, the solemnities and obligations of contracts, the liabilities of common carriers, etc., so far as they have not been altered by statute.

Particular or local customs are those which only affect land situate within particular districts; such are the customs of gavelkind and borough English, which govern the descent of land in certain places,—the customs which give the inhabitants of a certain place rights over land in the neighbourhood (see EASEMENT; RECREATION),—the custom of tin-bounding in Cornwall,—and the customs relating to lands held by copyhold and customary freehold tenure. The customs of gavelkind and borough English are judicially noticed; but to make any other particular custom good, it must be reasonable and must have been peaceably and continually observed from time immemorial; it is of course not necessary to prove that it has existed from time immemorial, for proof of its existence for, say, twenty years is often sufficient evidence of its immemorial existence.

The principal, if not the only, custom having the force of law and affecting a particular class of persons is that known as the custom of merchants (lex mercatoria, or law merchant), sometimes called the general custom of merchants to distinguish it from usages or customs of trade (infra). It resembles the common law in following precedents, for, said Lord Mansfield, "the custom of merchants, when established and settled by known decisions, is the general law of the kingdom, and therefore ought not to be left to a jury after it has been already settled by judicial determinations; but where it is doubtful it may be fit to ascertain from merchants the facts." The rules as to bills of exchange, cheques, and other negotiable securities, form an important part of the law merchant: a person who makes use of a mercantile instrument, such as a bill of exchange, becomes to that extent subject to the custom of merchants, in so far as such custom is not inconsistent with the provisions of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (see s. 97), which indeed is itself a codification, subject to modifications, of the law merchant as to bills of exchange.

Customs which modify contracts entered into by private persons are those which have prevailed so long and so uniformly in transactions between persons engaged in a particular occupation, that when two of such persons enter into a contract relating to their occupation, and not containing anything inconsistent with the custom, they are presumed to have contracted with reference to it, and it then forms part of the contract so far as it is applicable.

Customs modifying contracts are generally divided into two classes.

Usages or customs of trade are customs prevailing in a particular trade or business: thus, if by the usage of bankers, stockbrokers, etc., bonds or scrip certificates of a certain kind are treated as negotiable, a person who has deposited them with a stockbroker cannot claim them from a bonâ fide holder for value, who has acquired them by delivery from the stockbroker. Such usages or customs may not only annex terms to a contract which is not inconsistent with them, but may also control the interpretation of a contract which is complete in itself but which contains terms used in a technical sense.

Customs of the country are customs relating to agriculture and the tenure of land for agricultural purposes, prevailing within a certain district. They are of two principal kinds: customs relating to and regulating the course of husbandry, and the periods of taking farms; and customs which modify the rule of law that the land, together with everything that is in the soil or attached to it, at the determination of a tenancy, belongs to the landlord and not to the tenant.

Thus where the defendant granted to the plaintiff a lease of a farm situate within a parish where there was "an ancient and laudable" custom for tenants of lands in certain cases to cut and take away after the expiration of the lease crops sown by them before the expiration of the term, but the lease was silent on the question of away-going crops, it was held so far back as 1779 that the custom formed part of the agreement between the parties, being supplemental to the lease. Customs of this kind also regulate the rights of outgoing and incoming tenants, which vary infinitely in different parts of the country.

Such customs have been varied by certain Acts and particularly by the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908; but that Act expressly provides by s. 46 that all customs of the country, except as otherwise provided by the Act, are still to have effect. See CONSUETUDO DEBET, ETC.

Customary Freeholds. In the proper sense of the term customary freeholds are a privileged and superior kind of copyholds. The tenants of these lands hold by copy of court roll according to the custom of the manor, but they are not said to hold at the will of the lord. This tenure is found almost solely in the north of England, where it is not unfrequently known by the name of "tenant right" (q.v.).

Sometimes the term is inaccurately applied to lands which are really freehold, but which are subject by custom to some peculiar and customary mode of alienation: as in the case of lands held of a certain manor in which there was a custom that every feoffment should be void unless it were presented at a manorial court within a certain time.

Customary Tenements. Copyholds (q.v.).

Customer. In the statute 11 Hen. 7, c. 13, this appears to be used as a synonym of searcher (q.v.).

Custom of London. Under what was known as the Custom of London a freeman could, from the time of Littleton, devise his freeholds by will; but, on the other hand, until the enactment of the statute 11 Geo. 1, c. 18, s. 17, he could bequeath (1) only one-third of his personalty if he left a wife and children, the remaining two-thirds going, as to one-half thereof to the wife, and as to the residue, to the children; (2) half of his personalty if he left either a wife or children, the remaining half going to the wife or the children, as the case might be. Moreover, until the enactment of the statute 19 & 20 Vict. c. 94, the rules as to distribution of the personal estate of an intestate differed in the city from those applying in other places. Under the custom also, a woman trading separately from her husband was, in point of law, in the same position as a feme sole, that is to say, she alone was answerable for her trade debts. There were other special customs in the city: see, e.g., FOREIGN ATTACHMENT.

The Courts of common law took judicial notice of the Custom of London.

See DEAD MAN'S PART; WIDOW'S CHAMBER.

Customs are the duties or tolls payable upon merchandise exported from and imported into the country. The proceeds form part of the Consolidated Fund (q.v.). See COMMISSIONERS OF CUSTOMS AND EXCISE.

Customs and Services. Anciently this was a writ which lay for a lord to compel a tenant to observe and perform the customs and services upon which he held his land.

Custos brevium. (The keeper of the writs.) This was an officer of the old Court of Common Pleas whose function it was to receive and file all writs returnable to that Court. The office, as well as a large number of similar offices, was abolished by the Superior Courts Offices Act, 1837, s. 1, Sch. A. That Act entrusted to clerks of the modern type the remaining duties of a number of archaic officers.

Custos brevium et recordorum. (The keeper of the writs and records.) An officer of the old Court of King's Bench, whose duties were somewhat similar to those of the Custos brevium (q.v.) in the Court of Common Pleas. Both offices were abolished by the one Act.

Custos morum. (The guardian of morals.) Anciently the Court of Star Chamber (q.v.), and subsequently the Court of King's Bench, were the Courts regarded as specially entrusted with the enforcement of good conduct, and each Court in succession was sometimes called the Custos morum.

Custos placitorum coronæ. The officer who kept the pleas of the Crown (q.v.) in the time of Bracton.

Custos rotulorum is the first justice of the peace and first civil officer of the county for which he is appointed. As his name implies, he is nominally keeper of the rolls or records (writs, indictments, etc.) under the commission of the peace, but in practice they are kept by the clerk of the peace (q.v.). The office is always held either by the Lord Lieutenant (q.v.) of the county or by some other person of position.

Custos spiritualium. (The guardian of the spiritualities.) The person or body which exercises spiritual or ecclesiastical jurisdiction in a diocese during a vacancy in the see. By the canon law the dean and chapter are the guardians; but for most of the sees the archbishop is by prescription the guardian.

Custos statum hæredis in custodiâ existentis meliorem, non deteriorem, facere potest (7 Co. 7). (A guardian can make the estate of an heir who is under his wardship better, but not worse.) The guardian referred to was the guardian in chivalry.

Custos temporalium. (The guardian of the temporalities.) Anciently this was a person to whose custody a vacant see or abbey was committed by the king as supreme lord, and who, as steward of the goods and profits thereof, was to give an account to the king's escheator, who rendered an account thereof into the Exchequer. His trust continued till the vacancy was supplied by a successor, who obtained the king's writ de restitutione temporalium, which was sometimes after and sometimes before consecration, though more frequently after.

Custuma antiqua sive magna. (The old or large customs.) These were the customs anciently payable on the export of wool, woollen cloths, leather, and other products of this country.

Custuma parva et nova. (The small and new customs.) These were anciently customs payable both on exported and imported goods by aliens.

Cutlers. Amongst the minor City Companies (q.v.) is the Cutlers' Company. This is to be distinguished from the Sheffield "Company of Cutlers in Hallamshire," incorporated by the statute 21 Jac. 1, c. 31, and dealt with in many subsequent Acts, of which the latest are the Trade Marks (q.v.) Acts, 1905 to 1919. This Sheffield company is also known as the Cutlers' Company; see, for instance, s. 63 of the Trade Marks Act, 1905.

Cutter of the Tallies. Anciently this was an officer of the Exchequer who provided wood for the tallies (q.v.) and cut the notches on them.

Cycling. Bicycles and tricycles are "carriages" within the meaning of the Highway Act, 1875, s. 78—so also, for that matter, are perambulators, but de minimis—and persons using them can, in a proper case, be convicted of furiously driving them. Under the Local Government Act, 1888, s. 85, there must be on each bicycle or tricycle a lighted lamp, visible from the front, between one hour after sunset and one hour before sunrise, and the rider must, when overtaking anything on the road, give warning by a bell, whistle, etc. A motor cycle is a motor car (q.v.).

Cyne-bot; Cyne-gild. The part received by the nation out of the fine payable for the slaying of a king in Saxon times; the rest went to the relatives of the monarch. See WER.

Cyning. Anglo-Saxon for "king."

Cy-près. Where a person has expressed a general intention, and also a particular mode in which he wishes it carried out, but the intention cannot be carried out in that particular mode, the Court before whom the matter comes will in certain cases direct the intention to be carried out cy-près, that is, as nearly as possible in the mode desired.

Thus, if a testator shows an intention that part of his property should be devoted to charitable purposes, but he either does not effectually indicate the particular manner in which he wishes it applied, or indicates a mode of application which is or subsequently becomes impracticable, the Court will execute the trust cy-près, by applying the property to charitable purposes similar to those (if any) mentioned by the testator. (See SCHEME.) So where an executory trust, if carried literally into effect, would be void for illegality, as where it would infringe the rule against perpetuities, the Court, in order to carry the testator's intention into effect as far as possible, or, as it is termed, cy-près, will direct a settlement to be made as strictly as the law permits.

Cyrographum. A chirograph (q.v.).

D.S.O. See DISTINGUISHED, ETC.

Da. Law-French for "yes."

Dagenham-breach. The statute 12 Ann. st. 2, c. 13 (Statutes at Large) recited that in the year 1707 "there happened a great breach in the walls or banks of the levels of Havering and Beckenham in the county of Essex" with the result that a sandbank had been formed in the Thames so that the navigation of the river was "in danger of being utterly destroyed"; and the statute then proceeded to impose, for ten years from 10 July, 1714, certain duties on ships entering the port of London. These duties were known as the Dagenham-breach: the proceeds were presumably—though the Act does not say so—to be applied in repairing the breach.

Dairies. The law as regards dairies is now contained mainly in the Milk and Dairies (Consolidation) Act, 1915, and the Milk and Dairies (Amendment) Act, 1922, to which reference should be made.

Under the Infectious Diseases Prevention Act, 1890, s. 4, the local authority of a district in which that Act has been adopted may prohibit a dairy from supplying milk in the district if they are satisfied that milk from the dairy has caused infectious disease.

In a district to which Part IV. of the Public Health Acts (Amendment) Act, 1907, has been applied, a dairyman supplying milk which the medical officer reasonably believes to have caused infectious disease may be required to furnish a list of his sources of supply (s. 53), and every dairyman supplying milk within the district, from premises whether within or without it, must notify all cases of infectious disease amongst all persons connected with the dairy (s. 54). As to the meaning of "dairyman" and "dairy," see s. 13.

Dakir. The Assisa de Ponderibus, etc. (q.v.) enacted that a "dakir" of hides should consist of ten hides, and that twenty "dakirs" should make a "last." This was not the only measure known as a last. The enactment above mentioned provided that twelve sacks of wool should make a last of wool, and that ten thousand (really 12,000) herrings should make a last of herrings.

Dale; Dalus; Dailus; Daila. Synonyms of DOLE (q.v.).

Damage is where one person has done a wrongful act for which the person injured may obtain compensation in an action.

Damage in law, or general damage, is where no actual damage has been caused, but where the person whose right has been infringed brings an action to vindicate that right: thus if A enters on B's land without permission, B may bring an action and recover nominal damages against A for the trespass, though no actual injury to the land was caused, for repeated trespasses on the land might eventually give rise to an easement or right over the land. So A may recover nominal damages against B for a libel although it caused A no pecuniary loss.

Actual, or special, damage is where the wrongful act has caused a loss or injury which can be assessed in money: as where A negligently drives a carriage so as to cause bodily injury to B, whereby B is prevented from carrying on his business and put to medical expense; or where a slander injures a person in his business.

"Special damage" is also used in the sense of extraordinary damage: as where a person suffers damage from a public wrong (e.g. a public nuisance), differing in kind from the damage suffered by the community in general.

Consequential damage is that which is either the natural result of the wrongful act, according to the usual course of things, or, in the case of a breach of contract, such damage as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the parties, at the time they made the contract, as the probable result of the breach of it. Thus medical expenses incurred in consequence of an injury may be recovered; again, in an action for the breach of a warranty of a chain cable, it was held that the plaintiff might recover the value of the anchor to which the cable was attached and which was lost by the breaking of the cable. See REMOTENESS.

Damage-cleer; Damna clericorum. A fee of, in the Court of Common Pleas, ten per cent., and in the Courts of King's Bench or Exchequer, five per cent., upon the amount of all damages recovered to an amount exceeding five marks in actions on the case, covenant, trespass, assault and battery, battery, etc., which the plaintiff had to pay to the prothonotary (q.v.) or the chief officer of the Court before he could have a writ of execution. The fee was abolished by the statute 17 Car. 2, c. 6.

Damage-feasant. See DISTRESS.

Damages are a sum of money adjudged to be paid by one person to another as compensation for a loss sustained by the latter in consequence of an injury committed by the former. The test by which the amount of the damages is ascertained is called the measure of damages. Thus where a vendor sues his vendee for breach of contract for the sale of goods, the measure of damages is the price of the goods if the property in them has passed to the vendee, or the difference between the contract price and the market price at the time of the breach if the vendor has re-sold the goods. As to when interest is payable as damages, see INTEREST.

When the parties to a contract agree that on a breach of its provisions the one shall pay to the other a specified sum of money, the question frequently arises whether that sum is merely a penalty (q.v.), or whether it is liquidated damages, that is, a sum agreed to be paid on the breach in order to save the trouble and expense of ascertaining the damage actually sustained. The language in which the provision is expressed is immaterial if its true nature is apparent. Thus where A agreed to do certain services for B, for which B agreed to pay him £3 6s. 8d. per day, and the contract stipulated that if either party should commit a breach of any part of it he should pay the other £1,000 as "liquidated and ascertained damages, and not a penalty or penal sum," it was held that on a breach the plaintiff was entitled to recover only the damage actually sustained, and not £1,000, because otherwise, if B had failed to make a single payment of £3 6s. 8d., A would have become entitled to £1,000 as damages. On the other hand, where a lease stipulated that the lessee should pay £5 for every acre of meadow land which he should plough up, this was held to be liquidated damages and not a penalty.

Nominal damages are damages to such a small amount (e.g. a farthing) as to show that they are not intended as any equivalent or satisfaction to the party recovering them. They are given when the plaintiff in an action for an invasion of his right establishes his right but does not show that he has sustained any damage.

Exemplary or vindictive damages are damages given not merely as pecuniary compensation for the loss actually sustained by the plaintiff, but likewise as a kind of punishment to the defendant, with the view of preventing similar wrongs in future, as in actions for malicious injuries, fraud, seduction, oppression, continuing nuisances, etc. See AGGRAVATION.

As to excessive damages, see TRIAL; see also DOUBLE DAMAGES; INQUIRY; INQUIRY, WRIT OF.

See QUANTUM DAMNIFICATUS.

Dame is the legal title of the wife or widow of a knight or baronet, and also of ladies who have been made in their own right Dames (whether Dames Grand Cross or Dames Commander) of the Order of the British Empire.

Damna. Damages. This, the Latin equivalent (damna clericorum) for damage-cleer (q.v.), meant the damages which were the fee of the clerks.

Damnify; Damnification. To damnify is to cause loss or injury to another, and damnification means the suffering of loss or injury.

Damnosa hereditas. In the Roman Law this meant an inheritance which was a source of loss rather than of profit. The term is informally applied in English law—to which the damnosa hereditas is not formally known—as meaning property which the trustee in bankruptcy will disclaim under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 54, as not being advantageous to the creditors.

Damnum. Loss; damage; harm. See INJURIA.

Damnum absque injuriâ is a loss which does not give rise to an action of damages against the person causing it: as where a person blocks up the windows of a new house overlooking his land, or injures a person's trade by setting up an establishment of the same kind in the neighbourhood.

Damnum sentire non videtur qui sibi damnum dedit (D. 50, 17, 204). (A man is not deemed to have suffered damage in law where he himself has caused the damage.)

Damnum sentit dominus. (The lord suffers the damage, the loss falls on him who is in law the owner.) This expresses the general rule applicable to the case of the accidental destruction of goods contracted to be sold: the rule is that, in the absence of any agreement to the contrary, the loss usually falls upon the buyer or the seller according as the property in the goods has or has not passed. See RES PERIT DOMINO, and compare MORA DEBITORIS, ETC.

Damnum sine injuria esse potest (Hale. Max. 12). (There may be damage or loss inflicted without any act being done which the law deems an injury.) The most ordinary case is where a man sets up a shop in order to attract the customers of another shop. For such damage as may be caused in such a case no action can be maintained. The maxim Ubi jus ibi remedium does not apply, for there is no jus, no legal right to demand that the act which causes the damage shall not be done, and therefore there is no remedium.

Dancing-house. A house to which persons on payment are admitted for the purpose of dancing. Such a house, if within twenty miles of London or Westminster, requires to be licensed (Disorderly Houses Act, 1751) by the county council in the administrative county of Middlesex (Music and Dancing Licences (Middlesex) Act, 1894, s. 2 (1)), and elsewhere by quarter sessions (Disorderly Houses Act, 1751, s. 2). Outside the twenty-mile radius, it must be licensed under s. 51 of the Public Health Acts (Amendment) Act, 1890, in any district to which that Act has been applied. Licensing is also required under various local Acts.

None of the enactments relating to dancing (and music (q.v.)) apply to theatres conducted under letters patent or under licence from the Crown, or from the Lord Chamberlain.

Danegeld; Danegelt; Danegold. A tax, at first of one shilling and afterwards of two shillings, on every hide of land, which was levied in Anglo-Saxon times to meet the expenses caused by the Danish invasions. The tax was continued after the Conquest, although the risk of Danish raids had ceased. In 1084 William the Conqueror increased the rate to six shillings per hide and caused the Inquisitio Geldi (q.v.) to be made. The tax disappeared in the reign of Stephen.

Danelage. The laws of the Danish part of the kingdom in the early part of the tenth century. Camden (Brit., p. 94) alleges that the Conqueror took the best of these laws and of the Merchenlage (q.v.) and the West Saxonlage (q.v.) and made them, with additions, the laws of his kingdom, but this assertion is open to doubt.

Danelaw. The modern synonym of Danelage.

Dangeria. A payment anciently made by forest-tenants for liberty to plough during the time of pannage (q.v.).

Dangerous Animals. See ANIMALS, LIABILITY FOR.

Dangerous Goods. As to gunpowder and analogous compounds, see EXPLOSIVES; as to petroleum, see that head; as to sending by rail or train goods of a dangerous character (such as vitriol, matches, explosives, etc.) see the Railways Clauses (Consolidation) Act, 1845, s. 105, and the Tramways Act, 1870, s. 53; and as to similar goods on ships, see the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, ss. 446-450.

Dangerous Machinery. See the Factory and Workshops Act, 1901, ss. 1 (2), 10, 13, 17, 18, as to dangerous machinery generally. As to dangerous machinery in coal mines, see the Coal Mines Act, 1911, ss. 55, 108.

Dangerous Performances. A dangerous performance is not illegal except in the case of young persons. As regards young persons, the law does, however, concern itself, and dangerous performances by them are prohibited by the Dangerous Performances Acts, 1879 and 1897, the combined effect of which is to make illegal the employment of any male under the age of sixteen, or of any female under the age of eighteen, for any public performance or exhibition which, in the opinion of a court of summary jurisdiction, is dangerous to life or limb. See CRUELTY TO CHILDREN.

Dangerous Place. Under the Public Health Acts (Amendment) Act, 1907, the local authority may require the owner of any dangerous place adjoining any street, road, or public footpath in a district to which the Act has been applied to do such things as are necessary to prevent danger to the public, and in his default they may do such things at his expense.

Dangerous Structure. In urban districts the urban authority may require the owner of a building which is in a ruinous state and dangerous to passengers or to neighbouring buildings to make it secure or take it down, and in the event of his default they may do the necessary work at his expense (Towns Improvement Clauses Act, 1847; Public Health Act, 1875, s. 160).

As to dangerous structures in the Metropolis, see the London Building Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. ccxiii.), ss. 102-117.

Dapifer. Anciently this was a designation of the chief steward or head bailiff of a manor. Dapifer regis seems to have been an early title of the Steward of the King's Household.

Dare ad remantiam. An archaic expression meaning, with regard to land, to give for ever, that is to say, in fee.

Darrein is Norman-French for "last." See ASSISE OF DARREIN PRESENTMENT; PUIS DARREIN CONTINUANCE.

Date. See DEED.

Day. According to Coke, days are either natural or artificial. The natural day consists of twenty-four hours, and includes the solar day and the lunar day, which are artificial days. The solar day is from the rising to the setting of the sun: the lunar day or night is from the setting to the rising of the sun.

In the space of a day all the twenty-four hours are usually reckoned; the law generally rejecting all fractions of a day, in order to avoid disputes. Therefore, if I am bound to pay money on any certain day, I discharge the obligation if I pay it before twelve o'clock at night, after which the following day commences (Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 36 (2)).

But for certain purposes only part of the twenty-four hours is to be regarded as the day. Thus, as regards burglary (q.v.), the period between 9 p.m. and 6 a.m. is the night as distinguished from the day. In the law of distress the only part of the day during which distress for rent can be levied is the time between sunrise and sunset. See BUSINESS DAY; LAY DAYS; RUNNING DAYS.

Day in Bank. See RETURN DAYS.

Day-rule; Day-writ. This was a permission given to a prisoner confined in the King's Bench or the Fleet Prison to go at large on any day on which he was concerned in a case at hearing in the Courts. It was abolished by the statute 5 & 6 Vict. c. 22, s. 12.

Day to Show Cause. Under the practice of the Chancery Division of the High Court, where an infant is defendant to an action for foreclosure and a judgment is made against him, he has in general a day given him, after attaining twenty-one to show cause against the judgment; for this purpose a subpœna is served upon him on his coming of age requiring him to show cause against the judgment; if he does not do so, he is bound by it. The necessity for this proceeding has been taken away in most cases by statute. Where a sale is directed instead of foreclosure, the infant defendant has no day to show cause. See DEMUR, and Daniel's Chancery Practice (8th ed.), pp. 113, 114.

Day-were of Land. Anciently this meant as much land as a ploughman could plough in a single day.

Daysman. An old North of England name for an arbitrator.

Days of Grace are days allowed for making a payment or doing some other act after the time limited for that purpose has expired. Thus, insurance companies commonly allow a certain time for the payment of overdue premiums before forfeiting the policy.

In the law of bills of exchange, days of grace are a period allowed in many countries to the drawee or acceptor of a bill of exchange to pay the bill after the due date, originally as a favour, but now as a matter of right. The number of these days varies in different countries: in England it is three, except that where the last of the three days falls on Sunday, Christmas Day or Good Friday, or a day of public fast or thanksgiving, the bill is payable on the preceding business day; but where the last day of grace is a bank holiday (other than Christmas Day or Good Friday), or where the last day of grace is a Sunday and the second day of grace is a bank holiday, the bill is payable on the succeeding business day (Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 14); hence, if a bill falls due on the 11th June, and none of the exceptions apply, the acceptor is not bound to pay it until the 14th. Days of grace are not allowed in the case of bills, notes or drafts payable on demand or at sight.

De. For the various writs the titles of which commence with this word, as, for instance, de excommunicato capiendo, see the second word of the title, that is to say, for instance, excommunicato.

Deacon. A member of the third order of the Church of England. The other orders are bishops and priests. A deacon cannot hold a benefice or sit in Convocation, but he may perform all the offices of a priest except the consecration of the Holy Communion or the pronouncement of the Absolution. Deacon's orders are a preliminary to priest's orders and must be held for a year unless the bishop otherwise decides. The Clergy Ordination Act, 1804, confirming the canon law, provides that no one, in the absence of a faculty, may be ordained deacon unless he be twenty-three years of age.

Dead Animal. The body of an animal, whether it be a domestic animal or an animal feræ naturæ (q.v.), is the property of the person who owned the animal while it was alive, and (Larceny Act, 1916, s. 1 (3)), if of any value, is capable of being stolen.

Animals feræ naturæ are the property of the person on whose land they are killed, but in order to constitute larceny thereof the taking must be a separate transaction from the killing. Thus, if a poacher kills game on another man's land he is not guilty of larceny if he takes it away; but if a tramp subsequently finds the game dead on the land and takes it away, then the tramp is guilty of larceny.

Dead Body. See CORPSE; CREMATION.

Dead Freight. The amount payable by a charterer for such part of the carrying capacity of a ship as he has contracted to use but does not in fact use. It is damages for loss of freight. Apart from contract, a shipowner has no lien for dead freight on goods actually shipped.

"Deadlie Feude." Used in the statute 43 Eliz. c. 13, as meaning the system of reprisals for murder or other injury.

Dead Man's Part. By the custom of the City of London, when a citizen and freeman died intestate, a certain portion of his assets —known as the dead man's part—was anciently expended in getting masses said for the repose of his soul. After the saying of mass had ceased to be legal, the dead man's part seems to have been claimed as a perquisite by the administrator, but the statute 1 Jac. 2, c. 17, enacted that all assets in the hands of the administrator must be distributed in accordance with the Statute of Distribution (22 & 23 Car. 2, c. 10). See CUSTOM OF LONDON.

Dead Man's Place. See PRIVILEGED PLACES.

Dead Pledge (Mortuum Vaduum). A species of mortgage (q.v.).

Dead Rent. See RENT.

Dead Use. Stated to be a synonym of the term contingent or future use.

Deaf and Dumb. A person born deaf and dumb is presumed by the law to be an idiot, but this presumption can be, and generally is, rebutted. A deaf and dumb person can, like any other person, enter into a contract which he understands, and he is a competent witness if he can converse by signs and understands the nature of an oath.

Deaf and dumb children are amongst those whose education is provided for by the Elementary Education (Blind and Deaf Children) Act, 1893 (as amended by the Education (Administrative Provisions) Act, 1907), and the Elementary Education (Defective and Epileptic Children) Act, 1899.

Deafforest. Land comprised within a royal forest was said to be deafforested when it was made to be no longer subject to the forest laws.

Dealer. One who buys in order to sell again. See MARINE STORE DEALER; OLD METALS.

Dean; Dean and Chapter, are the council of a bishop, and also assist in the celebration of divine service in his cathedral. The dean of every diocese is nominated by the Archbishop of Canterbury: the appointment is by letters patent. The dean is the president of the council. The chapter consists of dignitaries of the Church called canons (q.v.). (See ARCHDEACON; BISHOP; CONGÉ D'ÉLIRE.) There are also other kinds of deans: such as rural deans (q.v.); deans of peculiars (of whom the Dean of Arches is one); honorary deans, such as the Dean of the Chapel Royal at St. James's; and deans of provinces or deans of bishops; the Bishop of London is dean of the province of Canterbury.

See CORPORATION.

The dean of the college of a university supervises the conduct of undergraduates, but though he may happen to be in orders, the office is not an ecclesiastical one.

Dean, Forest of. An ancient royal forest (q.v.), comprising about 19,200 acres, in Gloucestershire. For the special Acts, etc., affecting the forest and its mines, see Wood's Laws of the Dean Forest, London, (1878).

Dean of Arches is not really a dean in the modern sense of that word. See ARCHES, DEAN OF.

Death. "There is a death in deede [or natural death], and there is a civill death, or death in law, mors civilis and mors naturalis," says Coke. Civil death formerly took place when a man was banished or adjured the realm by the process of the common law, or when a man became professed in religion, for on such an event happening his property devolved as if he were really dead, and therefore grants of land for life were formerly made for the term of the man's natural life. The doctrine of civil death is now abolished in such cases, and also in the case conviction for treason or felony (see ATTAINDER), though it seems that it might still occur if a person were to be outlawed; but outlawry (q.v.), though still theoretically possible in criminal proceedings, was abolished in civil proceedings by the Civil Procedure Acts Repeal Act, 1879, s. 3. See COMMORIENTES; DONATIO MORTIS CAUSÂ.

In the criminal law the punishment of death is inflicted by hanging the offender by the neck until he is dead, unless, in the case of treason, beheading be substituted by the Crown for hanging. See CAPITAL PUNISHMENT; DEATH WARRANT; MURDER; PIRACY; TREASON.

See ABSENCE FOR SEVEN YEARS.

Death Duties. The death duties mean the duties payable on the devolution of property at death. Those now commonly payable are Estate Duty, Succession Duty, and Legacy Duty: see those titles. Another death duty payable from 1894 to 1914 was Settlement Estate Duty (q.v.). Three other death duties are Temporary Estate Duty (q.v.), now wholly abolished, Probate Duty (q.v.) which is still payable but only to a small extent, and Account Duty (q.v.), which would appear to be still payable in some cases.

Deaths, Registration of. See REGISTRATION OF BIRTHS, DEATHS AND MARRIAGES.

Death Warrant. Up to the enactment of the Central Criminal Court Act, 1837, which was passed a few weeks after Queen Victoria came to the throne, it had been necessary for the sovereign in council to sign with his own hand the warrant for the execution of anyone sentenced to death at the Old Bailey sessions or at the Central Criminal Court (q.v.), which took the place of these sessions in 1834. The Act of 1837 assimilated the practice of the Central Criminal Court to that of other courts of criminal jurisdiction, by providing that sentences of death passed at the Central Criminal Court should be carried out without the personal intervention of the sovereign.

De bene esse. To do a thing de bene esse is to do it provisionally or in anticipation of the occasion when it may be needed. Thus, in certain cases, the Chancery Division of the High Court will allow evidence to be taken out of the regular course, in order to prevent the evidence being lost by the death or the absence of the witness. This is called taking evidence de bene esse, and is looked upon as a temporary and conditional examination, to be used only in case the witness cannot afterwards be examined in the suit in the regular way. See COMMISSION; PERPETUATION OF TESTIMONY.

Debenture is an instrument usually but not necessarily under seal, issued (except in the not very usual case of issue by an individual or a club) by a company or public body as security for a loan of money. It contains either expressly or impliedly a promise to pay the amount mentioned in it, and almost invariably creates a charge on the whole or part of the property of the company or public body. A debenture generally forms part of a series or issue of similar instruments, with a provision that they shall all rank pari passu in proportion to their amounts.

Debentures are of two classes; debentures so called by the statutes under which they are issued, and debentures popularly so called.

Debentures so called by the statutes under which they are issued are:

I. Mortgage debentures issued under the Mortgage Debenture Acts, 1865 and 1870. The object of these Acts is to enable a company formed for the purpose of lending or borrowing money on real securities to raise money by issuing debentures charged on the securities for the time being in its possession, whether they belong to the company itself or to persons who have borrowed money of it. Provision is made for the registration in the Land Registry of the securities on which the debentures are to be charged, and for ascertaining their value; also for registering the debentures themselves, and for enabling a person who has borrowed money of the company to redeem his security notwithstanding that the company has made use of it by issuing debentures charged on it.

II. Debentures issued by a local authority (e.g., an urban sanitary authority) pursuant to the Local Loans Act, 1875. The provisions of this Act are made applicable to a local authority either by a special Act of Parliament incorporating its provisions, or by sanction of the Ministry of Health. The security generally consists of a local rate, with or without other property. The amount of the debenture may be made payable either to the bearer or to a person named therein, his executors, administrators or assigns; the latter kind is called a nominal debenture.

III. There are also numerous private or special Acts of Parliament authorising the issue of debentures by the companies or public bodies to which they relate. The nature and incidents of such debentures of course depend on the statutory provisions in each case.

Debentures, popularly so called, are of the following varieties:

(1) Mortgages issued by railway and other companies (incorporated by special Act) under the Companies Clauses Acts, 1845 to 1889. Such debentures contain an assignment of the undertaking and receipts of the company, and not merely a charge on them. Debentures issued by railway companies are also subject to the Railway Companies Securities Act, 1866, and the Railway Companies Act, 1867. See DEBENTURE STOCK.

(2) Mortgages issued by commissioners and similar bodies under the Commissioners Clauses Act, 1847. The provisions of this Act are similar to those of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, which is the first of the group entitled the Companies Clauses Acts, 1845 to 1889.

(3) Debentures of a company registered under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1907, and the Companies Acts, 1908 to 1917, issued pursuant to express powers contained in the articles of association. Such debentures vary in form and effect according to the provisions of the articles and the skill of the draftsman, but they generally purport to create a charge on the whole or part of the property of the company (see SECURITY); sometimes, however, so-called debentures are merely bonds or in the form of promissory notes.

The payment of interest on debentures issued under statutory powers (i.e., debentures belonging to all the above classes except that last mentioned) may be enforced by the judicial appointment of a receiver to collect the income of the property and apply it in payment of the interest. (See RECEIVER.) In many debentures issued under the Companies Acts, the holders are given express power to themselves appoint a receiver.

Debentures issued by any company under the Companies Acts are void as against the liquidator and any creditor of the company unless they are registered pursuant to the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, s. 93.

Debentures issued under the Companies Clauses Acts must be registered with the secretary of the issuing company (Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 45).

Debentures issued by foreign or colonial governments cannot be enforced by legal proceedings in this country.

The question whether a debenture is a negotiable instrument is sometimes one of difficulty. It seems clear that debentures issued under the Mortgage Debenture Acts, 1865 and 1870, the Companies Clauses Acts, 1845 to 1889, the Commissioners Clauses Act, 1847, or the Local Loans Act, 1875, are merely statutory mortgages, assignable in a particular form, and not negotiable. A debenture to bearer issued under the Local Loans Act, 1875, appears indeed to be negotiable so far as the issuing authority is concerned: that is, the authority would be bound to pay the bearer without reference to his title: but it does not appear whether a person wrongfully in possession of such a debenture could give a good title to a bonâ fide purchaser as against the true owner. The question whether a debenture issued under the Companies Acts is or can be negotiable in the latter sense (i.e., as between the successive holders of it) must apparently be answered in the negative: whether the holder of a particular debenture belonging to that class can claim the amount from the company, irrespectively of any question between the company and a prior holder, depends on the form of the instrument and (in some cases) on the circumstances attending its issue. Debentures of foreign governments may by usage of trade be negotiable instruments in the full sense of the term.

The Statutory Companies (Redeemable Stock) Act, 1915, enables statutory companies, that is to say, railway, canal, dock or water companies or other companies incorporated by special Act, to issue redeemable debentures or redeemable debenture stock.

The word "debenture" is derived from debentur, "they [moneys] are due," the word with which certain obsolete bonds given by the Exchequer began, and the term "debenture" is still applied to the certificate, issued by the Customs authorities, which entitles an exporter of goods to a bounty or drawback.

"Debenture" was also used to mean an acknowledgment of indebtedness given by the State or some public officer. See Ordinance 63 of 1649 for the form of debenture issued by the Commonwealth. In the Exchequer the auditor gave "debentures" (which seem to have been in the nature of receipts) to the tellers for moneys paid by them to him. The servants of the royal household used to receive "debentures" (which seem to have been in the nature of orders) for the amount of wages due to them.

Debenture Stock is a stock or fund representing money borrowed by a company or public body, and charged on the whole or part of its property. Lord Lindley defined it as "borrowed capital consolidated into one mass for the sake of convenience." It is almost invariably secured by a trust deed and the rights of the stockholders are primarily against, not the company, but the trustees of the deed. It differs from debentures chiefly in these respects: the title of each original holder appears in a register, instead of being represented by an instrument complete in itself: and the stock is capable of being transferred in any amounts, unless the regulations of the company, etc., forbid the transfer of amounts or fractions less than £10 or the like. Provision is sometimes made for issuing to each holder a certificate representing the amount of his stock, transferable by delivery, so as to entitle the bearer for the time being to the stock in question: such certificates generally have coupons for interest attached to them, and while they are outstanding the stock ceases to be transferable on the register. Perpetual debenture stock is stock which cannot be paid off.

The principal statutes relating to debenture stock are the Companies Clauses Acts, 1845 to 1889, the Commissioners Clauses Act, 1847, and the Local Loans Act, 1875 (see DEBENTURE), the Companies Clauses Act, 1863, and the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908.

Down to forty years ago the issue of debenture stock by companies incorporated under the Companies Act, 1862, was not common, but now the issue of such stock is, in the case of companies incorporated under that Act or under the Act of 1908, a usual means of raising money.

Debet et detinet. (He owes and he detains.) These words were formerly used in the writ and declaration in the now abolished action for debt. That action applied not only to debts but also to goods improperly detained. Where the action was for the recovery of money, both of the words were used: when it was for the recovery of goods only, detinet was used.

Debet et solet. (He owes and he is accustomed.) These words were anciently used in writs and declarations in actions to enforce a right which had been enjoyed by the plaintiff and his ancestors, such as the action (originated by the writ Secta ad molendinum), which was brought by the plaintiff to enforce his inherited right to have corn ground at his mill. Where the right in question had been enjoyed by the ancestor, but not by the plaintiff, only the word debet was used.

Debile fundamentum fallit opus (Noy, Max. 12; Finch, Law I. 14). (A weak foundation destroys the superstructure.) Thus, when there was defeated an estate to which a warranty was annexed, the warranty also was defeated.

Debita sequuntur personam debitoris (Halk. Max. 13). (Debts follow the person of the debtor.)

Debitor non præsumitur donare (Jur. Civ). (A debtor is not presumed to give.) This maxim has reference to the rule under which a debtor leaving to his creditor a legacy equal to or exceeding the debt, will be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, to have left the legacy in satisfaction of the debt and not as a spontaneous and independent gift. See SATISFACTION.

Debitorum pactionibus creditorum petitio nec tolli nec minui potest (1 Pothier, 108). (The rights of creditors can neither be taken away nor diminished by agreements among the debtors.) This is a principle of our law also.

Debitum et contractus sunt nullius loci. (Debt and contract are of no place.) This relates to the old rule under which in actions of debt or contract (known as transitory matters) the venue might be laid anywhere, although in local actions (such as trespass to the realty) it had to be laid where the cause of action arose.

De bonis asportatis. See TRESPASS.

De bonis non. The abbreviated form of de bonis non administratis (relating to assets which have not been administered). See ADMINISTRATOR.

De bonis propriis. Of a person's own goods.

De bonis testatoris. Of a testator's goods.

Debt. In the strict sense of the word, a debt exists when a certain sum of money is owing from one person (the debtor) to another (the creditor). Hence "debt" is properly opposed (1) to unliquidated damages (see DAMAGES); (2) to "liability," when used in the sense of an inchoate or contingent debt; and (3) to certain obligations not enforceable by ordinary process (see OBLIGATION). "Debt" denotes not only the obligation of the debtor to pay, but also the right of the creditor to receive and enforce payment.

Debts are of various kinds, according to their origin. See CONTRACT.

Debts may be created under the provisions of various statutes, as in the case of penalties imposed by penal statutes, and payable to an informer or to the party grieved; debts in respect of calls under the Companies Acts; debts for tolls payable under statutes, and the like. By the provisions of the Acts creating them, some of these debts have the same effect as debts created by specialty (infra).

A debt of record is a debt proved to exist by the official records of a Court of record. (See COURT.) Amongst such debts are recognisances and statutes (q.v.), but the most important are judgment debts, or debts created by the judgments, decrees, etc., of Courts of record. (See JUDGMENT.) Thus if A injures B, his liability to recompense B does not constitute a debt, but if B brings an action and recovers judgment against him for £500, this constitutes a judgment debt, and may therefore be proved for in the event of A becoming bankrupt. Judgment debts have certain privileges, which, however, have been much curtailed by recent legislation, though some still remain. Thus, on the death of a person, his judgment debts must be paid in full by his executors out of his personal estate before any of his debts due on contract. (See ASSETS.) The judgment creditor also has various rights of enforcing his judgment by execution and attachment (q.v. and DEBTORS ACT).

Debts created by contract are of two kinds, specialty and simple contract debts. Specialty debts are those created by deed or instrument under seal, e.g., a bond or covenant (q.v.). Formerly there was an important distinction between debts of specialty in which the heirs were bound (that is, where the person entering into the instrument expressly bound his heirs as well as himself), and those in which they were not, as debts of the former class had in some cases priority in payment out of the real estate of the debtor after his death over ordinary specialty debts, and all specialty debts had priority in payment out of the personal estate over simple contract debts; thus if a man owed £500 on bond and £500 on a bill of exchange, his personal estate being worth £700, the bond would have been paid in full, leaving only £200 to pay the other debt; but these distinctions no longer exist in the case of persons dying on or after the 1st January, 1870. (See ASSETS.) Specialty debts, however, have still this advantage over simple contract debts, that they may be enforced by action within twenty years, while actions on simple contracts can only be brought within six years from the right of action accruing.

Simple contract debts are all debts not secured by record or deed, e.g., the liability on a bill of exchange.

Debts due on specialty or simple contract are sometimes said to arise from privity of contract, as opposed to those created by privity of estate. Thus if A devises land to B charged with an annuity in favour of C, C's right to the annuity as against B arises from privity of estate. See PRIVITY.

With reference to the privileges which they confer on the creditor, debts are of the following kinds:—

Crown debts, or those due to the Crown, have been invested with special privileges by various Acts of Parliament, some of which apply exclusively to debts due from accountants to the Crown, that is, persons employed to collect and account for money due to the Crown, hence called "accountants' debts." Examples of these privileges are: that they bind the debtor's land if duly registered (see ACCOUNTANT TO THE CROWN); that on the death of the debtor his Crown debts are payable in priority to other debts; and that if he becomes bankrupt and obtains his discharge he nevertheless remains liable for his Crown debts (Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 28 (1) (a)).

Secured debts are those for which the creditor has some security in addition to the mere liability of the debtor. The term is somewhat vaguely used. Examples of secured debts in the strict sense are debts secured by mortgage, charge or lien, or by the collateral liability of some other person (see GUARANTIE); but we also speak of a debt being secured by a judgment, warrant of attorney, or by the bond, promissory note, etc., of the debtor, because the enforcement of the debt is thereby facilitated or made more certain. See SECURITY.

Debts may also be absolute or conditional, payable at once or in futuro, etc.

In the law of bankruptcy, "debt" is used in various meanings.

A debt sufficient to maintain a petition for adjudication, in other words, a debt which enables the creditor to have the debtor adjudicated bankrupt, is called a good petitioning creditor's debt. Such a debt must be one "which may be the immediate subject of an action," and must not be less than £50, nor secured, unless the creditor is willing to give up the security or give credit for it. See BANKRUPTCY NOTICE.

The term "debt provable in bankruptcy" excludes demands in the nature of unliquidated damages arising otherwise than by reason of a breach of trust or of a contract or promise (e.g. rights of action founded on tort), and also debts contracted with notice of an act of bankruptcy; but with this exception, "debt provable in bankruptcy" means any debt or liability, present or future, certain or contingent, existing at the date of the receiving order, including liabilities to arise on events not likely to occur or not capable of occurring before the discharge of the debtor, and liabilities capable of being valued or assessed by fixed rules, by a jury, or as matter of opinion (Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 30).

Debts provable in bankruptcy are called preferential debts when they are payable in full before any other debts; they consist of taxes and rates for one year, and, subject to limitation, national insurance contributions, workmen's compensation, and wages or salaries due to clerks, servants, labourers or workmen (Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 33).

"Debt" sometimes denotes an aggregate of debts: thus, the "bonded or mortgage debt" of a turnpike trust, meant all the debts of the trust secured by bond or mortgage.

See CHOSES IN ACTION; CREDIT; ACTION; CONTRACT; DUE.

Debt, Action of. As will be seen from ACTIONS, this was one of the original forms of action, now all abolished. See also DEBET ET DETINET.

Debt and Danger, Affidavit of. An affidavit which must be filed in order to obtain an immediate extent (see EXTENT) against a debtor to the Crown. It must set out the amount of the debt, how it arose, that it is in danger of being lost, and why it is in danger of being lost.

Debtee is a person to whom a debt is owing; i.e. a creditor. The term is not common.

Debtor is a person who owes a debt. For the purposes of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, the term "debtor" includes any person who at the time of the act of bankruptcy was (a) personally in, or (b) ordinarily resided or had a place of business in, or (c) was carrying on business either personally or by an agent or manager in, or (d) was a member of a firm or business carrying on business in, England (s. 1 (2)); and it includes a firm of debtors in partnership and any debtor proceeded against under the Act, whether adjudicated or not (Bankruptcy Rules, 1915, Pt. I., r. 3).

Debtors Act, 1869. The provisions of this Act may be treated of under four heads.

1. It abolished imprisonment for debt, except in certain cases, the most important of which are those of a debtor to the Crown, of a defaulting trustee, and of a judgment debtor who is able but refuses to pay (ss. 4, 5). See also the Debtors Act, 1878. See ATTACHMENT; COMMITTAL.

2. It abolished arrest upon mesne process (see ARREST), but provides that when in any action in one of the superior Courts in which, if brought before the Act, the defendant would have been liable to arrest, the plaintiff proves at any time before final judgment that he has a good cause of action for £50 or upwards, that there is probable cause for believing that the defendant is about to leave England, and that his absence will materially prejudice the plaintiff in the prosecution of his action (i.e. that the presence of the defendant is absolutely required for purposes of evidence), the judge may order the defendant to be imprisoned until he gives security that he will not go out of England without the leave of the Court. When the action is for a penalty (q.v.), proof that the defendant's absence will be prejudicial is not required, and the security is to the effect that any sum recovered against the defendant shall be paid or that he shall be rendered to prison (s. 6). See SECURITY.

3. It makes it a misdemeanour for any person to (1) obtain credit by false pretences or other fraud; (2) transfer his property with intent to defraud his creditors, or (3) with like intent, conceal or transfer his property after or within two months before any unsatisfied order or judgment against him (s. 13). Other sections dealing with fraudulent debtors have been repealed, and are replaced by sections of the Bankru[illegible], 1914. See FRAUDULENT DEBTOR.

4. It regulates the manner of executing and enforcing warrants of attorney, cognovits and orders for judgment (ss. 24-28).

Debtor Summons. Under s. 7 (now repealed) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, this was the equivalent of the bankruptcy notice (q.v.) now in use.

Deceased Wife's Sister or Deceased Brother's Widow, Marriage with. The Deceased Wife's Sister Marriage Act, 1907, enacts that no marriage with the sister or the half-sister of a deceased wife, whether contracted before or after 28th August, 1907, shall be deemed void or voidable as a civil contract, unless any such marriage was annulled before that day or unless either party to any such marriage did before that date and during the life of the other party lawfully marry another person, in either of which cases any such marriage is to be deemed to have become void on the day on which it was annulled or on which either party so lawfully married another person.

The Deceased Brothers' Widows Marriage Act of 1921 enacts that the Act of 1907, with the substitution of the "28th July, 1921," for the "28th August, 1907," and with such verbal amendments as are required in order to make it apply to the case of marriage with the widow of a deceased brother or half-brother, shall, as regards any such marriage, have effect as if passed on 28th July, 1921; and it gives the two Acts collectively the short title of the Marriage (Prohibited Degrees of Relationship) Acts, 1907 and 1921. The Act of 1921 is retrospective in its operation, in precisely the same way as that of 1907.

Deceit. An action upon the case (q.v.) for a deceit was an action which lay to recover damages caused by the fraud or false affirmance by the defendant of a thing within his knowledge. This tort is now more commonly called fraud or misrepresentation (q.v.).

The writ of deceit to reverse a judgment in a real action obtained by fraud or collusion was abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36.

Decem Tales. See TALES.

Decennarii; Deciners; Decinniers; Doziners. The inhabitants of a decennary (q.v.).

Decennary. A tithing (q.v.).

Decies tantum. (Ten times as much.) Under the statute 38 Edw. 3, c. 12, any juror who took money of either party to a case for giving his verdict was liable to a penalty of ten times the amount so taken; and any person might sue for this penalty, half of which went to the person who sued, and the other half to the Crown. The penalty was sued for on the writ Decies tantum. The statute 38 Edw. 3, c. 12, was repealed by the County Jurors Act, 1825, s. 62; but the writ had been then long obsolete.

Decimæ. Tithes (q.v.).

Declaration is a formal statement intended to create, preserve, assert or testify to a right. The following are the principal kinds of declarations:—

A declaration of use or trust is a statement or admission (which in the case of land or chattels real must, under the Statute of Frauds, be written) that property is to be held to the use of or upon trust for a certain person. Thus under the Statute of Uses land may be conveyed to A. to such uses as B. shall declare, and a declaration of the uses by B. takes effect accordingly by vesting the land in the person or persons in whose favour it is made. Deeds to declare uses were commonly employed before the abolition of fines and recoveries, which being only adapted to convey the absolute estate, could not be made to answer the purposes of family settlements where a variety of substitutional limitations are required, and therefore the land was conveyed by fine or recovery to a given person, and the uses afterwards declared by a separate deed. Appointments of uses under powers are identical in effect with declarations of uses, but, strictly speaking, the latter term is only applied in the case of uses created by a fine or recovery.

A declaration of trust is the ordinary mode of creating a trust when the trust property is already vested in the intended trustee. Thus if A. being owner of property wishes to create a trust in it for the benefit of B. without conveying it to another person, he executes a deed whereby he declares that he holds the property in trust for B.

A declaration of inability to pay debts is a declaration by a person admitting his inability to pay his debts; such a declaration when signed and filed with the required formalities constitutes an act of bankruptcy (Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 1 (1) (f)) on which a receiving order may be made against the debtor (ib. s. 3). Under the ancient law it was called a declaration of insolvency.

The presentation by a person of a bankruptcy petition against himself is also a way in which a declaration of inability to pay is made and has the same effect as a declaration (s. 1 (1) (f)). See RECEIVING ORDER.

In the law of evidence, declaration is commonly used to denote a statement made (not on oath) by a deceased person and admissible in evidence contrary to the general rule against derivative evidence. Thus in a case of murder, the dying declaration of the murdered person is admissible on the trial of anyone for the murder or manslaughter of the deceased, if it be shown that the deceased was in danger of death and had given up all hope of recovery; and so in a civil case is a declaration made by a deceased person against his proprietary or pecuniary interest, or on a question of pedigree, or in the course of business or professional duty, or as to public or general rights. A statutory declaration is a written statement of facts which the person making it (the declarant) signs and solemnly declares to be true before a commissioner or magisterial officer. Making a false statutory declaration is a misdemeanour (Perjury Act, 1911, ss. 5, 15). See AFFIDAVIT; AFFIRMATION; OATH. Statutory declarations were introduced to prevent the frequent use of oaths in extrajudicial proceedings, and oaths are accordingly forbidden in these cases. Thus the execution of a deed, if required to be proved extrajudicially, is properly proved by a statutory declaration. But as the Act does not apply to the colonies, proof of the execution in England of a deed for use in one of the colonies is properly made by an extrajudicial affidavit. Making a false statutory declaration is punishable as false swearing (q.v.).

In a judgment or order on the Chancery side the declaration or declaratory part is that part which gives the decision or opinion of the Court on the question of law in the case; thus in an action raising a question as to the construction of a will, the judgment or order declares that according to the true construction of the will the plaintiff has become entitled to the residue of the testator's estate, or the like; and under R. S. C., Ord. 25, r. 5, a judgment or order may consist of a binding declaration of right only. Under Ord. 54A, any Division of the High Court may, on an originating summons (q.v.), make a declaration as to the rights of the parties interested in a deed, will, or other written instrument, or as to the construction thereof. See DECLARATION OF TITLE ACT.

In the common law and probate practice before the Judicature Acts, a declaration was the first pleading delivered by the plaintiff, corresponding to the statement of claim (q.v.) under the present practice. It was divided into counts (q.v.) and was framed in technical language. See PLEADING; VENUE.

See FALSE DECLARATION.

Declaration of Right. See DECLARATION. A declaration of right may be obtained against the Crown.

Declaration of Title Act, 1862. This Act provides that any person entitled to land in possession for an estate in fee-simple, whether absolutely or subject to incumbrances, etc., may apply to the High Court of Justice, by petition in the Chancery Division, for a declaration that he has a good title to the land, and the Court, after causing the title to be investigated, may make a declaration nisi, and cause notice thereof to be given to all persons interested. If no one shows cause against the declaration within a certain time, the Court may make a declaration that the petitioner has the title which he claims.

The Act has not been put in force to any extent. The last application under it was made so far back as 1873.

Declaratory. A declaratory statute is one which declares or formally states what the existing law is on a given subject, so as to remove any doubts which may have been raised.

A declaratory decree or judgment is one which simply declares the rights of the parties, or expresses the opinion of the Court on a question of law, without ordering anything to be done. See DECLARATION.

As to declaratory evidence, see DECLARATION; EVIDENCE.

Declare. See LEAD.

Declinatory Plea. This was the means by which anciently a person arraigned for an offence in respect of which he was entitled to benefit of clergy (q.v.) could "claim his clergy."

Decoy. A contrivance for catching wild duck, etc. The birds are induced by a tame duck to swim into certain covered enclosures from which escape is impossible. Until they are debarred from escape the owner of the land on which the decoy is placed has no property in them. For nearly a hundred years it was settled law that disturbance of a decoy was actionable; but since 1898 the law would appear to be no longer so.

Decree is an order of a Court pronounced on the hearing of a suit. The term is included in the term "judgment" (Judicature Act, 1873, s. 100), and as a matter of fact it is used in the High Court only in matrimonial suits.

In matrimonial suits in the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division of the High Court, every decree for dissolution or nullity of marriage is in the first instance a decree nisi, that is, provisional, and cannot be made absolute until after the expiration of a certain time (generally six months), during which period any person is at liberty to show cause to the Court why the decree should not be made absolute, by reason of its having been obtained by collusion, or because of material facts not brought before the Court; and, on cause being so shown, the Court deals with the case by making the decree absolute, or by reversing it, or by requiring further inquiry.

In the Court of Arches (q.v.), a suit is commenced by a process called a decree, which is the same thing as a citation (q.v.). (See VIIS ET MODIS.) A final interlocutory decree is the same thing as a definitive sentence (q.v.), except that it is under the hand of the registrar, and not of the judge.

Under the practice in Chancery before the Judicature Acts, the decree was an order pronounced on the hearing of a suit, and was either final or interlocutory, in which latter case the "further consideration" (q.v.) was reserved. The decree usually contained a declaration (q.v.), followed by the ordering or mandatory part. Under the present practice, what was formerly called the decree is now usually represented by the judgment (q.v.); in administration actions and actions for accounts, etc., it sometimes takes the form of an order. See MOTION FOR DECREE; HEARING; FURTHER CONSIDERATION; ENROLMENT.

Decree nisi. See DECREE.

Decretal. In the Chancery practice, before the Judicature Acts, a decretal order was an order made on motion or otherwise not at the hearing of the cause (that is, not on motion for decree), but having the effect of a decree.

Decretals. See CANON LAW.

Dedbana. Homicide (Leg. Hen. 1, c. 85).

Dedi. (I have given.) In the ancient system of conveyancing the use of this word in a deed or conveyance was a warranty in law; see Co. Litt. 304. Compare CONCESSI.

Dedication. This is where a person expressly or tacitly throws open for public use a road on his land, and the public assent to or avail themselves of the dedication. For instance, if a man build a double row of houses opening into an ancient street at each end, making a street, and sells or lets the houses, that is instantly a highway. A dedication will be implied from an uninterrupted use by the public of the right of way claimed, even for a few years.

A dedication may be limited in point of time, so that the highway is usable by the public at certain times only; or may be qualified so as to make the use of the highway subject to a right of user by the owner of the soil for other purposes, or subject to an existing obstruction or excavation which, if made after the dedication, would have been a nuisance. See HIGHWAY; WAY.

Dedimus potestatem was a writ formerly sued out of Chancery, empowering the persons to whom it was directed to administer the oath of allegiance and a judicial oath to a person who had been newly appointed a justice of the peace. The writ was also formerly used to appoint special commissioners in the country to take a conusance of a fine, or to swear an answer to a bill in equity. And in still earlier times it was required when a person wished to appoint an attorney to represent him in Court (dedimus potestatem de attornato faciendo), because the law required the parties to appear in Court personally.

Deed. "A deed is a writing or instrument written on paper or parchment, sealed and delivered, to prove and testify the agreement [i.e., the intention] of the parties whose deed it is, to the things contained in the deed" wrote Sheppard in 1641; and a deed is still the same. A deed cannot be written on wood, leather, cloth, stone, or any other material than paper or parchment. A deed differs from other instruments not merely in its formalities (as to which, see SEAL; DELIVERY; EXECUTION; REGISTRATION; STAMP), but also in its effects (as to which, see BOND; CONTRACT; COVENANT; ESTOPPEL; LIMITATION; MERGER).

All deeds are either poll or indented. A deed poll is a deed made by one person or by several persons in the same interest, as where several persons appoint an attorney by deed, or bind themselves by a bond. A deed poll is so called because the paper or parchment is polled or cut even, as opposed to a deed indented. In the old writers "deed" is generally used in the sense of deed poll.

As to deeds indented, see INDENTURE. As to deeds acknowledged, see ACKNOWLEDGMENT. As to deeds enrolled, see ENROLMENT; DISENTAILING DEED; BARGAIN AND SALE.

A deed generally consists of the following parts, or some of them,—the premises, the habendum, the tenendum, the reddendum, the conditions, and the covenants. See the various titles

Deeds are essential to the validity of certain legal acts, especially for almost all conveyances and leases of real property, and for the alienation of chattels where there is no contract of sale or delivery of possession. (See BILL OF SALE.) Bonds, powers of attorney, and a few other instruments, are in practice always made by deed. See Escrow.

"Deed" is also used in the expression "in deed" to signify that a thing has been really or expressly done, as opposed to "in law," which means that it is merely implied or presumed to have been done (see CONDITION); therefore, when we say that a surrender in deed of an estate in land must be made by deed, the word "deed" is used in different senses.

"Deed" seems anciently to have signified a writing under seal not concerning land, as opposed to a charter. It is obviously derived from do, in the sense of execute, possibly in imitation of the Norman French fet, fait.

Deed of Covenant. A deed in which one party merely covenants with another to do certain things. In most deeds covenants are merely incidental to other things in the deed; but formerly it was not unusual to covenant by a separate deed of covenant to produce, when called on, the title deeds of a property assured by another deed; and deeds of covenant are sometimes still used. Thus such a deed may be used instead of a bond to secure the payment of money.

Deed of Grant. A deed whereby property is granted. Incorporeal hereditaments always lay in grant, that is to say, they were transferred by a deed whereby the vendor granted them to the purchaser. Since the enactment of the Real Property Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 106), s. 2, corporeal hereditaments have been transferable in like manner; but until then they lay in livery and not in grant, and were usually transferred by lease and release (q.v.). The Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, s. 49, provides that the use of the word "grant" is not now necessary to convey hereditaments of either kind. The word is in fact always used; but any other word which expresses the same meaning—"give" for instance—would be quite as effectual.

Deed of Settlement. A joint-stock company formed before November 1st, 1844, was usually formed by a deed of settlement, constituting certain persons trustees of the partnership property, and containing regulations for the management of its affairs. It was sometimes accompanied by a private Act of Parliament or by letters patent. (See COM-PANY.) Companies registered after 1st November, 1844, under the statute 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, and before 1862, were regulated by deeds of settlement, in the same way as companies formed under the Companies Act, 1862, and under the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, are regulated by a memorandum and articles of association (q.v.).

Deed Poll. See DEED.

Deer. See ANIMALS FERÆ NATURÆ.

Deer-hayes. These were nets into which deer were driven and captured. They were also known as buck-stalls. Their use by any person not having a "park, chase, or forest" of his own was prohibited by the statute 19 Hen. 7, c. 11.

Deer-leap. In the statute 31 Hen. 8, c. 5, which established and regulated the chase or park of Hampton Court, it was provided that the tenants of the manor of Hampton Court should be at liberty to fence off the lands on which they had the right to grow corn, but that the officers of the park might make "deer-leaps" in the fences after each crop of corn had been gathered, in order to give the deer access to the stubble fields.

De facto. (In fact.) The statute 11 Hen. 7, c. 1, enacts that no person serving the king for the time being in his wars shall be convicted or attaint of high treason for so doing. The intention was to protect persons serving the king de facto against punishment or forfeitures imposed by the king de jure on the latter recovering the kingdom.

Defaltum. Default.

Defamation is the act of maliciously making a false and disparaging statement concerning a person; by "disparaging" is meant that the statement is calculated to expose him to contempt, ridicule or public hatred, or to injure his character or credit, or to cause him to be feared or avoided, or the like. Defamation is either libel or slander (q.v.). See also MALICE; PRIVILEGE.

Default, said Coke, "is legally taken for non-appearance in Court;" but at the present day it means the failure to take any step required by the rules of procedure. Thus, if a party fails to appear or to deliver a pleading within the proper time, he is in default, and a judgment given against him in consequence is called judgment by default. Such a judgment may, in a proper case, be set aside by the Court on proper terms (Ord. 13, r. 10; Ord. 27, r. 15; Ord. 36, r. 33). See INQUIRY, WRIT OF; NIHIL DICIT.

Default Summons. In the County Court a default summons or a special default summons, like a specially endorsed writ in the High Court, is a summary means of recovering a debt or liquidated demand. Procedure is governed as from 1st April, 1920, by the County Courts Act, 1919, s. 8, and rr. 7-30 of the County Court Rules, 1920, dated 19th March, 1920.

