Forensic medicine is occasionally required in cases of a civil nature, such as questions of lunacy or unsoundness of mind (see LUNACY; DELUSIONS), or cases of nuisances injurious to health. Its most important function, however, is in criminal trials, where the evidence of a medical expert is frequently required. Thus, in a trial for murder, where the evidence is circumstantial, it is almost invariably necessary to adduce evidence by a medical practitioner as to the appearance of the body and the results of a post-mortem examination. So far as he attempts to account for the symptoms or appearances observed by him, his evidence is merely opinion evidence.

"Medical jurisprudence" is a synonymous term. So also is "legal medicine."

Foreschoke. Anciently lands which the lord had seised into his hands because of the tenant's failure to perform service, and which the lord then held for a year and a day without any steps for their recovery being taken by the tenant, were said to be foreschoke or abandoned.

Foreshore is that part of the land adjacent to the sea which is alternately covered and left dry by the ordinary flow of the tides, that is, by the medium line between the greatest and least range of tide (spring tides and neap tides); and this is popularly described as the land between high and low water marks. It is to be found in arms of the sea, such as the Thames above Kingston, and the Severn above Tewkesbury, where the height of the water varies with the tide, even though the water be fresh. It forms part of the adjoining county, the justices of which have cognizances of offences committed there, whether it is or is not at the time covered with water. It also forms part of the adjoining parish.

The property in the foreshore is primâ facie vested in the Crown, but a part of it may belong to a subject by an ancient grant from the Crown, or by prescription. This ownership of the Crown is for the benefit of the community, and cannot be used in any way so as to derogate from or interefere with the public rights of navigation and fishery.

See ALLUVION; DERELICTION; NIHIL PRAESCRIBITUR, ETC.

Forest, in the legal sense of the word, is the exclusive right of keeping and hunting wild beasts and fowls of forest, chase, park, and warren, in a certain territory of "wooddy grounds and fruitfull pastures," with laws and officers of its own, established for the protection of the game. These laws are now obsolete.

A royal forest is one belonging to the Crown (see DEMESNE): a forest in the hands of a subject is a franchise (q.v.).

Most of the royal forests had been disafforested by the commencement of the nineteenth century. Eyres (see ATTACHMENT OF THE FOREST) had before then ceased to be held. The statute 57 Geo. 3, c. 61, after reciting, in effect, that the Warden Chief Justice and Justice in Eyre of the Forests north of the Trent and the like officers of the Forests south of that river had little to do and large emoluments, abolished all their offices (which were the last remnant of the forest-law machinery) as from the occurrence of the next vacancies, and vested their functions in the First Commissioner of Woods and Forests.

Forests, chases, parks, and warrens have this peculiarity, that they give their owners a qualified property or ownership in the animals confined in them, so that no other person can acquire a property in them either by taking them within the forest, etc., or by chasing them thence and taking them in other ground.

See CARTA DE FORESTA; CHASE; PARK; WARREN; GAME; PURLIEU; ANIMALS FERÆ NATURÆ.

Forestall; Forestalment. To forestall a person is to obstruct his way with force and arms. To prevent a person from going on land to demand or distrain for rent in arrear by forestalling him operated as a disseisin of the rent. (See DISSEISIN.) The term is now obsolete.

It was also used to signify the offence of raising the price of certain goods, by buying merchandise on its way to market, or dissuading persons from bringing their goods there, etc. See ENGROSSING.

Forestry. The Forestry Act, 1919, is "an Act for establishing a Forestry Commission for the United Kingdom and promoting afforestation and the production and supply of timber therein and for purposes connected therewith." Reference should be made to the Act for information as to its provisions. The Commission has been duly established: its expenditure during the financial year 1921-22 was about £400,000.

The Act of 1919 has been amended on a minor point by the Forestry Act, 1921.

See RABBITS.

Forfang; forfeng. Anciently this meant the taking of provisions from fairs or markets before the king's purveyors had obtained what they required.

Forfeiture is where a person loses some property, right, privilege or benefit in consequence of having done or omitted to do a certain act.

Thus where a lease contains a provision enabling the lessor to put an end to the term if the lessee fails to pay the rent, or comply with the covenants, then if the lessee fails to pay his rent or repair, and the lessor puts an end to the term by re-entry, a forfeiture of the lease is said to take place.

In some cases the Courts before 1882 would relieve against a forfeiture, that is, prevent the person entitled to take advantage of it from doing so, the general rule being that the Court would relieve against a forfeiture when its object was to secure the performance of some collateral act, such as the payment of money, and when the Court could give by way of compensation all that was expected or desired. Thus the Court would relieve against the forfeiture of a lease for non-payment of rent, on the lessee paying what was due. The powers of the Court in this respect had been extended by statute to the case of forfeiture for breach of a covenant to insure against fire.

Now the Conveyancing, etc., Act, 1881, provides (s. 14), that a forfeiture for a breach of any covenant or condition in a lease shall not be enforceable, by action or otherwise, unless and until the lessor serves on the lessee a notice specifying the breach complained of and requiring him to remedy or make compensation for the same, and the lessee fails to comply with the notice within a reasonable time. Where a lessor proceeds to enforce a forfeiture the lessee may apply to the Court for relief, and the Court may grant or refuse relief as it thinks fit. This provision does not affect the law relating to forfeiture for non-payment of rent, and it does not extend to certain covenants and conditions (e.g., those against assigning, underletting, etc., or providing for forfeiture on the lessee's bankruptcy and the like), but, with these exceptions, it applies, notwithstanding any stipulation by the parties to the contrary. The Conveyancing, etc., Act, 1892, s. 4, now gives the Court power also to relieve underlessees on forfeiture of superior leases. See UNDERLEASE.

As regards copyholds, there is forfeiture absolute, the effect of which is to determine the tenancy, and forfeiture optional—otherwise known as seizure quousque—the effect of which is merely to suspend the tenancy until the grounds for the forfeiture conditional have ceased. Thus where the copyholder purports to convey the freehold, there is a forfeiture absolute; whereas if he merely grants a lease contrary to the custom of the manor there is only a forfeiture optional.

The making of a false declaration as to qualification to own a British ship or any share therein makes such ship, etc., liable to forfeiture (Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 67 (2)). A foreign ship assuming the character of a British ship, except for the purpose of escaping capture in war, or, if a warship, in the exercise of a belligerent right, is also liable to forfeiture (ib., s. 69).

If the master or owner of a British ship conceals the British character of the ship, or assumes a foreign character with intent to deceive any person entitled to inquire into the matter, the ship is subject to forfeiture (ib., s. 71).

Formerly forfeiture was a result of many acts by tenants or owners of estates on the ground of their being considered by the feudal law as contrary to the duties of the tenants towards their lords. Thus a feoffment of land by a tenant for life was a forfeiture of his estate, because it was an attempt to dispose of the reversion; but this operation of a feoffment was abolished in 1845. See FEOFFMENT.

In criminal law, forfeiture is obsolete. If a person solemnizes or assists at the marriage of any descendant of King George II., in contravention of the Royal Marriages Act, 1772, it would appear that his lands and goods are forfeited to the Crown; but this part of the possible punishment is not likely to be enforced. If a person is outlawed for treason, his lands are forfeited to the Crown; if a person is outlawed for felony, he forfeits to the Crown all his goods and chattels, real and personal, and also the profits of his freeholds during his life; after his death the King is further entitled to his freeholds for a year and a day, with the right of committing in them any waste he pleases (called the King's year, day, and waste); but no one has been outlawed for nearly a century. Formerly conviction for any kind of felony caused a forfeiture of goods and chattels, both real and personal, but this has been abolished. See ATTAINDER; ESCHEAT; FELONY; ADMINISTRATOR.

Sentence of death, of penal servitude, of imprisonment with hard labour, or of imprisonment exceeding twelve months, for treason or felony causes forfeiture of all public office, pension, etc., unless there be a free pardon within two months of conviction, or before the office is filled (Forfeiture Act, 1870, s. 2).

Forfeiture of Marriage. A writ (abolished in 1660 with the Court of Wards and Liveries) of which Fitzherbert (N.N.B. 141) says: "If the heir be in the lord's custody and doth marry himself within age, without the assent of the lord, and when he cometh of full age, he entreth upon the lord and puts him out of the land, then the lord shall have a writ of Forfeiture of Marriage against him for the double value of the marriage." The writ was also known as Forisfactura Maritagii.

Compare VALUE OF MARRIAGE.

Forgabulum; Forgavel. A quit rent; a small rent reserved in money.

Forged Transfers Acts, 1891 and 1892. These Acts enable companies, friendly and similar societies, local authorities, and colonial Governments to make compensation in cash to the holder of any of their stocks, shares and securities which have passed to him by way of a forged transfer, and to which he has no title as against the rightful owner. The Acts apply only to companies, etc., which have adopted them.

Forgery. Down to the year 1914 there was no statutory definition of forgery, and recourse to the decisions of the Courts and to the common law was necessary in order to define it, while the statute law as to the offence was to be found mainly in the Forgery Acts, 1861 and 1870. But, in particular sections of no fewer than about seventy other Acts, various matters were specifically declared to be forgery or punishable as forgery. The Forgery Act, 1913, which came into operation on the 1st January, 1914, repealed every single one of those enactments, except ss. 3, 5, 6, 28, 34, 36, 37, 42, 43, 44, 47, 48, 49, 50, and 51 of the Act of 1861, and s. 4 of the Act of 1870. The whole law as to forgery, properly so called, including an elaborate definition of the offence, is now to be found in the Act of 1913 and in the unrepealed parts of the Acts of 1861 and 1870. This makes all the pre-existing learning on the subject entirely obsolete.

There are, however, many cases of forging or fabricating documents which are not forgery in point of law, as, for instance, the offence of forging a hawker's licence, which is dealt with in s. 4 (2) of the Hawkers Act, 1888. Such offences are really offences kindred to forgery. The special Acts relating to them are enumerated under the heading Forgery and Kindred Offences, in the Index of the Statutes in Force, which is published annually, as Vol. II. of the Chronological Table and Index of the Statutes, by H.M. Stationery Office.

Forinsecus. (From without; on the outside.) This word is found in the expression forinsecum servitium, which meant such service as was due to the superior of whom the lord himself held the land, while intrinsecum servitium meant such service as was due out of the land by a tenant who held of the lord. The intrinsecum servitum was "inside," and arose out of the bargain between the lord and the tenant: the forinsecum servitium was "outside," and existed independently of any such bargain. The word also occurs in the expression forinsecum manerum, which, where a manor lay partly within and partly without the liberties of a town, meant the part without the liberties.

Forisbannitus. Banished; as in the expression forisbannitus ab Anglia.

Forisfacere. To do something outside, that is to say, outside law or custom; also to forfeit or to exact a forfeit from.

Forisfactura. Forfeiture.

Forisfactura Maritagii, De. See FORFEITURE OF MARRIAGE.

Forisfactura pugnæ. The same as fightwite (q.v.).

Forisfamiliate. A son was said, in the time of Bracton, to be forisfamiliated when his father gave him seisin of part of his land and the son accepted it in full discharge of all claim to any other property of the father.

Forjudge; Forjudger; Forjudgment; Forjudicatum. To forjudge is to deprive a person of a thing or right by a judgment. Thus where, under the old law, a mesne lord was bound to acquit or indemnify his tenant paravail against services demanded of him by the lord paramount, and failed to do so, he was liable upon the writ of mesne (q.v.) to be forjudged or deprived of the services of the tenant paravail. (Norman French, forjuger, from foris, out, and judicare, to judge.) So also where an order was made depriving an attorney or officer of a Court of his right to appear therein the order was called a forjudger, forjudgment, or, anciently, forjudicatum.

Forler-land. This was land, forming part of the endowment of the see of Hereford, which anciently was leased only for the life of the Bishop of Hereford for the time being.

Form; Formality. See IRREGULAR; also ACTION ON THE CASE.

Forma juramenti illorum de consilio regis. (Form for the Oath of those of the King's Council.) Printed under these titles in the Statutes of the Realm (Vol. I., p. 248), amongst Statutes of Uncertain Date. It is not in the Statutes at Large. The oath now to be taken by members of the Privy Council is that prescribed by the Promissory Oaths Act, 1868, s. 2.

Forma legalis is forma essentialis (10 Co. 100). (Legal form is essential form) "and," continues Coke, "stands upon the substance of the thing to be done, and upon the sense of the statute." For the purposes of the construction of a statute there was a distinction between forma verbalis, which stood "upon the letters and syllables of the Act" and the forma legalis, which went to essentials.

Formalities. Formerly used as meaning the robes or insignia of an office or dignity. Selden uses it as meaning a component part of a coat of arms: the London Gazette of 1696 speaks of the members of a municipal corporation being "in their formalities," that is to say, in their robes.

Forma pauperis. See IN FORMÂ PAUPERIS.

Formedon. Writs of formedon (de formâ donationis) were brought by persons who claimed land under a gift (donatio) in tail when it was in the possession of a person not entitled to it. A formedon in the descender was brought by the issue in tail, a formedon in the remainder by a person entitled in remainder after the determination of the estate tail, and a formedon in the reverter by the reversioner or donor of the estate tail. They were all abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36. See DISCONTINUANCE; HABERE FACIAS VISUM.

Formella, Formee. The translation of the ASSISA DE PONDERIBUS, ETC. (q.v.) in the Statutes at Large (Vol. I., p. 205) declares that "every formel containeth six stone except two pound, and every stone doth consist of twelve pound, and every pound consisteth of the weight of twenty-five shillings, whereby the sum in the formel is seventy pound."

Fornagium. The fee paid by a tenant to his lord for having his bread baked in the lord's oven, or for permission to use his own oven.

Fornication. This means voluntary sexual intercourse between two unmarried persons. In early times the Courts leet could inflict a fine, known as leger-wite, for fornication. This jurisdiction had fallen into disuse during the Middle Ages. In London and some other towns, under certain customary laws, there was some slight criminal jurisdiction with regard to fornication: but this also fell into disuse at an early period. During the period 1649-1660 fornication was for the first and last time made punishable by statute. Chapter 10 of the Acts of Parliament for 1650 made fornication punishable with three months' imprisonment. The often-repeated statement that a second offence was a capital felony under this Act is incorrect (see ADULTERY; INCEST). Now, fornication, unless it be incest, or with a girl under sixteen, or unless it be committed in a public place so as to involve indecency, or unless it involve the keeping of a disorderly house, is not a criminal offence.

The ecclesiastical Courts from the earliest times had jurisdiction as to fornication just as they had with regard to other forms of incontinence. The statute Circumspecte agatis (q.v.) expressly recognised this jurisdiction. Now an ecclesiastical Court can inflict the punishment known as penance (q.v.) for any form of incontinence (see CANONS OF 1603, No. 109). The jurisdiction is limited by the Ecclesiastical Suits Act, 1787, s. 2, which provides that any proceedings for incontinence must take place within eight months of the offence, and shall be barred by the intermarriage of the parties. Ecclesiastical Courts have for many years ceased to deal with sexual offences by laymen. In the case of clergymen, fornication, like other forms of incontinence, can be and is dealt with under the Clergy Discipline Acts, 1840 and 1892.

See CONTUMACE CAPIENDO; CONTUMACY; EX TURPI CAUSA.

Forprise. Used in the statute 22 Hen. 8, c. 15, and other early statutes, as well as in legal documents, to mean an exception or reservation. In leases and conveyances the expression "excepted and forprised" was frequently found.

Forspeaker. Anciently this meant an advocate.

Forsteal. In Anglo-Saxon and early post-Conquest law this meant waylaying an enemy.

Fortescue. John Fortescue was Chief Justice of the King's Bench in the reign of Henry VI.; he died about 1476. He wrote the well-known treatise De Laudibus Legum Angliæ.

Fortior est custodia legis quam hominis (2 Rol. Rep. 325). (The custody of the law is stronger than that of man.)

Fortior et potentior est dispositio legis quam hominis (Co. Litt. 234). (The will of the law is more resolute and more powerful than that of man.) Coke cites this maxim in support of the proposition that "such condition as is intended by the law to be annexed to anything is as strong as if the condition were put in writing."

Compare FIRMIOR ET POTENTIOR, etc.

Fortiori, A. Used as meaning "much more" in some such expression as "If A. be necessary, then a fortiori is B. necessary."

Fortuna. Anciently this meant treasure-trove (q.v.).

Fortune Telling. Under the Witchcraft Act, 1735, c. 5, s. 4, fortune telling is an indictable offence. Prosecutions are never instituted now under that Act, as the Vagrancy Act, 1824, s. 4, provides that persons pretending to tell fortunes shall be punishable as rogues and vagabonds upon summary conviction. See VAGABOND.

Forty-days Court. The same as the Court of Attachment of the Forest (q.v.). Also known as wood-mote. It was held before the verderers at intervals of forty days to try all offences against the forest laws.

Forum. A place; the place in which a remedy at law can be sought; a Court. A matter is said to be in foro conscientiæ when it is one which must be decided according to the dictates of conscience. A forum domesticum, or domestic court, is one which decides matters relating to a body, such as an Inn of Court, which is not within the purview of the ordinary Courts. A forum competens, or incompetens, means a Court which has, or has not, jurisdiction to deal with a matter. The word is used in the Statute of Westminster II., c. 43, in the expression forum regium, the King's Court. The word is commonly found in some such phrase as "This is a matter for another forum," i.e., "This is a matter for another Court."

Forwarding Agent; Forwarding Merchant. This is an agent who ships goods from England to merchants abroad on behalf of the owners of the goods. His rights and liabilities are governed by the principles which apply to other agents. See AGENT; PRINCIPAL.

Fossa. See FURCA ET FOSSA.

Fossatum. A ditch, as a defence of a walled town, or a ditch generally. Fossatura was another form. Fossaturum opera meant work done on the maintenance of ditches. Fossagium meant the levy made upon burgesses for maintaining the ditch round the town.

Foster-land. This, in Anglo-Saxon times and in the time of Domesday, meant land for the support of the monks of a monastery.

Fosterlean. This appears from Jacob to have meant, in Anglo-Saxon times, a provision for a wife corresponding to the later jointure.

Fother; Fodder. This literally meant a cartload. From that it came to mean about a ton. In the time of Jacob (1739) it was a customary weight for lead, but the weight varied in different places. Generally it meant 21 cwt. and 56 lbs.: but in London it meant only 19 cwt. and 56 lbs., while in the lead-mining districts it meant 22 cwt. and 56 lbs.

Foundation. The building and endowment of a college or hospital.

Foundling Hospital, The. The statute regulating the Foundling Hospital, London, is the 13 Geo. 2, c. 29, which confirmed and amplified the provisions of the royal charter by which the hospital had been incorporated in 1739.

Fourcher; Fourch; Furcare. To fork or divide an action; to delay an action. When A. and B. were sued jointly, neither was bound to answer until both had appeared. A. would come in on the essoin day, but B. would not, then the matter would be adjourned to enable B. to come in; B. would come in, but A. would not; then the matter would be again adjourned to enable A. to come in. From the old text-books it does not clearly appear to what length this manœuvre could be carried. It was forbidden to joint tenants and co-parceners by the Statute of Westminster I., c. 42, and to other defendants by subsequent statutes. The Termes de la Ley (1602) speaks of it as being in common use. So does Jacob in 1739; but in 1787 Reeves speaks of fourching as a thing which had formerly been practised. The abolition of essoins (q.v.) and of the essoin day in 1830-1832 made the practice impossible.

Four-day Order. Order 41, r. 5 of the R. S. C., provides that every order or judgment requiring any person to do an act shall specify the time within which such act is to be done. If, however, the order, etc., does not specify the time, then the Court makes a supplemental order fixing the time, and this order, although not invariably giving four or only four days for compliance, is known in the Chancery Division as a "four-day order."

Four Seas. These meant (1) the Atlantic; (2) the North Sea; (3) the German Ocean; and (4) the English Channel.

Coke upon Littleton (1628) defines the expression intra quatuor maria (within the four seas) as meaning "within the Kingdom of England and the dominions of the same Kingdom," which makes it mean in England, Scotland, or Ireland, but not within such colonies or plantations as then existed. Compare ABSENCE BEYOND SEAS.

Fovea. (A pit.) Anciently it meant a vault or grave for the dead.

F.O.W. These letters, which stand for "first open water," are used in charter-parties for northern European ports which are frozen up in winter. They mean "immediately after the ice breaks up so as to make navigation possible."

Fowls, Domestic. The Poultry Act, 1911, is "an Act to enable Orders to be made under the Diseases of Animals Acts for protecting Live Poultry from Unnecessary Suffering" while in transit or for sale. Fowls are animals within the meaning of the Protection of Animals Act, 1911; see s. 15 (a). See ANIMALS, LIABILITY FOR; CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.

Fowls of Warren. These were such fowls as the grantee of a right of free warren (q.v.) could take and kill to the exclusion of all other persons. They certainly included pheasants and partridges. It is disputed whether woodcock, herons, mallards, quails, and rails were also included.

Fox. The fox is a wild animal in which there can be no property unless it is kept in confinement. (See ANIMALS FERÆ NATURÆ.) Fox hunting is a trespass unless it be carried on with licence from the owners or occupiers of land. The old common law theory that a fox, being a noxious wild animal, might, like an escaped tiger, be lawfully followed and destroyed anywhere is now quite untenable.

Fox's Libel Act. This is the popular title of the Libel Act, 1792, which was passed at the instance of Charles James Fox. It got rid of the common law doctrine that in a prosecution for libel it was for the judge to decide whether the document alleged to be a libel is or is not a libel, and it left that, like every other question, to the jury.

F.P.A. These letters stand for "free from particular average," and are used in connection with policies of marine insurance to denote that the underwriter is liable only for a total loss, whether actual or constructive. See AVERAGE.

Fractionem diei non recipit lex (Lofft, 572). (The law does not recognise any fraction of a day.) Compare DE MINIMIS.

Frampole Fences. These were fences on the Manor of Writtel, in Essex, for the repair of which the tenants had certain unusual rights of taking the lord's timber.

Franchilanus. A free tenant; a freeman.

Franchise, in its general sense, is a liberty or privilege.

I. At common law, a franchise is a royal privilege or branch of the Crown's prerogative, subsisting in the hands of a subject, either by grant or by prescription. Franchises are of two classes—(1) those which originally formed part of the Crown's prerogative, and could therefore be exercised by the King jure coronæ before they were granted to a subject: such as the franchises of waifs, estrays, wrecks, royal fish, forests, etc.; (2) those which can only be created by granting them to a subject: such as fairs, markets, tolls, parks, warrens, etc. (see the various titles). The distinction is so far of importance that when a franchise of the former class is appendant to a manor or the like, and they both come into the hands of the Crown, the appendancy is extinguished, because the franchise merges in the prerogative: while in the case of a franchise of the latter class the appendancy would be preserved. A franchise is an incorporeal hereditament (see HEREDITAMENT); it not only authorises something to be done, but gives the owner the right of preventing all other persons from interfering with its exercise: thus, the owner of a market, ferry or the like, can generally prevent anyone from setting up a new market or ferry so near to his as to diminish his custom.

II. Franchise also means the locality subject to a franchise.

III. In ancient times, among other franchises usually granted by the Crown to a new borough on its incorporation, was the right of sending burgesses to Parliament; and hence franchise came to mean the right to elect members of parliament, whether in boroughs or counties.

See ELECTORAL FRANCHISE; PARLIAMENT.

Franchise Prisons. These were prisons in which debtors were confined under the authority of ancient grants from the Crown of the franchise or privilege of keeping the debtors in custody. Such a franchise was an estate of inheritance, descending to the heir of the grantee, or being held in right of succession by a corporation, if the grant had been to the corporation. In 1858 seven franchise prisons existed: (1) Swansea Debtors' Prison for the Liberty of Gower, which was in an old Norman castle belonging to the Duke of Beaufort; (2) Newark Liberty Prison for Debtors; (3) Halifax Home Gaol for the Manor of Wakefield; (4) Gaol for the Forest and Forest Liberty of Knaresborough, belonging to the Duchy of Lancaster; (5) Gaol for the Borough and Township of Knaresborough, belonging to the Duchy of Lancaster; (6) Sheffield Debtors' Gaol, for the Liberty of Hallamshire, and (7) Hexham Debtors' Prison. The grants under which they were carried on had all been made before Lord Coke wrote in the seventeenth century. They were all abolished by the statute 21 & 22 Vict. c. 22, which provided that the debtors then confined in them should be removed to county gaols on 1st August, 1858.

Franconia Case. The popular title of R. v. Keyn (1876), 2 Ex. D. 63. The question in the case was whether a foreign subject in command of a foreign ship could be convicted at the Central Criminal Court of the manslaughter of a person whose death resulted from the negligent navigation of the foreign ship within three miles of English territory. It was held that he could not (see HIGH SEAS).

Frankalmoign is the tenure by which the lands of the Church are for the most part held. "And," says Littleton, "such tenure beganne first in old time. When a man in old time was seised of certain lands or tenements in his demesne as of fee, and of the same land infeoffed an abbot and his covent, or prior and his covent, to have and to hold to them and their successours in pure and perpetuall almes or in frankalmoigne, in such case the tenements were holden in frankalmoigne." Tenants in frankalmoign do no fealty or other temporal service to their lord, but are only bound to celebrate divine service in accordance with the Book of Common Prayer; and, if they fail to do so, the lord cannot distrain them, but can only complain to their ordinary or visitor. See TENURE BY DIVINE SERVICE.

The word is derived from the Norman French, fraunche aumoyne, or aumone=free alms.

Frankbank. "In some boroughes," says Littleton, "by custome, the wife shall have for her dower all the tenements which were her husband's. And this is called frank banke, francus bancus." See DOWER; FREEBENCH.

Frank-chase. A free chase. See CHASE. A right of free chase over any area restricted the right of persons holding land within that area to cut even their own timber.

Frank-fee. Freehold land, especially as distinguished from land in ancient demesne (q.v.) or copyhold (q.v.).

Frank-ferme. Land, the tenure of which had been changed by feoffment from knight service (q.v.) to socage (q.v.).

Frank-foldage. The same as foldage (q.v.).

Franking Letters. In 1660 the members of both Houses of Parliament claimed the privilege of "franking" letters, etc., that is to say, of sending them through the post free of charge merely by writing their signatures on the outside. They were permitted to do this without any right, statutory or otherwise, until the privilege was legalised by the statute 4 Geo. 3, c. 24, which, however, restricted the right to letters, etc., not exceeding two ounces in weight, thereby stopping the franking of many things which certainly were not letters, and restricted to ten the number of letters that might be sent on any one day by any peer or M.P. But M.P.s used to supply friends and constituents with numbers of covers bearing only their signatures for use at any time; and there was no means of keeping an M.P. within his limit of ten a day. The statute 7 Will. 4, and 1 Vict., c. 35, s. 9, made it obligatory on every peer or M.P. who wished to frank a letter to write thereon, in his own hand, not merely his signature, but also the full name and address of the addressee as well as the date, and to post the letter on that date in or within twenty miles of the town where the peer or M.P. actually was; and the name of the town also had to be written by the peer or M.P. The privilege was completely abolished by the Post Office (Duties) Act, 1840, s. 55.

Concurrently with this parliamentary privilege there had existed, and there still exists, the privilege of certain high officials and of certain Government offices to send and receive letters upon which no stamp need be used, and members of either House of Parliament can send unstamped letters from the Houses of Parliament and letters addressed to them there need not be stamped; but such letters are not said to be franked.

Frank-law. The rights secured to a man by the common law. When a man lost his frank-law, the effect, according to Crompton (1583), was that he could not serve on a jury, he could not appear in the King's Court except by an attorney, his lands and goods were seized into the king's hand, his lands were estreated and he was committed to prison. Crompton says that a conviction for conspiracy involved these consequences.

Frankmarriage. When land was given with the words "in frankmarriage" to a man and his wife by the father or some blood relation of the wife, then she and her husband had the land to them and their issue, although no words of inheritance or procreation were used in the gift. They had therefore a kind of estate in tail special, the peculiarity of which was that they and their issue to the fourth degree held the land free of services to the donor, and that they had to bring it into hotchpot before they could take any other land by descent in fee simple from the donor. (See ESTATE TAIL; HOTCHPOT.) It is now obsolete.

Frankmarriage (free marriage) is a translation of the low Latin liberum maritagium. Maritagium was a dowry or gift to a woman about to marry: it was said to be "free" when it was free from services. "Maritagium," said Bracton, "est aut liberium aut servitio obligatum" (lib. 3, c. 7), that is to say, a maritagium is either free or subject to service.

The words in liberum maritagium were words of art: the effect produced by them could not be produced by other words of the same meaning. Thus, a gift of lands "in connubio soluto ab omni servitio" passed only an estate for life instead of an estate in tail special. See Co. Litt. 21.

Frankpledge (Norman French franc plege = free pledge) is a mistranslation of the Saxon word friborh or frithborh, literally pledge or surety for peace; it was the name given to those associations of ten persons into which, about the time of the Conquest, all men were bound to combine themselves. They were standing sureties for one another's good behaviour. The "view of frankpledge," or duty of seeing that these associations were kept in perfect order and number, was vested in the local Courts, especially the Courts Leet (q.v.). See HEADBOROUGH.

Frank-tenement is the same as "freehold" (q.v.).

Frassetum. A place on which ash trees are growing. The more correct form is fraxinetum.

Frater fratri uterino non succedet in hæreditate paternâ (Fort. de Laud, by Amos, 15). (A brother shall not succeed a brother by the mother's side in the paternal inheritance.) This, however, is not now law. See BLOOD.

Fratriagium. This is stated by Jacob (1749) to have meant a younger brother's inheritance; and he adds, citing Bracton, Lib. 2, c. 35, that for what the younger brother took he did homage to the elder brother, who in his turn did homage to the lord. But homage was an incident only of freehold land, and such land could be inherited only by the eldest brother. Even in the time of Glanvil, the tenant could alienate either the whole or sometimes only (see HEREDITAS) a "reasonable part" of his land during his lifetime—there was no will of lands until long after the time of Glanvil—in order, amongst other things, to portion a son or a daughter; and a portion so alienated, when the alienation was to a younger son, would appear to have been described as Fratriagium.

Fraud is used in many senses, but the point common to all of them is that pecuniary advantage is gained by unfair means.

I. Actual fraud is where one person causes pecuniary injury to another by intentionally misrepresenting or concealing a material fact which from their mutual position he was bound to explain or disclose. (See MISREPRESENTATION; CONCEALMENT.) This kind of fraud is also sometimes called "personal" or "moral," as opposed to "legal" or "constructive" fraud (infra). The difficulty in saying whether a particular act amounts to fraud lies in the necessity of determining what relation gives rise to the obligation to disclose a fact which, if disclosed, would materially affect the conduct of the defrauded person: and as the variations of human transactions and circumstances are infinite, an exhaustive enumeration of the relations giving occasion for fraud is impossible. Moreover, in many cases, the effect of fraud may be counteracted by the conduct of the defrauded person: as where he does not rely on the representation (see Dolus dans locum contractui), or where he is guilty of gross negligence.

The following are some of the more important instances of actual fraud.

If a person by intentional misrepresentation or concealment of a material fact peculiarly within his own knowledge induces another person to enter into a contract, conveyance or similar transaction with him, which he would not have entered into had he known the truth, the contract or other transaction is fraudulent: as where a person is induced to purchase a business by false accounts of its position and profits. Fraud also exists when a person enters into a contract, conveyance or similar transaction, with the intention of afterwards doing some act of such a nature that if the other party had known of his intention he would not have entered into the transaction. Accordingly if A induces B to enter into a contract with him with the object of committing an illegal or unlawful act to the injury of B, that is a fraud on B: thus a separation deed is fraudulent if the wife's real object in entering into it is to enable her to renew a former illicit intercourse which has been concealed from the husband; so it is a fraud to buy goods with the intention of not paying for them.

II. Fraud sometimes exists where no wrongful intention is proved. In this sense of the word, "fraud," or "constructive" or "legal fraud," is a comprehensive expression which indicates the cases in which a Court will not enforce or will set aside a contract, instrument or transaction, in which the Court is of opinion that it is unconscientious for a person to avail himself of the advantage which he has obtained. The principal instances of this kind of fraud are as follows:— First, the fraud may be apparent from the intrinsic nature and subject of the bargain itself, such as no man in his senses and not under delusion would accept on the one hand, and as no honest and fair man would accept on the other, which are inequitable and unconscientious bargains: and of such even the common law has taken notice. A well-known instance is the case in which a man agreed to buy a horse—worth about £8—for a barleycorn for the first nail in the horse's shoes, two for the second, and so on for each of the thirty-two nails, which made in all about 500 quarters of barley. Secondly, the fraud may be presumed from the circumstances and condition of the parties contracting, by that rule of equity established to prevent one person from taking surreptitious advantage of the weakness or necessity of another, "which knowingly to do is equally against conscience as to take advantage of his ignorance; a person is equally unable to judge for himself in one as the other." The principal instances of this kind of fraud occur (1) where there is a confidential or fiduciary relation between the parties; hence all contracts and conveyances whereby benefits are secured by children to their parents or guardians, and between cestui que trusts and their trustees, are always liable to be set aside, unless they are entered into with scrupulous good faith and are reasonable under the circumstances; (2) where one person takes an unfair advantage of the necessities or inexperience of another: it is on this ground that "catching bargains" (q.v.) with heirs, reversioners and expectants for the sale of their reversions or expectancies during the life of their parents and ancestors used formerly to be set aside merely because of the inadequacy of the price. Thirdly, a transaction may be fraudulent on the ground of public policy. To this class belong marriage brocage contracts (q.v.). "Frauds on third persons" are where one enters into an arrangement with or incurs an obligation to another, and at the same time, or afterwards, does an act without his knowledge by which the benefit of the arrangement or obligation is partly or wholly destroyed. The following is an instance:— If an insolvent debtor enters into an arrangement with the general body of his creditors by which they accept a proportion of their debts in satisfaction of the whole, and the debtor, or any person on his behalf, in order to procure the consent of some particular creditor, secretly promises him an advantage over the others, this agreement is void as being "in fraud of creditors."

A person to whom a power of appointment is given must exercise it bonâ fide for the end designed by the donor, otherwise the appointment will be set aside on the ground that it is what is termed a fraud on the power. Thus, if a parent having a power of appointing an estate to any of his children, appoints it to one upon a previous bargain with that child that he should pay the father a consideration for it, the Court will set aside the appointment. So it seems that if a power is given to a person to appoint by will only, a covenant by him to exercise it in a particular way is void, being a fraud on the power.

An act may be a fraud on the public: on this principle, an agreement to publish a work under a misleading title will not be enforced by the Court.

An act is sometimes said to be a fraud on a statute when it is an evasion of its provisions. For example, A sold a patent to B in consideration of B paying him royalties; B at the same time lent A £12,500, and it was agreed that B should retain one-half of the royalties as they became payable towards satisfaction of the debt, provided that if A became bankrupt B might retain the whole of the royalties in satisfaction of the debt: this proviso was held to be a fraud upon the bankruptcy laws and void.

III. Certain acts are made frauds by statute. Thus, by the Companies Act, 1867, s. 38, a prospectus which did not comply with the requirements of the Act in specifying all contracts entered into by the company, or the promoters, trustees or directors thereof, before the issue of the prospectus, was to be deemed fraudulent. This is an instance of "legal" fraud, in which proof of fraudulent intention is not required (supra, and see FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES; FRAUDULENT PREFERENCE). See MARITAL RIGHTS.

The effect of fraud may be said in general to be to entitle the injured person to avoid the transaction induced by the fraud (e.g., in the case of a contract, to have it rescinded) or to recover damages for the injury (see DECEIT); it gives rise to a defence to any action brought by the fraudulent party to enforce the contract or other transaction, but it does not make it void ab initio. In some cases an act is both a fraud on A and also wrongful against B, as in the case of the wrongful use of trade marks and trade names (q.v.). An agreement in fraud of third persons, or one which is a fraud on a statute, or on the public, is void ab initio, and not merely voidable. See VOID; VOIDABLE.

Certain frauds are also dealt with by the criminal law, and constitute misdemeanours. Such are frauds committed by public officers in discharge of their duties and affecting the public, and frauds committed by trustees (Larceny Act, 1916, s. 21), directors and other officers (ib. ss. 20, 21; Larceny Act, 1861, ss. 82-84).

Frauds, Statute of. See STATUTE OF FRAUDS.

Fraudulent Conveyance. By the statute 13 Eliz. c. 5, conveyances of landed estates or of goods, made for the purpose of delaying, hindering or defrauding creditors, are void as against them unless made for valuable consideration and bonâ fide to a person not having notice of the fraud.

By the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 1, a fraudulent conveyance, gift, delivery or transfer by a debtor of his property or any part thereof, is an act of bankruptcy (q.v.): by "fraudulent" is meant that the conveyance is one which tends to defeat or delay the creditors. See FRAUDULENT PREFERENCE.

Fraudulent Creditor. "If any creditor, or any person claiming to be a creditor, in any bankruptcy proceedings, wilfully and with intent to defraud makes any false claim, or any proof, declaration, or statement of account which is untrue in any material particular, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanour" (Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 160).

Fraudulent Debtor. See the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, ss. 154-159, and DEBTORS ACT, 1869.

Fraudulent Preference. The doctrine of fraudulent preference has for its object to prevent a debtor on the eve of bankruptcy from making a voluntary distribution of his property amongst his creditors, so as to defeat the distribution which is contemplated by the bankruptcy laws. Accordingly, every conveyance of property or charge thereon made, every payment made, every obligation incurred and every judicial proceeding taken or suffered by an insolvent person in favour of any creditor with a view of giving that creditor a preference over the others, will, if the insolvent becomes bankrupt within three months after the conveyance, payment, etc., be deemed fraudulent and void as against the trustee in bankruptcy (Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 44). The doctrine of fraudulent preference also applies to insolvent companies (Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, s. 210).

Fraudulent Settlement. Where an antenuptial settlement comprises property without which the settlor cannot pay all his debts or contains a covenant for the settlement of any property (not being property of or in right of the wife) in which he has not any present estate or interest, then, if the settlor becomes bankrupt or compounds or arranges with his creditors, and if it appears to the Court that the settlement was made with intent to defeat creditors or to have been unjustifiable in view of the state of the settlor's affairs when it was made, the Court may refuse, suspend or grant only conditionally an order of discharge, or refuse to approve a composition or arrangement as if the debtor had been guilty of fraud (Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 27). It must, however, be recollected that marriage is a valuable consideration; and unless both parties to the settlement are cognisant of the facts which make the settlement fraudulent quoad one of them, then the settlement is not void as being a fraudulent conveyance (q.v.).

Fraus est celare fraudem (1 Vern. 270). (It is fraud to conceal fraud.) Said by Lord Chancellor Jeffreys of one who had made an unconscionable bargain and had deliberately refrained from acquiring knowledge which would have fixed him with knowledge of facts fatal to his contention that the transaction was honest on his part.

Fraus est odiosa et non præsumenda (Cro. Car. 550). (Fraud is hateful and not to be presumed.)

Fraus et dolus nemini patrocinari debent (3 Rep. 78*b*). (Fraud and deceit ought not to avail anyone.) Compare Ex dolo malo, etc.; Nemo ex suo delicto, etc.

Fraus et jus nunquam cohabitant (Wing. Max. 158). (Fraud and right [enforceable at law] never dwell together.) That is to say, they are incompatible.

Fredstole; Fridstol. Forms of "frithstool" (q.v.).

Fredum. Stated by Jacob to have been a composition paid by a criminal for freedom from prosecution.

Fredwit. Stated by Cowel to have been a liberty to hold courts.

Free. See CHAPEL; FISHERY; SERVICE; SOCAGE; WARREN. As to free miners, see GALE.

Freebench is an estate which by the custom of most manors the widow of a copyholder has in the land of which her husband was tenant. The nature and duration of the estate, and the quantity of the lands to which it extends, vary according to the particular custom, but in many points freebench closely resembles dower (q.v.). Although the Dower Act, 1833, does not apply to copyholds, the widow's right to freebench is in most manors subject to any alienations of the land made by the husband, whether inter vivos or by will; it is, however, paramount to his debts. The right to freebench is enforced by an action similar to an action of dower. See DOWER.

In some places the widower of a female copyholder has by custom an estate in his wife's lands analogous to an estate by the curtesy in freeholds, and called his "man's freebench" or customary curtesy. (See CURTESY). This is called frank-bank (q.v.).

Freeboard; Freebord. This seems to mean a strip of land lying, for a width varying in different cases, outside the fence enclosing an ancient park. The usual width seems to be about two and a half feet: in the case of Richmond Park it is stated to be sixteen feet and a half. It would seem not to be necessarily the property of the owner of the park, who, however, can prevent anyone from building on it or otherwise depriving it of its open character.

Freeborough Men. Jacob (1749) states that this meant men of high position who were not required to give and get the sureties for good behaviour required under the frankpledge (q.v.) system. But it does not appear where he got either the word or its meaning. The word freeborough is obviously only a late form of friborough (q.v.), and freeborough men would appear to have meant persons who were in fact subject to frankpledge.

Freedom from Incumbrance. As to the covenant on this subject, formerly universal in conveyances but now never used, see COVENANTS.

Freedom of a Borough. A person who is a freeman of a borough is said to possess the freedom of the borough. Before the enactment of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1835, the freedom of each borough was regulated by its local customs in so far as those customs were not inconsistent with its charter. The freemen formed a part of the corporation of each borough: usually they had the right to vote at parliamentary elections and were exempt from the borough tolls and dues; and in many boroughs the corporate property was held for their benefit exclusively. As a rule, freedom was acquired either by birth, marriage, apprenticeship to a freeman, gift or purchase. Under the Act of 1835, s. 2, all the existing rights of admission, otherwise than by gift or purchase, to the freedom and all the existing rights and privileges of freemen were preserved, except that the exemption from tolls and dues was restricted to persons who in 1835 had been, or were entitled to be, admitted as freemen, or were the wives, sons, daughters, or apprentices of a freeman, or were inhabitants of the various boroughs.

The Representation of the People Acts, 1832 and 1867, by ss. 32 and 56 respectively, preserved the right of freemen to the parliamentary franchise, but now the Representation of the People Act, 1918, s. 47, Sch. 8, has repealed those sections, and no freeman, as such, has any longer the right to vote at a parliamentary election. The term freeman now means anyone who might have become a freeman, otherwise than by gift or purchase, if the Act of 1835 had not been passed, and every person who is an inhabitant of a borough or the wife, widow, son or daughter of a freeman, or the husband of the daughter or of the widow of a freeman, or a person who has served his apprenticeship to a freeman (Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, ss. 201, 205).

Under the Honorary Freedom of Boroughs Act, 1885, a borough may admit as "honorary freemen" persons of distinction or persons who have rendered eminent services to the borough, but such persons acquire none of the rights of freemen.

None of the enactments above mentioned, except the Representation of the People Act, 1918, apply to the City of London (see LONDON). In the City, anyone may, in accordance with ancient custom, be made a freeman, as a mark of honour, by a vote of the Court of Common Council.

Free Entry, Egress and Regress is an expression used to denote that a person has the right to go on land again and again as often as may be reasonably necessary. Thus in the case of a tenant entitled to emblements (q.v.) after the expiration of his tenancy, the law, says Coke, "giveth him a speedy remedy to enter into the land, and to take and carry [the crop] away, and compelleth not him to take it at one time, or to carry it before it be ready to be carried; and therefore the law giveth all that is convenient, viz., free entry, egresse and regresse as much as is necessary."

Free Fold is said to be the same as foldage or faldage (q.v.), but it would seem to denote the right of the tenant to have his sheep folded by the lord, rather than the right of the lord to have the tenant's sheep on his land.

Free Goods. See FREE SHIPS.

Freehold is applied to interests in land in two senses, either to denote the quality of an estate, or to denote the tenure by which the land is held.

With reference to the quality of an estate, "every one," says Littleton, "which hath an estate in any lands or tenements for term of his owne life or another man's life, is called tenant of freehold, and none other of a lesser estate [e.g., a tenant for years] can have a freehold; but they of a greater estate have a freehold; for he in fee simple hath a freehold, and tenant in taile hath a freehold, etc." Hence estates of freehold are opposed to estates for years and other chattel interests. (See ESTATE; INTEREST.) In the old writers "freehold" is used generally to denote an estate for life as opposed to a reversion. An estate of freehold descendible is an estate given to A and his heirs or the heirs of his body during the life of B. See QUASI-TAIL; OCCUPANT.

With reference to its tenure, land is said to be freehold when it is held by socage tenure (or by knight's service or other military tenure when those tenures existed), as opposed to land held by villeinage or customary tenures, such as copyhold land. (See SERVICE; TENURE.) Where two persons enter into a contract for the purchase and sale of land, whether in fee simple or otherwise, they are presumed to intend freehold land unless the nature of its tenure appears, and therefore if it turns out to be copyhold the purchaser cannot be compelled to carry out the contract, unless the tenure is in reality equivalent to freehold.

"Freehold" originally meant an estate held by a freeman, as opposed to "villeinage" (q.v.). It seems to have been originally used in much the same sense as seisin (q.v.), that is, the feudal possession of land. Thus in the old books a distinction is drawn between freehold in deed and freehold in law. Where a man dies seised of land so that it descends to his son, then until the son enters on the land he has only a freehold in law, which, however, is sufficient to entitle his wife to dower if he dies before entry.

Freehold Land Societies. Before the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893, came into force freehold land societies were formed under the Building Societies Acts. In a freehold land society subscriptions are received from the members in the way generally adopted by building societies, and, with the funds thus acquired, an estate is purchased in some eligible situation. The property is then laid out in lots of a size suited to the wants of the members; roads are made, and other improvements effected, the cost of which, and of the conveyance to the society, is added to the amount of the purchase-money. The total sum thus expended upon the whole estate is then equitably apportioned amongst the several lots, and determines their price. The members are thus enabled to obtain a small quantity of land at wholesale price. As a building society formed under the Building Societies Acts cannot legally hold land, except as security for advances, such an arrangement as the one above described was down to 1893 in reality ultra vires, and had to be effected through the medium of trustees, on whose honour the members had to rely: but now a freehold land society can be, and generally is, registered under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893, and when this is done, it can buy and sell land as it pleases.

See BUILDING SOCIETIES.

Freeman. A livery-man (q.v.).

See FREEDOM OF A BOROUGH.

Freemasons. Lodges of Freemasons are exempted by s. 5 of the Unlawful Societies Act, 1799, from the operation of that Act, provided (see ss. 6, 7) that they are duly registered under the Act; and s. 26 of the Seditious Meetings Act, 1817, provides that such registration shall also prevent that Act from applying. Consequently there is nothing illegal in the holding of masonic meetings.

Free Schools. This was the popular name of endowed schools, not being grammar schools (q.v.), at which instruction was given gratuitously. A grammar school at which instruction was given without payment was known as a free grammar school.

Free Ships. In the much-debated doctrine of international law which is summed up in the phrase, "free ships make free goods," a "free ship" means a neutral ship, while "free goods" means goods immune from capture by a belligerent.

Free Warren. See WARREN.

Freight. Strictly speaking, freight is the reward payable to a carrier by sea for the safe carriage and delivery of goods. Hence in ordinary cases it does not become payable unless the voyage is completed and the goods carried to their destination; but in some cases, where a part only of the voyage has been performed, freight is recoverable for that portion pro ratâ [parte or portione] itineris peracti (proportionally to the portion of the voyage performed): thus if the consignee voluntarily accepts the goods at a point short of their destination in such a way as to raise a fair inference that the further carriage is intentionally dispensed with, a new contract will be implied to pay freight for that portion of the voyage which has actually been performed.

When freight is prepaid, it is not strictly speaking freight at all and its nature differs considerably from that of ordinary freight, for it then ceases to be dependent on the safe delivery of the goods, and therefore if the goods are lost the shipowner is not liable to refund the prepaid freight.

In ordinary cases, the shipowner has a right of action against the consignor, or sometimes also against the consignee, for the recovery of the freight, and also has a lien on the goods for the amount, unless he has entered into a contract inconsistent with or expressly waiving his right of lien. As to the continuance of lien after the goods have been landed and warehoused, see the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, ss. 494-5.

Dead freight is money payable by a person who has chartered a ship and only partly loaded her, in respect of the loss of freight caused to the shipowner by the deficiency of cargo. There is no lien for dead freight.

See AFFREIGHTMENT; BILL OF LADING; CHARTERPARTY; LIEN.

French. The statute 36 Edw. 3, st. 1, c. 15, required pleadings—which were then delivered orally in open Court—to be in English instead of "in the French tongue which is much unknown in the realm." It further enacted that they should be entered and enrolled in Latin. The statute itself, like others of the period, is in French, and it was only after 1485 that English appeared in the statutes. The earliest statutes had been in Latin; later on one (e.g., 3 Edw. 1) is in French, while another (e.g., 4 Edw. 1) is in Latin again; but by 1309 French had become the more usual.

In 1731 the statute 4 Geo. 2, c. 26, ss. 1, 3, provided that as from 25th March, 1733, all pleadings, etc., except in the old Court of Admiralty, should be in English instead of in Latin. See FALSE LATIN.

French (or Fancy) Bread. This means bread which is different in appearance from ordinary household bread. Bread which is of the same quality as ordinary household bread may be "fancy bread" if baked of a fancy shape; and bread superior in quality to ordinary household bread is not fancy bread if it is baked in such a shape as to be indistinguishable by the eye from bread which is ordinary household bread as regards both quality and shape. See BREAD.

Frendwite. Stated by Blount to have been a pecuniary penalty for harbouring a friend who was an outlaw.

Frequentia actus multum operatur (4 Rep. 78; Wing. Max. 192). "The frequency of an act operates much": and so where the Princes of Wales had repeatedly acted as absolute owners of the duchy of Cornwall, this all went to show that each of them held in fee simple.

Fresh Disseisin. This was a disseisin (q.v.) of recent occurrence which a man in Bracton's time might defeat by his own power without having recourse to the law. See ASSISE OF NOVEL DESSEISIN: compare FORCIBLE ENTRY.

Fresh Fine. A fine (q.v.) which had been levied within the preceding year. See the Statute of Westminster II., c. 45.

Fresh Force. This was a force (q.v.) newly done within a city or borough. If it constituted a disseisin, then the party disseised might within forty days after the "force" bring his "assize (or bill) of fresh force" and recover the land.

Fresh Suit. In the law of distress, if the landlord comes to distrain and sees the tenant's cattle on the land, and the tenant, to prevent the distress, drives the cattle off the land, then if the lord makes fresh suit that is to say, follows the cattle, then and there, he may distrain them, although they are not on the land which the tenant holds of him.

"Suit" here means pursuit.

Freshwater Fish. See EELS.

Friborough; Friburg; Frithburgh. The spurious "Laws of Edward the Confessor" (1200) speak of the system "quam Angli vocant frithborgas," "Frithburg" was the proper form: "Friburg," or "freeborough," were corrupt forms, and frankpledge (q.v.) is a mistranslation of these corrupt forms.

Friendless Man. Anciently this meant an outlaw. The phrase (in the form freondleas man) occurs in the laws of Canute. See CANUTE, ETC.

Friendly Societies are now all registered, or treated as registered, under the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, 59 & 60 Vict., c. 25 (see s. 101). They are societies established to provide, by the voluntary subscriptions of their members, for the relief or maintenance of the members and their families during sickness or old age, or for the relief or maintenance of the widows and orphan children of deceased members, or similar objects (Friendly Societies Act, 1896, s. 8). Such societies have no legal status unless they are registered in pursuance of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, or of one of the earlier Friendly Societies Acts which were repealed and replaced by that Act. (See REGISTRAR.) Every registered society has one or more trustees in whom its property is vested (ib., s. 49), and who take and defend legal proceedings on its behalf (ib., s. 94). It must be regulated by rules defining its objects, the mode of holding meetings, the rates of the subscriptions and of the allowances during sickness and on death, the investments in which the funds are to be placed, etc., etc. (ib., s. 9 (2), (3), Sch. I.).

Friendly societies are intended for the encouragement of the frugal and industrious poor, and the legislature has therefore limited the amount to which any person can become entitled by being a member of one or more societies, to £300 by way of gross sum, and £52 a year by way of annuity (ib., s. 41).

A society with branches is one in which the members are divided into branches or groups, each having a separate fund administered by itself, although they are all under the control of a central body, and are all bound to contribute to a fund under the control of the central body (ib., s. 106).

Friendly societies are of numerous varieties, but the only two requiring mention here are deposit societies and dividing societies. A deposit society combines the functions of a savings bank with those of a friendly society, in a manner too complicated to be here described: as to such a society see s. 42 of the Act of 1896. A dividing society is one which periodically divides its funds among its members, the simplest plan being for the members to subscribe a fixed sum weekly or monthly, receiving in return certain benefits in case of sickness or death during the current year, at the end of which period the surplus funds are divided among the members: but such a society cannot be registered under the Act of 1896 unless it complies with s. 15 thereof.

See BENEVOLENT SOCIETIES; CATTLE INSURANCE SOCIETIES; COLLECTING SOCIETIES; WORKING MEN'S CLUBS; BUILDING SOCIETIES; INDUSTRIAL INSURANCE COMPANY; INDUSTRIAL AND PROVIDENT SOCIETIES; NOMINATION; DISSOLUTION.

Friendly Suit. This means a suit brought between parties by mutual arrangement in order to obtain a decision upon some point in which both are interested. In the old Chancery practice it meant a bill filed by consent of the Court, against executors or administrators, really by themselves but nominally at the instance of a creditor, in order to compel creditors to take an equal distribution of assets in an administration action.

Frith. The peace; found in many compounds of which some are given below.

Frithborgh. Frankpledge (q.v.).

Frithbreach. In Anglo-Saxon times this meant a breach of the peace.

Frith-gild. A guild or association for the maintenance of peace. See the Laws of Athelstan, lib. 6, c. 8, par. 9.

Frith-mote. From the Placita in itinere apud Cestriam of the 14 Hen. 7, this would seem to have been a local court of civil jurisdiction in the county palatine of Chester.

Frith Silver. This was an annual payment, charged upon the poor-rates of the parish of Alrewas, near Lichfield, which was made to Lord Somers down to the middle of the last century.

Frithsoken. The right to take the view of frankpledge (q.v.).

Frithstool. Literally, the seat of peace. It was a seat placed inside certain churches: anyone seeking sanctuary and seating himself in it was inviolable.

Frontage; Frontager. A frontager is a person owning or occupying land which abuts on a highway, river, seashore, or the like. The term is generally used with reference to the liability of frontagers on streets to contribute towards the expense of paving, draining, or other works on the highway carried out by a local authority, in proportion to the frontage of their respective tenements. It is also used with reference to rights of access (q.v.).

A frontager on the sea is under no liability at common law, apart from prescription, to maintain a sea wall on his land.

Fruit. As to compensation to market gardeners in respect of fruit trees planted by them on lands which they rent, see MARKET GARDEN.

Larceny of fruit is dealt with in the Larceny Act, 1861, ss. 36, 37, and malicious damage to it is dealt with in the Malicious Damage Act, 1861, ss. 23, 24.

Frusca terræ. Waste lands.

Frustrà fit per plura, quod fieri potest per pauciora (Wing. Max. 177). (It is useless to employ a multiplicity of agents when a less number will suffice). There is no use in employing several [instruments] to effectuate anything which can be done by a single instrument.

Frustrà legis auxilium quærit qui in legem committit (2 Hale P.C. 386). (He who offends against the law vainly seeks the help of the law.) And so an executor de son tort must go without remedies which are available for an executor duly appointed.

Frustrà probatur quod probatum non relevat (Halk. Max. 50). (It is useless to prove anything which does not improve your case.)

Frustrum terræ. A plot of land.

Fryzer. See SHEARMAN.

Fuage. See FUMAGE.

Fuel. See ESTOVERS.

Fuer; Fugere. The old French and the Latin respectively for "to fly." Both words were, however, used as nouns meaning flight. There was fuer in fait (fugere in facta), when an accused person literally ran away; and fuer in ley (fugere in lege) when upon an accused person being called to appear in the old county court, he failed so to do.

Fugacia. A chase (q.v.).

Fugam fecit. (He has made flight.) When a jury found, even in case of acquittal, that one charged with treason or felony had fled, such person anciently forfeited his lands and goods. Non-appearance to an indictment was held in law to amount to flight. The Criminal Law Act, 1827, s. 5, provided that a jury should not be charged to enquire whether any person indicted for treason or felony had fled; and the Forfeiture Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 23), practically abolished forfeiture (q.v.). See FUER.

Fugitive Offenders. See BACKING A WARRANT; EXTRADITION.

Fugitive's Goods. The goods of a man which had been forfeited because he had made flight. (See FUGAM FECIT.) Where a man fled for felony and escaped, his own goods were not forfeited as bona fugitivorum until it was found by proceedings of record (e.g., before the coroner, in case of death) that he fled for the felony. See WAIF.

Full Age. This is attained as from the first moment of the day preceding the twenty-first birthday.

Full Court. See INSTRUMENT OF APPEAL.

Fullers' Rents. See PRIVILEGED PLACES.

Fumage; Fuage; Fouage; Fumagium. A tax, popularly called smoke-farthings, which anciently was levied upon every house having a chimney. It is mentioned in Domesday. See HEARTH-MONEY.

Fumage (fumagium) also meant both manure and the manuring of land.

Fumotho. This word, which occurs in the statute 14 Car. 2, c. 31, is a form of fumodo (a smoked pilchard).

Functus officio, "having discharged his duty," is an expression applied to an agent or donee of an authority who has performed the act authorised, so that the authority is exhausted and at an end.

Fund. In its widest sense, a fund is a sum of money available for the payment or discharge of liabilities. Thus, the assets of a testator form a fund for the payment of his debts. (See BLENDED FUND.) So the borough fund (q.v.) of a corporation is primarily liable for defraying the expenses of the borough.

As to the Chancery funds, see PAY OFFICE.

In its narrower and more usual sense, "fund" signifies capital, as opposed to interest or income; as where we speak of a company funding the arrears of interest due on its debentures, or the like, meaning that the interest is capitalised and made to bear interest in its turn, until it is repaid.

The national debt of Great Britain is in part funded, and in part unfunded, the former being that which is secured to the creditor or holder upon the public funds, the latter that which is not so provided for. The unfunded debt is comparatively but of small amount, and is generally secured by Treasury bills (q.v.), and Exchequer bonds (q.v.). The funded debt consists of annuities, as they are called, granted to those who originally advanced the money, being the right to receive an annual sum equal to interest at a certain rate on the principal advanced. As regards the funded debt existing before the war of 1914-18, the principal itself is not repayable, except at the option of the Government. These annuities are charged on the Consolidated Fund (q.v.), and are themselves popularly called the public funds. They are a species of personal property, passing by transfer inter vivos, or on the death of the holder to his personal representatives. Since 2nd August, 1914, the funded debt has been increased nearly tenfold, and this portion of the funded debt must be redeemed at various dates which were fixed when the various additions to the debt were made from time to time.

Furca et Fossa. In ancient grants of criminal jurisdiction the king gave the right of using furca et fossa (the gallows and the pit); the first being for the hanging of felons who were men, and the second for the drowning of felons who were women.

Furcam et Flagellum, Ad. A bondman whose life and limb were at the disposal of his lord was said to hold ad furcam et flagellum (at the gallows and the scourge).

Furigeldum. In Anglo-Saxon law this was a pecuniary penalty for theft.

Furiosi nulla voluntas est (D. 50, 17, 5). (A madman has no free will.) Consequently, for instance, he cannot conceive the animus furandi essential to larceny, nor any other criminal intention. Compare ACTUS NON FACIT, etc.

Furiosus solo furore punitur (Co. Litt. 247). (A madman is punished only by his madness.) That is to say, he cannot be punished by the law.

Furiosus stipulare non potest, nec aliquid negotium agere, quia non intelligit quod agit. (A lunatic cannot enter into a contract or transact any business because he does not know what he is doing.)

Furlong; Furelingus. Originally this meant the length of a furrow in a field of ten acres. Where the acre was of the area (4,840 square yards) fixed by s. 12 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878, then the length of the furrow would be the 220 yards fixed by s. 11, which makes it the one-eighth of a statute mile: and a furlong as a measure of length has, for over a thousand years, meant one-eighth of a mile. It was also used as meaning one-eighth of an acre.

Furlough. In the case of anyone below the rank of an officer who is subject to military law, permission for absence from duty is known as furlough. See, for instance, the Army Act, s. 173. The word was formerly used in connection with officers, who, however, are now said to be on leave of absence.

Furnage; Furnagium. Fornagium (q.v.).

Furniture. See BILLS OF SALE; FIXTURES; HEIRLOOMS; ORDER AND DISPOSITION; HIRE-PURCHASE AGREEMENT.

Furnival's Inn. See INNS OF CHANCERY.

Furst and Fondung. (Time to advise or take counsel.) See Leg. Hen. 1. c. 46, which inserts these Anglo-Saxon words into a sentence which, except for them, is in Latin.

Further Assurance. Formerly every conveyance contained a covenant that the vendor and his heirs would at the request and cost of the purchaser, or of anyone claiming through him, execute any further assurance necessary to complete the title of the purchaser. This covenant is now implied in every properly-drawn conveyance by s. 7 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, and is never expressly inserted. See COVENANTS.

Further Consideration. Where, on motion for judgment made in an action, the Court has not before it the materials for finally determining all the questions in dispute and disposing of the action, it may reserve the further consideration of the action, and give directions for obtaining the necessary materials in the meantime (R. S. C., Ord. 40, r. 10).

Thus, in an action for the administration of an estate in the Chancery Division, the judgment commonly directs a number of inquiries and accounts to be made and taken in chambers (see INQUIRY); and when this has been done the action is heard on further consideration, and the rights of the parties are ascertained (see Ord. 36, r. 21). If all the questions arising in the action cannot then be disposed of, the further consideration may be again reserved, and so on. Sometimes the further consideration is taken in chambers, in order to save expense.

"Further Maintenance of the Action." See PLEA.

Furtum. Anciently this meant any kind of theft or of robbery.

Furtum est contrectatio rei alienæ fraudulenta, cum animo furandi, invito illo domino cujus res illa fuerat (3 Inst. 107). (Theft is the wrongful appropriation of another man's property, without his consent, and with the intention of stealing it.) This is an extract from Bracton, lib. 3, fol. 150.

Furtum non est ubi initium habet detentionis per dominum rei (3 Inst. 107). (There is no theft where the original possession is with the consent of the owner of the goods.) These words are quoted by Coke from Glanvil, lib. 10, c. 13; they show that Glanvil, like Bracton, held that furtum could not be committed unless there had originally been a taking without the consent of the owner.

Furze. The malicious and unlawful burning of furze is punishable on indictment under the Malicious Damage Act, 1861, s. 17.

Future Estate. See ESTATE.

Future (or After) Acquired Property. An assignment of property which the assignor does not actually possess is in equity an agreement to assign it when he does in fact acquire it. An agreement that after-acquired property shall be brought into settlement is frequently found in marriage settlements.

Gabel. Payment to a superior: tribute. Gavel is another and the more correct form of the word.

Gafol. The same of Gavel (q.v.).

Gage. The same as vadium (q.v.). In the ancient law as to replevin, to gage meant gager de deliverance (q.v.).

Gager de Deliverance. In the old procedure in the action of replevin gager de deliverance meant to give surety for the delivery of the goods which were in dispute.

Gager del Ley. The Norman French for wager of law (q.v.).

Gagging Acts. A popular title of the "Six Acts" (q.v.).

Gainable. Gainable land meant, not land capable of being reclaimed, but land ready for cultivation.

Gainage. The profit or produce of cultivated land; also used as the English equivalent for wainnagium (see Magna Charta, c. 20), that is, implements of husbandry. Lands reclaimed from the sea (see INNINGS) were sometimes known as gainage lands.

Gale. Under the Dean Forest (Mines) Act, 1838, passed to regulate the peculiar laws and customs of the coal, iron and other mines belonging to the Crown in the Forest of Dean and Hundred of St. Briavel's in Gloucestershire, the "free miners" of the district have the exclusive right of having gales or grants made to them, and of selling, devising or disposing of them to any persons whomsoever. All male persons born and abiding within the Hundred of St. Briavel's, of the age of twenty-one, who have worked a year and a day in a coal or iron mine within the hundred, are free miners. Quarrymen coming under a similar description, are deemed free miners for the purpose of obtaining gales of stone quarries. A person holding a gale is called a galee.

A gale is the right to open and work a mine within the Hundred of St. Briavel's, or a stone quarry within the open lands of the Forest of Dean. The right is a licence or interest in the nature of real estate, conditional on the due payment of rent and observance of the obligations imposed on the galee. It follows the ordinary rules as to the devolution and conveyance of real estate. The galee pays the Crown a rent known as a galeage rent, royalty or some similar name, proportionate to the quantity of minerals got from the mine or quarry. Provision is made for fixing the extent of the mine, pit or quarry comprised in each gale.

The gaveller (or deputy gaveller) is bound to grant gales to free miners in the order of their applications, which must be made in writing. Until the grant is actually made, the applicant has no interest or title. No free miner is entitled to more than three gales at a time.

"Gale" is a contraction of gavel (q.v.).

Galley-halfpenny. This coin seems to have been a Genoese silver coin of approximately the same value as the contemporary English silver halfpenny (q.v.) which Genoese galleys trading to London had introduced into circulation. The use of this coin, as well as of the suskin (q.v.) and doitkin (q.v.) and of all Scottish silver coins, was prohibited by the statute 3 Hen. 5, c. 1. That statute made the introduction into the realm of any of these coins a felony. An earlier statute, 11 Hen 4, c. 5, had merely enacted that the galley-halfpenny should be forfeited if used within the realm.

Gallon. The imperial gallon contains "ten imperial standard pounds' weight of distilled water weighed in air against brass weights, with the water and the air at 62 degrees of Fahrenheit's thermometer, and with the barometer at thirty inches" (Weights and Measures Act, 1878, s. 15). This gallon contains 277.274 cubic inches: it is to be distinguished from the American gallon which contains 231 cubic inches.

Game consists of certain wild animals the hunting or taking of which is a recognised sport or pastime. The old writers divide wild animals into beasts of the forest and chase (harts, hinds, boars, foxes and wolves), and beasts and fowls of warren (hares, rabbits, pheasants and partridges), but under the statutes regulating the taking of game (commonly called the Game Laws), "game" consists of "hares, pheasants, partridges, grouse, heath or moor game, black-game and bustards" (Night Poaching Act, 1828, s. 13). Under these Acts the right to kill game upon any land is vested in the occupier thereof, unless he holds it under a lease or agreement by which the right is reserved to the landlord. But every person killing, taking or pursuing game (with certain exceptions, including persons entitled to kill game under the Ground Game (q.v.) Act, 1880), is required to take out a yearly excise licence (Game Licences Act, 1860), and persons who (having no such licence and not being authorised to sell and selling ground game under the Ground Game Act) deal in game, must take out two annual licences for the latter purpose, one a licence by justices of the peace (see e.g., the Game Act, 1831, ss. 18, 24), the other an excise licence (Game Licences Act, 1860, s. 18; Revenue (No. 2) Act, 1861, s. 17). The Game Laws also contain provisions for the preservation of game and the eggs of game, and for the prevention of poaching, the contravention of which is punishable with fine or imprisonment (see especially the Night Poaching Act, 1828; the Larceny Act, 1861, ss. 12-17; and the Poaching Prevention Act, 1862): in the case of poachers armed with guns, the punishment is penal servitude (Night Poaching Act, 1828, s. 9).

As regards the property or ownership in game, the common law rules on this subject are founded on the principle of occupancy (q.v.), so that if A starts game on B's land, and kills it on C's land, the property in it vests in A: this rule, however, has been so far modified by the Game Act, 1831, s. 36, that if the trespasser is found on the land with the game in his possession, and in search or pursuit of other game, C may take the game from him. A trespasser is of course always liable to an action at law, and by s. 31 et seq. of the same statute, trespassing in search of game is made an offence punishable by fine on summary conviction. If A starts game on his own land and kills it on B's land, the property remains in A; but if, being a trespasser, he starts it on B's land and kills it there, the property vests in B.

There are special rules as to game confined in parks, chases, forests and warrens: see those titles. See ANIMALS FERÆ NATURÆ; ANIMALS, LIABILITY FOR; BUSTARDS; CLOSE SEASON; HARES; RABBITS.

Game Certificate. Before 1860 this was the equivalent of what is now known as a game licence (q.v.), and enactments referring to a game certificate (see e.g., the Game Act, 1831, s. 13) are to be read as referring to a game licence.

Gamekeepers. Gamekeepers are divisible into two classes: (1) gamekeepers, properly so called, who are appointed under the Game Act, 1831, and (2) servants employed to look after game, who are colloquially known as gamekeepers.

The Game Act, 1831, s. 13, provides that it shall be lawful for "any lord of a manor, lordship or royalty, or reputed manor lordship or royalty, or any steward of the Crown of any manor lordship or royalty appertaining to His Majesty," to appoint, by writing under his hand and seal, a gamekeeper or gamekeepers for such manor, etc., and to authorise such gamekeeper to seize within such manor, etc., all dogs, nets and other engines used thereon for taking or killing game by any person not having a game certificate (q.v.); and s. 15 of the same Act empowers the owner of any lands in Wales worth £500 a year to appoint in like manner a gamekeeper for such lands and to give him a like authority to seize dogs, etc. No such appointment is to be valid until it is registered with the clerk of the peace (ib. s. 16).

The licence for a male servant must be taken out by the employer of a gamekeeper of either class (Revenue Act, 1869, s. 18); no gamekeeper of either class can kill game woodcock, snipe, quails or landrails unless either he or his employer has taken out a game licence for him (Revenue Act, 1869, s. 18).

A gamekeeper of either class has no power of arrest in respect of persons whom he finds poaching in the daytime unless such person either fails to give his true name and address or refuses to leave or returns upon the land (Game Act, 1831, s. 31).

A gamekeeper of either class—unless he be employed by a person who has merely shooting rights over the land—can arrest anyone whom he finds unlawfully destroying or taking game at night upon, or upon the roads, etc., adjoining, the land belonging to his employer (Night Poaching Act, 1828, ss. 1, 2; Night Poaching Act, 1844); and he can also arrest persons who, to the number of three or more, one at least having an offensive weapon, unlawfully enter such lands at night for the purpose of taking or destroying either game or rabbits (Night Poaching Act, 1828, s. 9).

Game Licence. This is the authority to kill game, woodcock, snipe, quails, landrails, rabbits, or deer (only, however, during the open seasons and on lands where the holder of the licence has a right to shoot), which is issued under the Game Licence Act, 1860, as amended and extended by the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1883, ss. 4-6. If taken out after 31st July and before 1st November, the duty is £3 for a licence expiring on the 31st July in the following year, and £2 for one expiring on 31st October in the same year; if taken out after 1st November the duty is £2 for one to expire on the 31st July in the following year; the duty for a licence to cover any period of fourteen consecutive days is £1: and the duty for the whole year expiring 31st July is reduced to £2 in the case of a gamekeeper's licence authorising him to kill game on his master's lands.

Various persons, such as members of the Royal Family, are exempted from taking out game licences; and no licence is required for killing game in various cases, the most important of which are the hunting of hares with hounds or greyhounds and of deer with hounds (Game Licences Act, 1860, s. 5) and the killing of hares by the occupiers of land. (See GROUND GAME.)

Any person found in such circumstances that a game licence is necessary is liable to a penalty of £20 if he fails to produce a licence to, amongst others, any officer of Inland Revenue or any holder of a game licence or, upon lands for which there is a gamekeeper (q.v.) appointed under the Game Act, 1831, to such gamekeeper.

Games, Unlawful. See GAMING; CLOSH.

Gaming. This means to play at any game, whether lawful or unlawful, for money or money's worth. To constitute gaming, however, each player must have the chance of losing as well as of winning: and therefore a whist drive, played for prizes presented by persons other than the players, is not gaming.

Unlawful gaming includes all gaming in a common gaming-house (see GAMING-HOUSES), every game of cards which is not a game of mere skill, any game which is a game of mere chance, every game of dice (q.v. except backgammon), roulette, baccarat, and the obsolete games of ace of hearts, pharaoh, basset, passage, and hazard.

Under the Unlawful Games Act, 1728, s. 9, any person found playing any unlawful game may be committed by any justice to prison unless and until he shall enter into recognizance, with or without sureties, not henceforth to play any such game: but this Act does not appear to be now used. The Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, s. 79 (1), provides that any holder of a justices' licence who suffers any gaming or unlawful game to be carried on upon his premises shall be liable to a penalty on summary conviction:

At common law, money won at any game could be recovered by action, and so, down to 1845, could money won at any game which was not unlawful; but now all contracts or agreements, whether by parole or in writing, by way of gaming or wagering are null and void (Gaming Act, 1845, s. 18), so that no money lost at gaming or on bets can be recovered at law even (Gaming Act, 1892) by a person who, as agent for the loser, has paid the money to the winner, unless the money lost at gaming or on bets is due not merely on the result of the game or other event in question, but on a new contract entered into for a good consideration, as where a man who owes money on a racing bet and is liable to be posted as a defaulter and to be warned off the Turf if he fails to pay, agrees to pay the money if his creditor will give him time and refrain from having him posted.

Money or other valuable thing lent for the purpose of gaming or betting upon any game whatsoever is not recoverable at law (Gaming Act, 1710, s. 1.; Gaming Act, 1835). For the purposes of these Acts the word "game" includes cards, dice, horse-races, dog-matches (including coursing), footraces, or other pastimes or games whatsoever: but it does not include gambling in a foreign country where gambling is not illegal: and it is to be noted that the Acts do not apply to money lent for the payment of gaming debts already incurred.

Any note, bill, or other security given in payment of money lost in gaming or betting on any game, or to secure money lent for the purpose of gaming or betting, shall be deemed to have been given for an illegal consideration (Gaming Act, 1710, s. 1; Gaming Act, 1835, s. 1), which means that no holder, assignee or endorsee of such a note, bill or other security (including a cheque) can sue thereon: but now the Gaming Act, 1922, has repealed s. 2 of the Gaming Act, 1835 (which made money paid to such holder, etc., recoverable from the person to whom any such security was originally given), and payment of a betting or other gaming debt by cheque is put on precisely the same footing as payment of such debt in cash.

Money received by an agent of either party to a bet in settlement of the bet can be recovered from him at law by the person on whose behalf it has been received.

A person winning money by cheating at gaming is guilty of obtaining money by false pretences (Gaming Act, 1845, s. 17).

Any person convicted summarily of gaming in any open and public place may be punished as a rogue and a vagabond (q.v.) or, at the discretion of the justices, be fined not more than forty shillings for a first offence and not more than five pounds for any subsequent offence (Vagrancy Act Amendment Act, 1873, s. 2).

See WAGER.

Gaming-houses. Keeping a common gaming-house consists in keeping a house which a large number of persons are invited to frequent habitually for the purpose of gaming (q.v.). This is a misdemeanour at common law. The statute 33 Hen. 8, c. 9, s. 9, prohibited, under a pecuniary penalty, the maintenance of a house for unlawful games. The Disorderly Houses Act, 1751 (which was extended by the statute 58 Geo. 3, c. 70, s. 7), contained provisions directed against gaming-houses as well as other disorderly houses, but the first really effectual Act was the Gaming Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 109). Section 2 of that Act declares that every house or place shall be deemed a common gaming-house if kept or used for playing therein any unlawful game, or if a bank is kept there by one or more of the players exclusively of the others, or if the chances of any game played therein are not alike favourable to all the players; and s. 4 provides that any person keeping or assisting in the management of a common gaming-house shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding £100 or, at the discretion of the justices, to imprisonment for not more than six months. The Gaming House Act, 1854, s. 4, provides that any person, being the owner or occupier or having the use of any house, room or place, who opens, keeps or uses, or permits to be opened, kept or used, the same for unlawful gaming, or any person who has the care or management of, or in any way assists in the conduct of the place or who advances money for the purpose of gaming with persons frequenting the place, shall be liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding £500 or, at the discretion of the justices, to imprisonment not exceeding twelve months. The Acts of 1845 and 1854 apply to any house, including a private house or a club, but they do not apply to a private house in which, on an isolated occasion, unlawful gaming takes place between the owner and his friends.

Gang Days. An ancient synonym for rogation days (q.v.).

Gang Master. See AGRICULTURAL GANGS.

Gaol Delivery. The commission of general gaol delivery is one of the commissions given to the judges or commissioners of assize. (See ASSIZE). It authorises them to try, and (if acquitted) to deliver, i.e., discharge from custody, every prisoner who shall be in gaol for some alleged crime when they arrive at the circuit town. Formerly a special writ of gaol delivery was issued for each particular prisoner, but this has long been obsolete. The commission of general gaol delivery is supplemental to the commission of oyer and terminer (q.v.), which only empowers the judges to try persons charged with treasons, felonies and misdemeanours committed within the area named in the commission, while the commission of general gaol delivery authorises the trial of every prisoner charged with any such offence, no matter where it has been committed. Persons are considered to be in gaol for this purpose although they may have been liberated on bail.

See CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

Gaols. See PRISON.

Gaol Sessions. The Gaol Sessions Act, 1824, s. 1, provided that in every county having distinct commissions of the peace for separate parts of the county, "courts of gaol sessions," consisting of all the justices of the county, or of any two of them, should manage the gaols in the county. The Prison Act, 1865, s. 5 (2), declared the gaol sessions to be "a prison authority" for the purposes of that Act. All functions of the gaol sessions as regards prisons were transferred to the Secretary of State by the Prison Act, 1877, s. 5.

Garbler of Spices. The statute 1 Jac. 1, c. 19, enacted that all "spices, wares, drugs and other merchandises garbleable" (which included a large number of such things as "senie barberies rise erius stavisaker") for sale in the City of London should be "garbled, cleansed, severed, sorted or divided" by the "garbler," who was to get certain fees; and it provided penalties for any trader who did not get his spices, etc., "garbled," that is to say, freed from impurities. This statute was repealed by the statute 6 Anne, c. 16, and the latter is still unrepealed as regards s. 3, which provides that the corporation may appoint a "garbler" by whom spices, etc., may be "garbled" if the owner so desire and pay the prescribed fees. But no "Garbler of Spices" appears in the current list of City officials.

Gardein; Gardeyn. A guardian (q.v.).

Gardein de Lestemery. In the reign of Edward III. this was the title of the official afterwards known as the warden of the stannaries (q.v.): see the statute 16 Car. 1, c. 15.

Gardens. As to larceny from gardens and malicious damage to them, see FRUIT.

As to public gardens, see OPEN SPACES.

Garnish. This was the popular description of money exacted from prisoners on their admission to gaols and bridewells. The payment of any such money, or of any fee on discharge, in the case of persons in custody on criminal charges, was prohibited by the Gaol Fees Abolition Act, 1815, which, however, declared by s. 14 that such fees were not abolished in the case of debtors' prisons.

In the old law, to garnish meant to warn: see, e.g., the statute 27 Eliz. c. 3, where to garnish the heir means, as we should now put it, to serve him with notice of the proceedings.

Garnishee is a person in whose hands a debt has been attached, and an order for the attachment of debts is called a garnishee order. See ATTACHMENT, EXAMINATION, FOREIGN ATTACHMENT.

Garnishment (which is derived from the Norman-French garnir, to warn) seems to have originally meant any kind of notice to the opposite party in a proceeding.

Garnisture. Used in the fourteenth century as meaning a furnishing or providing.

Garrotting. Choking, so as to produce insensibility, and occasionally death, in order to facilitate robbery from the person or the commission of some other indictable offence. This is punishable under the Offences against the Person Act, 1861, s. 21. The punishment provided by that Act may now be supplemented by whipping under the Garrotters Act, 1863.

Garsummune. Used in Domesday as meaning a fine or amerciament.

Garter King-at-Arms. See HERALDS.

Garter, Order of the. This is the most ancient and the most distinguished of the orders of knighthood (q.v.). Its full title is The Most Noble Order of the Garter. It dates from 1347 or 1348. It is limited to twenty-five knights (K.G.) of whom the Prince of Wales is always one, in addition to the King, but the King has power to create additional knights, and there can be Ladies of the Garter. The total number of knights at present is about forty, of whom about one-third are reigning sovereigns or princes of Royal houses and the remaining two-thirds are English peers. The Queen Consort and the Queen Mother are the present Ladies of the Garter.

Garth. An enclosure; a yard; a weir or dam. See FISH-GARTH.

Garthman. A man who worked a fish-garth (q.v.). See the statute 17 Rich. 2, c. 9.

Gas. In theory, anyone can make gas and sell it to any other person who wants it. In practice, owing to questions in connection with the laying of pipes and many other matters, no one can supply gas except under statutory powers. It is done outside the metropolitan area either (1) by companies under special Acts which incorporate the Gasworks Clauses Acts, 1847 and 1871, or (2) by urban district councils (including town councils) under ss. 161, 162 and 163 of the Public Health Act, 1875. Within the metropolitan area public authorities have no power to supply gas: that is done by various companies under the Metropolitan Gas Acts, 1860 and 1861; part of the City of London Gas Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. cxxv.); the Gaslight and Coke and other Gas Companies Acts Amendment Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. clxxxi.); the Metropolis Gas (Prepayment Meter) Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. cclxxii.); and the London Gas Act, 1905 (5 Edw. 7, c. clx.); and various special Acts.

These Acts give the various "undertakers" —or bodies supplying gas—all necessary powers and regulate their relations with their customers. Amongst other things, gas was required by s. 12 of the Gasworks Clauses Act, 1871, and by s. 25 of the Metropolitan Gas Act, 1860, to be of a prescribed illuminating power: the Gas (Standard of Calorific Power) Act, 1916, empowered the Local Government Board (now the Ministry of Health) in the case of a local authority and the Board of Trade in the case of a company, to substitute a prescribed standard of calorific power for the illuminating standard. The Gas Regulation Act, 1920, contains further provisions with regard to the calorific standard, and provides by s. 1 (7) for the ascertainment of calorific value: by s. 2 (4) the Board of Trade is empowered to make orders as to the proportion of carbon-monoxide which may be contained in gas supplied for domestic purposes; and the Board of Trade have now authorised the supply of gas containing so large a proportion of carbon-monoxide as to be much more deadly in case of inhalation than was the gas of pre-war times. See THERM.

The stealing of gas from a pipe is as much larceny as the stealing of wine from a cask. As to offences cognate to larceny of gas, see the Gasworks Clauses Act, 1847, s. 18, and the Gasworks Clauses Act, 1871, s. 15. As to other offences, see s. 19 of the Act of 1847, and ss. 21, 38 of the Act of 1871.

Gauger. An officer who measures wines and spirits for the revenue authorities. He is the "gaugeour" mentioned in the statute 23 Hen. 6, c. 15, and other ancient statutes.

Gavel. See GABEL. The word appears in a number of compounds, such as GAVELKIND; GAVELMAN (q.v.); ETC.

Gavelet, says Mr. Hargrave in a note to Coke on Littleton, is "a remedy or process, peculiar in denomination to Kent and London, by which the lord of the fee, when his tenant is in arrear for rent or service, may force him to pay the arrears and damages by seizing the land and holding it till payment." It is now obsolete. See STATUTUM DE GAVELETO. Compare CESSAVIT.

Gavelgeld. Said to have meant tribute or toll.

Gavelkind is the tenure by which all land in the county of Kent is presumed to be held until the contrary is proved. The tenure also occurs in other parts of England, notably the manors of Hackney and Stepney, which now form part of London. No land is now gavelkind which can be shown to have originally been held by a tenure higher than socage, such as frankalmoign or a military tenure.

Its principal incidents are (a) the partibility of the inheritance, that is, the land descends, on the death of the tenant, to all the sons of the tenant equally: in some cases the custom extends to collaterals, e.g., brothers (see COPARCENER); (b) the right of the widow or widower of a deceased tenant to have half the land for dower or curtesy until a second marriage, the widower taking by the curtesy whether issue has been born of the marriage or not (see DOWER; CURTESY); (c) the right of an infant tenant to alien his land by feoffment at the age of fifteen years. (See FEOFFMENT.) Formerly, also, gavelkind lands were peculiar in being exempt from the liability to forfeiture on conviction for murder, but in this respect all other lands now stand on the same footing. In many places in Kent the freeholders are subject to customary heriots, fines and other ancient dues, and are compellable under penalty of distress to come for admittance into their tenancies.

The most remarkable incident of this tenure being the partibility of the land upon descent, the word "gavelkind" has come to be applied to many copyholds which only resemble the freehold tenure in this particular; but this use of the word is improper, and apt to lead to mistakes.

See CONSUETUDINE, ETC; DISGAVEL; SOCAGE; TENURE.

Gaveller is an officer of the Crown having the general management of the mines, pits, and quarries in the Forest of Dean and Hundred of St. Briavel's. The First Commissioner of Woods, Forests and Land Revenues is now ex-officio the gaveller (Dean Forest (Mines) Act, 1838, 1 & 2 Vict. c. 43, s. 13). He is empowered to appoint deputies (ib.); and the deputies grant gales to free miners in their proper order, accept surrenders of gales, and keep the registers required by statute. See GALE.

Gavelmannus; Gavelman. A villein who, in consideration of a money rent, had been released from the labour service by which he held of his lord.

Gavelmed. The service of meadowing the lord's hay which was rendered by some customary tenants.

Gazettes. The London Gazette, the Edinburgh Gazette, and the Dublin Gazette, are newspapers published weekly or bi-weekly, under the authority of the Government. They are the official organs of the Government for the purpose, not of expressing opinions or advocating measures, but of intimating appointments to public offices, and of publishing Royal Proclamations, Orders in Council, statutory rules and orders, dissolutions of partnership, proceedings in bankruptcy, and other such matters. At common law they are evidence only of Acts of State published therein: but their use as evidence is extended by many Statutes. Thus the Documentary Evidence Act, 1868, s. 2 (as amended by the Documentary Evidence Act, 1882, and the Documentary Evidence Act, 1895), makes the production of a copy of any of the Gazettes prima facie evidence of such proclamations, etc., as are printed therein; an advertisement of the dissolution or of any change in the constitution of a firm is notice to all persons who had not dealt with the firm before the dissolution or change took place, if such advertisement be inserted in the Gazette published for the country in which the firm had its principal place of business (Partnership Act, 1890, s. 36); and the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 137, makes a copy of the Gazette conclusive evidence of any notice published therein pursuant to that Act, or of the fact that any receiving order or any order of adjudication which is published therein had been made. A number of other statutes contain analogous provisions.

It is not possible to say, at present, how precisely the law stands now as regards the Dublin Gazette. For Northern Ireland there will presumably be a Gazette, which, as regards that area, will be the same in law as the Dublin Gazette: as regards Southern Ireland, surmise is useless.

Gebur. One of the denominations of a serf or of a semi-servile tenant in Anglo-Saxon times.

Geld. A tax, payment, tribute; see, for instance, DANEGELD. Also a pecuniary penalty: see, for instance, WERGELD.

Gemote; Mote; Moot. In pre-Conquest times this meant a meeting or assemblage, which might be of many different kinds, such as the witenagemot, the folcmote (q.v.), the shiremote, etc.

Geneath. In Anglo-Saxon times this seems to have meant one occupying a position analogous to that of the later villein.

General Average. See AVERAGE.

General Board of Health. The Public Health Act, 1848, s. 4, provided for the temporary appointment of three persons as a board (to be called "the General Board of Health") for the purpose of administering that Act. The Local Government Board Act, 1871, s. 2, Sch. (Pt. I.), transferred the functions of the board to the Local Government Board (q.v.) from the Privy Council, in which, by the statute 21 & 22 Vict. c. 97, some of them had been vested when the statutory authority for the existence of the General Board of Health expired in 1858, and from the Home Secretary, upon whom others of them had devolved.

General Council. For the purposes of the Medical Acts, this expression means "The General Council of Medical Education and Registration of the United Kingdom" (Medical Act, 1858, s. 3), which consists of five persons nominated by the Crown, more than twenty nominated by the universities and the various duly constituted medical and surgical bodies in the United Kingdom, and five elected by registered medical practitioners in the United Kingdom: see the Medical Act, 1886 (49 & 50 Vict. c. 48) s. 7, and the Acts relating to various universities founded since 1886. It exercises, amongst other functions, disciplinary powers with regard to medical practitioners, and also with regard to dentists (q.v.) and apothecaries (q.v.), analogous to those possessed by, for instance, the Benchers of the Inns of Court with regard to barristers and by the Law Society with regard to solicitors. See INFAMOUS CONDUCT.

General Council of the Bar. See BAR COUNCIL.

— Generale dictum generaliter est intelligendum (2 Inst. 81; 11 Rep. 59). (A general dictum (q.v.) is to be understood in a general sense).

— Generale nihil certi implicat (2 Rep. 34). —A general statement means nothing definite.

— Generale nihil ponit (2 Rep. 34). (A general statement is worthless.)

— Generale tantum valet in generalibus quantum singulare in singulis (11 Rep. 59*b*). (When words are general they are to be taken in a general sense, just as words relating to a particular thing, are to be taken as referring only to that thing.) This maxim is appended by Coke to the maxim QUI OMNE DICIT, ETC.

General Exceptions. Every definition of a crime is subject to certain exceptions which apply to every case in which there exist the facts stated or implied in the exception. Such exceptions are:—insanity; the fact that the person who did the act constituting the alleged crime was under seven or is under fourteen and unable to know that the act was wrong; drunkenness precluding the existence of such specific intention as is necessary to constitute the alleged crime; compulsion; and various others. Such exceptions are known as general exceptions.

General Health Acts. A popular title formerly applied to the Public Health Acts, 1848 and 1872, both of which were repealed by the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 343.

— Generalia specialibus non derogant (Jenk. Cent. 120). (General things do not derogate from special things.) Thus specific enactments are not affected by subsequent general enactments unless the earlier enactment is inconsistent with the latter enactment, or unless there be some express reference in the later enactment to the earlier enactment—in either of which cases the maxim LEGES POSTERIORES, ETC., applies.

Generalia verba sunt generaliter intelligenda (3 Inst. 76). (General words are to be understood generally.) But see VERBA GENERALIA, ETC.

Generalibus specialia derogant (Halk. 51). (Special things derogate from general.) This is the converse of GENERALIA SPECIALIBUS, ETC.

Generalis clausula non porrigitur ad ea quæ antea specialiter sunt comprehensa (8 Co. 154). (A general clause does not extend to those things which are included in previous special words.)

Generalis regula generaliter est intelligenda (6 Rep. 65). (A general rule is to be understood generally.) Compare GENERALE DICTUM, ETC.

General Issue. See ISSUE.

General Legacy. See LEGACY.

General Lighthouse Fund. See MERCANTILE MARINE FUND.

General Limits. For the purposes of the Metropolitan Streets Act, 1867 (which is the principal Act regulating traffic in London) this expression means all parts of the Metropolis within a radius of six miles of Charing Cross (Metropolitan Streets Act, 1885). These are the limits within which s. 7 of the Act of 1867 (prohibiting the driving of cattle during certain hours), s. 8 (metropolitan stage-carriages to take up or set down only on near side of roadway) and s. 9 (advertisements to be carried or distributed only as the police approve) have operation. Compare SPECIAL LIMITS.

General Meeting. See MEETING.

General Sessions is a Court of record held by two or more justices of the peace for the execution of the authority given them by the commission of the peace and certain statutes. General sessions held at certain times in the four quarters of the year pursuant to the statutes 36 Edw. 3, st. 1, c. 12, 12 Rich. 2, c. 10, and 2 Hen. 5, st. 1, c. 4, are properly called quarter sessions (q.v.), but intermediate general sessions may also be held. General sessions other than quarter sessions are now held only in London and Middlesex; special enactments apply to those places. See MIDDLESEX.

General Ship. Where the master and owners of a ship engage with separate merchants to convey their goods to the place of her destination, the contract is said to be for conveyance in a general ship, as opposed to a chartered ship, that is, a ship which is let to one or more persons under one contract of affreightment, called a charterparty (q.v.). In the case of a general ship, the contract with each freighter generally takes the form of a bill of lading (q.v.).

A shipowner who professes to carry the goods of all persons who apply to him, so long as he has room in his ship, is a common carrier (q.v.).

General Tail. See ESTATE TAIL.

General Warrant. A general warrant was a warrant issued by the Secretary of State for the arrest of such persons as were, for instance, the authors of a seditious libel. No persons were named in such a warrant, and such a warrant left it to the person entrusted with the warrant to decide who it was that should be arrested. No such warrant was ever authorised by statute, and in 1765 such warrants were decided to be illegal at common law. See ASSISTANCE, WRIT OF.

General Words: In conveyances, mortgages and many other assurances of corporeal hereditaments, numerous words descriptive not only of every kind of easement, privilege or appurtenance, supposed to be capable of belonging to the property assured, but also of portions of the soil, fixtures and produce of the land (as timber) were, up to 1882, added to the parcels or description of the property, and are called the "general words." They were useful when there were any easements or privileges reputed to belong to the property, although not legally appurtenant to it, as they would not have passed with the property unless expressly mentioned. But with this exception the "general words" were as a rule unnecessary verbiage. They are now always omitted, because everything which they could have done, even as regards easements, is now done by force of the Conveyancing, etc., Act, 1881, s. 6. See ALL THE ESTATE; OPERATIVE PART; PARCELS.

Geneva Arbitration. See ALABAMA CASE.

Geneva Convention. This was an international agreement entered into at Geneva in 1864 for the purpose of ameliorating the condition of sick and wounded soldiers in war. It was superseded by the Geneva Convention of 1906. It is under these conventions, which were accepted by practically every Government, that the "Red Cross" has been used. By the Hague Conference (q.v.) of 1899 the Geneva Convention was extended to naval warfare.

Geneva Convention Act, 1911. This statute prohibits the use of the "Red Cross" (a red cross on a white ground) or of the words

"Red Cross" or "Geneva Convention" for commercial purposes, except by the leave of the Army Council.

Gentili. Alberico Gentili (Albericus Gentilis) was born the 14th January, 1552, in Ancona, took the degree of doctor at Perugia in 1572, became professor of law at Oxford in 1587, and died there in 1611. He wrote De juris interpretibus dialogi sex, Lond. 1582; De Legationibus, 1583; De jure belli libri III., Lugd. Bat. 1589; Comment. secunda de jure belli, 1589; Opera omnia, Neap. 1770. Professor Holland published a new edition of the De jure belli libri tres (Clarendon Press, 1877).

Gentleman; Gentlewoman. When a man of independent means is not entitled to the affix "esquire" and is of no occupation, he is usually described in legal documents as "gentleman:" but no precise meaning in the law can be attached either to that word or to the word "gentlewoman." The latter word is not used in legal documents to describe even a woman of respectable social position who has no particular occupation. If unmarried, she is described as "spinster"; if a widow, she is described as "widow"; and if married, she is described as "wife of A. B."

George Noble. See GOLD COINS.

Gersuma; Gersoma = Garsummune (q.v.).

Gersumarius. A villein who, when he gave his daughter in marriage, had to pay a fine to the lord.

Gesith. This meant one of the upper classes in Anglo-Saxon times.

Gestation. The period of gestation is that time which elapses between the conception and birth of a child. It is usually about nine months of thirty days each; but may be shorter or longer. The time is added, where necessary, to the period allowed under the rule against perpetuities: for example, if an estate is limited to A. for life, with remainder to his eldest son on attaining twenty-one, and A. dies leaving his widow pregnant with a son, but without any other issue, the remainder to the son takes effect on his birth. See VENTRE INSPICIENDO, DE.

Gestu et Fama, De. A writ, obsolete and replaced by other process even when Lambard wrote in 1581, which lay to the King's Bench on behalf of persons imprisoned on suspicion of felony de gestu et fama (because of their demeanour and general reputation) who sought to be set free before "the coming of the Justices of Gaol Delivery." See Lambard's Eirenarcha, Bk. 4, c. 14.

Gift; Give, are words of wide signification, and import the transferring of property from one to another, especially when it is done without recompense, as opposed to a sale or barter. A gift by will is either a devise or a bequest (q.v.). Some writers speak of a gift in law, or gift by act of law: thus, when a woman was married to a husband before 1st January, 1883 (the date of the commencement of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (q.v.)), this operated as a gift in law of all her goods to him.

As an operative word in conveyancing, "give" was always held to be as wide as "grant" (q.v.), and now the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 49, gives statutory sanction to this view; but as a matter of fact "grant" is still always used. It was formerly the technical and proper word in a feoffment (q.v.), and created an implied warranty of title, now abolished by the Real Property Act, 1845, s. 3.

"Gift" in the old writers frequently means a conveyance of land in tail. See DE DONIS; DONEE; DONOR.

"Gift" is also applied to benefices or livings. Thus, if an advowson belongs to A., the living is said to be in A.'s gift.

In popular language, a voluntary conveyance or assignment is called a deed of gift.

See DONATIO INTER VIVOS; DONATIO MORTIS CAUSA.

Gilbert Acts. The Clergy Residences Repair Act, 1776, the Clergy Residences Repair Act, 1780, the Clergy Residence Act, 1826, the Parsonages Act, 1838, the Parsonages (Amendment) Act, 1838, the Parsonages Act, 1865, and the Incumbents and Benefices Loans Extension Act, 1881 (all of which aim at the provision of proper residences for the clergy), are popularly known as the Gilbert Acts. The name is more particularly applied to the Act of 1776, which was introduced by Mr. Thomas Gilbert, member for Lichfield.

The repealed statute 22 Geo. 3, c. 83, relating to the relief of the poor, was also introduced by Mr. Gilbert and was popularly known as the Gilbert Act.

Gilda mercatoria. A guild merchant. The gilda mercatoria, as known to English law, was the royal grant to merchants of a town of the exclusive right of trading therein and of levying tolls upon outsiders desirous of trade facilities. It was unknown in London and some of the other more important towns: elsewhere it was, down to the fifteenth century, a predominating factor in municipal life.

Gild-rents. Rents formerly receivable by gilds (q.v.) of the religious description.

Gilds. From soon after the Norman Conquest there existed in English towns and cities voluntary associations known as gilds or guilds which were formed for (1) religious and benevolent or (2) economic purposes. The first class of gilds performed a number of functions in connection with what would be now called health insurance, old-age pensions, fire and marine insurance, and even burglary insurance. They were, in fact, friendly societies of a most useful kind. But with these functions there were others of a spiritual character, such as the provision of lights for altars and of masses for the dead: and during the course of the Reformation they ceased to exist. The gilds which existed for economic purposes were the trade gilds and the craft guilds. The various kinds are well illustrated in the list of City guilds given in Whitaker's Almanac; as to them see COMPANIES, CITY. Outside the City of London the trade and craft gilds (which consisted exclusively of masters) did not form the governing body of the town or city; but they had many privileges, which, however, fell into desuetude as the modern economic system grew up in the sixteenth century.

Gill. This measure is not known to the law. It is a customary measure of capacity, generally understood to be one-fourth part of a pint (q.v.).

Gin Act. The popular title of the repealed statute 9 Geo. 2, c. 23.

Gippewyz, Le Domesday de. The more accurate title of the Domesday of Ipswich (q.v.).

Gipsy. See EGYPTIANS.

Gisement. Formerly this meant cattle taken in by an agister (q.v.) or the money received by him for taking them.

Gisetaker. An old synonym for agister (q.v.)

Gistment. An old equivalent for agistment (q.v.).

Giving Time. Where a creditor enters into a binding contract to permit his debtor to defer the payment of money or the doing of an act beyond the date upon which it was originally agreed the money should be paid or the act done, then the creditor is said to "give time," and such giving of time, if made without the consent of any person who has guaranteed the debtor, discharges the guarantor unless the guarantor had originally agreed that the giving of time should not operate as a discharge. And so such giving of time by the holder to the acceptor of a bill of exchange discharges any drawer or endorsee of the bill.

Glanders (or Farcy). A disease of horses, communicable to human beings, and invariably fatal to both the one or the other. It is at common law a nuisance punishable on indictment, to bring a glandered horse into any public place.

The Board of Agriculture and Fisheries, in exercise of the power given to them by the Diseases of Animals Act, 1894, s. 22 (xxv., xxvi.), extended the definition of disease under that Act so as to include glanders or farcy. That Order was revoked and replaced by the Glanders or Farcy Order of 1907, under which (s. 13) a local authority may with the consent of the owner slaughter horses, asses, or mules suspected of having glanders (if the owner objects, they cannot do this without the authority of the Board). And (see s. 23) a number of acts or omissions in relation to glandered animals are made punishable as offences under the Act of 1894. If any servant or workman having the care, or handling the carcase, of any glandered horse, etc., contracts glanders he is deemed to have suffered personal injury by accident for the purposes of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906; see s. 8 (1), Sch. III.

Glanville. The work called Tractatus de Legibus et Consuetudinibus Angliæ is generally attributed to Ranulph de Glanville, who was sheriff, justice itinerant, and afterwards chief justiciary under Henry II. He died at Acre, on an expedition to the Holy Land in 1190.

Glassman. A wandering dealer in glassware. The statute 39 Eliz. c. 4, s. 15, provided that duly licensed glassmen who did not beg should be exempt from the provisions of that statute for the "punishment of rogues, vagabonds, and sturdy beggars": but the statute 1 Jac. 1, c. 7, s. 2, provided without qualification that every glassman should be deemed a rogue and a vagabond for the purposes of the Act of Elizabeth.

Glebæ ascriptitii. The description anciently applied to villeins who could not be removed from their holdings provided they performed the prescribed service, but who on the other hand went with the land as part of its equipment. See VILLEINAGE.

Glebe in ecclesiastical law is a portion of land attached to a benefice as part of its endowment.

Gliscywa. A fraternity or association (Leg. Athel. c. 12).

Gloucester King-at-Arms. See HERALDS.

Gloucester, Statute of. This is the statute 6 Edw. 1, c. 1.

Glove Money; Glove Silver. Payments made formerly by the sheriff to the clerk of assize and the judge's officers at the end of an assize from which no convicts were left for execution.

Gloves. At maiden (q.v.) assizes or sessions it is the custom for the sheriff, whenever there are no prisoners for trial, to present a pair of white gloves to the judge sitting for criminal business.

God-bote. Anciently this meant a fine for some offence against God.

God-gild. In Anglo-Saxon times this meant any offering for the service of God.

Godparents. Under the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1866, s. 14, and the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868, s. 23, the godparent of any child (not belonging to the Church of England) in a workhouse or district school may, in default of relatives, apply to the Ministry of Health for the removal of the child to a school of the child's religion.

As to "advancement" by a godparent, see that heading.

God's Penny. The English form of denarius Dei (q.v.).

Going through the Bar. Before the Judicature Acts, the Chief Justice (or the Chief Baron) of each of the common law Courts used, at the sitting of the Court on all days other than Special Paper Days and other days on which motions were not taken, to ask, in order of seniority, each barrister who was in Court whether he had anything to move. This was called "going through the bar."

Going to the Country. See GO TO THE COUNTRY.

Gold Coins, Ancient. Some of the Anglo-Saxon kings appear to have issued gold coins, but none of these were in regular currency and nothing definite is known of them. The first gold coin after the Conquest was the gold penny of Henry 3, issued in 1257 and containing 45 1-5th grains of pure gold. The present sovereign weighs 123 grains, of which eleven-twelfths are pure gold. The value of the gold penny of 1257 was fixed by proclamation originally at twenty pence and subsequently in 1270 at twenty-four pence. It was never in general circulation, silver coins being sufficient for most purposes in view of the low prices of commodities.

The noble (138 grains), which was worth six shillings and eightpence, the half-noble, which was worth three shillings and fourpence, and the farthing of gold (or quarter-noble), which was worth twenty pence, were gold coins current in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. All three are mentioned in the statute 9 Hen. 5, c. 7. They were first coined in 1344, and no gold had been coined in the interval from 1257. In 1466 the noble had become the rose-noble or rial (120 grains), there being also half-rials and quarter-rials, the values being respectively ten shillings, five shillings, and two-and-six; and the angel (80 grains) and angelet, value respectively for six shillings and eightpence and for three shillings and fourpence, appeared in the same year. The George-noble (71 grains) of 1527 was of the same value as the angel of 1466; and the values of the angel (80 grains) and angelet coined in 1542 were declared to be increased to eight shillings and four shillings respectively, there being also a quarter-angel of that year worth two shillings. In 1553 rials (120 grains) worth fifteen shillings, angels (80 grains) worth ten shillings, and angelets worth five shillings were issued. Rose-rials (213 grains) worth thirty shillings, and the spur-rial (106 grains) worth fifteen shillings, were issued in 1607: and in 1621 the values of the rose-rial, spur-rial, angel and angelet were increased by royal proclamation to thirty-three shillings, sixteen shillings and sixpence, eleven shillings, and five shillings and sixpence respectively. None of the above-mentioned coins were minted after the reign of Charles I. The noble, which began at 138 grains and went as low at one time as 106 grains, corresponded more or less to the modern sovereign in weight: the rial also was of almost precisely the same weight as the modern sovereign, its weight throughout being 120 grains.

Down to 1490 the only gold currency consisted of the noble, the rial, the angel, and the smaller coins of similar names, such as the half-noble, etc. The sovereign appeared in 1490 with a weight of 240 grains, which by 1605 had come down to 154 grains: at the latter weight the coin was current for twenty shillings or one pound. See SILVER COINS.

Concurrently with the first nobles, Edward III. issued florins (108 grains), half-florins, and quarter-florins, worth respectively six shillings, three shillings, and eighteen pence. The florin did not again appear until 1849, when the familiar silver florin was first issued.

There were issued from 1527 to 1662, crowns, worth approximately one-fourth of a sovereign, half-crowns, worth approximately one-eighth of a sovereign, and also half-sovereigns, the weights of these coins varying with that of the sovereign. A variant of the half-sovereign was the double-crown; the sovereign itself was to some extent replaced during the reigns of James I. and Charles I. by the unite or laurel (current in Scotland as well as in England) which began at 154 grains and ended at 140 grains, the latter weight being also that of the twenty-shilling pieces, or broads, issued during the Protectorate and by Cromwell and during 1660-1662. Between 1662 and 1817 there was no gold coin minted of the value of twenty shillings, nothing being coined except, generally, guineas (129 grains) and half-guineas, and occasionally quarter-guineas and one-third guineas (or seven-shilling pieces), and two-guinea and five-guinea pieces.

The gold penny of 1257 contained only pure gold; the coinage from 1344 to 1527 contained only one part of alloy to 192 parts of gold; between 1527 and 1649 the standard of fineness varied considerably, the modern standard of eleven parts of gold to one part of alloy being the most common, although some issues between 1544 and 1546 contained as much as one-sixth of alloy, while others were of the standard which had existed before 1527: and since 1649 the standard of eleven parts of gold to one of alloy has been steadily adhered to.

The coins forming at various periods the gold coinage of the country were never mentioned for legal and business purposes, in connection with which the measures of money were the pound, the mark, the shilling and the penny. See SILVER COINS, ANCIENT.

Good Jury. A judge might, upon a writ of inquiry, or for the trial of issues in lunacy, order that the matter be tried by a "good jury." This was interpreted as meaning a special (q.v.) jury.

Goods, said Coke, "includes all chattels, as well reall as personall." In practice, however, the term "goods" is confined to those chattels which are capable of manual delivery, such as furniture and merchandise. Assignments of goods, by way of sale or mortgage, are subject to various statutory regulations, as to which see BILL OF SALE; STATUTE OF FRAUDS. The two words "goods and chattels" are generally used together, to denote personal property, especially in the old books, and in old forms which have survived: thus, writs of execution against personal property refer to it as the "goods and chattels" of the judgment debtor. In writs of fieri facias, the term "goods and chattels" includes not only furniture, cattle, merchandise, etc., but also money, bank notes, bills of exchange, bonds and other securities for money (Judgments Act, 1838, s. 12), and leaseholds or other chattel interests in land: the wearing apparel, bedding and implements of trade of a judgment debtor (not exceeding in value £5) cannot be seized (Small Debts Act, 1845, s. 8). See CHATTELS; CHOSE; EXECUTION; GROWING CROPS; PERSONAL PROPERTY.

Goods Bargained and Sold. One of the indebitatus counts (q.v.) used in the old action of assumpsit (q.v.) was for "goods bargained and sold," that is to say, for goods sold but not delivered. It was applicable where the property in the goods had, without delivery, passed to the purchaser and the price was payable under the contract. In a similar case now the writ may be specially endorsed under R. S. C. Ord. 3, r. 6, so as to ground an application for final judgment; Ord. 14, r. 1.

Goods Sold and Delivered. This, like the count for "goods bargained and sold," was one of the indebitatus counts in the action of assumpsit. It applied where the goods sold had been delivered and the price of them was due. In a like case the writ may now be specially endorsed under Ord. 3, r. 6.

Goodwill. The goodwill of a business is the benefit which arises from its having been carried on for some time in a particular house, or by a particular person or firm, or from the use of a particular trade mark or trade name (q.v.). Its value consists in the probability that the old customers will continue to be customers notwithstanding a change in the firm or place of business. It is personal property.

A goodwill is said to be personal when it depends on the personal character, that is, the skill or reputation of the person who carries it on. In the case of a public-house, baker's shop or the like, the goodwill is not personal, because it consists in the habit which the customers have of resorting to the house. Therefore, if a baker or publican mortgages his house of business without mentioning the goodwill, and the mortgagee sells the house as a going concern, thus obtaining the benefit of the goodwill, the mortgagor is not entitled to that part of the purchase-money which represents the value of the goodwill.

Questions of goodwill chiefly arise between an assignor and an assignee. An assignment of a goodwill implies a recommendation of the assignee by the assignor to his customers, and an agreement by him to abstain from all competition with the assignee. If A. carries on business under a firm name which is wholly or partially artificial (such as "A & Z." or "A. & Co."), and assigns the goodwill of his business to B., then B. becomes entitled to the exclusive use of the firm name as against A., and against all the world, so that A. can neither complain of B.'s use of the name, nor use any name so resembling it as to be calculated to represent to the world that he (A.) is carrying on the business which he assigned to B. On the same principle, A. is not allowed to solicit old customers of the business to deal with him, although he may deal with them, if they come to him without solicitation.

In the law of real property, where copyholds are granted for the lives of several persons, the first-named life, or the first taker as he is called (that is, the first-named cestui que vie), is generally, though not invariably, the beneficial owner. By the special customs of a great number of manors, the first taker has the right to surrender his estate, and thereby to bar all the rest. And it is frequently part of the custom that the life in possession, or the first of the lives in possession, shall have a veto upon any fresh creation of tenancies in remainder, without his assent or "goodwill," for the manifesting of which there is frequently a customary ceremony, the object being to preserve to the beneficial owner the power of surrendering to the lord and taking a new estate for his own benefit.

Goole. Used in the statute 16 & 17 Car. 2, c. 11, s. 7 (which dealt with sea-walls) as meaning an outlet: "if any goole . . . breach . . . or overflowings . . . shall . . . happen . . . through any of the . . . bancks."

Gorce; Gors; Gore. Anciently these words meant a weir, pool, or mill-dam. See the statutes 14 & 15 Hen. 8, c. 13, s. 2; and 23 Hen. 8, c. 5, s. 1.

Gote; Goote. A sluice. See the statutes mentioned under GORCE.

Go to the Country. Before the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 76), when a defendant concluded his pleading with the words "and of this he puts himself upon the country," he was said to "go to the country," that is to say, to require a trial by a jury. The corresponding form for a plaintiff was "And this the plaintiff prays may be enquired of by the country." See COUNTRY; VERIFICATION.

Governor. This, unless a contrary intention appears, means, in every Act passed after 31st December, 1889, as regards Canada or India, the Governor-General, or the person for the time being having his powers, and, as regards any other British possession, the person for the time being administering the government thereof (Interpretation Act, 1889, ss. 18 (6), 42).

Governors of the Chest at Chatham. Officers formerly appointed to relieve poor and maimed seamen. See the statute 22 & 23 Car. 2, c. 23, s. 4.

Go Without Day. When a proceeding was dismissed the plaintiff was formerly said to go without day, that is to say, the case was not adjourned to any future day. See EAT SINE.

Grace. An Act of Parliament giving a general and free pardon was formerly known as an Act of Grace: see, for instance, the statute 7 Geo. 1, c. 29, which, however, excepted certain crimes and did not apply to persons then in the service of the Pretender. As practically all serious crimes were capital felonies down to a century ago, an act of grace was of little avail to those who had been convicted of such crimes: they were beyond either pardon or punishment. Grace also meant a dispensation or special permission: see the statute 1 & 2 Ph. & M. c. 8, s. 33.

See DAYS OF GRACE.

Graffer. Anciently this meant a notary; see the preamble to the statute 5 Hen. 8, c. 1.

Graffium. Mediæval Latin for a cartulary or register of deeds.

Grain. One-seven-thousandth part of the imperial standard pound (Weights and Measures Act, 1878, s. 14).

Grainage. Formerly one-twentieth part of all salt imported by aliens into the City of London was taken by the corporation: this was known anciently as granage and subsequently as grainage.

Grammar Schools. A grammar school is defined by the Grammar Schools Act, 1840, s. 25, in words which substantially mean that it is an endowed school for instruction in Latin and Greek. Almost all grammar schools are "endowed schools" (q.v.) for the purposes of the Endowed Schools Acts; and the various bodies which have been entrusted with the administration of those Acts have had power since 1869 to reorganise the system of education in grammar schools. See s. 9 of the Endowed Schools Act, 1869.

Grand Coustumier du Pays et Duchè de Normandie, Le. This is a collection of the ancient laws and customs of the Duchy of Normandy as they existed before the year 1205, when the English king lost the whole of the duchy except the Channel Islands: and to this have been added a number of the ordinances of the French kings who reigned before 1205. This collection was the basis of the law of Jersey. In Guernsey (see APPROBATION DES LOIS; PRECEPTE D'ASSIZE) it had never the same authority as in Jersey.

The Coustumier has been printed many times. One of the most important editions is that printed at Rouen in 1539. The best modern edition is de Gruchy's "Ancienne Coutume de Normandie"—the Grand Coustumier and the Ancienne Coutume are identical—published at St. Helier in 1881.

Grand Days. One day in each term (q.v.) was formerly known as Grand Day. The Grand Days were: Candlemas Day (February 2nd), in Hilary Term; Ascension Day (March 25th), in Easter Term; St. John Baptist Day (June 24th), in Trinity Term; and All Saints' Day (November 1st), in Michaelmas Term. Each of these days was a dies non for the Courts, and was kept with much ceremony in the Inns of Court and Chancery. Now the Courts do not concern themselves with Terms or with Grand Days (see SITTINGS): the Inns of Chancery have passed away; and even in the Inns of Court Grand Day is merely one day—it may be any day—in each of the four terms on which guests are entertained at dinner by the benchers (q.v.), and a dinner somewhat more elaborate than usual is provided for the other members of the Inn.

Grand Distress. Formerly this meant distress which extended to all the goods and chattels which the party to be distrained upon had within the county. The process is now obsolete. It was exercised under the writ of grand distress, which issued in the action of quare impedit if the defendant failed to appear or if, after having appeared, he made default: and the action of quare impedit (q.v.) has been abolished.

Grand Jury. See JURY.

Grand Serjeanty. "Tenure by grand serjeanty," says Littleton, "is where a man holds his lands or tenements of our sovereign lord the king by such services as he ought to do in his proper person to the king, as to carry the banner of the king, or his lance, or to lead his army, or to be his marshall, or to carry his sword before him at his coronation, or to be his server at his coronation, or his carver, or his butler, or to be one of his chamberlaines at the receipt of his exchequer, or to do other like services, &c. And the cause why this service is called grand serjeanty is for that it is a greater and more worthy service than the service in the tenure of escuage." The services incident to grand serjeanty were known as honorary services.

The tenure by grand serjeanty still continues, though it is no longer a tenure by knight's service, the statute 12 Car. 2, c. 24, having converted it into free and common socage, merely preserving the honorary services incident to it.

See CORNAGE; KNIGHT'S SERVICE; PETTY SERJEANTY; SERJEANT; TENURE.

Grant.—I. "This word" says Sheppard in his Touchstone, "is taken largely where anything is granted or passed from one [the grantor] to another [the grantee]. And in this sense it doth comprehend feoffments, bargains and sales, gifts, leases, charges, and the like; for he that doth give or sell doth grant also. . . . And so some grants are of the land or soil itself; and some are of some profit to be taken out of or from the soil, as rent, common, &c. And some are of goods and chattels; and some are of other things, as authorities, elections, &c." But though "grant" was always an operative word of the most general effect and extent, it is especially used in the following cases:—

(1) It always was and is still the appropriate word for the conveyance, inter vivos, of incorporeal hereditaments (such as commons, easements, etc.), remainders, reversions, and generally of freehold estates not lying in livery, and consequently not the subject of livery of seisin and feoffment. See LIVERY.

(2) By the Real Property Act, 1845, s. 2, all corporeal hereditaments, as regards the conveyance of the immediate freehold thereof, are deemed to lie in grant as well as in livery, so that "grant" is now not only the sufficient, but the proper, technical word of conveyance of every freehold estate, and a simple deed of grant has superseded the old-fashioned feoffments, leases and releases, etc., which were formerly required to convey freehold estates in possession. (See CONVEYANCE; FEOFFMENT; LEASE AND RELEASE.) The word "grant," although always used, is not absolutely necessary in a deed of grant, for other words indicating an intention to grant will answer the purpose. See the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 49, and GIVE.

"Grant" is applied to copyhold lands to signify that the lord accepts a person as tenant of the land by copy of court roll. An ordinary grant takes place where the lord admits a tenant in pursuance of a surrender by the preceding tenant, or on his death. A voluntary grant is where copyhold land is "in hand," i.e., is in the possession of the lord free from the rights of any tenant, and the lord regrants the land to be held by copy of court roll.

II. "Grant" is the term commonly applied to rights created or transferred by the Crown, e.g., grants of pensions, patents, charters, franchises.

III. A grant of probate or letters of administration is made when probate or administration is issued from the proper Court. A grant is said to be general when it is unrestricted, and limited when it is confined to a part of the deceased's property, or to a period of time, or to a particular object. If an executor or administrator dies or becomes incapable to act before he has administered the estate, the Court will appoint a new representative by granting probate or letters of administration (as the case may be) de bonis non [administratis], "of the goods not administered," so that the new representative may complete the administration. Probate de bonis non is granted in the case of a deceased executor only where such executor dies either intestate or after having made a will of which he appoints no executor even though in his will he may mistakenly have appointed a person to be executor of the will of the original testator: see EXECUTOR.

Grants limited in time:—The commonest instances are—grants of probate limited to the life or widowhood of the executor or executrix; grants of administration—(a) "till a will be found," where the will has been lost since the death of the testator; (b) durante minoritate, absentiâ or dementiâ, "during the minority," "absence" or "insanity" of the executor or person entitled to a general grant of administration, hence sometimes called "grants for the use and benefit jus habentium" that is, for the benefit of persons "having a right" to a grant (see Guardian); (c) pendente lite, where a suit touching the validity of the will of the deceased is pending. When the time of a limited grant has expired, the person entitled may apply for a general and regular grant; this is called a supplemental or cessate grant.

Grants limited to a particular object:—The commonest instances are: (a) grants of administration pendente litem or ad litem, limited to the purpose of commencing, carrying on, or defending proceedings, involving a certain part of the deceased's estate; (b) grants of administration ad colligenda bona [defuncti], "to collect the goods [of the deceased]," where the estate is of a perishable or precarious nature, and regular probate or administration cannot be granted at once; (c) grants cæterorum [bonorum], "of the rest [of the goods]," where a grant limited to part of the estate, or to a particular purpose, has already been granted. A grant "save and except" is the reverse of a cæterorum grant.

See LOST GRANT.

Grass-week, "rogation week, so called in the Inns of Court and Chancery because the commons of that week consist chiefly of sallets, with hard eggs, green sauce, etc." (Phillips, ed. Kersey.)

Great Council (Great Council of the Realm; Concilium Magnum Regni). This was the assembly, consisting of the tenants in chief and the great ecclesiastics, which after the Conquest, represented the Anglo-Saxon Witenagemot (q.v.). The House of Lords originated out of it. After the House of Lords had been constituted, the name was applied to occasional assemblies of the peers meeting otherwise than in Parliament. The last Great Council was held by Charles I. at York in 1640: and Clarendon states that no such council had been held for centuries.

Great Roll, The. The Pipe (q.v.) or Pipe Roll.

Great Seal. By the Union with Scotland Act, 1706, it is provided that there shall be one Great Seal for the United Kingdom, to be used for sealing writs to elect and summon the Parliament, and for sealing all treaties with foreign States, and all public acts, instruments and orders of State which concern the whole United Kingdom, and in all other matters relating to England, as the Great Seal of England was used before the union.

Except in a few cases where the fiat of the Lord Chancellor or other authority is sufficient, the authority required for the use of the Great Seal is a warrant under the sign manual (q.v.) countersigned by the Lord Chancellor, a Secretary of State, or two of the Commissioners of the Treasury (Great Seal Act, 1884, s. 2).

The office of Lord Chancellor is created by delivery of the Great Seal. See CHANCELLOR.

The Great Seal was formerly required on charters, grants of office, pensions and annuities, licences of denization, licences for theatres and certain other licences: but the Crown Office Act, 1877, enacted that a simple and easily-affixed seal, known as the wafer great seal could be used in all cases instead of the Great Seal; and the Great Seal is now used mainly on the patents of peers and of judges of the High Court. Letters patent for inventions formerly also required the Great Seal; but they are now issued by the Patent Office, and are sealed with the seal of that office. See PATENTS.

Green Cloth. See BOARD OF GREEN CLOTH.

Greenhue; Greenhew. The same as vert (q.v.).

Greenland Company. A sum of £40,000 having been subscribed by various persons for the purpose of carrying on the Greenland whale fishery, the statute 4 Will. & Mar., c. 17, gave those persons power to form "a joint stock" of £40,000, and incorporated the stockholders, under the name of the Greenland Company with power to engage in the Greenland trade. But this Act gave the company no exclusive right to trade, and the statute 1 Ann, c. 10, expressly enacted that all British ships should have the same right to trade to Greenland as the Greenland Company. The statute-book does not disclose the subsequent history of the company.

Green Silver. A customary payment of one halfpenny made by tenants of the Manor of Writtle in Essex, whose front doors opened on a village green known as Greenbury.

Green Wax. This, says Jacob, "is where estreats are delivered to the sheriffs out of the Exchequer, under the Seal of that Court, made in Green Wax, to be levied in the several counties." As to earlier times, see the statutes 43 Edw. 3, c. 9, and 7 Hen. 4, c. 3.

The official in charge of the office was known as the Surveyor of Green Wax (Commons Committees' Reports (1803), Vol. 13, p. 314). In 1798 he drew about £250 a year, in return for which he did nothing except pay about £60 a year for a deputy, etc.; and the deputy seems also to have had little to do (ib.).

Greenwich Hospital. This was founded in 1694 for the relief of disabled seamen of the Royal Navy. William and Mary gave the first endowments, and these were increased during reigns of Anne and of the first two Georges. hospital has been the subject of much ılation. The Acts regulating it at present he Greenwich Hospital Acts, 1868 to 1895.

reenwich Time. "Whenever any expres- of time occurs in any act of parliament deed or other legal instrument the time referred to shall, unless it is otherwise specifically stated, be Greenwich mean time (Statutes (Definition of Time) Act, 1880, s. 1, as amended by the Time (Ireland) Act, 1916). The Act of 1880 had originally provided that "time" should mean, as regards Great Britain, Greenwich mean time, and, as regards Ireland, Dublin mean time.

Green Yard. In the metropolitan area this is, as regards stray animals, the equivalent for a pound (q.v.). See the statute 57 Geo. 3, c. xxix, s. 109.

Greffier. In the Channel Islands this means a clerk or notary, or an official of the Courts.

Grenville Act. The popular title of the statute 10 Geo. 3, c. 16, which transferred the trial of parliamentary election petitions from the House of Commons, as a whole, to special committees. It was repealed by the statute 9 Geo. 4, c. 22, s. 1.

See ELECTION PETITIONS.

Gretna Green. After the enactment of Lord Hardwicke's Act (see MARRIAGE) it was impossible to contract a valid marriage in England without either banns or special licence; but in Scotland it continued to be the law that consent of the parties in the presence of witnesses was sufficient to constitute a valid marriage; and it became not uncommon, in the case of an elopement, to cross the Scottish border to Gretna Green, where the village blacksmith read the English marriage service, and the consent of the parties was expressed by their concurrence in this quasi-ceremony. The Marriage (Scotland) Act, 1856, s. 1, put an end to Gretna Green marriages by providing that no irregular marriage contracted in Scotland after the 31st December, 1856, should be valid unless at least one of the parties usually resided or had for the twenty-one preceding days been in Scotland.

Grey Seals (Protection) Act, 1914. Under this statute anyone killing, wounding or taking the grey seal between 1st October and 15th December is liable to a penalty not exceeding £5. The Act was of limited duration, but has been kept in force by the Expiring Laws Continuance Acts.

The grey seal runs to a length of eight feet, as against the four or five feet of the common seal, and, in these countries, is generally found only on the western coasts of Ireland and Scotland.

Grievous Bodily Harm. There is no statutory definition of this expression.

See ACTUAL BODILY HARM; BODILY HARM.

Grith; Grithbreche; Grithstole. In Anglo-Saxon times these words meant respectively the peace, a breach of the peace (or a penalty for a breach of the peace), and a sanctuary.

Groat. See SILVER COINS.

Grocer. Formerly this meant a grossier or grossarius, that is to say, one who bought and sold in the gross, and who would now be called a wholesale dealer. The statute 37 Edw. 3, c. 5, says of "les marchauntz nomez grossers engrossent totes maneres des marchandises vendables" (the merchants called grocers engross all kinds of saleable merchandise). The word is not found in the modern sense before 1465.

Grogging. The popular description of any process for the extraction of spirit from the wood of an empty cask in which spirit had been stored. It is punishable summarily under the Finance Act, 1898, s. 4.

Groom. The designation, with an explanatory affix, of various officers of the royal household. There are still a number of Grooms in Waiting; and there is a Groom of the Robes. From about the year 1500 to the reign of George III. there was a Groom Porter, who provided facilities for gaming; there was formerly a Groom of the Cross-bows; and there were also various other grooms, such as the Groom of the Stole (See MISTRESS OF THE ROBES), the Groom of the Beds, and the Groom of the Privy Chamber. The Groom of the Posset was invented by Thackeray.

Gross. See IN GROSS.

Gross Bois. Timber (2 Inst. 642).

Grotius. Hugo de Groot, commonly called Grotius, was born at Delft on the 10th April, 1583, and died in Rostock the 28th August, 1645. He wrote Mare Liberum and De Jure Belli et Pacis, two important works on international law; and various smaller works. See SELDEN.

Groundage. Dues levied upon ships using a port. The modern term is harbour dues.

Ground Game. Hares (q.v.), but not rabbits (q.v.) are included in the term game (q.v.), but the Ground Game Act, 1880, s. 8, enacts that both one and the other are included in the term "ground game" for the purposes of that Act. That Act, as amended by the Ground Game (Amendment) Act, 1906, gives the occupier of land the right, inseparable from his occupation, to kill (himself or through certain specified persons) ground game upon his land concurrently with any other person who has the right to kill ground game thereon. The Act was passed (see Preamble) to enable "occupiers to protect their crops from injury and loss by ground game"; and (see s. 4) no game licence is required, though a gun licence is necessary if a gun be used.

Ground-rent. See RENT.

Ground Writ. See Testatum Writ.

Grouse. See GAME. The present close time is from 10th December to 12th August.

Growing Crops are part of the land, and therefore if A conveys or devises land to B the crops pass with it and belong to B. If, however, the owner dies intestate, the crops go to his executors, and not to his heir-at-law, because they are mainly the result of labour incurred at the expense of his personal estate. Tenants for limited terms are sometimes entitled to reap crops which have been sown by them, when their estate has determined before the crop is ripe. (See AWAY-GOING CROP; EMBLEMENTS.) Growing crops are liable to be taken in execution under a fieri facias, subject to the landlord's right of distress.

An assignment or charge of growing crops does not require registration as a bill of sale (q.v.), if by the same instrument any freehold or leasehold interest in the land is conveyed or assigned to the same person. See ss. 3, 4, 7 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878.

Growth Halfpenny. This is said to have been "a rate paid in some places for the tithe of every fat beast, ox or other unfruitful cattle."

Gruarii. The principal officers of the forest generally.

Guarantee; Guarantie; Guarantor; Guaranty. A guarantee, guarantie, or guaranty, is a collateral promise to answer for the debt, default or miscarriage of another, as distinguished from an original and direct contract for the promisor's own act. It is, therefore, of the essence of a guarantee that there should be some one liable as principal: consequently where one person agrees to become responsible for another, but no valid claim ever arises against the latter, no contract of guarantee exists.

The person who binds himself by the guarantee is called the guarantor or the surety, the person to whom it is made the guarantee, and the person for whom it is made is called the principal. Thus, if A agrees to supply goods to B in consideration of C's promise to pay him for them if B fails to do so, this is a contract of guarantee by C, who is the guarantor or surety, A being the guarantee and B the principal.

Under the Statute of Frauds, s. 4, every guarantee must be in writing, but (Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, s. 3) the consideration need not be stated.

A continuing guarantee is one which continues in force until recalled by the guarantor, as opposed to a guarantee applying only to a particular act, sum or transaction: thus, a guarantee "for any goods which A may supply B with to the amount of £100," is a continuing guarantee, and is, therefore, not discharged by one transaction, that is, by a supply of goods to the amount stated and a payment for them.

It is sometimes a question whether a continuing guarantee can be determined by the guarantor or not. In the instance above given, there seems no doubt that the guarantor could withdraw the guarantee at any time by notifying A that he would not be liable for any goods supplied to B after that date. Such a guarantee would also probably be determined ipso facto by the guarantor's death. But if the arrangement is of such a nature that the person to whom the guarantee is given cannot put a stop to future transactions, then the guarantee is not determinable by the guarantor, or on his death.

A representation in the nature of a guarantee is where A makes a wilfully false representation to B as to the credit or solvency of C, whereby B is induced to trust C. It gives B a right of action for damages against A, if B trusts C and thereby loses money.

As to companies limited by guarantee, see COMPANY.

Guardian; Gardein; Gardeyn. One or other of these words was often used anciently as part of a title, such as the Guardian of the Cinque Ports, in which now the word "warden" is substituted.

Guardian is a person having the right and duty of protecting the person, property, or rights of someone who is supposed to be incapable of managing his own affairs, such as an infant or a lunatic. They are of two kinds, guardians of the person or property, and guardians ad litem. See GUARDIANS OF THE POOR.

I. Guardians of the person or property of infants are of five kinds, namely, by the common law, by statute, by custom, guardians by nature in the modern sense, and by judicial appointment.

Guardians by the common law were formerly of five kinds, viz., guardian in chivalry, guardian by nature (in the technical sense), guardian in socage, guardian by nurture, and guardian by election. The first two are completely obsolete, the last three practically so. Guardians in chivalry and in socage are sometimes called guardians by tenure. Before tenure by knight's service was abolished, one of its incidents was guardianship or wardship in chivalry, "for," says Littleton, "when such tenant dyeth, and his heire male be within the age of 21 yeares, the lord shall have the land holden of him untill the age of the heire of 21 yeares. . . . And also if such heire be not married at the time of the death of his ancestor, then the lord shall have the wardship and marriage of him," that is, the wardship of the heir's person as well as of the land. While the lord had the wardship he was said to be guardian in right; if he assigned the wardship of the land or person of the heir or both to another person, the grantee was called guardian in fact or guardian in deed. But if land held by knight's service descended to an eldest son under age during the lifetime of his father, "in this case," says Littleton, "the lord shall have the wardship of the land, but not of the bodie of the heire, because none shall be in ward of his bodie to any lord, living [i.e., during the life of] his father." This guardianship of the father was called guardianship by nature in the proper sense of the phrase, and it applied only to the custody of an heir apparent. According to the old law, if land or any other tenement held in socage descended to an heir under the age of fourteen, the next of blood to whom the inheritance could not descend had the wardship of the land and of the heir until the heir attained fourteen (or, in the case of gavelkind land, fifteen), when the heir could enter and oust the guardian and occupy the land himself. During the wardship the guardian could grant leases for a term ceasing on the ward attaining fourteen. This was called a guardianship in socage, and though in theory it may still exist, it is in practice obsolete. Where a child has a testamentary guardian (infra), the guardian in socage has no authority. Guardianship by nurture only occurs where the infant is without any other guardian, and none can have it except the father or mother. It extends no further than the custody and government of the infant's person, and determines at fourteen in the case both of males and females. Guardianship by election is where an infant himself chooses a guardian, which he can only do when he would otherwise be wholly without one. This may happen either after seven but before fourteen, when the infant has no guardian by tenure and the father and the mother are dead without having appointed a guardian; or after fourteen when the infant has been in wardship by socage, which terminates on his attaining fourteen. As to guardians by election in probate practice, see infra.

Guardians by statute:—The statute 12 Car. 2, c. 24, s. 8, enacts that any father may by deed or will from time to time dispose of the custody and tuition of his children during their minority or any less time to any person or persons other than "popish recusants," and that such disposition shall be good against all persons claiming the custody of any such child as guardian in socage or otherwise, and that the guardian so appointed shall take into his custody and management the property of the infant for his benefit. A guardian so appointed is called a guardian by statute or testamentary guardian. The words disqualifying "popish recusants" have never been expressly repealed; but the Roman Catholic Relief Act, 1829, s. 10, would seem to have impliedly repealed them. The statute 9 Will. 3, c. 32, disqualifies any person twice convicted of blasphemy, and this disqualification still exists. The Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, makes a wife who survives her husband either the sole guardian, if the husband has appointed no guardian, or the guardian jointly with any guardian appointed by the husband: it also empowers a wife to appoint by deed or will guardians or a guardian to act after her death with her husband, or, after his death, with any guardian appointed by him or as sole guardian or guardians if he makes no appointment; and, amongst other provisions, it empowers the High Court to remove any testamentary guardians appointed, whether under this Act or that of Charles II.

Guardianship by custom is said to occur in the city of London and various other cities and boroughs, where the mayor and aldermen have the guardianship of orphans; in the county of Kent, when a tenant in gavelkind dies leaving his heir or heirs under fifteen; and in certain manors, where the lord has the power of naming or is himself the guardian of an infant copyholder. But these kinds of guardianship are obsolete.

Guardianship by nature, in its modern sense, is a term of somewhat uncertain scope, but the meaning intended to be conveyed by it seems to be that where a child has some property or rights in respect of which it requires to be represented, then its father, if it has one, is its guardian by nature, and if it has no father or other guardian, then its mother is its guardian by nature. So a mother is called the natural guardian of her illegitimate children, apparently because the full legal relation of parent and child is not recognised in the case of illegitimate children. Some writers, however, use the term "guardianship by nature" to express the ordinary relation of parent and child, but this is unnecessary and confusing.

Guardians of the person or property by judicial appointment:—The Chancery Division of the High Court, in the exercise of its general jurisdiction over infants (Judicature Act, 1873, s. 34), will appoint a suitable guardian to an infant ward of Court where there is no testamentary guardian or guardian in socage, or where the father or guardian is unfit to have charge of the child. Such a guardian can take no steps as to the person or property of the infant without the direction of the Court. In probate practice, where a person who would otherwise be entitled to a grant of probate or administration is under age and has no testamentary or judicial guardian, a curator or guardian is appointed for the purpose of taking out letters of administration for his use and benefit during his minority. If he is above the age of seven, but under twenty-one, he is styled a minor, and has the privilege of electing, subject to the approval of the Court, any one of his next of kin to be his guardian, which he does by signing and filing an instrument to that effect: if he is under seven, he is styled an infant, and is considered incompetent to elect a guardian: one of his next of kin is therefore appointed guardian for him by the Court. See GRANT.

II. Guardians ad litem:—A guardian ad litem is a person appointed to defend an action or other proceeding on behalf of an infant (R. S. C., Ord. 16, r. 18) or a lunatic or idiot not so found (ib., r. 17) who is defendant or respondent to a proceeding in the Court. If no such guardian enters an appearance on behalf of the infant or lunatic, the plaintiff may apply for the appointment of a solicitor as the guardian (Ord. 13, r. 1). In divorce practice, an infant elects his guardian ad litem, for the purpose of proceeding on his behalf as petitioner, respondent or intervener. (Divorce Rule 105.)

Guardian of the Cinque Ports. An ancient alternative title of the Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports. See CINQUE PORTS.

Guardians of the Poor. By the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, where any parishes are formed into a union with the concurrence of the Poor Law Commissioners (now the Ministry of Health), its affairs are administered by a board of guardians elected originally by the ratepayers and owners of property in the respective parishes, but now by nearly the whole adult population. And where the Ministry of Health direct that the poor law matters of any single parish shall be administered by a board of guardians, they are elected and constituted in the same manner. All justices of the peace were ex-officio guardians under s. 38 of the Act of 1834; but since 1894 all guardians have been elected (Local Government Act, 1894), s. 20 (1)) and now, under the Representation of the People Act, 1918, ss. 3, 4 et seq., practically all men and all women who or whose husbands own or rent premises within the union possess the franchise.

Guardian of the Spiritualities of a diocese is the person to whom presentations may be made, and by whom institutions, etc., may be given during the absence of a bishop from England, or during the vacancy of the see. Usually the archbishop is the guardian. See TEMPORALITIES.

Guelphs-Hanover, Order of. This Order was instituted in 1815 when Hanover became a kingdom. For the following twenty-two years the Kings of England were also Kings of Hanover, and the order was conferred on British subjects. When Queen Victoria became Queen of England, her uncle, the Duke of Cumberland, became King of Hanover, and the order became entirely a foreign order.

Guernsey. One of the Channel Islands (q.v.).

Guest-taker. Anciently this meant an agister (q.v.).

Guidon de la Mer. A French treatise, composed during the latter half of the sixteenth century and first published in 1607, which sets out the maritime law of the period. Many of the propositions laid down by the author became part first of the French law and subsequently of the law of other nations. See CONSOLATO DEL MARE.

Guild. See GILD.

Guildhalda Teutonicorum. (The Guildhall of the Germans.) According to the Termes de la Ley, it was used as meaning "the fraternity of Easterling Merchants in London called the Stilyard." The "Steelyard" (q.v.) meant not only the place so called, but also the association of German merchants forming the Hanse (q.v.).

Guildhall Sittings. For many years before 1883 sittings (known as the Guildhall Sittings and sometimes also as the London Sittings) had been held at the Guildhall of the City of London by judges of the common law Courts, and, after the Judicature Acts, of the King's Bench Division, under commissions issued for the trial of issues or inquiries in London cases at nisi prius. By Order in Council made 22nd May, 1885, under s. 20 of the Courts of Justice Building Act, 1865, such cases were ordered to be tried in future at the Royal Courts of Justice. The Supreme Court of Judicature (London Causes) Act, 1891, sanctioned a resumption of the ancient practice; but this provision was acted on for only a short time and sittings at the Guildhall have not been held for many years past.

Habeas Corpora juratorum. This was a writ upon which trial of causes at nisi prius was had in the Court of Common Pleas. It commanded the sheriff to have before the Court at Westminster, or before the judges of assize and nisi prius, the bodies of the jurors named in the panel to the writ as having been summoned to make a jury for the trial. It was abolished by the Common Law Procedure

Act, 1852, s. 104. Compare DISTRINGAS; VENIRE FACIAS JURATORES.

Habeas Corpus is a writ so called because it is directed to a person who detains another in custody and commands him to produce or "have the body" of that person before the Court for a specified purpose.

The most important species of habeas corpus is that which is called by way of distinction the habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, from its commanding the person to whom it is directed to produce the body of the person detained, with the day and cause of his caption and detention, ad faciendum, subjiciendum et recipiendum—"to do, submit to and receive" whatsoever the Court shall direct. This writ was formerly much used for testing the legality of imprisonment for political reasons, especially during the reigns of the Stuarts; and the evasions and abuses practised by the judges (at the instance of the Crown) to detain state prisoners in prison, led to the enactment of the Habeas Corpus Act, 1679. This Act in effect made the granting of a habeas corpus compulsory in the case of a person imprisoned without a legal cause being assigned in the warrant of committal, and provided for the speedy trial of persons imprisoned for treason or felony. The Habeas Corpus Act, 1816, passed to render the writ more effectual in cases not within the statute of Charles II., provided for the issue and return of a habeas corpus in vacation as well as in term, and for examining into the truth of the facts stated in any return to a habeas corpus. The Habeas Corpus Act, 1862, enacts that no habeas corpus shall issue out of England into any colony or foreign dominion of the Crown where there is a Court having authority to issue the writ; subject to this limitation, the writ of habeas corpus runs into all parts of the dominions of the Crown. At the present day the writ is only used to determine questions of law, e.g., as to the legality of an imprisonment (as where a person is arrested under the Extradition Acts), or as to the person entitled to the custody of an infant, or the like. The writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum is a prerogative writ. See WRIT.

The following kinds of habeas corpus have become practically obsolete since the abolition of arrest on mesne process and of imprisonment for debt—(1) Habeas corpus ad respondendum, to bring up a prisoner confined by the process of an inferior Court, to charge him with a fresh action in the Court above; (2) ad satisfaciendum, used with a similar object when judgment had been given in the inferior Court against the prisoner; (3) habeas corpus cum causâ (or ad faciendum et recipiendum), to remove, from an inferior Court to the Court above, an action in which the defendant had been arrested.

The writ of habeas corpus ad prosequendum, testificandum, deliberandum, etc., was formerly used when a prisoner had to be brought up to bear testimony in any Court, or to be tried in the proper jurisdiction; the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1853, s. 9, the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1867, s. 10, the County Courts Act, 1888, s. 112, and the Prisons Act, 1898, s. 11, have made the writ obsolete.

Habemus optimum testem confitentem reum (Fost. Cr. L. 243). (We deem an accused who pleads guilty to be the best possible witness.) "What is taken pro confesso, says Lord Stowell, is taken as indubitable truth. The plea of guilty by the party accused shuts out all further inquiry. Habemus confitentem reum is demonstration, unless indirect motives can be assigned to it" (2 Hagg. 315). But in murder cases a plea of guilty is rarely accepted, the general course being to get the accused to enter a formal plea of not guilty in order that the evidence may be brought out.

Habendum. This is the clause in a conveyance which indicates the estate to be taken by the grantee. Formerly it commenced "To have (habendum) and to hold (tenendum)," the words "to hold" being of effect where the land was held of some superior lord. Now it commences merely "To hold," and though the habendum proper has thus been dropped, the clause is still known as the habendum.

Haberdepayes. Avoirdupois (q.v.).

Habere facias possessionem (that you cause to have possession) was the name for the writ by which the claimant in the old action of ejectment (if successful) obtained possession of the land in question. The name is still sometimes applied to the analogous writ of possession now used, which is in similar terms. See WRIT OF POSSESSION.

The writ of possession now used under the Tithe Acts, 1831 and 1891, is still properly known as the writ of habere facias possessionem. See App. 8, No. 7B to R. S. C.

Habere facias seisinam. (That you cause to have seisin.) A writ which was formerly addressed to the sheriff requiring him to give seisin of a freehold estate recovered in an action.

Habere facias seisinam quia Rex, etc. An alternative title of the writ SEISINA HABENDA (q.v.).

Habere facias visum. (That you cause to have the view.) A writ which formerly issued in formedon and other real actions where it was necessary that a view should be had of lands in question.

Habitual Criminal. The preventive detention of habitual criminals is provided for by the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1908, ss. 10-16. For the purposes of that Act, the expression "habitual criminal" means a person who, after attaining the age of sixteen years, has been three or more times convicted, either before or after the passing of the Act, of the following crimes or some one or more of them—any felony, uttering false or counterfeit coin, possessing counterfeit gold or silver coin, obtaining goods or money by false pretences, conspiracy to defraud, or any misdemeanour under the Larceny Acts, 1861 and 1916—and who is proved to have been persistently leading [between the expiration of his last sentence and the commission of the offence for which he is indicted] a dishonest or criminal life, or any person who, on any such previous conviction has been found to be an habitual criminal and sentenced to preventive detention under the Act (s. 10 (2)). The question whether any person who is tried on indictment for any of the above-mentioned offences is an habitual criminal is also tried on indictment; if he is convicted of the offence and also of being an habitual criminal, he may, if sentenced for the offence to a term of penal servitude, be ordered to undergo, at the expiration of his term, preventive detention for not more than ten or less than five years.

Habitual Drunkards. The Acts dealing with habitual drunkards are the Habitual Drunkards Act, 1879, the Inebriates Act, 1888, the Inebriates Act, 1898, and the Inebriates Act, 1899. They are collectively entitled (Act of 1899, s. 3) the Inebriates Acts, 1879 to 1899. They provide for (1) the establishment of private retreats and State and certified inebriate reformatories; (2) the voluntary detention in private retreats of habitual drunkards; (3) the compulsory detention in State or certified inebriate reformatories of habitual drunkards (a) who are convicted on indictment of offences punishable with penal servitude or imprisonment, or (b) who are convicted of various offences involving drunkenness and within the twelve months preceding such conviction have three times been convicted of any such offence; and (4) the protection of property from a wife or husband who is an habitual drunkard. For the purposes of the Acts an "habitual drunkard" means (see s. 3 of the Act of 1879) "a person who not being amenable to any jurisdiction in lunacy, is notwithstanding, by reason of habitual intemperate drinking of intoxicating liquors, at times dangerous to himself or herself or to others, or incapable of managing himself or herself or his or her affairs." See SEPARATION ORDER.

Hackbut; Hagbut; Haquebut; Harquebus. A firearm, otherwise known as a demyhake, the total length of which, under the statute 33 Hen. 8, c. 6, s. 2, could not legally be less than three-quarters of a yard. See also the statute 4 & 5 Ph. & M. c. 2.

Hackney Carriage. See CAB.

Hade of Land. A strip of land left unploughed between two ploughed portions of a field.

Hadfield's Act. The popular title of the Judgments Act, 1864, which was introduced by Mr. George Hadfield, M.P.

Hærede abducto, De. A writ which anciently lay for one, who was entitled to the wardship of his tenant under age, when the tenant had been carried off by another.

Hærede deliberando alteri qui habet custodiam terræ, De. A writ which required the sheriff to hand over an heir to one who had custody of the heir's land.

Hæredem, qui ex testamento succedit in universum jus testaris (Co. Litt. 237). Coke, explaining the difference between the heir (q.v.) of the English law and the hæres of the Roman law, says "the civilians call him hæredem, etc.," that is to say, the civilians call him the hæres who by force of a testament succeeds to all the rights of the testator.

Hærede rapto, De. The writ of ravishment of gard. (q.v.).

Hæredi magis parcendum est (Dig. 31, 1, 47). (The hæres [of the Roman law] is to be treated with the greater tenderness.) This is merely the dictum upon which one Proculus Nepos decided that the construction of a testament which was most favourable to the hæres ought to be adopted.

Hæredipeta. The next heir to lands: see Leg. Hen. 1, c. 70.

Hæreditas, alia corporalis, alia incorporalis: corporalis est, quæ tangi potest et videri; incorporalis quæ tangi non potest nec videri (Co. Litt. 9). An inheritance (q.v.) is in some cases corporeal and in others incorporeal. A corporeal inheritance is one which is tangible and visible: an incorporeal inheritance is intangible and invisible. Thus it may be either land or a perpetual rent issuing out of land.

Hæreditas nihil aliud est quam successio in universum jus quod defunctus habuerit (Dig. 50, 17, 62). Heirship is nothing else than the succession to all the rights of a deceased. This is purely Roman law: our law knows nothing of the hæres of the Roman law. See HÆREDEM, etc.

Hæreditas nunquam ascendit (Glanville, l. 7, c. 1). Inheritance never ascends, that is to say, is never from a descendant to an ancestor, these words being taken in their ordinary sense. But this is no longer the law. See DESCENT. See PATER ET MATER NON, etc.

Hæredum appellatione veniunt hæredes hæredum in infinitum (Co. Litt. 9). (Under the denomination of heirs are included the heirs of heirs for ever.) Nevertheless, the old form of grant of lands to a man was to him and his heirs for ever; but the modern grant to him and his heirs would always have been just as effectual. Compare HEIR IS, ETC.

Hæres. An heir (q.v.). See ASTRARIUS.

Hæres est aut jure proprietatis, aut jure repræsentationis (3 Rep. 40). (An heir is by right of property, or by right of representation); that is to say, as Coke explains, the eldest son is the heir jure proprietatis, but if the eldest son dies in the life of his father his issue take jure representationis in preference to the younger son of the father. See Co. Litt. 10 b.

Hæres est nomen juris, filius est nomen naturæ (Bacon Max. Reg. 11). (Heir is a name of law, son is a name of nature.) That is to say an heir is such by the course of the law, while a son is such in the course of nature.

Hæres legitimus est quem nuptiæ demonstrant (Co. Litt. 7). (The lawful heir is he whom wedlock shows so to be.) That is to say, land can descend only as between persons whose relationship can be traced through lawful wedlock and where the birth of the person claiming as heir has taken place after wedlock.

Hæretico comburendo, De. See HERESY.

Hafne. An early spelling of haven. "Hafne courts" were granted to Richard Duke of Gloucester, High Admiral of England, by letters patent of 5 Edw. 4.

Hague Conference. A meeting of the representatives of practically every important State which was held at The Hague in 1899, in order to promote disarmament, a more humane method of conducting wars, and arbitration as a means of preventing wars. The most important result was the signing of the Hague Arbitration Convention, under which a permanent court—known as the Panel of Arbitrators, or the Permanent Hague Court, or the Tribunal of the Hague—was established for the settlement of international disputes. The court worked very well as regards various questions—such as the Newfoundland Fishery dispute—but it obviously could not prevent such a calamity as the war of 1914-18. See also GENEVA CONVENTION.

The conference reassembled in 1907 in order to consider various suggestions for the mitigation of the horrors of war and as to contraband, etc.: but little came of this further meeting.

Haia. This, which is a form of hagia (a hedge), was sometimes used in the time of Bracton, as meaning an enclosed park.

Haliwerkfolk. See HALIWERFOLK.

Hake. A species of gun capable of firing small shot: the statute 2 & 3 Edw. 6. c. 14, restricted its use. The word, of course, also meant a species of fish, as it still does.

Hale. Sir Matthew Hale was born at Alderley in 1609, became serjeant-at-law, a justice of the Common Pleas in 1654, Chief Baron of the Exchequer in 1660, Lord Chief Justice in 1671, and died in 1676. He wrote a History of the Common Law, an Analysis of the Law, a Treatise on Pleas of the Crown, —all of which are works of authority—and some minor works.

Half Blood. See BLOOD.

Half Bowl. See CLOSH.

Half-crown. See GOLD COINS; SILVER COINS.

Half-mark. Where a writ of right (q.v.) was brought and the seisin of the plaintiff or his ancestor was alleged, the defendant was not allowed to traverse (or deny) the seisin, but he could "tender the half-mark" and thereby put the plaintiff upon proof of the seisin alleged. See SILVER COINS.

Halfpenny. See COPPER COINS; SILVER COINS.

Half-seal. The seal formerly used in the Court of Chancery to seal commissions to delegates upon any appeal, whether maritime or ecclesiastical, to the Court of Delegates. See DELEGATES.

Half-timer. This was the popular designation of a child employed in a factory or workshop during such periods as are specified in ss. 24-27 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1908, who, except for such employment, would have been obliged to put in full attendance at school, but who in consequence of such employment was, under s. 68 of the same Act, permitted to put in a reduced number of attendances at school. Now, as will be seen under FACTORIES, a child under fourteen, and in some cases a child under fifteen, cannot be employed in a factory or workshop. The "half-timer" is consequently extinct.

Half-tongue. Medietas Linguæ: see JURY.

Halifax Gibbet Law. The burgesses of Halifax had from ancient times a right, probably originating in some royal grant, to execute anyone taken within the liberty of Halifax who was found guilty of the theft of goods to the value of more than thirteen pence. The execution was carried out upon a hill outside the town, the criminal being decapitated with an instrument resembling the modern guillotine. The last execution under the law was in 1650. The Halifax Gibbet Law was a survival of the law of infangtheft (q.v.). See CONFESSAND.

Haliwerfolk. This is an Anglicised form of the Old English haligweresfolc, which meant "the folk of the holy man": the holy man was St. Cuthbert and his folk were those who held their lands by the service of defending his tomb and the possessions of the see of Durham. By the fourteenth century the origin of the word had come to be forgotten: it was corrupted into "halywarkfolk and holy workfolk"; and the popular explanation that these words meant the folk of the holy work was accepted by various writers of law dictionaries down to our own time.

Hall. An abbreviated title of the Court of Common Hall. See LONDON.

Hallage. A toll upon goods sold in a building used as a mart, as Blackwell Hall in the City of London was formerly.

Hallamas. Formerly this meant the feast of All Hallows or All Saints (q.v.). The more correct form would appear to be Hallowmass: but that word would seem to be Scotch rather than English.

Hallamshire. One of the manors comprised in the borough of Sheffield.

Hallimote; Hallmote. An Anglo-Saxon court corresponding to the later court baron (q.v.). The name is still applied to the courts of manors forming part of the endowment of the see of Durham: and the meetings of the City Companies (q.v.) in their halls are known as hallmotes.

Hambling; Hammelling. The same as expeditation (q.v.).

Hamburg Company. See MERCHANT ADVENTURERS.

Hamfare. The same as HAMESÖKEN (q.v.): see Leg. Hen. 1, c. 80, par. 11.

Hamsocne; Hamesoken. In Anglo-Saxon and early post-Conquest law this meant an attack on a dwelling-house or an attack on a man in his own house.

Hanaper. See CLERK OF THE HANAPER; COMPTROLLER.

Handborow. According to Spelman, and the copyists of Spelman, this meant one or each of the nine sureties associated with the headborough (q.v.) in the frankpledge: but it is doubtful whether the word ever existed outside the glossaries and dictionaries. See MURRAY, s.v.

Handgrith. This seems to have meant, in Anglo-Saxon times, a protection or safeguard under the hand of the king.

Hand-habhende. A thief was said in Bracton's time to be hand-habhende when he actually had the stolen goods in his hand. See CONFESSAND.

Hand in and hand out. See CLOSH.

Handmoney. Earnest (q.v.) money.

Handsale. A sale of chattels which anciently was concluded by a shaking of hands. The custom still survives in connection with the sale of cattle in Ireland; but it is, of course, without legal effect.

Handsel. Earnest (q.v.) money.

Handwriting. In the law of evidence, where a document requires attestation for its validity, it is, as a rule, necessary to call an attesting witness to prove the signature, unless it is, for any reason impossible to produce him; but in the case of a document which, though not requiring attestation, has been attested, the signature may be proved as if it had not been attested. Evidence as to the handwriting of a person may be given (i) by a person who saw him write the document in question; (ii) by a person who has seen him write other documents and believes the writing in question to be his; the presumption arising from such evidence was formerly called præsumptio ex visu scriptionis: (iii) by a person who knows his handwriting from having corresponded with him or having had other opportunities of observing writing which there was reasonable ground for believing to be his (formerly called præsumptio ex scriptis olim visis); (iv) by an expert or other person who has compared the writing in question with a document proved, to the satisfaction of the judge, to be in the handwriting of the party (formerly called præsumptio ex scripto nunc viso). See COMPARISON OF HANDWRITING; DOCUMENT.

"Hanged, drawn and quartered." See HIGH TREASON.

Hanging. As to the punishment of hanging, see CAPITAL PUNISHMENT. For some time before 1834 the bodies of prisoners executed for murder were, as the Court might direct, either dissected or hung in chains: the statute 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 26, prohibited both practices. Hanging in chains meant that the body, covered with pitch, was suspended by chains from a gibbet on some such place as a common. In the old books "hanging" is used in the sense of "pending"; thus in Coke "hanging the process" means "pending the process."

Hangwite. This was a penalty for allowing a thief or felon to escape or for hanging a felon without trial.

Hanover (Herald). See HERALDS.

Hanse. From Norman times down to the reign of Edward VI. many privileges in connection with foreign trade were enjoyed by an association of German merchants, known at first as the Old Hanse and subsequently as the New Hanse.

See STEELYARD; MERCHANT ADVENTURERS; GUILDHALDA.

Hanseatic Laws of the Sea. The maritime law of the Hanse towns was collected and published as a code by the Hanseatic League in 1591. This was accepted as authoritative throughout northern Europe. The subject had been also dealt with by the earlier laws of Wisby (q.v.). A translation of the Hanseatic Laws is given in Cleirac's Us et Coutumes de la Mer.

Harbinger. See KNIGHT HARBINGER.

Harbours. A harbour is a place naturally adapted or artificially made for the safe riding of ships. The term, therefore, includes ports (q.v.).

The Crown has the prerogative of appointing or constituting ports and havens, and of declaring the limits of existing harbours, where they were not originally fixed. In practice, however, a harbour is now always constituted either by a special Act of Parliament, or, under the General Pier and Harbour Act, 1861, by a provisional order of the Ministry of Transport, confirmed by Act of Parliament. The provisions of the Harbours, Docks and Piers Clauses Act, 1847 (which contains clauses usually required in Acts authorising the construction of harbours, docks and piers), apply to harbours so formed.

The Crown is conservator of all ports and harbours. Its powers and duties in this respect are now, under the Harbour Transfers Act, 1862, chiefly exercised by the Ministry of Transport.

A "harbour authority" is a body of persons, corporate or unincorporate, being proprietors of or intrusted with the duty of constructing, improving, managing or lighting any harbour (Harbours and Passing Tolls Act, 1861, s. 2).

The powers and duties of the Board of Trade with regard to harbours were transferred to the Ministry of Transport pursuant to the Ministry of Transport Act, 1919, s. 2.

Hard Labour. Hard labour is a punishment unknown to the common law, under which imprisonment was detention merely; and a sentence could be to imprisonment with hard labour only if there was express statutory authority for ordering hard labour. Now under the Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, s. 16 (1), "Where a person convicted by or before any Court of an offence is sentenced to imprisonment without the option of a fine, the imprisonment may, in the discretion of the Court, be either with or without hard labour, notwithstanding that the offence is an offence at common law, or that the statute under which the sentence is passed does not authorise the imposition of hard labour or requires the imposition of hard labour"; but hard labour can never be ordered when the imprisonment is in default of payment of a fine (ib. s. 16 (1)).

Prisoners sentenced to hard labour are to do their work in strict separation from other prisoners during the first twenty-eight days, and, if under the age of sixty, they must sleep without a mattress for the first fourteen days (Rules for Local Prisons, r. 39). These are the points which distinguish them from prisoners in the third division. See IMPRISONMENT.

See FORFEITURE.

Hardwicke's (Lord) Act. The popular title of the statute 26 Geo. 2, c. 33. See MARRIAGE.

Hare. Hares cannot lawfully be taken or killed on Sunday or on Christmas Day (Game Act, 1831, ss. 2, 3); but there is no annual close season (q.v.) for them. Hares, other than those imported from abroad, cannot, however, lawfully be sold or exposed for sale during March, April, May, June, or July (Hares Preservation Act, 1892). See GAME; GROUND GAME.

As to the destruction of hares which injure or are likely to injure trees, see RABBITS.

Haro, Clameur de. This is mentioned in the Grand Coustumier, etc. (q.v.). The full ancient form appears to have been Haro, Haro, Haro, a l'aide, mon prince, on me fait tort. The word Haro was popularly supposed to be an abbreviation of Ha Rollo, Rollo being the first Duke of Normandy, but it is now established that it is merely a cry of distress or alarm which, in cognate forms, is found in languages other than the Norman French.

The Clameur de Haro, or crying of Haro was from the earliest times part of the legal system of the Channel Islands, where it has survived to our own time, though of recent years it has fallen into disuse. It consists, or consisted, of the word Haro three times repeated; and in Jersey and Guernsey it is the ancient form of protesting against trespass to land.

Jacob speaks of the Clameur de Haro as "an outcry after felons and malefactors"; but in England to "cry harrow" was merely to express distress or alarm, and no "crying of harrow" appears to have been known to our ancient law.

Harriott is the old form of heriot (q.v.).

Hart. In the law of the forest, this meant a stag five years old: if a hart was hunted by the king or the queen and escaped, then he was a "hart royal"; and where proclamation was made that none should hinder the return to the forest of a hart royal which had been chased out of it by the king or the queen, then that hart royal became a "hart royal proclaimed."

Hasta porci. It is recorded (see Kennett's Parochial Antiquities, p. 450) that Thomas de Musgrave held certain lands of the king by the service of carrying one "hastam porci" to the king whenever the king hunted in the park of Cornbury. Kennett translates "hasta porci" as "shield of brawn," and Jacob follows him; but hasta certainly did not mean a shield. Possibly "boar spear" is the correct translation; for porcus may have been corruptly used as meaning a wild boar (though properly it meant the domestic pig), and hasta could only have meant a spear.

Hat Money. See PRIMAGE.

Haw. This seems to have meant in Kent, much the same as messuage (q.v.), but it seems also to have been used as meaning either the house alone or the land in which it was enclosed.

Hawker. The Hawkers Act, 1888, s. 1, enacts that the word "'Hawker' means any person who travels with a horse or other beast bearing or drawing burden and goes from place to place or to other men's houses carrying to sell or exposing for sale any goods wares or merchandise or exposing samples or patterns of any goods wares or merchandise to be afterwards delivered, and includes any person who travels by any means of locomotion to any place in which he does not usually reside or carry on business and there sells or exposes for sale any goods wares or merchandise in or at any house shop room booth stall or other place whatever hired or used by him for that purpose." Compare PEDLAR.

The Act provides that hawkers, with certain exceptions, must hold excise licences, costing £2 and expiring on 31st March in each year; and there are also various other provisions, for which reference should be made to the Act.

Hawks. The stealing of a hawk (which meant a falcon, but no smaller hawk) was felony without benefit of clergy: see 3 Inst. 97, and the statutes 34 Edw. 3, 37 Edw. 3, c. 19. Interference with unreclaimed hawks when breeding involved a penalty of £10 (half of which went to the king and half to the prosecutor) under the statute 11 Hen. 7, c. 17.

Hay-bote. See ESTOVERS.

Haymarket. The statutes 2 W. & M. sess. 2, c. 8, s. 15, and 8 & 9 Will. 3, c. 17, s. 5, regulated the sale of hay in "the place now called the Hay Market near Pickadilly," which then was what its name denotes. The first of these Acts, though long replaced by other Acts relating to the metropolis, remained on the statute book until 1867; the second was repealed in 1831 by the statute 11 Geo. 4 and 1 Will. 4, c. 14, entitled "An Act for removing the market at present held for the Sale of Hay and Straw from the Haymarket; and for establishing Markets for the Sale of Hay, Straw and other articles in York Square, Clarence Gardens, and Cumberland Market in the Parish of St. Pancras and County of Middlesex." Under the Act of 1831 a market, of gradually diminishing importance, has been carried on in Cumberland Square, which lies between the Hampstead Road and the east side of Regent's Park, and, as the carriage of hay into London by carts has practically ceased, half of Cumberland Square was converted into an "open space" in the year 1922.

Hayward. This was an officer of the manor, elected and sworn in at the court baron (q.v.), whose duty it was to look after the boundary fences, and, amongst other things, to prevent animals from trespassing on meadows, etc.

Hazard. An unlawful game with dice. See GAMING.

"He." In every Act passed after the year 1850, and in every enactment, no matter when passed, relating to an offence punishable on indictment or summarily, "he" includes "she," unless the contrary intention appears (Interpretation Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 63), s. 1.