An ordinary summons may be issued in every case; and only an ordinary summons can be issued where the claim does not exceed, in the case of any defendant, £2, or in the majority of cases against anyone of the labouring class, £5 (r. 7). If the claim exceeds £2 but does not exceed £10, and a summons other than an ordinary summons is permissible, only a default summons can be issued instead of an ordinary summons; but if the claim exceeds £10, then the plaintiff, if he does not issue an ordinary summons, must proceed by special default summons (ib.). Summary judgment may be entered up unless the defendant, within eight days from service, delivers to the registrar (a) in the case of a default summons, a notice of defence; or (b) in the case of a special default summons, an affidavit of defence; or (c) in either case an admission of the debt with an offer of payment; but if the defendant does either (a), (b), or (c), the case is to be set down for hearing (r. 8).

For further information, reference should be made to rules 9-30.

Defeasance, "in a large sense, doth sometimes signify (i.) a condition annexed to an estate; and sometimes (ii.) the condition of an obligation, made with and annexed to the obligation at the time of making thereof," says Sheppard, in his Touchstone, but it is more properly applied (iii.) to a condition relating to a deed, such as an obligation, recognizance, statute, or the like, but contained in a separate instrument, whether entered into at the same time as the deed itself, or afterwards; on the condition or defeasance being performed by the obligor or recognisor, the deed is made void. A conveyance of the freehold of land at common law (e.g., by feoffment) could not be defeated by a defeasance unless it was executed at the same time as the conveyance. And in this manner mortgages were in former times usually made, the mortgagor enfeoffing the mortgagee, and he at the same time executing a deed of defeasance, whereby the feoffment was rendered void on repayment of the borrowed money at a certain day.

Almost the only instances of defeasances at the present day occur in the case of cognovits and warrants of attorney (q.v.).

" Defeasance " is also used to describe the effect of a conditional limitation in defeating or putting an end to an estate. See LIMITATION.

Defeasance is derived, according to Britton, from the Norman French defere, to undo.

Defeasible. An estate or interest in property is said to be defeasible when it is subject to be defeated by the operation of a condition subsequent or conditional limitation. Thus the estate of a mortgagee is defeasible, because the mortgagor has the right to redeem, and an estate followed by a conditional limitation is defeasible on the performance of the condition; for examples of conditions, see that title and also LIMITATION. The term may also be applied to interests given by will subject to being divested (see DIVEST), and to an estate or interest subject to a power of revocation. See POWER.

Defeat. See DEFEASANCE.

Defence. The right of private or self-defence is the right which every person has to inflict death or bodily harm in order to defend himself or any other person from unlawful violence, provided that he inflicts no greater injury than he in good faith and on reasonable grounds believes at the time to be necessary.

In pleading, a defence is a reason given by the defendant, respondent, prisoner or other person against whom a proceeding is brought, tending to show that there is no case against him.

In ordinary actions in the High Court, defences are both of law and of fact, and are put forward either by statement of defence or by proceedings in lieu of demurrer (q.v.). Some of the old defences at common law had short names, which are still preserved, e.g., " not guilty " (which forms part of the plea of not guilty by statute (Ord. 19, r. 12)), etc. As to defence generally, see R. S. C., Ord. 21. See also AMENDS; CONFESSION AND AVOIDANCE; PLEADING; TRAVERSE.

See also COUNTERCLAIM; CONFESSION.

In matrimonial suits, defences are divided into absolute, that is, such as being established to the satisfaction of the Court are a complete answer to the petition, so that the Court can exercise no discretion, but is bound to dismiss the petition; and discretionary, or such as being established leave to the Court a discretion whether it will pronounce a decree or dismiss the petition. Thus in a suit for dissolution, condonation is an absolute, adultery by the petitioner a discretionary, defence. See the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, ss. 29, 30, 31.

In County Court practice, defences of set-off, counterclaim, infancy, coverture, statute of limitations, discharge under the Bankruptcy Acts, and tender, or a statutory or equitable defence, or a defence of fraud or misrepresentation, are called special defences, and a defendant cannot set up one of them unless he gives the registrar notice of his intention to do so (County Courts Act, 1888, s. 82; County Court Rules, Ord. 10, r. 10).

Such notice is in addition to, and not in substitution for, the notice of defence or the affidavit of defence required in the case of a default summons (q.v.).

Now under s. 24 (2) of the County Courts Act, 1919, and Ord. 10, rr. 9A, 9B, 10A, every defendant, where the action is for £20, must file a statement of the nature of his defence within four days of receipt of notice from the plaintiff requiring him so to do.

As to defences in criminal procedure, see ARREST OF JUDGMENT; PLEA.

Defence Acts, 1842 to 1873, are the Acts 5 & 6 Vict. c. 94; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 67; 22 Vict. c. 12; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 112; 28 & 29 Vict. c. 65; and 36 & 37 Vict. c. 72, under which certain lands are vested in the Secretary of State for War to be used for military purposes, and power is given to acquire other lands for like purposes.

Defence of the Realm Acts. This was a series of Acts passed in order to give the Government various powers necessary, or deemed to be necessary, for the successful prosecution of the war with Germany and her allies. The first of them was the Defence of the Realm Act, 1914, which received the royal assent on 8th August, 1914. That Act was amended by the Defence of the Realm (No. 2) Act, 1914. These two Acts applied only to matters which directly and obviously affected the defence of the country. On 27th November, 1914, both of these Acts were repealed and replaced by the Defence of the Realm (Consolidation) Act, 1914. That Act was itself amended by the Defence of the Realm (Amendment) Act, 1915; and it was extended, for the purpose of the production of war materials, by the Defence of the Realm (Amendment) (No. 2) Act, 1915, and, for the purpose of controlling the trade in all intoxicating liquors, by the Defence of the Realm (Amendment) (No. 3) Act, 1915. The most important feature of these Acts was that they gave the Government power to make—and the Government did make—a multiplicity of r lations for effectuating the purposes of the Acts. The Defence of the Realm (Consolidation) Act and the three amending Acts, were all expressed to be in force only during the war, the date of the termination of which was by Order in Council (S. R. & O., 1921, No. 1276), made pursuant to the Termination of the Present War (Definition) Act, 1918, declared to be 31st August, 1921.

The above Acts are those popularly known as the Defence of the Realm Acts. The other Acts which may be included in that term are the Defence of the Realm (Acquisition of Land) Acts, 1916 and 1920. The Act of 1916 empowered the Government to remain, for a period of two years after the termination of the war, in possession of lands which had been occupied in connection with the war, and provided that the period of two years might be extended to five years. The Act of 1920 is an extending Act.

Defendant is a person against whom an action, information, or other civil proceeding (other than a petition) is brought, or against whom summary proceedings are brought, before magistrates and justices for the recovery of penalties. See COUNTERCLAIM; PRISONER; RESPONDENT.

Defendemus. (We will defend.) In the time of Bracton this was a word ordinarily used in grants. It imported a covenant by the grantor to secure the grantee in the enjoyment of what was granted.

Defender of the Faith; Fidei Defensor. By Bull issued in 1521 Pope Leo X. conferred the title of Fidei Defensor upon Henry VIII. in recognition of the services rendered to the Church by that sovereign's confutation of the heresies of Martin Luther. Subsequently differences arose between Henry and the Pope, and by another Bull, issued in 1588, the grant of the title was impliedly revoked. Henry, however, persisted in retaining the title, in which he was expressly confirmed by the statute 35 Hen. 8, c. 3, and the title, which upon the coinage is indicated by the abbreviation Fid. Def., has ever since been used by the reigning sovereign.

Defendere se per corpus suum. (To defend himself by his body.) The phrase is used by Bracton (q.v.) of a person who accepted a challenge to trial by battle (q.v.).

Defendere unica manu. To defend oneself with the mere hand, which anciently meant to lay one's hand upon the Scriptures and take an oath as compurgator (q.v.). See MANUS.

Defensiva. A title of the Wardens of the , who were in early times the defenders of the borders of the country (see Ranulphus de Diceto, Ymagines Historiarum, sub ann. 1153). See MARCHES.

Defensive Allegation. In the old ecclesiastical practice this was the allegation (q.v.) in which the defendant set forth the facts, if any, on which he relied as a defence to the charge preferred against him.

Defenso, In. Land reserved for corn or hay to the exclusion of pasture, or woodland fenced in against cattle, was anciently said to be in defenso.

Defensum. Anciently this meant any fenced ground.

Deficiente uno sanguine non potest esse hæres (3 Co. 41). (One blood being wanting, he cannot be heir.) This was formerly true, but now those of the blood (q.v.) and the half-blood are on the same footing.

De fide et officio judicis non recipitur quæstio; sed de scientiâ, sive error sit juris sive facti (Bac. Max. Reg. 17). (Of the good faith and integrity of a judge no question can be entertained; but it is otherwise as to his knowledge, whether the error be one of law or fact.)

It is a general rule that no action will lie against a judge of a superior Court for any act done by him in the exercise of his judicial functions, provided such act, though mistaken, was within the scope of his jurisdiction; but his errors may be corrected by appellate tribunals in all cases where the law allows of an appeal.

Definitive Sentence. In ecclesiastical practice this means a final judgment, under the hand of the judge, which puts an end to the case. It is to be distinguished from an interlocutory sentence; but its effect is the same as that of a final interlocutory decree: the latter is a statement, under the hand of the registrar, that a final judgment has been pronounced by the judge.

Deforcement; Defenceor; Deforciant. Deforcement was where a man wrongfully held lands to which another person was entitled. It therefore included disseisin, abatement, discontinuance, and intrusion, but it was applied especially to cases, not falling under those heads, where the person entitled to the freehold had never had possession: thus, where a lord had a seignory, and lands escheated to him propter defectum sanguinis, but the seisin was withheld from him, this was a deforcement, and the person who withheld the seisin was called a deforceor. So if a man covenanted to convey lands to another and refused to do so, continuing in possession against him, this wrongful possession was a deforcement; whence in levying a fine of lands, the person against whom the fictitious action was brought upon a supposed breach of covenant, was called the deforciant. See QUOD EI DEFORCEAT; FINE; TENANT BY SUFFERANCE.

Degradation is, or was, an ecclesiastical censure, whereby a clergyman is removed from the ministry, that is, deprived of Holy orders, after the formal removal of the insignia of his office. It has been obsolete, or nearly obsolete, since the Reformation, deposition (q.v.), which has the same effect as degradation, being now usually substituted.

De gratiâ speciali, certâ scientia, et mero motu; talis clausula non valet in his in quibus præsumitur principem esse ignorantem (1 Co. Rep. 53). The clause, "Of our special grace, certain knowledge, and mere motion," is of no avail where it may be presumed that the king was ignorant: and where the king has purported to give to lands, or to a title of honour, a new descendable quality unknown to the law, then, as the king can do no wrong, he will be presumed to have been kept in ignorance of the purported effect of his grant.

Degree. This means a step in the line of descent or consanguinity; it is also used in the criminal law in the case of a principal in the first degree, that being one who commits a felony either himself or through an innocent person, and of a principal in the second degree, that is to say one who is either actually or constructively present and aids and abets the principal in the first degree.

Degrees in the law of real actions were certain alterations in the rights of a person who had disseised another of his land, as where the disseisor conveyed the land to a stranger, or died seised so that the land descended to his heir. The nature of the action to be brought by the disseisee depended upon the number of degrees between the original disseisor and the person actually in possession. See AIEL; BESAIEL; TRESAIEL.

Dehors. (Without.) Used anciently in pleadings of a thing irrelevant to the matter in issue.

Dei judicium. See JUDICIUM DEI.

De injuria sua propria absque tali causa. (Of his own wrong without any such cause [as is alleged].) This, which was generally known as the traverse de injuria, was a species of traverse, or denial, by replication used in actions of trespass and actions on the case, and in the plea in bar in replevin. This traverse went out of use after the enactment of the now repealed s. 79 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, under which, as now under Ord. 19, r. 18, a joinder of issue can do what was formerly done by the traverse de injuria.

De jure. By right, as opposed to de facto (q.v.).

De la plus beale (or belle) dower. See DOWER.

Delatura. In Anglo-Saxon times this meant an accusation. Later (Leg. Hen. 1, c. 64), it also meant the reward given to an informer. In Scots law to delate means to accuse.

Del. credere. A del credere agent, or agent acting under a del credere commission, is an agent for the sale of goods who, in consideration of a higher reward than is usually given, guarantees the due payment of the price of all goods sold by him, that is to say, engages to pay the price himself if the purchaser does not. See COMMISSION.

Delectus personæ. (The choice of an individual.) The phrase occurs in connection with the rule that, in the absence of agreement to the contrary, no new member can be introduced into a partnership without the consent of all the existing partners.

Delegata potestas non potest delegari (2 Inst. 597). (A delegated power cannot be delegated.) This rule, says Mr. Broom, applies wherever the authority involves a trust or discretion in the agent for the exercise of which he is selected; but does not apply where it involves no matter of discretion, and it is immaterial whether the act be done by one person or another, and the original agent remains responsible to the principal.

Delegated Legislation. See ORDERS IN COUNCIL; PROCLAMATIONS, ROYAL; PROCLAMATIONS, STATUTORY; STATUTORY RULES AND ORDERS.

Delegates were commissioners appointed by the Crown, by a special commission of delegacy, to hear an ecclesiastical cause either in lieu of the archbishop of the province, or by way of appeal from him, and to hear appeals from the Court of the Admiral (q.v.). These commissioners formed the Court of Delegates which was abolished by the Privy Council Appeals Act, 1832; its jurisdiction was transferred to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council by the Judicial Committee Act, 1833, which created the Judicial Committee.

The Commission of Delegacy was first issued under the authority of the statute 25 Hen. 8, c. 19. Ancillary to it was the Commission of Adjuncts, which was issued whenever it was for any reason desired to increase the number of delegates. A Commission of Review was occasionally issued during the reign of Elizabeth, in order that there might be a rehearing of a case heard and decided by the Court of Delegates.

Delegatus non potest delegare (2 Inst. 597). A person to whom a power, trust, or authority is given to act on behalf or for the benefit of another, cannot delegate it—that is, he cannot put another person in his place—unless he is authorised to do so. (See SUBSTITUTE.) The rule applies especially to persons acting under powers of attorney, to directors of companies, and to trustees, executors, etc. It must not, however, be understood of merely ministerial acts, which do not involve the exercise of discretion, and which the delegatus cannot reasonably be expected to perform himself. Therefore a trustee may employ a banker, steward or agent to receive or pay money or the like. See AGENCY.

Trustees, executors and administrators engaged on war service in connection with the war of 1914-20 were permitted by the Execution of Trusts (War Facilities) Acts, 1914 and 1915, to delegate the execution of their trusts by power of attorney.

Deliberandum est diu quod statuendum est semel (12 Rep. 74). (That which is to be resolved once for all, should be long deliberated upon.) Coke had been summoned to the Council and urged to give off-hand an opinion to the effect that the King could, by proclamation, prohibit the erection of new buildings in London. He got out of the difficulty by urging that the matter required consideration by himself and the other judges: for Deliberandum est diu, etc. See PROCLAMATIONS, ROYAL.

Delicatus debitor est odiosus in lege (2 Bulst. 148). (A luxurious debtor is odious in law.) Mr. Broom quotes the maxim as containing the word Delegatus instead of Delicatus. The maxim, as here quoted, was used by Coke in a case where complaint was made that prisoners in the Marshalsea were allowed out continually upon bail and in the custody of warders (by "bail and baston"—see BASTON), so that they preferred to stay in the prison and spend their money in luxurious living instead of in payment of their creditors. Coke promptly decided that this practice was illegal and must cease.

Deliverance. See REPLEVIN.

Down to 1827, when a prisoner pleaded "Not Guilty," the clerk of the Court asked, "How will you be tried?"; to which the prisoner replied, "By God and my country"; and the clerk then said, "May God send you a good deliverance." The Criminal Law Act, 1827 s. 1, provided that any prisoner should be deemed "to have put himself upon the country for trial" by the plea of "Not Guilty."

Delivery. Delivery primarily signifies the act of transferring the possession of a moveable thing from one person to another: thus the delivery of goods is a necessary part of the transaction called a sale (q.v.). Delivery is either actual or constructive: thus if goods cannot conveniently be actually handed from one person to another, as if they are in a warehouse or a ship, the delivery of the key of the warehouse, a delivery order, bill of lading, etc., is a constructive or symbolical delivery of the goods themselves. See LIVERY; DELIVERY ORDER.

In conveyancing, delivery is that part of the operation of executing a deed by which the grantor signifies his intention when and how the deed is to take effect. Delivery is of two kinds: (1) absolute delivery, when the grantor intends the deed to take effect at once and unconditionally, even though he should retain the deed in his own possession; this kind of delivery is generally effected by the grantor saying at the time of signing and sealing the deed, "I deliver this as my act and deed"; (2) delivery as an escrow (q.v.), when the deed is delivered by the grantor to a third person not a party to it, to be delivered up to the grantee upon the performance of a condition, as the payment of money or the like.

Pleadings are delivered by being left at the address of the opposite party or his solicitor, unless the party has failed to enter an appearance, in which case the pleading (if one is required) is delivered by being filed with the proper officer. See SERVICE.

As to execution by delivery, see DELIVERY, WRIT OF; JUDGMENT; EXECUTION.

Delivery order is an order addressed by the owner of goods to a person holding them on his behalf, requesting him to deliver them to a person named in the order. Delivery orders are chiefly used in the case of goods held by dock companies, wharfingers, etc. Such an order is not a document of title, and therefore does not transfer the property or divest the vendor's lien for the purchase-money, until it is acted on by the holder obtaining either (i) actual delivery, or (ii) an entry of his title in the wharfinger's books, or (iii) the issue of a dock warrant in his name, which last operation would apparently presuppose the second.

Until he does one of these things, the original owner may obtain delivery to himself or transfer the property in the goods to someone else. See DOCK WARRANT.

Delivery, Writ of, is a writ of execution under R. S. C. Ord. 42, r. 6, to enforce a judgment for the delivery of chattels. It may command the sheriff to cause the chattels mentioned in the writ to be returned to the person who has obtained the judgment; and if the chattels cannot be found, to distrain the person against whom the judgment was given until he returns them. Such a writ is known as a writ of delivery absolute. Or the writ may order the sheriff to cause the chattels to be delivered to the plaintiff, or alternatively to levy against the defendant for the value of the chattels as assessed in the judgment and also for the assessed damages for detention and the costs. A writ in the latter form is known simply as a writ of delivery. Either writ is to be in the form prescribed by Ord. 48, r. 2, and Appendix H., Form 10. If a writ of delivery absolute will not be effectual, a writ of assistance (q.v.) may be employed.

Delusions. The general rule is that where a person suffers from mental delusions, his capacity to enter into contracts and make testamentary and other dispositions of his property is not affected by the delusions unless they are calculated to influence the particular contract or disposition, even although they are connected with its subject-matter. Thus where a person at the time he granted a lease laboured under the delusion that the property was impregnated with sulphur, it was properly left for the jury to say whether as a matter of fact that delusion made him incompetent to grant the lease. See LUNATIC.

Dem. In the action of ejectment (q.v.) before 1852, the action was by "Doe dem. Smith," Smith being the real plaintiff and Doe an imaginary person to whom Smith had made an equally imaginary lease. Dem. meant "on the demise of."

Demand, says Coke, "in the understanding of the common law is of so large an extent as no other one word in the law is," and therefore if a person release to another all manner of demands, this is the best release that the latter can have, for by it all actions, executions, rights of entry, rents, commons, profits à prendre, obligations, contracts, etc., are released and discharged. See DEMANDANT.

A demand also signifies a request addressed to a person that he will do some act which he is legally bound to do, after the request has been made. Thus bills of exchange and promissory notes may be, and cheques must be, made payable on demand. When a bill or note is made payable on demand the Statute of Limitations does not in general begin to run until the demand is made, unless it appears that the debt was recoverable and not merely payable on demand.

It is a doctrine of equity that where a claim is put forward which arose many years ago, and it is clear from the circumstances of the case that the person putting it forward has long been cognizant of his rights and has neglected to enforce them, the Court will decline to recognise his claim, although it may not be barred by the Statute of Limitations. Such a claim is called a stale demand. The term is chiefly used with reference to trusts, to which the Statute of Limitations do not in general apply, but it is also sometimes applied to ordinary debts. Thus, where A gave B a promissory note payable three months after demand, no interest being reserved, and A paid two half-yearly instalments of interest within eighteen months from the date, but no further interest was paid, and no proceedings were taken to enforce payment of the note for nearly forty years, the Court expressed an opinion that even if the claim had not been barred by the statute it ought to be rejected as a stale demand. See also ACQUIESCENCE.

Demandant was the technical name for the actor in a real action, corresponding to "plaintiff" in a personal or mixed action. See ACTOR.

De medietate linguæ. See JURY.

Demesne. In its primary sense "demesne" signifies "own," or that which is a man's private property. Thus Britton speaks of the right of some lords to hang their tenants on their fourches demeyne or private gallows. And see DE SON TORT DEMESNE.

Hence "demesne," as applied by the old writers to lands or rents, signified that they were in the possession or occupation of a freehold tenant, or of his lessees for years, as opposed to those which others held of him for an estate of freehold. Thus, if A was seised for an estate of freehold of eleven acres of land, and granted six of them to B, to be held by him as A's tenant, then A was said to be seised of the remaining five in dominico, and of the six which he had granted to B he was seised in servitio.

Under the old law, when an heir brought an action to recover land belonging to his ancestor, he had to allege in the writ that his ancestor died seised of the land "in his demesne as of fee," meaning that the immediate freehold in severalty was vested in him for an estate of fee simple, as opposed to one who held land for a term of years or for life only, or in common with others, or in servitio. From this use of the phrase, in dominico suo ut de feodo came to be the technical description of an estate of fee simple in a real action.

Demesne was also applied to those parts of a manor which were in the occupation of the lord, or of his villeins, or tenants for years, being cultivated "for the necessary sustentation, maintenance, and supportation of the lord and his household," as opposed to that part of the manor which had been granted out to free tenants in consideration of services; hence, a manor is said to be held in dominico and in servitio, or to consist of demesnes and services. At the present day the demesne lands of a manor consist (1) of the lord's demesnes, or that part which is in the actual occupation of the lord; (2) of the copyholders' demesnes, or the part held by copyhold tenants, and (3) of the waste land of the manor. See MANOR; SERVICE.

The demesne lands of the Crown are those which belong to the sovereign in his public capacity, that is, by succession from his predecessors, or by escheat, etc., as opposed to his private estates, namely, such as have been acquired by him by moneys out of his privy purse, or by gift or inheritance from any person other than his predecessors in their public capacity. The demesnes are under the management of the Commissioners of Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues, and their revenue forms part of the Consolidated Fund (q.v.). See ANCIENT DEMESNE; CIVIL LIST; SEIGNORY; MANOR.

Demesne is a form of the Norman French demeyne, which itself is derived from the Latin dominium, ownership.

De minimis non curat lex (Cro. Eliz. 353). (The law does not concern itself with trifles.) Courts of justice generally, says Mr. Broom, do not take trifling and immaterial matters into account, except under peculiar circumstances, such as the trial of a right, or where personal character is involved; they will not, for instance, take notice of the fraction of a day, except in cases where there are conflicting rights, for the determination of which it is necessary that they should do so.

Demise. This seems originally to have meant any transfer or succession of a right. Thus, in the old books, copyholds are said to be demisable by copy of court roll, meaning that the lord can grant them according to the custom of the manor. So "demise," as applied to the Crown, signifies that change in the succession which takes place when the royal dignity is transferred or demised from one king to his successor. This ordinarily occurs on the death of the king, but the expression is also used in the event of the king being deposed. The effect of a series of enactments, culminating in the Demise of the Crown Act, 1901, is that public business and the tenure of a public office is not now affected by the death of the sovereign.

In its ordinary sense, to demise is to grant a lease of lands or other hereditaments. It was formerly applied, though rarely, to chattels—e.g., a ship. The word "demise" in a lease of land under seal implies a covenant for quiet enjoyment. See COVENANT.

Demise and Redemise. Mutual leases of the same land or of something issuing out of it. They were formerly used upon, for instance, the creation of a rent-charge.

Demonstrative. See LEGACY.

Demoratur. (He demurs.) Compare MORATUR IN LEGE.

De morte hominis nulla est cunctatio longa (Co. Litt. 134). (Concerning the death of a man there is no long delay.) This maxim is cited by Coke in connection with the statement that pleas of the Crown affecting life were disposed of expeditiously.

Demur. In pleading, to demur was to raise an objection by demurrer (q.v.).

Formerly, at common law, in all actions for debt against infant heirs by specialty creditors of their ancestors, either party was entitled to pray that the parol might demur, that is, that the proceedings might be stayed until the heir had attained his full age. This rule was the foundation of a similar practice in equity, where it was by analogy extended to all cases in which the real estate of an infant was to be sold or conveyed under the decree of the Court—e.g., foreclosure and partition suits. (See DAY TO SHOW CAUSE.) The demurrer of the parol was abolished by the Debts Recovery Act, 1830, s. 10.

Demurrable. A pleading, petition, or the like, was said to be demurrable when it does not state such facts as support the claim, prayer, or defence put forward.

Demurrage, in the law of merchant shipping, means (1) the detention of a ship by the freighter beyond the number of days—called lay days—allowing for loading or unloading, and (2) the sum fixed by the contract of affreightment (the charter-party, for instance), as payable to the shipowner for such detention. The number of days—called days of demurrage —for which the ship may be detained at the agreed rate of demurrage is generally fixed by the contract. If the ship is detained beyond the days of demurrage, a claim for damages arises in respect of such further detention. See LAY DAYS; RUNNING DAYS.

Demurrer. In an action in the High Court, until the making of Order 25 of R. S. C. in 1883, a demurrer was a pleading by which one of the parties in effect alleged that the facts stated by the opposite party in the preceding pleading (or in a particular part of it), even assuming them to be true, did not sustain the contention based on them; that is, did not show a good cause of action or ground of defence, set-off, counterclaim, reply, etc. Thus, in an action on a bill of exchange, by an indorsee against the acceptor, if the defendant in his statement of defence alleged that there was no consideration for the acceptance, the plaintiff might demur to the statement of defence, because a bonâ fide holder for value of a bill of exchange could then, as he can now, recover against the acceptor notwithstanding a defect in the title of the original holder. Such simple cases as this did not often occur in practice, and usually demurrers raised new points, e.g., whether the acceptance of a composition by the joint creditors of a partnership under s. 126 of the now repealed Bankruptcy Act, 1869, was a satisfaction of the separate debts of the partners.

When a demurrer came on for hearing and the party demurring took an objection which might have been but was not raised by the demurrer, this was called demurring ore tenus.

If, on the argument of a demurrer, judgment was given in favour of the demurring party, the demurrer was said to be allowed; if it was given against him, it was said to be overruled.

A demurrer afforded a rapid and inexpensive mode of determining a point of law in question between the parties; and if the whole case lay in that question, the determination of the demurrer determined the result of the action. If, however, there were several questions of fact or law in the case, or if the demurrer was occasioned by bad pleading, the action went on notwithstanding the determination of the demurrer, because in the former case the remaining questions had to be decided, and in the latter case the Court generally gave the party against whom a demurrer had been allowed leave to amend his pleading, so as to state facts showing a cause of action or ground of defence. Questions of law might also be raised by special cases, motions for judgment and new trial, etc.

Before the Judicature Acts the nature of demurrers differed according as they were used at common law or in equity. At common law there were two kinds of demurrers, viz., demurrers upon pleading and demurrers upon evidence. Demurrers upon pleading were similar to demurrers under the practice down to 1883, except that a joinder in demurrer was necessary by the party whose pleading was impeached, and that the pleadings down to the joinder had to be made up into a demurrer book. Before the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, demurrers upon pleading were of two kinds—general demurrers, or demurrers to the substance, raising a point of law, and special demurrers, or demurrers to the form, used where the pleading demurred to did not follow the rules of pleading. The latter were called special because the defect of form objected to had to be specified in the demurrer. Special demurrers were abolished by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 51. There were also demurrers to aid prier, voucher, receipt, waging of law and the like, but these were obsolete long before the passing of the Judicature Acts. A demurrer to evidence was raised upon the trial of an action; the party demurring declared that he would not proceed because the evidence offered on the other side was not sufficient to maintain the issue. The practice of moving for a new trial has superseded this proceeding. In equity demurrers were rarely pleaded except by defendants, and were of several kinds, of which demurrers for want of equity, for want of parties, and for multifariousness, were the most important. If a demurrer was so framed as to bring in facts not stated in the bill, it was called a speaking demurrer, and would be overruled.

Demurrers were abolished in 1883 as regards pleadings in the King's Bench and Chancery Divisions by R. S. C., Ord. 25, which prescribes the proceedings in lieu of demurrer which are now available.

Demurring was also applicable to various proceedings not being actions, e.g., to some old common law writs, and to an indictment or information. Demurrers in criminal prosecutions by indictment or information seldom occur now. A general demurrer is founded on some substantial defect in the indictment, and is the only demurrer now available. A special demurrer, or demurrer in abatement, was founded on some formal defect; special demurrers are quite obsolete as the result of the wide powers of amendment given by the Indictments Act, 1915. See ARREST OF JUDGMENT; AMENDMENT; COUNT.

Demy-sangue. An old equivalent for the half-blood. It is mentioned in, for instance, the Termes de la Ley, published in 1641.

Denariate. As much land as was worth one denarius, or penny, per annum. It seems to have been an acre.

Denarii. Anciently this meant money generally.

Denarii de caritate. A customary offering anciently made at Whitsuntide to cathedral churches.

Denarii Quadragesimales. See QUADRAGESIMALS.

Denarii Sancti Petri. Peter's Pence; an annual payment made by every household to the Pope until it was abolished by the statute 25 Hen. 8, c. 21.

Denarius. The old English penny.

Denarius Dei. The earnest-money paid to bind a bargain. It was anciently handed over to the poor or to the Church.

Denarius tertius comitatus. Anciently this was a third part of the fines, etc., levied in the old County Court. It, or a composition for it, was paid to the earl of the county; the other two parts went to the king.

Denison's Act. The popular title of the statute 18 & 19 Vict. c. 34: it was repealed by the Elementary Education Act, 1873.

Denization; Denizen. A denizen in the primary but obsolete sense of the word is a natural-born subject of a country, or a native or inhabitant of a city or liberty. Denization therefore originally signified making an alien into a denizen or natural-born subject, and thus "denizen" afterwards acquired the special sense of an alien who had been "indenized" or made a natural-born subject.

Denizen in its modern sense denotes a person who is an alien born, but who has obtained from the Crown letters patent, called letters of denization, to make him an English subject; formerly there were several differences between denizens and naturalized subjects, principally with reference to the inheritance of land; but since the passing of the Naturalization Act, 1870 (now repealed and replaced by the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914), these differences have become unimportant, and now that naturalization can be easily obtained, letters of denization are seldom granted; but s. 25 of the Act of 1914, like s. 13 of the Act of 1870, expressly preserves the right of the Crown to issue letters of denization. See NATURALIZATION.

Denman's (Lord) Act. The popular title of the Evidence Act, 1843.

Denman's (Mr.) Act. The popular title of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1865.

De non apparentibus, et non existentibus, eadem est ratio (5 Co. 6). (Of things which do not appear and things which do not exist, the rule in legal proceedings is the same.)

What is not in evidence is presumed to be non-existent. This maxim applies, says Mr. Broom, where a party seeks to rely upon any deeds or writings which are not produced in Court, and the loss of which is not accounted for or supplied in the manner which the law prescribes; for in this case they should be treated, as against such party, as if non-existent.

Denshiring. A corruption of Devonshiring. It means to top-dress land with the ashes of burned weeds, turf, etc. Another name for the process is burn-beating.

Dentists. Down to 1878 anyone could practise dentistry and call himself a dentist or anything else that he pleased. The Dentists Act, 1878, did not interfere with the right of anyone, no matter how ignorant, to practise dentistry. It provided, however (s. 3), that unless he was registered under that Act, or was a qualified medical practitioner, he could not use the titles of "dentist" or "dental practitioner" or any other word or words implying that he was registered or that he was specially qualified to practise dentistry, and (s. 5), that he could not recover his fees in any Court, though it did not interfere with his right to sue for the cost of materials—such as a set of teeth—provided by him. In this state of the law it was held to be no offence for an unregistered and unqualified person to advertise himself as, for instance, "the world's expert adapter of teeth. Extraction 1s. by my own special system": and such persons carried on business extensively.

The Dentists Act, 1921, which became law on the 28th July 1921, enacts (s. 1) that "No person, unless he is registered in the dentists register under the Dentists Act, 1878, shall practise or hold himself out, whether directly or by implication, as practising or as being prepared to practise dentistry," under a penalty not exceeding £100 recoverable on summary conviction; it preserves the rights of qualified medical practitioners; it allows duly registered pharmaceutical chemists or chemists and druggists to extract, without anæsthetics, teeth where no registered or qualified person is available, and permits minor dental work in any public dental service to be done by any person under the supervision of a registered dentist. The same section, however, provides that it is not to come into operation for a period (known (see s. 14) as the interim period) consisting of one year from 28th July, 1921, or such further time not exceeding two years as may be fixed by Order in Council; and by Order dated 14th July, 1922 (S. R. & O., 1922, No. 809), it was directed that s. 1 should come into operation on 30th November, 1922, so that the interim period ended 29th November, 1922.

The Dentists Act, 1878, s. 6, provides that the persons entitled to be registered under that Act are (1) licentiates in dentistry or dental surgery of any of the universities, or of any of the recognised medical or surgical authorities in the United Kingdom, and (2) persons who were on the 22nd July, 1878, bonâ fide practising as dentists, whether in conjunction with medicine, surgery or pharmacy or otherwise, and (3) certain persons with foreign and colonial dental certificates. The second and third of these classes had by lapse of time practically disappeared from the register.

Now, however, the Act of 1921 establishes by s. 2 a Dental Board, and provides by s. 3 that it may admit to the dentists' register established under the Act of 1878, not only persons admissible under s. 6 of that Act, but also any person of good character who had attained the age of twenty-three before 28th July, 1921, and who applies for registration during the interim period (1) if he had for any five years since 28th July, 1914, been practising dentistry in the United Kingdom, or if he is a duly registered pharmaceutical chemist or duly registered chemist and druggist who immediately before 28th July, 1921, had been in full practice as a dentist; (2) if on 28th July, 1921, he had practised dentistry in the United Kingdom, no matter for how short a time, and if he passes a prescribed examination before 28th July, 1923; (3) if he was a member of the Incorporated Dental Society (q.v.) before 28th July, 1921; and (4) if he had been a dental mechanic for any five of the years since 28th July, 1914, and if before 28th July, 1931, he passes a prescribed examination. And persons on the dentists register may use the title of "dentist" or "dental practitioner" (s. 4).

The effect of the Act of 1921 is clearly to lower temporarily the standard of professional education implied by the use of the title "dentist": but, on the other hand, every person practising dentistry after the interim period must be on the register and will be liable to be struck off (see INFAMOUS CONDUCT) if he misconducts himself; and ultimately, as the unregistered dentists and dental mechanics and chemists who are admitted during the interim period die out, there will be no one upon the register except persons who have received a proper course of instruction.

See BARBERS AND CHIRURGEONS.

Deodand. Formerly if a personal chattel was the immediate and accidental cause of the death of any reasonable creature (as where a man was run over by a cart or killed by an ox), it was forfeited to the Crown under the name of a deodand (Deo, to God, and dandam, to be given). This rule was abolished by the statute 9 & 10 Vict. c. 62. Its revival, as regards motor cars and motor cycles, would enormously increase the security of life in this country.

Departure, says Coke, "in pleading, is said to be when the second plea containeth matter not pursuant to [the party's] former [plea], and which fortifieth not the same, and thereupon it is called decessus, because he departeth from his former plea." Thus, if a plaintiff, suing as the executor of A B, alleges in his statement of claim that the cause of action accrued to A B in his lifetime, and in his reply alleges that it accrued to him as executor after A B's death, this is a departure. Departure was forbidden by the rules of common law pleading, and is so still by the modern rules, although the term itself is not used. See R. S. C. Ord. 19, r. 16.

Depasture is to feed cattle on the grass, etc., growing on land. See COMMON.

Depeculation. A term used in the seventeenth century to describe various forms of dishonesty by servants of the Crown which are now dealt with as larceny, embezzlement, or common law cheats.

Deponent is a person who makes an affidavit or deposition, as opposed to a declarant who makes a declaration and to a witness who makes an oral statement. See DEPOSITION.

Deportation. See ABJURATION; ALIENS; TRANSPORTATION.

Deposit. An equitable deposit is a deposit of title-deeds or other documents of title, so as to create an equitable charge. See CHARGE; MORTGAGE.

A deposit in Court is where property is deposited with an officer of the Court for safe keeping, pending litigation, e.g., until a question as to the person entitled to its possession is determined; or where money is paid into Court as security, e.g., under the Parliamentary Deposits Act, 1846, as security for the execution of a railway or similar work. See PAYMENT INTO COURT.

On a sale of real estate, and on a sale by auction of personal property, it is usual for the purchaser to pay the vendor or auctioneer a deposit, that is, part of the purchase-money, by anticipation, as security for the completion of the purchase.

Deposition, in ecclesiastical law, is an ecclesiastical censure by which a clergyman is removed from the ministry, that is, deprived of Holy orders, as opposed to deprivation of benefice.

Where a clergyman is guilty of an immoral or criminal act, or of an ecclesiastical offence not relating to doctrine or ritual, he can be deposed under the Clergy Discipline Act, 1892, s. 8. Deposition for offences as to doctrine or ritual can be effected under the Church Discipline Act, 1840.

See DEGRADATION; DEPRIVATION; HOLY ORDERS.

In procedure, depositions, in the most general sense of the word, are the statements on oath of a witness in a judicial proceeding. It is in this sense that the term is used when we say that where a witness is dead, or is so dangerously ill that he will never be able to attend and give evidence, his depositions at a former trial are admissible in evidence on a subsequent trial between the same parties. In criminal procedure, the depositions of witnesses taken before a magistrate or justices of the peace, against a person charged with an indictable offence, are subject to the same rule, provided that when the deposition was taken the accused had the right and opportunity to cross-examine (Indictable Offences Act, 1848, s. 17; Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1867, ss. 6, 7).

In the practice of the High Court, deposition is used in a special sense to denote a statement made orally by a person on oath before an examiner, commissioner, or officer of the Court (but not in open Court), and taken down in writing by the examiner or under his direction (R. S. C. Ord. 37, r. 5). The deposition is filed, and is used as evidence in such manner as the Court directs. See COMMISSION; EVIDENCE; EXAMINER.

Deprave, in ecclesiastical law, means to despise or exhibit contempt for. Depraving the Lord's Supper (1 Edw. 6, c. 1, s. 1; 14 Car. 2, c. 4, s. 20) or the Book of Common Prayer (1 Eliz. c. 2, s. 3; 14 Car. 2, c. 4, s. 20) is a misdemeanour, punishable with fine and imprisonment.

Deprivation is an ecclesiastical censure, whereby a clergyman is deprived of his parsonage, vicarage, or other spiritual promotion or dignity, on account of some offence. Where a clergyman is convicted of treason, felony, grave misdemeanour, or adultery, or where a bastardy or judicial separation order is made against him, or if he is guilty of immorality or of other ecclesiastical offences not relating to doctrine or ritual, he may not merely be deprived, but also made incapable of holding preferment (Clergy Discipline Act, 1892, ss. 1, 2, 6). Deprivation for offences not coming within the Act of 1892 generally takes place under the Church Discipline Act, 1840. See CENSURE; DEGRADATION; DEPOSITION.

Deputy-Lieutenant. See LORD LIEUTENANT.

Deraign, said Littleton, "commeth of the French word derayer or deraigner, that is to say, to displace or to turne one out of his order. . . . So when a monke is deraigned, he is degraded and turned out of his order of religion, and become a lay man."

In the old books to deraign a warranty paramount seems to have meant to enforce or take advantage of it. Thus if A conveyed land to B with warranty, and B conveyed it to C with warranty, and C was evicted and recovered lands of equal value against B, and B recovered lands of equal value against A, then B was said to deraign the warranty paramount.

There was a Norman word, desreyner, to prove one's case in Court, from the late Latin disrationare. Hence came deraign, meaning to establish one's right, or to recover by legal proceedings.

Derelict; Dereliction. Dereliction is the act of abandoning a chattel or moveable; and so, says Blackstone, "if one is possessed of a jewel, and casts it into the sea or a public highway, this is such an express dereliction, that a property will be vested in the first fortunate finder that will seize it to his own use."

The term is, however, more commonly used of ships, which are said to be derelict when they are abandoned on the high seas. If the ship is salved, a greater amount of remuneration is frequently allowed to the salvors than in ordinary cases of salvage. "Abandonment" here merely means physical abandonment, not necessarily that kind of abandonment which takes place in the case of a constructive total loss; therefore if a derelict is salved it belongs to the owner, unless he has given notice of abandonment to the underwriters. See ABANDONMENT OF CARGO or SHIP. The Merchant Shipping (Convention) Act, 1914, s. 2, requires the master of a British ship to report any dangerous derelict of which he comes to know.

The term is also applied to land left dry by the sea shrinking back below the usual high-water mark, or by a river changing its bed. If this dereliction is sudden and considerable, the new land, in the case of the sea or a tidal river, belongs to the Crown; in the case of a non-tidal river, the property in the bed and the adjoining land remains as before, so that if the river leaves its bed altogether, the old bed is divided between the riparian proprietors according to the medium filum, while the new bed remains the property of the person over whose land the river has made itself a course. If the dereliction is by small and imperceptible degrees, the new land goes to the owner of the adjoining land; and if the owner of the original bed of the river had a several fishery over it, he has a similar right over the new bed. See ACCESSION; ACCRETION; ALLUVION.

Derivativa potestas non potest esse major primitivâ (Wing. 26). (A derivative power cannot be greater than the power from which it is derived.)

Derivative. Derivative conveyances are the same as secondary conveyances (q.v.). See also SETTLEMENT.

Derogate; Derogation. To derogate from a right, obligation, or the like, is to destroy, prejudice or evade it. Thus there is a maxim that no man can derogate from his own grant, which is chiefly applied to cases of the creation of easements by implied grant. If a man erect a house on his own land, and afterwards sell it to another, reserving the adjoining land, he cannot obstruct the windows in the house by building on the adjoining land, because the grant of the house contains an implied grant of the easement of light to its windows, and if the grantor were allowed to obstruct them he would derogate from his grant.

Agreements or provisions are said to be in derogation of the marriage contract when they tend to disturb or prejudice the status of lawful marriage; thus a provision in a settlement for the future separation of the husband and wife is in derogation of the marriage contract, because it is calculated to facilitate the dissolution of the marriage contract, which the policy of the law is to preserve intact and inviolate. See SEPARATION DEEDS; IMMORALITY.

An agreement is said to be in derogation of an Act of Parliament or of a rule of law, when it enables the parties to evade an Act passed or a rule made not for their benefit, but in the interest of the public.

Descent is what takes place when land or some interest in land or other realty belonging to a person passes on his death intestate to some one related to him by consanguinity, either directly or by reference to some other person, according to certain rules of law. Descent, therefore, is opposed on the one hand to what takes place when land on the death of a person passes to someone else by virtue of a gift or limitation to him as "persona designata" (q.v.); and on the other hand to the devolution of personal property, which is governed by the rules of distribution (q.v.).

The rules by which the descent of realty is governed have two objects: first, to determine the stock of descent, that is, the person from whom the descent is to be traced, or, in other words, the person with reference to whom the question of consanguinity is determined; and, secondly, to settle who is to be selected from the persons related by consanguinity to the stock of descent.

The rule which determines the stock of descent is that in every case descent shall be traced from the purchaser, that is, from the last person who acquired the land otherwise than by descent (Inheritance Act, 1833, s. 2). (See PURCHASER.) Thus if land is conveyed or devised to A and he dies intestate, the descent is traced from him, because he was the purchaser; again, if on A's death intestate the land descends to B, and he also dies intestate, the descent is still traced from A, because B was not the purchaser, although he is the person from whom the land descends. If, however, there is a total failure of heirs of the purchaser, the descent is traced from the person last entitled to the land (Law of Property Amendment Act, 1859, s. 19).

The rules regulating the selection of the person to take by descent in a given case are divisible according to their source, and are of the following kinds:—

(I) Descent according to the common law means either literally the common law, or (more usually) the common law as altered by the Inheritance Act, 1833, s. 2. The rules regulating this kind of descent are called the canons of descent, and are as follows:—

(A) Descent of an estate in fee simple.

The estate now, under s. 1 of the Land Transfer Act, 1897, vests in the personal representative of the deceased owner, but (s. 2) such representative is merely a trustee for the persons beneficially entitled and must transfer to such persons when required. The persons beneficially entitled are as follows:—

(1) Inheritances in the first place lineally descend to the issue of the purchaser, in infinitum, but the issue nearest in degree to the purchaser are preferred to the more remote; consequently the children of the purchaser are preferred to their own issue.

(2) The male issue is admitted before the female in the same degree; for instance, sons are admitted before daughters.

(3) Where two or more of the male issue are in equal degree of consanguinity to the purchaser, the eldest only shall inherit; but the females shall inherit all together.

(4) The lineal descendants of any person deceased shall represent him; that is, shall stand in the same place as the person himself would have done had he been living. Therefore, if the purchaser leaves a daughter, and a grandson by a deceased son, the grandson takes the land by right of representation, to the exclusion of the daughter. See PER CAPITA; PER STIRPES.

(5) On the failure of lineal descendants of the purchaser, the inheritance descends to his nearest lineal ancestor, or to the issue of such lineal ancestor, if he has died, according to the rule of representation (canon 4).

(6) The paternal line is preferred to the maternal. In other words, the father and all the male paternal ancestors of the purchaser and their descendants shall be admitted to inherit before any of the female paternal ancestors or their descendants; all the female paternal ancestors and their heirs before the mother or any of the maternal ancestors of the purchaser, or her or their descendants; and the mother and all the male maternal ancestors and their descendants before any of the female maternal ancestors or their descendants.

(7) A kinsman of the half-blood shall inherit next after a kinsman in the same degree of the whole-blood to the purchaser, and after the issue of such kinsman, when the common ancestor is a male, and next after the common ancestor, when such ancestor is a female. See BLOOD.

(8) In the admission of female ancestors, the mother of the more remote male (paternal or maternal) ancestor, and her heirs, shall be preferred to the mother of a less remote male (paternal or maternal) ancestor and her heirs.

(B) The descent of an estate tail follows the first four canons, unless it is barred, or unless it is limited to special heirs or to males or females, in which case the canons govern its descent so far as they are applicable. See TAIL; and infra.

(II) Customary descent is a descent regulated by the custom of the place where the land is situated, as in gavelkind and borough English land (q.v.); other peculiar kinds of descent occur in many manors.

A kind of descent which, before the enactment of the Land Transfer Act, 1897, was anomalous, takes place on the death of a mortgagee of land other than copyhold (Copyhold Act, 1894, s. 88), or on the death of a person who holds such land as sole trustee, in either of which cases the hereditament vests like a chattel real in the legal personal representative of the deceased mortgagee or trustee (Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, s. 30); and under s. 4 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, where a person has died after the 31st December, 1881, leaving an uncompleted contract for the sale of land enforceable against his heir or devisee, his personal representatives have power to convey the land so as to give effect to the contract.

An equitable estate or interest descends in the same way as if it were legal. Thus an equity of redemption in fee simple land descends to the heirs of the mortgagor in the some way as the fee simple would have descended.

With reference to the nature and degree of the consanguinity, descent is said to be lineal when it takes place from an ancestor to a descendant (e.g., from father to son) or vice versâ, and collateral or transversal when the parties are descended from a common ancestor, as in the case of uncle and nephew, cousin and cousin, etc. See ANCESTOR; CONSANGUINITY.

If an estate is limited to the heirs of the body of A, a deceased person who has left two sons, B and C, B takes by purchase as the first donee in tail, but nevertheless the estate devolves on his death as if he had taken it by descent from A, and, therefore, on B's death without issue the estate devolves on C as the heir of the body of A. This is called a descent per formam doni ("according to the form of the gift"), although it is in strictness neither a descent nor a purchase.

Before the Inheritance Act, 1833, there were several other kinds of descent, the most important of which were descent ex parte paternâ and maternâ (on the paternal or maternal side). If a person succeeded to land as heir to his mother and died intestate without issue, the land descended to his heir on the mother's side, that is, to a descendant of one of his mother's ancestors. In all other cases land descended to the heirs ex parte paternâ of the person last seised. If a person who had acquired land as heir to his mother conveyed it to a third person and then took a reconveyance to himself, he was said to break the descent, because on his death intestate the land would descend to his heirs ex parte paternâ. See HEIR; HEREDITAMENT; INHERITANCE.

Descent Cast is the same as what the older writers called a "descent which tolls entry." Where a person who had acquired land by disseisin, abatement, or intrusion, died seised of the land, the descent of it to his heir took away or "tolled" the real owner's right of entry, so that he could only recover the land by an action. The doctrine of descent cast was abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 39. The term seems to have originally meant the happening of any descent, because the law used to "cast" the land upon the heir.

Deserted premises may be recovered by the landlord in a summary way before a magistrate or justice of the peace, if they were held at a rent of three-fourths at least of their yearly value and one half-year's rent is due and no sufficient distress has been left by the tenant (Distress for Rent Act, 1737, s. 16; Deserted Tenements Act, 1817).

Desertion is where a husband voluntarily and without reasonable cause leaves his wife against her wish, or similarly where the wife leaves her husband. Where one spouse is compelled to leave in consequence of the misconduct of the other, then the spouse guilty of such misconduct, and not the spouse who leaves, is the party who is guilty of desertion. Desertion for two years or upwards affords ground for an application for judicial separation (q.v.), and if coupled with one of certain other matrimonial offences, for dissolution of marriage (q.v.). Desertion by a husband for any time, however short, enables the wife to apply for a protection order (q.v.), or to apply to a court of summary jurisdiction under s. 4 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, for an order giving her (s. 5) some or all of the following things: (a) a separation, which has the same effect as a judicial separation; (b) custody of children; (c) a weekly allowance not exceeding £2 payable by her husband. See RESTITUTION OF CONJUGAL RIGHTS; SEPARATION ORDER.

Designatio justiciariorum est à rege; jurisdictio vero ordinaria à lege (4 Inst. 74). (The appointment of justices [of the Court of King's Bench] is in the hands of the King; but their ordinary jurisdiction is given by the law.)

Designatio personæ. See PERSONA DESIGNATA.

Designatio unius est exclusio alterius, et expressum facit cessare tacitum (Co. Litt. 210*a*). (To mention one thing is to exclude another; and when you mention a thing expressly, anything which you have not mentioned is out of the matter.)

Designs. The registration of designs, and copyright therein, is now regulated by the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, ss. 49-61, 91, 93, as amended by the Patents and Designs Act, 1919, more especially by ss. 14, 15, 19, and also as set out in the schedule to the latter Act.

"'Design' means only the features of shape, configuration, pattern or ornament applied to any article by any industrial process or means, whether manual, mechanical or chemical, separate or combined, which in the finished article appeal to and are judged solely by the eye; but does not include any mode or principle of construction or anything which is in substance a mere mechanical device" (Act of 1919, s. 19).

A person registered as the proprietor of a design has copyright in it for five years from the date of registration (Act of 1907, s. 53). See PUBLICATION; NOVELTY.

De similibus idem est judicium. (In like cases the decision is the same.) Compare IN CONSIMILI CASU, etc., and LEX BENEFICIALIS, etc.

De son tort. See EXECUTOR.

De son tort demesne. (Of his own wrong.) Here demesne (q.v.) is used in its primary sense of own or private. The words de son tort demesne were used in an appropriate case as part of the replication to the defendant's plea in the old action of trespass. Thus where B, the defendant, pleaded that what was alleged against him had been done by the order of C, his master, then A, the plaintiff, might reply that B had done it de son tort demesne sans que C luy commande, that is to say, of his own wrong without being ordered by C.

Destructio = VASTUM (q.v.). See EXILIUM.

Destructive Insects, etc. The Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries (q.v.) has power to make orders for preventing the introduction and spreading of the Colorado Beetle (Destructive Insects Act, 1877), or of any insect, fungus or other pest destructive of agricultural or horticultural crops, or to trees or bushes (Destructive Insects Act, 1907). Such powers of the Ministry under these Acts as relate only to forest trees and timber were transferred to the Forestry Commissioners by s. 3 (2) of the Forestry Act, 1919. See FORESTRY.

Detachiare. Anciently this meant to make a seizure of chattels under authority of the law.

Detainer. When a person was in arrest in a civil proceeding and another writ for his arrest was lodged with the sheriff or other officer before his discharge, it was executed by detaining him. This was called a detainer. Detainers disappeared when arrest (q.v.) on mesne process, that is to say, before a judgment had been recovered, was abolished by s. 1 (now repealed) of the Judgments Act, 1838. As to detainer of lands, see FORCIBLE DETAINER.

Detainer, Writ of. A writ authorising the detention of a man (already in custody for debt, etc.) upon a cause of action other than that upon which he had been arrested originally: see the Schedule to the statute 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 39, now repealed by the Civil Procedure Acts Repeal Act, 1879.

Detaining Officer. An officer appointed by the Board of Trade to provisionally detain ships believed to be unsafe (Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 459). See COURTS OF SURVEY.

De tallagio non concedendo. The statute 25 Edw. 1, which enacts that no tallage or aid shall be levied without the assent of archbishops, bishops, earls, barons, knights, burgesses, and other freemen of the land. The statute has always been relied on as an authority for the constitutional doctrine that there can be no taxation except by Parliament.

Determinable; Determination; Determine. An estate is said to determine when it comes to an end, whether by limitation, effluxion of time, merger, surrender or otherwise. When an estate is subject to a condition, defeasance, or the like, it is said to be determinable on the happening of the event specified in the condition. Thus an estate given to a woman during widowhood is determinable on her marrying again.

Detinue was the name of the action which, before 1875, was the remedy where a person claimed the specific return of goods wrongfully detained from him, or their value; as where A lent B a horse, and B refused to return it. The particular form of action known as detinue has been abolished since 1875; but an action in the ordinary form which is instituted for the specific return of goods unlawfully detained is still properly described as an action of detinue (R. S. C., App. C., s. vi., No. 2). See ACTIONS; DELIVERY, WRIT OF.

Deus solus hæredem facere potest non homo (Co. Litt. 7). (God alone, and not man, can make an heir.) No instrument or act in the law can make one an "heir," which signifies the person to whom realty descends by right of blood. See various maxims under HÆRES.

Devastavit ("he has wasted [the assets]") is the name given to any violation or neglect of duty by a personal representative which makes him personally responsible to persons having claims on the assets, e.g., creditors and legatees. Thus if a personal representative applies the assets in satisfaction of a debt due by himself to a third person, or collusively sells the testator's goods at an undervalue, or pays claims which he is not bound to satisfy, he is guilty of a devastavit.

In ordinary cases the remedy for a devastavit is by proceedings to make him responsible or to administer the estate under the direction of the Court. See ADMINISTRATION; ACTION.

There is also a remedy in some cases by writ of fi. fa. de bonis propriis, and there was formerly also a remedy by the now obsolete scire fieri inquiry. See those titles.

Development. The Development and Road Improvement Funds Acts, 1909 and 1910, were passed in order to promote the development of the agricultural industry, forestry, drainage, transport, harbours, inland navigation and fisheries (Act of 1909, s. 1) through eight Development Commissioners, to be appointed by the Crown, who hold office for a period of ten years but who may be reappointed, one to retire every year, four to be a quorum, only two to be paid and such two to receive collectively not more than £3,000 a year (Act of 1909, s. 3; Act of 1910, s. 1).

Devenerunt. A writ (obsolete since the enactment of the statute 12 Car. 2, c. 24) which, on the death of the heir of a tenant in capite, under age, and in the wardship of the king, was issued to the escheator (q.v.) commanding him to enquire what lands and tenements came to the king by the death of the tenant. Compare DIEM CLAUSIT, etc.

Deviation, in the law of marine insurance, happens where there is a wilful and unnecessary departure from the due course of the voyage of a ship, for any, even the shortest, time. A deviation discharges the underwriters from liability in ordinary cases, but in some cases a deviation is justifiable, e.g., for the purpose of saving life.

In the law of railways, a deviation is an alteration of the line of a railway. The Railways Clauses (Consolidation) Act, 1845, s. 15, authorises a company which is subject to its provisions to deviate laterally from the line marked on the deposited plans within the limits delineated thereon; s. 14 limits the deviations which are permitted in gradients, curves, tunnels, or other engineering works; and other deviations are dealt with in ss. 11, 12, and 13.

Device. Among the "marks" which may be registered under the Trade Marks Act, 1905, is a distinctive device (ss. 3, 9 (5)), which comes within s. 9 of the Act and is not excluded by s. 11. Colour may enter into the device (s. 10).

De Viris Religiosis. See MORTMAIN.

Devisavit vel non. Under the old Chancery practice, where an heir at law was a party to proceedings affecting the real estate of his ancestor under an alleged will, he was generally entitled to an issue devisavit vel non, that is, to have the question, whether his ancestor devised the lands or not, tried in a common law Court before a jury. The practice was in effect abolished by the statute 25 & 26 Vict. c. 42. See ESTABLISHMENT OF WILLS.

Devise; Devisee. A devise, though often used as meaning a legacy, is properly a gift of land or other realty by will, e.g., "I devise Blackacre to A. for life and after his death to B."; this gives A. an estate for life and B. the fee simple (see ESTATE). A. and B. are called devisees.

A devise may be either specific (as in the above instance), or residuary, e.g., "I devise the residue of my land and realty to C.," which gives C. all lapsed and undisposed-of real property belonging to the testator at his death (Wills Act, 1837, ss. 24, 25). But in some respects every residuary devise is in effect specific, for where the testator's personal estate is insufficient for the payment of his debts, the specific devisees must contribute towards their payment rateably with the residuary devisee, while in the case of personalty the debts are payable out of the residue in exoneration of the legacies. See ASSETS.

An executory devise is such a direct limitation by will of a contingent interest in land as would be void at common law if made by deed; executory devises are therefore opposed on the one hand to limitations allowed at common law (such as contingent remainders), and on the other hand to limitations by use (see USE), though they scarcely differ from the latter except in form. Thus if A. devises land to B. (a minor) and his heirs, but if he should die under twenty-one, then to C., this is an executory devise to C., the effect of which might also be produced by a shifting use, though not by a conveyance at common law, because no limitation over can follow the limitation of an estate in fee simple (see LIMITATION). Executory devises must not transgress the rule against perpetuities, or the provisions of the Thellusson Act (q.v.).

Devoir. Used in the statute 34 Edw. 3, c. 18, as meaning a customs duty.

Devonshiring = DENSHIRING (q.v.).

Dialogus de Scaccario. This is an account, given in the form of an imaginary dialogue, of the Exchequer as it existed in 1178. It is now generally held to have been written by Richard Fitzneale or Fitznigel, Bishop of London from 1189 to 1198, who, as Treasurer of the Exchequer from 1169 to 1189, was thoroughly acquainted with the subject of the dialogue. A copy of the dialogue is in Stubbs' Select Charters (8th ed.), at pp. 200-241.

Diamorphine. See DRUGS, DANGEROUS.

Dica. Used in the Red Book of the Exchequer as meaning a tally (q.v.) for accounts.

Dice. Games played with dice are treated as unlawful by the statute 13 Hen. 8, c. 9; and all games played with dice, except backgammon and similar games, are prohibited by the Gaming Acts, 1738, 1739 and 1744. The prohibition extends not merely to dice, but also to "any other instrument, engine or device in the nature of dice" (Act of 1739, s. 9). See GAMING; UNLAWFUL GAMES.

Dickar; Deckar. An ancient measure of leather, containing ten hides.

Dictum is an observation by a judge on a legal question suggested by a case before him, but not arising in such a manner as to require decision by him. It is therefore not binding as a precedent on other judges, although it may be entitled to more or less respect. "Dictum" is an abbreviation of obiter dictum, "a remark by the way."

In early times dictum meant the award of an arbitrator, who himself was known as the dictor.

Dictum de Kenilworth. (The award made between the king and his commons at Kenilworth.) This is printed (under this title) in the Statutes of the Realm as 51 & 52 Hen. 3. In the Statutes at Large (Vol. 9, App., p. 1), it is printed simply as the Dictum de Kenilworth. It was not in fact a statute: it was merely a declaration of the terms arranged between Edward I. (then Prince Edward) and the barons who had been on the side of Simon de Montfort.

Diem clausit extremum (="he has died") is a special writ of extendi facias, or extent in chief, issuing after the death of the king's debtor, against his lands and chattels. It sets out with stating the death of the debtor, from whence it derives its name. See EXTENT.

Anciently a writ known by this name was issued upon the death of a tenant in capite commanding the escheator (q.v.) of the county to enquire of what lands such tenant had died possessed and who was the next heir. Compare DEVENERUNT; see MANDAMUS.

Dies amoris. In Coke's time this meant the fourth day of each term, that being the day upon which defendants could appear to writs. The fiction was that defendants were allowed only by the favour of the Court to appear at all.

Dies communes de banco. (General days in bank.) An enactment printed under these titles in the Statutes of the Realm (Vol. 1, p. 208), s.v. Statutes of Uncertain Date and in the Statutes at Large, as 51 Hen. 3, st. 2.

Dies communes de dote. (General days in dower.) An enactment printed under these titles in the Statutes of the Realm (Vol. 1, p. 208), s.v. Statutes of Uncertain Date, and in the Statutes at Large as 51 Hen. 3, st. 3.

Dies datus. (The day given.) It was the same thing as the dies amoris (q.v.).

Dies Dominicus non est juridicus (Co. Litt. 135). (The Lord's Day (Sunday) is not juridical); that is to say, it is not a day for legal proceedings. See SUNDAY.

Dies marchiæ. In the reign of Richard II. this meant a day every year on which the wardens of the English and Scotch marches or borders used to meet in order to adjust differences which had arisen, and to arrange for the continuance of peace between the two countries.

Dies non or Dies non juridicus is a day on which no legal business can be transacted. Such is Sunday, Christmas Day, Good Friday, etc. See VACATION.

Dieu et mon droit. (God and my right.) The motto used on the royal arms of England since the time of Richard I.

Dieu son act. Anciently this meant the act of God (q.v.).

Difforciare rectum. (To deny justice or to deny a man of his right.) Used by Mathew Paris in 1164.

Digamy. A second marriage contracted after the termination of the first marriage, as distinguished from bigamy (q.v.). The use of digamy as a synonym of bigamy is obsolete.

Digest. In jurisprudence, a digest properly means a collection of rules of law on concrete cases, as opposed to a code, which consists of abstract rules of law. In other words, a code lays down principles, while a digest gives examples of their application to certain combinations of facts. A digest may be either a legislative work (as the Digest of Justinian), or it may be the work of a private author. See CODE.

In English phraseology, "digest" sometimes means (i) a collection of headnotes of decided cases, arranged either alphabetically or systematically, of which Comyns's (see ABRIDGMENTS), and Mews' Digests are well-known examples; and sometimes (ii) a collection of principles or abstract rules of law, made by a private author, and which if promulgated by the Legislature would be called a code: such are the Digests of the Criminal Law and of the Law of Evidence, compiled by Mr. Justice Stephen.

Dignity. A dignity is the right to bear a title of nobility or honour. Some dignities, such as those of peers and baronets, are created either by writ or by letters patent; a knight bachelor is created by corporeal investiture. Dignities are either for life, such as knighthood or the peerages of Lords of Appeal in Ordinary (q.v.), or of inheritance, such as baronetcies and ordinary peerages. A dignity of inheritance may also exist by prescription. A dignity of inheritance is an incorporeal hereditament. It is generally limited either to the heir or the heirs of the body of the grantee, and follows the rules governing the ordinary descent of land. If, however, a man holds an earldom to him and the heirs of his body, and dies leaving only daughters, the dignity is in suspense or abeyance until the Crown declares which daughter shall hold it during her life. See ABEYANCE; OFFICE.

Dilapidations. In ecclesiastical law, an incumbent who incurs dilapidations, that is, allows the buildings of the benefice to fall into ruin, or pulls them down, or commits waste on the timber or lands of the benefice, is liable in the Ecclesiastical Courts to be punished for so doing and to be compelled to make good the injury. He and his personal representatives are also liable to an action at law by his successor in the benefice. (See WASTE.) As to the surveying of dilapidations, and as to loans to incumbents to enable them to execute repairs, see the Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Acts, 1871 and 1872.

Dilatory. See PLEA.

Diligence is care. As to the effect of the absence of diligence, see BAILMENT; NEGLIGENCE.

Diligiatus. Outlawed. See Leg. Hen. 1, c. 45.

Dilligrout. Anciently this was a tenure in sergeanty (q.v.) under which the lands were held of the king by the service of providing dilligrout (a species of pottage) for the king's table at the coronation.

Dime. The same as disme (q.v.).

Diminution. Formerly, where a record in a proceeding was ordered to be sent or certified by an inferior to a superior Court for the purpose of review, and the record was not completely or truly certified, the party injured thereby might allege a diminution of the record (i.e., its incompleteness), and a certiorari was awarded.

Dimisorry Letters. Where a candidate for Holy orders has a title of ordination in one diocese and is to be ordained in another, the bishop of the former diocese gives letters dimissory to the bishop of the latter to enable him to ordain the candidate. See TITLE.

Diocesan Courts. These are ecclesiastical Courts taking cognizance of all matters arising within the diocese of each bishop. They consist of the Consistorial Court (q.v.); the Courts of one or more commissaries (q.v.); and the Courts of Archdeacons, exercising general or limited jurisdictions, according to the terms of their patents, or to local custom, or to the authority of statute. See PROVINCIAL COURTS.

Diocese is a district subject to a bishop's jurisdiction, and is divided into archdeaconries (q.v.). See BISHOPRIC; PROVINCE.

Diplomatic Privilege. See AMBASSADOR.

Direction. When an action is tried before a jury, and a question of law arises on which the verdict of the jury partly depends, the judge directs them on the subject, that is, tells them what the law is, and they find accordingly. If the judge directs them erroneously, this is a misdirection, and may be a ground for granting a new trial. (See TRIAL.) When money is to be paid into or out of Court or securities, etc., are to be delivered out of Court, the Paymaster-General upon receipt of an order made out in accordance with r. 23 of the Supreme Court Funds Rules, 1915, prepares what is known as a direction giving effect to the order (r. 47), such direction to be in the form prescribed by the Treasury (r. 103), and to be sufficient authority for a bank or other company to act thereon (r. 49).

Directions, Summons for. In every action in the Supreme Court other than an Admiralty action, or an action in which the writ is specially endorsed under Ord. 3, r. 6, or proceedings commenced by originating summons, the plaintiff, within fourteen days after appearance by the defendant must take out a summons for directions (Ord. 30, rr. 1, 8), upon the hearing of which such order as may be just is made with respect to the proceedings in the action, and particularly with respect to pleading, particulars, admissions, discovery, interrogatories, inspection of documents, etc., commissions, examination of witnesses, place and mode of trial (r. 2). The object of the summons for direction is to replace by one comprehensive application a multiplicity of applications as to the several matters mentioned in r. 2.

Director of a company is a person elected by the shareholders or otherwise appointed to superintend the management of the company's affairs. There are usually several directors, with power for a certain number of them to act without the others. See QUORUM. The directors are the agents of the company, and it is bound by all acts done by them within the scope of their authority. They are not trustees in the proper sense of the word. See TRUSTEE; also COMPANY; QUALIFICATION; ARTICLES OF ASSOCIATION.

Director of Public Prosecutions. By the Prosecution of Offences Act, 1879, provision was made for the appointment of an officer called the Director of Public Prosecutions, whose duty it is, subject to the superintendence of the Attorney-General, to institute, undertake, carry on or give advice or assistance in criminal proceedings which appear to be of importance or difficulty, or in which special circumstances, or the refusal or failure of a person to proceed with a prosecution, appear to render the action of the Director necessary to secure the due prosecution of an offender. By the Prosecution of Offences Act, 1884, the Solicitor of the Treasury (q.v.) was made Director of Public Prosecutions, but this enactment was repealed by the Prosecution of Offences Act, 1908, s. 1 (1), and the Director of Public Prosecutions now exists again as he did under the Act of 1879. He must be a barrister or solicitor of ten years' standing (Act of 1908, s. 1 (4)). Such number of assistant directors as are required may be appointed (ib., s. 1 (1)). An assistant director must be a barrister or solicitor of seven years' standing (ib., s. 1 (4)).

Directory. A provision in an Act of Parliament, rule of procedure, or the like, is said to be directory when it is to be considered as a mere direction or instruction of no obligatory force, and involving no invalidating consequence for its disregard, as opposed to an imperative provision, which must be followed. The general rule is that the provisions of a statute relating to the performance of a public duty are so far directory that, though neglect of them may be punishable, yet it does not affect the validity of the acts done under them; as in the case of a statute requiring an officer to prepare and deliver a document to another officer on or before a certain day.

Diriment Impediments. Those bars to a marriage which make it void ab initio.

Disability is the absence of legal ability to do certain acts or enjoy certain benefits; such as the disability to sue, to take lands by descent, to enter into contracts, to alien property, etc.

Disability is called general when it disables the person from doing all acts of a given kind, or special when it disables him from doing a specific act. Examples of general disability occur in the case of outlaws and convicts, who cannot bring any action or suit in their own right, and lunatics and infants, who cannot alien property or enter into contracts except for necessaries. The disabilities of married women have been greatly modified by the Married Women's Property Acts (q.v.). A special disability occurs where a person who has entered into a contract becomes incapable of performing it. Such a disability generally arises by act of the party; as where a person who has contracted to marry a woman marries another, and thereby disables himself from performing his promise.

As a rule "disability" means a general disability, especially a disability to sue. Disabilities of this kind are of importance with reference to the Statutes of Limitation and the Prescription Act, 1833 (q.v.), which allow persons under certain disabilities an extended time within which to enforce their rights.

Disabilities are either personal or absolute. A personal disability is one which is confined to a certain person, such as that of an infant, married woman, etc. An absolute or perpetual disability is that which not only attaches to the person disabled, but also to his descendants or successors. Thus formerly where a person was attainted of treason or felony, that was an absolute and perpetual disability by corruption of blood for any of his posterity to claim any inheritance in fee-simple, either as heir to him or to any ancestor above him. But this rule as to attainder has been abolished except in the case of lineal descent from persons outlawed (Inheritance Act, 1833, s. 10; Forfeiture Act, 1870, s. 1); and outlawry is now practically obsolete.

Disability is also used in the special sense of disability to enter into the contract of marriage. This may be either canonical (such as the natural inability at the time of marriage to consummate the marriage) or civil. A canonical disability makes the marriage voidable, while a civil disability (except that for want of age) makes it void. Examples of civil disabilities are: (1) a prior and existing marriage of one of the parties; (2) want of reason; (3) consanguinity or affinity within the prohibited degrees; (4) want of age, viz., the fact that the male is under fourteen or the female under twelve.

Disable. In its ordinary sense, to disable is to cause a disability (q.v.).

In the old language of pleading, to disable was to take advantage of one's own or another's disability; thus, according to Coke, it was "an express maxim of the common law that the party shall not disable himself;" but "this disability to disable himself . . . is personal."

Disabling. A disabling statute is one which restricts a pre-existing right. Thus the statute 13 Eliz. c. 10, deprived corporations of their power to lease their lands for any term however long, and restricted them to leases for not more than twenty-one years.

Disadvocare. Anciently this meant to deny, or not to acknowledge, a thing.

Disafforest. To deprive land of the character of forest (q.v.). In mediæval times disafforested lands were known as purlieus and remained subject to certain rights, known as forestal rights, of the Crown. Now when any land is disafforested the disafforesting Act of Parliament goes on to enact that all forestal rights in respect of it shall cease.

Disappropriation is where the appropriation of a benefice is severed, either by the patron presenting a clerk, or by the corporation which has the appropriation being dissolved. See APPROPRIATION.

Disbar. When a barrister is expelled from his Inn for misconduct, he is said to be disbarred. The effect of such expulsion is that he ceases to be a barrister. A barrister may also be disbarred upon his own application if he, for instance, desires to become a solicitor:

and in such case, of course, no discredit attaches to the disbarring.

Discharge. To discharge a right or obligation is to deprive it of its binding force, and to discharge a person is to release him from an obligation; thus payment discharges a debt, and in the case of a guarantie, an alteration of the contract, without the consent of the surety, will in general discharge him. Discharge is a generic term; its principal species are rescission, release, accord and satisfaction, performance, judgment, composition, bankruptcy, merger (q.v.).

Discharge by operation of law is where the discharge takes place whether it was intended by the parties or not: thus if a creditor appoints his debtor his executor, and the debtor acts as executor, the debt is discharged by operation of law, because the executor cannot have an action against himself; but in equity the debtor is bound to account for the debt as part of the assets of the testator unless the circumstances are such as to indicate that the testator intended to forgive the debt.

In the law of bankruptcy, a discharge is the proceeding by which a person who has been adjudicated a bankrupt is freed from all his debts provable in the bankruptcy, with a few exceptions (as to which see s. 28 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914), and is also enabled to acquire property without its vesting in the trustee. As to the grant, conditional grant, suspension or refusal of the discharge, see the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, ss. 26, 27.

To discharge the order of a Court or judge is to set it aside, on an application made for that purpose, either to the Court in which the order was made, or to a Court of Appeal. An order nisi is said to be discharged where the Court refuses to make it absolute. See Absolute; Nisi.

At the trial of an action in the High Court, it sometimes becomes necessary to dispense with the further services of the jury, either on account of the sudden illness of a juryman, or because they cannot agree; in either of which cases it is now the practice to discharge them. The judge has a like power in a criminal case. In no case is a discharge a bar to a further trial.

A prisoner or defendant is discharged from arrest or imprisonment when he is set at liberty.

Disclaim; Disclaimer. To disclaim a right, interest or office is to expressly renounce all claim to it or refuse to accept it. Thus where property is conveyed to a person upon certain trusts, he may disclaim the trust unless he has accepted the office or has acted as trustee. The act of disclaiming is called a disclaimer, and is generally evidenced by a deed. See Renunciation.

In the law of landlord and tenant a disclaimer is such act by the tenant as amounts in law to a repudiation of the relation of landlord and tenant. Notice to quit given by the tenant is the most ordinary instance: but there may also be a disclaimer where the tenant sets up title for himself, as by claiming possession of the title-deeds, or for some third party as by attorning to such third party.

Where a person has obtained a patent for an invention of which the title is inconsistent with the specification, or of which a part is neither new nor useful, the patent is in strictness void; but by the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, s. 21, a patentee is in such a case empowered, with the leave of the comptroller, to enter a disclaimer of any part of the specification, and the disclaimer is then deemed to be part of the letters patent or specification, so as to render them valid for the future. As to amendment of a specification by way of a disclaimer in proceedings before the Court, see s. 22. See Memorandum of Alteration.

As to amendment, by disclaimer, of the register of trade-marks, see the Trade Marks Act, 1905, s. 32.

Where any property of a bankrupt consists of land burdened with onerous covenants, of unmarketable shares in companies, of unprofitable contracts, or of property which is not saleable by reason of its binding the possessor to the performance of any onerous act or to the payment of any sum of money, the trustee in the bankruptcy may sign a disclaimer of the property, which has the effect of determining the contract, surrendering the lease, forfeiting the shares, or determining the estate and interest of the bankrupt, according to the nature of the property (Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 54), but a disclaimer of a lease cannot be made without the leave of the Court except in the cases specified in r. 276 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1915 (ib.).

Under the practice of the Court of Chancery before the Judicature Acts, if a bill claiming relief was filed against a person who had no interest in the subject-matter of the suit, his proper course was to file a disclaimer, alleging that he had not any right or title, and that he did not and never did claim any title to the subject-matter of the suit. In such a case the plaintiff generally had his bill dismissed as against that defendant.

Disclosure. When partners sue out a writ in the name of their firm, they or their solicitors must, on demand in writing by or on behalf of the defendant, furnish the names and addresses of the partners (Ord. 48a, r. 2). Any party to an action may apply by summons to a judge for a statement of the names and addresses of all persons who are partners in any firm which is a party in the action (ib., r. 1).

Discontinuance. In the procedure of the High Court discontinuance is where the plaintiff in an action voluntarily puts an end to it, either by giving notice in writing to the defendant before any step has been taken in the action subsequent to the statement of defence, or at any other time by order of the Court or a judge (R.S.C., Ord. 26, r. 1). The effect of discontinuance is that the plaintiff has to pay the defendant's costs, but may commence another action for the same cause (ib.). (See WITHDRAWAL.) If the defendant has put in a counter-claim it may be proceeded with notwithstanding the discontinuance (Ord. 21, r. 16). A defendant may by leave of the Court discontinue any counter-claim set up by him (Ord. 26, r. 1).

In the County Court discontinuance is governed by Ord. 9 of the County Court Rules.

See MISCONTINUANCE as to the old discontinuance.

Formerly, in the law of real property, discontinuance was where a man wrongfully aliened certain lands or tenements and died, whereby the person entitled to them was deprived of his right of entry and was compelled to bring an action to recover them. The term was specially applied to alienations by husbands seised jure uxoris, by ecclesiastics seised jure ecclesiæ, and by tenants in tail: thus, if a tenant in tail aliened the land and died leaving issue, the issue could not enter on the land but was compelled to bring an action. The principal actions appropriate to discontinuances were: formedon, cui in vitâ, cui ante divortium. See those titles. The effect of discontinuance is taken away by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 39. See RECONTINUANCE; WITHDRAWAL.

Discovert. A woman is said to be discovert when she is either a spinster or a widow. See COVERT.

Discovery. Discovery is where one party to an action or suit obtains from another party information on oath. It is of two kinds—(i) discovery, by interrogatories, of facts relevant to the issue in the action, and within the knowledge of the party interrogated; and (ii) discovery of documents relating to the matters in question in the action, and in the possession of the party. The object of the former proceeding is partly to obtain information on subjects of which the interrogating party is ignorant or misinformed, and partly to obtain admissions so as to save the necessity of proving certain facts. For this purpose, the interrogating party delivers to the opposite party interrogatories (q.v.), to which the latter is bound to file his answer on oath. (See ANSWER.) For the purpose of obtaining discovery of documents, the party seeking it issues a summons, asking that the other party may be ordered to make an affidavit stating whether he has or has had in his possession any and what documents relating to the matters in question in the action (R. S. C., Ord. 31, r. 12). The proceeding is merely a preliminary to the more important one of production or inspection (q.v.), and see AFFIDAVIT; PRIVILEGE; CONFIDENTIAL COMMUNICATIONS.

Discovery in the County Court is governed by rules practically identical with those of the High Court. See the County Court Rules, Ord. 16.

Sometimes an action is brought against a person for the sole purpose of obtaining information to enable the plaintiff to take proceedings against some other person: such an action is called an action for discovery, as opposed to an action in which relief is sought against the defendant. But such an action is now very unusual: for under s. 24 (7) of the Judicature Act, 1873, the Court can give in any action all such discovery as could have been obtained before that Act by a separate action for discovery.

Discredit. To discredit a witness is to throw doubts on the correctness of a statement made by him in giving evidence, either—(i) by giving evidence of his general bad character for veracity, or by cross-examining him on the subject (see CHARACTER); (ii) by showing that he has on former occasions made statements inconsistent with the evidence he has given relevant to the cause; (iii) by proving misconduct connected with the proceedings, e.g., his having been bribed by one of the parties.

A party cross-examining an opponent's witness may use any of these modes. A party examining his own witness cannot as a rule discredit him, except collaterally, that is, by adducing evidence to show that the evidence he gave was untrue in fact. But if a witness prove adverse, that is to say hostile, the party calling him may, with the permission of the judge, use the second mode of discrediting above mentioned. See WITNESS.

Discretio est discernere per legem quid sit justum (10 Rep. 140). (Discretion is to know through law what is just.) "Discretion, when applied to a court of justice, means sound discretion guided by law. It must be governed by rule, not by humour; it must not be arbitrary, vague and fanciful, but legal and regular." (Lord Mansfield, 2 Burr. 25, 39.)

Discretion; Discretionary. Discretion is a man's own judgment as to what is best in a given case, as opposed to a rule governing all cases of a certain kind. Thus a trustee often has a discretion given him by the settlor as to the management or application of the trust property. So a judge or Court often has a discretion in making orders or imposing conditions on litigants, e.g., as to payment of costs, relaxing rules of practice, etc. Discretion, however, says Coke, is "to discerne by the right line of law, and not by the crooked cord of private opinion, which the vulgar call discretion"; and, therefore, if a judge proceeds on a wrong principle in a matter within his discretion, his order may be set aside by a Court of Appeal, and if a trustee acts fraudulently or negligently, the possession of a discretionary power will not protect him. See also DELEGATION; POWER; TRUST.

Disentailing Deed is an assurance by which a tenant in tail bars his estate tail so as to convert it into an estate in fee, either absolute or base. Under the Fines and Recoveries Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74), by which this mode of barring entails was introduced, every tenant in tail (other than a tenant in tail of lands granted by the Crown for services where the reversion is in the Crown, or a tenant in tail after possibility of issue extinct) may dispose of the land for an estate in fee simple absolute, so as to defeat the rights of all persons claiming under and after him: provided (i) that the disposition, in the case of freehold land, is by deed enrolled in the High Court of Justice, or if the land is copyhold, by surrender enrolled on the court rolls of the manor, unless the estate tail is equitable when it may be barred either by surrende. or by deed enrolled; and (ii) that if there is a protector under the instrument creating the entail, no disposition made without his consent by the tenant in tail bars the persons entitled in remainder or reversion expectant on the determination of the estate tail. An ordinary disentailing deed consists of a conveyance of the land by the tenant in tail to a nominee to such uses as the tenant in tail shall appoint, and in default of appointment to the use of him and his heirs. See ENROLMENT; SURRENDER; PROTECTOR; FEE.

Disforest. See DISAFFOREST.

Disgavel. To convert gavelkind (q.v.) land into ordinary freehold land. Several private Acts have been passed disgavelling land in Kent.

Dishonour. See BILL OF EXCHANGE; HONOUR.

Dismes; Decimæ. The same as tithes (q.v.). In the statute 25 Edw. 3, st. 7, disme is used as meaning the tax known as tenths (q.v.).

Dismissal of Action. If the plaintiff in an action does not deliver his statement of claim within the time during which he is bound to do so (R. S. C., Ord. 27, r. 1), or does not take out a summons for directions (q.v.) within the prescribed time (Ord. 30, r. 8), or does not set down the action for trial within the proper time (Ord. 36, r. 12), the defendant may apply to the Court or a judge to dismiss the action for want of prosecution. The defendant may also take this step if the plaintiff fails to comply with an order to answer interrogatories or produce documents (Ord. 31, r. 21); and the defendant, if he makes a like default, may have his defence, if any, struck out by order of the Court or a judge (ib.).

Dismissal of an action (under Ord. 36, r. 12) in consequence of the non-appearance of the plaintiff at the trial has the same effect as a dismissal on the merits, that is to say, after a hearing of the case, and so also has the dismissal of an action on a point of law under Ord. 25, rr. 2, 3. The effect of a dismissal on the merits is that the action cannot be brought on again.

Disorderly House is any common (i e., public) bawdy house, common gaming or betting house, or disorderly place of entertainment. It is a common nuisance, and therefore a misdemeanour at common law, to keep a disorderly house: but prosecutions in respect of any such places are usually under statute. See BETTING HOUSE; BROTHEL; GAMING HOUSE.

Disparage; Disparagement. As to disparaging statements, see DEFAMATION.

Under the law down to 1660, if a tenant of land held by knight's service died leaving an infant heir, the lord of whom the land was held was entitled to the marriage of the heir, that is, to bestow him or her in marriage. (See MARRIAGE.) It was necessary, however, that the proposed marriage should be without disparagement, that is, suitable to the heir; otherwise the heir was said to be disparaged.

Disparagements were of several kinds, of which the principal were: propter vitium animi, as where the proposed wife or husband was an idiot, etc.; propter vitium sanguinis (as in the case of villeins, "men of trade," etc.), and propter vitium corporis, by reason of some bodily defect.

Dispauper. A person who has been admitted to sue in formâ pauperis (q.v.) is said to be dispaupered when that privilege is withdrawn: as where it appears that he has means.

Dispensing Power. Under the Tudors and Stuarts the right of the Crown to dispense with (that is to say, to exempt from) the statute law was recognised by the Courts, subject, however, to the reservation that the Crown, while empowered to make lawful a mere malum prohibitum, could not legalise a thing malum in se nor grant a dispensation injurious to any subject. The dispensing power was ended by the Bill of Rights (q.v.), which, however, did not do more than declare that the dispensing power "as of late exercised" was illegal.

Disposition of Owner of Two Tenements. See EASEMENT.

Dissection. See ANATOMY.

Disseisin, says Coke, "is the wrongful putting out of him that is actually seised of a freehold"; in other words, the act of wrongfully depriving a person of the seisin of land, rents, or other hereditaments, as where a man not having a right of entry on certain lands or tenements enters into them and ousts him who has the freehold. In the case of land, the disseised person has both a right of entry and a right of action (q.v. and DESCENT CAST). In the case of incorporeal hereditaments, as the disseisin could only be by election (infra), the disseised person might either have an action for the disseisin, or avail himself of any other remedy which the law gave him (e.g., in the case of rent, distraint).

Equitable disseisin is where a person is wrongfully deprived of the equitable seisin of land, e.g. of the rents and profits.

Disseisin by election was where a person alleged or admitted himself to be disseised when he had not really been so. In former days this was done by persons in order to avail themselves of the writ of assize of novel disseisin, which was a convenient remedy available only by those who had been disseised of land. Since the abolition of forms of action, the distinction between disseisin and other modes of wrongful dispossession of land is no longer of practical importance. Disseisin of incorporeal hereditaments cannot be an actual dispossession, being in general nothing more than a disturbance of the owner in the means of coming at or enjoying them. Disseisin of an incorporeal hereditament therefore only took place at the election of the party injured, for the sake of more easily trying the right. As the remedy for a disseisin has now no advantages over other kinds of actions, disseisin by election has become obsolete.

See ABATEMENT OF FREEHOLD; DEFORCEMENT; DISTURBANCE; FRESH DISSEISIN; INTRUSION; POSSESSION; RE-DISSEISIN; SEISIN.

Disseisor; Disseisoress; Disseisee. These words mean respectively a man who unlawfully puts another out of possession of land, a woman who does the same thing, and the person who is so put out of possession.

Dissenter. See NON-CONFORMIST; RECUSANT.

Dissolution. This is the act of putting an end to a legal relation. In the case of a partnership, dissolution takes place either by operation of law (e.g. in ordinary cases on the death or bankruptcy of one of the partners), by agreement between the partners, by effluxion of time, or by the order of a Court in proceedings taken for the purpose (see WINDING-UP and Partnership Act, 1890, ss. 32-35). A state of things which entitles a partner to obtain an order of dissolution is called a ground of dissolution: such is the insanity, incapacity or misconduct of one of the partners, the hopeless state of the business, or any other state of things which makes it impossible to continue the partnership (ib. s. 35). In the case of a company incorporated under the Companies Acts, dissolution takes place when its affairs have been completely wound up and certain formalities have been gone through (Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, ss. 172, 195 (3) (4)), or where a company has ceased to carry on its business or operations (ib. s. 242). A Friendly, Industrial or Provident Society is dissolved by an instrument of dissolution setting forth the liabilities and assets of the society, signed by a certain majority of the members and registered (Friendly Societies Act, 1896, ss. 78 (1) (a) (b) (c), 79; Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893, ss. 58 (b), 61). A Friendly Society may also be dissolved by the award of the registrar (Friendly Societies Acts, 1896, s. 80, and 1908, s. 8). An Industrial or Provident Society may be wound up in practically the same way as if it were a company registered under the Companies Acts (Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893, s. 58 (a)).

A Building Society, whether incorporated or unincorporated, may be brought to an end by a winding up under the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, or, if it is a terminating society, by termination; an incorporated society may be dissolved (1) in manner prescribed by the rules, or (2) under an instrument of dissolution, or (3) under an award of the Registrar of Building Societies.

Other corporations may be dissolved in various ways, e.g. by surrender or forfeiture of a charter, etc.

The High Court, on proceedings taken in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division (q.v.) (and in certain cases (see DIVORCE COURT) at assizes), has power to decree the dissolution of a marriage on the petition of the husband alleging adultery by the wife, or on the petition of the wife alleging that the husband has been guilty of certain sexual offences punishable on conviction on indictment, or of incestuous adultery, or of adultery coupled with cruelty, or of adultery coupled either with desertion for two years or with such desertion as under s. 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1884, is deemed to have taken place by reason of non-compliance with an order for the restitution of conjugal rights (q.v.) (Matrimonial Causes Acts, 1857, s. 27; 1884, s. 5). (See ADULTERY; CRUELTY; DESERTION; DIVORCE; JUDICIAL SEPARATION.) A divorce of a foreign Court dissolving an English marriage—that is, a marriage celebrated in England—will be recognised by the English Courts: (a) if it was pronounced for grounds on which the marriage was liable to be dissolved in England; or (b) if the husband was at the time of the marriage domiciled in the foreign country. See DOMICILE; JUDGMENT.

As to the dissolution of Parliament, see PROROGATION.

Distinguenda sunt tempora (1 Rep. 24). (Times are to be distinguished.) This was said in connection with the question whether the statute 25 Hen. 8, passed in 1533, applied to facts before the Exchequer in 1592; and it meant that the circumstances of the two periods were to be taken into consideration.

Distinguished Service Order, The. Founded in 1886 to reward distinguished services in action of commissioned officers in the military (now including air) or naval service of the Crown. It consists only of Companions (D.S.O.) who rank next after C.V.O.s officially; but, as a matter of fact, the D.S.O. is a distinction which is coveted much more than is the C.V.O. (q.v.).

Distrain; Distrein. To distrain, or, to use the old spelling, distrein, is to seize goods by way of distress (q.v.).

Distress is the act of taking moveable property out of the possession of a wrongdoer, to compel the performance of an obligation, or to procure satisfaction for a wrong committed. An ordinary distress is effected by seizing the goods and placing them in a pound (q.v.). Some goods are privileged or exempted from distress, such as things in personal use or occupation at the time, instruments of husbandry, and trade fixtures, things in the possession of a trader but belonging to his customers, things in the custody of the law (e.g. goods seized under an execution), and things the property of a lodger (q.v.).

"Distress" also signifies the property distrained.

With reference to its origin, the right to distrain is either given by common law, or by statute, or created by reservation or agreement between the parties.

The principal kind of distress given by law is that used to compel payment of rent in arrear, especially by a landlord against his tenant. A right of distress (not often exercised) is given to every feudal lord (e.g. the lord of a manor) to compel his tenants to perform their services. A right of distress also formerly existed to enforce payment of amercements (q.v.) in certain cases. "Another injury for which distresses may be taken, is where a man finds beasts of a stranger wandering in his grounds, damage feasant, that is, doing him hurt or damage, by treading down his grass or the like, in which case the owner of the soil may distrein them till satisfaction be made him for the injury he has thereby sustained," says Blackstone. See POUND.

No distress can be made on an agricultural holding for rent which accrued due, or according to the course of dealing between the parties was payable, more than one year before distraining (Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908, s. 28); and agisted stock may be distrained only in the absence of other sufficient distress and then may be redeemed by the owner paying such amount, if any, as is due under the agistment agreement (ib. s. 29).

A statutory or statute-distress is given as a remedy for several duties and penalties imposed by special Acts of Parliament, such as assessments made by commissioners of sewers, or for the relief of the poor. See WARRANT.

A remedy by distress, analogous to the ordinary distress for rent, is sometimes created by agreement between the parties to secure the performance of an obligation: thus an annuity deed may include a conveyance of land to a trustee, with a power of distress whenever the annuity is in arrear. See GRAND DISTRESS.

With reference to the extent of the remedy, distresses are of three kinds. Formerly every distress was a mere pledge or security, and this is still so in the case of distress of cattle damage feasant, distress for services, etc., which merely entitle the distrainor to retain the property until satisfaction is made. (See LIEN.) Where the distress is for fealty or suit of Court, or against defendants convicted of nuisance in not repairing highways, etc., and in other cases where it is the only remedy and merely gives the right of detaining the goods, it is called a distress infinite, because it has no bounds with regard to its quantity and may be repeated from time to time, until the stubbornness of the party is conquered. In the case of distress for rent, for a Crown debt and some other cases, if the amount is not paid within a certain time the distrainor may sell the property distrained and satisfy the debt out of the proceeds.

Distress is an extra-judicial remedy. See REMEDY.

See REPLEVIN; RESCUE; LEVANT AND COUCHANT; GRAND DISTRESS; RENT.

Distress Committee. A body constituted under the Unemployed Workmen Act, 1905, s. 1, for each metropolitan borough, and, under s. 2 of the same Act, for every municipal borough or urban district with a population of 50,000, "with a view to the provision of employment or assistance for unemployed workmen in proper cases." See CENTRAL BODY.

Distribution. By the Statute of Distribution (22 & 23 Car. 2, c. 10), when the administrator of a deceased intestate has paid the expenses, debts, etc., he is directed to make "just and equal distribution of what remaineth clear amongst the wife and children or children's children, if any such be, or otherwise to the next of kindred to the dead person in equal degree," according to the rules contained in the statute; namely, if there is a widow and children, one-third is to go to the wife and the rest to the children in equal shares; if there are no children, then one-half is to go to the wife and the other half to the next of kin; and if there is no wife, then the whole property is divided amongst the children or next of kin. Under the Intestates Estates Act, 1890, if the intestate dies without issue, the widow gets the whole of his real and personal estates if they do not exceed £500 in value or, if they exceed that value, £500 in addition to the share to which she is otherwise entitled.

Formerly, local customs of distribution prevailed in certain places (e.g. the City of London), but they were abolished by the statute 19 & 20 Vict. c. 94. See CUSTOM OF LONDON.

See BLOOD; DEAD MAN'S PART; NEXT OF KIN; REPRESENTATION; PER CAPITA.

District Boards. These were boards constituted under the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, ss. 31-41, for the management of the sanitary affairs of groups of such London parishes as were formed into districts. Their powers, as also the similar powers of the vestries of single parishes which were not included in any district under the Act of 1855, were transferred by the London Government Act, 1899, to the present metropolitan boroughs. See SEWER.

The district boards at present existing are the boards elected under the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, s. 42, for the administration of the school districts (as regards the management of any class of infant poor not over the age of sixteen chargeable to the areas forming the districts) which may be constituted under s. 40 of that Act. See also the Poor Law Act, 1903.

District Council. District councils are divided into urban district councils and rural district councils. These designations were created by the Local Government Act, 1894. That Act, by ss. 21 (1), 84 (1), 85 (5), gave, except in boroughs, the name of urban district council to the body which up to then had been the urban sanitary authority; but in boroughs the name of the corporation and council remain unchanged, and the powers and duties of an urban district council are exercised by them. The Act, by s. 24, created and gave the name of rural district council to the bodies which under s. 25 are the sole sanitary authorities and the chief highway authorities of the districts which (s. 21 (2)) before the passing of the Act had been known as rural sanitary districts.

Districtione Scaccarii, De. The statute given as 51 Hen. 3, s. 4, in the Statutes at Large, which provides "What distress may be taken for the King's debts and how it shall be used."

District Parish. A parish may be divided into two or more district parishes by an Order in Council issued under the Church Building Act, 1818, in order to give effect, with the consent of the bishop of the diocese, to a scheme of the Church Building Commissioners. Such a scheme is prepared when a parish of large area has become so thickly populated as to become unworkable as a single parish. The church of a district parish is a parish church for all ecclesiastical purposes, except that it is only a perpetual curacy.

District Registries. By the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 60, provision is made for the establishment of district registries of the High Court of Justice, and for the appointment of district registrars: and under the Judicature Act, 1875, s. 13, two registrars may be appointed for the one district registry. District registries have accordingly been established in the principal country towns of England and Wales. The present number is eighty-nine. The limits of a district registry are in general conterminous with those of the County Court of the town in which the registry is situated; about three district registries each cover the whole of two County Court districts; and about five cover areas which are conterminous with no County Court district or districts. Only about one-sixth of England and Wales is within the limits of any district registry. Thus there is no district registry in, for instance, Cornwall.

An action in the High Court proceeds in a district registry when the plaintiff has issued the writ in that registry and all the defendants have appeared there, unless (Judicature Act, 1873, s. 65; Ord. 35, rr. 13-16) it is removed into the High Court. A defendant is only bound to appear in a district registry if he either resides or carries on business in the district (R. S. C., Ord. 12, r. 4); otherwise he has the option of appearing in London (Ord. 12, r. 5). When an action proceeds in a district registry, all the proceedings in the action down to and including final judgment, and the subsequent proceedings necessary to enforce it (including the issue of writs of execution, garnishee and charging orders) are taken in the district registry (Judicature Act, 1873, s. 64). The trial or hearing of the action must, unless where the rules otherwise provide, take place in the same way as if the action had been instituted in London, that is, before a judge of the High Court in London or at the assizes, with or without a jury, according to the practice applicable to the particular case (Ord. 35, r. 1). The district registrar may enter judgment or make an order for an account under Order 15 either by consent of the parties or by reason of the defendant's default (Ord. 35, r. 1).

The district registrar exercises most of the functions of a judge at chambers (Ord. 35, r. 6); an appeal lies from him to a judge of the High Court sitting in chambers (ib. r. 9).

The district registries are therefore in effect local branches of the Central Office and Judges' Chambers of the High Court, and are under the control of the Court accordingly (Ord. 35, r. 11). For more detailed information, reference should be made to the Judicature Act, 1873, ss. 60-66 and to R. S. C., Ord. 35, generally.

There are district registries of the Probate Division of the High Court in over fifty provincial towns: application for a grant of probate or letters of administration can be made at a district registry if the deceased had resided in the district allotted thereto (Court of Probate Act, 1857, s. 46, Sch. A.: see also s. 48, and the Court of Probate Act, 1858, s. 20).

Distringas is a writ so called from its commanding the sheriff to distrain on a person for a certain purpose. The old distringas to compel appearance on the civil side, the distringas juratores, and several other varieties of the writ, were abolished by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852

Distringas to enforce appearance to an indictment, information or inquisition in the King's Bench Division is however still available under the Crown Office Rules, 1906. See Rule 85 as to its issue on the non-appearance of a defendant generally, and Rule 87 as to its issue, whether merely as a writ of distringas or as alias and pluries writs of distringas, on the non-appearance as defendants of bodies corporate or inhabitants of a given place.

Rule 89 of the Crown Office Rules, 1906, provides for the issue of the writ of distringas in the now improbable case of outlawry.

Where a writ of fieri facias has been sued out, and the sheriff, after returning that he has levied but that the goods remain in his hands for want of buyers, goes out of office, the execution creditor, instead of suing out a venditioni exponas (q.v.), may sue out a writ called a distringas nuper vicecomitem ("that you distrain the late sheriff"), directed to the present sheriff, commanding him to distrain the late sheriff to compel him to sell the goods (see R. S. C., Ord. 43, r. 5); but this remedy against the late sheriff is now seldom necessary, the transfer of partly executed writs and processes from the late to the present sheriff being provided for by the Sheriffs Act, 1887, s. 28.

A writ of distringas, directed to the coroner, may be issued against a sheriff if he neglects to execute a writ of venditioni exponas; but nowadays such a case rarely, if ever, arises.

Where defendants are convicted of nuisance in not repairing a highway, payment of their fines does not release them. Either a fresh indictment may be preferred or writs of distringas (under which they can be distrained in infinitum) (see DISTRESS) may issue.

Fines and recognisances imposed or forfeited at quarter or petty sessions may be levied upon a writ of distringas (Levy of Fines Act, 1822, s. 2; Quarter Sessions Act, 1849, s. 17). Fines imposed or sums of money ordered to be paid by petty sessions or other courts of summary jurisdiction are, however, recoverable by the simpler remedy of a distress warrant (Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, s. 4): and that remedy is always used.

Distringas Juratores. A writ upon which the trial of causes at nisi prius was had in the Court of King's Bench. It commanded the sheriff to distrain the jurors named in the panel thereto by their lands and goods so as to enforce their appearance in that Court, or before the judges of assize and nisi prius, in order to make a jury. It was abolished by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 104. Compare HABEAS CORPUS JURATORUM.

Distringas, Notice in Lieu of. The commonest species of distringas (q.v.) was that formerly issued by the Court of Exchequer, then by the Court of Chancery, and lastly by the High Court of Justice, to prevent a public company (most commonly the Bank of England) from permitting the transfer of a sum of stock in their books, or from paying the dividends on it, without previously giving notice to the person who had obtained the writ or "put on the distringas." The proceedings were to a great extent of a fictitious character, and were abolished and replaced by the present practice in 1880. Under the present practice (as to which see R. S. C., Ord. 46, rr. 2-11) no writ is issued, and in lieu of it a notice is given to the Bank or other company to stop the transfer of stock or payment of dividends: this notice is filed in the Central Office, with an affidavit stating that the person giving it is beneficially interested in the stock; an office copy of the affidavit and a duplicate of the notice are served on the Bank or company. The proceeding is commonly used to prevent unauthorised or fraudulent dealings with stock by the person in whose name it is standing, e.g. a trustee. As soon as the Bank receive a request from that person to permit a dealing with the stock, they notify the person who has served the notice, and if he does not obtain an order or injunction from a Court to restrain the dealing within eight days from the stockholder's request, the Bank are compelled to allow the stockholder to deal with the stock.

See STOP ORDER; RESTRAINING ORDER.

Disturbance. In the law of incorporeal hereditaments, disturbance is where a man infringes a right of easement, common, profit à prendre, franchise or similar right; e.g. by obstructing an ancient light. The rights of the aggrieved person are the same as in a case of private nuisance, namely, either by abatement, action for damages, or injunction. Where the disturbance consists in refusing to pay toll for a market, ferry, etc., or in wrongfully putting beasts on a common, the person injured also has a right of distress.

To the same class of injuries belongs disturbance of patronage, or the wrongful hindering or obstruction of a patron in the presentation of his clerk to a benefice. As to the remedies for such disturbance, see QUARE IMPEDIT; USURPATION; and also the Benefices Act, 1898.

In the law of tenure, disturbance is where a stranger, by menaces, force, persuasion or otherwise, causes a tenant to leave his tenancy: this disturbance of tenure is an injury to the lord for which an action will lie.

As to public disturbances, see AFFRAY; BRAWLING; RIOT; UNLAWFUL ASSEMBLY; also the Offences against the Person Act, 1861, s. 36 et seq.

See COMPENSATION FOR DISTURBANCE.

Diversity. Anciently this was a plea in bar of execution, the prisoner when put forward for sentence pleading that he was not the person who had previously been attainted (see ATTAINDER), whereupon a jury was impanelled to try the issue raised by the plea.

Diversity of Courts, The; Diversité des Courtes. A book, probably written in the reign of Henry VIII., which treats of the common law, as distinguished from the equitable, jurisdiction of the Chancellor (see CHANCERY), and deals also with the King's Bench, the Common Bench, the Exchequer, the Cinque Ports, and the Court Baron.

Dives. In the practice of the Chancery Division down to 1883, "dives costs" were costs on the ordinary scale, as opposed to the costs allowed in an earlier time to a successful pauper suing or defending in formâ pauperis, and which consisted only of his costs out of pocket. Since 1883, in all the Divisions, successful paupers have been entitled to out-of-pocket costs only and cannot be allowed anything as remuneration for solicitors or counsel. See IN FORMÂ PAUPERIS.

Divest. To divest is to take away from a person an estate or interest which has already vested in him. The term is generally used with reference to gifts by will. Thus where a testator gives property to A. for life, and after his death to B., and then directs that on a certain event the property shall go to C., then B. takes a vested estate or interest subject to being divested on the happening of the event. The rule is that if the substituted legatee or devisee (C.) cannot take, then the original estate becomes absolute. Thus where a testator gave property to A. for her life, and after her death to her heirs, etc.; but in case A. should marry and have no child, then the property to belong to B.; A. married and had no child, and B. died in her lifetime without issue: it was held that A.'s estate became absolute. See DEFEASIBLE.

Divided Parishes Acts. The popular title of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876, the Poor Law Act, 1879, and the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1882. Before these Acts were passed, a very large number of parishes were either intersected by the boundaries of other local government areas so that the parish was partly in a borough and partly in a rural district, partly in one rural district and partly in another, or partly in one county and partly in another, or else the parish itself was divided into parts, each of which was wholly surrounded by other parishes. And other parishes consisted of parts so nearly detached that the parish could not be conveniently worked as a unit for local government or poor law purposes. The Acts of 1876 and 1879 gave the Local Government Board power to rearrange the areas of such parishes as those described above; but (s. 2 of the Act of 1876) a small proportion of the ratepayers of a parish could object and prevent any such order being made; and little was done in the way of rearrangement until the Act of 1882 enacted, by s. 2, that every detached portion of a parish should form part of the parish by which it was surrounded.

These enactments did not affect the ecclesiastical parish.

Dividend. A dividend is literally a thing to be divided. In the Exchequer it anciently meant each of the halves into which an indenture was cut; at the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge it formerly meant the share of college revenues to which a fellow was entitled; as regards the law, it meant, in the days when officers of the Courts were paid by fees, the share of each officer; and in trade it was used as meaning the share payable to each member of a partnership. Now it means only the interest payable on the public funds; the payment made out of profits to the shareholders in a company; or the amount—running from a penny to a pound—payable upon each pound of a bankrupt's liabilities.

Divinatio, non interpretatio est, quæ omnino recedit a literâ (Bac. Max. Reg. 3). (An interpretation, which altogether departs from the letter is a guess and not an interpretation.)

Divisible Averments. Where an indictment contains in the one count a number of distinct averments, some of which can and others cannot be proved, the averments which cannot be proved are said to be divisible if the averments which can be proved constitute a felony or misdemeanour of a character less serious than the felony or misdemeanour which would be constituted if all the averments were proved. Thus, on an indictment for murder, the jury may find that all the averments except that as to malice aforethought are true: such a finding is a verdict of manslaughter; and the averment as to malice aforethought is therefore a divisible averment.

Divisible Contracts. A contract is said to be indivisible where the consideration is one and entire or where it appears or is stated that no consideration is to pass from one party to the other until the whole of the obligations of the other have been performed. But where the contract is really a number of considerations for a number of acts, then the contract is said to be divisible, and neither party to the contract is discharged from the performance of the whole of his particular part by reason of the fact that the other party has failed to do his part in relation to some one or other of the matters into which the contract is divided; and thus where A agrees to erect ten houses on a plot belonging to B, and B agrees to give A a lease of each house when completed, B cannot refuse to give a lease of each house which is completed if only, say, five are built by A, the contract being divisible and the remedy of B for A's failure to build the other five being an action for damages.

See APPORTIONMENT OF CONTRACT; ENTIRE.

Division. See SUPREME COURT.

Divisional Courts were first established pursuant to the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 41, and consist of two or (in special cases) more judges of the High Court of Justice, sitting to transact certain kinds of business which cannot be disposed of by one judge. When the High Court was first formed, it was intended that the Divisional Courts should take the place of the sittings in banc of the old Common Law Courts (see BANC); but by the Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1876, s. 17, it was enacted that all proceedings in an action subsequent to the hearing or trial should, so far as is practicable and convenient, be taken before the judge before whom the trial or hearing took place. The business transacted before Divisional Courts consists of Crown and Election Petition business, appeals from County Courts, proceedings directed by statute to be taken before the Court, and in which the decision of the Court is final, cases of habeas corpus, in which a judge has directed that a rule nisi for the writ or the writ itself be made returnable before a Divisional Court, and appeals from Chambers in the King's Bench Division (Ord. 59, r. 1). See Ord. 59 generally.

Divisional Courts must not be confounded with the Divisions of the High Court, which are quite different things.

Divorce was a term used by the Ecclesiastical Courts to signify an interference by them with the relation of husband and wife. It was of two kinds—a divorce a mensâ et thoro ("from bed and board"), granted in cases where the husband or wife had been guilty of such conduct as to make conjugal intercourse impossible (as in the case of adultery, cruelty, etc.); and a divorce a vinculo matrimonii ("from the bond of marriage"), granted where the marriage was voidable or void ab initio (as in the case of the parties being within the prohibited degrees, or one of them having been already married, or being impotent when married). The former is now represented by judicial separation, the latter by a decree of nullity of marriage (q.v.; and see DISABILITY).

The term "divorce" is now applied both to decrees of nullity and decrees of dissolution of marriage. See DISSOLUTION.

Divorce Court. See COURT FOR DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES; PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION. Power to try matrimonial causes at assizes is now given by the Administration of Justice Act, 1920, s. 1, but only if they come within the classes prescribed by the Lord Chief Justice and the President of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division; those classes at present are (1) Undefended causes; (2) Poor persons' causes, whether defended or undefended.

Dock Defence. A barrister is said to accept a dock defence when he is directly instructed, without the intervention of a solicitor, by anyone arraigned for trial by indictment who then and there pays him a fee of £1 3s 6d., or in some places, £1 1s. See SOLICITOR.

Docket, or Docquet (from dock, to cut), is an epitome or abstract of a judgment, decree, order, etc.

In Chancery practice, a docket was used, before the Judicature Acts, for the purpose of enrolling a decree or order of the Court (see ENROLMENT). It consisted of a statement of the filing of the bill, petition, etc., and the other pleadings or proceedings; a recital of the decree made on the hearing; and the adjudication or adjudicatory part (q.v.), which set forth the mandatory part of the decree. It was certified by the Clerk of Records and Writs, signed by the Lord Chancellor, engrossed on parchment in the form of a continuous roll, and deposited at the Public Record Office, when it became a record (q.v.).

By the statute 4 & 5 Will. & Mary, c. 20, an alphabetical index or docket of judgments was directed to be kept by the Clerk of the Dockets in each of the superior Courts of common law, in order to give notice to intending purchasers of land from judgment debtors, because the judgment bound the land of the debtor from its date, even if the land had been sold before execution was issued. These dockets were closed by the Judgments Act, 1839, the provisions for registration of judgments (q.v.) having made them unnecessary.

Dock Warrant is a document issued by a dock company or dock owner stating that certain goods therein mentioned are deliverable to a person therein named or to his assigns by indorsement. Dock warrants in form resemble bills of lading (q.v.), but they differ from them in this, that when goods are at sea a purchaser who takes a bill of lading has done all that is possible to obtain possession of them, while a purchaser who takes a dock warrant can at any moment lodge it with the dock company and so take actual or constructive possession of the goods. It therefore seems that the indorsement of a dock warrant does not at common law pass the ownership in the goods, or divest the vendor's lien if the goods have not been paid for, but merely operates as a constructive delivery of them as between the indorser and indorsee, until the dock company has "attorned" to the indorsee by agreeing to hold the goods for him. See DELIVERY ORDER; DOCUMENT OF TITLE. Dock warrants, however, are included by the Factors Act, 1889, s. 1 (4), and the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 62, among the "documents of title" the possession of which gives a factor power to confer a good title to the goods on persons dealing with him in good faith. See FACTORS ACT.

Doctor and Student. See SAINT-GERMAN.

Doctors' Commons is the popular name for the buildings in which the Ecclesiastical and Admiralty Courts, and the College of Advocates practising in those Courts, were formerly held. The College was incorporated under the title of "The College of Doctors of Law exercent in the Ecclesiastical and Admiralty Courts," whence the popular name. See ADVOCATES, COLLEGE OF.

Document. A document is any solid substance upon which matter has been expressed or described by conventional signs, with the intention of recording or transmitting that matter. Thus a piece of paper on which words are written, lithographed, printed or stamped, or expressed by arbitrary signs or ciphers, is a document; and so is a tally or piece of wood with notches to represent figures or amounts. Every deed (q.v.) is a document; but, as deeds must be on either paper or parchment, every document is not a deed.

In the law of evidence, documents are either public or private. A public document is one recording facts which have been inquired into or taken notice of for the benefit of the public by an agent authorised and accredited for the purpose. Such are Acts of Parliament, judgments and proceedings of Courts, records generally, registers of births, deaths and marriages, and other registers (q.v.). Public documents are admissible, upon production from proper custody, as evidence of the truth of the facts stated in them without being verified on oath, some being conclusive on all the world, while others (and the greater number) merely afford primâ facie evidence; that is, hold good until they are disproved. Hence public documents are sometimes said to prove themselves. It is, however, in many cases unnecessary to produce the original of a public document, many Acts of Parliament having provided for the proof of such documents by authenticated or official copies: thus a proclamation by the Crown or Privy Council may be proved by the production of a copy of the Gazette containing it (Documentary Evidence Act, 1868, s. 2). As to copies under the Evidence Act, 1851, see CERTIFIED COPY; see also COPY; EXEMPLIFICATION.

Private documents include deeds, wills, agreements and the like. No proof is required of a deed more than thirty years old, if it be produced from proper custody.

A document of title is a document which enables the possessor to deal with the property described in it as if he were the owner. In this way a bill of lading represents the goods while they are at sea; and by it, when the goods arrive at the port of destination, the possession of the goods may be obtained, either by the person to whom the bill of lading was originally given, or by a person to whom he has transferred it, which he may do absolutely or by way of charge, etc. Some documents of title (as in the case of a bill of lading) pass the ownership of the goods represented by them; while others, such as delivery orders and dock warrants (q.v.), are mere authorities to obtain delivery of them. See NEGOTIABLE.

As to the discovery and production of documents, see those titles.

Doderidge. John Doderidge, or Doddridge, was born in 1555, was appointed justice of the King's Bench in 1612, and died in 1628. The work on conveyancing, known as Sheppard's Touchstone of Common Assurances, is generally attributed to him.

Doe, John. See EJECTMENT.

Dog-draw. See STABLE-STAND.

Doggett. An old form of the word docket (q.v.). The Clerks of the Dockets were also known (Commons Committees Reports, (1803), Vol. 13, p. 205) as Clerks of the Doggetts and (ib., 293) as Clerks of the Docquets.

Dogs. Dogs are not the subject of larceny at common law, although the stealing of the skin of a dead dog has always been a common law larceny, and a stolen dog was always the subject of an action of trover. The statute 10 Geo. 3, c. 18, made dog-stealing an offence punishable summarily. Dog-stealing and the unlawful possession of any stolen dog or of the skin of any stolen dog are now, in the case of first offences, punishable summarily under the Larceny Act, 1861, ss. 18, 19; and, in the case of subsequent offences, these offences are punishable on indictment under the Larceny Act, 1916, s. 5. Receiving money, etc., for recovering or pretending to recover a stolen dog is now punishable under s. 5 of the Larceny Act, 1916. Section 22 of the Larceny Act, 1861, provides a summary means of recovering a stolen dog.

Maliciously killing or wounding another man's dog is punishable summarily, in the case of a first offence, and on indictment, in the case of a second offence, under the Malicious Damage Act, 1861, s. 41. As to cruelty to dogs generally, see CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.

As to liability for injury caused by dogs, see ANIMALS, LIABILITY FOR.

It is illegal to use a dog to draw any vehicle on a public highway (Protection of Animals Act, 1911, s. 9).

A court of summary jurisdiction may order a dangerous dog to be kept under control, or may order it to be destroyed (Dogs Act, 1871, s. 2): and a dog is "dangerous" not only if it attacks human beings but also (Dogs Act, 1906, s. 1 (4)) if it is proved to have injured cattle or chased sheep.

The Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries may make orders requiring dogs to wear collars with the name and address of the owner, or restraining dogs from being at large during any part of the time between sunset and sunrise; dogs not complying with such orders to be regarded as stray dogs (Dogs Act, 1906, s. 2).

The police are empowered to seize and detain stray dogs (Dogs Act, 1906, s. 3). Any other person who takes possession of a stray dog must either give notice to the police that he has done so, or return it to the owner (ib., s. 4).

For every dog a dog licence must be taken out (Dog Licences Act, 1867, s. 3) except in the case of a dog less than six months old (ib., s. 10) or a hound whelp under twelve months old owned by a master of hounds (Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, s. 20), or a blind person's dog (ib., s. 21), or sheep dogs, used as such, to the number and subject to the conditions prescribed (ib., s. 22; Dogs Act, 1906, s. 5). A dog licence runs from the date of issue to the 31st December following (Dog Licences Act, 1867, s 5); and the duty thereon is now seven shillings and sixpence (Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, s. 17).

As to poisoning dogs, see POISONED GRAIN OR FOOD.

Doitkin. A fifteenth-century name for the Dutch doit, which was a coin, originally at any rate, of silver, which came into use in England about the year 1400, and which seems to have been worth approximately one-half of the contemporary English silver farthing (q.v.). See GALLEY HALFPENNY.

Do Law. Anciently this meant to give effect to the law.

Dole. A dole is a share in waste or common land.

Thus, open meadows are frequently divided into allotments called doles or lots, the ownership of which is shifted among the whole body of proprietors in yearly rotation, determined by lot or similar methods; hence such fields are sometimes called dole-meadows. See OPEN FIELDS; SHACK; COMMON.

Sometimes the right to take the whole of the turf from a given piece of land is vested in a number of persons, who may either have "doles," i.e., separate portions of turf-land allotted to them, or take the turf from any part of the land. Such a "dole," although similar to a common of turbary (see COMMON), is not a common, but an interest in land.

Under the customs of certain mining districts, waste lands are frequently divided into doles (called "dole of lead," "doles of tin," etc.), each of which is worked by a separate miner (see TINBOUNDING); these doles also are interests in land.

A dole seems also to have meant an untilled ridge left between two portions of tilled land. See DALE.

Dolo malo pactum se non servaturum (D. 2, 14, 7). ([The praetor says that] he will not uphold a contract made as the result of fraudulent deceit.) And an English Court will not uphold any such contract.

See EX DOLO MALO, ETC.

Dolosus versatur in generalibus (2 Rep. 34). (When a man is out to commit fraud he uses general terms.) Compare the scholastic maxim dolus latet in generalibus.

Dolus circuitu non purgatur (Bac. Max. Reg. 1). (Fraud is not purged by circuity.) "Dolus here means any wrongful act tending to the damage of another" (6 E. & B. 948): and the circuity referred to is a chain of causes, of which the most remote is tainted by fraud. And where there is such a chain the entire transaction will be regarded as tainted by the original fraud, so that the maxim in jure non remota, etc. (q.v.), does not apply.

Dolus dans locum contractui—literally, "fraud or deceit giving occasion for the contract,"—is applied to a false representation (q.v.) when it is such as to induce the contract. The phrase is commonly used in expressing the rule that a contract is not voidable for misrepresentation unless the representation was dans locum contractui, that is, unless it induced the misled party to enter into the contract. Therefore, if the person to whom the false representation was made did not rely on it, but made further inquiries, he could not afterwards make use of it to avoid the contract.

Dolus et fraus una in parte sanari debent (Noy, Max. 45). (Deceit and fraud should always be remedied.)

Domanium. A demesne.

Dome-book. A book of judgments (dooms, domes). See ALFRED, DOOMS OF; DOOM.

Domesday. The book thus called was compiled in the reign and by the direction of William the Conqueror, and is one of the many works of permanent utility of that sovereign. It was in two volumes, and contained the details of a great survey of the kingdom, throughout all its counties, five men in each county (called justices) having been assigned in 1081 for the purpose of collecting the necessary statistics. They completed their statement thereof in 1086, when the whole returns were thrown together and formed the two volumes of Domesday Book. The name is believed to be derived from the fact that the book was originally kept in a room in Westminster Abbey, which was a Domus Dei, or House of God.

This work is an authority upon certain points of real property law; e.g., upon the question whether lands of copyhold tenure are or are not of that peculiar species of copyhold which is called Ancient Demesne (q.v.).

Domesday of Ipswich. A local record which is printed at pp. 16-209 of Vol. II. of the Black Book of the Admiralty (q.v.). It contains amongst other things the Ipswich code of sea-laws.

Domestic Servant. One employed in or about and residing in the employer's house. But a governess or the housekeeper of a large hotel, even though so residing, does not come within the meaning of the expression. See MENIAL SERVANTS.

Domestic Tribunal. A quasi-judicial body, such as that consisting of the benchers (q.v.) of each of the Inns of Court, with whose decisions as regards the persons subject to their disciplinary jurisdiction, pronounced in the exercise of that jurisdiction, the Courts will not interfere.

Domicile is the legal home of a person, or that place where the law presumes that he has the intention of permanently residing, although he may be absent from it or even never have been there (infra).

The question where a person is domiciled may be important, because it is by the law of that place that his civil status, so far as it is independent of his voluntary acts, is regulated. Thus the question whether one person can contract a legal marriage with another is decided, not by the law of the country where he happens to go through the ceremony, but by the law of his domicile; so the legitimacy and majority of a child (except with reference to his capacity of inheriting real estate) depend on the law of its parents' domicile: and the manner in which personal estate devolves on the death of the owner is regulated not by the law of the country where he dies, nor by that of the place where the property is, but by the law of his domicile. Real estate is regulated by the lex loci rei sitæ (q.v.). Formerly also, a will of personal estate had to be made according to the formalities required by the law of the country where the testator was domiciled at the time of his decease; but this rule has been abolished as to wills made after the 6th August, 1861, and it is now sufficient if a will, made out of the United Kingdom by a British subject, was made according to the forms required either by the law of the place where it was made, or by the law of his domicile at the time, or by the law of his domicile of origin (Wills Act, 1861, s. 1).

Companies are also sometimes said to have domiciles when their operations are carried on in one country and their administration or direction in another: thus, a company formed in England to construct a railway in Germany, and having its principal seat of administration here, would be said to be domiciled in England. See RESIDENT; NON-RESIDENT.

Domicile is of three kinds:—

(i.) The domicile of origin or birth (natural domicile) is that which a child receives from its parents at its birth. Every person preserves his domicile of origin until he acquires another domicile, and on his abandoning or losing an acquired domicile, his domicile of origin revives. Thus, if a husband and wife domiciled in England take a voyage to India, and a child is born to them on the voyage, or in India before they acquire a domicile there, its domicile is English; if the child grows up and settles in India he acquires an Indian domicile (infra); if he leaves India with the intention of settling permanently in America, he loses his Indian domicile, and his English domicile revives, so that if he dies before reaching America the succession to his personal property will be regulated by English law.

(ii.) Domicile by operation of law (necessary domicile) is that which attaches to a person independently of his or her will, and without reference to birth, residence or other facts. Thus the domicile of an infant follows that of his father, so that if the father changes his domicile the infant's domicile ipso facto changes too. So the domicile of a wife follows that of her husband.

(iii.) Domicile of choice arises where a person having the power of changing his domicile voluntarily abandons his existing domicile and settles in another country with the intention of permanently residing there (animo manendi). Questions of change of domicile are proverbially difficult to determine, owing to the ambiguity of ordinary conduct: thus a person may have lived many years abroad without having acquired a foreign domicile if it appears that his reason for doing so was a desire to avoid his creditors or the like. So an ambassador or other public officer does not acquire a domicile in the country where he resides as a matter of duty.

Some writers affirm that a person may have two domiciles, one of them being called the principal domicile. The doctrine seems contrary to the principles of English law, except in this sense, that a person may be domiciled in one place according to the law of one country, and domiciled in another place according to the law of another country. Thus the fact of a Frenchman having resided in England for a number of years may be sufficient to give him an English domicile according to English law, and yet not sufficient to divest him of his French domicile according to French law.