Headborough. Originally this was the chief of the ten men who made up a frankpledge. During the thirteenth century, and probably during earlier times, there were for the various frankpledges, tithings and townships, persons known as headboroughs (or borrow heads), borsholders (borghs alders) and tithing men, elected by the courts leet, who were entrusted with the maintenance of order in the areas for which they were elected. They are mentioned so late as 1848 in the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, s. 3, and the Indictable Offences Act, 1848, s. 10; but by that time they had only a shadowy existence. They had been gradually replaced by the petty and parish constables (q.v.) who would seem to be first mentioned in the statute 2 Edw. 3, c. 3, and who would seem to have derived from them the various powers of a constable (as to arrest, etc.) at common law. See HANDBOROW.

Headlam's Acts. The popular title of the Trustee Acts, 1850 & 1852, both of which were carried through the House of Commons by Thomas Headlam, M.P., who subsequently was judge advocate-general.

Head Money. A poll tax. See POLL MONEY.

Head Pence; Head Silver. From a recital in the statute 23 Hen. 6, c. 7, it appears that the sheriffs of Northumberland had been accustomed to levy off the inhabitants of the county a sum of £40 twice in every seven years, that is to say every third and fourth year, for their own personal profit. This levy, which was called head pence or head silver, was prohibited by the statute.

Healfang; Halsfang. The pillory, or a fine as an alternative to the pillory. See the Leg. Hen. 1, c. 11, s. 7, where helsfang is made the punishment for false testimony. The words are Anglo-Saxon: but it is doubtful whether the pillory was used before the Conquest.

Health, Minister of. This minister is appointed under the Ministry of Health Act, 1919, s. 1. By s. 3 of that Act there were transferred to him all the powers and duties of the Local Government Board (q.v.) and of the Insurance Commissioners (q.v.) and the Welsh Insurance Commissioners and, to put it comprehensively, all such powers and duties of a multiplicity of ministries, boards, departments, etc., as have anything to do with the preservation of health or the prevention or cure of disease. The Minister of Health has a salary of £5,000 a year (s. 6 (1)); he can sit in the House of Commons (s. 7 (5): New Ministries and Secretaries Act, 1916, s. 12 (1)); and he is, and apparently will generally be, a member of the Cabinet.

See CONSULTATIVE BOARDS; OFFICE OF PROFIT.

Hearing. Under the practice in Chancery before the Judicature Acts the hearing of a cause was the argument of it in Court after the conclusion of the pleadings and the close of the evidence. In the case of a suit heard on motion for decree, the original hearing on the motion for decree frequently did not dispose of the suit, but made it necessary to have a subsequent hearing on further consideration (q.v.). Under the present practice the hearing of an action takes the form either of a trial or a motion for judgment (q.v.).

Hearsay. See EVIDENCE.

Hearth Money. Anciently used as meaning Church Scot (q.v.), but more generally used as an equivalent for CHIMNEY MONEY (q.v.).

Hearth-penny (Romescot). Peter-pence (q.v.).

Heath Cock; Heath Polt. These terms are used in the statute 4 W. & M. c. 23, s. 9, as synonyms of blackcock (q.v.).

Hebbermen; Hebberwears. These respectively were men (see the statute 4 Hen. 7, c. 15) who fished below London Bridge during the ebb-tide, and wears or engines (see Form of Commission to Commissioners of Sewers in the statute 23 Hen. 8, c. 5) set up in tidal waters to catch fish on the ebb-tide.

Heck. A grating used to catch fish or to obstruct their passage: mentioned in the statutes 12 Edw. 4, c. 7, 23 Hen. 8, c. 18, and 43 Geo. 3, c. 45, s. 15.

Hedge-bote. The same as hay-bote: see ESTOVERS.

Heineccius was born at Eisenberg in 1681, became professor in Halle, and died in 1741. He wrote numerous works on Roman law, which, though somewhat out of date, are still occasionally referred to. The principal are the Elementa Juris Civilis and the Antiquitatum Syntagma.

Heir. The word "heir," when used to describe or designate a given person, includes three classes, "heirs at law" (or "heirs" simply), "heirs apparent" and "heirs presumptive."

An heir (or heir at law) is a person who stood in such a degree of relationship to a deceased person (called the ancestor), that the real property of the latter has descended to him, or would have descended to him if the ancestor had died intestate. The mode in which the relationship is to be computed is regulated by the canons of descent laid down by the Inheritance Act, 1833. See DESCENT.

With reference to the rules of descent, by virtue of which they inherit, heirs are of the following kinds: (i) the heir at common law is he to whom his ancestor's lands, etc., descend according to the common law as modified by the Inheritance Act, as opposed to (ii) a customary heir or special heir, who inherits by virtue of a custom, such as gavelkind or borough-English; (iii) an heir general takes by descent as fixed by law, as opposed to (iv) an heir special or heir in tail, who claims as issue in tail per formam doni, i.e., according to the nature of the estate tail; hence heirs special are called "heirs male of the body," "heirs in special tail," etc., according to the variety of the entail, see ESTATE TAIL.

With reference to the nature and degree of the relationship between the ancestor and the heir: (i) Formerly a person was said to be lineal if he was lineally descended from his ancestor, as son, grandson, etc.; for, before the Inheritance Act, 1833, descent could not be traced lineally upwards, from son to father, but now an heir may be a lineal descendant or a lineal ancestor. (ii) A collateral heir is related to his ancestor by being descended with him from a common progenitor, as in the case of brothers, cousins, nephew and uncle, etc. (iii) An heir of the whole blood is descended from the same pair of progenitors as his ancestor, while (iv) an heir of the half blood and his ancestor have only one common progenitor. Thus A and B his wife have two sons, X and Y.: B. dies, and A marries C, and they have a son Z: here Y is heir of the full blood to X, but only heir of the half blood to Z. (v) Heirs of the part of the father are those related by blood to the father of the ancestor (e.g., a paternal uncle), and (vi) heirs of the part of the mother, are those related by blood to the mother of the ancestor, but this distinction is not now of importance. (See DESCENT.) (vii) Heir by propinquity is where the heir takes as being the nearest blood relation, as opposed to (viii) heir by representation, where he takes as representing or standing in the place of his ancestor. See the fourth canon of descent, DESCENT.

The following distinctions are not now of practical interest.—"Immediate heir" was formerly used to signify that the heir was heir apparent or presumptive at the death of the ancestor, as opposed to the case where there is an intermediate descent without seisin (See DESCENT.) Formerly a person might be heir and not absolutely heir; as if land descended to an heir presumptive and afterwards a nearer heir was born (Co. Litt. 11b); but since the Inheritance Act, 1833, this is impossible, except in the case of a posthumous heir being born.

When land is given to "the heir" of a person, the heir claims not by descent from his ancestor, but by purchase from the donor, the word "heir" being used as a descriptio personæ; and hence he is called heir by limitation, as opposed to the heir in fact, heir in deed (or actual heir). If a testator devises land to his own heir at law, the latter takes as devisee and not as heir.

"Right heir" seems to mean sometimes heir at common law; and sometimes rightful heir, as opposed to a supposititious heir. Hæres astrarius is used in the old books to denote an heir apparent to whom his ancestor has conveyed the inheritance in his lifetime, and he is so called from astre (modern French âtre), a hearth, used figuratively for a dwelling-house. As to mesne heirs, see SEISIN.

Co-heirs are two or more persons who take by the same descent. Thus, if a tenant of gavelkind land leaves several sons, they take as co-heirs. So if a tenant of ordinary land leaves no son and several daughters, they take his land as co-heiresses. See COPARCENERY.

An heir apparent is a person who will be heir to his ancestor if he survives him. He is not heir in the proper sense of the word until after the death of his ancestor, for "nemo est hæres viventis." Formerly "heir apparent" was applied to the nearest living heir, for he would be heir if the ancestor died immediately, while a distinction was taken between an heir apparent who must be heir in any event ("certain and perdurable heir apparent"), and an heir apparent whose claim is liable to be defeated wholly or partially by the birth of a nearer heir or co-heir. At the present day, however, "heir apparent" means him who, if he survives his ancestor, must certainly be his heir, e.g., an eldest son in ordinary cases, while any other heir is called an heir presumptive, because his claim to inherit is liable to be defeated by the birth of a nearer heir.

An heir apparent or presumptive is an immediate heir, that is, he is the nearest blood relation capable of inheriting to his ancestor. All other blood relations capable of inheriting are called remote heirs: thus A's eldest son is his immediate heir, and his younger son is his remote heir.

"Heir" is also used as a word of limitation to denote the quality of an estate of inheritance on its creation. Formerly an estate in fee could not be created by deed without the words "and his heirs" following the name of the grantee. "Tenant in fee simple," says Littleton, "is he which hath lands or tenements to hold to him and his heirs for ever." Now, since 1881, an estate in fee can be created by adding the words "in fee simple" to the name of the grantee. But either the one form of words or the other is necessary to create a fee simple: if land is conveyed to A simply, A merely takes an estate for life. Similarly, an estate tail is properly created by the words "and the heirs of his body" following the name of the grantee. In wills and agreements words of inheritance are not required. (See FEE; ESTATE TAIL; WORDS OF LIMITATION.)

"Heir" and "heirs" are used in a popular sense, especially by testators, to signify the eldest son, or all the children, or the devisee or the next of kin of a given person. The meaning to be given to the word is a question of construction, on which several rules have been laid down.

See EXPECTANT HEIR; BASTARD; MONSTER.

Heir Apparent. The eldest son of the sovereign, or the eldest son of an eldest son of the sovereign who has died during the life of the sovereign, is the heir apparent of the Crown. No female descendant of the sovereign can ever be the heiress apparent, for, in contemplation of law, her right to succeed may always be defeated by the birth of an heir apparent or, unless she be the eldest living daughter of the sovereign, by the birth of another princess with a prior right. Thus the Princess Victoria was heiress presumptive to William IV., and the proclamation issued upon her accession expressly saved the rights of any posthumous child of William IV.

The management and control of the establishment of the heir apparent is regulated by the Heir Apparent's Establishment Act, 1795. This Act was really passed in view of the financial embarrassments of the then Prince of Wales. But the preamble sets out that "it is expedient to establish a regular course of payment of all just demands which may hereafter be made upon any future heir apparent of the Crown for any debt to be incurred and that accumulation of debt may be prevented." It provides that debts due by the heir apparent are void unless a claim be delivered in writing within ten days after the expiration of the quarter in which they are incurred (s. 7), and that no action lies by a creditor against the heir apparent in his own name, but that proceedings may be taken against the proper officer of his household within three months of the delivery of the claim and that payment, if recovered, is a charge upon the revenues in the hands of the proper officer (ss. 8, 9). This is the only immunity from legal proceedings enjoyed by the heir apparent.

Heiress is a female heir. See HEIR.

Heir is nomen collectivum (1 Vent. 215). The word heir is collective: and so, said Lord Hale, a devise to one for his life and then after his decease to his heir was held to be a grant in fee, just as if the grant had been to him and his heirs. Compare HÆREDUM, ETC.

Heirlooms are such goods and personal chattels as, contrary to the nature of chattels, go by special custom to the heir or devisee of the owner, along with the inheritance, and not to his executor. It is said that the owner of an heirloom cannot dispose of it by will so as to sever it from the inheritance, although he may dispose of it during his lifetime. Heirlooms in the strict sense are rare. A patent creating a dignity is the most usual case: such a thing as an ancient horn, where land is held by cornage (q.v.) is another instance. When personal property is left by will, or settled so as to descend like a proper heirloom so far as the rules of law allow, it is called an heirloom by devise or settlement, or a quasi-heirloom. See CHATTELS. As to the power of a tenant for life to sell heirlooms by order of the Court, see the Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 37.

"Heirs and Assigns." Regarding the effect of these two words when used in a deed see ASSIGN.

Heirship is the quality or condition of being heir, or the relation between the heir and his ancestor.

Hell. In the seventeenth century this was a popular name for a debtors' prison, and more particularly for a prison attached to the Court of Exchequer Chamber, in which at some earlier date the king's debtors had been confined.

Helsing. This is stated by Jacob to have been an Anglo-Saxon coin "equivalent to our half-penny." It does not, however, appear to be known to numismatists.

Hempholme. See CHILTERN HUNDREDS.

Henedpenny. A customary payment mentioned in a charter of Edward III., the precise nature of which is uncertain. It has been surmised to have been a payment in lieu of hens or eggs; while on the other hand it is suggested that it is a form of HEADPENNY; and the latter explanation seems the more probable.

Hengen. A prison; see Leg. Hen. 1. c. 65.

Henry I., Laws of. So called because they commence with a charter of that monarch. They were compiled probably about the year 1118 and are an attempt to compile a general statement of the principles of English law. They are printed in Thorpe's Ancient Laws of England, i. 497-608.

See Stubbs, Lectures on Early English History.

Heralds; Heralds' College. There are nine English heralds. The three chief heralds are termed Kings of Arms, and are known as Garter, Clarencieux, and Norroy: the other six are entitled merely Heralds and are known as Lancaster, York, Somerset, Chester, Richmond, and Windsor. They, together with four minor officials known as Pursuivants (or messengers), and respectively entitled Rouge Croix, Portcullis, Bluemantle, and Rouge Dragon, make up the College of Arms.

The heralds are all of comparatively recent origin. York, Lancaster, Chester, and Windsor originated in the reign of Edward III., Garter in that of Henry IV., Clarencieux and Richmond in that of Edward IV.; Norroy appears to be first mentioned in 1485; and Somerset was created by Henry VIII.

Garter is the principal herald: he was anciently known as Rex Armorum Anglicanorum Indefinite. Clarencieux (or Surroy, that is to say South Roy) was known as Rex Armorum Partium Australium: he acted for England south of the Trent. Norroy (North Roy) acted for England north of the Trent, and was known as Rex Armorum Partium Borealium.

Of the Pursuivants, Rouge Croix is the most ancient and the date of his origin is uncertain. Blue Mantle is believed to date from the reign of Edward III.; and the offices of Rouge Dragon and Portcullis were founded by Henry VII.

The College of Arms, otherwise and better known as the Heralds' College, was incorporated by Richard III. in 1483. Its present charter is that granted by Philip and Mary in 1556. It is under the jurisdiction of the Earl Marshal (q.v.). It had a jurisdiction as to armorial bearings and such matters, rather overlapping that of the Court of Chivalry (q.v.), with which it came into conflict; and it had functions in connection with the funerals of the nobility: but in 1692 it was decided that the College could not prevent undertakers from marshalling funerals or coachbuilders from painting armorial bearings "contrary to heraldry." Its present functions are entirely extra-legal.

A Gloucester King of Arms and a Hanover herald were created by George I. They were never part of the College of Arms, and their offices are now vacant or non-existent.

Herbage is the same as vesture (q.v.).

Herb Beer. "Means the beverage usually known as herb beer or botanic beer, but does not include ginger beer" (Finance Act, 1916, s. 11 (2)). An excise duty at the rate of twopence a gallon and a customs duty at the same rate are payable upon herb beer (ib. s. 11 (1)).

Herdwick. A pasture or sheepwalk; literally land under the care of a herd. Compare BAILIWICK.

Hereditament. "Whatsoever," says Coke, "may be inherited is an hereditament": in other words, when a right is of such a nature that on the death of its owner intestate it descends to his heir, it is a hereditament. The term includes a few rights unconnected with land, but it is generally used as the widest expression for real property of all kinds, and is therefore employed in conveyances after the words "lands" and "tenements" to include everything of the nature of realty which they do not cover.

The principal division of hereditaments is into those which lie in livery and those which lie in grant (see GRANT; LIVERY). Hereditaments lying in livery are those whereof livery of seisin can be made, such as lands, houses, etc.: in other words, they are visible and tangible objects, and are hence also called corporeal hereditaments. Hereditaments lying in grant are those whereof no livery of seisin can be made because they are mere rights, but they pass by deed of grant without more. They include (a) reversions, remainders and other executory interests in land; and (b) incorporeal hereditaments, namely, advowsons, tithes, easements, profits à prendre, services, rents, annuities, offices, dignities, franchises, etc. Some writers include reversions and remainders among incorporeal hereditaments, and distinguish incorporeal hereditaments in the strict sense by calling them hereditaments purely incorporeal: but the classification is neither correct nor convenient.

Another division of hereditaments is into real, personal and mixed. Real hereditaments are lands and tenements. A personal hereditament is one which concerns neither lands nor tenements, such as an annuity granted to a man and his heirs. A mixed hereditament is partly real and partly personal, as, says Coke, where "the king created an earl of such a county or other place, to hold that dignity to him and his heires, this dignity is personall, and also concerneth lands and tenements."

Hereditaments are also either legal, namely, such as descend to the heir by the rules of the common law, as in the preceding examples, or equitable, namely, those rights which exist only by the rules of equity; thus an equity of redemption (q.v.), and the interest of an heir in money directed to be laid out in the purchase of land, are equitable hereditaments. (See CONVERSION.)

Coke says that the franchises of chase, warren, and park are collateral hereditaments and not issuing out of the soil like rights of common, "and therefore if a man hath a chase in other men's grounds, and after purchase the grounds, the chase remaineth"; in other words, it is not extinguished by unity of seisin, being a privilege distinct from the land.

An entire hereditament is one, the parts of which are connected together, as opposed to several hereditaments, which are unconnected with one another; as if a man has two estates which are separated from one another by land belonging to other persons. Entire hereditaments, again, are either divisible or indivisible. Thus a piece of land or a rent-charge is divisible, while an advowson or a common sans nombre cannot be divided, the former from its nature, the latter because its division would increase the charge to the owner of the commonable land. An advowson, however, may in effect be divided between co-parceners, for they may agree to present by turns.

Hereditament (low Latin hereditamentum, from hereditas, inheritance) seems to be a comparatively modern word in English law: the old word is heritage.

Hereditary Revenues of the Crown. See CIVIL LIST; DEMESNE.

Hereditas. In the time of Glanvil, land held of a superior lord was divided into the hereditas and the questum, the hereditas being that which had descended to him, and the questum being any which had been granted to him personally. Only a "reasonable part" of the hereditas could be alienated by the tenant, and that could be alienated only for proper purposes and by gift inter vivos. With regard to the questum, the power of alienation inter vivos appears to have been unrestricted. See FRATRIAGIUM.

Heregeld. Used in Anglo-Saxon times as meaning either danegeld (q.v.) or the tax imposed to defray that payment.

Heresy is an ecclesiastical offence, consisting in the holding of a false opinion repugnant to some point of doctrine clearly revealed in Scripture, and either absolutely essential to the Christian faith, or at least of most high importance. It was formerly punishable by death, but the writ de hæretico comburendo was abolished by the statute 29 Car. 2, c. 9, and it is now punishable only by excommunication or other censure (q.v.) See EXCOMMUNICATION. See also APOSTASY; BLASPHEMY.

Heriots are of three kinds,—heriot service, suit heriot, and heriot custom.

Heriot service can only exist as incident to a freehold tenure created before the Statute of Quia Emptores (q.v.). It consists in the right of the lord to the best beast of a tenant dying seised of an estate of inheritance, and is recoverable by seizure or distress. Hence it is said to lie both in prender and in render: see those titles.

Suit heriot is the right to some chattel of a deceased tenant, reserved on a grant or lease of freehold lands made in modern times. It is not confined to the best beast or to the case of a tenant dying seised of an estate of inheritance. A suit heriot being a species of rent, the lord must either distrain or bring an action for it and cannot seize it.

Heriot custom is usually found in copyholds, though it also occurs in freeholds held of a manor in which the freeholders are subject to a set of customary rules. It is not recoverable by distress except by special custom, and is in other respects entirely regulated by local custom; thus it may be confined to the second best beast, or to animals of a particular kind, or to "dead goods." A heriot custom may also be due on alienation as well as on death.

In many cases heriots have been commuted for money payments. Now, under the Copyhold Act, 1894, s. 2, any lord or tenant of land subject to any heriot, whether commuted or not, may require it to be extinguished upon the terms provided by the Act.

The word "heriot" is a form of the Norman French heriet, late Latin heriotum, from Anglo-Saxon hergeata, heregeatve, an implement of warfare, because the lord on the death of his tenant was entitled to a certain number of the tenant's horses and arms, varying according to his military rank, or, in the case of a villein, to his best beast. Originally heriot and relief (q.v.) were spoken of as synonymous, but after the Conquest "relief" became appropriated to free tenants and "heriot" to villeins.

See SERVICE; MORTUARY.

Heroin. See DRUGS, DANGEROUS.

Herring Silver. Anciently this meant a yearly payment made by tenants of a religious house in commutation of the service of providing herrings for the monks.

Hexham. This was anciently sometimes described as a county palatine; but the statute 14 Eliz. c. 13, declared that it was merely part of the county of Northumberland.

Hidage. A tax upon every hide of land other than that held by knight service, corresponding to the tallage (q.v.) or talliage levied off towns. The statute De Tallagio non Concedendo (q.v.) was wide enough to cover hidage as well as the other taxes expressly mentioned in it.

Hide of land is the same as a ploughland or plowland (q.v.).

Hide and Gain. This, before the time of Coke, was used as meaning arable land.

High Bailiff. See BAILIFF.

High Commission. The statute 1 Eliz. c. 1, restored all ecclesiastical jurisdiction to the Crown, and empowered the Queen to execute that jurisdiction by commissioners to be appointed under the great seal; and the power of the commissioners, when appointed, was made to extend to all heresies, schisms, abuses, and offences whatsoever which fell under the cognizance of the spiritual authority. After various temporary commissions had been appointed under this Act, a more permanent commission was appointed under it in 1583, during the primacy of Archbishop Whitgift. This last-mentioned commission was the Court of High Commission, commonly so called. It consisted of forty-four commissioners, twelve of whom were bishops, other twelve of them privy councillors, and the rest either clergymen or laymen, all which commissioners were directed and empowered to inquire (by jury or by witnesses, or by other means of trial) into all offences or misdemeanours against or contrary to the Acts popularly called Acts of Supremacy (1 Eliz. c. 1) and Uniformity (1 Eliz. c. 2), including thereunder the cognizance of all heretical opinions, seditious books, contempts, conspiracies, false rumours, slanders, etc.; also, incests, adulteries, and the like; also, absence from church, etc. And any three of the commissioners, of whom one was to be a bishop, were empowered to examine suspected persons on oath and to punish the refractory by spiritual censures, fines, or imprisonments, at their discretion, with power also to amend the statutes of schools, colleges, etc.

The procedure of the Court was wholly founded on the canon law, and the accused was subjected to a series of interrogatories of an exhaustive and searching character, which he was compelled to answer on oath (called the oath ex officio) without evasion, not being allowed the benefit of the common law maxim, that no one is bound to criminate himself.

This Court met with the same fate, in the same year, from the same causes, and by the same Parliament, as the Court of Star Chamber and the Council of the North (see those titles). The statute abolishing the High Commission was the 16 Car. 1, c. 11.

High Constable. See CONSTABLES; CONSTABLE, LORD HIGH.

High Court of Admiralty was a Court of maritime jurisdiction, anciently styled the Court of the Lord High Admiral (see ADMIRAL). It had two jurisdictions, one as an Instance Court, in which originally not only civil but also criminal suits of a maritime nature were decided, and the other as a Prize Court. The same judge presided over both Courts, but by virtue of separate commissions.

By the Judicature Acts, 1873-5, the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court was transferred to the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division of the High Court (q.v.).

See ADMIRAL; ADMIRALTY DIVISION; CAPTURE; PRIZE COURT.

High Court of Justice. See SUPREME COURT.

Higher and Lower Scale. In the practice of the Supreme Court of Judicature before the present Rules of the Supreme Court came into operation in 1883, there were two scales regulating the fees of Court and the fees which solicitors were entitled to charge. The lower scale applied (unless the Court otherwise ordered) to the following cases: all causes and matters assigned by the Judicature Acts to the Queen's Bench or the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Divisions; all actions of debt, contract or tort; and in almost all causes and matters assigned by the Acts to the Chancery Division in which the amount in litigation was under £1,000. The higher scale applied in all other causes and matters, and also in actions falling under one of the above classes, but in which the principal relief sought to be obtained was an injunction. Now under

Ord. 65, r. 8, only the lower scale, as set out in Appendix N (Part II., Div. I.) to the rules, may be charged, unless (r. 9) the Court or a judge or a taxing master, acting under directions, allows costs on the higher scale as set out in the same Appendix, or unless (r. 10) costs are being taxed as between solicitor and client.

Highness. This, in its Latin form of celsitudo, was the title of the English King from the twelfth century. Subsequently the English form came into use and was used exclusively until the reign of Henry VIII., who assumed the title of Majesty. Then for about a hundred years Majesty and Highness were used alternatively: and, finally, during the reign of James I., the title of Majesty came into exclusive use for the King, Highness being appropriated to his children. Now sons, daughters, brothers and sisters, uncles and aunts, and grandchildren (being the children of sons), are entitled Royal Highness, while nephews, nieces and cousins, and grandchildren (being the children of daughters) are entitled Highness merely.

The title of Highness is also accorded to the great Indian independent rulers.

High Seas include the whole of the seas or open salt water on the globe, beyond the distance of three miles from the coast of any country. The country must be one recognising the obligations of international law, as the three-mile limit is an arbitrary creation of that law.

In the Franconia Case (q.v.), it was decided by a majority of seven against six judges, that the English criminal Courts had no jurisdiction to convict a foreigner for an offence committed on the open sea within a distance of three miles from the English coast. Two of the majority were also of opinion that the English Parliament had no power to legislate with reference to the portion of the open sea within three miles, so as to give the English Courts jurisdiction over offences committed there. The rest of the majority, however, considered that the English Parliament had this power The decision, therefore, merely went on the ground that legislation was necessary to give the English Courts jurisdiction, and that no statute having that effect had been passed. In accordance with this view, the Territorial Waters Jurisdiction Act, 1878, was shortly afterwards passed. See TERRITORIAL WATERS.

The high seas are common to all nations, and no part of them can become the property of any one State. They are, therefore, open to the navigation, fishery and commerce of all the world, and no nation has the right to exercise civil or criminal jurisdiction over the ships of other nations while passing over the high seas. The Courts of a country may however exercise jurisdiction over foreign ships in respect of injuries committed by them on the high seas, if they subsequently come within the territorial waters of that country: and the English Courts have in fact jurisdiction in such cases under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 688. As regards the right of fishing on the high seas, where a particular locality is habitually frequented by fishermen of different countries, and a custom is established regulating the mode and time of fishing, and such matters, the custom is binding on all those who frequent the locality.

The bed of the high seas appears to follow the same general rule, that it is common to all nations. There is, however, this difference, that it is capable of permanent occupation, and it would consequently appear that if any State keeps uninterrupted and exclusive possession of a portion of the bed of the high seas, for a certain length of time, the State thereby acquires a right to it as against all others, by analogy to the doctrine of possession.

See CHAMBERS OF THE KING; PIRACY.

High Steward. Formerly there were, in the Liberty of Westminster, officers known as the High Steward and Deputy Steward; and in certain English cities the title of High Steward is still borne by an honorary official.

At Oxford, and also at Cambridge, there is a High Steward of the University, each of whom is always a person of rank and distinction, who performs no active duties. Theoretically, any scholar or privileged member of the University of Oxford can, under a charter of Henry IV., as confirmed by the statute 13 Eliz. c. 29, be tried before a Court presided over by the High Steward or his deputy; but this right has been in abeyance since the eighteenth century. As to the other exceptional jurisdiction of the University of Oxford, see UNIVERSITY COURTS.

See LORD HIGH STEWARD; STEWARD.

High Treason. This formerly meant such treason (q.v.) as was not petit treason; but, since the abolition of the latter offence by the statute 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 2, what was formerly called high treason is called treason only.

The ancient sentence pronounced upon persons convicted of high treason was "that they should be drawn on a hurdle to the place of execution and there be hanged by the neck but not until they were dead, but that they should be taken down again, and that while they are yet alive their bowels should be taken out and burnt before their faces, and that afterwards their heads should be severed from their bodies, and their bodies be divided into four quarters and their heads and quarters to be at the King's disposal" (Treason Act, 1814 (54 Geo. 3, c. 146), preamble). The same Act then went on to enact that in any future case where a person had to be sentenced for high treason, the sentence should be: "that such person shall be drawn on a hurdle to the place of execution and be there hanged by the neck until such person is dead; and that afterwards the head shall be severed from the body of such person, and the body, divided into four quarters, shall be disposed of as His Majesty and his successors shall think fit." The words in italics were repealed by the Forfeiture Act, 1870, s. 31.

Long before 1814 every person executed for high treason had, in practice, been hanged by the neck until he was dead before the further parts of the ancient sentence were carried out. Compare BURNING TO DEATH. See CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

Highway. This is a passage which is open to all the King's subjects; thus public rivers are in law considered as highways. A highway need not necessarily be a thoroughfare. The interest of the public in a highway consists solely in the right of passage over it; thus a highway over land (which is what is usually meant by a highway), gives the right of walking, driving and riding, unless it be only a footway (q.v.), or a horseway (q.v.). The soil and freehold over which that right of way is exercised may be and generally is vested in a private owner, who may maintain an action against persons who infringe his rights therein, as for instance by permitting cattle to depasture there. A way ceases to be a highway when all access to it has been legally stopped up, and the right to the surface then reverts to the owner of the soil.

The unlawful stoppage or obstruction of a highway is a public nuisance.

The charabanc, the lorry and other ponderous vehicles may be excluded from any specified highway pursuant to s. 7 (4) of the Roads Act, 1920.

See CARTWAY; DEDICATION; AD QUOD DAMNUM; WAY; NAVIGATION; NUISANCE; TRANSPORT, MINISTRY OF; ROAD BOARD; ROAD FUND.

Highway Board. See WAYWARDENS.

Hilary. See SITTINGS; TERM.

Hinde Palmer's Act. The popular title of the Administration of Estates Act, 1869. See ASSETS: DEBTS.

Hire-purchase Agreement. An agreement by which the owner of a chattel lets it out on hire and undertakes that it shall become the property of the hirer when the hirer has paid the last of a certain number of payments specified in the agreement. Until such last payment has been made no property in the chattel passes to the hirer; and the agreement therefore does not need to be registered as a bill of sale (q.v.).

Hiring Fair. See STATUTE FAIR.

Hoastmen. From time immemorial there existed in the town of Newcastle-on-Tyne a guild of hostmen, or ostmen, through which "ostmen," or strangers, conducted the purchase of coal and other commodities, and to which certain dues were payable in respect of such purchases. It received a charter of incorporation: and s. 12 of the statute 21 Jac. 1, c. 3, provided that none of the provisions against monopolies which were contained in that Act should affect the rights and privileges of the "Governors and Stewards and Brethren of the Fellowshippe of the Hoastmen of the Town of Newcastle uppon Tyne." Now, however, the "Company of Hoastmen" is merely a body membership of which is a coveted local civic distinction: it has no more to do with the coal trade than the Company of Merchant Taylors in the City of London has to do with the making of clothes.

Hobbes. Thomas Hobbes was born at Malmesbury in 1588 and died in 1679. He wrote De Cive, The Leviathan, and numerous other works, in which theoretical questions of law and government are discussed.

Hobhouse's Act. The popular title of the Vestries Act, 1831.

Hockettor. Coke (3 Inst. 175) says that this meant a "knight of the post" (q.v.). The Statute of Rageman (q.v.) speaks of "hocketтours ou barretours" (that is to say, common barrators—see BARRATRY), as if they were ejusdem generis.

Hock-tide; Hock Monday; Hock Tuesday. Hock-tide anciently meant the second Monday and the second Tuesday after Easter Day; and the two days were known as the Hock Days. Hock Tuesday was also known as Binding Tuesday (q.v.), because on that day women tied up men with cords to exact contributions, just as men tied up women on Hock Monday, all this being part of the Hock-tide festivities which anciently took place.

Hock Tuesday was anciently one of the half-yearly days for the payment of rent: Michaelmas was the other.

Hogarth's Acts. The popular title of the Engraving Copyright Acts, 1734 and 1766, the first of which had been passed at the instance of William Hogarth and other artists. Both were repealed by the Copyright Act, 1911: see COPYRIGHT.

Hogshead. This measure is not known to the law. Ordinarily it means one containing fifty-four gallons: but the number of gallons in the hogshead varies when it is used as a measure for different kinds of wine or for brandy.

Holder in Due Course. The meaning of this expression is given in s. 29 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882.

Holding. See AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS ACTS.

"Holding Out." See PARTNERSHIP, II.

Holding Over is where a tenant under a lease continues in possession of land after the determination of his tenancy. In ordinary cases the effect of holding over is either to make the tenant liable to an action for use and occupation (q.v.), or to continue the tenancy against his wish.

By the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1730, s. 1, where a tenant for term of life or years wilfully holds over the land after the determination of the term and after demand and notice in writing by the landlord for the delivery of the possession, the tenant is liable to pay damages at double the yearly value of the land.

By the Distress for Rent Act, 1737, s. 18, a tenant who holds over after giving notice to quit, is liable to pay double rent for the time he continues in possession.

Holiday; Holyday. See FEASTS; BANK HOLIDAY.

Holland. See RIDING.

Holloway Prison. Used as a debtors' prison under the Queen's Prison (q.v.) Discontinuance Act, s. 12, since the abolition in 1870 of Whitecross Street Prison (q.v.).

Holy Orders. See BISHOP; DEACON; PRIEST; DEGRADATION; DEPOSITION; DEPRIVATION.

Neither degradation nor deposition deprives one in Holy orders of his sacerdotal status, which, amongst other things, precludes him from being elected to the House of Commons, although, if a peer, he may sit in the House of Lords. Down to 1870 the rule was "once a priest; always a priest." But under the Clerical Disabilities Act, 1870, anyone in priest's or deacon's orders who has resigned every preferment held by him, becomes for all legal purposes a layman if he has executed, enrolled in the Chancery Division, and delivered to his bishop a deed of relinquishment in the form prescribed by the Act, and if at the expiration of six months after he has delivered the deed to the bishop, he requests that it be enrolled in the registry of the diocese.

Holy Thursday. Ascension Day (q.v.). The name is applied also to the Thursday preceding Good Friday, which is also known as Maunday Thursday.

Holywarkfolk. See HALIWERFOLK.

Homage.—I. Homage signifies the free tenants of a manor assembled in the Court Baron. They are sworn to make their presentments with impartiality, and are hence sometimes called the homage jury. But the attendance of free tenants at the Court Baron has become so unfrequent that the term "homage" is more commonly applied to the copyholders attending at the customary Court. The duty of a homage jury is to make presentments of all things done within the manor to the prejudice of the lord or tenants, and to recommend whatever may appear to be advantageous to the lord, and not injurious to the tenants. See PRESENTMENT.

II. Formerly homage signified what Littleton calls "a most honourable and humble service of reverence," which every free tenant for an estate in fee simple or fee tail was bound to perform to his feudal lord; it was so called because in doing homage in ordinary cases the tenant said to his lord "I become your man [Norman French home] of life and limb." Homage created an obligation of assistance by the tenant to his lord, and of protection by the lord to his tenant. Homage was of several kinds. Liege homage was without any saving or exception of the faith due by the tenant to anyone else, as where a tenant did homage to the king. Simple homage, or homagium non ligeum, was performed by a subject to a subject, as in ordinary cases, where the tenant promised to be faithful to his lord saving the faith he owed to the king. Homage auncestral (homagium antecessorium) is, says Littleton, "where a tenant holdeth his land of his lord by homage, and the same tenant and his ancestors, whose heire he is, have holden the same land of the same lord and of his auncestors, whose heire the lord is, time out of memorie of man, by homage, and have done them homage. And this is called homage auncestrell, by reason of the continuance which hath beene by title of prescription in the tenancie in the blood of the tenant, and also in the seignorie in the blood of the lord." The peculiarity of homage auncestral was that it imposed on the lord the duty of warranty (q.v.) and acquittal (q.v.) towards his tenant.

Homage in the sense of service was abolished by the statute 12 Car. 2, c. 24.

After a newly-elected bishop has been enthroned, he is introduced into the presence of the Sovereign, and on his knees does homage for the temporalities of his see, taking a solemn oath of fidelity and of acknowledgment that he holds the temporalities of the Crown.

Homage in the sense of service is derived from the Norman French homage, from home, a man, because the tenant became the lord's man. Homage in the sense of the suitors at a Court Baron is said to be of the same derivation, because the suitors were those who had done homage; this derivation is doubtful.

See FEALTY; LAY INVESTITURE.

Homager. One who did, or was bound to do, homage to another.

Homagio recipiendo, De. Anciently this was a writ which lay for a tenant to compel the lord to receive the homage of the tenant.

Homagio respectuando, De. An ancient writ commanding the escheator (q.v.) to deliver to the heir seisin of lands held of the king, notwithstanding that homage (q.v.) had not been done, upon the condition that the heir, when of age, did homage or agreed with the king for the respiting thereof.

Homagium repellit perquisitum (Gilb. Ten. 142.) (Homage precludes possession.) One of the maxims on which was based the rule set out under NEMO POTEST ESSE TENENS, ETC.

Homagium reddere. This meant to renounce, not to render, homage. See Bracton Lib. 2, c. 35.

Home ne serra puny pur suer des briefes en court le roy, soit il a droit ou a tort (2 Inst. 228). (A man shall not be punished for suing out writs in the king's court, whether he has or has not a cause of action.) Cited by Coke in connection with the statement that no action de scandalis magnatis (see SCANDALUM MAGNATUM), or at common law lay against one who brought a groundless appeal of felony against a peer.

Home Office. The Government office of which the Secretary of State, known as the Home Secretary, is the head. See SECRETARY OF STATE.

Home Trade Passenger Ship. This expression includes "every home trade ship" (q.v.) "employed in carrying passengers" (Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 742).

Home Trade Ship. This expression "includes every ship employed in trading or going within the following limits; that is to say, the United Kingdom, the Channel Islands, the Isle of Man, and the Continent of Europe between the river Elbe and Brest inclusive" (Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 742). Any ship trading outside those limits is a foreign-going ship (q.v.).

Homicide is where one human being kills another.

Homicide is unlawful or felonious—

(a) When death is caused by an act done with the intention to cause death or bodily harm, or which is commonly known to be likely to cause death or bodily harm, and when such act has no legal justification or excuse (see MURDER):

(b) When death is caused by an omission, amounting to culpable negligence, to discharge a duty tending to the preservation of life, whether such omission is or is not accompanied by an intention to cause death or bodily harm (see MURDER; MANSLAUGHTER):

(c) When death is caused accidentally by an unlawful act (see MANSLAUGHTER).

Homicide is excusable when the person by whom it is committed is not altogether free from blame, though it is not of such a kind as to make him criminally responsible. Excusable homicide is either per infortunium, by misadventure, as where a person driving a carriage with due care accidentally kills anyone, or homicide se et sua defendendo, that is, in defence of one's self or property upon some sudden affray considered by the law as in some measure blameable. (See CHANCE-MEDLEY).

Homicide is justifiable where no blame whatever attaches to the person killing; as in case of the execution of a malefactor by legal warrant, or where a constable or other officer in the execution of his duty, in either a civil or criminal case, kills a person who assaults or resists him, or where one person kills another in defending himself or his property against an attempt to commit a felony with force, e.g., murder, robbery. Formerly a person who committed excusable homicide was liable to be tried and punished, but this liability was abolished by the Offences against the Person Act, 1861, s. 7, so that the distinction between excusable and justifiable homicide is no longer of practical importance. Formerly "homicide" meant manslaughter. See BIRTH, CONCEALMENT OF.

Homicidium vel hominis cædium, est hominis occisio ab homine facta (3 Inst. 54). Homicide or the slaughter of a man is the killing of a man by a man. There never was such a word as cædium, though there is the word cædere, to kill or slaughter.

Homine capto in withernam. This, said Jacob, in 1739, "is a writ for the apprehending of one who has taken any man or woman and conveyed him or her out of the country, so that they cannot be replevied by law."

Homine eligendo ad custodiendum peciam sigilli pro mercatoribus editi. A writ anciently directed to a corporation commanding it to elect a keeper of "one part of the seal appointed for Statutes Merchant" in the place of a keeper deceased.

Homine replegiando. A writ which formerly lay to bail out of prison a man other than one in prison by order of the king or of the judges or for crime.

Homologation is the same thing as estoppel in pais (q.v.).

Homo potest esse habilis et inhabilis diversis temporibus (5 Rep. 98). (A man may be capable and incapable at different times.) This is still law: see LUCID INTERVAL.

Honor means (i) a seignory in capite of which several inferior lordships or manors depend; and (ii) the land or district included in the seignory. An honor cannot be created since the statute Quia Emptores, except by Act of Parliament: for an instance of such creation, see the statute 33 Hen. 8, c. 37, relating to the Honor of Ampthill. See IN CAPITE; MANOR; TENURE).

Honor Courts. These were courts baron and courts leet held in an honor (q.v.).

Honorary Freemen. See FREEDOM OF A BOROUGH.

Honorary Services. A designation applied to the services incident to tenure in grand serjeanty (q.v.), because they were generally connected with some title of honour.

Honorary Trustees. A synonym for trustees to preserve contingent remainders (q.v.).

Honoris respectum. See CHALLENGE.

Honour. The drawee of a bill of exchange is said to honour it when he accepts it. The acceptor of a bill, or the maker of a note, is said to honour it when he pays it. (See BILL OF EXCHANGE). As to acceptance for honour, see ACCEPTANCE.

"His Honour Judge Robinson," or as the case may be, is the designation of a County Court judge (see Order in Council of 7th August, 1884, published in the London Gazette of 8th August, 1884, at p. 3569), and also of a retired County Court judge (Royal Warrant, dated 8th December, 1919).

Honour, Court of. See COURT OF HONOUR, etc.

Honourable. This title is applied to the younger sons, but to none of the daughters, of earls, and to all the children of viscounts and barons; to all past and present Maids of Honour to the Queen; to all Justices of the High Court; to the Scottish Lords of Session; to the Lord Provost of Glasgow during office; and to members of Governments and of Legislative Councils in India and the Colonies. Where this title is applicable to the son of a peer, it is applied also to his wife or widow. These uses of the word are officially recognised.

Horn with Horn. The promiscuous feeding of bulls and cows upon the same common was called "horn with horn," or "horn under horn." The right to this is possessed by persons entitled to common (q.v.) causa vicinagii.

Horne Tooke's Act. The popular title of the statute 41 Geo. 3, c. 63, which was passed for the express purpose of making it clear that Mr. Horne Tooke, being in Holy orders (q.v.), could not be a member of the House of Commons.

Hors de son fee. Literally, "out of his fee." In an action (by one claiming to be the owner in fee) for rent or services out of land, if the defendant could prove that the land in question was "without the compass of the fee" of the plaintiff, then the action necessarily failed. The plea upon which evidence of such fact could be given was termed an exception (q.v.).

Horse. The law as to horses differs from that relating to other chattels chiefly in this respect, that by the statutes 2 & 3 Ph. & M. c. 7, and 31 Eliz. c. 12 (see also the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 22 (2)), the sale of a stolen horse in market overt (q.v.) does not pass the property therein, unless the requirements of those Acts for the ensuring of publicity are complied with, and unless, in addition, the owner fails to put in a claim within six months after the horse was stolen; if he proves his case, and tenders the purchaser the price paid by him, he is entitled to have his horse back again. See RACE COURSE; RESTITUTION; REVESTING; WAGERS; DRUGGING ANIMALS; KNACKERS.

Horse Breeding. The Horse Breeding Act, 1918, empowers the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries to grant, refuse, suspend, or revoke licences for stallions to be exhibited or travelled for stud purposes, and makes it an offence (punishable with a penalty not exceeding £20), to use such stallion without such licence.

Horseflesh. The Horseflesh Regulation, etc., Act, 1889, prohibits the sale of horse-flesh or the flesh of asses or mules for human food elsewhere than in a shop which exhibits a notice, in letters not less than four inches high, that horseflesh is sold there.

Horseway. A track which is open to persons on horseback and also to persons on foot. Like a footway (q.v.) it may be either public or private. See BRIDLE-PATH; CARTWAY; PACKWAY.

Hospital. In law a hospital is an eleemosynary corporation (q.v.), intended for the education of impecunious scholars or for the relief, whether by way of giving food and shelter or by way of medical treatment, of the indigent poor. Many hospitals are incorporated by royal charter: but the statute 39 Eliz. c. 5, empowers anyone seised of an estate in fee simple to found a hospital, which must be endowed with lands, etc., of the value of not less than £10 a year, may hold lands of the value of not more than £200 a year, and is to be governed as the founder directs.

Hospitallers; Hospitalarii. The English names for the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, a religious order founded in the twelfth century by the Pope, which had monasteries throughout Europe. It built a hospital, or hostel, for pilgrims at Jerusalem. On the suppression of the Knights Templars in 1314, the bulk of their property was transferred by the Pope to the Hospitallers. In the reign of Edward III. the Hospitallers demised the Temple, or monastery in London of the Templars, to certain lawyers, who subsequently formed themselves into the societies known as the Inner Temple and the Middle Temple (see INNS OF COURT): the other estates of the Templars were held by the Hospitallers until 1540, when the order was dissolved and its property transferred to the Crown by the statute 32 Hen. 8, c. 34, on the ground, as the preamble set out, that they had "unnaturally and contrary to the duty of their allegiances sustained and maintained the usurped power and authority of the Bishop of Rome."

Hostelagium. A right of a lord to lodging and entertainment in the house of a tenant.

Hostes sunt qui nobis vel quibus nos bellum decernimus; cæteri proditores vel prædones sunt (7 Rep. 24). (Enemies are those with whom we are at war; others are traitors or robbers.) That is to say, no subject can claim as against the King the rights of a belligerent. "Les liges le Roy," said Prisot, Chief Justice of the Common Bench, in 1454, "ils ne purront estre appelles esnemis le Roy, mes traitors" (Y.B. 6 Hen. 6, fol. 2B), if they levy war upon the King. And this is still law.

Hostiler. A corruption of hostelier, the keeper of a hostel or inn.

Hostile Witness. A witness whose conduct while under examination is such that the side by which he is called may, by leave of the judge, cross-examine him. A hostile witness does not mean one who gives evidence damaging to his own side; it means one who evidently is unwilling to tell the truth.

Hotchpot. Where property is settled on the members of a class (e.g., the children of a marriage) subject to a power of appointment among them, and part of it is appointed to one, that one is nevertheless not excluded by law from taking an equal share with the others in the part which remains unappointed, and thus obtaining a larger share than any of the others. This is usually prevented by the insertion of a clause called a hotchpot clause, which declares that no appointee shall take any share in the unappointed past without bringing his appointed share into hotchpot; that is, without adding it for the purpose of computation to the unappointed part, when the whole is divided equally. Of course an appointee is not bound to do this, and only does it when his appointed share is less than what he would obtain if no appointment had been made.

The Statute of Distribution contains a similar provision applying to advancement. See ADVANCEMENT; FRANKMARRIAGE.

"It seemeth," says Littleton, "that this word hotchpot is in English a pudding." It is derived from the Dutch hutspot, from hutsen, to shake up, and pot, or from the French hochepot, from hocher, to shake up.

House Agent. This expression is defined by s. 10 of the Revenue (No. 1) Act, 1861. It does not include agents for the sale or letting of unfurnished houses or of any house not exceeding £25 in annual rent or value. A house agent acting without an annual licence, expiring on 5th July (s. 11), is liable to a penalty of £20 (s. 12), unless he be an agent managing the property for an owner, a solicitor, or a licensed auctioneer or appraiser (s. 13). The holder of a house agent's licence, which costs £2 (s. 1), may act as an appraiser (s. 11). See VALUATION AND APPRAISEMENT.

House-bote. See ESTOVERS.

Housebreaking is where a person breaks and enters a dwelling-house or building occupied therewith, or a school-house, shop, warehouse, counting-house, etc., and commits any felony therein, or where a person commits a felony in any such building, and then breaks out of it (Larceny Act, 1916, s. 26). The maximum punishment is fourteen years' penal servitude (ib.). Compare BURGLARY.

House Duty. See INHABITED HOUSE DUTY.

House of Commons is the third branch of Parliament (q.v.), and consists of representatives of the nation at large (exclusive of the peerage), chosen by election. The counties of the United Kingdom (from which Southern Ireland is now excluded) are represented by members who were formerly called knights of shires, and the cities and boroughs by members who were called citizens and burgesses. Now all members are known simply as members of Parliament. The principal universities also elect representatives. There are now 615 members of the House. See ELECTORAL FRANCHISE; CHILTERN HUNDREDS; OFFICE OF PROFIT.

House of Lords is the assembly of lords spiritual and temporal, which forms the second branch of Parliament (q.v.). The lords spiritual are the two archbishops and such of the bishops of the Church of England (now separated from the Welsh Church (q.v.)) as have seats in Parliament by ancient usage or by statute.

The lords temporal consist of (1) the peers of England, of Great Britain and of the United Kingdom; (2) the representative peers of Scotland and Ireland, the Scotch peers having the right to elect for each Parliament sixteen representatives from their own body, and the Irish peers twenty-eight for life; (3) life peers, consisting of the six Lords of Appeal in ordinary (see LORDS OF APPEAL), and of such Lords of Appeal in ordinary as have retired from office. The Lord Chancellor is prolocutor and president of the House. (See CHANCELLOR.)

In addition to their functions as part of the legislature, the House of Lords exercise judicial authority (1) in the trial of peers for treason or felony (see CERTIORARI; LORD HIGH STEWARD); (2) in claims of peerage; (3) in disputed elections of representative peers; and (4) as a Supreme Court of Appeal from the Court of Appeal in England, and the Superior Courts of Scotland and Northern Ireland.

As to the practice in appeals to the House of Lords, see APPEAL; APPENDIX; CASE; PETITION.

See ACT OF PARLIAMENT.

House of Lords Offices Committee. See LORD PRIVY SEAL, besides whom the committee comprise the Lord Chancellor, the Lord President of the Council, and a fluctuating number of other peers.

Houses of Correction were a species of prison, originally designed for the confinement of vagrants and paupers refusing to work. By the Prisons Act, 1835, they were made available for the detention of prisoners committed for trial, and the effect of the Prison Act, 1865, ss. 4, 56, was to abolish all distinction between them and other prisons (q.v.).

House Tax. See INHABITED HOUSE DUTY.

Hudson's Bay Company. A company incorporated in 1670 by royal charter under the title of "The Governor and Company of Adventurers of England Trading into Hudson's Bay." Under their charter they acquired what were practically jura regalia in the vast territory now forming the middle part of Canada; and they used their position as a means of keeping in their own hands all the trade of their territory. Finally the company surrendered all its sovereign rights in 1868, and its territories were made part of Canada under the statute 31 & 32 Vict. c. 105. The company is still, however, the owner of an enormous amount of land and is a great trading corporation.

Hue and Cry is the old common law process of pursuing, with horn and with voice, all felons, and such as have dangerously wounded another. All those who join in following upon a hue and cry are justified in apprehending the person pursued, even though it should turn out that he is innocent, or that no felony has been committed. To maliciously or wantonly raise a hue and cry is a misdemeanour and grounds a civil action.

Huissier. This means the same as usher (q.v.), which, through various forms, is derived from it.

Humber Rules, 1910. These rules (for which see S. R. and O. 1910, No. 832) are made under s. 421 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. They regulate the navigation of the Humber.

Humiliation, Day of General. See FAST DAYS.

Hundred is a district forming part of a county, and was formerly governed by a high constable or bailiff. Hundreds were originally so called because each consisted of a hundred families of freeholders, or ten tithings. Each hundred formerly had its Court (see HUNDRED COURT), but they have fallen into disuse.

As to the Hundred of St. Briavel's, see GALE.

The status of a hundredor (or freeholder of a hundred) is now one of little importance.

Under the statute 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 31 (which consolidated the law on the subject), if damage was done to buildings or erections by "persons riotously and tumultuously assembled together" the inhabitants of the hundred, or district in the nature of a hundred, in which the offence was committed, were liable to yield full compensation to the person damnified. That Act was repealed by the Riot (Damages) Act, 1886, which makes the police district, instead of the hundred, the area from which compensation is payable.

Formerly the jurors in an action were taken from the neighbourhood of the vill or place where the cause of action was laid in the declaration, and some of them were obliged to be returned from the hundred in which the vill lay; if none were returned, the array might be challenged for defect of hundredors; this rule was abolished by statute 24 Geo. 2, c. 18, s. 3, and the Juries Act, 1825, 6 Geo. 4, c. 50, s. 13.

See WAPENTAKE.

Hundred Court is only a larger Court baron (q.v.), being held for all the inhabitants of a particular hundred (q.v.) instead of a manor. Hundred Courts are now rare, the County Court Act, 1867, s. 28, having abolished such of them as were not Courts of record. See SALFORD HUNDRED COURT OF RECORD; ANGLO-SAXON LAWS.

Hundred-man. The officer or constable of the Hundred Court.

Hundred-mote. The Hundred Court of Anglo-Saxon times.

Hundredor. One of the inhabitants of a hundred who was liable to serve on a jury trying an issue regarding land situate therein. See the statute 35 Hen. 8, c. 6. It meant also the hundred-man (q.v.): see e.g., the statute 2 Edw. 3, c. 4.

Hundred-penny. A tax formerly levied in the hundred by the sheriff.

Hundred Rolls. In 1274 Edward I. sent out commissioners to enquire by what warrant the great landowners were exercising jura regalia (q.v.). The result of these enquiries is embodied in what are known as the Hundred Rolls.

Hundredweight. This consists of eight stones (q.v.) (Weights and Measures Act, 1878, s. 14).

Hurrers. The makers of hats and caps in the city of London were anciently known as hurrers. They were included in the Haberdashers' Company.

Hus and Hant. Words used in pleadings of the reign of Henry III., which, except for these words, are in Latin; see 4 Inst. 72, where Coke gives a specimen of a pleading and an elaborate but scarcely convincing explanation of these words.

Husband and Wife. The law of husband and wife deals with the following matters:—(1) The pre-requisites and formalities of marriage, as to which see AFFINITY; CONSANGUINITY; DOMICILE; LICENCE; MARRIAGE. (2) The effect of the marriage on the rights and duties of the parties, as to which see CURTESY; DOWER; FREEBENCH; MARITAL RIGHTS; MARRIAGE; NECESSARIES. (3) Marriage settlements: see SETTLEMENT; EQUITY TO A SETTLEMENT. (4) Protection orders and separation deeds (q.v.). (5) Restitution of conjugal rights, judicial separation, separation orders, and divorce (q.v.). (6) Married women's property (q.v.).

Huscarle. Used in Domesday as meaning a male domestic servant.

Hush Money. Money paid to induce a person to compound a felony or to stifle a prosecution. See COMPOUNDING, ETC.; STIFLING, ETC.

Husting. A court held in a building as distinguished from other courts which, at an early period, were held in the open air. See COURT OF HUSTINGS.

Down to the passing of the Ballot Act, 1872, parliamentary candidates were nominated from a temporary wooden platform, known as the hustings, and addressed the electors from it; and from it the sheriff then took the "show of hands."

Hutesium et clamor. Hue and cry (q.v.).

Hybernagium. The season, between Michaelmas and Christmas, for sowing winter corn. Tremagium was the season, in spring, for sowing summer corn. The words were sometimes used as meaning respectively (1) the seasons included in them; (2) winter corn (that is to say, wheat and rye) and summer corn (that is to say, barley and oats), and (3) the lands on which the two classes of corn were grown.

Hypothecation. In its proper sense, hypothecation is where a ship, or her freight or cargo, or all three, are made liable for the payment of money borrowed by the master. It is of two kinds—bottomry and respondentia (q.v.).

In modern times attempts have been made to introduce "hypothecation" from the Roman law, as a general term equivalent to "charge," the proper English term. In this use of the word, to hypothecate property is to charge it with the payment of a sum of money or the performance of an obligation, giving the person in whose favour it exists neither the right to the possession of the property, nor the right to sell it, but merely the right of realization by judicial proceedings in case of default by the person who has made the hypothecation.

I

I.O.U. An I.O.U. is an acknowledgment of a debt in this form:—

London, 1st April, 1923.

Mr. William Smith.

I.O.U. one hundred pounds.

£100. JOHN AIKIN.

It need not, however, be addressed to the creditor by name. If an I.O.U. contains an agreement to pay, it becomes either an agreement or a promissory note and must be stamped accordingly.

Ibbetson's Acts. The popular title of both the Wine and Beerhouse Act,, and the Wine and Beerhouse Amendment Act, 1870. These Acts were introduced by Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbotson, M.P., afterwards the first and only Baron Rookwood.

Ice. The master of a British ship is required by the Merchant Shipping (Convention) Act, 1914, s. 2, to report any dangerous ice of which he comes to know.

Id certum est quod certum reddi potest; sed id magis certum est quod de semet ipso est certum (9 Rep. 47). (That is certain which can be made certain, but that is still more certain which of itself is certain.) See CERTUM EST, ETC.

Idem agens et patiens esse non potest (Jenk. Cent. 40). (It is impossible for a man to do as well as to suffer the same thing.) See NEMO AGIT, ETC.

Idem est facere et non prohibere cum possis; et qui non prohibet cum prohibere possit in culpâ est (3 Inst. 158). (Not to prevent an act when prevention is possible is the same thing as to do the act; and he is to blame who does not prevent the commission of an offence when he has power to prevent it.) Cited by Coke as illustrating the statement that justices, constables, etc., who took no steps to suppress an affray were liable to fine and imprisonment. See also QUI NON OBSTAT, ETC., and compare CULPA CARET, ETC.

Idem est nihil dicere et insufficienter dicere (2 Inst. 178). (It is the same thing to say nothing and to say what is insufficient.) Cited as illustrating the statement that a prisoner was held to be mute (q.v.) in point of law if he said something but would not plead either guilty or not guilty.

Idem est non esse et non apparere (Jenk. Cent. 207). (Not to exist and not to appear to exist are the same thing in point of law.) Cited by Jenkins apparently as meaning that facts not appearing on the proceedings in a case are to be treated as non-existent. But the maxim has been applied as illustrating the rule that alluvion (q.v.) will in law be taken to have never occurred unless the process was perceptible.

Idem semper antecedenti proximo refertur (Co. Litt. 20). (The word "same" always refers to the nearest antecedent.) Cited as illustrating the proposition that a grant to A for life, remainder to B in tail, remainder to C "in formâ prædicti" is void for uncertainty (an estate for life and an estate tail both being "aforesaid"), but that a grant to A for life, remainder to B in tail, remainder to C in eadem formâ was good inasmuch as the word eadem could refer only to the estate tail.

Idem sonans. (Sounding alike.) The Court will not set aside the verdict of a jury merely because, owing to a similarity of sound, Thomas Box, being on the panel, answers in good faith to the name of Thomas Cox, who is also on the panel, and serves on the jury as if he were in fact that person.

Identification; Identity. To identify a person or thing is to show that he or it is the person or thing in question. Thus, on an inquest or trial for murder, the first thing is to identify the deceased, that is, prove who he was. So in investigating the title of land, the purchaser, in the absence of a stipulation to the contrary, is entitled to proof of the identity of the land described in the title deeds, with that which he has contracted to purchase.

Identitate nominis, De. A writ which anciently lay to the sheriff directing him to enquire whether one arrested in a personal action was the person against whom the action had been brought.

Ideota inquirendo vel examinando, De. A writ which formerly lay to the sheriff directing him to ascertain by the verdict of a jury whether such and such a person was an idiot. See now LUNACY.

Idiocy; Idiot. According to the old lawyers, an idiot or fool natural is a person who from his birth, by a perpetual or incurable infirmity, is of unsound mind. By the Statute De Prerogativâ Regis, 17 Edw. 2, c. 9, the king shall have the custody of the land of natural fools, taking the profits of them without waste or destruction, and shall find them their necessaries; and after their death he shall render the lands to their right heirs. This prerogative was never favoured at law, and is now never exercised, the procedure by inquiry in lunacy having made it unnecessary. At the present day idiocy is considered as a species of insanity or lunacy. See INSANITY; LUNACY; MUTE; NON COMPOS MENTIS. But it, in common with other forms of mental deficiency not amounting exactly to lunacy, is now specially dealt with in the Mental Deficiency Act, 1913, which (s. 1) defines idiots as "persons so deeply defective in mind from birth or from an early age as to be unable to guard themselves from ordinary physical dangers." See MENTAL DEFICIENCY.

"Idle and Disorderly Person." See VAGRANCY.

Idoneus. It was said in the old law that a man was idoneus homo (a fit person) if he had honesty, knowledge and ability, and that anyone holding a public office should be discharged if he lacked any one of these three things: this principle is not acted on now.

Anciently idoneum se facere meant to purge oneself of a crime by oath. See Leg. Hen. 1, c. 75, and COMPURGATION.

Id possumus quod de jure possumus (Lane, 116). (We can do what the law allows us to do.) And so the words "if by the law it may be" in a bequest which was void as being for a superstitious purpose were of no effect.

Id quod commune est, nostrum esse dicitur. (That which is common is said to be ours.) This maxim has for centuries been held to illustrate the rule that a marine insurance of partnership property by one partner extends not only to his own interest but to the whole interest of the partnership. The Partnership Act, 1890, s. 5, expressly gives him implied authority to insure on behalf of the partnership.

Id quod nostrum est sine facto nostro ad alium transferri non potest (Dig. 50, 17, 11). (What is ours cannot be transferred to another except by our own act.) English law, as well as the Roman law, used to work on this principle, but it has been much broken in on by the Legislature during recent years. Compare NEMO COGITUR, etc.

Ignetegium. Curfew (q.v.).

Ignis judicium. The judgment of the fire, that is to say, ordeal (q.v.) by fire.

Ignoramus. "We know nothing of it," or "we ignore it," was formerly the indorsement made on a bill of indictment by a grand jury when they thought the charge not sustained by the evidence. They now indorse "Not a true bill," or "Not found." See INDICTMENT.

Ignorance of Fact or Law. See MISTAKE.

Ignorantia eorum quæ quis scire tenetur non excusat (Hale Pl. Cr. 42). (Ignorance of those things which everyone is bound to know, does not constitute an excuse.)

Ignorantia facti excusat; ignorantia juris non excusat (1 Rep. 177). (Ignorance of the fact excuses; ignorance of the law does not excuse.) See MISTAKE.

Ignorantia judicis foret calamitas innocentis (2 Inst. 591). (Ignorance on the part of a judge would be a calamity for the innocent.)

Ignorantia juris quod quisque scire tenetur non excusat. (Ignorance of the law which everybody is supposed to know does not afford excuse.) Coke gives the maxim at 2 Rep. 3*b*, as Ignorantia juris non excusat; the other words are an adaptation of part of the maxim Ignorantia eorum, etc.

Ignorantia legis neminem excusat. The version given by Lush, J. (at L. R., 3 K.B. 639), of the maxim Ignorantia juris non excusat.

Ignore. A grand jury are said to ignore a bill of indictment when they think the charge not sustained by the evidence. See INDICTMENT; JURY.

Illegal. An act is illegal when it is one which the law directly forbids, as to commit a murder, to obstruct a highway, or to sell a loaf otherwise than by weight. The illegality of an act is not only of importance as subjecting the doer to the penalties imposed for disobedience of the law, but also because the act is not recognised by law as capable of creating any right, except as a remedy for any injury caused by it. Thus, if A agrees with B to pay him £50 for the publication of a libel, or the like, the contract is void. But an act is not illegal in the strict sense simply because it is not recognised by the law as capable of giving rise to rights. Thus a contract made ultrà vires is void, but not illegal; and a cheque given in payment of a bet is given for an illegal consideration (see GAMING) and the payee cannot sue thereon, although it is not illegal to give the cheque.

Illegal is also used (1) in the same sense as unlawful (q.v.); (2) in the same sense as void; but it is convenient to keep the ideas distinct.

See CONDITION; CONSIDERATION; IMMORALITY.

Illegal Practices. This expression means certain acts so termed in, and prohibited by, the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Acts, 1883 and 1895. Both of those Acts were passed in order to put an end to such practices (and also to corrupt practices (q.v.)) at parliamentary elections.

The Municipal Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act, 1884, was passed in order to purify municipal elections in like manner: it has been extended to county council elections by the Local Government Act, 1888, s. 75, and to parish and district council, and other local government elections by the Local Government Act, 1894, s. 48 (3) (8), and by various orders made under statutory powers.

Illegal practices are: Payments for conveyance of voters to the poll, or for exhibition of addresses, bills or notices, or for excessive number of committee rooms; publishing false statement of withdrawal of a candidate; publishing a bill, etc., without name and address of the printer; payment made by election agent after the authorised time or otherwise improperly made; election expenses (q.v.) in excess of maximum permitted, or election expenses paid otherwise than through the election agent; voting by prohibited persons; failing to make return of election expenses; false statements as to the personal character of a candidate.

Illegitimacy. See BASTARD; CHILD; LEGITIMACY.

Illud quod alias licitum non est necessitas facit licitum; et necessitas inducit privilegium quod jure privatur (10 Rep. 61). (That which is otherwise not permitted, necessity permits; and necessity establishes a privilege which respects the operation of the law.) This is merely a quotation from Bracton which was used by the Court as showing how a statute should be construed. Compare NECESSITAS NON, ETC.

Illusory. See APPOINTMENT, POWER OF.

Imbasing. The imbasing of money meant the reduction of the standard of purity of coin, the nominal value remaining unchanged. The reduction in the standard of purity of silver coins which was authorised by the Coinage Act, 1920, is a modern instance of what anciently would have been called imbasing: but the silver coinage is now really only an expensive form of token money, whereas it anciently was the standard just as the gold coinage is now. Compare INHANSING.

Imbecile. The Mental Deficiency Act, 1913, s. 1, defines imbeciles as "persons in whose case there exists from birth or from an early age mental deficiency not amounting to idiocy, yet so pronounced that they are incapable of managing themselves or their affairs, or, in the case of children, being taught to do so." See IDIOT; MENTAL DEFICIENCY; MORAL IMBECILE.

Immemorial. Beyond legal memory: see MEMORY; PRESCRIPTION.

Immorality is of importance in law, because no party to a transaction founded on immorality can invoke the assistance of a Court of law in enforcing, nor (except in a few cases) in setting it aside. Thus, a contract for an immoral purpose or for an immoral consideration is void; but a party to an immoral contract or conveyance cannot, as a general rule, have it set aside. Almost the only kind of immorality having this vitiating effect is that consisting in illicit cohabitation. Thus an agreement providing for or tending to illicit cohabitation is void.

See also INDECENCY; POLICY.

Impanel. A jury is said to be impanelled when the sheriff has entered their names in the panel (q.v.).

Imparcamentum. A right of impounding cattle.

Imparl; Imparlance. Down to 1833, "imparlance" formed part of the procedure in a common recovery (q.v.). It consisted of a conference between plaintiff and defendant in order to see whether the matter could be amicably settled. In a common recovery it was part of a solemn piece of humbug, but in other cases it was what it purported to be, and under the old procedure a defendant in a civil action was entitled to "imparl" once with the plaintiff.

Imparsonee. See PARSON.

Impeachment was a complaint or accusation against a person for a great public offence, especially against a minister of the Crown for malversation or treason. The House of Commons first found the crime, and then as prosecutors supported their charge before the House of Lords, who tried and adjudicated upon it. The charge was contained in articles of impeachment, to which the accused made answers, and so on; the Commons appointed managers to conduct the proceeding on their behalf. (See LORD HIGH STEWARD.) Impeachment has not ceased to be possible: but it is practically obsolete, the last impeachment being that of Lord Melville in 1804.

Impeachment of Waste. Where an estate for life is given to a person "without impeachment of waste," he may cut down trees on the land and convert them to his own use, and open mines, etc.; but he may not pull down the family mansion, or fell ornamental timber, or commit any other acts of the kind known as equitable waste. See WASTE.

Impediatus. A dog which had been expeditated (q.v.) was described either as expediatus, or as impediatus, or as lawed.

Impediments to Marriage. These are (1) the continuance of a prior marriage; (2) affinity (q.v.) or consanquinity (q.v.) within the prohibited degrees; (3) force, fraud, or error; (4) want of sufficient age or of mental or physical capacity.

Imperative. See DIRECTORY.

Imperial Service Order, The. Founded in 1902 as a means of giving what is practically a long service and good conduct badge to members of the Civil Service. It consists of not more than 700 companions (I.S.O.) of whom 250 may belong to the Home, 200 to the Indian and 250 to the Dominion and Colonial Services.

Imperitia culpæ adnumeratur (D. 50, 17, 132). (Inexperience is accounted a fault.) This maxim has no application in our law.

Impertinence. Under the old rules of Chancery pleading, impertinence consisted in the introduction of long and unnecessary or immaterial allegations into a bill. The plaintiff was liable to pay the costs occasioned thereby. A similar rule still prevails. See Ord. 19, rr. 2, 5, 27; Ord. 65, r. 27 (20) (22).

Impescatus. Anciently this meant especially "impeached," and also "accused."

Impetitio. Impeachment (q.v.).

Impetratio; Impetration. In the ancient law this meant obtaining from the Pope a benefice which lay in the gift of the King or of some other layman: see the statutes 25 Edw. 3, st. 4; 38 Edw. 3, st. 2; 38 Edw. 4, c. 1. Impetration when it related to a bishopric was termed provision (q.v.).

Impierment. Used in the statute 23 Hen. 8, c. 9. as meaning prejudice.

Implead. Anciently this meant to prosecute or take proceedings against a person: in the statute 1 & 2 P. & M., c. 8, s. 35, it would appear to be used as meaning to make a thing the subject of litigation.

Implication; Implied.—I. An intention, or an act evidencing intention (such as a promise, request, devise, gift, offer, etc.), is said to be implied when it does not really exist, but is presumed to exist; that is, the same legal effect is produced as if it did exist. Thus, when a person goes to an inn with goods, and is taken in by the innkeeper, the law implies a promise by the innkeeper to keep his guest's goods safely, subject to certain exceptions, although the innkeeper may have had no such intention. Such a promise is sometimes said to be "implied in law" (or to exist in implication of law) in order to distinguish it from implication in the wider sense of the word (infra).

II. Implication is also used in the sense of inference, that is, where the existence of an intention is inferred from acts not done for the sole purpose of communicating it, but for some other purpose. (See EXPRESS). Thus, if a person orders goods to be sent to him, he impliedly promises to pay for them. Such a promise is more correctly called a tacit promise, so as to distinguish it from an express promise. So where a testator gives property to one person in such terms as to show that he meant to give some interest in it to another, the latter takes an interest by implication. Thus, if a testator gives personal property to A after the death of B, without giving anything to B expressly, then B takes a life interest in the property by implication.

"Implied" is sometimes applied in both the above senses to the same subject-matter. See CONTRACT; COVENANT; TRUST; WARRANTY; also CONSTRUCTION; EXPRESS; TACIT; QUASI-CONTRACT.

Impossibility. The question whether an act is possible is of importance in law with reference to the performance of conditions and agreements. See PERFORMANCE.

I. With reference to the nature of the act required, an impossibility is either physical, legal or logical.

An act is physically impossible when it is contrary to the course of nature. Such an impossibility may be either absolute, that is, impossible in any case (e.g., for A to reach the moon), or relative (sometimes called impossibility in fact), that is, arising from the circumstances of the case, e.g., for A to make a payment to B, he being a deceased person.

To the latter class belongs what is sometimes called practical impossibility, which exists when the act can be done, but only at an excessive or unreasonable cost. Thus, when a ship is so injured that it is not worth while repairing her, the same effect with respect to the liability of the insurer is produced as if it were physically as well as practically impossible to repair her. See Loss.

An act is legally or juridically impossible when a rule of law makes it impossible to do it, e.g., for A to make a valid will before his majority. This class of acts must not be confounded with those which are possible, although forbidden by law, as to commit a theft. See ILLEGAL; UNLAWFUL.

An act is logically impossible when it is contrary to the nature of the transaction, as where A gives property to B expressly for his own benefit, on condition that he transfers it to C. See REPUGNANCY.

II. With reference to the time when the impossibility first exists, the act may be either originally impossible (ab initio), or become impossible by matter subsequent (ex postfacto). Thus, if A contracts with B to pay money into the hands of C, and C was dead at the time the contract was entered into, then the payment was originally impossible; if C was alive at the time, but dies before the payment, it becomes impossible by matter subsequent. The latter class are again divisible according as the performance of the act required is rendered impossible by the person creating the requirement, by the person for whose benefit the act was to be done, by the person required to do it, by a stranger, such as the King's enemies (q.v.), by the act of God (q.v.), or by a change in the law, etc.

These divisions are important with reference to the effect of non-performance of the impossible act. Thus a contract for the performance of an act which every reasonable person must know to be impossible (as to make a flying machine and fly to the moon with it) is void, and an impossible consideration is no consideration. On the other hand, if a person contracts to do an act which is only impossible from circumstances (as to build a house in a week, all the workmen in the building trade being on strike, or to pay money when he has none), the impossibility does not excuse his non-performance except in special cases (ante). Again, if the act becomes impossible by the act or default of the promisor, not only does this not excuse him, but it operates as a breach of his contract, although the time for performance may not have arrived, while if it becomes impossible by the act of the person for whose benefit it was to be done, the promisor is discharged from performance. All these rules, however, are subject to the intention appearing from the whole transaction. See CONDITION.

Impossibilium nulla obligatio est (D. 50, 17, 185). (There is no obligation to do impossible things.) Compare NEMO TENETUR, etc.; LEX NON COGIT, ETC.

Impost; Imposition. In the ancient law this meant a tax or duty and more especially a customs duty. In conveyances where lands are granted subject to a rent the rent is said to be payable "over and above all taxes, charges, and impositions whatsoever."

Impotentia excusat legem (Co. Litt. 29). (When a man is unable to do a thing he can plead the law as an excuse.) The maxim is cited in Coke in connection with the law as to tenancy by the curtesy. But now it is used in much the same sense as Lex non cogit, etc.

Impotentiam, Propter. A qualified property in animals may exist propter impotentiam, that is to say, because of their helplessness. Thus such a property may exist in young birds in nests upon a man's trees, but only until the birds are able to fly.

Impound. In its literal sense, to impound is to put distrained cattle or other goods in a pound (q.v.), and as this is done to keep them as security, the term is also applied to cases where a document, money or other property is by order of the Court set apart to be kept in safety until some condition is fulfilled or some question is decided.

Impressment is a power possessed by the Crown of taking persons or property to aid in the defence of the country with or without the consent of the persons concerned. It was usually exercised until 1815 to obtain hands for the King's ships in time of war by taking seamen engaged in merchant vessels, but in earlier times impressment of merchant ships was also practised. The Admiralty issued protections against impressment in certain cases, either under statutes passed in favour of certain callings (e.g., persons employed in the Greenland fisheries) or voluntarily.

Under the Army Act, 1881, ss. 112-121, power is given of impressing carriages, animals and drivers required for moving military baggage and stores. This power was extended to aircraft by the Army (Annual) Act, 1913, s. 5: the Army (Amendment) Act, 1915, s. 2, provides for the ascertainment of the sums payable to the owners of carriages, etc., which are impressed; and the Navy Billeting, etc., Act, 1914, gives the Navy rights of impressment similar to those of the Army. See also the Army (Amendment) No. 2 Act, 1915, s. 3.

Imprest; Imprest-money. This is money imprested or advanced by the Crown for the purpose of being employed for its use. The term is not wholly obsolete. Anciently it also meant money paid in advance to men in the military or naval service of the Crown.

Imprimatur. (Let it be printed.) The word used during the period of the censorship (see PRESS) to authorise the printing of a book.

Imprisii. Adherents, as in the expression "imprisii Regis," used by Mathew Paris.

Imprisonment, as a punishment, consists in the detention of an offender in prison and in his subjection to the discipline appointed for prisoners during the period expressed in the sentence. It is either imprisonment with hard labour (q.v.) or imprisonment without hard labour; and if it be imprisonment without hard labour, it may be in the first, the second, or the third division. Prisoners in the First Division are treated in much the same way as those awaiting trial. Prisoners in the Second Division are clothed in dress of a colour different to that used for the Third Division, are segregated as far as possible, and are allowed a letter and a visit at the end of the first month and thereafter monthly. The Third Division are not allowed a letter and visit until after two months; the next letter and the next visit are allowed after a further six weeks; and thereafter a letter and a visit are allowed monthly. In all other respects, as regards food, labour, etc., there is no difference between the Second and Third Divisions.

Formerly imprisonment was a disability, in certain cases, which prevented the Statutes of Limitation from running against the person imprisoned, but this is no longer so. See the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, s. 10.

As to imprisonment in civil proceedings see ATTACHMENT; COMMITTAL; CONTEMPT; DEBTORS ACT.

See PENAL SERVITUDE; FORFEITURE.

Improbi rumores dissipati sunt rebellionis prodromi (2 Inst. 226). (Wicked rumours spread abroad are the forerunners of rebellion.) This is quoted by Coke in connection with the civil wars of the reign of Henry III:

Impropriation; Impropriator; Impropriate. Impropriation is where a rectory or tithes belong to a lay person called the impropriator. In the case of a rectory, the impropriator or lay rector is bound to provide for the cure of souls by appointing either a vicar or a perpetual curate. A rectory or tithes belonging to an impropriator are termed impropriate.

Impropriation is derived from the Latin in proprietatem, because the living is held as a lay property. Impropriation dates from the time of the Reformation, when many rectories which had been appropriated to the monasteries were granted to laymen. Before that time a layman could not hold a benefice.

Improvement of Land Acts. By the Improvement of Land Acts, 1864 and 1899, any person in the possession or receipt of the rents or profits of land (not being a tenant under an unrenewable lease for life or for less than twenty-five years) may, with the sanction of the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries (q.v.) borrow or advance money for the execution of certain improvements on the land, and obtain an order charging the amount, with interest, on the inheritance or fee of the land. The amount constitutes a rent-charge payable half-yearly over the period of years fixed by the order, in respect of principal and interest combined. The improvements authorised by the Acts include works of drainage, irrigation, embankment, reclamation, clearing and planting of land, and the construction of roads, farm and agricultural buildings, jetties, etc. The Limited Owners Residences Acts, 1870 and 1871, added to this list of improvements the erection of a mansion-house, with the usual and necessary outbuildings, etc., and the Limited Owners Reservoirs and Water Supply Further Facilities Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 31), added to it the construction or erection of reservoirs or other permanent works for the supply of water.

See SETTLED LAND.

Charges created before 1889 were registered pursuant to s. 56 of the Act of 1864 in a register now kept by the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries: those created since 1888 are registered pursuant to the Land Charges Registration and Searches Act, 1888.

Improvement of Towns. The Towns Improvement Clauses Act, 1847, contains a number of provisions relating to the paving, draining, cleansing, lighting and improving of towns and provides for the incorporation of these provisions in special Acts dealing with particular towns. See also the Public Health Act, 1875, ss. 160, 169.

Impunitas semper ad deteriora invitat (5 Rep. 69). (When a crime is left unpunished there is an inducement to the commission of worse crimes.)

Compare MINATUR INNOCENTIBUS, ETC., and UT PŒNA AD PAUCOS.

Inadequacy of consideration for a contract, conveyance, or the like, does not affect the validity of the transaction, except as supporting a charge of fraud, undue influence or the like. See CONSIDERATION; EXPECTANT HEIR; FRAUD; REVERSION.

In æquali jure melior est conditio possidentis (Plow. 296). (Where the rights of the parties are equal, the claim of the actual possessor is the stronger.) This maxim illustrated the rule that possession constitutes a good title against anyone unable to prove a better title.

See MELIOR EST CONDITIO POSSIDENTIS, ETC.

In altâ proditione nullus potest esse accessorius sed principalis solummodo (3 Inst. 138). (In high treason there can be no accessory but only a principal.) This has always been the law.

In ambiguâ voce legis ea potius accipienda est significatio quæ vitio caret, præsertim cum etiam voluntas legis ex hoc colligi possit (Bac. Max. Reg. 3). (Where the words of a statute are capable of two interpretations, then it is better to adopt the interpretation which is unobjectionable, more especially if that interpretation is in accordance with the intention of the Act.)

In ambiguis orationibus maxime sententia spectanda est ejus qui eas protulisset (D. 50, 17, 96.) (In dealing with ambiguous words the intention of him who used them should especially be regarded.)

In Angliâ non est interregnum (Jenk. Cent. 205). (In England there is no interregnum): that is to say, at the instant that a king dies the heir to the throne automatically becomes king.

See REX NUNQUAM, ETC.

In atrocioribus delictis, punitur affectus licet non sequatur effectus (2 Rol. Rep. 89). (In the case of the more atrocious crimes the intent is punished, though an effect does not follow.) This was said merely obiter in the course of a trial for treason in 1620. The statement really applies to all offences. See ATTEMPT.

In autre droit. (In the right of another.) If executors or administrators take legal proceedings they do so in autre droit, that is to say, as the representatives of the deceased.

In banc (or bank). See BANC.

Inborrow and Outborrow. In the Red Book of the Exchequer (1210) we read "Comes Patricius [tenet] baroniam de Beneleghe ut sit inborewe et utborewe inter reges Angliæ et Scotiæ (Earl Patrick holds the barony of Beneleghe in order that he may be surety in and surety out between the Kings of England and Scotland), that is to say, the Earl of Dunbar held upon the service of being surety for such persons as he passed to and from England and Scotland. He was, in fact, a species of frontier official.

In camerâ. A case is said to be heard in camerâ when the judge either hears it in his private room, or causes the doors of the Court to be closed, and all persons, except those concerned in the case, to be excluded. This was formerly done where it was in the public interest that the facts of the case should not be published, especially in divorce cases, though it was not clear whether the Court could do so as a matter of course in any case: but in 1913 it was decided in Scott v. Scott that there is no jurisdiction to hear any matrimonial suit in camerâ merely in the interest of public decency, although any such suit may be heard in camerâ if the Court be satisfied that justice cannot be done otherwise because, for instance, of the fact that a party would be reasonably deterred from seeking justice if the proceedings were to be in public. And so also the Court can hear in camerâ a case in which publicity would defeat the very object of the proceedings, as where the case relates to a secret trade process, or has been brought to prevent the publication of certain matters. In cases affecting wards of Court and lunatics, the Court can, and habitually does, sit in camerâ. Except in the cases above mentioned, all civil proceedings must take place in public.

As regards the trial of criminal cases, the rule is that, apart from statute, they cannot be held in camerâ; and the only statutes providing otherwise are (1) the Children Act, 1908, which (s. 114) is to the effect that while any witness under sixteen is giving evidence in any charge of indecency or immorality only those having business in the court may be present and (s. 115) that no child under fourteen, other than an infant in arms, may be present during any proceedings relating to such a charge unless he is actually required for the purposes of the case; and (2) the Official Secrets Act, 1920, which by s. 8 (4) enacts that the public may be excluded from proceedings (other than the passing of sentence) under that Act, or under the Official Secrets Act, 1911.

The Punishment of Incest Act, 1908, s. 5, had enacted that all proceedings under that Act should be in camerâ: but that enactment was repealed by the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1922, s. 5.

It is to be noted that the preliminary investigation of indictable offences is not a "trial" and that consequently the general public can be and are excluded from it if such exclusion is for any reason desirable.

Incapable; Incapacity. Incapacity is the opposite of "capacity" (q.v.), and therefore equivalent to disability (q.v.).

In capite. See CAPITE.

In casu extremæ necessitatis omnia sunt communia (Hale P. C. 54). (In cases of extreme necessity, everything is in common.) "There are many cases in which individuals sustain an injury for which the law gives no action; as where private houses are pulled down, or bulwarks raised on private property for the preservation and defence of the kingdom against the king's enemies or to arrest the progress of a fire" (per Buller, J., at 4 T.R. 797). If a highway be out of repair a passenger may lawfully go over the adjoining land.

See NECESSITAS PUBLICA, ETC.; SALUS PUBLICA, ETC.

Incaute factum pro non facto habetur (D. 28, 4, 1.) A thing done per incuriam (q.v.) is deemed not to have been done at all.

Incendiarism. See ARSON.

Incense. The use of incense, except for the purpose of fumigating the church, is illegal in the Church of England.

Incertainty. This, in the phraseology of the old common law practice, was "that which opposeth certainty" (q.v.). Both terms were applied to writs, pleadings, etc., and sometimes to deeds. See FALSE FORM; compare UNCERTAINTY.

Incerta pro nullis habentur (Grounds of Law, 191; Dav. 233). (Things which are uncertain are treated as nullities.) Thus a custom will not be recognised by the law unless it is certain.

Incerta quantitas vitiat actum (1 Rol. Rep. 465). (Uncertainty as to quantity spoils a deed); that is to say, a deed is void if it does not show either expressly or impliedly what quantity is granted. Compare INCERTA PRO, ETC.

Incest. This, in the ecclesiastical law, is sexual intercourse between persons who are within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity and affinity as set out in the table contained in the Book of Common Prayer. The offence so constituted is not and never was punishable by the civil Courts. It was, and is, punishable by penance or excommunication in the ecclesiastical Courts, who now, however, rarely exercise their jurisdiction: if they did exercise it, the civil Courts could be called to aid them by way of the writ of Contumace capiendo (q.v.). During the Commonwealth incest was a capital felony, without benefit of clergy, under Chapter 10 of the "Acts of Parliament" for 1650, incest for the purposes of that enactment being sexual intercourse between persons much less numerous than those specified in the table already mentioned The Punishment of Incest Act, 1907, was the first Act of Parliament properly so called which made incest a criminal offence. The persons to which it relates are again less numerous than those specified in the Act of Parliament of 1650. It provides that any male person who has carnal knowledge of anyone who, to his knowledge, is his granddaughter, daughter, sister or mother, and any female person over the age of sixteen who permits anyone who, to her knowledge, is her grandfather, father, brother or son to have carnal knowledge of her, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour punishable with not more than seven years penal servitude, and that it is immaterial whether the relationships above mentioned can be traced through lawful wedlock; and it further provides that an attempt by a male person to commit incest is an indictable misdemeanour. See IN CAMERA.

The incestuous adultery referred to under Dissolution (q.v.) is such adultery as amounts to incest within the meaning of the ecclesiastical law: see s. 27 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857. See IN CAMERA.

Inch. The inch is one-twelfth part of a foot (Weights and Measures Act, 1878, s. 11). See FOOT.

Inchartare; incartare. Anciently this meant to grant by a written deed.

Inch of Candle. See AUCTION.

Incident is "a thing appertaining to or following another." Thus, fealty is incident to every tenure, and cannot be separated from it; so a rent may be incident to a reversion, though it may be separated from it, that is, the one may be conveyed without the other. Hence incidents are divisible into separable and inseparable.

Formerly, every tenure had one or more of the following incidents, most of which no longer exist, namely, fealty, homage and other services, aids, reliefs, primer seisin, wardship, marriage, fines, escheat, forfeiture, and heriots (see the various titles).

Incipitur, in the old common law practice, was a copy on plain paper of the first words of a proceeding in an action. Thus, in entering a judgment for the purpose of issuing execution, it was sufficient to enter an incipitur, that is, the commencement of the proceedings, instead of the whole (Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s 206).

Incite; Incitement. Everyone who incites any person to commit a crime is guilty of a common law misdemeanour, even though the crime be not committed. If the crime be actually committed, he is an accessory before the fact in the case of felony, and equally guilty, in the case of treason or misdemeanour, with the person who commits the crime.

Incivile est nisi totâ sententiâ perspectâ de aliquâ parte judicare (Hob. 171). (It is unreasonable to form an opinion regarding any part of a decision without considering the decision as a whole.)

Inclosure; Inclosure Commissioners. Inclosure is the act of freeing land from rights of common, commonable rights, and generally all rights which obstruct cultivation and the productive employment of labour on the soil, by vesting it in some person as absolute owner.

Inclosure may be effected in three manners:—

(1) In the case of manorial wastes (a) by the lord of the manor alone under his right of approvement (q.v.); (b) by the lord under a special custom enabling him, with the consent of the homage, to grant parcels of the waste, to be held of him by copy of court-roll; (c) by the tenants themselves under various special customs (see INTAKES); (d) by encroachments, or unauthorised inclosures legalised by lapse of time.

(2) By agreement between the commoners and the owner of the soil.

(3) By Act of Parliament. Formerly every statutory inclosure was effected by a private Act appointing a commissioner and authorising him to parcel out the land among the persons interested (the commoners and the owners of the soil); but since the passing of the Inclosure Act, 1845, inclosures are now generally effected by permanent commissioners (at present represented by the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries (q.v.)), who inquire into the expediency of proposed inclosures; if they approve of a proposed inclosure, they make a provisional order setting forth the manner in which it is to be carried out, and, if Parliament thinks fit, a general Act authorising the inclosures so recommended, or some of them, is passed; each inclosure is then carried out by a valuer. (See ALLOT.) But for the last half-century no private enclosure Acts have been passed.

By the Commons Acts, 1876 and 1879, the powers of the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries are extended to cases where it is desirable to regulate, improve, stint and otherwise deal with commons, without wholly enclosing and allotting them in severalty; thus they may provide for the drainage or levelling of a common, the planting of trees on it, and its general management.

Formerly whenever a person entitled to a rent was prevented by gates or other erections from coming on the land to demand or distrain for it, this was called enclosure, and operated as a disseisin of the rent. (See DISSEISIN.) The term is now obsolete.

Inclusio unius est exclusio alterius. (The inclusion of one is the exclusion of another.) Another version of the maxim DESIGNATIO UNIUS, ETC. (q.v.).

Income. A bequest of income, whether it be described as such, or whether such words as dividends, interest or produce are used, is, unless a contrary intention appears, a bequest of the personal estate out of which the income arises.

Income Tax is a tax on the yearly profits arising from property, professions, trades, and offices. In the case of land, the tenant or occupier is primarily liable to pay the tax, but he is entitled to deduct a proportionate part from his rent, and he cannot by any agreement with his landlord deprive himself of this right (Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 170 (2) (a); Rule 23 of General Rules). The Income Tax Act, 1918, repeals and re-enacts the previously existing statute law on income tax.

The tax was first imposed in 1799 by the statute 39 Geo. 3, cc. 13, 22. Subject to modifications, it remained in force until 1816. It was then dropped, but it was re-imposed by the Income Tax Act, 1842, which has ever since been the basis of the legislation on the subject.

The present rate of income tax is five shillings in the pound, subject to certain abatements and exemptions: see the Finance Act, 1922. In 1842 it was at the rate of sevenpence in the pound.

In addition to income tax, there is a further tax known as super-tax, which was first imposed on incomes by the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910. That Act imposed super-tax at the rate of sixpence in the pound on so much of an income as exceeded £5,000. Now, under the Finance Act, 1920, s. 15 (2), super-tax is payable on so much of an income as exceeds £2,000, the rate being one shilling and sixpence in the pound on the first £500, and running up to six shillings on anything over £30,000.

See CIVIL LIST.

Income Tax Commissioners. There are (1) Commissioners for the General Purposes of Income Tax or (Taxes Management Act, 1880, s. 5), General Commissioners, that is to say, members of the Land Tax Commission who have been appointed by that body to act for the county, etc., over which they have jurisdiction; (2) the Special Commissioners, that is to say, the Inland Revenue Commissioners and such persons as are appointed by the Treasury; and (3) Additional Commissioners, that is to say, persons who are appointed by the General Commissioners to do, without payment, certain preliminary work in connection with Schedule D assessments.

The General Commissioners have power to decide appeals against assessments for inhabited house duty. Both they and the Special Commissioners have power to entertain appeals against assessments for income tax; but if an assessment under Schedule D has been made by the Special Commissioners the appeal is to that body.

Incompetency; Incompetent. See COMPETENCE; CAPACITY; DISABILITY.

In conjunctivis oportet utrumque, in disjunctivis sufficit alteram partem esse veram (Wing. Max. 9). (In conjunctives both must be true; in disjunctives it is sufficient if one of them be true.)

Where leaseholds were bequeathed to B for life, remainder to the issue of B, gift over C if B should die "an infant, unmarried, and without issue," it was held that the gift over took effect only if B fulfilled all three conditions, that is to say, died (1) an infant, (2) childless, and (3) without leaving a wife; but that if the gift over had been in the event of B dying "an infant or unmarried or without issue" it would have taken effect if he had fulfilled any one of the three conditions, as, for instance, by dying an infant but leaving issue and a wife.

In consimili casu, consimile debet esse remedium (Hard. 65). (In similar cases there should be like remedies.)

See also LEX BENEFICIALIS, ETC.

Inconsistency. In construing deeds and wills, the first rule is that every part of the instrument shall, if possible, take effect, and none be rejected. If, however, this cannot be done on account of an inconsistency, then the rules differ according as the instrument is a deed or a will. In a deed, if two clauses or parts be repugnant, the first part shall be received and the latter rejected, except there be some special reason to the contrary. In a will, on the other hand, the rule is that the latter of two inconsistent provisions prevails; therefore if a testator in one part of his will gives a person an estate of inheritance, and in a subsequent part refers to it as an estate for life, the prior gift is restricted accordingly.

Inconsistency in pleading is forbidden. See DEPARTURE.

In consuetudinibus non diuturnitas temporis sed soliditas rationis est consideranda (Co. Litt. 141). (With regard to customs, not the length of time but the strength of the reason should be considered.) This maxim notwithstanding, the length of time must in fact be considered, for no custom can be good if any date can be given for its commencement: but no custom, even though of immemorial origin, is good unless it fulfils the other requisites of a good custom in the way of being reasonable, compulsory, consistent with other customs, etc.

See QUOD AB INITIO; ETC.

In contractis, benigna; in testamentis, benignior; in restitutionibus, benignissima interpretatio facienda est (Co. Litt. 112). (Contracts are to be construed liberally, wills still more liberally, and restitutions in the most liberal possible way.) Coke cites this maxim only in connection with wills. The restitution referred to is the restitutio of the Roman law. Our law knows nothing of it.

In contractis tacitè insunt quæ sunt moris et consuetudinis. (The clauses which are in accordance with custom and usage are an implied part of every contract.) This was a maxim of the civil law: it has been adopted by our law (see 3 Bing. N. C. 818).

In conventionibus contrahentium voluntas potius quam verba spectari placuit. (In construing agreements the intention of the parties, rather than the words actually used, should be considered.)

Incopolitus. Used in Leg. Hen. I., as meaning a proctor or vicar.

Incorporated Dental Society, The. This originated in 1892 as an association of unregistered practitioners of dentistry: it was formed into a company limited by guarantee in March, 1911. Those eligible for membership prior to 28th July, 1921 (see DENTISTS) were such persons as (a) were of good character, (b) had served an apprenticeship of not less than four years with a dental practitioner, registered or unregistered, and had practised dentistry personally for not less than a year, and (c) had passed an examination prescribed by the society.

Incorporated Law Society. See LAW SOCIETY.

Incorporation. This word is used in the law in two different senses: (1) The merging of one thing in another so that the two form a single whole; and (2) The formation of a number of persons into a body politic or corporation.

The word is used in the first sense when we speak of the incorporation of a document in a will; this occurs when a will is so worded that a pre-existing document is to be read as part of the will. And in the same sense a codicil incorporates the earlier will, so that the two form one whole. There is also incorporation in the same sense when a private Act of Parliament incorporates the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, or the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, in whole or in part. See CLAUSES ACTS.

Incorporation in the second sense takes place by royal charter, by royal letters patent, by special Act of Parliament, or by royal charter granted in pursuance of a special Act of Parliament: instances of all these methods are given under COMPANIES, CHARTERED; ROYAL COLLEGE OF PHYSICIANS; ROYAL COLLEGE OF SURGEONS AND VETERINARY SURGEONS; ETC. But the vast majority of incorporations now take place—and since 1862 have taken place—under the Companies Acts. See COMPANY.

Incorporeal Hereditaments. See HEREDITAMENTS.

Incorrigible Rogue. See VAGRANCY.

Increase, Affidavit of. See AFFIDAVIT.

Increment Value Duty. See LAND VALUES DUTIES.

In criminalibus probationes debent esse luce clariores (3 Inst. 210). (In criminal cases the proofs ought to be clearer than light): that is to say, no man should be convicted if there is any doubt as to his guilt. Compare EXCUSAT, ETC.

In criminalibus sufficit generalis malitia intentionis cum facto paris gradûs (Bac. Max. Reg. 15). (What may be described as malice at large is sufficient to constitute a crime if it be accompanied by an appropriate act):—Thus A is guilty of killing B feloniously and of malice aforethought, if B be killed by a shot fired by A into a crowd without any intention of killing B in particular.

In criminalibus voluntas reputabatur pro facto (3 Inst. 106). (In criminal cases the will used to be taken for the deed.) This is cited by Coke merely as having been a rule of the law in the time of Edward III.

Incroachment. See ENCROACHMENT.

Incumbent. See INDUCTION.

Incumbrance. See ENCUMBRANCE.

Incurramentum. (Becoming liable to a penalty, fine, or amerciament.) Incurrere alicui meant to become liable to penalty, fine, or amerciament at the hands of another; thus "Statutum est quod . . tenentes . . . Regi incurrantur" (Stat. West. II., c. 37).

In custodia legis. (In the custody of the law.) This does not mean in the custody of a policeman. It refers to the moneys and securities which are in the hands of the Paymaster-General: to the preservation or interim custody of the subject-matter of a disputed contract under Ord. 50, r. 1; to deeds or documents deposited in the Central Office under Ord. 61, r. 30; and, in short, to every case in which anything is in the possession of officers of the Court as such. Compare IN GREMIO LEGIS.

Indebitatus assumpsit. See ASSUMPSIT.

Indecency. It is a misdemeanour at common law to do any grossly indecent act, or to exhibit any indecent thing, in any open or public place. As to gross indecency between male persons see the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, s. 11.

See also EXPOSURE, INDECENT; INDECENT ASSAULT; OBSCENITY; PHOTOGRAPH.

Indecent Advertisements. This means, for the purposes of the Indecent Advertisements Act, 1889, any advertisement relating to any complaint or debility relating to or arising from sexual intercourse (ib. s. 5). Exhibiting any such advertisement in any public urinal, or so as to be visible to any person passing along any public street, etc., or delivering it or attempting to deliver it to any person so passing, or throwing it down the area of any house, is an offence punishable on summary conviction (ib. s. 3); so also is procuring any other person to do any such thing (ib. s. 4). See also VENEREAL DISEASE.

Indecent Assault. Indecent assault upon any female is punishable with not more than two years' imprisonment (Offences against the Person Act, 1861, s. 52) and so also is indecent assault upon any male person (ib. s. 62). The Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1922, s. 1, provides that "it shall be no defence to a charge or indictment for an indecent assault on a child or young person under the age of sixteen to prove that he or she consented to the act of indecency." If, therefore, a male over sixteen consents to an indecent assault by another male person there can be no conviction under s. 62 of the Act of 1861; but in such cases both parties can be convicted of gross indecency (Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, s. 11).

A verdict of indecent assault may be returned against any prisoner charged with carnal knowledge or attempted carnal knowledge of a girl under thirteen (see CARNAL KNOWLEDGE) or with rape (Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, s. 9).

Indecimable. Not subject to tithe (2 Inst. 240).

Indefensus. In the thirteenth century this meant one who, being impleaded, refused to make answer.

Indefinite Payment. See APPROPRIATION.

Indefinitum equipollet universali (Vent. 308). (The indefinite is equivalent to the universal.) This maxim was cited by the King's Bench in deciding (upon the analogy of the case mentioned at IDEM SEMPER, ETC.) that "the said" must be taken as referring to each of several antecedents and not merely to the last of them. But the general rule is really that embodied in INCERTA QUANTITAS; ETC.

Indemnify; Indemnification. To indemnify is to make good a loss which one person has suffered in consequence of the act or default of another; and the operation of making good the loss is called indemnification. (See Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, s. 5.) Thus, if A fails to pay a debt which he owes to B, and a surety, C, pays it, C is said to indemnify B, and B is said to obtain indemnification. So if A wrongfully causes a loss to B, A is liable to indemnify B for the loss which he has sustained. A promise to indemnify is the same thing as an indemnity or guarantie (q.v.), and hence "to indemnify" sometimes signifies "to give an indemnity," that is, "to promise to indemnify:" thus, a person to whom an indemnity is given is said to be indemnified. See DAMNIFY.

Indemnity. An indemnity is a collateral contract or security to prevent a person from being damnified by an act or forbearance which he does at the request of the indemnor. Thus, if A agrees not to sue B for a debt during a certain period in consideration of a promise by C to repay him any loss which he may suffer from not suing B at once, C's promise constitutes an indemnity.

Settlements and wills used formerly to contain a provision that the trustees should not be liable for the acts or defaults of their co-trustees, or of any agent, banker, etc., but should only be liable for what they actually receive, and for their own acts and neglects. But it became customary to omit this provision after it had been enacted by the Law of Property Amendment Act, 1860, s. 31 (now repealed and replaced by the Trustee Act, 1893, s. 24) that every will, etc., should be deemed to contain a clause to the like effect.

See ACT OF INDEMNITY; GUARANTEE.

Indent; Indenture. To indent a document was to cut the top of the first page or sheet in a toothed or waving line. The most usual instance of this was in the case of a deed indented or indenture (infra), but it is also done in other cases: thus the inquisition under an elegit (q.v.) was indented.

An indenture is a deed made between two or more parties, e.g., an ordinary conveyance, lease, mortgage, settlement, etc. Formerly it was usual when a deed was made between two parties to write two copies of it on one piece of parchment or paper, and then to cut it in two in an indented or toothed line, so that each copy of the deed fitted the other and could thus be identified. Now a deed purporting to be an indenture has the effect of an indenture, although not actually indented (Real Property Act, 1845, s. 5).

Indentures were formally called bipartite, tripartite, quadripartite, etc., according as they were made in two, three, or four parts: but all the parts of an indenture have always been only one deed in law. See DEED.

Index animi sermo est. (Words are the indication of intention.) And so no statute can be construed in a way repugnant to its express words.

Indian Empire, Order of. The Most Eminent Order of the Indian Empire was founded in 1878 in connection with the assumption by Queen Victoria of the title of "Empress of India." It includes Knights Grand Commanders (G.C.I.E.), Knights Commanders (K.C.I.E.), and Companions (C.I.E.).

India Office. The Government department of which the minister known as the Secretary of State for India is the head. See SECRETARY OF STATE.

Indicatif. This would appear to be a corruption of indicavit (q.v.).

Indicavit. A writ in the nature of a prohibition which formerly lay to restrain the ecclesiastical courts from adjudicating in tithe cases involving rights of patronage. The patron of the clerk whose proceedings were restrained by the writ could, in his turn, sue out a writ de advocatione decimarum, in order that the proceedings in the ecclesiastical court might continue.

Indictment is a written accusation of one or more persons of a crime, presented on oath by a grand jury. Down to 1916 indictments were highly technical in form, but the Indictments Act, 1915, abolishes all the old technicalities: see in particular, r. 4 (4) in Schedule I., which provides that "particulars of such offence shall be set out in ordinary language in which the use of technical terms shall not be necessary." The indictment is preferred (that is, laid before) the grand jury under the technical name of a bill; the witnesses in support of the charge are then examined, and if the offence appears to a majority of the jury (consisting of twelve at least) to be sufficiently proved to put the offender on his trial, they indorse on the indictment "true bill"; the indictment is then said to be found, and the offender stands indicted and must be arraigned (q.v.). If the majority think that the offence has not been sufficiently proved, they indorse "No true bill," "Not a true bill" or "Not found," on the indictment, and the accused person is then discharged. Strictly speaking, the indictment is not so called until it has been found a true bill. See AMENDMENT; COUNT; PRESENTMENT; INQUEST; JURY; VENUE; IGNORAMUS.

Indictor; Indictee. These words meant respectively the person by whom and the person against whom an indictment was presented.

Indifferent. In the law this means without any interest which might prevent impartial adjudication.

Indivisum. That which is held by two persons in common without partition: each of them hold pro indiviso (q.v.).

Indorse; Indorsement. To indorse is to write something on the back of an instrument. "Indorsement" signifies either the act of indorsing, or the writing itself.

When a deed to be executed has reference to a transaction already embodied in a deed between the same parties, or some of them, or their predecessors in title, it frequently saves the repetition of many recitals and provisions to make the terms of the new deed refer to those of the former one, and to indorse it on that instrument; thus, the reconveyance of mortgaged property is frequently indorsed on the mortgage, and an appointment of new trustees on the settlement or other instrument creating the trust. A supplemental deed (q.v.) is used as a substitute for an indorsed deed if for any reason indorsement is impracticable.

Indorsement is also an important mode of transferring bills of exchange, cheques, bills of lading, and similar documents, and is effected by the person to whose order the document is payable writing his name on the back and delivering it to the transferee. An indorsement consisting merely of the indorser's name, is called an indorsement in blank; when it specifies the name of the person (the indorsee) to whom the document is transferred or indorsed, it is called a special indorsement, or an indorsement in full. An indorsement in blank makes the instrument payable to bearer; a special indorsement makes it payable to the order of the person named in the indorsement. As to the liability of an indorser, see BILL OF EXCHANGE.

The following kinds of indorsement seem, in practice, to be peculiar to bills of exchange and promissory notes.

An indorsement without recourse (sans recours) is where an indorser declares that he shall not be liable if the bill, etc., is dishonoured by the antecedent parties. A conditional indorsement is one made before acceptance, in such a form as to impose on the drawee accepting the bill a liability not to pay the bill except in a particular event. A restrictive indorsement is where the bill is expressed to be indorsed to a person for a particular purpose (e.g., "Pay to A. B. for my account"), and prevents him from negotiating it. A qualified indorsement is where one who is under an obligation to indorse in a representative capacity indorses in such a way as to deny personal liability.

As to indorsements on WRITS OF SUMMONS, see that title.

Inducement. Introductory statements in a pleading which are made to lead up to and explain the matter in dispute are known as "matters of inducement."

Induction, in ecclesiastical law, is the ceremony by which an incumbent who has been instituted to a benefice is vested with full possession of all the profits belonging to the church, so that he becomes seised of the temporalities of the church and is then complete incumbent. It is performed by virtue of a mandate of induction directed by the bishop to the archdeacon, who either performs it in person, or directs his precept to one or more other clergymen to do it. See INSTITUTION; COLLATION.

Indulto; Indult. An authorisation by the Pope for the doing of something which the canon law does not sanction. A common instance is the Lenten indult by which a bishop is authorised to mitigate the rigour of the Lenten fast. Since the Reformation, our law, of course, knows nothing of indults.

Industrial Assurance Company. The Collecting Societies and Industrial Assurance Companies Act, 1896, s. 1, defines an industrial assurance company as meaning "every such . . . person or persons, whether corporate or unincorporate, granting assurances on any one life for a less sum than £20, . . . as receives . . . premiums by means of collectors at a greater distance than ten miles from the registered office or principal place of business of the . . . company and . . . at less periodical intervals than two months." The Act regulates the business of such companies.

An industrial assurance company may issue policies for money to be paid for the funeral expenses of a parent, grandparent, grandchild, brother or sister; and no policy effected before 3rd December, 1909, is void if it was effected to cover such expenses as might be reasonably anticipated in connection with the death or funeral of a person in whose life the assurer had no insurable interest (Insurance Companies Act, 1909, ss. 36 (1) (2), 38).

Industrial and Provident Societies. These are societies which are regulated by the Industrial and Provident Societies Acts, 1893 to 1913. The Act of 1893, which repealed, re-enacted, and amended the previous legislation on the subject, defines (s. 4) an industrial and provident society which may be registered under that Act as "a society for carrying on any industries, businesses or trades specified in or authorized by its rules, whether wholesale or retail, and including dealings of every description with land," and provides that no member, other than another such registered society, may have an interest exceeding £200 in the shares of such society, and that the business of banking is to be carried on subject to the provisions of the Act; for those provisions, see ss. 19, 62 (4) and Sch. II., r. 6. Such a society (which must consist of seven persons at least (ib., s. 5)), when registered under the Act becomes a body corporate with limited liability (s. 21), and with the word "limited" as the last word in its name (s. 5), and is regulated by rules, providing for the holding of meetings, the appointment of officers, the mode in which the profits are to be applied, etc. (s. 10, Sch. II.). Down to 1918 such societies, subject to compliance with certain conditions, were, under s. 24 of the Act, of 1893, exempted from income tax, but that section was repealed by the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 238, Sch. 7. Section 1 of the Act of 1913 sanctions the registration of a society consisting of two or more societies registered under the Act of 1893.

Industrial and provident societies originated in the adoption of the principle of co-operation by working men for the purpose of buying goods for their own consumption at wholesale prices and selling them among themselves at a price sufficient to pay the expenses and realise a small profit. Many such societies also offer inducements for saving, by having the capital divided into shares of a small amount payable by weekly or monthly instalments. Sometimes part of the profits is applied in paying interest at a certain rate on the shares, and the balance for any purpose authorised by the Friendly Societies Acts Sometimes also the shares are not transferable, but the investment of each member is accumulated for the benefit of his family.

See BUILDING SOCIETIES; FRIENDLY SOCIETIES; DISSOLUTION; NOMINATION.

Industrial School. An "'industrial school' means a school for the industrial training of children in which children are lodged, clothed and fed as well as taught" (Children Act, 1908, s. 44). Such a school is a "certified industrial school" if certified by the Secretary of State as fit for the reception of children (ib., s. 45 (1)). A "day industrial school" is a school in which industrial training, elementary education, and one or more meals a day, but not lodging, are provided for children (ib., s. 77), and such a school, if certified by the Secretary of State as fit for the reception of children is a certified day industrial school. As to the powers of Courts to send children to industrial or day industrial schools, see ss. 58, 78 (1). See CHILD; REFORMATORY.

Inebriates. See HABITUAL DRUNKARDS.

Ine, Laws of. The earliest laws of the Kingdom of Wessex. They were probably promulgated between 688 and 694. Here are some of them:—

"If any one within the borders of our Kingdom commits an act of robbery or seizes anything with violence, he shall restore the plunder and pay a fine of 60 shillings."

"The wergeld of a Welsh horseman who is in the King's service and can ride on his errands shall be 200 shillings."

"If anyone destroys a tree in a wood by fire, and it becomes known who did it, he shall pay a full fine. He shall pay 60 shillings, because fire is a thief."

The full text of the laws, with an English translation, will be found in The Laws of the Earliest English Kings, edited by F. L. Attenborough (1922), at p. 36.

In eo, quod plus sit, semper inest et minus (D. 50, 17, 110). (The greater always includes the less.) See IN MAJORE, ETC.

In esse. Actually existing, as distinguished from in posse (q.v.) and in futuro (q.v.).

Inevitable. An accident is in law inevitable when it cannot be avoided by the exercise of ordinary care, caution, and skill.

Infamous Conduct. The General Council (q.v.) may erase from the register of medical practitioners the name of any practitioner whom they adjudge to have been guilty of conduct infamous in any professional respect (Medical Act, 1858, s. 29). Any conduct in the course of the profession which would reasonably be regarded as disgraceful or dishonourable by competent practitioners of good repute is "infamous." If the council, acting bonâ fide and after due inquiry, adjudge any practitioner to have been guilty of such conduct, the Courts have no jurisdiction to review their decision. It is to be noted that erasure does not disqualify a practitioner from practising; but (see the Medical Act, 1886, s. 6) it prevents him from recovering his fees by legal proceedings.

The council can also erase from the dentists' register the name of any person registered therein on proof that he has been guilty of any "infamous or disgraceful conduct in a professional respect" (Dentists Act, 1878, ss. 2, 11, 13).

The Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons (q.v.) possess analogous powers of removing from their register the name of any member guilty of misconduct.

See APOTHECARIES; CHEMISTS.

Infamous Crime. This expression was defined by the Larceny Act, 1861, s. 46, as meaning "the abominable crime of buggery, committed either with mankind or with beast, and every assault with attempt to commit the said abominable crime, and every attempt or endeavour to commit the said abominable crime, and solicitation, persuasion, promise, or threat offered or made to any person whereby to move or induce such person to commit or permit the said abominable crime." That section, together with ss. 44, 47, 48, 49 of the Larceny Act, 1861, is repealed by the Larceny Act, 1916, s. 48 (1), Sch., and all these repealed sections are substantially re-enacted by s. 29 of the Act of 1916, which however does not use the expression "infamous crime." That expression has consequently ceased to have a technical meaning. See BLACKMAIL.

Infamy. Under the common law a person convicted of forgery, perjury, gross cheats, or other such offences and against whom judgment had been pronounced in pursuance of such conviction was incompetent to give evidence. He was said to have incurred infamy. This disqualification was removed by the Civil Rights of Convicts Act, 1828, s. 3, and by the Evidence Act, 1843, s. 1, the combined effect of which enactments is that no witness is disqualified by any conviction. But of course the fact of his conviction may be put to him in cross-examination.

Infangtheft. This was the right to hang a thief caught "hand having or back-bearing" the stolen goods upon one's own land. It originated in very early times, and gradually fell into disuse—about the thirteenth century—as the royal Courts asserted their authority. It had originated in Anglo-Saxon times; and the right was given by a grant from the king. Compare HALIFAX GIBBET LAWS; HANDHABEND; OUTFANGTHEFT.

Infant is a person under the age of twenty-one years.

Infants are subject to various disabilities imposed on them for their protection: thus an infant cannot, as a rule, alien his lands, or make a deed or contract binding on him, and he cannot, unless he be a soldier on actual military service or a mariner at sea, make a valid will under any circumstances. He may, however, contract for necessaries (q.v.). Formerly the contracts of an infant not binding on him were voidable only, and therefore capable of being ratified by him after attaining majority: but this is no longer so, the Infants Relief Act, 1874, ss. 1, 2, having made such contracts absolutely void. So an infant under the age of seven years cannot be guilty of felony; under the age of fourteen he is conclusively presumed—even though the facts negative the presumption—to be incapable of rape; between the ages of seven and fourteen he is presumed to be doli incapax (incapable of discerning between good and evil) until the contrary is shown; and, under the age of sixteen, he cannot be sentenced to death (Children Act, 1908, ss. 103, 131). An infant of fourteen years, if a male, and of twelve years, if a female, may give the consent required (among other things) to make a valid marriage: but a promise to marry at a future time is not binding on an infant under twenty-one. See BREACH.

An infant may in some cases act in a representative capacity or in auter droit, in the same manner as a person sui juris. Thus an infant may act as an agent or as an attorney under a power, and it seems that an infant may also exercise a power of appointment over personal estate, although not over real. See EXECUTOR; GRANT; GUARDIAN; TRUSTEE.

In probate practice an infant is a person under the age of seven years, as opposed to a minor, who is a person between the age of seven and twenty-one years. See GUARDIAN.

An infant under fourteen cannot in general be on licensed premises (Children Act, 1908, s. 120 (q.v.)); and he cannot have or carry any firearm (Firearms Act, 1920, s. 3), or hold any motor licence (Motor Car Act, 1903, s. 3 (5)), and under seventeen he can hold no motor licence except for a motor cycle (ib.). A pawnbroker commits an offence if he takes a pledge from a child apparently under the age of fourteen (Children Act, 1908, 8 Edw. 7, c. 67, s. 133 (12)); but it is a good defence to prove that the child was in fact fourteen (ib., s. 123 (4)). The Betting and Loans (Infants) Act, 1892, makes it penal to incite infants either to bet or borrow money.

See WARD OF COURT; SETTLEMENT; NECESSARIES; FEOFFMENT; GUARDIAN; HABEAS CORPUS.

Infanticide. Colloquially, this means the killing of an infant soon after its birth: but down to 1922 no such offence as infanticide was formally recognised by the law. The law had, however (see BIRTH, CONCEALMENT OF), provided one means by which, in a certain state of facts, a jury could avoid a verdict of murder where a woman was charged with what is popularly known as infanticide: in other cases juries not infrequently took the law into their own hands and returned a verdict of manslaughter—or acquitted—where a woman was charged with the murder of her newly-born infant; and, even where there was a verdict of murder, it had been for many years customary to commute the capital sentence in the case of an infant being killed by its mother. The Infanticide Act, 1922, while expressly preserving the right of a jury to bring in a verdict of manslaughter or of concealment of birth, or of (see INSANITY) guilty but insane, provides that where a woman causes the death of her newly-born child before she has fully recovered from the effect of child-birth and while the balance of her mind is still disturbed, then she shall be guilty of infanticide and punishable as for manslaughter, if before the Act she might have been convicted of murder.

In favorem vitæ libertatis et innocentiæ omnia præsumuntur (Lofft, 125). (In favour of life, liberty, and innocence all possible presumptions are made.)

Infectious Diseases. It is a common law misdemeanour to expose in a public place any person, whether such person be the accused himself or another person, who is suffering from an infectious disease.

The notification and prevention of infectious diseases is provided for by the Public Health Act, 1875, ss. 120-139, the Infectious Diseases Notification Act, 1889, 52 & 53 Vict. c. 72, the Infectious Diseases Prevention Act, 1890, the Infectious Diseases (Notification) Extension Act, 1899, and the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1907, Pt. IV. See also DAIRIES.

Inferior Court. This means any Court other than the High Court, the Central Criminal Court (q.v.), or the Chancery (q.v.) Courts of Lancaster and Durham. The writs of certiorari (q.v.), mandamus (q.v.) and prohibition (q.v.) lie to an inferior Court: they do not lie from one superior Court to another. See COURTS; BOROUGH COURTS; BOROUGH SESSIONS; QUARTER SESSIONS; COURT OF SUMMARY JURISDICTION.

In fictione juris semper æquitas existit (11 Rep. 51). (Equity is manifest in every legal fiction.) See FICTIO LEGIS, ETC.

Infidels. It was anciently said that "infidels may not be witnesses by the laws of the kingdom because they believe neither the Old nor New Testament to be the Word of God, on one of which the oaths must be taken." Now "infidels" may affirm or take such oath as they declare to be binding. See AFFIRM; OATH.

In formâ pauperis. Under the statutes 11 Hen. 7, c. 12, and 23 Hen. 8, c. 15, s. 3, every poor person desirous of bringing an action who could swear that he had not property worth £5, except his wearing apparel and the subject-matter of the intended action, was to be allowed to bring his action without payment of the Court fees, and was to have assigned to him an attorney and counsel who acted for him without payment. The practice of the common law Courts, under these Acts, was adopted by the Courts of equity, and was extended by them to the case of defendants. The two enactments above mentioned were repealed by the Statute Law Revision and Civil Procedure Act, 1883, ss. 3, 4; and the matter is now regulated by the Rules mentioned under POOR PERSON (q.v.).

As to appeals in forma pauperis to the House of Lords, see the Appeal (Forma Pauperis) Act, 1893, which enables the House to refuse leave to prefer such an appeal where the appellant has no prima facie case.

Informant. This means a person who lays an information (q.v.) to recover a penalty recoverable by criminal proceedings or proceedings of a like nature. In summary proceedings the person who makes a complaint (q.v.) is known as a complainant, while the person who lays an information is known as an informant.

Information. An information is in the nature of a pleading. It is the step by which several civil and criminal proceedings are commenced.

I. Civil proceedings by information were formerly brought either in Chancery or in the Court of Exchequer, according to the nature of the remedy sought.

A. As to informations in Chancery. When a suit in Chancery was instituted on behalf of the Crown or of persons partaking of its prerogative or under its particular protection (e.g., a charity), the matter of complaint was offered to the Court by a document called an information, which was a statement of facts by the Attorney-General or other proper officer (the informant), resembling a bill of complaint (q.v.), except that it was not in the form of a petition. If the suit did not immediately concern the rights of the Crown, its officers depended on the relation of some person whose name was inserted in the information, and who was termed the relator (q.v.). It sometimes happened that this person had an interest in the matter of dispute, of the injury to which interest he had a right to complain. In this case his personal complaint was incorporated with the information given to the Court by the officer of the Crown; under the old practice they formed together an information and bill, and were so termed. When an information was filed by the Attorney-General upon his own authority it was sometimes called an information ex officio, as opposed to an information at the relation (q.v.) of a private individual. At the present day proceedings by information in the Chancery Division assume the form of an action by the Attorney-General, either ex-officio or at the relation of some person or corporation (see R. S. C. Ord. 1, r. 1).

There was also a proceeding called an English information in the Exchequer Division, under the equitable jurisdiction of the Court of Exchequer, so called because it was in the nature of a bill of complaint in equity, which was formerly called an English Bill. (See BILL OF COMPLAINT.) The originating proceeding in an equity suit instituted on behalf of the Crown on the Revenue side of the King's Bench Division is still known as an English information.

B. As to informations at common law:—The prerogative process of information was in the nature of a civil action at the suit of the Crown, and was instituted for the purpose of obtaining satisfaction in damages for some injury to Crown possessions, or to recover money due to or goods claimed by the Crown. The information was not founded on any writ, but merely on the intimation of the Attorney-General, who "gave the Court to understand and be informed of" the matter in question. The party was then put to answer by plea, which the Crown might traverse or demur to, etc., and trial was had as in suits between subject and subject. Informations were of three principal kinds:—An information of intrusion was in the nature of an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, and was brought for any trespass committed on the lands of the Crown. An information of debt (or information in personam) was brought upon any contract for moneys due to the Crown (though process by extent was more usual in such cases), or for any forfeiture due to the Crown upon the breach of a penal statute, especially when the revenue was concerned. An information in rem, or real information, lay where any goods were supposed to become the property of the Crown as derelict, and no man appeared to claim them, or where goods were forfeited for non-payment of excise duties. An information of devenerunt lay to recover goods belonging to the Crown which "have come into the hands" of a subject; it was in the nature of an action of detinue, and was either wholly or partly in rem. Informations of the kinds mentioned in this paragraph are now assigned to the King's Bench Division. (See HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.) Informations of debt are by far the most common.

II. In criminal procedure, informations are of three kinds:

A. Those brought partly at the suit of the Crown and partly at that of a subject, to enforce a penalty or forfeiture under a penal statute; these are a sort of qui tam actions, only carried on by a criminal instead of a civil process. See PENAL ACTION.

B. Informations brought in the King's Bench Division in the name of the Crown alone; these are of two kinds. Informations by the Crown, filed ex officio by the Attorney-General, are available, but are seldom now employed, in the case of crimes which peculiarly tend to disturb or endanger the King's Government, or to molest or affront him in the regular discharge of his royal functions.

Informations filed by the Master of the Crown Office upon the complaint or relation of a private subject, are applicable for the punishment of any gross and notorious misdemeanours, such as riots, batteries, libels, bribery, misconduct by magistrates, etc. The defendant then pleads to the information, and the trial and subsequent proceedings resemble those on an ordinary prosecution by indictment in the King's Bench Division, except that the preliminary inquiry by a grand jury is absent. See PLEADING; TRIAL; KING'S BENCH; QUO WARRANTO.

C. Proceedings before justices of the peace in matters of a criminal nature are commenced by an information, which is a statement of the facts of the case made by the informant or prosecutor, sometimes verbally, sometimes in writing, and either with or without an oath; when not upon oath, the information is said to be exhibited. See COMPLAINT.

Informer is a person who brings an action or takes some other proceeding for the recovery of a penalty of which the whole or part goes to him. A common informer is a person who sues for a penalty which is given to any person who will sue for it, as opposed to a penalty which is only given to a person specially aggrieved by the act complained of. (See PENALTY; PENAL.) And he also is any person who, in the exercise of the common law right to "inform" a Court, prosecutes for any offence, whether triable summarily or on indictment, which affects the public at large and with regard to which the right to prosecute has not been confined by statute to a particular person or class of persons.

See APPROVER; ACCOMPLICE; KING'S EVIDENCE.

Infortunium, Homicide per. (Homicide (q.v.) by misadventure.) This takes place where a man is lawfully doing an act and homicide accidentally results. At common law a person found guilty of homicide per infortunium was technically liable to forfeiture of all goods; but he received a pardon and a writ of restitution as a matter of course. Such forfeiture was abolished by the Offences against the Person Act, 1861, s. 7; and long before then a verdict of not guilty had become customary in such cases.

Infringement. When a person does an act which he has no right to do, and thereby interferes with the right of another person, he is said to infringe that right. Thus, when a person manufactures an article protected by a patent, or prints a book protected by copyright, or makes use of a trade mark without having the right to do so, he is said to infringe the patent, copyright, or trade mark. The remedy is an injunction to restrain future infringements, and recovery of the damages caused or profits made by the past infringements.

In futuro. (In the future): the converse of in præsenti.

In generalibus latet error. (Error lurks in generalities.)

Ingenuitas. Used in the Leg. Hen. 1, c. 9, as meaning freedom acquired by manumission (q.v.).

Ingenuitas regni. The freeholders of the realm. The title was sometimes applied to the Magnum Concilium Regni (q.v.).

In gremio legis. (In the bosom of the law). In gremio legis applies rather to matters which are not in the actual custody of the Court through its officers, but which are under its protection, while in custodia legis (q.v.) relates to things, such as money or title deeds, of which the Court has actual possession.

Ingress. The same as "entry," as the latter word is used in the expression "free entry, egress and regress" (q.v.).

Ingressu, De. A writ of entry (q.v.), also known as the writ præcipe quod reddat, which would seem to have been abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36, although it is not amongst the list of writs specifically mentioned in that section.

Ingressus. Literally, an entry. It sometimes meant the relief (q.v.) paid by an heir upon attaining full age for entering upon his fee; in another context it meant a payment made by one to whom forfeited lands had been granted.

In Gross, as applied to a right, means that it is not appendant, appurtenant, or otherwise annexed to land. Thus, if A grants to B the right of feeding a certain number of cattle on his (A's) lands, B has a common of pasture in gross. See COMMON; EASEMENT; PROFIT; VILLEIN.

In the old books, money payable by a mortgagor of land is said to be in gross, as opposed to a rent issuing out of the land; and hence the old rule was that a mortgagor must tender the money to the person of the mortgagee, while it was sufficient to tender rent on the land itself.

As to powers in gross, see POWER.

Ingross. See ENGROSS.

Ingrossator magni rotuli. (The engrosser of the Great Roll). This was an ancient synonym of Clerk of the Pipe (q.v.).

Inhabitant. See CUSTOM; COURT LEET; EASEMENT; HUNDRED; POOR; RECREATION; RESIDENCE.

Inhabited house duty is an assessed tax running (House Tax Act, 1851, Sch.; House Tax Act, 1871, s. 31; Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1890, ss. 25, 26) from twopence to ninepence in the pound, on inhabited dwelling-houses, according to their annual value if such value exceeds £20 (House Tax Act, 1851, s. 1), and is payable by the occupier, the landlord being deemed the occupier where the house is let to several persons (House Tax Act, 1808, Sch. B). Where a house, so far as it is used as a dwelling-house, is used for the sole purpose of providing separate dwellings or "flats," then the value of any "flat" of the annual value of less than £20 is deducted from the value of the house for the purpose of the duty (Revenue Act, 1903, s. 11). Houses occupied solely for business purposes are exempt from duty, although a caretaker may dwell therein, and houses partially occupied for business purposes are to that extent exempt (Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, s. 13). Houses belonging to the Royal Family, every public office for which the duty would be payable out of the public revenue, hospitals, charity schools, and houses for the reception or relief of poor persons, as well as houses occupied only by caretakers, are totally exempt (House Tax Act, 1808, Sch. B).

The tax is assessed on the rent or on the letting value of the house (House Tax Act, 1803, s. 10), but can never be assessed on less than the rateable value for poor rate (House Tax Act, 1808, Sch. B, vii.).

See WINDOW TAX.

Inhansing. The ancient designation of the effect of a royal proclamation declaring that the value of a coin should be raised although the weight and purity remained unchanged. For instances, see GOLD COINS: compare DEBASING.

Inheretrix is the old term for "heiress."

Inheritable is that which is capable of inheriting, that is, of taking land by descent. Thus, "blood inheritable," in the old books, means a capacity of inheriting by reason of consanguinity. (See BLOOD.) "Inheritable" is applied to the person, "descendible" to the estate or property. See FREEHOLD.

Inheritance is that which descends by way of the real representative (q.v.) to the heir of the owner on his death intestate. The term is not often used except in the expression "estate of inheritance" (see ESTATE), and in the following phrases:—

"No man," says Coke, "can institute a new kind of inheritance not allowed by the law." See DESCENT.

"If a man buy divers fishes," says Coke again, ". . . and put them in his pond, and dyeth, in this case the heire shall have them, and not the executors, but they shall goe with the inheritance."

"Inheritance" is also used in the old books where "hereditament" is now commonly employed; thus, Coke divides inheritances into corporeal and incorporeal, into real, personal and mixed, and into entire and several; as to these divisions, see HEREDITAMENT. The phrase "several inheritance," however, seems to be used in three senses: (i) in the sense of one of two hereditaments or estates which are unconnected the one with the other; (ii) in the sense of a sole estate, as opposed to an estate of coparcenery or other joint estate: thus, says Coke, "if a partition be made betweene two coparceners of one and the selfe-same land, that the one shall have the land from Easter untill Lammas to her and her heires, and the other shall have it from Lammas till Easter to her and her heires, or the one shall have it the first yeare, and the other the second yeare, alternis vicibus, etc., there it is one selfe-same land wherein two persons have severall inheritances at severall times"; (iii) to denote an estate free from the incident of survivorship, as opposed to joint tenancy: thus, "if lands be given to two men and to the heires of their two bodies begotten, in this case, the donees have a joint estate for term of their two lives, and yet they have severall inheritances." As to the meaning of this, see ESTATE TAIL.

See HÆREDITAS ALIA, ETC.

Inheritance Act, 1833. See DESCENT.

Inhibition. Under the Land Transfer Act, 1875, regulating the registration of land, an inhibition is an order or entry on the register inhibiting or forbidding for a given time, or until further order, any dealing with lands or charges registered under the Act. It resembles an injunction. See CAUTION; RESTRICTION.

In ecclesiastical law, an inhibition is (1) a writ forbidding a judge from further proceeding in a case depending before him, as where an appeal is brought against a sentence pronounced by him; (2) an order inhibiting or forbidding an incumbent to perform any service of the church or otherwise exercise the cure of souls for a certain period or until he obeys a certain monition or order (Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874, s. 13).

Under the practice of the Privy Council in admiralty appeals, before the Judicature Acts, as soon as the petition of appeal had been lodged, an inhibition and citation might be issued prohibiting the Court below and the respondent from proceeding in the cause pending the appeal, and citing the respondent to enter an appearance to the appeal. Relaxation of the inhibition was a kind of writ dissolving the inhibition in cases where the appeal had not been prosecuted with due diligence. Admiralty appeals now lie to the Court of Appeal (Judicature Act, 1873, s. 18; Judicature Act, 1875, s. 4), and this practice is therefore obsolete.

In hiis quæ sunt favorabilia animæ, quamvis sunt damnosa rebus, fiat aliquando extensio statuti (10 Rep. 101). (In things that are favourable to the spirit, though injurious to the things, an extension of a statute should sometimes be made.) That is to say, a point is sometimes to be stretched in favour of an interpretation which is in accordance with the spirit though opposed to the letter of a statute.

Initia. A corrupt form of ENITIA (q.v.).

Initials. Signature by initials is good for the purposes of the Wills Act, 1837, or of the Statute of Frauds. Ordinarily the Christian name of a defendant is set out in the title of a writ of summons (see Ord. 11, r. 3, and Sch. 1, Pt. 1, Form 1): but if the Christian name of the defendant be unknown he can be sued by his surname simpliciter: and in any case he can be sued by the initial or initials of his Christian name or names plus his surname.

Initiate, Tenant by the Curtesy. Where a man has a wife seised of an estate of inheritance this is the technical description applied to him after his wife has had a child, so that on his wife's death such man becomes tenant by the curtesy (q.v.).

In judiciis minori ætate succurritur (Jenk. Cent. 46). (In the decisions of the Courts help is given to a minor.) Compare SUCCURRITUR, ETC.

In judicio non creditur nisi juratis (Cro. Car. 64.) (In a trial no man's evidence is to be accepted unless he has been sworn.) This was said by the Lord Keeper regarding a claim by a peer that he should be allowed to give evidence upon his honour.

Injunction is an order or judgment by which a party to an action is required to do, or refrain from doing, a particular thing.

Injunctions are either restrictive (preventive) or mandatory. Thus, an injunction restraining a defendant from causing nuisance, or disturbing an easement, or committing waste, or infringing a patent, is a restrictive injunction, while an injunction ordering a defendant to take down or remove a wall or other obstruction is a mandatory injunction, or mandatory order, or more accurately a mandamus.

Injunctions are either interim, provisional (interlocutory) or perpetual. Provisional injunctions are such as are granted on interlocutory applications, and continue until a certain period, e.g., until the trial of the action. The object of an interlocutory injunction is to preserve the property in dispute, with the least injury to all parties, until their rights can be finally determined. Perpetual injunctions are such as form part of the judgment or order made at the trial or hearing of the action, and, as their name denotes, are not restricted as to time.

Formerly, in cases of great urgency, an injunction was obtained ex parte, but this is not now always done, the practice in such cases sometimes being to grant what is called an interim order or injunction, by which the defendant is restrained until after a particular day named, liberty being given to the plaintiff to serve notice for an injunction for the day before the day so named.

Formerly, if a person was sued at law in circumstances which gave him a defence sustainable only in a Court of equity, the Court of Chancery would give effect to this defence by granting an injunction restraining the plaintiff from continuing his action. This mode of proceeding was abolished by the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 24 (5), the provisions of that Act relating to equitable defences having rendered it inapplicable. See EQUITY.

See UNDERTAKING; RESTRAINING ORDER; MANDAMUS; EASEMENT; PATENT; INFRINGEMENT; SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE; CAIRNS' ACT.

Injunctions of Edward VI. and Elizabeth. These were regulations as to the discipline and ritual of the Church of England which were published by Edward VI. in 1549 and by Elizabeth in 1559. They were especially directed against such things as savoured of popery. They were published without statutory authority and would appear to be without legal effect.

Injured Animals Act, 1907. This statute, which empowered the police to destroy injured animals in appropriate cases, was repealed by s. 18, Sch., of the Protection of Animals Act, 1911, and is replaced by s. 11 of the latter Act.

In jure non remota causa, sed proxima spectatur (Bac. Max. Reg. 1). (In law the proximate, and not the remote, cause is to be regarded.) But this maxim does not always apply: see DOLUS CIRCUITU NON, ETC. As to where it in fact applies, see CAUSA PROXIMA NON, ETC., which is an abbreviated version.

In jure omnis definitio periculosa est. (In the law every definition is dangerous.) Compare IN GENERALIBUS LATET ERROR.

Injuria; Injury. In the technical sense of the word, an injury is where a right has been infringed. Hence "injury" is opposed to "damage," because a right may be infringed without causing pecuniary loss (injuria sine damno): thus the pollution of a clear stream is to a lower riparian proprietor both injury and damage, whilst the pollution of a stream already made foul and useless by other pollutions is an injury without damage, which would, however, at once become both injury and damage on the cessation of the other pollutions. See DAMNUM ABSQUE INJURIÂ.

Injuries are either legal or equitable. Legal injuries, or those formerly cognizable by the common law, are divided into breaches of contracts and torts (see those titles). Equitable injuries, or those formerly cognizable by the Courts of equity, include breaches of trust, equitable waste, and certain kinds of fraud.

Before the Judicature Acts the equitable remedies for legal injuries were specific performance and injunction, while damages (q.v.) were the ordinary legal remedy for such injuries. But see CAIRN'S ACT.

Injuria, De. In actions of trespass on the case and replevin, until the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, came into force, the plaintiff's replication to the defendant's plea (see PLEADING) might be in the form known as de injuriâ, which averred that the defendant "of his own wrong and without the the alleged cause" had done the acts alleged as a defence. It operated as a general traverse (q.v.) and tender of issue.

Injuria illata judici, seu locum tenenti regis, videtur ipsi regi illata, maximè si fiat in exercente officium (3 Inst. 1). (An injury offered to a judge, that is to say, a person representing the King, is considered as offered to the king himself, especially if it be done in the exercise of his office.)

Injuria non excusat injuriam. (One wrong does not justify another.) That is to say, a wrongdoer is not, as such, necessarily precluded from bringing an action.

Injuria non præsumitur (Co. Litt. 232). (Wrongdoing is not to be presumed.) The rule is OMNIA PRÆSUMUNTUR LEGITIME, ETC. (q.v.).

Injustum est nisi tota lege inspecta una aliqua particula proposita judicare vel respondere (8 Rep. 117; Wing. 239). (Unless you have gone through the whole of a statute it is unreasonable to give either a decision or an opinion upon any particular thing laid down in it.) Compare OPTIMA STATUTI, ETC.

In jus vocare. Anciently this meant to take legal proceedings against a man.

Inlagation; Inlagary. In the time of Bracton this meant the restoration to the protection of the law of one who had been outlawed: and inlagare meant to reverse an outlawry.

Inland. See OUTLAND.

Inland Revenue. See COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE.

Inlaw; Inlawry. When one subject to the king's allegiance was not an outlaw he was "inlaw": inlawry was the same as inlagation.

In loco parentis. A person is said to be in loco parentis towards an infant when he assumes towards the latter the moral obligation of making such a provision for him as his father would in duty be bound to make. The assumption of the character may be, and generally is, implied from the acts of the person putting himself in loco parentis, as where he pays for the maintenance and education of the infant or establishes him in life. The fact that the father of the child is living does not prevent another person putting himself in loco parentis, but if the child resides with the father and is maintained by him it affords an inference, though not a conclusive one, against the assumption of the character by another person.

A person in loco parentis is for many purposes treated as if he were the parent of the infant. Therefore the presumption in favour of advancement (as to which see ADVANCEMENT), and the presumption in favour of maintenance out of a contingent or deferred portion, apply to such persons.

In majore summâ continetur minor (5 Rep. 115). (In the greater sum of money is contained the less.) See IN EO, ETC.; IN TOTO, ETC.

In maleficiis voluntas, non exitus, spectatur (D. 48, 8, 14). (When acts primâ facie criminal are committed, regard must be had to the intention and not to the result). Thus, homicide may be justifiable or excusable, and so constitute no crime; or it may be manslaughter or murder and so constitute different crimes. But see AFFECTUS PUNITUR, ETC.

Inmate. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries this word was used as meaning one not being a member of a family, a guest or a servant, who was taken into a house, whether in return for payment or otherwise. Thus, the statute 31 Eliz. c. 7, s. 6, enacted: "There shall not be any inmate, or more famylies or householdes than one, dwellinge or inhabitinge in anye cottage"; the object was to keep down the number of the poor in the parish.

In misericordia pro falso clamore suo. When judgment was given against the plaintiff in an action, he was, down to 1733 (see FRENCH), said to be in misericordia pro falso clamore suo (to be at mercy for his false claim). Compare EAT INDE SINE DIE. See AMERCIAMENT.

Inner Temple. See INNS OF COURT.

Innings. Lands reclaimed from the sea. See GAINAGE.

Innkeeper. An innkeeper is one who holds himself out as being prepared to receive and entertain travellers. An innkeeper—including the keeper of every tavern or coffeehouse in which lodging is provided—is bound to receive and entertain every traveller who presents himself for that purpose and is ready to pay his expenses, provided there be sufficient room in the inn, and no impropriety of conduct in the traveller himself. He is not, however, bound to keep for an indefinite period anyone who originally came as a traveller, but who, by lapse of time, has lost the character of a traveller. He is also responsible for the goods and chattels brought by any traveller to his inn, unless they are stolen from the traveller's own person, or by his own servant, or are lost by his own negligence. By the Innkeepers' Liability Act, 1863, s. 1, no innkeeper is liable for the loss or injury of any goods (not being a horse or carriage) to a greater amount than £30, except they are stolen, lost or injured through the wilful act, default or neglect of himself or his servant, or unless they have been deposited with him expressly for safe custody. A copy of the Act must be conspicuously exhibited in the inn, and the innkeeper is entitled to the benefit of the Act only while such copy is so exhibited (s. 3). See BAILMENT; BOARDING HOUSE; CARRIER; CARRIERS ACT.

An innkeeper has a lien on his guest's goods for payment of charges incurred by him, and he may sell them in satisfaction if they are left for six weeks without the charges being paid, provided he advertises notice of the intended sale (Innkeepers Act, 1878). See LIEN.

Innocent, as applied to conveyances, is the opposite of tortious (q.v.).

Innotescimus. See INSPEXIMUS.

Innovation. In the civil law this means the substitution of one obligation for another: the word is not known in this sense to our law.

Coke regarded all innovations with suspicion, saying (Co. Litt. 379) that "commonly a new invention doth offend against many rules and reasons . . . of the common law."

In novo casu, novum remedium apponendum est (2 Inst. 3). (To a new case a new remedy should be applied.) See UBI JUS, ETC.

Inns of Chancery were the buildings known as Clifford's Inn, Clement's Inn, Lyon's Inn, New Inn, the Strand Inn, Thavies' Inn, Furnival's Inn, Staple Inn, and Barnard's Inn, as well as two others—St. George's Inn and Simond's Inn—which had both disappeared before the time of Coke. They were originally a sort of collegiate houses, in which law students learnt the elements of law before being admitted into the Inns of Court (q.v.), but they ceased to occupy that position in the sixteenth century, and from about 1650 they were entirely in the hands of the attorneys, who, however, did not maintain them for any educational purposes; and during the nineteenth century the inns all ceased to exist as such. Staple Inn was sold in 1884 to an insurance company, who have preserved it practically intact. Clifford's Inn was sold in 1899 by the sixteen surviving members of the inn to a builder, who pulled down the greater part of it; and the residue, except the old hall, was for sale in 1921 as an "eligible building site"; the hall of Barnard's Inn forms part of the school of the Mercers' Company; the other Inns of Chancery have completely disappeared.

Inns of Court are certain private unincorporated associations in the nature of collegiate houses, having the exclusive privilege of calling to the bar, that is, conferring the rank or degree of barrister (q.v.). They are:—the Inner Temple, the Middle Temple, Lincoln's Inn, and Gray's Inn. They have a common "Council of Legal Education" for giving lectures and holding examinations. See BENCHER; HOSPITALLERS; MOOT; READER; INNS OF CHANCERY.

The four Inns of Court, like certain other places, such as the Charterhouse, Furnival's Inn, Staple Inn, and the Close of Westminster Abbey, were formerly, for the purposes of what would now be called local government, under the control of the bodies that owned them; but all of these places except the two Temples (see S. R. & O. 1900, No. 885) are now under the jurisdiction either of the City or of some metropolitan borough. Thus the Holborn Borough Council paves, etc., the courts of Gray's Inn: the benchers of the two Temples themselves get the like work done within the Temples.

Innuendo is that part of an indictment in a criminal proceeding for libel, or of a pleading in an action for libel, which connects the alleged libel with its subject, or explains the meaning of words which are not on the face of them libellous. Thus if the libel complained of consisted of these words in a circular, "A. B. is a fit person to be a member of a certain society," and it was proved that the person who sent round the circular was the secretary of a society for the protection of tradesmen against swindlers, and that when he wrote to warn his correspondents against any person, he said, "He is a fit person to be a member of our society," it would be necessary in the declaration or statement of claim, after setting out the words "A. B. is a fit person to be a member of a certain society," to add, "meaning thereby 'He is a swindler'": these words form the innuendo.

In odium spoliatoris omnia præsumuntur (1 Vern. 19). (All possible presumption should be made against a wrongdoer.) The maxim was applied to the case of one who had wrongfully intermeddled with documents so that he might have abstracted some of them. See OMNIA PRAESUMUNTUR, ETC.

Inofficious Testament. A will which wholly passes over, without assigning sufficient reason, those having strong and natural claims on the testator. In the Roman law such a will raised a presumption of loss of memory or loss of reason and might be set aside: but any legacy, however small, prevented the presumption from arising. In English law no such presumption ever arose: but a mistaken idea that it did arise led formerly to the practice of giving a nominal legacy to ("cutting off with a shilling") a child or other relative whom the testator did not seek to benefit.

In omnibus quidem, maxime tamen in jure, æquitas spectanda sit (D. 50, 17, 90). (In everything, but especially in law, equity is to be regarded.) This was a maxim of the Roman law. The "law" and the "equity" referred to in it are not the entities known to our law.

Inops consilii. (Without advice: and especially, without legal advice.)

Inordinatus. Used in the thirteenth century as meaning intestate.

In pais, as applied to a legal transaction, primarily means that it has taken place without legal proceedings. Thus a widow was said to make a request in pais for her dower when she simply applied to the heir without issuing a writ. So conveyances are divided into those by matter of record and those by matter in pais (see CONVEYANCES). In some cases, however, "matters in pais" are opposed not only to "matters of record," but also to "matters in writing," that is, deeds, as where estoppel by deed is distinguished from estoppel by matter in pais. (See ESTOPPEL). It is not clear whether the phrase originally signified that the transaction in question took place on the spot, as in the case of a feoffment, which required livery of seisin on the land itself, or whether it denoted any place not being a Court. See COUNTRY; ACT IN PAIS.

— In pari causâ possessor potior haberi debet (D. 50, 17, 128). (As between two persons each having an equally strong claim to property, he who has possession of the property ought to be preferred.) See IN ÆQUALI JURE, ETC.

— In pari delicto, potior est conditio possidentis (or defendentis) (4 T. R. 564). Where both parties are equally in fault, the condition of the possessor (or defendant) is the best.) Where two persons are equally in fault, then he who actually possesses any property in dispute is to be preferred. Compare IN PARI CAUSA, ETC.

— In pari materia. In an analogous case.

Inpenny and Outpenny. In certain manors these were payments made on the alienation of copyholds. None of the modern writers mention them as being still made.

In Person. Anyone, whether plaintiff or defendant, can conduct his own case without employing a solicitor or counsel in any matter or action other than a motion for mandamus. If he does this, he is said to appear in person. But neither a next friend (q.v.) nor (see Ord. 16, r. 18) a guardian ad litem can personally conduct the case of anyone whom he represents. In summary proceedings, every complainant or informant (Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, s. 12), and every defendant (ib. s. 14), may conduct his case in person.

In personam; In rem.—I. In the Roman law, from which they are taken, the expressions in rem and in personam were always opposed to one another, an act or proceeding in personam being one done or directed against or with reference to a specific person, while an act or proceeding in rem was one done or directed with reference to no specific person, and consequently against or with reference to all whom it might concern, or "all the world." The phrases were especially applied to actions, an actio in personam being the remedy where a claim against a specific person arose out of an obligation, whether ex contractu or ex maleficio, while an actio in rem was one brought for the assertion of a right of property, easement, status, etc., against one who denied or infringed it.

II. From this use of the terms they have come to be applied to signify the antithesis of "available against a particular person" and "available against the world at large." Thus, jura in personam are rights primarily available against specific persons, jura in rem rights only available against the world at large. (See RIGHT). So a judgment or decree is said to be in rem when it binds third persons; such is the sentence of a Court of Admiralty on a question of prize, or a decree of nullity or dissolution of marriage (see JUDGMENT), or a decree of a Court in a foreign country as to the status of a person domiciled there.

III. Lastly, the terms are sometimes used to signify that a judicial proceeding operates on a thing or a person. Thus it used to be said of the Court of Chancery that it acted in personam and not in rem, meaning that its decrees operated by compelling defendants to do what they were ordered to do, and not by producing the effect directly. Hence the Court had (and therefore the High Court now has) jurisdiction to deal with a question affecting land situate in a foreign country, if the question can be settled by enforcing the decree or order against a person within the jurisdiction. It is in this sense that admiralty actions are divided into actions in rem and in personam, an action in rem being one in which the ship or other property out of which the cause of action arises (the res) is arrested as security for the performance of an obligation, while in an action in personam the performance of the obligation can only be enforced against the defendant personally.

In pœnalibus causis benignius interpretandum est (D. 50, 17, 155). (In matters relating to penalties the interpretation of the law should incline towards leniency.)

In posse. A thing which does not actually exist, but which may exist, is said to be in posse. Compare IN FUTURO; IN ESSE.

In præsenti. (At the present time): the converse is in futuro.

In præsentiâ majoris cessat potentia minoris (Jenk. Cent. 214). (In the presence of the greater, the power of the inferior ceases.) And so no commissioners of oyer and terminer could sit during term time in the county of Middlesex, because the King's Bench sat there, but such commissioners could, at any time, sit in the City of London, because the King's Bench did not sit there: see 9 Rep. 118 b.

Inquest originally meant the same as inquisition (q.v.), but at the present day it is almost exclusively used to signify an inquiry held by a jury before a coroner as to the death of a person who has been slain, or has died suddenly, or in prison, or under suspicious circumstances. It is held super visum corporis, that is, after the jury have viewed the body of the deceased, and the evidence is given on oath. If the jury by their verdict or inquisition find a person guilty of murder or other homicide, such an inquisition is in all respects equivalent to an indictment (q.v.). See CORONER; PARCHMENT.

Inquest of Office, or simply "office," as it is termed in the old books, is a prerogative remedy for the benefit of the Crown, which was formerly much in use. It was an inquiry made by a jury before a sheriff, coroner, escheator, or other officer of the Crown, or by commissioners specially appointed, concerning any matter that entitled the Crown to the possession of lands or tenements, goods or chattels, e.g., by reason of an escheat, forfeiture, idiocy, etc. (See INQUISITIO POST MORTEM; INQUISITION.) These officers were of two sorts, either of entitling, or of instruction. An office of entitling (which formerly issued out of Chancery) was used where the Crown did not become entitled to the property until after an office had been taken; thus, if the Crown claimed the land of an idiot, the person had first to be found an idiot by office. The office of instruction (which formerly issued out of the Exchequer) was used in cases where an office was not necessary to entitle the Crown, but merely for the better instruction of the officer before seizure, and to prevent hasty measures being adopted against the subject.

As to the remedy of any person aggrieved by an office found, see TRAVERSE; MONSTRANS DE DROIT; and Crown Suits Act, 1865, s. 52.

The Queen's Remembrancer Act, 1859, s. 25, provides that where the right of re-entry in any hereditaments shall have accrued to the Crown, it may be exercised without office found. This made inquests of office much less usual; the abolition (see ATTAINDER) of forfeiture on conviction of felony still further diminished the number; and the Escheat Procedure Act, 1887 (see ESCHEATOR) made the inquest of office almost entirely obsolete in cases of escheat. See OFFICE FOUND.

Inquiry.—I. In actions in the High Court it frequently happens that certain facts subsidiary to the main question in issue can be conveniently ascertained out of Court by a person appointed or directed to inquire into them. By the Arbitration Act, 1889, s. 13, general power is given to the Court to refer any question in a cause to an official or a special referee for inquiry and report (see ARBITRATION; REFEREE). But in the cases where an inquiry is usually directed, the practice divers according as the action is in the Chancery or the King's Bench Division.

In the Chancery Division an inquiry is usually directed in every action in which, after the Court has pronounced an order, judgment or decree, it becomes necessary to ascertain in detail the facts of the case or the rights of persons interested. In such a case the order, decree, etc., directs an inquiry on those points to be taken in chambers. Thus, in an action for the administration of the estate of an intestate, the administration order almost invariably directs inquiries as to the heir at law, next of kin, real and personal estate, debts, etc., of the deceased; and in an action to restrain the continuance of an injury (e.g., the infringement of a patent), there is commonly an inquiry either as to the amount of damages sustained by the plaintiff, or as to the amount of profits made by the defendant in consequence of the acts complained of. The inquiries are taken before a Master, who investigates the evidence adduced by the parties, and embodies the result in his certificate (q.v., and see ACCOUNT). In the King's Bench Division the procedure by inquiry is used in cases where the plaintiff has obtained judgment by default against the defendant for an unliquidated claim (e.g., for damages), so that it is necessary to ascertain what is due to him; if the amount is substantially a matter of calculation (as in an action for the arrears of an annuity), an inquiry as to the amount is directed to be taken by an officer of the Court (Ord. 36, r. 57); in other cases, a writ of inquiry (q.v.) must issue. See ORDER OF REFERENCE.

II. In lunacy practice an inquiry is the proceeding in which the unsoundness of mind of an alleged lunatic and his incapacity to manage himself and his affairs are investigated (Lunacy Act, 1890, s. 90) by the evidence of witnesses and the personal inspection of the alleged lunatic. The inquiry, which resembles the trial of an action (see TRIAL), is held before a Master in Lunacy (with a jury—see s. 91—if the alleged lunatic demands one), by virtue of the order of the judge in lunacy for inquiry; which is now issued in case of alleged lunacy in lieu of a special commission. But the judge may, under s. 94, direct an issue whether the alleged lunatic is of unsound mind, etc., to be tried in the High Court and the verdict of the jury on such trial has the same force as an inquisition. See COMMISSION; INQUISITION; TRAVERSE.

There are many cases in which the Board of Trade holds inquiries. See, for instance, BOILERS.

As to inquiries under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, see INQUISITION.

Inquiry, Writ of, is one of the modes of assessing damages when interlocutory judgment (e.g., by default in appearance or pleading) has been obtained by the plaintiff in an action for unliquidated damages. It is usually executed by the sheriff or under-sheriff and a jury of twelve, much in the same manner as an ordinary trial. When the damages have been assessed, the writ, return and inquisition are filed and final judgment signed. See Ord. 36, r. 56. See JUDGMENT; REFERENCE.

Inquisitio comitatus Cantabrigiensis. This is a document, probably written before the year 1200, which appears to be a copy of the original returns made as regards the county of Cambridge for the Domesday (q.v.) survey.

Inquisitio Eliensis. This is a record of an inquiry made towards the end of the reign of William the Conqueror into the manner in which the Domesday (q.v.) survery had been conducted as regards the Isle of Ely. The existing document, which is preserved in the British Museum, dates from about the end of the twelfth century. See LIBER ELIENSIS.

Inquisitio geldi. This was an inquest or inquiry made in 1085 by order of William the Conqueror, as to the persons liable to Danegeld (q.v.). No complete copies of the original returns made in the course of the enquiry are known to exist; but the information collected formed the groundwork of Domesday (q.v.), and some of the returns are transcribed in the Exon Domesday (q.v.).

Inquisitio post mortem was an inquest of office (q.v.) held upon the death of a tenant of the Crown to inquire of what lands he died seised, who and of what age was his heir, in order to entitle the Crown to his marriage, wardship, livery, primer seisin, etc. After the abolition of the feudal tenures the inquisitiones post mortem were held to inquire into cases of escheat, forfeiture, etc., of Crown lands, but they have now fallen into disuse, principally owing to the abolition of forfeiture (q.v.).

Inquisition means (i) an inquiry by a jury, held before an officer or commissioner of the Crown; and (ii) a formal document recording the result of the inquiry. The commonest instances of extrajudicial inquisitions at the present day are coroners' inquests and inquisitions to assess the value of land taken by a railway or other company under compulsory powers: these latter are held before the sheriff (or in some cases the coroner) of the county in which the lands are situated (Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, ss. 39-55).

Inquisitions are also held in the course of judicial proceedings, e.g., under writs of elegit (q.v.) and extent (q.v.), and in lunacy. In lunacy, "inquisition" means the same as "inquiry" (q.v.); but it also denotes the formal statement and finding, under the hands and seals of the master and jury (if there was one) before whom the inquiry was held, giving the result of it, e.g., stating (see Lunacy Act, 1890, s. 98) that the alleged lunatic is of unsound mind and incapable of managing himself and his affairs, or incapable of managing himself but capable of managing his affairs, and the lunatic is then called a "lunatic so found."

The proceedings in the course of which the ex officio oath (q.v.) was administered were in effect inquisitions of a stringent nature.

See AD QUOD DAMNUM; INQUEST; INQUEST OF OFFICE; TRAVERSE.

Inquisitor. This term was anciently applied to coroners, sheriffs and other officers empowered to hold inquisitions.

In quo quis delinquit, in eo de jure est puniendus (Co. Litt. 233). (In that in which anyone offends, in that according to law is he to be punished.) And so if a forest officer was guilty of an offence against the forest law he forfeited the office which he held under that law.

In re. (In the matter of.) Used in Chancery and bankruptcy to indicate the particular estate, person or matter to which such proceedings relate.

In re dubiâ magis inficiatio quam affirmatio intelligenda (Godb. 37). (In a doubtful case the negative is rather to be understood than the affirmative.) Compare EI INCUMBIT, etc.

In rem. See IN PERSONAM.

In republicâ maximè conservanda sunt jura belli (2 Inst. 58). (The rights recognised in war should be carefully preserved in the State.) This is cited in connection with the treatment accorded in war to enemy merchants.

In restitutionem, non in pœnam hæres succedit (2 Inst. 198). (The heir succeeds to the restitution, not to the penalty.) The restitution was that enjoined by the Statute of Westminster I., c. 19, and the penalty was that imposed by the same enactment.

Inrolment. See ENROLMENT.

Insanity is not, strictly speaking, a legal term, but it is commonly used to denote that state of mind which prevents a person from knowing right from wrong, and therefore from being responsible for acts which in a sane person would be criminal. Insanity may be total, or partial (where it is confined to certain subjects), or intermittent (where the attacks are separated by lucid intervals), and the question of responsibility depends upon whether the act was done under the influence of insanity or not. The term is also sometimes used with reference to the question whether a person has the mental capacity for entering into a contract, making a will, or the like. See DELUSIONS; LUNATIC.

The word "insane" is used in the verdict which is to be returned by a jury who find that a prisoner committed the act charged, but that he was insane when he committed it (see the Trial of Lunatics Act, 1883, s. 2), and in the verdict which they return if a prisoner is found to be insane when arraigned (see the Criminal Lunatics Act, 1800, s. 2).

A prisoner found by a jury, under the Act of 1800, to be insane when he is arraigned, may be detained under that Act during His Majesty's pleasure; and a prisoner found by a jury to have been insane when he committed the crime may be detained in like manner under the Act of 1883.

The Secretary of State may order that any prisoner be removed from prison to an asylum if (a) he is a prisoner (not under sentence of death) who has been examined at the request of the visiting committee by two medical practitioners and who has been certified by such practitioners to be insane, or if (b) he is a prisoner under sentence of death, whom there is reason to believe insane and who, having been examined at the request of the Secretary by two medical practitioners, has been certified by them to be insane (Criminal Lunatics Act, 1884, s. 2).

Where it is certified by two medical practitioners that any person detained as a criminal lunatic (other than a person found by a jury to have been insane when he committed the crime with which he was charged) is sane, then the Secretary may remit such person to prison "to be dealt with according to law" (Criminal Lunatics Act, 1884, s. 3). The effect of this enactment is that, theoretically, a prisoner who had been sentenced to death may then be executed in pursuance of the sentence; but as a matter of course, the sentence would in such a case be commuted to the sentence of penal servitude for life.

The word "insane" is not used in connection with the non-criminal person of unsound mind, for the care and control of whom provision has been made by the legislature. See LUNATIC; LUNACY.

Insidiatores viarum. The words "insidiatores viarum et depopulatores agrorum" (waylayers and devastators of the country) having come to be used in indictments in order to prevent persons convicted thereon from having benefit of clergy, the statute 4 Hen. 4, c. 2, enacted that such or similar words should not be used and that, if used, they should be without effect.

Insimul computasset. A writ or action of account which was formerly in use.

Insimul tenuit. One of the writs of formedon (q.v.).

Insinuation. In the practice of the prerogative Courts (q.v.) the "insinuation" of a will was the lodging of it with the registrar in order to obtain probate thereof.

Insolvent; Insolvency. A person is said to be insolvent when he is unable to pay all his debts in full; insolvency is the condition of such a person. Generally it results in bankruptcy or arrangement proceedings, or if the person dies before they are taken, his estate may be administered in an action in the Chancery Division.

Formerly when none but traders were included in the bankruptcy law, occasional Acts of Parliament, called Acts of Insolvency, or Insolvent Acts, were frequently passed, "whereby," as Blackstone puts it, "all persons whatsoever, who are either in too low a way of dealing to become bankrupts, or not being in a mercantile state of life are not included within the laws of bankruptcy, are discharged from all suits and imprisonments, upon delivering up all their estate and effects to their creditors upon oath, at the sessions or assizes." Subsequently various statutes were passed, providing for the discharge of persons imprisoned for debts, on their making a cessio bonorum for the benefit of their creditors, and by the Act 53 Geo. 3, c. 102, and subsequent Acts, the principle was made into a system, administered by a Court of record called the Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors. The first step was a petition by the prisoner for his discharge, or a petition by a creditor for the administration of the debtor's property; in either case a vesting order was made, by which all the debtor's property was vested in one or more assignees (see ASSIGNEE), and in due time the prisoner obtained his discharge. (See PROTECTION.) The Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors was abolished and its jurisdiction transferred to the Court of Bankruptcy by the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, which made non-traders subject to the bankruptcy law. See BANKRUPTCY.

In the case of a company, insolvency generally leads to winding up (q.v.).

Inspection. Inspection of documents. When a party to an action, or other proceeding in the High Court, has by his pleadings or by an affidavit of documents admitted that he has in his possession any documents relating to the matters in question between the parties, any other party to the proceeding may give him notice to produce them for inspection (Ord. 31, r. 15). If he fails to comply with the notice, the party requiring production may apply to the judge for an order for inspection (ib., r. 18). See AFFIDAVIT; CONFIDENTIAL COMMUNICATIONS; DISCOVERY; PRIVILEGE; SEALING UP.

Where the application is for the inspection of business books, the judge may, in the first instance, order that verified copies thereof be furnished to the applicant (ib., r. 19A (1)). As to inspection of documents in the County Court, see County Court Rules, Ord. 16, rr. 13-17.

Inspection of property. The High Court may make an order for the detention, preservation, or inspection of any property being the subject of an action, and for that purpose may authorise any person to enter on or into any land or building. (Ord. 50, r. 3; and see TRIAL; VIEW.) Ord. 12, r. 3 of the County Court Rules is to the like effect.

As to the inspection of mines, see BOUNDARIES; BOUNDS.

Inspector. When the members of a partnership have been adjudicated bankrupt, although the separate creditors of each partner have no voice in the choice of a trustee under the joint adjudication, still they could formerly apply to the Court for the appointment of an inspector to protect their interests, e.g., by getting in the separate effects, inspecting books and papers relating to the separate estates, etc. (See JOINT; SEPARATE.) And now (see Bankruptcy Rules, 1915, r. 294) each set of separate creditors may appoint its own committee of inspection (q.v.).

Inspector-General of the Forces. This officer came into existence in 1904. His function is to perform the executive duties of inspection which in theory had up to then been performed by the Commander-in-Chief (q.v.), and to report to the Army Council (q.v.) upon the efficiency of the Army. Subordinate to him are various inspectors of the various branches of the service. He has no voice as to policy. He is also President of the Selection Board which recommends as to appointments and as to promotions to positions higher than that of captain. The office is now vacant or in abeyance.

Inspectors; Inspectorship Deeds. See LETTER OF LICENCE.

Inspeximus is the name given in the old books to an exemplification of letters patent or other record, because it begins with a recital in the name of the Crown that "We have inspected the enrolment of certain letters patent," and then sets it out verbatim. A Constat was a somewhat similar kind of exemplification, beginning with the words "Constat nobis," but was only granted where the party made affidavit that the original was lost. An innotescimus or vidimus was a copy of a charter of feoffment or other instrument not of record granted by the Crown. See EXEMPLIFICATION.

Instalments. Any County Court judgment for not more than £20 exclusive of the costs is, together with the costs, to be paid by instalments if the Court so orders, and any such judgment of whatever amount is also so payable if the plaintiff so consents (County Courts Act, 1888, s. 105). If default be made in payment of the instalments, the whole amount becomes payable (ib., s. 149), but default does not ipso facto involve committal (q.v.): committal for nonpayment of a judgment debt, irrespective of amount, can be obtained only by proceedings under s. 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869.

See further, s. 153 of the County Courts Act, 1888 and the County Court Rules, Ord. 23, rr. 11, 12, 14, 15 (2).

Instance Court. The Admiralty Court (see ADMIRAL), was, as regards its jurisdiction otherwise than in prize (see CAPTURE), known as an Instance Court. The same judge exercised both jurisdictions, but under different commissions.

Instans est finis unius temporis et principium alterius (Co. Litt. 185). (An instant is the end of one period of time, and the beginning of another.) It consequently has no length.

In statu quo. See STATUS QUO.

Instaurum. This was anciently used as meaning, in the narrower sense, the stock of cattle on a farm; or in a wider sense, as meaning (Fleta, lib. 2, c. 27), the cattle and all implements of husbandry on the farm. In another sense it meant the vestments, books, altar plate, etc., of a church.

In stipulationibus cum quæritur quid actum sit verba contra stipulatorem interpretanda sunt (D. 45, 1, 38). (In the construction of contracts words are interpreted against the person using them.) This is a maxim of the civil law setting out the rule under which, in a case of doubt, the construction of the stipulatio was against the stipulator.

Institutes. See COKE; CORPUS JURIS CIVILIS.

Institution, in ecclesiastical law, is the ceremony by which the bishop of a diocese, when a clerk has been presented to him, commits to his charge the care of the souls of the parish: it is a kind of investiture of the spiritual part of the benefice. The bishop could formerly refuse to institute only if the clerk were under twenty-four or not in priest's orders, or because of facts connected with him which would be ground for deprivation. Now the bishop can refuse to institute for any of the reasons specified in s. 2 of the Benefices Act, 1898.

See ADMISSION; COLLATION; INDUCTION; PRESENTATION.

Instroke. See OUTSTROKE.

Instrument. An instrument is a writing, and generally means a writing of a formal nature. But where there is a power to appoint by "any deed or instrument or by will," any writing, such as a letter, which refers to the power, or which can have effect only by operating on the fund (such as a cheque or other order for payment) is an instrument. A telegram is an instrument within the meaning of the Forgery Act, 1913, s. 7 (replacing the Forgery Act, 1861, s. 38) and so also is an envelope with a postmark falsified for the purposes of a betting fraud; the term is, in fact, very comprehensive.

Instrument of Appeal was the document by which, down to 1881, an appeal was brought in a matrimonial cause from the President of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division to the full Court established by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (see ss. 8, 55). It was analogous to a petition. The Judicature Act, 1881, s. 9, substituted the Court of Appeal for the full Court; and the "instrument of appeal" is not used in appeals to the Court of Appeal.

Insufficient. When a person is required to make an answer or affidavit, and makes one which does not in form comply with the requirement, it is said to be insufficient. The word is used in connection with affidavits of documents and answers to interrogatories. Insufficiency differs from incompleteness, for a party may make an affidavit of documents which is in form sufficient and is nevertheless incomplete by the omission of documents which ought to have been included, and vice versâ.

Where an affidavit is insufficient, the opposite party may obtain an order requiring the deponent to make a further one (Ord. 31, r. 11).

Insuper. To "set insuper" in revenue accounts means to charge or debit a sum of money. See the Taxes Management Act, 1880, s. 112.

In the statute 21 Jac. 1, c. 2, s. 8, the word is used as part of the expression to "stand insuper," that is to say, to be carried forward as an unsettled debt.

Insurance is an agreement between two persons (the insurer and the assured) that in consideration of a comparatively small payment (called the premium) by the assured, the insurer will, on a certain event happening during a given time, pay to the assured either an agreed sum or the amount of the loss caused to the assured by the event. (See INTEREST.) The amount of the premium is calculated with reference to the risk incurred by the insurer. (See RISK.) The instrument by which the contract is entered into is called a policy (q.v.). Insurance is a contract uberrimæ fidei (q.v.).

Contracts of insurance are of two kinds, viz., those which are, and those which are not, in the nature of contracts of indemnity.

I. To the first class belong fire and marine (or maritime) insurances. By a fire insurance the insurer, in consideration of a certain premium, paid either in gross (i.e., once for all) or at stated intervals, undertakes to indemnify the assured against damage to his property by fire during a limited portion of time. Fire insurances are sometimes divided into "common," "hazardous," "double hazardous," and insurances of "extraordinary risk," according to the nature of the property insured and the purposes for which it is used. Marine insurance is a contract of indemnity against certain perils or sea risks to which the ship, freight or cargo, and the interests connected therewith, may be exposed during a particular voyage, or a fixed period of time. The insurer in marine insurances is usually either an underwriter (q.v.) or an insurance company. As to the varieties of marine insurances, see POLICY OF ASSURANCE. See also LLOYDS.

Insurances of this class being contracts of indemnity, the assured is only entitled to be paid once, and if he obtains payment of his loss from any other source, he is not entitled to claim against his insurer. Moreover, the insurer, upon paying the loss, is entitled to be put in the place of the assured; therefore if the assured had a claim which he might have enforced in respect of the property (e.g., against a person whose negligence or wrongful act caused the loss), the insurer will thenceforth be entitled to enforce that claim for his own benefit; or if after the insurer paid the assured's claim, the latter receives compensation from other sources, the insurer is entitled to recover from the assured any sum which he may have received in excess of his actual loss. See SUBROGATION.

Double insurance takes place when the same interest and the same risk are insured twice; a second insurance being often necessary where the precise value of the interest is not at first known. But if it appears, when the value of the interest becomes known, that there has been an over-insurance, that is to say, that the sum of the two or more insurances exceeds the interest of the assured, the excess cannot be recovered. And if the same persons insures the same property with two insurers, and it turns out that there has been an over-insurance, then the insurers are entitled to make one another contributor rateably, so that they may all bear the loss in proportion to the amounts for which they have respectively insured the property, instead of the loss being thrown on one.

In addition to fire and marine insurances there are several varieties of insurance belonging to the same class, whose names explain themselves, such as plate-glass and cattle insurance (see CATTLE INSURANCE SOCIETIES), insurance against damage by hail, and burglary insurance.

The law as to marine assurance is codified by the Marine Assurance Act, 1906. See LOST OR NOT LOST. See also P.P.I.; SUING AND LABOURING CLAUSE; ID QUOD COMMUNE EST, ETC.

II. To the second class belong life and accident insurances.

Insurance upon a life is a contract by which the insurer, in consideration of a certain premium, either in a gross sum or by annual payments, undertakes to pay to the person for whose benefit the insurance is made, a certain sum of money or annuity on the death of the person whose life is insured; the latter is sometimes called the cestui que vie or "the life." If the insurance be for the whole life, the insurer undertakes to make the payment whenever the death happens; if otherwise, he undertakes to make it in case the death should happen within a certain period, for which period the insurance is said to be made. The utility of this contract is obvious. A creditor is enabled thereby to secure his debt; an annuitant, the continuance of his income after the grantor's decease; a father, a provision for his family, available in case of his own death. Policies may also form the subject of settlements and mortgages.

An accident insurance is a contract to pay a fixed sum on death resulting from accident, either generally, or limited to accidents of a particular kind, e.g., railway accidents. Some policies also provide for payment of a fixed weekly sum during incapacity caused by an accidental injury.

As to insurable interest, see INTEREST.

The law as to insurances, other than insurance against loss by maritime perils, is consolidated and amended by the Assurance Companies Act, 1909.

See RISK; REINSURANCE; SALVAGE; SUING AND LABOURING; WARRANTY; UBERRIMÆ FIDEI; NATIONAL INSURANCE; ASSURANCE.

Insurance Commissioners; Welsh Insurance Commissioners. The Insurance Commissioners were appointed under s. 57 of the National Insurance Act, 1911, to administer that Act in England: the Welsh Insurance Commissioners were appointed under s. 82 to administer the Act in Wales. The powers and duties of both bodies were transferred to the Minister of Health (q.v.) in 1919.

Insurance Committee. For the purposes of the National Insurance Act, 1911, this means a committee constituted for every county and county borough under s. 59 of that Act. It must consist of not less than forty or more than eighty persons, three-fifths of whom represent the insured persons of the area for which it acts; one-fifth is elected by the county or borough council; and the remaining fifth is made up of medical practitioners and nominees of the Insurance Commissioners (q.v.), or now the Ministry of Health.

Intaker. In the North of England this anciently meant a receiver of stolen cattle: see the statute 9 Hen. 5, st. 1, c. 7.

In-takes are temporary inclosures made by customary tenants of a manor under a special custom authorising them to inclose part of the waste until one or more crops have been raised on it.

Intendment. "Intendment of the law," in the old books, signifies a presumption, and "common intendment" signifies a rule of law or præsumptio juris et de jure. See PRESUMPTION.

Intentio cæca mala (2 Bulst. 179). (A hidden intention is bad): see 5 Rep. 68, where it was decided that effect could not be given to a will containing a latent ambiguity for the explanation of which no evidence was forthcoming.

Intentio inservire debet legibus, non leges intentioni (Co. Litt. 314). (Intention ought to be subservient to the laws; not the laws to intention.) Where Coke quotes this maxim it really means that when anyone does an act it must have the effect which the law attributes to the act rather than the effect which it is intended to have.

Intention. In civil or private law, the general rule is that a person is responsible for the consequences of his acts, whether he intended them or not. Hence if A. in defending himself against B. unintentionally strikes C., he is liable to an action of battery by C. (See BATTERY). In such actions, however, the question of intention is generally taken into consideration by the jury in assessing the damages (see DAMAGES). As to actions of libel, see APOLOGY.

In criminal law, intention is an essential part of every crime or offence. But see IN CRIMINALIBUS SUFFICI, ETC.

See DELUSIONS; DURESS; FRAUD; INSANITY; LUNACY; MALICE; MENS REA; NEGLIGENCE; OVERT ACT; REMOTE; UNDUE INFLUENCE.

Intentione. After the death of a tenant in dower or for life, this writ lay anciently for the remainderman or reversioner against one who had entered on the lands.

Inter arma leges silent. (In war the laws remain silent); that is to say, when a state of war exists the civil law is superseded to such extent as may be necessary.

Inter canem et lupum. Literally, between the dog and the wolf. It actually meant during twilight: see Plac. Trin. 7 Edw. 1.

Intercommon. See COMMON.

Interesse termini ("interest of a term") is the interest which a lessee under a lease at common law has before he enters or takes possession of the land demised. But a term limited to commence immediately by a bargain and sale or other conveyance operating under the Statute of Uses passes an estate without the necessity of entry.

An interesse termini is merely the right to an estate, and therefore can neither prevent nor be the subject of merger.

Interest.—I. In the most general sense of the word, a person is said to have an interest in a thing when he has rights, advantages, duties, liabilities, losses or the like, connected with it, whether present or future, ascertained or potential: provided that the connection, and in the case of potential rights and duties, the possibility, is not too remote. The question of remoteness depends upon the purpose which the interest is to serve.

Interest also signifies, more especially, an advantageous or beneficial interest: thus declarations by deceased persons against their own pecuniary or proprietary interest are receivable in evidence in proceedings between third persons, by exception to the general rule against hearsay evidence.

Interest as applied to property is used in a wide sense to include estates (legal and equitable), charges, easements, profits à prendre licences, equities of redemption, and generally every right in respect of property which entitles or may in future entitle the holder to make use of it in some way, as opposed to bare powers, uses, authorities, possibilities, expectations, rights of presentation and the like. Hence "interest" is used in conveyances, etc., to denote every beneficial right in the property conveyed. In a narrower sense, interest is used as opposed to estate, and therefore denotes rights in property not being estates; e.g., an interesse termini (q.v.): the quasi-reversion of a lord which entitles him to the land on an escheat or forfeiture: the interest which the lord of a manor has in copyhold land between a surrender by the old tenant and the admittance of the new: the interest of executors under a devise of land for the payment of debts: interests resembling estates but not recognised as such by the common law, e.g., executory interests in land (see EXECUTORY INTEREST); and those interests in personalty which closely resemble estates properly so called. The terms "absolute," "limited," "vested," "contingent," "sole," "joint," etc. are applied to interests in the same senses in which they are applied to estates. See ESTATE; TENANT.

"Interest" is used by real property lawyers in several technical senses; thus at one time it may denote certain rights intimately connected with the soil of land, such as commons and other profits à prendre, licences for profit certain, etc., as opposed to "matters of easement and discharge," such as a right of way or a mere authority to enter upon land; while in another sense "interest" is used to denote an exclusive right to land, namely, that arising from ownership, as opposed to rights in alieno solo, such as commons. "Interest" is also opposed to "possession," as when we say that an estate is vested in interest, meaning that the right has accrued, but that the possession is deferred; thus a vested remainder is an estate vested in interest. See ESTATE.

In the law of insurance a person is considered to be interested in property or in the life of a person, when the destruction or injury of the property, or the death of the person, would expose him to pecuniary loss; this is an "insurable interest." Thus a creditor has an insurable interest in the life of his debtor, because if the debtor died his money might be lost; and a shipowner has an insurable interest in the goods on board his ship to the extent of his freight, because if the goods were lost the freight would not be paid; à fortiori of course the owner of the goods has an insurable interest in them. When a person insures for an amount exceeding the value of his interest (as where part only of an insured cargo is put on board) the excess is called short interest, and part of the premium proportionate to the excess is returnable by the underwriter. (See RISK.) A policy of insurance is void if it be on any event, other than a maritime loss (Life Assurance Act, 1774, s. 1), or against loss by maritime perils (Marine Insurance Act, 1906, s. 4), when effected by a person having no insurable interest in the life, house, or ship, etc.; and (Marine Insurance (Gambling Policies) Act, 1909) any person without insurable interest who insures against loss by maritime perils is guilty of an offence punishable upon summary conviction. See P.P.I.

It is a rule of equity that a person cannot maintain a suit or action unless he has an "interest" in the subject of it, that is to say, unless he stands in a sufficiently close relation to it as to give him a right which requires protection or has been infringed, and for the protection or infringement of which he brings the action; and "want of interest" is a ground for a motion to strike out under Ord. 23, r. 4; thus, if a testator bequeaths property in trust for his daughters and their issue, and on their death without issue, in trust for his next of kin, during the daughters' lives the next of kin have only an expectation and not an interest, and cannot maintain an action for the administration of the estate.

So in the law of probate and administration, a person has an interest, for the purpose of obtaining a grant of probate, when he is the executor of the deceased, and, for the purpose of obtaining a grant of letters of administration, when he is a relation, legatee, or creditor of the deceased; for the purpose of opposing a grant of probate or administration any person has an interest whose rights will or may be affected by the proposed grant. When a person has such an interest as to entitle him to a grant in priority to another person, the former is said to have a superior, the latter an inferior interest. An interest action (or cause) is one in which the legal interest of a person in the estate of the deceased is disputed; thus, where a person applying for a grant of probate or administration is stopped by a caveat, he issues a writ of summons against the caveator to have the question whether he is entitled to the grant determined, and (Ord. 20, r. 9) he must allege in his statement of claim that he denies the interest of the caveator.

One person may have an interest in another independently of the question of property. Thus a husband has an interest in his wife (see CONSORTIUM), a guardian in his ward, a master in his servant, and so on. (See RIGHT.) The interest which a guardian in socage had in his ward has been called an interest of honour, as opposed to an interest of profit. Similarly the interest which an executor has in the property vested in him is sometimes called an interest of office. See RIGHT; ESTATE; POSSIBILITY; POSSESSION; ESTOPPEL.

II. Interest also signifies a sum payable in respect of the use of another sum of money, called the principal. Interest is calculated at a rate proportionate to the amount of the principal and to the time during which the non-payment continues; this rate is generally expressed as so much for every hundred pounds (" per centum ") during a year (" per annum "). Thus a contract to pay five per cent. per annum on £1,500 entitles the lender to £75 for every year, £6 5s. for every month, and so on while the loan continues. Interest is considered as accruing from day to day (see APPORTIONMENT), although it is generally payable periodically, e.g., at half-yearly intervals.

Interest is of two kinds, namely, that which is agreed to be paid on a loan, and that payable as damages for the non-payment of a debt or other sum of money on the proper day. Formerly the common law only allowed interest by way of damages where the debt was secured by a bill of exchange, or where a promise to pay interest was implied from a usage of trade or the like. But by the Civil Procedure Act, 1833, s. 28, interest is recoverable on all debts payable by virtue of any written instrument. If no time of payment is fixed, the creditor must give the debtor notice before he can become entitled to claim interest. In equity, interest seems to be allowed as damages in all cases where there has been a wrongful detention of money which ought to have been paid; and in any such case the remedy is to obtain an order for an account with rests (q.v.). A judgment debt bears interest at four per cent. from the date on which the judgment is entered until it is paid (Judgments Act, 1838, s. 17), unless it had been agreed between the parties (as is commonly done in mortgages) that a higher rate should be paid on any judgment which might be recovered (Ord. 42, r. 16). If a person contracted to pay £100 on the 1st January, 1877, with interest at five per cent. per annum in the meantime, and he failed to repay the £100 on the day, the same rate of interest would generally be adopted by a Court or jury as the measure of damages for the delay in payment. If, however, the agreed rate were excessive and extraordinary, such as five per cent. per month, it would not be adopted, and only a reasonable rate, say four or five per cent. per annum, would be allowed as damages. See PENALTY.

Interest is also either simple or compound. Compound interest is where each periodical amount of interest as it becomes payable is added to the principal, so that the next instalment of interest is calculated not only on the principal but also on the interest already accrued.

In the case of loans made on the security of bottomry bonds, etc., the lender, in consideration of the risk incurred, has always been allowed to stipulate for an extraordinary rate of interest, called maritime interest, even when this was an exception from the laws against usury, and this still applies in foreign countries (see USURY); but the Courts can always reduce the interest when manifestly too high; and see now the Moneylenders Act, 1900.

" Interest," in Latin means (1) " it concerns," (2) " it concerns beneficially," " is of advantage " (Dig. ii. 11, fr. 14; x. 4, fr. 19); hence its primary meaning of " right." The word came to mean the payment made for a loan thus—In Roman law when a person brought an action against his debtor for non-payment of a sum of money he claimed, in addition to the debt, id quod interest creditoris solutum esse, that is, the benefit which he lost by the non-payment (Dig. xix. 1, fr. 1), and this was computed by calculating what profit he could have made by lending the money with a stipulation for the payment of a perdiodical sum for the use of it (usuræ, fœnus). Thus the damages for the wrongful detention of money (interest, interesse) became equivalent to the agreed payment for a loan (usuræ, fœnus). The word "interest" seems to have been introduced into England as a substitute for "usury" (q.v.) when that word had acquired a sinister meaning.

Interest, Disqualification for. Any direct interest in the subject-matter of legal proceeding disqualifies anyone for acting in a judicial capacity and will invalidate the proceedings if such person so acts, unless such interest is announced to or known by the parties and they waive the right to object. That is the general principle; but it is subject to statutory variation. Thus in licensing cases (see the Licensing Consolidation Act, 1910, s. 40) persons financially interested in the trade are disqualified from adjudicating, and incur penalties if they adjudicate, but the proceedings are not invalidated merely by reason of the fact that they have adjudicated. On the other hand, a judge (see the Jurisdiction in Rating Act, 1877, is not disqualified from adjudicating in a rating case merely because he will have to pay the rate in question. See also BIAS.

Various Acts relating to local government provide that persons interested in contracts with the bodies elected under those Acts are disqualified from being elected to or acting on such bodies.

Interested Witness. Before the enactment of the Evidence Act, 1843, no person was a competent witness in any legal proceedings in the result of which he was financially interested. That statute removed this disqualification: but parties to the proceedings remained disqualified until the enactment of the Evidence Act, 1851.

Interest reipublicæ ne maleficia remaneant impunita (Jenk. Cent. 31; Wing. Max. 140). (It is a matter of public concern that wrong doings are not left unpunished.)

Interest reipublicæ ne suâ re quis male utatur (6 Rep. 37). (It concerns the State that no one should make a wrongful use of his property.) This maxim is cited in support of the proposition that a lessee cannot commit waste and destruction.

Interest reipublicæ quod homines conserventur (12 Co. 62). (It concerns the State that men be preserved.) Cited by the Court in a case where part of the cargo of a ferry boat had been thrown overboard in order to prevent her from sinking and drowning the passengers.

Interest reipublicæ res judicatas non rescindi (2 Inst. 360). (It concerns the State that judgments be not rescinded.) Coke cites, along with this maxim, the maxim Judicia in, etc. (q.v.), which contains the necessary qualification.

Interest reipublicæ suprema hominum testamenta rata haberi (Co. Litt. 236). (It concerns the State that men's last wills should be deemed valid.) That is to say, effect is given to the intentions of a testator in so far as the law permits.

Interest reipublicæ ut sit finis litium (Co. Litt. 303). (It concerns the State that lawsuits be not protracted.) The law does not encourage litigation. See NEMO DEBET BIS, ETC. and LIMITATION.

Interim Order. An order as to the meantime; an order which is of effect for a limited period. Thus, under Ord. 50, r. 1, the Court may make an order for the preservation or interim custody of the subject-matter of Interim Period. See DENTISTS.

Interlineation. See ALTERATION.

Interlocutory. A proceeding in an action is said to be interlocutory when it is incidental to the principal object of the action, namely, the judgment. Thus, interlocutory applications in an action include all steps taken for the purpose of assisting either party in the prosecution of his case, whether before or after final judgment; or of protecting or otherwise dealing with the subject-matter of the action before the rights of the parties are finally determined; or of executing the judgment when obtained. Such are applications for time to take a step (e.g., to deliver a pleading), for discovery, for an interim injunction, for the appointment of a receiver, for obtaining a garnishee order, etc. So an order giving a plaintiff leave to sign judgment is interlocutory, because he must sign judgment before he can issue execution. The question whether an order is interlocutory is of importance with reference to the time during which it may be appealed against, three weeks being allowed for appeals from interlocutory orders, and (unless the time is enlarged when an order is made or unless the Court of Appeal enlarges the time subsequently) six weeks for all other appeals (Ord. 58, r. 15).

As to interlocutory judgment, see JUDGMENT; DECREE; as to interlocutory injunctions see INJUNCTION.

International Copyright. See COPYRIGHT.

International Law is of two kinds, public and private.

Public international law is the body of rules which control the conduct of independent States in their relations with each other. It is therefore altogether different in its nature from law in the narrower sense of the word, namely, law capable of judicial enforcement, for that implies a force superior to both the litigants or disputants; and as independent States have no recognised common superior, the rules by which their conduct is governed are incapable of enforcement except by war.

With reference to its sources, public international law is sometimes divided into natural and positive,—the natural consisting of those rules which are (or are supposed to be) derived from the law of nature, and the positive consisting of rules based on usage or custom (customary international law), and on agreement (conventional international law).

See BLOCKADE; CONFISCATION; CONTRABAND; DROIT D'ANGARIE; EMBARGO; MUNICIPAL; POSTLIMINIUM; PRE-EMPTION; PRIVATEERS; PRIZE COURTS; REPRISALS; RETORSION; SEARCH; TERRITORIAL.

Private international law is that branch of municipal law which determines before the Courts of what nation a particular action or suit should be brought, and by the law of what nation it should be determined; in other words, it regulates private rights as dependent on a diversity of municipal laws and jurisdictions applicable to the persons, facts, or things in dispute, and the subject of it is hence sometimes called "The Conflict of Laws."

Thus, questions whether a given person owes allegiance to a particular State where he is domiciled, whether his status, property, rights and duties are governed by the lex situs, the lex loci, the lex fori, or the lex domicilii (see those titles), are questions with which private international law has to deal.

Interpleader. When a person is in possession of property in which he claims no interest, but to which two or more other persons lay claim, and he, not knowing to whom he may safely give it up, is sued by one or both, he can compel them to interplead, i.e., to take proceedings between themselves to determine who is entitled to it. Thus, where a seller of goods attempts to stop them in transitu, and the buyer or his assignees contend that he has no right to do so, the wharfinger in whose hands the goods are is liable to an action by each for their delivery. Before the now repealed statute 1 Will. 4, c. 58, popularly known as the Interpleader Act, he must either have defended both actions, or filed a bill in equity (called a bill of interpleader) to compel them to interplead, but under that Act (as extended by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860), as soon as either of them commenced an action against him, he might apply to the Court or a judge, and if there was really a question between the claimants, an order would be made directing it to be tried either by substituting the second claimant as defendant to the action in lieu of the stakeholder, or by a feigned issue or by a special case. In some cases the question might be disposed of summarily.

The Interpleader Act also contained provisions for the relief of sheriffs against conflicting claims to goods taken in execution.

The Statute Law Revision and Civil Procedure Act, 1883, repealed the Interpleader Act and all the sections, except s. 17, of the Act of 1860 which dealt with interpleader; and these repealed enactments are now replaced by R.S.C. Ord. 57, which, together with s. 17 of the Act of 1860, contains without substantial alteration the law as it had existed before 1883. The feigned issue is, however, of course, gone.

Bankruptcy Courts (q.v.) can make interpleader orders under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 105.

Interpleader in the County Court by the high bailiff and by others is regulated by s. 157 of the County Courts Act, 1888, and by Order 27 of the County Court Rules.

In the Mayor's Court (see now MAYORS AND CITY OF LONDON COURT) interpleader by the serjeant-at-mace—corresponding to the sheriff in the High Court or the high bailiff in the County Court—is under the Mayor's Court of London Procedure Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. clvii.), ss. 32-35; and interpleader by others is still regulated by ss. 12-18 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, inasmuch as these sections were made applicable to this Court by an Order in Council of 1879 and still remain applicable to it by virtue of s. 7 of the Statute Law Revision and Civil Procedure Act, 1883, notwithstanding the fact that they, except s. 17, were repealed by the last-mentioned Act.

See PROPRIETATE PROBANDA.

Interpretare et concordare leges legibus est optimus interpretandi modus (8 Rep. 169). (To interpret and to reconcile the laws to laws is the best mode of interpretation.) That is to say, the best interpretation of the laws is that which makes them agree with one another.

Interpretatio chartarum benigne facienda est ut res magis valeat quam pereat. (The construction of deeds is to be made liberally, that the thing may rather avail than perish.) This is another form of BENIGNÆ FACIENDÆ, ETC., and of INTERPRETATIO FIENDA, ETC. (q.v.).

Interpretatio fienda est ut res magis valeat quam pereat (Jenk. Cent. 198). (A document should [where the law permits] be interpreted so that its intention is carried out and not defeated.) Compare BENIGNÆ FACIENDÆ, ETC.

Interpretation Act, 1889. This is the statute 52 & 53 Vict. c. 63. Its full title is "An act for consolidating enactments relating to the construction of Acts of Parliament and for further shortening the language of Acts of Parliament." It repealed all previous Acts on the subject; and it has certainly shortened Acts of Parliament by making it possible to use only a single word when, apart from enactment, very many words would be required. See, for instance, GOVERNORS.

Interpretation Section; Interpretation Clause. In every modern Act of Parliament which is of any length there is a section setting out the meanings which are to be attached to particular words when used in the statute. Thus, the Firearms Act, 1920, s. 12 (see FIREARMS) defines "firearm" and "ammunition" for the purposes of that Act. Such a section is known as the "interpretation section"; and such sections supplement for each particular Act the function performed for Acts in general by the Interpretation Act, 1889.

In deeds a clause setting out the meaning which is to be attached to a particular expression is known as the interpretation clause. Thus, when A and B are trustees of a settlement their names are inserted once only in the instrument creating the trust and after their names is added the words "(hereinafter called the trustees which expression as hereinafter used shall whenever the context so requires or admits include the trustees or trustee for the time being hereof)" or other words to the like effect.

Interrogatories are written questions to be answered on oath. Sometimes the answers are given verbally and taken down in writing, as when a person is examined by interrogatories before an examiner or commissioner, under R.S.C. Ord. 37, r. 1, but more generally the term is used to denote interrogatories delivered, under Ord. 31, by one party to an action for the examination of the opposite party, who is compellable to answer them by affidavit. By this means a plaintiff is enabled in many cases to ascertain whether he has a good cause of action, or obtain admissions in support of his case. See ANSWER; DISCOVERY.

The practice of administering interrogatories is derived from the old practice in Chancery.

As to interrogatories in the County Court, see County Court Rules, Ord. 16, rr. 1-9.

In terrorem. Where there is in a will a gift of personalty to A on condition that he does or does not marry a particular person or that he does not contest the will, but there is no gift over in the event of his failing to comply with the condition, the condition is void and is said to be in terrorem, that is to say, it is a mere futile attempt to frighten the donee. Any such condition will, however, be effectual if there is a gift over. See CONDITION; RESTRAINT OF MARRIAGE.

Interruptio multiplex non tollit præscriptionem semel obtentam (2 Inst. 654). (Frequent interruption does not take away a prescription once acquired.) This is merely a marginal note in Coke. See INTERRUPTION.

Interruption. In the law relating to easements, profits à prendre, franchises and similar rights, interruption is where the continuity of enjoyment of a right is broken. Interruption of the possession is where the right is not enjoyed or exercised continuously; interruption in the right is where the person having or claiming the right ceases the exercise of it in such a manner as to show that he does not claim to be entitled to exercise it. Thus if a person who has for some time used a right of way simply ceases to use it, this is an interruption to the possession; if he asks the permission of the owner of the land before continuing to use the right, this is an interruption in the right, even if he then makes use of the way, because he does so not in exercise of his original right, but by virtue of the permission granted to him by the owner.

Interruption in the right may arise either from the act of the person having or claiming the right, or from the act of the servient owner, or other person, as where an adverse obstruction is erected to prevent the exercise of the right.

Interruption of the possession has no legal effect except as evidence of an interruption in the right. Interruption in the right may prevent the acquisition of a right by prescription, or may cause the acquisition of a qualified right, or may destroy a right which has been acquired. By the Prescription Act, 1832, s. 4, it is provided that no act or other matter shall be deemed to be an interruption so as to prevent the acquisition of a right under the Act unless it shall have been submitted to or acquiesced in for one year after notice.

See ENJOYMENT; DISTURBANCE.

Intertiare. To put into the hands of a third person. In the Anglo-Saxon period when the owner of stolen property claimed it from one to whom it had been sold by the thief, it was usual to hand the property over to a third person pending the decision of the matter. See Leg. Inæ, co. 27, 52; and Leg. Edw. Conf. c. 25.

Compare IN CUSTODIA LEGIS; INTERIM ORDER.

Intervene; Intervener. An intervener is a person who voluntarily interposes in an action or other proceeding in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division with the leave of the Court. Therefore a person who is cited (q.v.) is not an intervener, although sometimes so called.

In divorce practice any person can intervene in a suit for nullity or dissolution by showing cause against a decree nisi (see DECREE); and at any time during the progress of such a suit and before the decree is made absolute, if the King's Proctor suspects that any parties to the suit are or have been acting in collusion for the purpose of obtaining a divorce, he may by leave of the Court intervene in the suit, alleging the collusion, and retain counsel and subpœna witnesses to prove it (Matrimonial Causes Act, 1860, s. 7, Matrimonial Causes Act, 1873, s. 1, and see COLLUSION).

In probate actions (R. S. C. Ord. 12, r. 23) and in admiralty actions in rem (ib. r. 24) any person may intervene who can show that he has an interest in the matter in dispute.

The term "intervene" is sometimes applied to those cases where a person may, by leave of the Court, make himself a defendant in an action by entering an appearance: as (under Ord. 12, r. 25) in an action for the recovery of land. See APPEARANCE.

In testamentis plenius testatoris intentionem scrutamur (3 Bulst. 103). (In the case of wills we bear the intention of the testator more fully in mind.) This is merely the version given by Dodderidge, J., of the maxim (D. 50, 17, 12) In testamentis plenius voluntates testantium (in the case of wills the wishes of those who made the wills are more fully interpreted.)

Intestate. In the strict sense of the word, a person is said to die intestate when he leaves no will: but he is also said to die intestate, wholly or partially, if he leaves a will which does not dispose of his property at all, or only disposes of part of it, so that the whole or a part of it devolves to his heir at law or next of kin according to the rules governing the devolution of intestates' estates: as to which see DESCENT; DISTRIBUTION.

Intimidation. Every person commits a misdemeanour, punishable with a fine of £20 or imprisonment for three months (maximum), who, in order to compel any other person to abstain from doing or to do any act which he has a legal right to do or to abstain from doing, wrongfully uses violence to, or intimidates, him, or his wife or children: see the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, s. 7. This enactment was chiefly directed against outrages by trade-unions (q.v.).

See COMBINATION.

In toto et pars continetur (D. 50, 17, 113). (The part is contained in the whole.) See IN MAJORE, ETC.; MAJUS CONTINET, ETC.

Intoxicating Liquor. "In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires, the expression 'intoxicating liquor' means spirits, wine, beer, porter, cider, perry and sweets, and any fermented, distilled, or spirituous liquor which cannot, according to any law for the time being in force, be legally sold without an excise licence" (Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, s. 110).

See LICENCE (IV.).

In traditionibus scriptorum, non quod dictum est sed quod gestum est inspicitur (9 Rep. 137). (In the delivery of deeds, not what is said but what is done is regarded.) Quoted as the ground of a decision that actual delivery of a deed without the use of any words is a good delivery in law.

Intra vires. An act is said to be intra vires ("within the power") of a person or corporation when it is within the scope of his or its powers or authority. It is the opposite of ultra vires (q.v.).

Intrinsic Service; Servitium intrinsecum. See FORINSECUS.

Introduction. The introduction of a deed consists of the words with which it begins. In an indenture the introduction consists of the words "This Indenture," followed by the word "witnesseth" after the date and parties and the recitals (if any). In a deed poll containing recitals the introduction is "To all to whom these presents shall come, A B of, etc. sends greeting:" followed by the recitals; when a deed poll contains no recitals it begins with the words "Know all men by these presents that I, A B, of, etc." See DEED; PREMISES.

Intruder; Intrusion. Intrusion, in the law of real property, occurs in the following cases:

Where a person (A) dies seised of an estate of inheritance expectant upon an estate for life, and then the tenant for life dies, and before the personal representative (formerly the heir) of A enters on the land, a stranger enters or "intrudes," then such personal representative has an action to recover possession of the land. The old remedy was the writ of entry on intrusion. That writ was abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36. The present remedies are entry or an action for the recovery of the land.

"He that entreth upon any of the king's demesnes and taketh the profits," says Coke, "is said to intrude upon the king's possession." Similarly, if a tenant of Crown land continues in possession after his estate has determined, he is an intruder on the Crown, and not a tenant at sufferance (q.v.), "because," as Coke explains, "there is no laches imputed to the king for not entring." See INFORMATION.

Formerly when an heir in wardship of chivalry ousted his lord by entering on the land during his minority, or if, after attaining majority, he entered on the land without making satisfaction for his lord's right of marriage (q.v.), he was said to intrude into the land and the remedy of the lord was the writ of intrusion de gard.

In ecclesiastical law, intrusion is where a person without ecclesiastical authority takes possession of a benefice while it is full. Several ancient constitutions are directed against this offence.

Intrusion de gard. As to this writ, see INTRUDER.

Intrusione, De. The writ of intrusion, see INTRUDER.

Inutilis labor et sine fructus non est effectus legis (Co. Litt. 127*b*). (The law does nothing which is useless and fruitless.) Compare LEX NIL FRUSTRA, ETC.

Invadiare. To pledge or mortgage [land].

Invadiatus. In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries this was used as meaning one who had given surety for his appearance to answer a pending charge.

Invasio. In the Inquisition of Serjeanties and Knights Fees, which was held in 1212, the titles of some of the claimants were termed invasiones super Regem, that is to say, infringements of the king's rights.

Inventiones. Anciently used as meaning treasure-trove and sometimes also, it would seem, as meaning wreck or flotsam, etc.: thus in a charter of Edward I. he declared that the Barons of the Cinque Ports should have "inventiones suas in mari et in terra," that is to say "what they found in the sea and on the land."

Inventions. See PATENT; SPECIFICATION.

In verbis non verba sed res et ratio quærenda est (Jenk. Cent. 132). (In the interpretation of words one should look rather for the intention of him who used them and for the reason why he used them than for their literal meaning.)

Investiture, in feudal law, was the delivery of corporal possession of land granted by a lord to his tenant. It answered to the more modern livery of seisin (q.v.).

In ecclesiastical law, investiture is one of the formalities by which the election of a bishop is confirmed by the archbishop. As to lay investiture, see that title.

See DIGNITY.

Investment. The securities upon which trustees may invest trust funds are usually enumerated in the settlement or will creating the trust. Independently of such an express power they have a statutory power of investing in the securities specified in the Trustee Act, 1893, s. 1, as extended by the Colonial Stock Act, 1900, s. 2, the Metropolis Water Act, 1902, s. 17 (4), and the Housing (Additional Powers) Act, 1919, s. 9, unless and in so far as such investment is prohibited by the instrument which created the trust.

The securities in which cash under the control or subject to the order of the Supreme Court may be invested are specified in R. S. C. Ord. 22, r. 17. The investment of moneys paid into the County Court is governed by the County Court Acts, 1888, s. 71, as extended by the County Courts (Investment) Act, 1900, s. 1.

Invito beneficium non datur (D. 50, 17, 69). (A benefit is not conferred upon anyone against his consent.) This is a maxim of the Roman law. Compare OMNES LICENTIAM, ETC.

Ipso facto. By the mere fact. See EXCOMMUNICATION.

Irish Free State. See the Irish Free State (Constitution) Act, 1922 (Sess. 2).

Irishmen. Irishmen coming into England were required by the statute 2 Hen. 6, c. 8, to give security for their good behaviour: this enactment, which does not appear to have been enforced, was repealed in 1863.

Irrebuttable. See PRESUMPTION.

Irregular; Irregularity. When a proceeding

(judicial or extra-judicial) is done in the wrong manner, or without the proper formalities, it is said to be irregular or an irregularity—as opposed to a proceeding which is illegal or ultra vires. An irregularity may be waived by the consent or acquiescence of the opposite party or (in the case of judicial proceedings) will generally be allowed by the Court to be set right on payment of the costs occasioned by it (see, as to the Supreme Court, Ord. 70, and, as to the County Court, Ord. 54, r. 24, of the County Court Rules), while a proceeding which is illegal or ultra vires is, as a rule, wholly null and void.

Irremovability is the status of a pauper who cannot be legally removed from the parish or union in which he is receiving relief, notwithstanding that he has not acquired a settlement there; thus under the Poor Law Removal Act, 1846, s. 1, the Poor Law Removal Act, 1861, s. 1, and the Union Chargeability Act, 1865, s. 8, a pauper who has resided in a parish during the whole of the preceding year is irremovable. See POOR LAW; SETTLEMENT; REMOVAL; RESIDENCE.

Irrepleviable; Irreplevisable. See REPLEVIN.

Issuable in pleading signified anciently that which was put in issue by the pleadings, e.g., "a matter of fact issuable," as Coke expresses it. More recently a pleading was said to be issuable when it raised a substantial question of fact or law, a judgment or verdict on which would determine the action on its merits. See ISSUE.

Issuable Terms meant Hilary and Trinity terms, because issues were then joined in the civil causes to be tried at the ensuing assizes. All the four terms were however, in fact, "issuable terms" (although not so called) for causes to be tried in London and Middlesex. See TERM.

Issue.—I. The issue of a person consists of his children, grandchildren, and all other lineal descendants. The word is, however, sometimes used by testators in the sense of "children." See HEIR.

II. "Issues" is the technical name for the profits of land taken in execution under a writ of distringas (q.v.).

III. When the parties to an action have answered one another's pleadings in such a manner that they have arrived at some material point or matter affirmed on one side and denied on the other, and the party whose turn it is to plead adds nothing to his previous pleadings, the parties are said to be "at issue"; the last pleading is called a joinder in issue (see JOINDER), and the question thus raised is called the issue, or one of the issues, in the action. Frequently issue is joined on one question in the case, and the pleadings continue as to the other questions; where the defendant sets up a counter-claim, issue is generally joined on the original claim before it is joined on the counter-claim.

If the pleadings do not succeed in sufficiently defining the issues in dispute between the parties, the judge may direct the parties to prepare issues, that is, to agree upon a written statement containing the questions between them, and, if they differ, the issues are settled by the judge (Ord. 33, r. 1).

The next step is the trial (q.v., and see ACTION).

As to the trial without pleadings of agreed issues, see FACT; and as to the trial of some issues before others, see Ord. 36, r. 7.

Under the old common law practice issues were either of fact or of law, the latter being where there was a joinder in demurrer. Demurrer (q.v.) has been abolished in civil proceedings, and the term "issue in law" is not used. (See QUESTIONS OF LAW.) A "general issue" was a peculiar kind of plea used in cases where the defendant wished to deny all the allegations in the declaration or the principal fact on which it was founded; thus, if an action was brought in respect of a contract or promise, the defendant might plead "that he did not promise as alleged" (see NEGATIVE PREGNANT), or to an action for a tort "that he is not guilty"; most of these general issues had short Latin or Norman names: e.g., "Non assumpsit." "Not guilty" (q.v.) is now the only general issue which can be pleaded. When issue in fact had been joined, all the proceedings in the action from the writ to the award of a jury were set out in a document called the issue, which was delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant, generally endorsed with notice of trial. In equity, joining issue was the mode of bringing on a suit for hearing on replication (q.v.) as opposed to motion for decree (q.v.).

In criminal procedure a prisoner is said to plead the general issue when he pleads "Not guilty" to the indictment. This is done when he intends either to deny or to justify the charge in the indictment; the general issue, therefore, includes defences in the nature of confession and avoidance (q.v. and see PLEA).

IV. A writ, subpœna, or similar document, is said to be issued when it is delivered by the proper officer of the Court to the party at whose instance it is sued out, after having been sealed or otherwise marked to denote its official character.

See PRAECIPE; QUANTUM DAMNIFICATUS.

As used in pleading, the word "issue" occurs at the very commencement of the Year-Books, viz., 1 Edw. 2. In some instances the expression isser d'empler occurs, which may be translated "to get out of," or "finish the pleading," and clearly marks the meaning and derivation of the word issue. In the reign of Edward IV. we find the Latin term thus regularly defined:—"Exitus idem est quod finis, sive determinatio placiti."

Itinerant. See EYRE.

J

Jactitation of Marriage is where a person boasts or gives out that he or she is married to someone, whereby a common reputation of their marriage may ensue; in such a case the person aggrieved may present a petition in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division praying a decree of perpetual silence against the jactitator. These suits are of rare occurrence. If there really has been something in the nature of a marriage, a nullity suit is the more efficacious remedy.

Jactus; Jactura mercium. Jetsam (q.v.).

Jeofail. In the days of oral pleading, which lasted into the fifteenth century, when a pleader perceived any slip in the form of his allegation, he acknowledged his error by the expression j'ay faillé, and thereupon obtained liberty to amend. The statutes passed to prevent formal objections being taken after a certain stage in the proceedings were hence called the Statutes of Amendment and Jeofail. See AID BY VERDICT; ARREST OF JUDGMENT; DEMURRER, as regards mistakes in pleadings, etc.

Jerque; Jerquer. To jerque a vessel was to search her for goods liable to duty, and the jerquer was the customs officer who performed this duty.

Jersey. One of the Channel Islands (q.v.).

Jervis' Acts. The popular title of the Indictable Offences Act, 1848, the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, and the Justices Protection Act, 1848, all of which were introduced by Sir John Jervis, then Attorney-General and afterwards Chief Justice of the Common Pleas.

Jesuits. The Roman Catholic Relief Act, 1829, ss. 28-37, contains provisions directed specially against Jesuits; but these provisions have never been enforced and the only attempt to enforce them was defeated in 1902 by the refusal of a Court of summary jurisdiction to issue a summons and by the refusal of the King's Bench Division to issue a mandamus to the inferior Court: see 86 L. T. 753.

Jetsam, Flotsam and Ligan. Jetsam is where goods are cast into the sea and there sink and remain under water; flotsam is where they continue swimming on the surface of the waves; ligan (or lagan) is where they are sunk in the sea, fastened to a cork or buoy, in order to be found again. In each of these cases the goods belong to the Crown, unless the owner appears to claim them. Jetsam, flotsam and ligan do not fall within the original or common law meaning of "wreck," and therefore do not pass by a royal grant of wreck; but for the purposes of the Merchant Shipping Acts "wreck" includes them. See WRECK.

Jettison is the throwing overboard of goods from necessity to lighten the vessel in a storm, or to prevent capture, or for any other sufficient cause. Jettison is the simplest and oldest instance of general average. See AVERAGE.

Jews. Practically the only disability to which Jews are now subject is inability to present to an ecclesiastical benefice attached to an office in His Majesty's gift (Jews' Relief Act, 1858, s. 4). But where a Jew is the owner of an advowson, he can present to the living. There would appear to be no enactment to the effect that a Jew may not be Lord Chancellor of England. It would further, however, appear that if a Jew were Lord Chancellor, his ex-officio rights of ecclesiastical patronage would devolve upon the Archbishop of Canterbury. See the enactment above cited.

See DOMUS CONVERSORUM; ESCHEATOR; EXCHEQUER OF THE JEWS.

John Doe. See EJECTMENT.

Joinder. Joinder of causes of action. The general rule in actions in the High Court (where the matter is governed by Order 18) is that the plaintiff may unite in the same action several causes of action, subject to separate trials being ordered where they cannot conveniently be tried together; but no cause of action can (unless by leave) be joined with an action for the recovery of land, except claims for mesne profits or arrears of rent, or for breach of contract in respect of the same property; provided however that there may be a joinder of a claim for possession in an action for foreclosure or redemption (Ord. 18, rr. 1, 2). Claims in autre droit cannot, as a rule, be joined with personal claims; as to claims by or against personal representatives see r. 4 of Ord. 18. As to the County Court, see County Court Rules, Ord. 4, which is practically the same as Ord. 18 of the R. S. C.

Joinder of parties:—All persons may be joined as plaintiffs in whom the right to any relief claimed is alleged to exist, whether jointly, severally, or in the alternative; and the same rule applies to the defendants (as to the High Court see R. S. C. Ord. 16, rr. 1-4; and, as to the County Court, see rr. 1, 2 of Ord. 3 of the County Court Rules). See MISJOINDER; NON-JOINDER; PARTY.

Joinder of issue is where one of the parties joins issue upon the previous pleading, or upon certain parts of it; that is to say, where the party whose turn it is to plead denies every material allegation of fact in the previous pleading, or in a specified part of it, without alleging any new facts in support of his case, and thus puts an end to the pleadings, wholly or to a certain extent. In ordinary cases the reply (q.v.) is a simple joinder of issue on the statement of defence. See R. S. C. Ord. 19, r. 18; ISSUE; PLEADINGS; as to the abolished joinder in demurrer, see ISSUE. See also TENDER OF ISSUE.

In proceedings on a writ of error in criminal cases, the joinder of error was a written denial of the errors alleged in the assignment of errors, and was in the name of the Attorney-General or the King's Coroner and Attorney. It was analogous to a joinder of issue in an action. See ERROR.

Joint.—I. As applied to property (other than choses in action), "joint" signifies that it belongs to two or more persons in such a way that on the death of one of them without having disposed of his interest inter vivos, it passes to the survivors, and so on until they have all died but one, who then takes the whole by survivorship. This quality distinguishes a joint ownership from an ownership in common, and also, in the case of land, from the form of ownership known as coparcenary (q.v.) As to the rules relating to joint ownership and ownership in common, see JOINT TENANCY; TENANCY IN COMMON.

II. In the case of bonds, covenants, contracts and other choses in action, when the right of action is vested in two or more persons, so that they must all join in suing upon the bond, etc., then the bond, etc., is said to be joint, as opposed to one which is several, namely, where each of the obligees has a separate interest, and may therefore sue alone. Whether a bond, covenant or the like is joint or several depends much more upon the subject-matter than upon the words employed, for if each of the obligees has a separate interest, the right of action will be several, although expressed to be joint and several. A bond, covenant, or the like, entered into with several obligees, cannot be joint or several at their election, but must be either one or the other. If one obligee releases the obligor, this is sufficient to bar all the obligees; and if one of several joint obligees dies, his interest passes to the survivors. In the case of partners in trade, however, the share of a deceased partner devolves in equity on his personal representatives, and the surviving partners become trustees for them of his share. The same rule applies where two or more persons advance money and take the security to themselves jointly.

A joint ownership of a chose in action cannot be severed at law by either or both of the obligees, but the parties may make a severance which will be binding in equity. See TENANCY IN COMMON.

Two or more persons may be jointly liable to the same debt or demand, and though each is liable for the whole debt, yet they are all considered as together forming one person; they must therefore all be sued together, and a voluntary release to one will discharge them all. (See RELEASE.) On the other hand, if one of them is compelled to pay the whole debt, he is entitled to contribution from the others to the extent of their shares. (See CONTRIBUTION.) On the death of one, his liability passes to the survivors, except in the case of partners, for on the death of a partner his estate remains liable in equity for all partnership debts then existing. Hence it is sometimes said that though a partnership debt is joint at law, in equity it is joint and several: but the rule is only true to the extent above mentioned. A liability may, however, be both joint and several, so that the creditor may sue one or more of the debtors separately, or all of them jointly at his option. And if one of them is compelled to pay the whole debt or more than his proportion, he is entitled to contribution from the others. (See CONTRIBUTION.) If one of them dies, his estate remains liable in the same way that he was. As to the release of such a liability, see RELEASE.

III. In the law of Bankruptcy a receiving order made against a firm operates as if it were a receiving order against each of the partners in the firm (Bankruptcy Rules, 1915, r. 284). When a receiving order has been made against members of a firm, quâ partners, the property of the members which vests in the trustee is divided into two parts, viz., the joint estate, or that of the firm, such as the capital, stock in trade, etc., and the separate estates, consisting of the private property of each partner (see Bankruptcy Rules, 1915, r. 368); and distinct accounts are also kept of the joint or partnership debts, and of the separate debts. This is necessary, because joint creditors (that is, creditors against the firm) are entitled to have their debts paid in full out of the joint estate before the separate creditors (that is, the creditors of each member) can receive anything from the joint estate, while the separate creditors of each partner are entitled to a similar priority of payment out of his separate estate as against the joint creditors (Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 33 (6)). A joint and several creditor is one for whose debt the firm is jointly, and all or some or one of its members are or is also separately, liable. Thus, if A and B are trading in partnership as the firm of A and Company, and a bill of exchange is accepted by A and Company, and indorsed by A, the holder of the bill would, in the event of A and B's bankruptcy, be a joint and several creditor, and therefore entitled to prove against both the joint estate of the firm, and the separate estate of A. See CONVERSION; PROOF.

IV. In the case of land registered under the Land Transfer Act, 1875, "joint proprietors" mean any two or more persons who are registered as being together entitled to land, whether concurrently (e.g., as joint tenants, tenants in common, etc.) or successively (e.g., tenant for life and remainderman) (see s. 69)

Joint Account. The rule that where two or more persons advance money and take the security to themselves jointly, each is in equity deemed to be separately entitled to his proportion of the money, so that on his death it passes to his personal representatives and not to his surviving co-lenders, made it usual, in cases where money was advanced by trustees, to insert in the mortgage deed or other instrument of security a declaration that the money belonged to the lenders on a joint account in equity as well as at law, and that the receipt of the survivors or survivor, or his personal representatives, should be a full discharge for any moneys due on the security. The Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 61, makes it now sufficient to say merely that the money is advanced by the lenders out of money belonging to them on a joint account.

Joint Committee. A standing committee, consisting of equal numbers of justices appointed by quarter sessions and of members of the county council appointed by the council, which deals with the police, the clerk of the peace, clerks of justices, and officers serving both quarter sessions and the council (Local Government Act, 1888, s. 30).

For parliamentary purposes, a joint committee consists of equal numbers of members of each House of Parliament.

Joint Exchequer Board. The Government of Ireland Act, 1914, s. 22, provided that for the purposes of the financial provisions of that Act there should be appointed a board, to be called the Joint Exchequer Board, consisting of two members appointed by the Treasury, two members appointed by the Irish Treasury, and a chairman appointed by the Crown. The Board contemplated by that enactment never came into existence, and the Government of Ireland Act, 1914, was altogether repealed by s. 76 of the Government of Ireland Act, 1920. The latter Act provides by s. 32 that, for the purposes of its financial provisions, there shall be a board, also to be called the Joint Exchequer Board, consisting of two members appointed by the Treasury, one member appointed by the Treasury of Southern Ireland, one member appointed by the Treasury of Northern Ireland, and a chairman appointed by the Crown. But the Act of 1920, although operative as regards Northern Ireland, was always practically waste paper as regards Southern Ireland; as regards the latter area it was superseded provisionally by the Irish Free State Agreement Act, 1922, and finally by the Irish Free State Constitution Act, 1922 (Sess. 2); and the "Irish Free State," which has now replaced "Southern Ireland," is not represented on the Joint Exchequer Board.

Joint Stock Company is a term which was originally applied to those unincorporated companies or large partnerships with transferable shares formed at the beginning of the last century (joint stock companies under the common law), and as to the legality of which doubts were and are entertained. The formation of joint stock companies was legalised and facilitated by various Acts, the first of which was passed in 1825, and the law on the subject has now been codified by the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908. See COMPANY.

Joint Tenancy. An estate in joint tenancy, in the strict sense of the phrase, is created where land or any other tenement is conveyed or given to two or more persons to hold in fee, for life, or other estate. Persons may also be joint tenants by wrong, as where two or more disseise another of any lands or tenements to their own use. (See TITLE.) The term joint tenancy is also applied to personal property, e.g., stock in the funds, although it is not the subject of tenure; hence it is more correct to say that two persons are jointly entitled to stock, or that they have a joint ownership of it. As to choses in action, see JOINT.

When two or more persons are joint tenants of property, they have, with respect to all other persons than themselves, the properties of a single owner. The principal incidents of joint tenancy are as follows:—

Every joint tenant is seised or possessed of the joint property per my et per tout, that is, by every part and by the whole; by this is meant that the possession of each is indivisible, and that each has an equal right, so that no one can claim the exclusive possession of any particular part of the property, though each is entitled to his proportion of the rents or other income. It also follows that one joint tenant cannot convey his interest to his co-tenants in the same way that one stranger conveys to another, and therefore the proper mode of conveyance from one joint tenant to another is by release, operating as an extinguishment of the interest conveyed. (See RELEASE.) Every joint tenancy is created by one and the same title (that is, the same devise or the same conveyance), and at one and the same time; hence if land is limited to A for life, and after his death to the heirs of B and C, and B dies in A's lifetime, and afterwards C dies also in A's lifetime, here B and C's heirs are not joint tenants, because the remainder in one moiety of the land vested in B's heirs, while the remainder in the other was still contingent. But under the Statute of Uses, or by a gift by will, two persons may be joint tenants, although they come to their estates at different times. All the joint tenants must be owners in the same interest and in the same capacity; and, therefore, if land is given to two persons, to the one for life, and the other for years, they are not joint tenants (see ESTATE TAIL). So if land is given to the King and to a subject, they are not joint tenants, because the King is seised in his royal or politic capacity in jure coronæ, while the subject is seised in his natural capacity. But the most important quality of a joint tenancy is that of survivorship; "as if three joyntenants be in fee simple," says Littleton, "and the one hath issue and dieth, yet they which survive shall have the whole tenements, and the issue shall have nothing. And if the second joyntenant hath issue, and dye, yet the third which surviveth shall have the whole tenements to him and to his heires for ever." But any joint tenant may, by disposing of his share during his lifetime (though not by will) to a stranger, sever the joint tenancy, so far as that share is concerned, so that it will henceforth be held by the stranger as tenant in common with the remaining tenant or tenants, who will continue to be joint tenants as between themselves. Joint tenants may also make partition (q.v.).

An exception to the right of survivorship between joint owners occurs in the case of partners in trade, for in this case the law vests in the executors or administrators of a deceased partner the share of the deceased in all personal chattels in possession (such as merchandise or ships) belonging to the partnership. But this rule does not apply to real estate or choses in action, which by law go by survivorship to the surviving partners. In equity, however, the share of the deceased partner in the real estate and choses in action of the partnership devolves on his executor or administrators, and the surviving partners are therefore trustees of it for his executors or administrators. See also JOINT.

The incident of survivorship being inconvenient where persons are beneficially entitled to property, joint tenancy seldom occurs except in the case of trustees; here the incident is useful, for on the decease of one of the trustees the property vests in the survivors by mere operation of law, without devolving on the representatives of the deceased trustee, and without being affected by any testamentary disposition by him.

See ESTATE; JOINT.

Jointress is a woman entitled to a jointure (q.v.).

Jointure.—I. In the ordinary sense of the word, jointure is a provision made by a husband for the support of his wife after his death. It is either legal or equitable.

A legal jointure is, as Coke says (or rather was, for it has long been practically obsolete), "a competent livelihood of freehold for the wife of lands or tenements, etc., to take effect presently in possession or profit after the decease of her husband for the life of the wife at the least," and was given to her either—(1) at common law, in which case it did not bar the wife's dower; or (2) by way of use before the Statute of Uses; or (3) under the provisions of the Statute of Uses—in which case, if the jointure was made in compliance with the Act, it operated so as to bar the wife's dower or put her to her election whether she would take the jointure or the dower, according as the jointure was made before or after the marriage.

An equitable jointure generally consists of a rent-charge or annuity payable by the trustees of a marriage settlement to the wife for her life if she should survive her husband, the rent-charge or annuity being generally secured by powers of distress and entry, and by the limitation of the settled lands to trustees for a long term of years. If the settlement is made by a tenant in tail after attaining twenty-one, and during his father's lifetime, the land is disentailed and resettled on the father and son successively for life, with remainder in tail to the son's issue, with power for the son to charge a jointure rent-charge secured by powers of distress and entry in favour of any wife whom he may marry, and to limit a term for securing it. By a separate deed the son exercises these powers in favour of the lady whom he is about to marry.

The acceptance of an equitable jointure by a wife always operated as a bar to her dower. Since the Dower Act, 1833, the doctrine of a jointure (legal or equitable), operating as a bar to dower, is of no practical importance. See DOWER.

II. Jointure in the time of Littleton also meant joint tenancy. The derivation of jointure in the sense of joint tenancy is obvious. The word acquired its meaning of a provision for a wife after her husband's death from the practice of making a provision for a wife by limiting a "jointure" or estate in joint tenancy to her and her husband before marriage, so that the estate would pass to the survivor.

Journals of Parliament. The records made in the House of Lords and the House of Commons of business done, but not of speeches made. Those of the House of Lords date from 1509, and those of the House of Commons from 1547. The journals of the House of Lords, but not those of the House of Commons, are public records (q.v.). Copies of either of the journals which purport to be printed by the printer to the Crown or to either House of Parliament are admissible as evidence (Evidence Act, 1845, s. 3). Forgery, with intent to deceive or defraud, of either journal is felony (Forgery Act, 1913, s. 3 (3) (g)).

Journey-hopper. There never was any such person. The statute 8 Hen. 6, c. 5, speaks of "les regratours du-file appelles yern-choppers" (the regrators (q.v.) of Yarn called Yerne choppers). Yernchoppers became "Journey-Choppers" in Cowell (1727), "Journ-Choppers" in Jacob (1739), and in a law dictionary of recent date it is "Journey-Hoppers."

Journey's Accounts. Formerly, when a writ abated (see ABATEMENT OF CIVIL PROCEEDINGS) the plaintiff was entitled to have a new writ "By Journey's Accounts," that is to say, within as little time as possible after the abatement. Fifteen days was the usual time.

Judex æquitatem semper spectare debet (Jenk. Cent. 45). (A judge ought always to bear equity in mind.)

Judex est lex loquens (7 Rep. 4). (The judge is the mouthpiece of the law.)

Judex non reddit plus quam quod petens ipse requirit (2 Inst. 286). (A judge does not give more than that for which the plaintiff asks.) This was said in connection with the fact that in real actions the plaintiff could not demand, and the Court could not award, damages. If a jury assess damages in excess of those claimed the Court may, under Order 28, r. 1, permit the statement of claim to be amended and may then enter judgment for the full amount given by the jury.

Judge. A judge is an officer of the Crown who sits to administer justice according to law. Judges are divided into judges of record, not of record, superior and inferior judges, etc. in the same way as the Courts of which they are members. See COURT; CHAMBERS; JUSTICE.

No action will lie against a judge of record for any act done by him in the exercise of his judicial functions; and even inferior justices, and those not of record, cannot be called in question for an error in judgment, so long as they act within the bounds of their jurisdiction. If, however, a judge not of record exceeds his jurisdiction, he is liable to an action by the injured party. See CORAM NON JUDICE; PUBLIC AUTHORITIES.

As to the removal of judges, see DUM BENE SE GESSERIT.

Judge Advocate General is the adviser of the Secretary of State for War in reference to courts martial and other matters of military law. Before 1793 he was the secretary and legal adviser of the board of general officers through whom the King governed the Army. When the office of Commander-in-Chief was created in 1793, the Judge Advocate General ceased to exercise the functions of a secretary, but he was the principal legal adviser of the Commander-in-Chief. He was a member of Parliament, and one of the Ministry for the time being down to 1892. The office was then conferred on the President for the time being of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division, who, however, acted mainly through two deputies, a legal and a military Judge Advocate General, whom he was empowered to appoint. In 1905 this arrangement ended and there was created, as part of the War Office, the department of the Judge Advocate General, with a permanent Deputy Judge Advocate General; and this department now advises as to whether the sentences of courts martial, other than those held in India, should be confirmed.

The Judge Advocate General can appoint an officiating judge-advocate to act at courts martial, other than those in India. This officer is practically a clerk of the Court and legal adviser to the court martial, whom he keeps right on matters of law and procedure.

Judge Advocate of the Fleet. This was an officer of the old Court of the Lord High Admiral. There was another officer known as the Counsel to the Admiralty. The two offices were united at the commencement of the reign of Queen Victoria. The holder of the combined offices occupies a position somewhat similar to that of the Judge Advocate General, except that the sentences of naval courts martial are referred to him only when the Admiralty sees fit.

Occasionally the Judge Advocate of the Fleet, but more usually a Deputy Judge Advocate, acts, when the proper naval authority so requires, at naval courts martial; and when he acts his functions are similar to those of an officiating Judge Advocate (q.v.) at military courts martial.

Judge Ordinary. By the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, s. 9, the judge of the Court of Probate was made judge of the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes created by that Act, under the name of the Judge Ordinary; he was in effect judge of first instance in all matters within the jurisdiction of the Court. By the Judicature Acts, which transferred the jurisdiction of the Court to the High Court of Justice, the Judge Ordinary was made President of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division of the High Court, and is now so called. See COURT FOR DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.

Judge's Notes. When evidence is given viva voce on the trial of an action, the judge usually takes notes of the evidence, which are used when it becomes a question what the evidence was, e.g., on a motion for a new trial, or an appeal. The judge is not bound in civil cases either to take notes or to allow them to be used, although in practice he does both; but in criminal cases he must do both the one and the other, for on an appeal in any such case the notes made by the judge of the Court of trial must be furnished to the Court of Criminal Appeal (Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, s. 8; Criminal Appeal Rules, 1908, r. 14), and the Court of Criminal Appeal may order their production (Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, s. 9 (a)).

As to notes of a County Court judge in civil cases, see ss. 120, 121 of the County Courts Act, 1888.

Judgment is the decision or sentence of a Court on the main question in a proceeding, or on one of the questions, if there are several. The judgment so pronounced is entered on the records of the Court (see RECORD; ENTER). The term "judgment," however, is also used to denote the reasons which the Court gives for its decision; so that where the Court consists of several judges it may and often does happen that each judge gives a separate judgment or statement of his reasons, although there can be only one judgment of the Court in the technical sense of the word. These judgments are reported as authorities in important cases. (See REPORTS.)

In civil actions, judgments (in the technical sense) are of the following kinds:—

With regard to their conclusive effect, judgments are of two kinds, in rem and in personam (see IN PERSONAM). A judgment in rem is an adjudication pronounced upon the status of some particular subject-matter by a tribunal having competent authority for that purpose. Such an adjudication being a solemn declaration from the proper and accredited quarter that the status of the thing adjudicated upon is as declared, it precludes all persons from saying that the status of the thing or person adjudicated upon was not such as declared by the adjudication. Thus the revenue side of the King's Bench Division having in certain revenue cases a right to condemn goods, its judgment is conclusive against all the world that the goods so condemned were liable to seizure. So a declaration of legitimacy and (it would seem) a judgment of outlawry are in effect judgments in rem. A judgment of divorce pronounced by a foreign Court is in certain cases recognised by English Courts, and is then a judgment in rem. (See DIVORCE.)

A judgment in personam is more accurately called a judgment inter partes, for an adjudication upon the status of a particular person (as in the cases mentioned above) is as much a judgment in rem as an adjudication on the status of a thing. Judgments in personam are those which bind only those who are parties or privies to them; as in an ordinary action of contract or tort, where a judgment given against A cannot be binding on B unless he or someone under whom he claims was party to it.

A final judgment is one which puts an end to the action by declaring that the plaintiff has or has not entitled himself to the remedy he sued for, so that nothing remains to be done but to execute the judgment. Thus, if the plaintiff in an action for damages obtains judgment for £500 damages and costs, the judgment is final.

An interlocutory judgment is one which does not terminate the action, because it is not complete and definite. Thus, if judgment by default is signed against the defendant in an action for damages, it is an interlocutory one, because the amount of the damages has to be assessed, after which final judgment is signed (see INQUIRY); so judgment in a Chancery action for administration or account is in general interlocutory, because the accounts and inquiries remain to be taken and made See FURTHER CONSIDERATION.

A judgment on the merits is where the case has been argued and the Court has decided which party is in the right; such a judgment is given after trial (q.v.); and see MOTION FOR JUDGMENT; VERDICT.

A judgment is not given on the merits when it is founded on some technical rule of procedure; the following are the principal instances:—

Judgment by default is obtained when one party neglects to take a certain step in the action within the proper time, and the judgment so obtained is described by a name indicating the step which ought to have been taken, e.g., judgment in default of appearance (see R. S. C. Ord. 13), judgment in default of delivery of defence (see Ord. 27), etc. Judgment of nonsuit was where the plaintiff failed to appear on the trial, or abandoned the action. See NONSUIT; DISCONTINUANCE.

Judgment by judge's order is obtained either by consent, or on failure by the defendant to satisfy the judge that he has a good or primâ facie defence to an action for a liquidated demand (see Ord. 14). To obtain this latter kind, commonly called "judgment under Order 14," the plaintiff takes out a summons supported by an affidavit verifying the cause of action, and stating that he believes the defendant has no defence. If the defendant fails to satisfy the judge that he ought to be allowed to defend the action (see MERITS), the judge either orders judgment to be signed, or allows him to defend on paying the money into Court or giving security. The writ must be specially indorsed. See WRIT OF SUMMONS.

The following kinds of judgment are or were peculiar to the Court of King's Bench or King's Bench Division; some of them are rare in practice, and some are entirely obsolete:—

Judgment by confession is where a defendant gives the plaintiff a cognovit or written confession of the action, by virtue of which the plaintiff signs judgment. (See COGNOVIT.) Where, in an action against several persons for a joint tort, the jury by mistake severed the damages by giving heavier damages against one defendant than against the others, the plaintiff might cure the defect by taking judgment for the greater damages (de melioribus damnis) against that defendant and entering a nolle prosequi (q.v.) against the others. Judgment of assets in futuro or quando acciderint (shortly "judgment quando"); if a personal representative is sued for a debt of a deceased person and pleads plene administravit (q.v.) or a real representative is sued and pleads riens per descent, the plaintiff in his reply may confess the truth of the plea and pray judgment of assets in futuro; or if a real or a personal representative pleads plene administravit prætər, the plaintiff may have immediate judgment of the assets acknowledged to be in the hands of the defendant, and of assets in futuro for the residue (see Ord. 32, r. 6). A judgment of assets quando acciderint, or in futuro, is one to be levied when assets shall come to the hands of the real or personal representative. (See SCIRE FACIAS.) Executions under a judgment in futuro can be levied only by leave of the Court or a judge (Ord. 42, r. 23).

If a real or personal representative pleads any other defence and fails, the judgment is usually special, viz., that the debt be levied of the goods or land of the deceased as the case may be; but if he pleads a defence which is false to his own knowledge (e.g., ne unques executor or riens per descent) then the judgment may be general, viz., that the debt be levied as if the action had been brought against him for his own debt.

In the Chancery Division judgments are generally known by names indicating their objects. Thus a judgment directing an account to be taken is called a judgment for an account, and a judgment entitling a mortgagor to redeem the mortgaged property is a judgment for redemption. In an action against a mortgagor, the judgment may be both a personal judgment directing the defendant to pay the mortgage debt, and a foreclosure judgment, or judgment of sale, enabling the plaintiff to foreclose or sell the mortgaged property on default in payment (see infra). Judgment against the separate estate of a married woman on a covenant entered into by her is in a special form. See R. S. C., App. F., Forms 1A, 1B, 1E, 1F.

A judgment is enforced by execution against the person or property of the party against whom it is given. (See EXECUTION.) Formerly a judgment for the payment of money operated as a charge upon all the lands, tenements, and hereditaments of the person against whom it was entered up, in the same way as if he had charged them by writing under his hand. Provision was made for registration of such judgments. (See REGISTRATION.) No judgment entered up after the 29th July, 1864, affected any land until it had been actually delivered in execution; the writ was registered in the name of the debtor (Judgments Act, 1864, s. 1). Now, under s. 2 of the Land Charges Act, 1900, no judgment operates as a charge on land unless a writ or order for enforcing it has been registered as mentioned in that section; and this applies also to recognizances.

A judgment may in some cases be enforced in other Courts than that in which it was originally given; thus, under the County Courts Act, 1888, s. 151, a judgment of a County Court may in certain cases be removed into the High Court of Justice, and then execution may be issued as if it had been a judgment of the High Court; and under s. 158 of the same Act a judgment obtained in one County Court district may be enforced in any other such district. A County Court may (under the Debtors Act, 1869 (q.v.)), in a proper case, commit a debtor to prison for non-payment of a sum due under a judgment of the High Court. By the Judgments Extension Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 34), a judgment obtained in a superior Court of England, Scotland, or Ireland, may be registered in a superior Court of either of the other two countries, and then has the same effect as if it had been originally obtained in the latter Court. This is done for the purpose of issuing execution in England on a judgment obtained in Scotland or Ireland, and vice versâ: but the position as regards the Irish Free State is at present unsettled.

A judgment may in some cases be transferred from one person to another; thus where, in a foreclosure action against the mortgagor of land, whose equity of redemption had been purchased by a third person, personal judgment for the mortgage debt was given against the mortgagor, and a foreclosure judgment was given against the mortgagor and his purchaser, it was ordered that, in the event of the purchaser redeeming the mortgage, the mortgagee (the plaintiff) should transfer to him the benefit of the personal judgment against the mortgagor, and that he should be at liberty to enforce it in the name of the plaintiff upon indemnifying him against his costs and expenses. As to assigning judgments to sureties, see SURETY.

In some cases a judgment may give rise to a fresh cause of action. Thus, if it becomes necessary to enforce a judgment against persons who have succeeded to the liability of the original defendants, an action must be brought for that purpose. So an action may be brought to set aside a judgment obtained by fraud. At common law, every judgment for payment of a sum of money creates a debt on which the successful party may bring an action, and in some cases he could not enforce it in any other way, e.g., if he had allowed a year and a day to elapse without issuing execution; but such a proceeding was never favoured if there was another remedy for enforcing the judgment. The statute 13 Edw. 1, c. 45, enabled a plaintiff to bring a scire facias (q.v.) on his judgment after a year and a day. And to discourage unnecessary actions on judgments, the statute 43 Geo. 3, c. 46, directed that the plaintiff should not be entitled to costs, except by special order of the Court. Under the modern practice, execution may be issued as of right within six years from the judgment, and by leave of the Court at any time afterwards (see R. S. C., Ord. 42, r. 23), without bringing an action on the judgment, and such actions therefore appear to be practically obsolete. An action cannot be brought upon a County Court judgment which has been removed into the High Court (County Courts Act, 1888, s. 151).

A judgment given in personam for an ascertained sum by a foreign Court of competent jurisdiction is considered in England as primâ facie evidence of the defendant's liability to pay the amount to the plaintiff, and may therefore be the subject of an action in the English Courts. So if A brings proceedings against B in a foreign country and fails, and then sues B for the same cause of action in an English Court, B may defeat the second action by pleading the foreign judgment as res judicata. In the latter case the judgment is conclusive. Where, however, an action is brought here to enforce a foreign judgment, it seems that our Courts will so far examine into it that if the proceedings by which it was obtained, or the law on which it is founded, are "repugnant to natural justice," or contrary to some principle of morality or public policy recognized by English law, our Courts will refuse to enforce it. As to proof of a foreign judgment, see the Evidence Act, 1851, s. 7.

In criminal proceedings, the judgment is the sentence of the Court on the verdict of the petty jury, or on the prisoner pleading guilty to the indictment. Where the jury acquits the prisoner, the judgment is that he be discharged of the premises; if he pleads guilty or is convicted the judgment declares the punishment which he has to suffer; e.g., death, imprisonment, fine, etc.

Judgment Creditor; Judgment Debtor; Judgment Debts. See COMMITTAL; DEBT; DEBTORS ACT, 1869.

Judgment-debtor Summons. This is quite distinct from a judgment summons (q.v.). It was a process issued by a judgment creditor under the repealed Bankruptcy Act, 1861, against a judgment debtor who in default of payment might be adjudged bankrupt. The present equivalent is a bankruptcy notice (q.v.).

Judgment Summons. The process used to procure the committal (q.v.) of a judgment debtor.

Judicatores terrarum. Anciently these were officials in the County Palatine of Chester who performed certain duties in connection with writs of error out of Chancery.

Judicature Acts. See CENTRAL OFFICE; COURT OF APPEAL; SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE.

Judices non tenentur exprimere causam sententiæ suæ (Jenk. Cent. 75). (Judges are not bound to explain the reason of their decision.)

Judicia in curia regis reddita non adnihilentur, sed stent in suo robore, quousque per error aut attinotam adnullentur (2 Inst. 360). (Judgments given in the King's Court are not to be made as nothing, but are to remain in full force until such time as they are reversed upon error or attaint.) In Coke's time error and attaint were the only means of reviewing a judgment of a Court or a verdict of a jury. The various appellate tribunals of modern times are within the spirit of the maxim; and arbitrary and capricious departmental interference with the decisions of the Courts is essentially the very thing at which the maxim is aimed.

Judicia in deliberationibus crebro maturescunt, in accelerato processu nunquam (3 Inst. 210). (Judgments frequently become ripe as the result of deliberation, but never when they are delivered in a hurry.)

Judicial. See EXTRAJUDICIAL; REMEDY; WRIT.

Judicial Authority. For the purposes of the Lunacy Acts, 1890 to 1908, this expression means a justice appointed to exercise the powers conferred on "a judicial authority" under these Acts, or a County Court judge (Lunacy Act, 1890, ss. 9, 10). See RECEPTION ORDER.

Judicial Commissioners. These are quasi-judicial bodies with power to give decisions binding in law. They are the Railway and Canal Commissioners (q.v.), the Income Tax Commissioners (q.v.), the Land Tax Commissioners (q.v.), the Commissioners of Sewers (see SEWER) and, as regards the incidence of tithe rent-charge, the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries (q.v.) under the various Tithe Acts.

Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was created by the Judicial Committee Act, 1833, for the purpose of hearing all appeals or complaints in the nature of appeals which before the passing of the Act could be brought before the King or the King in Council, and also certain other appeals, which were, as the result of many subsequent enactments, previously heard by other tribunals.

The Judicial Committee now consists of the President and ex-Presidents of the Privy Council, the Lord Chancellor, the six Lords of Appeal in Ordinary, such other members of the Privy Council as have been or are Lords of Appeal in Ordinary, judges of the Supreme Courts of England or Ireland or of the Court of Session in Scotland, and not more than seven judges or ex-judges of the superior Courts of the self-governing colonies, or of any other British possession fixed by Order in Council, who are Privy Councillors, and not more than two judges or ex-judges of any High Court in India who are Privy Councillors and whom the King may nominate.

The following are the principal matters in which the Judicial Committee has jurisdiction.

(i) Appeals from Courts in the colonies or dependencies of the United Kingdom, such as India, the Irish Free State, Canada, Australia, the Channel Islands, etc. In general the right to appeal is limited to cases involving a certain minimum value, unless special leave to appeal is obtained.

(ii) Complaints of amotion from office. See AMOTION.

(iii) Ecclesiastical appeals. (See ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS.) The archbishops and bishops act as assessors on such appeals.

(iv) Appeals in certain Admiralty matters; most Admiralty appeals now go to the Court of Appeal.

(v) Appeals under s. 4 of the Copyright Act, 1911, against the refusal of the owner of the copyright in the work of a deceased person to republish or permit republication.

(vi) Appeals against schemes relating to the endowments of an endowed school.

The jurisdiction which the Committee formerly had in lunacy and as to the confirmation and extension of patents has been taken away.

The Committee sits in the Council Chamber at Whitehall. Appeals are argued before it as they are before a Court. But the Committee is not a Court. It makes a "report" to the King advising that the appeal should be allowed or disallowed as the case may be: dissenting opinions are not disclosed, and there is nothing to show whether the decision is unanimous or otherwise.

Under the Government of Ireland Act, 1920, s. 52, an appeal lies to the Judicial Committee from any decision of the Joint Exchequer Board (q.v.) which involves a question of law. This now applies only to Northern Ireland. See REFERENCE.

Judicial Oath. This expression sometimes means an oath (q.v.) taken in the course of a proceeding before a Court, judge or justice; but it generally means the form of oath set out in s. 4 of the Promissory Oaths Act, 1868, which all judges and justices of the peace must, under s. 6 of that Act, take after acceptance of office.

Judicial Proceeding. See PERJURY.

Judicial Separation. A decree of judicial separation may be pronounced by the High Court in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division on the petition of either husband or wife (1) in all cases in which a divorce a mensâ et thoro (q.v.) might have been obtained in the Ecclesiastical Courts, and (2) on the ground of either adultery or cruelty, or desertion without reasonable cause for two years or upwards (Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, ss. 7, 16); and a judge of assize has (see DIVORCE COURT) like jurisdiction as regards certain prescribed classes of causes. The decree has the same effect as a divorce a mensâ et thoro had, that is to say, it does not affect the marriage, but it puts an end to cohabitation, and places the wife in the position of a feme sole as regards her capacity of acquiring property etc. (ib. s. 25), but in view of the Married Women's Property Act this latter effect is not of much importance now. See ALIMONY; PROTECTION ORDER; SETTLEMENT; DESERTION; SEPARATION ORDER.

Judicial Trustee. This is a trustee appointed by the Court under the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896, and the Rules made thereunder. He may be appointed either as sole trustee or as co-trustee on the application of a person creating or intending to create a trust, or of a trustee, or of a beneficiary: he acts under the directions of the Court and is remunerated as the Court may direct; and his accounts are audited annually under the direction of the Court (s. 1). Comparatively little use has been made of the Act, the judicial trustee being for practical purposes replaced by the Public Trustee (q.v.).

Judicia suum effectum habere debent (2 Inst. 341). (Judgments ought each to produce an effect.) That is to say, no Court ought to pronounce a judgment which will go forth without respect and return without effect. Compare JUDICIUM NON DEBET, ETC.

Judici officium suum excedenti non paretur (Jenk. Cent. 139). (Effect is not given to the decision of a judge delivered in excess of his jurisdiction.) As regards inferior Courts an order made in excess of jurisdiction may be quashed on certiorari. Compare JUDICIUM A NON, ETC.

Judicis est jus dicere, non dare (Lofft, 42). (It is for the judge to declare the existing law and not to make new law.) Compare OMNIS INNOVATIO, ETC.

Judicis officium est opus diei in die suo perficere (2 Inst. 256). (It is the duty of a judge to finish the work of each day within that day.) This is cited only in connection with the Statute of Westminster I. c. 46, which enacted that the justices of the King's Bench should dispose of pleas determinable on any one day before taking up those determinable on the next day.

Judicis officium est ut res ita tempora rerum quærere, quæsito tempore tutus eris (Co. Litt. 171). (It is the duty of a judge to inquire as well into the time of things as into things themselves; by inquiring into the time you will be safe.) This was cited merely in connection with the question whether in a case of partition by coparceners the share taken by each was of equal yearly value at the time of the partition.

Judicium a non suo judice datum nullius est momenti (10 Rep. 76). (A judgment pronounced without jurisdiction has no effect in the law.) The maxim is cited by Coke as embodying the principle that such a judgment is of no greater legal effect than if the words contained in it were uttered by any stranger. Compare JUDICI OFFICIUM, ETC.

Judicium Dei. The judgment of God, that is to say, trial by ordeal, the result of which was popularly supposed to express the judgment of God.

Judicium non debet esse illusorium (2 Inst. 341). (A judgment ought not to be illusory.) Compare JUDICIA SUM, ETC.

Judicium pilorie. (The judgment of the pillory.) An enactment printed under these titles in the Statutes of the Realm (Vol. 1, p. 201), s.v. Statutes of Uncertain Date, and in the Statutes at Large, as 51 Hen. 3, st. 6.

Judicium semper pro veritate accipitur (2 Inst. 380). (A judgment (once given) is accepted as right—until, of course, it is reversed or set aside.) Compare NEMO POTEST CONTRA, ETC.

Jugum terræ. A "yoke of land." It was half a plough-land (q.v.).

Junior. The expression "junior barrister" (or "junior") means any barrister who is not a King's Counsel.

Junior Right. The right of some person other than an eldest son to inherit freehold. See GAVELKIND; BOROUGH ENGLISH; ASSART-LAND; BOND-LAND; COTMAN-LAND; FARTHING-LAND.

Jura ecclesiastica limitata infra limites separatas (3 Buls. 53). (Ecclesiastical laws are limited within separate bounds.) This maxim is quoted from Bracton by Coke, L.C.J., in the course of a judgment.

Jura eodem modo destituuntur quo constituuntur (2 Dwarr. Stat. 672). (Laws are abrogated by the same means by which they were made.) It is in general the rule that a statute remains in force until it is repealed by another statute, but in 1902 the King's Bench Division virtually decided that s. 34 of the Roman Catholic Relief Act, 1829, had become abrogated by non-user: see R. v. Kennedy (1902), 86 L. T. 753. Compare EODEM MODO, ETC.

Juramentum episcoporum; Juramentum escætorum; Juramentum majorum et ballivorum. These are respectively the Oath of the Bishops, the Oath of Excheators, and the Oath of Mayors and Bailiffs. All these are printed in the Statutes of the Realm (Vol. 1. p. 249) among the Statutes of Uncertain Date. None of them are in the Statutes at Large.

Juramentum est indivisibile, et non est admittendum in parte verum et in parte falsum (4 Inst. 279). (An oath is indivisible, and is not to be received as partly true and partly false.) Compare FALSUS IN UNO, ETC.

Jura natura sunt immutabilia (Hob. 87). Hobart, C.J., cites this maxim as an authority for the proposition that "an Act of Parliament made against natural equity. . . is void in itself": but he spoke in 1614, and things have changed since then.

Jura publica anteferenda privatis (Co. Litt. 130). (Public rights are to be preferred to private.) Compare IN CASU, ETC., and SALUS POPULI, ETC.

Jura publica ex privato promiscue decidi non debent (Co. Litt. 181*b*). (Public rights ought not to be decided obiter in connection with a private transaction.) An almost identical maxim is at Co. Litt. 130.

Jurare est Deum in testem vocare, et est actus divini cultus (3 Inst. 165). (To swear is to call God to witness, and is an act of Divine worship.) Compare NON EST ARCTIUS, ETC.

Jura regalia. (Sovereign rights.) Such rights, including full criminal jurisdiction, were exercised under royal grant by the Lords Marchers (q.v.). In other cases they had been assumed without such grant by various great feudal lords during the two hundred years succeeding the Conquest; and in 1274 Edward I. proceeded to attack this usurped jurisdiction (see HUNDRED ROLLS). See COUNTY PALATINE; REGALIA; SERVITIUM.

Jura regis specialia non conceduntur per generalia verba (Jenk. Cent. 103). (No special rights are given to the king by general words.)

Jura sanguinis nullo jure civili dirimi possunt (D. 50, 17, 8; Bac. Max. reg. 11). (The rights of blood cannot be destroyed by any right arising out of the law.) This maxim is cited by Bacon in connection with questions as to the effect of attainder.

Jurat is a memorandum written at the end of an affidavit, stating the place where, and the date when, the affidavit was sworn, followed by the signature of the commissioner or other person before whom it was sworn and concluding with his description (R.S.C., Ord. 38, r. 5).

In the Cinque Ports (q.v.) a jurat was a municipal officer resembling the modern alderman. The name, as well as that of "bailiff" (another municipal officer of the Cinque Ports who was of higher rank than the jurat) appears to have been borrowed from the legal system of the Channel Islands. See LAST-COURT.

Jurata. See ASSISA VESTITUR. The Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 104, enacted with reference to juries and jury process that the entry jurata ponitur in respectu should no longer be used.

Jurato creditur in judicio (3 Inst. 79). (In a trial credit is given to such statements as are made on oath.) This means merely that statements, if they are to be believed at all, must be made on oath. The maxim is quoted by Coke in connection with the statute 1 Jac. 1, c. 4, s. 6, which provided that in certain cases of felony the witnesses for the accused might be sworn.

Juratores debent esse vicini, sufficientes, et minus suspecti (Jenk. Cent. 141). (Jurors ought to be neighbours of sufficient estate, and above suspicion of partiality.) This maxim related to the time when a jury was required to consist of probi homines de vicineto.

Juratores sunt judices facti (Jenk. Cent. 61). (Juries are the judges of fact.) Compare AD QUAESTIONEM FACTI, ETC.

Juratus. A jurat (q.v.) in the sense of a municipal officer.

Jure coronæ. See FRANCHISE; PREROGATIVE.

Jure mariti. See JUS MARITI.

Jure naturæ æquum est neminem cum alterius detrimento et injuriâ fieri locupletiorem (D. 50, 17, 206). (In the law of nature it is held just that no one should be enriched by the loss or injury of another.)

Juridical Days. Days on which legal business could be transacted, as distinguished from days (dies non juridici (q.v.)) on which it could not.

Juri non est consonum quod aliquis accessorius in curiâ regis convincatur antequam aliquis de facto fuerit attinctus (2 Inst. 183). (It is not lawful that any accessory should be convicted in the king's court before someone has been attainted of the fact.) This statement, or maxim, is contained in a disquisition on the Statute of Westminster I., c. 14, which provided that no accessory to a principal who had been outlawed should be outlawed before the principal had been attainted. The statement never applied generally. See ACCESSORY.

Jurisdiction.—I. Jurisdiction is the power of a Court or judge to entertain an action, petition or other proceeding. When a proceeding in respect of a certain subject-matter can only be brought in one Court, that Court is said to have exclusive jurisdiction; when it can be brought in any one of several Courts, they are said to have concurrent jurisdiction. Thus, as an action for the administration of an estate or trust property amounting in value to not more than £500 may be brought either in the High Court of Justice or in a County Court (see County Courts Act, 1888, p. 67), they have concurrent jurisdiction; but if the value of the property exceeds £500 the action can only be brought in the High Court, which has exclusive jurisdiction.

Where the jurisdiction of a Court is limited either by the amount or value of the property in litigation, or with reference to the question where the cause of action arose, it is called a Court of limited jurisdiction, as opposed to a Court of general jurisdiction.

A Court is said to have original jurisdiction in a particular matter when that matter can be initiated before it; while a Court is said to have appellate jurisdiction when it can only go into the matter on appeal after it has been adjudicated on by a Court of first instance. See COURT.

While the different jurisdictions of the Common Law and Chancery Courts existed, the Court of Chancery, in addition to its exclusive and concurrent jurisdiction, was said to have an auxiliary or ancillary jurisdiction, by which was meant that it entertained suits for relief required to obtain complete justice in another Court; the principal instances of such suits were bills for discovery, bills for the perpetuation of testimony, and bills of peace (q.v. and DE BENE ESSE; QUIA TIMET).

As to the jurisdictions of the various Courts, see the respective titles.

II. Jurisdiction also signifies the district or geographical limits within which the judgments or orders of a Court can be enforced or executed. This is sometimes called territorial jurisdiction. In the practice of the High Court it is not usual to allow an action to be brought if it is obvious that it cannot be enforced, such as an action to recover land in a foreign country; nor will the Court allow an action to be brought against a person who is out of the jurisdiction, unless the property in question in the action (if any) is situate within the jurisdiction, or unless some part of the cause of action arose within the jurisdiction (see Ord. 11, r. 1). See CAUSE OF ACTION; IN PERSONAM; SERVICE; EXCLUSIVE JURISDICTION; CONCURRENT JURISDICTION.

Juris effectus in executione consistit (Co. Litt. 289). (Effect is given to the law by execution.) This is one out of a number of maxims relating to execution which Coke has cited together. See EXECUTIO, ETC.

Jurisprudence.—I. In the proper sense of the word, jurisprudence is the science of law, namely, that science which has for its function to ascertain the principles on which legal rules are based, so as not only to classify those rules in their proper order and show the relation in which they stand to one another, but also to settle the manner in which new or doubtful cases should be brought under the appropriate rules. Jurisprudence is more a formal than a material science; it has no direct concern with questions of moral or political policy, for they fall under the province of ethics and legislation; but when a new or doubtful case arises to which two different rules seem, when taken literally, to be equally applicable, it may be, and often is, the function of jurisprudence to consider the ultimate effect which would be produced if each rule were applied to an indefinite number of similar cases, and to choose that rule which, when so applied, will produce the greatest advantage to the community.

Jurisprudence is mainly based on comparative law, that is, on the comparative study of the legal institutions of various countries, because such a study makes it more easy to separate the essential elements of the science from its historical accidents.

II. "Jurisprudence" is also used, incorrectly, as synonymous with "law." The imposing quadrisyllable is constantly introduced into a phrase, solely on grounds of euphony. Thus we have books upon 'Equity Jurisprudence' which are nothing more nor less than treatises upon the law administered by Courts of Equity; and we hear of the Jurisprudence of France or Russia, when nothing else is meant than the law which is in force in those countries respectively.

Juris utrum was a writ or action by an incumbent to recover possession of land held by him in right of the church, etc. It was so called because it raised the question whether the land was the lay fee of the tenant (defendant) or frankalmoign belonging to the church. It was abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36.

Juror; Jury. A jury is a number of persons summoned to inquire on oath into a question of fact depending in a judicial proceeding. The members of the jury are called jurors or jurymen.

I. In actions in the High Court, when the trial takes place before a jury, the jurors are twelve men possessing the necessary qualification (q.v.). Common juries are summoned from the class of tradesmen, clerks, etc.: special juries consist of merchants, bankers, independent gentlemen, etc. (see Juries Act, 1870, s. 6.), and are only summoned for the trial of important or difficult cases, either party to an action being entitled to have the case so tried at the risk of having to bear the extra expense. (See CERTIFICATE.) The jurors are selected by ballot from the panel or list furnished by the summoning officer (see PANEL), subject to the right of challenge (q.v.) by the parties. As to the cases in which a trial by jury takes place—which are now very few—and the course which it generally follows, see TRIAL. As to the discharge of a jury and the withdrawal of a juror, see DISCHARGE; WITHDRAWAL.

Juries are also summoned in actions for other purposes than that of trial. Thus a writ of inquiry (q.v) requires a jury, as does the execution of a writ of elegit (q.v.).

II. In County Court actions a jury consists of eight persons (County Courts Act, 1888, s. 102).

III. As to other kinds of juries in civil matters, see COURT LEET; EXTENT; HOMAGE; INQUEST OF OFFICE; INQUISITION; JUS PATRONATUS; LUNACY.

The preparation of the lists of persons liable to serve as jurors is now governed by the Juries Act, 1922.

IV. In criminal procedure the following kinds of jury exist:

A grand jury is summoned for every commission of "oyer and terminer" and "general gaol delivery," and at every quarter sessions (see those titles), to inquire into, present, and do all those things which shall then and there be commanded them on the part of the King. Their principal duty is to inquire into bills of indictment, and to present them, if they think a primâ facie case has been made out against the accused. (See INDICTMENT; PRESENTMENT.) A grand jury consists of from twelve to twenty-three persons, and every presentment must be by twelve at the least. They sit in private.

The jury by which criminal cases (indictments, informations, etc.) are tried, is sometimes called a petty jury, as opposed to the grand jury. It consists of twelve persons, who are liable to be challenged. See CHALLENGE.

In important cases of misdemeanour in the King's Bench Division a special jury may be obtained on the application of either prosecutor or defendant (Juries Act, 1825, s. 30).

Formerly every alien who was tried on a criminal charge in England was entitled to what was called a jury de medietate linguæ, that is, a jury one half of which consisted of aliens. This kind of jury is now abolished (see BILINGUIS), but it is said that where an indictment is found against a scholar or other person having the privilege of the University of Oxford, he is entitled to be tried in the University Court by a jury de medietate, half of freeholders, and half of matriculated persons. See UNIVERSITY COURTS.

Where, in a criminal prosecution, a female prisoner alleges herself or appears to be pregnant, a jury of twelve matrons may be impanelled to try whether she is so or not. They choose one of their number to be foreматron.

See REPRIEVE.

"Jury," Norman-French jurée (Britton, 134 a), is derived from jurata, which seems to be a contraction for assisa or recognitio jurata, the sworn assise or recognition (q.v.), from the oath taken by the members of the assise, (who were called jurors), to try the cause justly. The modern jury, however, is not directly derived from the assise, which was a statutory mode of trial, but from the practice which grew up after the introduction of the assise, of suitors consenting that their actions should be tried by a jurata or jury, in preference to the trial by duel.

See DISTRINGAS JURATORES; HABEAS CORPUS JURATORES; VENIRE FACIAS JURATORES.

Jus accrescendi is that right of survivorship which is peculiar to joint ownership, joint rights, and joint liabilities. (See JOINT). Survivorship does not occur in the case of merchants and other partners, the rule being —Jus accrescendi inter mercatores pro beneficio commercii locum non habet (Co. Litt. 182); that is to say, in the interest of commerce, the acquisition of property by survivorship is unknown as between merchants.

Jus accrescendi præfertur oneribus (Co. Litt. 185). (The right of survivorship is preferred to incumbrances.) Thus, if one of two joint tenants grants a right of way over the land held by them, this does not bind the survivor.

Jus accrescendi præfertur ultimæ voluntati (Co. Litt. 185). (The right of survivorship is preferred to the last will.) The survivor of joint tenants takes even though the joint tenant who has died has devised his interest to a third person.

Jus constitui oportet in his quæ ut plurimum accidunt, non quæ ex inopinato (D. 1, 3, 3). (Law ought to be made with a view to those cases which happen most frequently, and not to those which are unexpected.) The corresponding maxim of our law is Ad ea, etc. (q.v.).

Jus curialitatis Angliæ. The curtesy (q.v.) of England.

Jus descendit, et non terra (Co. Litt. 345). (The right descends and not the land.) Coke uses the words in the following context:— "When an estate is turned to a right as by discontinuance, disseisin, etc., . . . it shall be said . . . jus descendit et non terra": see RIGHT.

Jus disponendi (the right of disposing) is an expression used either generally to signify the right of alienation, as when we speak of depriving a married woman of the jus disponendi over her separate estate, or specially in the law relating to sales of goods, where it is often a question whether the vendor of goods has the intention of reserving to himself the jus disponendi, that is, of preventing the ownership from passing to the purchaser, notwithstanding that he (the vendor) has parted with the possession of the goods. Such a question becomes of great importance when a vendor has despatched goods to a purchaser in a distant place, and the latter becomes insolvent before paying for them, because if the vendor has effectually reserved the jus disponendi he can reclaim the goods. See APPROPRIATION; STOPPAGE IN TRANSITU.

Jus duplicatum. See DROIT.

Jus est norma recti; et quicquid est contra normam recti est injuria (3 Buls. 313). (A legal right must be within the rule of right; and whatever is contrary to the rule of right is a wrong.) Compare FRAUS ET JUS, etc.

Jus ex injuriâ non oritur (4 Bing. 639). (A right does not arise out of a wrong.) Compare EX DOLO, etc., EX TURPI, etc.

Jus gentium. See LAW OF NATIONS.

Jus in personam; in rem. See IN PERSONAM; RIGHT.

Jusjurandi forma verbis differt, re convenit; hunc enim sensum habere debet, ut Deus invocetur (Grotius l. 2, c. 13, § 10). (Oaths differ in form but are essentially the same; and every form of oath must involve a calling of God to witness).

Jusjurandum inter alios factum nec nocere nec prodesse debet (4 Inst. 279). (An oath made by others in another proceeding ought neither to hurt nor profit.) This is a variant of the well-known Res inter alios, etc. (q.v.).

Jus mariti. The jus mariti (or "right of a husband") is that right to the chattels of a woman which, in the absence of special provisions, her husband, before the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, acquired on their marriage; hence a gift to or settlement on the wife of property to her separate use was said to exclude the jus mariti. If a married woman having personal estate settled to her separate use die without disposing of it, the husband will be entitled, jure mariti, to so much of it as consists of chattels in possession, that is to say, they vest in him as if they had not been settled on the wife; while to entitle himself to so much of it as consists of choses in action he must take out letters of administration to his wife's estate. He is responsible for her debts to the extent of property acquired jure mariti.

Jus monetæ comprehenditur in regalibus quæ nunquam à regio sceptro abdicantur (Dav. 20). (The right of coining money is comprehended amongst those rights of royalty which are never separated from the royal sceptre.) But this general statement was made in an Irish Court—in the Case of Mixed Monies—and the fact seems to have been overlooked that the jura regalia—or some of them—were occasionally granted to subjects: see LIBERTATES REGALES, ETC.

Jus naturale est quod apud omnes homines eandem habet potentiam (7 Co. 12). (Natural right is that which has the same force among all men.) This is a definition from Aristotle which Coke inserts in the report of Calvin's Case (q.v.).

Jus non habenti tuto non paretur (Hob. 146). (It is safe to refuse obedience to one who has no legal right.) Coke quotes this maxim with regard to the Pope after declaring that something done by the Pope was coram non judice.

Jus patronatûs in ecclesiastical law signifies (1) the right of advowson (q.v.), or more commonly, (2) a proceeding to try the question who is entitled to a right of presentation which is claimed by different persons. It is an inquest of office, which is tried before the bishop (or commissioners appointed by him) by a jury of clerks and laymen. The result of the trial does not conclude the question, but merely justifies the bishop in admitting the clerk for whose title the verdict is given. See DISTURBANCE; QUARE IMPEDIT.

Jus primæ noctis. This is popularly supposed to have been a seignorial right of concubitus with the wife of a tenant on her wedding night. As a matter of fact, the jus primæ noctis, in this sense, is as purely mythical as Pope Joan. Sir J. S. Frazer, in his Folk Lore in the Old Testament, shows clearly that there is no trace of any such right in any authentic record of English—or Scottish—customs, and that the assertion of the former existence of such a right is made without proof or even probability. The jus primæ noctis in reality was the dispensation from the obligation of continence on the first three nights (the "Tobias Nights") imposed by the early Church on newly-married couples. See MARCHET.

Jus respicit æquitatem (Co. Litt. 24). (Law bears equity in mind.) This is one of a group of maxims about equity given at Co. Litt. 24.

Jus spatiendi et manendi. (The right to stray and remain.) Neither the public at large nor the inhabitants of a particular place have any such right. The public at large may have the right to pass across a particular open space, that is to say, there may be a public right of way, and the inhabitants of a particular place may have the right to play lawful games upon an open space; but the rights of neither the one nor the other go any farther.

Jus superveniens auctori accrescit successori (Halk. 76). (A right with which a former owner of land has been invested descends to him who takes afterwards.)

Just Allowances. It is provided by R. S. C., Ord. 33, r. 8, that in the taking of any account directed by any judgment or order all allowances shall be made without that being expressly directed. This means that credit shall be given for all payments or expenses reasonably and properly made or incurred.

Jus tertii. When a person who is primâ facie liable to A., on being sued by him sets up as a defence that the money or property claimed does not belong to A., but belongs by a paramount title to B., he is said to set up the jus tertii (right of a third person).

The general rule is, that a wrongdoer cannot set up the jus tertii. Therefore when A. seized goods in the possession of B., and on being sued by B. set up as a defence that B. had no title because the assignment from C. under which he claimed was fraudulent as against A., and that the goods belonged to A. under a valid assignment from C., it was held that A., being guilty of conversion, and therefore a wrongdoer, could not set up the jus tertii against B. So an agent cannot refuse to account to his principal or otherwise dispute his title by setting up the jus tertii, unless he does so under the authority of the third person.

Justice. The judges of certain Courts are called justices. Thus, before the Judicature Act, 1873, the judges of the Queen's Bench and Common Pleas were called justices of those Courts, the principal judge of each Court being called respectively the Lord Chief Justice of England, and the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas. The latter title has been abolished. (See SUPREME COURT.) With the exception of the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice, and the Master of the Rolls (Judicature Act, 1873, ss. 5, 32), all the judges of the High Court appointed since the Act came into operation are called justices of the High Court (Judicature Act, 1877, s. 5). See BARON.

As to the Lords Justices of Appeal, and the justices of the peace, see those titles. As to justices of assize, see ASSISE; also EYRE; TRAILBASTON.

The word justitia, in the sense of judge, occurs in our oldest books; otherwise one might suppose "justice" to be derived from justiciarius.

Justice in Eyre of the Forest. See FOREST.

Justices in Eyre Seat; Justice Seat. See ATTACHMENT OF THE FOREST.

Justices of Appeal. Under the Judicature Act, 1875, s. 4, this was the title of those members of the Court of Appeal who now, under the Judicature Act, 1877, s. 4, are known as Lords Justices of Appeal. See SUPREME COURT.

Justices of the Jews. These were the judicial officers who presided in the Exchequer of the Jews (q.v.). Some of them were Jews.

Justices of the Peace are persons appointed by the Crown to be, or persons who ex officio are, justices within a certain district (e.g., a county or borough) for the conservation of the peace, and for the execution of divers things, comprehended within their commission and within divers statutes, committed to their charge.

Their authority is either ministerial or judicial. They are said to act ministerially in cases of felony or misdemeanour, where they merely initiate the proceedings by issuing a warrant of apprehension, taking the depositions, and committing for trial. They act judicially in quarter sessions (q.v.), and in all cases where they have summary jurisdiction, whether criminal, as in cases of common assaults, drunkenness, etc.; or civil, as where they have to adjudicate between master and servant, or landlord and tenant, and in affiliation cases, etc. See PETTY SESSIONS.

By virtue of their commission, justices of the peace have jurisdiction in all matters relating to the preservation of the public peace; and in case of an actual or apprehended breach of the peace within their own view, they may commit the offender without warrant or information. Most commonly, however, their jurisdiction is exercised by binding over persons to keep the peace. See BREACH OF THE PEACE.

Justices have jurisdiction in claims for seamen's wages to an amount not exceeding £50 (Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 164).

The King's Bench Division of the High Court on its Crown side takes cognizance of breaches of the peace, and judges of assize sit under a commission of the peace as well as under commissions of nisi prius, etc. (See ASSISE.) Consequently the judges of these Courts are justices of the peace

As to licensing justices, see LICENCE; and as to visiting justices, see PRISON. See also COMMISSION; RECORDER; STIPENDIARY MAGISTRATE.

Justicia. This word as used in the eleventh century might mean, according to the context, either a law, a judge, or a jurisdiction.

Justiciar; Justiciary. Anglicised forms of Justiciarius, the chief political and legal officer of the Norman and Plantagenet kings. He was ex-officio regent when the king went overseas, and presided over the Curia Regis (q.v.). The office ceased to exist during the reign of Henry III.

Justicias facere. Anciently this meant to hold pleas, that is to say, to exercise judicial functions.

Justicies. A writ anciently directed to the sheriff, and empowering him to hear in the old County Court (q.v.) a plea of debt for a sum exceeding the forty shillings to which his jurisdiction was ordinarily limited.

Justifiable; Justification; Justify.—I. In the law of torts and crimes, justification is where the defendant in an action or prosecution shows that the act complained of was justifiable, that is, lawful. Thus, a derogatory statement is not defamatory if it is true; an assault or battery is lawful if committed in self-defence, or in defence of one's property, or for the purpose of proper correction or discipline, etc. A defendant who sets up such a defence is said to justify. It is obvious that such a defence is inadmissible in a prosecution for an obscene, blasphemous, or seditious libel; and even in the case of a prosecution for a defamatory libel, it is only available where it is for the public benefit that the matter complained of should be published (Libel Act, 1843, s. 6).

As to justifiable homicide, see HOMICIDE.

II. In procedure, bail or sureties for the defendant in an action were said to justify when they satisfied the plaintiff or the Court that they were sufficient, that is, that they would be able to perform their obligation if the plaintiff was successful. When bail or security was given, the sureties usually made affidavits of justification, stating that they were housekeepers or freeholders and that they were worth double the amount claimed in the action. If, however, bail were excepted to, and in certain other cases, they had to justify or attend before a judge at chambers and be examined on oath as to their sufficiency. See BAIL; EXCEPT; and Ord. 69, r. 3.

Justificators (Justificatores). The same as compurgators (q.v.).

Justitia debet esse libera, quia nihil iniquius venali justitia; plena, quia justitia non debet claudicare; et celeris, quia dilatio est quædam negatio (2 Inst. 56). (Justice must be unbought, because nothing is more hateful than venal justice; full, for justice ought not to be defective; and speedy, for delay is a kind of denial.)

Justitia est duplex; viz. severe puniens et vere præveniens (3 Inst. Epil.). (Justice is double; punishing with severity, and being really preventive.) Compare MELIOR EST, ETC.

Justitia firmatur Solium (3 Inst. 140). (Justice strengthens the Throne.)

Justitia nemini neganda est (Jenk. Cent. 178). (Justice is to be denied to no man.) This is merely an echo of Magna Carta.

Justitia non est neganda, non differenda (Jenk. Cent. 93). (Justice is neither to be denied nor delayed.)

Justum non est aliquem antenatum mortuum facere bastardum qui pro totâ vitâ suâ pro legitimo habetur (8 Co. 101). (It is not just to make an elder-born a bastard after his death, who all his life has been accounted legitimate.) This maxim applied only under the old law of bastard eigné and mulier puisné. See MULIER.

Juvenile Court. A Court of summary jurisdiction sitting for the hearing of applications for orders or licences relating to a child or young person in connection with which the child or young person has to attend, or for the hearing of a charge against a child or young person who is not charged along with an adult (Children Act, 1918, s. 111 (1)). The Juvenile Courts (Metropolis) Act, 1920, amends s. 111 of the Act of 1908 with respect to the constitution of juvenile Courts in the Metropolitan Police Court District. See IN CAMERA.

Juvenile Offenders. The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, ss. 10, 11, 49 (as amended by the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1899, s. 2), empowers a Court of summary jurisdiction to dispose summarily of anyone under sixteen who is charged with any indictable offence other than homicide, unless a trial by jury is demanded. The Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, s. 15 (3), also deals with such summary adjudications.

The Children Act, 1908, ss. 57 and 58, empowers the Court of summary jurisdiction to commit such offenders to reformatories (q.v.) or industrial schools (q.v.) instead of to prison.

There is no statutory definition of the expression "juvenile offender"; but the heading to Part. V. of the Children Act, 1908, read along with ss. 94-113 (which constitute Part V.) impliedly defines it as an offender under sixteen years of age.

Kailes; Kayles. See CLOSH.

Kalendæ. Rural chapters of the rural clergy with the rural (q.v.) dean presiding, which were anciently held (q.v.) on the calends, that is to say, on the 1st of the month; they were also known as Capitula ruralia.

Kantress = Cantred (q.v.).

Karle = Carle (q.v.).

Keating's Act. The popular title of the Summary Procedure on Bills of Exchange Act, 1855. It was introduced by Mr. H. S. Keating, M.P., afterwards Mr. Justice Keating. It enabled a plaintiff suing on a bill of exchange or a promissory note to obtain speedy judgment unless the defendant obtained leave to defend. It was repealed as regards the Supreme Court by the Statute Law and Civil Procedure Act, 1883, which, however, left it in force as regards the County Court; and it has been repealed as regards the County Court by the County Courts Act, 1919, s. 27. Both in the High Court and in the County Court a new procedure is substituted under the respective rules of Court. See TWELVE-DAY WRIT.

Keelage. The same as groundage (q.v.). The term keelage seems to have been used in connection with Hartlepool especially.

Keeper of the Great Seal. See LORD KEEPER; also PRIVY SEAL.

Keeper of the Queen's Prison. See QUEEN'S PRISON.

Keepers of the Liberty of England. See CUSTODES LIBERTATIS, ETC.

Keeping House is an act of bankruptcy (q.v.). It is confined to traders, and takes place when a debtor denies himself to a creditor who has called for payment, or withdraws into a secret part of the house, or refrains from going to his house of business, or confines himself to the house during the day, for the purpose of avoiding and thus delaying his creditors.

Kent, Customs of. See CONSUETUDINES, ETC.

Kenyon-Slaney Clause. The popular title of s. 7 (6) of the Education Act, 1902. The sub-section was inserted on the motion of Colonel Kenyon-Slaney, M.P. The Education Act, 1921, has repealed and (s. 29 (5) (c)) re-enacted it.

Compare COWPER-TEMPLE CLAUSE; CONSCIENCE CLAUSE.

Keps. Mechanism for supporting, when not in motion, the cage which goes up and down a mine shaft. See the COAL MINES ACT, 1911, s. 40 (4).

Kerhere. Stated to have meant both (1) a custom to have a cartway, and (2) a commutation for the service of carting goods for the lord.

Kernellatus. Crenellated.

Kesteven. See RIDING.

Keys, House of. The legislative assembly of the Isle of Man. See MAN.

Kidnapping. See ABDUCTION; SLAVE TRADING.

Kidnapping Act, 1872. This is the statutory short title of the statute 35 & 36 Vict., c. 19. (See s. 1.) That Act was amended and extended by the statute 38 & 39 Vict., c. 51, which (s. 1) provides that the two Acts "may be cited together as the Pacific Islanders Protection Acts, 1872 and 1875, and each of them may be cited separately as the Pacific Islanders' Protection Act of the year in which it was passed. The Short Titles Act, 1896, provides further that the short title of the Act of 1872 may be cited as the Pacific Islanders' Protection Act, 1872.

Kilderkin. A customary measure containing eighteen imperial gallons. It is not known to the law.

Killyth-stallion. Stated by Spelman to have been a custom under which the lord was bound to provide a stallion for the use of his tenants.

Kindred. This includes only such persons as are related by blood, including the half-blood.

King. See CIVIL LIST; DEMESNE; DEMISE; PARLIAMENT; PREROGATIVE.

King-at-Arms. The chief of the heralds was anciently known as the King of the Heralds. Subsequently he was entitled King-of-Arms. Upon the establishment of the Heralds' College he became Garter King-of-Arms. As to the other existing Kings-of-Arms, see HERALDS.

King's Advocate. See ADVOCATE-GENERAL.

Kings-of-Arms. See HERALDS.

King's Bench. The Court of King's Bench was one of the superior Courts of common law, having in ordinary civil actions concurrent jurisdiction with the Courts of Common Pleas and Exchequer; it was, however, considered superior to them in dignity and power, its principal judge being styled the Lord Chief Justice of England, and taking precedence over the other common law judges, and there being formerly an appeal to it from the Exchequer and the Common Pleas. It also had special jurisdiction over inferior Courts, magistrates and civil corporations by the prerogative writ of mandamus, and (concurrently with the two other Courts) by prohibition and certiorari (q.v.), and in proceedings by quo warranto and habeas corpus. The King's Bench was also the principal Court of criminal jurisdiction in England: informations might be filed and indictments preferred in it in the first instance, and indictments from all inferior Courts might be removed into it by certiorari, subject to certain limitations. See CERTIORARI; INDICTMENT; INFORMATION.

The King's Bench accordingly had two "sides" or sets of offices, namely, the "plea side," in which civil business was transacted; and the "Crown side," or "Crown Office," in which matters within the criminal and extraordinary jurisdiction of the Court were transacted. See CROWN OFFICE.

It is said to have been called the King's Bench or Queen's Bench, both because its records ran in the name of the king (coram rege), and because kings in former times have often personally sat there.

By the Judicature Act, 1873, the jurisdiction of the Court of Queen's Bench, as it then was called, was transferred to the High Court of Justice. Its judges (namely, the Lord Chief Justice and the five puisne justices) originally formed a separate division of the High Court, called the Queen's Bench Division, to which was assigned all business (civil and criminal) which was formerly within the exclusive cognizance of the Court of Queen's Bench. In 1880, however, the Common Pleas and Exchequer Divisions were consolidated with it into one division called the Queen's Bench Division, which now (1923) consists of the Lord Chief Justice and seventeen justices.

See SUPREME COURT.

King's Bench Prison. A debtors' prison in Southwark, which, under the name of the Queen's Bench Prison, was replaced by the Queen's Prison (q.v.) in 1842.

King's Briefs; King's Letters. These were letters patent issued by the King out of the Chancery, and were usually addressed to the clergy and churchwardens of the Kingdom and read during the service. The direct object of the briefs was to obtain contributions from the charitable towards mitigating the severity of calamities happening to persons or places, or for raising money for purposes likely to invoke general sympathy. They were first issued after the Reformation—up to then there were only papal briefs—and they were common from the Restoration until the time of William IV. One of the latest was that issued in 1835 on behalf of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts: but even before then the statute 4 & 5 Ann. c. 25, which had been passed in order to regulate them, had been repealed by the statute 9 Geo. 4, c. 42, s. 1. See Walford, King's Briefs, 1882; Bewes, Church Briefs, 1896.

King's Chambers are those portions of the seas, adjacent to the coasts of Great Britain, which are inclosed within headlands so as to be cut off from the open sea by imaginary straight lines drawn from one promontory to another. They appear to have always formed part of the territorial waters of the Crown. See HIGH SEAS; TERRITORIAL WATERS.

King's Coroner. This is an official quite distinct from the Coroner of the King's Household or Coroner of the Verge. See CORONER.

The King's Coroner and Attorney—to give him his full title—was formerly appointed by letters patent. He is now appointed by the Lord Chancellor. The only inquests (q.v.) with which he ever was concerned were those held upon persons dying within the now-abolished King's Bench Prison or the rules (q.v.) thereof. His further duty was to write out and extract all "amerciaments, fines, issues and forfeitures to the Crown." He now, in so far as he exists at all, is an officer of the Crown Office. The last King's Coroner who had held only that office died in 1892, and the Master of the Crown Office was thereupon appointed, without additional salary, to the office, and is now entitled the King's Coroner and Attorney and Master of the Crown Office. The office must be held by one of the Masters of the Supreme Court (King's Bench Division). See the Judicature (Officers) Act, 1879, s. 9 (2).

King's Counsel are barristers who have obtained the appointment of counsel to His Majesty by reason, as old writers put it, of their learning and talent. They wear silk gowns, sit within the bar, and take precedence in Court over "utter barristers," that is to say, the ordinary barrister, who sits outside the bar. They have no active duties to the Crown to perform, but they must not be employed in any cause against the Crown (e.g., in defending a prisoner) without special licence. There used to be also King's counsel in the County Palatine of Lancaster (see the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 78), who took precedence of other barristers in the Palatine Courts. See BAR; BARRISTER; SERJEANT-AT-LAW; INNS OF COURT.

King's counsel are comparatively modern. Francis Bacon (1604) was the first; Francis North (1668) was the next: and there seem to have been but few other appointments down to about 1750. In 1775 there were only fourteen, and in 1850 only twenty-eight King's counsel, the highest intermediate number being under fifty. Now the number is over three hundred.

Down to 1831 King's counsel received an annual stipend of £40. This made it necessary for a barrister who was a member of Parliament to vacate his seat if he took silk. (See OFFICE OF PROFIT.) To meet such cases the Crown occasionally issued patents of precedence, the holders of which became of equal rank with King's counsel and ranked with them according to seniority. Such patents were issued sometimes in other cases also. One was granted in 1872 to Mr. Benjamin, a distinguished American lawyer who came to the English bar in 1866 after the collapse of the Confederate cause. The last was that issued in 1883 to Mr. (now Lord) Phillimore.

King's counsel took precedence of serjeants (q.v.).

Colloquially, King's counsel are known as seniors and other barristers as juniors. When a barrister becomes a King's counsel he is said to "take silk."

Kingsdown's (Lord) Act. The popular title of the Wills Act, 1861.

King's Evidence. A prisoner who, instead of being put upon trial, is permitted by the Crown to give evidence against those associated with him in crime. See ACCOMPLICE; APPROVER.

King's Inns. The solitary Inn of Court in Ireland. All members of the Irish bar must before call have been members of this Inn.

King's Peace, Time [or Days] of. See NON-TERM.

King's Printer. This is the designation of the person to whom is delegated the right possessed by the Crown of publishing under authority, Acts of Parliament, Royal Proclamations, and other such public documents (see COPYRIGHT). As to the admissibility in evidence of copies of public documents purporting to be printed by the King's Printer see the Evidence Act, 1845, s. 3.

King's Proctor. The solicitor or proctor representing the Crown in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division. His function, in a proper case, is to intervene (q.v.) in order to prevent a decree (q.v.) nisi from being made absolute; and he may do this either quâ King's Proctor on the ground of collusion (q.v.) or quâ member of the public if the decree was obtained as the result of the suppression of material facts.

King's Regulations. "The King's Regulations and Orders for the Army" are issued by the Crown, through the Army Council, for the government of the Army. Their legal force depends upon the constitutional principle that the Crown commands the Army subject to statutory regulation. See ARTICLES OF WAR.

"The King's Regulations and Admiralty Instructions" are made by Order in Council countersigned by the Lords of the Admiralty, and they, along with the Articles of War, constitute the code under which the Navy is governed.

King's Remembrancer. See REMEMBRANCERS.

King's Silver. The same as POST FINE (q.v.).

King's Widow. The widow of a tenant in capite of the king. Under the statute Prerogativâ Regis (q.v.) she could not remarry without the king's licence, and if she did, she was liable to a fine amounting generally to one year's value of her dower. The statute 32 Hen. 8, c. 46, which established the Court of Wards and Liveries, empowered the Master of the Wards (the judge of that Court) to compound with king's widows for fines due in respect of their having re-married without licence (see s. 25).

Kipper-time. The season during which salmon are breeding and unfit for human food. The Rot. Parl., 50 Edw. 3, provided: "Qe nul salmon soit prise en Tamise entre Graveshend et le pount de Henlee sur Tamise en temps q'il soit kiper: C'est assavoir entre les Festes de l'Invention del Crois et le Epiphanie." (That no salmon be taken in the Thames between Gravesend and the bridge of Henley-on-Thames at the season when it is kipper, that is to say, between the Feasts of the Invention of the Cross [3rd May] and the Epiphany [6th January])—which shows that the Thames was a very early river. No English river is now open, even for rods, before 31st January.

Kirkby's Quest. A record similar to the Testa de Nevill (q.v.). It was made out in 1275 by order of John Kirkby, treasurer to Edward I. The original has disappeared: a transcript, which is attributed to the 16th century, still exists amongst the Records of the Exchequer in the Public Record Office.

Knacker. "A person whose trade or business it is to kill any cattle not killed for the purpose of being used as butchers meat" (Protection of Animals Act, 1911, s. 15 (e)). "'Cattle' includes any horse, ass, mule, bull, sheep, goat or pig" (ib.).

No knacker's yard can be established anew in the metropolis since 31st December, 1891, without the consent of the county council (Public Health (London) Act, 1891, s. 20), and every knacker's yard must have an annual licence from the county council (ib. s. 19). Outside the metropolis, knackers are licensed annually by the district councils (Local Government Act, 1894, s. 27).

No one licensed as a knacker can be a horse-dealer while so licensed (Protection of Animals Act, 1911, s. 6). Every knacker must observe the conditions set out in the First Schedule to the Protection of Animals Act, 1911 (ib. s. 5), which repealed inter alia the Knackers Acts, 1786 and 1844.

Knight. The dignity of knighthood ordinarily denotes that of a knight bachelor, which is the lowest title of dignity in this kingdom.

(See DIGNITY.) There are other kinds of knights, such as Knights of the Garter (q.v.) and of the Bath (q.v.), who are of higher degree.

A knight bachelor is created by the Sovereign, or someone acting under his commission, touching the proposed recipient of the honour with a sword on the shoulder while kneeling, and saying, "Rise, Sir Thomas Jones," or as the case may be.

Anciently fees were payable on knighthood, and, in order to raise money, Charles I. called upon the owners of land to the annual value of £40 to accept knighthood; but the statute 16 Car. 1, c. 20, put an end to compulsory knighthood. See LIBRATA TERRAE.

"Knights of the shire" was down to about 1885 the technical name for those members of Parliament who represented the counties, as opposed to the citizens and burgesses, or borough members, who represented the towns. See BANNERET; BAS CHEVALIER; WINDSOR, KNIGHTS OF.

Knightencourt. An "honor" court anciently held twice yearly by the Bishops of Hereford. Those bound to attend were the lords of manors forming the honor of that bishopric and those holding of them by knight service: such of them as failed to attend paid two shillings as suit-silver for respite of homage.

Knight Harbinger. An officer (abolished in 1846) of the king's household who, when the king travelled, rode a day's journey in advance to arrange for the king's lodging.

Knighthood, Orders of. See BATH; BRITISH EMPIRE; GARTER; GUELPHS-HANOVER; INDIAN EMPIRE; ROYAL VICTORIAN; ST. MICHAEL AND ST. GEORGE; ST. PATRICK; STAR OF INDIA; THISTLE.

As to ORDERS OTHER THAN OF KNIGHTHOOD, see that title.

Knight Marshal. An officer of the Court of the Marshalsea (q.v.).

Knight of the Post. A colloquial term which formerly meant one, such as a notorious perjurer, who was worthy of the whipping-post. See HOCKETTOR.

Knight's Fee. See FEE.

Knights of Grace; Knights of Justice. See ST. JOHN; ETC.

Knights of the Carpet. The same as Knights of the Chamber (q.v.).

Knights of the Chamber. In the fourteenth century this was a description applied to knights upon whom the honour had been conferred elsewhere than on the field of battle. See BANNERET.

Knights of the Green Cloth. The same as Knights of the Chamber (q.v.).

Knight's Service. Tenure by knight's service was where a man held land of another person or of the Crown by military service, of which the principal varieties were escuage, grand serjeanty, castleward and cornage (q.v.).

Knight's service had five incidents, namely, aids, relief, wardship, marriage and escheat; the king's tenants in capite ut de coronâ were further liable to primer seisin and fines for alienation. See the various titles: also OUSTERLEMAIN; FEALTY; HOMAGE; TENURE; SERVICE.

Tenure by knight's service was converted into common socage by the statute 12 Car. 2, c. 24.

"Knock Out." This term is applied to an arrangement between persons about to attend an auction to the effect that only one of them shall bid for any given article, and that after the auction there shall be a private sale amongst themselves of the articles which each of them has bought. This, of course means that only part of the competitive price goes to the original vendor; but the arrangement does not appear to be illegal.

L

Label. A slip of parchment or other material attached to a deed in order that a seal may be affixed to the slip.

Laborariis, De. Under the Statute of Labourers (q.v.) there were two forms of this writ:—One against a man having no apparent means of livelihood who refused to take employment, and the other against a man who refused to serve for the summer with a master living in the town where he had served during the winter. In each case the erring labourer was to be committed to gaol until he had seen the error of his ways.

See SUPER STATUTO VERSUS SERVANTES.

Labour Bureau. The Labour Bureaux (London) Act, 1902, which relates only to London, authorises the council of any metropolitan borough to establish a labour bureau, that is to say, "an office or place used for the purpose of supplying information, either by the keeping of registers or otherwise, respecting employers who desire to engage workpeople and workpeople who seek engagement or employment.

This Act has never been repealed: but it would appear to be practically superseded by the Labour Exchanges Act, 1909. See LABOUR EXCHANGES.

Labourer. It has been judicially decided that a parish clerk or a bailiff or a carpenter is not a labourer and that a labourer is a man who digs and does work of that kind with his hands. But a farmer who does manual work on his own farm is not a labourer within the meaning of the Sunday Observance Act, 1677, 29 Car. 12, c. 7, s. 1, which, however, is so worded that it is not clear whether even an agricultural labourer comes within it.

Labourers, Statute of. This was the statute 23 Edw. 3, passed in 1349 after about half the population had died of the Black Death. It recited that many of the people had died of the Pestilence and that many, " seeing the necessity of masters and great scarcity of servants, will not serve unless they may receive excessive wages and some [be] rather willing to beg in idleness than by labour to get their living," and enacted that everyone under sixty, except traders, craftsmen, those with private means and landowners, should work for anyone willing to employ them at the wages paid from 1340 to 1346. It was repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1863. See SUPER STATUTO VERSUS SERVANTES, ETC.

Labour Exchange. The Labour Exchanges Act, 1909, ss. 1, 2, was passed to establish and take over labour exchanges, and by s. 5 defines ' labour exchanges ' as meaning " any office or other place used for the purpose of collecting and furnishing information, either by the keeping of registers or otherwise, respecting employers who desire to engage workpeople and workpeople who seek engagement or employment." The establishment of labour exchanges had been authorised by the Unemployed Workmen Act, 1905, ss. 1 (4), 2 (3), and they had previously existed as the result of private action.

" Labouring Classes." This expression is declared by the Metropolitan Police Act, 1886, s 5 (7) to include " mechanics, artisans, labourers, and others working for wages, hawkers, costermongers, persons not working for wages but working at some trade or handicraft without employing others except members of their own family, and persons other than domestic servants whose income does not exceed an average of 30*s*. a week, and the families of any such persons who may be residing with them." Compare WORKING CLASSES.

Labour, Ministry of. The Ministry of Labour was established pursuant to s. 1 of the New Ministries and Secretaries Act, 1916. By s. 2 of that Act there were transferred to this new ministry the powers and duties of the Board of Trade under the Conciliation Act, 1896 (see CONCILIATION), the Labour Exchanges Act, 1909 (see LABOUR EXCHANGE), the Trade Boards Act, 1909 (see MINIMUM WAGE), and the National Insurance (Unemployment) Acts, 1911 to 1916 (see NATIONAL INSURANCE). The head of the ministry is styled the Minister of Labour and has a salary of £2,000 a year (s. 10): he can sit in the House of Commons (s. 12 (1)), and he has, up to the present, always been a member of the Cabinet (q.v.). See OFFICE OF PROFIT.

Laches is negligence or unreasonable delay in asserting or enforcing a right. In the old book the term is chiefly used with reference to rights of entry. Thus, while the doctrine of " descent cast " (q.v.) was in force, if an infant was disseised of land, and the disseisor died in possession, the infant was not deprived of his right of entry, as a person of full age would have been, because no laches could be imputed to an infant in such a case. See DISABILITY; also INTRUSION, as to laches by the Crown.

At the present day " laches " is generally used to denote unreasonable delay in enforcing an equitable right. Thus if a person discovers that he has been induced by fraud to enter into an instrument, and then waits an unnecessary time before taking proceedings to set it aside, this laches will disentitle him to relief. He is, however, entitled to a reasonable time for the purpose of making inquiries, and obtaining advice, etc. Where an equitable right of action is analogous to a legal right of action, and there is a Statute of Limitations fixing a limit of time for bringing actions at law to enforce such claims, the Court will by analogy apply the same limit of time to proceedings taken to enforce the equitable right. See ACQUIESCENCE.

Lada. This is stated to have meant (1) a Court of justice, (2) a trial, (3) a watercourse, and (4) a lathe (q.v.), with different derivations in each case.

Lady. The recognised courtesy title of the daughters of dukes, marquises, and earls (as, e.g., [the] Lady Jane Sheepshanks) and of the wife of anyone entitled to the courtesy title of lord (as, e.g., [the] Lady George Gaunt). It is the customary title of the wife of a knight or of a baronet (as [the] Lady Warrington); but the formal title of those ladies is, for instance, Dame Theodora Warrington: and, except formally, a marchioness, viscountess, or baroness is always spoken of or to as, for instance, Lady Farintosh instead of as the Marchioness of Farintosh.

Lady Day. The 25th March. See ANNUNCIATION, FEAST OF; OLD LADY DAY.

Lady of Grace; Lady of Justice. See ST. JOHN, ETC.

Laen-land. In the late Anglo-Saxon period this, as distinguished from bocland and folkland (q.v.)—both of which were held, but on different titles, from the king—meant land held of a superior other than the king. It thus corresponded more or less to land which, after the Norman Conquest, was held of, not by, a tenant, in capite.

Læsæ majestatis, Crimen. The crime of treason or, literally, "The crime of injured majesty." The expression is used by Glanville. There is no modern equivalent in our law, although lèse-majesté, the French translation of the Latin expression, is well known in continental law: but lèse-majesté includes many offences against the Sovereign, such as mere insult, which are of much less gravity than treason.

Læsio fidei. (A breach of faith.) The ecclesiastical Courts down to the middle of the fifteenth century claimed that in matters such as non-payment of debt and breach of contract they had a general jurisdiction, inasmuch as a læsio fidei came into question. The growth of the equitable jurisdiction of the Chancellor, and the steady resistance of the judges generally, eventually put an end to this claim.

Lætare Jerusalem. The more correct form of LETARE JERUSALEM (q.v.).)

Læthe = Lathe (q.v.).

Lagan. See JETSAM.

Lage; Laga. The Saxon for "law," and a Latinised form. We find the word in compound forms such as Danelage.

Lagen. An ancient measure of wine, stated to have contained seven quarts.

Lairwite. A penalty for adultery or fornication (q.v.), more especially with an unfree woman. See Leg. Hen. 1, par. 23, and 4 Inst. 206.

Lambarde, William. Born 1536, admitted to Lincoln's Inn in 1556, appointed a bencher of the Inn in 1578, became a master in Chancery in 1592, and died in 1601. He published in 1568 his Archaionomia, a paraphrase of the Anglo-Saxon laws and of the laws of William the Conqueror; and in 1581 he published his Eirenarcha; or of the Office of Justices of the Peace, which was for long the standard work on the subject.

Lambeth Degrees. Degrees conferred by the Archbishop of Canterbury, by virtue of the statute 25 Hen. 8, c. 21, ss. 2, 3. He has authority to confer all the usual degrees in Arts, Divinity, Law and Medicine, with or without examination, upon either laymen or clergymen. Recipients of such degrees may wear the academic costume of the university to which the archbishop who grants them may belong. A Lambeth degree in medicine does not, if granted after 30th June, 1858, entitle the holder to be registered as a medical practitioner (Medical Act, 1858, s. 15, Sch. (A) (10)) and the holder of such a degree who uses it for the purpose of implying that he is duly registered or that he is recognised by law as a physician commits an offence punishable upon summary conviction (ib. s. 40).

Degrees in divinity are those usually conferred by the archbishop: and such a degree is most usually given in the case of a bishop or other high dignitary who happens not to have obtained the corresponding degree at one of the universities.

Lammas. The 1st August. The word literally means "loaf-mass," being derived from the Anglo-Saxon hlaf (a loaf) and mæssc (mass). In Anglo-Saxon times a loaf was ceremonially offered in the churches on 1st August. · Old Lammas Day is the 12th August, which corresponds to the 1st August of the time before the calendar was reformed.

Lammas Lands are open arable and meadow lands, which are held by a number of owners in severalty during a portion of the year, and which after the severalty crop has been removed are commonable not only to the owners in severalty but to other classes of commoners, e.g., inhabitants of the parish, tenants and inhabitants of a manor, freemen or householders of a borough, or the owners or occupiers of ancient tenements within the parish, usually termed tofts. They derive their name from the former practice of keeping them open from Lammas Day to Lady Day next ensuing. The date of opening them is now August 12. See COMMON.

Lancaster. See DUCHY OF LANCASTER; HERALDS.

Land.—I. In its technical sense, as a word of description in conveyancing, pleading, etc., land, says Coke, "comprehendeth any ground, soile, or earth whatsoever: as meadowes, pastures, woods, moores, waters, marishes, furses and heath. It legally includeth also all castles, houses and other buildings: for castles, houses, etc., consist upon two things, viz., land or ground, as the foundation, and [the] structure thereupon, so as passing the land or ground, the structure or building thereupon passeth therewith. Also . . . waters . . . are not by that name demandable in a præcipe [that is, an action for the recovery of land]; but the land whereupon the water floweth or standeth is demandable; as for example, viginti acras terræ aquâ coopertas [twenty acres of land covered with water]. And lastly the earth hath in law a great extent upwards, not only of water, as hath been said, but of ayre [air] and all other things even up to heaven, for cujus est solum ejus est usque ad cœlum."

Land is divisible both horizontally (see CLOSE) and vertically. Therefore one man may be entitled to the surface of land, and another to the minerals under it (see (EASEMENT); or one man may have a fee simple in one story of a house, while the rest may belong to another.

Land is a tenement and a hereditament, and, therefore, belongs to the class of real property. See HEREDITAMENT; TENEMENT; REAL PROPERTY.

Rights in respect of land are of two kinds—(i) rights of ownership, although theoretically land is not the subject of ownership according to English law (see ESTATE; TENURE); and (ii) rights in alieno solo, which include easements and profits (q.v.).

II. In the old books, and in fines and the like, the word "land" strictly signified nothing but arable land; the reason given being that arable land was considered more beneficial to the country than pasture.

III. "In every Act passed after the year 1850 . . . the expression land shall include messuages, tenements and hereditaments, houses and buildings of any tenure . . . unless the contrary intention appears" (Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 3). The contrary intention appears in, for instance, the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891, s. 3 whereof enacts that "Land in the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888, and in this Act shall include tenements and hereditaments, corporeal or incorporeal, of any tenure, but not money secured on land or other personal estate arising from or connected with land."

See ACCUMULATION; EJECTMENT; LANDLORD AND TENANT; POSSESSION; SEISIN; VENDORS AND PURCHASERS.

Land Certificate. See CERTIFICATE.

Land Charge. The Land Charges Registration and Searches Act, 1888, s. 4, defines land charge as meaning in that Act "a rent or annuity or principal moneys payable by instalments, with or without interest, charged, otherwise than by deed, upon land, under the provisions of any Act of Parliament, for securing to any person either the moneys spent by him or the costs, charges and expenses incurred by him under such Act, or the moneys advanced by him for repaying the moneys spent or the costs, charges and expenses incurred by another person under the authority of an Act of Parliament, and a charge under the 35th section of the Land Drainage Act, 1861, or under the 29th section of the Agricultural Holdings (England) Act, 1883," for which latter enactment is now substituted s. 15 (as extended by the Agriculture Act, 1920, s. 22, Sch. I) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908. (See s. 19 of the Act of 1908.) S. 12 of the Act of 1888 provides for the registration of such charges. See IMPROVEMENT OF LAND; DRAINAGE; CHARGE.

The Land Charges Act, 1900, removed to the Land Charges Department of the Land Registry the register of land charges which previously had been kept in the Central Office.

The Acts of 1888 and 1900 deal not only with land charges properly so-called, but also with writs, orders, deeds of arrangement, lis pendens, annuities and executions, none of which can now affect land unless registered under the Acts.

Land-cheap. A customary fine paid in some manors on the alienation of copyholds.

Land Commissioners. See COPYHOLD COMMISSIONERS.

Landegandman. Anciently this meant a copyholder.

Land Gabel. Anciently a tax or rent issuing out of land. According to Spelman, the land gabel mentioned in Domesday was at the rate of a penny a year for each house.

Landirecta. This meant the Trinoda necessitas (q.v.).

Landlocked is an expression sometimes applied to a piece of land belonging to one person and surrounded by land belonging to other persons, so that it cannot be approached except over their land. See EASEMENT.

Landlord and Tenant. The relation of landlord and tenant is created by one person (the landlord) allowing another (the tenant) to occupy the landlord's house or land for a consideration termed rent, recoverable by distress.

In the absence of express agreement, the landlord impliedly contracts with the tenant to give him possession and guarantee him against eviction by any person having a title paramount to that of the landlord. On the other hand, the tenant impliedly contracts with the landlord to pay the rent, not to commit waste, and (subject to his right to compensation for disturbance, where such right exists — see AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS) to give up possession at the end of the tenancy.

Usually, however, the tenancy is regulated by the terms of a document called a lease (q.v.).

See DISTRESS; FIXTURES; NOTICE TO QUIT; RENT; TERM.

Land-man. A terre-tenant (Blount).

Land Registries, or registries for officially recording the title to, dealings with and charges on land are managed on two principles, namely, as registries of title and registries of assurances. A registry of title is an authentic and self-explanatory record of the state of the title to the land registered on it; that is to say, a piece of land appears on the register as belonging to A B, and if it is subject to a mortgage or charge in favour of C D, that also would appear. A registry of assurances or deeds, on the other hand, merely contains a statement of the existence of documents or assurances affecting the title to the land, by giving either a transcript or an epitome of each document (see MEMORIAL; MIDDLESEX), leaving the persons concerned to draw their own conclusions as to the effect of those documents on the title to the land.

As regards the district over which they extend, registries are of two kinds, general and local.

A general Land Registry for England and Wales was established by the Land Registry Act, 1862 ("Lord Westbury's Act"); but owing to the fact that it imposed on persons desirous of making use of it the necessity of showing a marketable title to, and defining the boundaries of, the land to be registered (both expensive and tedious, and in many cases impossible, processes), the Act was practically a failure, and (Land Transfer Act, 1875, s. 125) is no longer in operation, except as to land already registered under it. The next Act regulating the general registration of land was the Land Transfer Act, 1875, which created an office of Land Registry in London, consisting of a registrar, assistant registrar, etc., and (supplemented by the General Rules made under it) provides—(1) for the voluntary registration in six manners of existing titles to freehold land, and also leasehold land held on terms of a certain length (but not copyholds or customary freeholds); also of incorporeal hereditaments of freehold tenure, mines, fee farm grants, etc.; (2) for the transfer of registered land (see TRANSFER); (3) for the creation and transfer of charges on registered land (see CHARGE); (4) for the registration of titles, rights and interests to or in registered land acquired in consequence of the death, marriage, bankruptcy, etc., of a registered proprietor; (5) for the registration of notices as to the existence of leases and estates in dower or by the curtesy; and (6) for the protection of rights arising from unregistered dealings with registered land (see CAUTION; RESTRICTION). This Act also was a practical failure down to 1897, when Lord Halsbury procured the passage of the Land Transfer Act, 1897, which by s. 20 (1) enacts that registration of title to land may by Order in Council be made compulsory in any specified area and that within any such area no person can upon a sale acquire the legal estate in any freehold land unless upon such sale he is registered as proprietor of the land. Such Order in Council has been made in respect of the administrative county of London, which includes the City. Except within that area, the Act of 1875 is but little availed of.

Local land registries are for the registration of land within defined districts. By the Land Transfer Act, 1875, s. 118, power is given to the Lord Chancellor to create district registries for the registration (under the Act) of land within defined districts. No such district registries have been created, but local land registries, on the principle of registration of assurances, have existed in Middlesex and in each of the three ridings of Yorkshire for the last two hundred years, and in the Bedford Level (q.v.) since the reign of Charles II. As soon as land in any of these districts is registered in the general Land Registry, it becomes exempt from the jurisdiction of the local registry (Land Transfer Act, 1875, s. 127).

See TORRENS' SYSTEM; YORKSHIRE.

Lands Clauses Acts. This, before the enactment of the Interpretation Act, 1889, was the popular title, and since then (see s. 23) it has been, as regards England and Wales, the official title of the Lands Clauses Consolidation) Act, 1845, the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts Amendment Act, 1860, the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1869, the Lands Clauses (Umpire) Act, 1883, and any Acts for the time being in force amending the same. The Lands Clauses (Taxation of Costs) Act, 1895, is the only such additional Act.

These Acts, which are to be read as one, form a code under which land can be compulsorily acquired for public or quasi-public purposes, but only by way of the incorporation of the Acts with a special Act passed for a particular purpose. Such a special Act may be one for (1) the acquisition of land for purposes of national defence or official purposes; (2) the acquisition of land for local or municipal purposes by public bodies; or (3) the acquisition of land for commercial purposes of public utility by private persons or private corporations. As to the payment of purchase moneys into Court where owners of land for various reasons cannot convey, see ss. 69, 71, 72 of the Act of 1845.

Land Societies. See FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETIES, which mean the same thing.

Lands, Tenements and Hereditaments. This is the most comprehensive description of real property, as " goods and chattels " is of personalty. See HEREDITAMENT; LAND; TENEMENT.

Land Tax is a tax payable annually in respect of the beneficial ownership of land. The tax applies to land generally, with some exceptions, the most important of which are certain educational and charitable institutions enumerated in s. 25 of the Land Tax Act, 1797. If land subject to the tax is in lease, the tenant is primarily liable to pay the whole tax, but he is entitled (unless he has expressly agreed to pay it himself) to deduct from the rent so much of the tax as the landlord ought to bear in respect of the rent, so that if the rent is a rack-rent the landlord bears the whole tax. The tax was originally in 1692 levied under the statute 4 Will. and Mary, c. 1, at so much in the pound, but was afterwards imposed in 1698, under the statute 9 Will. 3, c. 10, in fixed amounts on the various counties, boroughs, cities, towns and liberties in England. From then down to 1797 the collection of the tax was authorised by a similar Act passed each year. In 1798 it was made perpetual by the Land Tax Perpetuation Act, 1798. The amounts payable by each county, borough, etc., were distributed or assessed at so much in the pound on the lands, tenements and hereditaments in each county, borough, etc., by commissioners under the Land Tax Act, 1797. The maximum rate of the tax was 4s. in the £1 under the Land Tax Redemption Act, 1802, ss. 180, 181, but this was reduced to 1s. in the £1 by the Finance Act, 1896, s. 31. The land tax was first made redeemable by the Land Tax Perpetuation Act, 1798; and under that and subsequent statutes about one-half of the whole amount of the tax has been redeemed.

No land tax is payable by an owner if his income does not exceed £160, and tax at only half rate is payable if his income is under £400 (Finance Act, 1898, s. 12; Finance (No. 2) Act, 1915, s. 21 (5); Finance Act, 1920, s. 63).

Land Tax Commission. This consists of (1) a number of persons appointed from time to time by various statutes which enact that the persons named in schedules deposited with the Clerk of the House of Commons shall be Land Tax Commissioners, and (2) of justices of the peace as regards the areas for which they hold the commission of the peace. The latest of such statutes is the Land Tax Commissioners Act, 1906.

These Commissioners, two of whom are a quorum (Taxes Management Act, 1880, ss. 21, 35), have power to decide without appeal all questions as to the assessment and collection of land tax (Land Tax Act, 1797, s. 23).

Land Tenants. Used in the English version of the statute 14 Edw. 3, st. 1, c. 3, as the equivalent of terres tenantz. See TERRE TENANT.

Land Transfer Acts. See LAND REGISTRIES; EXECUTOR.

Land Values Duties. These were duties imposed by the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, Pt. I., which comprises ss. 1-42 of that Act. They were (1) increment value duty; (2) reversion duty; (3) undeveloped land, and (4) mineral rights duty (q.v.). All that need be said of them here is that they all, except mineral rights duty, gave more trouble to collect than they were worth; and the Finance Act, 1920, s. 57, provided that as from the commencement of that Act none of them, except mineral rights duty, should be payable.

Land Waiter. An obsolete designation of a customs officer who enforced upon land the payment of customs duties upon goods before export and after import. The Tidewaiter (q.v.) boarded ships for the same purpose.

Langdale's (Lord) Act. A former popular title of the Wills Act, 1837.

Langemanni. Used in Domesday to mean, according to Coke (1 Inst. 5), lords of manors.

Languidus. See DUCES TECUM LICET LANGUIDUS.

Lanis de crescentia Walliæ traducendis absque custuma. Anciently this was a writ connected with the trade in wool.

Lano niger. In the reign of Edward I. this appears to have been the name of a species of base coin.

Lapis marmorius. A large marble slab in Westminster Hall on which the king's chair was formerly placed at the coronation banquet.

Lapse. As a general rule, when a person to whom property has been devised or bequeathed dies before the testator, the devise or bequest fails or lapses, and the property goes as if the gift had not been made;—consequently, if a testator bequeaths £100 to A (or to A "his executors or administrators") and the residue of his property to B, then, if A dies during the lifetime of the testator, the legacy lapses and falls into the residue, that is, it goes to B on the testator's death. There are, however, some exceptions to this rule. Thus if property is given to several persons as joint tenants, on the death of one of them during the lifetime of the testator the whole goes to the survivors. And if land is given to a person in tail who dies before the testator, leaving issue capable of taking under the entail, the land goes as if the devisee had died immediately after the testator (Wills Act, 1837, s. 32). And if a testator bequeaths (or devises) property to a child or other descendant of himself, and such descendant dies leaving issue who survive the testator, the legacy (or devise) does not lapse but takes effect as if the person to whom the gift was made had died immediately after the testator (ib. s. 33).

In ecclesiastical law, a lapse occurs when a benefice becomes void and the patron neglects to present within six months after the avoidance. In such a case the patronage devolves from the patron to the bishop (see COLLATION) and on the neglect of the bishop to the metropolitan, and on the neglect of the latter to the Crown. In criminal proceedings, "lapse" is used in the same sense as "abate" in civil procedure, that is to say, it means that the proceedings come to an end from the death of the accused or some other event. The death of the complainant or prosecutor does not cause a lapse. See ABATEMENT OF CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS.

Larceny in the common law was the wrongful or fraudulent taking and carrying away, without colour of right, of the personal goods of another from any place, with a felonious intent to convert them to his (the taker's) own use, and make them his own property, without the consent of the owner.

The Larceny Act, 1861, repealed, amended, and re-enacted all the pre-existing enactments as to larceny and cognate offences. It has been to a large extent repealed and replaced by the Larceny Act, 1916. The two Acts now form a complete code on the subject.

Stealing, for which no special punishment is provided by the Larceny Act, 1916, or any other Act, is simple larceny (Larceny Act, 1916, s. 2).

Formerly larceny was distinguished as grand or petty, according as the value of the property did or did not exceed twelve pence. This was abolished by the Larceny Act, 1861, s. 2.

See ANIMALS FERÆ NATURÆ; EMBEZZLEMENT; BURGLARY; FALSE PRETENCES; HOUSE BREAKING; MISAPPROPRIATION.

Larding Money. This was a small customary annual payment made by the tenants of the Manor of Bradford, in Wiltshire.

Last. See DAKIR.

Lastage. This seems to have meant, amongst other things, a toll payable by traders attending fairs and markets.

In London it was one of the metage (q.v.) dues.

Last Court. An obsolete administrative assembly in the Cinque Ports constituted of the bailiffs (q.v.) and jurats (q.v.).

Last Day of Term. Before the abolition of terms (q.v.) it was the custom of the common law courts on the last day of each term that the junior bar should move its motions first, and that they should begin with the barrister junior in point of standing and end with the senior. The inner bar then moved, but in order of seniority.

Last Heir. He to whom land came for want of heirs, whether the king or the lord, was formerly known as the last heir. See ESCHEAT.

Lata culpa dolo æquiparatur. (Gross negligence is equivalent to fraud.) "But," said Lord Esher in Le Lievre v. Gould (1893), 1 Q.B. 491, "negligence, however great, does not of itself constitute fraud," that is to say in our law. The maxim applies only in the civil law.

Latent. See AMBIGUITY.

Lathe is a division or district of a county, consisting of three or four hundreds. They only occur in Kent under this name; but they also occur in Sussex under the name of rapes. See COUNTY; HUNDRED. A law Latin form was lada.

Latimer. Used by Coke (2 Inst. 515) as meaning an interpreter. Camden suggests, and Murray agrees, that it may be a corruption of latiner, that is, one who knew Latin.

Latin. See FALSE LATIN; FRENCH.

Latinarius. Used in Domesday as meaning one able to translate Latin.

Latin Information. See ENGLISH INFORMATION.

Latitat. See BILL OF MIDDLESEX.

Latro; Latrocinium. These words generally meant respectively a robber (latro) and latrocinium (robbery): but in Leg. W. 1 latro is used a meaning one having exclusive local jurisdiction in cases of robbery and in a charter of Hen. I. latrocinium is used in the same sense.

Laudibus legum Angliæ, De. See FORTESCUE.

Laughe. Used by Reeves (1787), Vol. 2, p. 17, as meaning frank-pledge; but his authority for this use of the word is not clear. The word appears to be merely a variant of law.

Laureate. See POET LAUREATE.

Laurel; Laureate. A popular name of the unite (see GOLD COINS) which represented the king's head as having a laurel wreath round it.

Law is used in two principal senses, the idea common to both of them being uniformity of action. In one sense the name "law" is merely the expression for a uniformity of action which has been observed: as when we speak of the laws of gravitation, or say that crystals are formed according to certain laws: here the law follows from the uniformity. In the other sense, the law produces the uniformity, that is, the law is a rule of action. To this latter class belong the Law of Nature (using that term in the sense of rules imposed, as Blackstone puts it, on man by his Maker) and laws of human origin. Human laws again are either (i) social (such as the so-called laws of honour, morality, etc.), or (ii) political, the latter being divisible into (a) international law, and (b) positive law, that is to say, law capable of judicial enforcement, or law in the technical sense of the word. As to international law, see that title.

Law, as the subject of jurisprudence, is used in three senses.

I. In its widest sense, law is an aggregate of rules enforcible by judicial means in a given country; thus, we speak of the law of England as opposed to the law of France or the Roman law. This kind of law is called territorial or municipal law to distinguish it from international law and is of the following kinds—

A. With reference to its origin, law is derived either from judicial precedents, from legislation or from custom. That part of the law of England which is derived from judicial precedents is called common law, equity, or admiralty, probate or ecclesiastical law, according to the nature of the Courts by which it was originally enforced (see the respective titles). That part of the law which is derived from legislation is called the statute law: many statutes are classed under one of the divisions above mentioned, because they have merely modified or extended portions of it, while others have created altogether new rules. That part of the law which is derived from custom is sometimes called the customary law, as to which see CUSTOM.

The ordinary, but not very useful, division of law into written and unwritten, rests on the same principle. The written law is the statute law, the unwritten law is the common law (q.v.).

B. With reference to its subject-matter, law is either public or private. Public law is that part of the law which deals with the State, either by itself or in its relations with individuals, and is called (1) constitutional, when it regulates the relations between the various divisions of the sovereign power; and (2) administrative, when it regulates the business which the State has to do; the most important branches of the latter class are (a) the criminal law and the law for the prevention of crimes; (b) the law relating to education, public health, the poor, etc.; (c) ecclesiastical law; and (d) the law of judicial procedure (courts of law, evidence, etc.).

Private or civil law deals with those relations between individuals with which the State is not directly concerned: as in the relations between husband and wife, parent and child, and the various kinds of property, contracts, torts, trusts, legacies, the rights recognised by the rules of Admiralty law, etc. (See COMMON LAW; EQUITY; ADMIRALTY ACTION; ADMIRAL.) Even here, however, the Courts take cognizance, to a certain extent, of the indirect effects of private conduct on the community in general; they accordingly refuse to sanction contracts which are immoral, or in restraint of trade or marriage, or are otherwise against public policy. See PUBLIC POLICY.

C. Law is also divided by the Benthamite school into substantive and adjective. Substantive law is that part of the law which creates rights and obligations, while adjective law provides a method of enforcing and protecting them. In other words, adjective law is the law of procedure.

II. In a narrower sense, "law" signifies a rule of law, especially one of statutory origin; and hence,

III. In its narrowest sense, "law" is equivalent to "statute"; as when we speak of the Poor Laws, the Corn Laws, etc.

As to the distinction between law and fact, see FACT. See also RESPONDEAT OUSTER.

Law Christian. Anciently this meant the ecclesiastical law as distinguished from the common law.

Law-day. A day on which Courts, more especially the old Courts of the shire and the hundred, were held; hence used for the sitting of such a Court or for the Court itself.

Lawful Day. A day on which legal business may be done. Compare DIES NON.

Lawful Heirs; Lawful Issue; Heirs Lawfully Begotten. In these expressions the words "lawful" or "lawfully begotten" are mere redundances and do not affect the meaning of the words "heir" or "issue" (q.v.).

Lawing of Dogs. Expeditation (q.v.).

Lawless Court. A manor Court anciently held on Kingshill, at Rochford, in Essex, at cockcrow on the morning of the Wednesday next following Michaelmas Day. It belonged to the honor (q.v.) of Raleigh.

Lawless Man. The same as ex lex (q.v.).

Law List. The annual publication known as the Law List purports to be published, so far as relates to the solicitors and the conveyancer (not at the bar) whose names appear therein, under the authority (see the title page) of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. The Solicitors Act, 1860, s. 22, makes the list primâ facie evidence that any solicitor or conveyancer whose name appears therein holds the prescribed certificate for the current year and that any solicitor or conveyancer whose name does not appear therein does not hold such certificate.

Law Merchant. See CUSTOM.

Law Officers of the Crown. These, more generally described as the Law Officers, are the Attorney-General (q.v.) and the Solicitor-General (q.v.). Down to 1872 the Advocate-General (q.v.) was also included in the expression. The use of the expression is in general merely colloquial: but for the purposes of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, the term "law officer" is expressly declared to mean the Attorney-General or Solicitor-General (ib. s. 93).

Law of Nations is the old-fashioned equivalent for "International Law," or, more strictly, "Public International Law"(q.v.). It is a literal translation of the Latin phrase jus gentium, which, however, did not mean the law governing the conduct of States in their relations with one another, but those rules of law which are common to all civilised nations: "vocaturque jus gentium, quasi quo jure omnes gentes utuntur," says Justinian.

Law of Nature. See LAW.

Law Reports. See REPORT.

Law Society. In or before the year 1739, the "Society of Gentlemen Practisers in the Courts of Law and Equity" was formed, and in 1819 another society, called the "Metropolitan Law Society," came into existence, the object of both societies being the prevention of abuses amongst solicitors, attorneys and proctors. In 1825 a society, known as the "Law Society," was formed. This latter society received a charter of incorporation in 1831; it was thenceforth known as the Incorporated Law Society; and the societies which had preceded it became defunct. The Incorporated Law Society received in 1845 a further royal charter, in which it is referred to as "The Society of Attorneys, Solicitors and Proctors, and others, not being barristers, practising in the Courts of Law and Equity of the United Kingdom." Under the Solicitors Act, 1843, s. 2, the Society was made registrar of attorneys and solicitors: the custody of the roll of solicitors, which previously had been with the Clerk of the Petty Bag (q.v.), was transferred to it by the Solicitors Act, 1888, s. 5. Since 1877 no person can be admitted as a solicitor unless he has obtained from the Society a certificate that he has passed certain examinations (Solicitors Act, 1877, s. 5): it issues the annual certificate without which a solicitor cannot practise (Solicitors Act, 1843, ss. 21, 26). Under the Solicitors Act, 1888, s. 13, the committee of the Society investigated complaints against solicitors, and in a suitable case brought the matter before the Court in order to have the solicitor struck off the roll; and now, under the Solicitors Act, 1919, s. 5, the committee, in addition to investigating, can itself strike off the roll, the offender being, however, given by s. 8 a right of appeal to the Court.

The charters already referred to were supplemented by others granted in 1872, 1903 and 1909. In the charter of 1903 the Society is described as the Law Society: that is now its official description and is used in the Solicitors Acts, 1919 and 1922.

Lay Days (or laying days), in the law of merchant shipping, are the days which are allowed by a charter-party for loading and unloading the ship. If the vessel is detained beyond the period allowed, demurrage (q.v.) becomes payable. See CHARTER-PARTY.

Lay-fee. Lands held in fee of a lay lord, and subject to the ordinary services, as distinguished from lands held in frankalmoign discharged from such services.

Lay Impropriator. See IMPROPRIATION.

Lay Investiture. The putting of a bishop into possession of the temporalities of his see. This takes place when he performs homage (q.v.).

Lay Rector. The same as lay impropriator (q.v.).

Lazaret; Lazaretto. Formerly this meant a place in which a person coming from a country in which there was infectious disease performed quarantine. See, for instance, the title of the repealed statute 39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 80.

Lead. When fines (q.v) and recoveries (q.v.) were used as modes of conveying land any complicated limitations, such as those in settlements, which might be required were effected by deeds specifying the uses to which the lands were to be held. If the deed was executed before the fine or recovery it was called a deed to lead to the uses; if afterwards it was called a deed to declare the uses.

Leading Case is a judicial decision or precedent settling the principles of a branch of law. Thus Coggs v. Bernard is the leading case on the law of bailments (q.v.). Mr. J. W. Smith published an excellent selection of leading cases, principally illustrating rules of the common law. His example has been followed by Messrs. White and Tudor in their Leading Cases in Equity, and by Mr. Cockle in his Leading Cases on Evidence and his Leading Cases on the Common Law.

Leading Questions, on the examination of a witness, are questions which directly or indirectly suggest to him the answer he is to give, or questions embodying a material fact and admitting of the answer "Yes" or "No." The general rule is that leading questions are allowed in cross-examination, but not in examination in chief.

Lease. A lease is in effect a conveyance or grant of the possession of property (generally but not necessarily land or buildings) to last during the life of a person, or for a term of years or other fixed period, or at will, and usually with the reservation of a rent. Leases for a life or lives are comparatively rare, and when a lease is spoken of, primâ facie a lease for years is meant. The person who grants the lease is called the lessor, the person to whom it is granted being the lessee; until he accepts the estate he has merely an interesse termini (q.v.), unless the lease takes effect under the Statute of Uses. It is essential to a lease that it should be for a less estate or term than the lessor has in the property, for if it comprises his whole interest it is a conveyance or assignment and not a lease. Again, if the intention of the parties is that the grantee is not to be entitled to exclusive possession of the property, the grant is a licence and not a lease.

A lease for years or at will is a chattel interest. See CHATTEL; ESTATE; LEASEHOLDS.

Where a person who is himself a lessee grants a lease of the same property to another person for a shorter term, it is properly called an underlease or sublease or a derivative lease.

A concurrent lease, or lease of a reversion, is one granted for a term which is to commence before the determination of a previous lease of the same land to another person. If under seal, it operates as an assignment of the reversion during the continuance of the previous lease, so that the new lessee is entitled to the rent and covenants under the previous lease; and after the expiration of that lease, it (the concurrent lease) operates as a lease in possession.

A lease in reversion is a lease which is not to take effect in possession immediately, and the term "reversionary lease" is sometimes used in the same sense: but strictly speaking a reversionary lease is one to take effect from the expiration or determination of a previous lease. It only creates an interesse termini.

With reference to the right or authority under which they are granted, leases are made either (1) under a right or power incident to the lessor's estate; thus a tenant in fee has power to grant leases for any term: or (2) under a power of appointment or limitation to uses; as where land is limited to A and his heirs, to such uses as B shall by demise appoint (see POWER); or (3) under a statutory power, e.g., under the Settled Land Acts (q.v.): or (4) by virtue of a custom; thus an infant seised of land holden in socage may, by the custom of some places, make binding leases at the age of 15: or (5) by virtue of an authority given by the common law; thus a guardian in socage or by election may in some cases grant leases of the infant's lands.

As to leases by estoppel, see ESTOPPEL.

Leases are made either by deed: or by writing not under seal (called by the old writers "leases parol"): or without writing. The only leases of land or other corporeal hereditaments which need not be made by deed are leases at will, or for a term not exceeding three years under the Statute of Frauds (q.v.), and in practice the term lease commonly denotes a lease by deed.

A lease by deed in the ordinary form consists of the following parts: the premises, the habendum, the reddendum, the lessee's covenants, the proviso for re-entry, and the lessor's covenants (see those titles). The covenants in a lease are generally much more important than those in a conveyance; they vary according to the nature of the lease, but ordinarily they include covenants by the lessee for payment of the rent, and if the lease is one of a building, to repair and insure it, or if it is one of a farm or mine, to manage it in a proper manner; in a lease of a building there is also generally a covenant by the lessee not to underlet or assign the lease without the lessor's consent, and not to carry on certain trades or occupations, and a covenant for quiet enjoyment which merely guarantees the lessee against entry by the lessor and those claiming under him. The covenant implied by statute (see COVENANT) guarantees the lessee against entry by all persons whatsoever: it will be excluded if there be—and there usually is—an express covenant.

The rent and covenants are always binding on the original lessee and his representatives, notwithstanding any assignment which he may make. On assigning leaseholds, therefore, the assignee is bound to enter into a covenant with the assignor to indemnify him against this liability. The assignee is himself also liable for rent unpaid or covenants broken during his tenancy (provided the covenants run with the land, as to which see COVENANT); but when he assigns to another, his liability ceases so far as regards future rent or breaches of covenant. As to the statutory provisions enabling trustees in bankruptcy to get rid of liabilities under leases vested in them, see DISCLAIMER.

Leases are generally prepared in two parts, known as the lease and the counterpart: the lease is executed by the lessor alone, and is kept by the lessee; the counterpart is executed by the lessee alone, and is kept by the lessor.

Leases are in some cases subject to statutory provisions; such are leases at a rack-rent by tenants for life (as to which see EMBLEMENTS), and leases subject to the Agricultural Holdings Acts (q.v.).

The statutes under which ecclesiastical corporations sole or aggregate can grant leases of Church property are collected in Chitty's Statutes under the title "Leases, Ecclesiastical."

See ATTORNMENT; DEMISE; DISTRESS; GAME; RENT; TERM; USE AND OCCUPATION; BUILDING LEASE.

Lease and Release. This is a mode of conveying freehold land which was in common use from 1536 down to the year 1841. It was used to evade the Statute of Enrolments, 27 Hen. 8, c. 16, passed to prevent land from being conveyed secretly by bargain and sale (q.v.). The Act required only bargains and sales of estates of inheritance or freehold to be enrolled, and therefore it soon became the practice on a sale of land for the vendor to execute a lease to the purchaser for a year by way of bargain and sale, which under the Statute of Uses, 27 Hen. 8, c. 10, gave him seisin of the land without entry or enrolment, and then the vendor released his reversion to the purchaser by a deed known as a release, thus vesting in him the fee simple in possession without entry or livery of seisin. The lease and the release were executed on the same day, the release being dated for the following day and being executed after the lease. The consideration for the lease was a nominal sum of five or ten shillings, which was never paid, the real consideration being stated in the release. In 1841 the statute 4 Vict. c. 21, made a release effectual without the preliminary lease for a year, and in 1845 the Real Property Amendment Act, 1845, made a deed of grant sufficient for the conveyance of all corporeal hereditaments.

A release is still used (1) between joint tenants and coparceners (2) for the conveyance, to the owner of land, of rights over the land held by a person other than the owner (3) for the purpose of merging a remainder or reversion in the prior estate.

Before 1536 conveyance of lands of all tenures by lease and release had been practised: but the method differed from that used after 1536, there being first the lease, then an actual entry on the land by the bargainee or lessee, and then the release. It was the Statute of Uses that rendered actual entry unnecessary and so made the later form of lease and release practicable.

Until the Statute of Frauds was enacted in 1677 it was not necessary that the lease and release should be in writing.

Leaseholds are lands held under a lease for years. They are personal estate, being chattels real. But for the purposes of the Succession Duty Act, 1853 (q.v.), Locke King's Act (q.v.), and the statute 27 Eliz. c. 4 (see VOLUNTARY), leaseholds are on the same footing as real estate. And by the Wills Act, 1837, s. 26, a general devise of land, or lands and tenements, or the like, will include the testator's leasehold estates, unless a contrary intention appears.