In Roman law there was no opportunity for questions of domicile (in our sense of the word) to arise, because there was one system of law for the whole of the civilized world. The empire was divided into municipalities or local self-governed districts (civitates or respublicæ), all subject to the jus commune or imperial law, but having peculiar constitutions, jurisdictions and legislatures. Every subject of the empire was a member of at least one of these municipalities, either by origo, which was the case where he had been born, adopted or manumitted in it, or by domicilium, which was the case when he voluntarily chose the municipality as the chief place of his business and pleasure. Domicilium, therefore, was merely a peculiar mode of becoming a member of a municipality, with its accompanying incidents of burdens and liabilities; consequently a person could at the same time have an origo in one municipality and a domicilium in another or in several others, just as a person at the present day may be rated in respect of several parishes. Many modern writers seem to suppose that the Roman domicilium is exactly equivalent to our "domicile," and quote the definitions and principles of the Roman law as authorities on the subject. The same ignorance has given rise to the barbarous expression domicilium originis, which purports to be the equivalent for "domicile of origin" in Roman law, where it would have been an impossible combination, domicilium and origo being opposed to one another. See NATIONALITY; RESIDENCE; LEX LOCI.

Domina. A title anciently given to women who were peeresses in their own right. It is to be distinguished from its English equivalent, "dame" (q.v.). It is still used as part of the formal Latin description (Domina Regina) of a female sovereign.

Dominant. See EASEMENT.

Dominica in ramis palmarum. The mediæval Latin for Palm Sunday.

Dominicum. The same as domanium.

Dominium is equivalent to ownership (q.v.). The term dominium directum (or direct dominion), i.e., the nominal or bare right of ownership remaining in an owner who has granted the exclusive right of enjoyment and of limited or unlimited disposition over the thing to another person, and dominium utile (or beneficial dominion), i.e., the practical right of enjoyment and disposition thus vested in the grantee, were invented by the glossators to express the relation between the dominus and emphyteuta of the Roman law, which allowed the latter a so-called utilis in rem action, while the dominus retained the rei vindicatio directa. The terms are also applied to the interests of the lord and the tenant under the feudal system (q.v.), and to the legal and equitable interests in property recognized by the rules of common law and of equity respectively. See ESTATE; INTEREST.

Dominium non potest esse in pendenti (Halk. 39) (Lordship cannot be in suspense—that is to say, there must be and is an owner for everything).

Dominus. During mediaeval times this word was commonly prefixed to the name of a clergyman or of a gentleman of position. It indicated no special dignity known to the law.

Dominus litis—"master of the suit"—is a person who has control over an action or other judicial proceeding, and can dispose of it as he thinks fit. Thus, where one of several actions has been selected as a test action, the plaintiff in that action is nevertheless dominus litis, and can allow it to be dismissed, or judgment to go by default. (See CONSOLIDATION OF ACTIONS.) A solicitor or counsel employed by a person to conduct a suit for him is sometimes said to be dominus litis for certain purposes (e.g., to compromise, withdraw a jury, etc.) without the client's instructions, and in some cases even against them.

Domo reparanda, De. A writ which anciently lay for anyone who feared that his own house would be injured by the fall of the house of his neighbour, who was required by the writ to put the dangerous house in order.

Domus conversorum. This was a house, in what is now Chancery Lane, set aside by King Henry III. for the use of such Jews as embraced Christianity. When Edward I. put an end to any possibility of further converts by expelling all Jews from England, this house was used as a depository for the rolls and records of the Chancery. The present Record Office (q.v.) occupies the site.

Domus Dei. The hospital in Southampton known also as the Hospital of St. Julian. Domus Dei was a generic term for a hospital (q.v.) generally.

Domus Procerum. (The House of the Nobles.) An ancient title—abbreviated into Dom. Proc., or D.P.—of the House of Lords.

Domus sua cuique est tutissimum refugium (5 Rep. 91). (To every one his house is his surest refuge.) In Seymayne's Case it was resolved by the King's Bench:—(1) If thieves come to a man's house to rob or murder him, and he or his servants kill any of the thieves in defence of himself and his house, this is not felony; (2) When any house is recovered by action, the sheriff may break the house, and deliver the possession to the plaintiff; for after judgment it is not the house of the defendant; (3) In all cases where the king is party (as where a felony or misdemeanour has been committed), the sheriff may break the party's house to execute the king's process, if otherwise he may not enter; (4) In all cases when the door is open the sheriff may enter the house and do execution, at the suit of any subject; (5) The sheriff may break open the house of a man in order to execute process against the person or goods of another, if such other or his goods be actually therein. See Smith's Leading Cases (12th ed.), pp. 115 et seq.

Dona clandestina sunt semper suspiciosa (3 Rep. 81.) (Clandestine gifts are always to be regarded with suspicion.)

Donari videtur, quod nullo jure cogente conceditur. (A thing is deemed to be given when it is transferred otherwise than by virtue of a right.) This is a maxim of the Roman law.

— Donatio inter vivos. This is distinguished from a donatio mortis causa (q.v.) by the fact (1) that it is a gift which is not made by a man who is dying and because he knows that he is dying, and (2) that it may be a gift of things which do not pass by mere delivery. To constitute a donatio inter vivos all that is required are (1) the intention to give and (2) such acts as are necessary to give effect to the intention. Thus a horse may be given by mere delivery; while lands cannot be given except by some written instrument. The subject-matter of a donatio inter vivos made within three years of the death of the giver is now liable to estate duty, unless the gift be made in consideration of marriage, or unless the gift be a normal part of the expenditure of the deceased and be reasonable in view of his income and circumstances, or unless the gift is not in all more than £100 to one donee (Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, s. 59); and unless the case be one in which neither legacy duty nor succession duty is payable (see LEGACY DUTY; SUCCESSION DUTY), the gift will also be subject to legacy duty in the case of personalty and to succession duty in the case of realty.

The most common case of a donatio inter vivos to any substantial amount is a voluntary settlement.

— Donatio mortis causâ is a gift of personal property on a death-bed. It must be made in contemplation of the donor's death, it must be intended to take effect on his death from his existing illness, and it must be completed by the delivery of the thing at the time by the donor, or by his direction, to the donee. Hence things, the property in which does not pass by delivery (such as stock), cannot be the subject of a donatio mortis causa. A donatio mortis causa resembles a legacy in being subject to legacy duty and to the debts of the deceased, but it differs from a legacy in taking effect without probate or the executor's assent. It is also of course subject to estate duty (q.v.), unless the value of the whole estate be under £100.

Donatio non præsumitur (Jenk. Cent. 109). (A gift is not presumed.) That is to say, the possession by A. of what had admittedly been the property of B. raises no presumption of a gift.

— Donatio perficitur possessione accipientis (Jenk. Cent. 109.) (A gift is perfected by the possession of the subject-matter by the donee.)

Donative Advowson. See ADVOWSON.

Donator nunquam desinit possidere antequam donatarius incipiat possidere (Dyer, 281). (He who gives never ceases to possess until the receiver begins to possess.) See DOMINIUM NON POTEST, ETC.

Donee; Donor. In the most general sense of the words, a donor is a person who gives property, and the donee is the person to whom it is given, as in the case of a donatio mortis causa (q.v.). In their technical sense, "where a man giveth certaine lands or tenements to another in taile, he which maketh the gift is called the donor, and he to whom the gift is made is called the donee" (Litt. 57). See GIFT.

Doom, or Dome. This is literally a judgment, e.g., in the Black Book of Hereford, fo. 46, this phrase occurs,—"So help me God, at His holy dome," meaning at the Last Day of Judgment. The Anglo-Saxon laws were called "dooms." See ALFRED, DOOMS OF.

Dormant. See PARTNERSHIP.

Dormant Funds. Rule 98 of the Supreme Court Funds Rules, 1915, provides that on or before the 1st March in every third year the Paymaster is to prepare a list of accounts in the books of the Pay Office (to the credit of which there stood on the preceding 1st September not less than £50) which have not been dealt with, otherwise than by the accumulation of dividends, during the fifteen years preceding such 1st September; such list is to be exhibited in the offices of the Court and is to be published in the London Gazette. The Paymaster, in his discretion, may give information respecting funds in the list to any person or the solicitor of any person on a request in the prescribed form being signed. The Paymaster may omit from the list any fund in respect of which he is informed that an order dealing with it will be applied for, or any fund which had been lodged under the Trustee Act, 1893, and which had been dealt with during the preceding twenty years.

The only information which the Paymaster can give is as to (1) the amount of a particular fund and (2) the date of any order of the Court regarding it. The fee payable upon a request for information is two shillings and sixpence.

The funds included in this list are popularly known as "dormant funds." The aggregate amount in 1905 was under £1,000,000; in 1914 it was about £1,100,000, and in 1920 it was about £1,490,000. In 1920 the total number of separate accounts was about 4,100, out of which over 2,000 were less than £150, and only about 200 exceeded £1,000. Some of the accounts were opened nearly 200 years ago; others have not been dealt with, except by way of accumulating dividends, for nearly fifty years.

Dormit aliquando lex, moritur nunquam (10 Rep. 42). (A variant of the next maxim.) See NOVUM JUDICIUM, ETC.

Dormiunt aliquando leges, nunquam moriuntur (2 Inst. 161). (The laws sometimes sleep, but they never die.) For example, a state of war sometimes suspends contracts and the Statute of Limitations, but ultimately the contracts operate and the statute begins to run again.

Dos. Dower: dote and dotis, are the ablative and genitive cases respectively.

Dote amissa per defaltum, De. A writ which anciently lay under the Statute of Westminster II., c. 4, for a woman who had lost her dower by default, in order that she might, notwithstanding her default, recover her dower.

Dote assignanda, De. A writ for obtaining dower which anciently lay for the widow of a tenant in chief who at his death had been seised of lands in fee or in fee-tail. (Fitzherbert, N.B. 26.)

Dote unde nihil habet, De. See DOWER, WRIT OF.

Doti lex favet; præmium pudoris est, ideò parcatur (Co. Litt. 31). (The law favours dower; it is the reward of chastity, therefore is to be preserved.) So strong is this maxim in its operation that dower, when it once attaches, cannot be defeated except by the consent of the wife, or by divorce a vinculo. See SPONTE VIRUM, ETC.; and UBI NULLUM, ETC.

Dotis admensuratione, De. The writ of admeasurement (q.v.).

Double. See COSTS; COUNT; DUPLICITY; DOUBLE DAMAGES; PORTION; PROBATE; PROOF; VOUCH.

Double Damages; Double Rent; Double Value. Double and treble damages are in some cases given by particular statutes. The most important instances are—(a) where a person has distrained for rent although no rent was owing, and the distress has been sold, the owner may recover double the value of the goods distrained (2 Will. and Mary, sess. 1, c. 5, s. 4); (b) where a person is guilty of pound-breach or rescue of goods distrained for rent, the person grieved shall recover treble damages (ib. s. 3); (c) where a tenant of land holds over (that is, retains possession of the land) after the determination of his tenancy (see HOLDING OVER); (d) in some cases where the revenue has been defrauded by non-payment of customs, excise, or other duties, the person offending is liable to pay double or treble duty, or double or treble the value of the property. See SMUGGLING.

Double Quarrel. DUPLEX QUERELA (q.v.).

Douzen Peers. Twelve peers who, in the reign of Henry III., were assigned by the barons to act as advisers of the King.

Dower, said Lord Coke, is "that portion of lands or tenements which the wife hath for terme of her life of the lands or tenements of her husband after his decease, for the sustenance of herself and the nurture and education of her children." Dower was formerly of five kinds:—

At the common law, where a man was seised in deed or in law of land for an estate of inheritance (otherwise than as joint tenant), and died leaving a widow, she was entitled to hold the third part of such land and tenements as were her husband's at any time during the coverture, as tenant in dower for the term of her life, and notwithstanding that the husband might have sold, mortgaged or devised the lands or part of them, unless in the case of a conveyance the wife joined to release her dower, or unless she had barred her right of dower by accepting a jointure (q.v.) in lieu of it. To prevent this inconvenience, several methods were adopted to enable a person acquiring lands to alien them at a future time without his wife's concurrence; the most important of these methods was that of inserting "uses to bar dower" in the conveyance to the original purchaser. (See USES TO BAR DOWER.) But no such precaution is required in a conveyance to a man married since the 1st January, 1834, for by the Dower Act, 1833, no woman married since that day is entitled to dower out of any land which has been absolutely disposed of by her husband in his lifetime or by his will; her right to dower is subject to all partial estates and interest created by him, and to all debts, charges, encumbrances, etc., to which his lands are liable; and a husband may also wholly or partially deprive his wife of her dower by making a declaration to that effect by deed or will. So that now a widow can only claim dower as against her husband's heir-at-law, and she cannot do even that if her husband has executed a declaration to the contrary. On the other hand, the act granted widows a right of dower out of lands to which the husband had a mere right, without having had actual or legal seisin, and has extended the right of dower to equitable as well as legal estates in possession.

An action by a widow to enforce her right to dower is brought by writ of summons in the ordinary form endorsed with a claim for dower (R.S.C., Ords. 1 & 2; App. A., Pt. III., s. 4) and the judgment is executed by the sheriff assigning and delivering a third part of the lands to the widow. The action must be commenced within twelve years of the time when the right of dower accrued (Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, s. 1) and only six years arrears of dower can be recovered (Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 42). A woman may give leases for twenty-one years of the lands which she holds as tenant in dower (Settled Estates Act, 1877, s. 46).

By the custom of some places a widow has the half, or a quarter, or the whole of her husband's lands; with or without special incidents. Thus, in gavelkind lands, the widow has the half for her dower so long as she remains unmarried and without child other than a child of her late husband.

The three following kinds of dower no longer exist:—

Dower ad ostium ecclesiæ, or endowment at the church door, says Littleton, "is where a man of full age seised in fee simple, who shall be married to a woman, and when he commeth to the church doore to be married, there, after affiance and troth plighted betweene them, he endoweth the woman of his whole land, or of the halfe, or other lesser part thereof, and there openly doth declare the quantity and the certainty of the land which she shall have for her dower. In this case the wife, after the death of her husband, may enter into the said quantity of land of which her husband endowed her without other assignment." It was abolished by s. 13 of the Dower Act, 1833.

Dower ex assensu patris, or dowment by assent of the father, says Littleton, "is where the father is seised of tenements in fee, and his sonne and heire apparent, when he is married, endoweth his wife at the monastery or church doore, of parcel of his father's lands or tenements with the assent of his father, and assignes [i.e. fixes] the quantity and parcels. In this case, after the death of the son, the wife shall enter into the same parcell without the assignment of any." This also was abolished by s. 13 of the Dower Act, 1833.

Dower de la pluis beale, says Littleton, is "where a man is seised [e.g.] of forty acres of land, and he holdeth twenty acres of the said forty acres of one [lord] by knights service, and the other twenty acres of another in socage, and taketh wife, and hath issue a sonne, and dieth, his sonne being within the age of fourteene yeares, and the lord of whom the land is holden by knights service entreth into the twenty acres holden of him, and holdeth them as gardein in chivalrie during the nonage of the infant, and the mother of the infant entreth into the residue, and occupieth it as gardein in socage: if in this case the wife bringeth a writ of dower against the gardein in chivalry, to be endowed of the tenements holden by knights service, . . . the gardein in chivalry may pleade in such case all this matter, and shew how the wife is gardein in socage as aforesaid, and pray that it may be adjudged by the Court that the wife may endow her selfe de la pluis beale, i.e., of the most faire of the tenements which she hath as gardein in socage, after the value of the third part which she claimes by her writ of dower to have of the tenements holden by knights service. And note that after such a judgment given, the wife may take her neighbours and in their presence endow herself by metes and bounds of the fairest part of the tenements which she hath as gardein in socage, to have and to hold to her for terme of her life: and this dower is called dower de la pluis beale." This was impliedly abolished by the statute 12 Car. 2, c. 24, which abolished knight service. See ADMEASUREMENT; DOWER; WRIT OF; ESTABLISHMENT OF DOWER; ESTATE; FREEBENCH; CURTESY; ASSIGNMENT; METES AND BOUNDS; RECTO DE DOTE.

Dower, Writ of. Under the old practice, when a widow had no dower assigned to her within the proper time, she had a remedy by "writ of dower unde nihil habet," which was issued under the statute 20 Hen. 3, c. 1. If she had only part of her dower assigned to her, she had a remedy by "writ of right of dower,"—issued under the same statute—which was a general remedy also applicable to the case of no dower being assigned. These forms of real action were abolished by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, s. 26, and the ordinary form of action substituted.

Dowry. Otherwise maritagium or marriage goods, being the fortune which, before the days of the Married Women's Property Acts, a woman was said to "bring" to her husband on marriage.

Drachm. See APOTHECARIES WEIGHT.

Draft. A draft is an order for the payment of money drawn by one person on (i.e., directed to) another. Cheques and bills of exchange (q.v.) are drafts. In its technical sense a draft is an order drawn by one banker on another, but otherwise resembling an ordinary cheque.

Draft also signifies a document drawn up or framed for the purpose of discussion or consideration; e.g., a draft agreement, will, lease, conveyance, statement of claim, affidavit, etc. When the document is engrossed or copied for execution or signature the draft from which the engrossment or copy is made is the original draft. See ENGROSS.

Draftsman is anyone who draws or frames a legal document, e.g., a will, conveyance, pleading, etc. (See DRAW; CONVEYANCER.) Under the old practice in Chancery, all bills, answers, etc., had to be signed, and were almost invariably drawn, by counsel. A barrister whose practice included the drafting of Chancery pleadings was called an equity draftsman, the correlative term at common law being special pleader (q.v.). The special pleader has disappeared; but the names of certain barristers practising on the Chancery side are marked in the Law List with an asterisk, which signifies "Equity Draftsman and Conveyancer."

Drain; Drainage. As regards houses, "drain" means an underground pipe or open channel for carrying off water, soil, etc., from one building or premises within the same curtilage, into a cesspool or sewer (q.v.). Sanitary authorities have power to compel the effectual drainage of houses within their respective districts. See SANITARY AUTHORITIES.

The drainage of land, that is, the construction of works for taking off superfluous water from land for the purpose of improving it (as opposed to the drainage of houses, which is of a sanitary nature), is one of the works for which limited owners are empowered to borrow or advance money and charge it on the land with the sanction of the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries (q v.) See IMPROVEMENT OF LAND ACTS.

The Ministry is also empowered to enable landowners to obtain advances from the Treasury for the improvement of land by drainage (Public Money Drainage Acts, 1846 to 1856), and to authorize landowners to execute works required for the drainage of their land on land belonging to other persons, on making compensation to such persons for damage thereby occasioned (Land Drainage Act, 1847).

Under the Settled Estates Act, 1877, ss. 20, 21, the High Court may direct any part of a settled estate to be laid out for drains, and the expenses to be raised by sale, mortgage or charge of the estate. The drainage of lands is amongst the improvements specified in s. 25 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, which (see s. 26) may be carried out with, as the case requires, the approval of the trustees or the Court.

Drainage is one of the improvements allowed under the Agricultural Holdings Acts (q.v.).

See also COMMISSIONERS OF SEWERS, sub SEWERS.

Dram. This consists of one-sixteenth part of an ounce (Weights and Measures Act, 1878, s. 14). It is quite distinct from the drachm (q.v.) of the Apothecaries' Weights (q.v.).

Dramatic Copyright. See COPYRIGHT.

Drapery. Formerly used as meaning all kinds of woollen cloths. See, for instance, Cay's Abridgment, s.v.

Draw; Drawee; Drawer. To draw a bill of exchange is to write (or cause it to be written) and sign it; and hence to draw on a person is to draw a bill of exchange for his acceptance. The person who draws it is called the drawer, and the person to whom it is directed or addressed is called the drawee. See BILL OF EXCHANGE; DRAFT; DRAFTSMAN.

Drawbacks. Down to 1803, when goods liable to import duty were imported into the kingdom the full duty was payable in every case, but was repaid to the owner of the goods if they were exported without being used in the kingdom. Such repayment was called a "drawback." Drawbacks are still paid in the case of dutiable articles, such as tobacco leaf, which, after undergoing a process of manufacture, are exported as a manufactured article, such as roll-tobacco; but other dutiable articles, which are intended to be exported, never pay duty on importation, being kept in "warehouses" (q.v.) until they are exported.

Draw-latch. A thief. See Lamb. Eiren. lib. 1, c. 6.

Drenches; Drenges; Drengs; Drengi. Said by Spelman to have been Saxon landowners who had been deprived of their estates by the Conqueror but who had been reinstated as tenants in capite on it being shown that they were on his side, but this view would seem to be erroneous. Mr. Maitland says that they were tenants in Northumbria holding by a tenure, partly military and partly servile, which had existed before the Conquest and which continued after it. Even in the fourteenth century the "drengage" tenants of the Bishop of Durham were theoretically liable to do military service.

Drengage. The tenure of the drenches (q.v.).

Driftland; Drofland; Dryland. A yearly payment anciently made by certain tenants to their lord for the privilege of driving cattle through the manor to fairs or markets.

Drift of the Forest; Agitatio animalium in foresta. This was a rounding-up at certain in each year of all the cattle in a forest by the forest officers in order to ascertain that the forest laws were being complied with.

Driftway. A way along which there is a right to drive cattle. Along every highway there is, of course, a public right to drive cattle; but no right to drive cattle along any other way, such as a bridle-way, will be presumed, and the Court will not recognise the right unless it is proved. A man may have a private right, as an easement or under a licence, to drive cattle along a private driftway. See PRIVATE PATH: compare DROVE-WAY.

Drilling, Unauthorised. See the Unlawful Drilling Act, 1819, which makes it punishable on indictment to attend a meeting for the purpose of being drilled or of drilling others to the use of arms, unless the meeting is held under an authority of the King or (Firearms Act, 1920, s. 16) of a Secretary of State or of any officer deputed by such Secretary in the matter.

Drinclean. A rent payable in ale. See CERVISARII.

Droit; Droitural. "Droit" is Norman-French for "right" (Latin, directum). In the old books it signifies especially a right to land. Thus, if a tenant in fee simple was disseised of his land, his estate was said to be turned to a right, or a bare or naked right, meaning a right of ownership: the disseisor thereby acquired a mere possession (only good as against strangers), while the disseisee retained, in addition to his right of ownership, the right of possession as against the disseisor, which he could exercise either by entry or possessory action. If, however, the disseisee neglected to pursue his remedy within the time limited by law, or if he failed in a possessory action, the disseisor gained the right of possession as against him, so that the disseisee could only exercise his right of ownership by bringing a writ of right or droitural action. When a person had the right of possession, and the right of ownership, both at the same time, he was said to have droit droit, or jus duplicatum, and when to the jus duplicatum actual possession was added, there was said to be a juris et seisinæ conjunction—a union of law and seisin—so that the title became legally complete. These distinctions were abolished when real actions were done away with. See DESCENT CAST; RIGHT; RIGHT OF ENTRY.

The writs of right were known by Law French, or a mixture of Law French and Latin, as well as by Latin titles. Thus, the writ of Recto de rationabili parte (q.v.) was also known as the writ of Droit de rationabili parte. See RECTO.

Droit de Advowson, De. An obsolete writ which lay for the owner of an advowson whose right of presentation was interfered with.

Droit d'Angarie (Jus Angariæ; Right of Angary). This is the right possessed by a belligerent to use or destroy, for purposes of offence or defence, neutral property found on their own or on enemy territory or on the open sea, subject, of course, to the obligation to make compensation to the owners. It was asserted in 1870 by the Germans who seized and sunk, for the purpose of blocking the Seine, certain French vessels which were lying in that river; and in 1918, for the purposes of the war against Germany, the English and American Governments took possession of a number of Dutch vessels which were in English and American ports. Compare PRE-EMPTION (in international law), which is a quite distinct right.

Droit-droit. A double right, that is to say, the combination of possession and interest. See Co. Litt. 266.

Droits of Admiralty. See ADMIRALTY, DROITS OF.

Drovers. Men who drive cattle from one place to another. Under the repealed statute 5 Eliz. c. 12, they were required to be married men and householders. Under words, now repealed, in the Sunday Observance Act, 1625 (1 Car. 1, c. 1), they were liable to a penalty for driving cattle on Sunday. If drunk while in charge of cattle they are guilty of an offence punishable summarily under the Licensing Act, 1872, s. 12.

Droveway. A way along which cattle were driven to a particular pasture. Compare DRIFTWAY.

Drug. Section 2 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, enacts that this expression in that Act "shall include medicine for internal or external use." But there is no statutory declaration as to what else is included. Some substances are always clearly drugs; others may in some cases be drugs and in other cases not be drugs. Beeswax, when sold for polishing purposes, is not a drug; when sold for the preparation of medicines it is a drug.

Drugging Animals. The Drugging of Animals Act, 1876, made the malicious administration of poisonous drugs to horses and other animals (which really meant "getting at" racehorses) an offence punishable under that Act with fine or imprisonment. That Act was repealed by the Protection of Animals Act, 1911, s. 18, Sch., and is replaced by s. 1 (1) (d) of the latter Act.

Druggists. See CHEMISTS AND DRUGGISTS.

Drugs, Dangerous. The Dangerous Drugs Act, 1920, regulates the importation, exportation, manufacture, sale and use of "opium and other dangerous drugs." For the purposes of the Act opium is divided (see s. 15) into (1) "raw opium," which includes powdered or granulated opium but not "medicinal opium"; (2) "prepared opium," which means opium prepared for smoking and includes dross and any other residues remaining after opium has been smoked; and (3) "medicinal opium," which means raw opium artificially dried. Part I. (ss. 1-3) prohibits the importation of raw opium except under licence and at approved ports, and gives power to regulate the possession, etc., of such opium. Part II. (ss. 4-5) absolutely prohibits the importation or exportation of prepared opium, and provides penalties for possessing or smoking it, and for the possession of opium-smoking utensils, and for keeping or using premises for opium smoking. Part III. (ss. 6-8) prohibits the importation or exportation without licence of "medicinal opium," morphine, cocaine, ecgonine, diamorphine (commonly known as heroin) and new drugs which may be specified in an Order in Council, and of their respective salts, and of anything containing not less than .005 of morphine or .001 of cocaine, ecgonine or diamorphine; and it regulates the manufacture and sale of such drugs.

The Act gives the police power to arrest without warrant, even upon suspicion, persons whose names and addresses cannot be ascertained or who are likely to abscond (s. 14).

Drunkenness. In the civil law, where a person at the time he enters into a contract is by reason of drunkenness incapable of understanding its terms, the contract is voidable at his option, provided his condition was known to the other party at the time.

Under the Children Act, 1908, s. 26, where a person is convicted of an offence of cruelty, or of any of the offences mentioned in the first schedule to that Act, and where it appears to the Court that such person is an habitual drunkard and is the parent, or is living with the parent, of the child or young person in respect of whom the offence is committed, the Court may order, in lieu of imprisonment, his detention for not more than two years in a private retreat for inebriates, the keeper of which is wiling to receive him: but this provision does not affect such power as the Court may have under the Inebriates Act to commit to a State inebriate reformatory.

Where a person (charged under various statutes which make drunkenness an offence) is, and consents to be dealt with summarily as, an habitual drunkard under s. 2 (1) of the Inebriates Act, 1898 (which empowers justices to such cases to order detention in an inebriate reformatory), the Court, if satisfied that an order for detention could be made, must, upon his conviction, whether such order be made or not, notify the police of such conviction, and it thereupon becomes an offence for such person to obtain by retail, or for any person to supply to him by retail, any intoxicating liquor within three years after the date of the conviction (Licensing Act, 1902, s. 6 (2)). A person to whom this enactment applies is popularly said to be on the "Black List." The list is, however, much smaller than it might well be: for a court of summary jurisdiction cannot put even the worst habitual drunkard on the list unless he delivers himself into their hands by consenting to be dealt with summarily.

In criminal law the wholesome theory of the old writers was that a drunkard is voluntarius dæmon; thus Coke says "he hath no privilege thereby, but what hurt or ill he doth his drunkenness doth aggravate it." The modern principle, however, is that if the existence of a specific intention is essential to make an act a crime, the fact that the offender was drunk when he did it should be taken into account by the jury in deciding whether he had that intention. But when a man, although drunk, is not too drunk to form the intention of committing a rape, which he does in fact commit, he will, if death results from his violence, be held guilty of murder even though he was too drunk to know that his violence would cause death. The general principle in fact is that if one felony be intentionally committed any other felony which is consequentially committed by misadventure is held also to have been deliberately committed.

Drunkenness was first made punishable by the statutes 4 Jac. 1, c. 5, and 21 Jac. 1, c. 7, s. 3. Both of these enactments, which have long since been repealed, provided penalties for drunkenness in any place and in any circumstances. Under the enactments now in force, drunkenness simpliciter is no offence. Being found drunk in a highway or other public place, whether a building or not, or on licensed premises, being drunk while in charge, on any highway or other public place, of any carriage, horse, cattle or steam engine, being drunk when in possession of any loaded firearms, or being guilty, while drunk, of riotous or disorderly behaviour on any highway or other public place, whether a building or not, are all offences punishable under the Licensing Act, 1872, s. 12; refusing or failing when drunk to quit any licensed premises when requested is punishable under the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, s. 80, and refusing or failing when drunk to quit any premises or place under under the Refreshment Houses Act, 1860, when requested, is punishable under the Refreshment Houses Act, 1860, s. 41. Special Acts deal with some similar offences in London and in towns generally. Drunkenness of railway servants while on duty is dealt with in the Railway Regulation Act, 1840, s. 13; the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 287, deals with drunkenness on board passenger steamers; and drunkenness while in charge, in any highway or other public place, whether a building or not, or in any licensed premises, of a child apparently under seven is punishable under the Licensing Act, 1902, s. 2 (1).

There is no statutory definition of drunkenness; and a man may be held drunk for the purpose of one offence when he would not be held drunk for the purpose of another offence. The degree of intoxication which would make an engine driver drunk, if he were driving an express, would not make him drunk if he were walking along a country lane.

The sale of firearms or ammunition to any person who is drunk is punishable summarily under the Firearms Act, 1920 (10 & 11 Geo. 5, c. 43), s. 2. See HABITUAL DRUNKARD.

Dry Exchange. Usury, under the name of "dry exchange," was prohibited by the statute 3 Hen. 7, c. 5.

Dry-rent. Rent seek; see RENT.

Duces tecum. See SUBPŒNA.

Duces tecum licet languidus. Anciently when the sheriff made a return that he could not bring his prisoner because the prisoner was so ill (adeo languidus) the Court granted a habeas corpus in the nature of a duces tecum licet languidus commanding the sheriff to bring the prisoner even though the prisoner was ill (licet languidus).

Duchy Court of Lancaster, also called the Court of the Duchy Chamber of Lancaster, is a Court formerly held before the Chancellor of the Duchy or his deputy, concerning all matters of equity relating to lands holden of the king in right of the Duchy of Lancaster and also all matters of revenue relating to the duchy. It therefore resembles the old Court of Exchequer. It seems not to be a Court of record and not to have exclusive jurisdiction. Its jurisdiction is now never exercised, and is obsolete. See CHANCELLOR; COUNTY PALATINE; PALATINE COURTS.

Duchy of Cornwall. See CORNWALL.

Duchy of Lancaster consists of those lands which formerly belonged to the dukes of Lancaster, and now belong to the Crown in right of the duchy. The duchy is distinct from the county palatine of Lancaster, and includes not only the county but also much territory at a distance from it, especially the Savoy in London and some land near Westminster. There are numerous local Acts relating to the duchy, as to which see the Index to the Statutes published by the Statute Law Revision Commissioners. See COUNTY PALATINE; CHANCELLOR; DUCHY COURT OF LANCASTER.

Due, as applied to a sum of money, means either that it is owing or that it is payable: in other words, it may mean that the debt is payable at once or at a future time. It is a question of construction which of these two meanings the word "due" bears in a given case.

Duel. See CHALLENGE TO FIGHT. Duelling is not specifically forbidden by our law. But killing or attempting to kill a man in a duel is regarded by the law as differing in no way whatever from any other deliberate and unlawful homicide or attempted homicide, and the principals (in the duelling sense) or such one of them as may survive, as well as the seconds, are punishable just as they would be in any ordinary case of murder or attempted murder or in any ordinary case of unlawful shooting or attempting to shoot or unlawful wounding. See the Offences against the Person Act, 1861, ss. 1, 14, 15, 18, 20. But though duelling had never been sanctioned under English law except in the case of trial by battle (q v.), and although killing or attempted killing in a duel had always been a capital felony in point of law, yet down to the middle of the last century jurors had regarded a fair duel with such leniency that acquittals were the rule rather than the exception.

The Rules of War of 1844 made duelling a military offence, and now the Army Act, s. 38, provides that an officer taking any part in a duel may be cashiered and that a soldier committing the same offence is liable to imprisonment.

Duellum. This does not mean a duel in the modern sense. It meant the combat which took place in trial by battle (q.v.).

Duke. The highest rank in the peerage (q.v.). The title originated in 1337, when the Black Prince was created Duke of Cornwall, and it was first conferred on a subject in 1357.

The eldest son and the eldest son of the eldest son of a duke bear during the duke's lifetime two of the lower titles of the family. Thus, there may be living at the same time the Duke of A., his son the Marquis of B., and the son's son, the Earl of C. A duke's younger sons bear by courtesy the title of Lord, and his daughters are similarly entitled to that of Lady.

Duke of York's School. This school for the sons of soldiers was founded in 1801, under the name of the Royal Military Asylum, by the Duke of York, son of George III., and for many years commander-in-chief of the British Army. It originally occupied buildings adjacent to Chelsea Hospital (q.v.), from which it was removed in 1909 to new buildings at Guston, near Dover. See the Duke of York's School (Chapel) Act, 1910.

Dum bene se gesserit. (During good conduct.) Applied to offices from which the holder cannot be removed at the mere will of the Crown, as is the case in those held durante bene placito. Thus a judge of the High Court can only be removed on the address of both Houses of Parliament.

Dumb Bidding. Under the now repealed statute of 1779, 19 Geo. 3, c. 56, ss. 5, 6, certain duties were imposed on the prices realised at auctions, the duties to accrue due on "the knocking down of the hammer or other closing of the bidding." A plan was devised under which a price was written down and kept from the knowledge of the bidders, whose bids were to be made upon the conditions that no bid was to be accepted unless it reached such price. This plan was intended to avoid the duties; but the Courts declared it to be a fraud upon the revenue and that the duties were payable.

Dum casta vixerit. (While she lives chastely.)

Dum fuit infra ætatem; Dum fuit non compos mentis, were writs which lay for the recovery of land which had been aliened by a person "while he was within age," or "while he was non compos mentis." The former could be brought by the alienor after he had attained majority, or by his heir; the latter could only be brought by the heir. Both were abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36.

Dum fuit in prisona. (While he was in prison.) A writ which formerly lay for a person to enable him to recover lands which he had aliened under duress of imprisonment. Abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36.

Dum sola. (While she remains unmarried.)

Duo non possunt in solido unam rem possidere (Co. Litt. 368). (Two persons cannot possess one thing in entirety.)

Duo sunt instrumenta ad omnes res aut confirmandas aut impugnandas—ratio et auctoritas (8 Co. 16). (There are two means of either confirming or impugning all things—reason and authority.)

Duplex querela is a remedy which a clerk in Holy orders has against the bishop if the latter for any reason other than some one or more of the reasons specified in ss. 2, 3, of the Benefices Act, 1898, refuses or delays to admit and institute him to a church to which he is presented. It is a monition addressed by a judge of the Ecclesiastical Court to the bishop, requiring him to admit the party complaining, with a citation requiring the bishop, in case he does not comply with the monition, to appear and show cause why the right of institution has not devolved on the judge. It sometimes also contains an inhibition commanding the bishop to do nothing pending the suit to the prejudice of the party complaining. See CITATION.

Duplicate. Agreements, deeds and other documents are frequently executed in duplicate, in order that each party may have an original in his possession. In such cases each party as a rule only executes the part which is to be delivered to the other party. The part executed by the grantor, promisor or person receiving the pecuniary consideration is called the original, and the other the duplicate. A duplicate lease is called a counterpart. See LEASE; INDENTURE.

A duplicate is the proper legal description of what is popularly known as a pawnticket.

The drawer of a bill of exchange which is lost before it is overdue can be obliged to give a duplicate bill to the person who had held the lost bill upon such holder giving security and an indemnity (Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 69).

Second letters patent, granted by the Lord Chancellor in a case in which he had already issued letters patent, were formerly known as duplicates.

Duplicity. A pleading is double, or open to the objection of duplicity, when it, or a portion of it, contains more claims, charges or defences than one. Formerly the general rule was that a pleading ought not to contain more than one claim, charge or defence, but it has gradually been relaxed, and now no longer applies to civil pleadings (except so far as they may be embarrassing or otherwise objectionable) or to criminal proceedings. See COUNTS.

Durante absentia. See ADMINISTRATION; GRANT.

Durante bene placito. During the pleasure of the Crown. See DUM BENE SE GESSERIT; OFFICE.

Durante minore ætate. See ADMINISTRATOR; EXECUTOR; GRANT.

Durante viduitate. (During widowhood.)

Duress is where a man is compelled to do an act either by injury, beating or unlawful imprisonment (sometimes called duress in the strict sense), or by the threat of being killed, suffering some grievous bodily harm, or being unlawfully imprisoned (sometimes called menace, or duress per minas). Duress also includes threatening, beating or imprisonment of the wife, parent or child of a person.

An act done under duress has not in general the legal effect which it would otherwise have. Thus if a man is compelled by duress to execute a deed or contract he may afterwards avoid it. (See UNDUE INFLUENCE.) If a person is compelled by personal violence, or threats of death, or grievous bodily harm, to do a criminal act, the question as to whether he has or has not committed a crime will depend entirely on the facts of the particular case.

Strictly speaking, there is no such thing as duress to the goods or property of a person. If, however, a person pays money to obtain the possession of property wrongfully detained, or if he pays, under protest, an excessive charge for the performance of a duty, he can recover it back.

Durham. See COUNTY PALATINE.

Duty is the correlative of right (q.v.). In practice, however, "duty" is usually applied to those acts which a person is bound to do by virtue of an office held by him, e.g., as trustee, executor, director, &c., while the obligation created by a contract is called a debt or liability, according to its nature.

As to duties of customs and excise, see those titles.

Dwelling-house. For the purposes of the Larceny Act, 1916, " the expression ' dwelling-house ' does not include a building although within the same curtilage (q.v.) with any dwelling-house and occupied therewith unless there is a communication between such building and dwelling-house, either immediate or by means of a covered and enclosed passage leading from one to the other " (s. 46 (2)). See BURGLARY; HOUSEBREAKING; MANSION.

Dyestuffs. The Dyestuffs (Import Regulation) Act, 1920, prohibits (s. 1) the importation into the United Kingdom of dyestuffs except (s. 2) upon licence of the Board of Trade. The Act continues in force until 15th January, 1931 (s. 5).

Dying Declaration. See DECLARATION.

Dying without issue. These words, when used in any will, mean dying without issue (q.v.) living at death (Wills Act, 1837, s. 29).

Dyke-reeve. An officer who had the care of dykes and drains in fenny counties, especially in the eastern counties of England. See the repealed statute 16 & 17 Car. 2, c. 11.

Dynamite. See EXPLOSIVES.

E

Eadem mens præsumitur regis quæ est juris, et quæ esse debet, præsertim in dubiis (Hob. 154). (The mind of the king is presumed to be in conformity with the law, and with what it should be, especially in doubtful cases.) And so if the king does something which is contrary to law he will, on the principle embodied in the maxim rex non potest peccare, be deemed to have been deceived by someone or other.

Ealdorman. Literally, an elder. The title of ealdorman was applied in Anglo-Saxon times to an official who, along with the sheriff and the bishop, was one of the three chief officers of each county. He represented the king. The area of an ealdorman's jurisdiction was sometimes larger than a county, and his position was sometimes that of a viceroy. The office was not continued after the Conquest, but the name of the office was borrowed by the mediaeval alderman (q.v.) and is still used.

Ea commendandi causâ in venditionibus dicuntur si palam appareant venditorem non obligant (D. 18, 1, 43). (The things which, in the course of bargaining, are said merely in praise of the goods do not bind the vendor if it is clear that they are said in that way.) And so if an obviously broken-kneed horse is produced and sold as sound in limb this will not ground an action.

Ea quæ raro accidunt, non temere in agendis negotiis computantur (D. 50, 17, 64). (The things which seldom happen are not to be treated off-hand as factors in business transactions.) That is to say, no one is to be held responsible for not anticipating an event which would not ordinarily happen. Compare nemo tenetur divinare.

Earl. In Anglo-Saxon times this was a title of honour, not hereditary, borne by various high officials. After the Conquest the title in its present hereditary form came into existence.

The wife of an earl is styled the Countess of ——. His daughters bear by courtesy the title of " Lady." His younger sons are by courtesy known as " the honourable." During his lifetime his eldest son bears by courtesy the next lower title—a viscount or a barony—of the family.

The title of earl is the third in the peerage (q.v.).

Earl Marshal. The Earl Marshal and the Lord High Constable (q.v.) were the two chief officers of the feudal forces under the Norman kings. They jointly presided over the Court of Chivalry (q.v.). After the forfeiture of the office of the Lord High Constable in 1521, doubts arose as to whether the Earl Marshal could sit alone; and the matter ended by the court ceasing to sit except occasionally down to about 1740. Between 1521 and 1740 it was known as the Court of Honour of the Earl Marshal of England in matters concerning arms and honours.

The heralds (q.v.) had been officers of the Court of Chivalry and since 1521 have been nominated for office by the Earl Marshal, who appoints them under royal warrant when the appointment is approved. No new arms (in the heraldic sense) can be granted to anyone without the warrant of the Earl Marshal. The Earl Marshal is one of the high officers of state who attends the Primate at a coronation, when the Primate " presents " the new sovereign for formal recognition by the people.

In 1672 the office of Earl Marshal was granted to the then Duke of Norfolk, and it has been held ever since by the Duke of Norfolk for the time being. See HERALD.

Earmark. Property is said to be earmarked when it can be identified or distinguished from other property of the same nature. The term is chiefly used in respect of money, which differs from most other things in being rarely capable of being earmarked. As a general rule, "money has no earmark," and therefore if a sum is paid to a banker and is mixed by him in the ordinary course of business with other money in his custody, that particular sum is incapable of being distinguished from the rest. But if money is received by a person for a special purpose, and is kept separate from his other money or is invested in some property or security which can be identified, then the money is said to be earmarked, and can be "followed," that is, claimed and recovered, by the person entitled to it. The question is of importance in cases where the receiver of the money has become insolvent, for unless it is earmarked the person entitled to it can only share in the general assets instead of recovering the whole sum. (See Clayton's Case.) Trust moneys can, however, be followed in bankruptcy or in the hands of anyone who has received them with notice of their character; and the proceeds of trust moneys wrongfully dealt with can also be followed, except in the case of a purchaser without notice.

Earnest. Giving an earnest or earnest-money is a mode of signifying assent to a contract of sale or the like, by giving to the vendor a nominal sum (e.g., a shilling) as a token that the parties are in earnest or have made up their minds. The expression is chiefly of importance from the provisions of s. 17 of the Statute of Frauds (q.v.) making the giving of "something in earnest to bind the bargain" one mode of dispensing with a written contract for the sale of goods for the price of £10 or upwards. It must be an actual payment. See ARLES; ARGENTUM DEI; ERLES; FESTING PENNY; GOD'S PENNY; DENARIUS DEI.

Earnings. See MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY ACTS.

Ease, Writ of. See EXEMPTION, ETC.

Easement. When A., the owner of a piece of land, has the right of compelling B, the owner of an adjoining piece of land, either to refrain from doing something on his (B's) land, or to allow A to do something on his (B's) land, then A is said to have an easement over B's land: A is called the dominant owner, and his land the dominant tenement; B is called the servient tenant, and his land the servient tenement. The two tenements may adjoin either horizontally, as in the majority of cases, or vertically, as in the case of the owner of a stratum of minerals being entitled to work them in such a manner as to let down the surface of land owned by another man.

Vertical easements are also to be found in the rare case of flats separately owned so that they are practically separate houses built one upon the other; the owner of an upper flat is then entitled to the support of a lower flat.

The following are the principal kinds of easements:—(1) in respect of water (see WATER; WATERCOURSE); (2) in respect of air (see AIR); (3) in respect of light (see LIGHT); (4) rights of way (see WAY); (5) rights of support (see SUPPORT); (6) in respect of party-walls and fences (q.v.); (7) easements of recreation, that is to say, the right of the inhabitants of a particular place to walk, dance or hold lawful sports on the lands of another.

The law does not recognise any easement of prospect or privacy. If a landowner sells a plot of land as a site for a house which, when built, will derive a great part of its value from advantages of prospect or privacy, the landowner is not precluded from dealing with the rest of his land in such a way as to destroy the view from the house and interfere with its privacy so as materially to diminish its value.

Easements must be distinguished—(a) from rights of property or ownership (q.v.); (b) from profits à prendre (q.v.), which are rights to the produce or profit of land, while easements only relate to the user of land; (c) from natural rights (q.v.), such as the natural right to support (q.v.); (d) from licences (q.v.), which are personal, and confer no interest in the land.

As regards the servient owner, an easement is always negative, the obligation on him being either to suffer or not to do something. As regards the dominant owner, easements are divisible into affirmative and negative. An easement is affirmative when it entitles the dominant owner to make active use of the servient tenement, or to do some act which, in the absence of an easement, would be a nuisance or a trespass. The principal affirmative easements are rights of way, the right to lead or discharge water over or on a neighbour's land, the right to use or affect the water of a natural stream in a manner not justified by natural right (see WATER; WATERCOURSE), and the right to carry on an offensive trade. An easement is negative when it merely restrains the servient owner from exercising an ordinary right of ownership over his land; such are the rights of light and air (q.v.), and the acquired right of support (q.v.).

Continuous easements are those of which the enjoyment is or may be continual without the interference of the person entitled—as in the case of an artificial watercourse, or the right to light and air—as opposed to discontinuous easements, such as rights of way.

Apparent easements are those the existence of which appears from the construction or condition of one of the tenements, so as to be capable of being seen or known on inspection: such as a drain or artificial watercourse.

Easements of necessity are those which are absolutely necessary for the enjoyment of a piece of land or building.

The distinction between these classes of easements is of importance with reference to the rule that where the owner of a piece of land divides it, and conveys one part to a person without any stipulations on the subject, then the grantee becomes entitled by what is sometimes called "the disposition of the owner of two tenements"—(1) to all continuous and apparent easements, that is, to such easements as will enable him to enjoy the property in the same way as it is evident, from its condition, that the owner enjoyed it, and (2) to all easements of necessity. Thus, where the owner of land on which were some cattle sheds made an artificial watercourse through another part of the land to supply them with water, and afterwards conveyed the cattle sheds to another person, it was held that the grantee was entitled to the apparent and continuous easement of receiving water from the watercourse on the grantor's land. So, if I have a field enclosed by my own land on all sides and I alien this field to another, he shall have a way to it over my land as an easement of necessity, for without it he could not have any benefit of the field.

In some cases an easement is accompanied by certain rights which are necessary for its enjoyment, in which case it is called the principal easement, and the accompanying rights are called secondary easements; thus a right of watercourse includes the secondary easement of going on the servient tenement to clean and repair the channel.

Easements may be created (i) by express grant, as where A grants B a right of way over A's land; (ii) by implied grant, either on the principle of the disposition of the owner of two tenements (supra), or on the principle that a man cannot derogate from his own grant (see DEROGATE), and (iii) by prescription (q.v.). They may be extinguished—(i) by express release; (ii) by implied release, namely, (a) by merger or unity of possession, which occurs when the two tenements become united in the ownership of one person: (b) by necessity, as where the owner of the dominant tenement does, or authorises the owner of the servient tenement to do, an act which necessarily prevents the future enjoyment of the easement; (c) by alteration of the dominant tenement, so as to make the easement inapplicable (see ENCROACHMENT; LIGHT); (d) by non-user, evidencing an intention of abandoning the easement.

In the case of a temporary or imperfect unity of possession, as where the owner of the dominant tenement acquires a lease of the servient tenement, the easement is only suspended and not extinguished, and revives when the unity of possession ceases.

As to the protection of easements, see DISTURBANCE.

Easter. Easter Day is the first Sunday after the full moon which happens upon or next after the 21st March; so that if the full moon happens on a Sunday, Easter is the first Sunday after. Easter Monday, the day after Easter Sunday, is a Bank Holiday (q.v.). See SITTINGS; TERM; VACATION.

Easterling; Esterling. An apocryphal coin, first spoken of in the sixteenth century. In the thirteenth century men wrote of esterlingus or sterlingus, but only as meaning the sterling penny, which then (see SILVER COINS) was of silver, and Matthew Paris wrote about the moneta esterlingarum, that is to say, the coinage of sterling pennies, and not the money of the Easterlings. But it gradually came to be believed that esterling or easterling did in fact mean a coin of the Easterlings, that is to say, the Easterling merchants.

Easterling Merchants. This would appear to be synonymous with the Hanse. See GUILDHALLA.

Easter Offerings. The statute 2 & 3 Edw. 6, c. 13, s. 10, directs that every parishioner shall pay at Easter certain offerings, where they have not been commuted (S. L. R. Act, 1887), to the clergy of his parish. These are known as Easter offerings. They are due from every householder at the rate of two pence for every member of his family who is over sixteen, unless a larger sum is due by custom; and, where they still remain payable, they are, under the statute 7 & 8 Will. 3, c. 6, recoverable summarily before two justices. The rubric at the end of the Communion Service in the Prayer Book also enjoins payment of these offerings. Whether paid voluntarily or in pursuance of law, they are assessable for income tax.

Easter Pence. See QUADRAGESIMALS.

East Hendred. See CHILTERN HUNDREDS.

East India Company. See CHARTERED COMPANIES. This company was incorporated by royal charter on 31st December, 1600, purely for trading purposes, with a monopoly of the East India trade for fifteen years. This monopoly was finally definitely acquired about the year 1700 and lasted until 1813, after which date the company retained the monopoly only of the China trade until 1833, when its trading privileges altogether ceased. Meanwhile it had gradually developed from a mere trading company into a body governing a continually increasing area in India, and as a governing body it existed until 1858, when the administration of India was transferred from the company to the Crown.

Eastland Company. This company was incorporated in 1579, under the title of the Fellowship of the Eastland Merchants, by a charter which gave it the monopoly of trading in Prussia and in the Baltic generally. Its monopoly was abolished by the statute 23 Car. 2, c. 7, and it then fell into decay. It had originated in a charter granted by Richard II. in 1391 to the English merchants who traded to Prussia.

Eat inde sine die. When judgment was given for the defendant, and the cause was at an end, the order formerly was eat sine die, that is to say, let him go without a day (without any further adjournment and continuance of the cause); in effect, therefore, these words were a judgment that the king's writ commanding the defendant's attendance had now been fully satisfied, and that he was free to go. This form of judgment for the defendant continued until the use of English became compulsory in 1733. See FRENCH: compare IN MISERICORDIA, ETC.

Eau Brink. A hamlet in Norfolk about three miles north of King's Lynn. Both places are on the river Ouse. The Eau Brink Cut is an artificial channel for the Ouse, made in 1818 from Eau Brink to a point in the navigable waters of the Wash about half a mile north of Lynn. The Eau Brink Tax was the popular title of an annual charge which was imposed upon certain adjacent areas, in order to cover the cost of constructing the Cut, by various local Acts of Parliament mentioned in The Bedford Level, by S. Wells (Lond. 1830), at p. 759.

See the statute 35 Geo. 3, c. 77.

Eavesdropping. Eavesdroppers are "such as stand under walls or windows by night or day to hear news and to carry them to others and to make strife and debate amongst their neighbours" (Termes de la Ley, 317). This was formerly held to be a public nuisance indictable at the sheriff's tourn (q.v.) and at the court leet (q.v.); and now it would appear that justices can require an eavesdropper to give sureties for his good behaviour.

Ebdomarius; Ebdomary. Anciently this was an officer of a cathedral church whose duty it was to see to the proper carrying out of the various services.

Eber-murder = Abermurdrum (q.v.).

Ecclesia ecclesiæ decimas solvere non debet (Cro. Eliz. 479). (One church is not bound to pay tithes to another church.)

Ecclesia meliorari non deteriorari potest (2 Eden, 313). (The condition of the church may be improved but may not be altered for the worse.) This was a maxim of the common law with regard to the dealings of the parson, the patron, or the ordinary, with the endowments of a church.

Ecclesia non moritur (2 Inst. 3). (The Church does not die), although, as Coke adds, moriuntur ecclesiastici (churchmen die)).

Ecclesiastical Commissioners are commissioners established by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners Act, 1836, principally for the purpose of preparing schemes for the improvement of our ecclesiastical system, especially as to the equalisation of the revenues and duties of the various dioceses, and to provide for the cure of souls in parishes where assistance was required. Several of such schemes have been given effect to by Orders in Council. By later Acts a fund has been vested in the commissioners to enable them to make provision for the cure of souls in populous districts; and provision is accordingly made for the creation of ecclesiastical districts and parishes, and the appointment of ministers therein. See PARISH; NEW PARISHES.

Ecclesiastical Committee. See NATIONAL ASSEMBLY, etc.

Ecclesiastical Corporations. See CORPORATIONS.

Ecclesiastical Courts are Courts which have jurisdiction only in ecclesiastical matters. They are—(1) the two Provincial (q.v.) Courts of Canterbury and York, and (2) the Diocesan (q.v.) Courts of each diocese. There are also various other Courts which are either obsolete or are not strictly judicial tribunals; such are the Courts of Audience (q.v.), the Court of the Vicar-General, of the Master of the Faculties, etc. See FACULTY, etc.

The Privy Council is the supreme Court of Appeal in ecclesiastical matters.

Ecclesiastical Law is that part of the law which relates to the ministrations and governments, rights and obligations, of the Church established in the State, that is, of the Church of England. It is derived from constitutions of synods and councils of the Church, from canons of Convocation, from usage, and from Acts of Parliament.

Public ecclesiastical law determines the authority of the Church and those who govern it, and is both internal and external, the former being concerned with the constitution of the Church relatively to the members of it, and the latter with the relations of the Church to the State and religious bodies not directly connected with herself. Education. Under the seventeen Acts collectively entitled the Education Acts, 1870 to 1919, and various other ancillary Acts, there has been established a system of elementary education which is free, compulsory, and, so far as the State is concerned, non-denominational. The great mass of enactments above mentioned has been almost entirely repealed by the Education Act, 1921, s. 172, Sch. 7; and this Act of 1921 now codifies the whole law on the subject. See CONSCIENCE CLAUSE; COWPER-TEMPLE CLAUSE; EDUCATION, BOARD OF; EDUCATION CODE; EDUCATION COMMITTEE; ENDOWED SCHOOLS; HALF-TIMER; INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS; LOCAL AUTHORITY; LOCAL EDUCATION AUTHORITY; PUBLIC SCHOOL; REFORMATORY; SCHOOL.

Education, Board of. This consists of the President of the Board, the Lord President of the Council, the principal Secretaries of State, the First Commissioner of the Treasury, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Board of Education Act, 1899, s. 1 (2)); but the Board never meets, and its functions are discharged entirely by the President, who (s. 8 (1)) is not disqualified for membership of the House of Commons. His salary is £5,000 a year. He is usually a member of the Cabinet.

The Board of Education took the place of the Education Department (Board of Education Act, 1899, s. 2 (1)) (q.v.), including the Department of Science and Art (q.v.), and under the Education Act, 1921, s. 1, it continues to be the central authority as to education.

Education Code. The conditions with which an elementary school must comply in order to obtain an annual parliamentary grant are those set forth from time to time in minutes of the Board of Education (Education Act, 1921, ss. 118-120, Sch. 6). These conditions form what is known as the Education Code (ib. s. 170 (19)). The part of these minutes known as the General Regulations is but little altered from year to year: but almost every year there are alterations as regards other parts of the minutes.

Education Committee. Every local education authority (q.v.) (other than one concerned only with non-elementary education, which can exercise a discretion) must establish an education committee to which all matters, other than the raising of money, must be referred for report by the authority before any action is taken. The committee must be established in accordance with a scheme (made by the authority and approved by the Board of Education) which must give the authority the right of appointing at least half the committee and which may provide for the appointment to the committee of persons who are not members of the authority (Education Act, 1921, s. 4).

Education Department. The Elementary Education Act, 1870, s. 3, provided that in that Act the term "Education Department" should mean "the Lords of the Committee of the Privy Council on Education." The Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 12 (6), gives a definition which is practically the same. This committee had been constituted by Order in Council made 10th April, 1839; in 1856 it became the Education Department. The Education Department, like the Board of Education (q.v.) at present, was the Government Department concerned with the working of the elementary education system.

Eel-fares. The fry of eels. See the statute 25 Hen. 8, c. 4.

Eels. The legal status of the ordinary eel found in fresh water is peculiar. The period between 15th March and 15th June is the close season for "freshwater fish," that is to say, for all fish (other than pollen, trout, and char), which never leave fresh water and go to the open sea (Freshwater Fisheries Act, 1878, s. 11). Doubts having arisen as to whether the ordinary eel confined itself exclusively to fresh water, and therefore as to whether it was or was not a "freshwater fish," the Freshwater Fisheries Act, 1886, s. 1, declared that the term "freshwater fish" does not include eels, but that "nothing herein contained shall be deemed to authorise angling for eels during the close season." As, however, there is no prohibition of angling for eels at any time, it would appear that angling for them can never be in itself illegal, and that the only restriction on the capture of eels is that contained in the Salmon Fishery Act, 1873, s. 15, which prohibits the use in salmon rivers of nets, or, with certain exceptions, of baskets, for the capture of eels between the 1st January and 24th June, and in the Elvers (q.v.) Act, 1876.

Effractor. Anciently this meant a burglar or a housebreaker.

Effusio sanguinis. Anciently the king granted to some lords of manors, one of whom was the Abbot of Glastonbury, the right of levying a fine, known as effusio sanguinis, from anyone wounding so as to cause a flow of blood (effusio sanguinis).

Egality = "owelty" (q.v.).

Egyptians. The old legal description of gypsies, or gipsies. They seem to have been of Asiatic origin, and to have migrated into Europe during the fifteenth century. They were numerous in this country by 1514, when the statute 22 Hen. 8, c. 10, was passed. That Act, which describes them as "outlandish persons calling themselves Egyptians," made them liable to imprisonment if they failed to depart the realm within fifteen days of being commanded to go. The statute 1 & 2 Phil. & Mar., c. 4, provided that anyone importing them into the kingdom should forfeit £40, that any of them imported into the kingdom should suffer death as felons if they remained here for one month, and that those already here should also suffer death if they remained here for forty days after the issue of a proclamation requiring them all to leave the kingdom. The statute 5 Eliz., c. 20, provided that no person who had been born in the realm should be expelled, all that such persons were required to do being to engage in some honest service or work; but it provided that anyone found and remaining for one month "in the company or fellowship of vagabonds commonly called or calling themselves Egyptians" should suffer death, and it left in force the enactments directed against the further importation of gipsies into England. These enactments of Henry VIII., Philip and Mary, and Elizabeth, were for some time strictly enforced; but subsequently they fell into disuse, and ultimately the gipsies came to be dealt with only under the Vagrancy (q.v.) Acts. The statute of Elizabeth was repealed by 23 Geo. 3, c. 51; the statute of Philip and Mary was repealed, in so far as it prescribed the penalty of death, by the statute 1 Geo. 4, c. 116; and ultimately the Acts of Henry VIII., Philip and Mary, and Elizabeth were entirely repealed by the statute 19 & 20 Vict., c. 64. The only Act now in force which deals specially with the gipsies is the Highway Act, 1835, s. 72, which imposes a penalty of forty shillings on any "gypsy" encamping on the highway.

Eight Hours Act, The. The popular title of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1908. See COAL MINES.

Eigné. See MULIER.

— Ei incumbit probatio qui dicit non qui negat. (In the law of evidence the burden of proof lies on the party who asserts, not on the party who denies), for the reason that it is generally difficult, and sometimes impossible, to prove a negative. Thus, if in an action on a promissory note the defendant denied that he made the note, the burden of proof would lie on the plaintiff. But if the defendant pleaded that he had paid the note, then the affirmative would be on him. See AFFIRMANTI NON, etc.

— Ei qui affirmat, non ei qui negat, incumbit probatio. (The burden of proof lies on him who affirms a fact, not on him who denies it.)

This maxim was used by Lord Halsbury at p. 45 of 12 App. Cas. It is a variant of the maxim Affirmanti non, etc.

Eire. See EYRE.

Ejectione custodiæ, De. This, which is the Latin equivalent for the French ejectment de garde, was the title of a writ which lay for a guardian when turned out of any land of his ward during the minority of the latter.

Ejectione firmæ, De. The writ of ejectment which originated the old action of ejectment. The writ dated from about the year 1500. See EJECTMENT.

Ejectment is a judicial proceeding for recovering land from a person wrongfully in possession of it. Formerly, an action brought for this purpose in any of the superior Courts of common law was called an action of ejectment (infra), but now it is called an action for the recovery of land, as to which see RECOVERY.

Where the yearly value or rent of the land to be recovered does not exceed £100, an action of ejectment may be brought in the County Court of the district, unless a Judge of the High Court order the action to be tried in the High Court on the ground that the decision of the action would affect lands of a greater annual value than £100 (County Courts Act, 1888, s. 59; County Courts Act, 1903, s. 3).

Before the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, the action of ejectment was a complicated proceeding, resting on several fictions. It was originally devised to escape from the still greater intricacies of real actions, which were the proper mode of trying questions of title to the freehold of land, while ejectment was available only for persons entitled to the possession of land under a lease or other chattel interest. To adapt the remedy to questions of freehold title, two fictions were introduced—one, an imaginary lease (see DEM.) by the real plaintiff (the freeholder) to an imaginary "John Doe" (the nominal plaintiff); and the other, an imaginary ouster of John Doe by "Richard Roe," the nominal defendant, commonly known as the "casual ejector" (q.v.). The person really in possession of the land was then allowed to defend the action on condition that he admitted the truth of these fictions and relied only on his title as a defence.

The Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, abolished these fictions, and made the action of ejectment similar to other actions, except that it had no pleadings. See HABERE FACIAS POSSESSIONEM; WRIT OF RESTITUTION; see also RECOVERY; LANDLORD AND TENANT; DESERTED PREMISES; WRIT OF POSSESSION.

Ejusdem generis. It is a rule of legal construction that general words following an enumeration of particulars are to have their generality limited by reference to the preceding particular enumeration, and to be construed as including only all other articles of the like nature and quality.

Ejus est interpretari cujus est condere. (He who makes the law also explains it.) This was a maxim of the Roman law, but it does not apply in our law. Nothing said either in the House of Commons or in the House of Lords can be cited to any Court in explanation of any statute.

Ejus nulla culpa est cui parere necesse sit (D. 50, 17, 169). (He who is bound to obey is in no fault.) That is to say, no action will lie against anyone for anything done in the execution of a duty imposed by law.

Elder Brethren. The title of the Masters of the Trinity House (q.v.).

Elder Title. A title older in point of existence coming simultaneously into operation with a title of younger origin is called the elder title, and prevails. See FIRMIOR OPERATIO LEGIS.

Election is (i) the right, and (ii) the act, of choosing: the term is applied both to rights and liabilities. "If," said Coke, "I give unto you one of my horses in my stable, there you shall have the election; for you shall be the first agent by taking or seizure of one of them."

The equitable doctrine of election is founded on the principle that there is an implied condition that he who accepts a benefit under an instrument must adopt the whole of it, conforming with all its provisions and renouncing every right inconsistent with them. Thus, suppose A. by will or deed gives to B. property belonging to C., and by the same instrument gives other property belonging to himself to C., a Court of Equity will hold C. to be entitled to the gift made to him by A. only upon the implied condition of renouncing his own property in favour of B. He is, therefore, put to his election whether he will take under the instrument, that is, take the property given him by A., and give up his own property to B., or against the instrument, that is, retain his own property, and either forfeit the property given him by A., or take it and make compensation to B. for the value of his (C.'s) own property which he has retained.

Election is also the operation of choosing a representative, officer, etc., such as a member of Parliament, director, or the like. So, a bishop is elected by the chapter of the cathedral by virtue of a congé d'élire. As to election of guardian by an infant, see GUARDIAN.

Election Commissioners. If a judge who tries an election petition (q.v.) reports to the House of Commons that corrupt or illegal practices have extensively prevailed at the election, the two Houses of Parliament may by joint address apply to the Crown for the appointment of election commissioners, who must be barristers of seven years' standing, to inquire into the matter (Election Commissioners Act, 1852, s. 1; Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, s. 15; Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, s. 12). The commissioners sit as a Court, and are invested by the Act of 1852 with the necessary powers. They report to Parliament, setting out the evidence taken before them, and their findings upon it. Upon reports made by them a number of boroughs—mostly of small size—were from time to time disfranchised by statute; but no such disfranchisement has taken place since 1885—when the small boroughs which were more peculiarly amenable to bribery practically disappeared—and the latest instance of the appointment of an Election Commission was in 1906, when one inquired into an election for the borough of Worcester, with the result that the borough was temporarily disfranchised by the refusal in 1907 of the House of Commons to issue a writ for a new election. Election Commissioners are practically obsolete: candidates, instead of bribing individual electors, now bribe the electors as a whole with promises of predatory legislation—which is quite legal.

Election Committee. This was a committee of the House of Commons appointed to inquire into the validity of the election of its own members. Its mode of proceeding was regulated by the Act 4 & 5 Vict. c. 58, which prescribed a remedy by petition in favour of the party aggrieved, whether he were a candidate for election or an elector, and to which petition the member actually returned was made respondent. The petition was, in the first instance, delivered by either party to the general elections committee appointed by the House at the commencement of the session, and was then referred by that committee to the Select Committee, which consisted of a chairman and six other members. This select committee, being sworn duly to try the matter, were empowered for that purpose to examine witnesses on oath; and by the majority of their voices they determined the validity or invalidity of the past return, together with consequential findings. These election committees have been superseded by the judges who since 1868 have tried election petitions (q.v.).

Election de Clerke. This was a writ which lay for the election of a clerk to make and take Statutes Merchant (q.v.).

Election Expenses. By the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, s. 8, Sch. I., the election expenses, other than the personal expenses, of a candidate at a parliamentary election may not exceed, in boroughs, £350, where the number of electors does not exceed 2,000—there is now no such borough—and £380 where the number exceeds 2,000 with an additional £30 for every additional 1,000 electors, or, in counties, £650 where the number of electors does not exceed 2,000—there is now no such county—and £710 where the number exceeds 2,000, with an additional £60 for every additional 1,000 electors.

There is, however, no limit to the amount which a man may lawfully expend disinterestedly on public purposes in a constituency for which he subsequently happens to become a candidate; but such expenditure is injudicious unless made under expert advice.

Election Judges. The popular title of the judges of the King's Bench Division placed upon the rota (q.v.) for the trial of election petitions (q.v.), that is to say, who have been selected for that duty by the other judges.

Election Petitions are petitions for inquiry into the validity of elections of members of Parliament, when it is alleged that the return of a member is invalid for bribery or any other reason. These petitions are heard by two judges of the King's Bench Division (Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, s. 11; Parliamentary Elections and Corrupt Practices Act, 1879, s. 2; Judicature Act, 1881, s. 13). The corrupt withdrawal of a parliamentary election petition is a misdemeanour (Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, s. 41 (4)).

— Electio semel facta . . . non patitur regressum (Co. Litt. 146*a*). (Election once made cannot be recalled). Thus, where an agreement has been procured by fraud, the party defrauded may within a reasonable time elect to treat it as valid or to treat it as void: but once he has elected, he cannot change his mind. See QUOD SEMEL, ETC.

Electoral Division. See COUNTY COUNCIL.

Electoral Franchise. This phrase generally denotes the qualifications of the persons entitled to elect members of Parliament, whether in counties or in boroughs; although it may also apply to the qualifications (now entirely abolished) of persons entitled to become candidates for election. A brief history of the electoral franchise at different periods is as follows.—

I. In the case of counties: It appears that originally all the freeholders of the county, whether resident or not, elected the members for the county (7 Hen. 4, c. 15); that afterwards, by the statute 1 Hen. 5, c. 1, residence was made a necessary qualification; that, the number of electors occasioning turbulence, the forty shillings' freehold qualification was imposed by 8 Hen. 6, c. 7; that the statute 14 Geo. 3, c. 58, dispensed with the qualification of residence. By the Reform Act, 1832, the electors for counties were increased by the addition of copyholders and leaseholders for terms of years and of tenants at will, paying a rent of £50 a year.

II. In the case of boroughs: It appears that originally the right of election in these was very various, the chief varieties of qualification being the following:—(1) All inhabitant householders resident within the borough; (2) all inhabitants paying "scot and lot," that is to say, local rates; (3) all "potwallers," i.e., persons (whether householders or lodgers) furnishing their own diet; (4) all persons holding burgage lands; and (5) all persons enjoying corporate rights. And in some boroughs two or more of these qualifications might be combined.

The Reform Act, 1832, regulated the representation as follows: A £10 household franchise was uniformly established in all boroughs, saving only the rights of corporate towns. Subsequently, by the Representation of the People Act, 1867, which extended as well to counties as to boroughs, the franchise was given as follows.

I. In the case of counties: To every person duly registered as a voter, and who was of full age and capacity, and who was the owner of lands or tenements of freehold, copyhold, or any other tenure whatever, for his own life or pur autre vie, or for any larger estate, of the clear yearly value of not less than £5, or who was entitled either as a lessee or assignee to the unexpired residue of a term of years which was originally for a period of not less than sixty years, determinable or not on a life or lives, of the like clear yearly value (s. 5); or who had occupied for twelve months lands or tenements within the county of the rateable value of £12, and had been rated for the same for the relief of the poor, and had paid such rates (s. 6).

II. In the case of boroughs: To every person duly registered as a voter, and who was of full age and capacity, and who had for twelve months preceding been an inhabitant occupier, whether as owner or tenant, of any dwelling-house within the borough, and who had been rated for the same for the relief of the poor, and had paid such rates (s. 3); or who as a lodger had occupied in the borough, separately and as sole tenant for twelve months preceding the same, lodgings in a house of the clear yearly value of £10 at the least, and had also resided for that period in such lodgings (s. 4.).

The Representation of the People Act, 1884, left the property qualification for county electors untouched, but (s. 5) reduced the occupation franchise for counties to £10 so as to assimilate it to the borough occupation franchise; extended (s. 2) to counties the household and lodger franchise which since 1867 had existed in boroughs, and (s. 3) made the occupier of a dwelling-house, whether in a county or in a borough, by virtue of any office, service, or employment, an inhabitant occupier who was entitled to the franchise.

Up to 1918 women had no votes for parliamentary elections. Then the Representation of the People Act, 1918, not only gave the parliamentary vote to women, but established, except in the case of persons with no fixed abode, something very like universal suffrage for adult males and for women over thirty years of age. It sweeps away all the old franchises; in s. 1 it sets out clearly the franchise for men generally; in s. 2 it sets out the university franchise, and in s. 4 it sets out the franchise for women generally.

As to the electoral franchise for the purpose of local government elections, see, as regards men, s. 3 of the Act of 1918, and, as regards women, s. 4 of the same Act.

Electricity. "Every person who maliciously or fraudulently abstracts, causes to be wasted or diverted, consumes or uses any electricity" is guilty of felony, punishable as in the case of simple larceny (Larceny Act, 1916, 6 & 7 Geo. 5, c. 50, s. 10). As to the punishment of simple larceny, see s. 37.

Electric Lighting. The Acts of general application are the Electric Lighting Acts, 1882 to 1909, and the Electric Lighting (Clauses) Act, 1899.

The Electric Lighting Act, 1882, enables persons, companies, and certain local authorities to obtain powers for the supply of electricity by means either (s. 3) of a licence, granted by the Board of Trade, or (s. 4) of a Provisional Order of the Board of Trade, which is inoperative until confirmed by Act of Parliament. The powers given may be to supply for either public or private purposes (s. 3), public purposes being the lighting of streets, etc., and buildings of public resort (s. 3 (3)), and private purposes, covering everything except the sending of any telegram (s. 3 (4)), which includes any message or signal sent by electricity. The Act, which of course contains a large number of administrative sections, has been amended and supplemented, but not materially altered, by the Acts of 1888 and 1909.

The Act of 1899 contains a number of provisions which had usually been expressly inserted in every provisional order and in every special Act of Parliament for the giving of electrical powers, and enacts that except where the order or the special Act otherwise provides, those provisions shall apply to every subsequent order or special Act.

The granting of electrical powers by Board of Trade licences proved unsatisfactory, and has fallen into desuetude, the method now employed being generally either the provisional order or a special Act.

The Acts relating specially to the Metropolitan area are the London Electric Lighting Areas Act, 1904, the London Electric Supply Act, 1908, (8 Edw. 7, c. clxvii), and the London Electric Supply Act, 1910 (10 Edw. 7, and 1 Geo. 5, c. cxl).

Eleemosyna. Alms. "Dare in puram et perpetuam eleemosynam" (to give in pure and perpetual alms) anciently meant to give lands in frank almoign (q.v.). The plural (eleemosynæ) meant the possessions of the Church.

Eleemosyna Regis (Eleemosyna aratri or carucarum). A tax of one penny imposed by Ethelred the Unready upon every plough (q.v.) of land for the support of the poor.

Eleemosynary. See CHARITY; CORPORATION.

Elegit is a writ of execution by which a judgment creditor may obtain possession of the debtor's land, and hold it until the debt is satisfied, either out of the rents and profits, or otherwise. By the Statute of Westminster II., where a debt is recovered or acknowledged in the King's Court or damages awarded, it shall be in the election of the plaintiff, either to have a fieri facias to the sheriff to levy the debt (see FIERI FACIAS), or that the sheriff shall deliver to him all the chattels of the debtor (saving only his oxen and beasts of the plough), and the one half of his land, until the debt be levied upon a reasonable price or extent. From the election given to the plaintiff by this statute, and from the entry of the award of this execution on the roll, "quod elegit sibi executionem," the writ of elegit derives its name. A creditor who has sued out the writ is called an elegit creditor. By the Judgments Act, 1838, s. 11, the remedy by writ of elegit was extended to the whole of the debtor's land, including copyholds and lands over which he has an absolute power of disposition (e.g., by appointment). By the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 146 (1) it was provided that the writ of elegit should no longer extend to chattels. The Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3, s. 10) had made it applicable to trust estates.

In executing this writ, the sheriff first impanels a jury to inquire as to the lands of the debtor within the bailiwick and their value; the sheriff subsequently delivers legal (not actual) possession of the lands to the creditor; if the latter cannot otherwise obtain actual possession, he must bring an action of ejectment. The writ must be registered in the register of writs and judgments affecting land which is kept in the Land Registry (Land Charges Act, 1900, s. 3; Land Charges Registration and Searches Act, 1888, s. 5). While the creditor holds the lands he is called tenant by elegit, and has a chattel interest in them (see CHATTELS); he may obtain an order for the sale of the debtor's interest in them, by presenting a petition to the High Court in the Chancery Division (Judgments Act, 1864, s. 4). See INQUISITION; POSSESSION; EXTENT; SCIRE FACIAS.

The writ of elegit is a clumsy and inconvenient remedy, and up to a few years before 1883 was never used, except where the execution creditor desired to seize the debtor's land. For some years before 1883 the writ had come into use for seizing chattels, because suffering the execution of a writ of elegit was not an act of bankruptcy on the part of the debtor, as is the case with a writ of fieri facias, where the chattels were sold for £50 or upwards: but since 1883 (see supra) this method of evading the bankruptcy law has been made impossible.

Elisors or Esliors (from the French élire, to choose) are persons appointed to return a jury for the trial of an action when the jury returned by the sheriff and that returned by the coroner have been successively challenged to the array for partiality or default. (See CHALLENGE.) No challenge to the array can be made against a jury returned by elisors. The proceeding, however, is practically obsolete. It can be used only where not only the sheriff, but also the coroner, or (if there be more coroners than one) all the coroners, can be objected to as being not impartial: and that is an unlikely contingency.

Ell. An obsolete measure of length. The English ell was 42 inches. The Scottish ell was 37.2 inches; and the Flemish ell was 27 inches. See ULNA FERREA.

Eloign is to remove. See ELONGATA; ELONGAVIT.

Elongata. Where goods taken in distress and replevied were directed to be returned to the distrainor by a writ of delivery or de retorno habendo, and the sheriff found that they had been eloigned, that is, removed to places unknown, he used formerly to make a return to that effect, called a return of elongata. See REPLEVIN; CAPIAS IN WITHERNAM; RETORNO HABENDO, DE.

Elongavit. Where the plaintiff in a proceeding by foreign attachment had obtained judgment of appraisement, but by reason of some act of the garnishee the goods could not be appraised (as where he had removed them from the city, or had sold them, etc.), the serjeant-at-mace returned that the garnishee had eloigned them, i.e., removed them out of the jurisdiction, and on this return (called an elongavit) judgment was given for the plaintiff that an inquiry should be made of the goods eloigned: this inquiry was set down for trial and the assessment was made by a jury after the manner of ordinary issues. The proceedings on the inquiry were also sometimes called the elongavit. See FOREIGN ATTACHMENT.

Elopement. Down to the middle of the eighteenth century this meant in the law any going away from her husband by a married woman to live in adultery with another man.

Elvers. The fry of eels. See the Elver Fishing Act, 1876, which makes the periods 1st January—28th February, and 26th April—24th June, close seasons for elvers and eels in the Severn Fishery District.

Ely. The Isle of Ely had formerly a special judicial organisation which was assimilated by the Liberty of Ely Act, 1837, to that of the rest of England. Ely was sometimes described as a county palatine: see, for instance, the statute 5 Eliz, c. 23, s. 11.

Embargo is the temporary or permanent sequestration of the property of individuals for the purposes of a Government, e.g., to obtain vessels for the transport of troops, the owners being reimbursed for this forced service. This is sometimes called civil embargo. In international law, where one State has received or anticipates injury from another State, it may lay an embargo on property within its territory belonging to subjects of the offending State as a means of securing redress. Such an embargo may be civil or hostile, according as it results in peace or war. See REPRISALS.

Embarrassing. See AMENDMENT; UNCERTAINTY.

Ember Days. The Ember Days are the Wednesdays, Fridays, and Saturdays next following the first Sunday in Lent, Whit-Sunday, the 14th September, and the 13th December respectively. See FAST DAYS.

Embezzle; Embezzlement. When a clerk or servant commits theft by converting to his own use any chattel, money or valuable security received or taken into possession by him for or in the name or on account of his master or employer, his offence is called embezzlement. If a clerk or servant commits theft by converting to his own use a chattel of which he has merely the custody (not the possession) as clerk or servant of the owner, his offence is larceny and not embezzlement. As to the distinction between custody and possession, see CUSTODY. A partner can be convicted of embezzling the property of the co-partnership (Larceny Act, 1916, s. 40 (4)).

The Larceny Act, 1916, deals, in s. 17, with embezzlement generally; in s. 18 with embezzlement by postal officials, and in s. 19 with embezzlement by officials of the Bank of England or the Bank of Ireland; the offence in each case being a felony. Justices may, with the consent of the accused, deal summarily with cases of embezzlement by clerks or servants where the value of the property does not exceed £20 (Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 12; Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, s. 15 (1)).

A person indicted for embezzlement may be convicted of larceny (q.v.) or vice versa (Larceny Act, 1916, s. 44 (2)).

Emblements. In certain cases where a tenant of land has sown corn, or set roots, or sown "hempe or flax, or any other annual profit," and his estate is determined before the crop is ready to be gathered, he or his executors shall nevertheless have it, with the right of free entry, egress and regress on the land to take it and carry it away when it is ready. This is called the right to emblements Thus if a tenant at will sows corn, and the lessor ousts him before it is ripe, he is entitled to go upon the land when it is ripe, and cut and carry it away, "because he knew not at what time the lessor would enter upon him." For a similar reason if a tenant for life sows corn and dies, his executors shall have the crop; or if he leases the land to an under-tenant, who sows a crop, and then the tenant for life dies, the crop belongs to the under-tenant. But by the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1851, s. 1, it is provided that where a landlord entitled for his life or any other uncertain interest has let land at a rackrent, and his estate determines by his death or otherwise, then the tenant, instead of being entitled to emblements, shall continue to hold the land until the expiration of the current year of his tenancy.

From the nature of the right to emblements it is obvious that it does not exist in the case of labour which yields no immediate annual profit (as where a lessee at will plants young fruit-trees, etc.), nor in the case of the tenancy being determined by the tenant's own act: thus where a woman holding land durante viduitate sows the ground and marries, the landlord shall have the emblements.

Emblers de Gentz. A stealing from the people. The expression occurs in the Rolls of Parliament of 21 Edw. III (1347), where the Commons petition the King regarding "plusours murdres, emblers de gentz, roberies, homicidies, et ravissements des femmes" which were being committed.

Embracery is the common law misdemeanour committed by a person who by any means whatever, except the production of evidence and argument in open Court, attempts to influence or instruct any juryman, or who gives any reward to a juryman for anything done by the juryman as such, even though there was no previous promise of reward. The offence is also committed by a juryman who receives any reward for or in contemplation of anything which he has done or may do as a juryman.

The County Juries Act, 1825, s. 61, preserves the right to prosecute for embracery.

Embring Days. The old name for what are now known as Ember Days (q.v.). In the statute 2 & 3 Edw. 6, c. 19, they are called "Ymbringe dayes."

Emendals. A fund set aside to provide for depreciation and repairs of buildings, etc.; it is used in the accounts of the Middle Temple.

Emendatio. Putting such and such a thing in proper order. Thus the Assisa panis et cervisiæ (q.v.) was sometimes called the Emendatio panis et cervisiæ.

Emigrant Runner. This expression is defined in s. 347 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, which (ss. 348, 350, 351) requires that an emigrant runner must be licensed and wear a distinctive badge.

Eminent Domain. The right of a Government to take private property for public purposes. The doctrine is of American origin. In this country expression has been given to it by the various Acts under which land is acquired, without the consent of the owner, for works of public utility, such as railways, and also by the Defence Acts (q.v.), and in the emergency legislation which arose out of the Great War of 1914—1918. But the doctrine is unknown to our common law. Compare EXPROPRIATION.

Empire Settlement. The Empire Settlement Act, 1922, was passed "in order to make better provision for furthering British settlement in His Majesty's Oversea Dominions," and provides that there may be raised for that purpose not more than £1,500,000 during the financial year 1922-3, and not more than £3,000,000 in any subsequent year. The Act applies to protectorates as well as to actual British possessions Employer. Defined in s. 13 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, for the purposes of that Act.

Employers' Liability; Employers and Workmen. See MASTER AND SERVANT; WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION; COMMON EMPLOYMENT.

Enabling. See STATUTE.

Enabling Act, The. A popular title of the statute 9 & 10 Geo. 5, c. 76. See NATIONAL ASSEMBLY, ETC.

En autre droit. (In the right of another.)

Enclosure. See INCLOSURE.

Encroachment is where a person attempts to extend a right possessed by him, as where a tenant of land takes in or adds to it other land adjoining or near to it, so as to make the added land appear to be part of his original holding. The general rule is that if the wrongful act is acquiesced in, the encroachment (that is, the land added) is considered as annexed to the original holding, and as having the same incidents as if it had originally formed part of it. Therefore, if a lessee of land makes an encroachment on an adjoining waste (q.v.), at the expiration of the tenancy the encroachment will as a general rule belong to the landlord and not to the tenant.

In the law of easements, where the owner of an easement alters the dominant tenement, so as to impose an additional restriction or burden on the servient tenement, he is said to commit an encroachment. The principle seems to be that if the excess can be ascertained and separated, such excess alone is bad, and the original right remains, but that if the original right and the encroachment are so blended together that they cannot be separated, then the original right is lost or suspended so long as the dominant tenement remains in its altered form.

Encumber; Encumbrance. To encumber land is to make it subject to a charge or liability, e.g., by mortgaging it. Encumbrances include not only mortgages and other voluntary charges, but also liens, lites pendentes, registered judgments and writs of execution, etc. See COVENANT.

Endow; Endowment. See CHARITY. Endow also meant to give, and endowment meant giving, a woman the right to dower. See FINE FOR ENDOWMENT.

Endowed Schools. An ". . . endowed school means a school which is . . . wholly or partly endowed by means of any endowment . . ." (Endowed Schools Act, 1869, s. 5), but the mere fact that exhibitions are attached to a school does not make it an endowed school (ib.). The expression "endowed schools" does not include (1) the public schools (q.v.); (2) any school maintained wholly or in part by voluntary subscriptions which is endowed with buildings, etc., but not with an income; (3) any school in receipt of an annual parliamentary grant unless such school be a grammar school (q.v.) or a school a department only whereof receives such grant; (4) any school maintained out of an endowment which may lawfully be used for non-educational purposes; (5) any school (unless otherwise an endowed school) maintained out of an endowment which may lawfully be applied to other educational purposes; (6) any school (unless otherwise an endowed school) which receives assistance out of an endowment applicable solely to the education of ministers of religion or to the teaching of any profession; and (7) a school which before 1869 was used solely for the education of choristers (ib., s. 8); and (8) any school, not being a grammar school or a department of a grammar school, which on the 1st September, 1873, was an elementary school within the meaning of the Elementary Education Act, 1870, and which had a gross annual endowment income of not more than £100 (Endowed Schools Act, 1873, s. 3). The object of the Acts (which were temporary, but which have been continued by the various Expiring Laws Continuance Acts) was the reorganisation of endowed schools by means of "schemes" made by a specially appointed commission. The powers of the commission were transferred by the Endowed Schools Act, 1874, s. 4, to the Charity Commissioners, from whom they were again transferred to the Board of Education (q.v.) by Order in Council made pursuant to the Board of Education Act, 1899.

Enfeoff is the technical and proper operative word of a feoffment (q.v.); and see OPERATIVE WORDS.

Enfranchise; Enfranchisement. To enfranchise is to make free or to confer a liberty. Thus, in the old books a man is said to be enfranchised when he was made a free man of a city, or burgess of a borough, or when an alie alien was made a denizen or a villein was manumitted. At the present day, to enfranchise often means to confer on a man the franchise, or the liberty of voting at parliamentary elections.

To enfranchise copyhold land is to free it from the customs of that tenure and to render it subject to the same law as freehold land. The operation may take place either at common law or under a statute. Enfranchisement at common law is effected by the conveyance of the freehold to the copyholder, or by a release of all customs and services, by the freeholder. Statutory enfranchisement now takes place under the Copyhold Act, 1894, and is either voluntary or compulsory. The provisions as to voluntary enfranchisement make it possible, with the consent of the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries (Copyhold Act, 1894, s. 14), for persons to enfranchise who could not do so at common law; e.g., persons having limited interests. Compulsory enfranchisement is effected by an award of the Ministry, made on the application of either lord or tenant; the amount of compensation payable to the lord in commutation of his rights to fines, heriots, etc., is settled by valuation (ib., s. 7). The compensation is to consist of a lump sum except in certain specified cases, when it may be an annuity charged on the land and amounting to four per cent. per annum on the lump sum which otherwise would be payable (s. 8). On a statutory enfranchisement, the rights of the lord or tenant to sporting rights over, or to any minerals under, the land are not affected (s. 23), and the lord, on escheat for want of heirs, has the same rights as if there had been no enfranchisement (s. 21).

The Copyhold Act, 1894, repealed and re-enacted, with slight alterations, all the pre-existing statutes relating to enfranchisement. It contains all the statute law on the subject, as it has not been amended by any later Act.

Engagement, in its most general sense, is any undertaking or promise, but in practice the term has been appropriated to denote a contract entered into by a married woman with the intention of binding or charging her separate estate. See SEPARATE ESTATE.

Englecery; Engleschire; Englishry; Engleceria. This meant the plea that a murdered man was an Englishman. It is stated to have arisen in connection with a law of Canute, passed for the protection of his Danish followers, under which the town or hundred in which a man was murdered was made liable to a fine—unless it was proved that the man was only an Englishman. No such law appears amongst the laws of Canute, as published by the Record Commission; but the liability of the hundred or town for the murder of anyone other than an Englishman was certainly declared by the laws of Henry I., xcii, ss. 1, 9, and the presentment in Englishry, under which the fine was exacted, was part of our legal system until it was abolished by 14 Edw. 3, st. 1, c. 4. See MURDRUM.

English. See FRENCH.

English Bill. See BILL OF COMPLAINT.

English Channel District. In Part X. (dealing with pilotage) of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, it is declared by s. 618 that this district consists of the seas between Dungeness and the Isle of Wight.

English Information. This is the proceeding by which an equity suit is instituted by the Crown on the Revenue side of the King's Bench Division. It is so called in order to distinguish it from the information—sometimes called a Latin information—used in proceedings by the Crown to recover money or chattels. See INFORMATION; BILL OF COMPLAINT.

Engravings. See COPYRIGHT.

Engross; Engrossment. Formerly to engross a document was to write it in a peculiar hand (chiefly remarkable for its illegibility), derived from the court-hand in which records were anciently written. This engrossing hand was also used until well into the last century in transcribing wills at the Probate Office, but has now given way to the ordinary round hand.

At the present day, engrossing means copying a deed, agreement or the like with all words, dates and amounts written at length, and with the formal testatum and attestation clauses, so as to be ready for execution.

In the criminal law, engrossing was the offence of buying up large quantities of corn, etc., with intent to sell them again.

The statute 7 & 8 Vict. c. 24, repealed all the statutes under which engrossing, as well as regrating (q.v.) and forestalling (q.v.), had been made illegal.

Enitia pars or Aeisnetia, which is derived of the old French word eisne (eldest; modern French aîné), and means the part of the eldest, is used in the old books to denote the part or share taken by the eldest sister when several coparceners make partition of their land by agreement. See SECTA FACIENDA, ETC.

Enjoyment is the exercise of a right. It is to a right what possession is to a corporeal thing, and it is therefore divisible, like possession, into simple, rightful, permissive, adverse, etc. Adverse enjoyment is more commonly known as "enjoyment as of right," and occurs where a person exercises a right which does not belong to him in the same manner as if he were entitled to it, and without the permission of the true owner. Enjoyment which is open, peaceable, continuous, and of right, resembles adverse possession in being a mode of acquiring by lapse of time the right so enjoyed. See PRESCRIPTION.

Enlargement. When a tenant in tail has created a base fee in lands and it afterwards becomes united with the remainder or reversion in fee in the same lands in the same person, and there is no intermediate estate between them, then the base fee does not merge in the fee, but is ipso facto enlarged into as large an estate as a tenant in tail with the consent of the protector, if any, might have created by a disentailing assurance if the remainder or reversion had been vested in any other person (Fines and Recoveries Act, 1833, s. 39). Thus if land is settled upon A. for life, with remainder in tail to B., with remainder in fee to C., and B. executes a disentailing deed without the consent of A., the protector, B. acquires a base fee; if he subsequently purchases the reversion from C., his base fee is enlarged into a fee simple, because if he had executed a disentailing assurance with the consent of A., the protector, he would have created a fee simple. The object of the rule of law which produces an enlargement instead of (as in ordinary cases) a merger, is to prevent any mesne incumbrances from being let in or accelerated: thus, if in the above example C. had mortgaged his reversion before conveying it to B., the enlargement would destroy the incumbrance thus created, while a merger would have made it a charge on B.'s new fee simple. See MERGER.

The enlargement, merely by the execution of a deed by the tenant, of long terms of years into freehold, can be effected under the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 65, and the Conveyancing Act, 1882, s. 11. The terms to which those sections refer are terms of not less than 200 years unexpired out of terms which originally were not less than 300 years, where no rent, or only a peppercorn or other nominal rent, is payable.

Enlarger l'estate. Where there is a tenant for life or years with remainder to another in fee and the remainderman releases all his right to the tenant for life or years, so as to give the latter the fee, the remainderman is said to "enlarge the estate." More generally, enlarging the estate is the conveyance of the interest of anyone entitled in remainder or reversion to the prior particular tenant.

Enormia. See ALIA ENORMIA.

Enpleet. The ancient form of implead (q.v.).

Enquiry. See INQUIRY; INQUIRY, WRIT OF.

Enrol; Enrolment; Enrolment Office. To enrol is to enter (that is, copy) a document on an official record. Originally such records were kept in the shape of continuous rolls of parchment, but now most, if not all, of them are kept in books of the ordinary shape. (See ROLL.) The principal documents which require enrolment at the present day are recognisances (q.v.) and disentailing assurances (q.v.). See also BARGAIN AND SALE.

The Enrolment Office was a department of the Court of Chancery and of the Chancery Division of the High Court, in which, as its name implies, the enrolment of documents was effected. By the Judicature (Officers) Act, 1879, the Enrolment Office was amalgamated with the Central Office (q.v.). See CLERK OF ENROLMENTS.

In the practice of the Court of Chancery before the Judicature Acts its decrees were not unfrequently enrolled in order to prevent appeals or rehearings being brought from a judge of first instance to the Court of Appeal in Chancery. The effect was that an appeal could only be brought to the House of Lords, or by a bill of review. (See DOCKET.) Now, except where enrolment is specially required by statute, enrolment never takes place, and it is expressly declared to be unnecessary by Ord. 61, r. 8.

A judgment of the Chancery Division in Ireland must be enrolled in the Central Office here if it be proposed to enforce the judgment in this country (41 Geo. 3, c. 90, s. 6).

Enseint; Ensient. In old law French, this meant pregnancy.

Entail. An entail exists when land is limited to a person and the heirs of his body, with or without prior estates. The land is then said to be entailed. See ESTATE TAIL; QUASI ENTAIL.

Enter is used not only in the technical sense of going upon land (see ENTRY), but also in the sense of making in a book or record a note of a transaction or a transcript of a document. Thus, a defendant to an action, if he wishes to contest it, enters an appearance (q.v.). Every order or judgment pronounced by the Chancery Division is entered or copied into the registrar's book, and until this is done the order or judgment is not complete and cannot be enforced. In the King's Bench Division, the operation of entering a judgment is usually called "signing judgment." See PASS; MINUTES.

Entering (or Marking) Short. If a bill which is not yet due is lodged by the holder with his bankers, the bankers may do one of two things: (1) they may allow the holder to treat it as cash, interest being charged to him in respect of advances made on it pending maturity, or (2) they may enter it short, that is to say, merely note it as having been received for collection in due course, and credit it only when paid. When the bill is "entered short" the holder is entitled to it if the bank becomes insolvent before the bill matures, the bank in this case, being in fact a mere bailee of the bill so long as it remains unpaid.

Entire. A contract, claim, or the like, is said to be entire when each part is so connected with the rest that it cannot be separated into several distinct contracts or claims, as opposed to a severable or apportionable contract, etc. Thus, where a sailor was to be paid a certain sum for serving on a voyage and he died before the voyage was completed, it was held that his executor had no claim to any part of his wages; because the contract was to perform the complete voyage. See APPORTIONMENT OF CONTRACTS; DIVISIBLE CONTRACTS; SEVER.

As to entire hereditaments, see HEREDITAMENT.

Entireties. Before 1st January, 1883 (the date on which the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, came into operation), if lands were given to A. and B., husband and wife, and their heirs, they were not joint tenants, because they were in law considered as one person, but they took by entireties, that is, neither could dispose of any part of the land without the concurrence of the other, and if they did not agree in making a disposition, the survivor took the whole; and during the coverture the husband was entitled to the rents and profits. (See ESTATE.) Now, however, husband and wife take as joint tenants, the wife's share belonging to her for her separate use (q.v.): but they are still to some extent regarded in law as one person, for if a gift be made to a husband and wife and a third person, the husband and wife, unless a contrary intention be indicated by the donor, will take only one moiety, as joint tenants, and the third person will take the other moiety.

Entitle. In its usual sense, to entitle is to give a right; therefore a person is said to be entitled to property when he has a right to it. See RIGHT; TITLE.

In ecclesiastical law, to entitle is to give a title for ordination as a minister. See TITLE.

Entry. Entry is the act of going on land, or doing something equivalent, with the intention of asserting a right in the land. It may be made either in person or by a representative, such as a guardian, lessee, etc.

Entry is actual when the person making it goes on the land itself; while an entry in law is a constructive or fictitious entry. Thus, said Coke, where "a man maketh a charter of feoffment, and delivers seisin within the view, [and] the feoffee dares not enter for feare of death, but claims the same, this shall vest the freehold and inheritance in him." See LIVERY; and FREE ENTRY, EGRESS AND REGRESS. As to forcible entry, see FORCIBLE ENTRY.

The doctrine of entry is now of much less importance than formerly, owing to the abolition of most of the rules relating to seisin (q.v.); but entry is still a means of regaining possession of land from a person wrongfully in possession, being equivalent to recaption (q.v.) in the case of goods. It must be peaceable, and must be made within the period allowed by the Statutes of Limitation. See RIGHT OF ENTRY.

In the old books, "entry" often signifies a "right of entry" (q.v.).

As regards the Customs laws, "entry" is the declaration, to the Customs authorities, of the nature and quantity of a ship's cargo. See BILL OF ENTRY; BILL OF SIGHT; POST-ENTRY.

Entry ad communem legem. The writ of "entry at common law" which anciently lay for a reversioner where a tenant for life or pur autre vie, or by the curtesy, or in dower had aliened the land and died. It was one of the many writs which were abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36.

Entry sur abatement. One of the varieties of the writ of entry. It was abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36.

Entry sur alienationem, dum fuit non compos mentis, dum fuit infra ætatem, dum fuit in prisona. See DUM FUIT, ETC.

Entry sur disseisin, in the quibus, in the per, in the per and cui, or in the post. A real action which lay for one from whom lands were wrongfully withheld. The writ was said to be in the quibus when it was against the person who had actually committed the wrong; in the per when it was against the heir or grantee of such person; in the per and cui where there had been two descents, two alienations or a descent and an alienation since the original commission of the wrong; and in the post when the original wrong was still more remote. It was abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36.

Entry, Writs of. In addition to those writs set out with "Entry" as the first word of the title see, as to others, AD TERMINUM QUI PRETERIT; CASU CONSIMILI; CASU PROVISO; CAUSA MATRIMONII PRÆLOCUTI; CUI ANTE DIVORTIUM; CUI IN VITA; DUM FUIT, ETC.; QUARE EJECIT INFRA TERMINUM; SINE ASSENSU CAPITALI.

Enure is to operate or take effect. Thus, where it is said that if an attornment be made by a tenant of land to one only of several grantees of the reversion, it shall enure to the rest, it is meant that the attornment takes effect as if it had been made to all. See ATTORNMENT.

En ventre sa mere. An unborn child is described in the law as being "en ventre sa mere." Such a child is not regarded for the purposes of the criminal law as having been born. To occasion its death before delivery takes place is neither murder nor manslaughter (see, however, ABORTION); but its death after delivery has taken place may, if caused by an act before delivery, ground a charge for either the one offence or the other. For nearly every purpose of the civil law an unborn child is treated as born, where such a course is for the benefit of the child, but not where such a course is to its detriment. It may take property by will or grant, and may have a guardian assigned; and if an estate is limited to A. for life and after his death to his eldest son, and A. dies leaving his wife enceinte of a son, the posthumous son will take the estate, notwithstanding the rules as to contingent remainders. See also GESTATION.

Eodem ligamine quo ligatum est dissolvitur (Co. Litt. 212b). (An obligation is put an end to by the same means which imposed it.) Thus, if a man be bound by a bond to pay a certain sum, he cannot escape liability for payment in full, unless, upon payment in part, he receives an acquittance under seal for the whole. See EADEM MODO, ETC.

Eodem modo quo quid constituitur, eodem modo destruitur (6 Co. 53). (A thing is made and is destroyed by one and the same means.) See JURA EODEM, ETC.

Eo instanti. (At that instant; at the same instant; immediately.)

Eorl. In Anglo-Saxon times the population was divided into eorls and ceorls, the eorls being the large landowners and the ceorls (q.v.) the poor freeholders. The eorl was quite distinct from the earl (q.v.). The distinction between eorl and ceorl seems to have been one rather of social than of legal status, and corresponded more or less to the Scottish fifteenth-century distinction between "knight and churl," and to the much later distinction between "gentle and simple."

Epiphany. The 6th January; also known as Twelfth Day.

Episcopalia. Anciently this meant synodals or other customary payments made by the clergy to the bishop. They were also known as the onus episcopale.

Episcopus alterius mandato quam regis non tenetur obtemperare (Co. Litt. 134). (A bishop is not bound to obey any mandate save the king's.) That is to say, he need pay no attention to the Pope.

Equality (of Exchange or Partition). See OWELTY.

Equitable denotes (1) that which is fair (see EQUITY); (2) that which arises from a liberal construction or application of a legal rule or remedy (see EQUITY); (3) that which is in accordance with, or regulated, recognised, or enforced by, the rules of equity, as opposed to those of the common law. Thus, an equitable right, estate, or interest, is one which was originally recognised and enforced only in Courts of Equity—e.g., that of a cestui que trust, or of a mortgagor, after the day fixed for redemption had passed. So an equitable tenant for life is a person who is entitled for his life to the rents or income of property which is vested in trustees for his benefit.

The Court of Chancery (q.v.) had a jurisdiction known as its equitable jurisdiction.

Equitable fraud and equitable waste are wrongs which were originally recognised and restrained only in Courts of Equity. See ASSETS; ASSIGNMENT OF CHOSES IN ACTION; ESTATE; FRAUD; MORTGAGE; WASTE.

Equity. In its primary sense, equity is fairness, or that rule of conduct which in the opinion of a person or class ought to be followed by all other persons.

Equity in this sense is frequently opposed to law and legality, because that which is fair does not always constitute a legal claim or defence. Hence, when a legal rule or remedy is capable of two interpretations or applications, one literal or restrictive, and the other liberal (that is, calculated to make the rule or remedy operate fairly, and to extend its benefit to as many cases as possible), the latter is called the equitable construction or application. It is in this sense that the right of stoppage in transitu (q.v.), the writ of audita querela (q.v.), and the old action of ejectment are said to be equitable remedies; and the jurisdiction of the common law Courts, to set aside judgments obtained by default and confession, was called an equitable one. And when a statute contains a provision which applies literally to only a particular class of cases, but it is clear from the nature of the provision that if another class of cases had been present to the mind of its framer it would have been extended to them, they are said to be within the equity of the statute: "and the reason hereof," said Coke, "is that the lawmakers could not possibly set downe all cases in expresse terms." Thus an old statute literally applying only to executors was held to extend by equity to administrators, "because," as the Termes de la Ley puts it, "they are of the like kind."

But the most important sense of the word "equity" is that in which it denotes a part of the general law of England, as opposed to what is called the common law (q.v.). The distinction is purely historical, and arose from the fact that in former times the common law Courts provided no remedy in many cases where one was required. Hence the custom grew up of applying for redress in such cases either to the King in Parliament or to the King in Council, who referred the matters to the Chancellor. In later times petitions were presented to the Chancellor direct. The Chancellor, being an ecclesiastic, and keeper of the King's conscience, did not feel bound to follow the rules of the common law, but gave such relief as he thought the petitioner or plaintiff entitled to "in equity and good conscience." (See CHANCELLOR.) For a long time "equity" was an indefinite standard of right and wrong, and was regarded as having the function of mitigating the rigour and supplying the defects of the common law without any limitation except the personal opinions of each Chancellor; but in more modern times equity became as fixed in its principles, and as incapable of introducing new remedies without the authority of Parliament, as the common law itself.

At the time of the passing of the Judicature Act, 1873, equity was to be regarded as part of the law of England, distinguished from the common law only by reason of its being, or having originally been, administered in different Courts (the principal of which was the Court of Chancery), and by a different procedure. In many cases the Chancery and common law Courts had concurrent jurisdiction (e.g., in cases of ordinary fraud), while in other cases the same right gave rise to different remedies in law and in equity (see SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE; INJUNCTION), and in others the rules of law and equity were in direct conflict.

The principal subjects on which the rules of equity either differed from or conflicted with those of the common law were trusts, administration, separate property of married women, mortgages, penalties and forfeitures, and the wrongs known as equitable fraud, equitable waste, etc. (see those titles); and as the doctrines of equity on these points were not recognised by the Courts of common law, it sometimes happened that a person had rights which the common law would have allowed and assisted him to enforce, but which a Court of equity would not allow him to enforce, on the ground of the existence of an equitable right overriding or qualifying his legal rights. Thus, if A, the owner of an estate, stood by and allowed B to expend money upon it in the belief that the estate belonged to himself, then if A brought an action of ejectment against B to recover possession of the estate, B might file a bill in equity to restrain A from ejecting him without compensation for his expenditure. Various statutes were from time to time passed, giving the common law Courts jurisdiction to recognise and enforce equitable rights; and finally, by the Judicature Acts, 1873 and 1875, the superior Courts of equity and common law were amalgamated, the rules of law and equity on certain points were assimilated, and on all other points where there is a difference or conflict between equity and common law, the rules of equity are to prevail. Every Division and judge of the Supreme Court of Judicature is now bound to recognise and give effect to all equitable rights and liabilities appearing incidentally in the course of any action or matter. See CHANCERY.

Equity also signifies an equitable right, that is, a right enforceable in a Court of equity; hence, a bill of complaint which did not show that the plaintiff had a right entitling him to relief was said to be demurrable for want of equity; and certain rights now recognised in all the Divisions of the High Court are still known as "equities" from having been originally recognised only in the Court of Chancery. See EQUITY OF REDEMPTION; EQUITY TO A SETTLEMENT.

Equity also denotes a right or obligation incident to a property or contract as between two persons, but not incident to the property or contract from its own nature. In this sense the word is generally used in the plural—"equities"—and is chiefly of importance with reference to assignments of choses in action, the rule being that where there is a chose in action, whether it is a debt or an obligation, or a trust fund, and it is assigned, the person who owes the debt or obligation, or has undertaken to hold the trust fund, has, as against the assignee, exactly the same equities that he would have as against the assignor, or it may be expressed in the converse manner, that the assignee takes the chose in action subject to the same equities as those to which it was subject in the hands of the assignor. Thus, a debt is due from B to A, but there is also a debt due from A to B, which B might set off in an action by A. In this state of things A assigns the first debt to C, without telling him of the set-off. B is entitled to the set-off as against C. Again, if B has contracted to pay a sum of money to A, but the contract is voidable on the ground of fraud or misrepresentation, and A assigns the contract to C, who does not know the circumstances that render it voidable, then B may avoid the contract as against C.

In the law of bills of exchange, a distinction is drawn between "equities attaching to the bill itself" (such as an agreement between the original parties to the bill that in certain events the acceptor shall not be held liable) and "collateral equities," such as set-off. As a rule, a bill of exchange in the hand of a bonâ fide holder for value is not subject to the equities between prior parties, but in the case of a bill negotiated when overdue, the holder takes it subject to "any defect of title affecting it at its maturity (Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 36 (2)), that is to say, to the "equities attaching to the bill," which expression includes, for instance, an agreement not to negotiate, but does not include any collateral equities, such as right of set-off or absence of consideration. See NEGOTIABLE.

Equity Draftsman. See DRAFTSMAN.

Equity of Redemption is that right which a mortgagor has to redeem the mortgaged property at any time until he has conveyed it to the mortgagee or until he has been foreclosed, or until his right is barred by the Statutes of Limitations, or until the property has been sold by the mortgagee under a power of sale. See further on this point under MORTGAGE; also CLOG ON EQUITY OF REDEMPTION.

Equity to a Settlement. Before the enactment of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, where a husband became entitled in possession in right of his wife to property which before the Judicature Acts he would have been unable to recover by an action at law (say a legacy left to his wife by the will of a testator, or a share of personalty to which his wife had become entitled under a settlement), although primâ facie the husband was entitled to receive the property (so that upon the executor or trustee paying him the wife's legacy or share of personalty, the husband's receipt would be a good discharge), yet if the intervention of a Court exercising equitable jurisdiction was in any way called into action, whether by the husband to claim the property, or by the wife to enforce her equity, the Court only allowed the husband to receive the property subject to what was called the wife's right or equity to a settlement; that is to say, unless the wife expressly waived this right or equity, the Court would inquire into all the circumstances connected with the marriage (e.g., whether the husband had made a settlement on his wife, how much of her property he had already received, what was his pecuniary position, whether the husband and wife were living together or apart), and would upon a consideration of all the material facts, decide how much of the property (if any) should be paid to the husband, and how much (if any) should be settled on the wife.

The question as to an equity to a settlement cannot now arise at all in the case of a woman married on or after 1st January, 1883, for she holds her property as a feme sole (Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 2); and in the case of a woman married before that date, it can arise only as regards property her title to which, whether vested or contingent, and whether in possession, reversion or remainder, had accrued before that date, for (ib., s. 5) all property acquired by her after that date is held by her as a feme sole. The question is now, therefore, of historical rather than of practical interest.

Erasure. See ALTERATION.

Erles. See ARLES.

Errant. The justices in eyre (q.v.) were formerly described as errant, that is to say, itinerant.

Error. In the old common law practice in civil actions, error was some mistake in the foundation, proceeding, judgment or execution of an action in a Court of record, requiring correction either by the Court in which it occurred (in case of error in fact), or by a superior Court or Court of error (in case of error in law). To " bring error " was to apply for the rectification required. Error in fact was some mistake in the process (e.g., where an infant appeared by attorney instead of by guardian), while error in law was a mistake in the judgment, such as might have formed the foundation for a demurrer, motion in arrest of judgment, etc. Errors in law were either common (e.g., that the judgment was given for the plaintiff instead of for the defendant), or special, which was where some matter appeared on the face of the record which showed the judgment to be erroneous.

Before 1875 error lay from inferior Courts of record to the King's Bench; from the superior Courts of law it lay to the Court of Exchequer Chamber (q.v.) and thence to the House of Lords. At an earlier time, proceedings in error in the House of Lords were known as " error in Parliament." Before the statute 27 Eliz. c. 8, error from the King's Bench lay direct to the House of Lords.

Proceedings in error in civil cases were abolished, and a more simple mode of appeal was substituted in 1875 (Judicature Act, 1875, Ord. 58, in Sch. I.), except in appeals to the High Court from inferior Courts proceeding according to the course of the common law. In those cases the old practice still applies, and the plaintiff in error (the appellant) is therefore obliged to " assign errors," that is, specify the defects complained of in the judgment of the Court below; the defendant then delivers either a joinder in error, or a plea to the assignment of errors, or a demurrer, and so on until issue is joined, when the case is set down for argument. This procedure is, however, practically obsolete.

Appeals in criminal cases were also brought by proceedings in error, namely, by writ of error (q.v.); the plaintiff in error (that is, the prisoner or accused) assigned or indicated the errors of which he complained in the indictment. The writ of error was abolished in criminal cases by the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907 (7 Edw. 7. c. 23), s. 20 (1), but this alteration in the law is of little substantial effect, for where error formerly lay, an appeal under that Act now lies. See ERROR, WRIT OF; JOINDER.

Errores ad sua principia referre, est refellere (3 Inst. 15). (You refute errors if you go back to their origin.) This is Coke's marginal note to a disquisition in which he shows that whoever wrote the report in the Year Book of 2 Hen. 4, fo. 25, had not read the record of the case.

Error fucatus nudâ veritate in multis est probabilior; et sæpenumero rationibus vincit veritatem error (2 Rep. 73). (Painted error often appears more probable than naked truth; and again and again conquers truth by reasoning.)

Error qui non resistitur, approbatur (Doct. and Stud. c. 70). (He who can rectify a mistake, but does not rectify it, is deemed to have acquiesced.) See CONSENSUS TOLLIT, ETC; QUI NON OBSTAT, ETC.; QUI NON IMPROBAT, ETC.

Error, Writ of. In criminal cases this was an original writ issuing from the Petty Bag Office in Chancery, and directed to an inferior Court (e.g., the Central Criminal Court or quarter sessions), requiring them to send the record and proceedings on an indictment in which judgment has been pronounced to a superior Court for review. It lay for every substantial defect appearing on the record for which the indictment might have been quashed, or which would have been fatal on demurrer, or in arrest of judgment, provided such defect was not cured by verdict; thus it lay on an indictment for perjury in which it did not appear that the alleged false oath was taken in a judicial proceeding (see AID; ARREST OF JUDGMENT; DEMURRER; QUASH). It also lay to reverse an outlawry.

Writ of error was formerly the mode by which appeals from certain inferior Courts of record (proceeding according to the course of the common law) were brought to the Court of Common Pleas. See ERROR; FALSE JUDGMENT.

Erthmiotum. Used in Leg. Hen. 1, c. 57, as meaning a meeting of neighbours to adjust local disputes.

Escambio. The Statute of Westminster, 5 Rich. 2, st. 1, c. 2, forbade the exportation, except under royal licence, of gold and silver. This licence, which was given in connection with bills of exchange, was called an escambio. The enactment of Rich. 2 was repealed by the statute 59 Geo. 3, c. 49, s. 11, and again by the S. L. R. Act, 1863.

Escape. Voluntary escape is the offence committed by a person who knowingly, and with intent to save him from trial or execution, permits any person in his lawful custody to regain his liberty otherwise than in due course of law. The offence is a common law misdemeanour, punishable, if the offender is an officer of the law, with fine, or, if he be a private person, with fine or imprisonment or both: but the offender, if the prisoner was a felon, would be an accessory after the fact, and, if more than one person was concerned in the escape, there would clearly be a conspiracy indictable at common law. Aiding the escape or attempted escape of a prisoner is also punishable under various statutes, as to which see Archbold (25th ed.) pp. 1113-16.

Negligent escape is the misdemeanour committed by a person who by the neglect of any duty, or by ignorance of law, permits a person in his lawful custody to regain his liberty otherwise than in due course of law. It is punishable at common law by fine or imprisonment; but there is no modern instance of an indictment for the common law offence. If a sheriff allowed a person in custody under a ca. sa. to escape, he was liable to the plaintiff for the amount of the judgment debt.

Where a prisoner escapes from prison without using force he commits a common law misdemeanour punishable with fine or imprisonment or, if he was in custody on a criminal charge (Criminal Procedure Act, 1851, s. 29) with both fine and imprisonment and the imprisonment may be with hard labour.

As to the offence committed by a prisoner who escapes from prison by force, see PRISON-BREACH.

Under the Vagrancy Act, 1824, s. 5, anyone committed under that Act can be dealt with as an incorrigible rogue if found at large before being discharged in course of law: and under the Transportation Act, 1824, s. 22, and the Penal Servitude Act, 1857, s. 3, persons under sentence of penal servitude who are found at large without licence are guilty of felony. See RESCUE; PRISON-BREACH.

Escape Warrant. Under the statutes 1 Anne, st. 2, c. 6, and 6 Anne, c. 12, ss. 1-4, if any person who had been committed to the Queen's Bench or the Fleet Prison was unlawfully at large, then any judge of the superior Courts at Westminster, who had cognizance of the proceeding in which the prisoner had been committed, could issue a warrant—popularly known as an escape warrant—addressed to all mayors, sheriffs and constables, and commanding them to arrest the prisoner and to take him to the debtors' prison of the place at which he was arrested.

Escapio quietus. This, anciently, meant one who by charter was excused the punishment imposed on those whose cattle wandered unlawfully into forest land.

Escheat takes place when by accident lands fall to the lord of whom they are holden, or to the Crown. It is derived from the feudal rule, that where an estate in fee simple comes to an end, the land reverts to the lord by whose ancestors or predecessors the estate was originally created. At the present day, seignories in freehold land are of no practical value, and the evidence of them has generally been lost; so that where an escheat takes place the land in almost all cases goes to the Crown as the ultimate lord of all lands in England.

"An escheat," says Coke, "doth happen two manner of wayes—aut per defectum sanguinis, i.e. for default of heir; aut per delictum tenentis, i.e. for felony." Escheat for default of heirs, as may be imagined, seldom occurs, almost the only case being where a bastard dies intestate without children or other issue. Under the Intestates Estate Act, 1884, s. 4, the law of escheat applies to any estate or interest whether legal or equitable in any incorporeal hereditament and to any equitable estate or interest in any corporeal hereditament: until 1884 such estates or interests did not escheat. Escheat propter delictum tenentis took place where a person was outlawed for felony, upon which his blood was corrupted; that is to say, he became incapable of holding land, or of inheriting it, and it therefore escheated to the lord; but outlawry (q.v.), though still possible, is quite obsolete. Formerly judgment of death for felony caused an escheat in the same manner as outlawry; but this was abolished in 1870 (see ATTAINDER). The rule that a person could not trace descent to land through an ancestor who has been attainted of treason or felony, so that the land escheated to the lord, had been abolished by the Inheritance Act, 1833, s. 10. There was no escheat of gavelkind lands for felony. See CONSUETUDINE, etc.

Escheat is not properly a purchase in the technical sense of the word, for the land thus acquired by the lord descends as the seignory would have descended, into the place of which it comes. See PURCHASE.

The word is derived from the Norman French eschete, from escheoir, to fall (in the sense of a windfall), which again was derived from the Latin cadere.

See SEIGNORY; TITLE; FELONY; FORFEITURE; INQUEST OF OFFICE.

Escheator. This, says Coke, is "an ancient officer, so called because his office is properly to look to escheats, wardships, and other casualties belonging to the crowne." The office is obsolete since the abolition of the Court of Wards and Liveries (q.v.) (see INQUEST OF OFFICE.); and all statutes relating to escheators were abolished by the Escheat Procedure Act, 1887, which now governs the procedure as regards escheats and does not provide for the employment of escheators.

Anciently there was an escheator for each county, appointed by the Lord Treasurer. The inquest of office (q.v.) was held before him. After the Statute of Westminster I., c. 24 (1275) no lands could be "seized into the King's hands" before "office found," that is to say, before the jury found that there had been an escheat.

Before the banishment of the Jews in 1290, there was an officer known as the Escheator of the Jews. Down to 1271 the Jews were permitted to hold land, and the Escheator of the Jews had to look after escheats of lands held by them.

See PARCEL MAKERS; CAPITULA ESCAETRIE.

Eschekere. Norman French for Exchequer.

Escrow. This is a writing sealed and delivered to a stranger (i.e., a person not a party to it) to be held by him until certain conditions be performed, and then to be delivered to take effect as a deed. It is said that, to make the writing an escrow, the word "escrow" must be used in delivering it; but at the present day a writing is an escrow if it is delivered in circumstances which show that it is to take effect only when such and such a condition has been performed. Apparently the word is derived from the Norman French escrit, which itself was derived from the Latin scriptum, a writing.

Escuage. Tenure by escuage was one of the varieties of tenure by knight's service. It imposed on the tenant the duty of accompanying the king to war for forty days, or of sending a substitute, or of paying a sum of money which was assessed by parliament after the expedition or "voyage royal." This payment was also called escuage, or escuage uncertain, to distinguish it from escuage certain, which was one of the services of which socage tenure might consist. Thus, if a man held land by the service of paying to his lord half a mark, or other fixed sum, for escuage, this was escuage certain, and the tenure was socage and not knight's service. See TENURE.

Escuage was abolished by the statute 12 Car. 2, c. 24, and had fallen into disuse long before, for there is no instance of parliament's assessing it since the reign of Edward II.

The word is the Norman French form of the late Latin scutagium, which itself was a derivative of the Latin scutum (a shield). See SCUTAGIO HABENDO.

Esquire. Strictly speaking, the only persons entitled to the description of esquire are: (i) the eldest sons of knights, and their eldest sons in perpetual succession, and all the sons of baronets; (ii) the eldest sons of younger sons of peers in like succession; (iii) esquires created by the Crown's letters patent or other investiture, and their eldest sons; (iv) esquires by virtue of their office, such as justices of the peace and barristers at law and attorneys in colonies where every attorney is also a barrister; (v) foreign peers. Every Knight of the Bath has the privilege of creating three esquires at his installation. See ST. JOHN; ETC.

Essence of the Contract. A provision in a contract is said to be "of the essence of the contract" when compliance with it was known by both parties at the time of entering into the contract to be of such importance that performance of the contract without strict compliance with it may be of no avail; as where the subject-matter of the contract is required for immediate use, or is of a terminable or fluctuating character or value. Where a contract limits a time for the performance of an act, the promisor has the right of performing it within a reasonable time after that date, unless it appears that performance within the time was intended to be of the essence of the contract; hence it is usual in such cases to insert an express condition to that effect.

Essendi quietum de tolonio. A writ, claiming exemption from toll, which anciently lay for the citizens or burgesses of any city or town if toll was unlawfully demanded from them.

Essoin; Essoign. An excuse made for non-appearance in an action or suit. It lay in real, personal, and mixed actions. It was more or less in the nature of an application for time or for an adjournment. Thus there was the essoin de ultra mare, based on absence overseas, on which the defendant got forty days; the essoin de malo veniendi, or common essoin, based on illness occurring while coming to court; the essoin de malo lecti, also based on illness; and there were also other essoins. The first day of each term was the essoin day, or day for dealing with essoins. In the superior Courts essoins are now unknown. The statute 2 Will. 4, c. 39, made them inapplicable to personal actions; the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 37, abolished real actions; and the Law Terms Act, 1830, s. 6, had abolished the essoin day. Essoins are, however, still known in connection with certain proceedings in manorial courts.

See CASTING; FOURCHER; LICENCE TO ARISE.

Essoins, Statute of. A popular title of the statute 12 Edw. 2, st. 2. But there were many other statutes on the subject: see Cay. Abridg. s.v. Essoins.

Establishment of Dower. Jacob, citing Britton (q.v.) 102, 105, says that this meant "the assurance or settlement of dower, made to the wife by the husband, on marriage," and that assignment of dower meant "the setting it out by the heir afterwards according to the establishment."

Establishment of Wills. Formerly where the validity of a will disposing of real estate was disputed, or likely to be disputed, by the heir-at-law, or any other person, the only remedy open to the devisee was to bring a suit in equity against the person disputing the will, called a suit to establish the will, so as to prevent him from contesting it in future. In such a suit the execution of the will, and the other requisites to its validity, were proved (see DEVISAVIT VEL NON.) Under the Court of Probate Act, 1857, s. 62, probate in solemn form is conclusive as to the validity of the will as regards real estate; and proceedings to establish wills in Chancery have consequently been obsolete since 1857.

Estate. In its widest sense, "estate" denotes the condition or circumstance of a person or a class of persons; hence its use in the expression "the three estates," or estates of the realm; that is, the lords spiritual, the lords temporal, and the commons of England. See PARLIAMENT.

More usually, however, "estate" signifies—(i) the condition or circumstance in which a person stands with regard to property in which he has an interest, and, by extension, (ii) the interest itself. In this sense, "estate" means certain varieties or modes of ownership, especially in land, the rule being that no person can be the absolute owner of land in England; in theory, he can only have an estate or limited interest in it. See TENURE.

These limited interests are of the following kinds:—

(I.) Where a person has such an estate in property that he is entitled to the possession or enjoyment of it (either in present or in future) against all the world, or against all the world except one or more specified persons, he is said to have a legal estate in it, as opposed to an equitable or beneficial estate (infra). He may be entitled to it for his own benefit, or as trustee for someone else. (See TRUSTEE.) Legal estates are divisible as follows:—

(A) Estates in land of freehold tenure:

With reference to their quantity, or the extreme limit of their duration, estates are either freehold (q.v.) or less than freehold. Estates of freehold again are either (a) estates of inheritance, which include estates in fee simple, estates tail, and estates in frankmarriage (see those titles); or (b) estates not of inheritance, which are either (i) conventional, i.e., created by the act of the parties, including estates for life and estates pur autre vie (see TENANT FOR LIFE; QUASI-TAIL); or (ii) legal, that is, created by construction or operation of law; to this class belong the estates of a "tenant in tail after possibility of issue extinct," and of tenants by the curtesy, and in dower (q.v.). Estates less than freehold are either (a) certain, namely, estates for years (see TENANT FOR YEARS; TERM), or (b) uncertain, namely, estates at will, by sufferance, statute merchant (q.v.), statute staple (q.v.) and elegit (q.v.), and a few other interests without specific names, e.g., under a devise of land to executors to pay debts. See CHATTELS.