Leave and Licence. In an action for trespass to goods it is a good defence to plead that the act complained of was done with the "leave and licence," that is to say, the permission, of the plaintiff.

Leave to Defend. See JUDGMENT.

Leave to Move to set aside or vary a judgment might formerly be given by the judge at the trial of an action, when some point of law was raised, the decision of which affected the fate of the action; the motion was heard by a Divisional Court. This practice was abolished in 1876: see the Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1876, s. 17. See MOTION FOR JUDGMENT; TRIAL.

Leeman's Acts. The Banking Companies (Shares) Act, 1867, and the Borough Funds Act, 1872, are known by this name.

Leet. See COURT LEET.

Legacy; Legatee. A legacy is a gift of personal property by will. The person to whom the property is given is called the legatee, and the gift or property is called a bequest (q.v.). The legatee's title to the legacy is not complete until the executor has assented to it. See ASSENT.

Legacies are of three kinds, specific, demonstrative and general.

A specific legacy is a bequest of a specific part of the testator's personal estate. Thus, a bequest of "the service of plate which was presented to me on such an occasion," is specific, and so also is a bequest of "£100 Consols standing in my name at the Bank of England." A specific legacy must be paid or retained by the executor in preference to the general legacies, and must not be sold for the payment of debts until the general assets of the testator are exhausted. See ASSETS.

On the other hand, a specific legacy is liable to ademption (q.v.), unless it is given in such a way as to refer to the state of the property at the testator's death; thus, a bequest of "the black horses which I shall be possessed of at my death," is specific, but it takes effect if the testator leaves property answering the description, although he may have sold the black horses which he had at the date of his will. A demonstrative legacy is a gift of a certain sum directed to be paid out of a specific fund; thus, "I bequeath to A B the sum of £50 to be paid out of the £100 Consols in my name," is a demonstrative legacy. Such a legacy is not adeemed by the testator selling or disposing of the fund in his lifetime, while it also has the advantage of being paid in priority to the general legacies if the fund is sufficient. A general legacy is one payable only out of the general assets of the testator: as where he bequeaths to A £100 sterling, or £100 Consols, without referring to any particular stock, although he may have £100 Consols standing in his name. So a legacy of a mourning ring of the value of £10 merely amounts to a general legacy of £10, with a direction to the executor to purchase a ring. A general legacy is liable to abatement or total failure, if the residuary estate is not sufficient to pay the testator's debts and other legacies (see ABATEMENT) unless it is given for valuable consideration, e.g., to a wife in consideration of her releasing her dower.

Where personal property is bequeathed to trustees to be held upon trust, e.g., to pay the income to A B for life—this is called a trust legacy.

Where a legacy is given to an infant or person beyond the seas, the executor may pay the amount into Court in the Chancery Division under Ord. 54 (b), r. 4, and Supreme Court Funds Rules, r. 41, and when the legatee comes of age, or returns, he may have it paid out to him on making an application by petition or summons. See PAYMENT INTO COURT.

Legacy Duty. A duty of trifling amount was first imposed only on legacies of the value of £20 and upwards by the statute 20 Geo. 3, c. 28, s. 1; and by the Legacy Duty Act, 1796, s. 1, a duty was imposed on the value of legacies of the like value and also upon every part of any residuary personal estate of the value of £100, the rate of the duty running from 2 per cent. in the case of any brother, sister, nephew, or niece, to 6 per cent. in the case of a stranger. The incidence and the rate of duty were subsequently varied by a multiplicity of Acts; and now legacy duty is payable in respect of a deceased person domiciled in the United Kingdom on every legacy and on every succession upon the intestacy of such a person, except where exemption is specifically allowed. Leaseholds are not subject to legacy duty: but succession duty (q.v.) is paid on them. The effect of the Stamp Act, 1815, s. 2, Sch. (Pt. III.) and of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, s. 58, is that the rates of the duty are in the case of (1) a husband or wife or lineal ancestor or lineal descendants of the deceased, 1 per cent., (2) of brothers or sisters of the deceased or their lineal descendants, 5 per cent.; and (3) of any other person whatsoever, 10 per cent. But no legacy duty and no succession (q.v.) duty is payable (1) where the principal value of the property passing and liable to estate duty (excluding property in which the deceased never had an interest and property of which he was never competent to dispose and which on the death passes to anyone other than the husband, wife or lineal ancestor or descendant) does not exceed £15,000 and (2) where the total legacies or successions derived by the same person do not exceed £1,000 or, in the case of a widow or child under twenty-one of the deceased, £2,000 (Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, s. 58). Except in these cases, legacy duty is payable on everything except realty in addition to estate duty.

Legal is opposed (i) to that which is illegal or unlawful (see those titles); (ii) to that which is equitable (q.v.). As to legal memory, see MEMORY.

Legal Assets. See ASSETS.

Legal Estate. See ESTATE.

Legalis homo. (A "lawful man.") This anciently meant a man who was neither infamous, outlawed, nor excommunicated.

Legalise; Legalisation. When an act which is primâ facie illegal becomes legal, it is said to be legalised: thus many acts done upon a man's own property, which are injurious to the adjoining land and consequently actionable as nuisances, may be legalised by prescription, and thus form easements (q.v.).

When the execution of a document is attested by a notary, consul, magistrate, or the like, it is sometimes said to be legalised. This expression is borrowed from the French; it can hardly be said to be a technical term of law.

Legal Medicine. See FORENSIC MEDICINE.

Legal Quay. A place appointed by warrant of the Treasury (issued pursuant to s. 11 of the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876) for the loading and unloading of goods liable to duties.

Legatus regis vice fungitur a quo destinatur et honorandus est sicut ille cujus vicem gerit (12 Co. 17). (An ambassador fills the place of the king by whom he is sent, and is to be honoured as is he whose place he fills.) There seems to be an idea in some quarters that a British ambassador represents the Prime Minister: this is a mistake, but within recent years it has led an ambassador to refuse to receive a journalist who had written injuriously regarding a politician who happened to be Prime Minister.

Legem facere; Legem habere. Legem facere in the reign of Edward I. meant to institute legal proceedings by oath; and legem habere meant to possess the right legem facere.

Legergeld; Legerwite. The same as LAIRWITE (q.v.).

Leges Edwardi Confessoris. See EDWARD THE CONFESSOR, LAWS OF.

Leges et constitutiones futuris certum est dare formam negotiis non ad facta præterita revocari; nisi nominatim et de præterito tempore et adhuc pendentibus negotiis cautum sit (Cod. 1, 14, 7). (It is clear that laws and ordinances settle the course of future transactions and do not refer to bygone matters, unless their provisions relate expressly both to a past time—and to matters hitherto pending.) This maxim of the Roman law applies also in our law with the insertion of the words "or impliedly" after "expressly": see L. R. 6 Q. B. 23. Compare LEX PROSPICIT, ETC.

Leges Henrici Primi. See HENRY I., LAWS OF.

Leges posteriores priores contrarias abrogant (1 Co. 25). (Later laws abrogate prior contrary laws.) See LEGES ET CONSTITUTIONES, ETC.; and compare GENERALIA SPECIALIBUS NON, ETC.

Legis constructio non facit injuriam (Co. Litt. 183). (The law is construed so as not to work a wrong.) See CONSTRUCTIO LEGIS.

Legislative Committee. See NATIONAL ASSEMBLY, ETC.

Legitimacy; Legitimate. "Legitimate" signifies "lawful." The word is applied especially to children to signify that they have been born in lawful wedlock.

Under the Legitimacy Declaration Act, 1858, a natural-born subject of Great Britain may apply to the High Court, in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division, for a declaration that he is legitimate, or that his parents or grandparents were validly married, or that he himself is validly married, or that he is a natural-born subject of the King. A judgment made on such a petition is in rem, that is binding on all the world.

See BASTARD; CHILD; MULIER; LYNDHURST'S ACT.

Legitime imperanti parere necesse est (Jenk. Cent. 120). (It is necessary to obey him who gives an order as of right.) Compare JUS NON HABENTI, ETC.

Legrewita. The Latinised form of LEGERWITE (q.v.).

Leibnitz. Gottfried Wilhelm Leibnitz was born on the 3rd July, 1646, in Leipzig, and died at Hanover on the 14th November, 1716. He wrote Methodus nova jurisprudentiæ, Codex juris gentium diplomaticus, Observationes de principiis juris, and numerous miscellaneous works.

Lent. The forty days next preceding Easter Sunday (q.v.). See FAST DAYS.

Lep and Lace. Formerly a custom of the Manor of Writtel, in Essex, that every wheeled vehicle, other than that of a peer, which passed over the place known as Greenbury should pay fourpence to the lord.

Leproso amovendo, De. A writ which anciently lay to remove any leper who intruded himself upon his neighbours in the church or other public place.

Le Roy (1) le veut, (2) s'avisera, (3) remercie ses bons sujets. See ACT OF PARLIAMENT.

Le salut du peuple est la suprême loi. Montesquieu's translation of Salus populi suprema lex (q.v.).

Lèse-majesté. See LÆSÆ MAJESTATIS.

Le serement du visconte. (The Oath of the Sheriff.) An enactment printed in the Statutes of the Realm (vol. 1, p. 247) as of uncertain date, and in the Statutes at Large as of 34 Edw. I.

Les estatus de Excestre. (The Statutes of Exeter). Two enactment printed under these collective titles in the Statutes of the Realm (vol. 1, p. 210), s.v. Statutes of Uncertain Date, and in the Statutes at Large as 14 Edw. 1.

Les estatus de la Jeuerie. (The Statutes of Jewry.) An enactment printed under these titles in the Statutes of the Realm (vol. 1, p. 221), s.v. Statutes of Uncertain Date; printed also in the Statutes at Large (vol. 9, App., p. 28), as the Statutum de Judeismo.

Les estatuz del eschekere. (The Statutes of the Exchequer.) An enactment printed in vol. 1 of the Statutes of the Realm at p. 189, amongst the Statutes of Uncertain Date, and in the Statutes at Large, as 51 Hen. 3, st. 4, 5.

Leshchewes. (Windfalls.) (Broke's Abr. 341).

Lespegend. Used in the forged Constitutiones de Foresta (see CANUTE) as the title of a minor officer of the forest.

Lessee; Lessor. In the most general sense of the words, "where a man letteth to another lands or tenements for terme of life, or for terme of years, or to hold at will, he which maketh the lease is called lessor, and he to whom the lease is made is called lessee," says Littleton (§ 57).

In practice, however, the terms "lessor" and "lessee" are only used in the case of a lease for years, for occupation, building or mining purposes, or the like.

See LEASE; TERM; TENANT FOR LIFE; TENANT FOR YEARS.

Lestage. A form of lastage (q.v.) used by some old writers.

Leswes; Lesues. Used as meaning pastures in ancient conveyances.

Letare Jerusalem. See QUADRAGESIMALS.

Letter. With regard to contracts or agreements entered into by letter, the leading rule is, that a person who makes a proposal to another by letter is considered in law as making it during the whole time that the letter is travelling, and that as soon as the acceptor despatches his acceptance, he may treat the contract as complete. In other words, an acceptance by letter is complete as against the proposer from the date of posting the acceptance, if it arrives within the proper time. What is a "proper time" depends on whether the proposer has prescribed a mode and time of communicating the acceptance; if he has not, it depends on the nature of the business in hand. If however, the communication of the acceptance is delayed by the fault of the proposer, or by accident, the delay is not to be reckoned against the acceptor. The true principle also is, that the acceptor is at liberty to revoke his acceptance at any time before it reaches the proposer (e.g., by telegraph), but this principle does not yet seem to have been established by any decision. The result is that if a person makes a proposal by post and does not receive an answer as soon as he expected, he cannot assume that the proposal has been rejected, except at his own risk.

Letter Missive, in ecclesiastical law, is a document sent with the congé d'élire to the dean and chapter, containing the name of the person whom they are to elect. See CONGÉ D'ÉLIRE.

Under the practice of the Court of Chancery, before a peer was served with the bill in a suit, he was formerly entitled to be informed by a communication from the Lord Chancellor, termed a letter missive, of the fact of the bill having been filed. See BILL OF COMPLAINT.

Letter of Credit. A letter of credit is an authority by one person (A) to another (B) to draw cheques or bills of exchange (with or without a limit as to amount) upon him (A) with an undertaking by A to honour the drafts on presentation. An ordinary letter of credit also contains the name of the person (A's correspondent) by whom the drafts are to be negotiated or cashed: when it does not do so, it is called an open letter of credit.

A letter of credit is in fact a proposal or request to the person named therein, or (in the case of an open letter) to persons generally, to advance money on the faith of it, and the advance constitutes an acceptance of the proposal, thus making a contract between the giver of the letter of credit and the person cashing or negotiating the draft, by which the former is bound to honour the draft. See AGREEMENT.

Letters of credit are sometimes used in conjunction with circular notes, in which case the letter of credit is called a letter of indication. Circular notes are forms of drafts, generally for some specific amount, given with the letter and requiring to be signed by the bearer. Circular notes are chiefly used by persons travelling abroad, and may be obtained from almost any banker.

Letter of Licence was an agreement between a debtor and his creditors that the latter should for a specified time suspend their claims, and allow the debtor to carry on his business at his own discretion. Down to the virtual abolition by the Debtors Act (q.v.) of arrest for debt, it also contained an agreement by the creditors not to arrest the debtor. It was usually contained in a provision that the business should be carried on under the inspection and control of persons nominated by the creditors, who were called inspectors, and the agreement then became, and was termed, a deed of inspectorship.

The object of these instruments was to avoid bankruptcy proceedings. Neither of them is known in our present law of bankruptcy.

See COMPOSITION; BANKRUPTCY.

Letters Close (Literæ clausæ) are letters or missives in the name of the Sovereign, and sealed with the Great Seal, being directed to particular persons for particular purposes; they are closed up and sealed on the outside, whence their name. See LETTERS PATENT.

Letters of Administration. Where a person possessed of property, whether real or personal, dies intestate, or without an executor, the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division will grant to a proper person an authority under the seal of the Court, called letters of administration, by which the grantee, the administrator, becomes clothed with powers and duties similar to those of an executor (q.v.). In addition to the oaths taken by the administrator, which are similar to those taken by an executor (see PROBATE), he enters into a bond. See ADMINISTRATION BOND.

If the deceased died wholly intestate, simple letters of administration are granted to one of the next of kin (e.g., the widow or children of the deceased), or, if they renounce, to a creditor or other person, according to certain rules. If a will of the deceased exists, but no executor has been appointed, or the executor appointed pre-deceases the testator, or refuses or becomes incapable to act, the Court will grant (as a general rule, to the person having the greatest interest under the will, e.g., the residuary legatee) letters of administration with the will annexed (cum testamento annexo), a grant which is similar to probate of the will.

As to limited grants of letters of administration, see GRANT.

Letter of administration are liable to the same stamp duty as probates.

Letters of Attorney. More generally known as a power of attorney (q.v.).

Letters of Business. These are instruments under the Sign Manual addressed by the Crown to the Convocation of the Province of York or Canterbury and conveying to Convocation the desire of the Crown that some special business therein mentioned should be considered by Convocation. Such letters have from an early date been issued upon various occasions. One such occasion was in 1283; the latest was in 1906, when Edward VII. authorised the Convocation of Canterbury to report upon the recommendations of the Royal Commissioners on Ecclesiastical Discipline which had been made earlier in that year.

Letters of Marque (or Mart) were extraordinary commissions issued, either in time of open war or in time of peace, after all attempts to procure legal redress had failed, by the Lords of the Admiralty, or the vice-admirals of a distant province, to the commanders of merchant ships, authorising reprisals for reparation of the damages sustained by them through enemies at sea. They were either "special," to make reparation to individuals, or "general," when issued by the Government of one State against all the subjects of another; the former have long been obsolete; the latter kind seems to be an authorization of privateering (q.v.) and therefore to be no longer allowed. (See REPRISALS.)

Letters of Request. In ecclesiastical practice, where a diocesan Court (q.v.) has jurisdiction in a case, but the plaintiff wishes the cause to be instituted in the Provincial Court (q.v.), he may apply to the judge of the former Court for letters of request; and when the judge has signed them, and they have been accepted by the judge of the Provincial Court, a decree issues under his seal, calling upon the defendant to answer to the plaintiff in the suit.

The term "letters of request" is now more generally applied to the "request to examine witnesses in lieu of a commission," which may be made by the Court or a judge, under Ord. 37, r. 6 (a), to the Courts of foreign countries or British colonies, in which are persons whose evidence is required in a proceeding in this country. It is, or was, the only means of obtaining evidence in Austria, Germany, Luxemburg, Roumania, Russia, and Switzerland, none of which countries before the Great War allowed evidence to be taken by commission (q.v.) or examiner (q.v.), and it is now the usual means of taking evidence in India or the colonies (see MANDAMUS); but it is not available for the United States, which require that evidence should be taken by commission or by an examiner. See ROGATORY LETTER.

Letters Patent are grants by the Crown of lands, franchises, offices, etc., contained in charters or instruments not sealed up but exposed to open view with the Great Seal pendant at the bottom, and usually addressed to all the subjects of the realm.

As to letters patent for inventions, see PATENT; see also GRANT; GREAT SEAL; LETTERS CLOSE; WARRANT.

Levant and Couchant. When land to which a right of common of pasture is annexed can maintain during the winter by its produce, or requires to plough and manure it, a certain number of cattle, those cattle are said to be levant and couchant on the land. The origin of this double definition of levancy and couchancy probably was, that the number requisite to plough and manure was the limit to common appendant, and the capacity of wintering was the limit to common appurtenant. It appears that the Courts have adopted the latter admeasurement as the more liberal in both cases, but they have never denied the right of common appendant to be admeasured by its original standard. It is therefore commonly said that cattle levant and couchant are such as the produce of the land will maintain during the winter, without reference to their being required for its tillage. Levancy and couchancy is one of the standards for ascertaining the number of cattle which each commoner may put on the common. See COMMON.

If cattle escape from A.'s land into B.'s land by default of B. (as for want of his keeping a sufficient fence), they cannot be distrained for rent by B.'s landlord until they have been levant and couchant on the land, that is, until they have been at least one night there. If they escape by default of A., they may be distrained immediately.

Levant Company. After certain persons had opened up trade with the Sultan (or the Grand Signior, as he was then called), Elizabeth granted them a monopoly of that trade in 1581. James I. incorporated them in 1605, by a charter which confirmed their monopoly, gave them the right of choosing the consuls and vice-consuls in all places in the Levant Seas, and gave them power to fine and imprison members of the company. In 1643 the Long Parliament gave them the further right of nominating the ambassador at Constantinople. The privileges of the company were confirmed by the statute 26 Geo. 2, c. 13. The company actually nominated and paid the ambassador until 1803, and the consuls in Turkey until 1825, when the charter was surrendered pursuant to the statute 6 Geo. 4, c. 35.

Levari facias was a writ of execution which commanded the sheriff to levy a judgment debt on the lands and goods of the debtor by seizing and selling the latter, and receiving the rents and profits of the lands until the debt was satisfied. This writ had been practically superseded before 1883 by the writ of elegit (q.v.): and the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 146 (2) enacted that it should no longer be issued in any civil proceeding. The writ of sequestrari facias (q.v.) is in the nature of a levari facias, and was hence sometimes called a levari facias de bonis ecclesiasticis.

Levitical Degrees. These degrees of affinity are referred to in the statute 38 Hen. 8, c. 38, s. 2, and are set forth in the eighteenth chapter of the Book of Leviticus. Marriage within them is prohibited except, since 1907, in the case of a deceased wife's sister, and, since 1921, with a deceased husband's brother. See DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER.

Levy. To levy is to raise a sum of money, e.g., by a writ of execution against the property of a judgment debtor. See EXECUTION; FIERI FACIAS.

Lex Angliæ est lex misericordiæ (2 Inst. 315). (The law of England is a law of mercy.) This is said by Coke in connection with the Statute of Gloucester (6 Edw. 1), c. 9, which was passed in relief of those committing homicide by misadventure or in self-defence.

Lex Angliæ nunquam matris sed semper patris conditionem imitari partum judicat (Co. Litt. 123). (The rule of the law of England is that the offspring shall always follow the condition of the father; never that of the mother.) And so if a villein took a free woman to wife the children of the marriage were villeins. Compare PARTUS SEQUITUR, ETC.

Lex Angliæ sine Parliamento mutari non potest (2 Inst. 619). (The law of England cannot be changed except by Parliament.) See PROCLAMATIONS, ROYAL.

Lex beneficialis rei consimili remedium præstat (2 Inst. 689). (A beneficial law affords a remedy for cases both of which are on the same footing.) Compare IN CONSIMILI CASU.

Lex citius tolerare vult privatum damnum quam publicum malum (Co. Litt. 132). (The law is more willing to tolerate a private loss than a public evil.) Thus, no action lies for anything said by a member of Parliament in Parliament, or by an advocate in the course of judicial proceedings or by a witness in the witness-box, or by one official of another in a report: for if such actions lay, Parliament, the Courts, and the public services could not be carried on.

Lex dilationes semper exhorret (2 Inst. 240). (The law always abhors delays.) This is a comment by Coke on the Statute of Westminster I. (3 Edw. 1), c. 40, passed for the relief of persons who had been "delayed of their rights" by false vouching to warranty. Compare LEX REPROBAT, ETC.

Lex domicilii is the law of the country where a person has his domicile (q.v.).

Lex est dictamen rationis (Jenk. Cent. 117). (Law is the word of reason.)

Lex est exercitûs judicum tutissimus ductor (2 Inst. 526). (The law is the safest guide of all the judges.)

Lex est ratio summa, quæ jubet quæ sunt utilia et necessaria, et contraria prohibet (Co. Litt. 319). (Law is the supreme science which commands those things which are useful and necessary, and forbids what is contrary thereto.)

Lex est sanctitio sancta, jubens honesta, et prohibens contraria (2 Inst. 587). (Law is a sacred sanction, commanding what is proper and forbidding what is not.) This is a quotation from Bracton.

Lex est tutissima cassis, sub clypeo legis nemo decipitur (2 Inst. 56). (The law is the safest helmet; under the shield of the law no man is deceived.)

Lex fingit ubi subsistit æquitas (11 Co. 90). (The law has recourse to fictions when the resources of equity come to an end.)

Lex fori. See LEX LOCI.

Lex injusta non est lex. (Any interpretation of the law which makes the law work injustice is bad law.) But see ÆQUUM ET BONUM, ETC.

Lex intendit vicinum vicini facta scire (Co. Litt. 78). (The law holds that one neighbour knows what another does.)

Lex loci is late law-Latin for "the law of the place." It is chiefly used in the following phrases: the lex loci [celebrati] contractûs is the law of the place where a contract was made; lex loci solutionis is the law of the place of payment, that is, of the place where, by the terms of the contract, payment is to be made: lex loci actûs is the law of the place where a transfer of property or some similar formal act has been performed: lex loci rei sitæ is the same as lex situs (q.v.): lex loci delicti is the law of the place where a tort or wrong has been committed: lex fori is the law of the place where judicial proceedings have been taken to enforce an obligation, etc. See INTERNATIONAL LAW; JURISDICTION; LOCUS REGIT ACTUM.

Lex mercatoria. (The law merchant.) See CUSTOM.

Lex merciorum. See MERCHENLAGE.

Lex necessitatis est lex temporis, scilicet, instantis (Hob. 159). (The law of necessity is the [only] law for the time, that is to say, for the instant.) Compare NECESSITAS EST LEX, ETC.

Lex neminem cogit ad vana seu inutilia peragenda. An expanded version of Lex non praecipit, etc. (q.v.).

Lex neminem cogit ostendere quod nescire præsumitur (Lofft, 569). (The law compels no one to disclose that which he is presumed not to know.) This maxim would seem to apply to privileged communications.

Lex nil frustra facit (Jenk Cent. 17). (The law does nothing in vain.) Compare INUTILIS LABOR, ETC.

Lex non a rege est violanda (Jenk. Cent. 7). (The law is not to be violated by the king.) This is said as a gloss on an ancient decision that the king's justices ought not to comply with any royal command which was repugnant to the law.

Lex non cogit ad impossibilia (Co. Litt. 231*b*). (The law does not compel the impossible). At Hobart, 96, the maxim also occurs with the omission of ad. Compare IMPOTENTIA EXCUSAT, ETC.; LEX NON INTENDIT, ETC.

Lex non curat de minimis (Hob. 88). (The law takes no heed of trifles.) A variant of DE MINIMIS, ETC.

Lex non debet deficere conquerentibus in justitiâ exhibendâ (Co. Litt. 197). (The law ought not to make default in dispensing justice to those who seek it.)

Lex non deficit in justitiâ exhibendâ (Jenk. Cent. 31). (The law does not fail to dispense justice.) That is to say, the law always does justice.

Lex non favet delicatorum votis (9 Co. 58). (The law does not favour the wishes of the fastidious.) Thus, although an action will lie for "erecting a hogstye so near the house of a neighbour that the air thereof is corrupted," or for depriving his house of light or air, no action will lie because of the erection of any building which interferes with the view from a house.

Lex non intendit aliquid impossibile (12 Co. 89). (The law does not mean anything that is impossible.) Compare LEX NON COGIT, ETC.

Lex non præcipit inutilia (Co. Litt. 127 b). (The law does not enjoin useless things.)

Lex non requirit verificari quod apparet curiæ (9 Co. 54). (The law does not require that which is apparent to the Court to be verified.) In Co. Litt., at 303*b*, Coke says "That which is apparent to the Court by necessary collection out of the record need not be averred": and this maxim would seem to mean that, rather than "facts need not be proved of which the Court takes judicial notice."

Lex non scripta. (The unwritten law; that is to say, the common law.) See LAW.

Lex plus laudatur quando ratione probatur (Litt. Epil.). (The law is most worthy of approval when it is in accordance with reason.)

Lex posterior derogat priori (Mackeld, Civ. L. 5). (A later Act overrules an earlier one.) Compare CONSTITUTIONES TEMPORE, ETC.; LEGES POSTERIORES, ETC; PRIORES LEGES, ETC.

Lex prospicit non respicit (Jenk. Cent. 284). (The law looks forward, not backward.) That is to say, that no statute is retrospective in its action except by express provision or necessary implication. Compare LEGES ET CONSTITUTIONES, ETC; NOVA CONSTITUTIO, ETC.

Lex punit mendacium (Jenk. Cent. 15). (The law punishes falsehood.)

Lex rejicit superflua, pugnantia, incongrua (Jenk. Cent. 133). (The law rejects such things as are superfluous, contradictory, and incongruous.) In deciding which shall be rejected out of things contradictory or superfluous it is guided by the maxims set out at INTERPRETATIO (q.v.).

Lex reprobat moram (Jenk. Cent. 35). (The law disapproves of delay.) Compare LEX DILATIONES, ETC.

Lex sacramentalis. Compurgation (q.v.): see Leg. Hen. 1, c. 9.

Lex scripta. (The written law; that is to say, statute law.) See LAW.

Lex semper dabit remedium (Jacob, 69). (The law will always give a remedy.) See UBI JUS, ETC.; IN NOVO, ETC.; but compare DAMNUM SINE, ETC.

Lex semper intendit quod convenit rationi (Co. Litt. 78). (The law always intends what is in accordance with reason.) See also LEX EST RATIO, ETC; LEX NON COGIT, ETC.

Lex situs is modern law-Latin for "the law of the place where property is situated." The general rule is, that lands and other immoveables are governed by the lex situs, that is, by the law of the country in which they are situated. See LEX LOCI.

Lex spectat naturæ ordinem (Co. Litt. 197). (The law has regard to the order of nature.) Thus, the law will not compel a man to demand that which he cannot, in the nature of things, recover. Compare LEX NON COGIT, ETC.

Lex succurrit ignoranti (Jenk. Cent. 15). (The law assists the ignorant.) But not if their ignorance is ignorance of law. See IGNORANTIA FACTI, ETC.

Lex talionis. The primitive law embodied in the phrase "an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth." It survives to this day in the shape of capital punishment for murder. The statute 37 Edw. 3, c. 18, made a curious attempt to apply it by enacting that he who preferred an accusation should be put under sureties (which Lambarde calls "Sureties of Taliation") to undergo, in the event of the accusation being found to be false and malicious, the punishment to which the accused person, if found guilty, would have been liable; but the statute 38 Edw. 3, c. 9, repealed this enactment, and provided instead that the false accuser should be imprisoned until he had paid damages to the accused and a fine to the king. Except in this instance the lex talionis has never, apart from murder, been incorporated in our law.

Lex terrena. An ancient designation of the common law when regarded as the law of earthly origin, and contrasted with the Law Christian or spiritual law.

Lex uno ore omnes alloquitur (2 Inst. 184). (The law speaks to all with one voice.) This is quoted in connection with the Statute of Westminster I., c. 14, which provided that the one law should prevail throughout the whole land. Compare NIHIL IN LEGE, ETC.

Lex Wallensica. The ancient laws of Wales.

Liability is the condition of being actually or potentially subject to an obligation, and is used either generally, as including every kind of obligation, or, in a more special sense, to denote inchoate, future, unascertained or imperfect obligations, as opposed to debts, the essence of which is that they are ascertained and certain. (See DEBT.) Thus when a person becomes surety for another, he makes himself liable, though it is unascertained in what obligation or debt the liability may ultimately result: and when a person becomes a member of a company he makes himself liable for the debts of the company, to be ascertained when it is wound up. See LIMITATION OF LIABILITY.

Libel.—I. In the widest sense of the word, a libel is a published writing, picture, or similar production, of such a nature as to immediately tend to occasion mischief to the public, or to injure the character of an individual. Hence libels are of two kinds, public and private.

A public libel is one which tends to produce evil consequences to society, because it is either blasphemous (see BLASPHEMY), or obscene (q.v.), or seditious (q.v.). The publication of such a libel is a misdemeanour. To this class also belong libels on the Houses of Parliament, which are contempts or breaches of privilege: libels on Courts of justice, or on persons concerned in proceedings before Courts, which are contempts of Court (q.v.): and libels on foreign rulers, ambassadors, etc.

Private libels are of two kinds. A defamatory libel, or a libel on the character of an individual, is a false and malicious writing, picture, or the like, published concerning a certain person, and which either brings him within the danger of the law by accusing him of a crime, or has a tendency to injure him in his profession or calling, or by holding him up to scorn, ridicule, hatred or execration, impairs him in the enjoyment of general society, or by blackening the memory of one who is dead, tends to provoke a breach of the peace. A defamatory libel is a civil injury, giving rise to a right of action for damages by the person defamed. It is also a misdemeanour, and makes the offender punishable criminally by fine and imprisonment. The question whether a publication is libellous or not is one of mixed fact and law, and rests with the jury, subject to the judge's direction as to the law (see FACT); and this applies in criminal as well as in civil proceedings. See FOX'S LIBEL ACT.

The publication or threatened publication, or any offer to refrain from the publication, of any libel upon any person whether living or dead, in order to obtain money or other benefit, is a misdemeanour under the Larceny Act, 1916, s. 31.

A libel may be injurious to a person's property or trade. Thus, if a person falsely and maliciously publishes statements calculated to injure the property (e.g., the business) of another, this is a libel, and not only gives rise to a right of action for damages, but may also be restrained by injunction.

See APOLOGY; DEFAMATION; INNUENDO; JUSTIFICATION; MALICE; NEWSPAPER; PRIVILEGE; PUBLICATION; SLANDER.

II. In the Ecclesiastical Courts, the first plea in a plenary cause (not being a criminal cause) is termed the libel, and runs in the name of the party or his proctor, who alleges and propounds the facts on which his demand is based. See PLEA.

Libellant; Libellee. The persons by and against whom respectively a libel is filed in an ecclesiastical Court. Formerly the terms applied also to the persons by and against whom proceedings were brought in the old Court of Admiralty.

Libera batella. (A free boat.) The right of fishing with a boat in waters where no general public right of fishing existed.

Libera chasea habenda, De. A writ which anciently lay for one who claimed a free chase (q.v.).

Liber albus. The White Book of London (q.v.).

Liberam legem amittere. To lose one's free law: one of the consequences of the "villainous judgment" (q.v).

Libera piscaria. (A free fishery): see FISHERY.

Liber assisarum. A compilation of selected cases from the manuscript year books of the reign of Edward III. Coke (1 Inst. 198*b*) styles it a book of great authority in law.

Liberata pecunia non liberat offerentem (Co. Litt. 207). (Money being set free does not set free the party offering.) This means that a refusal of a tender does not free the debtor from the debt in respect of which the tender is made: but of course he can plead tender (q.v.).

Liberate. An obsolete original writ authorising the payment of money out of the Exchequer.

When execution had been issued on a statute staple by a writ in the nature of an extent, the lands, tenements and chattels of the conusor or debtor were not delivered to the conusee or creditor, but were seized by the sheriff "into the king's hands," and in order to get possession of them the conusee had to sue out a writ called a liberate, which commanded the sheriff to deliver them into his hands. See EXTENT.

Liberate Rolls. "Rolls" in the Record Office containing lists of the writs of Allocate (q.v.), Computate (q.v.), and Liberate (q.v.) which were issued between 1201 and 1436.

Liber Eliensis. The only known ancient copy of the Inquisitio Eliensis (q.v.) is the document called the Liber Eliensis which is in the library of Trinity College, Cambridge.

Liber fœdorum. See TESTA DE NEVILL.

Liber judicialis Alfredi. The Dooms of Alfred. See ALFRED.

Liber niger domus regis. (The Black Book of the king's household.) A record of matters connected with the household of Edward IV.

Liber niger scaccarii; Liber niger parvus. See BLACK BOOK OF THE EXCHEQUER.

Liber quadripartitus. A translation of the old dooms into Latin made about the year 1118. The first part contains the old English laws, the second some important State papers. The third and fourth parts, dealing respectively with legal procedure and theft, are not extant. See Liebermann, Quadripartitus; Halle, 1892.

Liber ruber scaccarii. See RED BOOK OF THE EXCHEQUER.

Libertas est naturalis facultas ejus quod cuique facere libet, nisi quod de jure aut vi prohibetur (Co. Litt. 116). (Liberty is the power given by nature of doing what each man pleases, unless it be a thing the doing of which is prevented by the law or by actual force.) This is cited in a disquisition on villenage.

Libertas est res inestimabilis (Jenk. Cent. 52). (Liberty is a priceless thing.)

Libertate probandi, De. A writ which anciently lay for one who, being claimed as a villein, offered to prove that he was free: it required the sheriff to take security from him to appear and prove his freedom before the justices and directed that upon such security being given the alleged villein should go unmolested pending the decision of the matter. See NATIVO HABENDO, DE.

Libertates regales ad coronam spectantes ex concessione regum a corona exierunt (2 Inst. 496). (Royal franchises pertaining to the Crown are alienated from the Crown by grant from the kings.) This is said by Coke in connection with the Statutum de quo warranto, 18 Edward 1, which applied to all jura regalia vested in subjects.

Libertatibus allocandis, De. A writ which anciently lay for a citizen or burgess impleaded contrary to his right to be impleaded only within his city or borough.

Libertatibus exigendis in itinerere, De. A writ which anciently lay to the justices in eyre directing them to allow a man to appear by an attorney.

Libertinum ingratum leges civiles in pristinam servitutem redigunt; sed leges Angliæ semel manumissum semper liberum judicant (Co. Litt. 137). (The civil laws reduce an ungrateful freedman to his original slavery, but the laws of England regard as free for ever a man who has ever been made a free man.)

Liberty.—I. In its general sense, a liberty is an authority to do something which would otherwise be wrongful or illegal. Thus, if a man grants to another trees growing on land, that implies a liberty to cut them and carry them away. (See FREE ENTRY, EGRESS AND REGRESS.) Such a liberty may be either personal to the grantee, or it may be inherent or annexed to property so as to pass with it on an assignment. See LICENCE.

II. "Liberty" is also used as equivalent to "franchise" (q.v.), both as denoting a right and as denoting the place where the right is exercisable. Thus, the Liberty of the Savoy is a place subject to a franchise. As to writs of execution within a liberty, see NON OMITTAS.

Liberty of the Press. This simply means that such a thing as an imprimatur (q.v.) is now unknown to our law, and that every man may print and publish what he pleases, although, of course, he will be liable to a prosecution if he prints anything which is a criminal libel, or which is obscene, blasphemous or seditious, and to civil proceedings if he prints defamatory matter. See PRESS.

Liberty of the Rules. In certain circumstances prisoners in the King's Bench, Fleet, and Marshalsea prisons obtained permission to live outside the actual prisons but within certain adjacent areas known as the Rules. This, which was called the Liberty of the Rules, was abolished, together with the prisons, by the Queen's Prisons Act, 1842. See QUEEN'S PRISON.

Liberum tenementum. A freehold or frank tenement (q.v.). Formerly the defendant in an action of trespass to land could plead that the locus in quo was the close soil and freehold of the defendant. This was called the plea or avowry of liberum tenementum.

Libra pensa. (A weighed pound.) In early times, and more especially during periods of debasement of the currency, there was sometimes used as a measure of money a pound which, instead of being the twenty shillings or two hundred and forty silver pennies making up the customary pound, was an actual pound weight of pure silver. See SILVER COINS.

Librata terræ. A measure of land containing four oxgates (q.v.), each of which seems to have contained thirteen acres.

In the time of Henry III. the owner of fifteen libratas terræ was liable to receive knighthood, which was then regarded as undesirable owing to the attendant expenses.

Licence.—I. In its general sense, a licence is an authority to do something which would otherwise be inoperative, wrongful or illegal. (See AUTHORITY; LIBERTY.) Thus, a lease frequently contains a covenant by the lessee not to assign the term without the lessor's licence.

II. In the law of real property, a licence is generally an authority to do an act which would otherwise be a trespass. A licence passes no interest, and therefore if A grants to B the right to fasten barges to moorings in a river, this does not amount to a demise, nor give the licensee an exclusive right to the use of the moorings, nor render him liable to be rated as the occupier of part of the bed of the river. Hence, also, if a person by deed grants an exclusive licence for the use of land, this may amount to a lease, or to the grant of an incorporeal hereditament (see LEASE). A mere licence is always revocable, but when a licence comprises, or is connected with, a grant of an interest, it is generally irrevocable: thus, a licence by A to hunt in his park is revocable; but a licence to hunt and take away the deer when killed is in truth a grant of the deer with a licence annexed to come on the land, and if the grant is good the licence is irrevocable. So a licence may be irrevocable if granted for valuable consideration.

III. A marriage licence is an authority enabling two persons to be married. Such licences are of three kinds. A special licence is granted by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and enables the parties to be married in any church or chapel or other meet and convenient place. An ordinary licence is granted by any archbishop or bishop for the marriage of persons within his diocese in a church or chapel in which banns may lawfully be published. The effect of the ordinary licence is merely to legalise marriage without banns: the grant of such a licence would appear to be entirely in the discretion of the bishop and the only remedy in case of refusal is to have recourse to either banns or a special licence. A superintendent registrar's licence is one granted by the superintendent registrar of the district in which the parties, or one of them reside, authorising the solemnization of a marriage between them according to the rites of the Church of England, or the usages of the Quakers or Jews, etc., or such form as they think fit to adopt. See BANNS; MARRIAGE; MARRIAGE ACTS.

IV. Licences for the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors and refreshments are of three kinds, according to the authorities by whom they are granted. A magistrate's or justice's licence is granted as a kind of certificate that the applicant is a proper person to be intrusted with the sale of intoxicating liquors, and that the "premises" which he occupies are fit for the purpose. In counties, new licences are granted by the justices of the petty sessional division present at the meeting held by them every year, and called "the general annual licensing meeting," and must be confirmed (except in the case of outdoor licences) by the justices at quarter sessions (Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, ss. 2 (2), 6 (2), 9, 10). In county boroughs and in boroughs, not being county boroughs but having ten justices', licences are granted by "the borough licensing committee," appointed every year from among themselves by the borough justices, and confirmed by the whole body of borough justices, or if the borough has not ten justices, licences are granted by the borough justices, and confirmed by a "joint committee" composed of three borough and three county justices (ib. ss. 2 (3), 3, 4).

The magistrate's licence entitles the holder to take out the corresponding excise licence (ib. s. 1), which is granted by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, and is a mode of levying a tax on the sale of liquors and refreshments.

Both magistrates' and excise licences require to be renewed every year, and are of various descriptions, according to the number and kind of liquors authorised to be sold under them (the publican's licence, the beerhouse licence, wine licence, etc.), and to the question whether the liquor is to be consumed on or off the premises (on- and off-licences), and to the time during which they authorise the consumption (the six-day licence, i.e., excluding Sundays: the early closing licence, etc.) A provisional licence may also be granted in respect of premises about to be constructed or in course of construction (ib. s. 33). See COMPENSATION AUTHORITY; CONFIRMATION AUTHORITY.

There are also excise licences granted without the necessity of a magistrate's licence, e.g., the refreshment house licence (Refreshment Houses Act, 1860, s. 6), which does not authorise the sale of intoxicating liquors, and the licences to brewers, wholesale beer dealers, maltsters, distillers, dealers in foreign wines, manufacturers of and dealers in tobacco, etc.

Among miscellaneous licences, or licences not granted in the usual way by justices or the excise authorities, may be mentioned the "occasional licence," namely, a licence granted by the excise authorities, on the written consent of a petty sessional court, or failing a court, of two justices sitting together, to a person already licensed to sell liquors to be consumed on the premises, authorising the sale of them at some other place between certain hours and on a special occasion (e.g., a fair, race, ball, etc.) specified in the licence (Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, s. 64). The term "occasional licence" was formerly also applied to an exemption granted by the commissioners of police or other "local authority" of the district, exempting the person to whom it is granted from the rules relating to the closing of premises on a special occasion (e.g., a fête or ball) and during certain hours specified in the licence: but such an exemption is now (ib. s. 57) known as a "special order of exemption," while a "general order of exemption" (ib. s. 55) is a continuing authority to keep open on such days and during such hours (other than the period from 1 a.m. to 2 p.m.) as may be required for the accommodation of persons (such as newspaper employees in Fleet Street or market gardeners, etc., in Covent Garden) whose business brings them into the neighbourhood during unusual hours.

V. There are also numerous other varieties of licence, such as game licences (see GAME), licences for making and selling gunpowder, fireworks, etc., licences (Racecourses Licensing Act, 1879) for racecourses in the suburbs of London, for the reception of lunatics, for retreats for habitual drunkards (see DRUNKENNESS), licences to use patents (q.v.), etc.

Licence to Arise (Licentia surgendi). This was a time allowed by the Court to a tenant who had been essoined de malo lecti (see ESSOIN) in a real action to arise from his bed and appear. It was also the title of a writ used in the matter. See Bracton lib. 5; Fleta lib. 6.

Licence to Convocation. The statute 25 Hen. 8, c. 19, provides that Convocation cannot enact any canons or constitutions without the king's "assent and licence." Such assent and licence is given by the document known as a licence to Convocation.

Licensing Acts. See LICENCE.

Licensing Authority. The body which grants, or declines to grant, justices' licences for the sale of intoxicating liquor by retail. See LICENCE (IV.).

Licentia concordandi. The king's licence or permission for which the king's silver (q.v.) was paid on the passing of a fine.

Licentia loquendi (Li. lo.). Leave to imparl (q.v.).

Licentia transfretandi. A writ which was anciently directed to the warden of a channel port and commanding him to permit the passage overseas of such persons as had obtained the royal licence.

Licet dispositio de interesse futuro sit inutilis, tamen fieri potest declaratio præcedens quæ sortiatur effectum, interveniente novo actu (Bac. Max. Reg. 14). (Although the grant of a future interest is inoperative, yet it may become a declaration precedent, which will take effect on the intervention of some new act.) The settlement of after-acquired property illustrates this maxim.

Licita bene miscentur, formula nisi juris obstet (Bac. Max. Reg. 24). (Things permitted are properly united unless a rule of law intervenes.) A common case is a grant of a rent by a tenant for life and the remainderman.

Lidford Law. Such law as was said to prevail in a place where the procedure was to hang a man first and try him afterwards. Lidford (now Lydford), in Devonshire, had rather a bad name: but there is no evidence that, in the ordinary course, an alleged felon was first executed and then tried there.

Liege. See HOMAGE.

Lien is a right by which a person is entitled to obtain satisfaction of a debt by means of property belonging to the person indebted to him. A lien is therefore a species of security (see SECURITY; RIGHT), but differs from a mortgage, charge or the like in this respect, that in the case of a mortgage or charge the origin of the debt is immaterial (e.g., it may be a loan, a debt for goods sold, etc.), while a lien can only be a security on property which is or has been the subject of a transaction between the parties; thus, if A sells lands to B, A has a lien on them for the unpaid purchase-money, unless he expressly or impliedly waives his right; and a vendor of goods who is an "unpaid seller" within the meaning of s. 38 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, has such lien on the goods as is provided by ss. 39, 41-48 of that Act.

I. With reference to their origin, liens arise either by operation of law or by agreement between the parties. Liens arising by operation of law (liens by implication, implied liens) are those which arise from the relation of the parties, without express or tacit stipulation, and either by the rules of the common law (as in the case of the vendor's lien for purchase-money mentioned above), by the rules of equity (equitable liens), or under the provisions of a statute (statutory liens), of which two latter classes examples will be found below. Liens by agreement between the parties (conventional liens) are those created intentionally in cases where the relation between the parties is not such as to give rise to a lien by operation of law, as where a carrier stipulates for a general lien (infra) on goods sent him for transmission. The intention to create the lien may be express, or it may be implied, e.g., from a previous course of dealings between the parties. See IMPLIED.

II. With reference to the nature of the right which they confer on the creditor, liens are of two kinds.

A retaining (or possessory) lien is the right of the creditor to retain possession of his debtor's property until his debt has been satisfied; thus, if a person takes a watch to a watchmaker to be repaired, the watchmaker has a lien on the watch for his remuneration, i.e., has the right of retaining it until his reasonable charges are paid. In this instance the lien is a particular lien, because it exists only as a security for the particular debt incurred in respect of the watch itself, while a general lien is available as a security for all debts arising out of similar transactions between the parties; thus, if a solicitor has possession of title deeds belonging to his client, he has a general lien on them, that is, he is entitled to retain them until he is paid not only his charges in respect of the deeds themselves, but also the whole amount owing to him from the client for professional services up to that time. (See also CHARGE.) General liens exist only in pursuance of a usage to that effect in the particular trade or business, the principal instances being in the case of solicitors, bankers, innkeepers, wharfingers and factors.

A charging lien is the right to charge property in another's possession with the payment of a debt or the performance of a duty; an instance of this is the equitable lien of a vendor of land for the unpaid purchase-money. A charging lien can be enforced by bringing an action (formerly by filing a bill in equity) for a sale of the property. The important distinction between a possessory and a charging lien is that in the case of the former, if the creditor gives up possession of the property, he loses his lien, while it follows from the nature of a charging lien that the property need not be in the creditor's possession.

There are also various forms of maritime lien, or lien on a ship, freight, etc. some of which are possessory, and some charging; thus, a shipowner has, independently of contract, a possessory lien on goods carried in his ship for the freight due in respect of them. If a ship is injured in a collision by the negligence of the other ship, the owners of the former have a maritime (charging) lien on the latter for the damage; so the master of a ship has a maritime (charging) lien on the ship and freight for his wages and disbursements (see Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 167); this is an instance of a statutory lien, or lien created by statute. A maritime charging lien can be enforced by proceedings in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division, in which (ib. s. 693) distress and sale of the ship may be ordered.

"Lien" formerly denoted "obligatio" generally. "Lien," says the Termes de la Ley, "is a word of two significations—Personal lien, as a bond, covenant, or contract; and real lien, a judgment, statute, recognizance, or an original against an heir, which oblige and affect the land." Coke uses it as meaning a warranty. These uses of the word are obsolete.

Lieutenancy, Commission of. In the reign of Edward VI. commissions of lieutenancy, which were practically the same as the earlier commissions of array (q.v.), began to be issued and were addressed to the then newly-created lieutenants (or lords lieutenant (q.v.)) of the counties. They continued to be issued from time to time up to the period of the Civil War. After the Restoration they fell into disuse as the result of the creation of the militia (q.v.) system.

Life. The law presumes the continuance of a given state of facts unless it be shown either that it has terminated or that in the inevitable course of events it must have terminated. Once the fact of life on a given date has been established, the law will presume its continuance unless there be evidence, or a presumption of fact recognised by the law, to the contrary effect. There is no presumption that any human life must terminate within any specified period. See ABSENCE FOR SEVEN YEARS; COMMORIENTES; PRODUCTION.

See DEATH; TENANT FOR LIFE.

Life Assurance. See ASSURANCE; INSURANCE; INTEREST; POLICY OF ASSURANCE.

Life Peer. No such thing is known to the law except in the case of the Lords of Appeal in Ordinary (q.v.).

Ligan. See JETSAM.

Ligeance is the old-fashioned equivalent for "allegiance" (q.v.).

Ligeantia est vinculum fidei: ligeantia est legis essentia (Co. Litt. 129). (Ligeance is the bond of fidelity, and the essence of the law.) Coke cites this maxim in connection with the rule that in an action by an alien against a subject the defendant could plead as a defence that the plaintiff was born "out of the ligeance."

Light. See ANCIENT LIGHTS.

Lightermen. See WATERMEN.

Lighthouses; Lighthouse Authorities. At common law no one but the Crown could erect beacons, lighthouses and seamarks. Many of the rights of the Crown with regard to such matters were at one time delegated by letters patent to the Lord High Admiral. The advent of the Trinity House (q.v.) resulted in all the powers of the Crown being vested in them. They began with beacons (q.v.), and ultimately developed the lighthouse system. They are the lighthouse authority for England, Wales, the Channel Islands and Gibraltar, under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 634 (1) (a); the law as to lighthouses is now to be found in ss. 634-679 of the same Act, as amended by the Mercantile Marine Fund Act, 1898; and the expenses of the Trinity House are provided out of the General Lighthouse Fund, as to which see MERCANTILE MARINE FUND.

Light Railway. There is no statutory definition of this term, which really means something resembling the ordinary standard-gauge high-speed railway, but on much more modest lines. The Regulation of Railways Act, 1868, s. 27, permits the Board of Trade (now, as regards these matters, represented by the Ministry of Transport) to license a company already working an ordinary railway, to use any part of its line as a light railway; and (s. 28) it provides that on a light railway the speed of trains must not be more than twenty-five miles per hour, and that not more than eight tons' weight may be brought upon the rails by any one pair of wheels. This impliedly defines a light railway for the purposes of the Act of 1868, but that Act has been little used, and the statute of most importance is now the Light Railways Act, 1896, which contains no definition of a light railway. It has, however, been decided that, as regards the Act of 1896, light railways are to be divided into three classes —(1) those on land which has been acquired; (2) those (mostly propelled by electric power) on public roads; and (3) others, such as funicular railways. A purely urban tramway is not, but a tramway partly urban and partly rural may be, a light railway.

The Act of 1896 provides that a light railway may, without reference to Parliament, be authorised by order of the Light Railway Commissioners, subject to allowance or disallowance by the Ministry of Transport.

Light Railway Commission. This consists of three persons nominated by the Ministry of Transport to facilitate the construction and working of light railways in Great Britain (Light Railways Act, 1896, s 1). Two of them receive £1,000 a year (ib.); (Light Railway Commissioners (Salaries) Act, 1901, s. 1). The powers of the Commissioners were at first temporary (Act of 1896, s. 1 (8)), but they have been from time to time continued by various enactments. Thus the Expiring Laws Continuance Act, 1920, continued them to 31st December, 1921.

Limit; Limitation.—I. To limit an estate is to mark out the extreme period during which it is to continue, and the clause by which this is done in a conveyance, will, etc., is called a limitation. Thus, if I grant land to A for life, and after his death to B and his heirs, this is a limitation of a life estate to A, and of the remainder in fee to B. (See WORDS OF LIMITATION.) Hence a limitation is opposed to a condition or defeasance, which may put an end to an estate before the time fixed for its extreme duration, though the difference is sometimes one of form only; thus, if A devises land to his widow for life, on condition that she does not marry again, the same result is produced as if he devised it to her during widowhood, which is a collateral limitation (infra).

A conditional limitation (in the generic sense of the term) is where one estate is limited to end and another to commence on the doing of some act or the happening of some event. Thus, if I grant land to A until B returns from Rome, and on that event to C in fee; or if I grant land to A, provided that when B returns from Rome it shall immediately vest in C in fee, in either case the limitation to C is a conditional limitation. But in the specific and more accurate use of the term, a conditional limitation is where an estate is limited to commence in defeasance of a preceding estate as opposed to a contingent remainder, which awaits the regular determination of the preceding estate; conditional limitations (in this sense) derive their name from their mixed nature: they so far partake of the nature of conditions as they abridge or defeat the estates previously limited, and they are so far limitations as, upon the contingency taking place, the estate passes to a stranger. The latter of the two examples given above of conditional limitations (in the generic sense) is a conditional limitation in this sense, the former being an instance of a collateral limitation (infra), or a determinable estate followed by a contingent remainder. See REMAINDER.

A collateral limitation is one which marks the extreme duration of an estate, and at the same time indicates an uncertain event, the happening of which will put an end to it before the expiration of that period. Thus, a limitation to a woman during widowhood, is a collateral limitation, because it gives her an estate for life, but makes it determinable on her marrying again. At common law, no estate could be limited in expectancy on the determination of an estate in fee simple, however limited or conditional it might be (see REVERTER; RIGHT OF ENTRY); but under the Statutes of Uses and Wills, such limitations may validly be created. A conditional or collateral limitation by way of use is sometimes called a shifting or springing use (see USE); when created by will it is called an executory devise. See EXECUTORY INTERESTS.

II. Limitation, as a measure of time, is a certain period prescribed by statute within which proceedings to enforce a right must be taken. This is of two kinds, namely (1) where on the expiration of the time the right itself is barred, as in the case of a person who has been out of possession of land for twelve years (Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, s. 1; Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 34), although he may be ignorant of the fact that another is in possession; and (2) where on the expiration of the time the remedy is barred, but not the right; thus, in the case of a debt which has remained unpaid and unacknowledged for six years, the creditor's right to bring an action to recover it is gone (Limitation Act, 1623, s. 3; Statute of Frauds Amendment Act, 1828, s. 1), but the debt exists for other purposes: hence he can exercise a right of lien to recover it, but not a set-off or counter-claim, because that is in the nature of a cross-action.

The period allowed in each case runs from the time when the right of action accrued. (See ACCRUE.) In certain cases, however, persons under disability have an extended time allowed them, calculated from the time the disability ceased, provided the whole time allowed does not exceed a certain maximum period. The disabilities recognised for this purpose are—infancy, coverture, and unsoundness of mind. As to the absence abroad of a plaintiff or defendant, see ABSENCE BEYOND SEAS.

If the person liable to be sued gives the claimant an acknowledgment of his title, this has the effect of extending the period of limitation, so that it only runs from the acknowledgment, or the last acknowledgment, if there were several. See ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

The Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25, provided that no claim of a cestui que trust against his trustee for any property held on an express trust or in respect of any breach of such trust shall be held to be barred by any Statute of Limitations, but the Trustee Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 59), s. 8, now provides that the Statutes of Limitation may be pleaded by any trustee or anyone claiming through him, "except where the claim is founded upon any fraud or fraudulent breach of trust to which the trustee was party or privy, or is to recover trust property or the proceeds thereof."

The Statutes of Limitation do not apply to the engagements of a married woman; nor to the Crown (see NULLUM TEMPUS OCCURRIT REGI). And in the case of concealed fraud, the right of a person to bring an action to recover land or rents is deemed to have accrued at the time he discovered, or might have discovered, the fraud. The statutes do not interfere with the equitable doctrines of laches and acquiescence (q.v.).

The following are the periods allowed by the principal Statutes of Limitation:—

Statute.	Subject Matter.	Ordinary Limitation.	Extended Time for Persons under Disability.	Maximum Period.
3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27 } 37 & 38 Vict. c. 57 }	Lands and rents.	Twelve years.	Six years.	Thirty years.

3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27 } 37 & 38 Vict. c. 57 }	Moneys charged on land.	Twelve years.	None.
Same.	Legacies.	Twelve years.	None.
23 & 24 Vict. c. 38	Claims to estates of intestates.	Twenty years.	None.
3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27.	Arrears of dower or rent, or of money charged on land, or of interest on legacies	Six years.	None.
Same.	Land or rent belonging to an ecclesiastical or eleemosynary corporation sole.	Two incumbencies and six years, or sixty years, whichever is longer	None.
Same, and 6 & 7 Vict. c. 54.	Advowsons.	Three incumbencies or sixty years.	None.	One hundred years.
3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42.	Bonds, covenants, recognizances, &c.	Twenty years.	Full period after removal of disability
Same.	Penalties under statute	Two years.	Same.
21 Jac. 1, c. 16, and 9 Geo 4, c. 14.	Simple contracts, torts to property, and actions on the case, except those mentioned below.	Six years.	Same.
21 Jac. 1, c. 16.	Assaults and other torts to the person.	Four years.	Same.
Same.	Slander.	Two years.	Same.

Limitation of Liability. As to companies with limited liability, see COMPANY; CONTRIBUTORY.

A shipowner is not liable at all for loss of or damage to goods on the ship in certain cases, e.g., when caused by fire (Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 502), and is not liable for loss of life or injury to persons or things caused by or on board the ship in other cases beyond a certain amount for each ton of the ship's tonnage, namely, £15 per ton in respect of loss of life or personal injury, and £8 per ton for loss or damage to goods (ib. s. 503), except in the cases mentioned under YACHT. If the damages actually sustained exceed the amount thus arrived at, it is paid into Court, and distributed among the claimants in proportion to their claims. The claimants are said to prove against the fund in Court just as creditors prove against an insolvent estate. (See PROOF.) These limitations of liability only apply to cases where the loss or injury has not been caused by the shipowner's actual fault or privity (ss. 502, 503).

Where two vessels are injured by collision, and both are to blame, so that the enactment as to apportioning the liability for the damage applies (as to which see COLLISION), and one of them obtains a limitation of his liability under the M. S. Act, 1894, a set-off is allowed between the amounts of the respective damages. Thus, suppose the ships A and B come in collision, and both are equally to blame, and the half-damage payable by A is £14,000, and that payable by B is £2,000, then if there were no limitation of liability, A would be liable to B in the difference, namely, £12,000; and if ship A obtains a judgment limiting its liability to £5,000, then ship B is entitled to set off the £2,000, against the £14,000, and to prove against the £5,000 for the balance of £12,000.

Lincoln's Inn. See INNS OF COURT.

Lincoln's Inn Fields. A square containing a public park, now under the control of the London County Council. It was an open space until 1735. The statute 8 Geo. 2, c. 26, was then passed to authorise the enclosure of the land and the levying of a rate, for its maintenance in proper order, from the houses forming the square in which the fields lay. This enactment was passed because the fields had become a receptacle for refuse and a resort of dangerous persons. It appears from the preamble to the Act that the Society of Lincoln's Inn had no proprietary interest in the land but were "interested in the benefit and advantage of the prospect and air of the said field."

Lincoln, Statute of. The statute 9 Edw. 2, st. 2.

Lindsey. See RIDING.

Lineal. See CONSANGUINITY; DESCENT; WARRANTY.

Linea recta semper præfertur transversali (Co. Litt. 10). (The direct line is always preferred to the collateral.) Thus the eldest son of a deceased eldest son is the heir of a grandfather rather than a surviving younger brother of the deceased eldest son.

Liquidated. A sum is said to be liquidated when it is fixed or ascertained. The term is usually employed with reference to damages (q.v.). See also WRIT OF SUMMONS.

Liquidation; Liquidator. Under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, a debtor unable to pay his debts might present a petition stating that he was insolvent, and thereupon summon a general meeting of his creditors. If the meeting passed a special resolution declaring that the affairs of the debtor were to be liquidated by arrangement, and not in bankruptcy, the creditors appointed a trustee, with or without a committee of inspection, and the property of the debtor vested in the trustee and became divisible among his creditors, in the same way as if he had been made bankrupt. The subsequent proceedings generally followed the same course as those in an ordinary bankruptcy, except that the close of the liquidation and the discharge of the trustee were fixed by the creditors. The theory of the proceeding was that the affairs of the estate were brought under the immediate control of the creditors, without the delays and expenses caused by the supervision of the Court as in bankruptcy, but it cannot be said that this object was always attained.

Liquidation is not now known to our bankruptcy law, the only alternative to bankruptcy being an arrangement (q.v.) effected either privately or through the Court.

The liquidation of a company is now known as winding-up (q.v.): but the person who carries out the winding-up is known as a liquidator (q.v.).

Liquidator is a person appointed to carry out the winding-up of a company (see WINDING-UP). In the case of a voluntary winding-up, with or without supervision, one or more liquidators are appointed by the company (Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, s. 186); but where a company is being wound up subject to supervision, the Court may appoint additional liquidators (ib. s. 202). In the case of a compulsory winding-up by the Court a provisional liquidator may be appointed by the Court as soon as a petition for winding-up has been presented (ib. s. 149 (2)): the official receiver is usually the person appointed, but any other fit person may be selected (ib. s. 149 (3)). After the winding-up order is made, the official receiver is ex officio the provisional liquidator until he or some other person is appointed as liquidator (ib.).

The duties of a liquidator are to get in and realise the property of the company, to pay its debts, and to distribute the surplus (if any) among the members. The chief difference between a liquidator in a winding-up by the Court and a liquidator appointed in a voluntary winding-up is, that the former cannot as a rule take any important step in the winding-up without the sanction of the Court, while the latter is not so restricted, and also as of course does various things which, in a winding-up by the Court, are done either by the Court or by the liquidator under a general authority of the Court, e.g., settling the list of contributories and making calls.

Lis alibi pendens="a suit pending elsewhere." The fact that proceedings are pending between a plaintiff and defendant in one Court in respect to a given matter is frequently a ground for preventing the plaintiff from taking proceedings in another Court against the same defendant for the same object and arising out of the same cause of action. As a general rule, the plaintiff is put to his election which suit he will pursue, and the other is either dismissed, or the proceedings in it are suspended until the other is decided. This applies more especially where both proceedings are in British Courts. Where one proceeding is in a British and the other in a foreign Court, the Court will consider whether in one of them relief is obtainable which could not be obtained at all, or so easily, in the other.

Lis mota is existing or anticipated litigation. The phrase is used chiefly with reference to declarations or statements made under such circumstances that they are admissible in evidence notwithstanding the rule against hearsay evidence; thus a pedigree drawn up by a member of a family is admissible after his death as evidence of the facts stated in it, unless it can be shown that it was drawn up after litigation was in contemplation (post litem motam). The phrase is also used in questions of privileged communications. See CONFIDENTIAL COMMUNICATIONS; PRIVILEGE.

Lis pendens is a pending suit, action, petition for winding up a company, or the like. The old doctrine of lis pendens was that if property was in question in a suit or action, it could not be alienated during the pendency of the suit or action, even to a purchaser or mortgagee without notice. But by the Judgments Act, 1839, s. 7, no lis pendens binds a purchaser or mortgagee without express notice thereof, unless a memorandum giving a description of the person whose estate is intended to be affected thereby, and particulars of the suit, is registered in the Land Charges Department of the Land Registry (Land Charges Act, 1900): such registration was originally effected in the Common Pleas Registry Office, which afterwards was merged in the Central Office (q.v.). The registration of a lis pendens does not create an incumbrance on the property, but merely gives intending purchasers or mortgagees notice of the litigation.

The Crown Debts and Judgments Act, 1860, provides for the entering of a discharge of a lis pendens upon the filing of an acknowledgment of satisfaction.

Provision is made by the Lis Pendens Act, 1867, for vacating a lis pendens if the litigation is not prosecuted bonâ fide.

Thomas Littleton seems to have been born about the beginning of the fifteenth century; was called to the bar at the Inner Temple, made serjeant-at-law 1453, judge of the Common Pleas 1466, knighted 1475, and died 23rd August, 1481. He wrote the celebrated "Treatise on Tenures," still quoted as an authority on the law of real property, and made valuable by the equally celebrated Commentary of Sir E. Coke. There is also a commentary on it by an unknown writer, which is pronounced by Mr. Hargrave to be "a very methodical and instructive work."

Livery. Formerly when an infant heir of land had been in ward to the king by reason of a tenure in capite ut de coronâ, he was obliged on attaining twenty-one to sue livery, that is, to obtain delivery of the possession of the land, for which (in the case of a general livery) he paid half-a-year's profit of the land. Livery was either general, that is, in the ordinary form, which had several disadvantages, or special, that is, granted by the king as a matter of grace, by which those disadvantages were avoided and for which the heir had to pay more. As to the mode by which a tenant in capite ut de honore obtained his lands, see OUSTERLEMAIN.

Liveryman. A member of such of the City Companies as are Livery Companies. See COMPANIES, CITY.

Livery of Seisin is a public solemnity, or "overt ceremony," which was formerly necessary to convey an immediate estate of freehold in lands or tenements: that is, an estate of freehold in possession, or an estate of freehold only kept out of possession by a chattel interest (i.e., a term of years) preceding it. Thus, if before the Statute of Uses a tenant in fee wished to convey his estate to another, he could only do so by a feoffment, which operates by livery of seisin. (See FEOFFMENT.) At the present day simpler means of conveyance are usually available, and livery of seisin is practically obsolete.

Livery of seisin is a transfer of the feudal possession of land, and it is therefore essential that it should be made either in the presence or with the assent of all persons having a right to the possession as against the feoffor, such as lessees for years.

There are two kinds of livery of seisin, viz., a livery in deed and a livery in law. A livery in deed is where the feoffer is on the land to be conveyed, and verbally requests or invites the feoffee to enter, or formally hands to him any object, such as the ring or hasp of the door of the house, or a branch or twig of a tree, or a turf of the land, and declares that he delivers it to him by way of seisin of all the lands and tenements contained in the deed of feoffment. "A livery in law [or livery within the view] is," as Coke explains, "when the feoffor saith to the feoffee, being in view of the house or land, 'I give you yonder land to you and your heires, and go enter into the same, and take possession thereof accordingly,' and the feoffee doth accordingly in the life of the feoffor enter, this is a good feoffment." See HEREDITAMENT.

Lloyd's. A number of merchants, shipowners, underwriters, and insurance brokers were accustomed to meet, about the time of James II., in a coffee-house in Tower Street, in the City of London, kept by one Lloyd. This informal assemblage gradually formed itself into the association through which the insurance of the British mercantile marine is effected, and which furnishes the commercial world with a complete record, in the well-known publication entitled Lloyd's List, of daily events in the shipping world, such as casualties and sailings. Lloyd's Signal Station Act, 1888, empowered Lloyd's to establish shipping signal stations with telegraphic communication; and the Derelict Vessels (Report) Act, 1896, requires British ships to report to Lloyd's all derelicts which they may observe. But Lloyd's was made by itself, not by Parliament, although Parliament did in fact incorporate and regulate it by Lloyd's Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. xxi.). Many of the usages recognised by Lloyd's as obtaining between shipowners and underwriters have been recognised by the Courts also.

The Insurance Companies Act, 1909, s. 28 (2), excludes members of Lloyd's from the operation of that Act, provided that they comply with the requirements of the 8th Schedule to the Act in so far as those requirements relate to the class of business transacted. Insurance at Lloyd's, it should be noted, can be effected to cover loss arising not merely from maritime disasters, but from almost every conceivable event, such, for instance, as the birth of twins.

Lloyd's Bonds are instruments which were invented about the middle of the last century by Mr. J. H. Lloyd, a member of the bar. They are intended to assist railway companies in carrying out their schemes, by indirectly enlarging their borrowing powers, which are limited by the Acts creating them, the Railway Regulation Act, 1844, s. 19, and the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. A Lloyd's bond is merely an admission under seal of a debt due from some railway company to the party in whose favour it is executed, with a covenant to pay the debt with interest. "An account stated under seal with a covenant to pay," as Mr. Justice Blackburn put it in 1864. The obligee is thus enabled to go into the market and obtain cash upon the faith of these instruments. They are generally used (and can only legally be used) for paying contractors and others who have done work or supplied materials, etc., for the company, and cannot be given for a mere loan of money to the company.

Lloyd's Register. This is the popular title of Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping, which is published annually by the Society of Lloyd's Register, an unincorporated society which has existed in its present form since 1834. The society, which is quite distinct from "Lloyd's," is voluntarily maintained by those interested in shipping, and is managed by a committee consisting of shipowners, merchants, and underwriters. The Register is an alphabetical list of ships, classified according to materials, mode of construction, state of repair, etc. The classification is indicated by letters and numerals—such as "100 A1," which are those used for the highest class. The society publishes rules in accordance with which vessels must be constructed in order to be classed in the Register.

The society is officially recognised: see, for instance, the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, ss. 429, 443.

Lloyd's Register is quite distinct from Lloyd's List, as to which see LLOYD'S.

Load-line. An imaginary line along the side of a ship below which the vessel must not sink when loaded. It is indicated by a circular twelve-inch disc painted amidships on each side with a horizontal line eighteen inches long through the centre of the disc; and the load-line is the prolongation fore and aft of this horizontal line. Every vessel, other than a fishing vessel or a sailing coaster of less than eighty tons register or a yacht, must be so marked (Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 438; Merchant Shipping Act, 1906, s. 7). Any vessel so marked which is loaded so that she is, when in salt water, below her load-line, is to be deemed unsafe, and may be detained (Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 439).

These enactments apply to foreign ships in British ports except where the King in Council has exempted them because the laws of their countries are as effective as ours on the point (Merchant Shipping Act, 1906, s. 1; Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 445); and French, Dutch, and Swedish ships have been so exempted (see S. R. & O., 1909, No. 1407; ditto, 1910, Nos. 671 and 1114).

The exemption extended to sailing coasters under eighty tons has been extended (S. R. & O., 1907, Nos. 349 and 481) to steamers of various kinds of less than eighty tons register when not carrying cargo.

Load-manage. See LODEMANAGE.

Loadsman. Jacob states that a loadsman was one who, after a ship had been brought to a port by a pilot, took the ship to her berth in the port.

Loan Commissioners. In the Public Works Loans Act, 1875 (see s. 4) this expression means the Public Works Loan Commissioners (q.v.).

Loan Society. A society formed in order to establish a fund for the purpose of making to the industrious classes loans repayable by instalments: see the Loan Societies Act, 1840, s. 3, which regulates the business of such a society.

Local Action. See VENUE.

Local Authority. This expression is of modern origin. In the definition clauses of dozens of Acts passed during the last seventy years, it is declared to mean, for the purposes of each of those Acts, the persons or bodies who respectively give effect to the Acts in various areas. Thus s. 4 of the Public Health Act, 1875, defines it as meaning urban sanitary authority and rural sanitary authority.

For the purposes of the Elementary Education Act, 1876, the expression "local authority" meant the school board and the school attendance committee (Elementary Education Act, 1876, s. 7 (2)). Under the Education Act, 1902, s. 5, the powers and duties of the school boards and the school attendance committees (see those titles) were vested in the local education authorities (q.v.).

In 1908 it was decided that neither reporters, nor the public at large, nor even the burgesses, could attend the meetings of a borough council, county council or district council, unless the council saw fit to admit them. In consequence of this decision the Local Authorities (Admission of the Press to Meetings) Act, 1908, s. 1, enacted that representatives of the Press should be admitted to every meeting of a local authority except in so far as a majority of the members present should decide that, in view of the business being or about to be transacted, the exclusion of reporters is advisable in the public interest. The Act (s. 2) defines "local authority" as meaning (1) a county council, a county borough council, a borough urban district council, a rural district council, a parish council, a joint committee or board of any such councils exercising the powers of its constituent councils, or a parish meeting under the Local Government Act, 1894; (2) an education committee, or joint education committee dealing with matters not requiring to be submitted to any council for approval; (3) a board of guardians, a joint committee under the Poor Law Act, 1879, s. 8, or the board of management of any school or asylum district under the Acts for the relief of the poor; (4) a central body or distress committee under the Unemployed Workmen Act, 1905; (5) a water board; (6) a rating authority. As regards the public at large, and even the burgesses, the Act left the law as it had previously been.

The annual meeting of a parish council is open to the public (Local Government Act, 1894, Sch. I., Pt. II., r. 13).

Local Boards of Health were (1) authorities formed under the Local Government Acts (q.v.) for carrying out in their respective districts the provisions of those Acts; (ii) authorities formed by order of the Local Government Board under s. 272 and Sch. II. of the Public Health Act, 1875, to be sanitary authorities for the execution of the provisions of that Act Under the Local Government Act, 1894, s. 21, diction of the Court of Lodemanage, which was a branch of the Court of Admiralty of the Cinque Ports (q.v.). The property of the Court of Lodemanage and of the Society of Cinque Ports Pilots was transferred to the Trinity House by the Pilotage Law Amendment Act, 1853, s. 10; and s. 4 of the same Act made the Cinque Ports pilots subject to the same rules, etc., as Trinity House pilots.

Lodger; Lodgings. A lodger is a person who occupies rooms in a house of which the general possession remains in the landlord, as shown by the fact that he retains control over the street or outer door. If, therefore, a house is divided into sets of rooms, each of which has an outer door opening on to a common staircase, while the entrance to that staircase either has no street-door, or has a door under the control of a porter acting as the servant of the collective tenants, then each set of rooms is not a lodging, but a separate hereditament, and each tenant has a rateable occupation. See RATEABLE.

Goods belonging to a lodger are exempt from distress for rent owing by the lodger's landlord to the superior landlord. To entitle himself to this exemption, the lodger must serve on the superior landlord a declaration, with an inventory of the goods distrained on, stating that the goods are his, and undertaking to pay to the landlord any rent due or to accrue from the lodger to his immediate landlord (Law of Distress Amendment Act, 1908, s. 1).

In every parliamentary constituency, a person who had occupied lodgings, being, if unfurnished, of the yearly value of £10, for twelve months preceding the last day of July in any year, was entitled to be registered as a voter at parliamentary elections; but this "lodger-franchise" was abolished in 1918. See ELECTORAL FRANCHISE.

The Acts relating to the public health contain provisions for the registration, inspection, and regulation of common lodging houses. See the Public Health Act, 1875, ss. 75-90; and the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1907, ss. 69-75; and, as regards London County, see the Common Lodging Houses Act, 1851, and the Common Lodging Houses Act, 1853. The Public Health (London) Act, 1891, s. 94, deals with lodgings, not being in common lodging houses, within London County; as regards such lodgings elsewhere, see s. 90 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1885, s. 8.

See COMMON LODGING HOUSE.

Log. A record, called "the official log," of happenings in and to a ship (every entry in which is to be made as soon as possible after the event to which it relates), which must be kept in every ship other than ships trading only between ports in Scotland, pleasure yachts, or ships belonging to lighthouse authorities. See the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, ss. 239-243, 262 (j).

Logating. "Logating in the field" is mentioned in the preamble of the statute 33 Hen. 8, c. 9, as one of "sundry new and crafty games" with which men occupied themselves instead of practising archery. Loggat was a game in which a stake was fixed in the ground and the players threw from a distance "loggats" (spherical masses of wood with long handles), which they tried to leave as near the stake as possible.

London. The area within a radius of about six miles of Charing Cross is colloquially described as London. In law, however, there is no such entity as London.

The administrative county of London was created by the Local Government Act, 1888, ss. 40 (1), 100, which provided that the metropolis, that is to say, the City of London and the parishes and places mentioned in Schedules A., B., and C. to the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, as amended by subsequent statutes, should form the administrative county of London. This is approximately the area popularly known as London. The City of London is included only for certain administrative purposes (Act of 1888, s. 40 (2)), but can be completely merged in the administrative county when and if the city authorities so desire (ib., s. 40 (3)). The administrative county originally contained about 121 square miles. Now the area is only about 117 square miles, the boundaries having been altered by transfers, under the London Government Act, 1899, of areas to and from so much of the ancient counties of Middlesex, Kent, and Surrey as remained after the administrative county had been carved out of those counties in 1888. The administrative county of London is the area governed by the London County Council, which, like the county, was created by the Act of 1888. (See COUNTY; COUNTY COUNCIL.) The whole of the administrative county is included in the metropolitan police district (q.v.).

The City of London contains a little more than a square mile, the precise area being 671 acres. The government of the city remains much as it was in the Middle Ages. It is vested in the Lord Mayor, the aldermen, the common councillors or councilmen, and the City Companies.

The title of Lord Mayor has existed from 1354. Before that date, as from, at any rate, 1189, the office had existed under the title of Mayor. The Lord Mayor is selected by the Court of Aldermen (infra) out of the two aldermen nominated for the office by the Court of Common Hall (infra).

The office of alderman—in its present, as distinguished from its Anglo-Saxon, meaning—has existed from, at latest, the thirteenth century. There are twenty-six aldermen, one of them being the Lord Mayor, each of whom represents one of the wards. The office is for life, except in case of insolvency, conviction of crime, or other good cause (17 Rich. 2, cc. 11, 13; 12 & 13 Vict., c. cxiv, s. 9). Each of them is elected by the constituents of his ward, except the alderman of the Ward of Bridge Without, or Southwark, who is always the senior alderman, there being no electors, and consequently no election in that ward. Each candidate for aldermanship must be a freeman of the city.

The Court of Aldermen consists of all the aldermen, presided over by the Lord Mayor or his locum tenens, thirteen being a quorum.

The Court of Common Council is the popular title of the "Court of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commoners of the City of London in Common Council assembled," which dates from, at any rate, 1275. It consists of, besides the Lord Mayor and the aldermen, two hundred and six common councillors, the latter being elected annually on December 21-22 by the ward-motes of the twenty-five wards which (see ante) have constituencies. The administration of the city is in the hands of the Court of Aldermen and the Court of Common Council. There is also a third municipal body—the "Meeting or Assembly of the Mayor, Aldermen and Liverymen of the several Companies of the City of London in Common Hall assembled," generally called the Court of Common Hall. This court consists of the Lord Mayor—or, in his absence, one of the sheriffs—four aldermen at the least, the sheriffs, and all the good freemen of the city who are liverymen of the City Companies: it nominates two aldermen for the office of Lord Mayor (see ante), and elects the sheriffs and certain other city officers, but takes no further part in the administration of the city.

London Commissioners to Administer Oaths in Chancery. Under the statute 16 & 17 Vict. c. 78, s. 2, the Lord Chancellor was empowered to appoint solicitors whose offices were within ten miles of Lincoln's Inn Hall—the habitation of the old Court of Chancery—to administer oaths, etc., in Chancery. This enactment was repealed by the Commissioners for Oaths Act, 1889. See COMMISSIONERS FOR OATHS.

London County Bills. Bills payable not less than three nor more than twelve months after date issued under a warrant sealed by the London County Council: each of them is sealed with the seal of the Council, and is attested by the clerk. See the London County Council (Finance Consolidation) Act, 1912, (2 & 3 Geo. 5, c. cv.), ss. 35, 38.

London Court of Bankruptcy. This Court was established by the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. It had jurisdiction throughout the City of London and the Metropolitan County Court districts. The Judicature Act, 1873, s. 16, transferred its jurisdiction to the Supreme Court. See BANKRUPTCY COURT.

London, Port of. The port of London includes all the water lying between Teddington, in Middlesex, and an imaginary straight line "drawn from the pilot mark at the entrance of Havengore Creek, in the county of Essex, to the land's end at Warden Point, in the Isle of Sheppey, in the county of Kent," but does not include any part of the river Medway, which is within the jurisdiction of the Medway Conservators, or any part of the river Swale, or any part of the river Lea, which is within the jurisdiction of the Lea Conservancy Board, or any part of the Grand Junction Canal (Port of London Act, 1908, ss. 490-5). The Port of London Act, 1908, put the port under the authority of a port authority thereby created (s. 1), and transferred to the port authority the undertakings of the London and India Docks Company, the Surrey Commercial Dock Company, and the Millwall Dock Company (s. 4).

London Sessions. Each of the twelve annual sittings of the Central Criminal Court (q.v.) is known as a session (see the Central Criminal Court Act, 1834, s. 15); and the sittings of the Court are sometimes called the London Sessions.

London Sittings. The Guildhall Sittings (q.v.).

Lopwood is a right in the inhabitants of a parish within a manor to lop for fuel at certain periods of the year the branches of trees growing upon the waste lands of the manor. The true nature of the right is not quite clear, and it seems that it can only be created by Crown grant or Act of Parliament. See PROFIT À PRENDRE; PRESCRIPTION.

Loquela. Imparlance (q.v.).

Loquela sine die. This appears to have meant an indefinite adjournment (q.v.).

Lord; Lordship. In the law of real property, a lord is a person of whom land is held by another as his tenant. The relation between the lord and the tenant is called tenure (q.v.), and the right or interest which the lord has in the services of his tenant is called a lordship or seignory (q.v.).

If before the Statute of Quia Emptores (q.v.), A conveyed land to B to hold of himself (A), and B conveyed it to C to hold of himself (B), A would be called lord paramount, B mesne lord, or "mesne," and C tenant paravail (see MESNE). The Statute of Quia Emptores having abolished subinfeudation, no person can now create a lordship (see SUBINFEUDATION). The only lords of any importance at the present day are lords of manors (see MANOR). But the Crown is sovereign lord, or lord paramount, of all the land in England, and in that character sometimes becomes entitled to land by escheat (q.v.).

Lord Great Chamberlain. See CHAMBERLAIN.

Lord High Admiral. See ADMIRAL.

Lord High Steward. When a person is impeached, or when a peer is tried on indictment for treason or felony before the House of Lords, one of the lords is appointed Lord High Steward, and acts as speaker pro tempore (see IMPEACHMENT; CERTIORARI). If a peer is indicted for treason or felony while the House of Lords is not sitting, the indictment is removed into the Court of the Lord High Steward, which is a Court instituted by commission from the Crown, summoning all the peers of Parliament; in it the Lord High Steward is sole judge on points of law, and the peers summoned are triers and judges of fact only. This Court, which has not sat since 1688, is, of course, quite distinct from the Court of the Lord Steward of the King's Household (q.v.).

The office of Lord High Steward was not at first hereditary, but at an early period it became so in the family of the Earls of Leicester. When Simon de Montfort, who held that title, was killed in 1265, it, and his other honours, were forfeited to the Crown. After various regrants, it finally merged in the Crown in 1407; and since then there has been no Lord High Steward, except when an appointment has been made pro hac vice, that is to say, for a special occasion. The appointment is made, upon an address from the House of Lords requesting that a High Steward be appointed, by commission under the Great Seal. When the peers have assembled for a trial—the last was that of Earl Russell for bigamy in 1901—the commission is read by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and the High Steward is then presented with his staff of office by the heralds. At the conclusion of the proceedings, the High Steward breaks his staff and declares the commission dissolved, whereupon his office determines.

Lord High Treasurer. See TREASURY.

Lord in Gross. He who was lord otherwise than in respect of a manor: thus the King, as lord paramount of all the country, was formerly described as lord in gross. See MANOR.

Lord Keeper, or Keeper of the Great Seal, was originally another name for the Lord Chancellor. (See CHANCELLOR.) After Henry II.'s reign the offices were sometimes divided: now there cannot be a Lord Chancellor and Lord Keeper at the same time, for by the statute 5 Eliz. c. 18, they are declared to be the same office. Down to 1760 the Great Seal was sometimes held by a Lord Keeper instead of by a Lord Chancellor; but since that date there has been no Lord Keeper.

Lord Lieutenant. The office of "lieutenants of counties" was created about the reign of Henry VIII., or one of his children (some say in that of Edward VI.), for the purpose of having a representative of the Crown in each county, to keep it in military order. For this purpose they had the power of raising militia. Formerly, they had the command of the militia and other auxiliary forces, and appointed their officers, but by the Regulation of the Forces Act, 1871, the jurisdiction of lieutenants of counties in these respects was transferred to the Crown. Their connection with the military forces of the Crown has, however, revived by the Territorial and Reserve Forces Act, 1907, which (see s. 1 (3) (c)) gives the lord lieutenant the option of becoming president of the county association formed under that Act for the purpose of administering the military forces of the Crown (other than the regulars and their reserves) within the county. Subject to the approval of the Crown, they nominate persons for the lowest rank of officer in the county territorial units (ib., s. 8). They have also the power of recommending persons for the commission of the peace; and the Crown usually, though not invariably, gives effect to their recommendations. The appointment to the office is made by the Crown, under the Militia Act, 1882, s. 29. The lord lieutenant, with the consent of the Crown, appoints as deputy lieutenants twenty persons having places of residence within the county, or within seven miles thereof, who are "shown to the satisfaction of a Secretary of State to have rendered worthy service as a member of, or in a civil capacity in connection with, His Majesty's naval, military or air forces," or such number, being less than twenty, as there may be of such persons (Militia Act, 1882, s. 30 (2); Deputy Lieutenants Act, 1918, c. 19, s. 1). He may, with the consent of the Crown, appoint one of such deputy lieutenants to act for him as vice-lieutenant during his absence, sickness, or other inability to act (Militia Act, 1882, s. 32).

Recruits for the Territorial Army may be attested by any lord lieutenant or deputy lieutenant (Territorial and Reserve Forces Act, 1907, s. 10 (2)).

There are separate lords lieutenant for each of the ridings of Yorkshire; and there is also a separate lord lieutenant for the district known as the town and county of Haverfordwest, which is part of Pembrokeshire.

In the City of London the Lord Mayor, although not entitled the Lord Lieutenant, is ex officio the head of the city lieutenancy, and recommends to the Crown the names of persons to fill vacancies therein.

See LIEUTENANCY, COMMISSION OF.

Lord Mayor's Court. See MAYOR'S COURT OF LONDON.

Lord President of the Council. The President of the Privy Council (q.v.). The office is held by such person, being a member of one House of Parliament or the other, as the King in Council, from time to time, verbally declares to be the Lord President of the Council. It is of cabinet rank, and carries a salary of £5,000 a year.

Lord Privy Seal. Before the Reformation this office was usually held by a Churchman. Since then it has usually been held by lay peers. Until recent times the Privy Seal had to be affixed to documents, especially letters patent, which were to pass the Great Seal (q.v.). But the Patents, Designs and Trade Marks Act, 1883, made the use of anything except the seal of the Patent Office unnecessary for letters patent: the Crown Office Act, 1877, authorised the use of a wafer Privy Seal instead of the actual Privy Seal: the Great Seal Act, 1884, s. 3, altogether abolished the use of the Privy Seal: and now the Lord Privy Seal has, as such, no official duties whatever to discharge unless he be a peer, in which case he is ex officio a member of the House of Lords Offices Committee, a body which looks after the domestic arrangements of that House. The office carries cabinet rank and a salary of, at present, £5,000 a year, and of recent years has generally been conferred upon some politician whom it is desired to include in the Cabinet without his holding an office involving official functions. Thus, down to March, 1921, Mr. Bonar Law was Leader of the House of Commons—which is not a recognised office, but involves much work—and also Lord Privy Seal. The office had been without salary down to 1900, when Lord Salisbury assumed it—with a salary of £2,000—on his becoming Prime Minister (q.v.), which was not then a recognised office, and which carried no salary. It carries none even now.

See CLERKS OF THE PRIVY SEAL.

Lords' Act. The popular title of the Debtors Imprisonment Act, 1758 (32 Geo. 2, c. 28).

Lords Justices. As regards Ireland, the Lords Justices were commissioners for executing the office of Lord Lieutenant who were always sworn in during a vacancy in that office and during any absence—unless it were very brief—from Ireland of the Lord Lieutenant. They could not be Roman Catholics (Roman Catholic Relief Act, 1829, s. 12). No provision was made in the Government of Ireland Act, 1920, for the appointment of Lords Justices.

As regards England, it appears from the Commons Journals, Vol. 44, pp. 38-39, that from 1253 Lords Justices had, from time to time, been appointed: these were frequently individual barons or individual members of the royal family; the Earl of Pembroke, for instance, being appointed in 1285 by Edward I., and John, Duke of Bedford, being appointed in 1421 by his brother Henry V. Since the Revolution of 1688 commissioners have been appointed from time to time under the Great Seal to exercise, during the absence of the Sovereign from the realm, such of the royal functions as are delegated to them. They have always been chosen from amongst such peers, spiritual or temporal, as are members of the Privy Council. See REGENCY.

Lords Justices of Appeal. The designation of the five ordinary judges of the Court of Appeal. See SUPREME COURT.

Lords of Appeal. See APPELLATE JURISDICTION ACTS.

Lords of Appeal in Ordinary. These are persons appointed by the King for the purpose of aiding the House of Lords in the hearing and determination of appeals; they must have held some high judicial office for two years, or have been practising barristers or advocates for at least fifteen years; they are barons for life, and are entitled to sit and vote in the House of Lords during their tenure of office (Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1876, s. 6). High judicial office means the office of Lord Chancellor of Great Britain or Ireland, or of judge of the superior Courts of Great Britain or Ireland (ib., s. 25). There are six Lords of Appeal in Ordinary, two of them being appointed under s. 6 of the Act of 1876, two under s. 14 of the Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1887, and two under s. 1 of the Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1913. They are ex-officio members of the Court of Appeal, but need not sit therein unless at the request of the Lord Chancellor they consent so to do (Act of 1913, s. 2).

Lord Steward of the King's Household. This is an office quite distinct from that of the Lord High Steward (q.v.). He is mentioned in the statute 24 Hen. 8, c. 13; his title was changed to that of Great Master of the Household in 1540, but the title of Lord Steward of the King's Household was revived by the statute 1 Mar., c. 4, and has ever since been in use. He originally presided over the now-abolished Court of the Lord Steward of the King's Household (q.v.), and was, in theory, one of the two judges of the Palace Court (q.v.); he still appoints the Coroner of the King's Household (see CORONER); but his main function from the beginning was, and still is, to supervise the servants and the arrangements of the Royal Household, as regards all matters not entrusted to the Master of the House (q.v.), or the Lord Chamberlain (q.v.), or not relating to the Chapels Royal. The office is not hereditary: it is always held by a peer, who is always a member of the political party which is in office for the time being.

See BOARD OF GREEN CLOTH.

Lord Treasurer. The full title of this officer was the Lord High Treasurer and Treasurer of the Exchequer. As Lord High Treasurer, he was appointed by receiving a white staff from the king; as Treasurer of the Exchequer, he was appointed by letters patent. The office, which dates from the earliest Norman period, was never hereditary. It was in early times always held by some one person; in 1612 it was put in commission; from then until 1714 it was sometimes held personally and was sometimes in commission; and since 1714 it has always been in commission. The Commissioners constitute the Treasury Board, which never meets now, but which used to meet, in gradually diminishing numbers, until the middle of the last century. It now consists of the First Lord of the Treasury (usually either the Prime Minister or the Leader of the House of Commons) who exercises as regards finance only what may be termed an appellate jurisdiction, the Chancellor of the Exchequer (who is for all practical purposes the Lord Treasurer), a couple of Junior Lords, a Patronage Secretary (who, with the assistance of the Junior Lords, acts as party whip for the Government), and a Financial Secretary, all of whom are members of Parliament.

See TREASURY.

Lord Warden. See CINQUE PORTS.

Lorimers. One of the City Companies, anciently composed of makers of bits, bridles and spurs. See the statute 1 Rich. 2, c. 12.

Loss. In the law of marine insurance, the losses which arise from the various perils insured against may be either total or partial; they are total when the subject-matter of the insurance is wholly destroyed, or injured to such an extent as to justify the owner in abandoning to the insurer, and partial when the thing insured is only partially damaged, or where, in the case of an insurance on goods, the owner of them is called upon to contribute to a general average. Total losses may again be divided into actual and constructive total losses. Actual total losses arise where the ship or cargo is totally destroyed or annihilated, or where they are placed by any of the perils insured against in such a position that it is wholly out of the power of the assured to procure their arrival. Thus, where by means of a peril insured against, a ship founders or is actually destroyed, or even where she is so much injured that she becomes a wreck, the loss is total and actual, although the form of the ship may still remain; and in these cases the assured may recover for a total loss without abandonment. Losses are constructively total when the subject-matter of the insurance, although still in existence, is either actually lost to the owners or beneficially lost to them, and notice of abandonment has been given to the underwriters. Thus, where the ship, although existing as a ship, is captured or laid under an embargo, and has not been recaptured or restored before action brought, so that she is lost to the owners; or where she is so damaged by a peril insured against as to be innavigable, and is so situated that either she cannot be repaired at the place in which she is, or cannot be repaired without incurring an expense greater than her value when repaired, the assured may abandon and treat the loss as total.

See ABANDONMENT OF SHIP; INSURANCE; POLICY.

As to loss of negotiable instruments, see ACCIDENT.

Lost Grant. Before the Prescription Act, 1832 (q.v.), a claim to an easement could in theory only be supported either where it had been enjoyed from time immemorial, or where the claimant could prove that it had been created by a deed of grant. But after the statute 21 Jac. 1, c. 16, had limited the time for bringing possessory actions for land to twenty years, the Courts adopted the same period as sufficient to give rise to an easement, on the presumption that it had been created by a deed of grant which had been lost, "and juries were directed so to find in cases in which no one had the faintest belief that any grant had ever existed, and where the presumption was known to be a mere fiction." This presumption of a lost grant has been deprived of its importance in the case of most easements by the Prescription Act, but it is not altogether obsolete. See SUPPORT.

Lost or not Lost are words inserted in a maritime policy of insurance to prevent the operation of the rule that if a ship is lost at the time of insurance, the policy is void, although the assured did not know of the loss. The words operate to make the underwriter liable, even where the subject-matter of insurance had not vested in the assured at the time of the occurrance of the loss (Marine Insurance Act, 1906, s. 6 (1)), but not where, at the time that the assurance was effected, the assured knew of the loss and the insurer did not (ib.); for instance, if a merchant, having bought goods at sea, were to insure them "lost or not lost," the policy would entitle him to recover from the underwriter in respect of a loss sustained during the voyage, but before the purchase and without the knowledge of the merchant when he insured. See INSURANCE; POLICY; LOSS.

Where the subject-matter of the insurance has arrived in safety before the insurance was effected, the "lost or not lost" clause makes the premium non-returnable unless the insurer, when effecting the policy, knew of such safe arrival (Marine Insurance Act, 1906, s. 84 (3) (b)).

Lot; Lot Mead. A lot is the same thing as a dole (q.v.).

A lot mead or lot meadow is an open field divided into lots or doles. See DOLE; OPEN FIELDS.

These lot meads seem to have originated in certain manors where a piece of meadow land was periodically allotted to the freehold tenants of the arable land in the manor.

See INHERITANCE; SEVERALTY.

Lot and Cope. Duties payable to the Crown in respect of lead mines in the High Peak, Derbyshire. Lot was every thirteenth dish of lead: cope was a payment of sixpence a load.

Lotherwit. The same (see Termes de la Ley) as LAIRWITE (q.v.).

Lottery. A distribution of prizes by lot or chance. A sweepstake on the Derby, or a raffle for a watch, is obviously a lottery. So also is the sale of, for instance, packets of tea containing each a ticket entitling the purchaser to some one or other of a number of prizes of different values. But the giving of a prize for the selection of, say, the horses that run first, second and third in the Derby, is not a lottery, the result being determined not entirely by chance, but also by the skill and knowledge with which the horses may be selected.

A lottery carried on in accordance with the provisions of the Art Union Act, 1846, is legalised by that Act. With this exception, all lotteries come within the Lotteries Act, 1699, which (see s. 1) declares them to be "common and public nuisances": the effect of this is that an indictment at common law will lie. And under s. 2 of the same Act any person who publicly or privately "exercises" or keeps any lottery is guilty of an indictable misdemeanour.

Other enactments directed against lotteries are the Lotteries Act, 1710, s. 57; the Lotteries Act, 1721, ss. 36, 37; the Lotteries Act, 1722, s. 4; the Lotteries Act, 1732, s. 29; the Gaming Act, 1738, ss. 3, 4; the Gaming Act, 1802, ss. 1-7; the Lotteries Act, 1806, s. 59; the Lotteries Act, 1823, ss. 19, 37-39, 41, 59, 60-62, 67; the Lotteries Act, 1836, s. 1; and the Lotteries Act, 1845, ss. 3, 4.

Prosecutions are most usually brought under s. 2 of the Gaming Act, 1802, which provides for the summary conviction of a defendant; but it is to be noted that the offence under that section is to "publicly or privately keep" a place for a lottery; and it has been held that the offence is not committed by using a room only on one occasion for the drawing of the tickets in a lottery.

Down to 1823, when the Lotteries Act, 1823, was passed for "granting to His Majesty a sum of money to be raised by way of lottery," it had been usual to raise, from time to time, money for public purposes by way of lotteries; but since then there has been no such lottery.

The sale of tickets for any foreign lottery is punishable summarily under the Lotteries Act, 1823, s. 41, and the Vagrancy Act, 1824, ss. 4, 21.

Loughborough's (Lord) Act. Formerly a popular title of the Accumulations Act, 1800. See ACCUMULATION.

Low Sunday. The Sunday next after Easter Sunday.

Lubbock's Act. A popular title of the Bank Holiday Act, 1871. See BANK HOLIDAY.

Lucid Interval is an interval of sanity separating two attacks of insanity. Perfect sanity is not required to constitute a lucid interval in the sense in which the phrase is now used; it is sufficient that the lunatic knows what he is doing, and that his act is not affected by a delusion (q.v.), and that he has capacity sufficient for the doing of a particular act. An act done during a lucid interval is as valid, and involves the same liabilities and responsibilities, as the act of a sane man. See LUNATIC.

See HOMO POTEST, etc.

Lunacy means either

I. The condition or status of a lunatic (q.v.), or

II. Judicial proceedings taken before the Judge in Lunacy, that is to say, before "the Lord Chancellor for the time being intrusted by the sign manual of His Majesty with the care and commitment of the custody of the persons and estate of lunatics, acting alone or jointly with any one or more of such judges of the Supreme Court as may for the time being be intrusted as aforesaid, or by any one or more of such judges as aforesaid" (Lunacy Act, 1890, s. 108 (1)), for the purpose of making inquiry (q.v.) into the state of mind of persons alleged to be lunatics, of taking charge of them and their property if they are found to be lunatics, and of having them treated with a view to restoring them to sanity. The proceedings used formerly to generally consist, and sometimes still consist, of a petition presented to the Lord Chancellor alleging the insanity, and supported by affidavits of two medical men and a relative of the alleged lunatic, and praying for an inquiry; an order by the Lord Chancellor directing the inquiry to be taken; and the inquiry before the Master in Lunacy (q.v.) with or without a jury, at which witnesses are examined and the alleged lunatic is inspected. The "finding" or result of the inquiry is stated in a document called the inquisition (q.v.), which consists of the verdict of the jury or (if there was no jury) of the Master's certificate. If the person has thus been found a lunatic, the party having the conduct of the proceedings must forthwith take out a summons, returnable before the Master, to inquire as to (1) The lunatic's age, position in life and residence; (2) The nature of his lunacy; (3) Who are his next-of-kin and heir-at-law; (4) Who ought to be appointed committee of his person and of his estate; (5) His property and the particulars thereof; (6) His income; (7) His past and future maintenance (Rules in Lunacy, 1892, r. 31). As to these matters the Master makes such order as he deems expedient (ib., r. 32). If the lunatic recovers his sound mind, he may obtain his release from restraint by presenting a petition for a supersedeas, and, on an order being made, a writ of supersedeas issues, by which the inquisition and other proceedings are superseded, determined, annulled and discharged; or the inquisition may be suspended for a time to test the effect of the removal of restraint; or (Lunacy Act, 1890, s. 106), the inquisition may be superseded so far as it finds the lunatic incapable of managing himself, but may be left in force so far as it finds him incapable of managing his affairs.

If the lunatic, or anyone representing him, desires to set aside the inquisition on the ground that he was of sound mind when it was returned, he proceeds by traverse (q.v.).

Procedure by way of petition is costly and lengthy, and has been to a large extent superseded by proceedings under the Lunacy Act, 1890, ss. 116-130 and the Lunacy Act, 1908, s. 1, and such of the Lunacy Rules of 1892 as are applicable. Ss. 117-130 of the Act of 1890 and s. 1 of the Act of 1908 empower a receiver or quasi-committee of the estate of a lunatic to do everything which might be done by a committee of his estate; and, unless it be necessary to control the person of the lunatic, the ordinary course is now to move under s. 116 of the Act of 1890 for the appointment of a person to exercise the powers of a quasi-committee of the estate of the alleged lunatic, if he be (1) a person lawfully detained as a lunatic though not so found; (2) a person whose whole property does not exceed £2,000, or whose whole income does not exceed £100, or (3) a person who through mental infirmity, arising from disease or age, is incapable of managing his affairs, but who has neither been detained nor found as a lunatic. In applications and orders under the Acts of 1890 and 1908 the use of the words "lunatic" and "lunacy" is avoided.

The High Court also has jurisdiction to authorise the income of the property of a person of unsound mind to be applied for his maintenance; this is done in an action for the administration of the property, instituted in the Chancery Division. See MAINTENANCE.

As to lunatic trustees, see TRUSTEE ACTS.

Where a reception order (q.v.) has been made in the case of a lunatic, the value of whose whole property is under £200, the County Court judge of the place from which the lunatic was sent may, on the application of an officer of the board of guardians, if no relative or friend of the lunatic is willing to act, appoint a person to manage the property of the Lunatic (Lunacy Act, 1890, s. 132; and see County Court Rules, Ord. 50, r. 17). See TRUSTEE ACTS.

Lunatic. A lunatic is defined by the Lunacy Act, 1890, s. 341, as "an idiot or person of unsound mind." The word "lunatic" is also used in law in three senses: to denote (1) a person who has attacks of intermittent insanity separated by lucid intervals, or suffers from delusions (q.v.); (2) a person who from unsoundness of mind is incapable of managing himself or his affairs, and has been found or adjudged to be so by inquisition; and (3) a person detained in an asylum on account of unsoundness of mind.

The word is used in the first sense when it is a question whether a person was insane or not when he entered into a contract, made his will, or did some other civil act; the general rule being that a contract or conveyance, etc., by a lunatic is voidable unless it was entered into by the other party without notice of his state of mind, bonâ fide, and for valuable consideration, and has been executed so that there cannot be a restitutio in integrum; but the principle is not satisfactorily settled. (See DELUSION.) A petition for divorce may be presented by the committee of a lunatic. The term "lunacy" is not now often used with reference to criminal responsibility, having been superseded by the term "insanity" (q.v.).

In its second sense "lunatic" includes not only insane persons and idiots, but also persons imbecile from age or infirmity, so that they are incapable of managing themselves or their affairs, or are capable of managing their affairs but incapable of managing themselves, or vice versa. See INQUISITION; LUNACY; MENTAL DEFICIENCY.

In its third sense the word means a proper person to be taken charge of and detained under care and treatment. Such lunatics are divided into (i) pauper lunatics and criminal lunatics (q.v.), who are confined and maintained at the public expense; and (ii) other lunatics, who are maintained either in private houses or in charitable institutions. As to the supervision of such persons see VISITOR.

As to lunatics generally, see the Lunacy Act, 1890, the Lunacy Act, 1891, and the Lunacy Act, 1908.

See MENTAL DEFICIENCY; URGENCY ORDER.

Lundress. An ancient popular designation of the sterling silver penny (see SILVER COINS), which was coined at the Mint in Londres (corrupted into Lundress), or London.

Lupinum. See CAPUT.

Lupulicetum. A hop garden (Inst. 4).

Lushburgs or Luxemburgs. Base coin made abroad and passed off in this country as English money in the reign of Edward III. The statute 25 Edw. 3, st. 5, c. 2, made it treason to bring into the realm "la mony appelle Lusburgh," just as it made it treason to levy war against the king.

Lying-by. A person who is guilty of laches and acquiescence (q.v.) is said to lie by.

Lying-in Hospitals. The statute 13 Geo. 3, c. 82, provides that no lying-in hospital can be established or carried on without a licence, costing 45s. (ss. 1 & 2), from the local quarter sessions, and unless there be over the door in large letters: "Licensed for the publick reception of pregnant women pursuant to an Act of Parliament passed in the thirteenth year of the reign of King George the Third," s. 4).

Lyndhurst's (Lord) Act. The popular title of the Marriage Act, 1835. See Campbell's Lives of the Lord Chancellors, Vol. VIII., p. 100, as to its origin. It provided that no marriage between persons within the prohibited degrees (q.v.) of affinity which had been celebrated before 31st August, 1835, should be annulled except in a suit pending on that date, but that any such marriage celebrated after that date should be absolutely null and void. Up to then, such marriages were not void, but were voidable by sentence of the ecclesiastical Court; and unless such sentence was pronounced during the lifetime of both parties to the marriage the children were legitimate.

See DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER.

The same popular title was also applied to the Nonconformist Chapels Act, 1844, and to the Execution Act, 1844.

Lyon's Inn. See INNS OF CHANCERY.

Lytton's (Lord) Act. A popular title of the Dramatic Copyright Act, 1833, now repealed.

Mace. An ornamental staff, generally made of some precious metal, borne as a symbol of authority, upon occasions of State, before certain persons, such as the Lord Chancellor, the Speaker of the House of Commons, the Lord Mayor, the Chancellors of Universities, etc. The Speaker's mace is on the table of the House while the Speaker is in the Chair; when his place is occupied by the Chairman of Committees while the House is in committee, the mace lies under the table.

In the City of London the Serjeant-at-Mace is not concerned with the mace. He is an officer of the Mayor's Court (q.v.), the process of which is executed by him.

Mace-greff. Used by Britton (q.v.) to mean a purchaser of stolen goods.

Machecollare; Machoulare. Used in Co. Litt. 5*a* as meaning to machicolate [a castle], that is to say, to provide it with apertures through which molten lead, stones, etc., could be dropped on assailants.

"Made in Germany." See MERCHANDISE MARKS.

Maegth. In Anglo-Saxon times a man's kindred were known as the maegth. See MAG-BOTE.

Mag-bot; Maeg-bote. Used in the Leg. Canuti, c. 2, to mean compensation for homicide paid to the kindred of the deceased.

Magister rerum usus (Co. Litt. 229). (Use is the master of things.) Compare MINIME MUTANDA, ETC.

Magistrate. The term "magistrate" is sometimes used in a wide sense to denote a person charged with duties of government, and being either supreme, namely, the Sovereign, or subordinate, namely, one of the officers who are appointed by or are subject to the Sovereign. In practice, however, "magistrate" means a judicial officer having a summary jurisdiction in matters of a criminal or quasi-criminal nature.

In this sense of the word magistrates are of two kinds, honorary and stipendiary. The former class consists of justices of the peace (q.v.), the latter class includes the magistrates appointed to act in certain populous places (such as the metropolis) in lieu of the ordinary justices. These stipendiary magistrates have wider powers than ordinary justices. To the stipendiary class also belong the recorders in boroughs, and the Recorder and Common Serjeant in the City of London. (See those titles.) See METROPOLITAN POLICE MAGISTRATE; STIPENDIARY MAGISTRATE.

As to the jurisdiction of magistrates generally, see JUSTICE OF THE PEACE. As to their liability for acts committed by them, see CORAM NON JUDICE; JUDGE.

Magna assisa eligenda, De. As to this writ see ASSISE, GRAND.

Magna Carta is the name usually given to the charter originally granted by King John, and afterwards re-enacted and confirmed by Parliament (more than thirty times, according to Coke) in the reigns of Henry III. and Edward I. The charter now in force is the statute 9 Hen. 3, with which our statute book commences. In addition to provisions respecting the feudal tenures, now of no practical importance, the charter contained provisions to protect the subject from abuse of the royal prerogative in the matter of arbitrary arrest and imprisonment, and from amercements, purveyance and other extortions. It also provided for the proper administration of justice, for the uniformity of weights and measures, and the protection of foreign merchants. Coke says that the charter was merely declaratory of the common law; but Coke wrote on the assumption—which is not well founded—that somehow or other there had previously been in existence an amorphous body of law, embodying everything that was excellent, which merely required to be put into shape and solemnly enunciated.

Magna precaria. A great or general reap day, or day of harvesting, on which the Lord of the Manor of Harrow-on-the-Hill was anciently entitled to require his tenants to do a certain number of days' harvesting for him.

Magnum centum. The great hundred, a measure of number containing one hundred and twenty, which was formerly in use.

Magnum concilium. See GREAT COUNCIL.

Magnus Portus. In the Middle Ages this meant the town and harbour of Portsmouth.

Maiden Assize, Circuit, Sessions. Formerly one at which no prisoner was sentenced to death, but now one at which there is no prisoner for trial. See GLOVES; ASSIZES.

Maiden Rent. A fine of a noble (q.v.), anciently paid on marriage by every tenant of the Manor of Builth in Radnorshire: formerly erroneously supposed to have been in commutation of the mythical jus primæ noctis (q.v.).

Maihem. See MAYHEM.

Maiming. See MAYHEM; MALICIOUS DAMAGE.

Mainour. Cowell, writing in 1607, said "Mainour alias Manour alias Meinoure signifieth in our common lawe the thing that a theefe taketh away or stealeth." The phrase "found (or taken) with the mainour" meant to be caught in possession of stolen goods.

Compare INFANGTHEF; HANDHABEND.

Later the phrase to be taken "with (or in) the mainour (or manner)" meant to be found in the commission of any unlawful act, and meant the same as to be taken in flagrante delicto.

Mainpernor; Mainprise. Mainprise literally means a taking into the hand, and is used in the old books to signify the process of delivering a person to sureties or pledges (mainpernors) who undertook to produce him again at a future time. Bail applied only to cases where a man was arrested or imprisoned, while a man could be mainperned not only in such cases but also where he had not been arrested or imprisoned, e.g., in an appeal of felony and other obsolete proceedings. Mainpernors were not bound by recognizances to the Crown, as bailsmen were and are, and they could not, like bailsmen, relieve themselves of responsibility by seizing and remitting to custody the man for whom they had gone security. Mainprise has quite fallen into disuse. So also has the writ of mainprise, which lay for a man in custody and entitled to be mainperned if the sheriff refused to mainpern him. See now BAIL.

See MANUCAPTIO.

Mainport. A small payment in kind—generally loaves of bread—which in some places was made by the parishioners to the rector in lieu of tithes.

Maintainor. One guilty of maintenance (q.v.).

Maintenance.—I. In the civil law, maintenance is the supply of necessaries, such as food, lodging, clothing, etc.

Where property is being administered in an action or other proceeding in the Chancery Division, and the persons absolutely or presumptively entitled to it are incompetent to support themselves (as where they are infants or lunatics), the Court will direct a proper portion of the income to be expended for their maintenance. Such an order may also be obtained, in the case of infants, on a summons without the institution of an action.

A maintenance clause in a marriage settlement or will, by which property is given to infants on their attaining majority, or the like, is one which authorises the trustees to expend part or the whole of the income of the property in maintaining and educating the infants during their minority. By the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1860, s. 26, this power was given to the trustees of all settled property. That enactment was repealed by s. 71 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, and is replaced by s. 43 of the latter Act. The maintenance clause is, therefore, now unnecessary, and is generally omitted. The settlement may, however, provide that s. 43 of the Act of 1881 shall not operate either as regards maintenance or accumulation. See ACCUMULATION; LUNACY.

II. In the criminal law, maintenance, says Coke, "signifieth in law a taking in hand, bearing up or upholding of quarrels and sides, to the disturbance or hindrance of common right . . . and it is twofold, one in the countrey and another in the court." An instance of maintenance in the country occurs where one person assists another in his pretensions to certain lands, by taking or holding the possession of them for him by force or subtilty. This kind of maintenance is said by Coke to be punishable only at the suit of the King. Maintenance in the Courts includes champerty and embracery (q.v.), and is also used generally to denote the offence committed by a person who, having no interest in a suit, maintains or assists either party, with money or otherwise, to prosecute or defend it. The punishment at common law is fine and imprisonment; it is also prohibited by several statutes. See, for instance, the statutes 1 Rich. 2, c. 4, and 32 Hen. 8, c. 9; but prosecutions for the offence are obsolete. See

BARRATRY; MANUTENTIA, DE.

Majesty. See HIGHNESS.

Major hæreditas venit unicuique nostrum à jure et legibus quam à parentibus (2 Inst. 56.) (A greater inheritance comes to every one of us from legal right and the laws than from our parents.) "The law," Coke goes on, "is the best birth right the subject hath."

Majority. See FULL AGE.

Majus continet minus (Jenk. Cent. 208). (The greater contains the less.) Compare IN TOTO, ETC.; OMNE MAJUS, ETC.

Majus dignum trahit ad se minus dignum (Co. Litt. 355). (The more worthy draws with it the less worthy.) Merger is an obvious illustration of this maxim. See also OMNE MAJUS, ETC.; CUI LICET, ETC.

Majus est delictum seipsum occidere quam alium (3 Inst. 54). (It is a greater crime to kill one's self than to kill another.) This was the view prevailing anciently.

Majus jus. In the reign of Edward III. this was a proceeding in some customary manor courts for the trial of a right to land.

Mala fides ("bad faith") is the opposite of "bona fides" (q.v.).

Mala grammatica non vitiat chartam. Sed in expositione instrumentorum mala grammatica quoad fieri possit evitanda est (6 Rep. 39). (Bad grammar does not vitiate a deed. But in the interpretation of instruments, bad grammar is to be avoided so far as may be.) That is to say, an interpretation is not necessarily erroneous because it involves an ungrammatical use of words; but such a construction is not to be adopted without actual necessity. Compare MENS TESTATORIS, ETC.

Mala in se; Mala prohibita. Mala in se are acts which are wrong in themselves, such as murder, as opposed to mala prohibita (mala quia prohibita), that is to say, those acts (such as smuggling) which are only wrong because they are prohibited by law. The distinction was formerly of importance with reference to the exemption of ambassadors, which, according to the earlier writers, only extended to mala prohibita; but this is no longer the case. See AMBASSADOR.

Mala praxis is where a medical practitioner injures his patient by neglect, want of skill, or for experiment. Ordinary cases of mala praxis give rise to a right of action for damages. (See TORT.) In cases of gross misconduct resulting in death the party may be indicted for manslaughter.

Maledicta expositio quæ corrumpit textum (4 Rep. 35). (It is a bad exposition which corrupts the text—that is to say, which substitutes other words for those actually used in the statute.)

"Nothing," says Lord Denman, C.J., at 5 Q. B. 184, "is more unfortunate than a disturbance of the plain language of the Legislature by attempt to use equivalent terms."

Maleficia non debent remanere impunita; et impunitas continuum affectum tribuit delinquendi (4 Rep. 45). (Evil deeds ought not to remain unpunished; and impunity is a continual inducement to the commission of crime.) See INTEREST REIPUBLICÆ, ETC.

Maleficia propositis distinguuntur (Jenk. Cent. 290.) (Evil deeds are distinguished from evil purposes.) Compare IN CRIMINALIBUS NON, ETC.; but see IN CRIMINALIBUS VOLUNTAS, ETC.

Male Servants. An excise licence, expiring on 31st December, must be taken out each year for every male servant who during the year, or any part of it, is employed as maître d'hôtel, house steward, master of the horse, groom of the chambers, valet de chambre, butler, under-butler, clerk of the kitchen, confectioner, cook, house porter, footman, page, waiter, coachman, groom, motor-car driver, postilion, stable-boy, gardener, under-gardener, park-keeper, gamekeeper, under-gamekeeper, huntsman, or whipper-in (Revenue Act, 1869, ss. 18, 19 (3); Motor Car Act, 1903, s. 13) whether he is employed for the purpose of a trade or business or not: but no licence is required for soldiers or sailors employed as servants by officers pursuant to the King's Regulations, or for a servant, other than one driving a carriage let for more than twenty-eight days, employed at a livery stable of which entry has been made, or for a driver employed to drive a public stage or hackney carriage for the licensee thereof (Revenue Act, 1869, s. 19 (5)), or for servants employed at any house of public entertainment or at a boarding-house (Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1873, s. 4 (4)), or where a male servant who does not live in his employer's house is employed in one of the taxable capacities for only an inconsiderable part of each day, or where a male servant living with his employer in a non-taxable employment is employed only occasionally in a taxable capacity (Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1876, s. 5); but, except in cases coming within the above exemptions, the licence is required in respect of every servant employed in a taxable capacity for any time, however short. The duty on the licence is 15s. per annum.

The licences for male servants (as well as those for armorial bearings and for carriages) are known as establishment licences, and are also included in the larger category of local taxation licences (q.v.).

Maletent. There never was such a word outside the law dictionaries. The statute 25 Edw. 1, c. 7, in the original law-French, prohibited the male toute (the low Latin mala tolta, or bad tax), which was a toll on every sack of wool: and this was mis-read as maletent.

Malfeasance is the doing of an unlawful act, e.g. a trespass. See MISFEASANCE; NONFEASANCE; TORT.

Malice; Malicious. "Malice," said Lord Campbell, "in the legal acceptation of the word, is not confined to personal spite against individuals, but consists in a conscious violation of the law to the prejudice of another" (3 Cl. & F. 321). "Malice," said Mr. Justice Bayley, "in common acceptation, means ill-wind against a person; but in it's legal sense, it means a wrongful act done intentionally without just cause or excuse. If I give a perfect stranger a blow likely to produce death, I do it of malice, because I do it intentionally, and without just cause or excuse. . . . If I am arraigned of felony, and wilfully stand mute, I am said to do it of malice, because it is intentional, and without just cause or excuse." (4 B. & C. 255) Personal spite or ill-will is sometimes called actual malice, express malice, or malice in fact, to distinguish it from malice in law. As to the effect of actual malice in questions of libel and slander, see PRIVILEGE.

In the definition of murder, malice aforethought exists where the person doing the act which causes death has an intention to cause death or grievous bodily harm to any person (whether the person is actually killed or not), or to commit any felony whatever, or has the knowledge that the act will probably cause the death of or grievous bodily harm to some person, although he does not desire it, or even (as in the case of an abortionist) wishes to avoid it. See HOMICIDE; MANSLAUGHTER; MURDER.

Malicious Arrest is where a person maliciously and without reasonable cause procures another to be arrested. He thereby makes himself liable to an action for damages. The term is practically confined to cases of arrest in civil cases (i.e., for debt, etc.) which have now become rare. See ARREST; DEBTORS ACT; MALICE; TORT; FALSE IMPRISONMENT.

Malicious Injuries to the Person. Everyone who unlawfully and maliciously wounds or causes any grievous bodily harm to any person, or shoots or attempts to shoot him with the intent in any such case to maim, disfigure, disable or do some grievous bodily harm to him, is guilty of felony, and liable to penal servitude for life (Offences against the Person Act, 1861, s. 18).

Malicious Injuries to Property—by which is meant those injuries to property which proceed rather from malicious or wanton motives than from any proposed gain to the offender—are in many cases criminal acts. They include arson (q.v.), causing injuries to buildings, etc., by gunpowder, destroying trees, cattle, etc., exhibiting false signals, removing buoys, etc., causing injuries to machinery, goods in process of manufacture, canals, telegraphs, ships, etc. Actual malice against the owner of the property is not essential (see the Malicious Damage Act, 1861). Cases of malicious damage to an extent not exceeding £20 can now be dealt with summarily under s. 14 of the Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914. See ANCIENT MONUMENTS.

Malicious Prosecution is where a person maliciously institutes criminal proceedings against another without reasonable or probable cause, that is, believing that he is innocent or not having good reason to believe that he was guilty. For the damage thereby caused to the accused he can sustain an action against the wrongdoer, but only when and if the charge is dismissed or results in a verdict of not guilty. The question of reasonable and probable cause is for the judge and not for the jury.

Malin's Act. The popular title of the Infant Settlements Act, 1855, and of the Married Women's Reversionary Interests Act, 1857.

Malitia supplet ætatem (Dyer, 104*b*). (Malice makes up for the want of years: but not always.) See AGE.

Malus usus est abolendus, quia in consuetudinibus non diuturnitas temporis, sed soliditas rationis est consideranda (Co. Litt. 141). (A usage which is bad in law ought to be abolished, because, in dealing with customs, it is not the length of time for which they have prevailed but the validity of the argument which can be advanced that has to be considered.) The maxim is cited in part at 4 Inst. 274.

Malveis Procurors. Jury-packers: those who procured the appointment of jurors who were not impartial. See Articuli super Chartam, c. 10.

Manager. In Chancery practice, when a receiver (q.v.) is required for the purpose not only of receiving rents and profits, or of getting in outstanding property, but of carrying on or superintending a trade or business, he is usually denominated a "manager," or a "receiver and manager." The most usual cases in which managers are appointed are those which relate to partnerships or to mines or collieries. In a case where the trade or property is abroad, or in one of the colonies, and the manager must necessarily be resident there, it is usual to add to the order directing the appointment of a manager an order for the appointment of one or more consignee or consignees resident in this country, to whom the produce of the property in question may be remitted, and by whom it may be disposed of.

As to the appointment of a manager by way of execution of a judgment against a railway company, see EXECUTION.

In bankruptcy, a special manager of the business of the debtor until a trustee is appointed may be appointed, on the application of any creditor, by the official receiver under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 10; and the official receiver, when acting as interim receiver under s. 8 of the Act, can, of his own motion, appoint a special manager.

Under the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, s. 161, the official receiver, when he becomes the liquidator of a company, may, if satisfied that a special manager is required, apply to the Court that a special manager be appointed, and the Court may thereupon appoint a special manager.

In parliamentary practice, where the two Houses of Parliament have a conference (e.g., to settle amendments to a bill as to which there is a difference between the two Houses), each House appoints managers to represent it, and the conference is held between the managers. As to managers of an impeachment, see that title.

Managing Owner of Ship. The managing owner of a ship is one of several co-owners, to whom the others, or those of them who join in the adventure, have delegated the management of the ship. He has authority to do all things usual and necessary in the management of the ship and the delivery of the cargo, to enable her to prosecute her voyage and earn freight, with the right to appoint an agent for the purpose. It seems that it is a question to be decided in each case, whether a managing owner has been appointed by all his co-owners or only by some of them, and consequently whether he has power to bind all of them or only some of them: "he binds those whose agent he is; he binds nobody besides" (per Bowen, J., 6 Q. B. D. 93).

Under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 59, the name and address of the managing owner for the time being of every registered British ship must be registered, or, if there is no managing owner, the ship's husband (q.v.) or other person to whom the management of the ship is entrusted, must be registered.

Manbote. Before, and for some time after, the Conquest, this was the fine paid by a homicide, more especially to the overlord when the deceased was unfree. The manbote in that case was, however, less than that payable to the relations of a freeman.

Manca; Mancus. This is stated to have been a square gold coin, current about the time of the Conquest and value for thirty silver pennies. But it must have been a continental coin, there being no English gold coinage before the reign of Henry III. See GOLD COINS.

Manche-present. A bribe.

Manchester Registry. See TRADE MARKS.

Mandamus is a writ issued in certain cases to compel the performance of a duty. It is directed to the person who is subject to the duty, and not to a sheriff or similar officer.

The prerogative writ of mandamus issues in the King's name from the High Court of Justice on application to the King's Bench Division in some cases where the injured party [the prosecutor] has also another less speedy method of redress, as in the case of admission or restitution to an office; but it issues in all cases where the party has a right to have anything done, and has no other specific means of compelling its performance, especially where the obligation arises out of the official status of the respondent and is hence of a public or quasi-public character. Thus the writ is used to compel the election of corporate officers, to compel public officers to perform duties imposed upon them by common law or by statute (e g., to make a rate), to compel inferior Courts to proceed in matters within their jurisdiction (cf. PROCEDENDO; PROHIBITION), to compel the lord of a manor to admit a person as tenant of copyholds (see ADMITTANCE); it is also applicable in certain cases where a duty is imposed by Act of Parliament for the benefit of an individual: thus it lies to compel a railway company to comply with the provisions of its Act for the benefit of private persons (e.g., to build a bridge, open a road, etc.), but in many such cases it has been superseded by the Order under R. S. C. Ord. 53 (infra). The writ recites the facts giving rise to the obligation, and commands the defendant to do the act or show cause why he should not; he may excuse himself by showing that the prosecutor, on his own showing, is not entitled to the writ, or by traversing some material fact alleged in the writ, or by alleging fresh matter as an answer to the prosecutor's case; if the return is insufficient or false the prosecutor may move to quash it, or may traverse or plead to it, or may bring an action to recover damages for a false return (see RETURN). In any case in which the right to the writ is established, the Court awards a peremptory mandamus, to which no excuse or other return except performance of the act required is allowed.

When witnesses whose evidence is required in a cause pending in the High Court in this country are resident in India or other parts of the King's dominions abroad, a writ in the nature of a mandamus may be issued requiring the judges of the principal Court in the colony to examine the witnesses and send over the depositions to be used at the trial (East India Company Act, 1772, ss. 40, 44; Evidence on Commission Act, 1831, s. 1). This writ is now, however, never issued: the present practice is to issue letters of request (q.v.) to Indian and colonial Courts as well as to those countries which act on such letters, and to issue a commission (q.v.) or appoint an examiner (q.v.) for those countries which do not.

Under Ord. 53, r. 1, the plaintiff in any action in the High Court may claim a mandamus, commanding the defendant to fulfil any duty in the fulfilment of which the plaintiff is personally interested. The construction put upon this rule limits it to cases where the duty is of a public or quasi-public nature (e g., to compel a railway company to carry out a compulsory purchase), and not merely personal, such as that arising out of a contract. If judgment be for the plaintiff an order may be made commanding the defendant to perform the duty in question (ib. r. 3) and such order has the same effect as a writ of mandamus, which can no longer be issued in an action (ib. r. 4). This procedure is in lieu of that under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, ss. 68-74, which created the action of mandamus and provided for the issue of a peremptory writ of mandamus if the plaintiff succeeded.

By the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25 (8), an interlocutory mandamus may be granted in any case in which it shall appear to the Court to be just or convenient. See INJUNCTION.

The writ of mandamus is so called from the words vobis mandamus, "we command you," with which, when the writ was in Latin, the mandatory part commenced. Originally "mandamus" was the generic name for a class of writs varying in their form and object, but totally different from the modern prerogative writ, which, for the sake of distinction, was called a special mandamus. In the fourteenth and the beginning of the fifteenth century the writ was in form a mere letter-missive from the Sovereign; during the latter half of the fifteenth century the writ was directed to issue on a petition to Parliament for redress; it thus became in form a parliamentary writ, and, being then chiefly used to enforce restitution to public offices, was commonly known as the "writ of restitution"; finally it became an original writ, issuable by the Court of King's Bench in all cases where there was a legal right, but no other specific remedy.

Anciently there was a writ of mandamus ordering the sheriffs to take into the hands of the king the lands of a king's widow (q.v.) who had married without the royal licence; and there was another writ of mandamus which in certain cases (F. N. B. 253) was used instead of a diem clausit extremum (q.v.)

Mandata licita strictam recipiunt interpretationem, sed illicita latam et extensam (Bac. Max. Reg. 16). (Lawful orders receive a strict interpretation, unlawful orders a wide and extended one.) Thus if A gives a lawful authority to B, then only such acts as are clearly within that authority are held to be the acts of A: but if C employs D to poison E, and D, contrary to the letter of his instructions, but within the spirit of them, takes it upon himself to strangle E, then C will still be an accessory before the fact to the murder of E.

Mandatarius terminos sibi positos transgredi non potest (Jenk. Cent. 53). (A mandatary cannot exceed the limits imposed upon him.) Compare MANDATA LICITA, ETC.

Mandatary. A bailee in a case where the bailment is a Mandatum (q.v.).

Mandate is a direction or request. Thus a cheque is a mandate by the drawer to his banker to pay the amount to the transferee or holder of the cheque. The word mandate is also used as an equivalent for mandatum (q.v.). In early times, before the independence of the superior Courts had been established, the Crown controlled their actions by mandates or orders to pursue such and such a course.

Mandati dies. Maundy Thursday (q.v.).

Mandatory. See INJUNCTION. The mandatory part of a writ is that part by which the person to whom it is directed is commanded to do the act required of him.

Mandatum. See BAILMENT.

Mandavi ballivo. (I have commanded the sheriff.) Where a sheriff receives a writ which has to be executed within a place which is a liberty he commands the bailiff of the liberty to execute the writ and afterwards makes the return mandavi ballivo, setting out also what return, or that no return, has been made by the bailiff.

Manentes. Those who had to stay on the land, that is to say, villeins.

Manifest. In the case of a merchant vessel this is a list of the goods making up her cargo, with the names of the shippers. See the Revenue Act, 1884, s. 3.

Manifesto. In international law this is a declaration by which a State gives notice of the existence of a state of war between it and another State.

Man, Isle of. Since 1290, this island has been under the protection of the English Crown, which for long delegated its rights to a succession of nobles. They, from 1406 to 1649, were known as Kings of Man: in 1649 the title was changed to Lord of Man; the last Lord of Man was the Duke of Athol, whose rights were acquired by the Crown in pursuance of the Isle of Man Purchase Act, 1765 (5 Geo. 3, c. 26). But the island was never incorporated with Great Britain. It remains a "dominion," though not a foreign dominion, of the Crown. The bishop—known as the Bishop of Sodor and Man—has a seat, although not a vote, in the House of Lords: but otherwise the island is entirely without any parliamentary representative. Parliament, however, can and occasionally does legislate for it: but in the absence of express provision it is not affected by any statute, and it makes its own laws subject to its own constitution.

It is included in the expression British Islands unless the contrary intention appears (Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 18 (1)).

See KEYS.

Manner; Manour See MAINOUR.

Manning. A man's work for one day: used in old leases reserving to the lessor so many mannings in each year from the lessee.

Mannire. To summon before a Court, where the summons was by the opposite party. Compare BANNIRE.

Manor. Properly speaking, a manor is a district of land of which the freehold is vested in a person called the lord of the manor, of whom two or more persons, called freeholders of the manor, hold other land in respect of which they owe him certain free services, rents or other duties. Hence every manor must be at least as old as the Statute of Quia Emptores (q.v.); indeed, immemorial existence is essential to a manor. The land which is vested in the lord is called the demesnes (q.v.), and comprises (1) the land of which the lord is seised, and which may be wholly in his own occupation or in that of his lessees for years, but in most manors is to a great extent in the occupation of the copyhold and customary tenants of the manor (though copyholders are not essential to a manor), and (2) the waste lands of the manor, usually subject to the tenants' customary rights of common. (See COMMON.) A Court Baron for the freeholders, and a Customary Court for the copyholders (if any), are necessary incidents to every manor, and the principal manor in a parish usually has an advowson appendant to the demesnes. There are also in general either annexed or appurtenant to the manor a variety of franchises (q.v.) exercisable by the lord, such as the right to have a Court Leet, the right to waifs and strays, treasure trove, wreck, the liberties of holding fairs and markets, of taking tolls and the like. Accordingly, a manor proper is shortly defined as consisting of demesne lands, jurisdiction in a Court Baron, and services of free tenants in fee, who are liable to escheat (q.v.) and owe attendance at the Court; or, more shortly still, as consisting of demesnes and services. See DEMESNE; SERVICE.

If the number of free tenants is reduced below two, the Court Baron cannot be held, and the manor ceases to exist, but may survive as a manor by reputation for the purpose of making a title to franchises or for holding copyholders' Courts. If all the demesnes are alienated, the manor is extinguished, and becomes merely a "lordship in gross"; while a temporary severance of all the demesnes, as by a lease for years, causes a suspension of the manor.

If a copyhold tenement has by immemorial custom been treated by the tenant as if it were itself a manor, e.g., by holding Courts, granting part of it to be held of himself as copyhold, etc., this forms a customary or copyhold manor, and the tenant is called a customary lord, although, as far as regards the principal manor, he is himself merely a copyholder of that manor, and pays fines, etc., like the other tenants.

"Manor" may mean the district actually or formerly comprised in a manor in the strict sense, although the land may have been separated from it by enfranchisement.

"Manor" is derived from the Norman-French manoir, maners (Latin, manerium, from manere, to remain or dwell), a dwelling or habitation, originally applied to the mansion of the lord. It is now generally supposed that manors were not a creation of the Norman Conquest, but an adaptation to the Norman rules of tenure of the institutions known as vilage communities which existed among the Saxons.

Mansion. "'Mansion' is in our law most commonly taken for the chief messuage or habitation of the Lord of a Mannor—the Mannor House where he doth most remain or continue, his Capitall Messuage as it is called," says the Termes de la Ley (1641); and in this sense the word was of identical meaning with the capitale mansum of earlier times. Alongside this meaning of the word there had grown up the meaning of any dwelling-house: thus the statute 11 Hen. 7, c. 9, s. 2, speaks of "every . . . mancion or dwelling place." But this "mansion" included all buildings within the curtilage of a dwelling-house, and the whole "mansion" in this sense was the subject of burglary (q.v.) until the statute 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 29, s. 13, excluded from the definition of the "dwelling-house" which can be the subject of burglary any structure between which and the inhabited house there is no covered communication, and thereby made a clear distinction between a dwelling-house and a mansion.

See PRINCIPAL MANSION HOUSE; MESSUAGE.

Manslaughter is the crime of unlawful homicide, without malice (q.v.) aforethought, either express or implied. The most frequent instances occur (a) where death is caused accidentally by an unlawful act, as where A strikes at B with a small stick, not intending either to kill him or to do him grievous bodily harm, and the blow kills him; (b) where death is caused by culpable negligence, as where A, whose duty it is to put a stage at the mouth of a colliery shaft, omits to do so from mere negligence, in consequence of which B is killed; (c) where death is caused by an act done in the heat of passion, caused by provocation (q.v.).

Manslaughter is felony, punishable by penal servitude for life, or a fine (Offences against the Person Act, 1861, s. 5).

Upon an indictment for murder, the jury, if they find that malice aforethought has not been proved, can bring in a verdict of manslaughter.

Mansum Capitale. See MANSION.

Man-trap. Setting (except in a dwelling-house for the protection thereof between sunset and sunrise) any "spring-gun, man-trap, or other engine calculated to destroy human life or inflict grievous bodily harm is an indictable misdemeanour (Offences against the Person Act, 1861, s. 31).

Manuale obedientia. Sworn submission: See MANUIS.

Manualia beneficia. The subsistence allowance anciently paid to canons and other members of chapters.

Manucaptio; Manucaption; Manucaptor. Manucaptio or manucaption was the writ of mainprise, and manucaptors were the mainpernors (q.v.).

Manumission was the act of freeing or enfranchising a villein. (See Litt. 204 et seq.) The term is taken from the Roman law.

Manu opera. This meant either (1) stolen goods taken from a thief or (2) cattle and farming implements.

Manupastus. Used in the Leg. Hen. 1, c. 66, as meaning a domestic servant.

Manus. Anciently used as meaning an oath. See DEFENDERE UNICA MANU.

Manutentia, De. This was the writ anciently issued against one guilty of maintenance (q.v.) (Reg. Brev. 182, 189).

Marcata. A rent of one mark.

Marchers, Lords. From a time soon after the Conquest, the English kings permitted their nobles to conquer and to hold such parts of Wales as they could. Each noble—there were 137 of them in 1536—was given jura regalia, or sovereign rights, within the area held by him: and this went on until the conquest of Wales in 1282. Each of such nobles was known as a lord marcher and his territory was called a lordship marcher. The territory held by them included approximately the present Welsh counties of Brecknock, Denbigh, Glamorgan, Montgomery, Pembroke, and Radnor, the English county of Monmouth, and parts of Shropshire, Herefordshire, and Gloucestershire. The statute 28 Edw. 3, c. 11, declared their territories perpetually annexed to the English Crown; and their quasi-sovereign position came to an end in 1543. See WALES.

Marches. Anciently this meant the boundary between England and Wales and that between England and Scotland. Powerful nobles were appointed by the Crown to act as Wardens of the Marches (see DEFENSIVA), that is to say, to prevent invasion.

See MARCHERS, LORDS; COURT OF THE COUNCIL OF THE MARCHES; DIES MARCHIÆ.

Marchet; Marcheta; Merchetum; Merchetæ. This was a fine which some tenants had to pay to their lord for liberty to give away their daughters in marriage. According to the old writers, no free man could be liable to pay such a fine, but only villeins, and therefore it could not be claimed by custom against all the tenants of a manor. But in later times a free man could take lands to hold by the service of marchet, if he liked to do so. The tenure by marchet seems to have been long obsolete. The fine was in respect of any loss of service which the lord might sustain. The idea that it was in any way connected with the mythical jus primæ noctis (q.v.)—as that expression is commonly understood—is said to be quite without foundation; but see Boerii Decisiones Burdigalenses, Lyons, 1579, fol. 532, cited at p. 423 of C. P. Cooper's Catalogue of Books on Foreign Law, 1849, from which it appears that in old France some seigneurs had this right which was there termed Markette, Marketa, Marquette, Merchet or Mercheta.

Marchioness. See MARQUIS.

Mare liberum; Mare clausum. See SELDEN; GROTIUS.

Margarine. "For the purposes of the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts and this Act the expression 'margarine' shall mean any article of food, whether mixed with butter or not, which resembles butter and is not milk-blended butter" (Butter and Margarine Act, 1907, s. 13 (1*j*). See BUTTER; MILK-BLENDED BUTTER.

Margarine-cheese. "In the Act, unless the context otherwise requires, the expression 'margarine-cheese' means any substance, whether compound or otherwise, which is prepared in imitation of cheese and contains fat not derived from milk" (Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899, s. 25). See CHEESE.

Marginal Notes. The notes in the margins of Acts of Parliament which shortly indicate the subject-matter or the substance of each section. They are not considered by Parliament and are not part of any Act, and anyone printing any Act is at liberty to alter them as he may think fit.

Marine Boards. See the Merchant Shipping Act, 1892, ss. 244-245.

Marine Insurance. See INSURANCE.

Marine Society. This society, which now carries on the well-known Warspite training establishment, was formed in 1756 for the purpose of training to the sea-service boys who otherwise would have drifted into criminal courses. It was incorporated by the statute 13 Geo. 3, c. 67.

Marine Store Dealer. A "person dealing in, buying or selling any of the articles following, that is to say, anchors, cables, sails, old junk, or old iron, or other marine stores of any kind" (Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 538). He is to be distinguished from "a dealer in old metals" (see OLD METALS), who can come within the definition of that term without being a "marine store dealer"; but one and the same person may deal in such articles that he is both "a dealer in old metals" and a "marine store dealer."

If he is a "marine store dealer" his business is specially regulated by ss. 538-542 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894; he, like a dealer in old metals, is liable on summary conviction to a penalty if found in possession of public stores for which he fails to account (Public Stores Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 25), ss. 9, 10), or if he purchases old metal from anyone apparently under sixteen (Children Act, 1908, s. 116); and dealers of both kinds are subject, in places where the Public Health Amendment Act, 1907, is in force, to s. 86 of that Act, which provides for their registration with the local authority and for the keeping by them of books recording the description and price of all articles bought by them and the names and addresses of the vendors.

Marines. See ROYAL MARINES.

Maritagio amisso per defaltum, De. A writ which anciently lay under the Statute of Westminster II. c. 4, for a tenant in frank-marriage who had lost through his default the land so held by him.

Maritagium. The power which the lord had of disposing of his infant ward in marriage. Also land given as a marriage portion; also a dowry of any kind.

See FRANKMARRIAGE.

Marital Rights are, or were, the rights of a husband. The expression was chiefly used to denote the right of a husband to property which his wife was entitled to during the treaty of marriage. If, after the engagement to marry, she made a voluntary conveyance of any part of that property without notice to the intended husband, it was considered a fraud on his marital rights, and therefore liable to be set aside, although he might not have known that she was entitled to the property; but since the Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (q.v.), this doctrine of fraud on marital rights has become obsolete. (See JUS MARITI.) The expression marital rights is now used as synonymous with conjugal rights (q.v.).

Maritima Angliæ. In ancient patents running from Edward II. to Henry VIII., this is used as meaning the sea coast. The eighteenth-century compilers of law dictionaries state that it meant the profits and emoluments of the sea which were anciently collected by the sheriff but were afterwards granted to the Lord High Admiral: but this statement would appear to be erroneous.

See COSTERA.

Maritima incrementa. Alluvion (q.v.), when caused by the action of the sea.

Maritime Law. See ADMIRAL; ADMIRALTY; AFFREIGHTMENT; BILL OF LADING; CHARTER-PARTY; INSURANCE; LIEN; MERCHANT SHIPPING; UNDERWRITER.

Maritime Laws. See OLERON; WISBY; CONSOLATO DEL MARE; WHITE BOOK OF LONDON; RED BOOK OF BRISTOL; DOMESDAY OF IPSWICH; RHODIAN, ETC.; HANSEATIC, ETC.

Maritime Territory. The same as territorial (q.v.) waters.

Mark. See SILVER COINS.

As a measure of weight the mark was always two-thirds of the pound weight, just as, in the monetary system, it was two-thirds of the pound sterling.

See MARKSMAN; MERCHANDISE MARKS ACT; TRADE-MARK.

Marketable Security. For the purposes of the Stamp Act, 1891, the expression "marketable security" is defined by s. 82 of that Act.

Market Garden. This means "a holding cultivated, wholly or mainly, for the purpose of the trade or business of market gardening" (Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908, s. 48).

With regard to what were at common law fixtures and the absolute property of the landlord: a market gardener may before the determination of his tenancy remove fruit trees and bushes planted, but not permanently set out; and if he fails to do so, they become the property of the landlord without any compensation being payable (Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908, s. 42 (1) (iii)). Any tenant is entitled to remove and retain any engine, machinery, fencing or other fixture affixed by him to the holding, and any building erected by him thereon for which he is not entitled to compensation, and which he was under no obligation to erect, provided that he has given a month's previous notice in writing to the landlord, and that the landlord has not within such month elected to purchase at the fair value (to be fixed, in default of agreement, by arbitration) to an incoming tenant (s. 21 (1)); but this right of an outgoing tenant, while applying to fixtures or buildings acquired by him since 1st January, 1900, does not apply to any fixture or building affixed or erected before 1st January, 1884 (s. 21 (2)).

Market Overt means "open market." Market overt in ordinary market towns is only held on the special days provided for particular towns, by charter or prescription; but in the City of London every day, except Sunday, is market day. The market place, or spot of ground set apart by custom for the sale of particular goods, is also in ordinary towns the only market overt; but in the City of London every shop in which goods are exposed publicly for sale is market overt, though only for such things as the owner professes to trade in.

The doctrine of market overt is that all sales of goods made therein are not only binding on the parties, but also on all other persons: so that if stolen goods are sold in market overt, the purchaser (unless, possibly, he be a shopkeeper buying in his own shop—see [1892] 1 Q. B., at pp. 29, 31), if acting in good faith, acquires a valid title to them against the true owner (Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 22 (1)) unless the latter has prosecuted the thief to conviction, in which case the goods re-vest in the true owner (ib., s. 24 (1)), and the buyer is left to obtain compensation (under the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1867, s. 9, where the conviction is summary and under the Larceny Act, 1916, s. 45 (3), where the conviction is on indictment) out of any money which may have been taken from the thief on his apprehension.

The doctrine of market overt does not apply to goods belonging to the Crown, and in the case of horses it is subject to statutory restrictions. See HORSES.

Markets and Fairs. At common law either a market or a fair is a franchise (q.v.) (or privilege) to establish meetings of persons to buy and sell. The privilege is in each case derived either from royal grant or from prescription implying such grant. It may be possessed by a lord of a manor or by a municipal corporation or other body corporate. The franchise carries with it the right to restrain—by scire facias (q.v.) or by injunction—any other man from setting up another market or fair so near as to interfere with the exercise of the franchise; and it also implied the right to hold a Court of Pie Powder (q.v.); but the right to levy tolls (q.v.) is not implied and exists only where given by the grant.

The difference between a fair and a market is that the fair is the larger gathering, and is held, say, only once or twice a year, while a market is held once or twice a week.

In course of time many fairs had ceased to fulfil any useful purpose, and had become mere gatherings of undesirable persons. The Fairs Act, 1871, empowered the Secretary of State to abolish any fair upon the representation of the justices of the petty sessional district in which it was held, and with the consent of the owner of the franchise. Under the Fairs Act, 1873, the Secretary of State may alter or lessen the days on which a fair is held upon the like representation of the justices, or upon the representation of the franchise owner.

The holding of unlawful fairs within the metropolitan police district can be summarily prevented under the Metropolitan Fairs Act, 1868.

In the great modern centres of population, markets are held either under special local Acts —generally embodying the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act, 1847—or under s. 166 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

The "hiring fairs" or "mops," still occasionally held for the purpose of the making of agreements between employer and domestic servants or farm labourers, are not fairs or markets in the legal sense. See STATUTE FAIR.

See CLERK OF THE MARKETS.

Marksman. Where a person who cannot write is desirous of subscribing his name to a document, another person writes it for him, and he identifies it as his signature by inscribing over it, or near it, a mark, usually a cross. He is hence called a marksman. It seems that if there is any peculiarity about the mark, the evidence of a person who is acquainted with the mark usually made by the alleged maker of the particular mark in question is admissible to prove it as the handwriting of the marksman, but not otherwise. See HANDWRITING.

Marlebridge, Statute of. The statute 52 Hen. 3, whereof cc. 1, 2, 4 and 15 (all dealing with distress) are still in force. When the statute was passed the town of Marlborough was known as Marlebridge.

Marque; Mart. See LETTERS OF MARK; LETTERS OF COUNTER-MARK. "Mart" is the form of the word used in Sch. I. to the Marine Insurance Act, 1906.

Marquis; Marquess. The rank in the peerage next below that of duke. The title dates from 1386. The wife of a marquis is formally styled marchioness, but is informally known as Lady Carabas, or as the case may be; and his sons (other than the eldest son, who takes by courtesy the next lower title—usually an earldom—of the family) are by courtesy entitled to the prefix of "lord," while his daughters are entitled in like manner to the prefix of "lady." During his life the eldest son of his eldest son bears by courtesy the title of the family next in rank after that used by the eldest son. See LORD; LADY.

See PEERAGE.

Marriage.—I. Marriage is the voluntary union for life of one man and one woman to the exclusion of all others, for the purpose of living together and procreating children, entered into in accordance with the rules as to the consanguinity (q.v.) or affinity (q.v.) of the parties, and their capacity to enter into and perform the duties of matrimony, prevailing in the place of domicile of the parties, and in accordance with the rites or formalities required either by the law of England or the place where the marriage takes place, as to which see MARRIAGE ACTS. A marriage must not contravene the fundamental principles of Christianity, and hence a polygamous marriage, although valid according to the lex loci, is no marriage according to English law.

As to capacity to marry, see CONSENSUS, ETC.

It is sometimes said that marriage is a contract, but this is incorrect; the agreement of the parties is essential to a valid marriage (see AGREEMENT); but when it has been solemnized marriage is a personal relation of a very special kind, somewhat resembling a natural relationship.

Under the canon law, as it existed before the rupture with Rome in the reign of Henry VIII., a marriage could be validly contracted (1) by a public celebration of the marriage service in a church, known as a celebration in facie ecclesiæ; (2) by a clandestine celebration anywhere conducted by one in priest's orders. The common law adopted the canon law as stated above. The Council of Trent, in 1563, modified the canon law in a manner immaterial from the point of view of the English law, which of course took no cognizance of the proceedings of the Council. But after the Reformation the common law put those in priest's or deacon's orders of the Church of England on the same footing as those in priest's orders of the Roman or Eastern Churches. The Convocation of the Province of Canterbury in 1603 passed certain canons, known as the Canons of 1603, which laid it down, among other things, that before the celebration of a marriage there must either be a licence or a publication of banns. But these canons, although binding to the extent that persons who violated them were liable to ecclesiastical censure, were never part of the law of the land, which therefore down to 1754 remained what it had been before the Reformation. A number of clergymen officiating in churches and chapels which were free from the visitation of the ordinary found it to their profit to celebrate marriages without banns or licence: but after the Commissioners for Ecclesiastical Causes had, about 1684, taken action against such clergymen, marriages of this kind ceased to be celebrated on a large scale by anyone who had anything to lose and the business passed mainly into the hands of the Fleet (q.v.) parsons, the process being accelerated by the statutes 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 6, 7 & 8 Will. 4, c. 35, and 10 Anne, c. 19, s. 176, which imposed pecuniary penalties for marrying, or getting married, without either licence or banns. The profits, however, were large, and many clandestine marriages continued to take place even outside the Fleet and its purlieus until 1754, when the statute 26 Geo. 2, c. 33 (Lord Hardwicke's Act) made it impossible to contract any valid clandestine marriage. That Act provided that any marriage celebrated after the 25th March, 1754, without publication of banns or licence duly granted should be absolutely null and void; that any marriage celebrated elsewhere than in the parish church or public chapel (in which banns were usually published) should be null and void in the absence of a special licence from the Archbishop of Canterbury for its celebration elsewhere; and that anyone solemnizing a marriage without banns or licence should be guilty of felony, punishable with fourteen years transportation. The Act had, however, unfortunate effects. It made invalid marriages of dissenters and Roman Catholics celebrated according to the rites of their respective communions, which antecedently had been valid. Such marriages had been valid in the case of Roman Catholics, because a Roman Catholic priest was recognised by the common law as being in priest's orders; and they were valid, in the case of dissenters, by force of the statute 1 Will. and Mar. c. 18 (the Toleration Act). But Lord Hardwicke's Act gave the Church of England the sole right of celebrating valid marriages; and this state of things continued until it was terminated by the enactment of the Marriage Act (q.v.) 1837.

Marriage affects the property as well as the person. For many purposes the husband and wife are one person in law, and hence the husband cannot at common law give or grant property to his wife inter vivos, though he can under the Statute of Uses (q.v.); and a grant of land to the husband and wife by a third person gives them an estate by entireties (q.v.).

If the husband survives the wife he has an interest in her lands and tenements during his life (see CURTESY), and vice versâ (in certain cases) if she survives him (see DOWER); but these interests are not now of frequent occurrence, other provisions being generally made by a settlement executed on the marriage. (See SETTLEMENT.) As to the interests acquired by each of the spouses in the personalty of the other, see JUS MARITI; DISTRIBUTION; NEXT OF KIN.

A husband was formerly liable for all the debts and liabilities of his wife contracted before the marriage, but this rule was broken down by the Married Women's Property Act, 1870, s. 12, which provided that in the case of marriages taking place after 9th August, 1870, a husband should not be liable for his wife's ante-nuptial debts. See MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY ACTS.

A wife is not criminally liable for an offence committed by her under the coercion of her husband, except in the case of treason or murder and other heinous crimes.

II. Marriage formerly signified not only the union of man and wife, but also the right of a guardian by tenure to bestow his ward in marriage, "which," as Coke puts it, "the law gave to the lord, not for his benefit onely, but that he should match him [the ward] vertuously and in a good family without disparagement." If an infant tenant by knight's service refused such a marriage, the lord was entitled to the value of the marriage, that is, to the amount which he would have received for giving his ward in marriage; but a guardian in socage could make no profit by the marriage of his ward.

Marriage Acts. The principal Marriage Acts are the Marriage Act, 1823, and the Marriage Act, 1836. The former Act provides for the publication of banns on three successive Sundays before the celebration of a marriage, unless it takes place by ecclesiastical licence (see LICENCE), and requires that it shall be solemnized by a person in Holy orders and before two credible witnesses at least. It also provides for the case of one of the parties being under age, and for the consent of his or her parent or guardian being given. In certain cases marriages not solemnized in accordance with the provisions of the Act are made void, and where a marriage is solemnized between persons, one of whom is under age, by means of the false oath or fraudulent procurement of one of the parties, the person so offending is liable to forfeit all property which would otherwise accrue to him or her from the marriage.

The Marriage Act, 1836, introduced the certificate of the superintendent registrar of marriages, with or without licence. To obtain the certificate without licence, public notice of the intended marriage must be given for twenty-one days: the certificate with licence only requires one day's notice. Under a registrar's certificate, marriages may be solemnized in any religious building registered for the purpose (except that under a certificate with licence a marriage may not be solemnized in a church or chapel of the Church of England), or it may be solemnized at the registrar's office. If the marriage was celebrated in a registered building it was, until 1st April, 1899, necessary, under s. 20 of the Marriage Act, 1836, that the registrar should be present; but since that date the attendance of the registrar is unnecessary, provided that the marriage is solemnized in the presence of an authorized person appointed by the authorities of the religious building in which the marriage takes place (Marriage Act, 1898, s. 4 and passim).

The Foreign Marriage Act, 1892, provides for the marriage of British subjects abroad; the law as to marriage of British subjects with foreigners either in the United Kingdom or abroad is amended by the Marriage with Foreigners Act, 1906; and the Colonial Marriages Act, 1865, makes colonial marriages valid everywhere, subject to certain restrictions. The Marriage of British Subjects (Facilities) Act, 1915, is, in the words of its full title, "An Act to facilitate marriages between British subjects resident in the United Kingdom and British subjects resident in other parts of His Majesty's Dominions or in British Protectorates."

See DOMICILE.

Under the Royal Marriages Act, 1772, no descendant of King George II., other than the issue of princesses married into foreign families, may contract matrimony without the previous consent of the Sovereign, provided, however, that any such descendant, being over the age of twenty-five, may, upon giving twelve months' notice to the Privy Council, contract a marriage of which the King disapproves unless in the meantime both Houses of Parliament expressly declare their disapproval.

See DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER OR DECEASED BROTHER'S WIDOW; GRETNA GREEN; FLEET PRISON.

Marriage-brocage. A marriage-brocage contract is an undertaking to procure a marriage between two persons for reward. Such a contract is void. See POLICY.

Marriage Officer. An official who can celebrate marriages in British possessions abroad as well as in foreign countries (Foreign Marriage Act, 1892, s. 11 (2) (c)). The term includes an ambassador, minister or chargé d'affaires (ib., ss. 11 (2) (b) (c), 24); or, under appointment in writing by the ambassador, etc., the locum tenens of the ambassador, etc., or any secretary of the Embassy (Foreign Marriage Order in Council, 1892, Art. I.); and, if holding a warrant from the Secretary of State, any British consul, consul-general, vice-consul, pro-consul, consular agent, governor, high commissioner or resident (Foreign Marriage Act, 1892, ss. 11 (2) (b), 24).

Marriage, Value of. A fine which a tenant holding by knight's service had on his marriage to pay to his lord. As to the writs available to the lord, see FORFEITURE OF MARRIAGE; VALUE OF MARRIAGE.

Marriages, Registration of. See REGISTRATION.

Married Women's Property Acts. At common law a husband became on his marriage absolutely entitled to all choses in possession belonging to his wife in her own right (including those acquired after marriage), and to the whole of the rents and profits of her lands during the continuance of the marriage, except in so far as such property was the separate estate (q.v.) of the wife. This rule was broken down in part by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, ss. 21, 25, which protected property acquired by a wife whilst living apart from her husband under a decree for judicial separation or a protection order. it was further infringed by the Married Women's Property Act, 1870, ss. 1, 7, 8, and by the Married Women's Property Act (1870) Amendment Act, 1874 (both repealed by the Married Women's Property Act, 1882), which provided, in effect, that (i) the earnings of a married woman derived from her own exertions; (ii) personal property coming to her during marriage, either (a) under an intestacy, or (b) under any deed or will (not exceeding in the latter case £200); and (iii) the rents and profits of real estate descending upon her during marriage, should belong to her, to her separate use; and it was altogether set aside by the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, which provides, by s. 1 (as amended by the Married Women's Property Act, 1893, and by the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, ss. 125, 168, sched. 6), that a married woman shall be capable of holding, acquiring and disposing of property whether real or personal, and of contracting and of suing and being sued and of being made a bankrupt as if she were a feme sole (q.v.), and contains a number of subsidiary provisions directed to making a married woman, so far as property is concerned, practically the same as a single woman. It, however, still leaves a husband liable for his wife's torts and for her breaches of trust: but he still also retains his right in her property after death under the curtesy (q.v.) and the jus mariti (q.v.): and a wife who has separate property is liable for his maintenance (s. 20) and for that of her children and grandchildren (s. 21) if he or they become chargeable to the parish.

The Act of 1882, and the statutes 47 & 48 Vict. c. 14, 56 & 57 Vict. c. 63, and 7 Edw. 7, c. 18, are collectively entitled the Married Women's Property Acts, 1882 to 1907.

The Married Women's Property Act, 1898, makes a married woman with separate property liable for the support of her parents if they are chargeable to the parish. See SEPARATE ESTATE.

Marshal. In the practice of the King's Bench Division of the High Court, a marshal is an officer who attends each judge on circuit. He is the personal officer of the judge, as an aide-de-camp is of a general, and he performs the duties of secretary. He is appointed for each circuit by the judge; the judge pays his travelling expenses, and out of public funds he gets two guineas for each day during the circuit. He has to swear the grand jury, and is supposed to make an abstract or note for the judge of the nature of the actions tried before him.

The Marshal of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division in Admiralty matters is entrusted with the following duties: Execution of all warrants issued by the Court; appraisement and sale of condemned ships and cargoes; removal of ships, sub judice, from port to port on removal being ordered; receipt and subsequent payment into Court of all money arising out of execution of process; ascertaining the sufficiency or otherwise of bail; and the custody of embargoed ships.

The Marshal of the Marshalsea was the keeper of the Marshalsea (q.v.) Prison. See 10 Co. Rep. 71*b*, 72*a*.

Marshal, Earl. See EARL MARSHAL.

Marshalling. In the distribution of assets, marshalling takes place where there are two claimants, A and B, and two funds, X and Y, both of which are available to satisfy A's claim, but only Y is available for that of B, and A is compelled to have recourse to the X fund in order that the Y fund may be left for B. Or, what is the same thing, if A has been paid out of the Y fund, B is allowed to have recourse to the X fund, against which he had originally no claim. Thus, if a legacy is given to A charged on real estate, and another not so charged is given to B, the personal estate not being sufficient to pay both, A will be compelled to satisfy his legacy wholly or partially out of the real estate, so that B's legacy may be paid in full out of the personalty.

A testator was formerly said to "marshal his own assets" in favour of a charity when he directed a legacy to a charity to be paid out of his pure personal estate, for the law did not marshal assets in favour of charities, and, therefore, without such a direction, the legacy would, until 1891, abate in the proportion of the impure to the pure personalty. See ABATEMENT; MORTMAIN.

The doctrine of marshalling also applies to mortgages. Thus, if the owner of two estates mortgages them both to one person, A, and then one of them to another, B, without B having notice of A's mortgage, B may insist that A's debt shall be satisfied out of the other estate (the one not mortgaged to B) so far as it will extend.

Marshal of the King's Household. This officer is mentioned in the statute 27 Edw. 3, st. 2, c. 6. He was quite distinct from the Earl Marshal. Apart from his duties in the administration of the Royal Household he, along with the Steward of the King's Household, adjudicated in the Court of the Marshalsea (q.v.), and both of them were nominally judges of the Palace Court (q.v.). The office of Marshal of the King's Household no longer exists.

Marshalsea. As to the Court of the Marshalsea, see that title. The Marshalsea Prison was a debtors' prison, used down to 1842, when it, the King's Bench Prison (q.v.), and the Fleet Prison (q.v.) were abolished and replaced by the Queen's Prison (q.v.). It had originally been the prison of the Court of the Marshalsea, and had been in existence from, at any rate, the year 1300.

Martial Law. This expression has been used in four distinct senses. It means (1) the law as administered down to 1521 in the Court of Chivalry (q.v.), of which Hale says: "In truth and reality it is not a law but something indulged rather than allowed as a law"; (2) Military law (q.v.); (3) Acts done for the purpose of defeating invaders or rebels; (4) "The suppression of ordinary law and the temporary government of a country or parts of it by military tribunals," to use the words of Dicey, whose definition should be expanded by adding "when this is done in pursuance of a proclamation by the Crown or of notice by the military authorities," for if it is done under the authority of statute, such as the Restoration of Order in Ireland Act, 1920 (10 & 11 Geo. 5, c. 31), there is no martial law.

Martial law is now usually and properly used in the fourth of the senses mentioned above. The expression in this sense is, however, something of a misnomer. Martial law in this sense is, in fact, no law at all. It is not merely extra-legal; it is also illegal. There is no provision for any such law in our legal system; and acts done in pursuance of it require to be covered by an Act of Indemnity in order to protect from legal proceedings those by or by whose orders such acts were done.

Martinmas. The feast of St. Martin, 11th November: formerly sometimes called Martinmas in Winter, in order to distinguish it from the feast of the Translation of St. Martin, 4th July. In many parts of England it was, down to our own time, the general time of hiring farm servants. Church-scot (q.v.) used to be paid on this day. See OLD MARTINMAS.

Masculine. Unless the contrary intention appears, the masculine includes the feminine in every Act of Parliament passed after the year 1850. (Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 1.)

Massachusetts Company. See COMPANIES, CHARTERED.

Master and Servant. The relation of master and servant exists where one person, for pay or other valuable consideration, enters into the service of another and devotes to him his personal labour for an agreed period. The test of such a service seems to be, first, that the servant is bound to obey the reasonable commands of his master to do all acts falling within the scope of his employment, and, secondly, that the master has the power of dismissing the servant on his neglecting his duty, or for incompetence or gross misconduct, or on giving notice of dismissal in accordance with the express or implied terms of the contract.

It would also seem that a material difference in social position is essential to the relation of master and servant, for tutors, clerks, governesses, opera singers, and the like, are not servants; and that the service must be exclusive, i.e., that the servant cannot work for anyone else, without his master's permission, unless his service is limited to certain times or otherwise.

Servants are generally divided into menial (q.v.) or domestic (q.v.) servants, labourers and workmen, and apprentices. The rules of law as to the respective rights and duties of the master and servant in the absence of express agreement vary to some extent according to the nature of the employment.

As regard strangers, the relation of master and servant affects them chiefly in the following respects:—The master may bring an action against any person for beating or maiming his servant, if he thus loses the services of his servant, and thereby suffers actual damages (see SEDUCTION; SERVICE; TORT), and the master has an action against any person who knowingly entices away a servant—or any other person under a contract of service—or harbours and detains him after having been apprised of the former contract. On the other hand, the servant is frequently the agent of his master for certain purposes, and accordingly has power to bind him by his acts (see AGENT); and if the servant in the course of his employment tortiously causes injury to any person, the master is liable. Therefore, if a servant in driving his master's carriage on his master's business injures a person by negligent driving, the master is liable in damages to that person, even although the servant may have gone out of his proper course for his own business or amusement; but if the servant takes the carriage out without his master's orders and for his own business or amusement, then the master is not liable for his negligence.

Under the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 90), justices of the peace have jurisdiction in many cases where questions arise as to the rights or liabilities of either party to a contract of service, and County Courts also have jurisdiction in some of those matters. But this Act (see s. 10) does not apply to domestic or menial servants.

See COMMON EMPLOYMENT; COUNCIL OF CONCILIATION; EMBEZZLEMENT; FACTORIES; FALSE CHARACTER; MALE SERVANTS; TRUCK ACTS; WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION.

Master in Lunacy. This is an officer of the Lord Chancellor, as guardian of lunatics. His duties are of two kinds: first, to hold commissions or inquiries to find whether persons alleged to be insane are incapable of managing themselves and their affairs; secondly, to inquire as to the property, relations, etc., of persons found lunatic, and to superintend the management and employment of the property for the benefit of the lunatic. (See LUNACY.) He must at the time of his appointment be a barrister of not less than ten years' standing (Lunacy Act, 1890, s. 111 (3)). There were originally two Masters in Lunacy (ib.) but there is now only one, who is assisted by an Assistant Master (Lunacy Act, 1922, s. 1). The jurisdiction of the Master, as regards administration and management, may be exercised by the Assistant Master, under the direction of the Master (ib.). The Assistant Master must at the time of his appointment be a barrister or solicitor of five years' standing or an officer of the Master (ib.).