With reference to their qualities, estates are either absolute, determinable, or conditional. An estate is said to be absolute when nothing but its quantity is indicated; thus, a conveyance to a man and his heirs gives him a fee simple absolute. An estate is determinable when by the terms of its limitation it may either continue as long as if it were absolute, or determine before that period; thus, a conveyance to A. during her widowhood, gives her an estate for life determinable on her marrying again. A conditional estate is one which has a condition annexed to it, which may defeat it before its natural termination; familiar instances of conditional estates are those created by mortgage, and the estate of a lessee under an ordinary lease with a proviso for re-entry on non-payment of rent, &c. As to the various kinds of conditions, see that title. Estates which depend for their creation on the performance of a condition precedent are not generally called conditional estates, but contingent remainders or executory interests (q.v.). Estates in fee are subject to a peculiar division with reference to conditions, as to which see FEE; LIMITATION.

With reference to the time of their enjoyment, estates are either in possession or expectancy. An estate in possession (or an immediate estate) gives a present right of present enjoyment, whilst an estate in expectancy is one which cannot be enjoyed until a future time. An estate of freehold is said to be in possession, although it is subject to an existing prior chattel interest. Estates in expectancy include reversions, remainders and future interests (q.v.). Every estate which precedes a reversion or remainder is also called a particular estate; thus, if land is granted to A. for life, with remainder to B. and his heirs, A. has a particular estate, and B. a reversionary estate.

With regard to the certainty of their enjoyment, estates are either vested or contingent. An estate is said to be vested in possession when the tenant has a present right to the present enjoyment; vested in interest, when he has a present fixed right to the future enjoyment; and contingent, when his right of enjoyment is to accrue on an event which is uncertain; in other words, when he has an estate in expectancy, which may or may not take effect in possession. See REMAINDER; REVERSION; EXECUTORY INTEREST; VEST.

An estate held by one person alone is called an estate in severalty, or in sole tenancy; estates held by two or more persons together are of the following kinds: tenancy by entireties, coparcenary, joint-tenancy, and tenancy in common. See those titles.

B. Customary estates are those which exist, by virtue of a custom, in land forming part of a manor, as in the case of copyholds and customary freeholds (q.v.). As a rule, they are similar to estates in freeholds: thus a copyholder may have a customary fee simple, or an estate for life or for a term of years or in joint tenancy, etc.; and, if there is a special custom to that effect, a customary estate tail; if there is no such custom, then a gift of land to A. and the heirs of his body creates a customary fee simple conditional at the common law. See FEE.

II. Equitable estates are those which were formerly recognised only in Courts of equity. (See EQUITY; EQUITABLE.) The main differences between legal and equitable estates are that the latter can exist to a certain extent in personalty as well as realty, and that they are free from many of the restrictions and incidents attached by the common law to legal estates in land. Equitable estates may be divided as follows—(1) those which are analogous to legal estates, e.g., equitable estates in fee simple, in tail, for life, in joint tenancy, etc. In these cases the legal estate in the property is vested in one person, and the beneficial or equitable estate in another; as where land or stock is given to trustees upon trust for A. and B. during their lives, and, after the death of the survivor to C.; here A. and B. have an equitable joint life estate or interest, and C. has an equitable reversion or reversionary interest: (2) those having no corresponding estates at law, e.g., equities of redemption.

"Estate" also signifies "property": thus we speak of real and personal estate, of partnership estate, trust estate, a married woman's separate estate, etc., especially with reference to questions of administration, as in the case of the estate of a deceased person, a bankrupt, or a dissolved partnership. See ASSETS.

From its use in these cases, "estate" has acquired the sense of a juridical or fictitious person, as when we say that a debt is due to the estate of a bankrupt or deceased person, or speak of an estate being insolvent, or of its being a co-contractor in a business. The idea is, that the estate represents or continues the persona of the individual to whom it belonged.

The word is the English form of the Norman French estat, which itself was derived from the Latin status. "Estate" was formerly also a verb active, meaning to create, limit, or grant an estate.

Estate at Will; Estate for Life, etc. See TENANT AT WILL; TENANT FOR LIFE, ETC.

Estate Clause. Down to 1881 it was customary to insert in every conveyance after the grant of the parcels (q.v.) and the general words (q.v.) the following words: "And all the estate right title interest claim and demands of the grantor unto and upon the said premises." Even before 1881 these words—known as the estate clause—had no effect in law: nothing passed under them which would not pass without them; and now they are omitted in reliance on the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, s. 63, which enacts that every conveyance shall pass all the estate, etc., of the grantor unless a contrary intention be expressed.

Estate Duty. The expression "estate duty" was used in the title of the tax known as temporary estate duty (q.v.). But the expression by itself now means the tax imposed by the Finance Act, 1894, s. 1, upon the principal value of all property (except such property as is expressly declared by that Act to be exempt), whether real or personal, settled or not settled, which passes on the death of any person dying after 1st August, 1894. For the property to which estate duty does not apply, see ss. 2 (2) (3), 3, 15, 16, 21, and VOLUNTARY. The duty applies to the realty and personalty abroad of everyone with British domicile; and it applies also to all realty and chattels real within the United Kingdom of everyone, no matter what be his domicile. For the purposes of the duty, property, whether real or personal, is deemed to "pass at death" on the happening of any of the events which made account duty (q.v.) payable (Finance Act, 1894, s. 2). Probate (q.v.) and account duty (q.v.) are not payable on any property upon which estate duty has been paid (s. 1, Sch. I. (1)).

The duty originally ran from 1 per cent. on estates exceeding £100 and not exceeding £500—it is not payable on estates not exceeding £100 (s. 8 (1))—up to 8 per cent. upon estates exceeding £1,000,000 (s. 17). Even the highest rate could be provided for by life assurance; and the duty, in fact, originally was a species of deferred income tax. Now (see Finance Act, 1919 (9 & 10 Geo. 5, c. 32), s. 29, Sch. III.) the duty is still 1 per cent. on estates exceeding £100 and not exceeding £500; but the 8 per cent. maximum rate of the year 1894 is reached on estates exceeding £25,000 and not exceeding £30,000; the rate on estates exceeding £1,000,000 and not exceeding £1,250,000 is 30 per cent. instead of the 8 per cent. payable in 1894; and there is a maximum rate of 40 per cent. payable on estates exceeding £2,000,000. In the case of large estates the duty is in fact no longer a tax which can be provided for out of income.

Some slight relief is given by the Finance Act, 1914, s. 13, under which some reduction in the amount of duty payable is allowed where the estate is of a value only slightly exceeding the amount which is the dividing line between two rates of duty. Thus, where the value is £25,010, duty will not be at the full 8 per cent payable (see ante) on estates exceeding £25,000. And under s. 15 of the same Act, where duty is payable a second time within a year on land or on a business, it is reduced by 50 per cent., and there are progressively smaller reductions where the second payment becomes due within two, three, four, or five years of the first death. See TIMBER.

Estate Tail, or an estate in fee tail, is an estate in lands or tenements, created by a conveyance or devise to a person and his descendants, or the "heirs of his body," as they are technically called (see HEIR). Such an estate will, if left to itself, descend on the death of the first owner to his children, grandchildren and more remote descendants, but not to his ascendants or collateral heirs; so that if he dies without issue, or any of his descendants die without issue, and there is no other descendant of the first owner living, the estate will, if left alone, come to an end, and the land will pass to the reversioner or remainderman. The owner for the time being of such an estate is called a tenant in tail.

An estate tail may be either general, as where land is given to A and the heirs of his body without more, in which case it descends to such of his heirs as are descended from him in the same manner as an estate in fee simple descends to the issue of the last purchaser: or special, when it is restrained to certain heirs of his body, as where land is given to B and the heirs of his body by a particular wife; here none can inherit but such as are his children by that particular wife, or descended from his children by her.

Each of these kinds may also be either in tail male, where the land is limited to the heirs male of the donee, so that it cannot descend to any but males who can trace their descent through male descendants from the donee (that is, to sons, sons of sons, and so on): or in tail female, where it can only descend to females and female descendants of females (daughters, daughters of daughters, and so on). Accordingly, a man may have an estate in tail male special, that is, descendible only to his heirs male by a particular wife, or the like.

Where land is given to two persons and the heirs of their bodies, then if they can by any possibility marry, either immediately or at a future time, they have an estate in special tail, limited to their own issue. If there is no possibility of their marrying, they have a joint estate for life and several inheritances in tail, that is, the land is divided on the death of the survivor, one-half going to the issue of each tenant for life, and the issue are tenants in common in tail.

Estates tail in freehold land are derived from the Statute of Westminster the Second (13 Edw. 1), called De Donis Conditionalibus. Before this statute, a gift of land to a man and the heirs of his body operated to create an estate in fee conditional on his having issue; as soon as he performed the condition by having issue, his estate practically became an absolute estate in fee simple (see FEE). The statute De Donis enacted that in such cases the land should go to the issue of the donee, or, on failure of his issue, should revert to the donor. The Act only applies to lands and tenements, and, therefore, does not include such hereditaments as annuities, which are neither lands nor tenements. See ANNUITY.

In course of time modes were invented of barring estates tail by means of fictitious proceedings called fines and common recoveries (see those titles), so that the estate of a tenant in tail might be converted into a fee simple absolute not only against his issue, but also against the donor or reversioner in tail. By statutes passed in the reigns of Henry VIII. and subsequent sovereigns, estates tail were further assimilated to estates in fee simple, and now by the Fines and Recoveries Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74), every tenant in tail may, by a disentailing assurance (q.v.), bar the entail as against his own issue, and may, with the consent of the protector of the settlement (if any), bar it as against the reversioner in tail, and thus convert it into an estate in fee simple. See ENLARGEMENT; PROTECTOR.

As to the powers of tenant in tail to lease, see SETTLED LAND.

The entail of copyholds depends upon the custom of each manor. In some manors there is no custom to entail, and in these manors a surrender of copyholds to the use of A and the heirs of his body gives him a conditional customary fee, corresponding to a fee simple conditional at the common law (see FEE). In some manors there is a custom to entail, so that a surrender to the use of A and the heirs of his body gives him a customary estate tail, which may be barred by a simple surrender, the consent of the protector, if any, being entered on the court rolls.

An equitable entail is where lands or tenements are vested in trustees in trust for a person as tenant in tail. Such an entail may be barred in the same manner as an ordinary entail. See DISENTAILING DEED.

A quasi entail at law is where an estate pur autre vie is given to a man and the heirs of his body: as if land held during the life of A is given to B and the heirs of his body. In such a case, B may bar the quasi entail by a simple deed of grant; if he dies in the lifetime of A without having done so, the land descends to the heir of his body as special occupant. (See OCCUPANT.) A customary quasi estate tail in copyholds is similar.

A quasi estate tail in equity is where land held on lease for lives with a covenant for perpetual renewal is given to a person and the heirs of his body: it may be barred by deed inter vivos. A customary quasi estate tail in equity in copyholds is similar.

As an estate tail can now be barred or converted into an estate in fee simple by the owner, subject to certain restrictions, the object with which estates tail were invented, namely, as Coke puts it, "to preserve the inheritance in the blood of them to whom the gift was made," is not completely secured. The principal use of estates tail at the present day is to keep an estate in a family for two generations: thus, on the marriage of the owner of an estate, it is generally settled on him for life, with remainder in tail to the eldest son of the marriage; when a son is born, he is tenant in tail, subject to his father's life estate, and when he attains twenty-one, he is able, with the consent of his father as protector (q.v.), to bar the entail: the father usually gives his consent on the terms of the estate being re-settled on the son for life, with remainder in tail to his issue, and so on. See SETTLEMENT; FRANKMARRIAGE; FORMEDON; BAR; DISENTAIL; FINE; RECOVERY; TENANT IN TAIL AFTER POSSIBILITY OF ISSUE EXTINCT; DESCENT; TENANT IN TAIL EX PROVISIONE VIRI.

Estates of the Realm. The Lords Temporal, the Lords Spiritual and the Commons. It is popularly believed that the three estates of the realm are the King, the Lords and the Commons; but this is a mistake.

Estoppel is an admission of so conclusive a nature that the party whom it affects is not permitted to aver against it or offer evidence to controvert it.

Estoppels are generally divided into three kinds—by matter of record, by deed, and in pais.

Estoppel by matter of record is based on the principle that a record imports such absolute verity that no person against whom it is producible shall be permitted to aver against it. The most important kind of estoppel by record occurs in the case of judgments (q.v.): thus, where A. wrongfully signed judgment against B., it was held that so long as the judgment stood B. could not dispute it, and that his remedy was to apply to the Court to set it aside. Other instances of estoppel by record occur in the case of letters patent, fines and recoveries, etc. See RECORD.

Estoppel by deed or specialty is based on the rule that no man is allowed to dispute his own solemn deed: hence, as a general rule, if a person executes a deed containing a recital or statement, he cannot afterwards deny the truth of it, or show it to be incorrect.

Estoppel by matter in pais occurs, says Coke, in the case of estoppel "by liverie, by entry, by acceptance of rent, by partition and by acceptance of an estate." The most important of these instances at the present day is the last, which occurs when a person has accepted a lease from one who has no title whatever to grant it; in such a case, neither the tenant nor anyone claiming under him can dispute the lessor's title; the tenant is therefore said to have an estate by estoppel, and the lessor a reversion in fee simple by estoppel, and if the lessor subsequently acquires an interest which, if he had had it before, would have enabled him to grant the lease validly, the interest is said to feed the estoppel, so that the lease is as effectual for all purposes as if the lessor had had a sufficient interest when he granted it. A licensee of a patent, etc., is similarly estopped from denying the patentee's right to the patent.

There are also many modern rules which may be referred to the doctrine of estoppel in pais: such are those that the acceptor of a bill of exchange is precluded from denying the drawer's handwriting; that a bailee cannot question the title of his bailor, etc., the general rule being that where a man by his words or conduct wilfully or by negligence causes another to believe in the existence of a certain state of things, and induces him to act on that belief, so as to alter his own previous position, the former is concluded from denying the existence of that state of facts. It was, indeed, decided in 1827 that where a person draws a cheque in such a manner that the amount may be altered without difficulty, and it is altered by being increased, he cannot sue his banker for paying the increased amount, because he is estopped by his own negligence, but this decision, although never expressly overruled, is not now to be regarded as law. If a customer issues a cheque in a completed form, the bank will in general have to bear the loss occasioned by any increase fraudulently made in the amount, even though the cheque is drawn in such a way as to make alteration easy.

Equitable estoppel, or estoppel by acquiescence, occurs where a person by tacitly representing his own position to be more favourable to another person than it really is, has induced that other to alter his position on the faith of the representation being true. Thus, if a stranger commences to build on land, supposing it to be his own, and the real owner, perceiving his mistake, abstains from setting him right, and leaves him to persevere in his error, the Court will not afterwards allow the real owner to assert his title to the land.

A person who has a public or quasi public status (such as the vicar of a parish) cannot waive or divest himself of the rights incident to his office by conduct which, in the case of a private person, would amount to estoppel.

Estoveriis habendis, De. Anciently, where a woman had been divorced a mensa et thoro, the writ de estoveriis habendis lay to enable her to recover her alimony.

Estovers. Every tenant for life or years of freehold land, unless restrained by agreement, may of common right take upon the land a reasonable quantity of wood for fuel, repairs, etc. This is called estover, or botes, which are sometimes divided into house-bote, for repairs of the house, fire-bote for taking fuel, plough-bote for making and repairing instruments of husbandry, and hay-bote for repairing fences (Anglo-Saxon, hegge; Norman French, haye, a hedge or enclosure). Copyholders' rights of estovers are sometimes subject to customary restrictions.

As to common of estovers, see COMMON. The word estover is derived from the old French estovoir or estoveir, that which is necessary. It was anciently used as meaning alimony or sustenance. See ESTOVERIIS HABENDIS, DE.

Estrays are such valuable animals as are found wandering in any manor or lordship, and no man knoweth the owner of them; after they have been proclaimed and kept for a year and a day without the owner appearing, the law gives them to the Crown; in most cases, however, they belong to the lord of the manor by special grant from the Crown. (See PREROGATIVE.) The only birds included are swans and cygnets. Animals feræ naturæ (q.v.) are included only when an ownership in them has been acquired at common law.

Estreat. Estreat (old French, estrait; Latin, extractum) originally meant a copy of a record of a Court. The word is now, however, used only in connection with fines, forfeitures and recognizances. If the condiction of a recognizance is broken, the recognizance is forfeited, and, on its being estreated, the cognizors become debtors to the Crown for the sums in which they are bound. Formerly recognizance was estreated (that is, extracted) by a copy being made from the original and sent to the proper authority to be enforced; thus, estreated recognizances in the superior Courts and Courts of Assize were sent into the Exchequer, while those before justices of the peace were sent to the sheriff, with writs of execution to enable him to levy the amounts. Now, where Parliament, the Supreme Court, or the assize Court is concerned, the estreat of recognizances, etc., is governed by the Fines Act, 1833, and the Queen's Remembrancer Act, 1859, under which the King's Bench Division and the King's Remembrancer take the place of the Court of Exchequer; and a discretion is given to the Court as to whether a recognizance shall be estreated or not, while the Treasury can compound or discharge a recognizance.

Estreat, at general or quarter sessions, except on the non-appearance of a defendant, is now effected under the Levy of Fines Acts, 1822 and 1823, the procedure being governed by the Criminal Law Act, 1826, s. 31. As to a defendant, his recognizance is forfeited at once on his failure to appear.

The procedure in case of estreat is complicated except at petty sessions, and cannot here be dealt with thoroughly. See Archbold (25th ed.), pp. 94-97.

As to the estreating, or, as it is there called, the forfeiture, of the recognizances with which Courts of summary jurisdiction are concerned —such as recognizances to be of good behaviour or to appear, entered into before justices—see the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 9 (1) (2).

Estrepe; Estrepement. Anciently estrepe meant to commit waste (q.v.) and estrepement meant waste. The writ, which subsequently was known only as the writ of waste, was also known as the writ of estrepement when Jacob wrote in 1739.

Et adjornatur. (And it is adjourned.) The words occur in the old law reports where a case was adjourned for further argument, etc.

Et de hoc ponit se super patriam. (And concerning this he puts himself upon his country.) Formerly, when a defendant traversed or denied the facts pleaded by the plaintiff he concluded his traverse (q.v.) in these words. See COUNTRY.

Ethelred, Laws of. See ANGLO-SAXON LAWS.

Et hoc paratus est verificare. (And this he is ready to verify.) The former method of concluding a plea in confession and avoidance (q.v.).

Et hoc petit quod inquiratur per patriam. (And he prays that this may be enquired into by his country.) These formerly were the words concluding a traverse (q.v.) in which the plaintiff traversed or denied the facts pleaded by the defendant. See COUNTRY.

Et inde producit sectam. (And thereupon he brings suit.) The declaration (q.v.) formerly concluded with these words.

Et sic ad patriam. (And so to the country.) Used in the Year Books as meaning that there had been an issue to the country (q.v.)

Eundo, morando, et redeundo. (In going, remaining and returning.) The phrase was used in connection with privilege from arrest for debt.

Evasive. A pleading is said to be evasive when, in contravention of Ord. 19, r. 19, it answers the pleading of the other party by a half-admission or half-denial or fails to answer the point of substance which has to be met. An evasive pleading is "embarrassing" within the meaning of r. 27 of the same order and may be struck out. See AMENDMENT.

Eventus varios res nova semper habet (Co. Litt. 379.) (An innovation produces various results); even, says Coke, if it be introduced by a judge. See PERICULOSUM, ETC.

Eviction is now a popular term, but formerly was known to the law as a term for turning a tenant of land out of possession, either by re-entry or by legal proceedings, such as an action of ejectment.

Evidence is means employed for the purpose of proving an unknown or disputed fact, and is either judicial or extra-judicial. Judicial evidence is that which is used on trials or inquiries before Courts, judges, commissioners, referees, etc., while extra-judicial evidence is that which is used to satisfy private persons as to facts requiring proof. An important kind of extra-judicial evidence is that known as conveyancers' evidence, namely, that evidence which by the practice of conveyancers is required in the investigation of the title to property, in proof of facts on which the goodness of the vendor's title depends: such are original title deeds, probates of wills, certificates of births, deaths and marriages, statutory declarations, etc. Evidence by statutory declaration is sometimes called declaratory evidence.

Judicial evidence is of the following kinds:—

I. Evidence is direct where the fact proved by it (the evidentiary fact) is the fact in issue, or the fact required to be proved; as where on a trial for murder a witness deposes that he saw the prisoner kill the deceased. Indirect evidence is where the existence of the fact in issue is inferred from the evidentiary fact. Such evidence is—(i) conclusive, when the existence of the fact in issue follows either by a necessary consequence of the laws of nature or from a rule of law (as where an alibi is proved, or the certificate of incorporation of a company is produced): or (ii) circumstantial or presumptive, where it only rests on a greater or less degree of probability; as where a person accused of a murder is proved to have in his possession the instrument with which the deceased was killed. Evidence which shifts the burden of proof is called primâ facie evidence. See PRESUMPTION; PROOF.

II. Real evidence is that which is derived from any object belonging to the class of things: thus, footsteps in a field are real evidence that someone has been there; and the production of a mutilated document is real evidence of the mutilation. Documentary evidence is that derived from conventional symbols (such as letters), by which ideas are represented on material substances. A written contract is documentary evidence. Documents are divided into those which prove themselves (such as the London Gazette, probates of wills, certificates by registrars and other officials, etc.); and those which require personal evidence to prove them, such as agreements, deeds and other private documents. (See DOCUMENTS.) Personal evidence is that which is afforded by human beings, either by words or by signs intended to convey ideas. It may be personal either as to its source, as where a person deposes to a fact which he has seen (e.g., an assault); or as to its instrument, that is, the means by which it is brought before the tribunal. The former class has some kinds with special names, of which opinion evidence, and its principal variety, expert or scientific evidence, are the most important. The latter class (evidence personal by reason of its instrument), also called testimony, is either oral or written. Oral evidence is that given by a witness viva voce before the tribunal. Written evidence is given either by affidavit or deposition (q.v.). In actions in the High Court, the evidence on the trial of the action is given orally in Court, unless the parties agree to have it taken by affidavit, and subject to the rule that the Court may order certain witnesses to be examined before an examiner or on a commission, or order a particular fact or facts to be proved by affidavit. (Ord. 37, r. 1.)

III. Original evidence is that which comes from its source without passing through any intermediate channel; as where a witness deposes to a fact within his own knowledge, or where a thing or an original document is produced to the tribunal. Original documentary evidence is called primary evidence: original real evidence is sometimes called immediate real evidence. Derivative, unoriginal, transmitted, second-hand or reported evidence, is that which is brought from its source through an intermediate channel, as where a witness offers to prove a fact of the existence of which he has been informed by another person, or describes the condition of a thing or the contents of a document not produced; so a copy of a document is derivative evidence of the contents of the original. Derivative evidence is called—(i) hearsay or second-hand, when a witness makes a statement on the authority of another person (see DECLARATION); (ii) secondary or parol, when the contents of a document are brought before the Court either orally or by means of a copy; and (iii) reported, when the original source is real, as where the appearance of a thing is described by a witness. The distinction between original and derivative evidence is important with reference to the rule that where two kinds of evidence are accessible, the best evidence must be given; hence secondary evidence of the contents of a document is not admissible if the original can be produced. See NOTICE TO PRODUCE.

IV. Substantive evidence is that adduced for the purpose of proving a fact in issue, as opposed to evidence given for the purpose of discrediting a witness (that is, showing that he is unworthy of belief) or of corroborating his testimony. See DISCREDIT.

V. Evidence may be either intrinsic [internal] or extrinsic. Intrinsic evidence is that which is derived from a document without anything to explain it, or, as it is said, "without going beyond the four corners of the document." The terms "intrinsic" and "internal" are not common in practice. Extrinsic or parol evidence is evidence given to explain, vary or contradict a document, being derived from some other source than the document itself. It is called (i) explanatory evidence, where it is used for the purpose of ascertaining the meaning of the words actually used in the document, and (ii) evidence to prove intention, where the object is to show what was intended to have been, but has not been, written. The principal varieties of explanatory evidence are (a) evidence of usage to show that certain words in the document were employed in a technical sense understood by the parties, and (b) evidence of circumstances (tautologically, "surrounding" or "collateral" circumstances), as where evidence is given of the state of a testator's family, in order to explain the provisions of his will. Evidence of intention is as a rule only admissible to explain latent ambiguities: thus where a testator gives a legacy to William Smith, evidence is admissible to prove which William Smith he intended. See ADMISSION; AMBIGUITY; CONFESSION; DECLARATION; ESTOPPEL; EXAMINATION; FACT; NOTICE; PRESUMPTION; PROOF; RES GESTÆ; VOIR DIRE.

Ewage; Ewagium = Aquage (q.v.).

Exaction. Anciently this was the name applied in the law to the particular form of extortion (q.v.), which consisted of the taking, by an officer of the law, of any fee or reward where none at all was due.

Exactor regis. The King's collector of taxes. The term was sometimes taken as meaning the sheriff; but such use of the word was incorrect, and arose from the fact that the sheriff in early times was the person entrusted with collection of all moneys falling due within his bailiwick to the king.

Examination is the interrogation of a person on oath, and is either by written interrogatories (q.v.) or viva voce. The commonest instance of viva voce examination occurs in obtaining evidence from witnesses, who are examined in Court or before an officer of the Court or an examiner (q.v.). When the evidence of the witness is obtained by oral examination, this is called the examination-in-chief; when a witness has been so examined, or has made an affidavit on behalf of the party calling him, and is then examined on behalf of the opposite party in order to diminish the effect of his evidence, this is called cross-examination, and when he is again examined by the party calling him in order to give him an opportunity of explaining or contradicting any false impression produced by the cross-examination, this is called re-examination; it is necessarily confined to matters arising out of the cross-examination. See DEPOSITION; INTERROGATORY; TESTIMONY; VOIR DIRE.

Sometimes an examination is in the nature of a cross-examination, as in the case of a judgment debtor being examined as to what debts are owing to him, with a view to their being attached. See ATTACHMENT; GARNISHEE.

Every debtor against whom a receiving order is made must attend at a public sitting to be examined as to his conduct, dealings, and property; the examination, which is known as the public examination, is to be held after the debtor's statement of affairs has been submitted; it is to be on oath; every creditor who has proved, the official receiver, and the trustee (if any) may question the debtor; and the examination is not to be concluded until after the first meeting of creditors (Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 15).

Persons desirous of being admitted solicitors of the Supreme Court are as a rule required to pass three examinations; namely, a preliminary examination in general knowledge (English, Latin, arithmetic, etc.) before being articled; an intermediate examination in elementary law after half the time under articles has been served, in order to ascertain the progress made by the articled clerk in acquiring the knowledge necessary for a solicitor; and a final examination to test the fitness of the candidate to transact the business of a solicitor. The examinations are conducted by the Law Society (Solicitors Act, 1877, s. 6). See ARTICLED CLERK.

Persons who have been members of the English Bar, or who have passed certain examinations at specified universities, or who have taken a degree in arts or law thereat, are exempt from the preliminary examination (Solicitors Act, 1922, s. 1). No one, unless exempted for special reasons, who is articled to a solicitor after December 31st, 1922, is to be admitted to the final examination if he has not attended a law school for one year in all (ib., s. 2).

Examined Copy. See COPY.

Examiner is a person appointed by a Court to take the examination of witnesses in an action, that is, to take down the result of their interrogation by the parties or their counsel either by written interrogatories or vivâ voce. (See EXAMINATION.) An examiner is generally appointed where a witness is in a foreign country, or is too ill or infirm to attend before the Court. The examiner is to be one of the examiners of the Court unless the Court otherwise directs (Ord. 37, r. 39); and, except where the witness is outside the jurisdiction, it is not now the practice to appoint any special examiner. The examiners of the Court are barristers of not less than five years' standing and are appointed for a period of five years by the Lord Chancellor, who may at any time remove them (ib., r. 40). They act in rotation (ib., rr. 41, 42). Where the witness is abroad he may be examined before either one of the examiners of the Court or a special examiner.

The appointment of an examiner has now to a great extent superseded the issue of a commission. See COMMISSION; LETTERS OF REQUEST; DEPOSITION; MASTER.

Under the practice of the Court of Chancery before the Judicature Acts, the evidence to be used on the hearing of a cause was taken either by affidavit or deposition before the examiner attached to that Court; persons so giving evidence were subject to cross-examination and re-examination. This practice has been abolished.

Exannual Roll. Anciently this meant a list made out annually by the sheriff of moneys leviable by him which were in fact irrecoverable.

Ex antecedentibus et consequentibus fit optima interpretatio (2 Inst. 317). (Any part of a document is best interpreted by reference to what goes before it and to what follows it.) The meaning of words, of course, varies with the context.

Excambium. An exchange or payment in lieu of—formerly used in the phrase "an excambium for dower," which had to be paid when the land to which the widow was entitled could not be handed over to her.

Except; Exception. In conveyancing, an exception is a clause in a deed whereby the feoffor, donor, grantor, lessor, &c., excepts something out of that which he had granted before by the deed, so that the thing excepted does not pass by the grant. An exception must be part of the thing granted, and must be in esse at the time of the grant, while a reservation (q.v.) must be of some new thing issuing out of the thing granted.

In procedure, to except to a thing was formerly to object to or challenge it. Thus, to except to bail or sureties was to object to their sufficiency (see BAIL; JUSTIFICATION). Formerly, in Chancery practice, to except to an answer to interrogatories or affidavit of documents was to object to its sufficiency, which was done by applying to the Court or judge on summons or motion to consider the sufficiency of the answer or affidavit; if a defendant to a suit put in an insufficient answer to interrogatories, the plaintiff filed exceptions, that is, objections, to it, which were set down in the cause-list and argued in Court.

Formerly also a plea which, if established, was fatal to the case of the other side was known as an exception: see, e.g., HORS DE SON FEE; NON SANAE MEMORIAE.

Where, on the trial of an action by a jury, the judge misdirects the jury as to the law, or admits or rejects evidence wrongly, the party aggrieved makes a motion for a new trial. (See DIRECTION; TRIAL.) This is a substitute for the old proceeding by bill of exceptions (q.v.).

Exceptio probat regulam [de rebus non exceptis] (11 Co. 41). (An exception proves the rule [concerning things not excepted].)

Exceptio semper ultima ponenda est (9 Co. 53). (An exception is always to be put last.) A rule governing pleadings in the time of James I.: it does not apply now.

Exceptis excipiendis. (All necessary exceptions having been made.)

Excess Profits Duty. A duty first imposed by the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1915, ss. 38-42, and Sch. 4, (1) upon such profits as a business established before 4th August, 1914, was making over and above the profits which it had been making before that date, and (2) upon such profits over and above a certain precentage on the capital employed as was being earned by businesses established since the same date. The duty was terminated by the Finance Act, 1921, ss. 35-42, after sundry variations as to its rate and otherwise had been effected by intermediate legislation.

Exchange, in its widest sense, is where A transfers property to B in consideration of B transferring property to A.

At common law an exchange is the mutual conveyance of equal interests in land or other hereditaments, corporeal or incorporeal; by equal interests is meant that the quantity of estate given and taken must be equal, e.g., an estate in fee simple in exchange for an estate in fee simple. Before the Real Property Act, 1845, an exchange was effected by the mere entry of each party on the land taken by him in exchange, without livery of seisin and without deed, except in the case of hereditaments lying in grant, or of lands situate in different counties; every exchange also implied a warranty, so that if one party was evicted from his newly-acquired land owing to a defect in the title, he could re-enter on the land originally held by him. But now by the Real Property Act, 1845, every exchange must be by deed, and the implied warranty has been abolished. Exchanges at common law had become practically obsolete by 1845, it having become usual even before that date to effect an exchange by mutual but separate conveyances in the form of ordinary deeds of grant. The same method, or one deed executed in duplicate, is still in use. By the Inclosure Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 118), provision is made for exchanges of land under the direction of the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries (q.v.) in cases where they have satisfied themselves by inquiries that the proposed exchange will be beneficial to the owners of the respective lands, and that the terms are just and reasonable. They thereupon make an order of exchange, which carries the arrangement of the parties into effect. An application for an exchange can be made by the person in possession of the lands (ib., ss. 16, 147; Inclosure Act, 1854, s. 5), but it is not necessary that both parties should have estates equal in duration, for the effect of the exchange is simply to substitute one piece of land for another, so that if lands belong to A for life, with remainder to B, A can by obtaining an order of exchange, effect an exchange with C, a tenant of other lands in fee simple; then C's lands vest in A for life, with remainder to B. If the lands are not of equal value, the difference in value may be compensated by a perpetual rentcharge on the land which is of lesser value (Inclosure Act, 1857, s. 6); but no exchange may be authorised if the deficiency in value exceeds one-eighth of the less valuable property (ib., s. 8). The Inclosure Commissioners (whose powers are now vested in the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries) were originally empowered to administer the Inclosure Acts.

An exchange of goods is a transfer of goods from A to B in exchange for a transfer of goods from B to A. Such a transaction, which hardly differs from a sale (q.v.), is more commonly called barter.

See Owelty of Exchange.

Exchange, Bill of. See Bill of Exchange.

Exchange (in ecclesiastical law). Any two incumbents may, with the requisite assent and upon compliance with the required formalities, exchange their benefices. But if either effects the exchange in consideration of receiving "any pension, sum of money or benefit whatsoever," then both the giver and the taker thereof are each liable, under the statute 31 Eliz. c. 6, s. 7, to forfeit double the amount or value thereof and also two years' profit of their benefices; and such forfeiture may be sued for by anyone, half of the forfeiture to go to the person suing and the other half to the Crown.

Under a series of statutes commencing with the Ecclesiastical Commissioners Act, 1840, an exchange of advowsons or of rights of patronage may be effected under a scheme of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and an Order in Council. Such exchanges are sanctioned only if and in so far as they conduce to the better management of the Church.

Exchanges, Regimental. Under the Army Act, s. 155 (3), any person who negotiates, acts as agent for, or otherwise connives at any exchange in respect of which any sum of money or other consideration is given or received, is liable on conviction upon indictment to a fine of £100 or to imprisonment not exceeding six months and, if an officer, is liable on conviction by court-martial to be dismissed the service.

Exchequer is a public office, and formerly consisted of two divisions—the receipt of the Exchequer and the Court of the Exchequer. The former manages the royal revenue, that is, it receives and keeps the public money, and sees that none of it is paid out except on proper authority. (See TREASURY.) Accordingly, all the principal revenues (e.g., those arising from the Customs, Inland Revenue, the Post Office, etc.) are paid into the Bank of England, to the credit of the Exchequer; and payments for the public service are made out of the fund thus formed. By the Exchequer and Audit Departments Act, 1866, the Audit Department (or office for auditing the public accounts) was consolidated with the Exchequer, and the two departments were placed under the management of a comptroller and auditor-general and subordinate officers.

The Court of Exchequer was one of the Courts into which the Curia Regis divided itself. By the year 1200 it had a separate existence; but the one body continued to collect revenue in addition to trying cases. The first Chief Baron was appointed in 1312, and from that date the Court had a separate existence. It was originally a Court having jurisdiction only in matters concerning the public revenue, e.g., in suits by the Crown against its debtors; but it afterwards acquired (by the use of fictitious pleadings—see FICTION) jurisdiction in actions between subject and subject. It was formally sub-divided into a Court of common law and a Court of equity; but by statute 5 Vict c. 5, its equitable jurisdiction (except in revenue matters) was transferred to the Court of Chancery. Under the Judicature Acts, 1873 and 1875, the jurisdiction of the Court of Exchequer, as a Court of revenue as well as a common law Court, was transferred to the High Court of Justice; the judges of the Court of Exchequer, and their successors, continued to form a division of the High Court, called the Exchequer Division, to which all causes which would formerly have been within the exclusive cognizance of the Court of Exchequer were assigned, until, in 1880, the three "common law" divisions of the High Court were merged into one. See SUPREME COURT; BARON.

The word "exchequer" is derived from the medieval Latin scaccarium (a chess board), from the chequered cloth, resembling a chess board, which covered the table on which, when certain of the king's accounts were made up, the sums were marked and scored with counters.

See RED BOOK OF THE EXCHEQUER; LIBER NIGER SCACCARII; CURSITOR BARON OF THE EXCHEQUER; TALLY; TELLER; CLERK OF THE PELLS; AUDITOR; CURSUS SCACCARII.

Exchequer Bills are bills issued by the government for the purpose of raising temporary loans, generally in anticipation of the supplies granted by Parliament, and occasionally for carrying on public works, etc.; they entitle the bearer (or the person named in each bill, if the blank left for that purpose is filled up) to the sum for which they are issued, to be paid at a time to be fixed by advertisement, with interest in the meantime. They are negotiable instruments. Their issue is regulated by the Exchequer Bills and Bonds Act, 1866, as amended by the Treasury Bills Act, 1877. They are not now much used, their place having to a large extent been taken by Treasury bills (q.v.). They are charged upon the Consolidated Fund (q.v.) (Act of 1866, s. 7).

Exchequer Chamber. The Court of Exchequer Chamber was a Court of error (that is, a Court of Appeal) from each of the three superior Courts of common law, and consisted of the judges of the two Courts other than that whose decision was being appealed against; that is, when error was brought from a judgment of the Queen's Bench, the Exchequer Chamber consisted of the judges of the Common Pleas and Exchequer, and so on. By the Judicature Acts the Exchequer Chamber was abolished and its jurisdiction was transferred to the Court of Appeal.

See HELL.

Exchequer of the Jews. This was a branch of the Exchequer, established about the year 1200, primarily for the purpose of supervising the money-lending business of the Jews. It was created in the interest, not so much of the Jew or of his debtor, as of the king, to whom the Jew, and all that the Jew might have, belonged in strict law. It managed all the king's transactions with the Jews; exacted from them escheats, forfeitures, reliefs and tallages (q.v.); decided disputes between Jews and Christians; and adjudicated in criminal cases affecting Jews. See CUSTODES JUDÆORUM.

Excise is properly a duty on certain commodities, charged in most cases on the manufacturer; such are duties on spirits, malt, tobacco, etc. There are also duties which, though not properly in the nature of excise, are classed under this head; such as the licences which are required to be taken out annually by those who manufacture or deal in certain goods, or carry on certain employments, and also what are more commonly known as assessed taxes, being those payable by persons who use male servants, horses, carriages, motor cars and armorial bearings. (See LICENCE.) See COMMISSIONERS OF CUSTOMS AND EXCISE.

Exclusive. See APPOINTMENT; POWER.

Exclusive Jurisdiction was that jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery in which the common law had no share, as opposed to the concurrent jurisdiction in which law and equity equally shared. Since the Judicature Acts 1873-5, this exclusive jurisdiction as such has now theoretically ceased, the jurisdiction being now concurrent; but practically, the old exclusive jurisdiction continues exclusively in the Chancery Division. The jurisdiction comprised and comprises trusts, administration of assets, and such like.

Excommengement. This was the old law French for excommunication (q.v.).

Excommunication is an ecclesiastical punishment, being a censure (q.v.), whereby the person against whom it is pronounced is for the time cast out of the communion of the Church. It is said to be of two kinds—the lesser and the greater. The lesser excommunication deprives the offender of the use of the sacraments and divine worship: this sentence was formerly passed by judges ecclesiastical, on such persons as were guilty of obstinacy or disobedience in not appearing upon a citation, or not obeying the orders or decrees of the Court; but in these cases it is no longer applicable (Ecclesiastical Courts Act, 1813, s. 1). The greater excommunication is that whereby, according to ecclesiastical law, men are deprived, not only of the sacraments and the benefit of divine offices, but of "the society and conversation of the faithful." It can be pronounced only as a punishment or censure for an ecclesiastical offence. If the person does not submit within forty days after the sentence of excommunication, he may, under s. 3 of the Ecclesiastical Courts Act, 1813, be arrested and imprisoned for any time not exceeding six months upon the writ of de excommunicato capiendo (q.v., and see SIGNIFICAVIT); but such imprisonment is obsolete.

In some cases the Court has no discretion, but must pass sentence of excommunication if the offender is found guilty; as where a person in Holy orders is found guilty of smiting another in a church. This is sometimes called excommunication ipso facto. See BRAWLING.

Excommunication, as a punishment for contempt of the decrees of Ecclesiastical Courts, has been abolished, and that for contumacy (q.v.) substituted.

A minister in Holy orders is not required to say the Office for the Burial of the Dead at the interment of a person who dies excommunicate.

Excommunication, in the Church of England, is now of rare occurrence.

Excommunicato Capiendo, De, was a writ issuing out of Chancery and directed to the sheriff, commanding him to arrest and imprison a person who has been excommunicated. See EXCOMMUNICATION; SIGNIFICAVIT; CONTUMACE CAPIENDO, DE.

Excommunicato Deliberando, De. A writ which formerly lay to the sheriff for the liberation of an excommunicated person upon a certificate by the ordinary that such person had conformed to the ecclesiastical jurisdiction.

Excommunicato Recapiendo, De. A writ which anciently lay for the re-arrest of an excommunicated person who had unlawfully been released from prison.

Ex concessis. Literally, from things already conceded.

Ex contractu. The actions of account, annuity, assumpsit, covenant, debt, and scire facias all arose ex contractu (from contract), as does now the action which has replaced them. See the titles of these different actions and also ACTIONS.

Excusat aut extenuat delictum in capitalibus quod non operatur idem in civilibus (Bac. Max. Reg. 15). (A wrong, in capital cases, is excused or palliated, which would not be so treated in civil cases.) Thus, in a civil action a wrong may be actionable whether it be done maliciously or not: in a criminal case a wrong may not be punishable unless it be done maliciously.

Ex debito justitiæ. A remedy which the applicant gets as of right. A remedy which may or may not be granted is called discretionary. Thus the writ of mandamus (q.v.) is a discretionary writ; the writ of habeas corpus (q.v.) is ex debito justitiæ.

Ex delicto. The actions which arose from tort (ex delicto) were trespass (whether quare clausum fregit or de bonis asportatis), case, trover, detinue, and replevin. See the titles of these different actions, and also ACTIONS.

Ex diuturnitate temporis omnia præsumuntur esse rite et solennitur acta (Jenk. Cent. 185). (From lapse of time, all things are presumed to have been done rightly and regularly.) See CONSUETUDO ET COMMUNIS ASSUETUDO, ETC.

Ex dolo malo non oritur actio. (No right of action can have its origin in fraud.) See DOLO MALO ETC.; EX TURPI CAUSA, ETC; NULLUS COMMODUM, ETC.

Exeat. (Let him go.) In the Church of England this means a permission from a bishop to a priest authorising him to leave the diocese, and, incidentally, to seek employment in another diocese. At Oxford and Cambridge it means leave of absence to an undergraduate.

Execute; Executed; Execution. To execute is to complete or carry into effect; execution is the act of doing so. Thus, to execute a deed is to sign, seal and deliver it (see DEED); and the Statute of Uses is said to execute a use when a use is carried into effect by being converted into a legal estate. (See USE.) As to executed contracts and trusts, see CONTRACTS; TRUST.

When a person makes an appointment under a power, he is commonly said to execute it, though the term "exercise" is more appropriate. In general, a power of appointment requires to be exercised with certain formalities, e.g., by deed or by will; when there is an intention to exercise a power, but the formalities have not been complied with, the power is said to be defectively executed. In certain cases, and in favour of certain persons, the High Court (following the rules of the Court of Chancery) will aid or supply the defective execution of a power; that is, consider it as having been properly executed, notwithstanding a defect in the formalities, as where there is merely an agreement to execute it, or where it is executed by will instead of by deed; this is sometimes called an equitable execution. See also the Wills Act, 1837, as to the exercise of powers by will, and the Law of Property Amendment Act, 1859, as to the exercise of powers by deed.

To execute a judgment or order of a Court is to carry it into effect or enforce it. In actions in the High Court, judgments are principally enforced by writs called writs of execution, which direct the sheriff or other persons either to do what is required to perform the judgment (e.g., to deliver possession of land to a successful plaintiff), or to compel the defendant or other person to do some act which he is required to do. (See the titles FIERI FACIAS; ELEGIT; DISTRINGAS; CAPIAS; POSSESSION; SEQUESTRATION; WRIT; RETURN.) In ordinary parlance, "execution" means execution to recover a debt, that being the most important kind, and hence a creditor or debtor, by or against whom execution has been issued, is called an execution creditor or debtor. See CREDITOR; DEBTOR.

Continuing execution is where the process continues until all that has been commanded to be levied is levied; as in the case of a sequestrari facias.

In some cases a judgment may be enforced by means formerly peculiar to Courts of equity, and hence called equitable execution. Thus, if a judgment debtor has an equity of redemption in land (an interest which could not be taken in execution at common law), the Court will appoint a receiver of the rents, profits and surplus proceeds of sale of the property for the benefit of the creditor.

There are also some other kinds of proceedings available to enforce or satisfy a judgment, which are hence usually treated of under the head of execution; such are charging orders, notice in lieu of distringas on stock, attachment of debts, etc. (see those titles).

The Railway Companies Act, 1867, s. 4, enacts that the rolling stock and plant of a railway company shall not be liable to be taken in execution; but a judgment creditor of the company may obtain the appointment of a receiver or manager of the company's undertaking; and the net income of the company is then applied in payment of its debts.

In criminal proceedings, judgment against a prisoner is executed by the sheriff, who causes him to be imprisoned, sent to penal servitude, hanged, or otherwise dealt with according to the sentence. The term "execution," however, is commonly applied to execution of judgment of death by hanging, which is now effected within the walls of the prison where the offender is confined. See CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

To execute a writ is to obey the instructions contained in it: thus, a writ of fieri facias is executed by seizing and selling the goods of the debtor. (See RETURN.) Writs are executed either personally, that is, by the persons to whom they are directed, or by a substitute appointed by warrant (q.v.).

— Executio est executio juris secundum judicium (3 Inst. 212). (Execution is the execution of the law according to the judgment.) Coke cites this maxim in connection with the point that a sentence of hanging will not justify beheading.

— Executio est finis et fructus legis (Co. Litt. 289*b*). (Execution is the end and fruit of the law.) This is one of a number of maxims as to execution cited by Coke on the same page.

The execution referred to is the execution of civil process.

Executio juris non habet injuriam (2 Inst. 482). (The execution of the process of the law does no injury.)

"If an action be brought in a Court which has jurisdiction upon insufficient grounds or against the wrong party, no injury is thereby done for which an action can be maintained; . . . he is not to be esteemed a wrong-doer who merely avails himself of his legal rights. . . . On the other hand, if an individual, under colour of the law, does an illegal act, or if he abuses the process of the Court to make it an instrument of oppression or extortion, this is a fraud upon the law, by the commission of which liability will be incurred." (Broom, 8th ed., p. 103.) See ACTUS CURIÆ, etc.

Executione Facienda, De. Anciently a generic title for writs of execution generally. See, for instance, the next title.

Executione facienda in withernam, De. A writ anciently used in the same circumstances as the writ Averiis captis in withernam (q.v.).

Executione judicii. Anciently this was a writ issuing to an inferior Court requiring it to either execute its own judgment or to show some reasonable cause for non-execution.

Executor. An executor is the person to whom the execution of a will of personal estate, that is, the duty of carrying its provisions into effect, is confided by the testator. The duties of an executor are to bury the deceased, to collect the estate, and, if necessary, convert it into money; to pay the debts in their proper order, then to pay the legacies, and distribute the residue among the persons entitled. For these purposes he may bring actions against persons who are indebted to the testator, or are in possession of property belonging to the estate. Some of these things, however, can only be done by him after he has proved the will. (See PROBATE.) When several executors are appointed, and only some of them prove the will, these are called the proving or acting executors.

Married women and infants may be appointed and act as executors. In the case of an infant, however, letters of administration durante minore ætate require to be taken out to carry on the administration of the estate until he attains majority. See GRANT.

An executor nominate is one appointed expressly by the word "executor"; an executor according to the tenor of the will is one appointed by inference; for if by any words the testator recommends or commits to a person the rights and duties which appertain to the office of executor (as where he says, "I commit all my goods to the disposition of A.B."), it is equivalent to an express appointment.

An executor de son tort (de son tort demesne, of his own wrong) is one who, being neither executor nor administrator, intermeddles with the goods of the deceased, or does any other act characteristic of the office of executor. When a man has so acted, he renders himself liable, not only to an action by the rightful executor or administrator, but also to be sued by a creditor or legatee of the deceased. He has all the liabilities, though none of the privileges, which belong to the character of executor.

An executor is allowed a year to realise the testator's estate before being bound to distribute it. Consequently interest does not begin to run on legacies until after the expiration of a year from the testator's death, unless the will contains some special directions on the subject.

As to the payment of debts and distribution of the estate, see ADMINISTRATION; ASSETS. Strictly speaking, an executor is bound to satisfy all just claims on the estate before distributing it among the legatees and other beneficiaries, whether he has had notice of such claims or not, and also to provide for all future and contingent liabilities arising out of the testator's estate, such as calls on shares, rents and covenants under leases and the like. These responsibilities, however, have been considerably reduced by the modern statutes referred to infra.

Where a testator charges his real estate with the payment of his debts or legacies, and does not make any express provision for raising them, his executor may do so by sale or mortgage of the lands, unless the testator has devised them in such a manner that his whole estate and interest in them has become vested in trustees, in which case they are the persons to exercise the power of sale or mortgage (Law of Property Amendment Act, 1859, ss. 14-16). Before 1898, neither such implied or statutory power, nor any express power to sell real estate, could be exercised by an administrator, even if acting under letters of administration with the will annexed. But now, under the Land Transfer Act, 1897, s. 1, all real estate to which a testator is absolutely entitled, other than copyhold, devolves to the executor or administrator as if it were personalty: and the executor or administrator has (s. 2 (2)) the same rights and powers regarding it that he has regarding personalty.

If an executor dies before the estate is completely administered, having by his will appointed an executor, the executor so appointed is also executor of the original testator. But if an executor dies without having appointed an executor, letters of administration de bonis non must be taken out. (See GRANT.) Frequently the office of trustee is combined with that of executor. See TRUSTEE.

Numerous powers have been conferred on executors during the last century by various Acts of Parliament, the principal of which are as follows:

Under the Law of Property Amendment Act, 1859, s. 29, where an executor or administrator has given such or the like notices for creditors and others to send in to him their claims against the estate of the testator, as would have been given by the Chancery Division of the High Court in an action to administer the testator's estate, then the executor may, at the expiration of the time named in the notices, distribute the assets without being liable for any claims of which he has not received notice: but this provision does not affect the right of any creditor or claimant to follow the assets into the hands of any person who may have received them (e.g., a legatee). Notices to creditors under this section are given by advertisement in the London Gazette and the principal newspapers circulating in the places where the testator resided and carried on business.

Under s. 27 of the same Act, where an executor or administrator has assigned to a purchaser a lease held by the testator, he is not bound to set aside a fund to answer future claims under the lease, unless it contains a covenant or agreement by the lessee to lay out a fixed sum on the property at some future time, in which case he is bound to set aside a sufficient fund for the purpose. But this provision does not affect the right of the lessor to follow the assets of the deceased into the hands of the persons among whom they have been distributed.

Under s. 29 of the same Act, an executor, administrator or trustee may, without the institution of an action, apply by petition or summons to a judge of the Chancery Division, for the opinion, advice or direction of the Court on any question respecting the management or administration of the assets, and he is protected from responsibility if he acts upon the opinion, advice or direction thus given, provided it was obtained without misrepresentation or concealment. See ADVICE OF COURT.

Under the Trustee Act, 1893, s. 21, executors (and also trustees) are empowered to pay debts or claims upon any evidence they think sufficient, and to accept any composition or security for any debts due to the deceased, and to allow time for payment of any debts, and also to compromise, compound or submit to arbitration all debts, accounts, claims, etc., relating to the estate of the deceased, without being responsible for any loss occasioned thereby. See WILL; SYNDIC; RENUNCIATION.

If notwithstanding these provisions an executor cannot safely administer an estate without the supervision of the Court, he may institute proceedings in the Chancery Division for the administration of the estate, in which he will act in accordance with the directions of the Court, and thus escape responsibility. See ADMINISTRATION; ACTION or MATTER; DISCRETION.

Executory is that which remains to be carried into effect, as opposed to executed (q.v.). See BEQUEST; CONSIDERATION; CONTRACT; DEVISE; EXECUTORY INTERESTS; TRUST.

Executory Interests. The term "executory interests" includes all future estates and interests in land or personalty, other than reversions and remainders.

As to executory interests in land, they are created either under the Statute of Uses or by will. Executory interests under the Statute of Uses are created by springing or shifting uses, a common instance of which occurs in an ordinary marriage settlement. Thus, supposing A. to be the settlor, the lands are conveyed by him to the trustees B. and C. and their heirs, to the use of A. and his heirs until the intended marriage shall be solemnised, and immediately after the solemnisation thereof to the use of D., the intended husband, for life, and so on. Until the marriage takes place, A. continues to be tenant in fee simple of the land, and D. has an executory interest; it is not a contingent remainder, for the estate which precedes it, that of A., is an estate in fee simple. As soon as the marriage takes place, the seisin of the land shifts away from A., and vests in D. for his life.

Executory interests in land created by will are called executory devises. See DEVISE.

Executory interests in personalty are created either by conveyance inter vivos or by will; in the latter case they are sometimes called executory bequests, formerly executory devises. In the wide sense of the word, "executory interest" includes interests in personal property analogous to remainders and reversions in land; but such interests are sometimes called remainders and reversions, as if they were estates in land. Thus, if stock is transferred or bequeathed to trustees in trust for A. for life, and after his death to B., the interest of B. might be called either a remainder or an executory interest.

Executory interests must not transgress the rule against perpetuities, or the provisions of the Thellusson Act. See those titles.

Executrix is a female executor.

Exemplary. See DAMAGES.

Exemplification is an official copy of a document made under the seal of a Court or public functionary. Thus, an exemplification of a will or probate is a copy under the seal of the Probate Division of the High Court; an exemplification of letters patent, or of a private Act of Parliament, is under the Great Seal. An exemplification is admissible evidence to prove the original document. See COPY; INSPEXIMUS; MITTIMUS.

Exemplificatione, De. This formerly was a writ granted for the exemplification (q.v.) of an original record.

Exemption Order. See LICENCE.

Exemption, Writ of. This writ, also known as the writ of ease, lay for one seeking exemption from service on juries or in public offices.

Exequatur is a permission by a government to the consul of another State to enter upon the discharge of his functions in the country of the Government giving the exequatur. The Government which issues it may at any time withdraw it; and its issue is entirely discretionary.

Exercise is to make use of: thus, to exercise a right or power, is to do something which it enables one to do. A power of appointment is exercised by making an appointment under it. See ENJOYMENT; EXECUTION.

Exercituale. In the Laws of Edward the Confessor, four horses are described as an exercituale; and it has been suggested that the word meant a heriot paid in arms or other military equipment.

Ex facto jus oritur (2 Inst. 49). (The law is grounded on the facts.)

Exfrediare. Used in the Laws of Henry I. as meaning to commit a breach of the peace.

Ex gratia. (As of favour.) In contradistinction to "as of right."

Ex gravi querela. This was a writ which lay for one to whom lands or tenements in fee had been devised (within any city, town or borough in which lands were devisable by custom) and the heir of the devisor entered upon the land. It was abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36.

Exhibit. When it is wished to put a document or moveable thing in evidence by affidavit, a reference to it is made in the affidavit, as being marked in some way for identification, and as having been produced to the deponent at the time of his swearing the affidavit, R. S. C., Ord. 38, r. 23: the document is marked in the way mentioned in the affidavit, generally with some letter of the alphabet; a certificate referring to the affidavit is also written on it, and is signed by the commissioner or person before whom the affidavit is made, and (ib., r. 24) must bear the short title of the cause or matter. The document is thenceforth called an exhibit, from the Latin exhibere, "to produce or show." It is not filed with the affidavit.

Exhibition. Jacob, referring to the period before the Reformation, says that this was "an allowance for meat and drink" made to a man by an appropriator (q.v.).

Exigent, or Exigi facias, was a judicial writ used in obtaining the outlawry of a person; it required the sheriff to exact the defendant, i.e., to call on him at five successive sheriff's County Courts (or, in the city of London, at five successive hustings) to appear and answer the plaintiff; if he made default after being exacted five times, he was outlawed. The writ might still possibly be used in outlawry in criminal proceedings. See OUTLAW.

Exigenter; Exigendary; Exigentarius de banco communi. Officers of the Courts of Common Pleas and King's Bench who performed duties in connection with the writ of exigent and other matters connected with outlawry. The Exigenter of the Common Pleas is mentioned in the statute 18 Hen. 6, c. 7, which deals with abuses of the process of outlawry. Jacob states that in the middle of the eighteenth century there were four Exigenters in the Common Pleas, but it appears from the Commons Committees Reports (1803), Vol. 13, p. 301, that in the Common Pleas in 1798 there was only one, whose office yielded no profit, while (ib. p. 280) in the King's Bench there was another, whose office (executed by deputy) was worth about £300 a year clear.

The office was abolished in both Courts by the Superior Courts (Officers) Act, 1837.

Exilium. A spoiling. Exilium, according to Fleta, meant the injury done to tenants when their tenure was wrongly determined. Vastum (waste) and destructio, each of which also meant a spoiling, applied to houses, gardens and woods.

Exitus. This meant (1) Issue or offspring; (2) the yearly rents and profits of lands and tenements; and (3) a joinder of issue or close of pleadings.

Exlegaliticus. In Anglo-Saxon times this meant an outlaw.

Ex-lex. An outlaw; see Bracton, lib. 3, c. 11.

Ex maleficio non oritur contractus. (A [valid] contract cannot arise out of an illegal act.) Compare Ex DOLO, ETC.

Ex mero motu. (Of his own accord.) The words were formerly used in royal grants and patents, in order to show that every such document was spontaneously done by the King. They are still applied to such action as a Court may take of its own initiative, such, for instance, as the binding over of an acquitted prisoner. See OFFICE OF THE JUDGE.

Ex multitudine signorum colligitur identitas vera (Bac. Works, vol. 4, p. 73). (True identity is collected from a number of signs.) The identity in question is the identity of the thing comprised in a gift.

Ex necessitate legis. (From the necessity of the law), that is to say, by necessary implication (q.v.) of the law.

Ex necessitate rei. (From the necessity of the case.) Compare Necessitas non habet legem and Quod necessitas cogit, defendit.

Ex non scripto jus venit quod usus comprobavit (I. 1, 2, 9). (Without anything being written, there comes into existence a body of law which derives its validity from custom.)

Ex nudo pacto non oritur actio (Plow. Com. 305). (No action arises from a nude contract, that is to say, a contract entered into without consideration.) "A consideration of some sort or another is so necessary to the forming of a contract, that a nudum pactum, or agreement to do or pay something on one side, without any compensation on the other, will not at law support an action; and a man cannot be compelled to perform it" (2 Bl. Com. 445). An action will, however, lie on an instrument under seal even though without consideration.

Ex officio. By virtue of his office. Thus the chairman of a county council is ex officio a justice of the peace for the county if he has taken, or as soon as he takes, the required oath: and the Attorney-General exhibits (or used to exhibit, for he has not done so of recent years) criminal informations (q.v.) ex officio in respect of misdemeanours affecting the public tranquillity or the government of the country.

Ex officio Oath. The statute 13 Car. 2, c. 12, forbade any ecclesiastical court to administer to any person the oath called the oath ex officio, that is to say, the oath under which he could be compelled to answer questions the answers to which would expose him to censure or punishment. A like oath known by a like name had been ordinarily administered by the High Commission (q.v.); and when that court was abolished by the statute 16 Car. 2, c. 11, the ex officio oath went with it and finally disappeared out of the procedure of our Courts. See INQUISITION.

Exon (or Exeter) Domesday. This is a collection of copies of the rolls or returns made in respect of the counties of Wilts, Dorset, Devon, Somerset and Cornwall by the Commissioners appointed by William the Conqueror to compile Domesday (q.v.). It is preserved in the library of the cathedral at Exeter.

Exoneration is where a person or estate is relieved from a liability, by the liability being thrown on another person or estate. The term is chiefly, if not exclusively, used with reference to questions arising in the administration of estates of deceased persons: thus, if a testator directs his debts to be paid primarily out of his real estate, this exonerates his personalty from liability to the debts. So, if a married woman joins in mortgaging her land to secure money raised for the benefit of her husband, she is entitled on his death to be exonerated from the charge by causing the debt to be paid out of her husband's estate.

As to the exoneration of the personal estate of a deceased person from the liability to satisfy a mortgage debt charged on his real estate, see LOCKE KING'S ACT; also CONTRIBUTION; MARSHALLING.

Exoneratione Sectæ, De. Up to 1660, when wardship in the feudal sense was abolished by the statute 12 Car. 2, c. 24, this was a writ which lay for a ward of the King to have the ward freed from all suit to the County Court, hundred court, etc., during wardship.

Exoneratione Sectæ ad Curiam Baronium, De. This was a writ which lay, up to 1660, for the guardian of a ward of the King to restrain the steward, etc., of the court baron from distraining the ward for not doing service at the court.

Exoneretur. (Let him be discharged.) In a proceeding by foreign attachment (q.v.) in the Mayor's Court, this was an entry on the defendant's recognisance of bail which was made when the action had been withdrawn or settled: it operated as a discharge of the bail from their liability.