See COMMISSIONERS IN LUNACY.

Master of the Bench. This is the full title of any bencher (q.v.) of the four Inns of Court. In matters relating to the business of the Inn, a bencher is described by other members of the Inn as Master Brown, or as the case may be.

Master of the Buckhounds. This was one of the officers of the royal household down to 1901, when the royal buckhounds were abolished and the office of Master of the Buckhounds ceased to exist. The Master had been one of the officers who went in and out with the Ministry. His function was to act as master of the packs of staghounds which, at the cost of the Civil List, hunted the country to the west of Windsor. The Master was always a peer. He was in theory a subordinate of the Master of the Horse.

Master of the Court of Wards and Liveries. The chief official of the Court of Wards and Liveries (q.v.) He was abolished, along with the court, in 1660.

Master of the Crown Office. See KING'S CORONER.

Master of the Faculties. See FACULTY.

Master of the Horse. This official was originally in actual charge of the royal stables. That, however, is now entrusted to a permanent official known as the Crown Equerry and Secretary to the Master of the Horse. The Master of the Horse, who is always a peer of high rank, is one of the three principal officers of the household, the first being the Lord Steward (q.v.) if and when that functionary exists, and the second being the Lord Chamberlain (q.v.). The Master of the Horse, like the Lord Chamberlain and other chief officers of the household, goes in and out with the Ministry. His chief present function is to attend the King on State occasions.

Various holders of the office during the last three hundred years have claimed to act as Serjeant of the Silver Scullery when a coronation took place; but this claim does not appear to have ever been established.

Master of the Household. The officer of the royal household who is now styled the Lord Steward (q.v.), was anciently sometimes styled the Grand Master of the King's Household, but the latter title has been disused for centuries, and the title of Master of the Household is now applied to a permanent subordinate officer of the department of the Lord Steward. The management of the household is in the hands of this officer. See SENESCHAL.

Master of the King's Musters. See MUSTER-MASTER.

Master of the Mint. Before 1870 there was an official known as the Master of the Mint who had charge of the Mint (q.v.): there was a Deputy Mint Master: and each of them was paid a salary. Now, under the Coinage Act, 1870, s. 14, the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the time being is the "Master Worker and Warden of His Majesty's Royal Mint in England," but without salary or functions other than the function of suspending, promoting, etc., the salaried deputy masters and other officials who do the work of the Mint and who are appointed by the Treasury.

Master of the Ordnance. An officer, dating from the reign of Henry VIII., to whom was entrusted the care of the King's artillery and ordnance or munitions of war. His modern representative in normal times is the Master-General of the Ordnance, a military officer who is one of the members of the Army Council (q.v.). The officer, who is at present known as Master-General of the Ordnance, is an officer in the Royal Artillery, and is ex officio a member of the Army Council (q.v.). See ORDNANCE, BOARD OF.

Master of the Posts. Henry VIII. created this officer for the purpose of making arrangements to have post-horses provided at such places and in such numbers as to ensure the speedy transit of the King's letters. In the reign of Elizabeth the transmission of foreign correspondence, which had previously been arranged by merchants, was entrusted to the Master of the Posts, whose title was changed to "Chief Postmaster." Between 1635 and 1660 the Crown and the Cromwellian authorities asserted the sole right to carry letters, and the Chief Postmaster become the "Postmaster General for Foreign Parts."

See POST OFFICE; POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

Master of Reports and Entries. An officer of the old Court of Chancery. The office was abolished by s. 5 of the Court of Chancery Act, 1855, as from the occurrence of the first vacancy after the passing of that Act.

Master of the Rolls. The office of Master of the Rolls is one of great antiquity and high rank. He was originally keeper of the records (see RECORD OFFICE) and acted as assistant to the Lord Chancellor, like the other masters in Chancery (see MASTERS). Subsequently, in the reign of Edward I., he acquired judicial authority in matters within the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, and in the reign of Henry VI. bills for relief were addressed to him as well as to the Lord Chancellor. In more modern times, any suit, petition, etc., could be heard in the first instance by the Master of the Rolls, as well as by the Vice-Chancellors. But down to 1827 the Master of the Rolls sat in the evening from six to ten o'clock, the theory being that he, as being only the deputy of the Lord Chancellor, ought not to sit at the same time as the Lord Chancellor, who up to then had dealt with such matters as now come before a judge of the Chancery Division. Until 1873 he was qualified to sit in the House of Commons. (See OFFICE OF PROFIT.) By the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 5, the Master of the Rolls was made a member of the High Court of Justice, and (s. 6) an ex-officio member of the Court of Appeal, while under the Judicature Act, 1881, s. 2, he became a judge of the Court of Appeal only (see those titles), but he still retains his non-judicial duties as custodian of the records. He (see the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 17) admits solicitors of the Supreme Court (ib. s. 87). His powers as to matters formerly appertaining to the Petty Bag Office are preserved by the Solicitors Act, 1888, s. 5.

Master of the Temple. This is the clergyman of the Temple Church. His salary is paid partly by the Crown and partly by the two Temples; and the Temples provide him with a residence near the Temple Church. The nomination is in the hands of the Crown. These arrangements are provided for by the lease from James I. under which the Temples are held.

Compare READER.

Master of the Wardrobe. An officer of the royal household who had charge of the robes of dead kings and queens and of all curtains, bedding, cloth for liveries, etc., in the palaces of the reigning sovereign. He is mentioned in the statute 39 Eliz. c. 7. He has disappeared, although the Mistress of the Robes (q.v.) remains.

Master of the Wards. This was the title of the judge of the Court of Wards and Liveries (q.v.): see the statute 32 Hen. 8, c. 46, s. 2.

Masters Extraordinary. The full title of these officers was "Masters Extraordinary in Chancery"; and under that designation they were abolished by the statute 16 & 17 Vict. c. 78, which created the London Commissioners (q.v.) and the Commissioners for Oaths (q.v.) to perform the duties vested in the Masters Extraordinary. Masters Extraordinary were first heard of in the reign of James I.: see Hargrave's Law Tracts 294.

Masters in Chancery. The full title of these officers, whose office was of great antiquity, was the "Masters in Ordinary of the High Court of Chancery." They were eleven in number, or twelve including the Master of the Rolls (q.v.). They were assistants of the Lord Chancellor, and also of the Master of the Rolls after the latter had acquired judicial authority. Down to the end of the eighteenth century they occasionally sat in Court with the Lord Chancellor and the Master of the Rolls; but subsequently they sat only in chambers for the discharge of functions which were partly ministerial and partly judicial. They, except one who received a salary of about £300 in addition to fees, were, in 1798, paid only by fees—many of immemorial origin—the amounts whereof averaged, in the case of different Masters, from about £1,300 to about £1,100 a year. (See Commons Committee's Reports (1803), Vol. 13, p. 224). The Court of Chancery Act, 1852, after reciting that "proceedings before the Masters in Ordinary of the High Court of Chancery are attended with great delay and expense," abolished the Masters by s. 1, and s. 16 provided for the appointment of eight Chief Clerks (q.v.), two being appointed by the Master of the Rolls and two by each of the three Vice-Chancellors.

The Masters in Ordinary were so called in order to distinguish them from the Masters Extraordinary (q.v.).

Masters of the King's Bench, Common Pleas and Exchequer. The Superior Courts (Officers) Act, 1837, provided that there should be in each of these Courts five officers, to be called the masters of each Court, to conduct the civil business thereof. In exercise of powers given by the Judges Chambers (Despatch of Business) Act, 1867, s. 1, rules were made empowering any of these masters to transact all business, with certain specified exceptions, which a judge of his Court might transact in chambers. The Judicature Act, 1873, s. 77, attached them to the Supreme Court. Upon the establishment of the Central Office (q.v.) by the Judicature Officers Act, 1879, they became, under that Act, Masters of the Supreme Court. As to their present powers see Ord. 54, rr. 12, 12A. See PROTHONOTARY.

Masters of the Supreme Court. These at present consist of (1) the Masters in the Chancery Division, who are the Chief Clerks (q.v.) and the Clerks of Record and Writs (q.v.) under another name; (2) the Masters of the King's Bench Division, who occupy the same positions and do practically the same work as the Masters of the King's Bench, Common Pleas and Exchequer (q.v.), (the present number is seven, of whom the senior is also King's Coroner (q.v.): there are also two assistant masters); (3) the eleven Masters of the Supreme Court who carry out in the Central Office (q.v.) the taxation of the costs (q.v.) of all cases in the Chancery and King's Bench Divisions.

Mast-feeding. Pannage (q.v.).

Matches. The manufacture or importation into the United Kingdom of matches in the manufacture whereof white phosphorus is used, has been unlawful since 31st December, 1909, under the White Phosphorus Matches Prohibition Act, 1908, which also provides that the Board of Trade may compel the owner of any patent, existing on 21st December, 1908, for the manufacture of matches, other than "safety matches" without the use of white phosphorus, to grant to any intending manufacturer a licence to use such patent.

The Finance (New Duties) Act, 1916, s. 3, imposes (1) a customs duty upon imported matches at the rate of three shillings and sixpence per ten thousand; (2) an excise duty at the rate of three shillings and fourpence per ten thousand on home-made matches. It also requires manufacturers of matches to take out annually a licence upon which there is an excise duty of one pound.

Material; Materiality. The question whether an untrue representation or a concealment avoids a contract to the subject-matter of which it relates, or whether an erasure or alteration avoids a written instrument, depends in general upon whether the misrepresentation, concealment, erasure or alteration is material; and the question whether it is material depends partly on the facts of the case and partly on the nature of the transaction. Thus, altering the date of a cheque is a material alteration. (See ALTERATION). So if during the negotiation of a marine insurance, a statement is made which has no real bearing on the risk, but which, nevertheless, influences the mind of the underwriter, as, for instance, an assertion that previous insurances have been obtained on the same ship at a low premium, the misrepresentation will avoid the policy. See UBERRIMÆ FIDEI.

Maternal. See DESCENT.

Maternity Benefit. "Payment in the case of the confinement of the wife, or, where the child is a posthumous child, of the widow of an insured person or of any other woman who is an insured person, of a sum of forty shillings . . ." (National Insurance Act, 1911, s. 8 (1) (e); National Health Insurance Act, 1920, s. 2 (2). "Insured person" means one insured under the Acts. The benefit, it will be noted, is payable in respect of an illegitimate child. See RE-INSURANCE.

Matricide. See PARRICIDE.

Matrimonial Causes include suits for divorce, nullity of marriage, judicial separation, damages for adultery, restitution of conjugal rights, and suits of jactitation of marriage. See the various titles; also ALIMONY; PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Matrimonium. This word was anciently sometimes used as meaning property descending ex parte materna (q.v.).

Matrimonium subsequens legitimos facit quoad sacerdotium non quoad successionem propter consuetudinem regni quæ se habet in contrarium (Co. Litt. 345). (A subsequent marriage makes children legitimate as regards Holy orders, but not (because of the custom of this kingdom, which is to the contrary effect) as regards succession [to land]). The canon law forbade the ordination of bastards, but it held that persons born out of wedlock were legitimated by a subsequent marriage of their parents; the common law recognised no such legitimation. See ANTENATUS.

Matrons. See JURY.

Matter. See ACTIONS AND MATTERS.

Maturiora sunt vota mulierum quam virorum (6 Rep. 71). (The promises of women are made earlier than those of men.) This merely means that the minimum age for a valid marriage is less for a woman than for a man. See CONSENSUS.

Maundy Thursday; Maundy Money. See ALMONER.

Maxime, so called quia maxima est ejus dignitas et certissima auctoritas, atque quod maximè omnibus probetur (Co. Litt. 11). ("Maxime," so called because its dignity is the greatest and its authority the most certain, and because it is universally approved by all.) "Maxime" is, of course, "maxim."

Mayhem consists in violently depriving another of the use of a member proper for his defence in fight, such as an arm, a leg, an eye, etc. It was originally both a civil injury and a criminal offence, but by modern statutes the law relating to felonious maiming and wounding has been amended, so that there is no legal difference between depriving a person of a member proper for his defence in fight and causing him any other grievous bodily harm (see MALICIOUS INJURIES TO THE PERSON), except that everyone has a right to consent to the infliction upon himself of any bodily harm not amounting to a mayhem.

Mayhem, as a civil injury, seems still to exist, but the use of the word is obsolete.

See APPEAL OF FELONY.

Mayor. See MUNICIPAL CORPORATION; STAPLE.

Mayor's and City of London Court. A new Court formed, as from 1st January, 1921, by the amalgamation of the Mayor's Court of London (q.v.) and the City of London Court (q.v.) (Mayor's and City of London Court Act, 1920 (10 & 11 Geo. 5, c. cxxxiv.)). The new Court has all the powers and jurisdictions of the two old Courts (ib. s. 1); the judges are the judges of the old Mayor's Court, with one additional judge—or two if the Lord Chancellor thinks two necessary (s. 2). Procedure is governed by the Mayor's and City of London Court Rules, 1920 (S. R. & O., 1920, No. 2382).

Mayor's Court of Bristol. By charter dated 8th August, 1373, Edward III. regularised this Court, which had assumed a jurisdiction analogous to that of the Mayor's Court of London. But it had never such a vigorous existence as the London Court. Within three hundred years from the date of the charter, the Bristol Court had fallen into disuse.

See CONCESSIT SOLVERE.

Mayor's Court of London was an inferior Court having jurisdiction in civil cases where the whole cause of action arose within the city of London, which did not for this purpose include Southwark or the river Thames; if, however, the debt or damage claimed in an action did not exceed £50, the Court had jurisdiction, provided that the defendant dwelt or carried on business within the city at the time the action was brought, or within six months previously, or that part of the cause of action arose within the city (Mayor's Court of London Procedure Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. clvii.), s. 12). Actions of ejectment, and actions under the Bills of Exchange Act, might be brought in the Court, and also certain proceedings peculiar to the city. It was the Court of Appeal from the Chamberlain Court (see CHAMBERLAIN OF THE CITY OF LONDON).

The Court had two "sides" or divisions—a legal and an equitable—but of late years the equitable jurisdiction had almost fallen into disuse. It had no jurisdiction in replevin (q.v.).

An ordinary action was commenced by the plaintiff entering at the office of the registrar of the Court what was called an action, which was in the nature of a præcipe (q.v.), giving the names of the parties and the nature of the claim; a copy of this action, together with a notice to the defendant to appear to the action, and particulars of the claim, was then issued and served on the defendant: this document was sometimes called a "copy action and notice," but more commonly a plaint. The subsequent proceedings were similar to those in actions at law before the Judicature Acts, 1873 and 1875, as to which, see PLEADINGS; CONCESSIT SOLVERE; RECORD; POSTEA. Suits on the equitable side of the Court followed the practice in equity of the old Court of Exchequer before the passing of the Court of Chancery Act, 1841. As to the procedure in foreign attachment, see that title.

For the rules of the Court see S. R. O. Rev. 1904, Inferior Courts (E), pp. 95, 107 and S. R. and O. Rev. 1908, pp. 1,004-6.

The judge of the Court was the Recorder, or, in his absence, the Common Serjeant (Mayor's Court of London Procedure Act, 1857, s. 43), or the assistant judge appointed under the Borough, etc., Courts of Record Act, 1872. The lord mayor and the aldermen were in theory the judges; but they never sat.

See MAYOR'S AND CITY OF LONDON COURT; COMMON PLEADER.

Mead. This seems to have been the same as metheglin (q.v.). Of course, it usually meant a meadow.

Mead-silver. An annual payment of one penny an acre formerly paid by the parishioners of Cobham as a composition for tithe-hay, that is to say, tithes of hay.

Meals for Children. A local education authority may provide at the public expense meals for children attending an elementary school who are insufficiently fed (Education (Provision of Meals) Act, 1906, s. 3); and they may do this without the sanction of the Board of Education (Education (Provision of Meals) Act, 1914, s. 1). These provisions are of great use, not merely to those who are inevitably poor, but to persons who do not choose to accept wages out of which they could perfectly well feed their children. The cost of the meals may be recovered from the latter class of persons (Act of 1906, s. 2); but it never is.

Mease or Mese is Norman-French for a house. In the form "mease" it also means a customary measure of herrings, containing in various places 500, 525, 612 or 615 fish.

Measondue. "Measondue is an appellation of divers Hospitals in this Kingdome" said the Termes de la Ley in 1641. See the statute 1 Eliz. c. 21, s. 34, and the title of the statute 39 Eliz. c. 5. The word is a corruption of maison de Dieu.

Measure. An enactment by the National Assembly (q.v.), such, for instance, as the Parochial Church Councils (Powers) Measure, 1921. A measure is in effect an Act of Parliament.

Measure of Damages. See DAMAGES.

Measurer. (See AULNAGER.) In respect of their metage (q.v.) rights the Corporation of the City of London was the measurer for the Port of London.

Measuring Money. A duty exacted, in addition to alnage, on cloth. It was abolished in the reign of Henry IV. See ALNAGE.

Mechanical Lighters. Excise and import duties were imposed upon these substitutes for matches by the Finance Act, 1916, s. 10: but that section has been repealed by the Finance Act, 1921, s. 5.

Mediators of Questions. Six persons appointed under the statute 27 Edw. 3, st. 2, c. 24, who decided questions arising between merchants as to whether wool was marketable or properly packed, etc.

Medical Jurisprudence. See FORENSIC MEDICINE.

Medical Practitioner. The Medical Acts are the Medical Act, 1858, the Medical Act, 1859, the Medical Acts Amendment Act, 1860, the Medical Practitioners Act, 1876, and the Medical Act, 1886. They apply to both physicians and surgeons, both of whom are medical practitioners: see s. 2 of the Act of 1858.

It is an offence (Act of 1858, s. 40) for any person to pretend falsely that he holds any medical or surgical qualification. Unless there be such false pretence, no unqualified person commits any offence whatever by merely practising medicine or surgery: but he does so at the risk of civil or criminal proceedings in respect of such consequences as may result if he treats a patient without proper skill; and he, like a qualified but unregistered medical practitioner, cannot recover in any Court for medical attendance or for medicine which he has both prescribed and supplied (Act of 1858, s. 32).

Under bye-law clxxii. of the Royal College of Physicians (q.v.) no registered medical practitioner who is a fellow of that college may sue for his fees; and it is provided by the Act of 1886, s. 6, that this bye-law is a bar to any proceedings by such fellow for the recovery of his expenses, charges, or fees.

Registered medical practitioners are exempt from serving on juries and inquests, or in the Militia, and in various municipal and similar offices (Act of 1858, s. 35).

See INFAMOUS CONDUCT; ROYAL COLLEGE OF PHYSICIANS; ROYAL COLLEGE OF SURGEONS.

Medietas linguæ. See JURY.

Medio acquietando, De. An obsolete writ defined by the old writers as "a judicial writ to distrain a lord for the acquitting of a mean lord from a rent which he formerly acknowledged not to belong to him." See ACQUITTAL.

Medletum. A fray or medley (Bract. lib. 3, tract. 2, c. 35). Other forms are medlea, medleta.

Medsypp. Used in the Placit. 9 Edw. 1, as meaning a harvest supper given to labourers.

Meeting. In the law of bankruptcy the most important kind of meeting is the first meeting of creditors, which is held (Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 13), as soon as possible after a receiving order has been made, for the purpose of deciding whether a composition or scheme of assessment shall be accepted or whether the debtor shall be adjudged bankrupt. The trustee in a bankruptcy is bound to have regard to the directions of the creditors in administering the estate, s. 79 (i); he may from time to time summon general meetings of the creditors for the purpose of ascertaining their wishes (s. 79 (2)); and he is required to do so if one-sixth in value of the creditors so demand (ib.). A general meeting may also be held for the purpose of removing the trustee or appointing a new trustee (s. 95).

In the law of companies, meetings are of three kinds, statutory, ordinary and extraordinary, or, as the two latter are also called, general and special. Ordinary or general meetings are usually held at stated times and for the transaction of business generally. Extraordinary or special meetings are held as occasion may require for the transaction of some particular business, which ought to be specified in the notice convening the meeting. The one meeting may be both ordinary and extraordinary. Every company formed under the Companies Acts, and limited by shares, is bound (Companies Act, 1908, s. 65) to hold a general meeting, known as a statutory meeting, not less than one month or more than three months after it is entitled to commence business and (s. 64) to hold an ordinary general meeting once at least in each calendar year and not more than fifteen months after the last such meeting. It has been decided that a single person cannot constitute a meeting.

See RESOLUTION; PUBLIC MEETING; SEDITIOUS MEETING.

Meiny. The king's household; see the statute 1 Rich. 2, c. 4.

Meldfeoh. The reward given to an informer in Saxon times: see Leg. Inæ, c. 20.

Meliorating Waste. See WASTE.

Melior est conditio defendentis. (The position of the defendant is the stronger.) Mr. Broom (8th ed.) cites this maxim: but its source does not appear.

Melior est conditio possidentis et rei quam actoris (4 Inst. 180). (The position of the possessor is the better; and that of the defendant is better than that of the plaintiff.) See also IN ÆQUALI JURE, ETC. and IN PARI CAUSA.

Melior est conditio possidentis, ubi neuter jus habet (Jenk. Cent. 118). (The condition of the possessor is better [than that of one seeking to oust him] where neither of them has a clear title [to the matter in dispute].)

Melior est justitia verè præveniens, quam severè puniens (3 Inst. Epil.). (The justice which is really preventive is better than the justice which punishes severely.) Compare JUSTITIA EST DUPLEX, ETC.

Meliorem conditionem suam facere potest minor, deteriorem nequaquam (Co. Litt. 337). (A minor is able [in law] to make his condition better, but not by any means to alter it for the worse.) This means that within certain limits the law protects a minor against his own improvidence. See INFANT; MINOR ANTE, ETC.; SUCCURRITUR, ETC.

Melius inquirendum. See AD MELIUS INQUIRENDUM.

Memoranda Rolls. These Rolls, now in the Record Office, date from 1199 to 1848. They were compiled by the King's Remembrancer and the Treasurer's Remembrancers for the use of the Barons of the Exchequer.

Memorandum. In a policy of marine insurance the memorandum is a clause inserted to prevent the underwriters from being liable for injury to goods of a peculiarly perishable nature and for minor damages. It begins as follows: "N.B.—Corn, fish, salt, fruit, flour and seed are warranted free from average, unless general or the ship be stranded"; meaning that the underwriters are not to be liable for damage to these articles caused by sea-water or the like. See AVERAGE; POLICY OF ASSURANCE.

To the particulars and conditions of sale of land which is to be sold by auction there is always appended a memorandum setting out that such and such a person has been declared the purchaser of the property, at such and such a price, and this must be signed by the purchaser and by the auctioneer as agent for the vendor. See CONDITIONS OF SALE; PARTICULARS OF SALE.

Memorandum of Alteration. Formerly where a patent was granted for two inventions, one of which was not new or not useful, the whole patent was bad, and the same rule applied when a material part of a patent for a single invention had either of those defects. To remedy this, the statute 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 83, empowered a patentee (with the fiat of the Attorney-General) to enter a disclaimer, or a memorandum of an alteration in the title or specification of the patent, not being of such a nature as to extend the exclusive right granted by the patent; and the Patent Law Amendment Act, 1852, s. 39, provided that thereupon the memorandum was deemed to be part of the letters patent or the specification. Subsequently, the Patents, Designs and Trade Marks Act, 1883, s. 18, provided that either an applicant for a patent or a patentee might apply in writing at the Patent Office for leave to amend his specification by way of either correction, disclaimer, or alteration (but not by way of enlargement or of substituting a practically different specification), and that the amendment, if leave therefor was obtained pursuant to the section, should form part of the specification; and s. 21 of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907 (which is the enactment now in force), is to the like effect. See DISCLAIMER.

Memorandum of Association. See ASSOCIATION, MEMORANDUM OF.

Memorial. In the Land Registries of Middlesex, York, etc., which are registries of deeds and not of titles, the registration of a deed or other document is effected by leaving it at the registry together with a memorial under the hand and seal of one of the parties to the deed. The memorial is an abstract of the material parts of the deed, with the parcels (q.v.) at full length, and concludes with a statement that the party desires the deed to be registered. The execution of the deed and memorial is proved by the oath of an attesting witness. See LAND REGISTRY.

"Memorial" also signifies a petition or statement submitted to a person or body.

Memory. In the old books, when a person alleges in legal proceedings, that a custom or prescription has existed from time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, that is as much as to say that no man then alive hath heard any proof of the contrary. This is also called time of living memory, as opposed to time of legal memory, which runs from the reign of Richard I., because the Statute of Westminster I. (3 Edw. 1, c. 8) fixed that period as the time of limitation for bringing certain real actions. (See LIMITATION.) As to the practical importance of the distinction, see ANCIENT MESSUAGES; CUSTOM; LOST GRANT; PRESCRIPTION.

Menaces. See BLACKMAIL and LIBEL, as to demanding money, etc., with menaces of various kinds other than threats of physical violence. As to demanding money, etc., with threats of physical violence, see the Larceny Act, 1916, s. 30.

Menial Servants. Those employed in or about a house, the word menial being derived from the Middle English meine, a household. The housekeeper of a large hotel, a steward and a resident governess are not menial servants, for they are not in strictness servants at all: but a huntsman, a head gardener, a pot-boy, and a man employed to do work about a garden and stables, all come within the definition. The fact that a servant lives elsewhere than in his employer's house does not prevent his being a menial servant; but it will prevent him from coming within the meaning of the expression "domestic servant" (q.v.).

In the absence of an express agreement the engagement of a menial or of a domestic servant is by the year; but the engagement is terminable during the course of the year by a month's notice on either side or by the payment of a month's wages in lieu of notice.

Mensa. Stated by Jacob to have meant patrimony, or goods and necessaries; from the reference which he gives—dominicum est proprie terra ad mensam assignata—it looks, however, very much as if mensa meant merely "table," in the sense of viands for household consumption.

Mensa et thoro, Divorce à. See DIVORCE.

Mens rea. (A guilty mind.) See ACTUS NON FACIT REUM NISI MENS SIT REA.

Mens testatoris in testamentis spectanda est (Jenk. Cent. 277). (In [construing] wills regard is to be had to the intention of the testator.) Compare VERBA INTENTIONI, ETC.

Mensura regalis. The ancient name of the standard measure of capacity used when the Clerk of the Markets (q.v.) still had functions to perform. See the statute 16 Car. 1, c. 19, which, however, does not make it clear what precisely the measure was.

Mental Deficiency. The Mental Deficiency Act, 1913, s. 1, enacts that Idiots, Imbeciles, Feeble-minded Persons and Moral Defectives (see those titles) shall be deemed defectives within the meaning of that Act. The Act provides for the care of such persons.

Mercantile Agent. See AGENCY.

Mercantile Law includes the law relating to bills of exchange, contracts of affreightment, marine insurance, etc.

Mercantile Marine Fund. The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 676, provided that a number of fees and other receipts, including light dues, mentioned in that section should be paid into the Mercantile Marine Fund; and s. 677 provided that the fund should be charged with the expenses of a large number of services relating to ships, including the lighthouse service. The Merchant Shipping (Mercantile Marine Fund) Act, 1898, abolished the Mercantile Marine Fund. It enacted that the receipts specified in s. 676 of the Act of 1898, other than light dues, should be paid into the Exchequer; that the light dues should be paid into a fund called the General Lighthouse Fund; and that the expenses incurred by a general lighthouse authority under s. 531 of the Act of 1894, and various other expenses in connection with lighthouses, etc., should be charged to the General Lighthouse Fund.

Mercantile Marine Offices. See the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, ss. 246-250.

Merchandise Marks Act, 1887. The object of the Act is to prevent the fraudulent marking of merchandise and the fraudulent sale of merchandise falsely marked or not bearing the proper mark. Its principal provisions are to make forging or falsely applying any trade mark or making or possessing any die, etc., for forging a trade mark, or applying any false trade description to goods, or wrongfully selling goods with forged or false trade marks or false trade descriptions, offences punishable on indictment or summarily. The effect of s. 16 of the Act is that goods made abroad and imported into this country are liable to seizure and forfeiture if marked in such a way as to lead purchasers to suppose that they were made in the United Kingdom: and this section has led to the marking of foreign goods with the words "Made in Germany," or as the case may be. Sections 7 and 8 contain special provisions which aim at preventing foreign watches being sold as of British make.

"For the purposes of this Act. . . the expression 'trade mark' means a trade mark registered in the register of trade marks kept under the Trade Marks Act, 1905, and includes any trade mark which, either with or without registration, is protected by law in any British possession or foreign state to which the provisions of the ninety-first section of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, are by Order in Council for the time being applicable" (Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, s. 3 (i), as impliedly amended by the Acts of 1905 and 1907; the amendments are shown in italics).

The Act of 1887 and the statutes 54 & 55 Vict. c. 15, 57 & 58 Vict. c. 19, 1 & 2 Geo. 5, c. 31, are collectively entitled the Merchandise Marks Acts, 1887 to 1911.

See FALSE TRADE DESCRIPTION; TRADE DESCRIPTION; TRADE MARKS.

Merchant Adventurers. This association grew out of the rivalry between a number of English merchants and the Hanse. In 1505 Henry VII. conferred on them the title of the Fellowship of Merchant Adventurers. At that time their chief centre was Calais. Subsequently they moved to Antwerp. In 1564 Elizabeth granted them a charter incorporating them as the Governor, Assistants, and Fellowship of the Merchant Adventurers of England with liberty to trade in what is known as the north of Germany. They then operated chiefly from Hamburg, and came to be known as the Hamburg Company. By the end of the seventeenth century they had ceased to be an active body.

Merchant Shipping. The statute law as to merchant shipping was consolidated by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. It is the longest Act in the statute books. It and the statutes 60 & 61 Vict. c. 59, 61 & 62 Vict. c. 14, 61 & 62 Vict. c. 44, 63 & 64 Vict. c. 32, 6 Edw. 7, c. 48, 7 Edw. 7, c. 52, 1 & 2 Geo. 5, c. 42, 2 & 3 Geo. 5, c. 31, 4 & 5 Geo. 5, c. 42, 4 & 5 Geo. 5, c. 50, 6 & 7 Geo. 5, c. 41, 9 & 10 Geo. 5, c. 38, are by various sections of those Acts, entitled the Merchant Shipping Acts, 1894 to 1919. Various matters referred to in those Acts are dealt with under the appropriate heads. No attempt can be made here to deal comprehensively with the Acts.

Mercy, Prerogative of. See PARDON; PREROGATIVE.

Merger is that operation of law which extinguishes a right by reason of its coinciding with another right, of greater legal worth, in the same person. By "operation of law" is meant that it may take place independently of the wishes or intention of the parties; and by "greater legal worth" is meant that one right in estimation of law, though not necessarily in fact, is of higher value than the other.

I. In the law relating to rights of action, when a person takes or acquires a remedy or security of a higher nature in legal estimation than the one which he already possesses for the same right, then his remedies in respect of the minor right or security merge in those attaching to the higher one. Thus, if a bond is taken for a simple contract debt, the remedy upon the simple contract is extinguished, and therefore an action for the debt must be brought on the bond; again, if judgment is recovered in such an action, the right of action on the bond is merged in the judgment, and therefore no second action can be brought on the bond.

II. In the law of property, merger takes place either according to the rules of law or according to those of equity.

At law, when a greater and a less estate meet in the same person without any intermediate estate, the less estate is merged in the greater, so as to cease to exist. The greater estate is thus accelerated, but not enlarged. (See ENLARGEMENT.) Thus, if A is tenant for life of land, and the reversion in fee afterwards descends to or is otherwise acquired by him, his estate for life merges in the fee, and he thus becomes tenant in fee in possession. But if a person has two estates in different rights, as where he has one in his own right, and the other as executor, there will in general be no merger. An estate for life being, in the estimation of the law, greater than any term of years however long, it follows that when a person holding a term for 1,000 years becomes entitled to the land for an estate for life, the term merges in the life estate. Merger or its consequences are in some instances prevented by statute; thus, by force of the Statute De Donis Conditionalibus (see ESTATE TAIL), an estate tail does not merge in the freehold (see ENLARGEMENT); the rights incident to a reversionary term which has merged are preserved by the Law of Property Act, 1845, s. 9; and now by the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25 (4), there can be no merger, by operation of law only, of any estate the beneficial interest in which would not be deemed to be merged or extinguished in equity. This enactment was apparently meant to recognise the rule which prevailed in equity before the Act, namely, that where the estate of a trustee accidentally merges, the cestui que trust shall not thereby be injured.

In equity, where a legal and an equitable estate, equal and co-extensive, unite in the same person, the latter merges in the former. Where an estate of inheritance in land and the right to a charge upon it become vested in the same person absolutely (as where a person entitled to have a portion raised out of land becomes entitled to the land in fee simple), the charge will merge unless kept alive, or unless it is to the owner's interest that it should not merge. There is a general leaning against merger in Courts of Equity, except in those cases where merger is convenient and beneficial to all parties.

III. In the law relating to grants by the Crown, it is the rule that when a right belonging to the Crown by virtue of its prerogative (such as the right to wreck) is granted to a subject as an appendancy to land, then if the land comes into the hands of the Crown the right merges in the jus coronæ, and does not pass by a grant of the land, but must be created again. Rights vested in the Crown otherwise than jure coronæ (such as warrens, fairs, etc.) do not merge.

As to the merger of tithes, see that title.

Meritò beneficium legis amittit, qui legem ipsam subvertere intendit (2 Inst. 53). (He justly loses the benefit of law who purposes to overturn the law itself.) "Against those that attempt to subvert . . . the king's laws there lieth a writ in the nature of a commission 'Ad capiendum impugnatores juris Regis et ad ducendum eos ad Gaolam de Newgate" . . . and this is lex terræ to take a man without answer or summons in this case" (2 Inst. 53). But Coke wrote before the days of habeas corpus, and the procedure indicated by him is no longer available.

Merit, Order of. This Order was instituted in 1902. Members bear no titles, but rank next after G.C.B.'s (see BATH) and are entitled to append the initials "O.M." to their names and to wear a badge. The badge distinguishes military from civil members by a difference in design and by the use of the words "Civ." or "Mil." respectively.

Meritorious. See CAUSE OF ACTION; CONSIDERATION.

Merits. A person is said to have a good cause of action or defence on the merits when his claim or defence is based on the real matters in question, and not on any technical ground. Thus before the Judicature Acts a defence based on the misjoinder or nonjoinder of parties by the plaintiff would not have been a defence on the merits. If a defendant inadvertently allows judgment to go by default, the Court will not, as a rule, set the judgment aside under Ord. 27, r. 15, and allow him to defend unless he makes an affidavit of merits, that is, an affidavit showing that he has a substantial ground of defence to the action. A like affidavit has to be made by a defendant seeking to resist an application for judgment under Ord. 14.

Merry-go-rounds. See WHIRLIGIGS.

Merton, Statute of. The statute 20 Hen. 3, cc. 1-11, of which cc. 2, 4 and 9 are still unrepealed. It is the earliest statute in the statute-book. It was in connection with this statute that the barons, when the question of the legitimation of the ante-nati (q.v.) arose, made the famous declaration "Nolumus leges Angliæ [or Anglie, as they put it] mutari."

Mesnalty is the tenure or seignory of a mesne lord. "If," says Littleton, "there be lord [paramount], mesne [lord], and tenant [paravail], and . . . if the lord paramount purchase the tenancie [of the tenant paravail] in fee, then . . . the seignorie of the mesnalty is extinct." (§ 231.)

Mesne signifies middle, intervening or intermediate. Thus in framing an assignment of a lease which has already passed through several hands since it was originally granted, it is usual to refer to all the assignments before the last as "mesne assignments." So if property is mortgaged first to A and then to B, and is subsequently mortgaged to A a second time, B is said to be a mesne incumbrancer, or to have a mesne incumbrance, because his mortgage stands between the two mortgages to A. See PRIORITY; TACKING.

When a person is wrongfully in possession of land, and the rightful owner brings an action to recover possession, he usually sets up in addition, either in the same or a separate action, a claim for "mesne profits"; that is, for the benefit which the defendant has derived from his wrongful occupation of the land between the time when he acquired wrongful possession and the time when the possession was taken from him. See JOINDER; also DOUBLE RENT; DOUBLE VALUE.

As to the meaning of "mesne lord," see LORD; MESNALTY; of "mesne process," see PROCESS; of "mesne tenure," see TENURE. In the old books "mesne" often denotes "mesne lord."

The writ of mesne was a writ which a tenant paravail (q.v.) had to compel his immediate lord (the mesne) to protect or acquit him against the lord paramount. (See FORJUDGER; ACQUITTAL.) It was abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833.

Messenger. In bankruptcy there was formerly, down to 1883, a sort of sheriff's officer, known as the messenger, whose duty it was to execute the decrees and processes of the Court. He and his staff were transferred by the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, to the Board of Trade, which does not now appear to employ any official designated a messenger.

Down to 1874 there was a messenger or pursuivant of the Great Seal, who, amongst other things, had to do with writs for the election of members of Parliament. His office was abolished as a separate office by the Great Seal (Offices) Act, 1874, s. 4, which provided that his duties as to writs for the election of members of Parliament should be transferred to such officer as the Lord Chancellor should select, and that the officer so selected might bear the title of Messenger of the Great Seal. Accordingly, there is now an officer known as the Clerk of the Chamber and Messenger of the Great Seal.

The Messengers of the Exchequer were four officers attached to that Court who acted as pursuivants to the Lord Treasurer.

In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries the Stationers' Company had an officer, known as the Messenger of the Press, whose duty it was to search, at first for unlicensed and subsequently for seditious, printings.

During the time of the Tudors and Stuarts, the arrest of prisoners of state was generally effected by officers known as messengers.

Now the only "messengers" left are King's Messengers. They carry important Government despatches to and from the King and for Secretaries of State, more especially the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

Messuage is a house. As a word of conveyance, "messuage" includes not only the buildings but also the curtilage, orchard and garden belonging thereto. A "capital messuage" is the chief mansion house of an estate. See MANSION.

Metage. The act of measuring. The Corporation of the City of London had under charter and by prescription been in receipt of a large income arising from their right of compulsory metage, at first of all merchandise, and finally only of grain, brought into the Port of London. The dues which they levied for measuring the grain were known as fillage and lastage. The Metage on Grain (Port of London) Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. c.) abolished compulsory metage and "fillage and lastage," and provided that for thirty years from 31st October, 1872, a duty at the rate of three-sixteenths of a penny on each hundredweight of grain should be paid to the Corporation. The Act, which provided that the proceeds of the duty should be applied to the preservation of open spaces for public use, was amended by the City of London (Various Powers) Act, 1877 (40 Vict. c. vii.).

Metal. Unless the context so requires, this term does not include the precious metals.

As to old metals, see that title and MARINE STORE DEALER.

Mete. A form of "meat," in the sense of food generally. It occurs in several compounds, such as metecorn (an allowance for food to servants or to customary tenants in return for their labour), metegavel (a rent paid in food, etc.). The word also meant to measure, and occurs in this sense in compound forms, such as metewand (a measuring-rod, like the modern draper's yard-stick), etc.

Metes and Bounds. In ordinary cases where a widow is entitled to dower of land, her share is ascertained and set apart to be held by her in severalty, and she is then, in the words of Littleton, said to hold it "by metes and bounds," that is, by measurement and boundaries. See ADMEASUREMENT.

Metheglin. An alcoholic fluid made by fermenting honey water and spices; mentioned in the statute 15 Car. 2, c. 9. See SWEETS.

Metric System. A system of weights and measures in which the unit is multiplied or divided by ten. The use of such a system is legalised by the Weights and Measures (Metric System) Act, 1897. The Order in Council (1898, No. 411) made in pursuance thereof sets out the equivalents in the metric system of our various imperial weights and measures. See also CARAT.

Metropolis. For the meaning of this expression see LONDON.

Metropolitan Board of Works. The name of a board appointed for the better local management of the metropolis, and constituted and authorised under the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, and many subsequent Acts. They had the care and management of all grounds and gardens dedicated to the use of the inhabitants in the metropolis; also, the superintendence of the drainage; also, the regulation of the street traffic, and generally of the buildings of the metropolis. The Board has ceased to exist and has been superseded by the London County Council. See LONDON.

Metropolitan Courts. These are the County Courts of the districts which, together with the City of London, form the London Bankruptcy District, as to which see BANKRUPTCY COURT.

Metropolitan Paving Act, 1817. The title generally, though without statutory authority, applied to the statute 57 Geo. 3, c. xxix., which is also known as Michael Angelo Taylor's Act.

Metropolitan Police District. This is the area under the charge of the Metropolitan Police. It includes the administrative county of London (the City being excluded), the whole of Middlesex, the county boroughs of Croydon and West Ham, and such places within a radius of fifteen miles of Charing Cross as the King by Order in Council has included. See the Metropolitan Police Act, 1829, ss. 4, 34, 35, the Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, s. 2; and (for a list if places included by Order in Council) Stat. R. & O. Rev. 1904, Vol. viii. "Metropolitan and City Police District," p. 1.

Metropolitan Police Magistrate. Under the Metropolitan Police Act, 1829, s. 1, the Metropolitan Police Courts Act, 1839, s. 3, the Metropolitan Police Courts Act, 1840, s. 2, and the Stipendary Magistrates Act, 1858, s. 14, the Crown may appoint not more than twenty-seven salaried magistrates, holding office at the pleasure of the Crown, to execute the duties of justices of the peace within the Metropolitan Police District, and to be justices of the peace for the counties of London, Middlesex, Surrey, Hertford, Essex, and Kent, from amongst barristers who have been in practice for the seven years preceding their appointment or who have been stipendiary magistrates (q.v.). The chief Metropolitan Police magistrate is ex officio a justice for Berks (Indictable Offences Act, 1848, s. 31); which enables him to attend Ascot Race Meeting and to deal with persons charged with indictable offences committed there.

Under the Metropolitan Police Courts Act, 1840, s. 2, the King in Council is empowered to divide the Metropolitan Police District into divisions, in each of which there is established a Court to which is assigned one of the magistrates, who, however, can still act anywhere within the limits of his commission. His commission is the same as that of a county justice: but he may not act at general or quarter sessions (Metropolitan Police Act, 1829, s. 1): and he can do all things for which two ordinary justices are required (Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, s. 33: Indictable Offences Act, 1848, s. 39). Beyond the limits of the jurisdiction of the Metropolitan Police Courts, he can act at licensing sessions as regards any licensing district wholly or partially within his jurisdiction (Licensing Act, 1872, s. 39).

Mice. See RATS AND MICE.

Michael Angelo Taylor's Act. A popular title of the statute 57 Geo. 3, c. xxix. It was introduced into the House of Commons by Mr. Michael Angelo Taylor, who, amongst other things, was admitted to Lincoln's Inn in 1770 at the age of twelve years, and was called to the Bar only four years afterwards.

Michaelmas. The 29th September, of which the fuller title is the Feast of the Archangel

Michael and All Angels. It is one of the customary quarter-days, and gives its name to the autumn sittings of the High Court, though they do not commence until 12th October, and to the Michaelmas term of the Inns, though it does not commence until 2nd November. See OLD MICHAELMAS DAY.

Micklemote; Micklegemote. The Great Council or national assembly of the Anglo-Saxon period. The names meant literally "the great meeting."

Middlesex. Since 1888, much of the ancient county of Middlesex has been part of the county of London. See LONDON.

The quarter sessions for the county of Middlesex—which are known as the Middlesex Sessions—are held at the Guildhall in the City of London, although provision was made by the Local Government Act, 1888, s. 42 (12), for the holding of them within the actual county of Middlesex, if that were considered desirable. Formerly (see ASSISTANT JUDGE, ETC.) paid judges presided at these sessions, but now, like the quarter sessions of other counties, they are presided over by an unpaid chairman, and an unpaid deputy chairman. They are quite distinct from the quarter sessions for the county of London—known as the County of London Sessions—which have jurisdiction over the whole administrative county of London, and are presided over by a paid chairman and a paid deputy chairman, both appointed by the Crown (see the Local Government Act, 1888, s. 42). The County of London Sessions were held until 1921 at the Sessions House, Clerkenwell, from which in that year they were removed to a new courthouse at Stoke Newington. See LONDON SESSIONS; GUILDHALL SITTINGS.

There is, since 1888, a Sheriff of Middlesex, selected by the Crown (Local Government Act, 1888, ss. 46 (6), 113). For the preceding seven hundred years the duties of sheriff had been performed in Middlesex by the Sheriffs of the City of London.

The Middlesex Land Registry is a registry of assurances relating to land situate in the county of Middlesex. (See LAND REGISTRIES.) It is regulated by the Middlesex Registry Act, 1708, which makes every such deed fraudulent and void against any subsequent purchaser or mortgagee for valuable consideration, unless it has been registered before the purchaser's or mortgagee's deed; but that statute does not apply (see s. 18) to copyholds, leases at a rackrent, or leases not exceeding twenty-one years, or to any instrument made after the passing, on 30th July, 1900, of the Land Charges Act, 1900, which is capable of registration under the Act of 1900 or under the Land Charges Registration and Searches Act, 1888 (Act of 1900, s. 4). A will of lands in the county also requires registration within six months of the testator's death, or before the registration of an assurance to a purchaser or mortgagee from the testator's heir-at-law (Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, s. 8). The Middlesex Land Registry was transferred in 1891 (Land Registry (Middlesex Deeds) Act, 1891, s. 1), to the Land Registry in London, established under the Land Transfer Act, 1875.

As to the ancient BILL OF MIDDLESEX, see that title.

Middle Temple. See INNS OF COURT.

Midsummer Day. The 24th June. It is the feast (q.v.) of St. John the Baptist, and is one of the customary quarter-days. See OLD MIDSUMMER DAY.

Midwives. Down to 1st April, 1905, anyone could call herself a midwife and attend women in childbirth, no matter how ignorant she might be. In England now a woman who habitually and for gain attends women in childbirth commits an offence unless she is certified as a midwife under the Midwives Act, 1902 (2 Edw. 7, c. 17) as amended by the Midwives Act, 1918, s. 10 (Act of 1902, s. 1 (2)). Unless she is certified she commits an offence if she calls herself a midwife or holds herself out as certified (ib. s. 1 (1)). There is a Central Midwives Board which issues certificates, publishes annually a roll of certified midwives and can remove from the roll any midwife guilty of misconduct (ib. s. 3). The misconduct need not necessarily be professional misconduct. The two Acts now regulate the whole subject, and the rules made pursuant to them form a complete code. For the rules see S. R. and O. 1916, I., p. 540 and S. R. and O. 1919, I, p. 1,099.

The Ministry of Health is now the department which is concerned with the administration of the Acts (Ministry of Health Act, 1919, s. 3 (1) (e)).

Mile. The statute 35 Eliz. c. 6, s. 8, provided as follows:—"A Myle to conteyne eight furlongs, and everie furlong to conteyne fortie luggs or poles, and overie lugg or pole to conteyne sixteen foote and half." This makes the mile, the furlong, and the pole or perch, precisely what they are declared to be by s. 11 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878. The mile everywhere has always contained 320 "rods, poles, perches or luggs" (which were all synonyms), but varied in different parts of the country as the length of the perch (q.v.) varied locally.

Miles; Militia; Militare. These words meant respectively a knight, knighthood, and to be knighted.

Milestones. Railway companies are required by the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, to set up the posts marking the miles, quarter-miles, and half-miles which are to be seen along railways. No corresponding obligation is imposed on highway authorities, who however are empowered by the Highway Rate Assessment and Expenditure Act, 1882, s. 6, to expend money on maintaining, replacing or setting up milestones along any highway. The trustees of turnpike roads had under various repealed statutes—see, for instance, the 3 Geo. 4, c. 26, s. 119—been required to erect milestones at distances of one mile. Pulling down or damaging a milestone is punishable summarily under the Highway Act, 1835, s. 2.

Military. The various tenures by knight-service, grand-serjeanty, cornage, etc., are frequently called military tenures, from the nature of the services which they involved. See SERVICE; TENURE.

Military Law. This is the law under which courts martial (q.v.) sit, and to which persons in the military service of the Crown are subject. (See MARTIAL LAW; ARMY.) It does not include the law which applies to the naval service of the Crown: and there is no corresponding expression such as "naval law." See NAVY.

Military Testament. A nuncupative will made by a soldier on active service. See WILLS.

Militia. The force which was raised after the Restoration of 1660 as a substitute for those which had been raised under the commissions of array (q.v.) and lieutenancy (q.v.). The name had been in use during the Civil War, but the force was for the first time regularly raised under the authority of the statute 14 Car. 2, c. 3, which empowered the lords lieutenant (q.v.) of counties to raise and train troops within their counties for service as the King might direct. In 1757 the statute 30 Geo. 2, c. 25, provided that the men required for the militia should be selected by a system of balloting. This system of balloting had been in abeyance from 1815 until 1921, except as regards two years in the reign of William IV.: but for this, until the enactment of the statute 10 Geo. 4, c. 10, there would appear to have been no statutory sanction. As a substitute for the balloting system, voluntary enlistment was introduced: but this again was not put upon a regular footing until the enactment of the statute 15 & 16 Vict. c. 50. The succession of Acts for the suspension of the ballot ended with the enactment of the Militia (Ballot Suspension) Act, 1865, which, though only a temporary Act, was kept in force by the annual Expiring Laws Continuance Acts. This Act of 1865 provided, however, by s. 2, that the Militia Ballot, as amended by Acts subsequent to the Act of 1757, might be revived by Order in Council. The Militia Act, 1882, s. 12 (as impliedly amended by s. 2 of the Reserve Forces and Militia Act, 1898), made the Militia available only for service in the United Kingdom, except as regards those members of the force who might voluntarily offer to serve elsewhere. The Militia in the old sense has now disappeared. The Territorial Army and Militia Act, 1921, s. 2, enacts that the portion of the Army Reserve previously called the "Special Reserve" shall be called the Militia. The modern Militia is therefore the Special Reserve which (Reserve Forces Act, 1882, s 12) may be called out for service anywhere in case of imminent national danger or of great emergency: and the Militia now consists of men who, without previous service in the regular forces, enlisted into the Special Reserve or (Territorial Army, Militia Act, 1921, s. 5 (2)) since 1st October, 1921, have enlisted into the Militia (Territorial and Reserve Forces Act, 1907, s. 30 (1)). Any member of the Militia may agree in writing to be called out at times other than those of danger or emergency: see Reserve Forces Act, 1882, s. 32 (1).

Milk. See DAIRIES.

Milk-blended Butter. ". . . Any mixture produced by mixing or blending butter with milk or cream other than condensed milk or cream" . . . (Butter and Margarine Act, 1907, s. 1 (1) (b)) Compare BUTTER.

Minatur innocentibus, qui parcit nocentibus (4 Co. 45). (He threatens the innocent who spares the guilty.) That is to say, the leaving of law-breakers unpunished is a menace to law-abiding persons. Compare IMPUNITAS, ETC.

Mineral Rights Duty. This is an annual duty at the rate of 1s. in the £1 on the rental value (that is to say, the actual or estimated rent) of mining royalties; it is payable under the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, ss. 20-24. See LAND VALUES DUTIES; RENTAL VALUE.

Minerals; Mines. In the most general sense of the term, minerals are those parts of the earth which are capable of being got from underneath the surface for the purpose of profit. The term therefore includes coal, metal ores of all kinds, stone, slate, and coprolites, but not the common clay, sand, or gravel found in the upper soil. A mine is a work for the excavation of minerals by means of pits, shafts, levels, tunnels, etc., as opposed to a quarry, where the whole excavation is open. While unsevered, minerals form part of the land, and as such are real estate. When severed, they become personal chattels. Royal mines are mines of gold or silver, and belong to the Crown, in whosesoever land they may be found. In other cases, mines and minerals belong primâ facie to the owner of the surface of the land, though they may be, and frequently are, held by different persons. It follows from the nature of copyhold tenure that the minerals under copyhold land belong to the lord, though he cannot work them without the tenant's consent, except by a local custom. (See COPYHOLD.) In many places, customs or prescriptions exist, by virtue of which persons are entitled to work mines in land, the freehold of which is vested in another person. See GALE; STANNARIES; TIN-BOUNDING.

A trustee having a power of sale may, with the sanction of the High Court, sell the lands without the minerals, or the minerals without the lands (Trustee Act, 1893, s. 44).

As to the rights of adjoining owners in respect of minerals, see BARRIER; BOUNDARIES; BOUNDS; EASEMENT; SUPPORT.

By modern statutes, numerous obligations have been imposed on mine owners for the protection of the public and of persons employed in mines. The principal Acts now in force are, as regards coal mines, those mentioned under COAL MINES, and, as regards mines generally, the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Acts, 1872 and 1875 (see FENCE), the Quarries Act, 1894, the Mines (Prohibition of Child Labour Underground) Act, 1900, and the Mines Accidents (Rescue and Aid) Act, 1910. The right to work minerals under railways, canals, waterworks and highways is restricted by the Acts relating to those matters.

Children may not be employed in any mine or quarry to which the Metalliferous Mines Acts, 1872-1875, apply (Education Act, 1918, s. 14).

See COAL MINES.

Mineral Waters. See TABLE WATERS.

Minimè mutanda sunt quæ certam habent interpretationem (Co. Litt. 229, 365). (Things which have a settled interpretation are to be altered as little as possible.) Compare A COMMUNI, ETC; PERICULOSUM EST, ETC.; MAGISTER RERUM, ETC.

Minimum Wage. The system of establishing by statute a wage which is to be the lowest paid, was introduced in modern times by the Trade Boards Act, 1909, c. 22, which applied only (1) to certain trades (mentioned in the schedule to the Act), the men and women employed in which were understood to be unable to secure adequate wages by negotiation with their employers; and (2) such other trades as might be brought within the Act by Order in Council. In 1912 a minimum wage was established for coal-miners (see COAL MINES). During the war of 1914-1918 the payment of prescribed wages was made obligatory in a number of industries connected with the supply of munitions of war by Acts of temporary operation. The Corn Production Act, 1917, Pt. II., established for agricultural workers a minimum wage, which was to be fixed by the Agricultural Wages Board constituted under s. 5 of the Act. The Act of 1917 was to have expired on 31st December, 1922; but the Agriculture Act, 1920 (10 & 11 Geo. 5, c. 76), s. 1, provided that it should remain in force until Parliament otherwise determines. Within eight months Parliament did in fact "otherwise determine": for the Corn Production Acts (Repeal) Act, 1921, repealed the Acts of 1917 and 1920 as from 1st October, 1921, with saving clauses which did not preserve the minimum wage. But the Act of 1921, s. 5, provides machinery by which standard rates of wages can be fixed, and enacts that these rates shall be paid to agricultural workers unless the contract for service specifies a lower rate, and unless such lower rate be approved by the body which fixes the standard rate or by a Court in which proceedings for the recovery of wages at the standard rate are being taken.

See TRADE BOARDS.

Minister. Quoad the Church of England this includes anyone in priest's-orders having a cure of souls. Compare PRIEST.

Ministerial is opposed to judicial or discretionary. Thus, a ministerial office or duty is one which merely involves the following of instructions; in other words, one which can be performed without the exercise of more than ordinary skill, prudence, or discretion, e.g., the payment or receipt of money, the execution of a deed, or the like; while a judicial or discretionary office or duty involves the exercise of judgment or discretion (q.v.). As to the ministerial office of a coroner, see CORONER. The phrase is often used in speaking of a delegation of authority; the general rule being that an executor, trustee, agent, etc., can delegate his authority so far as to empower another person to do a merely ministerial act for him, but not to empower another person to exercise a discretion vested in him (the executor, trustee, agent, etc.). Thus, an executor cannot (it is conceived) authorise another person to dispose of his testator's estate, or compromise claims by creditors; but if he has entered into an agreement for the sale of the property, or for the compromise of a claim, he may appoint another person to carry out the agreement by receiving or paying the money. See AGENT.

As to ministerial trusts, see TRUST.

Ministry. This means not merely the members of the Cabinet but also all holders of offices who go in and out with the Government. Thus the Solicitor-General is always a member of the Ministry, but is never in the Cabinet.

Minor. In law a minor and an infant are one and the same thing. See GUARDIAN; INFANT.

Minor ante tempus agere non potest in casu proprietatis, nec etiam convenire; differetur usque ætatem; sed non cadit breve (2 Inst. 291). (A minor before majority cannot act in a case of property, not even to agree; it should be deferred until majority; but a writ does not fail.) This is a passage from Bracton which is quoted by Coke with special reference to the Statute of Gloucester (6 Edw. 1), c. 2.

Minor Canon. This term includes every vicar, vicar choral, priest vicar, and senior vicar being a member of the choir in any cathedral or collegiate church (Ecclesiastical Commissioners Act, 1840, s. 93). The term minor canon is used only at St. Paul's and Hereford Cathedrals.

Minories, The. See PRIVILEGED PLACES.

Minor jurare non potest (Co. Litt. 172). (A minor cannot swear.) This is a quotation from Bracton, lib. 5, fo. 340. It was never literally true. Thus in Bracton's time the oath of allegiance could be required of one over twelve; but even after the time of Coke an infant could not upon his oath make his law in an action of debt.

Minor minorem custodire non debet; alios enim præsumitur male regere qui seipsum regere nescit (Co. Litt. 88). (A minor cannot be guardian to a minor, for he is presumed to direct others badly who knows not how to direct himself.) This is merely a quotation from Fleta, lib. 1, c. 10, with regard to guardianship under the feudal system.

Minor, qui infra ætatem 12 annorum fuerit, utlagari non potest, nec extra legem poni, quia ante talem ætatem non est sub lege aliqua (Co. Litt. 128). (A minor who is under twelve years of age cannot be outlawed, nor placed without the law, because, before such age, he is not under any law.) This is a quotation from Bracton, lib. 3, fo. 125.

Mint. This meant anciently not merely the Mint at which coins of the realm are made, but also a pretended sanctuary (q.v.) in Southwark, which was finally suppressed by the statute 9 Geo. 1, c. 28. It was also known as Suffolk Place. See PRIVILEGED PLACES.

The Mint, or place in which money is manufactured, existed in the Tower of London so far back as Anglo-Saxon times. From early times there were also provincial mints at various towns, and down to the fall of Cardinal Wolsey grants of coining rights were frequently made to ecclesiastical persons. The coining at the principal Mint in the Tower was done by contractors from the thirteenth century down to 1851. In 1325 the officers of the Mint were incorporated by royal charter, which placed the management in the hands of a master (the contractor for the time being) and various other officers. The Mint remained in the Tower until 1810, when it was removed to its present site on Tower Hill. In 1851 contractors ceased to be employed, and the Mint became in all respects a Government Department, managed by public officials. It is now regulated by the Coinage Act, 1870. See MASTER OF THE MINT.

By virtue of the royal prerogative, branch mints were established at Sydney in 1853 and at Melbourne in 1869 under Orders in Council. Those branch mints, as well as others at Perth (Western Australia), Ottawa, Bombay, and Calcutta, are now carried on under Orders in Council made pursuant to the Coinage Act, 1870, s. 11 (8), and coins minted at them are deemed to have been minted at the Royal Mint upon Tower Hill (ib.). See PYX.

Mint-master. See MASTER OF THE MINT.

Minutes are notes or records of a transaction. Thus, the record of the proceedings at a meeting of directors or shareholders of a company is called the minutes. Minutes must be made, in the proper book, of all general meetings and of all meetings of directors and managers of a company (Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, s. 71).

When the parties to an action, petition, or other proceeding in the Chancery Division are agreed as to the order or judgment which should be made on an application to the Court, they usually (especially if the matter is complicated) draw up beforehand minutes of the order or judgment (formerly called "minutes of order"), containing in outline all the provisions which are thought necessary. The minutes are afterwards put into the form of an order by the registrar. (See PASS; SETTLE.)

Formerly, in Chancery suits, when an order or decree had been made, the registrar did not draw it up in full in the first instance, but framed an outline giving the substance of the order, copies of which were delivered to the parties, to be settled by them in his presence, if necessary. For many years the practice has been to draw up the order or decree complete in the first instance, and copies of the draft are delivered to the parties. In practice these copies are still called "minutes"; and when any dispute arises on the form of the order which has to be referred to the Court, the cause is put into the paper "to be spoken to on the minutes." See ENTER; PASS; SETTLE.

Mirror of Justices. A book supposed to have been written in the thirteenth century which was first published in 1642. It is entirely without value as an authority. The best edition is that of Mr. Whitaker, published, with an introduction by Mr. Maitland, by the Selden Society in 1893. As to the authorship of the book, see 13 L. Q. R. 85.

Misadventure, Homicide by. See INFORTUNIAM, HOMICIDE PER.

Misappropriation is a term sometimes applied to the misdemeanour which is committed by a banker, factor, agent, trustee, etc., who fraudulently deals with money, goods, securities, etc. entrusted to him, or by a director or public officer of a corporation or company who fraudulently misapplies any of its property. (See FRAUD; PUBLIC OFFICER). The term is not, however, used in the law at all except in the title of the Misappropriation by Servants Act, 1863, which provides that a servant taking without authority his master's corn, etc., for the purpose of giving it to a horse, etc., other than his master's shall be guilty, not of felony, but of an offence punishable summarily. Such taking had previously been felony, like other larcenies.

Miscarriage. See ABORTION.

Miscontinuance. Down to 1833, when the entry of continuances (q.v.) was abolished, there was said to be a discontinuance (q.v.) when no continuance was entered: when the continuance was entered up, but irregularly, there was said to be a miscontinuance. There was, therefore, a distinction between the two terms, although they are sometimes erroneously said to be of identical meaning.

Misdemeanour is any crime or indictable offence not amounting to felony: such as perjury, battery, libel, conspiracy, and public nuisances. At common law, misdemeanours are generally punishable by fine and imprisonment, formerly without, but now with or without, hard labour (q.v.) In many cases special punishments have been attached to misdemeanours by statute.

Misdescription. In certain cases, when a contract contains a material misdescription, that is, when the description of the subject-matter of the contract is incorrect or misleading in a material and substantial point, the contract is voidable at the option of the party misled, independently of fraud, concealment, or misrepresentation (q.v.). Thus, in a contract of fire insurance, if the building is so described by the assured as to make the risk appear less than it really is, the insurer is entitled to avoid the contract. So, in a sale of land, a misdescription materially affecting the value, title, or character of the property sold will make the contract voidable at the purchaser's option. The test of materiality seems to be whether, if the subject-matter had been correctly described, the party misled would have entered into the contract.

A wrong description does not affect the validity of the transaction if there is no mistake as to the identity of the person or thing intended to be described, as where a person is called by a wrong name. See the maxim falsa demonstratio non nocet.

As to misdescription of quite another kind, see FABRICS.

Mise, in the obsolete writ of right, was the same thing as the issue in an ordinary action, and was so called because the tenant "put" himself upon the grant assise (q.v.), that is, chose it as the mode of trial.

The word was also applied to certain taxes payable in Wales and in the adjoining areas See, for instance, the statutes 27 Hen. 8, c. 26, s. 23, and 2 & 3 Edw. 6, c. 36, s. 52.

It was also used in the old personal action where the judgment was pro misis et custagiis (for charges and costs) such and such a sum.

Mise-book. A book formerly kept in the County Palatine of Chester for entries as regards the payment of mise (q.v.).

Misera est servitus, ubi jus est vagum aut incertum (4 Inst. 246). (Obedience to the law is a hardship, where the law is vague and uncertain.) This maxim is quoted by Coke as a comment on the jurisdiction exercised by the Council of the North—until the common law Courts intervened—under instructions which were kept secret so that the king's subjects were unaware of their position with regard to the Council. It is cited by Lord Kenyon, C.J. (8 T. R. 504) as showing the inadvisability of capricious departure from well-settled law.

Misericordia. See AMERCIAMENT.

Misevenire. Used in Leg. Canut. as meaning to fail in one's defence or in purgation.

Misfeasance; Misfeasor. Misfeasance is the improper performance of a lawful act: as where a person is guilty of negligence in performing a contract. Misfeasor is a person who does a misfeasance. In the old books misfeasance was used especially to signify trespasses and other offences in parks, forests, etc. At the present day it is chiefly used to signify negligence.

See MALFEASANCE; NONFEASANCE; TORT.

Mishering. See ABISHERING.

Misjoinder is where persons are wrongly joined as plaintiffs or defendants in an action: in other words, where persons are made parties who ought not to be. The rule before the Judicature Acts was that in an action of contract a misjoinder of plaintiffs led only to increased costs, while a misjoinder of defendants was fatal; and that in an action of tort a misjoinder of plaintiffs or defendants led only to increased costs. No action can now be defeated by a misjoinder (Ord. 16, r. 11). See JOINDER.

Misnomer. A mis-naming. Down to 1834, a plea in abatement (q.v.) lay for a misnomer in civil proceedings, and down to the enactment of the Criminal Law Act, 1826 (7 Geo. 4, c. 64) a misnomer in an indictment was fatal. Now in either case an amendment (q.v.) can be made.

See IDEM SONANS.

Misprision, "in its larger sense, is used to signify every considerable misdemeanour which has not a certain name given to it by the law; and it is said that a misprision is contained in every treason or felony whatsoever, and that one who is guilty of felony or treason may be proceeded against for a misprision only." The term is, however, rarely if ever used in this sense, it being now practically confined to the two phrases, misprision of treason and misprision of felony.

Misprision of treason is where a person who knows that some other person has committed high treason does not within a reasonable time give information thereof to a judge of assize or justice of the peace. At common law the punishment is imprisonment for life and forfeiture of the offender's goods, etc.; but prosecutions for the offence are now unknown.

Misprision of felony is where a person who knows that some other person has committed felony conceals or procures the concealment thereof. In ordinary cases the offence is a common law misdemeanour; if the offender is a sheriff or coroner, or the bailiff of either officer, a special punishment is inflicted. But prosecutions for this offence also are obsolete.

Misrepresentation is where one of the parties to an intended contract conveys to the other a false impression as to some matter relating to the contract, whether by an express statement (active) or by silence (passive).

False or fraudulent misrepresentation is a representation contrary to the fact, made by a person with knowledge of its falsehood, and being the cause of the other party's entering into the contract. See DOLUS DANS LOCUM CONTRACTUI; FRAUD.

Negligent misrepresentation is a false representation made by a person who has no reasonable grounds for believing it to be true, though he does not know that it is untrue, or even believes it to be true

Innocent misrepresentation is where the person making the representation had reasonable grounds for believing it to be true.

When a person has been induced to enter into a contract by fraudulent or negligent misrepresentation, he may in general either (i) affirm the contract and insist on the misrepresentation being made good, if that is possible, so as to be put in the same position as if it had been originally true, or (ii) rescind the contract (see RESCISSION), or (iii) bring an action for damages, or (iv) rely upon the misrepresentation as a defence to an action on the contract. An innocent misrepresentation has no effect on the contract unless it produces mistake excluding true consent (error in substantia, as to which see MISTAKE); or unless it amounts to a warranty or condition, or unless the contract is one in which good faith is especially required, such as contracts of insurance and family settlements.

Mistake. Although mistake and ignorance are strictly speaking not identical, the one being positive and the other negative, they are commonly used as convertible terms in law, their effects being identical. Mistake then may be defined as a misapprehension as to the existence of a thing, arising either from ignorance in the strict sense, that is, absence of knowledge on the subject, or from mistake in the strict sense, that is, a false belief on the point. Where, however, mistake produces a legal effect, not of itself, but because it coincides with some other fact, the effect is not attributed to the mistake, but to the whole transaction. Thus, mistake is essential to the idea of fraud, because no one can be defrauded unless he is misled, and to many cases where negligence or bona fides is of importance; but no one would treat these subjects as instances of mistake. In practice, therefore, the term mistake is limited to cases where the effect produced is attributed to it alone.

Mistake is either of law or of fact.

I. Mistake of law (error or ignorantia juris) is a mistake as to a general rule of law: as where a testator thinks that to disinherit his heir it is necessary to give him a nominal bequest, or where a person does not know that a contract not to be performed within a year must be in writing. The general rule is that such a mistake does not affect the transaction, whether in civil or in criminal law. Thus, in the first of the above cases the executor could not refuse to pay the bequest, and, in the second, the contract would be void for want of the formality of writing.

II. Mistake of fact (error or ignorantia facti) is either as to the existence of a fact or as to the existence of a right depending on questions of mixed law and fact. Thus, where A., believing that under a deed of grant he had merely a right of rabbit warren over certain land, entered into an agreement for an exchange of properties with a neighbouring proprietor, who was also under the belief that A. was only entitled to the right of warren, but it was afterwards discovered that under the deed of grant A. was entitled to the land itself: it was held that the mistake was one of fact, and that, therefore (under the rule stated infra), A. was entitled to have the agreement rescinded, although it had been partially carried out. Questions of foreign law being questions of fact, a mistake as to foreign law is a mistake of fact. See FACT.

Mistake of fact is of two kinds, fundamental and collateral.

A mistake is fundamental when it prevents an act from producing its legal effect, because it excludes the necessary intention. Such a mistake may be either unilateral or bilateral. Instances of unilateral mistake excluding intention occur both in civil and criminal law. Thus, if A. signs a document by mistake, thinking it to be another document, his signature is ineffectual, because he did not intend to sign it. So if A. takes away a thing belonging to B., believing it to be his own, he does not commit a theft, because the necessary criminal intention is absent. Bilateral mistake excluding intention occurs only in civil law. Thus, if A. and B. enter into a contract of sale for an estate called Dale, there being in fact two estates called Dale, A. meaning one and B. the other, the consent or common intention necessary to constitute a contract is absent, and there, therefore, is no contract (error in corpore).

Collateral mistake is where the necessary intention is present, but it is induced or accompanied by a mistake. The mistake may be either unilateral or mutual. As a general rule, unilateral mistake has no legal effect at all. Thus if A. purchases property from B. under a mistaken belief as to its qualities, he cannot set aside the sale or recover damages from B. on the ground of his mistake, unless there was misrepresentation or a guarantee on the part of B. The principal exception to the rule is that if money is paid under a mistake of fact it may be recovered back. Mutual mistake is where the parties have a common intention, but it is induced by a common or mutual mistake. The most important instance of this kind is where there is a common mistake as to the substance of the thing (error in substantia). Thus if A. and B. enter into a contract of sale for a vessel, each believing it to be of gold, while it is in fact of brass, either may rescind the contract. Again, if a mistake occurs in expressing the terms of an agreement, it will, as a general rule, be corrected, either when proceedings are taken to enforce it or by substantive proceedings taken for the purpose. (See RECTIFICATION). The most obvious example is that of clerical errors made in reducing a contract to writing.

Mistress of the Robes. A lady of high rank who is, theoretically, the chief personal attendant of the Queen, whether the Queen be a queen consort or a queen regnant, but whose duties are purely formal. Her attendance is required only on rare occasions of State. During the first years of the reign of Queen Victoria it became the rule that the Mistress of the Robes went in and out with the Ministry of the day. (See BEDCHAMBER.) The corresponding official as regards the King is the Groom of the Stole. His office would appear to be at present in abeyance. There is no rule that the holder goes in and out with the Ministry.

Mitigation. Where a defendant or prisoner whose responsibility or guilt is not in dispute proves facts tending to reduce the damages or punishment to be awarded against him, he is said to show facts in mitigation of damages, or of sentence, as the case may be. Thus the defendant in an action of seduction may prove the bad character of the woman in mitigation of damages.

Mitre Court. See PRIVILEGED PLACES.

Mitter le droit; Mitter l'estate. See RELEASE.

Mittimus (="we send") was a writ used in sending a record or its tenor from one Court to another. Thus where nul tiel record was pleaded in one Court to the record of another Court of equal or superior jurisdiction, the tenor of the record was brought into Chancery by a certiorari (q.v.), and thence sent by mittimus into the Court where the action was. The necessity for the writ ceased in certain cases by force of the Crown Debts Act, 1801, ss. 5, 6; in others, by force of the statute 5 Geo. 4, c. 3; and in all the remaining cases by force of s. 76 of the Judicature Act, 1873. The effect of these enactments was to make an exemplification (q.v.) available in every case in which a mittimus had previously been required. See TESTE.

Mixed. "Mixed personalty" is the same as "impure personalty." (See PERSONALTY; CHARITY; ABATEMENT OF LEGACIES). As to what is meant by a BLENDED FUND, see that title; as to mixed questions of law and fact, see FACT; and as to mixed actions, see ACTIONS.

Mixed Arbitral Tribunal. A temporary tribunal, consisting of three members, which was established under Part VI. of the Treaty of Peace Order, 1919, made 19th August, 1919 (1919—No. 1517), pursuant to the Treaty of Peace Act, 1919: that Act relates to the Treaty of Versailles. The tribunal sits at Winchester House, London, to deal, under the economic clauses of the Treaty, with questions of international indebtedness.

Mobilia sequuntur personam. (Moveables follow the person.) Thus the law of a man's domicile governs the descent of his personal property and his testamentary dispositions thereof.

Mock Auction. See AUCTION.

Moderata misericordia, De. See AMERCIAMENT.

Modius terræ vel agri. This appears to have meant ten thousand square feet of land in pre-Conquest charters.

Modo et forma. In the ancient system of pleading it was the rule to deny that the thing alleged in the pleading of the other side had been done modo et forma (in the manner and form) alleged. This put the opposite party upon strict proof of every averment. Exceptions to the rule were the replications de injuria (q.v.) and non est factum (q.v.), in neither of which was the expression modo et forma used.

Modus, or Modus decimandi, was where there existed by custom a particular manner of tithing, that is, of paying tithes, different from the general rule. This was sometimes a pecuniary compensation, such as twopence an acre for the tithe of land; sometimes it was a compensation in work and labour, as that the parson shall have only the twelfth cock of hay, and not the tenth, in consideration of the owner's making it for him, or the like. Moduses are within the Tithe Commutation Acts, and have been commuted in all cases. See TITHES; DE NON DECIMANDO; COMPOSITION; RANK.

Modus calumpniandi essoniarum. (The Manner of Challenging Essoins.) An enactment printed under these titles in the Statutes of the Realm (Vol. I., p 217), amongst Statutes of Uncertain Date, and in the Statutes at Large as 12 Edw. 2, st. 2.

Modus et conventio vincunt legem (2 Rep. 73; Co. Litt. 19). (Custom and agreement overrule law.) An agreement may be made, if the parties to a contract so desire, which will overrule the law, but this does not apply to cases in which "contracting out" is prohibited by statute, or to cases in which their agreement would derogate from the rights of the public or is against public policy. See PACTA, ETC.; PERPETUA, ETC.; PRIVATORUM, ETC.

Modus faciendi homagium et fidelitatem. (The Manner of doing Homage and Fealty.) An enactment printed under these titles in the Statutes of the Realm (Vol. I., p. 227), s. v. Statutes of Uncertain Date: printed in the Statutes at Large as 17 Edw. 2, st. 2.

Modus legem dat donationi (Co. Litt. 19; Plow. Com. 251). (Agreement gives law to the gift.) That is to say, the agreement for the transfer of land settles the conditions upon which the land is to be held. But this rule, which dates from the time of Fleta, now has limitations: see MODUS ET CONVENTIO, ETC.

Modus levandi fines. (The Manner of Levying of Fines.) An enactment printed under these titles in the Statutes of the Realm (Vol. I., p. 213), s. v. Statutes of Uncertain Date, and in the Statutes at Large as 18 Edw. 1, st. 4. See CONGÉ D'ACCORDER.

Moiety is used in the old books in its proper sense of "half." "If," says Littleton, "a joynt estate be made of land to a husband and wife, and to a third person, in this case the husband and wife have in law in their right but the moity, and the third person shall have as much as the husband and wife, viz. the other moity. And the cause is, for that the husband and wife are but one person in law," and the rule laid down by Littleton still holds good, the Married Women's Property Acts notwithstanding. The word is, however, frequently used to signify any fractional part —such as a third, fourth, etc.

Molestation. Molesting a person by following him in a persistent or disorderly manner, or by hiding his property, or by besetting his place of work or residence, with the view of compelling him to do, or abstain from doing, an act, is forbidden by s. 7 of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, repealing the statute 34 & 35 Vict. c. 32. The term "molest" was used in the earlier Act, but is omitted from that of 1875. (See COMBINATION; INTIMIDATION; TRADE UNIONS).

In separation deeds between husband and wife there are generally mutual covenants against molestation. In such a case molestation implies not merely annoyance but an intention to annoy; and proceedings taken bona fide for the purpose of obtaining a divorce are not molestation.

Molitura. The toll paid to a lord by those grinding at his mill. Molitura libera meant freedom from the toll: the privilege of free grinding was generally possessed only by members of the lord's family. Compare FARINAGIUM.

Moll Flanders' Act. The popular title of the Disorderly Houses Act, 1751.

Molliter manus imposuit was the compendious name for the defence set up to an action for battery, where the defendant alleges that the battery complained of was lawful, and that "he laid hands on the plaintiff gently"; that is, used no more force than was necessary: as where a churchwarden turns a man out of church to prevent him from disturbing the congregation.

Molman. The same as gavelman (q.v.).

Molmutian Laws. An apocryphal code of laws attributed to a mythical Dunwallo Molmutius, the so-called sixteenth King of the Britons, alleged to have flourished about 400 B.C. No one knows who concocted them: Gildas, a British historian of the sixth century, translated them into Latin. See Usher, Primord. 123.

Money. See EARMARK; GOODS.

Money-bill. "A money bill means a bill which in the opinion of the Speaker of the House of Commons contains only provisions dealing with all or any of the following subjects, namely, the imposition, repeal, remission, alteration, or regulation of taxation; the imposition, for the payment of debt or other financial purposes, of charges on the Consolidated Fund, or on money provided by Parliament, or the variation or repeal of any such charges; supply; the appropriation, receipt, custody, issue or audit of accounts of public money; the raising or guarantee of any loan or the repayment thereof; or subordinate matters incidental to those subjects or any of them. . . ." (Parliament Act, 1911, s. 1 (2)). Taxation, public moneys, and loans by local authorities for local purposes are not within the definition (ib.). This is the first and only statutory definition of the expression "money-bill," although the expression had been well understood for centuries much in the sense of the definition. For hundreds of years it had been settled that money-bills could originate only in the House of Commons: in the seventeenth century the Commons claimed that the Lords could reject but not alter a money-bill, and this claim came in course of time to be admitted by the Lords: then the Commons claimed that the Lords could not reject such a bill: finally, when the Finance Bill of 1909 was rejected by the Lords, the Parliament Act, 1911, was passed by the Commons and was forced through the Lords. The effect of that Act is that any bill certified by the Speaker to be a money-bill within the meaning of the definition must be presented for the Royal Assent at the end of the session in which it passes the Commons, whether it is or is not passed by the Lords.

Money Counts. See COUNT; ASSUMPSIT.

Money had and received; Money paid. See CONTRACT; QUASI-CONTRACT.

Moneylenders. For the purposes of the Moneylenders Acts, 1900 and 1911, a moneylender means any "person whose business is that of money-lending or who advertises or announces himself or holds himself out in any way as carrying on that business; but does not include" pawnbrokers, friendly societies, bodies authorised by law to lend money, bankers, or bodies exempted by the Board of Trade (Moneylenders Act, 1900, s. 6).

The Act of 1900 provides that every moneylender must be registered and carry on business in one name only and only at his registered address or addresses; that he cannot send circulars to infants (q.v.); and that the Courts may re-open transactions between him and his clients. The Act of 1911 protects bona fide holders without notice of securities taken by moneylenders: see also BANK.

Money Lent. (See ASSUMPSIT.) The expression is of course still used in pleadings, as where a plaintiff claims "for money lent by the plaintiff to the defendant."

Money lent for gaming (q.v.) or for an illegal or immoral consideration (q.v.) cannot be recovered at law.

Money Paid. See ASSUMPSIT; GAMING.

Money Received. See ASSUMPSIT.

Monition. In Admiralty practice, a monition was a formal order of the Court commanding something to be done by the person to whom it was directed, and who was called the person monished. Thus, when money was decreed to be paid, a monition might be obtained commanding its payment. A monition was granted either on motion or on application in chambers, and, if not obeyed, might be enforced by attachment (q.v.). A monition also meant the process, analogous to a writ of summons, by which a cause for the condemnation of a ship as prize was formerly commenced. Monitions in either of these senses are now unknown: in admiralty, the judge has the same powers of injunction, etc., as in other divisions: and every cause in prize is commenced by writ of summons.

In ecclesiastical appeals to the Privy Council (and formerly also in admiralty appeals), as soon as the petition of appeal is lodged, a "monition for process" issues, calling upon the judge and officers of the Court below to transmit the proceedings in the cause to the registry of the Court of Appeal (Rules of 11th December, 1865, r. 4; S. R. & O. Rev. 1904, VI., Privy Council, p. 98). See PROCESS.

Monitions in divorce practice are now disused, orders having taken their place.

In ecclesiastical procedure, a monition is an order monishing or warning the party complained against to do or not to do a certain act "under pain of the law and contempt thereof." Thus, there may be a monition for personal answers (see ANSWER), for payment of costs, requiring a clergyman to reside, etc. A monition may also be appended to a sentence inflicting a punishment for a past offence: in that case the monition forbids the repetition of the offence.

See ADMONITION.

Monitory Letters. Letters from an ecclesiastical authority with regard to scandals and abuses within the cognisance of the ecclesiastical Courts. They are not, however, a recognised part of the procedure of such Courts.

Monmouthshire. This is part of Wales for the purposes of the Ministry of Health Act, 1919: see s. 11 (3). In the Census (Great Britain) Act, 1910, it is not expressly declared to be part of Wales for the purposes of that Act, but (see s. 4 (1) (e)) it is dealt with much as if it were. For the purposes of the Welsh Church Act, 1914 (which disestablished the Church in Wales), it is part of Wales: see s. 1. The Welsh Intermediate Education Act, 1889, deals with it as if it were part of Wales. The Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries Act, 1919 (see AGRICULTURE AND FISHERIES, ETC.), provides, by s. 6, that for the purposes of that Act it shall be in Wales and not in England. For the purposes of National Health Insurance it is in Wales (see INSURANCE COMMISSIONERS). But, apart from these enactments, Monmouthshire is in England and not in Wales. The Small Holdings Colonies Act, 1916, s. 1 (3), makes it part of England for the purposes of that section.

Monopoly is a licence or privilege allowed by the Sovereign for the sole buying and selling, making, working, or using of anything whatsoever. Monopolies were made illegal by the statute 21 Jac. 1, c. 3 (popularly known as the Statute of Monopolies), except in the case of patents for new inventions and a few other instances. (See PATENT). Ancient franchises existing either by grant or by prescription, such as the tolls of a bridge, ferry, or market, are not within the statute.

Monster, in the technical sense, is a child "which hath not the shape of mankind." It cannot inherit or purchase land; and, therefore, the birth of a monster does not entitle a husband to curtesy. All this is the learning of Coke. But Coke spoke in contemplation of the possibility of there being something which was not of human shape and which resembled an animal rather than a man, although one at least of the parents was a human being. Such a creature is now known to be an impossibility.

Monstrans de droit was a remedy which a subject had when the Crown was in possession of property belonging to him, and title of the Crown appeared from facts set forth upon record. In such a case the claimant might present a monstrans de droit ("manifestation of right"), either showing that upon the facts as recorded he was entitled to the property, or setting forth new facts showing that he was entitled. Thus if A. disseised B. of land and then died without heirs, whereupon the land was adjudged to the Crown by inquest of office (q.v.), here the Crown's title appeared upon record, and B.'s remedy was therefore by monstrans de droit, setting forth his disseisin by A. This remedy is now, however, practically superseded by Petition of Right (q.v.). See OUSTERLEMAIN; TRAVERSE.

Monstrans de faits (or Records). Producing the deeds or records. After the plaintiff in an action on, for instance, a bond, had delivered his declaration (q.v.) he was bound under the old common law practice to exhibit his bond. See PROFERT.

Monstraverunt. A writ which anciently lay for tenants in ancient demesne when required to perform services to which they were not liable.

Montague Close. See PRIVILEGED PLACES.

Montesquieu. Charles de Sécondat, Baron de la Brède et de Montesquieu, was born 1st January, 1689, and died 10th February, 1755. He wrote L'Esprit des Lois, and various historical and other works.

Months are either lunar, consisting of twenty-eight days, and of which thirteen make a year: or calendar, which are of unequal lengths according to the almanac or common calendar, and of which twelve make a year. By the common law, a "month" means in matters temporal a lunar month, and in matters ecclesiastical a calendar month; but in Acts of Parliament passed after 1850 "month" means calendar month, unless a contrary intention appears (Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 3). As regards the Rules of the Supreme Court, a month means a calendar month (R.S.C., Ord. 54, r. 1), and the same is the case as regards bills of exchange (Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 14 (4)), and as regards commercial transactions within the custom of the City of London. But in commercial contracts generally, as well as in legal documents, such as wills, deeds, etc., "month" means a lunar month unless there be evidence that a calendar month was meant.

Monumenta quæ nos recorda vocamus sunt veritatis et vetustatis vestigia (Co. Litt. 118). (The written documents which we call records are the footprints of truth and antiquity.) Coke is here speaking of the dignity of Courts of record.

Moot. See GEMOTE.

Moots are exercises in pleading, and in arguing doubtful cases and questions, by the students of an Inn of Court (q.v.) before the benchers of the Inn. They were, like bolts (q.v.), also held in the Inns of Chancery up to the time when these institutions ceased to perform educational functions.

Mop. See STATUTE FAIR; MARKETS AND FAIRS.

Mora debitoris non debet esse creditori damnosa (Pothier). (Delay on the part of one under a duty ought not to be injurious to him to whom the duty is owing.) This is a qualification of the principle embodied in the maxim Damnum sentit, etc. Thus, where there is delay in giving or taking delivery of goods sold, then the goods, as from the date of the commencement of the delay, are at the risk of the party in default as regards any loss which might not have been incurred but for the default.

Moral Consideration. See CONSIDERATION.

Moral Imbecile. The Mental Deficiency Act, 1913, s. 1, defines moral imbeciles as "persons who from an early age display some permanent mental defect coupled with strong vicious or criminal propensities on which punishment has little or no permanent effect." See MENTAL DEFICIENCY.

Moratur in lege. (He tarries in the law.) It meant "he demurs"; for in a demurrer the party demurring did not go on with his case but elected to stand or fall by the judgment of the Court upon the point raised on demurrer (q.v.).

"More or less." These words, in the expression "be the same more or less," were formerly generally used in a contract for the sale of land to cover any slight inaccuracy in the area as stated. The conveyance would run, "containing ten acres statute measure be the same more or less." They would, however, cover only a very slight deficiency in the area: what precisely they cover has never been accurately laid down; and for any considerable deficiency the purchaser would be entitled to an abatement of the agreed price. The more general form now is "ten acres or thereabouts," which may be still more briefly put as "about ten acres."

Morganatic Marriage. A marriage between two persons of unequal rank which is valid and indissoluble, but in which the spouse of lower rank does not assume the rank of the other and of which the children do not inherit the dignity nor, as of right, the possessions of the spouse of higher rank. Such a marriage is unknown to English law, but is recognised by the laws of various foreign States. Such marriages have not infrequently been contracted by royal personages, most of whom have been men: they have sometimes occurred in the case of ladies of royal rank who have married subjects.

Morgangina. A gift which, in Anglo-Saxon times, was made by a bridegroom to the bride the day after the wedding: see Leg. Hen. 1, c. 70; Leg. Canut. c. 99.

Morphine. See DRUGS, DANGEROUS.

Mors dicitur ultimum supplicium (3 Inst. 212). (Death is denominated the extreme penalty), because, as Coke explains, the law is satisfied by the execution of judgment of death and has the body buried instead of leaving it on the gallows. Coke had not anticipated hanging in chains.

Mors omnia solvit (Jenk. Cent. 160). (Death clears all scores). But not always: see ACTIO PERSONALIS, ETC.

Mort d'ancestor. See ASSISE OF MORT D'ANCESTOR.

Mortgage. A mortgage is where one person (the mortgagor) secures to another (the mortgagee) the payment of money (whether already owing, or advanced at the time, or to be advanced subsequently), by vesting in him some property or interest in property, subject to the mortgagor's right to redeem or buy it back by paying the money within a certain time, while the mortgagee has the right, after the lapse of a certain time, of enforcing his security, or making it available in obtaining payment of the money advanced. The sum secured by the mortgage is called the mortgage debt, although there is not necessarily any personal liability on the part of the mortgagor (as, for instance, in the case of a mortgage by trustees for raising portions). The term "mortgage debt" is also used to signify the security of the mortgagee, that is, his interest in the property mortgaged, and his other rights and remedies for obtaining satisfaction of the debt.

In a contributory mortgage there are two or more persons who advance the mortgage money in separate amounts. Such mortgages are, however, unsatisfactory and are therefore not usual.

The term "mortgage" is most commonly used as applied to land or other realty and leaseholds, but personalty may also be mortgaged, although the transaction is not generally called a mortgage, except in the case of ships and choses in action (e.g., policies of assurance, copyrights, etc.). A mortgage of chattels in possession, such as furniture, is called a bill of sale (q.v.). A mortgage of stock in the funds, or of a public company, etc., may be made. Such a mortgage must be distinguished from what is technically called a stock mortgage, which is where A has sold a sum of stock (e.g., Consols), and advanced the proceeds to B, who covenants to replace the stock (that is, to purchase and transfer to A a like amount of stock) at a future time, and executes a mortgage of land or other property to A as security for the covenant. The object of such a mortgage generally is that the mortgagee may obtain a higher rate of interest than that paid on the stock, and that he may be protected from the risk of the stock rising in price before the mortgage debt is repaid.

Mortgages are of three kinds, legal, equitable, and statutory.

I. A legal mortgage (so called because it was formerly the only one recognised at common law) is where A conveys property to B by deed, as a security for the repayment of money. If the property mortgaged consists of the fee simple of land, the deed contains a conveyance in the ordinary form. If the mortgagor is the owner of the fee simple, and grants a term of years as the mortgage security (formerly a common mode of mortgaging land), it is called a mortgage by demise. If the owner of a term or lease wishes to mortgage it, he may do so either by an assignment or by underlease. If the terms of the lease are onerous, the mortgagee generally prefers the latter mode, as he thus escapes liability to the original lessor. A legal mortgage may take one of five forms:—

(1) The old form was a conveyance, with a condition that it should be void on payment of the debt on a fixed day. In such a case the mortgagee had at common law an estate upon condition, and was called "tenant in mortgage." The condition was sometimes called a defeasance (q.v.) When the time for payment expired, the estate of the mortgagee became absolute at law, but remained redeemable in equity, whence the mortgagor was said to have an equity of redemption (q.v.). This form of mortgage has long been obsolete in all cases except mortgages of copyholds (see SURRENDER); and as the rules of equity now prevail, it seems that a conditional conveyance by way of mortgage cannot become absolute until foreclosure.

(2) At the present day, a mortgage is, in ordinary cases, effected by an absolute conveyance, followed by a proviso or agreement (express or implied), called the proviso for redemption, by which the mortgagee agrees to reconvey the property to the mortgagor on payment of the debt and interest by a certain date. Formerly, if the money was not paid on the day, the mortgage became irredeemable at common law, but the mortgagor had an equity of redemption until foreclosure or sale. The common law rule no longer exists. Incident to both these kinds of mortgage is the right of foreclosure, a right which entitles the mortgagee to compel the mortgagor either to pay off the debt within a reasonable time, or to lose his equity of redemption. (See FORECLOSURE.) In addition to the rights thus created by operation of law, a legal mortgage generally contained, down to the 31st December, 1881, elaborate stipulations and provisions, mainly in the interest of the mortgagee. The principal of these are the power of sale, which enables the mortgagee to take possession of and sell the property, if default is made in payment of the principal or interest beyond a certain period, and the various powers of leasing and managing the property, and appointing a receiver, which are necessary for the proper management of a landed estate. They are now generally omitted. The Conveyancing Act, 1881, unless a contrary intention is expressed in the deed, gives the mortgagee and any person deriving title under him (i) a power of leasing (s. 18); (ii) a power to sell the mortgaged property, as soon as the money has become due (s. 19); (iii) a power to insure the property against fire, and to add the premiums to the mortgage debt, unless an insurance is kept up by the mortgagor (ib.); (iv) a power to appoint a receiver as soon as the money has become due (ib.; see RECEIVER.) The power to sell or appoint a receiver is not exerciseable unless the mortgagor has failed for three months to comply with a notice requiring him to pay off the mortgage debt, or unless interest is in arrear for two months, or there has been a breach of covenant, etc. (ib. ss. 20, 21); but these restrictions do not affect the title of a purchaser buying under the power of sale (ib. s. 21). The Conveyancing Act, 1911, s. 3, extended the power of a mortgagee under s. 18 of the Act of 1881, as regards leases; by s. 4, it extended his power of sale under s. 19 of the Act of 1881; and by s. 5 it amended s. 21 of the Act of 1881. As to the other powers of a mortgagee, see MORTGAGEE IN POSSESSION; PAYMENT INTO COURT: see also REDEEM. Section 25 of the Act of 1881 gives to the Court very wide powers of directing the sale of mortgaged property in any action brought respecting a mortgage, whether for redemption, foreclosure or otherwise.

(3) A mortgage may also take the form of a conveyance by the borrower to the lender (or his nominee), upon trust to sell it, and, after satisfying the debt and expenses, etc., to pay the surplus proceeds (if any) to the mortgagor. Such a mortgage does not give the right of foreclosure, but in all other respects it seems to be similar to an ordinary mortgage; and hence, if the mortgagee remains in possession for more than twelve years, without giving a written acknowledgment of the mortgagor's title, the mortgagor's right to redeem is gone (Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, s. 1).

(4) A Welsh mortgage is said to be a mortgage under which the mortgagee is let into possession of the mortgaged land until the rents and profits repay the principal and interest, the property being redeemable at any time on payment of the amount remaining due. But this is sometimes described as "a mortgage in the nature of a Welsh mortgage,"—a genuine Welsh mortgage being defined as the conveyance of an estate redeemable at any time on payment of the debt, without payment of interest by the borrower, or account of the rents and profits by the lender, who is let into possession from the beginning, and takes the rents in lieu of interest. A Welsh mortgage does not admit of foreclosure, as the mortgagee does not stipulate for redemption. Such a mortgage is now very unusual.

(5) A sub-mortgage is a mortgage by a mortgagee of his mortgage debt with a transfer of the mortgage security; the original mortgagee is then called sub-mortgagor in respect of the sub-mortgage. A further charge is an agreement that a subsisting mortgage shall be a security for a further advance by the mortgagee. A further security is a mortgage of some additional property, or a grant of additional remedies to secure a subsisting mortgage debt.

II. An equitable mortgage is one which passes only an equitable estate or interest, either (1) because the form of transfer or conveyance used is an equitable one, that is, operates only as between the parties to it, and those who have notice of it, or (2) because the mortgagor's estate or interest is equitable, that is, consists merely of the right to obtain a conveyance of the legal estate. Of the former class, the principal kinds are (a) an agreement to execute a legal mortgage; (b) a deposit of title deeds, share certificates, land certificates, or other documents of title, either with or without a memorandum of deposit, that is, a statement in writing that the documents are deposited by way of security. An equitable mortgage of the second class occurs in the case of a mortgage of an equity of redemption; thus, if A mortgages his estate to B, and then mortgages it again to C, though in terms professing to convey the legal estate, C has an equitable mortgage, because it is in effect only a charge on A's equity of redemption.

III. A statutory mortgage is one which, by virtue of the provisions of a statute, produces almost the same effect as an ordinary mortgage, without operating as a transfer or conveyance of the property. Thus, a mortgage of land registered under the Land Transfer Act, 1875, ss. 22-28, is effected by an "instrument of charge" executed by the mortgagor and entered on the register. So a "mortgage" of a ship under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 31, does not operate as a conveyance, but merely gives the mortgagee a charge with (s. 34) a power of sale.

A statutory mortgage of freehold or leasehold land, operating by conveyance, may be made under the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 26. The Act also provides for the transfer and reconveyance of a statutory mortgage (ss. 27-29).

See CHARGE; CONSOLIDATION OF SECURITIES; EQUITY OF REDEMPTION; PAWN; PLEDGE; RECEIVER; RECONVEYANCE; TACKING.

The word mortgage is a compound of the Norman-French, mort, dead, and gage, a pledge, from low Latin, vadium, which in its turn comes from either Latin, vas, vadis, a surety, or Germanic, wetti, ved, a bond, or from a combination of the two. Notwithstanding the authority of Littleton, who says that a mortgage (or vadium mortuum) is so called because if the feoffor does not pay on the appointed day the land is dead to him, and if he does pay then it is dead to the feoffee, it seems quite clear that "mortgage" originally denoted a pledge of land under which the creditor took the rents and profits for himself, so that it was dead or profitless to the debtor, as opposed to a pledge under which the rents and profits went in reduction of the debt (vif gage, vadium vivum). For another instance of mort in the sense of profitless see MORTMAIN.

"Mortgagee, As." See COVENANTS.

Mortgagor and Mortgagee in Possession. A mortgagor in possession is in the same position as an ordinary landowner, except that he must not prejudice the security by committing waste. He is entitled to collect rents under leases granted before the mortgage, until the mortgagee gives the tenants notice of the mortgage; and, under s. 25 of the Judicature Act, 1873, he may bring actions in his own name in respect of the possession or rents of the land. A limited power of leasing is sometimes given to the mortgagor by the mortgage.

A mortgagee in possession is bound to account to the mortgagor for the rents and profits which he has received, or ought with proper management to have received, and is liable for waste.

By the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 18, as extended by the Conveyancing Act, 1911, s. 3, a mortgagor or mortgagee of land, while in possession, has a power of making binding leases of the mortgaged land, subject to certain limitations and restrictions as to the length of the term, the rent, etc. By s. 19 (1) (iv.) of the same Act, a mortgagee in possession of land has power to cut and sell timber and other trees ripe for cutting, not being used for shelter or ornament. These provisions apply only so far as a contrary intention is not expressed by the parties (s. 19 (1)). See MORTGAGE.

Morth; Morthlaga. Anglo-Saxon for murder and murderer respectively.

Mortmain. The term mortmain is applied to two classes of statutes.

I. The statutes prohibiting alienation in mortmain, in the strict sense of the word, that is, alienation of land to corporations, are Magna Charta, the statute De Viris Religiosis (7 Edw. 1), the Statute of Westminster II. (13 Edw. 1, c. 32), and the statute 15 Rich. 2. These statutes prohibited not only direct grants of land to corporations, whether sole or aggregate, but also several contrivances by which the religious houses (against which the statutes were especially directed) attempted to elude their provisions. (See USE.) Their effect was, that if land was granted to a corporation without a licence from the Crown, and from the feudal lords of whom it was mediately or immediately holden, then within a certain time the immediate lord might enter on or take possession of the land, which thus became forfeited to him; or, if he failed to do so, each lord paramount had the right to enter in his turn, and in default of all of them the Crown. In modern times, however, the rights of intermediate lords became unimportant, and by the statute 7 & 8 Will. 3, c. 37, it was enacted that the Crown for the future might grant licences to alien or take land in mortmain, of whomsoever it might be holden. The Act of William III. was repealed by s. 13 of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888, and was in substance re-enacted by Pt. I. (ss. 1-3), of the latter Act. Many corporations are exempt under various statutes from the operation of the Statutes of Mortmain: such are the universities and colleges of Oxford and Cambridge, associations formed under the Companies Acts, the Building Societies, Friendly Societies, and Industrial and Provident Societies Acts, etc. Any unincorporated charity may, with the consent of the Charity Commissioners, hold and invest money in land (Charitable Trusts Act, 1855, s. 35; Charitable Funds Investment Act, 1870, s. 1).

II. In the popular use of the word, the Mortmain Act is the Act of 9 Geo. 2, c. 36 (more accurately called the Charitable Uses Act, 1735), which prohibited gifts of land or of money to be laid out in the purchase of land for any charitable purposes, except by absolute and immediate conveyance by deed, executed twelve months before the death of the donor, and enrolled with certain formalities, the object being to prevent improvident alienations or dispositions of land by languishing or dying persons to the disherison of their lawful heirs. Therefore, all gifts by will of land and of money arising out of or connected with land, for charitable purposes, were void under that Act. The Act was passed to supplement the provisions of the Statutes of Mortmain (supra), and of the Act against superstitious uses (q.v.); because, although charities are not generally corporations, yet gifts to them are practically in perpetuity, and are therefore contrary to the policy of the law, which favours free dealing in land.

The Act of 1735 was repealed in 1888, except as regards the section mentioned under CHARITABLE USES ACTS, after having had some of its more stringent provisions modified by various Acts passed before 1888, and is now replaced by Part II. of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888, which (s. 4 (7) (8) (9)) provides, with regard to gifts inter vivos for charitable uses (q.v.), that a voluntary assurance, except of public funds, must be made twelve months before the death of the donor, a voluntary assurance of public funds must be made six months before his death, and all voluntary assurances, whether of realty or of personalty, except assurances of public funds, must be enrolled at the Central Office (q.v.) within six months of execution, and will otherwise (s. 4 (1)) be void. Up to this point no gift of lands for charitable uses could be made by will. But the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891, effected a complete change in the law by enacting (s. 5) that "land may be assured by will to or for the benefit of any charitable use, but, except as hereinafter provided, such land shall, notwithstanding anything in the will contained to the contrary, be sold within one year from the death of the testator, or such extended period as may be determined by the High Court, or any judge thereof sitting in chambers, or by the Charity Commissioners" (q.v.). Section 8 (as to which see the Board of Education Act, 1899, and Orders made thereunder) provides for the retention of the land where it is required for the use of the charity and not as an investment.

The Act of 1891 for the first time excluded from the definition of land (q.v.) "money secured on lands or other personal estate arising from or connected with land."

The word mortmain is derived from the Norman French, morte meyn; low Latin, mortua manus, a dead hand, because, says Coke, "the lands were said to come to dead hands as to the lords, for that by alienation in mortmaine they lost wholly their escheats, and in effect their knights-services for the defence of the realme; wards, marriages, reliefes, and the like; and therefore was called a dead hand, for that a dead hand yeeldeth no service." (Co. Litt. 2B.)

See ABATEMENT OF LEGACIES.

Mortuaries. In the modern sense of the word, a mortuary is a place for the reception of dead bodies before interment. Under the Public Health Act, 1875, ss. 141, 142, every local sanitary authority is empowered to provide a mortuary, and to cause dead bodies to be removed to it in cases where their retention in dwelling-houses might be prejudicial to the health of the inmates.

In Church law, mortuaries are a sort of ecclesiastical heriots, being a customary gift claimed by and due to the minister in very many parishes on the death of one of his parishioners. The nature of the gift formerly varied according to the custom of the place, being frequently the next best chattel of the deceased, after the lord's heriot. But by the statute 21 Hen. 8, c. 6, mortuaries were fixed at certain sums, in no case exceeding 10*s*., and are not payable at all unless they were legally payable in 1529.

In the Welsh dioceses of Bangor, Llandaff, St. David's and St. Asaph's, the statute 21 Hen. 8, c. 6, s. 7, legalised the taking of mortuaries by the bishop on the death of any of the diocesan clergy. The statute 13 Ann. c. 6, s. 1, after reciting that these mortuaries often amounted to "a very considerable part" of the estate of the deceased, wholly abolished this right. See CORSEPRESENT.

Mortuum vadium. A mortgage.

Mote. See GEMOTE.

Moteer. A customary payment at the court of the lord: some persons were exempted by charter.

Motion. A motion is an application to a Court or a judge. Some motions are made without reference to any pending action, as where (under r. 217 of the Crown Office Rules, 1906) application is made for a writ of habeas corpus (q.v.). Other motions are employed to obtain a judgment on the main question in an action (see MOTION FOR JUDGMENT); but these are not motions in the sense in which the word is commonly used, namely, to denote an interlocutory application in an action. As a general rule, a motion is an oral application made by counsel in open Court, as opposed to a petition, which is a written application, and to a summons, which is made in chambers, unless it be an originating summons. See SUMMONS.

Ordinarily a motion is to be made only after notice has been given to the parties affected (Ord. 52, r. 3); but where before the passing of the Judicature Act, 1873, any order or rule might have been made absolute ex parte in the first instance, or where an order (q.v.) may still be made to show cause, or where the Court or a judge thinks it necessary that an order should be made at once, then the motion may be moved ex parte, and any party affected by an order applied for ex parte may move to set it aside (ib.). As to motions on the Crown side to a Divisional Court, see RULE.

Applications for an injunction or for a receiver under s. 25 (8) of the Judicature Act, 1873, may be made ex parte (Ord. 50, r. 6); so also may motions of course.

A motion of course is a motion which is granted by the Court as a matter of course: for an instance, see FORECLOSURE.

In Chancery practice, if counsel is unable to make a motion on the day for which notice has been given, he is entitled, as a matter of right, "to save the motion," that is, to adjourn it to the next motion day by mentioning it to the Court, without the consent of the other side; but in cases where the motion was listed by special leave he can do this only with the consent of the other side or with the leave of the Court.

If counsel does not either bring on or save his motion on the day for which notice has been given (provided of course he has had an oportunity of being heard), the motion is said to be abandoned, and the other side is entitled to his costs of it.

As to motions by way of appeal, see APPEAL.

Motion for Decree. Under the practice of the old Court of Chancery the most usual mode of bringing on a suit for hearing when the defendant had answered was by motion for decree. To do this the plaintiff served on the defendant a month's notice of his intention to move for a decree. (See DECREE; FURTHER CONSIDERATION.) Now, of course, the plaintiff merely replies and gives notice of trial in his reply (Ord. 36, r. 11) or subsequently (ib. r. 14).

Motion for Directions. Formerly, in divorce and probate practice, after the pleadings had been concluded, it was necessary to make a motion to obtain the directions of the Court as to the manner in which the questions of fact raised by the pleadings were to be tried. This practice has long been abolished, and a cause at issue is now set down for trial in accordance with a general order of the Court. The motion for directions was quite distinct from the summons for directions. See DIRECTIONS.

Motion for Judgment is the mode of obtaining the judgment of the High Court in an action in all cases where no other mode of obtaining it is prescribed (Ord. 40, r. 1). At the trial of an action the judge must now (Ord. 36, r. 39) direct judgment to be entered as he thinks right, and no motion for judgment is necessary. If the defendant makes default in delivering his defence, the plaintiff must set down the action on motion for judgment, unless it is of such a nature that he may enter judgment for his claim at once (e.g., where it is for a debt, damages, recovery of land, or the like). See Ord. 27, r. 11 and preceding rules of that Order.

A motion for judgment requires to be set down in the cause list, and notice of it is given to the other side. See MOTION.

Motions for judgment are rare in the King's Bench Division. In the Chancery Division they are more frequent.

Motion for New Trial. See TRIAL.

Motion in Arrest of Judgment. See ARREST OF JUDGMENT.

Motion to Set Aside Judgment is a step taken by a party in an action in the High Court who is dissatisfied with the judgment directed to be entered at the trial of the action, on the ground either that the finding of the jury has been wrongly entered, or that the judgment itself is wrong (Ord. 40, rr. 3, 4). The motion is made to the Court of Appeal (ib. r. 5).

Motor Cars. There are two classes of locomotives in use on highways: (1) Heavy locomotives, as to which see LOCOMOTIVES; and (2) light locomotives (or motor cars), that is to say vehicles propelled by mechanical power (Locomotives on Highways Act, 1896, s. 1) not exceeding five tons of unladen or, with a trailer, six-and-a-half tons (Heavy Motor Car Order, 1904, Art. III., made pursuant to the Motor Car Act, 1903, s. 12). Anything over these weights is a heavy locomotive. Light locomotives are divided into two classes: (1) "Heavy motor cars," that is to say motor cars exceeding two tons in weight unladen (Heavy Motor Car Order, 1904, Art. II.); (2) motor cars of any less weight.

A motor cycle obviously comes within the definition of a motor car.

No light locomotive is subject to the provisions of the Locomotives Acts, 1861 and 1865 (Act of 1896, s. 1, Sch.). The enactments applying to them are the Acts of 1896 and 1903 which are mentioned in this article and the Roads Act, 1920, and the various regulations and orders made pursuant to those Acts, some of which apply only to heavy motor cars, others only to other motor cars, and some both to one class and the other.

The Motor Car (International Circulation) Act, 1909, and the Motor Car (International Circulation) Order, 1910, made thereunder, provide for the cases of foreign-owned cars visiting this country and of British-owned cars visiting foreign countries.

A customs duty on imported motor cars at the rate of thirty-three and one-third per cent. is imposed by the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1915, s. 12.

As to licences for drivers of motor cars, see the Motor Car Act, 1902, s. 3. As to licences for cars see the Roads Act, 1920, ss. 1, 5; and as to registration and identification marks see s. 6 of the same Act.

See HIGHWAYS.

Motor Spirit. For definition, see the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, s. 84 (7).

Mulier is applied in the old books to a son, daughter, brother, sister, etc., to signify one born in lawful wedlock, or legitimate, as opposed to a bastard. (Norman-French, mulieré; from Latin, mulier, a wife.) The expression was formerly of importance in what was called the case of "bastard eignè and mulier puisnè" ("eldest son a bastard and younger son legitimate"), which occurred where a man had a bastard son, and afterwards married the mother and by her had a legitimate son. If the father died and the bastard entered on his land and died seised of it, so that it descended to his issue, the mulier puisnè was barred of his right to the land. The doctrine seems to have been abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 39. See BASTARD.

Mulieres ad probationem status hominis admitti non debent (Co. Litt. 6). (Women ought not to be admitted to prove the status of a man [where the question is whether he is a villein].)

Mulierity. The status of one born in wedlock as distinguished from a bastard. See Co. Litt. 352*b*.

Multa or Multura episcopi. This is explained by Coke to have meant a fine anciently paid by bishops to the king for the privilege of being allowed to make their own wills and in order to secure the right of granting probate of other men's wills.

Multa conceduntur per obliquum, quæ non conceduntur de directo (6 Co. 47). (Many things are allowed by a side-wind which are not allowed directly.)

Multa in jure communi, contra rationem disputandi, pro communi utilitate introducta sunt (Co. Litt. 70). (For the sake of the public good many things which are logically indefensible have been made part of the common law.)

Multa multo exercitamentis facilius quam regulis percipies (4 Inst. 50). (There are many things which you will learn much more easily from practice than from rules.) Coke is here speaking of parliamentary procedure.

Multifariousness. Under the practice of the old Court of Chancery, a bill of complaint was open to a demurrer for multifariousness when it attempted to embrace too many objects or causes of suit. Under the present practice, a plaintiff may include as many causes of action as he pleases in one writ, except in the case of actions for the recovery of land, actions by trustees in bankruptcy, etc., and in the case of one action being brought for several claims which cannot be conveniently disposed of together (Ord. 17, rr. 1, 2, 3). (See JOINDER.) But a claim for possession of the land in question may be made in an action for foreclosure or redemption (Ord. 17, r. 2).

Multiplicata transgressione, crescat pœnæ inflictio (2 Inst. 479). (Where wrongdoing is multiplied the infliction of punishment increases also—which seems to mean that habitual offenders should get heavy sentences.)

Multiplication. The "multiplication" of gold and silver was made felony by the statute 5 Hen. 4, c. 3. This "multiplication" was the imaginary or pretended manufacture of gold or silver out of other metals. See PHILOSOPHERS' STONE.

Multiply. When a thing is divided into several parts, and something which was dependent on or annexed to it thenceforward becomes dependent on or annexed to each part of it, the accessory is said to be multiplied. Thus, if a copyhold tenement for which a heriot is due to the lord on the death of each successive tenant, is divided into parcels and conveyed to different persons, the heriot will be multiplied, i.e., a heriot will be due for each parcel.

Multitudinem decem faciunt (Co. Litt. 257). (Ten make a multitude.) So at least "some have said," remarks Coke, who is considering what precisely is meant by the word "multitude" where it was said that one "occupied the tenements . . . with a multitude of people." Coke himself says that the question is one for "the discretion of the judges"—which is obviously the correct view.

Multitudo errantium non parit errori patrocinium (11 Rep. 75). (The fact that many persons have made any given mistake does not tend to show that it is right.)

Multitudo imperatorum perdit curiam (2 Inst. 219) (A multitude of masters destroys a court.) Quoted by Coke as a comment on the provisions against extortion by officers of the Court which are contained in the Statute of Westminster I., c. 30. It is not an authority for the proposition that cases are better heard by a single stipendiary magistrate than by a multiplicity of justices.

Multo. A sheep. Multones auri (literally, "golden sheep"), mentioned in a patent of Edward I., were French gold coins which sometimes circulated in England.

Multure. The same as molitura (q.v.).

Municipal Corporation is a corporation consisting of all or part of the inhabitants of a town, and having the power and duty of enforcing the good rule and government of the place, including the lighting, cleansing, paving and improving of the streets, the prevention of nuisances, etc. Municipal corporations, except that of the City of London, are regulated by the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, which provides for the election in each borough of a mayor, aldermen and council: for the appointment of a watch committee to regulate the police of the borough, and for the payment of the expenses of the borough out of the borough fund and rate. Municipal corporations are also the authorities for carrying out the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875, and similar acts, in their respective districts.

Corporations regulated by the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, are trustees of the corporate property for the benefit of their respective boroughs.

See BOROUGH; JUSTICE OF THE PEACE; LONDON; METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS; RECORDER; WARDS.

Municipal Law. See LAW.

Muniments. Title deeds and other documents relating to the title to land are sometimes called muniments, from the Latin word munio, which signifies to defend or fortify, because they enable the owner to defend his estate.

Munitions of War. Patents for improvements in instruments or munitions of war may be assigned to the Secretary of State for War or the Admiralty, and this may be done in such manner as to ensure secrecy (Patents and Designs Act, 1907, s. 30).

See CONTRABAND OF WAR; FOREIGN ENLISTMENT.

Murage. Mentioned in the statute 3 Edw. 1, c. 30, as having been granted by the Crown to certain citizens and burgesses "por lor vile enclose" (for the enclosing of their town). It was a toll, or the right to levy a toll, for the erection or maintenance of town walls, upon persons passing through the town.

Murder is the crime of unlawful homicide with malice aforethought (see HOMICIDE; MALICE; MANSLAUGHTER); as where death is caused by an unlawful act done with the intention to cause death or bodily harm, or which is commonly known to be likely to cause death or bodily harm. Thus, if A finds B asleep on some straw and lights the straw, whether he means to kill B, or whether he means to do B serious injury without killing him, in either case if B is burnt to death, A is guilty of murder. So if A unlawfully shoots at B, intending to kill him, and kills C instead, A is guilty of murder.

Murder is punishable by death (q.v.); attempts to murder are punishable by penal servitude for life (Offences against the Person Act, 1861, ss. 1, 11, 14, 15).

A person who kills himself in a manner which, in the case of another person, would amount to murder, is guilty of self-murder or suicide (q.v.); and see FELO DE SE.

Murdrum. Anciently this meant a homicide in respect of which the murder fine was payable.

See ENGLECERY.

Muscovy Company. A company, also known as the Russia Company, which originated in the reign of Edward VI., and which in 1555 received a charter authorising discovery and colonization as well as granting the monopoly of the Russia trade. It had a quasi-official position in Russia, and until, upon the execution of Charles I., it lost the favour of the Czar, it was predominant amongst the foreign traders there. Until recently it levied—with the consent of the Russian Government—certain duties upon exports from Russia to England, and out of the proceeds paid the English consuls in Russia and defrayed the expenses of the Anglican chapels at Petrograd and Moscow. It has ceased to trade, and now exists only as the owner of certain funds.

Music. The enactments mentioned under dancing (q.v.) apply also to public music, public singing, or the like.

See COPYRIGHT; STREET MUSIC.

Muster-Master General. An officer who kept lists of the forces of the Crown. He is mentioned in the statute 35 Eliz. c. 4, and in 1802 there was still a "Commissary and Muster-Master General."

Mute. A prisoner is said to stand mute when, being arraigned for treason, felony, or misdemeanour, he either makes no answer at all, or answers foreign to the purpose, or with such matter as is not allowable, and will not answer otherwise. In the first case, a jury must be sworn to try whether the prisoner stands mute of malice (i.e., obstinately) or by visitation of God (e.g., being deaf or dumb). If he is found mute by visitation of God, the trial proceeds as if he had pleaded not guilty; if he is found mute of malice, or if he will not answer directly to the indictment, the Court may, under the Criminal Law Act, 1827, s. 2, and as a matter of course always does, order a plea of not guilty to be entered, and the trial proceeds accordingly. See PEINE FORTE ET DURE.

Mutilation. See MAYHEM.

Mutiny Act. The Bill of Rights (1 W. & M. sess. 2, c. 2), declares that the raising or keeping a standing army within the kingdom in time of peace, unless it be with consent of Parliament, is against law. Therefore, to enable the Army to be kept up, an Act of Parliament is annually passed authorising this to be done. Formerly this annual Act contained elaborate provisions for the enlistment, payment and billeting of soldiers, for the punishment of mutiny and desertion, and generally for the government of the Army, and was hence called the Mutiny Act; but these provisions were consolidated in the Army Discipline and Regulation Act, 1879; and, therefore, in the annual Act it was sufficient to provide that the Army Discipline and Regulation Act, 1879, should remain in force for one year. The Act of 1879 was supplemented and amended by various Acts, especially the Regulation of the Forces Act, 1881, and was itself replaced in 1881 by the Army Act. The last-mentioned Act is annually re-enacted, frequently with amendments, by the Army Annual Act, which also fixes the number of men to be maintained in the Army during the current year. The Army Annual Act for the time being in force is now the authority for the existence of the Army, and since 1879 there has been no Mutiny Act.

Mutual Credits; Mutual Dealings. The phrase "mutual credits" used in the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, denotes such dealings between two persons as must in their nature terminate, or have a tendency to terminate, in debts. The Act provides by s. 31 that where there have been mutual credits, mutual debts, or other mutual dealings between the bankrupt and one of his creditors, an account shall be taken of what is due from the one party to the other in respect of such mutual dealings and the sum due from the one party shall be set off against any sum due from the other party, and the balance of such account, and no more, shall be claimed or paid on either side respectively. The effect produced by the mutual credit clause is, therefore, a species of set-off (q.v.), but differs from the ordinary set-off between solvent persons in having for its object, not to prevent cross actions, but to avoid the injustice, which would otherwise arise, of compelling a creditor to pay the trustee in bankruptcy the full amount of the debt due from him to the bankrupt, while the creditor would perhaps only receive a small dividend under the bankruptcy on the debt due from the bankrupt to him.

Mutuality. In every agreement the parties must, as regards the principal or essential part of the transaction, intend the same thing; that is, each must know what the other is to do: this is called mutuality of assent.

In a simple contract arising from agreement, it is sometimes the essence of the transaction that each party should be bound to do something under it: this requirement is called mutuality; thus, an agreement by A to refer a question between him and B to arbitration is not enforceable, unless B also agrees to be bound by the award; and an agreement by

C with D to learn a trade is not binding unless there is also an undertaking by D to teach him. This may be called mutuality of obligation.

Mutuality of remedy is where each party can enforce the contract against the other; thus, a vendor of land can enforce specific performance of the contract by the purchaser, because the purchaser could have done the same to him; on the other hand, mutuality of remedy does not exist where one of the parties to a contract is under disability, or where it is required by the Statute of Frauds to be in writing, and he has not signed it, because, though he can enforce it, the other party cannot.

Mutual Promises. See CONSIDERATION; PROMISE.

Mutual Wills. See WILLS.

Mutuatus. "If a man oweth another person £10 and hath a note for the same, without seal, action of Debt lies upon a mutuatus; but in this there may be Wager of Law, which there may not be in Action on the Case, on an implied promise of payment," says an old writer, cited in Jacob. As to wager of law, see COMPURGATION.

N

Nail. An ancient measure, sometimes of weight, in which case it was usually eight pounds and was used with regard to cheese, beef, etc., and sometimes of length, in which latter case it was two-and-a-half inches and was used for cloth.

Nam; Naam; Namium. Anciently these words meant the taking or distraining of another man's goods. The term, in its Latinized form, is found in the laws of Canute; and in the Anglo-French form of naam it is found in Britton (1290) and in the Termes de la Ley (1641). Naam vif meant a distress of cattle; naam mort was a distress of other chattels.

Namium vetitum was the proceeding which lay where distress had been unlawfully concealed or carried out of the country; and namium repetitum was a second distress.

Namation. A later form of nam (q.v.).

Name. See CHRISTIAN NAME; SURNAME; REGISTRATION OF BUSINESS NAMES.

Name and Arms Clause is the popular name for the clause, sometimes inserted in a will or settlement by which property is given to a person, for the purpose of imposing on him the condition that he shall assume the surname and arms of the testator or settlor, with a direction that if he neglects to assume or discontinues the use of them, the estate shall devolve on the next person in remainder.

Narrator. Anciently a pleader or reporter. A serviens narrator meant in the time of Fleta a serjeant-at-law.

Narrow-land. The same as selion (q.v.).

National Assembly of the Church of England. This "means the Assembly constituted in accordance with the constitution set forth in the Appendix to the Addresses presented to His Majesty by the Convocations of Canterbury and York on the 10th day of May, 1919, and laid before Parliament" (Church of England Assembly (Powers) Act, 1919 (9 & 10 Geo. 5, c. 76), s. 1 (1)). This assembly is known as the Church Assembly (ib). The constitution above referred to provides that the Assembly shall consist of the House of Bishops, the House of Clergy and the House of Laity; that the House of Bishops is to consist of the members of the Upper Houses of the two Convocations (q.v.); that the House of Clergy is to consist of the members of the two Lower Houses; that the House of Laity shall consist of representatives of the two Provinces (q.v.) elected in manner set forth in the schedule annexed to the constitution; that the Assembly shall meet at least once a year; that there shall be a Legislative Committee, consisting of members of all the three Houses, to whom all "measures" which it is desired shall become law shall be referred, and who shall thereupon take such action as may be authorised by statute in order that such "measures" may become law.

The Act provides that there is to be constituted at the commencement of each Parliament a committee of both Houses styled "the Ecclesiastical Committee," consisting of fifteen peers nominated by the Lord Chancellor and fifteen members of the House of Commons nominated by the Speaker (s. 2); that every "measure" relating to the Church of England which is passed by the Church Assembly shall be submitted by the Legislative Committee to the Ecclesiastical Committee, who are to report thereon to Parliament (s. 3); and that upon each House of Parliament resolving that such "measure" be presented to His Majesty it shall have the force of an Act of Parliament upon the Royal Assent being signified as in the case of Acts of Parliament (s. 4).

National Debt. See FUND.

National Insurance. A system of compulsory State insurance for loss occasioned by ill-health and, in certain cases, for loss occasioned by unemployment, was introduced by the National Insurance Act, 1911, which provided that the moneys constituting the necessary insurance premiums should be provided in part by employed persons, in part by employers, and, as to the balance, out of public funds. The Act consisted of Part I. (ss. 1-83), relating to National Health Insurance; Part II. (ss. 84-107), relating to Unemployment Insurance; and Part III. (ss. 108-115), containing miscellaneous provisions.

The Act of 1911, in so far as it relates to National Health Insurance, remains the basis of the present law on that subject; it and seven subsequent Acts by which it has been amended and extended are collectively entitled the National Health Insurance Acts, 1911 to 1921 (National Health Insurance Act, 1921, s. 5 (1)).

The Act of 1911, in so far as it related to unemployment, was amended first by the National Insurance (Part II. Amendment) Act, 1914, and then by other Acts relating specifically to unemployment as distinguished from ill-health: all these enactments were (National Insurance (Unemployment) Act, 1919, s. 4 (1)) collectively entitled the National Insurance Acts, 1911 to 1919. The whole of the Acts bearing this collective title were repealed by s. 48 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920; and the last-mentioned Act now forms the basis of the existing law. But the process of amendment began again at once. The Act of 1920 was amended by the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1921; the Acts of 1920 and 1921 were both amended by the Unemployment Insurance (No. 2) Act, 1921; and further amendments have been made by the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1922, and the Unemployment Insurance (No. 2) Act, 1922.

A Legislative jungle such as that above-mentioned cannot be thoroughly explored in a work of this kind. But it may be said generally (I.) as to health insurance: Practically everyone, whether male or female, over the age of sixteen and under seventy, who is regularly employed under a contract of service within the United Kingdom must be insured, unless the employment is (1) otherwise than by way of manual labour and (2) at a rate (National Health Insurance Act, 1919, s. 1) exceeding £250, or is in the Civil Service, or with some statutory company which makes proper provision for its employees during sickness, etc.; the weekly contributions are (National Health Insurance Act, 1920, Sched. I.), normally at the rate of 10d. for a man and 9d. for a woman, out of which the employer pays 5d. in the case of a man and 5d. in that of a woman; but (ib.) special provisions apply to wages at rates not exceeding 4s. a day; and for these contributions the insured person gets (1) medical benefit, that is to say medical attendance, medicines, etc.; (2) sickness benefit, that is to say, an allowance during illness at the rate (National Health Insurance Act, 1920, s. 2) of 15s. per week for a man and 12s. 6d. per week for a woman during not more than twenty-six weeks, provided that twenty-six weekly contributions have been paid (National Insurance Act, 1911, s. 8); (3) disablement benefit, at the rate (National Health Insurance Act, 1920, s. 2 (1)) of 7s. 6d. per week, after sickness benefit has ceased, during any period of inability to work as the result of sickness, provided that 104 contributions have been paid (National Insurance Act, 1911, s. 8); (4) maternity benefit of 40s. (National Health Insurance Act, 1920, s. 2 (2)) for a woman on her confinement, if she or her husband have paid a sufficient number of contributions. And (II.) as to unemployment insurance: Under the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920, ss. 1-4, practically everyone—over sixteen and under seventy—who is engaged in any employment involving manual labour, other than agriculture or private domestic service, or who is employed otherwise than by way of manual labour, at a rate not exceeding £250 a year, must (Unemployment Assurance Act, 1922, s. 2, Sched. I.) pay, at present, a weekly contribution of 9d. for a man, 7d. for a woman, 4½d. for a boy under eighteen, and 4d. for a girl under eighteen, while in each case the employer has to add 10d. to the man's contribution, 8d. to the woman's, 5d. to the boy's and 4½d. to the girl's, and the State also supplement these contributions; unemployment benefit is paid, subject to certain conditions, at the weekly rate of 20s. for a man and 16s. for a woman (Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920, Sched. II., as amended by the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1921, s. 1), during not more than twenty-six weeks (Unemployment Insurance Act, 1921, s. 4), in any one year. But the rates of unemployment benefit and of the contributions to secure it and the rules as to the periods during which it may be paid have been for some years, and apparently still are, in a constant state of flux: and nothing except a reference to the various Acts, as altered and varied by subsequent Acts, is at any given time a reliable guide to the law bearing on the matter; text-books are inevitably out of date. At the present moment (January, 1923), there are in force various ephemeral provisions applicable to the abnormal amount of unemployment now existing: these cannot be set out here.

Nationality is that quality or character which arises from the fact of a person's belonging to a nation or State. Nationality determines the political status of the individual, especially with reference to allegiance (q.v.), while domicile determines his civil status. Nationality arises either by birth or by naturalization (q.v.) See BRITISH SUBJECT.

National Trust. The statutory short title given by the National Trust Act, 1907 (7 Edw. 7, c. cxxxvi.), s. 2, to the "National Trust for Places of Historic Interest" formed pursuant to that Act for the purpose of preserving, and with statutory powers to preserve, such places as are specified in the schedules to the Act. Their powers extend to the maintenance of such places for public resort and public recreation.

Nativi de stipite; Nativi de conventione. A nativus, or native, anciently meant a bondman or villein. In Cornwall at the time of Henry I. nativi de stipite were bondmen by birth, while nativi de conventione were bondmen by contract. See NEIFE; CONFESSION.

Nativo habendo, De. This was anciently a writ in the nature of a writ of right, which lay for a lord whose villein had absconded. It required the sheriff to apprehend the villein and restore him to the lord, and upon it the question was tried as to whether the alleged villein was a free man or the villein of the lord. See LIBERTATE PROBANDA, DE.

Natura Brevium. This was the Natura Brevium of the reign of Edward III.—a compilation giving the original writs then in use. After Fitzherbert (q.v.) had brought out his new Natura Brevium the earlier list was known as the Old Natura Brevium.

Naturæ vis maxima (Noy. Max. 26). (The force of nature is very great.) Quoted as a comment upon the Articuli Super Cartas, c. 11, which sanctioned as between relations what is between others would have been chamberty (q.v.).

Natural-born Subject. See ALLEGIANCE; BRITISH SUBJECT; NATIONALITY; NATURALIZATION.

Naturale est quidlibet dissolvi eo modo quo ligatur (Jenk. Cent. 70). (It is natural for a thing to be unbound in the same way in which it was bound.) "An obligation is not made void but by a release; . . . a record by a record; a deed by a deed; and a parol promise or agreement is dissolved by parol, and an Act of Parliament by an Act of Parliament." (ib.)

See EODEM LIGAMINE, ETC.; NIHIL TAM CONVENIENS, ETC.; LEX ANGLIÆ SINE, ETC.

Naturalization takes place when a person becomes the subject of a State to which he was before an alien. The effect of naturalization is that the naturalized subject thereby acquires all political and other rights, powers and privileges, and becomes subject to all obligations to which natural-born members of the State are entitled and subject, except that he cannot divest himself of his obligations towards the State of which he was formerly a subject, without the consent of that State. See EXPATRIATION.

Down to the enactment of the Naturalization Act, 1844—the popular title of the statute 7 & 8 Vict. c. 66—an alien could become a British subject only by force of a special Act of Parliament. Under the Act of 1844 (and subsequently under the Naturalization Act, 1870, which repealed and replaced the earlier Act) an alien could become a British subject upon receiving from a Secretary of State a certificate of naturalization; and since 1844 naturalization by special Act has occurred in only a few cases.

The Act of 1870 was in its turn repealed by the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914, which, as amended by the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1918, now governs naturalization. The sections bearing on it are ss. 2-9 of the Act of 1914; and the amendments of those sections which are made by the Act of 1918 are contained in s. 2 of the latter Act. The general rule is that a certificate of naturalization can be granted only to any applicant who (a) during the preceding eight years has for five years resided in His Majesty's dominions or been in His Majesty's service, (b) is of good character and knows English adequately and (c) intends to reside in His Majesty's dominions or to enter and continue in his service (Act of 1914, s. 2; Act of 1918, s. 2).

The main alterations made in the pre-existing law by the Acts of 1914 and 1918 are:—Naturalization makes an alien a British subject not merely quoad the United Kingdom but quoad the King's dominions generally; a certificate of naturalization, instead of being irrevocable, may be revoked in the state of facts mentioned in the Act of 1918, s. 1; a certificate of naturalization may be granted, not only by the Secretary of State, but also by the Governments of Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and, with the approval of the Secretary, by the Government of any other British possession; and the revocation of a certificate is to be effected by the like authorities (Act of 1914, s. 8; Act of 1918, s. 2).

A procedure—analogous to but not precisely naturalization—under which a married woman can remain or become a British subject although her husband becomes or, in certain cases is, an alien is provided by s. 10 of the Act of 1914 as amended by s. 2 of the Act of 1918.

The term "naturalization" is also sometimes applied to that operation of law by which the children and, down to 1st January, 1915, the grand-children born abroad of English natural-born subjects are themselves natural-born subjects "to all intents, constructions and purposes." See ALLEGIANCE; BRITISH SUBJECT; DENIZEN; NATIONALITY.

Natural Persons. Human beings, as distinguished from artificial persons or corporations recognised by the law.

Natural Rights are those rights which supplement the direct rights of ownership (q.v.), by imposing duties on other persons. Thus every owner of land has primâ facie the right to prevent his neighbours from polluting the air passing over his land, and from disturbing, diminishing or polluting the water flowing through his land; he is also entitled to so much support from his neighbour's land as is necessary to keep his own land at its natural level. These are called natural rights, as opposed to acquired rights, such as easements, profits à prendre, franchises, etc. See the various titles: also ACCESS; AIR; NAVIGATION; SUPPORT; WATER.

Natura non facit saltum; ita nec lex (Co. Litt. 238). (Nature takes no leap; neither does law.) Coke is pointing out that various preliminary steps to a writ of entry sur disseisin must be taken.

Natura non facit vacuum, nec lex supervacuum (Co. Litt. 79). (Nature does nothing useless and the law does nothing superfluous.)

Naval Courts are held abroad in certain cases to inquire into complaints by the master or officers or seamen of a British ship, or as to the wreck or abandonment of a British ship, or when it is required in the interests of the owners of the ship or cargo (Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 480). A Naval Court consists of three, four or five members, being officers in His Majesty's Navy, consular officers, masters of British merchant ships or British merchants (s. 481). It has power to supersede the master of the ship with reference to which the inquiry is held, to discharge any of the seamen, to decide questions as to wages, and send home offenders for trial or try certain offences in a summary manner (s. 483). See the King's Regulations (for the Navy) 706. A naval court is quite distinct from a naval court-martial.

Naval Testament. A nuncupative or other informal will made, pursuant to s. 11 of the Wills Act, 1837, by a sailor at sea, whether he be in the service of the Crown or in the merchant service. See WILLS.

The right of the "lower deck" to make such wills has been much restricted by the Navy and Marines (Wills) Act, 1865, as amended by the Navy and Marines (Wills) Act, 1897, and the Navy and Marines (Wills) Act, 1914. These Acts (Act of 1865, s. 2) apply to members of His Majesty's Naval or Marine Forces, exclusive of commissioned, warrant, and subordinate (but not petty) officers, assistant engineers, and Kroomen. Kroomen are Liberian negroes.

Navigable; Navigation. The right of navigation is the right of the public to use an arm of the sea, a river, or other piece of water, as a highway for shipping, boating, etc., including the right to anchor in it. It is a right of way and not a right of property, and therefore the owner of the bed of a river over which the public have by user acquired a right of navigation may erect any structure on it which does not interfere with the navigation warranted by that user (see HIGHWAY). In the case, however, of estuaries and navigable tidal rivers, the beds of which are primâ facie vested in the Crown, the ownership of the soil is wholly subject to the public right of navigation, and no part of it can be used so as to derogate from or interfere with that right. A river which is subject to a right of navigation is said to be "navigable."

As to navigation on the sea, see HIGH SEAS.

The question whether a river is navigable or not seems to depend partly on its size and the formation of its bed, and partly on the use to which it has been put; if a river will admit ships and it has been used for shipping purposes by the public, it is a navigable river, whether it be tidal or non-tidal, and whether it flow through or over private land or land belonging to the Crown. As a rule, however, an arm of the sea or a tidal river with a broad and deep channel is deemed navigable.

Where the public have acquired the right of navigation on a private or non-tidal river, the original exclusive right of the riparian owners to fish in it is not thereby affected. (See FISHERY).

Obstructing the navigation of a navigable water is a public nuisance. (See NUISANCE).

Navigation Acts were various statutes (especially 12 Car. 2, c. 18) passed for the encouragement and protection of British shipping by excluding foreign ships from trading with British colonies and even with Great Britain. They have now been wholly repealed.

Navy. See ARTICLES OF WAR.

The Naval Discipline (Dominion Naval Forces) Act, 1911, provides for the application, with modifications, of the Naval Discipline Act, 1886 (see ARTICLES OF WAR), as amended, to the naval forces raised by Canada, Australia, New Zealand, or Newfoundland.

Navy Agency. See SHIP'S AGENT.

Navy Bills. These were bills of exchange which certain officers of the Navy were authorised to draw for their pay, etc., or which various naval authorities were authorised to draw in payment for stores, etc. No such bills are now in use. The Acts authorising them were repealed by the Admiralty, etc., Acts Repeal Act, 1865.

Ne admittas. While the old writ of quare impedit (q.v.) was available, a plaintiff who had sued out that writ could then sue out another writ, known as the writ of ne admittas, prohibiting the bishop from admitting, pending the decision of the case, the clerk whom the defendant had presented.

Ne baila pas. (He did not bail.) In detinue, this meant a plea by the defendant that the chattels in question had not been delivered to him by the plaintiff.

Necessaries. Notwithstanding the general rule that an infant is incapable of binding himself by a contract, he may make a contract for necessaries: and the word necessaries is not confined in its strict sense to such articles as are necessary to the support of life, but extends to articles fit to maintain the particular person in the state, degree, and station of life in which he is. See INFANT. The same doctrine applies to lunatics.

As a general rule, every wife has an implied authority to contract with tradesmen for necessaries suitable to the degree and estate of her husband, so as to make him liable to the tradesmen, unless he has sufficiently supplied her with articles of the kind in question, or unless she has a separate income. If the husband and wife are living together, this authority is implied, in the case of ordinary household necessaries, from the usual practice of persons in the particular class of life, according to which a wife has the management of such matters: if, therefore, the husband wishes to put an end to this authority, he must give notice to the tradesmen that it is withdrawn. But this principle does not apply to such things as dresses, jewellery, etc.; and, therefore, the husband need not give notice to the tradesmen that his wife has no authority to pledge his credit for such things, unless, by his previous conduct (as by habitually allowing his wife to purchase such things on credit and by paying for them), he has given her an implied authority to do so. Where, however, the husband turns the wife out of doors, or so conducts himself that she is obliged to leave him, he is under a legal duty to maintain her; and if he does not do so, she has power to provide for herself at his expense by pledging his credit for necessaries, such as food, apparel, lodging, etc. And as this authority is conferred on her by the law, and not by the husband, he cannot revoke or destroy it.

In the case of ships, the term "necessaries" means such things as are fit and proper for the service in which the ship is engaged, and such as the owner, being a prudent man, would have ordered if present; e.g., anchors, rigging, repairs, victuals. The master may hypothecate the ship for necessaries supplied abroad so as to bind the owner.

In the criminal law, wilful neglect to provide necessaries for children or apprentices is a common law misdemeanour, and it is also an offence, as regards apprentices, under s. 6 of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, and, as regards children not over the age of sixteen, under the Children Act, 1908, s. 12 (1); while under s. 3 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, anyone who can maintain his family but fails so to do is punishable summarily as an idle and disorderly person. See VAGRANCY.

Necessitas est lex temporis et loci (Hale P.C. 54). (Necessity is the law when and where it exists.) But Hale quotes this maxim only to dissent. He says: "If a person being under necessity for want of victuals or clothes shall upon that account clandestinely and animo furandi steal another man's goods, it is felony." This is clearly sound law, though Bacon (Max. 5) says otherwise. And so where starving sailors in an open boat kill and eat one of their number, they are in law always guilty of murder. Where a man is a free agent, necessity is never a justification for the doing of a criminal act, although it may justify the doing of an act which is merely a civil wrong.

Necessitas inducit privilegium quoad jura privata (Bac. Max. 25). (Necessity gives a privilege as to private rights.) Thus it is lawful for a shipmaster to jettison another man's goods in order to save the ship.

Necessitas non habet legem (Plowd. 18). (Necessity has no law.) This is true only as regards the doing of acts which are not criminal. See NECESSITAS EST.

Necessitas publica major est quam privata (Bac. Max. Reg. 5; Noy Max. 34). (Public necessity is greater than private.) "The law imposeth it on every subject that he prefer the urgent service of his Prince and country before the safety of his life." (Bac. Max. Reg. 5).

Neck Verse. The words Miserere mei Deus, with which the fifty-first Psalm begins. When a prisoner claimed benefit of clergy (q.v.) a paper on which these words were printed in black letter was handed to him. If he could either read them, or recite them as if he were able to read them, he was held to be able to read and to be entitled to benefit of clergy.

Nec tempus nec locus occurrit regi (Jenk. Cent. 190). (Neither time nor place affects the King.) In a decision that no grant of rights of criminal jurisdiction by the King could preclude him from prosecuting any pleas of the Crown in any place within the realm, this maxim is quoted only quoad the words nec locus. See NULLUM TEMPUS, ETC.

Nec veniam, effuso sanguine, casus habet (3 Inst. 57). (Where blood is spilled the case is unpardonable.) This is quoted only as fortifying the proposition that the unlawful throwing of a missile into a crowded street so that someone is killed constitutes murder though there was no intention to kill.

Ne disturba pas. In the old action of quare impedit, if the bishop and the clerk who had been presented pleaded ne disturba pas, the proceedings determined as against them. Now the bishop and the clerk usually disclaim title and leave the alleged owner of the advowson to fight the action.

The plea ne disturba pas in the old action of quare impedit was the general issue appropriate to that action. See ISSUE.

Ne dona pas or Non dedit. The form of general issue (see ISSUE) used in formedon (q.v.).

Ne exeat regno is a writ which issues from the High Court of Justice (in the Chancery Division) to restrain a person from going out of the kingdom without the King's licence or the leave of the Court. It is a high prerogative writ, which was originally applicable to purposes of State only, but was afterwards extended and confined to private transactions. It is or may be employed when a person, against whom another has an equitable claim for a sum of money actually due, is about to leave the country for the purpose of evading payment, and the absence of the defendant would materially prejudice the plaintiff in the prosecution of his action; but it would appear to be confined now to persons coming within s. 6 of the Debtors Act (q.v.).

Negatio conclusionis est error in lege (Wing 268). (The negation of a conclusion is error in law.) It is the premises upon which the conclusion is based that ought to be traversed.

Negatio destruit negationem, et ambo faciunt affirmativum (Co. Litt. 146). (A negative destroys a negative, and both make an affirmative.) Yet where the law ("that principally respecteth substance") considers that a negative was in fact intended, it will hold that there is really a negative, for mala grammatica non vitiat cartam" (q.v.).

Negative Pregnant, in pleading, is where a person gives an evasive answer to an allegation of his opponent by answering it literally, without answering the substance of it. Thus, if it is alleged that A received a certain sum of money, and he denies that particular amount, this is a negative pregnant, because the substance of the allegation is the receipt of some money, and not the particular amount received. A should, therefore, answer either that he did not receive any money at all, or state how much he received. Similarly, when something is alleged to have happened under certain circumstances, it is not sufficient to deny that it happened under those particular circumstances; but the party must state whether it happened at all. See Ord. 19, rr. 17-19.

Negilldare. To claim kindred: see Leg. Hen. 1, c. 70; Leg. Inæ. ss. 7, 8.

Negligence is want of proper care, and may consist in doing something which ought not to be done, or in not doing something which ought to be done. The legal effect of negligence is either civil or criminal.

I. In the civil law, negligence may operate either to create or to defeat a right of action.

(1) Negligence which creates a right of action is a species of tort or injury giving rise to a right to damages, and may exist either (a) where the parties are strangers, or (b) where they stand in a special relation to one another. (a) To the first class belong those cases where one person by want of care in the use of his own property, or in the pursuit of his own private advantage or pleasure, causes injury to someone else; thus, a person who keeps his buildings in a bad state of repair, is liable for any injury caused thereby to a person having a right to be in or near them. So where a man's land is subject to an easement for the support of the buildings on his neighbour's land, and he excavates his land, so that the buildings are injured, he is liable to an action, no matter how carefully he may have done it; hence this kind of negligence (meaning the invasion of a jus in rem) is sometimes called negligence in law, to distinguish it from negligence in fact. (b) To the latter class belong those cases in which a person by entering into a contract with another puts himself under an obligation to exhibit a certain degree of care, and fails to do so, whether the obligation is created by the contract itself, or is imposed by law. It is with reference to these cases that the division of negligence into slight, ordinary, and gross, becomes important: thus, the general rule in the law of bailments (q.v.) is that when a bailment is made for the sole benefit of the bailee, he is liable for slight negligence; when it is made for the benefit of both, he is liable for ordinary negligence; and when it is made for the sole benefit of the bailor, the bailee is liable only for gross negligence. Slight negligence is the want of that care which a reasonable man, guided by those considerations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs, would presumably have exercised under the circumstances of the particular case, and ordinary negligence is the want of a greater degree of care. The term gross negligence is chiefly used to mean, not that the person accused of it has used less care than a reasonable man would have used, but that he has used less care than he himself would presumably have used if he had been acting in his own affairs, so that what would be gross negligence in a prudent man may not be so in a reckless one. Thus, if a man for his own convenience places goods for safe keeping without reward with a man who "is an idle, careless, drunken fellow, and comes home drunk, and leaves all his doors open, and by reason thereof the goods happen to be stolen and his own, yet," says Chief Justice Holt, "he [the bailee] shall not be charged, because it is the bailor's own folly to trust such an idle fellow." It is, however, also used to signify the want of that skill and care which persons exercising certain employments are bound to exhibit, even when they act gratuitously, as in the case of physicians, solicitors, etc.; it is, therefore, ordinary negligence committed by a gratitous agent or bailee; the term "gross" seems to have been applied to these cases in order not to disturb the symmetry of the rule that a gratuitous agent is only liable for gross negligence.

(2) Negligence operating to defeat a right of action is either (a) negligence amounting to estoppel (as to which see ESTOPPEL), or (b) contributory negligence, which occurs where the injury complained of has been caused partly by the negligence of the plaintiff and partly by that of the defendant: thus, if A and B are both driving negligently, and their carriages come into collision, so that A is injured, he cannot sue B if his own negligence contributed to the accident, that is, if he could by ordinary care have avoided the consequence of the other's negligence.

II. As to the effect of negligence in criminal law, see HOMICIDE.

Negligentia semper habet infortuniam comitem (Co. Litt. 246). (Negligence always has misfortune for a companion.)

Negotiable.—I. An instrument is said to be negotiable when any person who has acquired it in good faith and for value can enforce the contract or right of property of which it is evidence against the person originally liable on it, although the person from whom he acquired it may have had a defective title or none at all. In the first of these respects, negotiable instruments were always an exception to the rule that choses in actions are not assignable (a rule which can now be hardly said to exist); and, in the latter respect, they are an exception to the rule which denies to the transferee of property a title superior to that of the person from whom he receives it. Moreover, the benefit of the contract or other right is attached to the possession of the document, which, according to ordinary rules, would be only evidence of the right. Negotiable instruments are, therefore, altogether anomalous institutions. They exist primarily for the convenience of commerce.

Negotiability is either absolute or qualified.

When an instrument is transferable so as to give the transferee all the rights originally created by it without affecting him with any equities between prior holders, its negotiability is said to be absolute; an ordinary bill of exchange, promissory note or cheque is an instance. Thus, if A, being indebted to B, gives B a promissory note on the condition that it is to be regarded as a security only, and is not to be negotiated before a certain time, B may nevertheless transfer it to C for value; and if C has no notice of the arrangement between A and B, he may enforce payment of it against A. So if B steals a bill and transfers it to C for value, and without notice of the theft, C may enforce it against the parties liable on it, although B had in fact no title to transfer. When an instrument is transferable only to certain persons, or in a certain manner, or so as to make the transferee take it subject to equities affecting it in the hands of prior holders, while preserving the other incidents of negotiability, its negotiability is said to be qualified or restrained. Thus, in the first instance given above, if the promissory note were transferred after its due date, the transferee would take subject to the arrangement between A and B. See EQUITY; CHEQUE.

II. "Negotiable" is also used in a wide sense to denote an instrument transferable from one person to another by indorsement or delivery, but wanting in the essential of giving the transferee a good title notwithstanding any defect of title in his transferor. This quality is also called quasi-negotiability, to distinguish it from negotiability in the true sense. See DEBENTURE; EXCHEQUER BILLS; SCRIP.

Negotiate. To negotiate a bill of exchange, promissory note, cheque or other negotiable instrument for the payment of money is to transfer it for value by delivery or indorsement.

Negotiorum gestio. This, in the Roman law, meant the interference of one in the affairs of another merely from benevolence and without authority. In English law a man so interfering (1) has no claim on the other in respect of what he may do—"Liabilities," said Lord Bowen, "are not to be forced upon people behind their backs"; (2) is liable for the wages of anyone whom he may employ; (3) must have the skill and knowledge necessary for whatever he takes it on himself to do.

Neife is the technical name for a female villein. Originally, however, the word signified a villein of either sex, and "nayfté" meant the status of a villein. It is derived from the Latin nativus, there having been apparently at one time a distinction between villeins by birth and freemen who had become villeins, e.g., by confession in a Court of Record. See CONFESSION: see also NATIVI DE STIPITE.

Neifty, Writ of. In the days of villeinage this writ lay for a lord who claimed a woman for his neife.

Ne injuste vexeris. A writ founded on Magna Charta, c. 10, which lay for a tenant distrained by his lord for more services than he ought to render. Jacob gives the form of writ used about 1749. It was one of the many writs abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 35.

Nem. con.; Nem. dis. Anything unanimously agreed to in the House of Commons is recorded as having been agreed to nem. con, that is to say, nemine contradicente (no one saying otherwise). In a like case in the House of Lords the term used is nem. dis., that is to say, nemine dissentiente (without anyone dissenting).

Neminem oportet esse sapientiorem legibus (Co. Litt. 97). (No man ought to be wiser than the laws.) That is to say, no man ought to set himself up as being "wiser than the law which is the perfection of reason, . . . because by many successions of ages it hath been fined and refined by an infinite number of grave and learned men." The law is, of course, the common law.

Nemo admittendus est inhabilitare seipsum (Jenk. Cent. 40). (Nobody is to be permitted to incapacitate himself.) Quoted in connection with a decision that a man could not plead that his own deed had been executed while he was non compos mentis.

Nemo agit in seipsum (Jenk. Cent. 40). (No one takes proceedings against himself.) Thus an executor or administrator does not in his private capacity sue himself in his representative capacity for any debt which may have been due to him in his private capacity by the deceased; he simply exercises his right of retainer (q.v.). See IDEM AGENS, ETC.

Nemo aliquam partem recte intelligere potest antequam totum iterum atque iterum perlegit (3 Rep. 59). (No one can properly understand a part until he has read the whole again and again.) "The function of a good expositor of an Act of Parliament is to make construction on all the parts together and not of one part only by itself" (ib.).

Nemo cogitur rem suam vendere, etiam justo pretio (4 Inst. 275). (No one is compelled to sell his property, even for the full value.) Compare ID QUOD NOSTRUM, ETC.

Nemo contra factum suum proprium venire potest (2 Inst. 66). (No one can come against his own deed.) This is the well-known doctrine that no grantor can derogate from his own grant.

Nemo dat qui non habet (Quoted in this form by Willes, J., at 14 C. B. N. S. 257; given in a slightly different form at Jenk. Cent. 250). (No one gives who possesses not.) That is to say, the general rule is that no man can give another any better title than he himself has. This is the rule both as to realty, except where the Settled Land Acts or other enactments apply, and as to chattels, except (1) where the true owner is estopped by his conduct from denying the purported title of the vendor, (2) where under the Factors Act there is statutory authority for an apparent owner to sell, (3) where the sale is made under a statutory power, as by a pawnbroker, and (4) where the sale is in market overt.

Nemo debet bis puniri pro uno delicto (4 Rep. 43). (No one should be punished twice for one fault.) This is an invariable rule of our criminal law. And so a decision of a competent Court upon any given set of facts—so that the plea of autrefois convict or the plea of autrefois acquit is available—is a bar to any subsequent prosecution. But where a man is convicted of common assault and the injured person subsequently dies, a prosecution for manslaughter is not barred, because here there is an additional fact.

Nemo debet bis vexari, si constat curiæ quod sit pro unâ et eâdem causâ (5 Rep. 61). (No man ought to be twice vexed, if it be proved to the Court that it be for one and the same cause.) That is to say, no man should be twice sued or twice prosecuted upon one and the same set of facts, if there has been a final decision of a competent Court. As to prosecutions, see also the preceding title. See also INTEREST REIPUBLICÆ UT SIT, ETC.; RES JUDICATA, ETC.

Nemo debet esse judex in propriâ causâ (12 Rep. 113). (No one should be judge in his own cause.) Compare ALIQUIS, ETC.; NEMO POTEST ESSE, ETC.

Nemo de domo suâ extrahi debet (D. 50, 17, 103). (No one can be dragged out of his own house.) This is a maxim of the civil law; it never applied to this country. As to a man's house, see DOMUS SUA, ETC.

Nemo est hæres viventis (Co. Litt. 22). (No one is the heir of anyone who is alive.) See HEIR.

Nemo ex alterius incommodo debet locupletari (Jenk. Cent. 4, 8). (No man ought to be made rich out of another's injury.)

Nemo ex dolo suo proprio relevetur, aut auxilium capiat (Jur Civ.). (No one is relieved or aided by his own fraud.) Compare NULLUS COMMODUM, ETC.

Nemo ex próprio dolo consequitur actionem. (No one obtains a cause of action by his own fraud.) Compare FRAUS ET DOLUS, ETC.

Nemo ex suo delicto meliorem suam conditionem facere potest (D. 50, 17, 134, par. 1). (No one can improve his position by his own wrongdoing.) Our law also acts on this principle; and so where the existence of a cause of action is, by the fraud of the person who creates it, concealed from the person who could take advantage of it, then the Statute of Limitations will begin to run only as from the date of the discovery of the fraud (see 9 Q. B. D., at p. 65). Compare FRAUS ET DOLUS, ETC.

Nemo militans Deo implicetur secularibus negotiis (Co Litt. 70). (No man warring for God should be associated with secular business.) Quoted in connection with the rule that one holding of the king in escuage should not himself render military service, but should send a substitute.

Nemo nascitur artifex (Co. Litt. 97). (No one is born a skilled workman.) Quoted in connection with the observation that knowledge of the common law was to be acquired only by "long study, observation, and experience."

Nemo patriam in quâ natus est exuere nec ligeantiæ debitum ejurare possit (Co. Litt. 129). (A man cannot abjure his native country, nor the allegiance he owes his Sovereign.) This is no longer the case. See ALIENAGE; NATURALIZATION.

Nemo potest contra recordum verificare per patriam (2 Inst. 380). (No man can take the verdict of a jury as to the correctness of any decision.) Quoted by Coke along with JUDICIUM SEMPER PRO, ETC.

Nemo potest esse simul actor et judex. (No one can be at once suitor and judge.) "A man cannot sue either before himself or his deputy" (per Holt C.J., at 1 Salk, 398). See NEMO DEBET ESSE, ETC; NEMO SIBI ESSE, ETC.

Nemo potest esse tenens et dominus (Gilb. Ten. 142). (No man can be tenant and lord.) Cited in connection with the rule that if an eldest brother had enfeoffed the second brother and received homage, and if the second brother had died without issue, then the land descended to the youngest brother and not to the eldest.

Nemo potest facere per alium, quod per se non potest (Jenk. 237). (No one can do through another what he cannot do himself.)

Nemo potest mutare consilium suum in alterius injuriam (D. 50, 17, 75). (No one can change his counsel to the injury of another.) This was applied by the Roman lawyers as meaning that legislation should not be retrospective.

Nemo potest plus juris ad alium transferre quam ipse habet (Co. Litt. 309). (No one can transfer a greater right to another than he himself has.) See NEMO DAT, ETC.

Nemo præsumitur alienam posteritatem suæ prætulisse (Wing. 285). (No one is presumed to have preferred another's posterity to his own.) Quoted in connection with a doctrine of the old law as to warranty of land. It has no application now.

Nemo præsumitur esse immemor suæ æternæ salutis, et maxime in articulo mortis (6 Rep. 76). (No one is presumed to be forgetful of his own eternal welfare, and more particularly in the moment of death.) Quoted, not in connection with the admissibility of dying declarations, to which it would naturally seem to apply, but as showing that fraud is not to be imputed to a testator in connection with his will.

Nemo prohibetur pluribus defensionibus uti (Co. Litt. 304). (No one is forbidden to use several defences.) This is still true. As Thesiger, L.J., says at 3 Ex. 255, a defendant "may raise . . . as many distinct and separate . . . defences as he thinks proper": but see Ord. 19, r. 27.

Nemo punitur pro alieno delicto (Wing. 336). (No one is punished for the fault of another.) Quoted in connection only with the doing of civil wrongs.

Nemo punitur sine injuriâ, facto, seu defaltâ (2 Inst. 287). (No one is punished unless for some injury, deed, or default.) Quoted as being to the same effect as ACTUS LEGIS NEMINI FACIT INJURIAM.

Nemo sibi esse judex vel suis jus dicere debet (C. 3, 5, 1). (No one ought to be his own judge, or to decide matters in which he is interested.) See NEMO DEBET ESSE JUDEX, ETC.

Nemo tenetur ad impossibile (Jenk. Cent. 7). (No one is required to do what is impossible.) Compare IMPOTENTIA, ETC.; LEX NON COGIT, ETC.

Nemo tenetur armare adversarium contra se (Wing. 665). (No one is bound to arm his adversary against himself.) Wingate applies the maxim to obsolete law as to replevin and the challenging of jurors.

Nemo tenetur divinare (4 Rep. 28). (No one is bound to be a prophet.) Compare EA QUAE RARO, ETC.

Nemo tenetur seipsum accusare (Wing. Max. 486). (No one is bound to incriminate himself.) That is to say, to give any evidence which in the opinion of the Court will expose him to any penalty or forfeiture reasonably likely to be sued for, or to any penalty.

Nephews and Nieces. These words mean primarily the children of a brother or sister, but will be held to include a grandnephew or grandniece or the children of the brother or sister of a husband or wife when the context of a will or other instrument so indicates.

Ne recipiatur. A notice against receiving and setting down an action for trial which the defendant might formerly enter when the action had not been entered in due time.

Ne rector prosternat arbores in cemiterio. (That the rector do not cut down trees in the churchyard.) An enactment printed under these titles in the Statutes of the Realm (vol. 1, p. 221), s.v. Statutes of Uncertain Date, and in the Statutes at Large as 35 Edw. 1, st. 2.

Ne relessa pas. (He did not release.) It was the technical name of a replication (q.v.) filed in reply to an answer (q.v.) in which the defendant alleged that the plaintiff had released.

Nether House. Used during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries as meaning the House of Commons.

Ne unques. Law-Latin for "never."

Ne unques accouplè. Formerly this was the technical name of a plea in which the fact of marriage was denied.

Ne unques executor. (Never an executor.) This was the old term for a pleading which declares that "the defendant [or plaintiff] is not and never was executor [or administrator] as alleged," or other words to the like effect.

Ne unques indebitatus. Another form of nunquam indebitatus, as to which see NIL DEBET.

Ne unques seisie que dower. Formerly this was the name of a plea by which a defendant denied that the husband of a widow was at or after her marriage seised of such an estate in lands as to entitle her to dower.

Ne unques son receiver. In an action for an account this was formerly the plea by which a defendant denied that he had ever received anything for the plaintiff.

Neutrality. See FOREIGN ENLISTMENT ACT.

Ne varietur. (Let it not be changed.) These words are sometimes written by foreign notaries and translators on copies or translations of documents furnished by them.

Never Indebted. See NUNQUAM INDEBITATUS.

New Assignment. Under the common law practice before the Judicature Acts, where the declaration in an action was ambiguous and the defendant pleaded facts which were literally an answer to it, but not to the real claim set up by the plaintiff, the plaintiff's course was to reply by way of new assignment, that is, to allege that he brought his action not for the cause supposed by the defendant, but for some other cause to which the plea had no application. Under the present practice, a plaintiff in such a case would amend his statement of claim See AMENDMENT.

New Forest. A royal forest in Hampshire which has existed as such since the time of the Conqueror. It contains about 92,000 acres, of which about 63,000 acres are strictly speaking forest; 2,000 belong to the Crown, and 27,000 acres belong to private persons. Some parts of the 27,000 acres are subject to certain forest rights of the Crown.

Newgate. The New Gate of the City of London, which was built in the reign of Henry I., was used as a prison from at any rate 1188. It was rebuilt as a prison about 1420. In 1780 it was destroyed by the Gordon rioters. In 1783 it was rebuilt; and it was used both for criminals and debtors until 1815, after which year only criminals were confined in it. In 1881 it ceased to be used as a prison except during the actual sittings of the Central Criminal Court. In 1902 it was pulled down.

New Inn. See INNS OF CHANCERY.

New Parishes Acts. These are the New Parishes Acts, 1843 to 1884. They were passed "to make better provision for the spiritual care of populous parishes." See BLANDFORD'S ACT; ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS; PEEL'S ACT.

Newspapers. The Newspaper Libel and Registration Act, 1881, provides for (s. 8) the establishment of a register of proprietors of newspapers, and for (s. 9) annual returns being made by the printers and proprietors of every newspaper, giving particulars of its title and its proprietors. The returns are entered in the register, which is open to public inspection (s. 13). A newspaper is anything within the popular meaning of that word which is published in England or Ireland at intervals not exceeding twenty-six days (s. 1).

The Law of Libel Amendment Act, 1888, s. 3, enacts that newspaper reports of proceedings in any Court are privileged unless they contain blasphemous or indecent matter. By the same Act (s. 4), any report published in a newspaper of the proceedings of a public body to whose meetings the public or reporters are admitted, or of a public meeting, is privileged (that is, not libellous), if such report was fair and accurate, and was published without malice and is not blasphemous or indecent, but this protection is not available as a defence to any proceeding, if the defendant refused to insert in his newspaper a reasonable explanation or contradiction by the plaintiff No criminal prosecution for a libel contained in a newspaper can be commenced without the leave of a judge in chambers (s. 8). Charges of libels contained in newspapers may be tried summarily (Act of 1881, ss. 4, 5).

New Year's Day. From the seventh to the twelfth century, the year began on Christmas Day; from the twelfth century as regards the church, and from the fourteenth century as regards the law, it began on the 25th March; and under the Calendar Act, 1751 (see CALENDAR), it began on 1st January. Under the Bank Holidays Act, 1871, New Year's Day is a Bank Holiday (q.v.) in Scotland, but not elsewhere.

New Zealand Company. See COMPANIES, CHARTERED.

Next Friend. An infant who desires to bring an action must, as a rule, do so through the intervention of a person called a next friend, generally a relation (Ord. 16, r. 16) Before the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, came into operation, the same rule applied where a married woman sued without her husband, and it still applies (see Ord. 16 r. 17), where an action is to be brought by a person of unsound mind who has no committee or has a committee whose interest is adverse to his own. Every next friend is responsible for the propriety of the proceedings taken in his name. (See GUARDIAN.)

A married woman cannot be either a next friend or a guardian ad litem.

Next of Kin.—I. In the strict sense of the term, the next of kin of a deceased person are those who are next in degree of kindred to him, that is, are most closely related to him in the same degree. The degrees of kindred are reckoned according to the Roman law, both upwards to the ancestor and downwards to the issue, each generation counting for a degree. Thus, from father to son is one degree, from grandfather to grandson or vice versâ is two degrees, and from brother to brother is two degrees, namely, one upwards to the father and one downwards to the other son: so from uncle to nephew, or vice versâ, is three degrees. In tracing the degrees of kindred in the distribution of an intestate's personal estate (infra), no preference is given to males over females, nor to the paternal over the maternal line, nor to the whole over the half blood, nor do the issue of a deceased person stand in his place, as in the case of descent of real estate. See DESCENT.

II. More commonly, the "next of kin" of a person who has died intestate signifies those persons who are entitled to his personal property, after payment of his debts, under the Statutes of Distribution (22 & 23 Car. 2, c. 10; 1 Jac. 2, c. 17, s. 7; see DISTRIBUTION). If the intestate leaves a widow and any child or children or descendant of any child, the widow takes the first £500 and, as regards anything over that amount, she takes a third and the issue take two-thirds per stirpes (q.v.), subject to the rule as to advancement (q.v.). If he leaves no widow, his issue take the whole in the same manner. If he leaves a widow but no issue, the widow takes the first £500, and as regards anything over that amount, she takes a half, and the other half, or if there is no widow, the whole, goes as follows: first to the father, if living; then to the mother, brothers and sisters, or such of them as shall be living, in equal shares, the children of any deceased brother or sister standing in their parent's place, provided the mother or any brother or sister of the deceased is living; and if there is neither mother, brother nor sister living, then to those who are next of kindred to the deceased in the same degree (supra). The husband of a woman dying intestate takes the whole of her personal property.

When a testator gives his property to the "next of kin" of himself or another, the expression is construed to mean "next of kin" in the strict sense of the word (supra); and, therefore, does not include persons claiming by representation (e.g., children of a deceased brother), unless there is an express or implied reference to the Statutes of Distribution. Even then "next of kin" does not include the husband or wife of the deceased.

Next Presentation. In the law of advowsons (q.v.) the right of next presentation is the right to present to the first vacancy of a benefice. When an advowson is sold during an existing incumbency, the right of next presentation passes to the grantee, unless the owner has already sold it to someone else, which he might do down to 1st January, 1899, as from which date, under the Benefices Act, 1898, s. 1, no dealing with the right of presentation separately from the advowson can take place. But when a vacancy had actually occurred, the right of presenting to it was always considered to be of such a personal nature that it could not be sold, and if, therefore, the owner sold the advowson at such a time, the next presentation did not pass to the grantee. If the owner of the advowson died intestate during a vacancy, the next presentation formerly went to his executor, while the advowson went to his heir. Now, since 1897, both pass to the executor (q.v.).

A next presentation, when held separately from the advowson, is personal estate, but the cases in which it is so held are now rare.

See SIMONY; AVOIDANCE.

Nient comprise. Formerly this was an exception (q.v.) taken to a petition (q.v.) on the ground that the matter prayed for therein was outside the deed or proceeding upon which the petition was founded. Thus, where one petitioned to be put into possession of certain lands whereof a recovery had been had, it was open to the defendant to take the exception that they were not included (nient comprise) in the lands to which the judgment related.

Nient culpable. An ancient form of the plea of not guilty in criminal cases. It was in use so late as the eighteenth century. The customary abbreviation in the Court records was nient cul. See NON CULPABILIS.

Nient dedire. In the old common law practice, when a suggestion (q.v.) was entered on the record in an action, and the opposite party did not wish to deny it, he made an entry on the record to that effect, which operated as a confession of the truth of the suggestion, and was called a nient dedire (Norman-French, = "not deny").

Nient le fait. Formerly this was a plea which denied that an alleged deed had been duly signed, sealed and delivered. Also used to deny that a bond was the valid bond of the defendant.

Niger liber. (The Black Book of the Exchequer.) See that title.

Night. See DAY. The Night Poaching Act, 1828, s. 12, provides that for the purposes of that Act night commences one hour after sunset and ends one hour before sunrise. This means local sunset and sunrise.

Nightline. A line fastened at one end to a peg on the banks of a river or lake, and with a weight at the other end, the intermediate line carrying baited hooks. The weighted end is thrown overnight into the water and is drawn in next day with such fish, if any, as may have been hooked. The use of nightlines is not "angling" for the purposes of s. 25 of the Larceny Act, 1861.

Nightwalker. Used in the Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, s. 4, and in the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, s. 28, as a synonym for common prostitute. Originally it meant anyone who prowled about at night.

Nihil; Nil. An endorsement by a sheriff upon a writ; it signifies that the defendant has no goods upon which the sheriff can levy, or none of any value; and it is more particularly appropriate to the writ of elegit (q.v.). See CLERK OF THE NIHILS; compare TOT.

Nihil aliud potest rex in terris, cum sit Dei minister et vicarius, quam quod de jure potest (11 Rep. 74). (The King, since he is the Minister and Vicar of God, is incapable of doing anything in the world except what he is of right empowered to do.) This is a quotation from Bracton which Coke, apparently with an eye on King James, introduces into the judgment in the Magdalen College Case. Compare REX NON POTEST PECCARE.

Nihil capiat per breve (or billam). This, says Coke, "is the judgment given against the plaintiff in an action either in bar of his action or in abatement of his writ or bill." It meant literally "Let him take nothing by his writ [or bill]."

Nihil consensui tam contrarium est quam vis et metus (D. 50, 17, 116). (Nothing is so opposed to consent as force and fear.) That is to say, there is no consent when an act is done under duress (q.v.).

Nihil dat qui non habet (Jur. Civ.). (He gives nothing who has nothing.) That is to say, a gift of anything by one other than the owner is a nullity. Compare NEMO DAT, ETC.

Nihil dicit. (He says nothing.) Formerly this was the judgment which a plaintiff had against a defendant who failed to put in an answer to the plaintiff's plea by the day assigned. See DEFAULT.

Nihil facit error nominis cum de corpore constat (11 Rep. 21). (A mistake as to the name has no effect when there is no mistake as to who is the person meant.) The maxim is cited by Coke as explaining the decision that "a grant made to the King by the title of Sovereign Lord James, omitting the word 'King,' is good." Compare FALSA DEMONSTRATIO, ETC.

Nihil infra regnum subditos magis conservat in tranquillitate et concordiâ quam debita legum administratio (2 Inst. 158). (Nothing more preserves in tranquillity and concord those subject to the royal authority than a due administration of the laws.)

Nihil in lege intolerabilius est, eandem rem diverso jure censeri (4 Rep. 93). (Nothing in law is more intolerable than that like cases should be decided upon different constructions of the law.) Compare LEX UNO, ETC.

Nihil præscribitur nisi quod possidetur (1 B. & A. 277). (No right can be acquired by prescription except in respect of what is owned [by anyone other than the king or a grantee of the king].) The maxim is cited from the Roman law by Hale at p. 32 of his De jure Maris, and again by Best, J. ub supra, in his judgment to the effect that the public have no common law right of bathing in the sea and, as incident thereto, of crossing the seashore for that purpose. See FORESHORE.

Nihil quod est contra rationem est licitum (Co. Litt. 97). (Nothing is lawful which is contrary to reason), "because," as Coke goes on, "reason is the life of the law."

Nihil quod inconveniens est licitum est (Co. Litt. 97). (Nothing which is inconvenient is lawful.) But Coke really quotes this maxim only as meaning that "an argument drawn from inconvenience is forcible in law." For although he says "the law cannot suffer anything that is inconvenient," yet he continues, "it is better to suffer an inconvenience which is peculiar to one than an inconvenience that may prejudice many." See NECESSITAS PUBLICA, ETC.

Nihil simul inventum est et perfectum (Co Litt. 230) (Nothing is invented and perfected at the same moment.) Coke quotes this as illustrating the gradual development of the forms used in conveyancing: at 4 C. B. N. S. 290 it is quoted in connection with a patent.

Nihil tam conveniens est naturali æquitati quam unumquodque dissolvi eo ligamine quo ligatum est (2 Inst. 359). (Nothing is so much in agreement with natural justice as that everything should be loosed by the same means that bound it.) This is practically the same as NATURALE EST, ETC. (q.v.).

Nihil tam conveniens est naturali æquitati, quam voluntatem domini volentis rem suam in alium transferre, ratam habere (1 Co. 100). (Nothing is so consonant to natural justice as to give effect to the intentions of an owner who desires to transfer his property to another.) This is a quotation from Bracton which is cited in the argument for the defendant in Shelley's Case.

Nihil tam proprium est imperii quam legibus vivere (2 Inst. 63). (Nothing is so characteristic of the royal power as the fact that it is exercised in accordance with the laws.)

Nihil temere novandum (Jenk. Cent. 167). (Rash innovations should be avoided.) Compare NOVITAS, ETC.

Nil debet. (He owes nothing.) Down to 1834 this was the plea of the general issue (q.v.) in actions of debt not founded on specialty. By rules made in that year the plea of nil debet was abolished, and it was provided that the defendant in actions of debt on simple contract, other than actions on promissory notes or bills of exchange, should plead "that he never was indebted in manner and form as in the declaration alleged." This plea was known as nunquam indebitatus. But the rules of 1834 were made under the authority of the statute 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 42, which expressly provided (s. 1) that no rule made thereunder should deprive anyone of the power of pleading the general issue by statute, that is to say, where the power had been expressly given by statute. This of course limited the operation of the rules of 1834. In 1853, however, by rules made under the authority of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852 (which contained no section analogous to s. 1 of the Act of Will. IV.), it was provided that the plea of nil debet should not be allowed in any action, and the plea (also known as nunquam indebitatus) that the defendant "never was indebted as alleged" was substituted not only for that prescribed by the rules of 1834 but also for the plea of non assumpsit in certain cases; and it was provided also that the new plea, when used instead of the non assumpsit plea, should operate as a denial of the matters of fact from which the liability of the defendant was alleged to arise. In 1883, Ord. 21, r. 1, provided that, in an action for a debt or liquidated demand, a mere denial of the debt was inadmissible; and Ord. 19, r. 17, provides that no defendant can deny generally, and that he must deal specifically with every allegation of fact—except as regards damages—which he does not admit. Nunquam indebitatus is consequently abolished.

Nil habuit in tenementis. (He had no interest in the tenements.) This was a plea to be pleaded only in an action of debt, which was brought by a lessor against a lessee for years or at will without deed; it put the plaintiff on strict proof of his title.

Nimia subtilitas in jure reprobatur (4 Rep. 5). (Over-great subtlety in the law is condemned.) Compare SIMPLICITAS, ETC., which Coke links with this maxim.

Nimium altercando veritas amittitur (Hob. 344). (If you argue overmuch the true view is lost.)

Nisi. A decree, order, rule, declaration, or other adjudication of a Court is said to be made nisi when it is not to take effect unless the person affected by it fails to show cause against it within a certain time, that is, unless he appears before the Court, and gives some reason why it should not take effect. See ABSOLUTE; DECREE; RULE.

Orders (or rules) nisi were much used in the common law Courts before the Judicature Acts, but their number was much reduced by Ord. 52, r. 2. See ORDER.

Nisi prius. In the practice of the High Court, a trial at nisi prius is where an action is tried by a jury before a single judge, either at the sittings held for that purpose in London and Middlesex, or at the assizes (q.v.). Formerly all common law actions were tried at bar, that is, before the full Court, consisting of several judges; and, therefore, the writ for summoning the jury commanded the sheriff to bring the jurors from the county where the cause of action arose to the Court at Westminster. But when the statute 13 Edw. 1. directed the justices of assize to try issues in the county where they arose, the sheriff was thenceforth commanded to bring the jurors to Westminster on a certain day, "unless before that day" (nisi prius) the justices of assize came into the county. See BAR; BANC; TRIAL.

A Chancery action which is to be tried by a jury must be tried at nisi prius, and not before a judge sitting in the Chancery Division.

See RECORD.

Nobiliores et benigniores presumptiones in dubiis sunt præferendæ (Reg. Jur. Civ.). In cases of doubt, the more generous and more favourable presumptions are to be preferred.

Noble. See GOLD COINS.

Noctanter. (By night.) Under so much of the Statute of Westminster I. (13 Edw. 1, st. 1, c. 46), as provided that where a hedge or ditch was overthrown the neighbouring vills (q.v.) should be liable for damages if they did not indict the offenders, a writ known as noctanter (issuing out of Chancery and returnable to the King's Bench) lay to the sheriff, and was the first step in the proceedings for the recovery of damages. The above-mentioned provision was repealed by the statute 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 27; and this put an end to the issue of the writ.

Formerly an indictment for burglary was defective unless it set out that the act charged had been done noctanter.

Nolle prosequi, in the practice of the King's Bench Division of the High Court, was an acknowledgment or undertaking entered on record by the plaintiff in an action, to forbear to proceed in the action, either wholly or partially: it has been superseded by the modern practice of discontinuance. In criminal prosecutions by indictment or information, a nolle prosequi to stay proceedings may be entered by leave of the Attorney-General at any time before judgment: it is not equivalent to an acquittal and is no bar to a new indictment for the same offence.

Nolumus leges Angliæ mutari. (We decline to have the laws of English changed.) See MERTON, STATUTE OF.

Nomen collectivum. (A collective name), that is to say, a designation covering persons of a particular class (such as the word "children") or indicating one of a particular class (such as the words "eldest male issue": see [1922] 1 I. R. 54). Compare PERSONA DESIGNATA.

Nominal. See DAMAGES.

Nomina sunt mutabilia, res autem immobiles (6 Co. 66). (Names can be changed but things remain the same.) Compare "A rose by any other name would smell as sweet."

Nominating and Reducing was in London and Middlesex a mode of obtaining a panel (q.v.) of special jurors, from which to select the jury to try a particular action. The proceeding took place before the under-sheriff or secondary, and in the presence of the parties' solicitors. Numbers denoting the persons on the sheriff's list were put into a box and drawn until forty-eight unchallenged persons had been nominated. Each party struck off twelve, and the remaining twenty-four were returned as the panel (q.v.).

The Juries Act, 1870, s. 17, provided that this course should be adopted only by order of the Court or a judge; but that section has been repealed by the Juries Act, 1922, which provides (s. 5 (1)) that a special jury shall be balloted for and called in the same manner as a common jury, except that there is to be no alteration in the method of striking a special jury for the purposes of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, which (ss. 54, 55) provides for the employment of the practice of nominating and reducing.

Nomination. A member, not being under the age of sixteen, of a friendly society, or of an industrial or provident society, may by writing under his hand, delivered at or sent to the registered office of the society, nominate any person to whom his share or interest in the society is to belong at his death. Such a nomination may be revoked or varied by the nominator, and must not dispose of a share or interest exceeding £100 (Friendly Societies Act, 1896, s. 56; Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893, s. 25). In the case of a friendly society it is revoked by marriage (Act of 1896, s. 56). It is in the nature of a testamentary disposition, and seems to be allowed in this form because members of the working classes do not generally leave wills.

In ecclesiastical law, the owner of an advowson may grant the right of nomination to another, and then the grantor is bound to present for institution any clerk whom the grantee shall name. (See PRESENTATION.) No Roman Catholic can nominate (Presentation of Benefices Act, 1713, s. 1).

As regards parliamentary, municipal and local government elections, nomination is the written proposal of a person as a candidate for a vacancy. Such nominations are the subject of various statutory provisions.

Nomina villarum. (The names of the vills.) The title of the various lists of vills, that is to say of townships, towns or villages, which from time to time were compiled for public purposes. The title is more particularly applied to the lists which all the sheriffs furnished in 1316 of the vills in their respective counties and of the owners of the vills. The original lists for nine of the southern counties are still preserved. A transcript of all the lists was made out by order of Henry VII. and copies of this still exist. The lists had been made out for the purpose of enabling Edward II. to raise one man from each vill in accordance with the authorisation of the Parliament of Lincoln.

The name is also applied to the lists contained in the Testa de Nevill (q.v.), and to reports made out in the reign of Charles II. by the bailiffs of the liberties of various towns as to the claims of the lords thereof to estreats, etc.

Nomine pœnæ. (Under the description of a penalty.) Additional rent—known as a penal rent—payable to the landlord under a covenant in a lease which is to become operative in the event of non-performance of conditions in the lease, was formerly said to be payable nomine pœnæ. Formerly it might be made payable in all leases in, for instance, the event of non-payment of rent on the appointed days. But now the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908, s. 25, precludes the landlord of an agricultural holding from recovering as penal rent any greater sum than is sufficient to cover the actual loss sustained by reason of breach of the condition unless the condition be against the breaking up of permanent pasture, the grubbing of underwoods, injuries to trees or one regulating the burning of heather.

Non acceptavit. (He did not accept.) Before the Judicature Acts this was the name of the plea, in an action of assumpsit against an alleged acceptor of a bill of exchange, by which the acceptance of the bill was denied.

Non-access, in the law of husband and wife, is the absence of access (q.v.). If non-access for above nine months is proved, by showing that the husband and wife were separated from one another, any children of the wife conceived during and born after that period are bastards unless the Court can be induced to adopt a large view of the period of gestation.

Non accipi debent verba in demonstrationem falsam quæ competunt in limitationem veram (Bac. Max. Reg. 13). (Words capable of being read as amounting to a limitation which was obviously intended are not to be read in a sense which makes them a false description.) Thus, where the parish of Hurst lies both in Wilts and Berks, and in the Berkshire part I own the lands of Callis, they will pass under a devise of the lands of "Callis situate in the parish of Hurst in the county of Wiltshire," because the words "in the county of Wiltshire" can and should be taken as referring to "the parish of Hurst" and not to Callis.

Nonæ et decimæ. Tenants of church lands anciently paid nonæ, or rent, and also decimæ, or tithes.

Non-age. Minority. See INFANT.

Nonagium; Nonage. The ninth part of the moveables of a deceased which was anciently paid for pious uses to the clergy of his parish.

Non alio modo puniatur aliquis, quam secundum quod se habet condemnatio (3 Inst. 217). (A person may not be punished otherwise than in accordance with the sentence), and so, as Coke continues, non licet felonem pro felonia decollari. (It is unlawful that a felon should be decapitated for felony.)

Non aliter a significatione verborum recedi oportet quam cum manifestum est aliud sensisse testatorem (D. 32, 69). (There should be no departure from the ordinary meaning of words except in so far as it appears that the testator meant something different.) This is a well-known rule for the construction of wills.

Non-appearance. See DEFAULT.

Non assumpsit, in the old action of assumpsit (q.v.), was the name for the plea by which the defendant averred that "he did not promise" as alleged, and thus raised the general issue. (See ISSUE; NIL DEBET.)

Non assumpsit infra sex annos (he did not promise within six years) was the plea by which the Statute of Limitations was pleaded.

Non-business Days. See BUSINESS DAY.

Non cepit modo et forma. (He did not take in the manner and form [alleged].) This was the plea used by the defendant in the old action (q.v.) of replevin to plead the general issue.

Non-claim. At common law, the levying of a fine (q.v.) barred the right of all persons, whether parties, privies or strangers, unless they put in their claim within, at first, a year and a day. This was called being barred by non-claim. Alterations were afterwards made in the time allowed for claiming, but the subject is now of no practical importance, fines having been abolished since 1833.

There was also a non-claim in a writ of right.

Non compos mentis (not sound in mind) is properly a generic term, in which are included four species: — These are, says Coke, "1. Ideota [an idiot], which from his nativitie, by a perpetuall infirmitie, is non compos mentis. 2. Hee that by sicknesse, griefe, or other accident, wholly loseth his memory and understanding. 3. A lunatique that hath sometime his understanding and sometime not, aliquando gaudet lucidis intervallis, and therefore he is called non compos mentis so long as he hath not understanding. [4] Lastly, hee that by his owne vitious act for a time depriveth himselfe of his memorie and understanding, as he that is drunken. But that kind of non compos mentis shall give no privilege or benefit to him or to his heires." (See DRUNKENNESS; INSANITY; LUNACY.) But there are certain offences which cannot be committed without the mens rea or intent to commit the crime; and so therefore a man who kills another while in delirium tremens cannot be convicted of murder or manslaughter. Compare NON SANÆ MEMORIÆ.

Non concessit. (He did not grant.) This was the plea by which formerly a stranger to a deed put in issue the title of the grantor in the deed and also the operation of the deed.

Nonconformist. In the wider sense this is anyone who is not in conformity with the Church of England; but it is more generally used as meaning Protestant Dissenters, as distinguished from persons such as Roman Catholics on the one hand or professed atheists on the other. See RECUSANT.

Non constat, ("it is not clear," "it does not follow," "there are no grounds for assuming.")

Non-contentious. See CONTENTIOUS.

Non culpabilis. A form of the plea of not guilty which was used in Blackstone's time in criminal cases. The usual abbreviation on the minutes of the Court was non cul. See NIENT CULPABLE.

Non damnificatus. In an action of debt upon a bond conditioned to hold the plaintiff harmless, this was the plea by which the defendant averred that the plaintiff had not in fact suffered damage.

Non debeo melioris conditionis esse, quam auctor meus, a quo jus in me transit (D. 50, 17, 175). (I ought not to be in a better position than my assignor, from whom the right passes to me.) See NEMO DAT, etc.

Non debet alteri per alterum iniqua conditio inferri (D. 50, 17, 74). An unjust condition ought not to be imposed upon one man by another.)

Non debet, cui plus licet, quod minus est non licere (D. 50, 17, 21). (It is lawful for a man to do a less thing if he is entitled to do a greater thing [which includes the less].) This is the equivalent in the civil law of our maxim Cui licet, etc. Compare MAJUS CONTINET, etc., and OMNE MAJUS, etc.

Non decimando, De. A prescription de non decimando is a claim to be exempt from tithes and to pay no compensation in lieu of them. Such a prescription can be set up only by spiritual persons or by corporations or persons claiming under them, and formerly it was necessary to prove that the land in question had been immemorially exempt from tithes. But by the Tithe Act, 1832, non-payment of tithes during a certain period (thirty years in some cases and sixty in others) is sufficient to establish a prescriptive exemption.

Non decipitur qui scit se decipi (5 Rep. 60). (He is not deceived who knows himself to be deceived.) Compare VOLENTI, etc.

Non definitur in jure quid sit conatus (6 Rep. 42.) (No definition of an attempt is given by the law.)

Non demisit. (He did not demise.) A plea available before the Judicature Acts to a defendant in an action of debt for rent when the plaintiff in his declaration did not aver that the demise was by indenture: it could not be used when the plaintiff declared an indenture. In replevin (q.v.) it was a plea in bar to an avowry for arrears of rent.

Non detinet. (He does not detain.) In the old action of detinue the defendant could use the plea of non detinet in order to plead that he did not detain the goods specified in the plaintiff's declaration; but if he did use the plea he was estopped from pleading that they were not the goods of the plaintiff.

Non differunt quæ concordant re, tametsi non in verbis iisdem (Jenk. Cent. 70). (Those things that agree in substance, though not in the same words, are not different from one another.)

Non distringendo, De. A writ to prevent distraint; it was formerly available in many cases.

None Effect. See VOID AND OF NONE EFFECT.

Non est arctius vinculum inter homines quam jusjurandum (Jenk. Cent. 126). (As between men there is nothing more binding than an oath.) Compare JURATO, etc.

Non est factum. The Law-Latin form of nient le fait (q.v.). See MODO ET FORMA.

Non est inventus. The return which a sheriff has to make upon a writ commanding him to arrest a person who is not within his bailiwick. See ATTACHMENT; CAPIAS; RETURN.

Non est recedendum a communi observantiâ (2 Rep. 74). (There should be no departure from common usage.) See A COMMUNI, etc.

Non est regula quin fallit (Plow. Com. 162). (There is no rule without exceptions.) Compare EXCEPTIO PROBAT, ETC.

Non-existing Grant. See LOST GRANT.

Non facias malum ut inde fiat bonum (11 Rep. 74). (You are not to do evil in order that good may come thereof.)

Nonfeasance is the neglect or failure of a person to do some act which he ought to do. The term is generally used to denote, not a breach of contract, but rather a failure to perform a duty towards the public whereby some individual sustains special damage, as where a highway authority permits a road to become worn into a dangerous hole. If they had purported to repair the hole and then opened it to the public in a dangerous state, there would be a misfeasance (q.v.). Compare MALFEASANCE; TORT.

Non impedit clausula derogatoria quo minus ab eadem potestate res dissolvantur a qua constituuntur (Bac. Max. Reg. 19). (A derogatory clause does not prevent things from being destroyed by the same power which created them.)

If an Act of Parliament contain a clause, "that it shall not be lawful for the King by authority of Parliament during a space of seven years, to repeal this Act," such a clause, which is technically termed clausula derogatoria, is void; for one Parliament cannot by its ordinances bind another, and (Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 10) Parliament may alter, amend, or repeal, during any session even an Act which it has passed earlier in that session. Compare PERPETUA, etc.

Non implacitando aliquem de libero tenemento sine breve. An ancient writ stated by Jacob (1739) to have issued "to prohibit bailiffs, etc., from distraining or impleading any man touching his freehold without the King's writ."

Non infregit conventionem. (He committed no breach of covenant.) This was formerly a plea by the defendant in an action for breach of covenant.

Non in legendo sed in intelligendo leges consistunt (8 Co. 167). (The laws consist not in reading but in understanding)—which would appear to mean that understanding and not mere knowledge of the letter of the law is required of a lawyer.

Non-intromittant Clause. A clause in the charter of a borough which exempts the borough from the jurisdiction of the justices of the peace appointed for the county in which the borough is situated.

Non intromittendo, quando breve præcipe in capite sub dole impetratur. This writ, which ceased to be available when the Court of Wards and Liveries (q.v.) was abolished, issued to the justices of the King's Bench or Eyre commanding them not to give any benefit under the writ præcipe in capite to one who had obtained that writ under pretence of entitling the king to lands, and directing them to put such person to his writ of right.

Non-joinder is where a person who ought to be made party to an action is omitted. The general rule is that, in an action on a contract, all the parties to it who are entitled or liable jointly should be joined as plaintiffs and defendants, and that, in an action of tort, persons who have a joint interest ought to sue jointly for an injury to it: persons who have a separate interest, but sustain a joint injury, may sue either jointly or separately. Joint wrongdoers may be sued either jointly or separately. (See JOINT; MISJOINDER.)

Non-joinder is cured by making an application to the Court to add the necessary parties (Ord. 16, r. 11).

Non jus, sed seisina, facit stipitem (Fleta, 6, c. 14). (Not right, but seisin, makes the stock [of descent].) See SEISIN; SEISINA, ETC.

Non liquet. (It is not clear.) In the Roman law the judices or judges, instead of deciding a case, could, if the facts did not point to a definite conclusion, write N.L. (Non liquet) on their tablets and leave the case for decision at some future time. No similar finding has ever been open to an English jury: the nearest thing to it is the Scottish verdict "not proven," which, however, is a bar to any further trial.

Non merchandizanda victualia, De. A writ which in early times was directed to justices of assize directing them to enquire whether the magistrates of towns had dealt in victuals while in office and to punish those who had.

Non molestando, De. A writ which anciently lay for one molested notwithstanding that the writ of protection (q.v.) had issued to him.

Non observata forma infertur adnullatio actus (Coke, De jure Reg. Eccl. 4*a*. See 5 Rep. p. xx.) (Non-observance of the prescribed formalities involves the invalidity of the proceeding.) Quoted by Coke in connection with the deprivation of a clerk pursuant to the statute 1 Eliz. c. 2.

Non obstante. (Notwithstanding.) About the year 1250, the Crown began to issue licences to do such and such a thing non obstante any law to the contrary. At a later period, such licences were frequently given in order to enable corporations to hold lands in contravention of the Statutes of Mortmain (q.v.). This continued to be done, in spite of protests, until at last James II. resolved to dispense with the provisions of the Test Act. This led to the Revolution of 1688, after which the Bill of Rights enacted that any dispensation non obstante should be wholly void and without effect. See MORTMAIN.

Non obstante veredicto. (Notwithstanding the verdict.) Upon an application for a new trial, the Court of Appeal, if satisfied that the findings of the jury cannot stand and that it has all the necessary evidence before it, may set aside the judgment of the Court below and enter judgment, notwithstanding the verdict for the party who was unsuccessful in the Court below (Ord. 40, r. 10; Ord. 58, r. 4).

Non officit affectus nisi sequatur effectus (1 Rol. Rep. 226). (The intention is not hurtful unless an effect follow.) This maxim requires qualification: see VOLUNTAS IN, ETC. Compare AFFECTUS PUNITUR, ETC.

Non omittas was a clause usually inserted in writs of execution, directing the sheriff "not to omit" to execute the writ by reason of any liberty, because there were many liberties or districts in which the sheriff had no power to execute process unless he had special authority. Such authority was given by this clause, the full form of which was "non omittas propter libertatem" (do not omit because of any liberty).

Non omnium quæ a majoribus nostris constituta sunt ratio reddi potest (D. 1, 3, 20). (A reason cannot be given for all the laws that have been established by our ancestors.) Compare QUI RATIONEM, ETC; CONTRA NEGANTEM, ETC.

Non plevin. Default in replevying (q.v.) land within due time.

Non ponendis in assisis et juratis. A writ which anciently issued to free a person from serving on assizes or as a juror.

Non possessori incumbit necessitas probandi possessiones ad se pertinere (C. 4, 19, 2). (A person in possession is not bound to prove that what he possesses belong to him.) This applies only as against a person other than the true owner. Compare IN PARI, ETC.; MELIOR EST CONDITIO, ETC.

Non potest adduci exceptio ejusdem rei cujus petitur dissolutio (Bac. Max. Reg. 2). When the validity of any matter is in question, then he who seeks to uphold it cannot plead it in bar of proceedings taken to upset it; for that would be a begging of the whole question.

Non potest probari quod probatum non relevat. (That cannot be proved, which, if proved, is immaterial.) This is an obvious truism. Although the maxim is given in Broom's list of maxims, its source does not appear: something very like it, but not verbally the same, is at 1 Exch. 91, 92.

Non potest rex gratiam facere cum injuriâ et damno aliorum (3 Inst. 236). (The king cannot confer a favour on one man to the injury and damage of others.) Thus no pardon can be granted in respect of a common nuisance which remains unabated.

Non procedendo ad captionem assisæm rege inconsulto. A writ anciently available to stop proceedings at an assize until the pleasure of the king was known.

Non pros. An abbreviation for non prosequitur, that is to say, "he does not follow up." Judgment non pros. was available for the defendant in an action when the plaintiff failed to take the proper steps within the prescribed time. The modern equivalents are an order (under Ord. 27, r. 12) of dismissal for want of prosecution, where the plaintiff fails to deliver his statement of claim, or an order of dismissal (under Ord. 36, r. 12) where the plaintiff does not serve notice of trial after the pleadings are closed.

Non-provided School. A voluntary (q.v.) school.

Non quod dictum est, sed quod factum est, in jure inspicitur (Co. Litt. 36). (Not what is said, but what is done, is regarded in law.) This is quoted in connection with the proposition that there can be valid delivery of a deed without any words spoken.

Non quod voluit testator, sed quod dixit in testamento inspicitur. (Not what the testator wished, but what he said, is considered in construing a will.) The maxim is cited in part by Rolfe, B., at 5 Exch. Rep. 194. At 14 M. & W. 701, Parke, B., observes that "difficulties have arisen from confounding the testator's intention with his meaning. Intention may mean what the testator intended to have done, whereas the only question in the construction of wills is on the meaning of the words."

Non refert an quis assensum suum præfert verbis, an rebus ipsis et factis (10 Rep. 52). (It matters not whether a man gives his assent by his words, or by his acts and deeds.) Compare INDEX, ETC. Speech shows what is in the mind—but so may other things.

Non refert quid notum sit judici, si notum non sit in formâ judicii (3 Buls. 115). (It matters not what is known to the Judge, if it be not known judicially.) This is the rule now, just as it was when Coke quoted this dictum three hundred years ago.

Non-residence, in ecclesiastical law, is where a spiritual person holding a benefice does not keep residence on it. It is in ordinary cases an offence, and is punishable by monition and sequestration of the benefice, by forfeiture of part of the income of the benefice, and by the compulsory appointment of a curate. Licences for non-residence may be granted by the bishop in certain cases. See the Pluralities Act, 1838, ss. 42-51.

Non-resident, as applied to a trading corporation, signifies that it has no place of business in England. The question is of importance with reference to the liability of such a corporation to be sued in this country, and to the manner in which it should be served with process. (See JURISDICTION; DOMICILE.) It should be served not with the writ, but with a copy thereof. See Ord. 10, rr. 1, 6, 8.

Non residentia pro clericis regis. Anciently this was a writ enjoining a bishop not to molest, by reason of non-residence, a clerk who was absent in the service of the king.

Non Sane Memory (Non sanæ memoriæ). In the old system of pleading this was an exception (q.v.) whereby it was pleaded that the person who had done an act was "not of sound memory" when he did it. Compare NON COMPOS MENTIS.

Non solent quæ abundant vitiare scripturas (D. 50, 17, 94). (Surplusage does not vitiate writings.) For corresponding maxims of the English law, see SURPLASAGIUM, ETC; UTILE, ETC.

Non solvendo pecuniam ad quam clericus mulctatur pro non-residentia. Anciently this was a writ prohibiting the bishop from enforcing a fine imposed for non-residence upon a clerk who was absent on the king's service.

Nonsuit was where the plaintiff in an action abandoned his case at the trial before the jury had given their verdict, whereupon judgment of nonsuit was given against him. (See JUDGMENT.) Before 1875 the advantage of this practice (which was peculiar to the common law Courts) was that the plaintiff could bring another action against the defendant for the same cause of action; but under Ord. 41, r. 6, of the R. S. C. 1875, any judgment of nonsuit, unless the Court otherwise directed, had the same effect as a judgment on the merits, that is, it barred the plaintiff from bringing another action for the same cause; but in case of mistake, surprise or accident, a judgment of nonsuit might be set aside by the Court. Order 41, r. 6, was cancelled in 1883 and there is now in strictness no such thing as a nonsuit; but the term is still loosely used instead of the term "judgment for the defendant," where the judge withdraws the case from the jury and directs a verdict for the defendant.

See DISCONTINUANCE.

Non sum informatus. (I am not informed. That is to say, I have no instructions to defend.) Upon this being filed by the attorney appearing for a litigant, it formerly enabled the other party to have judgment. See now COGNOVIT; WARRANT OF ATTORNEY.

Non-summons. Failure to serve a summons. The statute 31 Eliz. c. 3, s. 2, provided that the process in a real action known as "summons upon the lands" should be 'proclaimed" upon the local church door fourteen days at the least before the day that the summons was returnable. If the provisions were not complied with the defendant (as appears from Saund. 45*c*) could "wage his law of non-summons."

Non tenuit. In the old action of replevin (q.v.) this was a plea in bar to an avowry for arrears of rent: it set out that the plaintiff did not hold in the manner and form alleged in the avowry.

Non-tenure. This was a plea in bar to the now abolished real action. The defendant denied by the plea that he had held the land in question, or denied that he had held some particular part of it.

Non term; non terminus. In the sixteenth century, and earlier, these expressions meant the period between one term (q.v.) and another. Any such period was also known as the time or days of the king's peace.

Non-user is where a person ceases to exercise a right. The term is principally used with reference to easements, profits à prendre, and similar rights, which may be extinguished by non-user for a certain number of years, which apparently must be not less than twenty; but the non-user must be of such a nature as to show an intention to abandon the right, as where it amounts to acquiescence in an unlawful interruption. (See INTERRUPTION.) A public officer is liable, according to Coke, to forfeiture for non-user or neglect to perform the duties of his office: see Co. Litt. 233*a*.

Non valet confirmatio, nisi ille, qui confirmat, sit in possessione rei vel juris unde fieri debet confirmatio; et eodem modo, nisi ille cui confirmatio fit, sit in possessione (Co. Litt. 295). (Confirmation is without effect unless he who confirms is either in possession of the thing itself or of the right of which confirmation is to be made, and, in like manner, unless he to whom confirmation is made is in possession.) See CONFIRMATION.

Non videntur qui errant consentire (D. 50, 17, 116). (Those who are mistaken are not deemed to consent.) That is to say, where an agreement has been made or an act done under a mistake of a material fact, then relief can be obtained in equity. See MISTAKE.

Non videtur consensum retinuisse si quis ex præscripto minantis aliquid immutavit (Bac. Max. Reg. 22). (He is not deemed to have consented who has altered anything at the command of anyone using threats.) Compare NIHIL CONSENSUI, ETC.

Non videtur quisquam id capere, quod ei necesse est alii restituere (D. 50, 17, 51). (No one is deemed to take that which he must give up to another): he is in fact a mere conduit pipe.

Nook. An obsolete measure of land which appears to have sometimes meant twelve and a half acres, but which, according to Noye's Complete Lawyer (1651), contained two fardels (q.v.) or one-fourth of a yardland (q.v.).

Norman French. See FRENCH.

Norroy. See HERALDS.

Northampton, Statute of. The statute 2 Edw. 3, containing 17 chapters, most of which are now repealed. It was enacted at Northampton in 1328.

Northern Ireland. That part of Ireland comprising "the parliamentary counties of Antrim, Armagh, Down, Termanagh, Londonderry and Tyrone, and the parliamentary boroughs of Belfast and Londonderry" (Government of Ireland Act, 1920, s. 1 (2)). The rest of Ireland was Southern Ireland (ib.), but is now the Irish Free State (q.v.).

North Sea Fisheries Convention. An agreement arrived at, on May 6, 1882, between Great Britain, Belgium, Germany, France, Denmark and Holland for the purpose of "regulating the police of the fisheries of the North Sea outside territorial waters." It does not affect the rights of the parties as regards their respective territorial waters.

Northstead, Manor of. See CHILTERN HUNDREDS.

Noscitur à sociis (3 T. R. 87). (A man is known from his associates.) So also the meaning of a word can be gathered from the context.

Nostrum est judicare secundum allegata et probata (1 Dyer, 12). (It is our duty to decide according to what is pleaded and proved.) This is a dictum of Shelley, J. Another form is JUDICIS EST JUDICARE, ETC. Compare NON REFERT QUID, ETC.

Notary Public is a person who attests the execution of any deeds or writings, or makes certified copies of them in order to render the same authentic, especially for use abroad (see LEGALIZATION). He is appointed to his office by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and can be removed from office by the Court of Faculties. An important branch of his duties is the protesting of bills of exchange (see PROTEST). He also makes a record of the proceedings in an ecclesiastical cause. See SCRIVENER.

Notation, in probate practice, is the act of making a memorandum of some special circumstance on a probate or letters of administration: thus where probate is granted of the will of a testator who died domiciled in England and it appears that part of the estate is in Scotland, then a notation of the fact that the testator died domiciled in England is made on the probate in order that recognition may be given to the grant in Scotland under the Confirmation and Probate Act, 1858.

Note of a Fine. This was "a brief of the fine made by the chirographer before it was engrossed." See FINE.

Note of Allowance. Under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 149, either party to an action might deliver to one of the masters a memorandum alleging error in law, whereupon the master delivered to the party a note of the receipt thereof. A copy of this note—known as a note of allowance—together with a statement of the error relied on might then be served on the other side to ground proceedings in error (q.v.).

Notes. See JUDGE'S NOTES.

Not Guilty; Not Guilty by Statute. "Not Guilty" is the appropriate plea to an indictment where the prisoner wishes to raise the general issue (see ISSUE; PLEA), that is to say, when he wishes to deny everything and to let the prosecution prove what they can. It was also a plea used in common law actions of tort under the old practice, when the defendant simply denied that he had committed the wrong complained of. (See ISSUE.) Under the present system of pleading, a defendant must deal specifically with all allegations made by the plaintiff which he does not admit, and therefore a plea of "not guilty" is no longer permissible in civil proceedings other than informations at the suit of the Crown.

Down to 1894 there were certain public and private Acts of Parliament which provided (principally for the protection of constables, inspectors, and other public officers) that in all actions for anything done in pursuance of such Acts or in execution of the powers and authorities thereof, the defendant might plead "not guilty" which entitled him to give the special matter in evidence at the trial; that is, he might prove the facts of the case and show that he acted in pursuance of the statute, so that such a plea had the same effect as if he had pleaded the facts and his defence specifically. This was called pleading "not guilty by statute," but the defendant could not plead any other defence without leave; and he had to insert in the margin of the plea the words "By Statute," together with the year, chapter, and section of the Act or Acts on which he relied and to specify whether they were public or private. Since 1st January, 1894, the right to plead "not guilty by statute" in any such cases has been taken away by the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1894, s. 2. The right to plead "not guilty" under any local or personal Act passed before 10th August, 1844, had previously been taken away by s. 3 of Pollock's Act (q.v.).

Notice. Primarily "notice" means knowledge or cognizance: and, therefore, when we speak of a Court taking judicial notice of a fact we mean that the Court recognises the fact without evidence to prove it. Thus the Courts notice the political constitution of our own Government, the existence and title of every State and Sovereign recognised by the Sovereign of England, the dates of the calendar, etc.

To give notice of a fact to a person is to bring it to his knowledge: when the circumstances are such that he is either actually aware of the fact, or might or ought to be aware of it, he is said to have notice of it.

Notice is either actual (express) or constructive. Actual or express notice is that given in plain words from one person to another, either verbally or in writing. When a written notice purports on the face of it to be a notice it is called a "formal notice."

Constructive notice is where knowledge of the fact is presumed from the circumstances of the case: thus where a person has actual notice of a charge or incumbrance on certain property, he is held to have constructive notice of facts to a knowledge of which he would have been led by an inquiry into the charge or incumbrance, whether his abstention from inquiry was fraudulent or merely negligent. So notice to an agent, solicitor, etc., is constructive notice to the principal or client, on the presumption that the agent did his duty by communicating the notice to his principal; therefore that presumption may be rebutted if it appears that the agent was a party to the fraud, or otherwise acted in such a way as to raise a presumption that he would not communicate the notice to his principal.

The doctrine of notice (formerly an equitable doctrine) is that a person who purchases an estate, although for valuable consideration, after notice of a prior equitable right, makes himself a malâ fide purchaser, and will not be enabled, by getting in the legal estate, to defeat that right, but will be held a trustee for the benefit of the person whose right he sought to defeat. Thus if a vendor contract with two different persons, for the sale to each of them of the same estate, and if the person with whom the second contract is made acquires notice of the first contract, and then procures a conveyance of the legal estate in pursuance of his own contract, the Court will order him to convey the property to the first purchaser.

As to notice of the assignment of a chose in action, see CHOSE IN ACTION.

See LIS PENDENS; PRIORITY; REGISTRATION; TACKING.

Notice of Accidents. See ACCIDENTS, NOTICE OF.

Notice of Action. When a statute imposes public or quasi-public duties on a person, such as a magistrate, constable, surveyor of highways, or the like, it frequently provided that before any action was brought against him for acts done in execution of his office, one month's notice of the intended action should be served on him. (See also AMENDS; NOT GUILTY.) Now, however, the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, s. 2, enacts that "so much of any public general Act as provides that notice of action is to be given is repealed." But where notice of action is required under a local or personal Act, such notice must still be given.

Notice of Admission. See ADMISSION. Notice of admission of fact is given under Ord. 32, r. 1.

Notice of Breaches. See PARTICULARS OF BREACHES AND OBJECTIONS.

Notice of Claim. See CITATION.

Notice of Dishonour. See BILL OF EXCHANGE.

Notice of Judgment or Order. In the Chancery Division, when an action is instituted for the administration of the estate of a deceased person, or for the execution of the trusts of an instrument, by or against one member of a class of persons (e.g., one of the executors, administrators, residuary legatees, next of kin, trustees or cestuis que trust), it is not necessary to join the other members of the class as plaintiffs or defendants in the action (Ord. 16, rr. 33-38). Whenever, in any action for the administration of the estate of a deceased person, or for the execution of the trusts of any instrument, or for the partition or sale of any hereditaments, a judgment or order has been pronounced or made (under Ord. 15 or under Ord. 33) which affects persons not parties to the action, then the Court or a judge may order such persons to be served with notice of the judgment or order (Ord. 16, r. 40); this gives them the right with one month of service to apply to have the order varied or discharged (ib); and it makes them parties (Judicature Act, 1873, s. 100).

Notice of Motion. See MOTION. Unless the Court or a judge gives leave for shorter notice, there must be at least two clear days' notice, except in applications to answer matters in an affidavit, in which latter case there must be at least ten clear days' notice (Ord. 52, r. 5). Sunday cannot be counted as one of the two clear days, but is counted as one of the ten clear days (see Ord. 64, r. 2).

Notice of Objections. See PARTICULARS OF BREACHES AND OBJECTIONS.

Notice of Trial. In the practice of the High Court, the plaintiff may give the defendant notice of trial of the action along with the reply (if any), or when the issues of fact are ready for trial, or (except in Admiralty action) four days after the delivery of the defence or the last of the defences if no reply has been ordered under Ord. 23, r. 1 (Ord. 36, r. 11); if the plaintiff fails to give such a notice within six weeks of the earliest possible time, the defendant may give notice of trial, or move to dismiss the action for want of prosecution (ib. r. 12). Ordinary notice of trial is a ten days' notice; and short notice of trial (which is sufficient, if the Court so orders, or if the party to whom it is given has consented to take it) is a four days' notice (ib. r. 14). See ACTION; TRIAL.

Notice of Writ of Summons, etc. In an action in the High Court, when the plaintiff has obtained leave, under Ord. 11, r. 1, to serve the defendant out of the jurisdiction, the defendant, if neither a British subject nor within the British dominions, is served with a notice (ib. r. 6) giving the substance of the writ of summons, and stating what will be the result of his not entering an appearance within the time allowed (Ord. 2, r. 5). This is done in lieu of serving the defendant with the writ of summons itself, because it is considered inappropriate to serve a foreigner in a foreign State with a mandate in the King's name. This now applies also to a variety of legal processes other than writs (Ord. 11, r. 8A).

When a defendant is suspected of keeping out of the way to avoid service, the Court, under Ord. 10, sometimes allows substituted service to be effected by notice of the writ or other legal process being given to the defendant, e.g., by advertisement. (See SERVICE). See also Ord. 67, r. 5.

Notice to Admit. See ADMISSIONS (IN CIVIL PROCEEDINGS).

Notice to Produce. If one of the parties to an action is in possession of any document which would be evidence for the other party if produced, the latter may give him notice in writing (Ord. 66, r. 1) to produce it at the trial, and, in default of production, may give secondary evidence of it.

At any time before the trial of an action, any party to an action or other proceeding may give any other party notice to produce for his inspection any document referred to in the pleadings or affidavits of the party to whom the notice is given: and if he refuses to produce them without good cause, an order for inspection may be obtained from the Court (Ord. 31 r. 15).

See DISCOVERY; INSPECTION; PRODUCTION.

Notice to Quit. Where there is a tenancy of land or tenements from year to year, or from two years to two years, or other like indefinite period, a notice to quit is required, to enable either the landlord or the tenant to determine the tenancy without the consent of the other. As a general rule, no particular form is required, but the notice is usually in writing and formal

In some cases the length of notice required is fixed by special agreement between the lessor and lessee, in other cases it is fixed by a local custom, and in other cases by the general law of the land. Where a tenancy from year to year exists, without a special agreement or local custom as to its determination, half a year's notice, expiring at the end of the first or some other year of the tenancy, must be given; thus, if the tenancy commenced on the 25th March, notice to quit must be given on or before the 28th September, expiring on the 25th March following. In the case of land subject to the Agricultural Holdings Acts a notice to quit must purport to terminate the tenancy not earlier than twelve months from the end of the year of the tenancy during which the notice is served (Agriculture Act, 1920, s. 28), but this does not apply where the notice is from a military, etc., authority in respect of land required for military or other such purposes, where it is from a railway or other such company requiring the land for its undertaking, where there is a provision in the contract of tenancy authorising resumption for purposes other than agricultural, or where the notice is served by a tenant on a sub-tenant, or where a receiving order has been made against the tenant (ib.).

Notice to Third Party. See CITATION.

Notice to Treat is the notice which a railway company or other public body having compulsory powers for the purchase of land is bound to give to the persons interested in any land which it is empowered and desires to purchase. The notice demands particulars of the estate and interest of the persons to whom it is given, and states that the company is willing to treat for the purchase of the land (Land Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 18). If the parties do not agree as to the compensation to be paid the amount is to be settled by two justices, where the amount claimed or offered does not exceed £50 (s. 22); and where the amount claimed or offered exceeds that sum, then the amount is to be settled by arbitration if the owner so requires, or if he does not so require, or if no award is made within three months, then it is to be fixed by a jury (s. 23).

Noting. This, in the law of bills of exchange, is a minute or memorandum made by a notary on a bill which he has presented, and which has been dishonoured It consists of his initials and charges, and the date, and, in the case of foreign bills, is considered as preparatory to a formal protest (q.v.). Noting must take place on the day of dishonour or the next following business day (Bills of Exchange (Time of Noting) Act, 1917, s. 1).

Notorious. In the law of evidence, matters deemed notorious do not require to be proved. There does not seem to be any recognised rule as to what matters are deemed notorious; cases have occurred in which the state of society or public feeling has been treated as notorious, e.g., during times when sedition was rife.

Nova constitutio futuris formam imponere debet non præteritis (2 Inst. 292). (A new law ought to regulate what is to follow, not the past.) It is a general principle that no statute shall be construed so as to have a retrospective operation, unless its language is such as plainly to require that construction; and this involves the subordinate rule that a statute is not to be construed so as to have a greater retrospective operation than its language renders necessary. Except in special cases, a new Act ought to be construed so as to interfere as little as possible with vested rights; and where the words admit of another construction, they should not be so construed as to impose disabilities not existing at the passing of the Act.

Compare LEX PROSPICIT, ETC.

Novæ Narrationes. A collection, made in the reign of Edward III., of the forms of pleadings then in use. It was first printed about the year 1515. See ARTICULI AD NOVAS NARRATIONES.

Novale. In old records this means either land newly converted from pasture to tillage or else fallow land, that is to say, land which lies untilled after either two years or one year of tillage.

Nova Statuta. The statutes from the year 1327 to 1483. They were first printed in 1485 by Maclinia; and they were reprinted by Pynson about twenty years later. Compare VETERA STATUTA.

Novation is where the promisee in a contract agrees to accept another person as the person to be bound in lieu of the original promisor. The term is practically confined to cases where a company or partnership transfers its liabilities to another company or partnership, in which case the question frequently arises whether there has been a novation, that is, whether the creditors or promisees have agreed to accept the liability of the new company or partnership in discharge of the old company or partnership.

The term is borrowed from the Roman law.

Novel disseisin. See ASSISE OF NOVEL DISSEISIN.

Novellæ. See CORPUS JURIS CIVILIS.

Novelty. An objection to a patent on the ground that the invention is not new or original, is called an objection for want of novelty. Only the "first inventor" is entitled to apply for a patent (Patents and Designs Act, 1907, s. 1 (1)) and the Comptroller, if satisfied that there is want of novelty, may either require the specification to be amended or may, subject to appeal, refuse to grant a patent at all (ib. s. 7 (4)). A design also is to be registered only if it is either "new or original" (ib. s. 49); but the degree of novelty required in the case of a design is less than that required in the case of a patent.

See DISCLAIMER; PATENTS; PUBLICATION.

Novitas non tam utilitate prodest quam novitate perturbat (Jenk. Cent. 167). (A new thing does not produce by its utility a benefit commensurate with the disturbance caused by its novelty.) Compare NIHIL TEMERE, ETC.; OMNIS INNOVATIO, ETC.

Noviter perventa, or Noviter ad notitiam perventa, in ecclesiastical procedure, are facts "newly come" to the knowledge of a party to a cause. Leave to plead facts noviter perventa is generally given, in a proper case, even after the pleadings are closed, or on appeal.

Novum judicium non dat jus novum, sed declarat antiquum, judicium est juris dictum et per judicium jus est noviter revelatum quod diu fuit velatum (10 Rep. 42). (A new judgment does not make new law, but declares the old law; because a judgment is the enunciation of law, and by judgment the law is newly revealed which was previously hidden.) This maxim is, of course, based on the theory that within the common law—which had "neither fault nor flaw"—there was an amorphous body of law, covering every conceivable case, which had only to be put into shape by the judges in their judgments. The law was in fact the Sleeping Beauty and the judge was the Fairy Prince.

Compare DORMIT, ETC.

Nuces colligere. (To gather [hazel] nuts.) This was anciently a service due from some tenants to the lord.

Nudi consensus obligatio contrario consensu dissolvitur (D. 50, 17, 35). (The binding force of a contract made without consideration is terminated by an agreement to the contrary effect.)

Nudum pactum. A nude contract, that is to say, a contract made without consideration and upon which, unless it be under seal, no action will lie.

Nudum pactum est ubi nulla subest causa præter conventionem; sed ubi subest causa, fit obligatio, et parit actionem (Plow. 309). (A contract is a naked contract (nudum pactum) where there is no consideration except the agreement: but where there is consideration the contract becomes binding and constitutes a cause of action.)

Nuisance is either public (common) or private.

A public or common nuisance is an act which interferes with the enjoyment of a right which all members of the community are entitled to, such as the right to fresh air, to travel on the highways, not to be exposed to danger to health from infectious diseases, unwholesome food, etc. Hence, if a person carries on a manufacture from which noxious fumes are emitted, or exposes for sale unwholesome food, or stops up or obstructs a highway, or allows buildings belonging to him near a highway to become ruinous, he commits a public nuisance. The remedy for a public nuisance (which is a misdemeanour) is by indictment or information, and in certain cases by abatement (q.v.); and if special damage is caused to an individual, he has an action for damages or injunction against the wrongdoer. Modern legislation has also provided a summary mode of dealing with nuisances. Thus, under the Public Health Acts, local sanitary authorities are required to ascertain by inspection what nuisances exist within their districts, and the local magistrates are empowered to deal summarily with such as are found to exist

A private nuisance is such a continuous infringement of a natural right of property as would in process of time give the wrongdoer an easement or prescriptive right to do an act which was originally tortious. Thus, if a man builds a house so close to mine that his roof overhangs mine, and the water flows off his roof upon mine, this is a nuisance, for which an action will lie. Similarly, if my neighbour carries on a noisy or offensive trade, or if anyone injuriously interferes with my watercourse, market, ferry, or the like. This remedy for a nuisance is either by abatement (q.v.), or by action for damages, injunction, or mandamus. See PRESCRIPTION; TORT; DISTURBANCE.

Null and Void. An expanded form of void (q.v.) from which it does not clearly differ.

Nulla bona ("no goods") is the name given to the return made by a sheriff, sequestrator, or other officer, to a writ or warrant authorising him to seize the chattels of a person, when he has been unable to find any to seize. It is a not infrequent return to a writ of fieri facias (q.v.).

Nulla curia quæ recordum non habet potest imponere finem, neque aliquem mandare carceri; quia ista spectant tantummodo ad curias de recordo (8 Rep. 60). (No Court which has not a record can impose a fine, or commit any person to prison; because those powers belong only to Courts of record.) This, of course, does not apply to statutory Courts such as petty sessions or the police Courts of the metropolis.

Nulla impossibilia aut inhonesta sunt præsumenda; vera autem et honesta et possibilia (Co. Litt. 78). (Things which are impossible or shameful are not to be presumed, but rather things which are true and seemly and possible.) Coke is speaking of the question whether a will was obtained by collusion.

Nulla pactione effici potest ut dolus præstetur (D. 2, 14, 27). (By no contract can it be arranged that a man shall be indemnified against responsibility for his own fraud.)

Nullity of Marriage. Where a marriage is void, on the ground that it was to the knowledge of both parties celebrated without the proper formalities, or that one of them was not single at the time, or that they are within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity or affinity, or that one or both of them were not consenting to the marriage, or are unable to perform the duties of matrimony, then either of them, unless the default or defect invalidating the marriage lies in him or her only, may present a petition to the High Court in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division, and obtain a decree declaring the nullity of the marriage. See DECREE; DIVORCE.

Nullius filius. A bastard (q.v.).

Nullius hominis auctoritas apud nos valere debet, ut meliora non sequeremur si quis attulerit (Co. Litt. 383). (The authority of no man ought so to prevail with us that we should not adopt better things, if another bring them.) Quoted in connection with a point on which Littleton differed from Newton, C.J., the latter being in the wrong.

Nullum arbitrium; Nul tiel agard. (There was no such award.) This was formerly the common plea of a defendant sued on an award

Nullum exemplum est idem omnibus (Co. Litt. 212). (No example is the same to all.) No precedent is the same for all cases: that is to say, alterations in the forms of conveyances are necessary to fit them for particular cases.

Nullum fecerunt arbitrium. (They never submitted to arbitration.) The name formerly applied to the plea of a defendant sued upon an award, which denied that there had been an arbitration.

Nullum iniquum est in jure præsumendum (Rep. 72). (The doing of anything contrary to justice is not to be presumed in law.) The maxim is also cited at Hard. 61. There are exceptions to it: see for instance IN ODIUM SPOLIATORIS, ETC.

Nullum simile est idem (4 Rep. 18; Co. Litt. 3*a*). (A thing which is similar to another thing is not the same as that other thing.) Cited 3 T. R. 664 (by Buller, J.), and also in several other cases, as a warning against being misled by analogies. Another form of the maxim is nullum simile est idem nisi quatuor pedibus currit, that is to say, things similar to one another are not the same unless they are on four feet with one another. Compare ARGUMENTUM A SIMILE, ETC.; and yet another form is, nullum simile quatuor pedibus currit (No simile is exactly on all fours with any other). Compare TALIS NON, ETC.

Nullum tempus aut locus occurrit regi (2 Inst. 273). "Time never runs against the Crown," is a maxim grounded on the principle that no laches can be imputed to the Sovereign, whose time and attention are supposed to be occupied by the cares of government; and therefore the ordinary Statutes of Limitations do not bind the Crown. But by the Crown Suits Act, 1769, commonly called the Nullum Tempus Act, and the Crown Suits Act, 1861, the common law rule has been altered, and the Crown is barred by lapse of time in cases within those Acts. The statutes 7 & 8 Vict. c. 105; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 53, and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 62, apply to the lands of the Duchy of Cornwall.

See NEC TEMPUS, ETC.

Nullus commodum capere potest de injuriâ suâ propriâ (Co. Litt. 148). (No one can gain an advantage by his own wrong.) This is the Latin form of NUL PRENDRA, ETC. The maxim goes much further than to say merely that no man shall profit by his own fraud: he is not allowed to profit by his own mistake, and so where he grants a lease believing that he has a sufficient estate to grant it and purporting to grant thereout, he will not be heard to say that he did not grant it under a power which in fact made the lease valid. Compare NEMO EX, ETC.

Nullus videtur dolo facere qui suo jure utitur (D. 50, 17, 55). (No one is to be deemed a wrongdoer who merely avails himself of his legal rights—that is to say, no action will lie against him for so doing.

Nul prendra advantage de son tort demesne (Branch Max. 5th ed., p. 141). (No man shall profit by wrong that he does.)

Nul Tiel Record was the name given to that plea or defence which a defendant sets up to an action brought against him on some matter of record, when he avers that "no such record" as that alleged by the plaintiff exists. See CONTRACT; FAILURE OF RECORD; JUDGMENT; MITTIMUS; RECORD, TRIAL BY.

Nunc pro tunc. In procedure, the Court sometimes directs a proceeding to be dated as of an earlier date than that on which it was actually taken, or directs that the same effect shall be produced as if it had been taken at an earlier date. Thus it will direct a judgment to be ante-dated if the entry of it has been delayed by the act of the Court, or if the plaintiff has died between the hearing and the date when the judgment was delivered. This is called entering a judgment nunc pro tunc (="now for then").

Nuncupative. See WILL.

Nunquam crescit ex post facto præteriti delicti æstimatio (Bac. Max. Reg. 8). (Once an offence has been committed its gravity is not increased by any subsequent offence.) This is a maxim of Paulus (D. 50, 17, 138) which Bacon uses to illustrate, inter alia, the proposition that if A slandered B, a commoner, and B afterwards became a peer, proceedings for scandalum magnatum would not be available for B, whose only remedy would be an action on the case. He does not quote it as an authority for the doctrine that penal statutes should not be retrospective.

Nunquam indebitatus. See NIL DEBET.

Nunquam res humanæ prosperè succedunt ubi negliguntur divinæ (Co. Litt. 95). (Human things never prosper where divine things are neglected.) Quoted in an encomium of tenure in frankalmoign.

Nuper obiit. A writ which lay for a sister and co-heir, deforced by her coparcener of lands or tenements whereof their father, brother, or any other common ancestor died seised of an estate in fee simple. It was one of the many writs abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36.

Nuper vicecomes, an ex-sheriff. See DISTRINGAS.

Nuptias non concubitus sed consensus facit (D. 50, 17, 30). (It is contract, not cohabitation, which makes a marriage.) The Roman original of Coke's Consensus non, etc. (q.v.).

Nurture. See GUARDIAN.

O

Oath of Office. See PROBATE.

Oaths are of two kinds, according as they relate to the truth of a statement as to past events, or to an intention to do something at a future time. The latter are called promissory oaths.

An oath verifying a statement as to past events is a religious asseveration by which the party calls his God to witness that what he says is the truth; consequently, an oath may be administered to a person who believes in a God, although he is not a Christian; while it cannot, in the case of atheists or very young children who have no religious belief. (See AFFIRM.) Such an oath is sometimes called "judicial" when given in a matter pending before a tribunal, and "extrajudicial" or "voluntary" in other cases. Declarations (q.v.) have been substituted for extrajudicial oaths in most cases. As to the punishment for making a false oath, see PERJURY; FALSE SWEARING. See also AFFIDAVIT; DEPOSITION.

The manner of swearing a witness which is now almost universally adopted is that authorised by the Oaths Act, 1909, s. 2, which, however, provides that where a witness so requires he is to be permitted to be sworn with the form of words formerly used and to "kiss the Book" or Testament, and that anyone who is neither a Christian nor a Jew may be sworn in any manner previously lawful, that is to say, in any way which he declares to be binding on him.

Promissory oaths include the oath of allegiance (see ALLEGIANCE; NATURALIZATION)—the official (q.v.) oath, taken by certain high officers of the Crown on accepting office—the parliamentary oath, taken by members of Parliament before taking their seats, and the judicial (q.v.) oath, taken by the judges and justices of the peace on accepting office Jurors, executors, administrators, and some other persons, are also required to take an oath for the due performance of their duties. See COMPURGATION; EX OFFICIO OATH; RECUSANT.

O.B.E. See BRITISH EMPIRE, ETC.

Obedience; Obedientia. In the canon law, as it applied before the Reformation, this meant not merely compliance with a command, but a monastic office or the administration of it.

Obit. Anciently this meant a Requiem Mass celebrated while the corpse was in the church before interment; and it also meant a mass celebrated annually for the repose of the soul of a deceased person. Many churches held lands and received annual payments in consideration of the annual celebration of obits: all such lands and payments were confiscated to the Crown by the statute 1 Edw. 6, c. 14, ss. 4, 5.

Obiter dictum. See DICTUM.

Objection. See EXCEPTION.

Oblata. In the Exchequer this anciently meant debts to the Crown which the outgoing sheriff had been unable to collect and which were handed on to the incoming sheriff for collection by him.

Oblations, or obventions, are offerings or customary payments made to the minister of a church, including fees on marriages, churchings, burials, mortuaries, etc. (q.v.), and Easter offerings.

The Baptismal Fees Abolition Act, 1872, makes it illegal for any clergyman of the Church of England or any parish clerk, etc., to demand any fee for baptism or for the registry thereof; but it does not prohibit the acceptance of any such fee spontaneously offered.

The ceremonies at the coronation of the Sovereign include the "oblation" to the King of a pall or altar-cloth of gold and a wedge of gold weighing one pound and the "oblation" of the Sword of State. The first of these oblations was omitted at the last two coronations, to the loss of the Lord Chamberlain; he is entitled to the pall and the wedge after the oblation, if he claims them.

Obligation.—I. In its most general sense, especially in jurisprudence, obligation signifies the relation between two persons, one of whom can take judicial proceedings or other legal steps to compel the other to do or abstain from doing a certain act. Although it includes both the right of the one and the duty of the other, the term is more frequently used to denote the latter.

With reference to the origin and nature of obligations, see RIGHT.

With reference to their remedies, obligations are either perfect or imperfect. A perfect obligation is one which can be directly enforced by legal proceedings in the ordinary way: thus, if A contracts to pay B £50, B can enforce the obligation by bringing an action against A. (See REMEDY.) An imperfect obligation is one which cannot be directly enforced but still has some legal effects. Imperfect obligations may be divided into two classes: (1) An obligation may have been originally perfect, but have become imperfect from the remedy having been taken away: thus, if an action on a simple contract is not brought within the time prescribed by the Statutes of Limitations, the remedy by action is gone, although the right still exists, and may become available in certain cases; for instance, if a debt is barred by the statute, the creditor may nevertheless, if he has the chance, obtain payment of it by a lien or by appropriation of payment, or the remedy may be revived by an acknowledgment by the debtor (see the various titles). (2) An obligation is imperfect if no proceedings can be taken on it, because it does not satisfy the requirements of the law in regard to form or otherwise: thus, no action can be brought on a contract under the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds (e.g., for the sale of land), so long as the contract is not in writing signed by the party to be charged; but the contract nevertheless exists for other purposes, and, therefore, money paid under it cannot be recovered back merely on the ground of its not being enforceable by action. So solicitors, medical practitioners, etc., cannot recover remuneration for their services unless they have complied with the Acts requiring them to take out certificates (q.v.).

II. In the technical sense of the term, an obligation is the same thing as a bond. In the case of a conditional bond, the operative part is sometimes called the obligation, to distinguish it from the condition. See BOND.

Obligee; Obligor. The obligee is the person who receives and the obligor is the person who gives a bond (q.v.).

Obreption. In ecclesiastical law, this is the obtaining of a faculty, dispensation, etc., by means of a false statement. Compare SUBREPTION.

Obscene; Obscenity. A publication is said to be obscene when its tendency is to deprave and corrupt those whose minds are open to such immoral influences, and into whose hands it is likely to fall. Obscene publications or libels are punishable with fine or imprisonment, being misdemeanours at common law. So also is the obtaining of such publications for purposes of sale; but the mere possession of them is not. The Obscene Publications Act, 1857, s. 1, gives justices power to issue a warrant to search for such publications upon information upon oath being made that they are kept for purposes of gain, and empowers a Court of summary jurisdiction to order them to be destroyed. As to exposing such publications, or any indecent exhibition, to view in public places see the Vagrancy Act, 1824, s. 4, and the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, s. 28. See PHOTOGRAPHS.

Obtaining Credit. As to an undischarged bankrupt obtaining credit, see s. 155 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. As to obtaining credit by fraud, see DEBTORS ACT, 1869.

Obtemperandum est consuetudini rationabili tanquam legi (4 Rep. 38). (A reasonable custom is to be obeyed as if it were law.) This is said of a custom of a manor.

Obvention. See OBLATION.

Occasio. In the time of Fleta this meant a levy made by a lord on those holding of him for war or other urgent necessity.

Occasiones. The same as assarts (q.v.).

Occultatio thesauri inventi fraudulosa (3 Inst. 133). (The concealment of discovered treasure is fraudulent.) It is in fact a misdemeanour: see TREASURE TROVE.

See THESAURUS, ETC.

Occupancy; Occupant. Occupancy is where a person takes possession of an ownerless thing.

Occupancy, as a mode of acquiring title to personal property, is of comparatively little importance in English law, being principally confined to the case of goods unclaimed or thrown away (see DERELICT; ESTRAYS; WAIFS), and game or animals feræ naturæ (e.g., fish in the sea or a river) when taken by the finder or pursuer. See GAME.

As regards land, the doctrine of occupancy was formerly of some importance. If A granted land to B. during the life of C, and B died before C, then there was no one entitled to the land, because A had parted with his right during C's life, and B's estate had determined with his own death; therefore anyone might enter on the land and retain possession during the remainder of C.'s life. A person so entering was called an occupant ("because his title is by his first occupation"), or, more commonly, a general occupant, because any one might enter in this manner. This doctrine of general or common occupancy was abolished by the Statute of Frauds, s. 12, under which, and subsequent statutes, a tenant pur auter vie may dispose of his interest by will, and in default of such disposition it forms part of his personal estate. The Wills Act, 1837, ss. 3, 6, has now been substituted for s. 12 of the Statute of Frauds.

If A grants land to B and his heirs during the life of C, and B dies before C, B's heir may enter and hold possession, and in such case he is called a special occupant, having a special right of occupation by the terms of the grant (and see ESTATE TAIL; FREEHOLD).

Occupation; Occupier.—I. In its usual sense, occupation is where a person exercises physical control over land. Thus, the lessee of a house is in occupation of it so long as he has the power of entering into and staying there at pleasure and of excluding all other persons (or all except one or more specified persons) from the use of it. Occupation is therefore the same thing as actual possession. See POSSESSION; USE AND OCCUPATION.

Permissive occupation is where the occupier has merely a licence or permission from the person entitled to the occupation.

In the law of rating, occupation signifies actual use and enjoyment, as distinguished from mere possession. Thus a freeholder is in the possession of the minerals beneath the surface of his land, and of a house which is to let, whether empty or in the custody of a caretaker, but he is not in occupation of them for the purpose of rating. To constitute a rateable occupation, it must be exclusive as well as beneficial; therefore lodgers (q.v.), licensees (supra), and servants are not rateable occupiers.

In the law of parliamentary and municipal elections, the occupation of a dwelling-house, lands, or lodgings, was one kind of qualification for being registered as a voter (known as an inhabitant occupier); but this qualification is now gone. See ELECTORAL FRANCHISE.

II. In a technical sense, "occupation is a word of art, and signifieth a putting out of a man's freehold in time of warre: and it is all one with a disseisin in time of peace." (6 Co. Litt. 249*b*.) Such occupation, however, did not produce a descent cast as a disseisin did. (See DESCENT CAST.) And in civilised warfare at the present day, occupation of an enemy's territory does not interfere with the rights of private owners, even if the territory is permanently annexed by the conquerors. As to moveables, see CAPTURE; PRIZE.

Occupavit. Anciently this was a writ which lay for him who had been ejected out of his freehold in time of war, as novel disseisin lay for him ejected in time of peace. See OCCUPATION (II.).

Occupier's Liability Notice. The popular title of the notice which the owner of land should serve on the owner of a tithe rent-charge in a case where the occupier of the land is liable for the payment of the charge under a contract made before 26th March, 1891 (Tithe Act, 1891, s. 2 (6)). Unless such contract exists the charge is payable by the landowner (ib., s. 1 (1)). See TITHE.

Octave. The eighth day after a festival, both days being counted: thus the octave of Easter was the following Sunday.

Octo Tales. See TALES.

Odio et atia, De. At a very early period this was a writ which lay for a man committed to prison upon suspicion of murder; it commanded the sheriff to inquire whether the committal was upon just cause of suspicion or only upon malice and ill-will (odio et atia): if, upon the inquisition, it was found that there was, in the modern phrase, no case against the prisoner, then another writ issued commanding the sheriff to bail him.

Œconomicus. Anciently this meant an executor.

Of Course. A step in an action or other proceeding is said to be of course when the Court or its officers have no discretion to refuse it, provided the proper formalities have been observed. In this sense the issue of a writ of summons is a matter of course. (See WRIT.) An order of course means an order made on an ex parte application to which a party is entitled on his own statement and at his own risk. The term is most commonly applied to those orders which are obtained (under Ord. 62, r. 18) by petition (q.v.) of course from the Registrar of the Chancery Division of the High Court, which, as in the case of an application to tax a solicitor's bill of costs, may be an originating application, or which, as in the case of an application to carry on proceedings under Ord. 17, may be in a pending action. An order of course improperly obtained may be set aside.

Offa. See ANGLO-SAXON LAWS.

Offence. The word "offence" has no technical meaning in English law, but it is commonly used to signify any public wrong, including, therefore, not only crimes or indictable offences, but also offences punishable on summary conviction. The word is used as part of the titles of various Acts, such as the Coinage Offences Act, 1861, and the Offences against the Person Act, 1861; and in various enactments such as the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907, s. 1, it is used as a comprehensive term to cover anything for which a Court can inflict punishment.

Offensive Trade. For the purposes of the Public Health Act, 1875, ss. 112-116, this means "the trade of blood boiler, bone boiler, fellmonger, soap boiler, tallow melter or tripe boiler or any other noxious or offensive trade, business or manufacture (ib. 112); in districts where the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1907, is in operation the following words, that is to say, "trade, business or manufacture which the local authority declare by order, confirmed by the Local Government Board [now Ministry of Health] and published in such manner as the Board [now Ministry] direct, to be an offensive trade" are substituted by s. 51 (1) of that Act for the italicised words of s. 112 of the Act of 1875. An "offensive trade" may not be established now in any urban district without the licence of the urban authority (Act of 1875, s. 112), but there is no such enactment as regards rural districts; both in urban and in rural districts the local authorities may make bye-laws in order to minimise the offensiveness of any offensive trade, no matter when established, which is lawfully carried on within their districts (Act of 1875, s. 113; Act of 1907, s. 51 (2)); in any urban district proceedings may be taken under s. 114 of the Act of 1875 for nuisance arising from "any candle house, melting-house, melting-place, or soap house or any slaughter-house, or any building or place for boiling offal or blood, or for boiling, burning or crushing bones, or any manufactory, building, or place used for any trade, business, process or manufacture causing effluvia"; but outside urban districts the only remedy is under the law relating to nuisances generally.

In the administrative county of London (to which the Acts of 1875 and 1907 do not apply) no one, since 31st December, 1891, can start the business of blood boiler, bone boiler, manure manufacturer, tallow melter, knacker or (if tallow, animal fat or oil other than olein is mixed with alkali to produce soap) soap boiler (Public Health (London) Act, 1891, s. 19), or can start without the licence of the county council the business of fellmonger, tripe boiler, slaughterer of cattle or horses or any other business duly declared to be an offensive business (ib.); bye-laws may be made for any business lawfully carried on under the section (ib.), and summary proceedings are available to abate nuisances arising from any such business (s. 21).

See ALKALI WORKS; NUISANCE.

Offer. Every agreement in substance consists of an offer made by one party and its unconditional acceptance by the other. An acceptance, with conditions or new terms added, is in effect a new offer, and does not operate as an acceptance of the original offer. An offer may be withdrawn at any time before it has been unconditionally accepted: and if the person to whom an offer is made refuses it, or neglects to accept it within a reasonable time, it is deemed to be at an end, and he cannot afterwards revive it by purporting to accept it. See ACCEPTANCE; AGREEMENT; LETTER.

Offerings. See OBLATIONS.

Offertory; Offertorium. During the Communion Service, while the portion known as the offertory sentences is being read, the churchwardens "or other fit persons," each carrying "a decent basin," go round amongst the congregation and make a collection. Before the Reformation the collection made at the part of the mass known as the offertory was for the use of the priest; the offertory since the Reformation has been applicable to "such pious and charitable uses as the minister and churchwardens shall think fit."

Office.—I. In the usual sense of the word, an office is the right and duty to exercise an employment: thus, we speak of the office of a trustee, executor, guardian, director, sheriff, judge, etc. Offices are either public or private: a public office being one which entitles a man to act in the affairs of others without their appointment or permission. Public offices are granted either for life or (as in the case of judges of the High Court) during good behaviour (dum—or quamdiu—bene se gesserit), or (as in the case of nearly all offices held of the Crown) during the pleasure of the appointor (durante bene placito), and some few offices, such as that of Earl Marshal (q.v.), are capable of being granted to a man and his heirs (in which case they are incorporeal hereditaments), or of being entailed (in which case they are also tenements). Public offices are either offices of trust, which cannot be performed by deputy (including offices of judges, justices of the peace and other judicial offices), or ministerial offices, which may be performed by deputy. See OATH.

See AMOTION; DEMISE; PUBLIC OFFICER; PUBLIC OFFICES, SALE OF.

As to private offices, see EXECUTOR; GUARDIAN; TRUSTEE; and the other titles dealing with them.

II. "Office" is frequently used in the old books as an abbreviation for "inquest of office" (q.v.); when the jury on inquest of office had found the facts to be inquired into, and the verdict or inquest had been returned, the office was said to be found and returned.

Office Copy. See COPY.

Office Found. The decision of an inquest of office (q.v.) to the effect that the king was entitled to the lands or chattels in question.

Office of Profit. The Act of Settlement, (12 & 13 Will. 3, c. 2,) s. 3, provided that no person having an office or place of profit under the Crown could be a member of the House of Commons. This enactment was repealed in 1706. The Succession to the Crown Act, 1707, s. 24, enacts that persons holding any "office or place of profit under the Crown" which was created after 25th October, 1705, and persons holding various offices specified in the section, shall be incapable of being elected or sitting as members of the House; s. 25 enacts that any member accepting any office of profit from the Crown which does not come within s. 24 shall cease to be a member but may be re-elected; s. 27 enacts that the acceptance of any new or other commission in the army or navy shall not disqualify or cause a member to lose his seat.

This enactment, if it stood by itself, would disqualify for membership nearly all the members holding salaried political offices who are now in the House. They are there by virtue of a number of Acts passed since 1705 which, while creating new offices, have expressly declared that the holders thereof should not be ineligible for election, or by virtue of the Representation of the People Act, 1867, s. 52, which enables a minister holding one of certain offices specified in Schedule H thereof to accept another of these offices without vacating his seat, or by virtue of the Re-election of Ministers Act, 1919, the effect of which is that where, within nine months of the issue of a proclamation summoning a new Parliament, a member accepts an office the holder of which is eligible for membership, then he shall not vacate his seat, and, that if the office be one included in Sch. H to the Act of 1867, he may accept any other office included in the schedule without vacating his seat. The offices of the Ministers of Agriculture and Fisheries, of Health, of Labour, of Pensions, and of Transport, and the offices of the President of the Board of Education, and of the Secretary for Scotland have been added to Sch. H of the Act of 1867 by the various enactments creating those offices: the same was the case as regards the offices of various ephemeral ministers created in connection with the war of 1914-1918. Many offices of profit, other than those which are held by politicians going in and out with the ministry of the day, have been expressly declared by various Acts to disqualify the holders for membership of the House. These offices run from the great office of Master of the Rolls, who for the first time was disqualified by s. 5 of the Judicature Act, 1875, down to minor offices, such as those of clerks in the Treasury (House of Commons Disqualification Act, 1741).

There is no statutory definition of the expression "office of profit under the Crown." Anything held direct of the Crown which purports to be a source of income, although it may in fact be nothing of the kind, is held to come within the meaning of the expression. Hence a member vacates his seat by accepting the Stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds or any other of the nominal offices mentioned under Chiltern Hundreds (q.v.). See KING'S COUNSEL.

Office of the Judge. In ecclesiastical law, it is said that "the office of the judge is promoted" when criminal proceedings are taken. The meaning of the expression is, that inasmuch as all spiritual criminal jurisdiction is in the hands of the bishop or ordinary (judex ordinarius), his office or function is set in motion whenever such proceedings are instituted. The person taking the proceedings is known technically as promotor officii judicis: he is promotor necessarius when the machinery of the Court is set in motion by the ordinary ex mero motu (q.v.) and he is promotor ordinarius in other cases.

Official, in ecclesiastical law, is the judge of an archdeacon's Court. See DIOCESAN COURTS.

Official Assignee. See ASSIGNEE.

Official Liquidator. Under the Companies Act, 1862, s. 92, after a winding-up order had been made, official liquidators were appointed for the purpose of carrying out the winding up under the direction of the Court. There is now no such thing as an "official liquidator." See LIQUIDATOR.

Official Oath. This means the form of oath set out in s. 3 of the Promissory Oaths Act, 1868, which, under s. 5 of that Act, must be taken by all ministers and other high officers of State, including, under various Acts passed since 1868, several ministers (such as those of Agriculture, Health, Pensions, Transport, etc.) whose offices have been created since that date. This oath is quite distinct from the oath of office, as to which see PROBATE.

Official Principal is an ecclesiastical officer whose duty it is to hear causes between party and party, as the delegate of the bishop or archbishop by whom he is appointed. He generally also holds the office of vicar-general (q.v.) and (if appointed by a bishop) that of chancellor (q.v.). The Official Principal of the province of Canterbury is called the Dean of Arches. See COURT OF ARCHES.

Official Receivers. These are officers, appointed by the Board of Trade, who act in bankruptcy (see Bankruptcy Act, 1914, ss. 70-75) and also in the winding-up of companies (see LIQUIDATOR; and Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, ss. 146-148).

Official Referee. See REFEREE.

Official Secrets. Legislation to prevent the disclosure of official secrets began with the Official Secrets Act, 1889. The wonder is that no Act on the subject was passed until then. So far back as 1878 a clerk in the Foreign Office was employed to copy a secret agreement between Great Britain and Russia. He took a copy for his own use and gave it to a London newspaper, in which it was published: he was arrested on an obviously untenable charge of larceny: and he was discharged because he had committed no offence known to the law. The facts in the case would have constituted a "breach of official trust" punishable under s. 12 of the Act of 1889. That Act, in addition, covered various cases of improperly obtaining or endeavouring to obtain information as to military or naval matters. It was repealed and re-enacted, with amendments and additions, by the Official Secrets Act, 1911: and the Act of 1911 was materially amended and extended by the Official Secrets Act, 1920. The Act of 1920 contains a number of remarkable ancillary provisions. The fact that a person charged with an offence has been in communication with any person "reasonably suspected" of being an agent of a foreign Power, or that he even has in his possession the address of any such person, is evidence against the accused (s. 2): a Secretary of State may require the production by cable companies of any paper relating to any telegram, whether wireless or otherwise, which he sees fit to specify (s. 4); and every person who receives letters for others must be registered with the police and must keep a record, which the police can inspect, of letters passing through his hands (s. 5). See IN CAMERA.

Official Solicitor. The Official Solicitor of the Court of Chancery was an officer whose functions consisted of protecting the Suitors Fund (q.v.) and of administering so much of that fund as came under the spending power of the Court. He was transferred to the High Court by the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 77, which made no change in the title of his office: in view, however, of the fact that the Court of Chancery is gone, he is now known as the Official Solicitor of the Supreme Court. When so directed, he acts for persons suing or being sued in forma pauperis (q.v.); he acts generally as solicitor in cases in which the Chancery Division requires his services as solicitor: he visits persons in custody for contempt: and see Ord. 22, r. 12B.

Official Trustee of Charity Lands is the secretary of the Charity Commissioners. He is a corporation sole for the purpose of taking and holding real property and leaseholds upon trust for an endowed charity in cases where it appears to the Court desirable to vest them in him. He is a bare trustee, the possession and management of the land remaining in the persons acting in the administration of the charity. See the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, ss. 47-50, and the Charitable Trusts Act, 1855, s. 15.

Official Trustees of Charitable Funds are persons in whom the money, stocks or investments of any endowed charity may be vested (either voluntarily or by order of the Court) for the purpose of security or convenient administration. They are appointed by the Charity Commissioners, with the approval of the Treasury, and form a corporation. See the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, s. 51; the Charitable Trusts Act, 1855, s. 18; and the Charitable Trusts Act, 1887, s. 4.

Official Use. Before the Statute of Uses, an official use was one which imposed a duty upon the feoffee to uses; it made him in fact what would now be called a trustee.

Officiariis non faciendis vel amovendis. This was a writ addressed to municipal corporations commanding them not to admit such and such a one to office or to remove him from office. It was superseded by the writ of quo warranto (q.v.).

Officina justitiæ. (The workshop of justice). The common law side of the Chancery was anciently so called, inasmuch as all original writs issued from it although returnable to the common law Courts. (See CHANCERY.) "This Court," says Coke, "is officina justitiæ out of which all original Writs and all Commissions which passe under the Great Seale go forth, which Great Seale is Clavis regni" (4 Inst. 80).

Officious Will. A will by which the testator fulfils the duty (or officium) of providing for his family. The expression belongs to Roman, rather than to English, law. Compare INOFFICIOUS, ETC.

Officit conatus si effectus sequatur (Jenk. Cent. 55). (An attempt becomes harmful if the effect follows), and sometimes even when it does not: see ATTEMPT.

Off-licence. "In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires . . . the expression 'justices' off-licence' means a justices' licence for the sale of any intoxicating liquor not to be consumed on the premises" (Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, s. 110).

Oil in Navigable Waters Act, 1922. This enactment was passed in order (see its title) to prevent the discharge or escape of oil into navigable waters. For the purposes of the Act "the expression 'oil' means oil of any description and includes spirit produced from oil and oil mixed with water" (s. 8 (1)): and it therefore includes petroleum and petrol as well as the crude oil (used as a substitute for coal in oil-fired marine engines and used also for internal-combustion engines of the Diesel type) against which it is more especially directed. The waters to which the Act applies are "the territorial waters of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the waters of harbours therein" (s. 8 (3)). There is nothing in the Act—or elsewhere—to prevent the discharge of oil outside the three-mile limit.

Old Age Pensions. The Old Age Pensions Act, 1908, introduced the system under which, with few exceptions, everyone on reaching the age of seventy became entitled to a weekly pension of 5s. during his life where his yearly means from other sources did not exceed £21, and to a rate of pension sinking by sums of 1s. a week according as the yearly means exceeded £21 but did not exceed £31 10s. Where the yearly means exceeded £31 10s. there was no pension.

The Act of 1908 was amended as regards details by the Old Age Pensions Act, 1911, and was materially altered by the Old Age Pensions Act, 1919, the main effect of these alterations being that now the yearly means which disqualify for a pension must amount to £49 17s. 6d., that the pension is 10s. a week where the yearly means do not exceed £26 5s., and that the pension sinks by a sliding scale when the yearly means exceed £26 5s. but do not exceed £49 17s. 6d. See BLIND PERSONS.

Old Bailey. See CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

Old Christmas Day. The 7th January, which represents the 25th December of the period before the reform of the calendar.

Old Lady Day. The 7th April, which represents the 25th March of the period antecedent to the reform of the calendar (q.v.).

Old Lammas Day. See LAMMAS.

Old Martinmas. The 24th November, corresponding to the 11th November of the period before the reform of the calendar.

Old Metals. "In the construction and for the purposes of this Act the term "dealer in old metals" shall mean "any person dealing in, buying and selling old metal, scrap metal, broken metal, or partly manufactured metal goods, or defaced or old metal goods, whether such person deals in such articles only or together with second-hand goods or marine stores, and the term 'old metals' shall mean the same articles" (Old Metal Dealers Act, 1861, s. 3). The Children Act, 1908, s. 116, gives the same definition of "old metal."

The business of a "dealer in old metals" is regulated by the Old Metal Dealers Act, 1861—to which reference should be made—as well as by the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, s. 13, which provides that he may not buy less than 112 lbs. of lead, or 56 lbs. of copper, brass, tin, pewter or German silver; by s. 116 of the Children Act, 1908; by ss. 9 and 10 of the Public Stores Act, 1875; and by s. 86 of the Public Health Amendment Act, 1907, where that Act is in force. If his course of dealing brings him within the definition of a "marine store dealer" (q.v.) he is also subject to ss. 538-542 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. See MARINE STORE DEALER.

Old Michaelmas Day. The 12th October, corresponding to the 29th September of the time before the reform of the calendar.

Old Midsummer Day. The 7th July, which corresponds to the 24th June of the period before the reform of the calendar, is still in some places a customary quarter-day. The actual expression "Old Midsummer Day" does not appear to be in use.

Old Rent. The same as accustomed rent (q.v.).

Old Style. See CALENDAR.

Old Tenures. A treatise, attributed to the reign of Edward III., dealing with the various tenures upon which land was held. It is called the Old Tenures to distinguish it from Littleton's well-known Treatise on Tenures.

Oleron, Laws of. This compilation, also known as the Rolls (or Lois or Jugements) of Oleron, derives its name from an island off the coast of the département of Charente Inférieure in France. It contains a collection of the customs of the sea which formed in the twelfth century something in the nature of a code of international maritime law for the Atlantic, corresponding to the Laws of Wisby (q.v.) for the Baltic and the Consolato del Mare (q.v.) for the Mediterranean. The compilation is alleged to have been made about 1150 by Eleanor of Aquitaine, then the wife of Louis VII. of France, and afterwards, in 1152, the wife of Henry II. of England. The earliest known copy, called La Charte D'Oleroun des Juggements de la Mer, and dating apparently from the fourteenth century, is contained in the Liber Memorandorum which is preserved in the Guildhall of the City of London. The Rutter of the Sea, by Thomas Petyt, printed in 1536, contains a translation entitled the Laws of Ye Yle of Oleron & Ye Judgementes of Ye See; this appears to have been made from the Purple Book of Bruges, which is a version slightly altered to give it a local Flemish colour. An earlier translation, by Robert Copland, had appeared in 1528.

See 37 L. Q. R. 326.

O.M. See MERIT, ETC.

Omne crimen ebrietas et incendit et detegit (Co. Litt. 247). (Drunkenness both aggravates and reveals every crime.) The loosening of the tongue resulting from over much drink does certainly often lead to the detection of criminals; but although drunkenness is no excuse for crime, it may preclude the formation of the intent which is necessary to constitute certain crimes. See DRUNKENNESS.

Omne jus aut consensus fecit aut necessitas constituit aut firmavit consuetudo (D. 1, 3, 40). (Either mutual consent has made, or necessity has established, or usage has fixed every rule of law.) This very sweeping statement of a Roman jurist does not apply accurately to our law.

Omne majus continet in se minus (5 Rep. 115). (The greater contains the less.) This, like In majore, etc., is cited as an authority for the proposition that tender of a sum larger than a debt is good tender. See MAJUS CONTINET, ETC.

Omne quod solo inædificatur solo cedit (I. 2, 1, 29). (Everything which is built into the soil is merged therein.) But there are exceptions: See ÆDIFICATIO, ETC. See also QUICQUID PLANTATUR, ETC.

Omne sacramentum debet esse de certâ scientiâ (4 Inst. 279). (Every oath ought to be of certain knowledge). And so it has long been held to be perjury (q.v.) for a witness to give evidence as to a matter of which he knows nothing. This view is now confirmed by statute: see the Perjury Act, 1911, s. 1.

Omnes licentiam habent his, quæ pro se indulta sunt, renunciare (C. 1, 3, 51). (Every one has liberty to renounce those things which are granted for his benefit.) But there are exceptions to this rule: see, for instance, AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS ACTS.

Omnes sorores sunt quasi unus hæres de unâ hæreditate (Co. Litt. 67). (All sisters are, as it were, one heir to one inheritance): for they all take as coparceners (q.v.).

Omnes subditi sunt regis servi (Jenk. Cent. 126.) (All subjects are the king's servants.) Quoted as a comment on a decision of the Exchequer that in an action of trespass or debt or in which outlawry lay, "servant" was not a good "addition" (q.v.); for, said the Court, "every man is a servant of the law and of the king."

Omne testamentum morte consummatum est (Co. Litt. 322; 3 Rep. 29). (Every will is completed by death): until the death of the testator it is of no effect.

Omnia delicta in aperto leviora sunt (8 Rep. 127). (All offences are less grave when they are committed openly.) But this statement is too sweeping; it scarcely applies, for instance, to indecent exposure. But the Legislature has, for instance, made poaching by day punishable with less severity than poaching by night.

Omnia præsumuntur contra spoliatorem (Branch, Max. 80). (All things are presumed against a wrongdoer.) This maxim, which is practically identical with IN ODIUM, ETC. (q.v.), embodies the grounds of the decision in the leading case of Armory v. Delamire (1 Str.

504): there it was held that where A had unlawfully detained jewels (of which only the size was proved) the property of B, then the jewels must—unless produced—be presumed to have been of the finest quality.

Omnia præsumuntur legitimè facta donec probetur in contrarium (Co. Litt. 232). (All things are presumed to have been legitimately done, until the contrary is proved.) See Ex DIUTURNITATE, ETC. Where there is question of official acts there is a rebuttable presumption that all necessary conditions, precedents and formalities have been complied with.

Omnia præsumuntur ritè et solemniter esse acta (Co. Litt. 6). (All things are presumed to be correctly and solemnly done—that is to say, until the contrary is proved.) See Ex DIUTURNITATE, ETC.

Omnia quæ jure contrahuntur, contrario jure pereunt (D. 50, 17, 100). (All things which are made by a law perish as the result of a contrary law.) Compare LEGES POSTERIORES, ETC.; NATURALE EST, ETC.

Omnia quæ sunt uxoris sunt ipsius viri; non habet uxor potestatem sui, sed vir (Co. Litt. 112). (All things which belong to the wife belong to the husband; it is not the wife but the husband who has control of the wife's property.) Compare UXOR NON, ETC. But see now MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY.

Omnibus. For the purposes of the Town Police Clauses Acts, 1847 and 1889, the term "omnibus" when used in these Acts is defined in s. 3 of the Act of 1889. For the purposes of the Metropolitan Public Carriages Act, 1869, there is no definition of the term "omnibus": but the term "stage carriage" (q.v.), as defined in s. 4 of that Act, clearly includes everything known as an omnibus.

Omnibus pœnalibus judiciis et ætati et imprudentiæ succurritur (D. 50, 17, 108). (In all criminal proceedings assistance is given to age and imprudence.) That is to say, the rigour of the law is mitigated in the case of offenders who are of tender age or who, for any reason, have not such intent as is necessary to constitute a crime. Formerly the policy of our law was to hang felons even of tender years, and down to recent years a convicted murderer was almost invariably hanged unless he or she was a raving lunatic. All this is now changed. A murderer who is mad "but north-north-west" escapes even though there be method in his madness; and illustrations of the recent tendency of the law will be found under CHILDREN; FIRST OFFENDER; INFANTICIDE; PROBATION.

See also CATCHING BARGAINS.

Omnis actio est loquela (Co. Litt. 292). (Every action is a complaint.) And so, says Coke, a release of all loquelæ was a release of all actiones.

Omnis conclusio boni et veri judicii sequitur ex bonis et veris præmissis et dictis juratorum (Co. Litt. 226). (Every conclusion arrived at in a proper and good judgment is the conclusion to be drawn from the premises that have been properly and reasonably found by the jurymen.) Coke is speaking of a special verdict. See VERDICT.

Omnis innovatio plus novitate perturbat quam utilitate prodest (2 Buls. 338). (Every innovation causes more confusion by what is new in it than good by what is useful in it.) At a public meeting on 7th November, 1922, the Prime Minister, Mr. Bonar Law, said, in connection with a proposed change in our fiscal system: "The advantage you would get by changing the system would not be as great as the disadvantage which would come from the disturbance it would cause." He had probably never even heard of Bulstrode's Reports: and what he said shows only that, in all ages the sensible man—whether it be Lord Coke in 1615 or Mr. Bonar Law in 1922—thinks on much the same lines.

Compare JUDICIS EST JUS, ETC.; MISERA, ETC.; VIA, ETC.

Omnis interpretatio si fieri potest ita fienda est in instrumentis, ut omnes contrarietates amoveantur (Jenk. Cent. 96). (If it be possible, deeds are to be so interpreted that all inconsistencies are got rid of.) Compare INTERPRETATIO TALIS, ETC.

Omnis nova constitutio futuris temporibus formam imponere debet, non præteritis (2 Inst. 95). (Every new law should regulate the future and not the past.) Compare LEGES ET CONSTITUTIONES, ETC.

Omnis privatio præsupponit habitum (Co. Litt. 339). (Every deprivation presupposes former possession.) Quoted in support of the proposition that an estate tail could not be discontinued except by one seised by force of the entail. See DISCONTINUANCE. Compare NEMO DAT, ETC.

Omnis querela et omnis actio injuriarum limitata est infra certa tempora (Co. Litt 114). (Every plaint and every action for injuries is limited within certain times.) Quoted from Bracton by Coke in connection with the common law rule as to time within the memory (q.v.) of living men.

Omnis ratihabitio retrotrahitur et mandato priori æquiparatur (Co. Litt. 207). (Every ratification of an act already done has a retrospective effect, and is equal to a previous request to do it.) Quoted in connection with the proposition that an unauthorised payment of a debt by a stranger is to be deemed payment by the creditor as on the date of actual payment if the creditor subsequently ratifies it. See RATIFICATION.

Omnium contributione sarciatur quod pro omnibus datum est (4 Bing. 121). (That which is given for all is made good by the contribution of all.) This is the principle on which the doctrine of general average is founded. See AVERAGE.

One Hundred Thousand Pound Clause. In a recovery (q.v.), or common recovery, it was at one time the practice for the tenant for life to convey to the tenant to the præcipe (q.v.) for the life of the tenant for life, subject to the proviso that, unless £100,000 should be paid on the day after the time within which the recovery was to be suffered, the use should cease. As the sum specified—it might be any sum—was always far in excess of the value of the estate, the effect of this proviso (known as "The one hundred thousand pound clause") was to work an avoidance of the estate of the tenant to the præcipe; and this avoidance in no way affected the validity of the recovery, it being necessary only that there should be a tenant to the præcipe when the recovery was suffered.

Oneranda pro ratione portionis, De. A writ which formerly lay for a joint tenant, or a tenant in common, who had been distrained for more rent than he was liable to pay.

Onerous. A contract, lease, share or other right, is said to be onerous when the obligations attaching to it counterbalance or exceed the advantage to be derived from it, either absolutely or with reference to the particular possessor.

As to disclaimer of onerous property by a trustee in bankruptcy, see DISCLAIMER.

"O. Ni." Coke explains this abbreviation as follows: "The course of the Exchequer is that as soon as a sheriffe or escheator enters into his account for issues, amerciaments and mean profits, to mark upon his head O NI, which is as much as to say, Oneratur nisi habet sufficientem exonerationem, and presently he is become the King's debtor and a debet set upon his head, and thereupon the parties paravaile are become debtors to the sheriffe or escheator and discharged against the King"—the effect of which seems to be that the sheriff, unless he could show cause to the contrary, became himself liable to pay the moneys that he was empowered to get in, but had his remedy over against those who should have paid such moneys.

On-licence. "In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires . . . the expression 'justices' on-licence' means a justices' licence for the sale of any intoxicating liquor for consumption on the premises" (Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, s. 110).

Onus episcopale. See EPISCOPALIA.

Onus probandi. See PROOF.

Open. An open account means one which has not been stated or settled between the parties: see ACCOUNT SETTLED; ACCOUNT STATED. As to reopening accounts, see FALSIFY. As to reopening a foreclosure, see that title.

The trial or hearing of an action at nisi prius is commenced by the junior counsel for the plaintiff "opening the pleadings," that is, stating shortly the substance of them to the jury, after which the senior counsel for the plaintiff addresses the jury on the whole case. In the Chancery Division, the trial or hearing of an action commences with the speech of the plaintiff's senior counsel, which is called the opening. See REPLY.

Formerly where an estate had been sold under the order of the Court of Chancery, the Court was in the habit of "opening the biddings," that is, of allowing a person to offer a larger price than the estate was originally sold for, and of directing a resale accordingly. But this practice was abolished, except in the case of fraud or improper management of the sale, by the Sale of Land by Auction Act, 1867, s. 7.

See CONTRACT.

Open Court. See IN CAMERÂ.

Open Cover. An informal unstamped agreement by which a marine insurance company undertakes to issue a policy on cargo not yet shipped as soon as the cargo is actually shipped and the premium has been paid. The policy will be issued not only to the person who received the "open cover" but also to any person who produces it to the company. Effect is given as a matter of course to such agreements; but they cannot be enforced in law.

Open Fields or Meadows are fields which are undivided, but belong to separate owners; the part of each owner is marked off by boundaries until the crop has been carried, when the pasture is shared promiscuously by the joint herd of all the owners. See DOLE; LOT MEADOWS.

Open Policy. An unvalued marine policy: see POLICY.

Open Spaces. The law as to open spaces which have been placed under the management of trustees, with a view to the preservation and regulation thereof as open spaces, has been consolidated by the Open Spaces Act, 1906. Section 20 of that Act defines the meaning of the expression "open space." It is under this Act (see ss. 9-11), and the enactments (for which see the Schedule to the Act) repealed and replaced by it that local authorities have acquired and now control the many disused burial grounds which are used as recreation grounds in various cities and towns.

See also LOCAL IMPROVEMENTS.

Operarii. Tenants of small portions of a manor who held by the service of doing a stipulated number of days' work in the year for the lord.

Operatio. A day's work due to the lord by an operarius.

Operative Part. In a conveyance, lease, mortgage or other formal instrument, the operative part is that which carries out the main object of the instrument. Thus, in a conveyance or lease, the operative part consists of the operative words of conveyance or demise and the parcels; sometimes everything which follows the recitals (q.v.) is called the operative part, for the term has no fixed meaning. In a mortgage, the operative part consists of (1) the covenant for payment of the mortgage debt; (2) the conveyance of the mortgaged property; and (3) the proviso for reconveyance.

Operative Words. In the original sense of the phrase, operative words are words which have an operation or effect in the creation or transfer of an estate. Thus, in a gift of land to A and B and the heirs of the body of A, the word "heirs" is an operative word, because it creates an estate of inheritance in A; and the words "of the body" are operative words, because they limit an estate tail. (See HEIR.) More often, however, such words are called words of limitation (q.v.), and the term "operative words" is applied to those words which pass an estate. Thus, the words "enfeoff," "grant," "bargain and sell," "demise," "alien," "release," and "confirm," are or were used in conveyances of freehold land as operative words, that is, for the purpose of effecting an alienation of the land from the grantor to the grantee. See the various titles.

Opinion. The judgments delivered in the House of Lords by the Law Lords are technically known as "opinions." The mere expression of opinions by any judge as to matters not decided in a case are known as dicta (see DICTUM). The advice given by counsel upon the facts set out in a case submitted to him is known as an opinion; it is quite distinct from "Advice on Evidence" (q.v.).

See ADVICE OF COURT.

Opinion Evidence. See EVIDENCE.

Opium. See DRUGS, DANGEROUS.

Oportet quod certa res deducatur in judicium (Jenk. Cent. 84). (A thing which is certain must be brought to judgment); that is to say, there must be no doubt as to what precisely it is that the Court has to decide. Quoted in connection with a decision of the Exchequer as a double plea. See DUPLICITY.

Opposer. An officer of the Green Wax (q.v.) whose office was abolished before 1798; he does not appear in the list of Green Wax Officials at that time.

Oppression is the common law misdemeanour committed by a public officer, who, under colour of his office, wrongfully inflicts upon any person any bodily harm, imprisonment, or other injury. In 1762 the offence was held to have been committed where justices refused licences to publicans who had not voted as the justices wished. Prosecutions for the offence are now unknown.

Optima est lex quæ minimum relinquit arbitrio judicis; optimus judex qui minimum sibi (Bac. Aphor. 46). (That system of law is best which confides as little as possible to the discretion of a judge; that judge the best who trusts as little as possible to himself.) This does not mean that a judge should be weak; what it does mean is that he should not rely upon his own views where there is law to guide him. Compare DISCRETIO EST, ETC.

Optima legum interpres est consuetudo (Plow. Com. 336). (Custom is the best interpreter of the law.) This is a maxim of the civil law which was quoted by Chief Baron Saunders—who said optima, not optimus—in 1568 in connection with the question whether the King was entitled to all mines of copper if the copper contained gold or silver (Plowd. 336). In 1874 the Court of King's Bench (L. R. 9 Q. B. 339) was manifestly influenced by the view embodied in the maxim when it declined to vary the construction which had always been put upon a statute of Queen Anne.

Optima statuti interpretatrix est (omnibus particulis ejusdem inspectis) ipsum statutum (8 Co. 117; Wing. 239). (The best interpreter of a statute is (all the separate parts being considered) the statute itself.) Compare INJUSTUM EST, ETC.

Optimus interpres rerum usus (2 Inst. 282). (The best interpreter of things is usage.) A wider form of Optima legum, etc. But evidence of usage is inadmissible to vary, though admissible to explain, a written contract; and evidence of the existence of a custom which is bad in law is never admissible. See MALUS USUS, ETC.: compare EX NON SCRIPTO, ETC.

Option. A lease of lands or houses may contain a provision that the lessee shall have the option of purchasing the property within a certain period, upon giving the lessor notice of his intention to exercise it. Such a notice constitutes a contract of purchase, the specific performance of which may be compelled. The exercise of an option relates back to the date of the lease or other instrument by which it was given, so as to operate a constructive conversion of the property from that date. If, therefore, the lessor (being a freeholder) should die intestate before the option is exercised, the reversion will pass to his heirs; but when the option is exercised, the reversion will become personal property, and pass away from the heir to the next of kin of the deceased. See ELECTION.

In ecclesiastical law, an archbishop had a customary prerogative to name a clerk or chaplain of his own, to be provided for by each bishop of his province who was consecrated by him. In lieu of this right, it was usual for the bishop to make over by deed to the archbishop the next presentation of such dignity or benefice within the bishop's see and disposal, as the archbishop should choose: hence, this was called his option. This privilege was incidentally abolished by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners Act, 1840, s. 42, which forbade a spiritual person to assign any patronage or presentation belonging to him by virtue of his office.

As regards commercial transactions, an option is the privilege (acquired for a consideration) of calling for delivery or of making delivery of, or both, within a specified time, of some particular stock or article at a specified price to a specified amount. An option is valid if—which is not always the case—it is intended that the stock or article shall actually change hands. Options must be stamped as contract notes (Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, s. 79 (1)).

Optional Writ. Formerly this was the name of any original writ which commanded the defendant to either do a thing or else show cause why he had not done it.

Ora. A Danish coin introduced into England by the Danish invaders. From the Laws of Edward the Elder and Guthrum (circa 920), c. 7, it would appear to have been at one time worth something like thirty pennies. In Domesday Book the word is used as meaning an ounce.

Orando pro regne et regno. Before the Reformation it was customary for a new Parliament to petition the King to require the clergy to offer up prayers for the kingdom and for a good understanding between the King and the Parliament; and thereupon the writ De orando pro rege et regno (to pray for the King and the kingdom) was issued to the clergy.

Orator; Oratrix (from Latin, orare, to pray) were the names for a male and female plaintiff in a Chancery suit before the statute 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86.

Ordeal. The most ancient species of trial was that by ordeal, which was distinguished by the appellation of judicium Dei, and sometimes by that of vulgaris purgatio, to distinguish it from the canonical purgation, which was by the oath of the party. It was of two kinds: fire ordeal and water ordeal; the former being confined to persons of rank, the latter being open to the common people. Fire ordeal was performed either by taking up in the hand a piece of red-hot iron of one, two, or three pounds' weight, or else by walking barefoot and blindfold over nine red-hot plough-shares laid lengthwise, at unequal distances, and if the party escaped unhurt he was adjudged innocent; if otherwise, he was condemned as guilty. Water ordeal was performed either by plunging the bare arm up to the elbow in boiling water, or by casting the suspected person into a river or pond of cold water; and if in the former instance his arm was unburnt, or if in the latter instance he floated without any effort to swim, it was deemed evidence of his innocence; if otherwise, of his guilt. The ordeal was abolished in the reign of Henry III., when the more rational process of trying the guilt or innocence of an accused person by means of compurgation (q.v.) was substituted for it.

See APPEAL OF FELONY; BATTLE, TRIAL BY.

Ordel. Ordeal.

Ordelf; Oredelf. Used in old charters as meaning the right to mine for metals on one's own land.

Order. In its simplest sense, an order is a mandate or direction. Thus, bills of exchange, cheques, etc., are said to be drawn to order when the payee is entitled to transfer the right to claim payment to any person whom he may direct. See BILL OF EXCHANGE; BEARER; DELIVERY ORDER; NEGOTIABLE.

More commonly, however, order signifies a direction or command by a Court of judicature, and directions or commands termed "rules" are included in "orders" (Judicature Act, 1873, s. 100). As a general rule, "order" is opposed to "judgment," and therefore denotes (i) orders made in summary proceedings on petition or summons (see SUMMARY), and (ii) orders made in actions on interlocutory applications, whether before or after final judgment (see INTERLOCUTORY). Such are the ordinary orders for discovery and production of documents, orders for time, etc., made in the course of almost every action. In the practice of the King's Bench Division, an order to show cause, or order nisi, is an order obtained by one party on an ex parte application, and calls on the other party to show cause within a certain time why a certain order should not be made; and then the order is either discharged or made absolute. The order to show cause is not granted unless the applicant has a primâ facie case. But now Ord. 52, r. 2, provides that no application for a rule (q.v.) nisi or order to show cause shall be made in any action, or to set aside, remit or enforce an award, or for attachment, or to answer the matters in an affidavit, or to strike off the rolls, or against the sheriff to pay money levied on an execution; and this, together with r. 3 (see MOTION) of the same Order, has very much reduced the number of applications for orders nisi; but they may still be made in a few cases, as, for instance, for the assignment of an administration bond in order that it may be sued on, and (Crown Office Rules, r. 235) all applications on the Crown side, made by motion to a Divisional Court, are to be for an order nisi. See RULE

As to orders of course, see OF COURSE.

Orders are also issued by subordinate legislative authorities. Such are Orders in Council, or orders issued by the Privy Council in the name of the King, either in exercise of the royal prerogative or in pursuance of an Act of Parliament. The Rules of Court under the Judicature Act are grouped together in the form of orders, each order dealing with a particular subject-matter. See RULE.

Order and Disposition. The "order and disposition section" of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, is s. 38: it is that on which the doctrine of reputed ownership rests. It is so called from its containing the provision that all goods being at the commencement of the bankruptcy in the possession, order or disposition [that is, in the possession or apparent control] of the bankrupt in his trade or business, by the consent and permission of the true owner, of which goods and chattels the bankrupt is reputed owner, shall be divisible amongst his creditors: the section, however, provides that choses in action, other than debts due or growing due to the bankrupt in the course of his trade or business, shall not be deemed goods within the meaning of the section. See REPUTED OWNERSHIP; POSSESSION.

Order in Council. This is an Order made by the King "by and with the advice of His Majesty's Privy Council"; or an Order of a Colonial Viceroy with the advice of the Privy or Executive Council of the British Colony or Possession to which the Order relates.

Some Orders in Council come within the class of Statutory Orders (q.v.), that is to say, of Orders made under statutory authority. The issue of Orders in Council is expressly authorised by various modern statutes, the effect of this authorization being to give the Government a power to legislate, subject in many cases to the right of Parliament to nullify the Order in Council by an address disapproving thereof.

Other Orders in Council are made by virtue of the royal prerogative (q.v.). Thus the Civil Service of the United Kingdom is regulated by Orders in Council made under the prerogative.

Order of Council. An Order in Council (q.v.) is an Order made by the Sovereign by and with the advice of the Privy Council: an Order of Council is an Order made by the Privy Council without the concurrence of the Sovereign.

The Municipal Corporations Act, 1883, s. 6, provided for the issue of Orders of Council: but the section has never been acted on. The Acts relating to dentists, medical men, chemists and veterinary surgeons, however, contain provisions which authorise the issue of Orders of Council for certain purposes (see, for instance, s. 31 of the Dentists Act, 1878) and are, in fact, availed of.

Order of Reference. In the practice of the King's Bench Division, when an interlocutory judgment (e.g., by default) is obtained in an action brought for a sum which, though unascertained, is "substantially a matter of calculation" (e.g., for principal and interest), the Court or a judge may refer it to an officer of the Court to be ascertained (Ord. 36, r. 57). Before the Judicature Acts a matter could in a like case be referred to one of the Masters under s. 94 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852. See INQUIRY; INQUIRY, WRIT OF.

Orders, Holy. See HOLY ORDERS.

Orders other than of Knighthood. See MERIT; COMPANION OF HONOUR; and DISTINGUISHED SERVICE. See also IMPERIAL SERVICE; VICTORIA AND ALBERT; CROWN OF INDIA; SAINT JOHN—which are all Orders of a sort.

Ordinance.—According to Coke, "the difference between an act of parliament and an ordinance in parliament, is, for that the ordinance wanteth the threefold consent [of lords, commons, and crown], and is ordained by one or two of them" (4 Inst. 25). The enactments which were passed during the period between the outbreak of the Civil War and the Restoration (1642-1660) were all passed without the consent of the Crown, and are known as ordinances. According to other old writers, an ordinance was in the nature of a declaration by the Crown in answer to a petition by the Commons, on a question as to the law applicable to a given case, while a statute was an enactment of new law. In modern times the term ordinance is applied to the instrument by which the King creates a new order of knighthood, and to what correspond in Crown Colonies to Acts of Parliament here and in the self-governing colonies.

Ordinance of the Forest. The same as ORDINATIO FORESTÆ (q.v).

Ordinary is the bishop of a diocese when exercising the ecclesiastical jurisdiction annexed to his office, he being judex ordinarius within his diocese. See BISHOP.

The name was also applied to the chaplain of Newgate, whose principal duty was to prepare condemned prisoners for death. There was also formerly an Ordinary of Assize and Sessions, who attended on behalf of the bishop to ascertain whether claimants of benefit of clergy (q.v.) could read the "neck-verse" (q.v.). See JUDGE ORDINARY.

Ordinatio forestæ. This title was applied to the statutes 33 Edw. 1, statute 5, and 34 Edward 1, statute 5, each of which related to the forest law.

Ordination is the ceremony by which a bishop confers on a person the privileges and powers necessary for the execution of sacerdotal functions in the Church. He thereby becomes a clerk in Holy orders, and capable of being presented and admitted to a benefice. (See ADMISSION; BENEFICE; RECTOR; VICAR.)

Ordinatione contra servientes, De. A writ which anciently lay against a servant for leaving his master contrary to the Statute of Labourers, 23 Edw. 3.

Ordnance, Board of. This was a body of officials which from the sixteenth century provided the munitions of war required for the army and the navy, and more especially for the navy, the army until after the Restoration having no regular establishment in time of peace. The head of the Board was the Master of the Ordnance (q.v.), who afterwards developed into the Master-General of the Ordnance. The Board grew into an important separate department. For many years before 1828 the Master-General of the Ordnance was a member of the Cabinet, and necessarily a member of one House of Parliament or the other. Up to 1855 the Board remained independent of the Secretary of War, and was represented in Parliament by two of its members. In 1855 its powers were transferred to the Secretary of War by the Ordnance Board Transfer Act, 1855. The Army Ordnance Corps now carries out under the direction of the Secretary of State for War work which would have been allocated to the Board.

Ordnance Debentures. Bills payable by the treasurer of the Board of Ordnance which that body formerly issued in payment for stores, etc., purchased by them.

Ordnance Survey. This is an accurate and authoritative survey of the United Kingdom, made under the authority of the Ordnance Survey Act (4 & 5 Vict. c. 30). The work was originally entrusted to the Ordnance Board (q.v.), from whom it passed in 1855 to the Secretary of State for War, in 1870 to the Commissioners of Works (under the Survey Act, 1870, and in 1889 to the Board of Agriculture (under the Board of Agriculture Act, 1889). The actual work has been done by the Royal Engineers. Maps of the entire country, prepared from the survey, have been made on various scales. They are not evidence. For definition of the term "ordnance map," see the Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 25.

Ore tenus means orally. See DEMURRER.

Orfgild. According to Lambarde, this was compensation made by the hundred or county for any wrong done by a member of a frankpledge.

Orgild. According to Spelman, this meant "without compensation."

Origin. A declaration as to the place in which goods were manufactured or grown, made before a prescribed person by a shipper of the goods before they are actually shipped, is known as a certificate of origin. This must be produced in most foreign countries before the goods can be unloaded. It is obviously necessary in countries whose duties vary according to the origin of goods.

As to domicile of origin, see DOMICILE.

Original. See CONVEYANCE; EVIDENCE; TITLE; WRIT.

Originalia Rolls. Rolls running from 1236 to 1837, in which were recorded the estreats sent from the Chancery to the Exchequer. They are now in the Record Office.

Originating Summons. See SUMMONS.

Origine propriâ neminem posse voluntate suâ eximi manifestum est (Cod. 10, 38, 4). (It is manifest that no one is able, of his own will, to get rid of his proper origin.) No one could at common law divest himself of his natural allegiance. As to the present law, see NATURALIZATION.

Compare NEMO PATRIAM, ETC.

Ornaments Rubric. This is the rubric (q.v.) in the Book of Common Prayer (1662) which directs that "such Ornaments of the Church and of the Ministers thereof . . . as were in this Church of England by the Authority of Parliament in the Second Year of the reign of King Edward the Sixth" shall be used.

Orphan. A minor without a living parent. It is sometimes used as meaning a minor who has lost one parent.

The Lord Mayor and Aldermen of the City of London, sitting in their Court of Orphans, are by custom the guardians of the persons and property of the minor children of a freeman who—as now seldom happens—has died in the City. Apart from this special case, the Lord Chancellor is the guardian, not merely of orphans, but of minors generally.

Ortelli. The claws of a dog's foot: used in connection with forest law.

Osborne Morgan's Act. A popular title of the Burial Laws Amendment Act, 1880.

Os demonstrat quod cor ruminat (3 Buls. 260). (The mouth shows what it is that the heart is thinking.) Compare SERMO EST, ETC.

"Oswald's Law." The popular title of a law made by King Edgar about 964 at the suggestion of St. Oswald, the bishop of Worcester. During the anarchy produced by the Danish invasions, the parochial clergy had become to a large extent non-celibate and the monasteries had in many cases been broken up. Under Oswald's law, celibacy became again the rule amongst the clergy and the monks were restored.

Oswald's Law Hundred. According to Camden, this was a hundred in Worcestershire containing about 300 hides of land which St. Oswald obtained from King Elgar as an endowment for St. Mary's Church in Worcester. It was exempt from the sheriff's jurisdiction.

Otter. A small board weighted on one edge so that it floats upright, which is attached to a line in the same way that an ordinary kite is attached to the string. When pushed out from the bank of a lake or river it works through the water parallel to anyone walking along the bank and holding the line. On the line are flies to catch fish. The use of any otter (or of various other poaching instruments) for the capture of salmon or trout is prohibited by the Salmon Fishery Act, 1861, s. 8 (2) and the Salmon Fishery Act, 1873, s. 18 (1).

See s. 4 of the Act of 1873.

Oulter le mer. (Beyond seas.) This was one of the recognised essoins (q.v.).

Ounce. The ounce consists of one-sixteenth part of the imperial standard pound (Weights and Measures Act, 1878, s. 14). It therefore consists of 437½ grains. As to other ounces, see TROY WEIGHT; APOTHECARIES' WEIGHT.

Oust; Ouster. To oust a person from land was to take the possession from him so as to deprive him of the freehold. An ouster might be either rightful or wrongful. A wrongful ouster was a disseisin (q.v.).

Blackstone divides ouster into abatement, intrusion, disseisin, discontinuance and deforcement; he also applies the term to chattels real, but this use of the word does not seem to be warranted by the old writers. See DEFORCEMENT.

Ousterlemain was a writ directing the seisin or possession of land to be delivered out of the hands of the Crown into those of a person entitled to it. It was the mode by which an heir in ward of land held of the Crown ut de honore obtained possession of it on attaining majority. (See WARDSHIP; LIVERY.) Ousterlemain also meant a judgment on a monstrans de droit, deciding that the Crown had no title to a thing which it had seized. See AMOVEAS MANUS; CAPITE; TENURE IN.

Ouster le mer. This is a misprint in Cowell (1607) for OULTER LE MER (q.v.), and it has been printed in one law dictionary after another for the last three hundred years without regard to the fact that except in the dictionaries there never was such a form of words.

Outas = Utas (q.v.).

Outcry. Used in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries as a synonym for auction. See OUTROPER.

Outfangtheft. The franchise of outfangtheft, according to Britton, was the right of a lord to bring into his own jurisdiction and to hang upon his own gallows one of his own men who had been condemned for theft by someone else. Bracton and Fleta, on the other hand, say that it meant the right of the lord to try thieves who had come into the lord's jurisdiction after stealing elsewhere; and Rastell (1579) says that it meant the right of the lord to bring back into his jurisdiction and to try there any man of his own who had stolen elsewhere. Compare INFANGTHEFT.

Outland. In Saxon times this meant the parts of a manor or estate which were let to tenants: inland meant the part—corresponding to the modern demesne and home-farm—which the lord retained for his own use.

Outlaw is a person who is put out of the protection of the law by judgment of outlawry (q.v.) See WAIVED. The word outlaw is derived from the Anglo-Saxon, ûtlaga, ûtlah, = out of the law. (See UTLAWRY.) "In the reign of king Ælfred," says Coke, "and until a good while after the Conquest, no man could have been outlawed but for felonie, the punishment whereof was death. . . . But in the beginning of the raigne of king Edward the third, it was resolved by the judges, for avoyding of inhumanity and of effusion of Christian blood, that it should not be lawfull for any man, but the sherife onely (having lawfull warrant therefore) to put to death any man outlawed, though it were for felonie" (Co. Litt. 128*b*) Up to then an outlaw was caput lupinum (q.v.). See WAIF.

Outlawry. Where an indictment has been found against a person and summary process (see PROCESS) proves ineffectual to compel him to appear, process of outlawry may be issued, though in practice this is never done. The preliminary process of issuing successively writs of venire facias ad respondendum, distringas and capias ad respondendum (see those titles), is first gone through; and if the defendant still eludes justice, a writ of exigent is awarded, by which the sheriff is required to proclaim the defendant and call him on five County Court days (of the old Sheriff's County Court) one after another upon pain of outlawry: a writ of proclamation is also issued and executed. If the defendant still fails to appear, judgment of outlawry is pronounced by one of the coroners for the county: judgment may also be signed in the Crown Office, and a capias utlagatum (q.v.) issued. See QUINT-EXACT.

The effect of outlawry seems to be that the outlaw becomes liable to imprisonment, forfeits his property to the Crown (his goods immediately and his chattels real and the profits of his land upon office found) (see OFFICE), is incapacitated from maintaining civil proceedings, and becomes subject to other disabilities (see ATTAINDER).

Formerly there were also two kinds of outlawry in civil proceedings, one (called outlawry on mesne process) which was used to compel a defendant to appear in an action, the other (called outlawry after judgment) which was a means of execution to enforce a judgment. The former was abolished by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 24; the latter by the Civil Procedure Acts Repeal Act, 1879, s. 3.

Outparters. The same as outputters (q.v.): the latter seems to be the correct form of the word.

Outpenny. See INPENNY.

Outputters. These were persons in the franchise of Redesdale who maintained and equipped robbers operating in the adjacent counties of Northumberland, Cumberland and Westmorland: see the statute 9 Hen. 5, st. 1, c. 7, and compare INTAKERS.

Outriders. Described by Jacob (1739) as "bailiffs errant" employed by sheriffs to summon persons to the old County Court: mentioned in the statute 14 Edw. 3, c. 9.

Outrooper; Outroper. An auctioneer. This was at one time a title of the officer of the City of London now known as the Common Crier and Serjeant-at-Arms. "We do . . . create in . . . the said City . . . a certain office, called outroper or Common Crier . . . for the selling of household stuff, apparel, leases . . . and other things . . . by open and public claim, commonly called outcry and sale," says Charles I. in the charter of 1638.

Outstanding. Where land is vested in a trustee or mortgagee, the cestui que trust or mortgagor can only deal with the beneficial or equitable interest, the legal estate in the land being, as it is said, outstanding in the trustee or mortgagee. If the trust or mortgage is satisfied without the legal estate being revested in the cestui que trust or mortgagor, and he contracts to sell the land, the purchaser may require him to get in the legal estate, that is, to obtain a reconveyance of it from the trustee or mortgagee.

As to outstanding terms, more often called attendant terms, see TERM.

Outstroke. The right of conveying minerals to the surface from one mine through another mine is known (as regards the mine through which the minerals are brought) as outstroke and (as regards the mine from which the minerals are brought) as instroke.

Over. In conveyancing, the word "over" is used to denote a contingent limitation intended to take effect on the failure of a prior estate.

Thus, in what is commonly called the "name and arms clause" (q.v.) in a will or settlement, there is generally a proviso that if the devisee fails to comply with the condition the estate is to go to someone else; this is a limitation or gift over. See PLEAD.

Overdue. A bill of exchange is overdue when the time fixed for its payment is passed. Such a bill is subject to the peculiar rule, that anyone taking it takes it subject to the equities of prior holders. (See BILL OF EXCHANGE; EQUITY.)

An overdue ship is one of which news has not been received for such a time as to give rise to the presumption or probability that she has been lost.

Overhernissa. In Anglo-Saxon times this meant either contumacy or a forfeiture.

Overreaching Clause, in a resettlement, is a clause which saves the powers of sale and leasing annexed to the estate for life created by the original settlement, when it is desired to give the tenant for life the same estate and powers under the resettlement. The clause is so called because it provides that the resettlement shall be overreached by the exercise of the old powers. If the resettlement were executed without a provision to this effect, the powers annexed to the estate for life created by the original settlement would be gone after the resettlement: but this is not now a matter of much importance because the powers given to a tenant for life by the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890, remain notwithstanding the resettlement; and the clause is therefore frequently omitted, although it is, on the whole better to insert it. See RE-SETTLEMENT.

Overriding Trust. A trust which takes precedence of other trusts previously declared.

Oversamessa. In early times this meant a fine for failure to pursue a robber or a murderer.

Overseers. The statute 14 Eliz. c. 5, created the office of overseer in order that they might assist the churchwardens in the care of the poor. The Poor Relief Act, 1601, repealed the sections of the Act of Elizabeth which related to overseers, and provided that in every parish two or more justices living in or near the parish should annually nominate under their hands and seals the churchwardens, and from two to four householders of the parish, to be overseers of the poor. The Poor Law (Overseers) Act, 1814, provided that the nomination should be made on 25th March or within fourteen days thereafter. Such nomination is still the method of appointing overseers in places to which the Local Government Act, 1894, does not apply. Such places are not now common. Under s. 5 (1) of the Act of 1894 the power of appointing is now vested in the council of every rural parish having a parish council; under s. 19 (5) it is vested in the parish meeting of a parish which has no parish council; and under s. 33 of the same Act the Local Government Board (now the Ministry of Health) may confer on the council of any municipal district which so desires the power of making the appointment. Churchwardens are no longer overseers of the poor in rural parishes (Act of 1894, s. 5 (2)).

Overseers were originally entrusted not merely with the levying of poor rate but also with its expenditure; but the latter duty is now in the hands of Guardians of the Poor (q.v.) except (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834) in cases of emergency. In addition to their duties in connection with the poor, overseers are entrusted with a multiplicity of other functions connected with matters so different as the registration of voters and the burial of bodies cast up by the sea.

Formerly it seems to have been common for a testator after appointing an executor to appoint an overseer, who had no power to intermeddle with the administration, but only to counsel, persuade and advise the executor. This is now obsolete.

Overt Act is an open act, or one consisting of something stronger than mere words, and evidencing a deliberate intention in the mind of the person doing it. The phrase is chiefly used in the law of treason, it being a rule that a treasonable intention is not punishable unless it is evidenced by some overt act. Thus, to provide weapons or ammunition for the purpose of killing the King, or to assemble and consult on the means of doing so, is an overt act of treason: but the mere speaking of words is not an overt act.

The term is also used in the law of criminal conspiracy to signify any act done by conspirators in pursuance of their intention; the unlawful agreement of which the conspiracy consists constitutes an overt act.

Owe; Owing. To owe a sum of money is to be under an obligation to pay it either at once or at some future time, and such a debt is said to be "owing" as opposed to "payable." See DUE.

Owelty. (Equality.) Where an exchange of two pieces of land of unequal value is made, and a sum of money or some other compensation is given by the owner of the less valuable land to the owner of the other land, this compensation is said to be given for owelty of exchange, that is, to equalise the value. So, where a partition is made of property, which cannot be divided, into shares of equal value (as where two houses descend to coparceners, one being worth ten shillings, the other twenty shillings per annum), the partition may be made on the terms of the person to whom the property of greater value is allotted giving something by way of owelty of partition to the other: as in the case supposed, by the parcener to whom the house worth twenty shillings per annum is allotted granting a rent-charge of five shillings per annum to the other, or paying him a lump sum.

Owlers; Owling. In popular phraseology, owlers were people who carried exported wool in contravention of the statute 14 Chas. 2, c. 18, s. 8, and owling was the offence which they committed by so doing.

"Owner's Risk." See RISK.

Ownership is the most extensive right allowed by law to a person, of dealing with a thing to the exclusion of all other persons, or of all except one or more specified persons. It is therefore a right in rem. (See RIGHT.) Ownership is essentially indefinite in its nature, but in its most absolute form it involves the right to possess and use or enjoy the thing, the right to its produce and accessions, and the right to destroy, encumber, or alien it: or, as the civilians express it, ownership gives the jus utendi, fruendi, et abutendi; but the exercise of these rights may be restricted in various manners, and the owner may part with them or limit them in favour of other persons; so long, however, as the grantees have only definite rights of user over the thing, and the original owner retains an indefinite right, he is still owner; but if he parts with the indefinite right and retains only a definite one (e.g., a right of way, in the case of land), he ceases to be owner. Ownership may exist either in corporeal or incorporeal things. Thus, a man may be owner of an annuity, patent, or copyright, as well as of land or furniture.

I. With reference to the right of user and alienation, ownership is either absolute (dominium plenum), or not (minus plenum).

Ownership is said to be absolute when it is subject only to those restrictions which are imposed by law on all owners, and are therefore implied in the idea of ownership. These restrictions may arise from the duties of the owner of the thing towards his neighbours and the world at large, which forbid him to make it hurtful or dangerous to those who happen lawfully to come into contact with it. (See NATURAL RIGHTS; NUISANCE.) Restrictions on alienation exist in the case of persons under disability, and are also imposed by the rule against perpetuities and the Mortmain Acts (q.v.). In English law absolute ownership can only exist in chattels, as all land is subject theoretically to the obligations of tenure; but practically the fee-simple in land gives absolute ownership. See ESTATE; FEE; TENURE.

Restricted ownership occurs where either concurrent or successive rights of user are vested in persons other than the owner; thus land may be subject to easements or rights of common (q.v.), or the right of user possessed by the owner for the time being may be restricted by the fact that he has only a limited interest in it, as in the case of a joint tenant, tenant for life, or lessee. See WASTE.

II. Ownership may be divided among several persons in various manners, so that each is owner to a limited extent, either successively, i.e., one after another, or concurrently, i.e., at the same time. These divisions are called modes of ownership. Hence we obtain the following classes of owners. As to its duration, ownership may be (1) absolute or unlimited (dominium perpetuum), as in the case of an estate in fee-simple, or (2) limited (dominium temporale), that is, liable to determine at a certain time or on the happening of a given event, as in the case of a lessee or tenant for life. As to the time of enjoyment, ownership may be present, as in the case of an estate in possession, or deferred, as in the case of an estate in reversion or remainder. (See ESTATE.) Ownership is called sole or several, where one person only is entitled to the thing at the same time. Concurrent ownership, where several persons are entitled to the thing at the same time, takes the form either (1) of co-ownership, or (2) of nominal and beneficial ownership. Co-ownership occurs where several persons are entitled to the possession, user and benefit of one thing, pro indiviso, no one being entitled to any specific part of it, and the right of user of each being subject to a similar right in the others; as in the case of joint tenancy, coparcenary and tenancy in common (q.v.). Nominal and beneficial ownership occurs where two persons are owners in respect of one thing, although one of them either cannot derive any benefit from it at all, or has only exactly defined rights over it, while the other has the real benefit of the thing. Each is considered owner for certain purposes. Thus, a person (A) may be owner of a thing as against all the world, except another person (B), while with regard to that person he may have no rights of ownership at all, being bound, by virtue of a personal relation between them, to allow him to have the use and profits of the property, or even to deal with the property as he may direct. As the rules of the common law only recognise A's rights to the property and ignore those of B, A is called the legal owner, while B is called the equitable owner, because his rights are only recognised by virtue of the doctrines of equity. The legal owner is the nominal owner, the equitable the beneficial owner. (See EQUITY; MORTGAGE; TRUST.) So, if the owner of land grants a lease of it for 1,000 years, his ownership becomes practically nominal, while the lessee acquires the beneficial ownership.

As to general and special, ordinary and privileged, ownership, see PROPERTY.

See further as to ownership, ESTATE; INTEREST; RIGHT; TITLE.

Oxgang; Oxgate. As much land as one ox could plough in a year. The plough team contained eight oxen: the land which they could plough in one year was known as the carucate (q.v.); and the oxgang was one-eighth part of the carucate, it being taken that the one ox could plough one-eighth part of the land which the whole team could plough. But a single ox never ploughed alone; and the oxgang was really so much land as a single ox ought, in theory, to plough. See LIBRATA TERRÆ.

Oyer. In the old common law practice, a defendant was said to demand or crave oyer of a deed pleaded by the plaintiff when he asked that it should be read to him, the generality of defendants in early times being incapable of reading themselves; the record then generally went on to set out the deed in full as having been read to the defendant. This copy or setting out of the deed was also called the oyer. See PROFERT.

Oyer was used in the reign of Edward I. as meaning an assise.

Oyer and Terminer. The commission of oyer and terminer is the commission which is issued to certain judges of the High Court and other persons as their authority to "inquire, hear, and determine" all treasons, felonies, and misdemeanours committed within the county into which they are sent. This commission only authorises them to proceed upon an indictment found at the same assizes, for they must first "inquire" by means of the grand jury, before they can "hear and determine" by the help of the petty jury. (See JURY.) Their power to try other prisoners is conferred by the commission of gaol delivery (q.v.). (See ASSISE; CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT; GAOL DELIVERY.) "Oyer and terminer" is old French for "hear and determine."

Oyer de Record. (Hear of the record.) Formerly this was a petition that the Court, for greater certainty, should refer to any record which was relied on in a proceeding.

Oysters. Oysters in oyster-beds are protected by s. 26 of the Larceny Act, 1861. See also the Sea Fisheries Act, 1868, Pt. III., and the statutes mentioned under CRABS and LOBSTERS.

P

P.A. Particular average. See AVERAGE.

Package. Duties known as package, scavage, balliage, and porterage had been levied in the port of London for hundreds of years on goods exported or imported by aliens or by denizens (q.v.) who were the sons of aliens, under the authority of charters granted by Edward IV. and Charles I., until they were abolished, at an expense of about £140,000, under the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 66.

"Packed Parcel." This is a parcel containing several smaller parcels each addressed to a different consignee, which, when the packed parcel reaches its destination, will be sent on to those different consignees. A railway company cannot charge a higher rate for "packed parcels" than for other parcels, nor can it charge varying rates to the consignors of "packed parcels"; and thus the sender of a "packed parcel," even if he himself is a common carrier, can secure the carriage of the smaller parcels in a "packed parcel" at a cheaper rate than if he sent each of them separately, for the rate charged in respect of a "packed parcel" will be less than the aggregate rate for the parcels contained therein if they are sent separately.

Packway. A way along which there was a right of leading pack-horses. See BRIDLEPATH.

Pacta conventa quæ neque contra leges neque dolo malo inita sunt omnimodo observanda sunt (C. 2, 3, 29). (Compacts which are not illegal, and do not originate in fraud, must in all respects be observed.) Even for the purposes of our law this maxim is more accurate than Coke's MODUS ET, ETC. (q.v.)

Pacta dant legem contractui (Halk. 118). (Agreements constitute the law of the contract.) Provided that they are not illegal. See MODUS ET, ETC.

Pacta privata juri publico derogare non possunt (7 Rep. 23). (Private compacts cannot derogate from public right.) Compare CONVENTIO, ETC.

Pacta quæ contra leges constitutionesque vel contra bonos mores fiunt, nullam vim habere, indubitati juris est (C. 2, 3, 6). (It is undoubted law that agreements which are contrary to the laws and constitutions, or contrary to good morals, have no force.) See MODUS ET, ETC.; PRIVATORUM CONVENTIO, ETC.

Pacta quæ turpem causam continent non sunt observanda (D. 2, 14, 27). (Agreements containing a disgraceful cause are not to be observed.) As has been said by an American jurist, "Wherever the consideration, which is the ground of the promise, or the promise which is the consequence or effect of the consideration, is unlawful, the whole contract is void." Compare ALLEGANS TURPITUDINEM, ETC.; EX DOLO, ETC.

Pactis privatorum juri publico non derogatur (No derogation from public right is effected by agreements between individuals.) Used by counsel in 4 Cl. & F. at p. 211 as equivalent to PACTA PRIVATA, ETC. (q.v.).

Pains and Penalties. See BILL OF PAINS AND PENALTIES.

Paintings. See COPYRIGHT.

Pais. See IN PAIS.

Palace Court. This Court was established under letters patent granted by James I., Charles I., and Charles II. It had jurisdiction in personal actions to any amount within twelve miles of Whitehall, except as regards actions arising in the city of London or actions within the jurisdiction of the Court of the Marshalsea (q.v.) or of the Courts at Westminster; but cases of importance were generally removed into the King's Bench or Common Pleas. The judges were the Steward and the Marshal of the King's Household—neither of whom ever sat—and the Steward of the Court (or deputy). The deputy was a barrister and the sole real judge. It was an extremely unsatisfactory tribunal. The statute 12 & 13 Vict. c. 101, ss. 13-17 made an end of it; and its work has since been done by the County Courts.

Palace of Westminster. The official designation of the block of buildings containing the Houses of parliament, the many offices connected with them, and the residences of various officers of the two Houses. The buildings are theoretically a royal palace in which the Houses are permitted to meet.

Palatine Courts formerly were the Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster, the Chancery Court of Lancaster, the Chancery Court of Durham, and the Courts of Pleas at Durham (the second and third of which still exist), and the Courts of the County Palatine of Chester (which were abolished by the Law Terms Act, 1830). See CHANCERY; COUNTY PALATINE; COURT; COURT OF PLEAS.

Pallio cooperire. To cover with the pallium. It is stated, on the authority of Robert Grosseteste, the famous bishop of Lincoln (1175-1253), that in his time, at the marriage of persons with children born before the marriage, it was the custom for the parents and the children to stand beneath a cloth, or pallium, spread over their heads in signum legitimationis (to signify the legitimation of the childen). The statement is made in the Epistolæ Roberti Grosteste, printed as vol. 25 of the Chronicles of Great Britain and Ireland, London, 1861: see Epist. XIII., which was written in 1236 (the year that the barons—see MERTON, STATUTE OF—declined to permit ante-nati (q.v.) to be legitimated by a subsequent marriage), in the hope of getting the barons to make the marriage law of England the same as that of the Church.

Palmer's Act. The popular title of the Central Criminal Court Act, 1856 (see CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT) which was passed specially for the purpose of securing a fair trial for William Palmer, a poisoner, against whom there was a strong local feeling in the provincial town at which, in the absence of special legislation he would necessarily have been tried.

See HINDE PALMER'S ACT.

Palmistry. The telling of fortunes from the lines on the palm of the hand. It seems to have been introduced into England by the gypsies (see EGYPTIANS), who are described in the statute 22 Hen. 8, c. 10, as practising it. Under the Vagrancy Act, 1824, s. 4, anyone telling fortunes by palmistry is punishable as a rogue and a vagabond (q.v.).

Palm Sunday. The Sunday before Easter Sunday.

Pandects is another name for the Digest of Justinian. See CORPUS JURIS CIVILIS; DIGEST.

Panel generally means the printed list, made up by the sheriff, of the persons who have been summoned to serve as jurors for the trial of all actions at a particular sittings; it is also used to mean the lists of (1) grand jurors, (2) special jurors, (3) common jurors and (4) magistrates, etc., attached to the precept by the Master of the Crown Office, which is one of the documents authorising the opening of assizes; and the term is also applied to the list of special jurors returned by the sheriff for the trial of a particular action. See IMPANEL; JURY.

"Pannell," says Coke, "is an English word, and signifieth a little part; for a pane is a part, and a pannell is a little part, as a pannell of wainscot, a pannell of a saddle, and a pannell of parchment wherein the jurors' names be written and annexed to the writ" (Co. Litt. 158*b*).

Panel of Arbitrators. See HAGUE CONFERENCE.

Pannage. A common of pannage is the right of feeding swine on mast and acorns at certain seasons in a commonable wood or forest. It does not prevent the owner of the wood from lopping and cutting down the trees in the ordinary course of management. Pannage also meant the money paid for agisting (q.v.) swine. There was also a common of after-pannage, or the right of feeding swine after the right of pannage had been exercised.

"Pannage" is also a corrupted form of PARAGIUM (q.v.).

Pannier-man; Pannier. Anciently in the Inns of Court one of the Inn servants used a horse with panniers to convey the supplies of provisions required for use in hall, and was known as the pannier-man.

The servants of the Inner Temple who wait at dinner are still colloquially known as panniers.

Papal Bull. The Bull is a circular leaden seal with, on one side, the images of Saints Peter and Paul and, on the other side, the name of the reigning Pope, and the date of his accession. It is affixed to certain documents issued by the Pope; and these documents are themselves known as bulls.

The introduction into the kingdom of papal bulls had been made treason by the statute 13 Eliz. c. 2. That Act, in so far as it imposed punishment, was repealed by the Religious Disabilities Act, 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 59), which, however, enacted that it should not be lawful to bring bulls into the country. See PRÆMUNIRE.

Paper Blockade. A blockade declared by a belligerent which cannot or does not effectually enforce it.

Paper Books, in proceedings on a writ of error in a criminal case, were copies of the proceedings, with a note of the points intended to be argued, delivered to the judges by the parties two days before the argument.

Paper Days. Before the Judicature Acts there were in each of the common law Courts certain days—known as Special Paper Days—on which the Courts heard the cases entered for argument in a list called the Special List. In the Queen's Bench there were Crown Paper Days, or days for business on the Crown side.

Paper Office; Paper Mill. In 1578 Queen Elizabeth established "the Office of Her Majesty's Papers and Records for Business of State and Council," and appointed a keeper of the papers. This office—popularly known as the Paper Office—existed until 1854 at a number of different addresses in and about Whitehall. Upon the death in 1854 of the then keeper of the State papers, the Paper Office became merged in the Public Record Office (q.v.).

In the old Court of King's Bench there was an office known as the Paper Office or Paper Mill. In it were kept the records of the Court pending their removal to the Treasury of the Exchequer, in which latter office all records of the Courts were finally deposited. See CLERK OF THE PAPER OFFICE.

Paper, Special. A list kept in the King's Bench Division of matters set down for argument on points of law.

Papist; Papish: Popish Recusant. From the Reformation down to 1791 one or other of these terms was used in statutes to describe Roman Catholics. The latter term was for the first time used in the Relief Act, 1791 (31 Geo. 3, c. 32). See RECUSANT.

Paracium. The tenure which anciently existed between parceners (q.v.) when they held of a lord in unequal shares. It was due from the younger to the elder of them.

Parage; Paragium. Equality: the equality referred to is that of blood, name, or dignity. When a fief was divided unequally amongst brothers, the younger held of the elder ex jure et titulo paragii (by right and title of equality) just as in a corresponding case parceners (see PARACIUM) held the one of the other.

Paramount means superior. Thus, "title paramount" means a superior title; for instance, if A purports to convey to B land which really belongs to C, and C ejects B from the land, B is said to be evicted by title paramount, meaning a title superior to that granted to him by A.

In the law of tenure, if A holds land in fee of B, and B holds the same land in fee of C, then C is the lord paramount, and he has the seignory paramount, as opposed to A, the tenant paravail, and B the mesne, whose seignory is called the mesnalty (q.v.).

Paraphernalia or bona paraphernalia are such apparel and ornaments given to a married woman by her husband as are suitable to her condition in life, and are expressly given to her to be worn as ornaments of her person only. Before the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, they differed from property held by the wife for her separate use in that the husband might dispose of them during his life and that they were liable for his debts, while they differed from her ordinary chattels in that the husband had no power to dispose of them by will, so that if she survived him she was entitled to them, subject to his debts.

The better opinion would seem to be that now the doctrine of paraphernalia is gone, and that, while the wife may own some chattels and the husband may own others, there is no such mixed and partial ownership as was known to the doctrine.

Paravail means inferior or subordinate. Thus, where A is indebted to B, and B is indebted to C, B is the primary debtor and A is the sub-debtor or debtor paravail.

The term is chiefly used with reference to the tenure of estates in land, a tenant paravail being a tenant who holds land in fee of another and has no tenant who holds of him, as opposed to a mesne lord and a lord paramount (q.v.).

Parcel, in the law of real property, signifies a part or portion of land. Thus, every piece of copyhold land forms parcel of the manor to which it belongs: that is to say, so far as the freehold is concerned, the copyholds belong to the lord, and form part of his lands, although his beneficial interest in them is comparatively small, being subject to the customary estates of the tenants. See COPYHOLD; DEMESNE; MANOR.

The word was also applied (see PARCEL MAKERS) to the accounts of the escheators.

Parcel Makers. These were two officers of the Exchequer who, at a remote date—they were long abolished even in 1739—after making the "parcels" of the escheators' (q.v.) accounts, and after charging the escheators with everything levied by them for the king, then delivered the parcels to the auditors of the Exchequer.

Parcels. In a conveyance, lease or other deed dealing with property, that part which follows the operative words is called the parcels. It contains the description, either expressly or by reference, of the property dealt with, and in the case of lands generally begins with some such words as "All that piece or parcel of land," etc. Sometimes the full description is contained in a recital or in a schedule to the deed, with a reference to a map drawn on the deed. See ABSTRACT; ABUTTALS; DEED; OPERATIVE PART; PREMISES.

Parcels, Bill of. A list of the articles comprised in a consignment of goods, with the prices of the articles. It is sent by a seller to a purchaser.

Parcener; Parcenary. These are the old-fashioned equivalents for coparcener (q.v.) and coparcenary.

Parchment. Prior to the enactment of the Judicature Act, 1875, all writs of summons had from time immemorial been written on parchment. Now, writs of summons are partly printed and partly written (or typewritten) on paper of a prescribed size (R.S.C. Ord. 5, r. 10; Ord. 66, r. 3). Down to 1st April, 1916, all inquisitions (or records of the findings of coroners' inquests) were invalid where murder, manslaughter or felo de se was found, unless set out on parchment (see s. 18 (2) of the Coroners Act, 1887, as originally enacted), but now the use of parchment is unnecessary in any case (Indictments Act, 1915, s. 9, sch. 2). See also PROBATE.

Parco fracto, De, was a writ or action for damages caused by a pound-breach (q.v). It has long been obsolete.

Pardon is where the Crown releases a person from the punishment which he has incurred for some offence. A pardon may be granted either (1) before or during a prosecution, in which case it may be pleaded in bar, or (2) after conviction, in which case it may be pleaded in arrest of judgment or in bar of execution, so that the offender is discharged from punishment. Some offences, however, cannot be pardoned, e.g., a common nuisance while it remains unredressed: and a pardon cannot be pleaded to a parliamentary impeachment. A pardon is granted by warrant under the Great Seal (which is now never used for the purpose) or under the Sign Manual. It may be either free or conditional, that is, the Crown may annex to it a condition on the performance of which the operation of the pardon will depend. For many years past pardons have been granted by the Crown only upon the advice of a Secretary of State. They are, in fact, really granted by the Home Secretary. The Home Secretary now, before deciding any question as to a pardon, can take the opinion of the Court of Criminal Appeal on the matter (Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, ss. 19, 23).

Parens est nomen generale ad omne genus cognationis (Co. Litt. 80). (Parent is a name general to every kind of blood-relationship.) This is merely Littleton's explanation of "parentes" in the Statute of Merton (20 Hen. 3), c. 6, where that word is in fact used in the same sense as the modern French parents.

Parent and Child. The relation of parent and child is not one which is much interfered with by the law, almost the only duties arising from it which are capable of legal enforcement being those of maintenance and education. Every parent is bound to provide necessaries for his children if he is able to do so and they are unable to support themselves; and is bound to send them to school. On the other hand, the children of a poor person not able to work are bound to maintain him or her if they are able to do so. These reciprocal obligations of maintenance are enforceable only as public duties, and not by the person liable to be maintained. See MAINTENANCE; POOR.

As regards third persons, the relation gives the parent the right of protecting the person and property of his child, and vice versâ, while in some cases the child is by a fiction considered as the servant of the parent. See SEDUCTION.

See BASTARD; GUARDIAN; INFANT.

Parentela. This, or the fuller form de parentala se tollere, signified a renunciation of kindred and of all rights of inheritance from them, effected in Court before twelve men, who made oath that they believed it to be done for good cause. See Leg. Hen. 1, c. 88.

Pares. (Peers, equals.) The best-known use of the word is in the 39th clause of Magna carta, where it is declared that no free man is to be condemned except by the lawful judgment of his peers (parium suorum) or in accordance with the law of the land. The lawyers of the seventeenth century contended that this reference to "the judgment of his peers" was in effect a declaration of the right to be tried by a jury. But that was going too far. The jury which they knew was unknown in 1215. What the judicium parium suorum meant was the judgment of the pares curtis or other vassals of the lord of the accused or the defendant. See PEERS.

Paribus sententiis reus absolvitur (4 Inst. 64). (When opinions are equal, a defendant is acquitted.) "When opinions are equal" means when the Court is equally divided. The maxim was relied on by the Star Chamber in a case where the Court was divided four and four. On the hearing of an appeal the order appealed against stands in the event of an equal division of the Court. In cases of summary jurisdiction the proper course is for equally divided justices to adjourn the hearing; but they may dismiss the case and so bar a further prosecution. On an equal division of the joint committee in licensing matters, the chairman has a casting vote (Licensing Consolidation Act, 1910, s. 4). Compare SEMPER PRÆSUMITUR PRO NEGANTE, ETC.

Par in parem imperium non habet (Jenk. Cent. 174). (An equal has no authority over an equal.) This is cited by Jenkins in connection with a decision—which is now obviously bad law—that one justice cannot commit another for a breach of the peace. But as regards Courts, the maxim holds good; thus one judge of the King's Bench Division is not bound by any decision of any other judge of that division.

Parish is that district which is committed to the charge of one parson or vicar, or other minister of the Church of England, having cure of souls therein. A parish is, however, since the middle of the seventeenth century, a division for civil as well as for ecclesiastical purposes: thus the collection and application of the poor rate is parochial. Down to about one hundred years ago the ecclesiastical and civil parish in nearly every case covered the same area. Now there are about 15,000 civil parishes and about 14,000 ecclesiastical parishes and the areas coincide in only about 4,000 cases. This is the effect of many statutes by which provision is made for the sub-division of parishes into districts or parishes for ecclesiastical, poor law and taxation purposes, and for the amalgamation of detached portions of parishes. (See CHAPEL; ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS; OVERSEERS; PERAMBULATION; POOR LAW.) Now, since 5th March, 1894, parishes for civil purposes are divided into urban parishes (q.v.) and rural parishes (q.v.).

In every Act passed after 1866, "parish," unless a contrary intention appears, means "a place for which a separate poor rate is or can be made, or for which a separate overseer is or can be appointed" (Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 5).

A place not included in a parish is called extra-parochial. Such places are, however, now in substantially the same position for civil purposes as if they were parishes, that is, so far as regards the collection and application of rates, the registration of voters, etc. See TITHES.

See PAROCHIAL CHURCH COUNCIL.

Parish Apprentices. "Parish apprentices" originated with the Poor Relief Act, 1601, s. 4, which provided that the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of any parish might, with the assent of two justices, bind as apprentices the children of parents unable to maintain them. Poor children are now bound as apprentices by boards of guardians acting in accordance with the Orders of the Ministry of Health (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, s. 12). No person can now be compelled to take a parish apprentice (ib. s. 13): under the statute 8 & 9 Will. 3, c. 30, parishioners had been precluded from refusing to take apprentices whom the parish required them to receive.

Parish Boundaries. The ecclesiastical parish in most parts of England was simply the old Anglo-Saxon tun or township, or two adjoining townships in one only of which was there a church. It originated long before the period of statute law, and so was a creation of the common law. It became the custom for the parishioners to "beat the bounds," that is to say, to perambulate or walk round the parish in order to perpetuate the memory of the boundaries. This was done during the three days (known as Rogation Days) which precede Ascension Day (q.v.). The 19th Injunction of Elizabeth, while forbidding religious processions generally, sanctioned perambulation and subsequent prayer in the parish church. The proper expenses of perambulation once in every three years are payable out of the poor rate (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, s 60), but no charge for refreshments can be allowed.

Perambulations still take place in many parishes, but their necessity or utility has to a large extent ceased by reason of the fact that in the great majority of parishes the boundaries have been fixed by statute during the last century.

Apart from other evidence, the exact line followed in a perambulation will be held to mark the parish boundary.

Parish Clerk. The parish clerk is coeval with the parish. In early times he kept the parish school, accompanied the priest when visiting the sick, and assisted in the services of the church. After the Reformation he sat under or in front of the officiating minister and recited the responses in the church services. Now he assists the minister at baptisms, marriages and funerals, in connection with the two latter of which he receives fees.

Before the Reformation the appointment of the clerk lay with the vicar or rector. Canon 91 of the Canons of 1606 confirmed this arrangement. In some places, under an ancient custom, the parishioners themselves have the right of making the appointment; and Canon 91 does not override such a custom. But the custom is modified by the Lecturers and Parish Clerks Act, 1844, which provides that, where the minister does not himself appoint, the appointment is subject to his consent. Where the parishioners appoint, they act through the vestry or the churchwardens.

The office of parish clerk is a freehold at common law, and down to 1844 there was no means whatever of removing him, but now, under the Lecturers and Parish Clerks Act, 1844, the archdeacon can in a proper case suspend or remove him.

The above applies only to the parish clerk of the ecclesiastical parish known to the common law. The clerks of the many churches erected under the Church Building Acts, 1818 and 1819, and under the New Parishes Acts, 1843, 1844 and 1856, are known simply as clerks and have not the same status as the parish clerk proper.

Parish Clerks Company. See COMPANIES, CITY.

Parish Constables. See CONSTABLES.

Parish Councils. These are the creation of the Local Government Act, 1894. Under s. 1 of that Act there is a parish council in every rural parish (q.v.) with a population of not less than 300; in every rural parish with a population exceeding 100 but less than 300 there must be a parish council if the parish meeting so desires; in every rural parish with a population of less than 100 the county council may, if it thinks fit and if the parish meeting consents, establish a parish council; and the county council may, with the consent of the parish meetings, group together still smaller parishes to be represented by one parish council. Under s. 18 large parishes may be divided into wards, for each of which there is to be a separate election of councillors to serve on the one parish council. Each parish council consists of such number of councillors, not exceeding fifteen or less than three, as the county council may from time to time determine (s. 3 (1)). Parish councillors are elected by the parochial electors at the parish meetings or at polls consequent thereon (s. 48 (1)). The tenure of office is three years (Parish Councillors (Tenure of Office) Act, 1899). A parish councillor must be a parochial elector or must have resided in or within three miles of the parish since the 25th March preceding the election (Local Government Act, 1894, s. 3 (1); Local Government Act, 1897, s. 1).

The parish council appoints overseers (q.v.) (Act of 1894, s. 5); exercises, except in ecclesiastical matters, the functions previously exercised by vestries and churchwardens (s. 6); and possesses various miscellaneous powers and duties, as to which see ss. 7-19 of the Act of 1894.

Parishioner. Anciently this meant a resident in the common-law ecclesiastical parish. Down to the Reformation the word had reference only to religious status: afterwards, when the parish became an area for civil purposes, the word parishioner acquired a civil meaning. In its civil meaning it includes not only the residents in a parish but also non-resident occupiers of land who pay rates. At common law parishioners paying "scot and lot" (q.v.) formed the vestry; as to the present constitution of which see that title. The parochial elector (who is defined in s. 75 of the Local Government Act, 1894) is the modern representative of the parishioner regarded in his civil capacity (see PARISH MEETING).

As to "parishioner" in the modern ecclesiastical sense, see the Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874, s. 6.

Parish Meeting. This, like the parish council (q.v.), is the creation of the Local Government Act, 1894, which provides (s. 2) that in every rural parish there shall be a parish meeting at least once a year, and that it shall consist of the parochial electors (q.v.). Their qualifications are set out, as regards men, in s. 3 of the Representation of the People Act, 1918, and as regards women, in s. 4 of the same Act. The Local Government Act, 1897, s. 2, provides that the annual parish meeting shall be held between 1st March and 1st April. The parish meeting elects the parish councillors where there is a parish council (q.v.).

Parish Register. This is sometimes used as meaning "The register of parochial electors of the parish": see the Local Government Act, 1894, s. 44. It more properly means the register of marriages, baptisms and burials which Canon 70 of the Canons of 1603 requires to be kept in every church and chapel of the Church of England. The keeping of this register is also directed by the Parochial Registers Act, 1812, s. 1: but the Births and Deaths Registration Act, 1836, s. 1, repealed so much of the Act of 1812 as related to the entry of marriages in this register. See REGISTRATION.

Park, in the technical sense of the word, is the same as a chase (q.v.), except that it is enclosed, while a chase is always open. A park, in the popular sense of the word, namely, one erected without lawful warrant, is sometimes called a nominative park by the old writers, but now, even in Acts of Parliament, it is called simply a park. The parks forming part of the demesnes of the Crown are called royal parks. See DEMESNE.

Park-bote. "To be quit of enclosing a park or any part thereof, derived of two English words, Parke and Bote" (Coke, 4 Inst. 308). Cowell and all subsequent compilers of law dictionaries have copied this statement. Possibly, however, Murray may be more correct when he says that park-bote means "the repair of the fence or wall of a park." See BOTE.

Parkhurst Prison. A prison established at Parkhurst, in the Isle of Wight, by the Parkhurst Prison Act, 1838. It was originally intended for young offenders. Since 1869 it has been used for male prisoners undergoing penal servitude.

Parliament. The Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland is composed of the King or Queen and the three estates of the realm, viz., the lords spiritual, the lords temporal, and the commons. These several powers collectively make laws that are binding upon the subjects of the British Empire, and also separately enjoy privileges and exercise functions peculiar to each. For details see HOUSE OF LORDS; HOUSE OF COMMONS; PREROGATIVE; also ACT OF PARLIAMENT; CHILTERN HUNDREDS; CONTEMPT OF PARLIAMENT; ELECTORAL FRANCHISE; IMPEACHMENT; KNIGHT; PROROGATION.

Parliamentary Agents are persons (usually solicitors) who transact the technical business involved in passing private Bills through the Houses of Parliament. They are required to sign a prescribed declaration and to give security for compliance with the rules of the House of Commons.

Parliamentary Committees. These consist of (1) committees of the whole House, (2) standing or sessional committees, (3) select committees, (4) joint committees.

A committee of the whole House, whether in the Lords or the Commons, is really the House of Lords or the House of Commons, as the case may be, presided over by a chairman instead of by the Lord Chancellor or the Speaker. In the House of Commons, there are the Committee of Supply and the Committee of Ways and Means. These committees do not legislate. They merely pass resolutions on financial matters. But a resolution of the Committee of Ways and Means which varies or renews taxation has, under the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act, 1913, statutory effect for a limited period. That Act was passed because it was decided—as indeed was obvious—that the practice which had grown up of acting on resolutions of the Committee of Ways and Means before they had been embodied in an Act of Parliament was wholly illegal.

The standing or sessional committees and the select committees consist in each House of a certain number of members who perform various functions in connection with Bills.

Joint committees consist of equal numbers of members of each House. Since 1864 they have frequently been constituted; but between 1695 and 1864 there had been no such committee.

See May's Parliamentary Practice.

Parliamentary Deposits. Under the Standing Orders of both Houses of Parliament, the promoters of Bills providing for parliamentary powers over the property of others—such as railway and tramway Bills—are required to deposit in Court sums bearing a certain proportion to the estimated cost of the works proposed. The object is to place a check on speculative promotion and to provide security for persons whose property may be injuriously affected. The principal statute on the subject is the Parliamentary Deposits Act, 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 20): see also the Parliamentary Costs Act, 1865; the Railways Construction Facilities Act, 1864, ss. 34, 35, 36, 38, 40, 41, 43; the Tramways Act, 1870; the Light Railways Act, 1896, s. 11; and the Parliamentary Deposits and Bonds Act, 1892.

Parliament de la Bonde. (The Parliament of the Band.) This was the Parliament held in London in 1321. The Earl of Lancaster and other great barons wore coloured bands as distinguishing marks when they attended, in order to procure a sentence of forfeiture and exile against the Despensers.

Parliamentum diabolicum. (The Diabolical Parliament.) It was the Parliament held at Coventry in 1459. The Duke of York (afterwards Edward IV.) and many of his chief adherents were attainted by it.

Parliamentum indoctum. (The Unlearned Parliament.) The Parliament held at Coventry in 1404, for membership of which all lawyers and persons skilled in the law were declared disqualified.

Parliamentum insanum. (The Mad Parliament.) The Parliament held at Oxford in 1368, distinguished for the extreme character and the violence of its proceedings.

Parochial Church Council. The establishment in every parish of a parochial church council is provided for by the Parochial Church Councils (Powers) Measure, 1921, 11 & 12 Geo. 5 [No. 1]. (See NATIONAL ASSEMBLY; MEASURE.) Such a council is, of course, quite distinct from the parish council, and is in no way concerned with secular matters.

Parochial Electors. "The persons registered in such portion either of the local government register of electors or of the parliamentary register of electors as relates to the parish" (Local Government Act, 1894, s. 2 (1)). See PARISH MEETING.

Parol, in its technical sense, as applied to a legal transaction, means that it has been effected without the solemnity of a deed Therefore an assignment of chattels, or a contract, or a lease, which is either verbal or reduced into a writing not under seal, is called a parol assignment, contract or lease (see CONTRACT). Similarly in the law of evidence, where the contents of a document are brought before the Court either orally or by means of a copy, this is called adducing parol evidence of its contents. Parol evidence also sometimes means extrinsic evidence. See EVIDENCE.

As to demurrer of the parol, see DEMUR.

"Parol" literally means verbal or oral. In early times few persons could write, and therefore when a document was required to record a transaction the parties put their seals to it and made it a deed. Transactions of less importance were testified by word of mouth or by parol, and this use of "parol," to signify the absence of a deed, remained after simple writing without sealing had come into use.

Parricide. The killing of a father and, in some old writers, of a mother: but the killing of a mother is of course more properly known as matricide. No such offence as parricide or matricide is known to English law: the offence, if any, will be murder or manslaughter; it did not come within the old offence of petty treason (q.v.).

Parson, "persona ecclesiæ," says Blackstone, "is one that hath full possession of all the rights of a parochial church." He is called parson, persona, because he personates or represents the church. He is a corporation sole. See CORPORATION.

"Persona impersonata, parson impersonee," says Coke, "is the rector that is in possession of the church parochiall, be it presentative or impropriate, and of whom the church is full." In other words, a parson impersonee is he who is in full possession of a church. Of course the rector of a presentative advowson is not complete parson until he has been inducted (q.v.), while in the case of an impropriate advowson the rector is perpetual parson.

See ADVOWSON; RECTOR; VICAR.

Parsonage. Strictly, this means the parochial church with the residence of the incumbent, the glebe (q.v.) and the tithes (q.v.); but it is commonly applied to the house only. As to the provision of parsonage houses see GILBERT'S ACTS; and as to their repair see DILAPIDATIONS.

Parson Mortal; Parson Immortal. Before the Reformation, the rector of a church, appointed for his own life, was called "parson mortal" (persona mortalis), but any collegiate or conventional body to which the church was for ever appropriated was styled parson immortal (persona immortalis).

Pars rationabilis. A reasonable part. See RATIONABILI PARTE BONORUM, DE.

Part. See RIDING.

Part; Party. A person who takes part in a legal transaction or proceeding is said to be a party to it. Thus, if an agreement, conveyance, lease, or the like, is entered into between A. and B., they are said to be parties to it; and the same expression is often, though not very correctly, applied to the persons named as the grantors or releasors in a deed poll (q.v.).

Parties to formal instruments are divided into classes or parts according to their estates or interests in the subject-matter of the transaction; thus, if A. mortgages land to B., C. and D., and they all agree to sell it to E. and F., the conveyance would be made between B., C. and D. of the first part (because the legal estate, which is part of the title to the land, is vested in them jointly), A. of the second part (because he has the equity of redemption, which is the remainder of the title to the land), and E. and F. of the third part, because the whole title is to be conveyed to them. As to the distinction between parties and privies, see PRIVY.

In a legal proceeding, the parties are the persons whose names appear on the record. In Chancery practice, persons who are not parties, but who are affected by certain orders of the Court, can be made parties by being served with notice of such orders. (See NOTICE OF JUDGMENT.) In an action, the parties are divided into plaintiffs and defendants, and, if necessary, they are distinguished according to the manner in which they were introduced into it.

As to who should be made parties to an action, see JOINDER; MISJOINDER; NONJOINDER.

In the case of a petition, the parties consist of the petitioners and the respondents. In the case of a summons, the persons at whose instance it is issued are called the applicants, and the persons to whom it is addressed the respondents.

Parties to a proceeding are also divided into necessary and proper. Necessary parties are those who are interested in the subject-matter of the proceedings, and in whose absence, therefore, it could not be fairly dealt with: proper parties are those who, though not interested in the proceedings, are made parties for some good reason; thus, where an action is brought to rescind a contract, any person is a proper party to it who was active or concurring in the matters which gave the right to rescind.