In the days when arrest on mesne process existed in ordinary actions in the superior Courts, an exoneretur was entered on the bail-piece or filacer's book, if the defendant was rendered or taken to prison, because the bail were thereby discharged.

Ex pacto illicito non oritur actio. (No action arises out of a contract which is prohibited by the law.) Compare Ex TURPI CAUSA, etc.

Ex parte. In its primary sense, "ex parte," as applied to an application in a judicial proceeding, means that it is made by a person who is not a party to the proceeding, but has an interest in the matter which entitles him to make the application. Thus in a bankruptcy proceeding or an administration action, an application by A. B., a creditor or the like, would be described as made "ex parte A. B.," that is, on the part of A. B. In its more usual sense, ex parte means that an application is made by one party to a proceeding in the absence of the other. Thus an ex parte injunction is one granted without the opposite party having had notice of the application. It would not be called ex parte if he had proper notice of it, and chose not to appear to oppose it.

Ex parte materna; Ex parte paterna. Claiming through the mother's (materna) or the father's (paterna) line. See DESCENT.

Ex parte talis. An obsolete writ which, according to Fitzherbert, lay for a bailiff or receiver who "having auditors assigned to take his accounts, cannot obtain of them reasonable allowances but is cast into prison." Under the writ the bailiff was brought up before the Barons of the Exchequer, before whom the lord who had employed him was also required to appear. More generally speaking it was the remedy of a defendant against whom there had been a judgment in the old action of account (q.v.).

Expatriation takes place when a person loses his nationality, and renounces his allegiance to his native country by becoming the subject of a foreign State. Expatriation by a British subject was for the first time made possible by the Naturalization Act, 1870, s. 4. That Act was repealed and replaced by the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914, under s. 13 whereof a British subject may now expatriate himself. See EXUERE PATRIAM; NATURALIZATION; REPATRIATION.

Expectancy, Estate in. See ESTATE.

Expectant Heir. An expectant heir, in the language of equity, is a person who, having a reversionary right or hope of succession to property, but little or no property immediately available, is exposed to the temptation of selling or mortgaging his right or expectation on unreasonable terms (e.g., for much below its value, or at a usurious rate of interest), and is therefore considered as entitled to the protection of the Court against the enforcement of "catching bargains," as they are called. Thus, where a man twenty-six years of age entitled to a reversion of £600, but wholly without present means, applied to a money-lender, who advanced him £85 on a mortgage of the reversion for £100, with a provision that if default should be made in payment of the £100, it should bear interest at 5 per cent. per month; it was held, that the mortgagor was entitled to a decree for redemption of his reversion on payment of the sum borrowed and simple interest at 5 per cent. per annum. The term "expectant heir" is used, not in its literal meaning, but as including everyone who has either a vested remainder or a contingent remainder in a family property, including a remainder in a portion, as well as a remainder in an estate, and everyone who has the hope of succession to the property of an ancestor, either by reason of his being the heir apparent or presumptive, or by reason merely of the expectation of a devise or bequest on account of the supposed or presumed affection of his ancestor or relative. See REVERSIONARY; UNDUE INFLUENCE; FRAUD.

Expeditatæ arbores. In Fleta this expression means trees which not merely had been cut down but the roots of which had been stubbed up.

Expeditate; Expeditation. In the ancient forest law this meant to cut out the balls of a dog's fore-feet so as to render him incapable of pursuing game. The operation was known as expeditation. See IMPEDIATUS.

Expeditio. The liability to contribute to the cost of repelling invasion which in Anglo-Saxon times attached to land. See TRINODA NECESSITAS.

Expedit reipublicæ ne sua re quis male utatur (I. 1, 8, 2). (It is to the interest of the public that no one should use his property badly.)

Expedit reipublicæ ut finis sit litium (Co. Litt. 303). (It is in the public interest that the decision of cases should be final.)

Expenditors. Officials who performed duties, such as those of treasurer or manager, for the various commissioners of sewers (q.v.), were known as expenditors. See the statute 23 Hen. 8, c. 5, popularly known as the "Bill of Sewers" (q.v.).

Expensæ Litis. (The expenses of the cause.) The ancient term for costs.

Expensis Levandis, De. While members of Parliament were paid by their constituents, this was the general name of the writ which each member, being a citizen or burgess, was entitled to sue out at the end of each session. It required the sheriff to levy the allowance of two shillings which the member was entitled to receive in respect of each day that he had attended during the session.

Expensis militum levandis, De; Expensis militum non levandis, De. Down to 1681, when the common law liability of constituencies to pay their representatives was last enforced, the writ de expensis militum levandis lay to a sheriff commanding him to levy the allowance of four shillings a day payable at the end of the parliamentary session to a knight of the shire in respect of each day that he had attended the House of Commons, while the writ de expensis militum non levandis lay to restrain a sheriff from levying in respect of such allowance from any tenant in ancient demesne (q.v.).

Expilationis, Crimen. The offence of extortion (10 Rep. 102*a*). Expilatio does not seem to have been used by the jurists as meaning extortion; but Cicero uses it as meaning the act of pillaging. Compare CONCUSSIONIS, ETC.

Expiring Laws Continuance Act. This is an Act passed every year to continue, generally until the end of the following year, a number of Acts which otherwise would have expired. The Ballot Act, 1872, was thus kept in force down to 1918, when it was made permanent. When the annual Act includes any expiring Act, but is not passed until after the expiration thereof, then that expiring Act is deemed to have been in force, except as to penalties, between the date of its expiry and the passing of the annual Act (Act of Parliament (Expiration) Act, 1808).

Explees; Esplees; Expleta; Expletia; Explecia. All anciently used as meaning the rents and profits of an estate.

Explosives. The causing of explosions endangering property is punishable under the Malicious Damage Act, 1861, ss. 9, 10; the causing of those which injure the person is dealt with in the Offences against the Person Act, 1861, ss. 28-30, 64, 65; using, keeping or making explosives with intent to damage either person or property subjects the offender to heavy penalties under the Explosive Substances Act, 1883, ss. 2-4; and the last-mentioned Act also empowers the Attorney-General to have an inquiry held before a justice into any offence against the Act, even though no person is charged.

The manufacture, keeping, sale, and conveyance of every kind of explosive, and of any adaptation or preparation thereof, is regulated by the Explosives Act, 1875. See FIREWORKS.

Exposing Child. See CRUELTY TO CHILDREN.

Exposing Person with Contagious Disease. This, if done in a public place, is a common law misdemeanour. Under the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 126, the exposure of the infected person, either by himself or by others, in any place of public resort, or the sale, etc., of infected clothing or things, is punishable summarily.

Ex post facto. (By a subsequent act.) Thus a lease granted in excess of or outside the limits within which leases of settled land may be granted is capable of ratification ex post facto by the remainderman or reversioner. But the most common use of the word is in connection with a statute which either makes an act punishable which, when done, was not punishable, or which imposes in respect of any act a punishment different from that which could be inflicted at the time when the act was done. Such statutes are not now passed.

Exposure, Indecent. This, if done in public, is a common law misdemeanour. Under the Vagrancy Act, 1824, s. 4, it is punishable on summary conviction if done in or in view of any place of public resort and with intent to insult any female. Under the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, s. 28, wilful and indecent exposure in any street to the annoyance of residents or passengers, in any place where the Act is in force, is punishable summarily.

Ex præcedentibus et consequentibus est optima interpretatio (1 Rol. Rep. 375). (The best interpretation is from that which precedes and follows.) This is practically a repetition of ex antecedentibus, etc.

Express. An act evidencing intention is said to be express when it is done with the direct object of communicating the intention, as opposed to implication (q.v.). The communication may be effected by speech, writing or gestures: thus a promise in these words, "I promise to pay you £50," is express, whether verbal or written; if A. signifies his assent to a proposal by nodding or other gestures, the communication is still express; therefore the acceptance of a bid by an auctioneer is express when it is evidenced by the fall of his hammer. See CONSTRUCTIVE; IMPLICATION; TACIT.

Expressa nocent, non expressa non nocent (D. 50, 17, 195). (Things expressed harm, things not expressed do not.) This was a maxim of the Roman law. But in our law there is malice implied as well as express malice.

Expressa non prosunt quæ non expressa proderunt (4 Rep. 73). (If a benefit is produced without the use of any given words, then nothing is gained by the use of those words.)

Express Colour. See COLOUR.

Expressio eorum quæ tacitè insunt nihil operatur (4 Rep. 73). (The expressing of those things which are tacitly implied, is inoperative.) Thus no effect whatever is produced by the addition of the words "value received" to a promissory note or to a bill of exchange: either the one or the other will have precisely the same operation whether those words are or are not inserted, for the law in the case of either of them implies consideration.

Expressio unius personæ vel rei, est exclusio alterius. (The express mention of one person or thing is the exclusion of another.) This is another form of the maxim DESIGNATIO UNIUS ETC. (q.v.). Thus if a testator leaves "all my silver plate to A.," this will of course carry all the plate that she may have; but if she goes on to say, "that is to say, my teapot, my tray and my biscuit box," the bequest will not cover a coffee pot which she overlooked when enumerating her plate.

Express Malice. See MALICE.

Expressum facit cessare tacitum (Co. Litt. 183; 210*a*). (When there is express mention of certain things, then anything not mentioned is excluded.) See DESIGNATIO UNIUS, ETC.

Expropriation is compulsorily depriving a person of a right of property belonging to him in return for a compensation. The term has been introduced from its use in foreign countries to denote a compulsory purchase of land, etc. for the purposes of a railway, canal, or the like (expropriation pour cause d'utilité publique). Compare EMINENT DOMAIN.

Ex proprio motu. (Of his own accord.) See EX MERO MOTU.

Ex relatione. (From a narrative or information.) A case decided in a Court of justice is said to be reported ex relatione (or ex rel. amici) when the reporter derives his knowledge of it not from having been present in Court, but from notes or information communicated to him by some member of the Bar who heard the case argued and decided.

Both criminal informations (q.v.) and quo warranto (q.v.) informations (both of which are partly at the suit of the Sovereign and partly at the suit of the subject) are filed on the information or at the relation (ex relatione) of such subject, who is called the relator (q.v.), and may have no interest in the matter except as a common informer (q.v).

Extend; Extent. To extend is to make a valuation of property by the oath of a jury, pursuant to a writ issued for that purpose. An extent is (1) the valuation thus made, which is embodied in an inquisition by the sheriff or other person executing the writ—the most usual instance occurs under a writ of elegit (q.v.); (2) a writ of execution, sometimes also called a writ of extendi facias ("that you cause to be extended"), directing an extent to be made.

Extents to recover debts due to the Crown are of two kinds—in chief and in aid.

An extent in chief is an adverse proceeding by the Crown for the recovery of a debt of record due to it. It issues in the first place against the Crown's immediate debtor, and directs the sheriff to extend and seize his body (which is not now commonly taken) and his real and personal property, including debts due to him by other persons, to enforce payment of which an "extent in chief in the second degree" may be issued against them, and so on.

An extent in aid is one sued out at the instance and for the benefit of a debtor to the Crown, for the recovery of a debt due to himself, the Crown being merely the nominal plaintiff. To obtain an extent in aid, an extent pro formâ is first sued out against the debtor to the Crown, and on the sheriff returning that another person is indebted to him, the extent in aid issues against the subdebtor. For some years before the enactment of the Extents in Aid Act, 1817, persons who already were or who deliberately made themselves debtors to the Crown had turned the extent in aid into a means of recovering their own private debts; but the Act of 1817 provides that no more than what is due to the Crown can be recovered on an extent in aid; and that process is now practically obsolete.

An immediate extent is one which issues in urgent cases without the usual preliminary of a scire facias (q.v.), on proof that the debt is in danger of being lost (Crown Suits Act, 1865, s. 47). If there is any question as to the existence of the debt, or as to whether the property seized under the writ belongs to the debtor, it is raised by pleading either to the scire facias, or to the return of the writ of extent. See PLEA; DEBT AND DANGER, AFFIDAVIT OF.

Writs of extent are seldom issued.

Extents, or writs in the nature of extents, were formerly issued as writs of execution for private persons, either (1) to obtain satisfaction of a debt due on a recognizance (e.g., a statute merchant); or (2) to levy execution against lands descended to an heir under a judgment recovered against him on an obligation or bond entered into by his ancestor.

See DIEM CLAUSIT EXTREMUM; LIBERATE; VENDITIONI EXPONAS; AMOVEAS MANUS; QUIETUS.

Extendi facias. See EXTEND.

Extenta manerii. A statute of uncertain date which deals with the method to be adopted in "extending or surveying a manor." It is printed in the Statutes of the Realm, at p. 242 of Vol. I.: in the Statutes at Large it is printed as 4 Edw. 1, st. 1.

Exterritoriality. See EXTRATERRITORIALITY.

Extinguishment. A right or obligation is said to be extinguished when it ceases to exist. Thus, a debt is extinguished when it is paid, and an easement may be extinguished in several ways, as by release, abandonment, etc.; but the term "extinguishment" is applied especially to the case of an easement ceasing to exist from unity of possession—that is, where the dominant and the servient tenements become united in the same person for an estate in fee simple. Compare SUSPENSION; MERGER.

Extirpatione, De. A writ which formerly lay against one who maliciously destroyed houses, trees, etc., on land in respect of which a verdict had been found against him.

Extocare. Anciently this meant to clear land of trees, etc., and convert it into arable, pasture, or meadow.

Extortio est crimen quando quis colore officii extorquet quod non est debitum, vel supra debitum, vel ante tempus quod est debitum (10 Co. 102). When, by colour of office, any person extorts that which is not due, or above due, or before the time when it is due, then he commits the offence known as extortion (q.v.).

Extortion is the misdemeanour committed by a public officer, who, under colour of his office, wrongfully takes from any person any money or valuable thing. It is punishable at common law by fine and imprisonment, and removal from office. As to extortion by sheriffs, bailiffs, etc., see the Sheriffs Act, 1887, s. 29 (2).

As to extortion of money, etc., by threats, see the Larceny Act, 1916, ss. 29-31.

See OPPRESSION; DURESS.

Extra Costs. See AFFIDAVIT.

Extracta curiæ. Anciently this meant the profit arising from the customary fees paid to the Court.

Extradition. Where a person, who has committed a crime in one country, takes refuge in another, and is delivered up by the latter to the former for the purpose of being tried and punished, this delivery up or surrender is called extradition.

Until well into the last century there was no means of effecting extradition either to or from this country. To remedy this, various Acts have been passed, beginning with the statute 6 & 7 Vict. cc. 75, 76, confirming or authorising treaties of extradition between Great Britain and foreign countries. Such treaties contain reciprocal obligations on the part of each country to deliver up fugitive criminals. These Acts were repealed by the Extradition Act, 1870, and that Act, as amended by the Extradition Acts, 1873, 1895 and 1906, contains the existing law on the subject. They provide for the application of the Acts to foreign States with which arrangements have been made for the surrender of fugitive criminals, and define the offences for which they may be surrendered. They also provide that no criminal shall be surrendered for a political offence, or for the purpose of being tried for any other than the "extradition offence," that is, the offence for which he is surrendered.

To obtain the extradition of a fugitive criminal in England, a requisition is made to a Secretary of State by a diplomatic representative of the State requiring the surrender. The Secretary of State signifies this requisition to a magistrate (normally the police magistrate sitting at Bow Street), who, after hearing primâ facie evidence in support of the application, issues a warrant for the apprehension of the accused. If, on the hearing of the case, sufficient evidence is produced (such evidence, namely, as would justify the committal for trial of an offender against the English law), the magistrate commits the accused to prison. A period of fifteen days is allowed to elapse, to enable the prisoner to apply for a writ of habeas corpus, if he is so advised. If no such application is made, or, if made, is unsuccessful, the Secretary of State makes out a warrant on which the criminal is surrendered to the foreign State. See POLITICAL OFFENCE.

Extrajudicial means (1) something which is done without judicial proceedings—as, when we speak of extrajudicial evidence (see EVIDENCE), or say that a distress is an extrajudicial remedy (see REMEDY); (2) something which is said by a judge or judicial officer in a judicial proceeding, but beyond its scope. Thus, a dictum (q.v.) is an extrajudicial opinion.

Extra legem positus est civiliter mortuus (Co. Litt. 130*a*). (One put outside the law [that is to say, an outlaw] is civilly dead.)

Extraordinary. The writs of mandamus, quo warranto, habeas corpus, and some others, are sometimes called extraordinary remedies, in contradistinction to the ordinary remedy by action.

As to extraordinary resolutions, see RESOLUTION. As to the "extraordinary jurisdiction" of the Court of Chancery, see CHANCERY.

Extraterritoriality. The fiction of extraterritoriality is that by which the persons and residences of ambassadors and Sovereigns, when abroad, are treated as being within their own territory, and outside of (extra) the territory where they actually are. The fiction is not now of much importance except with reference to the exemption of ambassadors (q.v.) from process, etc.

Extra territorium jus dicenti impune non paretur (10 Co. 77). (The sentence of one adjudicating outside his jurisdiction can be disobeyed with impunity.)

vagantes. See CANON LAW.

vires. The more usual form is res (q.v.).

nsic. See EVIDENCE.

irpi causâ non oritur actio. (No dismatter can ground an action.) Thus a woman who is seduced has no action against the seducer, because, so far as she is concerned, the seduction is disgraceful; but anyone who suffers the loss of her services has a cause of action, inasmuch as he is not affected by the nature of the transaction out of which the action arises. See EX DOLO MALO, ETC.

Exuere patriam is to cast off one's nationality, to expatriate oneself. See EXPATRIATION.

Ex vi termini. (From the force of the term.) A term, or expression, is said to be interpreted ex vi termini when it is interpreted, not by extrinsic evidence, but by its own intrinsic meaning. Thus it has been held that it is a manifest contradiction in terms to say that a man was assaulted by his permission, inasmuch as an assault must be against the will of the party assaulted.

Eyre, or Eire (from the Latin iter, a journey), signified the Court of the justices itinerant or justices in eyre, who were regularly established, if not first appointed, by the Parliament of Northampton, 1176, in the twenty-second year of Henry the Second, with a delegated power from the king's great Court or Aula Regia, being looked upon as members thereof; and they made their circuit round the kingdom once in seven years, for the purpose of trying causes. They were afterwards directed by Magna Charta to be sent into every county once a year; but, says Coke, "as the power of the justices of assize, by many Acts of Parliament and other commissions increased, so these justices itinerant by little and little vanished away." See ASSIZE.

There were also eyres of the forest. See FOREST.

See ARTICLES OF THE EYRE.

F

"F." See BRAWLING.

F.A.A. In policies of marine insurance, these letters denote "free from all average," which means that the underwriters are not liable unless there is a total, as distinguished from a partial, loss of the subject-matter of the insurance. See AVERAGE.

Fabric Lands. These are lands given ad fabricam ecclesiæ reparandam (to repair or maintain the fabric or structure of a church). Such lands were known in Anglo-Saxon times as timber lands. Notwithstanding the law of mortmain (q.v.), any person may, under the Gifts for Churches Act, 1803, by deed executed three months before his death and duly enrolled in the Central Office, or by will executed three months before his death, vest in any person or body politic or corporate lands not exceeding five acres (whatever be the value) or goods and chattels not exceeding £500, towards erecting, rebuilding, repairing, purchasing, or providing any church or chapel of the Church of England or a residence for the officiating minister; and the grantees of such gift may, notwithstanding the law of mortmain, buy and hold land out of the proceeds of such gift. Under the Gifts for Churches Act, 1811, s. 1, the King is empowered to make, for the like purposes, grants (not exceeding five acres in any one grant) of crown lands in the Duchy of Lancaster; while by s. 2 the owner of any manor is empowered to give by deed (which may be executed at any time before his death and must be duly enrolled in the Central Office) five acres of the waste of the manor for the like purposes; but (Commons Act, 1899, s. 22, Sch. I.) such gift by the owner of a manor is invalid unless made with the consent of the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries.

Fabrics, Inflammable. Under the Fabrics (Misdescription) Act, 1913, it is an offence, punishable on summary conviction, to sell, expose, or have for sale any textile fabric which is directly or indirectly described, whether orally or in writing, as being in any degree uninflammable, unless such fabric conforms to the standard of non-inflammability prescribed by regulations made under the Act by the Home Secretary. Those regulations (1914, No. 48) prescribe that the required standard of non-inflammability is as follows:—that the fabric, when a sample is thoroughly washed, dried and hung up vertically, and, when a lighted taper is kept in contact with its lower edge for from twelve to fifteen seconds, shall not go alight or, if it does go alight, shall burn without a flame or with a flame which converges and dies out.

The Act was passed as the result of many serious accidents having been caused by flannelette which, although highly inflammable, had been sold as non-inflammable.

Facias.. (That you cause.) This is found in fieri facias (that you cause to be made) (q.v.) and scire facias (that you cause to know) (q.v.).

Facio ut des; Facio ut facias. (I do in order that you may give; I do in order that you may do.) These are two out of the four divisions of considerations given by Blackstone. The others are do ut des and do ut facias.

Fac Simile. (Make it alike.) A copy which exactly reproduces not merely the words but the form of the characters of the words, etc., of the original. A photographic or other similar copy is the only kind which can properly be called a fac simile.

In the law a complete copy was, however, known as a fac simile; and down to 1851 it was necessary to set out in every indictment, inquisition, or criminal information, a complete copy of the instrument by means or in respect of which the offence had been committed. The Criminal Procedure Act, 1851, ss. 5, 7, and the Forgery Act, 1861, ss. 42, 43, made it sufficient to describe the instrument by any usual name or to give its purport; and now, since the repeal of these enactments by the Indictments Act, 1915 (see INDICTMENTS), it is sufficient to set out the offence "in ordinary language."

The complete copy known in law as a fac simile is not, however, a mere fair copy; for it sets out the alterations and obliterations, if any, which were made in the original.

In the case of a will, it is usual to engross the probate copy merely as a fair copy: but in cases where the construction of a will may be affected by the appearance of the paper, the probate copy is a fac simile copy; and a fac simile probate is conclusive proof that the will had, before execution, been altered as shown in the fac simile.

Fact. The existence of every right and liability depends on two questions: first, whether there is a rule of English law that in certain circumstances that right or liability shall arise; and secondly, whether those circumstances exist in the particular case under discussion. The former is called a question of law, the latter a question of fact. Thus the right of C.B., the eldest son of A.B., to succeed to the land of his deceased father, depends first on the rule of law that, unless it is subject to a peculiar rule of descent (e.g., gavelkind, borough English, or the like), the land of an intestate person descends to his eldest son; and secondly, on various questions of fact, such as whether the land is situated in a district subject to a peculiar rule of descent, whether A.B. died intestate as to that land, and whether C.B. is his eldest legitimate son, which again involves other questions of fact or law, or both.

Questions of foreign law (including Scotch, Irish, and colonial law) are questions of fact in the English Courts, requiring to be proved by the evidence of persons professionally familiar with the system of law in which the question arises, or by the opinion of a Court administering that law, given on a case submitted to it under the British Law Ascertainment Act, 1859, or the Foreign Law Ascertainment Act, 1861. See CASE.

The distinction between questions of fact and law is of importance with regard to pleading, because a party is bound to state, and to state only, the material facts upon which he relies, but not the evidence in support of them (R.S.C., Ord. 19, r. 4), while questions of law need not and must not be pleaded. Questions of law may be raised by proceedings under Ord. 25, in lieu of demurrer, special case, or on motion for judgment (see those titles). When a question of law is raised at the trial of an action by a jury, it is decided by the judge, and the questions of fact are decided by the jury, the rule being that "ad quæstionem facti non respondent judices; ad quæstionem juris non respondent juratores." (See that maxim.) It not unfrequently happens that the pleadings raise a mixed question of law and fact (e.g., whether the defendant has libelled the plaintiff), and then either the judge directs the jury as to the law, leaving them to give their verdict for one party or the other on the facts as proved, subject to the direction so given, or the jury may bring in a special verdict finding the facts of the case, on which judgment is given by the Court for one party or the other, according to the law applicable to the facts so found. See FURTHER CONSIDERATION; RESPONDEAT OUSTER; VERDICT.

When, after the issue of a writ, the parties are agreed as to the question of fact to be decided between them, they may with the consent of the Court or a judge have those questions tried without formal pleadings (Ord. 34, rr. 9-12).

In the law of evidence, facts are sometimes divided into (i) facts in issue (also called principal facts, facta probanda), or those facts which are required to be proved, and (ii) evidentiary facts (facta probantia), or those facts which are given in evidence with the view of proving the former. Where the fact given in evidence is the same as the fact in issue, the evidence is said to be direct; as where a witness on a trial for murder proves that he saw the prisoner kill the deceased. See EVIDENCE.

In jurisprudence, facts are variously divided into juridical and non-juridical, according as they do or do not give rise to or affect legal rights and duties, and, by the Benthamite school, into investitive facts (those by means of which a right comes into existence), divestitive facts (those by which it terminates), and translative (those by means of which it passes from one person to another).

Factor. A factor is an agent to whom goods are consigned or delivered for sale by or for a merchant or other person, and who in return for his trouble receives a compensation called factorage or commission. He has a lien for this remuneration on all the goods entrusted to him by his principal. (See LIEN.) "Factor" is also sometimes used (especially in the old books) to denote an agent for the purchase of goods; but at the present day this kind of agent seems to be more commonly called a commission agent or commission merchant. (See AGENT.) The general rule (independently of the Factors Act, 1889 (q.v.) and the doctrine of market overt (q.v.)) seems to be that a factor is a general agent; and therefore if goods are entrusted to him as factor, and he sells them, such a sale will bind the principal, whatever his private instructions may have been, unless the purchaser knew of them at the time. See AGENT.

Factorage. Formerly this meant the commission received by a factor.

Factories. The Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, consolidated and amends the provisions of the pre-existing enactments for protecting the health and lives of persons employed in such establishments, for regulating the employment of children over twelve and of young persons and women, and for the inspection of factories and workshops; and it (s. 62) altogether prohibits the employment of children under twelve in factories or workshops.

It forms a complete code which, however, has itself been to some extent amended and extended by the Employment of Women Act, 1907, the Factory and Workshop Act, 1907, the White Phosphorus Matches Prohibition Act, 1908, the Factory and Workshop (Cotton Cloth Factories) Act, 1911, the Police Factories, etc. (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1916, and the Education Acts, 1918 and 1921. It is illegal to employ in any factory or workshop any child (Education Act, 1918, s. 14) under the age up to which (Education Act, 1921, s. 170 (13)) his parents are under an obligation to cause him to receive elementary instruction or to attend school That age is normally fourteen (Education Act, 1921, s. 42); but it may be extended under a byelaw to fifteen (ib. s. 46). See HALF-TIMER.

Factors Act, 1889. This enables a person in the possession of goods, or documents of title to goods, to validly sell or pledge the same, notwithstanding they may have been entrusted to him for a different purpose, or may have been already sold by him to someone else, or may be subject to a lien in favour of the person from whom he has bought them, or that his agency may have been revoked—the object being to protect persons having bonâ fide dealings with a factor or agent, without notice of the limitation on his power to deal with the goods.

The Act repeals, consolidates and amends, and replaces all the earlier enactments on the subject.

Factum. An act or deed. (See NON EST FACTUM.) It must be recollected that anciently land was transferred by an act, such as the giving of seisin, of which a deed or written instrument was merely evidence.

Factum à judice quod ad ejus officium non spectat, non ratum est (D. 50, 17, 170). (Anything done by a judge, otherwise than in due execution of his functions, derives no validity from the fact of his being a judge.) (Compare JUDICIUM A NON, ETC.

Factum probandum; Factum probans. See FACT.

Facultas probationum non est angustanda (4 Inst. 279). (The opportunity of proof is not to be limited.) Coke inserts this maxim amongst a miscellaneous collection of maxims as to the examination of witnesses: he does not give its source.

Faculty. This, in ecclesiastical law, is a licence to do some act which without such licence would be unlawful; and it is granted by the ordinary of the diocese or his deputy. A licence (under the Church Building Act, 1845, s. 1, and the New Parishes Acts and Church Building Acts Amendment Act, 1869, s. 8), for the demolition of an existing church, which is to be replaced by a new church, is a case in point. Strictly speaking, a monument cannot be erected in a church or churchyard without a faculty, though it is not in practice often applied for, but faculties for such things as a second altar, a chancel screen, etc., must be applied for. A notary public is appointed by faculty.

The Archbishop of Canterbury has a Court (really an office) called the Court of Faculties, out of which faculties, including licences to marry, etc., are granted, and also an officer called the Master of the Faculties, who deals with applications for the admission and removal of notaries public. The judge of the Provincial Courts (q.v.) of Canterbury and York is now ex officio Master of the Faculties (Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874, s. 7).

A faculty for the ordination as deacon, anywhere in England, of anyone under the age of twenty-three can be obtained only from the Archbishop of Canterbury.

Faggot Vote. A faggot voter was one who voted in respect of property just sufficient to give him a vote, and of which he had become the real, or more often the nominal, owner merely in order that he might acquire the vote. Thus he might acquire a forty-shilling freehold—which for centuries gave him the county franchise—and mortgage it for the full value, which still left him the vote. The faggot voter came into existence about the year 1700; he flourished until 1832, when the Reform Bill seriously interfered with his activities; the Representation of the People Act, 1884, repressed him still further, and the Representation of the People Act, 1918, finally disposed of him. The matter is now of historical interest only. Compare POTWALLER.

Failure of Issue. There is said to be a failure of issue in the case of one dying without issue (q.v.).

Failure of Record. Before the Judicature Acts, when an action was brought against one who pleaded, in bar (q.v.) of the action, matters of record, and when the plaintiff in reply pleaded nul tiel record (there is no such record), then if the defendant failed to prove the record, the defendant was said to fail of his own record and the plaintiff was entitled to judgment.

Faint Action. See ACTIONS.

Faint Pleader. Anciently this meant a false and fraudulent manner of pleading to the detriment of some person other than a party to the action.

Fair. See MARKETS AND FAIRS; STATUTE FAIR.

Fair Comment. It is a defence to an action for libel if the defendant can show that words in themselves defamatory were a fair comment on a matter of public interest. But the defence will fail if the plaintiff can show that the words were published maliciously. The question as to whether the matter was of public interest is for the judge; the questions as to fair comment and malice are for the jury.

Fair Pleader. See BEAU PLEADER.

Fairway. This means the part of a navigable river or of an estuary, etc., which is used as a passage by vessels.

Fait. The French form of factum (q.v.).

Fait enrolle. A deed enrolled, and particularly a deed of bargain and sale (q.v.) which required enrolment.

Faitours. Used in the statute 7 Rich. 2, c. 5, as meaning evil doers or vagabonds.

Falcatura; Falca; Falcator. Falcatura was one of the services from an inferior tenant to his lord. It consisted in mowing for one day in the lord's meadow. Falca was the hay that was mowed in the day and falcator was the mower.

Falda; Fald. Anciently these words each meant a sheepfold.

Faldæ cursus. Anciently this meant a sheep-walk. See FOLD COURSE.

Faldage is the same as foldage and free-fold (q.v.).

Faldfee; Faldfey. A fee or rent paid anciently by some tenants to their lord for the privilege of folding their sheep on their own land instead of performing foldage (q.v.).

Faldworth. A person of sufficient age to be subject to the law of frankpledge (q.v.).

Falkland. The same as folkland (q.v.).

Falkmote. The same as folkmote (q.v.).

Fall. This, as a lineal measure, meant the fortieth part of a furlong, and as a square measure, it meant the one hundred and sixtieth part of an acre. As the furlong and the acre varied locally, so also did the fall.

Falmotum. The same as folkmote (q.v.).

Falsa demonstratio non nocet (6 T. R. 676). (An erroneous description [of a person or thing] does not [necessarily] destroy [the effect of an instrument].) Thus, where A devised "all his freehold houses in Aldersgate Street, London," and had in fact only leasehold houses there, it was held that the leaseholds passed. Compare NIHIL FACIT ERROR, ETC.

Falsa demonstratione legatum non perimitur (I. 2, 20, 30). (A legacy will not [necessarily] fail because of an erroneous description [of a person or thing].) Compare NIHIL FACIT ERROR, ETC., and FALSA DEMONSTRATIO, ETC.

Falsa orthographia non vitiat concessionem; Falsa grammatica non vitiat concessionem (9 Co. 48). (Bad spelling or bad grammar does not vitiate a grant.) Compare MALA GRAMMATICA, ETC.

False Action. See ACTIONS.

False Character. Personating the master or mistress of a servant, or any representative of such master or mistress, and giving, whether in writing or verbally, a false character to the servant, or the seeking of employment by a servant with a false character, is punishable summarily with not more than £20 (half of which goes to the prosecutor) and imprisonment according to scale in default of payment (Servants' Characters Act, 1792).

[illegible]gery of the certificate of service or of any soldier or seaman, or the per- of the holder of any such certificate, able summarily under the Seamen's ers' False Characters Act, 1906, s. 1. ion lies on a false representation as to the character of another made with intent that he may obtain money, credit or goods unless such representation is in writing and is signed by the person making it (Statute of Frauds Amendment Act, 1828, s. 6).

False Claim. Under the ancient forest law a man having certain rights in the forest who claimed more than his due was said to make a false claim; and he was liable to be amerced. See AMERCIAMENT.

False Declaration. See CORRUPT PRACTICES.

False Form. In the old common law practice, errors and omissions in pleadings were termed false form. False form might still leave the pleadings intelligible, in which case aid by verdict (q.v.) might take place: but when the false form produced incertainty (q.v.) there could be no aid by verdict.

False Imprisonment is where a total restraint for some period, however short, is put upon the liberty of a person without sufficient legal authority. Thus, if a constable arrests a man for felony without warrant and without reasonable cause for suspecting him, he is liable to an action of damages for false imprisonment. See TORT.

False Judgment, Writ of. This was a writ used to bring appeals to the High Court from inferior Courts not of record proceeding according to the course of the common law. See ACCEDAS AD CURIAM; ERROR.

False Latin. Indictments were in Latin, of a sort, in England until the enactment of the statute 4 Geo. 2, c. 26, and in Wales until the enactment of the statute 6 Geo. 2, c. 14, s. 5. The Treason Act, 1695, s. 9, which deals with the use of improper Latin in an indictment for treason, has never been formally repealed; but it is virtually repealed by the above-mentioned Acts of Geo. II. When an indictment was in Latin it could be quashed for "false Latin" if the words in question did not make sense as Latin, unless they were terms of art in English law. See FRENCH.

False Lights and Signals. Exhibiting false lights or signals, with intent to bring any ship into danger, is felony, punishable with penal servitude for life as a maximum (Malicious Damage Act, 1861, s. 47). See also ABATEMENT OF FALSE LIGHTS.

False News. The Statute of Westminster the First (3 Edw. 1) c. 34, provided that anyone who told or published any false news or tales whereby discord might grow "between the King and his People or the Great Men of the Realm" should be taken and kept in prison until he had brought into Court him who was the first author of the tale. The statute

2 Rich. 2, stat. 1, c. 5, enacted that a like course should be taken with "Devisors of False News, and of horrible and false Lyes of Prelates, Dukes, Earls, Barons, and other Nobles and Great Men of the Realm and also of the Chancellor, Treasurer, Clerk of the Privy Seal, Steward of the King's House, Justices of the one Bench or the other [that is to say of the King's Bench or the Common Bench] . . . whereby Debates and Discords might arise between the said Lords or the Lords and the Commons . . . and great Peril and Mischief might come to all the Realm." The statute 12 Richard 2, c. 11, also dealt with the subject. The spirit in which these provisions were enacted was wholly foreign to that of a society which enjoys freedom of the Press and which has seen a campaign against the House of Lords carried to a triumphant conclusion. They were repealed by the S. L. Revision Act, 1887; and long before that date they had fallen into desuetude, the last proceedings under them having taken place in the reign of Queen Anne.

See SCANDALUM MAGNATUM; SEDITIOUS LIBEL.

A conspiracy to spread false news in order to affect the prices of stocks or shares or of merchandise is indictable at common law; but proof is not easy and prosecutions are infrequent, which is more than can be said of the offence.

False Pretence, in criminal law, is a false representation that some fact exists or has existed. Obtaining goods, money, etc., by false pretences with intent to defraud is a misdemeanour, the maximum punishment for which is five years' penal servitude (Larceny Act, 1916, s. 32). The offence is committed even if the accused intended to pay for the goods or to repay the money ultimately. Merely obtaining the use of a chattel for a time—as when a boat is hired—is not within the Act. A prisoner charged with larceny may be convicted of obtaining by false pretences if that offence be proved; and a prisoner charged with obtaining by false pretences may be convicted even though larceny is proved (Larceny Act, 1916, s. 44 (3) (4)). Although it is now practically immaterial whether a prisoner be indicted for false pretences or for larceny, yet the distinction between the two offences is of importance as regards the right of arrest. Any person may be arrested without warrant by anyone if he be actually "found committing" the offence of obtaining by false pretences (Larceny Act, 1916, s. 41 (1)) but not afterwards; whereas anyone reasonably suspected of having committed larceny may be arrested at common law without warrant by a constable or, if there has actually been a larceny committed, by anyone. The attempt either to obtain by false pretences or to commit larceny is a misdemeanour at common law (see ATTEMPT); but there is no power of arrest without warrant for the attempt to commit either the one offence or the other.

See DEBTOR ACT, 1869.

False Prophecies. The statute 5 Eliz. c. 15, enacted that any person publishing, whether orally or otherwise, any "fond fantastical or false prophecy" (compare FALSE NEWS), concerning the Queen or divers honourable personages and others of the realm, with intent thereby to cause "rebellion, insurrection, dissension, loss of life, or other disturbance," should be punishable with, for a first offence, a fine of £10 and one year's imprisonment or, for a subsequent offence, with imprisonment for life and forfeiture of all goods and chattels. This Act, which was a re-enactment of the statute 3 & 4 Edw. 6, c. 15, appears to have been directed chiefly against prophecies as to the date of the death of the sovereign; this had already been held to be treason, as being an "imagining" of the death of the King. Both statutes were repealed by the S. L. Revision Act, 1863.

False Representation. See MISREPRESENTATION.

False Return. An action of damages lies against a person who makes a false return to a writ, whether a sheriff acting under an ordinary writ of execution, or a person to whom a special writ, such as a mandamus, is directed. A false return may consist in a suppressio veri, as well as an allegatio falsi. A sheriff is liable to indictment if he makes a false return. See FALSO RETORNO BREVIUM, DE.

False Swearing was the common law misdemeanour committed by a person who swore falsely before any person authorised to administer an oath upon a matter of public concern, in such circumstances that the false swearing would have amounted to perjury if committed in a judicial proceeding; as where a person made a false affidavit under the Bills of Sale Act, 1854. Now false swearing in a judicial proceeding is punishable under s. 1 of the Perjury Act, 1911, and is called perjury (q.v.), while false swearing otherwise than in a judicial proceeding, where the law requires or authorises the administration of an oath, is punishable under ss. 2, 3 of the same Act, but is not called perjury.

That is now the only matter distinguishing the two offences, both being misdemeanours and the punishment being the same in each case.

Swearing includes affirmation (q.v.) or declaration (q.v.) (Perjury Act, 1911, s. 15).

False Trade Description. "For the purposes of this Act . . . the expression 'false trade description'" means a trade description which is false in a material respect as regards the goods to which it is applied, and includes every alteration of a trade description, whether by way of addition, effacement, or otherwise, where that alteration makes the description false in a material respect, and the fact that a trade description is a trade mark, or part of a trade mark, shall not prevent such trade description being a false trade description within the meaning of this Act (Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, s. 3 (1)). See TRADE DESCRIPTION; MERCHANDISE MARKS.

False Verdict. See ATTAINT.

Falsify. Where an account is being investigated in the Chancery Division, and the party at whose instance it is taken shows that an item of payment or discharge contained in it is false or erroneous, he is said to falsify it.

If an account has been stated or settled between the parties and one of them afterwards impugns it, the Court may either reopen the whole account, or merely give liberty to "surcharge and falsify." In the former case the accounting party has the onus of showing that the account is full and correct, while in the latter case the onus lies on the party impugning the account, and if he objects to any omissions or errors in the account, he must allege them specifically and substantiate them by evidence. The grounds on which the Court allows a settled account to be re-opened are:—fraud in the settlement of the account, want of good faith on the part of a person in a fiduciary relation (e.g., a trustee or solicitor), or the like. Where, however, it is merely a question of mistake and not of fraud, then only liberty to surcharge and falsify will be given. See SURCHARGE; ACCOUNT; SETTLED.

In the old books, falsify is used in the sense of defeating or avoiding, but this sense is obsolete. Thus, where a man was attainted of treason and afterwards was pardoned by Parliament, the attainder might, in certain circumstances, be falsified by him or his heir; and where a tenant for life suffered a recovery, the recovery might always be falsified by his issue in tail.

False retorno brevium, De. This was formerly the writ in an action against a sheriff for making a false return (q.v.).

Falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus. (False in one, false in all.) This maxim is not to be implicitly relied on. A person whose evidence as a co-respondent in a divorce case is utterly false may yet be perfectly reliable in matters of business.

Family Arrangement. This is an arrangement entered into between members of the one family for the benefit of the family as a whole, as, for instance, one made to preserve the family property or the honour of the family, or in order to avoid disputes and litigation. The Courts view any such arrangement with favour and will uphold it unless there are strong reasons for doing otherwise; and they will not enquire whether the consideration received by any party to it was adequate or inadequate unless the facts point to the conclusion that the party either did not know what he was about or was the victim of an imposition. But any material fact which is known to any one of the parties must be communicated to the others before the agreement is arrived at; and non-communication of any such fact, as well as any material misrepresentation by any party, is a ground for setting the agreement aside. Mutual mistake by the parties as to their rights is not in general a ground for setting aside the agreement, but where the mistake goes to the root of the matter, as where the agreement consists of a compromise of rights which are in fact non-existent, then the agreement will not be upheld. The agreement which leads to the arrangement is what the Courts look to; and a deed of family arrangement which does not give effect to the agreement upon which it purports to be based will be rectified or, if necessary, set aside unless there have been such laches and acquiescence (q.v.) as to render either course inequitable. A family arrangement is not a voluntary conveyance for the purposes either of bankruptcy or of the statute 13 Eliz. c. 5, if made bonâ fide, and will be upheld as against the creditors of any of the parties unless it was carried out with intent to defraud.

Family Bible. Entries in a family Bible which is used as a family register are deemed to be relevant evidence of any birth, death, or marriage therein recorded, when the fact of such birth, etc., is in issue, and when the entry relating to it was made by a deceased declarant legitimately related in blood to the person whose birth, etc., is in issue and before that question became in issue.

Famosus libellus. A scandalous libel. It would now be called simply a libel (q.v.).

Fanatio; Mensis fanationis. In the ancient forest law this was the "fawning month," (comprising the thirty days from 6th July in each year), during which deer could not be hunted. See FENCE MONTH.

Farcy. A form of glanders (q.v.).

Fardel; Fardella terræ. An obsolete measure of land which is stated by different ancient authorities to have been either a fourth or an eighth of a yardland (q.v.).

Farding Deal; Farundel. An obsolete measure of land, stated to contain a quarter of an acre, and therefore corresponding apparently to the modern rood (q.v.).

Farinagium. This, more particularly in Jersey, meant a toll of meal or flour or a mill. Compare MOLITURA.

Farleu. This anciently meant the money payment for which a heriot (q.v.) had been commuted. In some Devonshire manors it meant the best chattel which, under the custom of the manor, was taken instead of a heriot.

Farm. A house and a considerable tract of land let for agricultural purposes. Anciently it meant the chief messuage in a village.

Farm Let. This forms part of the words (used in old leases), "doth hereby demise, sett and to farm let."

Faro; Pharaoh. An obsolete card game of pure chance. See GAMING.

Farthing. See COPPER COINS; SILVER COINS.

Farthing; Farthing-dell (of Land). A measure of land (apparently quite distinct from the farding deal or farundel (q.v.)) about the extent of which we know only that it must have been considerable, for in one Devonshire manor six farthings of land appear, from an ancient survey, to have been held at the rent of £126.

Farthing-land. This is quite distinct from a "farthing of land" (q.v.). At Rotherfield, in Sussex, it means copyhold which descends to the youngest son, and, in default of sons, to the youngest daughter.

Farthing of Gold. See GOLD COINS.

Farydon, or Farnqudon, Inn. Down to about 1484, this was the name of the inn, afterwards known as Serjeants' (q.v.) Inn, which stood on the eastern side of Chancery Lane, next to Clifford's Inn. (See INNS OF CHANCERY.) The name was derived from that of one Faryndon who, with one Sharle, was the lessee of the inn on behalf of the judges and serjeants-at-law.

Fasaculus de superioritate maris. The Roll [of Records] relating to the lordship of the sea. It is a collection of fourteenth-century records relating to Admiralty matters. See Vol. VI. of the Selden Society series at pp. XXX-XXXVI.

Fast Days. The still unrepealed statute 5 & 6 Edw. 6, c. 3, ss. 2, 5, directs that the days before Christmas Day, Easter, Ascension Thursday, Whit Sunday, the Purification, Lady Day, and all the feasts of the Apostles, "other than of St. John the Evangelist and Phillip and Jacob," shall be kept as fast days (unless the day before the feast be a Sunday, in which case the preceding Saturday is to be the fast day), and provides that persons failing so to do may be punished with the "censures of the Church." This enactment has long been obsolete. The Book of Common Prayer makes also the eve of All Saints' Day (1st November) a fast day.

Days of general fast, humiliation or thanksgiving (q.v.) may be declared by royal proclamation. The last of such days was in 1857. The Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 92, declares any such day to be a non-business day, like Sunday, Good Friday, Christmas Day or any Bank Holiday; the R.S.C., Ord. 63, r. 6, and the County Court Rules, Ord. 51, r. 18, also treat any such day as a dies non.

Fasting, or abstinence, is prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer (1) during the whole of Lent (q.v.); (2) on the Ember Days (q.v.); (3) on the Rogation Days (q.v.); and on all Fridays other than a Friday which happens to be Christmas Day; but not even ecclesiastical censures can be directed against the somewhat large number of persons who fail to fast or abstain on these days.

Fastens-een, -eve, -even, -Tuesday. Shrove Tuesday (q.v.).

Fastermans; Fasting-men. Before the Conquest these were men eligible to be sureties that other men would keep the peace. See FRANKPLEDGE.

Fatetur facinus qui judicium fugit. (He who flies from trial confesses his guilt.) See FUGAM FECIT.

Fautors. Anciently this meant favourers or supporters of others, and especially of criminals. Hence it came to mean abettors (q.v.).

Favorabilia in lege sunt fiscus, dos, vita, libertas (Jenk. Cent. 28). Another form of CAUSAE DOTIS, VITÆ, ETC. (q.v.).

Favorabiliores rei potius quam actores habentur (D. 50, 17, 125). (The law is on the side of the defendant rather than on that of the plaintiff.) And so the Court would not give judgment against a defendant, even though he were in default, if it appeared from the record that the plaintiff had no cause of action. Compare MELIOR EST CONDITIO POSSIDENTIS.

Favorabiliores sunt executiones aliis processibus quibuscunque (Co. Litt. 289). (Executions are more preferred than all other processes whatever.) This is one of a number of similar maxims on the page referred to above, such as EXECUTIO EST FRUCTUS, ETC. (q.v.).

Favour, Challenge For. See CHALLENGE.

F.C.S. (Free of capture and seizure). These letters are used in policies of marine insurance to indicate that the underwriter is not to be liable for capture or seizure of either the ship or the cargo resulting from the action whether of the King's enemies, or of pirates, or of the owner's own Government or of a foreign Government.

Feal. This meant in Scotland a feudal tenant who owned fealty (q.v.). In England the word occurs only in the oath to be feal and leal (faithful and loyal) to the lord, which tenants holding by knight service had to take.

Fealty is a service which every free tenant (except tenant in frankalmoign) is in theory bound to perform to his feudal lord. It is therefore an incident to every seignory (q.v.), and is due on every change of the tenancy or the seignory, but it is in practice completely obsolete. The ceremony of fealty consisted in the tenant taking an oath of fidelity to the lord. A bishop still performs it. (See HOMAGE.)

Fealty is also one of the incidents of tenure due from every copyhold tenant to the lord of the manor in respect of his customary tenement. It consists in swearing to be faithful in performing the services of the tenancy, and may be required on every change of the lord or tenant; but in practice it is always respited. See ALLEGIANCE; SUBTRACTION; SERVICE.

The word is derived, through the Norman French, from the Latin fidelitas (fidelity).

Fear. See DURESS.

Feasance means "doing." See MALFEASANCE; MISFEASANCE; NON-FEASANCE; SERVICE.

Feasts. These are the days, the eves of which are, in theory, fast days according to our law, and also a number of other days, including Sundays, Christmas Day, and several week days, which are enumerated in the "Table of all the Feasts" given in the Prayer Book. That table is almost identical with the list of feasts given in the statute 5 & 6 Edw. 6, c. 3, s. 1, which commands all feasts "to be kept holy day." See CORPUS CHRISTI.

See the statute 27 Hen. 6, c. 5, forbidding fairs and markets on certain feasts.

Fee is applied to property to denote that it has the quality of descending to the heirs of the owner for the time being if he does not dispose of it during his life or by his will, supposing he has power to do so. Thus an office or annuity in fee is one which descends to the heir of the holder for the time being on his death intestate. (See ANNUITY; OFFICE.) The term is, however, chiefly of importance as applied to land, estates of inheritance in land being called estates in fee.

Fees are of two principal classes, fee simple and fee tail.

An estate in fee simple is the greatest estate or interest which the law of England allows any person to possess in landed property. The owner of an estate in fee simple is practically absolute owner of the land or other realty; he may put it to any use, lease it, mortgage it, sell it or give it away; if he dies without having disposed of it during his lifetime or by his will it descends to his heir according to the rules of descent (q.v.)

An estate in fee simple is properly created by the words "and his heirs" or merely the words "in fee simple" (Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, s. 51) following the name of the grantee: thus a conveyance of land to "A. and his heirs" or to "A in fee simple" gives A. an estate in fee simple. A conveyance to "A" without more, or to "A. for ever," or to "A. and his assigns," or the like, without the word "heirs," or to "A. in fee," gives A. only an estate for life. In a devise by will, however, neither the word "heirs," nor the words "in fee simple," are required, as a gift of land by will to A. without more vests in A. all the estate which the testator had, whether a fee simple or a less estate. In a conveyance to a corporation sole (q.v.) the word "successors" is substituted for "heirs." The word is not required in a conveyance to a corporation aggregate (q.v.), but it is not uncommonly so used.

An estate in fee simple may be either absolute, as where land is given to a man and his heirs or in fee simple, without more, or determinable, where some words are added which may put an end to it on the happening of a certain event. This may be (1) where a condition is added: thus, where an annuity is granted to a man and the heirs of his body, he has a fee simple conditional on his having issue instead of having an estate tail (q.v.) as he would have if the thing granted were freehold land: if he has issue, the condition is performed, so that he can alien or charge the annuity; but if he does not alien it, it descends to his eldest son, subject to the same condition: (2) by limitation, as where land is granted to A. to hold to him and his heirs so long as C. has heirs of his body; this is a fee simple qualified (formerly also called a base fee): (3) by construction of law, as where a person seised of an estate tail grants the land to A. and his heirs, in which case A. has an estate in fee simple so long as the tenant in tail has heirs of his body, but as soon as those heirs fail, A.'s estate comes to an end. This, though sometimes called a fee simple qualified or determinable, is more properly called a base fee. See ENLARGEMENT.

As to estates in fee tail, see ESTATE TAIL.

Formerly "fee" also signified the land itself. Thus, a "knight's fee" was the quantity of land which, as Coke puts it, "goeth to the livelyhood of a knight," and seems to have consisted of lands worth £20 a year.

The word is derived from the Norman French, fee, fé, fié; low Latin, feodum, from Gothic, faihu, property (modern German Vieh, cattle). Feodum originally meant land granted in consideration of services to be rendered, as opposed to allodium, or land held absolutely.

Feeble-minded Persons. The Mental Deficiency Act, 1913, s. 1 defines feeble-minded persons as "persons in whose case there exists from birth or from an early age mental defectiveness not amounting to imbecility, yet so pronounced that they require care, supervision, and control for their own protection or for the protection of others or, in the case of children, that they, by reason of such defectiveness, appear to be permanently incapable of receiving proper benefit from the instruction in ordinary schools." See IMBECILE; MENTAL DEFICIENCY.

Feed. See ESTOPPEL.

Fee, Expectant. See ESTATE.

Fee-farm Rent. A perpetual rent issuing out of lands held in fee simple, reserved when the lands were granted, and payable by the freeholder. Coke says that a perpetual rent, if it is to be called a fee farm rent, must be not less than one-fourth of the annual value of the land at the time that the rent was reserved, but the better opinion is that the amount of the rent is immaterial.

A tenant in fee farm, said Britton about 1290, owes no service not expressly reserved, except fealty, and this is still the case. Fee farm rents granted before the statute Quia Emptores (1290) are rents service; those granted since are rent charges or rent seck, because since that statute no one can grant land to be held of himself in fee simple. (See RENT; QUIA EMPTORES; SUBINFEUDATION; TENURE.) It is, however, a question whether the term fee farm rent is properly applicable to rents created since the statute.

Fee-simple. See FEE.

Fee-tail. See ESTATE TAIL.

Feigned Issues. Formerly questions of fact arising in the course of an action could be decided upon what was known as a feigned issue, that is to say, by stating that the parties interested in the matter had made a wager upon the truth or falsehood of the proposition or propositions, setting out the fact or facts in dispute, and then having the issue tried by a jury. This procedure was either directed by a judge of the superior Courts or else was expressly authorised by statute. It was abolished by the Gaming Act, 1845, s. 19, which enacted that, instead of the procedure by feigned issue, a writ of summons should be sued out upon which the issue should be tried when any superior Court desired to send it to a jury for decision. The procedure is now governed by R. S. C., Ord. 34, r. 9, which provides that where parties to a cause or matter are agreed as to what facts are in dispute, then the Court or a judge may direct that the issue be tried by a jury. No writ of summons is now required.

Feint, or "feint in law." See ACTIONS.

Felagus. In the early Anglo-Saxon period this meant one who was bound in the decennary (q.v.) as surety for the good behaviour of another: he is mentioned in Leg. Inae, c. 15.

Felix qui potuit rerum cognoscere causas (Co. Litt. 231). (Happy is he who can ascertain the causes of things.)

Fellow-servants. See COMMON EMPLOYMENT.

Felo de se is a person who murders himself, that is to say, commits suicide. See MURDER.

Felonia implicatur in quâlibet proditione (3 Inst. 15). (Every treason involves felony.)

Felony. At common law, every species of crime a conviction for which occasioned the forfeiture of the lands or goods of the offender, and to which a punishment might be added according to the degree of guilt, was called felony. Forfeiture for conviction, however, has been abolished (Forfeiture Act, 1870) (see FORFEITURE); and several offences have been made felonies by statute which were not felonies at common law.

Felony is punishable in various modes, as by death or penal servitude, many felonies having special punishments attached to them. Where no punishment is specially provided, felony is punishable by penal servitude for not less than three or more than seven years, or imprisonment for not more than two years, with or without hard labour (Criminal Law Act, 1827, s. 8; Penal Servitude Act, 1857, s. 2; Penal Servitude Act, 1891, s. 1). (See RECOGNIZANCE.) A felon is also in general incapacitated from holding certain offices (Forfeiture Act, 1870, s. 2).

"Felony," strictly speaking, includes treason (q.v.), although the terms are generally used as opposed to one another. Instances of felony in the more usual sense of the word are: piracy, murder, manslaughter, rape, larceny, robbery, burglary, arson, some kinds of assault, and certain acts resembling treason.

The word comes through the old French felun, felon, from the low Latin felo, which meant a vassal guilty of disobedience or breach of fidelity towards his lord; the ultimate derivation is unknown.

See ACCESSORY; ARREST; CHALLENGE; COMPOUND; JUDGMENT; JURY; MISPRISION; PEER; SEISINA HABENDA, DE; TREASON-FELONY.

Feme Covert is a married woman. As to the status and disabilities of a married woman, see MARRIAGE; COVERTURE; SEPARATE ESTATE; ENGAGEMENT.

Feme Sole is an unmarried woman, whether a spinster or a widow.

Feminæ non sunt capaces de publicis officiis (Women are not able to hold public offices.) But this is not now the case.

Feminine. See MASCULINE.

Fence. The obligation on the owner of land to keep it fenced may exist either at common law, or by virtue of a special obligation, or by statute. At common law a proprietor of land is only bound to keep up fences round his land if they are required to prevent his cattle from trespassing on the land of his neighbours. An owner of land may, however, be subject to a prescriptive obligation to keep the fence between his and his neighbour's land in repair. See QUASI-EASEMENT.

A railway company, when subject to the provisions of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (ss. 68 et seq.), is bound to construct and maintain fences between it's line and the adjoining lands.

See further as to fences under titles BOUNDARIES; PARTY WALL.

Under various Acts of Parliament the duty is cast on owners of mines and machinery to keep them fenced, so as to prevent injury to persons coming near them. The most important provisions as to mines and mining machinery are contained in the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act, 1872, s. 23, and in the Coal Mines Act, 1911, ss. 26, 37, 55. The Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, s. 10, contains provisions as to the fencing of machinery in factories, etc.

Stealing or maliciously injuring or destroying fences is an offence, punishable on summary conviction, under the Malicious Damage Act, 1861, s. 25, or the Larceny Act, 1861, s. 34. See also QUARRIES.

Fence Month; Fence Season; Fence Time. Formerly the term "fence month," or "defence month," also known as the mensis vetitus or mensis prohibitionis, was more particularly used as an equivalent for fanatio (q.v.). Now the fence month, fence time, or fence season mean the different annual close seasons during which various kinds of game and freshwater fish may not be killed or taken.

Fengeld. A levy made in Anglo-Saxon times for what would now be called the defence of the realm.

Feod; Feodum. The older forms of feud, feudum. All four words meant land held by a feudal tenant: they meant also the grant of the land and the interest of the feudal tenant. See FEE.

Feodal. Of or belonging to the feod (q.v.).

Feodal System. The feudal system (q.v.).

Feodality. Fealty (q.v.).

Feodary; Feudary. An officer of the Court of Wards and Liveries (q.v.) whose office ceased to exist when that court was abolished. He attended before the inquest of office (q.v.) to give evidence as to the tenure and value of lands, assigned dower to the "King's widows" or widows of tenants by knight service, and received the rents of lands which belonged to wards.

Feodary, or feudary, also meant a feudal tenant.

Feodi firma. Fee-farm (q.v.). Usually found in the combination in foedi firma.

Feodum antiquum. An ancient fee. A fee (q.v.) which had descended to the feudal tenant from an ancestor. Compare FEODUM NOVUM.

Feodum laicum. A lay fee (q.v.).

Feodum militis. A knight's fee. See FEE.

Feodum novum. A new fee; which meant a fee held by the feudal tenant to whom it had been first granted. Compare FEODUM ANTIQUUM.

Feoffee to Uses. Before the Statute of Uses (q.v.) was passed in 1535, this was a person to whom a feoffment (q.v.) had been made to the use of a cestui que trust. This left the legal estate in the feoffee, while the cestui que trust became the beneficial owner. The statute had the effect of making the feoffee a mere conduit pipe for conveying the legal seisin to the cestui que trust, so that a feoffment to A. to the use of B. gave the legal seisin to B. the moment the enfeoffment took place, just as a modern deed of grant to A. to the use of B. gives B. the legal estate. See USES.

Feoffment; Feoffor; Feoffee. A feoffment is a mode of conveying a freehold estate in possession in land from one person (the feoffor) to another (the feoffee). It was at one time almost the only mode of conveying freehold land in possession, but it is now practically obsolete, because the same object can, in most cases, be obtained by simpler means. Almost the only case in which a feoffment is now specially required is where an infant tenant of gavelkind land wishes to dispose of his estate: this he can do by feoffment at the age of fifteen; but even he must now put the feoffment in writing in order to comply with the Statute of Frauds (q.v.); he must moreover be in actual possession; and the feoffment must be for a valuable consideration not being an under-value.

Originally a feoffment was merely the overt or public delivery of the possession of land by the owner (the feoffor) to the grantee or purchaser (the feoffee) and consisted of the ceremony called livery of seisin (q.v.). But, for the sake of convenience, it became usual to put the terms of the conveyance in writing, as a record of the transaction: this writing was called the charter or deed of feoffment. The Statute of Frauds (q.v.) made a writing necessary in every case; and now, by the Real Property Act, 1845, s. 3, every feoffment (except one made under a custom by an infant) is void at law unless made by deed. The livery of seisin is of course still necessary, but if livery be omitted the charter of feoffment will take effect as a grant under the Real Property Act, 1845.

Formerly a feoffment was an assurance of great power, for it not only cleared (that is, destroyed) all disseisins, abatements, intrusions and other wrongful or defeasible estates, where the livery of seisin by the feoffor was lawful, but also operated by wrong, or tortiously, where the feoffor granted a greater estate than he was entitled to, so as to confer on the feoffee the whole estate purported to be granted. Thus, if a tenant for his own life made a feoffment of the land in fee simple, the feoffee became seised of an estate in fee simple by wrong, which was good against everyone except the reversioner: as regards him, the feoffment, being unauthorised, operated as a forfeiture of the tenant for life's estate, and entitled him to re-enter and take possession of the land. But by the Real Property Act, 1845, s. 4, the tortious operation of a feoffment was abolished, and now a feoffment in fee simple by a tenant for life merely passes the feoffor's life interest and does not work a forfeiture.

See CONVEYANCE; GRANT; OPERATIVE WORDS, USES.

The word feoffment is the Norman French feoffament, from feoffer, to grant a fee or feudal estate. See FEE.