As to the parties to a bill of exchange, and as to the "parts" of foreign bills of exchange, see BILL OF EXCHANGE.

Partes finis nihil habuerunt, De. In the time of Coke this was an exception (q.v.) taken against a fine levied; it was upon the ground that "the parties to the fine had no estate in the lands."

Partial Loss. See LOSS.

Partibility. See GAVELKIND.

Particata terræ. Anciently this meant a rood (q.v.) of land.

Particeps criminis. One who has a share in a crime: an accessory (q.v.).

Particular Average. See AVERAGE.

Particular Estate. See ESTATE.

Particularity, in a pleading, affidavit, or the like, is the allegation of particulars or details. An excess or deficiency of particularity in a pleading is equally a defect; the latter entitles the opposite party either to an order for particulars (q.v.), or to an order requiring the other party to amend his pleading (see AMENDMENT), while the former may lead to a disallowance of costs for prolixity (Ord. 19, r. 5; Ord. 65, r. 27 (20)).

Particular Lien. See LIEN.

Particulars. These mean the details of the claim or of the defence in an action which are necessary in order to enable the other side to know what case he has to meet. They are intended to make quite clear the case of the party who furnishes them. Interrogatories (q.v.) and discovery (q.v.), on the other hand, relate to the evidence upon which the case of the other party depends.

As to the High Court, see Ord. 19, rr. 7, 7A, 7B; as to the County Court see County Court Rules, Ords. 6, 15.

Particulars of Breaches and Objections. It was provided by the Patent Law Amendment Act, 1852, s. 41, that in an action for the infringement of letters patent, the plaintiff was bound to deliver with his declaration (now with his statement of claim) particulars (that is, details) of the breaches which he complained of, and that the defendant in an action for infringement, and the prosecutor in any proceedings by scire facias (q.v.) to repeal letters patent, were bound to deliver with the plea (now statement of defence) or declaration (as the case might be) particulars of any objections to the validity of the patent on which they meant to rely at the trial. This enactment was repealed by the Patents Designs and Trade Marks Act, 1883 (now itself repealed), neither which, nor any later statute (see PATENTS) contains any corresponding provision.

Particulars of Sale. When land or houses are sold by auction it is usual to prefix to the conditions of sale (q.v.) a description of the property, giving (1) the area, (2) the tenure, (3) the tenancy or tenancies if the property or any of it is let, (4) easements or incumbrances affecting it, (5) any outgoings other than tithe and tithe rentcharge, (6) the name of the auctioneer and the place and time of sale, (7) the name of the vendor.

The particulars and conditions of sale and the memorandum (q.v.) form the contract of sale.

Particular Tenant. The owner of a particular estate. (See ESTATE.) See FEOFFMENT as to the effect of the conveyance by the particular tenant of an estate greater than the particular estate.

Partition is where land belonging to two or more joint tenants, tenants in common, coparceners or heirs in gavelkind is divided among them in severalty, each taking a distinct part. Partition is either voluntary, that is, by agreement between the parties, or compulsory.

At the present day a voluntary partition is effected either by a deed, which varies according to the nature of the property and the tenancy, or by obtaining an order of exchange from the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries, which takes effect without any further conveyance.

Compulsory partition is effected by an action for partition in the Chancery Division of the High Court (Judicature Act, 1873, s. 34), in which case the details are generally settled by a scheme in chambers. (See SCHEME.) The Partition Act, 1868 (amended by the Partition Act, 1876), empowers the Court to make an order for the sale of property liable to partition, and the distribution of the proceeds among the persons interested, in cases where that course is more convenient than an actual division of the property itself. (See OWELTY.) Such sale is now much more common than partition.

See COMMISSION (OF PARTITION).

Partitione facienda, De. Anciently when an inheritance descended to more than one heir, and they could not agree to a partition, the writ de partitione facienda lay for any of them. It was one of the many writs abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36. The writ was a common law writ. Its abolition left the Chancery Courts with exclusive jurisdiction in partition (q.v.), and that jurisdiction was confirmed to the Chancery Division by s. 34 of the Judicature Act, 1873.

Partner; Partnership. Partnerships are divisible into those known to the law before 1907 and the limited partnerships which first were known in that year. Down to 1890 the only enactments dealing with partnership were s. 4 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (which has been repealed by the Partnership Act, 1890, and is replaced by s. 18 of that Act), and the Partnership Act, 1865 (q.v.), and, except in so far as those enactments applied, the law as to partnership was to be found only in the decision of the Courts, just as down to 1882 the law as to bills of exchange was entirely case-law.

The Partnership Act, 1890, sets out and declares with little variation the pre-existing law, the chief amendment being that contained in s. 23, which deprived a judgment creditor of an individual partner of the right to issue execution against the property of the partnership, but gave such creditor power to obtain an order charging the judgment debtor's interest in the partnership.

The Partnership Act, 1890, s. 1, defines partnership as "the relation which subsists between persons carrying on business in common with a view to profit," but excludes from this definition a company incorporated under the Companies Acts or by statute or by letters patent or by royal charter and a company working within the Stannaries (q.v.). At common law; as well as under the Act of 1890, the following are the characteristic marks of a partnership:—

(1) Every partner is entitled and bound to take part in the conduct of the business, unless it is otherwise agreed between them (s. 24 (6)).

(2) Every partner is liable for the debts of the partnership to the whole extent of his property (s. 9). As between the partners, each partner is bound to contribute to the debts in proportion to his share of the profits (s. 24 (1)).

(3) As regards third persons, the act of every partner, within the ordinary scope of the business, binds his co-partners, whether they have sanctioned it or not (ss. 5, 6).

(4) The relation between the partners being personal, no one of them can put a stranger in his place without the consent of the others (s. 24 (7)).

Where no time for the duration of the partnership is fixed, it is called a partnership at will, and may be dissolved at the pleasure of any partner at a moment's notice (s. 32 (c)). As to other modes of dissolving a partnership, see DISSOLUTION.

When a partner dies or retires, and the partnership agreement provides that the partnership shall not thereby be dissolved, the remaining partners are called the continuing partners. A retiring partner (and the estate of a deceased partner) is not liable for the partnership debts contracted after his connection ceased, provided, in the case of a retiring partner, that notice of the fact is given. No notice is required in the case of a dormant partner. As to the bankruptcy of partners, see JOINT; CONVERSION; FIRM.

Partnerships are of two kinds. A general partnership is where the business includes all transactions of a particular class, as where A. and B. agree to carry on the business of bankers, grocers, etc. A particular or special partnership is where the parties agree to share the profits of one particular transaction: as where A. and B. agree to join in selling a particular cargo of goods, or in working a particular patent.

A sub-partnership is where a partner in a firm makes a stranger a partner with him in his share of the profits of that firm. Thus, if A. and B. carry on business as A., B. & Co.; and B. agrees with C. to give him a share of the profits received from the business of A., B. & Co.; C. is a sub-partner with B., but not a partner in the firm of A., B. & Co. See FIRM.

II. A quasi-partnership, or partnership as regards third persons, is where one person is liable for the debts of another as if he were his partner, although no true partnership exists. The cases in which this occurs are referable to one of two principles. The first is, that where a person carries on business as agent for another, the latter is liable to third persons for the debts of the business. If the business is not carried on in his name, he is called a dormant or undisclosed partner. Before 1865, the doctrine was carried much further, so as to make every person who received a share of the profits of a business liable for its debts, but it became the tendency to hold that an agreement entitling one person to share the profits made by another gave rise to nothing more than a presumption that the relation of principal and agent existed between them, and the passing of the Partnership Act, 1865 (q.v.), deprived the question of much of its importance. By the operation of this Act, a person who merely lent money to a firm, in consideration of receiving a share of the profits, was not a partner even as regards third persons, but in popular language he was sometimes called a dormant partner, or commanditaire (q.v.), and the effect of s. 2 (3) of the Act of 1890 is identical. The second principle under which a person may be subjected to the liabilities of a partner is, that where a person holds himself out to third persons as a partner in the firm, he is liable to those persons for debts contracted by the firm (Partnership Act, 1890, s. 14 (1)); such a person is called an ostensible partner. Generally, the "holding out" consists in his allowing his name to appear in the firm as if he were a partner, and he is then sometimes called a nominal partner. The mere continuance of a business after a partner's death in the old firm name does not make the estate or the personal representatives of the deceased partner liable for partnership debts contracted after his death (ib., s. 14 (2)).

A limited partnership is one in which, although there must be one or more partners responsible for all the liabilities of the partnership, there may be one or more partners who are under no liability if they contribute an agreed sum for partnership purposes (Limited Partnership Act, 1907, s. 4 (2)) provided (s. 6) that they take no part in the management, and (s. 8) that the partnership is registered as a limited partnership. See COMMANDITE.

See PART-OWNERS.

Partnership Act, 1865 (also called Bovill's Act), was the statute 28 & 29 Vict. c. 86. Its object was to abolish the common law rule that a person who shares in the profits of a firm is primâ facie so far a partner as to be liable for the business debts of the firm. It, therefore, provided that no one of the following facts should of itself make the person concerned a partner in the firm:—(1) An advance of money to the firm in consideration of a periodical payment out of or varying with the profits; (2) remuneration of the services of a servant or agent by a share of profits; (3) the receipt of an annuity out of the profits by the widow or child of a deceased partner; (4) the receipt of a share of profits in consideration of the sale of the goodwill. It also provided that if the firm became bankrupt, the persons who had advanced money or sold the goodwill to it in consideration of a share of the profits, were not to recover anything until the other creditors had been paid in full. The whole Act was repealed by s. 48 of the Partnership Act, 1890; but the above-mentioned provisions of the Act of 1865 are in effect re-enacted by ss. 2 (3), 3 of the Act of 1890.

Part-owners are persons who are entitled to property either jointly, in common, or in coparcenary. Part-owners differ from partners in several respects, the principal of which are: (1) that a partner is the agent of his co-partners within the ordinary scope of the business, so that he has power to bind them towards third persons even against their will, while a part-owner, in the absence of a special agreement, has no such power, and can only deal with his own interest in the property; (2) that a part-owner can transfer his interest to a stranger, while a partner cannot without the consent of his co-partners. The term "part-owners" in this relation chiefly occurs in the law of merchant shipping. Part-owners of a ship are tenants in common. Difficult questions often arise as to whether the co-owners of a vessel are partners in respect of her, either generally or for a particular voyage. See also MANAGING OWNER.

Part Payment, as the phrase implies, is payment of part of a debt. Such a payment (independently of its effect in satisfying the debt pro tanto) has a legal effect (1) in dispensing with the necessity of writing in contracts for the sale of goods under the Statute of Frauds (q.v.); and (2) in reviving a debt (or rather the balance of a debt) which would otherwise be barred by the Statute of Limitations, payment of part being evidence of a fresh promise to pay. Part payment by one joint debtor does not revive the debt against the others (Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, s. 14).

Part Performance. See PERFORMANCE.

Partus sequitur ventrem (I. 2, 1, 19). (The offspring follow the dam.) This was a rule of the civil law. It never prevailed in England. See LEX ANGLIÆ NUNQUAM, ETC.

Party. See PART.

Party Jury. Used in the statute 14 Car. 2, c. 11, s. 13, as meaning a jury de mediate linguæ. See JURY.

Party-wall. In the general common-law meaning of the term, a party-wall is:—(1) a wall of which the two adjoining owners are tenants in common: and in the absence of evidence to the contrary such tenancy will be presumed. But at common law it may also mean—(2) a wall divided longitudinally into two strips, one belonging to each of the neighbouring owners; (3) a wall which belongs entirely to one of the adjoining owners, but is subject to an easement or right in the other to have it maintained as a dividing wall between the two tenements; or (4) a wall divided longitudinally into two moieties, each moiety being subject to a cross easement in favour of the owner of the other moiety.

Party-walls in London are subject to the provisions of the London Building Act, 1894, 57 & 58 Vict., c. ccxiii., which (s. 5 (16)) defines a party-wall in London as being either "(1) a wall forming part of a building and used or constructed to be used for separation of adjoining buildings belonging to different owners, or occupied, or constructed or adapted to be occupied, by different persons or (2) a wall forming part of a building and standing to a greater extent than the projection of the footings on lands of different owners." As to the rights of adjoining owners in London with regard to such walls, see ss. 87-90 of that Act.

Outside London there is no statute law regarding party-walls; but the bye-laws which may be made under s. 157 of the Public Health Act, 1875, may affect them.

Parum differunt quæ re concordant et cum adsunt testimonia rerum quid opus est verbis

(2 Bulst. 53). (Verbal differences are of little account when there is substantial agreement; and when you have facts to bear witness what use is there of words?)

Parum est latam esse sententiam nisi mandetur executioni (Co. Litt. 289). (It is not enough that judgment be pronounced unless it be carried to execution.) Compare EXECUTIO EST, ETC; JURIS EFFECTUS, ETC.

Parum proficit scire quid fieri debet si non cognoscas quomodo sit facturum (2 Inst. 503). (It avails little to know what ought to be done if you do not know how it is to be done.) Cited in connection with the somewhat vague provisions of the Statute of Westminster III., c. 2, as to apportionment.

Parvise. A moot (q.v.).

Pascha clausum. Low Sunday (q.v.).

Pascha floridum. Palm Sunday (q.v.).

Paschals; Paschal Rents. Quadragesimals (q.v.).

Pascua. Land used mainly for the pasturing of cattle, such as land which is not farmed and is mountain, moor or marsh.

Pascuage; Pascuagium. The grazing or pasturing of cattle or swine.

Pasnage. A form of pannage (q.v.).

Pass.—I. In conveyancing, to pass is to transfer or be transferred. Thus, we may either say that a conveyance by a person entitled to make it passes the estate limited by it (see OPERATIVE WORDS), or that the estate passes by the conveyance.

II. In the practice of the Chancery Division (as to which see R. S. C. Ord. 62) when the draft (or "minutes") of an order or judgment has been settled by the registrar in the presence of the parties, it is left for engrossment, and when it has been engrossed, the parties again attend to examine the engrossment with the draft; if it is correct they sign it, and this is generally called "passing" the order, but strictly speaking the passing is performed by the registrar, who places his initials at the end: after which the order is entered (q.v. and see MINUTES). In simple cases, an order not affecting the rights of the parties inter se may be settled and passed by the registrar without notice to the parties: see Ord. 62, r. 14. When an account has been brought into chambers and vouched, the master is said to have passed or allowed it, with or without disallowances or surcharges. The term "pass" is also applied to the accounting party who brings in the account.

III. See ACT OF PARLIAMENT as to the passing of Acts of Parliament.

Passage is the easement of passing over a piece of private water, analogous to a right of way over land. See EASEMENT; WAY.

Passage Broker. A person providing steerage passages from the British Islands to any port out of Europe and not within the Mediterranean (Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 341). He must be licensed (s. 343).

Passage Court. See COURT OF PASSAGE.

Passagio, De. An obsolete writ which anciently was issued to authorise passage overseas.

Passator. One who controlled or who could levy toll for the use of a ford, ferry, or bridge across a river.

Passenger. This means, for the purposes of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, any person carried in a ship other than the master, the crew, the owner, or the family and servants of the owner (Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 267).

The London Hackney Carriages Act, 1843, s. 2, contains a definition of "passenger" for the purposes of that Act.

See RAILWAY PASSENGER DUTY.

Passenger Ship. This means, for the purposes of the Merchant Shipping Acts, every ship propelled by mechanical power carrying passengers to, from or between any places in the United Kingdom except steam ferries working in chains (Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, ss. 267, 743; Merchant Shipping Act, 1906, s. 13).

Passim. (In various places.) Used with regard to an author, book, statute, etc., in such a reference as "see the Trade Marks Act, 1905, passim."

Past Debt. A debt which is in existence before the doing of some subsequent act in the law relating to it, e.g., a debt which is secured by a promissory note given after the advance had been made and not when it originally was made.

Pasturage; Pasture. "Pasture" means both (i) land employed for the pasturage of cattle, etc., and (ii) the right of pasture.

A right of pasture is the right of feeding animals on the grass and other wild herbage, and the leaves, mast, acorns, etc., of trees growing on land belonging to another person. Rights of pasture are of three kinds, several, common, and seignorial.

A several pasture is one which entitles the person having the right to exclude the owner of the land from feeding his beasts on it. Such a right may be created by grant or prescription. Sheepheaves (q.v.) seem to be several rights of pasture.

A common of pasture is where the person having the right can only exercise it in common with the owner of the soil. As to the varieties of common of pasture, see COMMON.

A seignorial right of pasture occurs in the case of a fold-course (q.v.).

By s. 113 of the Inclosure Act, 1845, any land directed to be inclosed under that Act may be set apart to be stocked and depastured in common by the persons interested therein. The valuer acting in the matter is to ascertain and allot the stints or rights of pasturage of the persons interested, the numbers and kinds of animals to be admitted to the pasture, the times during which the animals may be kept on the pasture, etc. Such a pasture is called a regulated pasture. See FIELD REEVE.

See SHACK.

Pastus. The maintenance by tenants of the king or other great men when on their lands. Thus a charter of the Anglo-Saxon period (Mons. Angl. tom. 1, p. 123) grants land free "a pastu regis et principum."

Patent. See AMBIGUITY; LETTERS PATENT; PATENT.

Patent Agent. No person can describe himself as a patent agent unless he is registered pursuant to the Patents and Designs Act, 1907 (ib. s. 84); and a "patent agent" means an agent for obtaining patents in the United Kingdom (ib.)

Patent Bill Office. The Attorney-General's Patent Bill Office was the office in which were formerly prepared the drafts of all letters patent other than those for inventions. The draft patent was called a bill (q.v.), and the officer who prepared it was called the Clerk of the Patents to her Majesty's Attorney and Solicitor General. By the Great Seal Act, 1851, warrants were substituted for bills, and by the Great Seal Act, 1880, the duty of preparing such warrants was transferred to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery (q.v. and see PRIVY SEAL).

Patent Medicine Licence. A licence costing 5s., which must (under penalty of £20 for default) be taken out yearly by every person compounding or selling proprietary medicines (q.v.) liable to duty (Medicine Stamp Act, 1802, s. 9; Stamp Act, 1804, Sch. A.; Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1875, s. 3).

Patent Office. The only Patent Office now existing is that relating to inventions. It exists by virtue of s. 62 of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, not merely for the purposes of that Act (see PATENTS), but also for the purposes of the Trade Marks Act, 1905.

The Great Seal Patent Office was the office in which the Clerk of the Patents affixed the Great Seal (q.v.) to the many documents upon which it formerly was required. In 1832 the office of the Clerk of the Patents (see that title) had been abolished; but this (Lord Chancellor's Pension Act, 1832, s. 2) was without prejudice to the rights of anyone entitled to the office in either possession or reversion; and the office in fact existed until it was finally abolished and the duties were transferred to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery (q.v.) under the Great Seal (Office) Act, 1874, s. 6.

Patent Rolls. See CLOSE ROLLS.

Patents. Patent, for the purposes of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, "means letters patent for an invention" (ib. s. 93). The law as to patents is now to be found in the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, Pts. I. and III., as amended by the Patents and Designs Act, 1919, and in the Patents Rules, 1920, dated 25th February, 1920, and being No. 338 of the Statutory Rules and Orders, 1920. A patent is obtained by making to the Patent Office an application (Patents and Designs Act, 1907, s. 1 (1) (2)) accompanied by a specification (q.v.). If the specification be provisional, the complete specification must be lodged within nine months of the date of the application, or such further time, not exceeding one month, as the Comptroller may direct (s. 5 (1)). The provisional specification secures priority as from the date of the application: for, on acceptance, every patent is sealed as from the date of the application (s. 13). If the complete specification be not accepted by the Comptroller within fifteen months (or eighteen months if he so directs) of the date of the application, the application becomes void unless an appeal to the Law Officers is lodged (s. 6).

A patent, when granted, is sealed with the seal of the Patent Office (s. 14). Its normal duration is sixteen years (s. 17) but this may be extended by five, or in exceptional cases ten, years by the High Court, or a new patent may be sanctioned by the Court (s. 18).

Patents are assignable, and assignments, as well as licences, are to be registered in the Register of Patents (ss. 28, 71). In addition to licences which the patentee may grant, there are since 1919 licences which any patentee must grant, upon certain terms, if his patent be endorsed by the Comptroller with the words "Licence of Right" (s. 24). Such endorsement is one of the means of preventing abuse of the monopoly given by the patent. See s. 27 (as amended by the Act of 1919) as to the other remedies for such abuse. As to the revocation of patents, see ss. 25, 26.

The remedy for infringement of a patent is an action for damages or an injunction, or both. See INFRINGEMENT.

A patent will be granted only for something which is both novel (see NOVELTY; PUBLICATION) and of utility; but utility means merely utility for the purpose indicated by the patentee, although that purpose may itself be useless.

See PARTICULARS OF BREACHES AND OBJECTIONS; SCIRE FACIAS; COMMISSIONERS OF PATENTS; TITLE (VI.); DISCLAIMER.

Pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant (Co. Litt. 123). (He is the father whom marriage indicates.) Compare SEMPER PRÆSUMITUR PRO LEGITIMATIONE, ETC.; and see FILIATIO, ETC.

Pater et mater non sunt de sanguine puerorum (3 Rep. 40). (The father and the mother are not of the blood of their children.) That is to say, land cannot descend from a child to a parent. See HÆREDITAS NUNQUAM, ETC.

Paternity. See AFFILIATION; BASTARD; LEGITIMACY.

Patria. Used in the old law as meaning a jury of the neighbourhood. See COUNTRY.

Patria laboribus et expensis non debet fatigari (Jenk. Cent. 6). (A jury ought not to be harassed by labours and expenses.) This relates to the jury in an assize of novel disseisin.

Patriotic Fund. Commissioners were appointed under the Royal Sign Manual, dated 7th October, 1854, for the purpose of raising and applying a fund (to be known as the Patriotic Fund) for the relief of officers and men in the naval and military service of the Crown who might lose their lives in the Crimean War. A number of Acts, entitled the Patriotic Fund Acts, 1867 to 1899, were passed to regulate the application of the fund. In 1903 the Patriotic Fund Reorganization Act, 1903, established a body corporate, entitled the Royal Patriotic Fund Corporation, and transferred all the property of the original fund to this new body upon trust for the widows, children and dependents of officers and men of the Navy and Army.

Patron of a living or benefice is the owner of the advowson (q.v.).

Patronum faciunt dos, ædificatio, fundus. (Endowment, building, and dedication to religious purposes are necessary to make one the founder [of a church or religious house]). But this is merely what Joan de Garlandia says in Synonymis without reference to English law. See Du Cange, s.v. Patronus.

Pauper means (i) a person in receipt of relief under the poor laws; (ii) a person suing or defending an action in formâ pauperis. As to the former see POOR LAW; GUARDIANS OF THE POOR; OVERSEER; PARISH; SETTLEMENT; as to the latter see IN FORMÂ PAUPERIS; DISPAUPER; DIVES.

Pauper, Assignment to. This is the same as an assignment to a "man of straw." See STRAW.

Pavagium; Pavage. A toll anciently levied to meet the cost of paving streets or other highways.

Pawn; Pawnbroker. Pawn is sometimes used (especially by the older writers) in the same sense as pledge (q.v.), but more usually at the present day it signifies a pledge to a pawnbroker or person who keeps a shop for the purchase or sale of goods, and takes goods by way of security for money advanced thereon. Statutory regulations have been made for preventing frauds and overcharges by pawnbrokers: thus, under the Pawnbrokers Acts, 1872 and 1922, every pawnbroker taking a pledge for a loan not exceeding £10 is bound to give the pawner a pawn ticket, specifying the charges for interest, etc., which he is allowed by statute to make, the period within which the pledge may be redeemed, etc.; he is also bound to keep account books showing all sales of pledges by him, and he has a statutory power of sale by auction with regard to goods pledged for above ten shillings, while goods pledged for ten shillings or under become his property if not redeemed within the year and the days of grace allowed for redemption. In other respects he is a bailee, like an ordinary pledgee. See BAILMENT

A pawnbroker commits an offence if he takes anything in pawn from anyone apparently under the age of fourteen (Children Act, 1908, s. 117), or if he takes any firearm (q.v.) in pawn.

Pawnage. A form of pannage (q.v.).

Payable. A sum of money is said to be payable when a person is under an obligation to pay it. "Payable" may therefore signify an obligation to pay at a future time, but when used without qualification "payable" means that the debt is payable at once, as opposed to "owing" (q.v.).

Payee. See BILL OF EXCHANGE; CHEQUE.

Paymaster-General is the officer who makes the various payments out of the public money required for the different departments of the State, by issuing drafts on the Bank of England.

By the Chancery Funds Act, 1872, the duties of the Accountant-General of the Court of Chancery were transferred to the Paymaster-General. (See ACCOUNTANT-GENERAL.) The Paymaster-General carried out the duties so transferred to him at the "Office of the Paymaster-General for Chancery Business" in the Royal Courts of Justice, London. The business transacted there included the issuing of directions for the payment and transfer into Court of the moneys and securities belonging to the suitors: the payment by drafts on the Bank of England of sums payable out of Court, and of the interest on funds in Court: the keeping of the necessary accounts, and the issuing of certificates and transcripts of the accounts. Under the Supreme Court of Judicature (Funds, etc.) Act, 1883, all the accounting departments of the various Divisions were consolidated into the Pay Office of the Supreme Court, with the Paymaster-General as its head. The business of the Pay Office is now regulated by the Supreme Court Fund Rules, 1915, dated September 14, 1915 (S. R. & O., 1915, Vol. III., p. 184).

See CERTIFICATE; DIRECTION; PAYMENT INTO COURT.

Payment. This is a transfer of money from one person (the payor) to another (the payee). When made in pursuance of a debt or obligation it is sometimes called payment in satisfaction.

Payment in fact is an actual payment from the payor to the payee; payment in law is a transaction equivalent to actual payment; thus, payment in fact by a debtor to one of two or more joint creditors is payment in law to all; and retainer, set-off, allowance in account, acceptance of security, goods or other means of obtaining actual payment, and payment into Court (q.v.), are said to be equivalent to payment, because they produce a satisfaction of the debt.

Payment in satisfaction is said to be absolute when the debt is completely discharged, as by payment of cash without stipulation; conditional payment is where the debt may afterwards revive if the mode of payment does not result in actual payment, as where a creditor is paid by a cheque or bill which is afterwards dishonoured; whether the acceptance by the creditor of a negotiable security operates as conditional or absolute payment is a question of fact in each case.

As to general and appropriated payments, see APPROPRIATION.

As to the effect of part payment, see PART PAYMENT.

In the law of bills of exchange, payment for honour is where a person pays a dishonoured bill for the honour of some one of the parties. The payor has the rights of a holder against the person for whose honour he has paid, and against all antecedent parties, but the subsequent parties are discharged. See ACCEPTANCE; HONOUR.

See PROTEST.

Payment into Court is the deposit of money with an official or banker of a Court of justice for the purposes of proceedings pending in the Court.

Payment into Court may be made with one of three objects.

I. Where the defendant in an action for debt or damages, or in an Admiralty action, admits the plaintiff's claim to a certain amount, he may pay that amount into Court by way of satisfaction or amends (Ord. 22, r. 1), and plead the payment in as a defence. Except in libel or slander, a defendant may also pay money into Court with a defence denying liability (ib.). The plaintiff (unless otherwise ordered) is entitled in either case to receive the amount paid in (rr. 5, 6), and if he accepts it in satisfaction of his entire claim the defendant must pay him his costs of the action (r. 7). In no case where money is paid into Court is that fact to be communicated to a jury before they have found their verdict (r. 22). Like payments into Court may be made in the County Court, where the rules (see County Court Rules, Ord. 9, rr. 12, 13, 26) are to the same effect as the High Court Rules.

II. Money may be paid into Court to remain there pending litigation. Thus, where a primâ facie liability is established against a defendant, the Court may, under Ord. 32, r. 6, order him to pay the amount in question into Court to remain there until the rights of the parties have been determined, or, in the language of common law, "to abide the event" of the litigation: so where a defendant is a trustee or stakeholder of a fund he may be ordered to pay it into Court. Payment into Court is also a mode, under Ord. 65, r. 6, of giving security, e.g., for the costs of an appeal, as to which see Ord. 52, r. 15.

III. In the Chancery Division of the High Court, payment into Court is also a mode by which a person may relieve himself from the responsibility of distributing or administering a fund in his hands. The commonest instance is that of a trustee, as to whom see s. 42 of the Trustee Act, 1893, and R. S. C. Ord. 54B, Another instance is that of promoters under the Land Clauses Acts (q.v.).

See DEPOSIT; PAYMASTER-GENERAL; TRANSFER.

Where land subject to any incumbrance is sold, whether by the Court or out of Court, the Court may direct or allow payment into Court of a sum sufficient to provide for the incumbrance, and thereupon declare the land to be freed from it. The Court may distribute or apply the fund in Court according to the rights of the parties (Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 5).

Pay Office. The office in which the Paymaster-General (q.v.) performs his duties.

P.C. Prime cost sum. In specifications for building and engineering works it is usual to provide that such and such an article is to be provided at the "p. c." of such and such a sum. Here the prime cost means the net price actually paid by the contractor. He is not entitled to buy the article at the price which a private purchaser would pay and to deduct for himself any trade discount or, apart from special custom, any discount for cash, which may be allowed to him.

Peace. In municipal (as opposed to international) law, "peace" or the "king's peace" is used to signify the law relating to public order. Hence, an indictment used formerly to conclude with a charge that the offence complained of was committed "against the peace of our lord the King." See CONTRA PACEM.

See ARTICLES OF THE PEACE; BILL OF PEACE; BREACHES OF THE PEACE; CLERK OF THE PEACE; COMMISSION; JUSTICE OF THE PEACE; PLEAS OF THE CROWN.

Peccatum peccato addit qui culpæ quam facit patrocinium defensionis adjungit (5 Co. 49). (He adds one offence to another who, when he commits an offence, joins the protection of a defence.) This is not true as a general statement of the law. It is quoted in connection with the practice as to a defendant on a writ of Quibus, etc., (q.v.) who had vexatiously defended the case. Compare PRUDENTER, ETC.

Peck. A measure of capacity containing two imperial gallons (Weights and Measures Act, 1878, s. 15). Formerly the peck varied in different places and for different articles. It was never used for fluids.

Peculiars, in ecclesiastical law, are districts exempt from the jurisdiction of the ordinary of the diocese. Royal peculiars are the King's free chapels. Formerly the peculiar jurisdictions in England amounted to nearly three hundred; but they have been practically abolished by legislation which was initiated by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners Act, 1836. See COURT OF PECULIARS; ORDINARY.

Pecunia dicitur à pecu, omnes enim veterum divitiæ in animalibus consistebant (Co. Litt. 207). (Money (pecunia) is so called from cattle (pecus), because the wealth of our ancestors consisted in cattle.) Etymologies were as a rule curious rather than accurate in the days of Coke: but this particular etymology is correct. See Varro, Lib., 5, par. 95.

Pecuniary Causes. In the terminology of the ecclesiastical Courts, this expression means such injuries to private persons as these Courts can, or could, entertain for the purpose of making pecuniary satisfaction to those persons. Such "causes" related chiefly to the "subtraction" (q.v.) of tithe, and to the non-payment of various clerical dues. They are now almost obsolete, tithe having been almost universally commuted into tithe rentcharge, and dues not exceeding £10 being recoverable before a Court of summary jurisdiction under the Ecclesiastical Courts Act, 1813, ss. 4-6.

Pedage. Toll anciently paid for passing, whether on horse or on foot, through a town or other place.

Pedigree. In proceedings with reference to the devolution of a deceased person's property, questions as to the relationship of the claimants are called questions of pedigree. They are subject to peculiar rules of evidence. Thus, declarations by deceased persons (see DECLARATION; LIS MOTA); the general reputation of a family, proved by a surviving member of it; entries contained in family Bibles or other books, produced from the proper custody; inscriptions on tombstones; and charts of pedigrees, made or adopted by deceased members of the family, are admissible as evidence on questions of pedigree, by way of exception to the general rule against derivative evidence. (See EVIDENCE; REPUTATION.)

In Chancery practice, when a question of pedigree arises (e.g., on an inquiry as to the next-of-kin or heir-at-law of a deceased person), a pedigree should, except in very simple cases, be prepared for the use of the master.

Pedis abscissio. The cutting off of a man's foot. See Leg. Gul. I., c. 7; Fleta, lib. 1, c. 38; Bracton, lib. 3, c. 32.

Pedlar. This means "Any hawker, pedlar, petty chapman, tinker, caster of metals, mender of chairs, or other person who, without any horse or other beast drawing or bearing burden, travels and trades on foot and goes from town to town or to other men's houses, carrying to sell or exposing for sale any goods, wares or merchandise, or procuring orders for goods, wares or merchandise immediately to be delivered, or selling or offering for sale his skill in handicraft" (Pedlars Act, 1871, s. 1). Every such person must hold a certificate, costing 5s. and expiring one year after the date of issue (ss. 4, 5) unless he be a commercial traveller, a seller of fish, fruit or vegetables, or a seller at a fair or market (s. 23). The certificate is good for any part of the United Kingdom (Pedlars Act, 1881). The essential difference between a hawker (q.v.) and a pedlar is that a hawker employs, while a pedlar does not employ, a horse, etc., in the course of his business. The case of a motor car has never been provided for: and a pedlar will not become a hawker merely because he uses a motor car.

Peel's Acts. These Acts (named after the first Sir Robert Peel) are the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, cc. 27, 29, 30 (all relating to the criminal law and all now repealed), the Sliding Scale Act, 9 Geo. 4, c. 60 (a corn law repealed in 1842), and the New Parishes Acts, 1843 and 1844.

Peerage. The peerage consists of dukes, marquises, earls, viscounts and barons: see these titles. They are divided into (1) Peers of England created before the Union with Scotland in 1707; (2) Peers of Great Britain created after 1707 and before the Union with Ireland in 1800; (3) Peers of the United Kingdom created since 1800; (4) Peers of Scotland created before 1707; and (5) Peers of Ireland created at any time: as to the right of these five classes respectively to sit in the House of Lords, see that title.

All peerages except baronies (q.v.) have always been created by letters patent, except in the few cases in which they have been created by charter or by statute, and all, except baronies, have always been limited to the heirs male of the body of the original grantee. The creation of a baron by writ of summons is now obsolete, except for the purpose of calling up the eldest son of a peer during such peer's life.

Peers are exempt from arrest in civil proceedings, and from service on juries. If charged with treason or felony, they are tried, not by a jury, but by the House of Lords (q.v.).

No peer, other than an Irish peer not being a representative peer, can be a member of the House of Commons: and no peer can vote at a parliamentary election.

Down to 1909, the House of Commons had for centuries been in the habit of annually passing a resolution to the effect that the interference of any peer in a parliamentary election was a breach of the privileges of that House: but the influence which a peer, as such, can exercise over electors is now negligible; and no such resolution has been passed since 1909.

The children of peers are in point of law commoners, although they bear courtesy titles ranging, according to the rank of the peer, from "Marquis" to "Honourable." See the titles of the various ranks.

Peeress. The wife or the unmarried widow of a peer (q.v.), or a woman upon whom a peerage has been conferred, or a woman holding a peerage descendible to the heirs general of the original grantee.

A peeress in her own right cannot sit in the House of Lords: but under the statute 20 Hen. 8, c. 9, she is entitled to be tried by that House if charged with treason or felony.

Peers (Pares). In the old books it is laid down that "pares sunt qui de eodem domino feudum tenent" (those are peers [or equals] who hold of the same lord). These are the peers contemplated by the declaration in clause 39 of Magna Carta that no freeman was to be condemned "nisi per legale judicium parium suorum" (except by the lawful judgment of his peers). See Pares.

Peine forte et dure. This was the common-law sequel to a refusal by one indicted for felony to plead "guilty" or "not guilty." The order of the Court was that he be removed and laid upon his back in prison with so much weight upon his body as he could bear—and more—and that he be given small quantities of dry bread and of water upon alternate days until he died. The object of a prisoner in refusing to plead, or "standing mute" as it was called, was to obviate the attainder which resulted from a conviction of felony. Even this means of saving a family from ruin was not available to one indicted for treason: for him, as for one indicted for misdemeanour, refusal to plead was taken as being a plea of guilty.

In 1772 the statute 12 Geo. 3, c. 20, made refusal to plead to a charge of felony equivalent to a plea of guilty, and so abolished the peine forte et dure. As to subsequent legislation, see MUTE.

Pell. See CLERK OF THE PELLS; COMPTROLLER. In addition to meaning a skin of parchment, pell also meant a skin which had not been converted into parchment: see PELLAGE.

Pellage. This was a duty levied on skins exported out of the kingdom.

Pells of Issue and Receipt. These are records of daily payments and receipts by the Exchequer. They took the place of the earlier Receipt Rolls (q.v.). The Pells of Issue now in the Record Office cover the periods 1221-1470 and 1566-1797, while the Pells of Receipt preserved in the same office run from 1213 to 1782. See CLERK OF THE PELLS.

Pembroke. This was anciently a county palatine, but the statute 27 Hen. 8, c. 26, s. 14, made it merely an ordinary county.

Penal Action. This is an action for a penalty which is imposed by some statute as a punishment. When the statute gives the penalty to any person who will sue for it, such an action is known as a popular action; and where the statute gives the penalty partly to the Crown and partly to the informer, the action is known as a qui tam action, because the action was formerly described as being brought by one "qui tam pro domino rege quam pro se ipso in hac parte sequitur," that is to say, "who sues on behalf of our Lord the King as well as for himself."

Penal Rent. See NOMINE PŒNÆ.

Penal Servitude, in criminal law, is a punishment which consists in keeping an offender in confinement and compelling him to labour. It was substituted for transportation by the Penal Servitude Act, 1853. The main distinction between penal servitude and "imprisonment with hard labour" (q.v.) seems to be that the latter is carried out within the walls of a gaol, and cannot be inflicted for more than two years as a rule, though in some cases it may be for three years, while penal servitude is carried out in any place appointed for the purpose by the proper authority, and may be for life or any period not less than three years. (See IMPRISONMENT.) A ticket of leave may be granted to anyone sentenced to penal servitude, but not to anyone sentenced to imprisonment. Under the Rules for Local Prisons, 1st September, 1907, r. 37*a*, anyone sentenced to imprisonment can now, however, if he behaves well in prison, get a remission of not more than one-sixth of his sentence: and he, once he is discharged upon such remission, is deemed to have served the whole of his sentence, in which respect he is at an advantage as compared with the holder of a ticket of leave. See CONVICT: FORFEITURE: TICKET OF LEAVE.

Penal Sum; Penalty. A penalty or penal sum is a sum of money payable as an equivalent or punishment for an injury.

Some penalties are imposed by law; thus, many statutes creating duties of a public nature contain provisions for the recovery of penalties against persons neglecting those duties. Some of these may be enforced by information (q.v.), others by an ordinary action. See INFORMER.

The "exemplary" damages recovered in certain actions for tort are in the nature of penalties. See DAMAGES.

Penalties may also be agreed on by the parties. Thus, in a bond with a condition, the penalty or penal sum is a nominal sum (e.g., double the amount to be secured) which the obligor binds himself to pay if the condition is not complied with. When the obligee sues on it, he recovers only what is due to him under the terms of the condition. See BOND.

Where the parties to a contract agree that, in the event of a breach of its provisions, the one shall pay to the other a specified sum of money, and it appears on the true construction of the instrument, apart from the form of words used, that the sum so specified does not represent the amount of damage caused by a breach of the contract, but is merely a nominal sum, as in the case of a bond (supra) then the sum so specified is called a penalty; and if the person injured sues on the contract, he cannot recover the penalty, but only damages for the injury which he has actually sustained. For examples, see DAMAGES.

Formerly the Court of Chancery granted relief against penalties in many cases where the Courts of common law allowed them to be enforced. But this distinction has been abolished since 1873. See EQUITY.

Penance is an ecclesiastical punishment affecting the body of the penitent, by which he is obliged to give public satisfaction to the Church for the scandal which he has given by his evil example; an open confession generally forms part of the penance, while in some cases the penance may be commuted for a sum of money to be applied for pious uses. But now this punishment is never enforced. See CENSURE.

Pendency; Pendent; Pendente lite. An action, arbitration or other proceeding is said to be pendent after it has been commenced and before the final judgment or award has been given. Pendency is the state of being pendent. "Pendente lite" means during the pendency of a suit. See ALIMONY; GRANT; LIS PENDENS; LIS ALIBI PENDENS.

Pendente lite nihil innovetur (Co. Litt. 344). (Nothing should be altered pendente lite (q.v.).) Quoted in connection with the common-law rule that, if, pending the decision of a quare impedit (q.v.), the defendant bishop instituted a clerk of his own, then the plaintiff in the quare impedit had a writ against the bishop for the removal of the bishop's clerk.

Penny. See COPPER COINS; GOLD COINS; SILVER COINS. It should be noted that a penny, whether of copper or of silver, was worth one two-hundred and fortieth part of the pound for the time being: but the gold penny was in a class by itself.

Penny Bank. See SAVINGS BANK.

Penny Post. This, in the modern sense, was instituted pursuant to the Post Office (Duties) Act, 1840, popularly known as the Penny Post Act. During the war of 1914-1918 it became a three-halfpenny post; subsequently it became a twopenny post; and in 1922 it again became a three-halfpenny post. There was an earlier penny post (but only for places within ten miles of the General Post Office) under the statute 9 Ann. c. 10.

Pennyweight. See TROY WEIGHT.

Pensam, Ad. Payment ad pensam was payment by weight, as where payment of a pound was made in a pound weight of silver instead of in twenty shillings. See LIBRA PENSA.

Pensa salis. A weight of salt: an ancient measure containing 256 pounds.

Pension. This word is used in four senses: (1) at the University of Cambridge it means, and in the Inns of Court it formerly meant, certain fees payable to those bodies; (2) a consultative meeting of the Benchers of Gray's Inn; (3) an annual payment made to one superannuated, or retired, from the service of the Crown or of the Church, or some other public body; (4) payments in lieu of tithes made to the clergymen of some churches.

As regards the Pension of Gray's Inn it would appear from Waterhouse's Commentary upon Fortescue (1663) that formerly all members of the Inn, except students, took part in it; and this seems to have applied to the Parliaments of the two Temples and to the Council of Lincoln's Inn, which are the meetings in those Inns corresponding to the Pension of Gray's Inn. Now, however, only the Benchers of the Inns attend the Pension, the Parliaments, or the Council.

When a pension is granted by the Crown to one who, though not for the time engaged in any active duties, is still liable to be called to active service, and is therefore to be considered in the service of the Crown, as in the case of an officer on half-pay, the pension cannot be assigned, attached or otherwise made liable to his debts. But a pension granted entirely as a compensation for past services may be assigned by the grantee, or it may be taken in execution by his creditors. See CIVIL LIST PENSIONS; POLITICAL PENSION.

Pensions, Ministry of. This Ministry was established pursuant to the Ministry of Pensions Act, 1916, which (s. 1) authorised the appointment of a Minister of Pensions. It (s. 2) transferred to him the powers and duties of the military and naval authorities with regard to pensions and grants payable by them respectively, and the powers and duties of the Commissioners of Chelsea Hospital with respect to grants and pensions (other than in-pensions) payable by them. The salary of the Minister is £2,000 a year (s. 4 (2)): he and one of the secretaries of the Ministry may sit in the House of Commons, and the office of the Minister is to be deemed one of the offices included in Sch. H to the Representation of the People Act, 1867 (see OFFICE OF PROFIT). Further powers were given to the Ministry by the Naval and Military War Pensions, Etc. (Transfer of Powers) Act, 1917; and there have been several other enactments regulating its functions.

Pension Writ. An order which formerly was issued against members of the several Inns of Court who were in arrear for commons (that is to say, dinners) or dues payable to their Inns. The order, which of course was without legal effect, precluded the member against whom it was made from coming to commons or being discharged from his Inn until the arrears were paid. It is now obsolete.

Pentecostals. Offerings anciently made by parishioners at Pentecost, or Whitsuntide, to their parish priest. One-fourth went to him personally, one-fourth to the poor, one-fourth towards church repairs, and one-fourth to the bishop. Pentecostals were also known as Whitsuntide Farthings, and as Smoke Farthings. These offerings were originally in kind; subsequently they were commuted to money payments. Compare QUADRAGESIMALS.

Pentonville. A prison in the Clerkenwell district of London, established by the Pentonville Prison Act, 1842, which authorised the confinement therein of male convicts under sentence of transportation (q.v.). When penal servitude (q.v.) was substituted for transportation, Pentonville became a prison for convicts sentenced to penal servitude. Ultimately, pursuant to the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1885, s. 3, the prison was sold and demolished.

Peppercorn Rent. See RENT.

Per. As to actions in the per, see ENTRY SUR DISSEISIN.

Perambulation is the act of walking over the boundaries of a district or piece of land, either for the purpose of determining them or of preserving evidence of them. Thus, in many parishes it is the custom for the parishioners to perambulate the boundaries of the parish in Rogation Week in every year. Such a custom entitles them to enter any man's land and abate nuisances in their way. See PURLIEU.

Perambulatione facienda, De. This is a writ which formerly lay where encroachments were alleged to have been made between adjoining lordships. It commanded the sheriff to make due perambulation and to set out the boundaries.

Per auter vie. See TENANT FOR LIFE.

Per capita; Per stirpes. When property is given to the descendants or relations of two or more persons, the question frequently arises whether the donees are to take per stirpes, that is, as representatives of their respective ancestors or relations; or per capita, that is, whether they together form one class, each member of which is to take an equal share. The question chiefly arises in gifts to descendants. If a testator leaves property to his issue and dies leaving children who are living and grandchildren who are the issue of deceased children, then the property is divided per capita, that is, each child and grandchild takes an equal share of the whole. But if there is a gift to two or more persons, with a substitutional gift to the children of such of them as shall die before the gift takes effect, then the distribution takes place per stirpes. Thus, if there were three original donees, A, B and C, and B has died leaving three children, and C has died leaving two children, the property is divided into three parts, one going to A, another to B's three children, and the third to C's two children. The expressions per capita and per stirpes are also used in the law of descent and distribution with reference to the rule of representation. See DESCENT; DISTRIBUTION; NEXT OF KIN; REPRESENTATION.

Percaptura. Anciently this meant a part of a river which was embanked so as to be in the nature of a fish-pond.

Perch. The perch, rod or pole is a measure of length containing five yards and a half (Weights and Measures Act, 1878, s. 11). Even before the perch had a statutory meaning, it was in most cases taken as being of the present statutory length; but in Staffordshire it was eight yards, while in Hereford it was seven yards as regards ditching, and only five and a half as regards walling, and there were many similar local variations.

A square perch of land contains 30¼ square yards, being 5½ yards (or one perch) on each side, if it be an exact square.

Perdonatio utlagariæ. A pardon for outlawry. This was anciently available for one who had been outlawed for not yielding obedience to the King's Court and who had afterwards of his own accord surrendered himself.

Perdono. An obsolete original writ which released the king's claim to have certain moneys paid into the Exchequer.

Perdurable, as applied to an estate, signifies lasting long or for ever: thus, a disseisor or tenant in fee upon condition has as high and great an estate as the rightful owner or tenant in fee simple absolute, but not so perdurable. The term is chiefly used with reference to the extinguishment of rights by unity of seisin, which does not take place unless both the right and the land out of which it issues are held for equally high and perdurable estates.

Perempt. In ecclesiastical procedure an appeal is said to be perempted when the appellant has by his own act waived or barred his right of appeal: as where he partially complies with or acquiesces in the sentence of the Court.

Peremptory. An order, writ or other judicial command, is said to be peremptory when no excuse for non-compliance with it is admitted. Thus, in an action in the High Court, a peremptory order for time is final, and the party must either take the step within the time fixed by it (known as the "peremp-tory day ") or incur the consequences of not doing so: see Ord. 41, r. 5.

As to peremptory challenges, see CHALLENGE. As to a peremptory mandamus, see MANDAMUS. As to peremptory pleas, see PLEA.

Perfecting Bail. See BAIL.

Performance, with reference to a contract or condition, is the act of doing that which is required by the contract or condition. The effect of performance, in the case of a contract, is to discharge the person bound to do the act from liability, and, in the case of a condition, to create or establish the right dependent on the condition. Thus, where A contracts to supply goods to B, not only is he bound to supply them, but he cannot claim their price until he has done so (condition precedent); if he performs the contract by supplying them, he discharges his liability, and at the same time entitles himself to claim their price.

Part performance is where the contract has been partly carried into effect; what is called the doctrine of part performance is the rule that where a contract is not enforceable for want of some formality (e.g., by reason of not being in writing, as required by the Statute of Frauds), and it has been partly carried into effect by one of the parties, the other cannot set up the informality as a defence: as where possession has been taken under a parol contract for the sale of land. See PART PAYMENT. Part performance of a contract will, as a rule, give no right of action to the person who has partially performed it; but an action will lie against one who has accepted and retained the benefit of the part performance.

In equity, the doctrine of performance is applied to cases where A has covenanted to purchase and settle or leave by will property in favour of B, and B has obtained the benefit stipulated for, although the covenant has not been strictly performed. Thus, where A covenanted to purchase lands of £200 a year and to settle them on his wife and the children of the marriage, and purchased lands of that value, but did not settle them, it was held that this was a performance of his covenant, and that the eldest son was therefore not entitled to have both the benefit of the lands which had descended to him as heir-at-law and to have the covenant performed by the purchase of other land.

See DISCHARGE; ESSENCE OF THE CONTRACT; PAYMENT; SATISFACTION.

Periculosum est res novas et inusitatas inducere (Co. Litt. 379). (It is a dangerous thing to introduce innovations which have never been tried before.) See EVENTUS VARIOS, ETC.: compare MINIME MUTANDA, ETC.

Periculum rei venditæ, nondum traditæ, est emptoris. (A thing, sold but not yet delivered, is at the risk of the purchaser.) Compare DAMNUM SENTIT, ETC.; RES PERIT, ETC.; but see MORA, ETC.

Peril. See INSURANCE; RISK.

Per incuriam. (Through want of care.) An order of the Court which clearly is the result of some oversight is said to have been made per incuriam.

Perinde valere. The initial words of the dispensation anciently given by the Pope to a clerk presented to a benefice for which he was disqualified. The power of granting such dispensations was transferred from the Pope to the Archbishop of Canterbury by the statute 25 Hen. 8, c. 21.

Per infortunium. (By mischance.) See HOMICIDE.

Perjury. (1) "If any person lawfully sworn as a witness or as an interpreter in a judicial proceeding wilfully makes a statement material in that proceeding which he knows to be false or which he does not believe to be true he shall be guilty of perjury . . . (2) The expression judicial proceeding includes a proceeding before any Court, tribunal or person having by law power to hear, receive and examine evidence on oath" (Perjury Act, 1911, s. 1). The statute does not declare perjury to be a felony; and it consequently remains a misdemeanour, as it was at common law.

"No person shall be convicted of any offence against this Act, or of any offence declared by any other Act to be perjury or subornation of perjury or to be punishable as perjury or subornation of perjury solely upon the evidence of one witness" . . (Perjury Act, 1911, s. 13). This is merely declaratory of the pre-existing law, under which it was necessary to have either (1) two witnesses or (2) one witness whose evidence was corroborated by independent proof of some separate material fact, such for instance as independent proof of a material letter written by the accused.

See AFFIDAVIT; AFFIRM; DECLARATION; FALSE SWEARING; OATH; SUBORNATION OF PERJURY.

The Perjury Act, 1911, repeals the multitudinous enactments which had declared false swearing of various kinds to be perjury or to be punishable as perjury. It is a complete code dealing with the various kinds of false oaths, false declarations, and false affirmations.

Permanent Hague Court. See HAGUE CONFERENCE.

Permissive Waste. See WASTE.

Permutatione archidiaconatus et ecclesiæ eidem annexæ cum ecclesia et prebenda, De. A writ anciently addressed to the ordinary requiring him to admit to a benefice a clerk who had made an exchange with the incumbent.

Per my et per tout. See JOINT TENANCY.

Pernancy; Pernor. Pernancy is the act of taking or receiving rents or other profits of land: the person who takes them is called the pernor. The terms are now obsolete.

Per pais, Trial by. (Trial by the country): see COUNTRY; PATRIA.

Perpetual Commissioners. See COMMISSIONERS FOR TAKING ACKNOWLEDGMENTS, ETC.

Perpetual Curate. See CURATE; CHAPEL.

Perpetua lex est, nullam legem humanam ac positivam perpetuam esse, et clausula quæ abrogationem excludit, ab initio non valet (Bac. Max. Reg. 19). (It is an everlasting law, that no positive and human law shall be perpetual, and a clause which excludes abrogation is invalid from its commencement.) Compare NON IMPEDIT, ETC.; POTESTAS, ETC.; and see LEGES POSTERIORES, ETC.

Perpetual Injunction. See INJUNCTION.

Perpetuation of Testimony. Under the Perpetuation of Testimony Act, 1842, which was repealed by the Statute Law Revision and Civil Procedure Act, 1883, s. 3, any person who would, in circumstances alleged by him to exist, become entitled, upon the happening of any future event, to any honour, title, dignity or office, or to any estate or interest in any property, real or personal, the right or claim to which he could not bring to trial before the happening of that event, might file a bill in Chancery to perpetuate any testimony material for establishing his claim; and where the Crown was affected by the claim, the Attorney-General was a necessary defendant. In a proper case, the Court made an order that the witnesses whose testimony was required should be examined, cross-examined and re-examined in the usual way: and, when this had been done, the cause was at an end. This jurisdiction was transferred to the High Court of Justice in the Chancery Division by the Judicature Act, 1873, and now, under Ord. 37, rr. 35, 36, a precisely similar procedure, except that the commencement of an action is substituted for the filing of a bill in Chancery, is available in the circumstances contemplated by the Act of 1842. Bills to perpetuate testimony as to legitimacy were formerly of not unfrequent occurrence; but the same object became attainable under the Legitimacy Declaration Act, 1858, and bills in Chancery for the purpose became rare, as are now the corresponding actions. See DE BENE ESSE; LEGITIMACY.

Perpetuity. Perpetuity properly signifies a disposition of property by which its absolute vesting is postponed for ever; as, for instance, if property were conveyed to trustees upon trust to pay the income to A for life, and after his death to his eldest son for life, and after his death to his eldest son, and so on. Such dispositions are contrary to the policy of the law, because they "tie up" property and prevent it's free alienation. Accordingly, it has long been a rule in the law relating to contingent remainders, that an estate cannot be given to an unborn person for life, followed by any estate to any child of such unborn person. But the rule which is commonly known as the rule against perpetuities is that applicable to executory interests (q.v.): it forbids any disposition by which the absolute vesting of property is or may be postponed beyond the period of the life or lives of any number of persons living at the date of the disposition, and the further period of twenty-one years after the death of the survivor. Thus, property may be given upon trust for A for life, and after his death for such of his children as attain twenty-one. Hence "perpetuity" has come to mean any disposition which is void, because it infringes this "rule against perpetuities"; such as a gift to A for life, and after his death to such of his children as shall attain twenty-five.

The principal exceptions to the rule are estates tail and limitations following estates tail (q.v.), charitable dispositions, and grants of property to particular families for public services. See ACCUMULATION; APPOINTMENT; MORTMAIN; REMOTENESS.

Per proc (or P.P.). See PROCURATION.

Per quæ servitia. Before the levying of fines (q.v.) was abolished in 1833, the writ per quæ servitia was a judicial writ issuing on the note (q.v.) of a fine and lay for the cognizee (q.v.) of a manor, lands, or rents or other services, to compel the tenants at the time of the fine being levied to attorn (q.v.) to him thereon.

Perquisite. Anything acquired by perquisition (q.v.), something acquired by the holder of a place or office over and above the wages or salary thereof; and, in connection with copyholds, such things as fines, escheats, heriots, reliefs, wards (see those titles), etc., as distinguished from yearly profits or income.

Perquisitio; Perquisition. Anciently this meant the acquisition of anything otherwise than by inheritance.

Per quod. (Whereby.) In the old common law system of pleading the per quod was that part of the declaration in which the plaintiff stated the special damage which the wrongful act of the defendant had caused him, as in an action for slander. (See DAMAGE.) Per quod servitium amisit ("whereby he has lost the benefit of his service"), and per quod consortium amisit ("whereby he has lost the benefit of her society"), were allegations used in actions against persons for injuring a man's servant or wife. See HUSBAND AND WIFE; SERVICE.

Perry. "Any reference to cider shall include a reference to perry" (Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, s. 52). Perry is the same as cider (q.v.), except that pears are substituted for apples.

Per se. (By itself; taken alone).

Person. In jurisprudence, a person is the object of rights and duties, that is, capable of having rights and of being liable to duties, while a thing is the subject of rights and duties.

Persons are of two kinds, natural and artificial. A natural person is a human being (see MONSTER). Artificial persons include (i) a collection or succession of natural persons forming a corporation (q.v.); (ii) a collection of property to which the law attributes the capacity of having rights and duties. The latter class of artificial persons is only recognised to a limited extent in English law: examples are—the estate of a bankrupt or deceased person, and the assets of a company or partnership. See PERSONALTY; STATUS.

In the construction of every Act, whenever passed, the word "person" includes a body corporate, if the Act relates to an offence punishable summarily or on indictment, and includes any body of persons, corporate or unincorporate, if the Act relates to any other subject, unless—in either case—a contrary intention appears (Interpretation Act, 1889, ss. 3, 19).

A corporation is not a person within the meaning of any statute making a penalty recoverable by the "person or persons" who shall inform and sue for the same.

Persona. See PARSON.

Personable. In an obsolete sense, this meant having the status of a person (q.v.).

— Persona conjuncta æquiparatur interesse proprio (Bac. Max. 18). (A connection is regarded as being on the same footing as a man himself.) Thus a deed is deemed to be executed under duress and is void as against anyone induced to execute it by threats of injury to his father or to his son.

Persona designata is a person pointed out or described as an individual, as opposed to a person ascertained as a member of a class, or as filling a particular character. Thus, if a testator bequeaths property to his children as a class, only those who fill that character at his death, that is, the survivors, can participate in the gift, while if he bequeaths it to them as personæ designatæ, the children of such of them as have died in his lifetime will take their parents' shares under the 33rd sect. of the Wills Act, 1837 (see LAPSE). So property may be given to an illegitimate child as persona designata, but not as a child simply (see CHILD). Compare NOMEN COLLECTIVUM.

Personal is that which has reference to the person of an individual, as in the case of a personal contract (see CONTRACT). A personal injury is an injury to the person of an individual, such as an assault, as opposed to an injury to his property, such as a trespass. See ACTIO PERSONALIS MORITUR CUM PERSONÂ.

In the division of actions, a personal action originally meant one which was brought to enforce a remedy against a specific person, while in a real action the remedy was against a thing. Thus, an action on a contract or tort was a personal action, while an action to recover land was a real action, because the land itself could always be recovered. (See ACTIONS; IN PERSONAM; IN REM.) Hence also arose the distinction between real and personal property, as to which see the respective titles.

A system of law is said to be personal when its operation is limited to one of several races inhabiting a State, as is the case in India.

See also ACT OF PARLIAMENT; SERVICE

Personal Property or Personalty may be said generally to include (i) everything the subject of ownership not being land, or an interest in land, and also (ii) a few exceptional interests in land which from historical reasons are nevertheless personalty.

Personal property differs from realty chiefly in the following respects:—(1) Realty is in theory only capable of being held for an estate (q.v.), while personalty is essentially the subject of absolute ownership. A chattel is accordingly incapable of being entailed. But limited and reversionary interests in chattels, analogous to certain estates in land, may be created under the doctrines of equity: thus, a personal property may be vested in trustees in trust for A. for life, and after his death for B.; but the rules governing contingent remainders in land do not apply to personal property. Chattels may also be made the subject of joint ownership and ownership in common (see JOINT; JOINT TENANCY; TENANCY IN COMMON), and of appointment under a power (see POWER). (2) On the death of its owner, personalty (like, since 1897, realty also) passes to the executor or administrator of the deceased; and if he died intestate, it is divisible among his next-of-kin according to the Statutes of Distribution, while realty, except in so far as it has to be applied to the payment of debts, passes, through the executor or administrator, to the devisee of its owner if he has disposed of it by will, or to his heir if he has died intestate. (See ANIMALS FERÆ NATURÆ; DESCENT; DONATIO MORTIS CAUSÂ; FIXTURE; GOODS; GROWING CROPS; HEIR; HEIRLOOM; NEXT-OF-KIN; TITLE DEEDS.) As to the administration of the real and personal property of a deceased person, see ADMINISTRATION; ASSETS; EXECUTOR. (3) Personal property is capable of being transferred or conveyed by modes inapplicable to real property. See ASSIGNMENT.

Personal property is subject to several divisions. As to the distinction between chattels real and chattels personal, see CHATTEL. Chattels personal are further divisible into choses in possession and choses in action. (See CHOSE.) Mixed or impure personalty consists of leaseholds, terms of years, estates at will, land directed to be converted into money (see CONVERSION), and money secured on land, e.g., by mortgage. The term impure personalty is generally used, with reference to the Mortmain Act, to denote property which, though personalty, was not (up to 1891) allowed to be given to charitable uses by will, etc. (See CHARITABLE USES ACT; DEBENTURE; MORTMAIN.) Pure personalty comprises all personal property not connected with land in such a manner as to fall within the Mortmain Act. Personal property is also divisible into (i) corporeal personal property, which includes moveable and tangible things, such as animals, ships, furniture, merchandise, etc.; and (ii) incorporeal personal property, which consists of such rights as personal annuities, stocks, shares, patents and copyrights.

Personal Representatives. This expression includes executors (q.v.) and administrators (q.v.), whether acting with regard to personal property (q.v.) or, under the Land Transfer Act, 1897, with regard to real property. See REAL REPRESENTATIVE.

Personation is the act of representing oneself to be someone else, whether living or dead, real or fictitious. At common law personation for the purpose of fraud is a misdemeanour. By various statutes personation for the purpose of obtaining property, dividends, wages, etc., or of giving votes at elections, is made felony. See CORRUPT PRACTICE, as to personation at elections. As to personating a husband, see RAPE.

Per stirpes. See PER CAPITA.

Per totam curiam. (By the whole Court.) Used formerly of a unanimous decision.

Per verba, etc. See VERBA, ETC.

Perverse; Perversity. See TRIAL; VERDICT.

Pesage; Persage. A duty anciently paid for having goods weighed.

Peter ad Vincula, St. See GULE OF AUGUST.

Peter Pence. A levy of one penny per house formerly made annually on the 1st of August, that day being the feast of St. Peter ad Vincula. The proceeds went to the Pope. It was abolished by the statute 25 Hen. 8. c. 21, s. 1, which was repealed by the statute 1 & 2 Phil. & Mar. c. 8, s. 3. The statute of Hen. 8. was revived by the statute 1 Eliz. c. 1, s. 4. See DENARII S. PETRI.

Petit Cape. See CAPE.

Petition is a written statement addressed to a Court or public officer setting forth facts on which the petitioner bases a prayer for remedy or relief. With the exception of petitions of right (q.v.), petitions are merely a peculiar mode of applying to a Court, and do not necessarily indicate that the right sought to be maintained is different in its nature from ordinary rights. See ACTIONS AND MATTERS IN THE HIGH COURT; MOTION; SUMMONS.

The person by whom a petition is presented is called the petitioner, and the persons on whom it is served, in order that they may appear at the hearing and oppose or consent to the granting of the prayer, are called the respondents.

Petitions in the Chancery Division are of two kinds, those presented in a pending action or suit, and originating petitions. Petitions presented in pending actions are of various kinds according to the nature of the application: thus, there are petitions of course (see OF COURSE) and special petitions, the latter being the proper method of applying to the Court where a long and intricate statement of facts is necessary, while in simpler cases application can be made by motion. The growth of facilities for disposing of business in chambers and for the use of originating summonses has led to an extended use of summonses instead of either petitions or motions.

Originating petitions are usually of statutory origin, having been introduced to save the expense of a regular action in simple cases. The examples of most usual occurrence are petitions under the Trustee Acts, the Settled Estate Act, the Settled Land Acts, the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts, and winding-up petitions under the Companies Acts. (See those titles.) As to petitions by trustees, executors, etc., for the opinion or direction of the Court, see EXECUTOR. See, generally, Ord. 52, r. 16, and notes thereto in the Annual Practice.

In the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division every matrimonial suit is commenced by a petition praying the relief sought, e.g., a decree of nullity or dissolution of marriage, etc. In addition to these original petitions, subsidiary or incidental petitions of various kinds are sometimes required to be presented in a suit, e.g., to claim the custody of children, for alimony, etc.

Formerly the pleadings in Admiralty actions commenced with a petition by the plaintiff in the nature of a declaration (q.v.) at common law. See now STATEMENT OF CLAIM; PROTEST.

In Bankruptcy, a petition is the mode by which proceedings to administer an insolvent's estate are commenced. It may be a petition for adjudication presented by a creditor, or by the debtor himself. See ADJUDICATION; ARRANGEMENT; BANKRUPTCY; DECLARATION.

In the House of Lords and Privy Council, every appeal is commenced by a petition of appeal praying that the judgment appealed from may be reversed or varied. Interlocutory petitions are also sometimes required, e.g., to extend the time for lodging the printed cases or for leave to introduce fresh evidence.

Proceedings in lunacy are sometimes instituted by a petition for an inquiry, and after inquisition every matter requiring to be brought before the Court forms the subject of a petition. See LUNACY.

See PETITION OF RIGHT; ELECTION PETITION.

Petition of Right is the mode by which a subject can claim relief from the Crown for certain kinds of injury arising from the acts of the Crown or its servants, e.g., an illegal seizure of goods, wrongful possession of land, or a money claim consisting of a debt or damages for breach of contract. The petition itself is a document in which the petitioner sets out his right, legal or equitable, to that which is demanded by him, and prays the King to do him right and justice, and, upon a due and lawful trial of his right and title, to make him restitution. The petitioner is called the suppliant, and the persons against whom relief is prayed (for any person in enjoyment of the property or right claimed is made a party) are called the respondents. The petition may be presented in any of the divisions of the High Court on the Home Secretary granting his fiat for that purpose (Petition of Right Act, 1860, s. 1; Naval Prize Act, 1864, s. 52). The Petition of Right Act, 1860, ss. 6, 7, provided that, if the petition was presented in Chancery, the subsequent proceedings up to judgment were to follow those in a suit in equity; and if in one of the common law Courts, that they were to follow those in an action at law. As petitions of right are not affected by the Judicature Act, the rules of the former common law and equity practice are still applicable to them. The Statute Law Revision and Civil Procedure Act, 1881, s. 6, extends the rule-making powers of the judges to all proceedings by and against the Crown: but no rules relating to petitions of right have been made. See AMOVEAS MANUS; FIAT; MONSTRANS DE DROIT; TRAVERSE.

The title "Petition of Right" is also popularly applied to the statute 3 Car. 1, c. 1.

Petition, Subject's Right to. The right of the subject to petition the Crown or Parliament was denied by James II., but was affirmed by the Court in the case of the Seven Bishops (see title BISHOPS, CASE OF THE SEVEN); and the right was re-formulated in the Bill of Rights (see title BILL OF RIGHTS). But violent and tumultuous petitioning is forbidden by the statute 13 Car. 2, st. 1, c. 5, which was put in force on the threatened presentation of the Chartist Petition in 1848, and is still in force.

The right of petitioning was of great importance when only a few persons possessed the parliamentary franchise; but now, when practically everyone has a vote, petitions are unimportant and comparatively rare.

Peto's Act. The popular title of the Trustee Appointment Act, 1850, which was passed at the instance of Sir Samuel Peto, M.P.

Petra. Used as meaning a stone (q.v.) weight.

Petroleum. The enactments as to the safe keeping and sale of petroleum are the Petroleum Act, 1871, the Petroleum Act, 1879, and the Petroleum (Hawkers) Act, 1881. They are all to be construed as one, and are collectively entitled the Petroleum Acts, 1871 to 1881 (Act of 1879, s. 1; Act of 1881, s. 7).

"For the purposes of this Act the term 'petroleum' includes any rock oil, Rangoon oil, Burmah oil, oil made from petroleum, coal, schist, shale, peat, or other bituminous substance, and any products of petroleum or any of the above-named oils" (Act of 1871, s. 3); and "in the Petroleum Act, 1871, the term 'petroleum to which this Act applies' shall mean such of the petroleum defined by s. 3 of that Act as, when tested in manner set forth in Schedule I. to this Act, gives off an inflammable vapour at a temperature of less than 73° of Fahrenheit's thermometer" (Act of 1879, s. 2).

The Petroleum (Production) Act, 1918, s. 1, provides that no person, other than a person acting for or holding a licence from the Crown, shall bore for or get petroleum in the United Kingdom: other sections regulate such boring and getting: and s. 5 enacts that "for the purposes of this Act the expression 'petroleum' means all petroleum and its relative hydrocarbons (except coal and bituminous shales and other stratified deposits from which oil can be extracted by distillation) and natural gas, existing in its natural condition in strata." The Act is without prejudice to the right of any person who had been using any supply of natural gas for any commercial purpose on 21st November, 1918 (s. 6).

See OIL IN NAVIGABLE WATERS.

Petty Bag Office was the principal office on what was formerly the common law side of the Court of Chancery, and was under the management of an officer called the Clerk of the Petty Bag (q.v.). Under the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 16, it became an office of the High Court of Justice. Out of it issued all original writs, certain kinds of writs of error and certiorari, commissions of charitable uses, idiocy, and lunacy, commissions to seize escheated and forfeited lands, etc., writs of dedimus potestatem, congé d'élire, scire facias to repeal letters patent and enforce recognisances, etc., and writs on the calling of a new Parliament. In it were filed traverses of inquisitions and returns to various commissions, including commissions for production of a cestui que vie. (See the various titles.) In it was also transacted business connected with the admission of solicitors, which in 1888 was transferred to the Law Society (q.v.). The practice of the office was regulated by the Petty Bag Act, 1849, and the general orders. By the Judicature (Officers) Act, 1879, s. 14, the office of Clerk of the Petty Bag was abolished as from the occurrence of the next vacancy, which in fact occurred in 1888; and his powers and duties are now vested in the Senior Clerk of the Crown Office Department of the Central Office (q.v.). The Petty Bag Office was so called because in it the proceedings in which the Crown was concerned were preserved in a little sack or bag (in prava baga) instead of being enrolled on rolls as in the case of other proceedings. See CHANCERY; HANAPER.

Petty Jury; Petty Larceny; Petty Treason. See JURY; LARCENY; TREASON.

Petty Serjeanty. "Tenure by petite serjeanty," says Coke, "is where a man holds his land of our soveraigne lord the king, to yield to him yearly a bow, or a sword, or a dagger, or a knife, or a lance, or a paire of gloves of maile, or a pair of gilt spurs, or an arrow, or divers arrowes, or to yield such other small things belonging to warre." . . . "And such service is but socage in effect."

The Act 12 Car. 2, c. 24, took away from this tenure the incidents of livery and primer seisin, but does not seem to have affected it in other respects. See GRAND SERJEANTY; SOCAGE; TENURE.

Petty Sessional Court. This means "a court of summary jurisdiction consisting of two or more justices when sitting in a petty sessional court-house," and includes the Lord Mayor or any alderman of the City of London, or any salaried magistrate when sitting in any place where he is authorised by law to do alone any act for which two justices are required (Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 13 (12)). Such a Court, as will be seen from the preceding sub-section of the same Act, does not include any Court sitting otherwise than under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts. It must be held (Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 20) in a house or place generally or occasionally used for the holding of special or petty sessions (Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 13 (13)).

Petty Sessions is an occasional meeting of two or more justices of the peace, arranged between themselves for the transaction of business for which the presence of more than one justice is either necessary or desirable. It includes any meeting, not being a general or quarter sessions, which justices are authorised to hold. Colloquially it means what is more properly described as a petty sessional Court (q.v.). Petty sessions, for the purpose principally of exercising summary jurisdiction, are commonly held weekly. In cities, boroughs, and towns corporate having a separate commission of the peace, every sitting of justices of the peace or of a stipendiary magistrate is deemed a petty sessions of the peace (Petty Sessions Act, 1849, s. 1). See SPECIAL SESSIONS.

Pew. An exclusive title to pews and seats in the body of an ordinary parish church may be maintained in virtue of a faculty, or by prescription claimed in respect of a messuage in the parish. All other pews and seats in the body of the church are the property of the parish; and the churchwardens, as the officers of the ordinary, and subject to his control, have authority to place the parishioners therein. A pew annexed by prescription to a messuage cannot be severed from it.

As to the chief pew in the chancel, see CHANCEL.

In the case of churches erected under the Church Building Acts, the distribution of the pews and seats is vested in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and the bishop of the diocese, and they have power to fix rents for pews, subject to the provisions of the Acts.

Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain. See CHEMISTS.

Pharmacopœia, British. A book, published under the authority of the Medical Act, 1858, s. 54, by the General Council (q.v.), which sets out the method of preparing, and the components of, the medicines and compounds generally used in practice. Where a standard for a drug is fixed by the Pharmacopœia, that standard is primâ facie the one to be adopted by a Court in deciding whether an offence has been committed against the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts: but evidence is admissible to show that there is a different commercial standard.

Philosophers' Stone. An imaginary substance reputed by the mediaeval alchemists to be efficacious for the "multiplication" (q.v.) of metals. Henry VI. (notwithstanding the statute of Henry IV. against "multiplication"), granted letters patent to various persons authorising them to find the philosophers' stone: see Coke, 3 Inst. 74.

Photograph. For the purposes of copyright (q.v.) the expression "'photograph' includes photo-lithography and any works produced by any process analogous to photography" (Copyright Act, 1911, s. 35 (1)). The photographer is the owner of the copyright (s. 5 (1)) unless he received valuable consideration for taking it, in which case the copyright belongs to the person from whom such consideration emanated (s. 5 (1) (a)). The period of copyright is fifty years from the date on which the photograph was taken (s. 21). The sending through the post of indecent matter (including photographs) is punishable on indictment or summarily (Post Office Act, 1908, s. 63); and Post Office regulations may be made to prevent the sending or delivery of such matter (s. 16).

Physicians. See MEDICAL PRACTITIONERS.

Picard; Pickard; Piker. A large boat or barge propelled by sails and of from about fifteen to forty tons which was used for coasting and river work. See the statutes 31 Edw. 3, stat. 2, c. 2, and 34 & 35 Hen. 8, c. 9, s. 1.

Piccage. A duty payable to the owner of a fair for liberty to pick holes in the ground for the posts of stalls.

Pickard. An instrument with iron spikes or teeth for raising a nap upon cloth, the use of which was prohibited by the statute 3 & 4 Edw. 6, c. 2. See PICARD.

Picketing by members of a trade union on strike consists in posting members at all the approaches to the works struck against, for the purpose of observing and reporting the workmen going to or coming from the works, and of using such influence as may be in their power to prevent the workmen from accepting work there. It having been found that picketing led to molestation, threats and even violence, the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, made picketing an offence punishable by fine or imprisonment (see INTIMIDATION; MOLESTATION; TRADE UNIONS); but now (see COMBINATION) picketing has been legalised.

Piepowder Court. See COURT OF PIE POUDRE.

Pierage. Anciently this seems to have meant an imposition for the maintenance of a pier: now, when used at all, it means a toll for the use of a pier by a vessel.

Piers. The law as to piers is to be found in the Public Harbours Act, 1806, and the statutes mentioned under HARBOURS.

Pigeon-house. Anciently it was held that none but the parson or the lord of the manor or a tenant by permission of the lord could have a pigeon-house or dovecot on his land: but by Coke's time it was established that any freeholder might have one on his land. This restriction of the right to keep pigeons was due to the fact that pigeons kept by the lord of the manor and feeding on the lands of the tenants were of distinct value: and the right to keep a dovecot was one jealously insisted on by the French seigneur down to 1789.

Pillory. A wooden framework arranged in such a way that an offender was kept standing behind it, with his head and his hands protruding through holes. The instrument seems to have dated from very soon after the Conquest. It was used as a common-law punishment for offences involving fraud on the public, who frequently took a hand in the matter by pelting the culprit with missiles ranging from bad eggs to brickbats: this sometimes had fatal results, for which no one was ever made amenable. The pillory was also used during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries as part of the common-law punishment of persons convicted of minor political offences, such as libel and sedition. It was, moreover, a statutory punishment for various offences. The statute 5 Eliz. c. 9, s. 2, for instance, provided not merely that one convicted of perjury should be put in the pillory but also that his ears should be nailed to it. This enactment remained unrepealed until 1911; but the pillory had in the meantime been abolished by the statute 56 Geo. 3, c. 138, for all offences except perjury and cognate offences, and, by the statute 7 Will. 4 and 1 Vict. c. 23, for all offences. See HEALFANG: compare STOCKS.

Pilotage; Pilots. A pilot has been defined as a person who is taken on board a ship for the purpose of conducting her through a river, road or channel, or from or into a port. A licensed pilot is one licensed for a particular district by a pilotage authority (Pilotage Act, 1913, s. 16). Pilotage is not, however, by any means exclusively in the hands of such persons. A pilotage authority may grant to the master or mate of a ship a pilotage certificate under which he can act as her pilot within the district of the authority (s. 23): and such a certificate is frequently held by an officer on board vessels trading regularly and at short intervals to or from certain ports. The chief pilotage authority is the Trinity House (q.v.).

The law as to pilotage has been consolidated by the Pilotage Act, 1913. See COMPULSORY PILOTAGE.

Pimp Tenure. In Pla. Cor. apud Windesor for 12 Edw. 1, rot. 28, there is this record:—"Wilhelmus Hoppeshort tenet dimidiam virgatam terræ in eadem villa [Bokhampton] per servitium custodiendi sex damisellas, scil. meretrices, ad custum Dominini Regis." This is noted under the head of PIMP-TENURE by various compilers of old and modern law dictionaries, upon the strength of the substitution of "usum" for "custum," which makes the last four words mean "for the use of our Lord the King," instead of "at the cost of our Lord the King." If meretrix is to be taken in its ordinary sense, the record merely shows that William Hoppeshort was bound to do what is now known as rescue work, the cost of which was defrayed by the King. Blount (Tenures, p. 3), indeed, notes that in those times "meretrices" meant "laundresses": but Du Cange does not show any such use of the word. The record is not, in any event, evidence of the iniquities of the feudal system. Compare the mythical JUS PRIMÆ NOCTIS.

Pin. A small barrel, containing four and a half gallons, used for beer. It is not a legal measure.

Pinder. An officer of a manor or borough, whose duty it was to impound all stray cattle within the manor or borough.

Pin Money. An allowance made by a husband to a wife for her dress and personal expenses. It may be secured by settlement, or it may be given voluntarily. When secured by settlement the wife cannot assign it: if she predeceases her husband, her representative cannot recover the arrears, if any; if she is living with her husband she generally cannot on his death claim arrears for more than one year unless she has demanded her allowance and failed to get it. But if she is living apart from her husband she can claim up to six years. A legacy by a husband satisfies pro tanto a claim for the allowance.

Pint. A measure of capacity containing one eighth part of a gallon (q.v.) (Weights and Measures Act, 1878, s. 15).

Pipe. A "roll" in the Exchequer also known as the Great Roll. It consisted of the accounts relating to the hereditary revenues of the Crown. See CLERK OF THE PIPE; COMPTROLLER.

Piracy.—I. In private or civil law, piracy is the infringement of copyright (q.v.); in other words, where a person reproduces the whole or part of a work which is the subject of copyright, so as to interfere with the profit of the owner, he commits a piracy, unless the new work is a bonâ fide abridgment of the other, and unless such abridgment is something more than a mere concatenation of extracts. The importation of pirated copies from abroad is an infringement of copyright. The remedy for a threatened piracy or for continued infringement is by injunction; for a past infringement the remedy is damages, or in certain cases a penalty is imposed by statute: see the Copyright Act, 1911, s. 6 (1).

II. In criminal law, piracy is of two kinds. Piracy by the law of nations is the offence of taking a ship on the high seas or within the jurisdiction of the Lord High Admiral from the possession or control of those who are lawfully entitled to it, and carrying away the ship or any of its goods, tackle, etc., under circumstances which would have amounted to robbery if the act had been done within the body of an English county. Piracy by the law of nations is punishable with penal servitude for life, unless it is accompanied by attempted murder, or violence dangerous to life, in which case the punishment is death (Piracy Act, 1837, s. 2). Several offences have been made piracy, and punishable with penal servitude for life, by various statutes (see SLAVE TRADING); but such statutory piracies are punishable only by the States on whose waters or ships they were committed, while piracy by the law of nations is punishable by any State which may have captured the pirate either in its own territorial waters or anywhere on the high seas.

The Treaties of Washington Act, 1922, s. 4, Sch. II. (1.), provides that any person shall be punishable as for an act of piracy (by any Court which would have jurisdiction if the act were in fact piracy) if he violates the following laws of war:—(1) A merchant vessel must be called on to submit to visit and search before she can be seized; (2) a merchant vessel must not be attacked unless she refuses to submit to visit and search or to proceed as ordered after seizure; (3) a merchant vessel must not be destroyed until all on board have been placed in safety.

Piscary. See FISHERY.

Pistol. See FIREARMS.

Pit and Gallows. See FURCA ET FOSSA.

Pitching; Pitching Money. Formerly these expressions meant the toll charged for the exhibition of an article for sale in a market or fair.

Pix. See PYX.

Place. No comprehensive definition of this expression can be given, the meaning varying according to the context in which it is used. There have been many cases turning upon its meaning in the Betting Houses Act, 1853. It has been decided that "Tattersall's Ring" on a race-course is not a "place" for the purposes of that Act ([1897] 1 Q. B. 579); but where a bookmaker in a similar enclosure erected a bamboo structure, supporting a board and a canvas banner on which was inscribed: "Bob Patch, London. All in, run or not—pay first past the post," and betted on a stool alongside the structure, it was held that he had used "a place for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto" within the meaning of s. 1 of the Act ([1899] 1 Q. B. 892). See also PUBLIC PLACE.

Place of Abode. The meaning of this expression varies for the purposes of different statutes. As used in the Municipal Corporations Act, 1835, s. 32 (providing that voting papers should set out, amongst other things, the "places of abode" of the persons voted for), and as used in the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, s. 1 (providing that a summons may be served by leaving it with some person at the "last or most usual place of abode" of the defendant), it was held to mean "place of residence," as distinguished from place of business. But the Court of Exchequer, in a considered and unanimous judgment, decided that there was a sufficient compliance with the Constables Protection Act, 1751, s. 1 (which required notice of an intended action against a justice to be endorsed with the name of the attorney proposing to issue the writ and with "the place of his abode") where the notice was endorsed with the attorney's place of business, although he slept and resided elsewhere.

Placita. (Pleas.) Thus we have the Placita coronæ or Pleas of the Crown. See PLEA.

Placitare; Placitator. Anciently these words meant respectively "to plead" and "a pleader."

Placitum nominatum. In Leg. Hen. 1, c. 29, this means the day on which an accused person was required to appear and plead.

Plaint. Every action in a County Court is commenced by the registrar entering, in a book kept for the purpose, at the request of the intended plaintiff, a "plaint in writing," stating the names and the addresses of the parties, and the substance of the action: on this a summons (q.v.) is issued (County Courts Act, 1888, s. 73: see also C.C.R., Ord. 5). The registrar gives the plaintiff a note called a plaint note, containing the date of the entry, the day fixed for the trial, and some notices for the guidance of the plaintiff (C.C.R., Ord. 7, r. 1).

Before the abolition of real actions (see ACTIONS) a copyholder could only plead and be impleaded in respect of his copyhold land in the Court of the manor, by what were called customary plaints, which were analogous to the common law writs in real actions, and called after them, e.g., plaints in the nature of writs of entry, plaints in the nature of writs of right, etc.

Formerly "plaint" meant, in the superior Courts, the cause for which the plaintiff complained against the defendant and for which he obtained the King's writ.

Plaintiff is a person who brings an action. See PART.

Plantation. This was the term applied to the steps taken in the reign of James I. for the division between English settlers—or planters—of the forfeited lands which had been held in Ulster by the Earls of Tyrconnell and Tyrone.

Plantations, The. The name applied to the English settlements in North America and in the adjacent West Indian Islands. These were the Plantations of Jamaica, Barbadoes, the Bermudas, the Leeward Islands, etc., which are now British Colonies; and there were also on the mainland the Plantations of Virginia, Maryland, Carolina, Georgia, New England, and New York, which now are included in the United States of North America. The term "plantations" fell into disuse during the second half of the eighteenth century: it was never applied to the British settlements in the Antipodes.

See COLONIES; BOARD OF TRADE; TRANSPORTATION.

Plea.—I. A plea is a mode of putting forward a defence to certain proceedings. Thus, if a writ of scire facias is issued against a person, and he wishes to put forward facts in answer to the writ, he does so by plea: or, if a return is made to such a writ, and the person at whose instance the writ was issued wishes to contest it, he puts in a plea to the return. (See TRAVERSE.) This formerly applied also to prohibition (q.v.), in which now, however, the proceedings are the same as in an ordinary action for damage.

In a criminal prosecution, the prisoner has to plead to the indictment, which he may do either—(1) by pleading to the jurisdiction, that is, alleging that the Court has no jurisdiction to try him; or (2) by demurring (see DEMURRER); or (3) by pleading some plea in bar, namely, either a general plea, "guilty," or "not guilty," or a special plea, such as "autrefois acquit," "autrefois convict," or "pardon." (See the various titles.) As formal defects are now always capable of amendment, pleas in abatement (q.v.) are obsolete.

In the ecclesiastical Courts, all the pleadings are called pleas. The first plea is either articles or a libel, and every subsequent plea is an allegation. (See those titles.)

Formerly a plea was the principal mode of putting forward a defence to a civil action or suit. In an action at common law, the plea was similar to the statement of defence under the present practice in so far that it stated facts as an answer to the declaration, as opposed to a demurrer (q.v.); but it differed from a statement of defence in stating the facts vaguely and in a peculiar form. Pleas were of two kinds, dilatory and peremptory. The first class included pleas to the jurisdiction, that is, pleas denying the jurisdiction of the Court, pleas in suspension, and pleas in abatement; the second class consisted of pleas in bar. A plea in suspension was one which alleged grounds for not proceeding with the action at present: where it was grounded on infancy it was also known as demurrer of the parol, as to which see DEMUR. A plea in abatement did not give an answer to the plaintiff's case, but showed that he had committed some informality, e.g., that he had not joined the proper parties to the action. A plea in bar showed a substantial defence to the action, either by traverse or by confession and avoidance (q.v.). Formerly pleas were distinguished as general issues, in which the defendant simply traversed the plaintiff's allegations, and special pleas, in which the defendant stated the grounds of his defence; from the latter term arose the expression special pleading. (See PLEADER; ISSUE.) A plea puis darrein continuance ("after the last continuance") was a plea setting up a ground of defence which had arisen after the defendant had pleaded in the ordinary course: thus if, after the defendant had delivered his plea, the plaintiff gave him a release, the defendant could set up the release by plea puis darrein continuance. After continuances (q.v.) had been abolished the defendant could, after defence, plead new matter of defence which had arisen since the writ or since his defence by a pleading which was said to be "to the farther maintenance of the action"; and this pleading was in substitution for the original defence.

In equity, pleas were very rare in practice, and were only used in cases where the defendant was in a position to state one or more facts, which if inserted in the bill would make it demurrable; in such a case the defendant by filing a plea (which generally had to be sworn to by him) might avoid putting in an answer, and bring the suit to an end at once. Pleas in equity were of various kinds, of which pleas to the jurisdiction and pleas in bar were the principal.

II. In its original sense, "plea" meant any legal proceeding. "Pleas of the Crown" were criminal proceedings, while civil actions were called "common pleas," or "pleas" simply. The Court of King's Bench was formerly said to have a Crown side and a plea side, the former being its jurisdiction in Crown business, and the latter its jurisdiction in ordinary actions: so the jurisdiction of the Court of Exchequer in ordinary actions was called its plea side, as opposed to its jurisdiction in revenue matters. See PLEADING.

Plea to the Action. Formerly this was a pleading in which the plaintiff's cause of action was attacked; it is to be distinguished from the ACTION OF THE WRIT, which attacked only the form of the plaintiff's action.

Plead.—I. In its general sense, to plead is to answer the previous pleading of the opposite party in an action or other proceeding by denying the facts therein stated, or by alleging some fresh facts; pleading was formerly opposed to demurring: the former raised a question of fact, the latter a question of law. Thus, if a plaintiff delivered a statement of claim which was not only demurrable but also failed in stating the facts correctly, the defendant might apply for leave to plead and demur, and, if he obtained leave to do so, he delivered a statement of defence and a demurrer.

II. To plead also signifies to plead a plea: thus, in a criminal prosecution the prisoner pleads guilty or not guilty, etc.; and under the old common law practice, a defendant was said to plead to the jurisdiction, to plead in bar, etc., according to the nature of his plea. To plead issuably, was to demur or plead some substantial defence to the action, so that it might be determined on its merits.

In criminal practice, a prisoner charged with treason or felony is said to plead over when in addition to, or after, pleading specially, he pleads "not guilty." As to a further use of the term "pleading over," see AID BY VERDICT.

See PLEA; RESPONDEAT OUSTER.

Pleader is a person whose business it is to draw pleadings. Formerly, when pleading at common law was a highly technical and difficult art, there was a class of men known as "special pleaders not at the bar," who held a position intermediate between counsel and attorneys. The class is now extinct.

See DRAFTSMAN.

Pleading. The pleadings in an action in the High Court are written or printed statements delivered alternately by the parties to one another, until the questions of facts and law to be decided in the action have been ascertained. Each pleading commences with the title of the action, and states concisely the material facts on which the party pleading relies, but not the evidence by which they are to be proved (Ord. 19, r. 4). The first pleading is the plaintiff's statement of claim (q.v.), unless the writ of summons itself is specially endorsed with the statement of claim (see Ord. 3, r. 6). The next pleading is delivered by the defendant, and is a statement of defence or a statement of defence and counterclaim (q.v.) combined. The next pleading is a reply (q.v.). If the reply is not merely a joinder of issue (q.v.), the next pleading is delivered by the defendant. This and the subsequent pleadings, if any, follow the names of the old pleadings at common law, viz., rejoinder, surrejoinder, rebutter and surrebutter (q.v.); but the general rule (see DIRECTIONS, SUMMONS FOR) that no reply or subsequent pleading shall be pleaded without leave of a master (Ord. 23), coupled with the power of the judge to order issues to be settled (see ISSUE), and the power of amendment (q.v.), will in general prevent the pleadings from going so far. In any case, however, unless either party makes default in pleading, or unless issues are settled, the ultimate result must be that one party joins issue upon the preceding pleading of his adversary (Ord. 19, r. 18), and then the pleadings are said to be closed. If a reply or subsequent pleading be ordered, then, if the plaintiff does not deliver the reply, or any party does not deliver any subsequent pleading within the proper time, the pleadings are then deemed to be closed, and the statements of fact in the pleading last delivered are deemed to have been denied and put in issue (Ord. 27, r. 13). The next step is the notice of trial (q.v.). As to judgment by default in other cases, see JUDGMENT.

See COMMERCIAL CAUSES.

Pleadings are by no means so essential a part of an action as they once were. The necessity for the leave of a master before a reply or subsequent pleading can be delivered, the control exercised by the Court over pleadings generally under Ord. 30, rr. 1, 8 (see DIRECTIONS), and the provision made by Ord. 34, r. 9, for trial without pleadings have materially altered the old practice. See also COMMERCIAL CAUSES.

There are some miscellaneous proceedings in which the pleadings are different from those in an action, e.g., petitions of right (q.v.), in which the pleadings after the petition itself follow the same course as those in an action at law or suit in equity under the old practice (infra): and proceedings by scire facias, extent, traverse of office or inquisition, and criminal proceedings, as to which see INDICTMENT; INFORMATION; PLEA.

Formerly different systems of pleadings, except as to demurrers, prevailed in the common law and equity Courts. In a common law action the pleadings consisted of (1) the declaration, (2) plea, (3) replication, (4) rejoinder, (5) surrejoinder, (6) rebutter, (7) surrebutter. In a suit in equity the pleadings consisted of (1) the bill of complaint; (2) either (a) a demurrer, (b) a plea, (c) an answer, (d) a disclaimer, or (e) a combination of these; and (3) replication. Formerly rejoinders were also used in Chancery pleadings, but they had been disused long before the Judicature Act. According to the later practice of the Court of Chancery, if the plaintiff required to state fresh facts after the defendant had filed his answer or plea, he amended his bill.

In the early ages of the common law the pleadings were oral statements, or arguments by the parties or their counsel, made alternately until the question in dispute was ascertained.

Pleas of the Crown. Originally this meant offences which were triable only in the King's Courts, as distinguished from offences which could be dealt with in the old County Court (known as pleas of the sheriff), and those cognisable in manor and borough Courts. After justices of the peace had been established all offences were included in the expression "pleas of the Crown": and in proceedings relating to them they were averred to have been committed contra pacem Domini Regis, coronam et dignitatem suam (against the peace of our Lord the King, his crown and dignity). Compare the form used in Pleas of the Sword (q.v.) where gladius was substituted for corona.

The term "pleas of the Crown" was also applied to the various interrogatories which collectively made up the ARTICLES OF THE EYRE (q.v.).

Pleas of the Sword. When the Conqueror granted the earldom of Chester (q.v.) to Hugh Lupus, the grant carried with it jura regalia (q.v.), including the right to hold Courts corresponding to the King's Courts elsewhere than in a county palatine. In proceedings before a Court of the earldom with regard to what were known in England generally as pleas of the Crown, it was averred that any given offence had been committed contra pacem Domini Comitis gladium et dignitatem (against the peace of our Lord the Earl, his sword and dignity). In a later grant by Henry III. of the earldom of Chester, pleas of the sword or placita gladii were expressly excepted from the grant. Compare SPATÆ PLACITUM.

Pledge. A pledge is where the owner of a chattel agrees with another person that it shall be held by the latter (the pledgee) as security for the payment of a debt or performance of an obligation. This entitles the pledgee to hold the chattel until payment or performance, and, upon failure of payment or performance at the proper time, to sell it; but until he does so, the pledgor may redeem it by payment or performance.

Specific appropriation is sometimes called an equitable pledge. See APPROPRIATION.

See BAILMENT; CHARGE; MORTGAGE; PAWN.

Pledgery. Suretyship.

Pledges to Restore. Before the plaintiff in foreign attachment could issue execution against the property in the hands of the garnishee, he had to find "pledges to restore," consisting of two householders, who entered into a recognisance for the restoration of the property, as a security for the protection of the defendant; for, as the plaintiff's debt was not proved in any stage of the proceedings, the Court guarded the rights of the absent defendant by taking security on his behalf, so that if he should afterwards disprove the plaintiff's claim he might obtain restitution of the property attached. See FOREIGN ATTACHMENT.

Plegii de prosequendo; Plegii de retorno habendo. In the action of replevin, these respectively were pledges to prosecute the action with effect, and pledges to return the object distrained if the action resulted adversely to the plaintiff.

Plegiis acquietandis. A writ which anciently lay for a surety against one for whom he was surety if the latter failed to pay on the appointed day.

Pleins pouvoirs. See PLENIPOTENTIARY.

Plenarty. Under the old practice, when a defendant in an action of Quare impedit pleaded that the church was full (that is, that a clerk had been previously presented and instituted), he was said to plead plenarty. (See VACATION.) This plea, if proved, was at common law a good defence to the action; but the Statute of Westminster II., 13 Ed. 1, st. 1, c. 5, enacted that it should not be a defence to an action brought by the rightful patron within six months; and it is no defence to an action at any time by the King.

Plenary. An admission or confession, whether in civil or in criminal law, is said to be plenary when it is, if believed, conclusive against the person making it. As to plenary causes in ecclesiastical practice, see CAUSE.

Plene administravit is the name given to the defence set up by an executor or administrator when sued upon a debt of his testator which he has no assets to satisfy: if he has some assets, but not enough to satisfy the debt, his defence is called a plea of plene administravit præter. See JUDGMENT.

Plenipotentiary. This at present means, as regards the British diplomatic service, a diplomatic agent of the second or third class, who is described as minister plenipotentiary, sometimes in conjunction with other titles. Thus, in Peru we have an "Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary," while in the United States we have an "Ambassador," and in Rumania a "Minister."

A plenipotentiary originally meant an envoy with full powers (pleins pouvoirs) to settle a specific point without reference to his Government.

Pleno lumine, In. (In broad daylight.)

Plevin. A warrant or assurance. Now obsolete except in the compound form REPLEVIN (q.v.).

Plough; Plough-land. In Anglo-Saxon times this, in the northern and eastern counties, meant as much land as could be tilled in the year by one team of eight oxen; and it seems also to have included originally the meadow and pasture land of the holding. The corresponding term in the other counties was the "hide." Both terms seem to be represented in Domesday and other Latin records by carrucata. See CARUCATE.

Coke defines plough-land as a quantity of land "not of any certain content, but as much as a plow can by course of husbandry plough in a year." (Co. Litt. 69*a*.)

Ploughbote. See ESTOVERS.

Plough Monday. The Monday next after the EPIPHANY (q.v.).

Plough Silver. Money formerly paid by tenants in lieu of ploughing the lord's land as sometimes required by their tenure.

Plow-Alms. A payment, of one penny for every plough-land, which was anciently made to the Church.

Plowden, Edmund. Born 1518; entered the Middle Temple 1538, and was subsequently called to the Bar; died 1585. He is best known by his "Commentaries," or reports, covering the period 1550-1578. On the title-page of the portion published in 1571 he describes himself as "un apprentice de la comen ley," which indicated that, although a barrister, he was not a serjeant-at-law, as he would have been but for his refusal to conform to the Established Church. See APPRENTICII AD LEGEM.

Plural. See SINGULAR.

Pluralities. By several modern statutes no spiritual person can hold any two benefices at the same time except in certain cases, in some of which a licence or dispensation by the bishop is required. These are Acts forbidding pluralities, that is, the holding of benefices in plurality. See CESSION.

Plures participes sunt quasi unum corpus, in eo quod unum jus habent (Co. Litt. 164). (Several sharers are as one body, in that they have one right.) A quotation from Fleta which Coke uses to illustrate the law as to coparceners.

Pluries. See ALIAS WRIT.

Plus valet unus oculatus testis quam auriti decem (4 Inst. 279). (One eye-witness is worth more than ten witnesses who can speak only from hearsay.) The general rule, of course, is that hearsay evidence is altogether inadmissible except in certain well-known cases, as to which see CONFESSION; DECLARATION.

Plus valet vulgaris consuetudo quam regalis concessio (Co. Copyh. § 31). (Common custom has more power than royal grant.) For no royal grant can create the immemorial custom which is essential to a manor.

Poaching is the popular name for the offence of unlawfully taking or destroying game (q.v.) on another man's land, and is part of the title of the Poaching Prevention Act, 1862, though the offences dealt with in that Act are not described in it as poaching.

Pocket Judgment. A colloquial equivalent for a statute merchant (q.v.), the holder of which had, so to say, a judgment in his pocket, inasmuch as he could, upon non-payment on the date fixed, levy execution as if he had recovered a judgment.

Pocket-sheriff. If the Crown appointed as sheriff a person who was not one of the three persons nominated for the office in the Exchequer, the person so appointed was known as a pocket-sheriff. See PRICKING FOR SHERIFFS.

Pœnâ ex delicto defuncti, hæres teneri non debet (2 Inst. 198). (The heir ought not to be bound in a penalty for the wrong done by the defunct.) See IN RESTITUTIONEM, ETC., the note to which applies

Poet Laureate. It is stated to have been the custom of the mediaeval universities to invest with a wreath of laurel anyone who had taken the degree of grammar, which included rhetoric and the making of verses; and this gave him the title of poeta laureatus, or poet laureate. John Kay (or Caius), in dedicating to Edward IV. a translation of a Latin poem, described himself as the King's "humble poete lawreate"; but this did not necessarily mean that he held any position analogous to that of the earlier versificator (q.v.). A succession of poets from Chaucer (ob. 1400) to Spenser (ob. 1599) acted occasionally as informal poets laureate, or court poets: and the academic use of the title poeta laureatus ceased. The first actual appointment as poet laureate was that of Ben Jonson in 1617. Since then the office has been conferred by letters patent on various poets, of whom Dryden, Southey, Wordsworth, and Tennyson were the most notable. From 1670 the laureate got annually a butt of canary (commuted in 1813 for £27 a year): and there has always been also a stipend which is at present £72 a year. Down to 1813 the laureate wrote, or was supposed to write, an ode on each birthday of the Sovereign. Now he has no definite duties.

Points. The questions of law to be argued on a writ of error. See PAPER BOOKS.

Points of Claim; Points of Defence. See STATEMENT OF CLAIM; STATEMENT OF DEFENCE.

Poisoned Grain or Food. (1) Selling, exposing for sale, etc., any seed or grain which has been made poisonous, except for bona fide use in agriculture; and (2) placing anywhere any poison or any poisoned edible matter (other than sown grain or seed) without taking reasonable precautions for the safety of domestic animals, are offences punishable on summary conviction (Protection of Animals Act, 1911, s. 8).

Poisons, Sale of. As to the drugs which are "poisons" and as to the persons who may sell them, see CHEMISTS AND DRUGGISTS. Sulphuric acid, nitric acid, hydrochloric acid, soluble salts of oxalic acid, though none of them are "poisons" for the purposes of the Pharmacy Act, 1868, and any other substance specified in an Order in Council, cannot be sold at all unless the receptacle containing the substance is marked with its name, with the word "Poisonous" and with the name and address of the vendor (Poisons and Pharmacy Act, 1908, s. 5). Substances specified in the Schedule to the Poisons and Pharmacy Act, 1908, or added thereto pursuant to s. 2 of the Pharmacy Act, 1868, may not be sold except in receptacles marked in like manner; and it is unlawful to sell any of the poisons (including arsenic) specified in or added (under s. 2 of the Act of 1868) to Part I. of the Schedule, (1) except to a person known to the seller or introduced by some person known to the seller; (2) without entering in a book (which must be signed by the seller and the buyer), the date of the sale, the name and address of the buyer, the name and quantity of the poison sold, and the alleged object of the purchase (Pharmacy Act, 1868, s. 17).

See ARSENIC.

Pole. The same as perch (q.v.).

Police. See CONSTABLE; METROPOLITAN POLICE DISTRICT.

Police Court. A petty sessional court (q.v.), held in London and in a number of the large provincial cities, as well as in some thickly populated semi-urban areas, by a barrister who is known in London as a metropolitan police magistrate (q.v.), and elsewhere as a stipendiary magistrate (q.v.).

Police Magistrate. See METROPOLITAN POLICE MAGISTRATE; STIPENDIARY MAGISTRATE.

Police Supervision. Subjection to police supervision is where a criminal offender is subjected to the obligation of notifying the place of his residence and every change of his residence to the chief officer of police of the district, and, if a male, of reporting himself once a month to the chief officer or his substitute (Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, s. 8). Offenders subject to police supervision were formerly popularly called habitual criminals: but the term "habitual criminal" (q.v.) has now a precise meaning in the law.

Policies of Insurance, Court of. The preamble of the statute 43 Eliz. c. 12, recited that it had long been the custom of merchants to "give some considercion of money to other persons (which commonly are of noe small number) to have from them assurance made of their goodes, merchandise, ships and things adventured, . . . which course of dealing is commonly termed a policie of assurance," and that the few controversies which had arisen had been settled "by certaine grave and discrete merchants appointed by the Lord Mayor of the Citie of London," until of late years divers persons had sought to compel the parties assured to obtain payment from each of the assurers by means of separate suits in the superior Courts; and the statute then proceeded to enact that the Lord Chancellor should constitute and keep constituted a Court consisting of the Judge of the Admiralty, the Recorder of London, two doctors of the civil law, two "common lawyers" and eight "grave and discreet merchants," for the summary decision, subject to appeal to the Court of Chancery, of all disputes as to policies of assurance entered at the office of assurances in the City of London. This enactment was amended by the statute 14 Car. 2, c. 23. The Court fell into disuse during the eighteenth century, and both the statutes above referred to were repealed by the S. L. R. Act, 1863.

Policy, as applied to a statute, regulation, rule of law, course of action, or the like, refers to its probable effect, tendency or object, considered with reference to the social or political well-being of the State.

Thus certain classes of acts are said to be against public policy when the law refuses to enforce or recognise them on the ground that they have a mischievous tendency so as to be injurious to the interests of the State, apart from illegality (q.v.) or immorality (q.v.). Thus, trading with an enemy without licence from the Crown, marriage-brokage contracts, and agreements in general restraint of marriage or trade (q.v.), are instances of acts against public policy. The "policy of the law" seems to be the same thing as public policy.

The "policy of a statute," or "of the Legislature," as applied to a statute, means the intention with which a statute was passed or by which Parliament was actuated.

Policy of Assurance. A policy is an instrument containing a contract of insurance, and is called a maritime (or marine), fire, life or accident policy, according to the nature of the insurance.

Maritime policies are either unvalued (or open) or valued (Marine Insurance Act, 1906, s. 27 (1)). An unvalued policy is where the value of the thing insured is not stated in the policy (s. 28), and must therefore be proved if a loss happen. A valued policy is where the value of the thing is settled by agreement between the parties and inserted in the policy (s. 27 (2)). An insurance may be effected either for a voyage or for a number of voyages, in either of which cases the policy is called a voyage policy; or the insurance may be for a particular period, not exceeding twelve months, irrespective of the voyage or voyages upon which the vessel may be engaged during that period, and the policy is then called a time policy; in addition to the two last-mentioned kinds of policy, there is a third, which is usually called a mixed policy, as, for instance, where a ship is insured "from A. to B. for a year," this being in effect a time policy with the voyage specified. Voyage policies, time policies, and mixed policies are all sanctioned by s. 25 of the Act of 1906.

Before the Acts forbidding insurances by persons having no interest in the subject-matter of insurance, it was sometimes provided in the policy that it should be valid whether the insurer had any interest or not, in order to dispense with proof of interest in case of loss; these were called "interest or no interest policies" or "wager policies." See INTEREST; P.P.I.

Life policies for the whole life of the cestui que vie, i.e., payable whenever the death happens, are called whole life policies; a policy for a term of years gives no right to the sum insured, unless the life drops within the period.

When a fire insurance is made for a limited period (e.g. a year) it is called a time policy. When it is made to insure not any specific goods, but the goods which may at the time of the fire be in a certain building, it is called a floating policy.

As to the assignment of life and marine policies, see ASSIGNMENT.

See ASSURANCE; LOST OR NOT LOST; MEMORANDUM; UNDERWRITER.

Politiæ legibus non leges politiis adaptandæ (Hob. 154). (Politics are to be adapted to the laws, and not the laws to politics.) But this, unhappily, is no longer a principle which applies.

Political Offence. For the purposes of the laws under which various offences are punishable within the United Kingdom, there is not, and there never has been, such a thing as a political offence. A person committing any given offence is liable to the one punishment whether he commits it from political motives or from motives which are not political. But, as regards offenders whose extradition to or from this country is sought, there is a clear distinction between political and other offences. Offences of a political character are invariably excepted in extradition treaties from the list of offences for which extradition may be obtained; and the Extradition Act, 1870, s. 3, provides that a fugitive offender shall not be surrendered by this country if the offence for which his extradition is demanded is of a political character. In this country, an offence of a political character is held to mean any offence committed in connection with or as part of political disturbances; it does not mean an anarchist crime.

See EXTRADITION.

Political Pension. This means a pension which may, in certain circumstances, be granted by the Crown to persons who have held "political offices," that is to say, "offices in the civil service of the Crown which are usually held by members of the House of Lords or the House of Commons" (Political Offices Pension Act, 1869, preamble). No political pension can be granted in respect of service in the permanent civil service, or in the Royal Household, or in any legal office other than that of Judge Advocate-General (s. 1). Political offices are divided into Class 1, being offices with salaries of not less than £5,000; Class 2, being offices with salaries less than £5,000 and not less than £2,000; and Class 3, being offices with salaries of less than £2,000 and not less than £1,000 (s. 2). The Act applies only to offices existing on 9th August, 1869, and to those subsequently created by statute; the salaries of offices existing on 9th August, 1869, are, for the purposes of the Act, to be the salaries then payable unless they are altered by statute (s. 4). The pension for Class 1 is to be a first-class pension of not more than £2,000; for Class 2 it is to be a second-class pension of not more than £1,200; and for Class 3 it is to be a third-class pension of not more than £800 (s. 3). The qualifying period of service for a pension is four years for a first-class pension, six years for a second-class pension, and ten years for a third-class pension (s. 3); service in one class counts, either in whole or in part, as service in another (see s. 4). Not more than four pensions of each class may be paid at any one time, and not more than one pension under the Act may be granted in one year (s. 4). No pension can be granted except upon a declaration of inadequacy of private means (s. 7). Pensions are to be suspended either in the whole or in part where the pensioner receives other income from public sources (s. 6).

Poll. See DEED; CHALLENGE.

Pollock's Act. The popular title of the Limitation of Actions and Costs Act, 1842.

Poll-tax; Poll-money; Poll-silver. A tax upon every poll or head, that is to say, upon every person. Sometimes the tax was levied equally on all persons—as in the case of the poll-tax, which led to the rebellion of Wat Tyler; at other times it was graduated according to the rank of the payer—as in the case of the poll-tax imposed by the statute 18 Car. 2, c. 1, s. 10, which ran from £100 in the case of a duke to £5 in the case of an esquire, and from £50 in the case of an archbishop to £5 in the case of a doctor of divinity.

Pondus regis. (The King's weight.) This was anciently a synonym for troy (q.v.) weight. There seems to have been an idea that troy weight was a corruption of Le Roy weight (though it was actually derived from Troyes, the town at which it first came into use), and this led someone to invent the pondus regis as being the true and original form of Le Roy weight.

Pone. A writ whereby a cause pending in the old County Court of the sheriff was removed into the Common Pleas, or sometimes into the King's Bench. There was also the writ of pone per vadium, which directed the sheriff to take sureties for the appearance of a defendant. See TOLT.

Ponendis in assisis. A writ granted by the Statute of Westminster II., c. 38. It related to the impanelling of assizes.

Ponendum in ballium. An ancient writ which lay for a prisoner entitled to bail.

Ponendum sigillum ad exceptionem. A writ by which justices (of the superior Courts) were required to put their seals to exceptions (q.v.) taken by a defendant.

Pontage. A payment made or toll levied for the repair of bridges. See TRINODA NECESSITAS.

Pontibus reparandis. A writ which anciently was directed to the sheriff commanding him to cause the owner of a bridge to repair it.

Poor Knights, The. Formerly used as a synonym of the Knights of Windsor (q.v.).

Poor Law is that part of the law which relates to the public or compulsory relief of the indigent poor. The subject has been dealt with in a series of Acts of Parliament from 27 Hen. 8, c. 25, to the present time. By the Poor Relief Act, 1601, overseers of the poor were appointed in every parish, to provide for the relief of paupers settled in their parish (see SETTLE), the necessary funds being produced by a poor rate levied on property within the parish. (See RATE.) The system of overseers being unsatisfactory, the statute 22 Geo. 3, c. 83, authorised any parish to appoint guardians in lieu of overseers, and also to enter into a voluntary union with one or more other parishes for the more convenient accommodation, maintenance and employment of their paupers in common. (See GUARDIANS OF THE POOR; OVERSEER; VESTRY.) In 1834, the general management of the poor, and of the funds for their relief, was placed under the superintendence and control of a body called the Poor Law Commissioners (q.v.), whose functions were transferred in 1847 to a new authority called the Poor Law Board (q.v.), and in 1871 to the Local Government Board (q.v.), which since 1919 has been represented by the Ministry of Health, who have the power of making general poor law rules (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, s. 15), and of compulsorily consolidating any two or more parishes into one union for the relief and management of their paupers (ib. s. 26), or of constituting separate parishes out of divided parishes or amalgamating parts of divided parishes with other parishes (Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876, ss. 1-9).

All those who stand in need of relief are entitled to be relieved in the parish (or union) in which they happen to be, whether they are "settled" or "casual" poor. (See SETTLEMENT; REMOVAL; IRREMOVABILITY.) But in many cases there is a person bound to maintain a pauper in exoneration of the guardians: as where the pauper has a wife, husband, child, parent, or grandparent, able to maintain him or her. There are also numerous statutes imposing penalties and punishments on persons who refuse or neglect to work to maintain their families, or desert them, leaving them chargeable to the parish.

Poor Law Board; Poor Law Commissioners. The Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, empowered the Crown to appoint for a period of five years three commissioners styled "The Poor Law Commissioners for England and Wales," to whom was entrusted the administration of that Act and of other laws relating to the relief of the poor. Subsequent statutes continued these commissioners in office until 1847, when they were superseded (under the Poor Law Board Act, 1847) by another body, to which the title of "The Poor Law Board" was given by the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1849, s. 21. The Poor Law Board was also a temporary body, but it was from time to time continued by statute until it was made permanent by the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1867, s. 1. It lasted, however, only until 1871, when its functions passed to the Local Government Board (q.v.).

Poor Law Union. This is defined by the Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 16, as meaning "any parish or union of parishes for which there is a separate Board of Guardians."

"Poor Person." "Any person may be admitted to take or defend or be a party to any legal proceedings in the High Court of Justice as a poor person on satisfying the Court or a judge (1) that he has reasonable grounds for taking or defending or being a party to such proceedings; and (2) that the applicant is not worth a sum exceeding £50 (excluding wearing apparel, tools of trade, and the subject-matter of such proceedings) or such larger sum not exceeding £100 as a judge personally in special circumstances may direct; and (3) that the usual income from all sources of the applicant does not exceed £2 a week or such larger sum not exceeding £4 a week as a judge personally in special circumstances may direct; and (4) in matrimonial causes where the wife is the applicant, in addition to (1), (2) and (3) either (a) that the applicant and her husband are not worth the amount specified in (2) and that their joint income does not exceed the amount specified in (3), or (b) that it is reasonable in the circumstances that the applicant should be admitted to take or defend or be a party to the proceedings as a poor person: provided always that in cases within (4) (b) the order giving leave to take or defend or be a party to such legal proceedings shall be limited to such proceedings as are necessary to enable the applicant to obtain security for her costs of such proceedings or to such further or other proceedings as the judge may direct" (Ord. 16, r. 22). This rule does not apply to any bankruptcy proceeding or matter or to any criminal cause or matter except case stated, certiorari, mandamus or prohibition, where those matters relate to Courts of summary jurisdiction (ib.).

Rules 23-31o, 34A and 45 (4) of Order 16 govern the procedure in "poor person" cases. The poor person has a solicitor and counsel assigned to him free of cost; he pays no costs to the other side except (r. 31E) as specially ordered, and his own costs are limited to out-of-pocket expenses (ib.), unless (r. 31I) he recovers money in the case; and he makes no deposit except (r. 23) in matrimonial cases, in which he has to deposit at the least £5 in ordinary cases and £20 at the least in nullity cases involving medical examination.

See POOR PRISONERS.

Poor Prisoners. Where a prisoner is committed for trial and it appears on the depositions that there is a defence of such a nature that he ought to have legal aid, then, if it appears that he has not sufficient means to obtain such aid, the committing justices, or the chairman of quarter sessions or judge before whom he is to be tried, may certify for such aid and thereupon the prisoner is entitled to have solicitor and counsel assigned to him (Poor Prisoners Defence Act, 1903); and the Court of quarter sessions or assizes may direct the costs of his defence to be paid out of public moneys (Costs in Criminal Cases Act, 1908, s. 1).

Where it appears to the Court of Criminal Appeal that an appellant ought to have legal aid which he has not means to obtain, the Court may assign to him solicitor and counsel or counsel only (Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, s. 10). The registrar of the Court is to report as to any case in which legal aid appears to be necessary (s. 155).

Popular Action. See PENAL ACTION.

Populous Place. This expression was defined by s. 32 of the Licensing Act, 1874, as meaning "any area with a population of not less than one thousand which, by reason of the density of such population, the county licensing committee may by order determine to be a populous place." The part of that section which contained this definition was repealed by s 112 and Sch. VII. of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910. The latter Act, in Sch. VI. (B) (1) (c), defined it as "an area with a population of not less than one thousand which, by reason of the density of its population, the confirming authority of the county by order determine to be a populous place." The whole of Sch. VI. of the Act of 1910 has been repealed by the Licensing Act, 1921, s. 6, Sch. I., and no such entity as "a populous place" is now known to the licensing laws.

Porrect. In the procedure of the ecclesiastical Courts this means to submit for examination or approval.

Port. A port is a harbour where customs officers are established, and where goods are either imported or exported to foreign countries, as distinguished from a mere harbour or haven, which is simply a place, natural or artificial, for the safe riding of ships. It is said that every port comprehends a city or borough (sometimes called caput portûs), with a market and accommodation for sailors. No person may land customable goods on his own land or elsewhere than at a port. The privilege of erecting ports and taking dues and tolls as incident thereto is part of the royal prerogative, and can belong to a subject as a franchise only by grant or prescription from the Crown, or by Act of Parliament. The owner of the port is bound to keep it in repair. See TOLL.

In other respects a port is the same thing as a harbour (q.v.).

See SANITARY AUTHORITY.

Port also in Saxon times meant a city or town. From this use of the word come PORTMEN; PORTMOTE; PORTSOKEN; PORTREEVE; PORTSALE. See those titles.

Portcullis. See HERALDS.

Porterage. See PACKAGE.

Porters. The metage (q.v.) rights of the City of London were exercised through the Company of Porters. The abolition of those rights led in 1894 to the abolition of the Company by an act of the Court of Common Council.

Portgreve; Portreeve. In the time of the Conqueror the authorities of the City of London were the Bishop, the Portgreve, and the burgesses. The portgreve was in fact the predecessor of the mayor, or Lord Mayor. (See LONDON.) The portreeve was everywhere the chief municipal magistrate at the time of the Conquest. In most places he has been replaced by the mayor (see MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS), but in many small towns he still survives. Crediton, Holsworthy and Tavistock are instances of towns with a portreeve as the chief local officer.

Portion. When land is settled in strict settlement, that is to say, on the husband for life, with remainder in tail to the eldest son, it is usual to provide for the payment to the "younger children" (that is, all except the one who takes the estate) of gross sums of money, on their attaining twenty-one, or, in the case of daughters, marrying. To enable these portions to be raised, the land is generally limited to trustees for a long term of years with power to mortgage it. See SETTLEMENT; TERM.

As to the operation of the rule against double portions, by which a child is prevented from taking both a sum paid to him as a portion and a legacy bequeathed to him as a portion, see SATISFACTION.

Portioner. This is stated to have been one of several ministers who served a parsonage alternately and each of whom got only a portion of the tithes.

Portman-mote. The assembly of the portmen (q.v.) or citizens of a town.

Portmen. In Old English this meant the inhabitants of towns generally, and later it meant the inhabitants of the Cinque Ports in particular. In a narrower sense it meant a citizen having authority within a town: thus formerly the municipal authority at Ipswich was the Mayor, the Portmen and the Common Council, while at Oxford it was the Mayor, eight Portmen, and twelve Capital Burgesses.

Portmote. This meant either the portmanmote (q.v.) or (more especially in the County Palatine of Chester and in the Cinque Ports) the Court of a town.

Portsale. Literally, a sale in the town. A public sale of goods: more especially a sale of fish at the place where they were landed. See PORT.

Portsoken; Portsokne. The liberties of the City of London which were granted to the City by Henry III. They were outside the walls of the City: thus in the Pleas of the time of Edward I. there is reference to steps for the putting down of murder "within the City and in Portsokne." They now form the Ward of Portsoken. Portsoken is a compound of port (in the sense of city or town) and soca (jurisdiction), the liberties being within the jurisdiction of the City.

Positive Law. Rules of conduct laid down and enforced by some public authority, as distinguished from such entities as the "law of nature," which is merely a series of propositions as to what the law ought to be. Also known as public law.

Posse comitatus (literally "the power of the county") is an assemblage of the able-bodied male inhabitants of a county, except peers and clergymen. The sheriff of the county may summon the posse comitatus either to defend the county against the king's enemies, or to keep the peace, or to pursue felons, or to enforce the king's writ. Persons failing to obey the summons are liable to fine and imprisonment. The use of the posse has fallen into disuse in this country as the result of the establishment of the various police forces which have come into existence during the last century: but the power to call out the posse is still in the sheriff and is expressly affirmed by the Sheriffs Act, 1887, s. 8 (1).

Possessio fratris. Under the old law of descent, where A had a son and a daughter by one marriage, and another son by a subsequent marriage, and died intestate seised of land in fee simple, then if the eldest son entered on the land and died without issue, the daughter took the land, because the descent was traced from the person last seised; and in this case the younger son, being of the half-blood to his brother, could not inherit to him. This was called a possessio fratris, the rule being possessio fratris de feodo simplici facit sororem esse hæredem (the possession of the brother makes the sister heir). Now descent is traced from the purchaser (see DESCENT) and not from the person last seised, so that the possessio fratris has been abolished.

Possession.—I. In its primary sense, possession is the visible possibility of exercising physical control over a thing, coupled with the intention of doing so, either against all the world, or against all the world except certain persons. There are, therefore, three requisites of possession. First, there must be actual or potential physical control. Secondly, physical control is not possession, unless accompanied by intention; hence, if a thing be put into the hand of a sleeping person, he has not possession of it. Thirdly, the possibility and intention must be visible or evidenced by external signs, for if the thing shows no signs of being under the control of anyone, it is not possessed; hence, if a piece of land is deserted and left without fences or other signs of occupation, it is not in the possession of anyone, and the possession is said to be vacant. The question whether possession of land is vacant is of importance in actions for recovering possession, as in such cases service of the writ is effected (under Ord. 9, r. 9), by posting a copy of it on part of the land. See SERVICE.

Possession does not necessarily imply use or enjoyment; thus a warehouseman has possession of the goods entrusted to him, without having the use of them. But, inasmuch as the use of property cannot be had without possession, the term "possession" is frequently used as implying use and enjoyment, and in this sense is opposed to "reversion," "remainder," "expectancy," "action," etc.; thus a tenant for life in possession is one who has the immediate benefit of the property (e.g., by occupation, receipt of the rents or income, etc.), as opposed to a tenant in remainder, whose right to the enjoyment of the property is deferred (see ESTATE). a chose in possession is a chattel which can be immediately used, such as a book, while a chose in action is merely the right to obtain possession of a chattel, as in the case of a debt. See CHOSE; REDUCTION INTO POSSESSION.

Possession gives rise to peculiar rights and consequences. The principal is that a possessor has a presumptive title, that is to say, is presumed to be absolute owner until the contrary is shown, and is protected by law in his possession against all who cannot show a better title to the possession than he has. Thus, if a person takes possession of a piece of deserted land no one can eject him from it except the rightful owner, and even he only by taking legal proceedings to prove his title. This is called the right of possession. Ordinarily, possession (unless combined with other elements) does not affect the question of ownership; and therefore if A, being wrongfully in possession of a thing, conveys it to B, B cannot retain it against the true owner, even though he may have believed A to be the true owner and paid him the value of the thing. But in a few cases possession is sufficient to enable a person without title to give a perfect title to a bonâ fide acquirer: thus if A steals money or a negotiable instrument from B and transfers it for value to C, who has no notice of the theft, B cannot claim it from C. (See EARMARK; NEGOTIABLE; MARKET OVERT.) So under the Factors Act, 1889 (q.v.), a person in possession of goods belonging to another may, in certain cases, sell or pledge them, so as to give a good title to the purchaser or pledgee. As to long-continued adverse possession, see infra.

In criminal law, possession frequently gives rise to a presumption against the possessor, so as to shift the burden of proof on him. Thus the possession of stolen goods, where recent and exclusive, is, in many cases, sufficient to raise a presumption of larceny against the possessor, which he must rebut by showing that he came honestly by them.

(i) With reference to its origin, possession is either with or without right.

1. Rightful possession is where a person has the right to the possession of (that is, the right to possess) property, and is in the possession of it with the intention of exercising his right. This kind of possession necessarily varies with the nature of the right from which it arises; a person may be in possession of a thing by virtue of his right of ownership, or as lessee, bailee, etc.; or his possession may be merely permissive, as in the case of a licensee; or it may be a possession coupled with an interest, as in the case of an auctioneer. So the right may be absolute, that is, good against all persons: or relative, that is, good against all with certain exceptions; thus a carrier or borrower of goods has a right to their possession against all the world except the owner.

In jurisprudence, the possession of a lessee, bailee, licensee, etc., is called derivative possession, while in English law the possessory interest of such a person, considered with reference to his rights against third persons who interfere with his possession, is usually called a special or qualified property, meaning a limited right of ownership. See PROPERTY.

2. Possession without right is called wrongful or adverse, according as the rights of the owner or those of the possessor are considered. Wrongful (or naked) possession is where a person takes possession of property to which he is not entitled, so that the possession and the right of possession are in one person, and the right to possession in another. Where an owner is wrongfully dispossessed, he has a right of action to recover his property, or, if he has an opportunity, he can exercise the remedy of recaption in the case of goods, or of entry in the case of land (see RECAPTION; ENTRY). Formerly the doctrine of wrongful possession was of more importance than now, owing to the peculiar rules applicable to disseisin, intrusion, feoffments, etc. See ADVERSE POSSESSION.

(ii) With reference to the mode of its exercise, possession is of several kinds.

1. A person has actual possession (de facto possession, possession in fact) of a thing when he exercises physical control over it. Thus a person who holds a thing in his hand has actual possession of it, and the lessee of a house is in actual possession of it while he occupies it.

2. A person has constructive possession (or possession in law) (1) when someone representing him has actual possession of the thing. Thus if A, the owner of the land, leases it to B, A has constructive possession by B, and if A dies intestate leaving C his heir, C is immediately in constructive possession of the land by B, although he has never had actual possession; (2) a person may have construc tive possession of one thing because he has actual possession of another; thus if a person is in legal possession of a house he is ordinarily in constructive possession of the goods in it, or if he is in legal possession of a portion of an estate or farm he is in constructive possession of the whole of it.

3. Joint or concurrent possession is where two or more persons have possession of the same thing at the same time.

4. Under the Bills of Sale Acts, the validity of an unregistered bill of sale frequently depended upon whether the owner of the goods remained in "apparent possession" of them, having merely given "formal possession" to the creditor. Thus where the holder of an unregistered bill of sale of furniture put a man into the house, but did not interfere with the furniture in such a manner as to show that it had been taken out of the debtor's control, it was held that the possession so taken was merely formal, and that the goods remained in the apparent possession of the debtor. (See BILL OF SALE.) This doctrine of apparent possession now applies only to bills of sale to which the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882, does not apply.

As to possession in the law of bankruptcy, see ORDER AND DISPOSITION; REPUTED OWNER.

5. In criminal law, possession is sometimes distinguished from custody. Thus if the owner of a chattel gives it to his servant to keep for him for a specific purpose or until he requires it again, the chattel is in the custody of the servant and in the possession of the master; if, however, the servant receives anything for his master from a third person (not being a fellow-servant), e.g., a tradesman, he has the possession and not merely the custody of it until he places it in his master's possession by putting it into a place or thing belonging to his master, or by some similar act The importance of the distinction is with reference to the difference between larceny and embezzlement (q.v.): and see CUSTODY.

II. Possession is sometimes used in the old books in the technical sense of seisin or feudal possession of land. "It is to be knowne," says Coke, "that there is a jus proprietatis, a right of ownership, jus possessionis, a right of seisin or possession, and jus proprietatis et possessionis, a right both of property and possession: and this is antiently called jus duplicatum, or droit droit. For example, if a man be disseised of an acre of land, the disseisee hath jus proprietatis, the disseisor hath jus possessionis, and if the disseisee release to the disseisor, hee hath jus proprietatis et possessionis." (Co. Litt. 226A.) See SEISIN; DROIT; POSSESSIO FRATRIS.

III. Possession was also sometimes opposed to seisin. "The difference," says Noy, "between possession and seisin is: lessee for years is possessed, and yet the lessor is still seised; and therefore the terms of law are, that of chattels a man is possessed, whereas in feoffments, gifts in tail, and leases for life, he is described as seised." (Noy's Max. 64.)

See ENJOYMENT; QUASI-POSSESSION.

Possession money is the fee to which a sheriff's officer is entitled for keeping possession of property under a writ of execution. It is fixed at five shillings per day by the Order as to Fees made 31st August, 1888, under the Sheriffs Act, 1887.

Possession (of Ships). The Admiralty Court Act, 1840, s. 4, gave, for the first time, the Admiralty Court (now the Admiralty Division) jurisdiction to decide all questions as to the title to or ownership of ships. Before the Judicature Acts, only legal owners could institute a suit to recover possession of a ship: but now, under ss. 24 and 25 of the Judicature Act, 1873, equitable interests in ships are put on the same footing as legal interests.

Possession, Writ of. This is the writ of execution employed to enforce a judgment to recover the possession of land. It commands the sheriff to enter the land and give possession of it to the person entitled under the judgment. It is issued under Ord. 47, r. 1, and is in the form set out in App. H., No. 8. See HABERE FACIAS POSSESSIONEM; WRIT OF DELIVERY; EXECUTION.

Possessory is that which arises out of or is concerned with possession. Thus a possessory action, in the days of real actions, was an action to recover the possession of land (see DROIT). An action of possession is a different thing; it is one in which a person claims possession of a ship either against one wrongfully in possession or against a co-owner. (See POSSESSION OF SHIPS.) As to possessory liens, see LIEN.

Possibility is a future event, the happening of which is uncertain. In the law of real property, the term also signifies an interest in land which depends on the happening of such an event. In this sense, a possibility is said to be either bare or coupled with an interest Thus, the expectation of an eldest son of succeeding to his father's land is a bare possibility, which is not recognised by law as being capable of transfer, though it may form the subject of a covenant to settle after-acquired property. If land is conveyed to A for life, and if C should be living at his death, then to B in fee, B's contingent remainder is a possibility coupled with an interest: such a possibility may be devised by will or conveyed by deed.

In the old books a distinction is drawn between (i) a common or near possibility, and (ii) a double or remote possibility, or possibility on a possibility. Thus, the chance that a man and a woman, both married to different persons, shall themselves marry one another, is a common possibility, and therefore a gift to two such persons, and the heirs of their two bodies, gives them an estate tail; but "if," says Coke, "land is given to a man and two women and the heires of their bodies begotten, in this case they have a joynt estate for life and every of them a severall inheritance, because they cannot have one issue of their bodies, neither shall there be by any construction a possibility upon a possibility, viz., that he shall marry the one first and then the other." (See further as to the effect of a gift of this kind, under titles ESTATE TAIL; INHERITANCE.) When an estate in fee simple conditional at common law is created, the donor has what is called a possibility of reverter, as to which see REVERTER.

Formerly, also, there was a rule that a contingent remainder could not be created to take effect on the happening of a double possibility. But this is now obsolete.

See TENANT IN TAIL AFTER POSSIBILITY OF ISSUE EXTINCT.

Post. As to contracts entered into through the post, see LETTER. As to actions "in the post," see WRIT OF ENTRY.

Post diem. This was where a writ was returned after the day assigned: thereupon the Custos Brevium (q.v.) received a fee of fourpence.

Post Disseisin. This was a writ which formerly lay for one who, having recovered lands by præcipe (q.v.) quod reddat, on default or reddition, was again disseised by the former disseisor: under it, the party suing it out got double damages and the disseisor was imprisoned.

Postea, in the common law practice before 1873, was a formal statement, indorsed on the nisi prius record, which gave an account of the proceedings at the trial of the action. Under the present practice, the associate makes an entry of the findings of the jury, and of the directions and certificates given by the judge at the trial, in a book kept for that purpose. See CERTIFICATE.

Post Entry. A corrective entry (q.v.) made to the Customs authorities by an importer whose original entry is found to be erroneous.

Posteriority. "Posteriority," wrote Cowel in 1607, "is a word of comparison and relation in tenure, the correlative whereof is prioritie. For a man holding lands . . . of two lords, holdeth of his auncienter lord by prioritie, and of his later lord by posterioritie," and when he died the "auncienter lord" had the wardship of the heir.

Post Fine. The payment made for the licentia concordandi upon the levying of a fine (q.v.).

Posthumous. See IN VENTRE SA MÈRE.

Postliminium is the name given to the rule of international law by which, in certain cases, persons or property captured by an enemy revert to their original owner, when recaptured from the enemy by individuals belonging to the nation from which they were captured. To what cases the rule is applicable depends to a great extent on the practice of each particular nation: for it properly belongs to private international law, though the term postliminium is also said to apply to those cases where captured property has come into the hands of neutrals, and is reclaimed by the belligerent from whom it was taken. As to the English law on the subject, see RECAPTURE.

Post litem motam. See LIS MOTA.

Postman. A junior barrister in the Court of Exchequer who, except in Crown business, had precedence in motions. The office ceased to exist when the Court of Exchequer, as the result of the Judicature Acts, was merged in the Queen's Bench Division, but the judges intimated that whenever a Divisional Court sat in what had been the Court of Exchequer, the barrister who had held the post was to have his old precedence. The last postman was Sir Charles Hall, Recorder of London, 1892-1900. The postman took his name from the fact that his place in the Court of Exchequer was by the post anciently used as a measure of length in excise cases. See TUBMAN.

Postmaster-General. This official is the modern representative of the Master of the Posts (q.v.). He comes into and goes out of office with the ministry of the day and is sometimes a member of the Cabinet. He is not disqualified for membership of the House of Commons (Representation of the People Act, 1867, s. 52, Sch. II: see OFFICE OF PROFIT). He is the head of the Post Office (q.v.). Each successive Postmaster-General is appointed by letters patent (Post Office Act, 1908, s. 33 (1)). There is also an Assistant Postmaster-General, who likewise can sit and vote in the House of Commons (Assistant Postmaster-General Act, 1909 (9 Edw. 7, c. 14)). The salary of the Postmaster-General is £2,500, and that of the Assistant Postmaster-General is £1,200.

Post-mortem Examination. A medical examination of a corpse in order to discover the cause of death. It may be ordered by a coroner (q.v.) under s. 21 of the Coroners Act, 1887.

Post-nati. See CALVIN'S CASE.

Post-note. A species of bank-note, intended for transmission by post, which is payable to order on a future specified date instead of to bearer on sight, as in the case of the ordinary bank-note. The term seems to be confined to the United States. The British equivalent is a Bank Post-Bill (q.v.)

Post-obit. This is a money bond conditioned for payment at or after the death of some person other than the giver of the bond. It is a form of quasi-security not infrequently given to a money-lender by an expectant heir (q.v.). See CATCHING BARGAIN.

Post Office. This department, which is under the management of the Postmaster-General (q.v.), has a monopoly in the transmission of all letters and telegraphic and telephonic messages in the United Kingdom. Its monopoly as regards letters rests at present on the Post Office Act, 1908, s. 34; as regards its monopoly of telegraphs and telephones, see those titles. It also carries on the business of a savings bank, life insurance business, annuity business, and the sale of money orders and of postal orders for the transmission of money. It acts as a carrier of parcels, pays old age pensions, and performs several other public services.

See PENNY POST.

Post terminum. This was the return of a writ, not merely after the day assigned (see POST DIEM), but after the end of the term in which that day fell. In that case the Custos Brevium (q.v.) received a fine of twenty pence, and the fine was also known as a post terminum.

Potestas suprema seipsam dissolvere potest, ligare non potest (Bac. Max. Reg. 19). (The supreme power may loose, but cannot bind, itself.) Compare PERPETUA, ETC.

Pothier. Robert Joseph Pothier was born on the 9th January, 1699, at Orleans, where he afterwards became professor: he died on the 2nd March, 1772. He wrote Pandectæ Justinianeæ in novum ordinem digestæ: and treatises on many important branches of private law: they enjoy considerable reputation. Complete editions of his works were published in 1820-22, 1825, 1845 and 1861.

Potior est conditio defendentis. (The condition of a defendant is better.) Where a plaintiff can succeed only as the result of either an illegal or a disgraceful course of conduct the Court will not decide in his favour, even though the conduct of the defendant be equally discreditable. Compare EX TURPI CAUSÂ.

Potior est conditio possidentis. (The condition of one in possession is the better.) This maxim is mentioned in Williams on Executors (11th ed.), p. 797, as an alleged source of the doctrine of retainer (q.v.).

Potwaller; Potwalloper. This meant one, either a householder or a lodger, who provided his own food and cooked it at his fireplace. Such persons were entitled to the parliamentary electoral franchise in some boroughs. The rights of existing potwallers were preserved by s. 33 of the Representation of the People Act, 1832; but all such persons are now long since dead. Compare FAGGOT VOTE; see ELECTORAL FRANCHISE.

Pound. A pound is a building or piece of land where goods which have been seized as distress are placed by the distrainor; as soon as this has been done, the goods are in the custody of the law. See RESCUE; POUND-BREACH.

A pound is either overt (open) or covert (close). A pound overt is practically only used for cattle, and may be either a common pound overt, which is a pinfold or structure of wood made for such purposes on a public piece of land: or a special pound overt, which is where the cattle are impounded (under the Distress for Rent Act, 1737 (11 Geo. 2, c. 19), s. 10) on the land where the distress was made, or on that of the distrainor, or of some other person by his consent, in which two latter cases the distrainor must give notice to the owner of the cattle, because where cattle are impounded in a pound overt their owner is bound to supply them with food and drink. A pound overt is so called, either because it is open overhead (which seems to be the true reason), or because the owner of the cattle may go to it wherever it is, without being liable for a trespass. A pound covert or close is where the distrainor impounds the cattle or goods in some part of a house (e.g., a stable), and then he is bound to supply the cattle with food and drink. Goods which are liable to be damaged by the weather or stolen must always be impounded in a pound covert.

Formerly a distrainor could not impound the distress on the land of the tenant, but had to remove it. Now, however, the distrainor may convert any part of the premises, upon which a distress is taken, into a pound pro hac vice (Act of 1737, s. 10).

Pounds may be used for the confinement of cattle found damage feasant, for stray cattle on highways, and also for stray cattle found by the police in any place to which the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, applies.

At common law neither the person impounding an animal nor the pound-keeper was obliged to feed it, and no charge could be made for its keep. Now any person who impounds an animal is bound to supply it with food and water; on his default, anyone can enter the pound and feed the animal, and the cost of the food can in either case be recovered from the owner (Protection of Animals Act, 1911, s. 7).

See PARCO FRACTO, DE.

Poundage is a fee payable to an officer of a Court, or to the public revenue, in respect of services performed by the officer: it is so called because it is calculated at so much for every pound sterling of the amount with which he has to deal. Thus a sheriff on executing a fieri facias, is entitled to a poundage of one shilling in the pound if the sum levied does not exceed £100, and sixpence in the pound above that sum (Sheriffs Act, 1887, s. 20 (2), and rules thereunder made).

Historically, poundage was a duty at the rate of so much (usually twelvepence) per pound sterling upon the value of merchandise (other than wine) imported into the kingdom. The statutes which granted it also invariably granted tonnage (q.v.) as well, the two being known as tonnage and poundage.

Poundagium. The liberty (or right) of impounding cattle.

Pound-breach is the act of taking goods out of a pound before the distrainor's claim has been satisfied, and that whether the distress was lawfully made or not, because impounded goods are in the custody of the law. The distrainor's remedy is either by action for treble damages under the Sale of Distress Act, 1690, s. 4, or by proceedings for a penalty before justices under the Pound-Breach Act, 1843. See DOUBLE DAMAGES; RESCUE.

On the criminal side, pound-breach to rescue cattle distrained or found damage feasant is an indictable misdemeanour, but is now always dealt with summarily under the Pound-Breach Act, 1843.

Where the cattle are impounded under the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, s. 24, pound-breach is punishable summarily under s. 25 of that Act; and where they have been found straying on the highway and have been impounded under the Highway Act, 1864, s. 25, pound-breach is also punishable summarily under the Highway Act, 1835, s. 75.

Pound (Weight). The imperial standard pound, as ascertained in accordance with s. 13 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878, weighs 7,000 grains, and is the unit from which all other measures of weight are ascertained.

Up to the reign of Edward III. the pound of 5,760 grains, made up of twelve ounces each containing 480 grains, was in general use. After that period this ounce was reserved for precious metals, and the pound of 7,000 grains came into use for other substances.

Pour fair proclaimer que null inject fimes ou ordures en fosses ou rivers pres cities. A writ directed to the mayor or bailiff of a city or town requiring him To make proclamation that none should throw filth or ordure into ditches or rivers near cities. It was founded on the statute 12 Rich. 2, c. 13, repealed by the statute 19 & 20 Vict. c. 64 and S. L. R. Act, 1875.

Pourpresture. See PURPRESTURE.

Pour seisir terres la femme qui tient in dower. (To seise the lands held by the wife in dower.) A writ which lay for the king when the widow of a tenant in capite had remarried without the king's leave.

Poursuivants. See HERALDS.

Purveyance. See PURVEYANCE.

Powdike. In Norfolk, west of the Great Ouse, there were three embankments built to keep the waters of the fens out of the tract, in the Isle of Ely, known as Marshland There was the Old Powdike, built about 1225; the New Powdike, built about 1425; and the Little Powdike, adjoining the Old Powdike. The statute 22 Hen. 8 made it felony to injure them.

Power is sometimes used in the same sense as "right," as when we speak of the powers of user and disposition which the owner of property has over it; but strictly speaking a power is that which creates a special or exceptional right, or enables a person to do something which he could not otherwise do. Powers are either public or private.

I. Public powers are those conferred by the Crown, by the Legislature (parliamentary powers), or by a delegate of the Crown or Legislature, such as the Privy Council or Board of Trade, for a public purpose, e.g., the construction of a railway. When a parliamentary power authorises acts by which the rights of private persons may be affected against their will, it is called a compulsory power; such are the powers given to railway companies for the compulsory purchase of land required for their undertakings. See ACT OF PARLIAMENT.

II. Private powers are those conferred on private persons. Some are created by the parties themselves, in which case the person conferring the power is called the donor, and the person to whom it is given the donee; others are statutory, that is, conferred by statute.

Powers must be distinguished from trusts: "powers," says Wilmot, L.C.J., "are never imperative—they leave the act to be done at the will of the party to whom they are given.

Trusts are always imperative." (Wilm. 28.) Powers are, however, sometimes divided into (i) mere, bare or naked powers (or powers in the proper sense of the word), and (ii) powers coupled with a trust, or powers in the nature of trusts, which the donees are bound to exercise; they are, therefore, really trusts, and are powers only in form.

Powers are of two principal kinds, viz. (1) those which are by law incident to an office (sometimes called general powers), such as the ordinary powers of directors, solicitors, guardians, executors, trustees, etc.; and (2) those conferred specially (special powers), such as a power of sale or leasing, or an authority conferred by a power of attorney, procuration, warrant, etc. Special powers are of infinite variety, but for practical purposes they may be divided into those which enable the donees to create or modify estates or interests in property (called in conveyancing "powers" par excellence), and those conferred for other purposes.

A. Powers which enable the donees to create or modify estates or interests in property "confer," says Mr. Sugden, "the right of alienation as opposed to that of enjoyment": that is, the power enables the donee to declare in whom and in what manner the property is to vest, but gives him (qua donee) no right of ownership over it. Such a power is said to be legal when it operates upon or passes the legal estate in the property, and equitable when it only operates on or passes a beneficial or equitable estate or interest.

(a) Legal powers (which are confined to land) operate either under the Statute of Uses, under the Wills Act, 1837, or by custom. Powers under the Statute of Uses operate in the following manner: if land is conveyed to A and his heirs to such uses as B shall appoint, and B appoints or declares the uses to C for life, and after C's death to himself in fee, then the legal estate passes to C for his life with remainder to B, as if the estates had been originally so conveyed to them. (See APPOINTMENT, POWER OF; USE.) Powers operating under the Wills Act, are similar to those operating by way of use, except that they can be created and take effect with greater freedom; thus, if a testator charges his real estate with the payment of his debts the executor takes a power of sale over it. Powers operating by virtue of a custom (e.g., a custom applicable to copyholds) resemble those under the Statute of Uses in their effect, but they are less flexible in their application.

Legal powers are (α) appendant or appurtenant when the donee has an estate in the land and the power is to take effect wholly or in part out of that estate, as in the case of a tenant for life having a power of leasing, or a mortgagee having a power of sale; (β) in gross or collateral, either (i) where the donee has an estate in the land, but the power does not take effect out of it, as where a tenant for life has power to appoint an estate to commence after his death, or (ii) where the donee has no present estate, but may exercise the power for his own benefit; (γ) merely collateral or naked, where the donee neither has an estate nor can exercise the power for his own benefit, as in the case of executors having a mere power of sale. If lands are devised to an executor with a trust or power of sale, this is sometimes called a power coupled with an interest, to distinguish it from a bare or naked power. This classification of powers is of importance with reference to the ability of the donee to release, suspend or extinguish the power. Thus, executors who have a merely collateral power to sell land cannot release or extinguish it.

By s. 52 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, a person to whom any power, whether coupled with an interest or not, is given, may by deed release it, or contract not to exercise it. This provision does not apply to so-called powers coupled with a trust.

(b) Equitable powers are analogous to legal powers. Thus, if land or stock is vested in trustees upon such trusts as B shall appoint, and B appoints it to C, the legal ownership of the land or stock remains in the trustees, but the equitable ownership passes to C, and he can compel the trustees to convey the land or transfer the stock to him.

Powers are also divisible into (a) powers of revocation, which give only the right of revoking existing estates, and (b) powers of appointment, which enable the donees to create or appoint new estates. When a power of appointment is not preceded by an existing estate, it is sometimes called a primary power; when it is preceded by an existing estate which the donee may revoke, it is called a power of revocation and new appointment, or a subsidiary power. As to the operation of appointments with reference to the rule against perpetuities, see APPOINTMENT.

Powers are either general (that is to say, absolute) or limited. A general power enables the donee to appoint the property to any person or persons (including himself), for any estates, and on any conditions, and is therefore equivalent to ownership. If he dies having exercised it by will in favour of a volunteer, or if he becomes bankrupt, the power forms part of his assets (q.v.) for payment of his debts. See ASSETS.

A limited power is either special or particular. A special power is one which is restricted as to the nature or duration of the estates or interests to be created under it, as in the case of the power to grant leases for terms in excess of those permitted by the Settled Land Act, 1882, which are frequently given to the tenant for life under a settlement. A particular power is one which is restricted as to its objects or the persons in whose favour it may be exercised, as in the case of a power to appoint property among a certain class only (e.g., the children of the donee); but the terms "special" and "particular" are frequently used as synonymous. When a power of appointment among a class requires that each shall have a share, it is called a distributive or non-exclusive power; when it authorises, but does not direct, a selection of one or more to the exclusion of the others, it is called an exclusive power, and is also distributive; when it gives the power of appointing to a certain number of the class, but not to all, it is exclusive only, and not distributive. A power authorising the donee either to give the whole to one of a class, or to give it equally amongst such of them as he may select (but not to give one a larger share than the others), is called a mixed power. Formerly, if the donee of a non-exclusive power excluded one of the objects from his appointment, or only gave him an illusory share, the appointment was held void; but this rule has been abolished. (See APPOINTMENT.) As to frauds on powers, see FRAUD.

B. Powers not given for the purpose of creating or modifying estates or interests in property are of great variety. In most cases their names explain themselves. Thus, a power of appointing new trustees is incident to every modern settlement created by will or deed, either by express provision, or by statutory enactment. So a power of distress and entry may be inserted in a deed to enable the donee to enter and distrain on certain land of the donor, to enforce the performance of some covenant, e.g., the payment of an annuity. (See DISTRESS.) For other examples of powers, see POWER OF ATTORNEY.

Power of Attorney is a formal instrument by which one person empowers another to represent him, or act in his stead for certain purposes. A power of attorney is usually a special instrument in the form of a deed poll, but it may form part of a deed containing other matter; thus a deed of dissolution of partnership often contains a power of attorney from the retiring to the continuing partner, to enable the latter to wind up the business, and collect the assets. A power which authorises the execution of a deed or the transfer of stock at the Bank of England must itself be conferred by deed. It is always well that the execution of the power of attorney should be attested by two witnesses; and, for the transfer of stock at the Bank of England, the power of attorney must be so attested.

The donor of the power is called the principal or constituent; the donee is called the attorney. As a general rule, either an infant or a married woman may be an attorney.

A power of attorney which authorises the attorney to do all acts of a certain class from time to time, such as to carry on a business, collect debts, etc., is sometimes called a general power, as opposed to a special or particular power, or one which is confined to a specified act or acts. A limited power is one containing precise instructions as to the mode of executing it, while an unlimited power leaves this to the discretion of the attorney.

As to the persons who can empower others to act for them by power of attorney, see AGENT; AUTHORITY; DELEGATUS NON POTEST DELEGARE; MINISTERIAL. As to the cases in which a power of attorney is revocable, see AUTHORITY; REVOCATION. Under the Trustee Act, 1893, s. 23, a trustee (or an executor or administrator (see s. 50)), making any payment or doing any act bonâ fide in pursuance of a power of attorney, in ignorance of the death of the person who gave the power, or of his having done some act to avoid it, is not liable for the money so paid, or the act so done: see also s. 47 (post) of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881.

The Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, contains the following provisions in regard to powers of attorney. The donee of a power of attorney may act in and with his own name, signature and seal instead of the name, signature and seal of the donor (s. 46). Any person making or doing any payment or act in good faith, in pursuance of a power of attorney, is not to be liable by reason that the donor of the power had previously died, or become lunatic, or bankrupt, or revoked the power, provided such fact was not known to him at the time (s. 47). A power of attorney may be deposited in the Central Office of the Supreme Court, on its execution being verified by affidavit or otherwise. The file of powers so deposited may be searched, and an office copy of any power obtained, by any person on payment of the office fees. An office copy is sufficient evidence of the contents of the original instrument (s. 48). A married woman, whether an infant or not, is to have power, as if she were unmarried and of full age, to appoint an attorney on her behalf to do anything which she herself might do (s. 40).

The Conveyancing Act, 1882, provides (s. 8) that a power of attorney given for value may be made irrevocable in favour of a purchaser, that is to say, a mortgagee, lessee, or other person dealing for value, and (s. 9) that a power of attorney, whether given for value or not, may be made irrevocable in favour of a purchaser for a time not exceeding one year

A company can give a power of attorney for the performance of acts which are merely ministerial, but not for the doing of anything involving the exercise of a discretion: if incorporated under the Companies Consolidation Act, 1908, it can (see s. 78) give a power of attorney for the execution of a deed abroad.

Power of the County. See POSSE COMITATUS.

P.P.I. (Policy proof of interest.) A P.P.I. policy of marine insurance was one which was good as against the underwriter, even though the insurer had no insurable interest in the ship or cargo. The effect of the Gaming Act, 1845, s. 18, was to make a P.P.I. policy void if in fact there was no insurable interest: the Marine Insurance Act, 1906, s. 4, is to the like effect, and now any person without insurable interest effecting a marine insurance commits an offence. See INTEREST.

Practice. The law of practice or procedure is that which regulates the formal steps in an action or other judicial proceeding. It therefore deals with writs of summons, pleadings, affidavits, notices, summonses, motions, petitions, orders, trial, judgment, appeals, costs and execution. In jurisprudence it forms part of adjective law. See LAW.

Practice Court. Better known as the Bail Court (q.v.).

Præbendam, In. See PREBEND.

Præcaria bedrepium = Bederepe (q.v.).

Præcipe, in the practice of the High Court, is a slip of paper on which a party to a proceeding writes the particulars of a document which he wishes to have prepared or issued; he then hands it to the officer of the Court whose duty it is to prepare or issue the document. Thus, when a party wishes to issue a writ of execution, he must file a præcipe containing the title of the action, the reference to the record, the date of the judgment, and the name of the party against whom the execution is to be issued (R. S. C., Ord. 42, r. 12).

In admiralty actions præcipes are longer and more important than in other actions.

Formerly a præcipe was a species of original writ, so called because it required the sheriff to command the defendant either to do a certain thing or to show cause why he had not done it; e.g., the præcipe quod reddat, commanding the defendant to give up land to the demandant, which was the writ by which a common recovery was commenced against the tenant of the freehold. In order to have a recovery with double voucher to ban an entail, it was usual for the tenant in tail to convey an estate of freehold to a friend against whom the præcipe was brought; this was called making a tenant to the præcipe (q.v.). See RECOVERY; VOUCHER.

The instructions for issuing an original writ consisted of a copy of the writ required, and therefore began with the word "præcipe"; hence probably the use of the word in its modern sense.

Præcipe in capite. This was a writ issuing out of the Chancery for a tenant in capite. See NON INTROMITTENDO, ETC.

Præfine; Prefine. A fee payable on the issue of the writ which formed the first part of a fine (q.v.). It was usually about one-tenth of the annual value of the lands sued for. Known also as primer fine.

Præjuramentum = Antejuramentum (q.v.).

Præmunire. This is the offence of directly or indirectly asserting the supremacy of the Pope over the Crown of England, as by procuring excommunications or bulls from Rome. The punishment is for the offender to be put out of the king's protection, to forfeit his lands and goods to the king, and to be imprisoned. The mandatory part of the writ grounding a prosecution used to enforce the provisions of the Acts against præmunire began præmunire facias, "that you cause [the accused] to be forewarned"; hence the name. It is now quite obsolete.

Various other Acts not coming within the definition of præmunire given above have been declared to be præmunires. Thus it is a præmunire (13 Car. 2, c. 1) to assert that both Houses of Parliament can legislate without the King or (Habeas Corpus Act (31 Car. c. 2)) to send a subject, a prisoner, out of the realm without lawful authority.

Præmunire, Statute of. The popular title of the statute 16 Rich. 2, c. 5. It is the basis of the law as to præmunire.

Præpositus. Literally, one put in front. In Anglo-Saxon and Norman times the word is used in the records as meaning a principal officer of various kinds. There was the præpositus villæ, which meant the steward or bailiff of a lord of the manor; the præpositus regius, who was the chief representative of the king in a hundred or town; and the præpositus ecclesiæ, who was a church-reeve (see REEVE) or churchwarden.

Præsentia corporis tollit errorem nominis; et veritas nominis tollit errorem demonstrationis (Bac. Max. Reg. 25). (The presence of the body cures error in the name: the truth of the name cures error of description): which may be freely translated as meaning that if you have the right man it does not matter that you have called him by a wrong name, and that if you mention the right thing it does not matter that you have made an error in describing it. Thus, where one on the jury panel is erroneously called and sworn in the name of another who is also on the panel, the error is immaterial; and a legacy of something which can be clearly identified is not invalidated by error in description of details. Compare FALSA DEMONSTRATIO, ETC.

Præstita Rolls. "Rolls" in the Record Office containing lists of payments made by the Exchequer to royal officials between 1199 and 1603.

Præsumptio violenta valet in lege (Jenk. Cent. 56). (Strong presumption avails in law). This is quoted in a context which has no application to modern law. See PRESUMPTION.

Pray in Aid. See AID; PRAYER.

Prayer Book. The Sarum Missal and Breviary was drawn up in 1085 for the Cathedral Church at Salisbury. This was in most general use throughout England at the time of the Reformation. It formed the basis of the Prayer Book of Edward VI., published in 1548; and the statute 2 & 3 Edw. 6, c. 1 (popularly known as the Book of Common Prayer Act, 1548) enacted that only the services mentioned in this Prayer Book should be used. The Prayer Book was suppressed by Mary; Elizabeth revived it, with alterations, by the Act of Uniformity (1 Eliz. c. 2), in 1558. Under the Act of 1558, Elizabeth made alterations in 1561, and James I. made some more in 1604. The Puritans suppressed the book, but after the Restoration it was revived, in substantially the modern form, by the Act of Uniformity, 1662 (14 Car. 2, c. 4). Modern enactments on the subject are the Table of Lessons Act, 1871, and the Act of Uniformity Amendment Act, 1872.

Prayers for the Dead. The House of Lords decided in 1919 that a bequest of personal estate for masses for the dead is not a gift for superstitious uses, and is not void.

Prayers for the dead are not expressly prohibited by the Church of England, but they are discouraged. "Mortuary celebrations" of the Holy Communion "for the repose of the departed" were condemned in 1870, and in 1903 the ecclesiastical Court authorised the removal of a tombstone inscribed "Of your charity pray for the souls of ——." So far back as 1838, however, the ecclesiastical Court had refused authority for the removal of a tombstone inscribed "Pray for the soul of ——"; and in 1894 a compromise had been effected in another case by a refusal to sanction the use of the words "Pray for the soul of ——," but by permission being given for the substitution of the inscription "Requiescat in pace."

Preamble of a Bill in Parliament is that part which contains the recitals showing the necessity for the Bill. It, unlike the marginal notes (q.v.), is part of the statute and may be used in order to ascertain the meaning. Preambles are now the exception rather than the rule. Formerly they were often of great length, and those in early statutes are frequently of historical value. See "S. L. R."

When a private Bill is referred to a select committee, and is opposed on the question of its general expediency, the promoters have to adduce arguments and evidence in support of it; this is called proving the preamble. If it is not proved, the Bill is generally rejected by the House.

Pre-audience. The right of pre-audience in a Court of law is the right which one person has of being heard before another, in business which is not set down to be heard in a particular order—e.g., motions. Thus the Attorney-General has precedence of other counsel in most matters, King's counsel over junior barristers, etc. See POSTMAN; TUBMAN.

Prebend; Prebendary. A prebend is an endowment of land or money held by a cathedral or collegiate church in præbendam, that is to say, for the maintenance of a canon known as a prebendary. The word prebend came to mean also both the prebendary and the annual payment which he received from the endowment; but the word is properly and usually applied to the endowment. There are simple prebendaries, being those who have no cures of souls and no clerical incomes except such as are received by them as prebendaries, and dignitary prebendaries, being those who have cures of souls as well as prebends.

Precariæ. Days in harvest-time on which the tenants of some manors were obliged to work for the lord. Also known as Bind Days.

Precatory. See TRUST.

Precedence, Patent of. Letters patent of precedence are grants whereby the Crown assigns to some person a rank higher than that to which he is otherwise entitled. See KING'S COUNSEL; SERJEANTS-AT-LAW.

Precedence, Scale of. The table showing the order in which various persons take rank at official and social functions. For England it commences, of course, with the Sovereign and ends with "gentlemen." It is to be found, in an abbreviated form, in Whitaker's Almanack, and, in full, in the various "Peerages." See PRIME MINISTER.

There are other scales of precedence for India and the Colonies.

Precedent. A judicial precedent is a judgment or decision of a Court of law cited as an authority for deciding a similar state of facts in the same manner, or on the same principle, or by analogy. The original rules of common law and equity are contained in precedents established by the Courts, that is, they have to be arrived at by ascertaining the principle on which those cases were decided. See LAW; REPORT.

In conveyancing, a precedent is a copy of an instrument, used as a guide in preparing another instrument of a similar description.

As to "conditions precedent" see CONDITION.

Prece partium. (At the request of the parties.) Used in the statute 13 Edw. 1, c. 27.

Precept. A precept is an order or direction given by one official person or body to another, and requiring him to do some act within his province.

Thus rates levied by school boards, sanitary authorities, and the like, are collected by the overseers of the respective parishes in accordance with precepts issued to them, because they, as collectors, of the poor rate, have the materials and machinery available for the collection of other rates. So jurors for the trial of actions in the High Court are summoned by the sheriff under precepts directed to him by the judges.

Précepte d'Assize. This is the title of an ancient collection of records which, as from a date soon after 1205, set out a series of decisions or statements of the Royal Court of Guernsey as to the customary laws of that island. It was popularly supposed that these statements were approved by officials sent to the island in 1340 under a Précepte d'Assize of Edward III. and afterwards by various justices in eyre; but this does not appear to be the case. The Précepte is, however, a valuable record of the customary law of the island from an early date and, together with the Approbation des Loix (q.v.), is one of the sources of the laws of Guernsey. See GRAND COUSTUMIER.

Preces primariæ. In the Holy Roman Empire the emperor had the right—known as preces primariæ—of presentation to the first prebend in every cathedral which fell vacant after his accession. Edward I. is said to have exercised a similar right in England; and this is stated to have been the origin of the Crown's right of Corody (q.v.).

Precognitors. See ASSISE, GRAND.

Pre-contract. A contract preceding another. The term was used in the ecclesiastical law, which made an existing contract of marriage a bar to the marriage of either of the parties to anyone except the other party. See BREACH.

Predecessor. When a person who is a corporation sole, such as a bishop or parson, dies, and the land held by him in his corporate capacity passes to his successor, the person so dying is called the predecessor, just as a natural person from whom land descends to his heir is called the ancestor. See SUCCESSOR.

As to the meaning of "predecessor" in the Succession Duty Act, 1853, see SUCCESSION.

Pre-emption. The right of pre-emption is the right of purchasing property before or in preference to other persons. Thus, under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 128, where a company has, under its compulsory powers, purchased land which is not required for the purposes of its undertaking and is not situate in a town or used for building purposes, the company must first offer it for sale to the person owning the lands from which it was originally severed. This is commonly called the right of pre-emption.

Pre-emption was formerly part of the royal prerogative, and consisted in the right of buying up provisions and other necessaries for the use of the royal household, at an appraised value, in preference to all others, and without the consent of the owner. This right was surrendered by Charles II. at his restoration, and was abolished by the statute 12 Car. 2, c. 24.

In international law, pre-emption is the right of a Government to purchase, for its own use, the property of the subjects of another Power in transitu, instead of allowing it to reach its destination. Formerly the right appears to have been exercised in times of peace on any cargoes which entered the port of the purchasing State, but this practice has long fallen into disuse, and at the present day pre-emption is confined to time of war, and to cases where the goods are of such a description that their transport to the enemy of the pre-empting State would be manifestly to the disadvantage of the latter, while on the other hand the law of contraband does not justify their confiscation. The Manual of Naval Prize Law (1888), Art. 84, says:—"The carriage of goods conditionally contraband, and of such absolutely contraband goods as are in an unmanufactured state and are the produce of the country exporting them, is usually followed only by the pre-emption of such goods by the British Government, which then pays freight to the vessel carrying the goods." This right of pre-emption is to be distinguished from the DROIT D'ANGARIE (q.v.).

Preference; Preferential. See FRAUDULENT PREFERENCE. As to preferential debts, see DEBT.

Prefine. See PRÆFINE.

Pregnancy. See VENTRE INSPICIENDO, DE; JURY.

Prejudice means injury. An offer which is made "without prejudice" for the purpose of settling an existing dispute cannot be construed as an admission of liability, or given in evidence at all, except for a wholly collateral purpose, e.g., to account for delay in asserting or prosecuting a claim. The offer need not be expressly made without prejudice: it will be deemed to have been so made if on its face it was made for the purpose of effecting a settlement. But the existence of a dispute is indispensable: thus a notice to creditors of intention to suspend payment issued "without prejudice" can be used as evidence in bankruptcy and a written promise, made "without prejudice," to pay a debt can be used to prevent the statute running in favour of the debtor.

Prelector. A public reader or lecturer. It was used as a translation of the title Reader (q.v.) in the Inns of Court. At Oxford it was formerly used as interchangeable with professor, except in the case of the Regius Professors. At Cambridge it meant either a college tutor or a lecturer on some subject. In the Cathedral Church of Hereford one of the prebendaries is elected prelector and has to preach on certain days; he vacates his prelectorship on becoming a canon resident.