Feræ naturæ. See ANIMALS FERÆ NATURÆ.

Ferdella. The same, apparently, as fardel (q.v.).

Ferdfare. This, as used in Fleta, appears to mean an exemption from military service.

Ferdingus. The same as Cotsethus (q.v.).

Ferdwit. This, as used in Fleta, means a fine for manslaughter committed while on military service. It also meant a fine for failure to perform military service.

Fere secundum promissorem interpretamur (D. 45, 1, 99). (We generally decide in favour of the promissor.) This was a maxim of the Roman law: it cannot be applied in our law.

Ferial Days. This properly means days which were in the nature of feriae, or feasts. But in the statute 27 Hen. 6, c. 5, the expression is used in the sense of working days, as distinguished from Sundays and the "high and principal feasts" (q.v.), such as the Feast of the Ascension; and such use of the expression was common at that time.

Ferling. A farthing; the fourth part of a ward in a borough: the fourth part of an acre of land. Obsolete in all senses.

Ferlingata. A quarter of a yardland. The yardland contained forty acres.

Ferlingus; Ferlingum. A furlong (q.v.).

Ferm; Fermholt. The same as farm (q.v.).

Fermary. Anciently this meant a hospital (q.v.).

Fermisona; Fermison. The season between 11th November and 2nd February. It is stated by Jacob to have been the winter season for killing deer: by Murray it is stated to be a close season for male deer: and both rely upon a permit of 1248 given for the killing of one hart during the fermison. Murray would appear to be right.

Fernigo. Anciently this meant waste land covered with ferns or bracken.

Ferramentum. Ironwork. The word was generally appropriated to the iron fittings of a mill, and was occasionally, as in the Liber Niger Herefordiæ, used to mean the ironwork of three ploughs.

Ferrets. Ferrets were not the subject of larceny at common law: but since the enactment of the Larceny Act, 1916 (see ANIMALS FERÆ NATURÆ), a ferret kept in a cage, etc., is clearly the subject of larceny, although a ferret lost whilst rabbiting would, while not under control, appear to be still incapable of being stolen.

Ferry. The right to keep a boat for ferrying passengers, to charge tolls for so doing, and to prevent other persons from setting up another ferry so near and in such a state of facts as to diminish the custom, is a franchise (q.v.) It can be created only by grant from the Crown, by prescription, or by statute.

It is not a disturbance of ferry if some person other than the ferry-owner ferries persons across in order to provide for the needs of passengers more numerous than those whom the ferryman can carry. What the ferry-owner gets is, in fact, a monopoly of such custom as existed when the ferry was created. What he does not get is, for instance, the monopoly of carrying passengers between the two parts of a populous city occupying what had been a thinly populated agricultural area when the ferry was created.

Under the Ferries (Acquisition by Local Authorities) Act, 1919, power is given to local authorities to acquire existing ferries by agreement.

Fertilisers and Feeding Stuffs. The Fertilisers and Feeding Stuffs Act, 1906, provides safeguards for the purity of all artificial manures and all artificial foods for cattle and poultry and authorises the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries to make regulations on the subject.

The Fertilisers (Temporary Control of Export) Act, 1920, empowered His Majesty to prohibit by Order in Council the export of certain fertilisers specified in the Schedule. The Act (see s. 2) was in force until only 31st December, 1922.

Fesance. The same as feasance (q.v.).

Festinatio justitiæ noverca (Hob. 97). (Haste is the stepmother of justice—which is only a ponderous way of saying that hasty decisions work injustice.)

Festing-men. See FASTING-MEN.

Festing Penny. Earnest-money, formerly paid in some places in the North of England to a servant upon his being engaged. The term corresponds to the Norse faeste penge, the meaning of which is identical. The word festing is derived from a Saxon word meaning to make fast or secure.

Festinum remedium (A speedy remedy.) The action of dower (q.v.), for instance, was so described; so also were the actions of assise of darrein presentment, mort d'ancestor, or novel disseisin (q.v.).

Festum stultorum. The Feast of Fools; New Year's Day. More usually known as Caput Anni.

Feu. See FEO.

Feuage = Fuage.

Feud, in the Middle Ages, was a grant of land by a feudal superior or lord, to be held by the grantee (the feudal inferior or tenant) in return for services to be rendered by him. The word is used to signify the interest of the tenant, and also the land itself. (See FEE.) The word, in these senses, is derived from feudum or feodum (q.v.).

The word, as a derivate of the Anglo-Saxon fœdhe, was also used to mean, first enmity and then a quarrel.

See BENEFICE.

Feudal System is the name given to certain institutions which prevailed in the principal States of Europe during the Middle Ages, and regulated both the tenure of land and the political and social system in each State. As to the land, the peculiarity of the feudal system was the division of the ownership. The absolute or nominal ownership (dominium directum) was in one person, the lord or feudal superior; while the occupation, use and benefit of the land (dominium utile) was in another person, the tenant or feudal inferior. In consideration of having the use of the land, the tenant rendered his lord certain services (q.v.), which in the feudal system proper were principally of a military nature, and the lord was further entitled to certain incidents or casual profits. (See INCIDENTS.) With regard to the social and political system, the relation of landlord and tenant was a mutually protective one: that is, each was bound to assist and protect the other in case of danger (see FEALTY); and it was exclusive, that is, no one had any right to interfere between them, though the lord himself might be tenant to a yet higher superior: thus, A. might be tenant to B. and B. tenant to C., but C. would have nothing to do with A. Hence, in the pure feudal system, the king or other head of the State was to a great extent merely a feudal lord, having no right to the allegiance of his tenants' tenants: but this was never so in England; for although since the Norman Conquest, when the feudal system was introduced, all lands in England, as Coke puts it, "are holden mediately or immediately of the king," yet he has always been the feudal superior not only of his tenants in chief but also of their tenants and tenants' tenants. It will be seen from the titles TENURES, INCIDENTS, ESTATE, SEIGNORY, SUBINFEUDATION, that but few traces of the feudal system now survive, except in the rules of descent, in the operative words required to pass an estate of inheritance by deed (see FEE; HEIR), and in the law of copyholds.

Feud-bote. Stated by Jacob to have meant a recompense for joining in a feud or quarrel.

F.G.A. These letters, in polices of marine insurance, denote "free from general average," which means that the underwriters are not liable to make good general average (q.v.) losses. They are also used to mean "foreign general average," that is to say, average adjustment (q.v.) made at a foreign port which is the port of destination of a ship.

Fiat, in procedure, formerly meant a memorandum written on a document by a judicial officer, giving leave to take some step. (Latin = "Let it be done.") It is now generally used as meaning a memorandum as to an order having been made with regard to the matters mentioned in R.S.C. Ord. 52, r. 14. In Chancery practice, when a petition is presented, a registrar (see ANSWER) writes a fiat on it, directing all parties to attend on a certain day when the petition will be heard.

In criminal procedure, before the abolition of error (q.v.) a writ of error could not be sued out unless the Attorney-General granted his fiat for that purpose. The word is also in general use as meaning the leave of the Attorney-General to do something or to take proceedings which, as many modern statutes provide, cannot be done or taken without such leave. Thus under the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, s. 25 (3), a petition for the revocation of a patent can be presented only by either the Attorney-General or some person authorised by him: and proceedings under the Punishment of Incest Act, 1908, cannot (see s. 6) be taken, except by the Public Prosecutor, without the sanction of the Attorney-General. See GREAT SEAL.

— Fiat justitia. (Let justice be done.) Formerly the royal warrant to bring a writ of error in Parliament (see ERROR) was issued only after a petition had been presented and the King had written "Fiat Justitia" thereon. The same words are used, nominally by the King, but really by the Home Secretary (Petitions of Right Act, 1860, s. 2), as the endorsement without which a petition of right (q.v.) cannot be heard; and they had before 1860 been so used in accordance with the common law procedure as to petitions of right, unless, instead of this general endorsement, there was, as sometimes happened formerly, a special endorsement directing that such and such a thing should be done.

— Fiat justitia, ruat cœlum (4 Burr. 2562). (Let justice be done, though the heavens fall.) That is to say, a Court must do its duty without regard to consequences.

— Fiat quod prius fieri consuevit (Jenk. Cent. 167). (Let that be done which hitherto has been accustomed to be done.) Compare NIHIL TEMERE, ETC.

— Fictio legis non operatur damnum vel injuriam (Palm. 354). (A legal fiction does not work loss or injustice.)

Fiction. A fiction is a rule of law which assumes as true, and will not allow to be disproved, something which is false but not impossible. Formerly the practice and jurisdiction of the Courts rested largely on fictions: thus, the Court of King's Bench acquired jurisdiction in actions for debt, etc., by surmising (that is, feigning) that the defendant had been arrested for a trespass which he had never committed, and then allowing the plaintiff to proceed against him for debt. The Court of Exchequer (see EXCHEQUER) also acquired a jurisdiction which it prima facie was not entitled to exercise, by permitting the plaintiff in certain actions to plead that he was a debtor to the King, and that by reason of the cause of action pleaded he had become less able to pay his wholly fictitious debt to the King. See COMMON PLEAS; COLOUR; EJECTMENT; FEIGNED ISSUES; RECOVERY.

Fictitious Payee. "Where the payee" [the person to receive the money] "is a fictitious or non-existing person the bill may be treated as payable to bearer" (Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 7 (3)).

Fidem mentiri. In the reign of Henry I., when a tenant broke his oath of fealty to his lord he was said fidem mentiri (to belie his faith).

Fiduciary. A person is said to stand in a fiduciary relation to another when he has rights and powers which he is bound to exercise for the benefit of that other person. Hence he is not allowed to derive any profit or advantage from the relation between them, except with the knowledge and consent of the other person. Such is the relation between trustee and cestui que trust, solicitor and client, principal and agent, and generally wherever from the position of two persons, one of them reposes confidence in the other. Promoters and directors also stand in a fiduciary relation to their companies.

Fief d'hauberk. Anciently this meant a knight's fee (see FEE). Literally it meant a fee of the hauberk or helmet.

Field-ale; Filkdale. A levy of drink for the consumption of an officer of the forest. It had been prohibited by the time of Bracton (q.v.).

Field Reeve is an officer elected by the owners of a regulated pasture (see PASTURE) to keep in order the fences, ditches, etc., on the land, to regulate the times during which animals are to be admitted to the pasture, and generally to maintain and manage the pasture subject to the instructions of the owners. See the Inclosure Act, 1845, s. 118.

Fi. fa.; Fieri facias; Fieri feci. A fieri facias or fi. fa. is a writ of execution to levy a judgment debt. (See R.S.C., Ord. 43.) It commands the sheriff or other officer to whom it is directed to levy (or cause [a levy] to be made) of the goods and chattels of the debtor (including his chattels real) the sum recovered by the judgment with interest. In executing the writ, the officer enters upon the premises in which the execution debtor's goods are (if he can do so peaceably, and without breaking open any outer door), and leaves one of his assistants in possession of them. After the seizure, the officer gets an auctioneer to make an inventory of the goods, and to remove and sell them, or to sell them on the premises, if the debtor, or the person on whose premises the goods are, consent to it. When the writ becomes returnable (see RETURN), the sheriff returns either fieri feci, i.e., that he has levied the sum named in the writ, or a part of it, which he is ready to pay to the execution creditor; or that he has taken goods which remain unsold for want of buyers (see YENDITIONI EXPONAS; DISTRINGAS NUPER VICECOMITEM); or nulla bona, i.e., that the execution debtor has no goods within his bailiwick. See WRIT; LEVARI FACIAS.

Fieri facias de bonis ecclesiasticis. When the sheriff, to a common fieri facias, returns nulla bona, and that the defendant is a beneficed clerk not having any lay fee, the plaintiff may sue out a fieri facias de bonis ecclesiasticis, directed to the bishop of the diocese (see Ord. 43, rr. 3, 4), or to the archbishop, during a vacancy of the bishop's see, commanding him to make of the ecclesiastical goods and chattels belonging to the defendant within his diocese the sum therein mentioned. This is done by issuing a sequestration (q.v.) to levy the debt out of the tithes and other profits of the defendant's benefice.

Fieri facias de bonis testatoris is the writ issued on an ordinary judgment against an executor when sued for a debt due by his testator; if the sheriff returns to this writ nulla bona, and a devastavit (q.v.), the plaintiff may sue out a fieri facias de bonis propriis, under which the goods of the executor himself are seized. See DEVASTAVIT; JUDGMENT.

Fifteenths. This was a tax of, theoretically, one fifteenth of the moveable property of every subject, granted from time to time to the king. It was virtually what would now be called a levy on capital, except that real estate escaped. Fifteenths originated in the twelfth century and are last heard of in the reign of James I. In the reign of Edward III. the amount which the inhabitants of each vill or township were to pay as a fifteenth was assessed; and this amount was not subsequently increased, so that gradually, as the national wealth increased, the tax became very much less than one fifteenth of the value of the moveables in the kingdom.

Fightwite. In Anglo-Saxon times this meant a fine for fighting to the disturbance of the peace. The fight in respect of which it was imposed must apparently have been serious, for the amount was no less than one hundred and twenty shillings, which represented a considerable sum at that period.

Filacer; Filazer; Filizer. Filacers were officers of the Courts of Common Pleas, King's Bench, and Exchequer. Jacob, writing in 1749, states that there were fourteen of these officers in the Court of Common Pleas; their offices had originated before the statute 10 Hen. 6, c. 4, in which they are mentioned. Filacers of the two other Courts were of later origin. All these filacers, whose duty it was to file original writs and to issue process thereon, were abolished by the Superior Courts (Officers) Act, 1837, which created the Masters of the King's Bench, etc. (q.v.). See PROTHONOTARY.

File. A file is literally a piece of string or wire passing through papers relating to the same matter, to keep them together. It seems to have been the practice in olden times to fasten together in this way writs and other papers in the offices of the Courts; now, however, documents which are filed are merely placed in pigeon-holes or tied in bundles. Affidavits and other documents requiring filing are handed to the proper officer with the necessary stamps.

A document will be ordered to be taken off the file if it is scandalous or an abuse of the forms and proceedings of the Court.

Filiatio non potest probari (Co. Litt. 126). Evidence cannot be adduced to prove that a man is the son [of his mother's husband], for the law will presume that he is, unless the facts negative the presumption. Compare PATER EST, etc.

Filicetum. Anciently this meant ground covered with ferns or bracken.

Fillage. A duty formerly payable on certain cargoes brought to the Port of London. See METAGE.

Filum aquæ; Filum viæ. See AD MEDIUM FILUM VIÆ.

Final. See INTERLOCUTORY; JUDGMENT.

Final Interlocutory Decree. See DEFINITIVE SENTENCE.

Finance Act. Since 1893 the annual Act imposing or continuing various duties has been entitled the Finance Act, 1894, or as the case may be. Before 1894 the corresponding title was the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1893, or as the case might be.

Financial Year. This expression is defined in the Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 22, which provides that unless the contrary intention is expressed it shall, as regards the Consolidated Fund, or moneys provided by Parliament, or the Exchequer, or imperial taxes or finance, mean the twelve months ending 31st March.

Finder. In the statutes 18 Edw. 3; 14 Rich. 2, c. 10.; and 1 Hen. 4, c. 13, this is used as meaning, apparently, an officer performing duties somewhat similar to those of a searcher (q.v.).

Finder of Lost Property, like every other possessor of property, is entitled to the possession of it against all persons, except the true owner. (See POSSESSION.) If a person, when he finds lost property, knows whom it belongs to, or knows that the owner can be found, and appropriates it for himself, he commits larceny. See DOGS.

Finding. A finding is a conclusion upon an inquiry of fact. Thus, when the jury in an action return a verdict, they find either generally, i.e., for one of the parties, or specially, i.e., as to certain facts. (See FACT; VERDICT.) Frequently, too, by consent of the parties, questions are drawn up and put to the jury in an action, and their answers are termed findings. Decisions upon questions of fact are also termed findings when they are come to by substitutes for juries, e.g., a judge sitting without a jury. See TRIAL.

Fine.—I. In criminal law, a fine is a sum of money ordered to be paid to the King by an offender, as a punishment for his offence. A fine is at common law one of the punishments for misdemeanours, and it has been made a punishment for several offences by modern statutes, which in many cases provide that when any person has been convicted of an indictable misdemeanour, the Court may, in addition to or in lieu of any other punishment authorised by the particular Act, inflict a fine upon the offender.

The superior Courts (see COURTS) have a general power of imposing pecuniary mulcts for disobedience to their orders, not only on their own officers and on parties to suits depending before them, but also on strangers. See AMERCEMENT.

II. In the law of tenure, a fine is a money payment made by a feudal tenant to his lord. The only existing fines of any importance occur in copyhold lands, where upon a change in the tenancy a fine is commonly due to the lord. The most usual fine is that payable on the admittance of a new tenant, but there are also due in some manors fines upon alienation, on a licence to demise the lands, or on the death of the lord, or other events. Fines are of two kinds, arbitrary and certain.

A fine certain may be fixed by the custom at a particular sum for every admittance, when it is called a "general fine"; or at so much for every acre, or the like; or it may be ascertained by reference to some other standard, as where the tenant is to pay a year's value for a fine. The amount of an arbitrary fine is not left to the discretion of the lord, except in those cases where the grant is purely voluntary, as where a copyhold has come into the ownership of the lord, or where a copyholder for lives, without right of renewal or power of nominating a successor, surrenders his estate for the purpose of putting in more lives. In other cases the fine, though arbitrary, must be reasonable; and the Court will decide what is reasonable under the particular circumstances. In ordinary cases it must not exceed two years' improved value of the land.

A "full" fine is the highest amount which the lord can exact on an ordinary admittance, as opposed to a "small" or nominal fine: thus in some manors where a person who is already a customary tenant is admitted to other copyholds he pays only a small fine certain, e.g., a penny. There are also many fines payable under particular customs and having special names: thus in some manors there is a custom for the lord of the manor for the time being to admit each tenant to his estate, which gives him the right to hold it during the joint lives of himself and the admitting lord; on the death of the lord the tenant pays what is called a "general fine" for admittance to the succeeding lord, which gives him a new estate during the joint lives of himself and the new lord, while on the death or alienation of the tenant his heir or devisee pays the lord a "dropping fine" for admittance.

One of the incidents of tenure in capite by knight service was that a fine was due to the king on every alienation or conveyance of the land by the tenant to another person. Fines of this kind were abolished by the statute 12 Car. 2, c. 24.

III. Before the Fines and Recoveries Act, 1833 (q.v.), there existed a fictitious judicial proceeding known as a fine, which was formerly in common use as a mode of conveying land. It was really a compromise of a fictitious suit commenced concerning the lands intended to be conveyed, and the operation (called levying a fine) was thus performed. A præcipe or writ (usually a writ of covenant) was sued out and the parties appeared in Court; a composition of the suit was then entered into, with the consent of the judges (see CONGÉ D'ACCORDER), whereby the lands in question were declared to be the right of (that is, to belong to) one of the parties. This agreement was reduced into writing, and was enrolled amongst the records of the Court, so that it had the effect of a judgment of the Court. On the completion of the fine a writ was issued to the sheriff of the county in which the land lay, in the same form as if a judgment had been obtained in a hostile suit, directing the sheriff to deliver seisin and possession to the person who acquired the lands. But if he was already in possession this writ was dispensed with. A fine consisted of five parts:—namely, the original writ, the licence to agree, or licencia concordandi, which was given by the leave of the Court, on payment of a fine to the king, called the king's silver or the post fine. The third part was the concord or agreement, by which it was agreed that the lands were the right of the person in whose favour the fine was levied. The fourth part was a note of the proceedings, drawn up by an officer called the chirographer; and the fifth part was the "foot" or "chirograph" of the fine, which recited the whole proceedings. This chirograph was delivered to the parties, and was legal evidence of the fine, and was retained by the purchaser as one of his title deeds. The person to whom the land was to be conveyed was called the complainant or conusee, and he by whom it was to be conveyed the deforciant (see DEFORCEMENT) or conusor (cognisor), because he acknowledged the right of the complainant.

The principal use of fines was to put an end to all adverse claims to the land after a certain period. For this purpose a fine required to be levied with proclamations, that is, to be openly and solemnly read in Court in four successive terms. A common instance of this being done was when a person had acquired a tortious fee simple by a feoffment and wished to bar the owner of the reversion; he did this by levying a fine with proclamations. Such a fine barred the claims of all persons unless they took proceedings within five years. Fines were also used by tenants in tail to effect a discontinuance of the entail (see DISCONTINUANCE), and to bar their issue in tail (see RECOVERY): and to enable a married woman to join with her husband in making a conveyance of her lands, which she could not otherwise do; in such a case the wife was examined by the judges apart from her husband in order to ascertain whether she consented freely to the conveyance.

Fines were of four kinds. The first and most usual was a fine sur conusance (or cognizance) de droit come ceo qu'il ad de son done, that is, a fine "on acknowledgment of right as that which he has of his gift." In other words, the fine was founded on an acknowledgment by the conusor that the conusee was entitled to the land in question by virtue of a gift or feoffment to him by the conusor. It was used for the conveyance of an estate in fee simple or freehold in possession. A fine sur cognizance de droit tantum ("on acknowledgment of right only") was used for passing an estate in reversion or remainder. A fine sur concessit ("he has granted") was where the conusor, in order, as the form ran, to make an end to all disputes, granted to the conusee a new estate by way of supposed composition. This kind of fine was principally used for granting estates for life or years. A fine sur done, grant et render ("on the gift, grant and re-grant") was a double fine. It had the effect of the fine sur cognizance de droit come ceo, etc., and of the fine sur concessit combined, that is, the conusee, after the right was acknowledged to be in him, rendered or granted back to the conusor or to a stranger some other estate in the land.

Fines were abolished by the Fines and Recoveries Act, 1833 (q.v.), which substitutes simpler modes in those cases where the operation of fines was beneficial. The Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, was passed to provide for the protection of titles to land after the lapse of a certain time, without the necessity of levying a fine.

See NON-CLAIM.

Fines were so called from the words with which the record of the fine began: Hæc est finalis concordia inter, etc.: "this is a final concord or compromise between, etc." In the criminal law the same idea prevailed: "it is called finis," says Coke, "because it is an end for that offence."

See PREMIUM.

Fine adnullando levato tenemento quod fuit de antiquo dominico, De. Anciently this was a writ directed to the justices of the Common Bench, and annulling a fine levied (i.e., a sale effected), to the prejudice of the lord, in respect of lands held in ancient demesne (q.v.).

Fine capiendo pro terris, etc., De. Anciently this was a writ which lay for a person who had been convicted of an offence by a jury and had been committed to prison and had his goods and lands in the hands of the king; under the writ he might obtain his discharge and the return of his lands and goods on payment of a fine.

Fine Force. A man was said to do a thing de fine force when he did it under compulsion and of absolute necessity.

Fine for Endowment. In early times this meant a fine which the widow of a tenant had to pay to the lord in order to obtain her dower.

Fine levando de tenementis tentis de rege in capite juxta licentiam regis, De. A writ which formerly lay to authorise the levy of a fine in respect of (i.e., the sale of) lands held in capite.

Fine non capiendo pro pulchro placitudine, De. This obsolete writ was also known as the writ of beau-pleader (q.v.).

Fine permittendo levari de tenementis quæ tenentur de rege in capite, De. This was a writ authorising the levying of a fine in respect of (i.e., the sale of) lands held in capite.

Fine pro redisseisina capienda, De. This was a writ which entitled one imprisoned for a redisseissin (q.v.) to obtain his liberation upon payment of a reasonable fine.

Fines and Recoveries Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74). This Act was passed in order: (1) To abolish fines and recoveries and to make warranties by a tenant in tail no longer effectual for barring entails; (2) To enable a tenant in tail to bar the entail either wholly or partially by a deed enrolled, instead of by a fine or a recovery; (3) To enable a married woman, with the concurrence of her husband, to dispose of land by a deed acknowledged by her before a judge or commissioner, instead of by a fine. See DISENTAILING DEED; ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF DEEDS; FINE; RECOVERY; WARRANTY.

Fines for Alienation. See FINE.

Fines le Roy. This meant fines payable to the king. Amongst them were the fines or, as they would now be called, fees, charged upon the issue of original writs. In the middle of the eighteenth century, these fees, which varied with the amount involved in the case, were calculated according to the number of marks (q.v.). Thus, for the original writ in debt, the fine was 6s. 8d. where the amount did not exceed 100 marks, with an additional 6s. 8d. for every additional 100 marks.

Finire. (To finish.) In ancient law finire meant to pay a fine, and so to end the matter.

Finis finem litibus imponit (3 Rep. 78). A fine puts an end to legal proceedings, that is to say, a fine levied with proclamation creates an indefeasible title to land. See FINE.

Finis rei attendendus est (3 Inst. 51). (We must bear in mind the end which was aimed at.) And so, says Coke, where A incites B to poison C, but B instead shoots C, A is an accessory before the fact to the murder of C, because the death of C was the object of the whole arrangement.

Fird. See FERD.

Fire. The owners of houses in which fires arise accidentally and without negligence are not responsible for damage thereby caused to other persons (Fires Prevention (Metropolis) Act, 1774, s. 86; which applies to all England). At common law a man, unless he could prove that there had been no negligence on his part, had (except in the City of London: see the statute 6 Anne, c. 58, s. 7) been liable for fire originating on his land; and, notwithstanding the statute of 1774, he is still liable if negligence can be proved. The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 502, exempts shipowners from liability for damages caused by fire to goods in their ships. Railway companies are responsible for injury not exceeding £100 caused by sparks from engines to crops (Railway Fires Act, 1905). Where goods pledged with a pawnbroker are destroyed by fire, the pawnbroker must pay to the pledgor a sum ascertained by adding to the loan and profit (or interest) twenty-five per cent on the amount of the loan, and then deducting the amount of the loan and profit (Pawnbrokers Act, 1872, s. 27).

As to policies of insurance against fire, see INSURANCE. As to fire-bote, see ESTOVERS. As to incendiary fires, see ARSON.

Firearms. For the purposes of the Firearms Act, 1920, "the expression 'firearm' means any lethal firearm or other weapon of any description from which any shot, bullet or other missile can be discharged, or any part thereof, and the expression 'ammunition' means ammunition for any such firearms, and includes grenades, bombs, and other similar missiles, whether such missiles are capable of use with a firearm or not, and ingredients and components thereof: provided that a smooth-bore shot-gun, or air-gun, or air-rifle (other than air-guns and air-rifles of a type declared by rules made by a Secretary of State under this Act to be specially dangerous) and ammunition therefor shall not in Great Britain be deemed to be a firearm and ammunition for the purposes of the provisions of this Act other than those relating to the removal of firearms and ammunition from one place to another for export" (s. 12 (1)).

For the purposes of the Gun Licence Act, 1870, "the term gun includes a firearm of any description and an air-gun or any other kind of gun from which any shot, bullet or other missile can be discharged" (s. 2). In this definition the word "firearm" must of course be read in its ordinary sense of an instrument from which a missile is projected by the explosion of gunpowder or other explosive substance; and only the same restricted meaning can be attached to the word in the Acts (other than the Firearms Act, 1920, and the Gun Licence Act, 1870), which are referred to under this title.

The Firearms Act, 1920, forbids members of the general public to have firearms (other than antique arms not for use, or, subject to permission from the police, war trophies—see s. 13) without obtaining, at a cost of half-a-crown, a "firearms certificate" (lasting for three years) from the police, against whose refusal of a certificate there is an appeal to a court of summary jurisdiction (s. 1, sch. I.); manufacturers of or dealers in firearms must be registered with the police, no pawnbroker may take a firearm in pledge, and no firearms may be sold except to a person so registered as a dealer or who holds the requisite firearms certificate (s. 2), or to anyone who is drunk or insane (s. 4); no person under fourteen can have or carry any firearm (s. 3); and in addition to these provisions there are others for which reference should be made to the Act.

The Gun Licence Act, 1870, is merely an Act to oblige those, with certain specified exceptions (see e.g., VERMIN), who carry a gun, as defined in that Act, to take out, at a cost of ten shillings, a gun licence expiring on the 31st of March next following the issue thereof. Nothing in the Firearms Act, 1920 (see s. 1 (9)), relieves any person from the obligation to take out a gun licence.

Wantonly discharging firearms within fifty feet of the centre of a highway available for wheeled traffic is punishable summarily under the Highway Act, 1835, s. 72. It would appear that the use of firearms within fifty feet of the centre of the highway is not wanton, within the meaning of this enactment, if they are used for purposes which, apart from this enactment, are not unlawful and with due regard for the safety of persons on the highway.

In London it is an offence, punishable summarily, to discharge firearms wantonly in any street or public place (Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, s. 54 (15)); and under the Town Police Clauses Act (10 & 11 Vict. c. 89), s. 28, wantonly discharging firearms in a street within any urban district outside London is punishable summarily. It is obvious that only exceptional circumstances could make the use of firearms in any street or public place in London, or in any street in any other town, other than wanton.

Any person found drunk with loaded firearms in any highway or public place is punishable summarily under the Licensing Act, 1872, s. 12.

Fire-bare. In Anglo-Saxon and mediaeval times this meant a primitive kind of light-house consisting of a lofty beacon on which a fire was kindled.

Fire-bote. Fuel for household use; also called house-bote. See ESTOVERS.

Fire, Extinction of. The legislation on the subject commenced with the statute 6 Anne, c. 58, which provided that in London and within the Bills of Mortality churchwardens should fix fire-cocks at proper distances in streets and keep a "large engine and a hand engine to throw up water for the extinguishing of fires," and that on the outbreak of fire all constables and beadles should at once proceed to the place where the fire occurred and aid in extinguishing the fire, and cause people to work at the engines. The "large engines" were primitive and ineffective machines, and the small engines seem to have been "fire-squirts," much resembling the ordinary garden syringe on a large scale. It was not until about 1725 that Newsham invented the first really effective fire-engine, which was a machine much of the same type as that in use until, about the middle of the nineteenth century, the steam fire-engine became general; and it was not until the era of the steam fire-engine that there was much of an advance on the legislation of Anne. Now the extinguishing of fires is provided for, in London by the Metropolitan Fire Brigade Act, 1865; in urban districts and in rural districts where urban powers have been acquired, by the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 171 (2), which incorporates the sections (32 & 33) of the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, applying to the subject; and in other rural districts, under the Lighting and Watching Act, 1833, s. 44, if that Act has been adopted, or, where that Act has not been adopted, under the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1867, s. 29. Under the Parish Fire Engines Act, 1898, a parish council may arrange to have fires in their parish dealt with by the fire brigade of a neighbouring borough or district.

Fire, False Alarm of. The offence of giving a false alarm of fire is punishable summarily, in London under the London County Council (General Powers) Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. ccxxi.), s. 16, and elsewhere under the False Alarms of Fire Act, 1895.

Fire Insurance. See ASSURANCE; INSURANCE; INTEREST; POLICY OF ASSURANCE.

Fireworks. As to the manufacture, sale, etc., of fireworks, see the Explosives Act, 1875, and the Orders in Council, and of the Secretary of State, made thereunder. Under ss. 80, 91, of the Act, any person who throws, casts, or fires any firework in or into any highway, street, thoroughfare, or public place is liable, on summary conviction, to a penalty not exceeding £5.

Firken. A quarter-barrel; contains nine gallons. It is not known to the law.

Firm denotes (1) the style or title under which one or several persons carry on business; and (2) the partnership itself, that is, the individual members forming the partnership. The mercantile notion of a firm is that it is a body distinct from the members composing it, and having rights and obligations distinct from those of its members; in other words, a firm is by laymen considered as a kind of corporation. Although this is not the legal status of a firm, yet in the following respects its quasi-corporate nature is recognised.

In procedure, an action may be brought by or against a firm in the name of the firm (Ord. 48*a*, r. 1), and when a firm is so sued the writ may be served either upon one or more of the partners or at its place of business on the manager of the business (ib., rr. 3, 4); provision is also made for issuing execution against the members of the firm, and also against any property of the firm within the jurisdiction (ib., r. 8).

Any individual trading under a name or style other than his own name may be sued under such name or style as if it were a firm name (ib., r. 11), but he must sue in his own name unless he be a moneylender, in which case he must sue both in his registered name, because the Moneylenders Act, 1900, s. 2, requires him so to do, and also in his own name, because the R.S.C. do not authorise him to sue only in his registered name.

In bankruptcy, where a firm becomes bankrupt, the assets of the firm (called the joint estate), and the assets of each individual partner (called the separate estate), are administered separately. (See JOINT.) Again, when several persons form a firm, and one or more of them (not being all) form another firm, the former is called the major, and the latter the minor, firm. The distinction is of importance, because where one of such firms becomes bankrupt any member of the other may prove against it notwithstanding the general rule that a partner cannot prove against the joint estate in competition with the joint creditors; and where both become bankrupt a creditor of the two firms may prove against each (Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 32, Sch. II., r. 19). See PARTNER.

Firma. Anciently this meant either victuals or rent. Firma noctis before and immediately after the Conquest meant a liability to provide one night's entertainment for the king. Firma burgi meant the right to receive the tolls, rents, or other profits of a burgh or borough; it was granted to the local authority by the king or other lord of the borough upon payment of a fixed sum.

See Alba firma; Feodi-firma.

The word was also used as meaning a farm (q.v.), and in the phrase ad firmam tradidi (I have to farm let): see FARM LET.

Firmior et potentior est operatio legis quàm dispositio hominis (Co. Litt. 102). (The operation of the law is firmer and more powerful than the will of man.) In general, no man's legal position is varied by any agreement between third parties. Thus the right of taking by survivorship in joint tenancy remains unaffected by either joint tenant devising his undivided share: the title of the survivor is sometimes known as the elder title.

Compare FORTIOR ET POTENTIOR, etc.

First Fruits. See ANNATES; RECEIVER, ETC.

First Fruits and Tenths, Court of. Under the statute 32 Hen. 8, c. 45, this Court was constituted for the collection of the first fruits or annates (q.v.) and tenths (q.v.). It consisted of a chancellor, a treasurer and a king's attorney, all of whom were described as being "of the first fruits and tenths." The Court was abolished by the statute 1 Mar., sess. 2, c. 10. The Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty (see QUEEN ANNE'S BOUNTY) now perform, under statutory powers, the functions formerly vested in this Court.

First Impression. A case which presents to a Court of law for its decision a question of law which is new, and for which there is consequently no precedent, is said to be a case of first impression.

First Offenders. Up to 1861 there was no statutory provision relating especially to persons convicted for the first time. Before that time it had been customary to discharge upon recognizance, to come up for judgment when called on, persons convicted of minor felonies or of misdemeanours, if the Court, whether of assize or quarter sessions, considered such a course advisable in view, amongst other things, of the fact that the prisoner had not been previously convicted; and this course is still followed in the case of conviction on indictment. Under the Larceny Act, 1861, s. 108, and the Malicious Damage Act, 1861, s. 66, there is power to adopt a like course in respect of a first summary conviction for larceny or malicious damage. The now repealed Probation of First Offenders Act, 1887, provided, or purported to provide, Courts with further powers which might be exercised in the case of persons convicted of larceny, false pretences, or misdemeanour punishable with not more than two years' imprisonment, against whom no previous conviction was proved. Now the fact that any summary conviction, or any conviction on indictment for any offence punishable with imprisonment, is for a first offence, is one of the grounds upon which Courts can exercise the powers given to them by the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907, as to which see PROBATION OF OFFENDERS.

Fishery. A fishery or piscary "is a liberty of fishing in another man's waters, or his own," according to the Termes de la Ley.

Fisheries are either royal, public or private.

I. A royal fishery is the exclusive right of the Crown of fishing in a public river. Such a right cannot be created de novo since Magna Charta. If it has been granted to a subject, it is called a free fishery (infra).

II. A public or common fishery (or public common of fishery) is the right of the public to fish in the sea and in public navigable rivers as far as the tide flows. This right cannot exist if the water is subject to an exclusive right of fishery in any person or corporation.

III. Private fisheries are of three kinds.

(i.) A several fishery or piscary (sometimes called simply a fishery or piscary) is an exclusive right of fishing in a particular water, and vested either in the owner of the soil or in someone claiming under him. Hence if a man grants a several fishery in water belonging to him, the grantee may exclude him from fishing there. And a several fishery may be confined to a particular kind of fish. It may sometimes shift if the bed of the river shifts. (See DERELICTION.) A several fishery in public waters which excludes the public from fishing there, may be either in the Crown, in which case it is also called a royal fishery (supra), or in a private person or body claiming under the Crown: but it cannot have been created since Magna Charta. The owner of a several fishery has a privileged property in the fish before they are caught. See PROPERTY.

(ii.) Common of piscary or fishery is the right of fishing in another man's waters, such as a pond or private river, but in common with, that is, not in exclusion of, the owner of the soil. Common of piscary is a profit à prendre, and may be either appurtenant or in gross, but apparently not appendant. The term seems to be confined to that right of fishing which the tenants of manorial land have of fishing in the waters of the lord (infra).

(iii.) The true nature of a free fishery is a disputed point. According to Coke, it is much the same (at all events in the right which it confers) as a common of piscary, while Blackstone says that a free fishery is an exclusive right of fishing in a public river, and is a royal franchise. There is no doubt that the term is used in both senses. It may be suggested that "free fishery" originally meant merely a liberty or right of fishing created by express grant from the owner of the soil or water. Consequently such a right, if granted by the Crown, would give the right of fishing in a public river to the exclusion of all private persons (though not necessarily to the exclusion of the Crown), while, if granted by the owner of a several fishery, it would give the right of fishing in his water to the exclusion of all persons except himself: in other words, it would create the right of fishing in common with him. The term "common of fishery," having been already appropriated to denote the right of the tenants of a manor to fish in the lord's waters in common with him (supra), the term "free fishery" would conveniently be used to denote any other right of fishing in common with the owner of the water; so that, according to this view, a free fishery and a common of fishery in private waters both confer the right of fishing in common with the owner of the soil, and only differ in their origin.

Fishery Laws. The Fishery Laws are a series of statutes passed for the regulation of fishing, especially to prevent the destruction of fish during the breeding season, and of small fish, spawn, etc., and the employment of improper modes of taking fish.

Fish-garth. A dam or weir in a river for taking fish. See the statute 23 Hen. 8, c. 18.

Fish Royal are whale and sturgeon, which, when either thrown ashore or caught near the coast, are the property of the Sovereign. It is said by the old writers, that in the case of a whale it is divisible between the king and the queen, the head being the king's and the tail the queen's. See PREROGATIVE.

Fitzherbert. Anthony Fitzherbert, the author of the Grand Abridgment, a species of digest of the law (see ABRIDGMENTS OF THE LAWS OF ENGLAND), and of the New Natura Brevium, was a serjeant-at-law, and afterwards a judge of the Common Pleas, during Henry VIII.'s reign. He also wrote a work on justices of the peace. See NATURA BREVIUM.

Five Mile Act. This was the popular title both of the statute 35 Eliz. c. 2, and of the statute 17 Car. 2, c. 2. The Act of Elizabeth forbade "popish recusants" who had been convicted of failing to attend the services of the Established Church to move more than five miles from their usual places of abode; and the statute of Charles, amongst other things, prohibited persons preaching in nonconformist places of worship, from being, except when on a journey, within five miles of any city, incorporated town or borough sending burgesses to Parliament.

Fixtures are personal chattels annexed to land, that is, fastened to or connected with it. The general rule is that if the owner or occupier of land annexes anything to the freehold it becomes part of the freehold, so that the ownership of the chattel passes with the ownership of the freehold. Thus, if A sets up fixtures on his land, and then mortgages the land to B, and afterwards becomes bankrupt, the fixtures pass with the freehold to B, although all the other chattels belonging to A (not comprised in a registered bill of sale) pass to his trustee in bankruptcy. For the same reason no fixture can be taken in distress for rent.

If the rule that fixtures form part of the freehold were invariable, it would have the effect of entitling every heir, devisee and reversioner of land to the fixtures left on the land by the ancestor, testator or tenant for life, instead of their passing to his personal representatives with his other chattels: it would also entitle every freeholder to all the fixtures set up by his tenants; but it is relaxed in certain cases, especially as between landlord and tenant. Hence fixtures are divided into two classes; (1) landlord's fixtures, or those which belong to the landlord; and (2) tenant's fixtures, or those which belong to and may be removed by the tenant at any time during his tenancy. Tenant's fixture again are divisible according to their nature into (a) trade fixtures, being articles erected by the tenant solely for the purposes of trade or manufacture, such as engines, cisterns, plants and trees planted by nurserymen, etc., and (b) ornamental fixtures, or articles put up for domestic use or ornament, such as bookcases, marble chimney-pieces, etc.

Agricultural fixtures, or those erected by a tenant for agricultural purposes, are subject to special rules and statutory provisions, the general rule (in the absence of a special agreement) being that he is entitled to remove such fixtures, on giving notice to his landlord, unless the latter elects to purchase them. See in particular the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908, s. 21. As to market gardens, see that title.

As between the next-of-kin and the heir of the owner of the fee, and also as between the next-of-kin of a tenant for life or in tail and the remainderman or reversioner, the general rule now is that trade fixtures as well as fixtures for ornament or domestic use pass to the next-of-kin if they can be removed without damage to the land and are not essential to its enjoyment.

Fixtures are "personal chattels" within the meaning of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 4.

Flagrante delicto. An offender is said to be found or apprehended flagrante delicto (while the offence is flagrant) when found or apprehended in the act of committing the offence charged. The phrase is chiefly used in matrimonial cases with reference to adultery.

Fledwite; Flightwite. Anciently this meant a discharge from amerciaments where a person, having been a fugitive, came within the king's peace on payment of a fine or on pardon. It also seems to have meant a fine paid for the discharge.

Fleet Prison; Marriages and Registers. The Fleet Prison is believed to have dated from the Norman period. It seems never to have been used for prisoners sentenced to imprisonment for offences, the only persons confined there being prisoners for debt and those committed for contempt of court. It was abolished by the Queen's Prison Act, 1842, the prisoners in the prison being transferred to the Queen's Prison (q.v.).

Under the common law, neither banns, licence, nor clergymen were absolutely necessary for the validity of a marriage. One of the means by which persons might validly be married was mere consent of the parties in the presence of witnesses. Another valid means was a clandestine marriage by a person in priest's orders. The Fleet marriages were clandestinely performed, in defiance of ecclesiastical authority, by persons who were, or pretended to be, in priest's orders; and they were therefore valid either qua clandestine marriages celebrated by a priest, or qua matrimonial contracts in the presence of witnesses. They were celebrated by a class of disreputable persons living in or about the Fleet Prison, who cared nothing for ecclesiastical censures, in any room—frequently a tap-room—which they saw fit to use. The first on record took place in 1613. From 1674 to 1754 many thousands of these marriages took place. In 1753 the statute 26 Geo. 2, c. 33 (Lord Hardwicke's Act), was passed and made any such marriage impossible as from 25th March, 1754. See MARRIAGE.

The Fleet Registers consist of about three hundred large books, or registers, and about a thousand "pocket books" containing entries of marriages and baptisms celebrated in or about the Fleet Prison between 1674 and 1754. Up to 1821, when they were purchased by the Government, they were in private hands. After 1821 they were in the Registry of the Consistory Court of London, from which they passed to the Registrar-General under the Non-Parochial Registers Act, 1840, s. 6. These registers are not admissible in evidence for any purpose whatsoever.

The Fleet, as it was immediately before its abolition, is described in The Pickwick Papers. As to Fleet marriages, see Burn (2nd ed.), History of Fleet Marriages; and, for a popular description, see Sir Walter Besant, The Chaplain of the Fleet. See BASTON.

Flem. Anciently this meant a fugitive bondman or an outlaw.

Flemene frit; Flemenes frinthe; Flymena frynthe. Before, and for some time after, the Conquest this meant receiving or harbouring fugitives or outlaws.

Flemeswite. Fleta (q.v.) states that this meant habere catalla fugitorum (to have the cattle or the chattels of fugitives or outlaws.)

Fleta is the name given to a Commentarius Juris Anglicani, composed by an unknown writer during the reign of Edward I. The title is derived from the book having been written during the author's confinement in the Fleet Prison. He appears to have obtained his materials from Bracton and Glanville (q.v.).

Floating. See SECURITY.

Floor. The floor of a Court is that part between the judge's bench and the front row of counsel. Litigants appearing in person, in the High Court or Court of Appeal, are supposed to address the Court from the floor.

Florin. See GOLD COINS; SILVER COINS.

Flotsam. See JETSAM.

Flumina et portus publica sunt, ideoque jus piscandi omnibus commune est. (Navigable rivers and ports are public; therefore the right of fishing there is common to all.) But this is true only as regards navigable tidal waters, and even then it may be excluded by some exclusive right of fishery.

"Fly for it." The question "Did he fly for it?" was anciently put to a jury in order to enable them to find whether one charged with treason or felony had fled in order to avoid justice. See FUGAM FECIT.

Flymena-ferm. In Anglo-Saxon and early post-Conquest law this meant the harbouring of outlaws.

F.O.B. These letters, which mean free on board, indicate, when used in a contract relating to the sale of goods intended to be sent by sea, that the seller is bound to deliver the goods on board ship free of cost to the buyer.

Focage; Focagium. The same as firebote (q.v.).

Focale. Firewood.

Fodertorium. Food or fodder provided for the king's use in Anglo-Saxon times. Compare the later purveyance.

Fœmina viro co-operta. A feme covert (q.v.).

Fœnus nauticum. In Roman law this meant the interest charged for money secured by what corresponded to our bottomry (q.v.) bond.

Foiterers. The same as faitours (q.v.).

Folcland; Folkland. This, in late Anglo-Saxon times, meant land held of the king without written title under customary law (see BOCLAND; LAEN-LAND). The tenure corresponded more or less to that of the post-Conquest copyhold land.

Folcmote; Folkmoot. In Anglo-Saxon times this meant any assembly of the people, other than the witenagemot (q.v.), for either judicial or legislative purposes. It included, for instance, the shire mote or shire court, and the court of the hundred.

Folcright; Folkright. The laws of England as they existed in later Anglo-Saxon times. They were the basis of the common law (q.v.).

Foldage is a privilege possessed in some places by the lord of a manor, and consists in the right of having his tenants' sheep to feed on his fields, so as to manure the land, in return for which the lord provides a fold for the sheep. It is a seignorial right (q.v.).

The name of foldage is also given in parts of Norfolk to the customary fee paid to the lord for exemption at certain times from this duty. Compare FALDFEE.

Foldcourse means (i) in its proper sense, the right which the lords of some manors have of feeding a certain number of sheep on the lands of their tenants during certain times of the year. It seems that such a right is not strictly a right of common, although frequently so called, but a seignorial right reserved by the lord of the manor over his tenants' lands.

"Foldcourse" also means (ii) land subject to a right of foldcourse, or the same thing as a sheepwalk (q.v.); and (iii) the right of a tenant of a manor to pasture sheep on the land of the lord; such a right is a common appurtenant.

See FOLDAGE; COMMON.

Folgarii; Folger; Folgere. In the time of Bracton folgarii meant household servants. The other two forms of the word seem to have had the same meaning at a later period.

Folio. In the law, a folio means so much of a document as contains seventy-two words, except where the term is used with regard to wills or office copies, in which case it means so much of the will or copy as contains ninety words.

Food. "For the purposes of the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts the expression 'food' shall include every article used for food or drink by man, other than drugs or water, and any article which ordinarily enters into or is used in the composition or preparation of human food; and shall also include flavouring matters and condiments" (Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899, s. 26).

Foot. This was the same as the chirograph (q.v.) or record of the levying of a fine (q.v.).

The foot, as a measure of length, is one-third of the imperial standard yard (Weights and Measures Act, 1878, s. 11). See YARD.

Football. See BETTING.

Footgeld. In the forest laws this was an amerciament for failing to expeditate (q.v.) dogs. To be free of footgeld meant to be under no obligation to expeditate.

Footpath; Footway. A footpath or footway may be either public or private. If public, it is open to all the King's subjects, but only when on foot. A road which is a horseway or carriageway for only the occupiers of certain tenements or the inhabitants of a parish, may be a public footway. A private footway is one which can be used only by the occupiers of certain tenements or by the inhabitants of a parish.

Public footways may be created either by dedication (q.v.) or by statute.

The Local Government Act, 1894, s. 13 (2), empowers the parish council or parish meeting to spend money on public footways other than those at the side of a public road. S. 13 (2) makes the consent of the parish council and of the rural district council necessary for the stopping or diversion of any footway; and under s. 26 the district council, whether urban or rural, or in the event of their default, the county council, may prevent the obstruction of any footway, either by removing, or suing for the abatement of, or indicting for, the obstruction. It is to be noted that these provisions do not abrogate the right of any individual to abate or to take proceedings in respect of an obstruction.

The Public Health Act, 1875, s. 144, enables every urban authority to take such action for the purpose of stopping or diverting a public footway as, under ss. 84-92 of the Highway Act, 1835, might have been taken by the inhabitants, in vestry assembled, of any parish within the urban district; and it also vests in every urban authority all the powers, under the Act of 1835, of the surveyor of highways, which, of course, includes public footways.

As to the power of local authorities to repair damage caused by excavations on land adjoining the footways of streets, see the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1907, s. 20.

Foragium. Straw from which the corn had been thrashed.

Forbalk. This seems to have been a strip of land lying next the highway.

Forbatudus. Anciently this meant one killed by another in self-defence.

Forbearance. See CONSIDERATION.

Force (Vis). This generally meant such violence as was unlawful. It was necessarily implied in every trespass (q.v.), rescue (q.v.) or disseisin (q.v.). See FRESH FORCE.

Force and Arms, With. These words (originally vi et armis), with the addition of the words "against the peace" (contra pacem originally), were a necessary part of every count for misdemeanour or civil trespass respectively until the Criminal Procedure Act, 1851, s. 24, made them unnecessary in any indictment, and the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 49, made them unnecessary in any pleading in a civil proceeding.

Forcheapum. Anciently this meant forestalling (q.v.).

Forcible Detainer is the offence committed by a person who, having wrongfully entered upon any lands or tenements, detains them with violence or threats, that is, in the same manner as would render an entry upon them for the purpose of taking possession a forcible entry (q.v.). It is a misdemeanour. See the statutes 8 Hen. 6, c. 9, and 21 Jac. 1, c. 15.

Forcible Entry is the offence of entering upon any land or tenements in a violent manner in order to take possession thereof, whether the violence consists in actual force applied to any other person, or in threats, or in breaking open any house, or in collecting together an unusual number of persons for the purpose of making such entry.

Forcible entry is a misdemeanour. At common law it had been permitted in certain cases, as, for instance, where the rightful owner had been wrongfully disseised or put out of possession, but it was altogether prohibited by the statute 5 Rich. 2, st. 1, c. 7. Other Acts relating to it are the statutes 15 Rich. 2, c. 2, 8 Hen. 6, c. 9, 31 Eliz. c. 11, and 21 Jac. 1, c. 15.

The offence would not appear to be committed where the rightful owner enters in order to obtain possession from a person who is the mere custodian or bailiff of the owner, or who is a mere trespasser.

See FRESH DISSEISIN.

Foreclose; Foreclosure. When a mortgagor has failed to pay off the mortgage debt within the proper time, the mortgagee is entitled to bring an action in the Chancery Division of the High Court asking that a day may be fixed on which the mortgagor is to pay off the debt, and that in default of payment on that day he (the mortgagor) may be foreclosed of his equity of redemption, that is, deprived or debarred of his right to redeem. The judgment fixes a place (usually a room in the Royal Courts of Justice) for payment at the expiration of six months from the date of the judgment, and orders that the mortgagor be foreclosed if the debt is not paid on that day. Upon an affidavit of non-payment at the appointed time and place, the order for foreclosure contained in the original judgment will be made absolute by an order which is obtained, as of course, upon motion or summons. The effect of the foreclosure is to bar the mortgagor's right or equity of redemption, and thus to vest the property absolutely in the mortgagee; and he cannot subsequently sue the mortgagor for any deficiency of value, unless he gives the mortgagor a new right of redemption; but even after an order of foreclosure absolute the Court has a discretion to re-open the foreclosure within a reasonable time and to allow the mortgagor to redeem. Foreclosure actions are now comparatively rare in practice, as the mortgagee's remedy by sale, under the power of sale conferred upon him either by the mortgage deed or by the Conveyancing, etc., Act, 1881, s. 19, is in general more speedy and convenient. As to the derivation of the word, compare Forjudge. See DAY TO SHOW CAUSE; JUDGMENT; MORTGAGE; POWER.

Foregift. Used in the Ecclesiastical Leasing Act, 1842, s. 30, as a synonym for a fine or premium for a lease.

Foregoers. The king's purveyors were anciently known by this name. See the statute 30 Edw. 3, c. 5. See PURVEYANCE.

Foreign, in law, is that which is out of a certain State, country, county, liberty, manor, jurisdiction, etc. Thus in the law of divorce

"foreign" means anywhere out of England, and "foreigner" means one who is not a domiciled Englishman. As to foreign law, see FACT. As to foreign judgments, see JUDGMENT. As to foreign services, see SERVICE. As to foreign bills of exchange, see BILL OF EXCHANGE. See also FOREIGN ATTACHMENT; FORFEITURE; STATE.

In the early law-writers forinsecus is the law Latin form of foreign. The word is derived from the Latin foras (outside of); and it must be recollected that, although in the modern sense foreign means outside the United Kingdom or the British Empire, the word anciently was used much more frequently as meaning outside some particular part of the realm, as, for instance, the City of London. See FOREIGN ATTACHMENT; FOREIGN BOUGHT AND FOREIGN SOLD.

Foreign Adjustment. See ADJUSTMENT; F.G.A.

Foreign Attachment. By the custom of the City of London (and also of Bristol, Exeter, and Lancaster), if an action of debt was brought in the Mayor's Court, and the defendant made default in appearing to the action, and it appeared that he had nothing within the city whereby he might be summoned, the Court might, on the plaintiff alleging that some person within the city had property belonging to the defendant in his possession, attach such property to compel the defendant to appear. The attachment was effected by warning the person in whose possession the property was not to part with it without the further order of the Court. This person was then called the garnishee. If the defendant still made default in appearing, the garnishee was required to show cause why the plaintiff should not have execution of the property attached, and in default of cause being shown, the plaintiff obtained execution, first giving security to restore the property to the defendant if he should within a year and a day come into Court and disprove the debt alleged in the action. (See PLEDGES TO RESTORE; SCIRE FACIAS.) What the plaintiff received by the execution operated as a satisfaction (wholly or pro tanto) of the debt due to him from the defendant.

Where the property attached was money belonging to the defendant, the judgment was final, but in the case of goods the judgment was interlocutory, and was called judgment of appraisement, because it directed the goods to be appraised (i.e., valued) by the serjeant-at-mace, in order that the defendant might be credited with their value, and when this was done final judgment was signed and execution issued.

Theoretically, the primary object of the process of foreign attachment was to compel the defendant to appear, and therefore if the defendant appeared according to the custom, as by giving bail, paying money into Court, etc. (see APPEARANCE), the attachment was dissolved or at an end. In practice, however, the proceeding by foreign attachment was used principally for the purpose of taking the defendant's property in satisfaction of the debt. Hence it had become usual to make the record in a proceeding by foreign attachment recite a number of steps which were purely fictitious, e.g., a return by the sheriff that the defendant had nothing within the city whereby he might be summoned, a "solemn calling" of the defendant, his default, etc., etc.: all this was recited in the record as occurring at one and the same Court: no specific time was necessary to elapse, but as soon as the action was entered and the plaintiff made a satisfactory affidavit of his debt, he was at liberty to issue the attachment, which was a command of the Court to the sheriff to attach the property; the sheriff accordingly served on the garnishee an "attachment paper" or notice not to part with the property; after the fictitious "solemn calling" of the defendant and his four successive defaults (for, as the proceedings to obtain execution were founded on the defendant's supposed default in appearing, it was necessary to allege his default, although it had not actually taken place), a scire facias was issued to warn the garnishee to appear and show cause why the plaintiff should not have execution of the property attached, and if no cause was shown, or if cause was shown but judgment was given for the plaintiff, he obtained execution of the property.

In the City of London foreign attachment had been used from time immemorial, and had been applied systematically to cases in which neither the debt sued for nor the debt due by the garnishee had accrued due within the City and in which no single one of the three parties was either a citizen or a resident in the city; all that was necessary was that the garnishee should be within the City when the attachment paper was served on him. And bodies corporate had frequently been made garnishees. But in 1867 it was decided (1) that foreign attachment did not lie unless either the original debt or the debt which it was proposed to attach had accrued due within the City or unless some one or other of the parties was a citizen or a resident in the City, and (2) that the garnishee was entitled to apply for a writ of prohibition in order to test the legality of any particular attachment without first pleading in the Mayor's Court. In 1881 it was decided (1) that a body corporate could not be made a garnishee, and (2) that all the various steps which it had been customary to recite must actually be taken instead of being purely fictitious. These decisions put an end to the use of foreign attachment. See MAYOR'S COURT; BILL OF PROOF.

Foreign Bought and Foreign Sold. This was a custom existing in the City of London which prevented "foreigners" from buying and selling cattle in Smithfield Market. The statute 22 & 23 Car. 2, c. 19, s. 12, provided that as from 24th June, 1671, it should be lawful for "foreigners" as well as freemen to buy and sell in that market. Here, of course, foreigner meant anyone other than a freeman of the City. See FOREIGN.

Foreign Company. There is no statutory definition of this expression, which, however, has long borne in the law the meaning of any company constituted elsewhere than in the United Kingdom. Every such company, if it establishes a place of business within the United Kingdom, must comply with the provisions of ss. 274, 275 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908.

Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870. This Act makes it an offence, punishable with fine and imprisonment, for any British subject, without the licence of the Crown, to accept a commission or any employment in the military or naval service of any foreign State at war with any other foreign State which is at peace with England, or to build or equip any ship for the service of any such State, or to assist in increasing her armament or warlike force. Until the enactment of the statute 59 Geo. 3, c. 69 (which was repealed and replaced by the Act of 1870) none of these things were illegal.

The Act of 1870 has been supplemented by the Treaty of Washington, 1922, which (ss. 2, 3) makes it an offence at any time to build or send out of the ports of His Majesty's Dominions to which the statute applies, any ship of war without the licence of the Admiralty. The Act is (s. 6) to come into operation on such date as may be fixed by Order in Council, and (s. 5) extends, speaking generally, only to England, Scotland, and the Crown Colonies.

Foreign General Average. See F.G.A.

Foreign-going Ship. This expression "includes every ship employed in trading or going between some place or places in the United Kingdom and some place or places situate beyond the following limits, that is to say, the coasts of the United Kingdom, the Channel Islands, the Isle of Man, and the Continent of Europe between the river Elbe and Brest exclusive" (Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 742), and fishing boats owned out of Canada and Newfoundland which are engaged in the Newfoundland cod fisheries, but not other fishing-boats (ib., s. 744). Such ships are subject to many sections of the Act which do not apply to home-trade ships (q.v.).

Foreign Jurisdiction. This means such jurisdiction as a State has with regard to its subjects when they are, or with regard to acts done, outside its boundaries. As to acts done outside British territory, see ABROAD, OFFENCES COMMITTED. As to jurisdiction exerciseable abroad, the earliest instance was that exercised through the Levant Company (q.v.). There were various consular jurisdictions—that is to say, jurisdictions exercised through our consuls—in the Ottoman Empire and in China; but the events of recent years have produced so much unsettlement in those countries that little of a definite nature can be said about them at present.

The Act now regulating the subject is the Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890. That Act repealed and replaced a series of enactments (all specified in the Third Schedule) commencing with the Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1843, and ending with the Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1878. The preamble to the Act of 1890 is as follows: "Whereas by treaty, capitulation, grant, usage, sufferance, and other lawful means, Her Majesty has jurisdiction within divers foreign countries. . . ; and it is expedient to consolidate the Acts relating to the exercise of Her Majesty's jurisdiction out of Her dominions." It accordingly proceeded to enact a series of provisions, which, along with various Orders in Council made pursuant to it, now form a complete code. As to the Orders, see the Index to S. R. O., under Foreign Jurisdiction. See CAPITULATION; CONSUL.

Foreign Marriages. See MARRIAGE ACTS; MARRIAGE OFFICER.

Foreign Office. The Government Department of which the minister known as the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs is the head. See SECRETARY OF STATE.

Foreign Opposer or Apposer; Forinsecarum Appositor. This was an officer of the Exchequer who audited the accounts of the sheriffs. The office was abolished in 1833. Jacob (1739) says "The Foreign Opposer . . . opposes or makes a charge on all Sheriffs, etc., of their Green Wax, i.e., Fines, Issues, Amerciaments, Recognizances, etc., certified in Estreats attached to the Writ, under the Seal in Green Wax, and delivereth the same to the Clerk of the Estreats to be put in Process." From the Commons Committees Report (1803), Vol. 13, p. 315, it appears that in 1798 the duties were much as described by Jacob, and that the office, after payment of a deputy and other expenses, was worth about £210 a year to the holder—who did nothing except draw that amount annually.

Foreign Plea. Anciently this meant a plea (q.v.) to the jurisdiction of the Court.

Foreign Security. The present statutory definition of this expression is to be found in the Stamp Act, 1891, s. 82.

Forejudge; Forjudger. See FORJUDGE.

Foreman. The member of a jury who acts as spokesman of that body. On grand juries the foreman is selected by the members of the jury. On other juries the juror who first enters the box generally acts as foreman.

Forensic Medicine, or medical jurisprudence, as it is also called, is, as Taylor puts it, "that science which teaches the application of every branch of medical knowledge to the purposes of the law: hence its limits are, on the one hand, the requirements of the law, and, on the other, the whole range of medicine. Anatomy, physiology, medicine, surgery, chemistry, physics and botany, lend their aid as necessity arises; and in some cases all these branches of science are required to enable a Court of law to arrive at a proper conclusion on a contested question affecting life or property."