Preliminary Accounts. Under Ord. 20 of the Consolidated Orders of the Court of Chancery the Court could direct preliminary accounts and enquiries at any time after the appearance of the defendant. The present Rules of Court as to ACCOUNTS AND ENQUIRIES (q.v.) do not specifically refer to preliminary accounts.

Preliminary Act. In actions for damage by collision between vessels, unless the Court otherwise orders, the solicitor for each party, before any pleading is delivered, must file a sealed-up document, called a Preliminary Act, which is not opened until ordered by the Court: it contains a statement as to the names of the vessels and their masters, the time and place of the collision, the state of the wind, weather and tide, the course, speed and lights of each vessel, and other particulars tending to show how the collision happened; and the Court may order the preliminary acts to be opened and the evidence to be taken thereon without any pleadings being delivered (R. S. C. Ord. 19, r. 28). The object of the rule requiring preliminary acts is to obtain a statement of the facts while they are still fresh in the recollection of the witnesses, and to prevent either party varying his version of facts, so as to meet the allegations of his opponent. The Court will never allow a party to contradict his own preliminary act at the hearing.

Premier. A colloquial equivalent for Prime Minister (q.v.). It is an abbreviated form of premier minister, and has been in use for about two hundred years.

Premises. In the primary sense of the word, "premises" signifies that which has been before "premised" or mentioned. Thus, after a recital of various facts in a deed, it frequently proceeds to recite that in consideration of the premises, meaning the facts recited, the parties have agreed to the transaction embodied in the deed. See AGREEMENT.

In a conveyance, when the property to be dealt with has been fully described, it is generally referred to in the subsequent parts of the deed, as "the premises hereinbefore described and intended to be hereby assured," or similar words. From this use of the word, "premises" has gradually acquired the popular sense of land or buildings. Originally, it was only used in this sense by laymen, and it is never so used in well-drawn instruments, but it is frequently found in badly-drawn agreements and in Acts of Parliament.

In its technical sense, the "premises" is that part of a deed which precedes the habendum, and therefore includes—the introduction, and (in indentures) the date—the parties, or (in deed polls) the name of the grantor, etc.—the recitals—the consideration—and the grant, release or other operative part. See the various titles.

Premium. In granting a lease, part of the rent is sometimes capitalised and paid in a lump sum at the time the lease is granted. This is called a premium. A limited owner, such as a tenant for life, could not, before the Settled Land Acts, as a rule take a premium on granting a lease under a power, as the power generally forbids him to do so, but now he can take a fine or premium which, however, is to be treated as capital money (Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 6; Settled Land Act, 1884, s. 4).

As to premiums of insurance, see INSURANCE.

Premunire. See PRÆMUNIRE.

Prender. The power or right of taking a thing without its being offered. It was opposed to "render." Thus heriots were in "prender," it being the right of the lord to take them: rents were in "render," it being the duty of the tenant to pay them. See RENDER.

Prender de baron. Literally, to take a husband. (See BARON ET FEME.) Upon a woman making an appeal of felony (q.v.) against one who had murdered her husband, prender de baron was an exception (or objection) taken on the ground that she had re-married.

Prepensed. Prepensed malice (malitia præcognita) is the same as malice aforethought, that is to say, the malice necessary to constitute the offence of murder. The word is now obsolete.

Prerogativa regis. (Of the King's Prerogative.) An enactment printed under these titles in the Statutes of the Realm (vol. 1, p. 226), s.v. Statutes of Uncertain Date; printed in the Statutes at Large as 17 Edw. 2, st. 1, cc. 4-6, 7-16. Many of the chapters composing it are still unrepealed. Those of practical value are cc. xi., xii., under which the Crown is in effect made trustee of the lands of idiots and lunatics.

Prerogative means those exceptional powers, pre-eminences and privileges which the law gives to the Crown. They are either direct or by way of exception. Those by way of exception are such as exempt the Crown from some general rules binding on the rest of the community, as that lapse of time is no bar to a claim by the Crown, though this rule has been modified by statute. See NULLUM TEMPUS OCCURRIT REGI; REGALIA.

The direct prerogatives may be divided into three kinds: as they regard the royal character, the royal authority and the royal income. To the first class is generally referred the rule that the king can do no wrong: in other words, that he is not liable to be sued or punished for any act or default. (See PETITION OF RIGHT.) The second class includes the right of sending and receiving ambassadors, making treaties, declaring war and peace, assembling, proroguing and dissolving Parliament, raising and regulating fleets and armies (see MUTINY ACT), appointing ports and harbours (q.v.), appointing judges and magistrates, creating titles and offices, pardoning convicted criminals (see PARDON), and coining money. The third class, or fiscal prerogatives, are the sources of the royal revenue: these, however, though nominally belonging to the Crown, have for long past been surrendered to the public use, and now form part of the public income known as the Consolidated Fund (q.v.), out of which the Crown receives an annual sum, called the Civil List (q.v.), for the expenses of the royal household and establishment. The ancient fiscal prerogatives included the profits of the demesne lands of the Crown, the right to royal fish, wrecks, treasure-trove, waifs and estrays, escheats, etc. The rest of the public income consists chiefly of taxes, duties and other imposts voted by Parliament.

The Crown also has certain protective prerogatives, such as its prerogatives in connection with charities, idiots and lunatics, and the foreshore of lands adjoining the sea.

Prerogative Courts. Before the Probate Court (q.v.) was established there was an ecclesiastical Court held in each province, before a judge appointed by the archbishop, for granting probates and administrations in cases where the deceased left bona notabilia (q.v.) in different dioceses. It was called a Prerogative Court because the archbishop claimed the jurisdiction by way of special prerogative.

Prerogative Writs. See WRIT.

Prescribe. To prescribe is to claim a right by prescription. As to the meaning of the expression "to prescribe in a que estate," see PRESCRIPTION.

In modern Acts of Parliament relating to matters of an administrative nature, such as procedure, registration, etc., it is usual to indicate in general terms the nature of the proceedings to be adopted, and to leave the details to be "prescribed" or regulated by rules or orders to be made for that purpose in pursuance of an authority contained in the Act. See ORDER; RULE.

Prescription is where a right, immunity or obligation exists by reason of lapse of time (infra). Thus, where a number of persons in succession have acted and been treated as a corporation from time immemorial without being able to show any express creation, they constitute a corporation by prescription. More commonly, however, prescription is applied to incorporeal hereditaments and rights or obligations connected with the user of land, to signify that they have been enjoyed as of right, and without interruption for a certain period. Thus, prescription is one of the principal modes by which easements, profits à prendre, franchises and other incorporeal hereditaments are created or evidenced. So, also, a privilege or exemption may be prescriptive, e.g., a modus decimandi, a de non decimando, and an exemption from toll or stallage (q.v.). Prescription differs from custom in being personal: that is, when a person claims a right by prescription, he must allege that it has been enjoyed by him and his ancestors or predecessors in title. (See CUSTOM.) Prescription differs from limitation in being applicable only to incorporeal hereditaments and similar rights, and not to land or other corporeal hereditaments. Villenage was capable of existing by prescription; and it would appear (see Co. Litt. 195B) that two persons may be tenants in common of lands by title of prescription.

I. With reference to the length of time required, prescription is either at common law or by statute. At the common law, a title by prescription is where a right has been enjoyed from time immemorial, or time out of mind. By analogy to the old Statutes of Limitation, "time out of mind" was held to mean the first year of Richard I.'s reign; but when this period became inconveniently long, it was held to be sufficient if evidence of the enjoyment of the right was carried back as far as living memory would go. And when the Limitation Act, 1623, limited the time for bringing a possessory action to twenty years, the Courts held by analogy that if a right had been enjoyed for twenty years, it should be presumed to have been enjoyed from time immemorial: the presumption being based, according to some, on the fiction of a lost grant (see LOST GRANT), and, according to others, on the analogy between prescription and limitation. According to some of the older writers, however, the real common law prescription was when a right had been enjoyed "from," (see Co. Litt. 114A), "time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, that is as much as to say, when such a matter is pleaded, that no man then alive hath heard any proofe of the contrary, nor hath no knowledge to the contrary"; but subsequently the two expressions "time out of mind," and "time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary," became synonymous. See MEMORY.

As to the statutory periods of prescription, see PRESCRIPTION ACT, 1832.

II. With reference to the manner in which a prescriptive right is claimed, prescription is of three kinds, namely:—(1) where the person claiming the right proves that it has been enjoyed by him and his ancestors during the time required by law; as in the case of an advowson or common in gross; (2) where the members of a corporation and their predecessors have enjoyed the right for the period required by law; and (3) where the person claiming the right proves that it has been enjoyed by him and his predecessors in title; or, as the old writers say, he must claim that the right is en luy et en ceux que estate il ad, that is, "in him and in those whose estate he hath": hence this is called prescribing in a que estate. A prescription in a que estate is simply a right annexed to and going along with certain lands, as where a man claims a right of advowson as appendant to a manor belonging to him. The rule of common law pleading used to be that a prescription in a que estate could only be claimed by a tenant in fee, and that if a tenant for a less estate wished to claim such a right, he was obliged to allege it as belonging to the tenant in fee. The most important practical result of this rule was that copyholders, being in theory mere tenants at will, were obliged to prescribe in the name of the lord of the manor, in whom the fee is vested; hence they were allowed to claim rights of common against the lord by custom instead of prescription. (See CUSTOM.) This rule was abolished by s. 5 of the Prescription Act, 1832: and now a tenant for any estate may prescribe in his own name.

In Roman law the præscriptio was a clause placed at the head of the pleadings (præ, before, and scribere, to write), in order to raise a kind of preliminary objection or reservation. One of the cases in which a defendant could make use of a præscriptio was where he wanted to raise the defence that the plaintiff's claim was barred by what corresponded to a Statute of Limitations: hence the modern sense of the word.

See POSSESSION; INTERRUPTION; ENJOYMENT.

Prescription Act, 1832. This is the statute 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71, passed to limit the period of prescription in certain cases. In the case of rights of common and other profits à prendre, the period of enjoyment as of right required to establish the claim is thirty years, subject to an extension in case the person against whom it is claimed was under disability during part of that period; but in any case enjoyment for sixty years establishes an absolute and indefeasible right (s. 1). In the case of rights of way, watercourses and other affirmative easements, the terms are respectively twenty and forty years (s. 2); in the case of lights, enjoyment for twenty years gives an absolute and indefeasible right (s. 3). As to what is "enjoyment as of right," see ENJOYMENT; and as to the effect of interruption, see that title. The Act does not apply to any negative easements except that of lights.

Present; Presentation. Primarily, to present is to tender or offer. Thus, to present a bill of exchange for acceptance or payment is to exhibit it to the drawee or acceptor (or his authorised agent), with an express or implied demand for acceptance or payment. See BILL OF EXCHANGE; HONOUR.

In ecclesiastical law, presentation is where the patron or owner of an advowson offers a clerk in Holy orders to the bishop of the diocese to be instituted as parson or vicar of the living.

See ADVOWSON; INSTITUTION; NEXT PRESENTATION; SIMONY.

Present; Presentment. A presentment is a kind of report by a jury or other body of men. Thus, formerly, at every Customary Court of a manor, all events relating to the alienation of the copyhold lands of the manor were presented by the homage for the information of the lord. But by the Copyhold Act, 1841, s. 89, a presentment was made unnecessary for the alienation of copyholds.

Most commonly, however, presentment signifies one made by a jury acting in a judicial capacity; and, in its general sense, it includes inquisitions of office (q.v.), and indictments by a grand jury. But in the narrower sense of the word a presentment is the notice taken by a grand jury of any matter or offence from their own knowledge or observation, without any bill of indictment laid before them at the suit of the Crown; such as the presentment by them of a nuisance, a libel, or the like, upon which the officer of the Court must afterwards frame an indictment. This procedure is practically obsolete.

Presentation Office was the office of the Lord Chancellor's official, the Secretary of Presentations, who conducted all correspondence having reference to the twelve canonries and 650 livings in the gift of the Lord Chancellor, and drew and issued the fiats of appointment. The office was abolished by the Lord Chancellor's Pension Act, 1832, and the duties are now performed by the official in the Lord Chancellor's office who is known as the Secretary for Ecclesiastical Patronage and Secretary of the Permanent Secretary.

Presentee. The clerk presented to a benefice.

"Presents." The words "these presents," as used in a deed, mean "this deed." In an indenture the synonymous words, "this indenture," are more usual, but in a deed-poll (which cannot be described as "this indenture"), "these presents" is the only form permissible.

President of the Council. See LORD PRESIDENT.

Press, The. Upon the art of printing becoming general, the Press was subjected to a rigorous censorship, first on the part of the Church, and latterly on the part of the State. Thus, in the reign of Elizabeth, printing was interdicted, save in London, Oxford, and Cambridge. In the reign of James I. the first newspapers were printed, but that king and his successor endeavoured to silence them by means of the Star Chamber jurisdiction. In 1641, when the Star Chamber was abolished, newspapers promised to become more abundant, especially as the mind of the nation was at that time in a very active and even excited state; but the Long Parliament by various ordinances endeavoured to restrain printing, at least on the part of the Royalist and Prelatical party. This conduct on the part of the Long Parliament was the occasion of Milton's treatise, entitled "Areopagitica, A Speech for Liberty of Unlicensed Printing." Upon the Restoration, in 1660, the statute 13 & 14 Car. 2, c. 33, was passed, which placed printing under the control of the Government, and in particular confined the trade to London, York, Oxford, and Cambridge, limiting also the number of master printers to twenty; moreover, it imposed the severe punishments on offenders against the Act. This Act expired in 1695, after various periods of renewal, and was not again re-enacted, it having been the opinion of Scroggs, C.J., and of the twelve other common law judges, that the common law was sufficient of itself, and without any statute, to repress the publication of any matter without the king's licence, and the liberal opinions which sprung up after the Revolution of 1688, preferring to entrust the control of the Press to the ordinary jurisdictions at common law.

From this date newspapers rapidly increased, and in the reign of Anne began to be published regularly, and some even daily; and in that reign they began for the first time to combine political discussion with matters of intelligence, and were subject only to the two following restraints:—

(1) The stamp duty on newspapers, which was imposed for the first time in 1712; and

(2) The law of libel.

These two restraints have been since gradually removed or relaxed: thus,—

(2) The law of libel was at first extremely severe, any reflection upon the Government, or upon ministers, being construed into a reflection upon the king himself, and therefore as a seditious libel. This state of the law of libel was rendered all the worse by reason of the then doctrine of the common law, that the jury could only find the particular fact of publication, and not a general verdict of libel or no libel, that matter being left to the judges, who (as being the servants of the Crown) were naturally suspected of being disposed towards the Crown. And although in the Case of the Seven Bishops (1687), the jury brought in a general verdict of no libel, yet that precedent was insufficient of itself to change the law, more especially as it was given in bad times. It was left to Mr. Erskine, in the Case of the Dean of St. Asaph (1778), to advocate the right of the jury in actions of libel to find a general verdict, and to Mr. Fox, in his Libel Act, 1792, to confer that right upon the jury. By the Libel Act, 1843, s. 6, a defendant, in a criminal information, was for the first time enabled to plead in defence or justification the truth of the matters published, and that the same were so published for the public good.

See APOLOGY; FOX'S LIBEL ACT; JUSTIFICATION; LIBERTY OF THE PRESS; NEWSPAPER; PRINTERS.

Pressing to Death. See PEINE FORTE ET DURE.

Prest. This was anciently used as meaning (1) a forced loan levied by the king; (2) an impost, and more especially a deduction from any payment; (3) the money paid to a soldier on enlistment. Absconding after receiving prest-money, in its last-mentioned sense, was felony without benefit of clergy under the statute 7 Hen. 7, c. 1.

Prestation Money. Money payable by an archdeacon to his bishop for being allowed to exercise a jurisdiction which originally appertained to the bishop.

Prestimony. A fund for the maintenance of a priest, which did not constitute a benefice. No such thing would appear to be known to the present ecclesiastical law.

Presumption. In the law of evidence, a presumption is a conclusion or inference as to the truth of some fact in question, drawn from some other fact judicially noticed, or proved or admitted to be true.

Presumptions are of three kinds. Irrebuttable or conclusive presumptions (præsumptiones juris et de jure) are absolute inferences established by law: they are called irrebuttable because evidence is not admissible to contradict them. Thus an infant under the age of seven years is presumed to be incapable of committing a felony, and the presumption cannot be rebutted by the clearest evidence of a felonious intention. Irrebuttable presumptions are more properly called rules of law or fictions of law, according as the fact presumed is probably true, or is known to be false. See AGE; FICTION.

Inconclusive or rebuttable presumptions of law (præsumptiones juris tantum) are inferences which the law requires to be drawn from given facts, and which are conclusive until disproved by evidence to the contrary; thus an infant between seven and fourteen is presumed to be incapable of committing a felony, but evidence may be given to prove a felonious intention.

Presumptions of fact (præsumptiones hominis vel facti) are inferences which the tribunal (e.g., a jury) is at liberty, but not compelled, to draw from the facts before it: if the tribunal thinks that the facts do not support the inference suggested, the presumption fails from its own weakness. This class is divisible into strong presumptions, or those which shift the burden of proof, and slight presumptions, which do not. Thus, possession is a strong presumption or primâ facie evidence of property (see POSSESSION), while the presumption of guilt arising from the fact of a person having a pecuniary interest in the death of a murdered person is too slight to put him on his defence. Mixed presumptions, or presumptions of facts recognised by law, or presumptions of mixed law and fact, are certain presumptive inferences, which from their strength, importance, or frequent occurrence, attract as it were the observation of the law. The presumption of a "lost grant" (q.v.) falls within this class.

As to presumptive evidence, see EVIDENCE.

Presumption of Life or Death. See ABSENCE FOR SEVEN YEARS; COMMORIENTES; LIFE.

Presumptive Title. See POSSESSION.

Pretenced Right or Title. Where one is in possession of land and another claims and sues for it, there is said to be a "pretenced title" in the latter person. The sale of any "pretenced title" was void at common law and was expressly prohibited by s. 2 of the statute 32 Hen. 8, c. 9, commonly known as the Bill of Bracery and Buying of Titles. The Real Property Act, 1845, s. 6, makes a "pretenced title" transferable by deed; but the Act of 1845 did not repeal the enactment of Henry VIII., which, however, was eventually expressly repealed by s. 11 of the Land Transfer Act, 1897.

Preventive Detention. See HABITUAL CRIMINAL.

Preventive Service. See COASTGUARD.

Previous Conviction. Under the Criminal Law Act, 1827, s. 11, the Larceny Act, 1916, s. 37, persons convicted of certain offences, after a previous conviction for certain other offences, are liable to severer sentences than they would otherwise be: and under many other statutes an increased penalty may be inflicted for an offence other than the first. Where a person is convicted of felony or of certain misdemeanours, and a previous conviction for a like offence is proved against him, he may in addition to the ordinary punishment for the offence, be subjected to police supervision (q.v.) under the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871.

The general rule is that previous convictions may not be proved against a prisoner unless evidence of his good character is given (Previous Conviction Act, 1836); but where the prisoner is charged with receiving or possessing stolen goods, then evidence may be given of his conviction within the preceding five years of any offence involving fraud or dishonesty (Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, s. 19).

A prisoner giving evidence on his own behalf may not be questioned as to whether he has committed or been convicted of any offence other than that charged unless evidence of a previous conviction is admissible to show whether he is or is not guilty of the offence charged, or unless in the course of the case he has sought to prove his own good character or the bad character of the prosecutor or the prosecutor's witnesses, or unless he has given evidence against anyone charged with the same offence (Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, s. 1.(f)).

Pricking for Sheriffs. When the yearly list of persons nominated for the office of sheriff in each county or county of a city is submitted to the King in Council, he takes a silver bodkin, and, to ensure impartiality, lets the point of it fall upon one of the three names nominated for each county, etc.; and the person upon whose name it chances to fall is sheriff for the ensuing year. This is called pricking for sheriffs. In practice, persons whose names are pricked have been decided on beforehand, and there is really no element of chance in the matter.

Pricking does not apply to Cornwall (the sheriff of which is appointed by the Prince of Wales, as Duke of Cornwall), or to Lancashire (the sheriff of which is appointed by the King as Duke of Lancaster).

Pride; Pride-gavel. The pride was the lamprey: and pride-gavel was a rent paid until recently by the tenants of the Manor of Rodeley, in Gloucestershire, for the privilege of fishing for lampreys in the Severn.

Priest. One in priest's orders of the Church of England or of the Roman Catholic Church, or, it would seem, of the Greek Church. In the Church of England deacon's orders are a necessary preliminary to priest's orders. No one can be admitted to the latter, in the absence of a faculty, unless he be twenty-four years of age (Clergy Ordination Act, 1804). No one, other than a priest—every bishop is of necessity a priest—can consecrate the Holy Communion or pronounce the Absolution.

See DEACON; HOLY ORDERS.

Primæ Impressionis. (Of first impression.) See FIRST IMPRESSION.

Primage. This is a small payment (also known as hat-money) made by the owner or consignee of goods to the master of the vessel in which they are shipped for his care and trouble, and varies in amount according to the particular trade in which the ship is engaged. The payment of this sum is generally stipulated for in the bill of lading (q.v.). See AVERAGE.

Primary. See CONVEYANCE; EVIDENCE.

Primate is an archbishop. The Archbishop of Canterbury is styled Primate of all England: the Archbishop of York is Primate of England simply. Primacy is the office or authority of a primate.

Prime Election. First choice.

Prime Minister. In point of law, as distinguished from constitutional law, there is no such office as that of Prime Minister. He is simply the particular member of one House of Parliament or the other to whom the Sovereign deputes the function of selecting other members of those Houses as the persons to form the Cabinet. The Prime Minister, as such, receives no salary, but he holds one or other of the great political offices—usually the office of First Lord of the Treasury, to which a salary of £5,000 a year is attached. Although the Prime Minister, as such, has no legal status (except under the Chequers Estate Act, 1917), he is the head of the Government for the time being. Other members of the Cabinet hold office only at his pleasure: he remains the predominant member of the Cabinet so long as he commands a majority in the House of Commons, and he, for that reason, is always the leader of the political party which, for the time being, is the strongest.

By Royal Warrant, 2nd December, 1905, the Prime Minister takes precedence next after the Archbishop of Canterbury (who ranks next after the Princes of the Blood Royal), the Lord Chancellor and the Archbishop of York.

In the Chequers Estate Act, 1917, the Prime Minister is referred to (Sch. (VI)) eo nomine: but this is a statutory recognition merely of the fact that a particular person bears a particular label for the time being.

Primer. First—now used only in the archaic compound expressions given below.

Primer Fine. See PRÆFINE.

Primer seisin was a payment due by a tenant of land held of the Crown in capite ut de coronâ if he succeeded to it by descent when of full age. The payment consisted of one year's profits of the land if it was in possession, and half a year's profits if it was in reversion. Primer seisin was abolished by the statute 12 Car. 2, c. 24. See IN CAPITE; LIVERY; OUSTERLEMAIN.

Primitiæ. See ANNATES.

Primo beneficio. A writ which, upon occasions, was formerly addressed to the Chancellor or the Keeper directing him to bestow upon such and such a clerk the first benefice in the royal gift, and over a certain value, which became vacant. See BENEFICIO, ETC.

Primo excutienda est verbi vis, ne sermonis vitio obstruetur oratio, sive lex sine argumentis (Co. Litt. 68). (The meaning of the word must be first examined in order that the meaning of the sentence may not be obscured by a verbal error, and that the law may not be left obscure for want of its being argued.) "The golden rule of construction is that words are to be construed according to their natural meaning, unless such a construction would either render them senseless or would be opposed to the general scope and intent of the instrument, or unless there be some very cogent reason of convenience in favour of a different interpretation"—per Bramwell, B, (3 H. & C. 461).

Primogeniture. This (from primo-genitus, first-born) is the rule of inheritance according to which the eldest of two or more males in the same degree succeeds to the ancestor's land to the exclusion of the others. It was a matter of far greater consequence in ancient times, before alienation by will was permitted, than it is at present, and from it arose the English custom of settling the family estates on the eldest son. See DESCENT; ESTATE TAIL; SETTLEMENT.

Prince Consort. This title was bestowed by patent in 1857 upon Prince Albert of Saxe-Coburg, the husband of Queen Victoria. Until then he had been merely "Prince Albert" with, however, a patent of precedence next after the Queen. The title of Prince Consort was merely honorific, and made no substantial difference in the position of the Prince.

Prince of Wales. The eldest son of the reigning Sovereign is always created Prince of Wales and Earl of Chester by patent. George III., when he became heir apparent to George II. upon the death of Frederic, Prince of Wales, was also created Prince of Wales and Earl of Chester; but (see CORNWALL) he was never Duke of Cornwall. Since the accession of James I., the heir apparent has been by inheritance Duke of Rothesay, Earl of Carrick, and Baron of Renfrew in the peerage of Scotland, and Lord of the Isles and Great Steward of Scotland, these titles being inherited under an Act of the Scottish Parliament, passed 27th November, 1469. See CIVIL LIST; CORNWALL; HEIR APPARENT.

"Princes, Rulers and Peoples." "Arrests, restraints, and detainments of princes, rulers, and peoples," are almost always provided against in contracts of affreightment and policies of marine insurance. The expression virtually means "interference of a lawful authority."

Princess Royal. The title borne by the eldest daughter of the Sovereign, if and when it is conferred on her by the Sovereign. Thus the London Gazette of 9th November, 1905, announced that Edward VII. had "been pleased to declare" that his eldest daughter should bear "the style and title of Princess Royal." No grant by letters patent is necessary. The question as to what happens when the title is borne by the eldest daughter of a deceased Sovereign and there is an eldest daughter of a subsequent Sovereign has never arisen until now. The title had not up to the end of 1921 been conferred on the eldest daughter of his present Majesty. It would seem that the title cannot well be held simultaneously by two ladies.

Principal. A person who authorises another to act on his behalf is called the principal, and the person so authorised is called the agent. The law of principal and agent deals both with the rights and duties of the principal and agent inter se, and with those of each of them toward third persons. See AGENT; AUTHORITY; POWER OF ATTORNEY.

When an authorised agent does an act in his own name and professedly on his own behalf, though really on behalf of his principal, the latter is said to be undisclosed: the general rule is that an agent contracting for an undisclosed principal is himself liable to the person contracting with him, and that the latter also has the option of suing the principal as soon as he discovers his existence, unless in the meantime the principal has bonâ fide paid the agent, in which case the principal is discharged from liability.

A person who owes a debt for which another person is liable in case of his default in paying it, is called the principal or principal debtor, the other being his surety (q.v.) See GUARANTIE; INDEMNITY.

As regards "principals" in the criminal law see DEGREE.

Principal Mansion-house. The Settled Land Act, 1890, s. 10 (2), enacts that the principal mansion-house, and the pleasure grounds and parks usually occupied therewith, cannot be sold, exchanged, or leased without the consent of the trustees of the settlement or an order of the Court; but s. 10 (3) declares that no house usually occupied as a farmhouse, or occupying with its park and grounds less than twenty-five acres, is within the section.

Where there are more mansion-houses than one upon the same estate the question as to which is the principal mansion-house depends upon the facts. Where there is only one mansion-house on settled land it is a "principal mansion-house" unless it be such house as is specified in s. 10 (3) of the Act of 1890.

Principiorum non est ratio (2 Buls. 239). (First principles do not require proof.) Compare NON OMNIUM, ETC.

Printers. The Newspapers, Printers, and Reading Rooms Repeal Act, 1869, repeals a number of earlier Acts dealing with the subjects indicated by the title of the Act of 1869, except as regards certain parts (set out in extenso in the Second Schedule to the Act of 1869) of those earlier Acts. These unrepealed parts of the earlier Acts provide (1) that a printer shall incur a penalty of £20, recoverable summarily, in respect of anything (other than parliamentary papers, bank notes, bills of exchange and various documents used in the course of law or business, or papers for public departments) which he prints for hire, unless he keeps a copy bearing the name and address of his employer; (2) that he shall incur a penalty of not more than £5, recoverable summarily, for every copy of anything intended for publication which does not bear his name and address, unless it be, and is declared to be, printed at the University Press, Oxford, or the Pitt Press, Cambridge; and (3) that no such penalty can be sued for except in the name of a law officer (q.v.).

Priores leges ad posteriores trahantur (D 1, 3, 26). This literally is: "Earlier laws are drawn to those of later date." It practically means the same as Lex posterior (q.v.).

Priority. When two persons have similar rights in respect of the same subject-matter, but one is entitled to exercise his right to the exclusion of the other, he is said to have priority. The question is chiefly of importance with reference to securities on property; thus, if A mortgages his land first to B by a deposit of title-deeds, then to C by a formal deed of mortgage, and then to D by an agreement of charge, the question arises who is entitled to realise his security in priority to the others. The general rule is that he who has the first mortgage and has the legal estate has priority over all other incumbrancers, and that where there is a prior equitable mortgage, a subsequent incumbrancer who obtains the legal estate without notice of the equitable mortgage, is entitled to priority over it. In the case supposed, therefore, C would have priority over B unless he had notice of B's charge, or was guilty of gross negligence, e.g., in omitting to inquire as to the deeds.

Priority is of various kinds according as it arises by the doctrines of tacking (q.v.), of consolidation (q.v.), or of salvage (q.v.),—by simple priority in point of time or date,—or by a statutory provision (statutory priority), as under the various registration Acts, which usually make instruments take effect in the order of date in which they are registered. Important questions as to priority also arise in administering estates and assets, where the contending claims of creditors, legatees, etc., have to be considered. See ASSETS; LEGACY.

In the old law of tenure, priority was antiquity of tenure in comparison with another tenure less ancient. See POSTERIORITY.

Prior petens ("the person first applying"). In probate practice, where there are several persons equally entitled to a grant of administration (e.g., next-of-kin of the same degree), the Court sometimes makes the grant priori petenti, to the first applicant (or prior petens); but there is no fixed rule to that effect.

Prior tempore potior jure. See QUI PRIOR, ETC.

Prisage was an ancient hereditary revenue of the Crown, consisting in the right to take a certain quantity from cargoes of wine imported into England. In Edward I.'s reign it was converted into a pecuniary duty called butlerage. All prisage and butlerage on wines were abolished as regards England, except the Duchy of Lancaster, by the statute 49 Geo. 3, c. 98, ss. 35, 36, and, as regards the Duchy, by the statute 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 84, s. 40. The present duties on wines are regulated by the Customs Acts. (See CIVIL LIST; CONSOLIDATED FUND; CUSTOMS.)

Prisage is also stated in Cowell (1607), and in all subsequent law dictionaries, to have been the share of the King or the Lord High Admiral in ships lawfully taken in prize: but this seems to be entirely without foundation.

Priso. Used by Roger de Hovenden in the twelfth century as meaning a prisoner taken in war.

Prisonam frangentibus, Statutum de. This is the statute 23 Edw. 1. It is taken as the foundation of the doctrine that prison-breach was felony in the case of one confined on a charge of felony, and misdemeanour in the case of one confined on a charge of any lesser offence.

Prison-breach, or prison-breaking, is where a person, being lawfully detained on a charge of or under sentence for an offence, breaks out of the place where he is detained, that is, escapes with force. The degree of the offence and its punishment varies at common law with that of the offence for which he was detained.

See ESCAPE.

Prisons are places in which persons are kept either for safe custody until they have been tried for an offence of which they stand charged, or for punishment after being tried and convicted. The general administration of prisons is vested in the Home Secretary, assisted by prison commissioners appointed by the Crown, and each prison is further under the more immediate jurisdiction of a visiting committee of the justices of the peace or magistrates in the district. (See IMPRISONMENT; HABEAS CORPUS; PENAL SERVITUDE).

Private. See ACT OF PARLIAMENT; BILL; CHAPEL; LAW.

Privateers were ships commissioned by letters of marque (q.v.) to exercise general reprisals (see REPRISALS). Privateering, properly so called, was abolished as between European nations by the Declaration of Paris in 1856. But very much the same thing still exists. During the Franco-Prussian War the Prussian Government incorporated all its merchant ships into its navy, and used them for ordinary naval operations: during the Russo-Japanese War the Russian Government used armed merchantment as cruisers; and we did the same during the Great War. There is, however, a clear distinction between the new quasi-privateer and the old privateer. In the old privateering, the privateer was for all purposes a private ship except that her master had letters of marque (q.v.): now when a private ship is used for warlike purposes she is under naval discipline, and is precisely the same as a regular warship, except that she was not originally built as one.

Privation. An obsolete abbreviated form of DEPRIVATION (q.v.).

Privatis pactionibus non dubium est non-lædi jus cæterorum (D. 2, 15, 3). (It is clear that the rights of others are not prejudiced by private agreements.)

Compare DEBITORUM, ETC.; PACTA PRIVATA, ETC.

Privatorum conventio juri publico non derogat (9 Rep. 141). (An agreement between private persons does not derogate from the public right.) Compare PACTA PRIVATA, ETC.

Privatum commodum publico cedit (Jenk. Cent. 223). (Private good yields to public good.) Compare SALUS POPULI, ETC.

Privatum incommodum publico bono pen-satur (Jenk. Cent. 85). (Private loss is compensated by public good.)

Privement ensient. Used in the old law-French as meaning pregnant but not yet quick with child.

Privilege. A privilege is an exceptional or extraordinary right, immunity or exemption. It may exist in respect of a person, or in respect of a thing.

I. With reference to the persons who enjoy them, personal privileges are of various kinds: the principal are those belonging to the Royal Family, the Houses of Parliament, peers, ambassadors, barristers, solicitors and clergymen. With reference to the nature of the right or exemption, the principal privileges are —the freedom from arrest enjoyed by ambassadors (q.v.) and peers; the exemption from serving on juries enjoyed by peers, members of Parliament, ministers, barristers, solicitors, medical practitioners, etc.; the privileges exempting solicitors and barristers from giving discovery or evidence of matters communicated to them by their clients in professional confidence, etc. (see CONFIDENTIAL COMMUNICATIONS). With reference to their duration, privileges are either permanent or temporary: thus, a member of Parliament is privileged from arrest on civil process during the sitting of the House, and for forty days before and after a prorogation: a barrister has a similar privilege while he is on circuit, and a peer always possesses a similar privilege.

A statement is said to be privileged when it is made in such circumstances that it does not render the person making it liable to proceedings for slander or libel, although it would have that effect in the absence of those circumstances. The principal instances of privileged statements are those made between a solicitor or counsel and the client; by a witness in the course of his examination, or a counsel in his speech; those made where it is the duty of the person making it to do so, e.g., where a master is giving the character of a servant, or where the matter is of public interest; this last is sometimes called privilege by reason of the occasion: thus, statements made in the course of legal proceedings and parliamentary debates are privileged, as are also fair reports or comments on such proceedings, and fair criticisms on literary publications and works of art. The privilege is said to be absolute where the intention of the speaker or writer is immaterial (as in the case of judges, members of Parliament, etc.), or qualified, when it does not excuse malice in fact, as in the case of statements made by persons in the discharge of some public or private duty, or in the conduct of his own affairs. See MALICE.

II. Privileges in respect of things. Some chattels are privileged from distress (q.v.), and some from being taken in execution (q.v., and see GOODS). A document is privileged from production when its production cannot be compelled under the ordinary order for production in an action (see PRODUCTION): the principal instances of privileged documents are documents of title and confidential communications (q.v.).

As regards the former Court of Common Pleas, privilege meant the right of all belonging to that Court, whether attorneys or their clerks, to sue or be sued only therein. See CLERK OF THE PLEAS.

Privileged Copyholds. Customary freeholds (q.v.).

Privileged Debts. The same as preferential debts. See DEBT.

Privileged Places. These were places—all in or near the City of London—in which a pretended right of sanctuary (q.v.) existed. They were Whitefriars, the Savoy, Salisbury Court, Ram Alley, Mitre Court, Fuller's Rents, Mintage Close, the Minories, the Mint, and Clink or Deadman's Place. This pretended right was taken away by the statute 8 & 9 Will. 3, c. 26, which provided for the execution of process within these places and for the punishment of anyone resisting. A subsequent statute dealt further with the Mint (q.v.).

Privileges, Committee of. This is a standing committee of the whole House of Lords, which is presided over by the Chairman of Committees and is reappointed at the beginning of each session. It is concerned with the privileges of peers generally, and more especially with claims to peerages. The first mention of such a committee is in 1620. The Court of Chivalry (q.v.) had adjudicated on such matters down to 1521, when (see Earl Marshal) it become doubtful whether the Court could be properly constituted: and for the next hundred years claims went sometimes before Commissioners appointed by the Crown, sometimes to the judges and sometimes to the House of Lords, which thereupon became in fact, if not in name, the modern committee of privileges in each particular case.

Privilegium clericale. Benefit of clergy (q.v.).

Privilegium non valet contra rempublicam (Bac. Max. 5). (A privilege avails not against the State.) For this reason the husband's coercion does not excuse the wife if she join him in committing treason. Compare NECESSITAS INDUCIT, ETC.

Privity; Privy.—I. Originally "privy" signified a friend or acquaintance, as opposed to a stranger; and hence privity means knowledge: thus, the rule is that "when any deed is altered in a point material by the plaintiff himself, or by any stranger without the privity of the obligee . . . the deed thereby becomes void." (11 Rep. 27.) See ALTERATION.

II. In its secondary sense, privity denotes a peculiar relation in which a person stands, either to a transaction or to some other person. The persons standing in such a relation are called privies. Thus, in the law of fines, the heirs and successors of the parties to a fine were said to be privies to it, and were bound by it as if they had been parties, as opposed to strangers, that is, persons who were neither parties nor privies. (See FINE.) The principal kinds of privity of practical interest are as follows:—

Privity of contract is the relation which exists between the immediate parties to a contract, as where A agrees with B to pay him £100. Privity of contract is necessary to enable one person to sue another on a contract. Thus, if A agrees with B that he will pay C £100, C, for want of privity between them, cannot bring an action against A on the contract.

Privity of estate is that which exists between lessor and lessee, tenant for life and remainderman or reversioner, etc., and their respective assignees, and between joint-tenants and coparceners. Privity of estate is required for a release by enlargement. Thus, if A grants land to B for life, and B grants a lease to C, and then A executes a release to C, this is void as a release, because there is no privity between A and C. But the assignee of a lease liable to the rent and covenants contained in it, although there is no privity of contract between him and the lessor.

Privity of blood exists between an heir and his ancestor (privity in blood inheritable), and between coparceners. This privity was formerly of importance in the law of descent cast (q.v.).

Privity in representation exists between a testator and his executors; and privity in succession exists between a predecessor and a successor, in the case of a corporation sole. Either kind is also called privity in right.

Privity in tenure is that which exists between a lord and a tenant who holds of him by a service. See TENURE.

In the old books, privity of person is said to exist (i) between trustee and cestui que trust; (ii) between husband and wife; (iii) between coparceners.

Privity of possession exists between joint-tenants, tenants in common and coparceners. The last, therefore, have a three-fold privity, and the first a two-fold privity (supra).

Privity in deed is a privity created by the act or consent of the party, as opposed to privity in law, which is one created by the law.

Privy Council is, in theory, the principal council of the Crown, and consists of such persons as are nominated by the Crown to the office. Nominally the Council is supposed to advise the Crown on affairs of State, but practically that duty is fulfilled by a select body called the Cabinet, who are members of either House of Parliament and hold the principal offices of State. The only members of the Privy Council (other than the Cabinet) who perform active duties are those constituting the Judicial Committee (q.v.). The Board of Trade (q.v.) is composed of Privy Councillors: but it never meets. In the case of a large number of Privy Councillors the office is, therefore, purely nominal: it confers the title of "Right Honourable." In 1916 it was decided that a person born abroad of alien parents, but who is subsequently naturalized, is capable of being a Privy Councillor: see [1916] 2 K. B. 858, C. A.

See FORMA JURAMENTI; LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL.

Privy Purse. The only part of the Civil List (q.v.) which the Sovereign can spend as he pleases.

Privy Seal. This was a seal—intermediate between the Signet (q.v.) and the Great Seal—employed by the Crown, chiefly as an authority to the Lord Chancellor to affix the Great Seal to certain documents, e.g., letters patent. The Privy Seal was affixed either to the bill or draft of the letters patent (see BILL), or to a warrant which set them forth and directed the Lord Chancellor to have them passed under the Great Seal (q.v.). It was abolished in 1884. See CLERKS OF THE PRIVY SEAL; LORD PRIVY SEAL.

Privy Signet. See SIGNET; SEAL.

Prize Bounty. Under the Naval Prize Act, 1864, s. 42, the King may by Order in Council grant prize bounty for distribution amongst the officers and men of His Majesty's ships which are present at the capture or destruction of any armed enemy ship, such bounty to be at the rate of £5 for each of the crew of such enemy ship. At the Battle of Jutland on June 1st, 1916, eleven German ships with crews numbering in the aggregate 4,537, were destroyed: and it was held (see [1920] P. 408) that the sum of £22,685 was divisible amongst the 151 vessels which formed the British Fleet.

Prize bounty is a purely naval award and is, therefore, not payable in respect of any capture or destruction effectuated otherwise than by the naval forces of the Crown and by them alone.

Prize Fight. If two men fight with ungloved fists until one of them can fight no more, each of them is certainly guilty of assault: so also, it would seem, are those promoting or assisting at the fight; and they all are guilty of unlawful assembly. The same is the case if gloves are worn but the contest is decided not upon the skill of the competitors but by one or the other being rendered incapable of fighting any longer.

Prize Money. The same as Prize Bounty (q.v.).

Prize; Prize Courts. "Prize" is property captured from an enemy at sea. (See CAPTURE.) Prize Courts are Courts specially constituted for the purpose of deciding questions of maritime capture in time of war according to international law. In this country, the jurisdiction in such questions formerly belonged to the Court of Admiralty sitting as a Prize Court under the Naval Prize Act, 1864, and is now vested in the High Court of Justice by s. 16 of the Judicature Act, 1873, and s. 4 of the Judicature Act, 1891. Procedure in prize is governed by the Prize Court Rules, 1914 (S. R. & O., 1914, Vol. III., p. 105), which came into operation on 5th August, 1914. From that date the sections of the Act of 1864 dealing with the practice and procedure of Prize Courts were repealed by the Prize Courts (Procedure) Act, 1914, which excepted from the jurisdiction of Prize Courts ships of war taken as prize.

See MONITION.

The constitution of Prize Courts in the British dominions overseas is dealt with in the Prize Courts Act, 1894.

Prize Salvage. Under the Naval Prize Act, 1864, s. 40, where a ship or cargo belonging to a British subject, after being taken as prize by an enemy, is recaptured by a King's ship and restored to the owners, the crew of the King's ship are entitled to salvage at the rate of not less than one-eighth or more than one-fourth of what they have re-captured: this is termed marine salvage. Under the law of nations, a King's ship is entitled to receive analogous payments in respect of the re-capture of a neutral ship, captured by the enemy, which, but for the re-capture, would have been confiscated or destroyed: see [1916] P. 100.

Probandi necessitas incumbit illi qui agit (I. 2, 20, 4). (The necessity of proving lies upon him who commences proceedings.) Compare EI QUI, ETC.

Probate. This is a certificate granted by the Probate Division of the High Court of Justice to the effect that the will of a certain person has been proved and registered in the Court and that administration of his effects has been granted to the executor proving the will, he having first sworn faithfully to administer them and to exhibit a true inventory and render a just account when called on. This certificate was formerly on a piece of parchment annexed to a copy of the will and codicils or other testamentary papers, if any, engrossed on parchment: but since 1st January, 1901, paper of a special kind and size has been substituted for the parchment. The whole is commonly referred to as the probate, but inaccurately, the certificate being the probate, and the copy of the will being the "probate copy."

When a grant of probate has been made, the Clerk of the Seat (q.v.) makes an entry or memorandum of the fact; this (or a copy of it) is called the probate act.

Probate may be granted either in solemn form or in common form. Probate in solemn form is only employed when there is or is likely to be a dispute as to the validity of the will, and in such a case the person who wishes its validity to be established commences an action against the person who disputes it. The action proceeds as to pleadings, trial, etc., in the same way as an ordinary action; if the plaintiff makes out his case, the Court pronounces for the validity of the will and the executor may then take probate of it as if it had not been disputed. As a general rule, probate in solemn form is conclusive on all who are parties to the proceedings or cognizant of them. See ESTABLISHMENT OF WILLS.

Probate in common form is, in the words of Lord Stowell, that "form which is slight and summary for ordinary and undisputed cases." It is granted in ordinary cases as a matter of course on the executor swearing and filing (1) an affidavit called the oath of executor or oath of office, by which he swears that the will annexed to the affidavit is "the true and original last will and testament" of the testator, and that he will faithfully administer the estate; and (2) an affidavit for Inland Revenue.

Where several persons are named as executors it is not necessary for all to prove together; one may prove, power being reserved to the others to prove subsequently. If they do, another probate, called a double probate, must issue.

As to limited grants of probate, see GRANT.

" Probate business " is used as a general term to include all business relating to the granting and revoking of probates and letters of administration both in contested and uncontested cases. The non-contentious business is transacted in the registries (see REGISTRY) of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division of the High Court (q.v.): the contentious business is, as a rule, transacted in the same Division, or, where the personal estate does not exceed £200 and the real estate does not exceed £300 in value, in the County Court (q.v.) of the district, where the deceased had his fixed place of abode.

Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division is that Division of the High Court of Justice which exercises jurisdiction in matters formerly within the exclusive cognisance of the Court of Probate, the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, and the High Court of Admiralty (see those titles). It consists of two judges, one of whom is called the President, and a number of registrars (q.v.). In certain cases the judges of assize now have jurisdiction (see DIVORCE COURT).

The jurisdiction in probate matters is of two kinds, contentious and non-contentious. The non-contentious business comprises all " common form business," that is, " the business of obtaining probate and administration (q.v.) where there is no contention as to the right thereto, including the passing of probates and administrations in contentious cases when the contest is terminated, and also the business of lodging caveats " (Court of Probate Act, 1857, s. 2). (See CAVEAT; WARNING.) And contentious business comprises all other proceedings (Rule 3 (Contentious Business)).

The jurisdiction in divorce and matrimonial matters is exercised in pronouncing decrees of nullity or dissolution of marriage, judicial separation, restitution of conjugal rights and jactitation of marriage (q.v.), and in dealing with subsidiary matters arising in suits for the above purposes (see ALIMONY; SETTLEMENT). Appeals from any decision in these matters lies to the Court of Appeal (Judicature Act, 1881, s. 9). Under s. 120 of the County Courts Act, 1888, an appeal lies from the decision of a County Court in a probate action to (see Ord. 59, r. 4) the Divisional Court of the Division.

The jurisdiction in Admiralty matters is exercised in questions as to the possession, mortgage, damage, salvage and towage of ships and claims in respect of necessaries and wages.

Probate Duty. This is a stamp duty payable (except where it is merged in estate duty) with certain unimportant exceptions, on all the personal property over the value of £100 in this country of anyone in respect of whom a grant of probate or letters of administration should be obtained. Such personal property includes property appointed by will under a general power (Probate Duty Act, 1860, s. 4). It is not payable in respect of deaths since 1st August, 1894, upon any estate for which estate duty is payable (Finance Act, 1894, s. 1, Sch. I. (1)); but it is still payable upon the personal estates in this country of persons domiciled abroad, inasmuch as no estate duty is payable thereon, and it therefore is not entirely superseded by estate duty. Like estate duty, it is payable on the total value of the property which is subject to it: but, unlike estate duty, it applies only to personalty.

Probate duty was first introduced in 1694. From 1815 to 1894 it was payable under the Stamp Act, 1815, the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1880, and the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881: and now, when payable, it is paid under the Act of 1881.

The rate of probate duty varies with the value of the property subject to the duty. In no case is the duty less than 1 per cent. or more than 3 per cent (see Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, s. 27).

Before 1881, probate duty was paid by a stamp on the grant and was calculated on the whole value of the personal estate without deducting debts (other than debts on leaseholds), although after the debts had been paid repayment of a proportionate part of the duty could be obtained. The Act of 1881 made an important alteration in the pre-existing law—(i) by allowing debts (other than voluntary debts) and funeral expenses to be deducted from the value of the estate before payment of the duty (s. 28); and (ii) in making the duty payable on the affidavit for Inland Revenue instead of on the grant (s. 27). A certificate is written on the grant to show that the duty has been paid (s. 30). The affidavit for Inland Revenue verifies an account of the estate, a schedule of debts and funeral expenses, and states the net amount of the estate (s. 29).

Probation of Offenders. Under the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907, s. 1, where a person is charged before a magistrate with a summary offence which is proved, or where a person is convicted on indictment, the magistrate may, instead of convicting, dismiss the charge or discharge the offender on recognisances (with or without sureties) for good behaviour and to come up for judgment within three years, and the Court before which the prisoner is convicted on indictment may discharge him on the like recognisances: but one of these courses is permissible only where it is considered desirable, in view of the character, antecedents, age, health, or mental condition of the accused, or the trivial nature of the offence, or extenuating circumstances: the Court may also order payment by the accused of the compensation to the extent of £10, or any higher amount fixed by statute, and the costs of the proceedings. The recognisance may contain various conditions aimed at securing the good conduct of the offender (s. 2). There may be appointed probation officers, for adult offenders, and also "children's probation officers" (s. 3), who keep in touch with offenders on probation (s. 4). Where an offender fails to observe the conditions of his recognisance he may be brought up and sentenced for the original offence. The Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, s. 8, materially amends s. 2 of the Act of 1907.

See FIRST OFFENDER.

Procedendo. This is a prerogative writ which issues (1) when the judge of an inferior Court delays the parties to a proceeding before him, by not giving judgment for one side or the other, when he ought to do so; or (2) when a cause has been removed from an inferior Court to a superior Court improperly or on insufficient grounds, and the superior Court thinks fit to remit or remove it back to the inferior Court. In the former class of cases the writ of mandamus (q.v.) is more frequently used. See WRIT.

Formerly where a defendant "prayed in aid" of the King (see AID PRAYER), proceedings were stayed until the Court had received out of the Chancery a writ procedendo in loquela (to proceed to deliver judgment).

Procedure. See PRACTICE.

Proceeding. See ACTIONS AND PROCEEDINGS.

Process is a form of proceeding taken in a Court of justice for the purpose of giving compulsory effect to its jurisdiction. The process of the Supreme Court of Judicature consists of writs (q.v.) and originating summonses (q.v.).

In civil actions process is of two kinds: (i) Against a defendant, and this again is of two kinds, viz., (a) process to compel him to appear, now consisting of a writ of summons or originating summons; and (b) process of execution, by which the judgment, decree, etc., is executed or carried into effect (see EXECUTION). (ii) Process against persons not parties to the action, e.g., process to summon jurors, witnesses, etc.

Process in a proceeding in foreign attachment (q.v.) denoted the attachment paper served upon the garnishee.

In the practice of the Privy Council in ecclesiastical appeals, "process" means an official copy of the whole proceedings and proofs of the Court below, which is transmitted to the registry of the Court of Appeal by the registrar of the Court below in obedience to an order or requisition requiring him so to do, called a monition for process, issued by the Court of Appeal. See MONITION.

In criminal proceedings, process means those writs which are or were issued to bring in a person to answer an indictment which has been found against him. Summary process consists, or consisted, of the writs of venire facias, distringas and capias ad respondendum (q.v.), though a justice's warrant is now commonly used (see WARRANT). If summary process is ineffectual, process of outlawry (q.v.) may in theory be issued; but it never is used now.

Formerly process in common law actions was much more complicated and important than now. It was either original or judicial. The former (which was so called because at one time it commenced with the original writ issued out of Chancery) had for its object to compel the defendant to appear (see WRIT). Original process against either the person or property of the defendant was called single process; when it was against both it was called mixed. Judicial process was that which issued out of the common law Court, either when the original writ was returned or without an original being issued at all. When original writs fell into disuse, an action was commenced by process issued out of the common law Court to compel the defendant's appearance, to compel him to give bail, etc., and this was called mesne process; the term also included other kinds of process, e.g., jury process, or writs to compel the attendance of jurors. Writs used to revive an action or remove it into another Court, or the like, were called "judicial process in the nature of new originals." Process of execution or final process was much the same as at present, except that imprisonment for debt has been abolished in most cases (see ARREST).

Processu continuando, De. Anciently this was a writ which directed the continuance of process if the Chief Justice or other justice in the commission of OYER ET TERMINER (q.v.) happened to die during the currency of the commission.

Prochein amy. See NEXT FRIEND; AMY.

Prochein Avoidance. This means next avoidance. See AVOIDANCE.

Proclamation. See FINE.

Proclamations, Royal. The Statute of Proclamations, 31 Hen. 8, c. 8, gave Royal Proclamations the force of Acts of Parliament; but this enactment was repealed by the statute 1 Edw. 6, c. 12 s. 4. The statute of Henry VIII. had legalised—for the time being—the practice of legislating by way of proclamation which the Crown had from time to time pursued. The practice was not abandoned after the enactment of the statute of Edward VI.; but in 1610 it was decided in the Case of Proclamations (see DELIBERANDUM EST, ETC.) that the practice was without legal warrant: and it ceased when the Star Chamber (q.v.) was abolished.

If and when martial law (q.v.) became necessary, a Royal Proclamation would be one of the means by which it could be set up: but such a proclamation would not involve a claim by the Crown of any right to legislate, for the proclamation, like martial law itself, would be entirely extra-legal.

No question of law-making arises in connection with the issue of Royal Proclamations for the usual purposes, that is to say, to assemble or dissolve Parliament, to appoint days of public thanksgiving (see FAST DAYS), to declare peace or war, to annex new territories, to constitute new colonies, etc.

A Royal Proclamation is valid in law—that is to say, has such force as the law allows—if published in the London Gazette (Crown Office Act, 1877, s. 3 (3)). It can be proved by a copy purporting to be printed by the King's printer (Evidence Act, 1845, s. 3).

Proclamations, Statutory. These, as distinguished from Royal Proclamations—which are issued under the prerogative—are issued by the Crown under statutory powers, which give them the force of law. The most important are those issued to regulate the coinage under the Coinage Acts, 1870 and 1891. Most statutes now, however, authorise the issue of Orders in Council (q.v.) rather than proclamations.

Pro confesso. Under the old practice in Chancery, when it appeared that a defendant in a suit had absconded to avoid being served with the bill, or absconded after being served and without putting in an answer, the Court might order the bill to be taken pro confesso (as if the defendant had confessed or admitted the truth of it), either immediately or at some future time. The cause was accordingly set down for hearing, and such decree was made as the Court thought just.

See DEFAULT.

Proctors. In the Ecclesiastical and Admiralty Courts proctors discharged duties similar to those of solicitors and attorneys in other Courts. They used to be empowered to institute or withdraw proceedings by an instrument called a proxy, signed by the litigant, attested, and deposited in the registry of the Court.

By the statute 33 & 34 Vict. c. 28, s. 20, attorneys and solicitors were empowered to practise in the Ecclesiastical Courts, except the provincial Courts of York and Canterbury, and the diocesan Court of London; and they were admitted to these excepted Courts by the Solicitors Act, 1877, s. 17.

By the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 87, proctors of the then existing Admiralty Court were entitled solicitors of the Supreme Court.

At Oxford and Cambridge, proctors are university officials who have disciplinary powers over members of the universities.

In Convocation (q.v.) proctors are the representatives of the chapters of cathedrals and of the beneficed clergy of each diocese.

See ARCHES, COURT OF; QUOD CLERICI BENEFICIATI DE CANCELLARIA; KING'S PROCTOR.

Procuration. Agency. The abbreviations "per proc." or "p.p." following a signature upon a bill of exchange indicate that the signatory signs only as an agent. Such signature binds the principal only in so far as the agent signs within the limits of his authority (Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 25), and does not make the agent personally liable (s. 26).

Procuration Fee. A commission taken by scriveners, brokers, etc., for procuring loans of money. This was limited to five shillings per cent. per annum by the statute 13 Anne, c. 15, repealed by the Usury Law Repeal Act, 1854.

Procuration (of Women). The procuring of women or girls for immoral purposes is punishable on indictment under the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, ss. 2 and 3, as amended by the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1912, ss. 2, 3.

See also CARNAL KNOWLEDGE; CORROBORATION.

Procurations; Procurationes. These were contributions of provisions made by parochial priests for the sustenance of bishops and archdeacons when upon visitation. They were subsequently commuted to payments in money. The right to receive them is understood to still exist; but they can be sued for only in the Ecclesiastical Courts; and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who are entitled to receive these payments where the estates of bishops have vested in the Commissioners under the Ecclesiastical Commissioners Act, 1860, have ceased to claim them.

Procurator. One, who acts on behalf of another. In the old law books the proxies (q.v.) of peers were sometimes termed procuratores, and the bishops, as members of the House of Lords, were sometimes described as the procuratores ecclesiarum. In 1327, Trussel, Speaker of the House of Commons, acting as "procurator" of both Houses, renounced allegiance to Edward II. Procurator was also an early form of the present proctor (q.v.).

Procurator-General and Treasury Solicitor. See TREASURY SOLICITOR.

Prodes homines. In the old books this meant the barons or other tenants in capite.

Proditorie. (Treasonably.) The word was anciently necessary in an indictment for treason.

Producent. Formerly used in ecclesiastical law as meaning a party calling a witness Production. The High Court of Justice has a general power to order a party to an action or other proceeding to produce to the Court any documents in his possession or power relating to the matters in question in the action, and the Court may deal with the documents so produced as it thinks right (Ord. 31, r. 14). It has also power to order a party to produce any documents in his possession for the inspection of any other party, unless they are privileged from production. See AFFIDAVIT; DISCOVERY; INSPECTION; NOTICE TO PRODUCE; PRIVILEGE.

Where a person is entitled to property in reversion or remainder expectant on the death of another person, and has reason to believe that that person (called the cestui que vie (q.v.)) is dead, and that his death is concealed, he may apply to the Chancery Division of the High Court for an order directing the person in possession of the property to produce the cestui que vie to persons named by himself or in case of non-production to them, the cestui que vie is ordered to be produced in open Court or to commissioners appointed by the Court, and on failure of production the applicant may take possession of the property as if the cestui que vie were actually dead (Cestui que Vie Act, 1707, s. 1).

Pro falso clamore suo. Anciently in a judgment for a defendant the unsuccessful plaintiff was in certain cases amerced (see AMERCIAMENT) pro falso clamore suo (for his groundless complaint).

Profert. Formerly the general rule was that where a party to an action relied in his pleading on a deed under seal, to which he was party or privy, the deed had to be "shown forth" or produced to the Court. Hence the party in his pleading used to allege that he brought the deed into Court, although it was not actually done. This was called "profert in curiâ," and entitled the opposite party to "oyer" of the deed (see OYER). Profert and Oyer were abolished by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 55.

Professed; Profession. Formerly a man was said to be professed or "entered and professed in religion" when he had entered a religious order, taken the habit of religion and vowed three things, "obedience, willfull poverty, and perpetual chastity." A nun was also said to be professed. Profession operated as a civil death (see DEATH). Since the Reformation, however, religious profession is not recognised by the law.

"Professional privilege" is the privilege which exempts barristers and solicitors from disclosing matters confided to them in their professional capacity by clients. See CONFIDENTIAL COMMUNICATIONS; PRIVILEGE.

Profit.—I. In its primary sense, profit signifies advantage or gain in money or in money's worth. Thus, in an action in the Chancery Division for infringement of a patent or copyright, the plaintiff generally has his election whether the defendant shall be ordered to pay him the damages caused to him by the infringement, or the profits which the defendant has made by the wrongful use of the patent or copyright (see INQUIRY).

II. In the law of real property "profit" is used in a special sense to denote a produce or part of the soil of land. Therefore, "if a man seised of lands in fee by his deed granteth to another the profit of those lands, to have and to hold to him and his heires, and maketh livery secundum formam chartæ, the whole land itselfe doth passe: for what is the land but the profits thereof; for thereby vesture, herbage, trees, mines and all whatsoever parcell of that land doth passe." (Co. Litt. 4B). In the old books, an easement is defined to be a privilege, without profit, which one neighbour hath of another." See TERMES DE LA LEY s.v. EASEMENT.

Profits in this sense are of three classes. (i) Profits lying in render consist of rents, dues and services rendered to a lord by his tenant. They are so called because it is the duty of the tenant to pay or tender them to the lord, as opposed to (ii) profits à prendre, which are rights of taking the produce or part of the soil from the land of another person, and (iii) the casual profits which accrue to a lord from his tenants "by chance and unlooked tor," such as escheats (Co. Litt. 92B).

Profits à prendre consist of rights of common (see COMMON), and rights of sole or several pasture, vesture and herbage (see PASTURE; VESTURE). The custom of tin-bounding (q.v.) is also sometimes treated as a profit à prendre. The right of taking water from a well or stream on another's land is not a profit à prendre, but an easement. A profit à prendre may be claimed by grant or prescription, or, in the case of copyholders, by custom. See PRESCRIPTION; PRESCRIPTION ACT.

See MESNE.

Pro forma. As a matter of form.

Pro hac vice. For this occasion—as when a Lord High Steward (q.v.) is appointed for the trial of a peer.

Prohibited Degrees. See AFFINITY; LYNDHURST'S (LORD) ACT.

Prohibitio de vasto directa parti. A judicial writ which formerly could be addressed to the tenant of lands which were in controversy or to anyone making waste upon glebe lands; it commanded that such waste should cease.

Prohibitio formata de Statuto Articuli Cleri. (A Prohibition made upon the Articles of the Clergy.) An enactment printed under these titles in the Statutes of the Realm (Vol. 1, p. 209), s.v. Statutes of Uncertain Date; printed also in the Statutes at Large (Vol. 9, App., p. 29) as of uncertain date. It appears to have been framed on certain Articuli Cleri of 51 Hen. 3. See 2 Inst. 600.

Prohibition. The writ of prohibition is a writ issuing out of the High Court to restrain an inferior Court within the limits of its jurisdiction. It is granted in all cases where an inferior Court exceeds its powers, either by acting where it has no jurisdiction, or where, having a primary jurisdiction, it takes upon itself the decision of something not included within its jurisdiction.

Prohibitions are of three kinds. (1) An absolute prohibition is peremptory, and wholly ties up the inferior jurisdiction, but if the superior Court afterwards comes to the conclusion that the matter relied on is not a sufficient ground for prohibition, a writ of consultation may be awarded, by which the cause is remanded to the inferior Court; this latter writ seems in practice to be awarded only in ecclesiastical cases (see CONSULTATION). (2) A temporary prohibition (sometimes called a prohibition quousque) is operative only until a particular act is done, and is ipso facto discharged on the act being done. (3) A limited or partial prohibition (sometimes called a prohibition quoad) extends only to that part of the proceeding which exceeds the jurisdiction of the inferior Court, allowing it to proceed as to the residue.

The writ is applied for in criminal matters by motion to a Divisional Court except during the Long Vacation, when it may be granted by a judge in chambers ex parte or on summons; in civil matters it is granted either by a judge in chambers ex parte or on summons, or by the Divisional Court on motion. It will in no case be granted without an affidavit. If the defendant appears and contests the matter, the Court may, where the question involved is doubtful, order that there be pleadings as in an ordinary action for damages: but where the matter is clear the writ will issue without pleadings; and (County Courts Act, 1888, s. 128) where the writ is applied for against a County Court the matter is always disposed of without pleadings.

See PLEA.

Pro indiviso. Lands held by two or more persons, none of whom knew his particular portion—as coparceners, for instance—were said to be held pro indiviso (as undivided).

Pro interesse suo. Where sequestrators acting under a writ of sequestration have seized property apparently belonging to the party in default, any person claiming that it belongs to him must make an application to the Court for an inquiry as to the nature of his interest therein. This is called an inquiry pro interesse suo. In the Chancery Division the inquiry is conducted in the usual way before the Master, and he makes his certificate of the result. If it is in favour of the claimant, the Court directs the sequestrators to deliver up the property to him. The same rule applies where property is taken possession of by a receiver. See CERTIFICATE; INQUIRY.

Prolixity is the allegation of facts at unnecessary length, either in a pleading or affidavit. The party offending may be ordered to pay the costs thereby occasioned (Ord. 19, r. 2; Ord. 38, r. 2), or the affidavit may, by virtue of the inherent power of the Court, be ordered to be taken off the file.

Prolocutor. One of the members of the Lower House of Convocation (q.v.) is selected by the members of that House to represent their resolutions and opinions to the Upper House. He is known as the Prolocutor and sometimes also as the Referendarius. The office is always filled at the beginning of each sitting of Convocation; the Prolocutor has the power of appointing a deputy; and if a vacancy occurs during the sitting there must be a new election. The appointment of the Prolocutor or of a deputy requires confirmation by the Archbishop.

One of the members of the Upper House is Prolocutor thereof and presides over its sittings.

Lambarde, writing in 1635, says that the Keeper of the Great Seal (see LORD KEEPER) was the Prolocutor or mouth of the Higher House of Parliament, that is to say, was the Speaker of the House of Lords. See CHANCELLOR.

Promise. Promises are of two kinds. A true promise is the expression of an intention to do or forbear from some act, made by one person (the promisor) to another (the promisee). Expressions in the form of promises, but reserving an option as to their performance, and illusory promises (e.g., a promise by me to pay B. such a sum as I think proper), are not true promises.

True promises are either express or implied; thus, if I request A to lend me £50, and he does so, a promise by me to repay it is implied. See EXPRESS.

To have legal effect, a promise must either be under seal, when it forms a covenant (q.v.), or must form part of a contract, that is, be made in consideration of something done or to be done in return by the promisee (see CONSIDERATION; CONTRACT). When that consideration consists of another promise, each party is both a promisor and a promisee, and the contract consists of mutual promises; thus, in an ordinary contract of sale, the vendor's promise to deliver the goods is in consideration of the purchaser's promise to pay for them, and vice versa. Mutual promises are said to be "independent" where either party may sue the other for the breach of his promise and where it is no excuse for the party sued to allege a breach by the plaintiff of his own promise (see APPORTIONMENT OF CONTRACTS): "dependent," when the performance of one promise depends on the performance of the other, and therefore, until the prior condition is performed, the other party is not liable on his promise; as where A promised B to keep some buildings in repair on condition of their being first put into repair by B: "concurrent," where both promises are mutually dependent; thus, where A agrees to sell property to B, neither can sue the other without showing that he has performed or is ready to perform his part of the contract.

Fictitious promises, sometimes called implied promises, or promises implied in law, occur in the case of those contracts which were invented for the purpose mentioned under CONTRACTS (q.v.).

Promissory Note. "A promissory note is an unconditional promise in writing, made by one person to another, signed by the maker, engaging to pay on demand, or at a fixed or determinable future time, a sum certain in money to, or to the order of, a specified person or to bearer" (Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s 83 (1)). It may contain also a pledge of collateral security (s. 83 (3)) but it may not contain anything else. It may be made by two or more persons, who may make themselves liable jointly or severally (s. 85). The person who signs the note is called the maker. Promissory notes are negotiable or transferable in the same manner as bills of exchange (q.v.).

The legal effect of making a note is an absolute contract by the maker to pay the note. As to the effect of an indorsement, see BILL OF EXCHANGE.

The rules are the same in both cases, the maker of a note being in the same position as the acceptor of a bill (s. 89 (1)) save as regards the exception set out in s. 89 (3).

Promoter. Anciently this meant the persons who laid themselves out to bring, as common informers, penal (q.v.) and popular (q.v.) actions. They were not in good repute. Coke calls them "turbidum hominum genus." Now it generally means either a person who procures the passing of a private Act of Parliament or a person who "floats" a company, in which latter case it means, for the purposes of s. 84 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, a person "who was a party to the preparation of the prospectus" [of the company] "or of the portion thereof containing the untrue statement" [in question] "but does not include any person by reason of his acting in a professional capacity for persons engaged in procuring the formation of a company."

In the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts "promoters of the undertaking" means the company, commissioners, etc., or private persons who are empowered to execute the works or undertaking authorised by the special Act (Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 2). See ACT OF PARLIAMENT; STATUTE.

In the practice of the Privy Council in ecclesiastical appeals, a promoter is a person who brings an appeal from the judgment of an inferior Court. See OFFICE OF THE JUDGE.

Promovent. This is the plaintiff in a suit of DUPLEX QUERELA (q.v.).

Proof.—I. In the law of evidence, an allegation of fact is said to be proved when the tribunal is convinced of its truth, and the evidence by which that result is produced is called the proof. Where a person who makes an allegation is bound to prove it, the burden or onus of proof (onus probandi) is said to rest on him. The general rule is that the burden of proof lies on the party who asserts the affirmative of the issue or question in dispute. See EI INCUMBIT PROBATIO, ETC.

Where a person on whom the burden of proof lies, adduces evidence sufficient to raise a presumption that what he asserts is true, he is said to shift the burden of proof: that is, his allegation is taken to be true, unless his opponent adduces evidence to rebut the presumption. See EVIDENCE; PRESUMPTION.

II. When evidence is to be given vivâ voce, e.g., at the trial of an action, the solicitor of the party on whose behalf a witness is to be called usually sees the witness beforehand, and takes down a statement of the facts on which he is able to give evidence. This statement is called the "proof" of the witness. A copy of it is furnished to the counsel of the party for his guidance in examining the witness.

III. In Admiralty practice, "proof" was equivalent to "evidence," and was divided into three kinds,—proofs by affidavit, by written depositions and by oral examination of witnesses in open Court. The rules as to evidence in Admiralty actions are now the same as in other actions.

IV. In bankruptcy, "proof" denotes not only the operation of proving the existence of a debt owing from the bankrupt's estate, but also the affidavit, declaration, etc., by which debts are usually proved: and hence to "prove against the estate" means to bring forward a claim in that way. An ordinary proof is an affidavit by the creditor to the effect that the bankrupt was at the date of the order of adjudication, and still is, justly and truly indebted to the creditor, stating the amount and the consideration for the debt, and whether the creditor holds any security for it. See Bankruptcy Rules, 1915, r. 250, and Form 60 in Appendix of Forms. See CREDITOR; DEBT; SECURITY.

Formerly there was a rule that if a person was liable in respect of distinct contracts,—either as member of two or more distinct firms, composed in whole or in part of the same individuals; or as a sole contractor and also as member of a firm,—then the creditors under those contracts could not prove against the estates of the two firms in the one case, or against the several estate of the sole contractor and the joint estate of his firm in the other case, but could only prove against one estate. This rule against double proof was abolished by the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 37. Now the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, Sch. II. (19) also provides against the operation of the rule. But if a firm is carrying on business in England and abroad, and its property abroad is divided among its creditors, those of them who prove against the estate in England must give credit for what they have received abroad.

When a proof has been admitted by the trustee, it may afterwards happen that circumstances are disclosed which, if known at the time of proof, would have excluded the creditor from the right to prove, wholly or in part; or circumstances may arise after proof so as materially to change the state of the debt: and in these cases it becomes necessary either to expunge the proof,—that is, to reject it retrospectively, as if it had never been made; or to reduce it,—that is, reduce the amount on which the creditor is to receive dividends, as if he had originally proved for the smaller amount. See Sch. II (24-27) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914.

V. An executor is said to prove a will when he obtains probate of it, either in common or in solemn form. See PROBATE.

Property.—I. In its largest sense "property" signifies things and rights considered as having a money value, especially with reference to transfer or succession, and to their capacity of being injured. Property includes not only ownership, estates, and interests in corporeal things, but also rights such as trade marks, copyrights, patents, and rights in personam capable of transfer or transmission, such as debts.

Property is of two kinds, real and personal; as to which see those titles.

II. "Property" also signifies a beneficial right in or to a thing. Sometimes the term is used as equivalent to "ownership"; as where we speak of the right of property as opposed to the right of possession (q.v.), or where we speak of the property in the goods of a deceased person being vested in his executor. The term is chiefly used in this sense with reference to chattels: "the ownership of a chattel personal is termed a propertie," says Finch (Finch, Law 176).

Property in this sense is divided into general and special or qualified.

General property is that "which every absolute owner hath." (Co. Litt. 145B). See OWNERSHIP.

"Special property" has two meanings. First, it may mean that the subject-matter is incapable of being in the absolute ownership of any person. Thus a man may have a property in deer in a park, hares or rabbits in a warren, fish in a trunk, etc.; but it is only a special or qualified property, for if at any time they regain their natural liberty his property instantly ceases, unless they have animus revertendi. (See ANIMALS FERÆ NATURÆ.) Secondly, a person may have a special property in a thing in the sense that he can only put it to a particular use. Thus, in the case of a bailment (q.v.), the bailee has a special property in the thing bailed, for he is only entitled to deal with it in accordance with the contract of bailment; but he can maintain an action in respect of it against a wrongdoer. So possession is said to confer a special property, by which is meant that the possessor of a thing is deemed to be owner as against everyone who cannot show a better title. See MELIOR EST, ETC.

Property Qualification. The enactments requiring candidates to be possessed of certain real or personal property as a qualification for election were abolished as regards Parliament by the statute 21 & 22 Vict. c. 26, and as regards municipal corporations and local governing bodies by the Town Councils and Local Boards Act, 1880, 43 Vict. c. 17.

See QUALIFICATION.

Property Tax is income tax (q.v.) payable in respect of landed property under the Income Tax Act, 1853, s. 2, Sch. A.

Propound. An executor or other person is said to propound a will or other testamentary paper when he institutes an action for obtaining probate in solemn form. (See PROBATE.) The term was formerly also used technically as meaning to make the allegations in the statement of claim, by which the plaintiff alleges that the testator executed the will with proper formalities, and that he was of sound mind at the time.

Proprietary Chapels. These are chapels erected by and belonging to private persons, and not consecrated for divine service. Such a chapel has no parochial rights, unless acquired by a composition with the patron, incumbent and ordinary of the parish church, nor can public divine service be celebrated in it except with the consent of the incumbent and the licence of the bishop. The bishop, on the other hand, has no authority over such a chapel. Such chapels were formerly sometimes erected as commercial speculations; but, in view of the facilities for forming new parishes under the various Church Building Acts passed since 1818, proprietary chapels are now rare. Some unconsecrated private chapels have been converted to secular uses.

The Private Chapels Act, 1871, deals only with the chapels, whether consecrated or unconsecrated, of colleges, schools, hospitals, asylums, or public or charitable institutions.

Proprietary Medicines. These are (1) about five hundred preparations—such as Browne's British Pills and Solander's Sanative Tea—of which the very names are unknown to-day; (2) all other preparations intended to be used medicinally by human beings, (a) when the vendor claims that they are made by a secret process, or that he has the exclusive right of manufacture, or (b) which are protected by letters patent, or (c) which have been advertised as beneficial (Medicine Stamp Act, 1812, s. 1, Sch.). Under the Stamp Act, 1804 (44 Geo. 3, c. 98), s. 2, Sch. B., duties were imposed on each bottle, packet, etc., of such preparations, running from 1½d., where the price was under 1s., up to £1, where the price was over £2 10s.: and under s. 3 of the Medicine Stamp Act, 1802, these duties are payable by the actual manufacturers before sale by them to the public or to retailers: they were temporarily increased by one hundred per cent. in 1915 (Finance (No. 2) Act, 1915), and this increase has been kept in force by the subsequent Finance Acts. They are payable by means of labels, of appropriate value, which are affixed to the bottle, etc., so that they are torn when it is opened (Act of 1812, s. 2). The duties do not apply to drugs sold entire by a medical practitioner, a chemist or druggist, or the holder of a patent-medicine licence (q.v.), or to preparations of mixed drugs (not coming within the definition of proprietary medicines) prepared and sold by a medical practitioner or a chemist or druggist (Medicine Stamp Act, 1812, Sch.).

Proprietary Rights are those rights which an owner of property has by virtue of his ownership. When proprietary rights are opposed to acquired rights, such as easements, franchises, etc., they are more often called natural rights (q.v.). See OWNERSHIP.

Proprietate probanda, De. This was a writ commanding the sheriff to inquire whether goods distrained were the property of the person who had sued out a writ of replevin (q.v.). It was issued when the sheriff returned as his reason for not executing the writ of replevin the fact that some third person claimed property in the goods. The modern equivalent is a summons to interplead. See INTERPLEADER.

Proprietor is almost synonymous with "owner" (q.v.), as in the phrase "riparian proprietor." (See RIPARIAN.) A person entitled to a trade mark or a design under the Acts for the registration of trade marks and designs (q.v.), is called proprietor of the trade mark or design: see the Trade Marks Act, 1905, s. 4 and passim, and s. 93 of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907.

Pro rata. In proportion: see e.g., FREIGHT.

Prorogation. The bringing of a session (q.v.) of Parliament to an end. This, like dissolution (which brings the Parliament to an end) can be done only by an exercise of the royal prerogative. Adjournment to a future hour on the same day, or to a future day, can be effected by either House of its own motion.

The House of Lords can at all times sit as a Court of Appeal without regard to the prorogation or dissolution of Parliament: and an impeachment is carried on from one session to another or from one Parliament to another: but all other business lapses upon prorogation and, à fortiori, upon dissolution, and must be reintroduced in the new session or the new Parliament.

Prosecution; Prosecutor. A prosecutor is a person who takes proceedings against another in the name of the Crown. The commonest instance of a prosecutor is in criminal matters, where the suit is said to be by "His Majesty the King on the prosecution of A. B. against C. D. (the prisoner)." The prosecutor may be a private person, in which case he is generally the person specially injured by the crime. When the crime is of a heinous nature or likely to go unpunished for want of a prosecutor, the proceedings are conducted by the Director of Public Prosecutions (q.v.), in the name of the Attorney-General.

A person who sets in motion proceedings by scire facias to repeal a Crown grant (see SCIRE FACIAS), or the prerogative process of information (q.v.), or mandamus, or similar proceedings, is called the prosecutor, as is also a person who institutes proceedings for attachment (q.v.). See INFORMER.

Prospectus. This is a document published by a company or municipal corporation, or by persons acting as its agents or assignees, setting forth the nature and objects of an issue of shares, debentures or other securities created by the company or corporation, and inviting the public to subscribe to the issue. (As regards companies, see s. 285 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908.) A prospectus is also usually published on the issue, in England, of bonds or other securities by a foreign State or corporation.

Prospectuses are of importance from a legal point of view, chiefly because they are not unfrequently made the vehicle of misrepresentations, so that persons induced to subscribe on the faith of the statements contained in them acquire a right of action for damages or rescission of the contract. This right, however, is limited, as a rule, to those who subscribed to the issue, and does not extend to persons who may have bought shares or bonds on the market, after seeing a prospectus inviting subscriptions: but if the prospectus is part of a scheme to induce persons to purchase in the market, then persons who have so bought may have a good cause of action for damages.

The Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, s 81, enacts that every prospectus inviting persons to subscribe for shares in any joint-stock company shall give a very large number of particulars, including:—the names, etc., of the directors and of the auditors; the number of shares; the minimum subscription for allotment; previous issues and commission for getting subscribers thereto; names, etc., of vendors; purchase money; payment to promoter; contents of and signatories to the memorandum; preliminary expenses; rights of voting; directors' interest in the company; etc The section, which is of great length, should be compared with the corresponding section (s. 38) of the Companies Act, 1862, in order that an appreciation of the increasing requirements of the Legislature may be arrived at. See COMPANY.

Prostitute. The main enactment is the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, s. 28, which makes it an offence (in a town which is subject to the Act) for a prostitute to loiter and importune passengers in a street. The corresponding London enactment is the Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, s. 54. For the definition of street, quoad the Act of 1847 and the Vagrancy Act of 1824, see the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1907, s. 81. It is an offence under s. 35 of the Act of 1847 to permit prostitutes to continue in any place of public resort: and s. 76 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, makes it an offence for the holder of a licence to allow them to be on his premises except for the purpose of obtaining refreshment. Children frequenting the company of a prostitute (other than a mother taking care to prevent contamination) or living with her under circumstances conducive to immorality, may be sent to a certified industrial school (Children Act, 1908, s. 58). See VAGRANCY.

Protected Transactions. Every bankruptcy is deemed to commence from, at latest, the act of bankruptcy upon which the receiving order was made, and sometimes from three months before the presentation of the petition (Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 37 (1)). The effect is to invalidate alienations and dispositions of property by the debtor, and judgments against him made or obtained since the commencement of his bankruptcy, and the object is to protect the general creditors against fraudulent and collusive arrangements for the benefit of particular creditors. But to prevent the rule from bearing hardly on honest creditors, the bankruptcy law excludes from its operation payments, transfers, contracts, and dealings, when made or obtained before the date of the receiving order and for valuable consideration by persons not having notice of an act of bankruptcy (s. 45); and it also excludes executions and attachments completed before the date of the receiving order without notice of the petition or of an act of bankruptcy (s. 40). These are known as protected transactions. See SETTLEMENT.

Protectio trahit subjectionem, et subjectio protectionem (Co. Litt. 65). (Protection involves subjection; subjection, protection.) While an alien is within the King's dominions he is subject, in many respects, to British law, but, on the other hand, he is within the protection of our law even though he be the subject of an enemy State.

Protectionibus, Statutum de. The statute 33 Edw. 1, under which the validity of a writ of protection (q.v.) could be challenged and investigated.

Protection Order. As regards licensed premises this means an order which may be made by justices when a transfer of a justices' licence has been authorised: it authorises the transferee to carry on business until the next transfer sessions or any adjournment thereof (Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, s. 88).

Under s. 21 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1858, a deserted wife may obtain from either the High Court or a petty sessional court an order protecting her property and earnings from her husband and those claiming through him. The Married Women's Property Acts and the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 (see DESERTION) have made applications for such orders of rare occurrence.

Protection, Writ of. This was a writ which, from a very early period, issued out of the Chancery to men absent overseas on the king's service. It made them free of all suits except some few such as the Assize of Novel Disseisin, the Assize of Darrein Presentment, Attaints, etc. It could not, as a rule, be pleaded to any suit instituted before it was issued (see the statute 13 Rich. 2, st. 1, c. 16), nor to a charge of felony. The last instance of its issue was about 1690.

The writ of protection was also issued to Crown debtors in order to prevent private creditors from getting priority of the Crown. See NON MOLESTANDO.

Protector. The protector of a settlement is a person without whose consent a tenant in tail cannot bar the entail except as against his own issue, nor a tenant in base fee enlarge his estate into a fee simple. In the absence of a protector specially appointed by the settlor, the original owner of the first estate for years determinable on the dropping of a life or lives, or any greater estate, prior to the estate tail, is the protector. (Fines and Recoveries Act, 1833, s. 22.) Thus, if land is limited to B. for life, with remainder to C. in tail, B. is the protector. The Act contains special provisions for cases in which co-owners, married women, lunatics, etc., have the first prior estate. The person to whom the prior estate was originally given remains protector, although he may have encumbered or alienated it (s. 21). Every settlor is empowered to appoint by the settlement any number of persons in esse not exceeding three to be protector of the settlement in lieu of the person who would otherwise have been protector, and to insert in the settlement a power of appointing a protector in the place of any protector dying or relinquishing his office (s. 32).

Although the protector fills an office somewhat similar to that of the donee of an ordinary power, he is exempt from the rules (see FRAUD) applying to dealings between the donee and the object of a power (s. 37). Thus the consent given by a protector is not invalidated by his obtaining a pecuniary benefit in consideration of his giving it. Section 37 (as Shadwell, V.-C., puts it in 11 Sim., at p. 527), enables him to take a bribe. The law as to protectors of settlements of freeholds applies with certain variations to settlements of copyholds (s. 50).

See ESTATE TAIL; DISENTAILING DEED; TENANT TO THE PRÆCIPE.

Protest. In its most general sense, a protest is an express declaration by a person doing an act that the act is not to give rise to an implication which it might otherwise cause. Thus, the payment of a sum of money by A. in answer to a demand by B. would in general give rise to the presumption that the money was owing by him to B., and if A. wishes to prevent it from doing so, he pays the money under protest. As a general rule, a protest is not effectual unless the payment or other act takes place under compulsion: thus, if A. wrongfully distrains goods belonging to B., and B. pays the sum claimed for rent under protest in order to regain his goods, he may afterwards sue A. to recover the amount. (See DURESS.)

In the law of bills of exchange, a protest is a solemn declaration by a notary stating that he has demanded acceptance or payment of a bill, and that it has been refused, with the reasons, if any, given by the drawee or acceptor for the dishonour. The object of a protest is to give satisfactory evidence of the dishonour to the drawer or other antecedent party; but it is not necessary except in the case of a foreign bill (see BILL OF EXCHANGE; NOTING). Where the acceptor of a bill becomes bankrupt or suspends payment before it matures, the holder may cause the bill to be protested for better security against the drawer and indorsers (Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 55 (5)). The advantage of a protest is that there may be an acceptance (q.v.) for honour. The expenses of the protest are recoverable where it is for non-acceptance or non-payment (s. 57 (1) (c)); but not where it is for better security.

In Admiralty, a defendant desiring to object to the jurisdiction must enter an appearance under protest, and then make an application by summons or motion to have the action dismissed on the ground of want of jurisdiction. Formerly a question of this kind was raised by "pleadings on protest," commenced by the defendant filing a "petition on protest," to which the plaintiff filed a reply, and so on.

See APPEARANCE, as to appearance under protest generally.

Protestation; Protestando. Protestation was once used in pleadings at common law when a party wished to prevent an admission of a fact by him in one action from being afterwards used against him in another action as an estoppel or conclusion of the truth of the fact; the use of the word protestando was necessary in such a pleading; and the pleading itself was known as a protestando. Protestation was abolished in 1834 by Rules of Court.

Prothonotary. A principal notary, that is to say, a chief clerk. The title was borne by three officers of the Common Pleas and by one officer of the King's Bench. The Prothonotary of the King's Bench recorded all civil actions—all criminal matters in that Court were recorded by the Clerk of the Crown Office (q.v.). The prothonotaries of the Common Pleas, in conjunction with the filacers (q.v.), performed functions analogous to those of the modern Master. Both prothonotaries and filacers were abolished in 1837 by an Act which replaced them by the Masters of the Common Pleas. See MASTERS OF THE KING'S BENCH, ETC.

Protocols. These are the original acts and proceedings in an ecclesiastical cause taken down by a notary (πρῶτος κολλὴ, the things first glued together, i.e., the original drafts).

For the last hundred years it has also meant the minutes of a deliberative assembly of the representatives of nations.

Protonotary. See PROTHONOTARY.

Prove. See PROOF; PROBATE.

Provided School. The popular synonym for a council school (q.v.).

Provident Societies. See INDUSTRIAL AND PROVIDENT SOCIETIES.

Province. A province is a district subject to an archbishop's jurisdiction. England is divided into two provinces, those of Canterbury and York, and each province contains many dioceses. (See ARCHBISHOP; DIOCESE; PROVINCIAL COURTS.) For the dioceses in each province, see BISHOPRICS.

Provincial Courts. These are ecclesiastical Courts within the provinces of the two primates, and are hence also called the Courts of the Primates. They are (1) in the province of Canterbury—(a) the Court of Arches (q.v.); (b) the Court of the Vicar-

General, wherein bishops of the province are confirmed; (c) the Court of the Master of the Faculties, wherein matters relating to notaries public are dealt with (see FACULTY; NOTARY); (d) the Court of Audience (q.v.); and (e) the Court of the Commissary (q.v.) of the Archbishop: (2) in the province of York—(a) the Supreme Court or Chancery Court (see CHANCERY); (b) the Consistory Court (q.v.); and (c) the Court of Audience (q.v.). See DIOCESAN COURTS.

Provision; Provisors. In the law of præmunire (q.v.) a provision was a nomination by the Pope to an English benefice before it became void, though the term was afterwards indiscriminately applied to any right of patronage exerted or claimed by the Pope. The statute 35 Edw. 1, was the first statute against provisions. Persons who attempted to take the benefit of provisions were called provisors.

Provisional Order. Under various Acts of Parliament (see e.g., ELECTRIC LIGHTING) public bodies and departments of the Government are authorised to inquire into matters which, in the ordinary course, could only be dealt with by a private Act of Parliament, and to make orders for their regulation. These orders have no effect unless they are confirmed by an Act of Parliament, and are hence called provisional orders. Several orders may be confirmed by one Act. The object of this mode of proceeding is to save the trouble and expense of promoting a number of private Bills.

As to provisional orders by the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries, see INCLOSURE; SEWER. Provisional orders are also made by the Ministry of Health under the Public Health Acts.

Provisional Specification. See SPECIFICATION.

Proviso. This is a clause in a deed or other instrument beginning "provided always that, etc,"; in Latin, proviso semper. It operates as a condition, limitation, qualification or covenant, according to its tenor. A common instance of a proviso is that for re-entry contained in almost every lease (see RIGHT OF ENTRY); another is the proviso for redemption contained in an ordinary mortgage (q.v.).

Proviso, Trial by. Where the plaintiff in an action desisted from bringing his suit and did not bring it to trial in convenient time, the defendant might formerly take out the venire facias (q.v.) to the sheriff (containing the words proviso quod) upon which the case was set down for trial. This was called "Trial by Proviso." An alternative course was after 1852 permitted to the defendant under s. 101 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852; but s. 116 of that Act preserved the right to trial by proviso. Since the Judicature Acts the defendant's remedy has, of course, been to dismiss for want of prosecution.

Provisor victualium. Before the abolition of the right of purveyance (q.v.) this was the officer of the royal household who exercised the right.

Provisors. (See PROVISION.) The statute 25 Edw. 3, st. 4, was more particularly known as the Statute of Provisors, but it was only one of a series directed against provision.

Provocation. This, as the element in a case of homicide which will reduce the offence from murder to manslaughter (q.v.), does not mean such resentment as arises from the conduct of, for instance, a nagging woman, whose conduct is, in colloquial phraseology, provoking. Mere words are not, as a rule, sufficient to constitute provocation, and acts are held to constitute provocation only where they are sufficient to deprive the average man of his self-control, and where the blow, etc., which caused death, was a natural result of such loss of control. And so where a woman slaps a man's face and he kills her by stabbing her, it will be murder.

Provost-Marshal. The statutory authority for the existence of this officer is the Army Act, s. 74 (as amended by the Army (Annual) Act, 1907, s. 10 (4)), which enacts that provost-marshals may be appointed by general officers commanding. They and their assistants are intended to secure "the prompt repression of all offences which may be committed abroad," and they are to "arrest and detain for trial persons subject to military law committing offences," and to execute punishments ordered by courts-martial.

In the Navy, a senior member of the ship's police is appointed provost-marshal when a court-martial is to be held. He arrests the accused and produces him to the Court.

Proxenta; Proxenete. A marriage broker. See BROCAGE.

Proxies. The same as procurations (q.v.).

Proxy. This has been judicially defined as "a lawfully constituted agent." As regards companies under the Companies Acts, it denotes (i) a person appointed to represent another at a meeting or number of meetings; (ii) the instrument containing the appointment. It requires a stamp of 1*d*. (Stamp Act, 1891, s. 80, Sch. I.). In most companies a shareholder has the power of appointing any other shareholder as his proxy to vote at meetings.

In bankruptcy, any creditor may, by an instrument in the prescribed form, appoint a person to represent him as a proxy in the matter of the bankruptcy; if in general terms, the proxy operates as an authority for the appointee to vote at all meetings, receive dividends, and generally to act in all matters in the bankruptcy as fully as the creditor himself could act. In the analogous process of winding up a company, creditors and contributories can vote by proxy: see Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1909, rr. 139, 140.

From an early date, peers had exercised the right of voting in the House of Lords by proxy entrusted to another peer. At first this was done only by permission of the Crown in each case. Then the permission was dispensed with and votes were given by proxy as of right, many proxies being sometimes held by the one peer. In 1868 the Orders of the House on the subject were to the effect that no peer should hold more proxies than two, and that proxies should not be used at all in committees or when the House was sitting as a Court of Appeal. In 1868 it was unanimously resolved by the House that the use of proxies should be discontinued, and there has never been any question as to its being revived.

Prudenter facit qui præcepto legis obtemperat (5 Rep. 49). (He acts prudently who complies with the command of the law.) This obvious truism is quoted in connection with the observation that "he who commits a wrong and at the first confesses it and obeys the king's command by his writ, shall not be amerced." As to one who took the opposite course, see PECCATUM PECCATO, ETC.

Pryk. In the reign of Richard II. we find land "per servitum unum equum, unum saccum et unum pryk in guerra Walliæ" (subject to supplying one horse, one sack (see SACCUS) and one pryk for the Welsh war). The pryk was the spiked spur of the mediæval horseman, resembling—on a large scale—the woman's spur of to-day.

Public. See ACT OF PARLIAMENT; COMPANY; DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC PROSECUTIONS; HIGHWAY; NAVIGABLE; POLICY; RIVER.

Public Agent. See PUBLIC OFFICER.

Publican. There is no statutory definition of this term. It means one who keeps a public-house (q.v.).

Public Analyst. Section 25 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899, defines this expression for the purposes of that Act.

Publication. Before 1837 the law was that, for the validity of a will, it was necessary that it should be proved to have been "published" by the testator, that is to say, had been declared by him, in the presence of witnesses, to be his will; but proof of "publication" was not insisted on in the case of a holograph will. Now under the Wills Act, 1837, s. 13, no proof of publication is required other than such as is implied by properly attested execution.

In the practice of the former Court of Chancery, it was at one time customary to pass a rule (or order) for the "publication" of the depositions of witnesses—that is to say, to authorise the giving out of copies—but this ceased to be the practice after all parties were permitted to attend the examination of witnesses.

As regards copyright (q.v.) the Copyright Act, 1911, s. 1 (3), enacts that "For the purposes of this Act, publication in relation to any work means the issue of copies of the work to the public, and does not include the performance in public of a dramatic or musical work, the exhibition in public of an artistic work, or the construction of an architectural work of art, but, for the purposes of this provision, the issue of photographs and engravings of works of sculpture and architectural works of art shall be deemed to be publication of such works"

As regards designs (q.v.) publication may be by prior use or in books, etc., or by communication to third persons or by exhibition at exhibitions generally. Only a "new and original design not previously published in the United Kingdom" can be registered (Patents and Designs Act, 1907, s. 49 (1)); but the exhibition of a design at certain specified exhibitions is not publication (s. 59). See NOVELTY.

As regards patents (q.v.), only a new and original invention (see NOVELTY) can be patented. The invention is not new and original if the public have been made acquainted with it by a prior publication. Such publication may be by prior user or by prior written or printed matter which has brought the invention to the knowledge of third persons generally. But the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, s. 41, provides that (1) publication in any fifty-year-old specification, or in any provisional specification; and (2) publication without the inventor's knowledge and consent shall not be deemed publication unless, in the case of unauthorised publication, there has been a failure to obtain protection for the invention with reasonable diligence.

In any action of libel (q.v.) or slander the plaintiff must show that the defamatory words were actually published, that is to say, brought to the knowledge of some person other than the plaintiff. There is publication if the defendant has "published" the libel to the husband or wife of the plaintiff, but not if libel has been "published" to the husband or wife of the defendant or if the words have been written or spoken on an occasion with regard to which there is privilege (q.v.). Whether the publication is intentional or accidental is immaterial, except as affecting the amount of damages.

In criminal proceedings for libel, publication to the prosecutor himself is sufficient to constitute publication in law; the publication must be intentional; and, even though there be no actual publication, any overt act towards publication will constitute the common law offence of attempting to publish a libel.

As regards civil proceedings for libel, publication means bringing the alleged libel to the knowledge of some person other than the plaintiff.

Public Authorities. There is no statutory or other definition of this term. It, however, means any person for whose protection in a particular capacity provision is made by the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893. That Act (s. 2) enacts (with regard to "any action, prosecution, or other proceeding . . . against any person for any act done in pursuance or execution or intended execution of any Act of Parliament or any public duty or authority or in respect of any alleged neglect or default in the execution of any such act, duty or authority")—

(a) The action, etc., must be commenced within six months of the ceasing of the cause of action;

(b) If judgment in such action, etc., be for the defendant, he shall have costs as between solicitor and client [unless he is wholly deprived of costs under Ord. 65, r. 1];

(c) If the action be for damages, there may be tender of amends; if the action be commenced after tender or is proceeded with after payment into Court of the sum tendered, and the plaintiff does not recover more than that sum, he shall not recover any costs after tender or payment, and the defendant shall have solicitor and client costs as from tender or payment;

(d) If in the opinion of the Court the defendant was not given sufficient opportunity of tendering amends before action brought, then he may be awarded solicitor and client costs.

Public Body. Section 7 of the Public Bodies Corrupt Practices Act, 1889, defines this expression for the purposes of that Act.

Public Building. Section 5 (27) of the London Building Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. ccxiii.) defines this expression for the purposes of that Act.

Public Health. The enactments relating to public health are (as regards England generally) the Public Health Acts, which begin with the Public Health Act, 1875, and end with the Public Health Act, 1908: see s. 2 (2) of the last-mentioned Act. The Act of 1875, eight other Acts passed from 1878 to 1890, and the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1907, are (see s. 2 (3) of the Act of 1907) collectively entitled "the Public Health Acts, 1875 to 1907"; and they, together with the Act of 1908 above mentioned, are "the Public Health Acts" referred to in the Act of 1908.

The principal Act dealing with public health in the metropolis is the Public Health (London) Act, 1891; but other Acts, such as Michael Angelo Taylor's Act (q.v.) and the Metropolis Management Acts, 1855 and 1862, in so far as they are unrepealed, still apply.

For an early instance of a Public Health Act, see SUPER STATUTO QUE NUL JECT DUNG.

Public-house. As regards England, there is no statutory definition of this expression. It may, however, be taken as meaning generally premises on which excisable liquors are sold, for consumption thereon, to the public at large. Thus the use of premises as a club in which such liquors are sold to members only is not a breach of a covenant against use as a public-house; but the Refreshment Houses Act, 1860, s. 44, expressly provides that the sale of wine, to be consumed on the premises, under a licence for such sale and consumption, is a breach of such covenant as is mentioned above.

See VINTNER.

Public juris ("of public right"), as applied to a thing or right, means that it is open to or exercisable by all persons.

When a thing is common property, so that anyone can make use of it who likes, it is said to be publici juris, as in the case of light, air and public water. (See AIR; LIGHT; WATER; NATURAL RIGHTS.) So when a copyright or patent has expired, or a trade mark, or trade name becomes common property, the book, process, trade mark, or trade name is said to be publici juris, that is, any person can print or use it.

As applied to the case of water flowing through private land, publici juris means that the water flows in such a defined channel as to give the owner of each piece of land through which it passes what are called rights of water in respect of it, as opposed to water which is either confined to one piece of land, as in a pond, or percolates or flows in no defined course.

Public Law. Positive law (q.v.).

Public Meeting. An assembly called together by private persons to direct attention to some matter alleged to be of public interest. If held on private premises, those present are merely licensees of the owners, or of those claiming through the owners, of such premises; if held on a public thoroughfare, there is no right to cause an obstruction. If the meeting be a lawful one, then, under the Public Meeting Act, 1908, any person creating or inciting to disorder in order to prevent the transaction of business is guilty of an offence punishable summarily and, if the meeting be a political meeting held between the issue and the return to a writ for the election of a member of Parliament, he is guilty of an illegal practice within the meaning of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883.

No public meeting can be held within one mile of Westminster Hall during a session of Parliament (Seditious Meetings Act, 1817).

See NEWSPAPERS; TRAFALGAR SQUARE.

Public Officer. This sometimes means the holder of a public office under the Crown (see FRAUD), but it is more generally used to denote an officer of a joint-stock company or corporation. Fraudulent appropriation of money, alteration of accounts, destruction of books and papers, etc., by such a public officer are misdemeanours (Larceny Act, 1916, s. 20; Larceny Act, 1861, ss. 82-84).

The term "public officer" in the latter sense seems to be derived from the Country Bankers Act, 1826 (7 Geo. 4, c. 46), which (see ss. 4-9) provided for the appointment of public officers of banking companies, and empowered such companies to sue and be sued in the name of any such officer, although the companies themselves were not incorporated. A similar provision was frequently contained in private Acts authorising the formation of unincorporated companies. Companies formed under modern Acts are always incorporated.

The term "public officer" in the former sense is less usual than the synonymous "public agent." A public agent cannot sue in his own name in respect of any contract made by him in his public capacity, nor can he be sued thereon unless he has pledged his personal credit; he is accountable only to the Crown for moneys received by him in his official capacity; no action lies against him for acts done by his subordinates unless he was party or privy thereto; and, while he is personally liable for his own wrongful acts or omissions, no action lies against the Crown in respect of anything wrongfully done or left undone by him.

Public Offices, Sale of. The Sale of Offices Act, 1551, prohibited the sale of certain offices. The Sale of Offices Act, 1809, extends the Act of 1551 to all offices—whether civil, naval or military—under the Crown, except (see ss. 7, 8) in so far as the sale of commissions in the Army was permitted by the King's Regulations. In consequence of the abolition of purchase in the Army, ss. 7 and 8 of the Act of 1809 were repealed in 1872. Now only such payments as are specified in the Regimental Exchanges Act, 1875, can be made in connection with the exchange of commissions.

Public Place. There is no statutory definition of this expression. It occurs in many Acts of Parliament, which declare such and such a thing to be an offence if done in a "public place." In each case the meaning depends upon the context and upon the object of a statute. A place may be a "public place" at one time and not at other times. Thus a railway carriage is a public place while being used for the reception and conveyance of passengers, but not while it lies empty in a siding.

Public Prosecutor. See DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC PROSECUTIONS. It is noteworthy that, so far back as the eighteenth century, it had been suggested that there should be "an officer who might act as Deputy-Attorney-General for the Crown in superintending the regular conduct of prosecutions" (Commons Committees' Reports (1803), Vol. 13, p. 203).

Public Records. The General Records of the Realm which are kept at the Record Office (q.v.) in the custody of the Master of the Rolls (q.v.). Copies purporting to be sealed with the seal of the Record Office are admissible as evidence (Public Record Office Act, 1838, ss. 12, 13).

The documents to which the Act of 1838 relates are (see s. 20) "all rolls, records, writs, books, proceedings, decrees, bills, warrants, accounts, papers and documents whatsoever of a public nature" belonging to the Crown or at the commencement of the Act deposited in a number of places and offices specified in s. 1 of the Act.

See JOURNALS OF PARLIAMENT.

Public Schools. A public school, in the widest sense of the expression, means any school which is not a private enterprise carried on without public control.

In the narrower sense it means the seven schools — Eton, Winchester, Westminster, Charterhouse, Harrow, Rugby and Shrewsbury—mentioned in s. 3 of the Public Schools Act, 1868. These seven schools are declared by s. 8 of the Endowed Schools Act, 1869, not to be " endowed " for the purposes of that Act. They are carried on subject to the Public Schools Acts, 1868 to 1873.

St. Paul's School, the Merchant Taylors' School, Marlborough, Wellington, Bradfield, Haileybury, Clifton, Cheltenham and others, are colloquially known as public schools, but they are not affected by the Public Schools Acts.

Public Stores. The Public Stores Act, 1875, provides for the marking of certain public stores and contains various provisions for the protection of all public stores. The expression ' public stores " is not used except in the title to the Act. Section 3 declares that the Act " shall apply to all stores under the care, superintendence or control of a Secretary of State or the Admiralty or any public department or office or of any person in the service of Her Majesty, and such stores are in this Act referred to as Her Majesty's stores." Section 2 enacts that " the term ' stores ' includes all goods and chattels and any single store or article."

Public Trustee. This official, who has practically replaced the Judicial Trustee (q.v.), is appointed by the Lord Chancellor under the Public Trustee Act, 1906. The Public Trustee, under that Act and the rules made pursuant thereto, may act as trustee of English wills or settlements (with certain exceptions) precisely as a private trustee may do; but he makes a small charge for acting, whereas a private trustee makes none. The great advantage of the Public Trustee is that there can be no defalcations and that, as he is a corporation sole, the trouble of replacing trustees who have died never occurs. The main disadvantages would appear to be that he can scarcely administer a discretionary trust as advantageously as a private trustee, and that, when a cestui que trust comes of age and becomes absolutely entitled to large trust funds, he can scarcely advise a self-protective settlement with the same authority as a family solicitor of good standing. These disadvantages can, however, be got over by appointing another trustee to act jointly with the Public Trustee.

Many insurance companies, and several companies subsidiary to several of the great banks, also act as trustees, with an efficiency at least equal to that of the Public Trustee and at very much lower charges. See TRUSTEE.

Public Way. A highway (q.v.).

Public Works Loan Commissioners. This body makes advances of public funds to a multiplicity of public bodies for the construction of many things ranging from baths to lighthouses. It was established by the Public Works Loans Act, 1875, which repealed twenty-seven earlier statutes on the same subject and which, down to 1920, had itself been amended and extended by twenty other Public Works Loans Acts.

The offices of the Commissioners are at 19, Old Jewry, E.C. 2, in the City of London.

See LOAN COMMISSIONERS.

Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874. This statute contains provisions designed to prevent unlawful alterations in or additions to the fabric, ornaments or furniture of any church belonging to the Church of England, to prevent the use of unlawful ornaments, and to enforce the use of prescribed ornaments and vestures, and the observance of the rites ordered by the Book of Common Prayer. (See ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS.) The statute is, however, practically obsolete. It was indeed hardly ever put into force.

Publisher. In s. 9 of the Newspaper Libel and Registration Act, 1881 (see NEWSPAPER), the printer of a newspaper is described as the " printer and publisher for the time being," although colloquially the term " publisher " is used only with regard to books or other printed matter bound in covers.

In criminal proceedings against anyone in respect of a libel published by some other person presumably acting under his authority, it is a complete defence for the defendant to prove that he did not fail to exercise due care and that such other person acted without the knowledge, authority or consent of the defendant (Libel Act, 1843, s. 7).

See NEWSPAPER.

Puchta. Georg Friedrich Puchta was born 31st August, 1798, became professor at Erlangen, Munich, Marburg, Leipzig and Berlin, and died 8th January, 1846. He wrote numerous works on modern Roman law, especially the Cursus der Institutionen and the Lehrbuch der Pandecten.

Pufendorf. Samuel (Freiherr) von Pufendorf was born 8th January, 1632, became professor in Heidelberg, and died 16th October, 1694. He wrote De jure naturæ et gentium and other works.

Puffer. One who bids at an auction (q.v.) on behalf of the vendor.

Puis darrein continuance. Under the old common law system, a plea puis darrein continuance was one in which the defendant pleaded some matter of defence which had arisen "since the last continuance" or adjournment. (See CONTINUANCE.) After the abolition of continuances, the same name was given to pleas of defences which arose after the defendant has put in his plea. (See PLEA.) Under the present practice, where a ground of defence arises after the delivery of the statement of defence, the defendant may by leave of the Court or a judge deliver a further defence setting forth the same (Ord. 24, r. 2).

Puisné literally means "later born," as in the phrase mulier puisné (see MULIER). As applied to incumbrances, puisne denotes subsequent in point of date. (See PRIORITY.) In modern usage, the accent on the final "e" is dropped and the word is pronounced as puny.

While the old Common Law Courts existed, all the judges of each Court, except the chiefs, were called puisne justices or puisne barons, according to the Court.

Now "a puisne judge of the High Court of Justice means, for the purpose of this Act, a judge of the High Court of Justice other than the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice of England, and their successors respectively" (Judicature Act, 1877, s. 5) This, however, makes the appellation applicable to the Master of the Rolls: but he certainly is not generally known as a puisne judge.

Pulsator; Pulsare. In early Norman times pulsator meant what would now be called the prosecutor or complainant; pulsare meant to accuse or make complaint against.

Punctuation. Properly drawn deeds are never punctuated, and must be so drawn that their meaning is clear without any marks of punctuation. Punctuation in deeds, if it does occur, is to be wholly disregarded. Even in Acts of Parliament it is of little importance.

Punishment. See CRIME; DEATH; IMPRISONMENT; PENAL SERVITUDE; PENALTY; POLICE SUPERVISION; WHIPPING.

Pur auter vie. See TENANT FOR LIFE.

Pur cause de vicinage. See COMMON.

Purchase is used in law not only in the popular sense of buying (see VENDOR AND PURCHASER), but also in a technical sense to denote that a person has acquired land by the lawful act of himself or another, e.g., by conveyance, gift or devise, as opposed to title by act of the law, such as descent, dower, curtesy, etc., and to title by wrong, as in the case of disseisin. As to escheat, see that title. See PURCHASER; TITLE.

Anciently the word "purchase" meant to acquire or seek for. Hence the old writers speak of "purchasing" land by accretion, and of purchasing writs, charters of pardon, etc.

Purchaser means, I. a person who buys property (see VENDOR AND PURCHASER); II. a person who acquires land by purchase in the technical sense of the word (see PURCHASE); III. a person who acquires land otherwise than by descent. It is in the last sense that the term is used in the Inheritance Act, 1833. See DESCENT.

Purchaser without Notice. This, as regards realty, is the technical description of one who has purchased bonâ fide for valuable consideration (even though inadequate) without notice (q.v.) of any prior right or title which, if upheld, would derogate from the title which he has purported to acquire. Such a purchaser, if he has got in the legal estate, will usually take priority of equitable claims ranking before him as to time; and, if he has not got in the legal estate, he will usually take priority of mere equities as distinguished from equitable estates.

Purchase, Words of. See WORDS OF LIMITATION, ETC.

Purgation. This was either canonical purgation or compurgation (q.v.) or else vulgar compurgation, that is to say, trial by ordeal (q.v.) or by battle (q.v.).

Purge. See CONTEMPT.

Purification, Feast of. The Purification of the Blessed Virgin, which falls on 2nd February. It is also, but not generally, known as Candlemas. In the statute 32 Hen. 8, c. 21, it is mentioned under its full title of "Purificatio Beatæ Mariæ Virginis." See FAST DAYS; FEASTS.

Purlieu. This is stated by Manwood to have been a certain territory of ground adjoining a forest, bounded with immovable boundaries known by matter of record only, which territory was once forest and was afterwards disafforested by the perambulations made for the severing of the new forests from the old, in accordance with the Carta de Forestâ (q.v.).

See FOREST.

Purlieu-man. One who had, within the purlieu, freehold land of the annual value of forty shillings. He could keep greyhounds on his land, and had certain privileges as regards hunting deer: see Manwood's Forest Laws, s.v. "Purlieu."

Purparty is an old word for share or portion, so that to hold land in purparty with a person was to hold it jointly with him.

Purpresture is where an erection or enclosure is made on any part of the king's demesnes, or on a highway, or a common street or public water, or the like. The term is derived from the Norman-French purprendre, to encroach or enclose, and is not now much used, the offence being more commonly called a common nuisance (q.v.). See USURPATION.

Pursue. To pursue a warrant or authority, in the old books, is to execute it or carry it out. See EXECUTE.

Purveyance. The Crown's prerogative right to buy up provisions and other necessaries for the Royal Household at an appraised price, and of impressing horses and vehicles, at an appraised price, for the royal use. Various statutes, beginning with the statute 28 Edw. 1, c. 2, were directed against the abuse of the right; and it was so oppressive that at length it was wholly abolished by the statute 12 Car. 2, c. 24, which provided for the indictment of any officials purporting to exercise it. The right of impressing carriages, etc., but only by officers of the Navy, was revived by the statute 14 Car. 2, c. 20: and the right now exists for all branches of His Majesty's forces (see IMPRESSMENT). The right of the King to take carriages, etc., for his personal use on royal progresses was revived by the statute 1 Jac. 2, c. 10: but this revived right had been obsolete since 1688; and the statute of James was formally repealed in 1863.

See PROVISOR VICTUALIUM.

Purview. This was the old name for that part of a statute which provides or enacts; as opposed to the preamble, which recites the reason or occasion for the statute. The word is now, however, more generally used as meaning scope or policy. Hence a case was formerly said to be within the purview of an Act when it was expressly covered by the provisions of the Act: now, the same expression would rather mean that the case was impliedly covered by the Act.

The word "purview" is derived from the first word of the Norman-French purveu est (Latin, provisum est) used in the enacting part of old statutes.

Putts and Refusals. This expression is used in the statute 7 Geo. 2, c. 8, s. 1, as meaning time bargains. See STOCK JOBBING ACT.

Putura; Puture. The keepers in forests, and sometimes the bailiffs of hundreds, anciently claimed the right (known as puture) to get, without payment, provisions, etc., for themselves, their horses and their dogs from those holding land within the forest or hundred. Before the time of Edward III. this right had been commuted for a small payment (generally fourpence) from each tenant; and the statute 25 Edw. 3, st. 5, c. 7, prohibited the taking of anything (under colour of puture) except the accustomed payments.

Land subject to puture was known as putura.

Pyx. A box in which samples of all the coins which are being issued are kept at the Mint (q.v.) for the trial (known as the Trial of the Pyx), which is held every year for the purpose of ascertaining whether the coins have been made in accordance with the Coinage Act, 1870. The procedure is regulated by s. 12, and the Order in Council made thereunder. The trial takes place before the King's Remembrancer and a jury of six members of the Goldsmiths' Company, summoned by the officials of that company, who are known as the Prime Warden and the Wardens; there is a weighing, melting and assaying of the coins in order to ascertain whether they are of proper weight and fineness, and the verdict of the jury, which must be signed by each of them, contains various averments as to these matters.

Q

Qua. "In the capacity of," "because he is": used in such phrases as "qua trustee."

Quadragesima. Lent.

Quadragesima Sunday. The first Sunday in Lent.

Quadragesimals. On Mid-Lent Sunday (the third Sunday in Lent), it was anciently the custom to make certain offerings, in kind, on the high altar of the church; subsequently these offerings were commuted to money payments known as Quadragesimalia, Chrismatis Denarii, Denarii Quadragesimales, Easter Pence, Letare Jerusalem, Paschals or Paschal Rents. These offerings seem to have gone to the bishop or his suffragan. Compare PENTECOSTALS.

Quadrantata terræ. A rood of land. Compare FARDING DEAL.

Quadripartitus. See LIBER QUADRIPARTITUS.

Quæ ab initio inutilis fuit institutio, ex post facto convalescere non potest (D. 50, 17, 210). (That which was a useless institution from the commencement cannot be strengthened by anything subsequent.) Compare QUOD AB INITIO, ETC.

Quæ accessionum locum obtinent extinguuntur cum principales res peremptæ fuerint (2 Pothier Ob. 202). (Things which are incidents are extinguished when the principals are extinguished.) See ACCESSORIUM NON DUCIT, ETC.; QUUM PRINCIPALIS, ETC.

Quæ ad unum finem loquuta sunt, non debent ad alium detorqueri (4 Rep. 14). (Those things which are spoken for one purpose, ought not to be perverted to another.) This is a maxim which applies to all other maxims; nothing can be more misleading than a maxim taken apart from the context.

Quæ communi legi derogant strictè interpretantur (Jenk. Cent. 221). (Things derogating from the common law are to be interpreted in a narrow sense.)

Quæ contra rationem juris introducta sunt, non debent trahi in consequentiam (12 Rep. 75). (Things introduced contrary to a rule of law ought not to be drawn into a precedent.) Used by Coke, where he says, "we do find divers precedents of proclamations which are utterly against law and reason." See PROCLAMATION, ROYAL.

Quæ dubitationis tollendæ causâ inseruntur, communem legem non lædunt (Co. Litt. 205). (Things which are inserted for the purpose of removing doubt do not injure the common law.) Coke is here speaking of words inserted for greater clearness in a deed where the effect would be the same if the words were omitted. Compare SURPLUSAGIUM, ETC.

Quæ est eadem. Literally, "which is the same." This was formerly used in pleadings to supply the place of a traverse (q.v.) in certain actions, more especially the action of trespass. Thus in a clausum fregit (see CLOSE), where the declaration (q.v.) alleged the trespass to have been on November 1st, and the defendant justified in respect of November 2nd, a plea (q.v.) averring quæ est eadem was good if the date was immaterial, but if the date was material, then a traverse was necessary. If, however, the defendant justified in respect of the date averred, then neither a quæ est eadem nor a traverse was required.

Quæ in curiâ regis acta sunt rité agi præsumuntur (3 Bulst. 43). (Things which are done in the king's court are presumed to be done in the right way.) Compare OMNIA PRÆSUMUNTUR RITE, ETC.

Quæ in testamento ita sunt scripta, ut intelligi non possint, perinde sunt ac si scripta non essent (D. 50, 17, 73). (Those things which in a testament are so written that they are not capable of being understood are as if they had not been written at all.) See AMBIGUITY.

Quælibet concessio fortissimè contra donatorem interpretanda est (Co. Litt. 183). (Every grant is to be construed as strongly as possible against the grantor.) Compare VERBA CARTARUM.

Quælibet pœna corporalis, quamvis minima, major est qualibet pœna pecuniaria (3 Inst. 220). (Corporal punishment, however slight, is more efficacious than a fine.) This is merely a quotation from Bracton, lib. 3, fo. 105 a.

Quæ mala sunt inchoata in principio vix est ut bono perangantur exitu (4 Rep. 2). (Things bad in the commencement can scarcely be carried through to a good ending.) Cited in conjunction with QUOD AB INITIO, ETC.

Quæ non valeant singula, juncta juvant (2 Bulst. 132). (Words which are of no effect by themselves are effective when combined.) Cited by Dodderidge, J., where he says that certain words "being severed, shall not be actionable, yet they, being all conjoined together, are well actionable.") Compare NOSCITUR, ETC.

Quæ plura. Where an inquisitio post mortem (q.v.) had been held and there was reason to believe that the deceased had died seised or possessed of lands, etc., other than those disclosed at the inquest, then the escheator, etc., who held the inquest, could sue out the writ of quæ plura to enquire quæ plura (what more) the deceased had been seised or possessed of. The writ was virtually abolished by the abolition of the Court of Wards and Liveries in 1660.

Quærens non invenit plegium. See QUERENS.

Quæ servitia. See PER QUÆ SERVITIA.

Quæstum. See QUESTUM.

Quaker. The colloquial title of a member of the Society of Friends. They have never formally adopted it. But it has received statutory recognition: thus the Short Titles Act, 1896, gives the short title "The Quakers and Moravians Act, 1833," to the statute 3 & 4 Will 4, c. 49.

Quale jus. This judicial writ was framed after the enactment in 1284 of the Statute of Westminster II., c. 32. It was designed to enforce the provisions of that statute, which were directed against the alienation of lands in mortmain (q.v.). Where an abbot or other religious person had recovered lands by a judgment in default, then the abbot, etc., had to sue out this writ in order to have it decided whether he really had a right to the lands or whether the judgment was collusive: and execution was stayed pending a decision on the point.

Qualification is a quality which makes a person eligible for an office. As a general rule, the term denotes the possession of property of a certain value. Thus every juryman for the trial of actions in the High Court must be over twenty-one and under sixty-five years of age and must either (i) be assessed to the poor rate or inhabited house duty on a value of not less than £30 in Middlesex, or £20 in any other county; or (ii) occupy a house containing not less than fifteen windows; or (iii) possess freehold or leasehold property of a certain yearly value (County Juries Act, 1825, s. 1). In the City of London the qualification is different: see the Local Government Act, 1888, s. 89. A special juror must either be a banker, merchant, or esquire, or occupy a private dwelling-house of a certain value (Juries Act, 1870, s. 6). So a director of a company is generally required to be the holder of a certain number of shares.

The statute 22 & 23 Car. 2, c. 25 (popularly known as the Qualification Act), which made certain property qualifications necessary for the killing of game, was repealed by the Game Act, 1831.

Various statutes had from time to time made certain property qualifications necessary for the office of justice of the peace. The Justices of the Peace Act, 1906, s. 5, Sch., repealed such of those enactments as were in force in 1906. The Act of 1906, s. 3, also enacted that a solicitor shall not be disqualified for the commission of the peace of any county by reason of his profession, but that neither he nor any partner of his may practise before the justices of the county.

See PROPERTY QUALIFICATION.

Qualified Fee. See FEE.

Qualified Indorsement. See INDORSE.

Qualified Property. This is the technical description of the property of a bailee in a bailment.

Quality. See ESTATE.

Quamdiu se bene gesserit. (During good behaviour.) See OFFICE; AD VITAM AUT CULPAM.

Quam longum debet esse rationabile tempus, non definitur in lege, sed pendet ex discretione justiciariorum (Co. Litt. 56). (How long reasonable time ought to be is not defined by law, but depends upon the discretion of the judges.) But where a case is being tried by a judge with a jury, the question of reasonable time is for the jury.

Quando abest provisio partis, adest provisio legis (cited 13 C. B. 960). (When provision of party is wanting, provision of law is there); that is to say, a point not expressly covered by contract is decided according to general rules of law.

Quando acciderint. See JUDGMENT.

Quando aliquid mandatur, mandatur et omne per quod pervenitur ad illud (5 Rep. 116). (When anything is commanded, everything by which it can be accomplished is also commanded.) And so a master employed to navigate a ship is impliedly authorised to do all things necessary for the voyage—such as the giving of bottomry bonds in case of need.

Quando aliquid prohibetur fieri, prohibetur ex directo et per obliquum (Co. Litt. 223). (When the doing of anything is forbidden, then the doing of it either directly or indirectly is forbidden.) And so, as Martin, B., says at 2 H. & C. 918, the law will not uphold anything which is "a mere device for carrying into effect that which the legislature expressly says shall not be done."

Quando aliquid prohibetur, prohibetur et omne per quod devenitur ad illud (2 Inst. 48). (When anything is prohibited, everything also is prohibited by which the same thing is arrived at.)

Quando duo jura in una persona concurrunt, æquum est ac si essent diversis (2 Preston Abs. Tit. 430). (When two titles concur in one person, it is the same as if they were in different persons.)

The "jura" here spoken of are titles to property. Thus, what A cannot take as half-brother to B, he may take as cousin of B—if such in fact he be—and in each capacity he is dealt with by the law as a separate person.

Quando jus domini regis et subditi concurrunt jus regis præferri debet (9 Rep. 129). (When the titles of the king and of the subject concur, that of the king is to be preferred.)

The King cannot have a joint property with any person in one entire chattel; where the titles of the King and of a subject concur, the King takes the whole. The King's debts, in suing out execution, shall be preferred to that of every other creditor who had not obtained judgment before the King commenced his suit. So, too, Crown debts have priority in administering the assets of a company in liquidation.

Quando lex aliquid alicui concedit, concedere videtur id sine quo res ipsa esse non potest (5 Rep. 47). (When the law gives anything to anyone, it gives also all those things without which the thing itself could not exist.)

A person who has a right to expose goods for sale in a public market has also a right to occupy the soil with baskets necessary and proper for containing the goods; and that as against one to whom the owner of the fee-simple of the soil has made a devise. Compare CUICUNQUE ALIQUIS, ETC.

Quando lex est specialis, ratio autem generalis, generaliter lex est intelligenda (2 Inst. 83). (Where a law is special, but its reason general, the law is to be understood generally.) Coke applies this maxim to illustrate the practice under which the assize of novel disseisin referred to in the Statute of Merton, c. 3, might be taken, not merely before the itinerant justices there mentioned, but also before the King's Bench or the Common Pleas, or the justices of assize who had taken the place of the itinerant justices.

Quando mulier nobilis nupserit ignobili desinit esse nobilis nisi nobilitas nata fuit (4 Rep. 118). (When a noble woman marries a man not noble, she ceases to be noble, unless her nobility was born with her)—that is to say, unless she is a peeress in her own right.

Quando plus fit quam fieri debet, videtur etiam illud fieri quod faciendum est (5 Rep. 115). (When more is done than ought to be done, then that is considered to have been done which ought to have been done.)

The act shall be void quoad the excess only. Thus, if a man have power to lease for ten years, and he lease for twenty, the lease for the twenty years shall in equity be good for ten years of the twenty. Compare OMNE MAJUS, ETC.

Quando res non valet ut ago, valeat quantum valere potest (Cowp. 600). (When anything does not operate in the way I intend, let it operate as far as it can.)

If a deed cannot operate precisely as the parties intend, the law will nevertheless give effect to their intention so far as is possible.

Quando verba statuti sunt specialia, ratio autem generalis, generaliter statutum est intelligendum (10 Rep. 101). (When the words of a statute are special, but the reason is general, the statute is to be understood generally.) Another form of QUANDO LEX, ETC.

Quantity. See ESTATE.

Quantum damnificatus. (The amount of damage suffered.) The issue quantum damnificatus was one which the Court of Chancery down to 1858, used to have tried in a court of law when it appeared that a party was entitled to damages as well as to an injunction. The Chancery Amendment Act, 1858, empowered the Court of Chancery to itself take the verdict of a jury as to the amount: there was no such power previously.

Quantum meruit. Literally, "as much as he has earned." If a person enters into a contract to do services for another, and either the contract is put an end to before they are completed, or they are not rendered in the manner provided by the contract, the contractor is obviously not entitled to be paid his contract price, but in some cases he is entitled to be paid the actual value of his services; and if he brings an action to recover it, he is said (in the language of common law) to sue on a quantum meruit. Thus, where a party to a contract refuses to perform his part of it, the other has the right to rescind it, and to sue on a quantum meruit for the services which he had done under it previous to the rescission. See QUANTUM VALEBANT.

An action will not as a rule (but there are exceptions) lie for a quantum meruit if the work has been done under a special contract which remains open, that is to say, if the completion of the work is a condition precedent to payment. The claim for "extras" on a building contract is an instance of a claim on which the quantum meruit doctrine is available; a case in which it is not available is that of work done by an agent towards carrying through a transaction which ultimately is not carried through.

Quantum valebant. Literally, "as much as they were worth." If a person contracts to supply goods of a certain kind, and supplies goods of a different kind, and the other party does not avail himself of the right of rejecting them, the former, although he cannot claim the price payable under the contract (for it has not been performed), can claim the actual value of the goods supplied; and if he brings an action for it, he is said, in the language of common law, to sue on a quantum valebant.

Quarantine (or Quarentine) is, literally, a period of forty days. The expression was used to denote the period (whether forty days or not) which persons coming from a country or ship in which an infectious disease was prevalent were obliged to wait before they were permitted to land in England. The law on the subject is now to be found in the Public Health Act, 1896 (as amended by the Public Health Act, 1904), under which the Ministry of Health can make regulations, not merely as regards the detention of persons on board ship, but also as regards many other matters relating to the prevention of the importation of disease. Quarantine also signifies the forty days during which a widow is entitled (under Magna Carta) to remain in her husband's dwelling-house after his death. See QUARENTINA HABENDA.

Quare clausum fregit. See TRESPASS.

Quare ejecit infra terminum. This writ was abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36. It lay for one who had been ejected from land before the expiration of the term for which he had held, where the land was in the possession, not of the wrongdoer, but of someone claiming through the wrongdoer. The writ was well known to Bracton.

Quare impedit. This, says Coke, "is an ancient writ which lies by him who being in possession of an advowson of a church is disturbed in his presentation of it." This writ was abolished by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, s. 26, which provided that the ordinary writ of summons should be issued instead. If, on a living becoming vacant, two persons present clerks to the bishop, the action of quare impedit may be instituted, upon the ordinary writ of summons, by either of the alleged patrons, the bishop, and the other alleged patron and his clerk, being the defendants. The action of quare impedit also lay until 1898 against a bishop who had refused to admit on the ground of unfitness: but, under s. 3 (5) of the Benefices Act, 1898, no proceeding in the nature of quare impedit lies against a bishop who has refused to admit on that ground, and the remedy is by appeal to the archbishop.

See GRAND DISTRESS; NE ADMITTAS; USURPATION.

Quare incumbravit. This writ, like many others, was abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36. It lay, in circumstances which it is unnecessary to specify in detail, against a bishop who had himself admitted to a benefice a clerk whom he was not entitled to admit.

Quare intrusit. This writ, which was impliedly abolished by the statute 12 Car. 2, c. 24 (abolishing the Court of Wards and Liveries), lay for a lord where the lord had offered a suitable marriage to his ward, who rejected it and married another, and entered into the land, so that the lord's right to the value of the marriage was not satisfied.

Quare non admisit. A writ anciently directed to a bishop who had been refused to admit a clerk to a benefice. In such a case now, the remedy will be appeal to the archbishop if the refusal is on the ground of unfitness. See QUARE IMPEDIT.

Quarentina; Quarentine. A rood of land (Leg. Hen. 1, c. 16); also the widow's "quarantine."

Quarentina habenda, De. An obsolete writ which lay for a widow to enforce her right of quarantine (q.v.).

Quarrels. Actions, whether real or personal, and all causes of actions and suits, were released by a "release of all quarrels."

Quarries. Quarries on open or unenclosed land and within fifty yards of a highway or place of public resort are nuisances unless adequately fenced (Quarry Fencing Act, 1887). See MINES.

Quart. One-fourth part of a gallon (Weights and Measures Act, 1878, s. 15).

Quarter. A measure of capacity containing eight bushels (q.v.) (Weights and Measures Act, 1878, s. 15).

Quarter-days. These are Christmas Day, Lady Day, Midsummer Day, and Michaelmas (see those titles). There are, however, some local variations: thus, in the City of Bristol the customary December quarter-day is December 21st instead of Christmas Day.

Quarter Rating. The privilege of being rated (see RATING) at one-fourth of the net annual value, which attaches to arable, meadow, or pasture land, woodlands, market gardens, nurseries, land covered with water, canals and towing paths, railways (Public Health Act, 1875, s. 211 (1) (b)), and allotments (Allotments Rating Exemption Act, 1891, s. (1)) not exceeding two acres (s. 2).

Quarter Sessions is a Court of Record held before two or more justices of the peace once in every quarter of the year for execution of the authority given them by the commission of the peace and certain statutes. Formerly their jurisdiction, in theory, extended to trying all misdemeanours and felonies, other than forgery and perjury, though in practice they sent the more serious cases to the assizes. Now, however, their jurisdiction to try cases of treason, murder, manslaughter, rape, incest, frauds by agents, and numerous other serious offences, has been taken away altogether, chiefly by the Quarter Sessions Act, 1842, so that in those cases their jurisdiction ceases as soon as the indictment has been found. See GENERAL SESSIONS.

There are over a hundred boroughs with separate courts of quarter sessions, granted under s. 103 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1835, or under s. 162 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882. These sessions are popularly known as borough sessions: the borough justices cannot act as justices of any gaol delivery or quarter sessions (Act of 1882, s. 158 (1)), and the recorder is the sole judge (ib. s. 165 (2)).

Proceedings at quarter sessions consist (1) of the finding of bills or indictments by the grand jury (see BILL); (2) of the removal to the assizes of those indictments which the Court of Quarter Sessions has no jurisdiction to try; (3) of the trial of those indictments which it has jurisdiction to try (see TRIAL); (4) of business falling within the original jurisdiction of the sessions, chiefly in matters relating to the preservation of the peace and the punishment of rogues and vagabonds; (5) of business within the appellate jurisdiction, which includes (a) appeals from petty and special sessions in bastardy, highway, rating, removal of paupers, and licensing cases, under various statutes relating to those matters, and (b) appeals from any conviction by a Court of summary jurisdiction for any offence other than an offence to which the defendant had pleaded guilty (Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, s. 37 (1)). The appellate jurisdiction in bastardy is materially extended by s. 37 (2) of the Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914.

The Assizes and Quarter Sessions Act, 1908, contains provisions under which the holding of assizes or quarter sessions and the attendance of jurors thereat can be dispensed with when there is no business to be transacted: and it also amends the law as to the dates for quarter sessions.

Quash is to discharge or set aside. Thus a conviction may be quashed if it be made without or in excess of jurisdiction.

Quasi-contract. A quasi-contract is an obligation similar to that created by contract, but not really arising by the consent of the person bound. Thus, in Roman law, if a person left his property without anyone to look after it, a stranger might undertake the care of it, and had a right of action against the owner for his expenses (actio negotiorum gestorum); "and this," says Justinian, "is for the sake of utility, lest the affairs of persons suddenly called away without being able to arrange for their management should be neglected, for no one would look after them if he had not a right of action for his expenses." The term quasi-contract is unknown to the English law, although the thing itself exists. Thus if, in the absence of a husband, I incur expense in burying the wife in a manner suitable to the husband's condition, though without his knowledge, I may sue him for my expenses, or, as it is said, the law will imply a promise by him to reimburse me. Again, everyone exercising an office or employment who undertakes a duty comprised in it is bound to perform it with integrity, diligence and skill, independently of any special stipulation to that effect with his contractee. Thus a common carrier is bound to carry his goods or passengers safely, and a solicitor, surgeon, engineer, &c., who undertakes a professional duty is bound to discharge it with integrity and skill, and, if he does not, he is liable for any damages caused by his default or negligence. If, however, a person be employed to do anything outside his ordinary profession or business the law implies no such general undertaking: in order to charge him with damages, a special agreement is required. The best example of a quasi-contract in English law is salvage (q.v.).

See QUASI-TORT.

The term "quasi-contract" is a modern abbreviation of the obligatio quasi ex contractu of the Romans.

Quasi-easement. An easement, in the proper sense of the word, can exist only in respect of two adjoining pieces of land occupied by different persons, and can impose only a negative duty on the owner of the servient tenement. Hence an obligation on the owner of land to repair the fence between his and his neighbour's land is not a true easement, but is sometimes called a quasi-easement.

Quasi-entail. A quasi-entail or quasi-estate-tail exists when an estate pur autre vie is limited to a person and the heirs of his body. Thus, if land is given to A and the heirs of his body during the life of B, A has a quasi-entail. A quasi-entail in possession may be barred by an ordinary deed of conveyance: if it is in remainder, the concurrence of the tenant for life is required.

Quasi-partnership. See PARTNER, II.

Quasi-possession is to a right what possession is to a thing—it is the exercise or enjoyment of the right, not necessarily the continuous exercise, but such an exercise as shows an intention to exercise it at any time when desired. When the right itself is exercised by means of possession of the thing which is the subject of the right, as in the case of ownership, the idea of quasi-possession does not arise, and hence the term is confined to those rights which merely give a limited power of using the thing, as in the case of easements and profits à prendre; it is, however, not much used in English law, the word "enjoyment" (q.v.) being more frequently employed.

Quasi-tenant at Sufferance. This term has sometimes been applied to an under-lessee who continues in possession, after the termination both of his own and of his lessor's leases, without the reversioner either assenting or dissenting.

Quasi-tort, though not a recognized term of English law, may be conveniently used in those cases where a man who has not committed a tort is liable as if he had. Thus, a master is liable for wrongful acts done by his servant in the course of his employment. The ground of the liability is sometimes expressed by the rule qui facit per alium facit per se; but this is erroneous, that rule applying only to authorised acts: the true rule is respondeat superior. See QUASI-CONTRACT.

Quasi-trustee. A person who, without authority, has taken it on himself to act as a trustee.

Queck Board. See CLOSH.

Queen. This may be either:—a Queen Regnant (as in the case of Queen Victoria), who is for every purpose the same as the King; a Queen Consort (or wife of a reigning King), who has no political power whatever; and a Queen Dowager (or widow of a deceased King), who likewise has no political position.

A Queen Consort was anciently entitled to Queen Gold (q.v.). Her person and her chastity are specially protected by the Treason Act, 1351. She is not subject to, in the words of Coke, "any toll fine or amerciament." She is entitled to appoint her own attorney-general and solicitor-general: but this privilege has not been exercised since the death of Queen Victoria resulted in there being again a Queen Consort.

A Queen Dowager retains her rank in the event of her re-marriage. It is said that she retains most of the privileges of a Queen Consort: and so it may be that her income from the Civil List (q.v.) is exempt from income tax if, like a Queen Consort, she is not subject to "any toll," etc.

Queen Anne's Bounty. By the statute 26 Hen. 8, c. 3, certain duties called first fruits and tenths which had up to that time been paid by the incumbents of ecclesiastical benefices to the Pope, were made part of the revenues of the Crown. Queen Anne determined to apply them to the augmentation of the livings of the poorer clergy, and under the provisions of the statute 2 & 3 Anne, c. 20, she appointed certain persons to be a corporation to receive and apply for this purpose the first fruits and tenths, and also any gifts and benevolences given to them for the same purpose; they are called the Governors of the Bounty of Queen Anne for the Augmentation of the Maintenance of the Poor Clergy. See ANNATES; TENTHS; FIRST FRUITS AND TENTHS, COURT OF; RECEIVER, ETC.

Queen Gold. This was a revenue payable to every queen consort for the duration of her marriage to the king. It consisted of the amounts payable to the king for privileges, dispensations, pardons, and similar exercises of the royal prerogative, and of an additional ten per cent. upon every such amount. It ceased to be paid after the restoration of Charles II.

Queen's Advocate; Queen's Bench; Queen's Counsel; Queen's Coroner; Queen's Evidence; Queen's Printer; Queen's Proctor; Queen's Remembrancer. See KING'S ADVOCATE; KING'S BENCH, ETC., these latter being the terms in use except when there is a queen regnant.

Queen's Prison. A debtors' prison in Southwark which was established by the Queen's Prison Act, 1842, to take the place of the Queen's Bench, Fleet, and Marshalsea Prisons (q.v.). It was abolished by the Queen's Prison Discontinuance Act, 1862, which provided for the transfer of prisoners to Whitecross Street Prison (q.v.).

Que estate. See PRESCRIPTION.

Que est le mesme. Literally, "which is the same." Que est le mesme were formerly words of art used as direct justification in actions of trespass, etc., of the very act complained of by the plaintiff as a wrong. Compare QUAE EST EADEM.

Quem redditum reddit was a real action by which the grantee of a rent could compel the tenants of the land out of which the rent issued to attorn to him. It was abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36. See ATTORNMENT.

Querela. From a very early period this meant any civil proceeding in any Court. See AUDITA QUERELA and DUPLEX QUERELA.

Querela coram rege et concilio. A writ whereby one was called to justify a complaint of trespass before the King and the Council (or Curia Regis): see Reg. Brev. 124.

Querela frescæ fortiæ. A writ of Fresh Force (q.v.).

Querens; Querent. Anciently this was a plaintiff or complainant.

Querens non invenit plegium. (The plaintiff has not found security.) Anciently this was a return made in appropriate circumstances by a sheriff to a writ commanding him to do such and such a thing, " Si A fecerit B securum de clamore suo prosequendo " (if A shall give B security for the prosecution of the complaint). For an instance of the use of this return see Fitzherbert N.B. 38.

Quest. An inquest or inquisition held upon the oaths of a jury duly impanelled. In the City of London the aldermen and citizens of every ward anciently held a " quest " during the Christmas holidays to inquire of misdemeanours and nuisances. The word now survives only in " crowner's quest " sometimes colloquially used as a provincial equivalent for " coroner's inquest." Compare QUESTMAN.

Questions of Law arising in an action may, under R. S. C., Ord. 34, r. 1, be stated in the form of a special case (q.v.) for the opinion of the Court, or in such other manner as the Court may deem expedient. See further as to questions of law, FACT.

See CASE STATED; COURT FOR CROWN CASES RESERVED.

Questman. Two persons were anciently elected by the parishioners of every parish as questmen, whose duty it was to make " quest " (q.v.) as to ecclesiastical offences and to " present " the offenders to the ecclesiastical Courts. By the end of the sixteenth century these duties had devolved upon the churchwardens, who were sometimes called questmen.

Questum. See HEREDITAS.

Questus est nobis. The statute 13 Edw. 1, c. 24, provided that the writ questus est nobis should lie against the person to whom had been sold a house, wall, etc., which had been erected so as to cause a nuisance.

Quia Emptores is the name usually given to the statute 18 Edw. 1, c. 1, passed in the third " notable " parliament holden at Westminster, and therefore also called the Statute of Westminster III. After reciting that purchasers of lands (quia emptores terrarum) from freeholders of great men and other lords hold their lands of the freeholders and not of the superior lords, whereby the latter lose the feudal fruits of tenure, it enacts that every freeman shall be at liberty to sell his lands, but that the purchaser shall hold them of the chief lord, so as to take the place of the vendor. The statute, therefore, abolished subinfeudation (q.v.), and thus made the future creation of seignories, manors, honours, etc., impossible. It also first authorised conveyances of feudal lands, which had hitherto been considered inoperative as against the lord.

Quia forma non observata, infertur adnullatio actus (12 Rep. 7). (Because the prescribed procedure has not been observed, the proceedings are void.) This was said in connection with an alleged irregularity in the procedure of the ecclesiastical Courts.

Quia improvide. A supersedeas (q.v.) which anciently was granted in the case of a clerk of the Chancery who had, in contravention of the privilege of that Court, been sued in the Common Pleas. The term quia improvide was also used as meaning a supersedeas generally in the case of writs erroneously sued out.

Qui aliquid statuerit parte inaudita altera, æquum licet statuerit, haud æquus fuerit (6 Rep. 52). (He who shall decide anything, one party being unheard, though he shall decide rightly, will not be just.) Compare AUDI, ETC.

Quia profecturus. The writ of protection (q.v.) used to contain a clause commencing with the words quia profecturus est (because he is about to set out). This was known as the quia profecturus: see the statute 13 Rich. 2, c. 16.

Quia timet. See BILL OF COMPLAINT; BILL QUIA TIMET.

Quibus sur disseisin, De. " A writ of De quibus, which is brought in the place of an assize, is where a man is disseised of any lands, tenements or rents, whereof he hath an estate in fee: then he may sue that writ." (Fitzherbert N. B. 191.)

Quick Successions. See ESTATE DUTY.

Quicquid demonstratæ rei additur satis demonstratæ frustra est (D. 33, 4, 1). (Whatever is added to describe anything already sufficiently described, is without effect)—whether the redundancy is accurate (see SURPLUSAGIUM, ETC.) or inaccurate (see FALSA DEMONSTRATIO, ETC.)

Quicquid necessitas cogit, defendit (Hale, P. C. 54). (When anything is done of necessity, then necessity can be pleaded as a defence.) This is one of a group of maxims to the same effect as NECESSITAS EST, ETC. (q.v.).

Quicquid plantatur solo, solo cedit (Went. Off. of Exec. 58). (Whatever is affixed to the soil belongs to the soil.) But see ÆDIFICATIO, ETC.

Quicquid solvitur, solvitur secundum modum solventis (2 Vern. 606); quicquid recipitur, recipitur secundum modum recipientis (Halk. p. 149). (Whatever is paid, is paid according to the intention or manner of the party paying; whatever is received, is received according to the intention or manner of the party receiving.) As to the meaning of this maxim, see APPROPRIATION.

Qui cum alio contrahit, vel est, vel debet esse, non ignarus conditionis ejus (D. 50, 17, 19). (He who contracts with another, either is, or ought to be, acquainted with the condition of that person.)

Quid juris clamat was a real action by which the grantee of a reversion or remainder expectant on an estate for life could compel the tenant for life to attorn to him. It was abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36. See ATTORNMENT.

Quid pro quo ("something for something") is the old term for consideration (q.v.). "In every contract," says Coke, "there must be quid pro quo." (Co. Litt. 47B).

Quietare. To quit, discharge or save harmless: often found in deeds of dates during the seventeenth century and earlier.

Quiete clamare. To quit claim, that is to say, to renounce all claim to: used in Bracton, lib. 5.

Quiet Enjoyment. See COVENANT; LEASE.

Quietus was a discharge granted by the Crown or its officer to a person indebted to the Crown, e.g., an accountant, and more especially a sheriff. It was a defence to a writ of extent, and might be entered on the register of judgments in discharge of an execution already issued. It seems to have been originally a writ addressed to the Barons of the Exchequer, directing that the debtor should be discharged (quietus sit) of all claims. Afterwards it was the term made use of by the Clerk of the Pipe in the certificate quietus est (he is quit) which he gave to a sheriff when the sheriff had paid any balance due after the sheriff's bill of cravings (q.v.) had been allowed in whole or in part.

The term quietus was in use down to a recent period (see the Judgments Act, 1839, s. 9, repealed by the Land Charges Act, 1900, s. 5, Sch.), but it is now obsolete.

See SURPLUSAGE.

Quietus redditus. Quit-rent: see RENT.

Qui ex damnato coitu nascuntur inter liberos non computentur (Co. Litt. 8*a*). (Those who are born from unlawful intercourse are not counted among the children.) See BASTARD.

Qui facit per alium facit per se (Co. Litt. 258). (He who acts through another is deemed to act in person.) This means that a principal is liable for the acts of his agent within the scope of his authority. See AGENT; MASTER AND SERVANT; RESPONDEAT SUPERIOR.

Qui fraudem agit, frustra agit (2 Rolle. 17). (He who works a fraud is labouring in vain.) He can thereby acquire no right of action. Compare EX DOLO, ETC.

Qui hæret in literâ hæret in cortice (Co. Litt. 283). (He who sticks in the letter sticks in the bark)—that is to say, he who considers merely the letter of an instrument cannot comprehend its meaning; he never gets at its true inwardness. The law on the other hand, concerns itself with the substance, as distinguished from the form, of any matter. Compare FALSA DEMONSTRATIO, ETC.

Qui in jus dominiumve alterius succedit jure ejus uti debet (D. 50, 17, 177). (He who succeeds to the right or property of another ought to be clothed with his right.) If he takes over the rights he does not escape the liabilities: see ASSIGNATUS, ETC.

Qui jure suo utitur neminem lædit (D. 50, 17, 151). (He who exercises his legal right inflicts upon no one any injury [for which an action lies].) For here there is damnum sine injuria (q.v.).

Qui jussu judicis aliquod fecerit non videtur dolo malo fecisse quia parere necesse est (10 Rep. 76). (He who does anything by command of a judge will not be supposed to have acted from an improper motive; because there is an obligation to obey.) The maxim is cited by Coke in support of the rule that no action will lie against anyone executing the order of a Court, given in a matter within its jurisdiction, even though it be given erroneously or irregularly. Compare JUDICIUM A NON, ETC.

Quilibet potest renunciare juri pro se introducto (2 Inst. 183). (Every man is entitled to renounce a right introduced in his favour.) And so a defendant may waive his right to plead the Statute of Limitations where a debt is barred by that enactment. But there are exceptions to the principle embodied in this maxim: see OMNES LICENTIAM, ETC.

Qui non habet in ære, luet in corpore (2 Inst. 173). (Let him who has not the money, pay with his person.) Quoted by Coke in connection with the provision contained in the Statute of Westminster I., c. 9, for the imprisonment (in default of payment of a penalty) of officials who had failed to apprehend felons; the familiar "ten shillings or seven days" of Courts of summary jurisdiction, is a modern instance.

Qui non improbat, approbat (3 Inst. 27). (He who does not disapprove, approves) provided, of course, that he would naturally express disapproval unless he in fact approves.

Qui non obstat quod obstare potest facere videtur (2 Inst. 146). (He who does not prevent what he can prevent is regarded as doing the thing.) See IDEM EST FACERE, ETC.

Qui non prohibet quod prohibere potest assentire videtur (2 Inst. 305). (He is deemed to consent who does not prohibit a thing which he has power to forbid.)

Quinquennial List. See VALUATION LIST.

Quinsisme. This word, of which there are many forms, meant a tax of one fifteenth part or quinzième: see FIFTEENTHS. See the statute 25 Edw. 3, st. 7.

Quint-exact; Quinto exactus. "Called for the fifth time," literally; used as meaning the fifth or last call in the old process of outlawry (q.v.).

Qui omne dicit nihil excludit (2 Inst. 81). (He who says "all" excludes nothing.) Cited in connection with the statement that a provision as to omnes viduae in the Statute of Merton related to every tenant in dower whether she took under one or the other of the five kinds of dower known to the law: and cited also in 11 Rep. at 29*b* as showing that, where it was provided that all penalties went to the Crown, then no one else got any part of them. See GENERALE TANTUM, ETC.

Qui peccat ebrius, luat sobrius (Cary, 133). (Let him who sins when drunk, be punished when sober.) Said of one who while drunk had slandered his neighbour. See DRUNKENNESS as to how far that condition is a defence in criminal matters.

Qui per alium facit, per seipsum facere videtur (Co. Litt. 258). (He who does anything by another is deemed to have done it himself.) See QUI FACIT, ETC.

Qui prior est tempore potior est jure (Co. Litt. 14). (He who is first in time has the strongest claim in law.) The principle embodied in this maxim governs the law as to lost property, wreck, derelicts, and waifs. Compare MELIOR EST CONDITIO, ETC.

Qui rationem in omnibus quærunt rationem subvertunt (2 Rep. 75). (They who search for reason in all things subvert reason.) Compare CONTRA NEGANTEM, ETC.; NON OMNIUM, ETC.; PRINCIPIORUM, ETC.

Qui sentit commodum sentire debet et onus; et e contra (1 Rep. 99). (He who enjoys the benefit ought also to bear the burden; and vice versa.) This rule applies precisely in the case of a covenant running with the land and in the case of a contract which is made on behalf of or is assigned to another.

Qui tacet consentire videtur (Jenk. Cent. 32). (He who is silent is deemed to consent), provided that the circumstances are such that it would have been natural for him to express dissent unless he actually consents. Compare QUI NON IMPROBAT, ETC.

Qui tam Action. See PENAL ACTION.

Quit Claim "is," says the Termes de la Ley, "a release or acquitting of a man for any action that he [the releasor] hath or might have against him." "Fleta," says Coke, "calleth it charta de quietâ clamantiâ." The expression "quit claim" is used in old-fashioned releases as an operative word equivalent to "release." See QUIETE CLAMARE.

Quit Rent. See RENT.

Quittance. An acquittance (q.v.).

Qui vult decipi decipiatur (1 De G. M. & G. 687, 710). (If a man wants to be deceived, then let him be deceived.) That is to say, if a man enters into an agreement with express knowledge of the falsehood of representations upon the faith of which the agreement is made, he cannot afterwards be heard to plead such false representations; but the case is otherwise if he has only the means of knowledge, as distinguished from express knowledge, and has negligently failed to avail himself of such means.

Quoad. "Regarding," "as to": generally in the phrase quoad hoc (regarding this).

Quod ab initio non valet, in tractu temporis non convalescit (4 Rep. 2). (That which is bad from the beginning does not improve by length of time.) Cited in the Case of Tanistry (Dav. 32), as showing that where a custom was bad at its inception, it could never become good through lapse of time.

Quod ædificatur in areâ legatâ cedit legato. (That which is built on ground that is devised passes to the devisee.) The general rule is that the devisee is entitled to everything which is affixed to the land. See FIXTURES; compare QUICQUID PLANTATUR, ETC.

Quod approbo non reprobo. (What I approbate I do not reprobate: that is to say, I cannot blow hot and cold.) And so where a condition is annexed to a bequest the legatee cannot accept the bequest and reject the condition. Compare QUI SENTIT, ETC.

Quod clerici beneficiati de cancellaria. A writ which anciently lay for a clerk of the Chancery to exempt him from contributions in respect of the proctors (q.v.) of the clergy.

Quod clerici non eligantur in officio. A writ under which a clerk could obtain exemption from serving in some office for which he was eligible by reason of lands which he held.

Quod computet. In the ancient action of accompt, one of the steps was a judgment of quod computet, by which auditors, or persons to take the account, were appointed. When the account was completed, there was a final judgment for the amount found due. See ACCOUNT, ACTION OF.

Quod constat curiæ, opere testium non indiget (2 Inst. 662). (What is well known to the Court needs not the help of witnesses.) Coke is speaking of propositions of law.

Quod contra legem fit, pro infecto habetur (Grounds of Law, 405). (What is done contrary to law is deemed not to have been done at all—that is to say, it is a nullity.) Compare QUOD AB, ETC.

Quod contra rationem juris receptum, non est producendum ad consequentias (D. 50, 17, 141). (That which is received against the reason of the law is not to be advanced to a precedent.) The corresponding maxim of our law is QUÆ CONTRA, ETC.

Quod cum. "For that whereas": formerly used in pleadings and indictments

Quodcunque aliquis ob tutelam corporis sui fecerit, jure id fecisse videtur (2 Inst. 590). (Whatsoever anyone shall do in defence of his person, that he is considered to have done legally.) But, continues Coke, there must be "inevitabilis necessitas," as where a prisoner breaks out of his prison in order to save his life when it has been set on fire, otherwise than by his privity.

Quod dubitas ne feceris (Hale P. C. 300). (Do nothing about which you feel doubtful.)

Quod ei deforceat was a writ or action which lay for the recovery of land where a tenant for life, in tail, or the like, had lost the right of possession through his default or non-appearance in a possessory action. It was abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36.

Quod est inconveniens, aut contra rationem, non permissum est in lege (Co. Litt. 178). (What is inconvenient, or contrary to reason, is not permitted in law.) Compare NIHIL QUOD EST INCONVENIENS, ETC.

Quod fieri debet facile præsumitur (Hale Max. 153). (What ought to be done is easily presumed [to have been done].) Compare OMNIA PRÆSUMUNTUR RITE, ETC.

Quod fieri non debet factum valet. (What ought not to be done is valid if it has been done.) This very sweeping statement is, as a proposition of general application, erroneous and dangerous. It is safer to refer to the dictum (5 Rep. 38), "fieri non debuit sed factum valeat" (it ought not to have been done, but, since it has been done, it will be regarded as valid), which was acted on at L. R. 4 Q. B. 85, in a case where the Court declined to go into the question of the legality of payments made to special constables, who had been irregularly appointed and where the payments had not been regularly sanctioned.

Quod in minori valet valebit in majori; et quod in majori non valet nec valebit in minori (Co. Litt. 260). (What avails in the lesser will avail in the greater; and what does not avail in the greater will not avail in the lesser.) Compare ARGUMENTUM A MINORE, ETC.; OMNE MAJUS, ETC.

Quod meum est sine facto meo vel defectu meo amitti vel in alium transferri non potest (Prest. Abs. 147). Practically the same as QUOD NOSTRUM, ETC. (q.v.).

Quod necessarie intelligitur id non deest (1 Bulst. 71). (There is no omission of a thing which is necessarily understood)—for the law impliedly inserts it.

Quod necessarium est, est licitum (Jenk. Cent. 85). (Anything which is necessary is also lawful.) See NECESSITAS, ETC.

Quod non apparet non est (2 Inst. 479). (That which does not appear does not exist); that is to say, the Court knows nothing of anything except what is proved in the case Compare DE NON APPARENTIBUS, ETC.; INCERTA PRO, ETC.

Quod non habet principium non habet finem (Co. Litt. 345). (That which has not a beginning has not an end: which is as much as to say that no structure can exist without a foundation.) Compare DEBILE, ETC.

Quod non legitur non creditur (4 Inst. 304). (What is not read is not believed.) This maxim may very well be applied to "an unreported decision of Mr. Justice ——," occasionally cited by counsel when in difficulties.

Quod nostrum est, sine facto sive defectu nostro, amitti seu in alium transferri non potest (8 Rep. 92). (That which is ours cannot be lost or transferred to another without our own act, or our own fault): except, of course, by force of a statute.

Quod nullius est, est domini regis (Fleta, l. 3). (That which is the property of nobody, belongs to our lord the king.) Whenever the owner or person actually seised of land dies intestate and without heir, the law vests the ownership of such land either in the Crown, or in the subordinate lord of the fee, by escheat. The Crown is entitled to the undisposed-of personal estate of any person who happens to die without next-of-kin.

Quod nullius est id ratione naturali occupanti conceditur (D. 41, 1, 3). (That which is no one's is granted to the occupant by natural right.) But nowadays the occupant of land in this country has, as such, no title thereto, except such as he may acquire under the Statutes of Limitation. See, however, POTIOR EST CONDITIO POSSIDENTIS.

Quod per me non possum, nec per alium (4 Rep. 24). (What I cannot do in person, I cannot do by proxy.) Compare NEMO POTEST PLUS, ETC.

Quod permittat. Formerly this was a writ which lay against one who built a house, wall, etc., which was a nuisance to his neighbour's land. It was also a writ which lay for the heir of one disseised of common of pasture. All writs of quod permittat were abolished by s. 36 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833.

Quod persona nec prebendarii. A writ which formerly lay to exempt ecclesiastical persons from distress for FIFTEENTHS (q.v.).

Quod prius est verius; et quod prius est tempore potius est jure (Co. Litt. 347). (What is first is truer, and what is first in time is better in law.) Coke quotes this in support of his statement "that the law preferreth a sure and constant right, though it be little, before a great estate by wrong and defeasible."

Quod remedio destituitur ipsâ re valet si culpa absit (Bac. Max. Reg. 9). (That which is without remedy avails of itself if there be no fault in the party seeking to enforce it.) "The benignity of the law is such," says Bacon, "that, when, to preserve the principles and grounds of law, it deprives a man of his remedy without his own fault, it will rather put him in a better degree and condition than a worse; for if it disable him to pursue his action, or to make his claim, sometimes it will give him the thing itself by operation of law without any act of his own; sometimes it will give him a more beneficial remedy." The maxim applies in the case of retainer—that is, where a creditor is made executor or administrator to his debtor—for he cannot sue himself. See NEMO AGIT, ETC.

Quod semel aut bis existit prætereunt legislatores (D. 1, 3, 6). (Legislators pass over that which happens only once or twice.) Compare AD EA, ETC.

Quod semel meum est amplius meum esse non potest (Co. Litt. 49*b*). (What is once mine cannot be more fully mine.) Coke cites this maxim as illustrating the old law that livery of seisin could not be made to one in actual possession of lands.

Quod semel placuit in electione, amplius displicere non potest (Co. Litt. 146). (Where choice is once made it cannot be altered.) Coke cites this maxim in support of the old law that, where a rentcharge was in arrear, the grantee of the charge might either sue out the writ of annuity against the grantor, or distrain the lands; but that if the grantee took the latter course and in an action of replevin (q.v.) made avowry, the action of annuity was thereby barred. The maxim is nowadays quoted in support of the rule that, where a contract is induced by fraud, the person defrauded may within a reasonable time elect either to treat the contract as valid or to rescind it, and that he must abide by such election as he makes.

Compare ELECTIO SEMEL, ETC.

Quod subintelligitur non deest (Ld. Raym. 832). (What is understood is not lacking.) This is practically the same as QUOD NECESSARIE, ETC.

Quod vanum et inutile est, lex non requirit (Co. Litt. 319). (The law requires not what is vain and useless.) Practically the same as LEX NEMINEM COGIT AD, ETC.; LEX NON COGIT, ETC. See LEX EST RATIO, ETC.

Quoits. See CLOSH.

Quo jure. A species of writ of right. It compelled claimants to common in the land of another to show their title. Abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36.

Quo ligatur, eo dissolvitur (2 Rolle, 21). (Whatsoever binds can also release.) Compare EODEM LIGAMINE, ETC.

Quo minus. Literally, "by which the less." These were the initial words—and the short title—of the writ by means of which (see FICTION) the Court of Exchequer obtained its extended jurisdiction. The writ was impliedly abolished by the Uniformity of Process Act, 2 & 3 Will 4, c. 39, s. 1, which substituted the modern writ of summons in all personal actions in all the common law Courts.

Quomodo quid constituitur eodem modo dissolvitur (Jenk. Cent. 74). (In the same manner by which anything is constituted, so also is it dissolved.) This is from the Doctor and Student (q.v.), 2 Dial. Compare QUO LIGATUR, ETC.

Quorum. When a committee, board of directors, meeting of shareholders, or other body of persons, cannot act unless a certain number at least of them are present, that number is called a quorum. Thus, a first meeting of creditors in bankruptcy cannot act for any purpose, except the election of a chairman, the proving of debts, and the adjournment of the meeting, unless a quorum of three creditors (or all the creditors if the number be less than three) are present (Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 13, Sch. I. (24)).

The expression quorum is derived from the use of the word in the form of commission (q.v.) of the peace, which was issued up to 1878. The justices "quorum aliquem vestrum A. B. C. D. unum esse volumus" were known as "justices of the quorum" until such time as every justice was named as of the quorum, so as to put all on the same footing.

Quorum nomina. A form of writ framed in the fifteenth century for the purpose of enabling accountants to the king to obtain their quietus (q.v.) at less expense than had previously been necessary.

Quotiens dubia interpretatio libertatis est secundum libertatem respondendum est (D. 50, 17, 20). (Whenever it is possible to decide either for liberty or against it, then the decision in favour of liberty should be given.)

Quotiens idem sermo duas sententias exprimit: ea potissimum excipiatur, quæ rei generandæ aptior est (D. 50, 17, 67). (Whenever the same language is capable of two meanings, that is to be taken which is the better fitted for effecting the proposed end.)

Quoties in verbis nulla est ambiguitas ibi nulla expositio contra verba expressa fienda est (Co. Litt. 147). (When in the words there is no ambiguity, then no interpretation contrary to the actual words is to be adopted.) Coke is speaking of deeds. See AMBIGUITY; compare A VERBIS, ETC.; MALEDICTA, ETC.

Quousque. See PROHIBITION; SEIZURE.

Quo warranto. The writ of quo warranto is a high prerogative writ by the Crown against one who claims or usurps any office, franchise or liberty, to inquire "by what authority" he supports his claim. It lies also in cases of non-user, or mis-user, of a franchise, or where any public trust is executed without authority, though it may be no usurpation of a franchise of the Crown. The prerogative writ of quo warranto, however, has long fallen into disuse, having been supplanted by what is called an "information in the nature of a writ of quo warranto," where in the process is speedier, and the judgment not so inconveniently decisive, as on the ancient writ: it is now the usual remedy in the case of corporation disputes between private persons, without the intervention of the prerogative, by virtue of the Municipal Offices Act, 1710 (9 Ann. c. 20), s. 4, which permits an information in the nature of a quo warranto to be brought with leave of the Court, at the relation of any person desiring to prosecute the same (who is then styled the relator) against any person usurping, intruding into, or unlawfully holding any franchise or office in any city, borough or town corporate.

A private relator can only challenge the right of an individual to act as a member of a corporation; the right of a corporation as an aggregate to act, can be challenged only by the Attorney-General. Such application as a private relator can make must be made within twelve months after the alleged disqualification arose (Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 225; Local Government Act, 1888, s. 75).

Where statutory provision is made for testing, by way of election petition, the validity of an election to any municipal office, then information in the nature of a quo warranto will not lie (Municipal Elections Act, 1882, s. 87; Local Government Act, 1894, s. 48).

A proposed relator cannot appear in person; any application relating to quo warranto must be made by counsel.

The statute 18 Edw. 1 contains two statutes each known as the Statutum de Quo Warranto.

Quum principalis causa non consistit, ne ea quidem quæ sequuntur locum habent (D. 50, 17, 129). (When the principal cause does not hold its ground, then the things which arise thereout have no place.) Compare ACCESSORIUM NON DUCIT, ETC.; QUÆ ACCESSIONUM, ETC.

R

"R." See BRANDING.

Rabbits. Trespass in the daytime in pursuit of rabbits is punishable summarily under ss. 30-32 of the Game Act, 1831 (which terms rabbits "coneys"); so also, under the Night Poaching Act, 1828, s. 1, is the unlawful taking of them by night (q.v.); and unlawful entry by three or more armed persons at night, for the purpose of taking them, is punishable on indictment under s. 9 of the last-mentioned Act. Sections 1, 9 of the Act of 1828 apply to game (q.v.) as well as to rabbits.

Under the Forestry Act, 1919, s. 4, the Forestry Commissioners are empowered to cause entry to be made upon any lands for the purpose of destroying "rabbits, hares or vermin" which destroy trees or tree plants. Rabbits are not vermin under any statute or otherwise. See VERMIN.

See AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS ACTS; ANIMALS, LIABILITY FOR; GAME; GROUND GAME.

Rabies. Canine madness. This is one of the diseases for the prevention of which orders may be made pursuant to the statutes mentioned under ANIMALS, DISEASES OF.

Racecourse. Within ten miles of Charing Cross, no race can take place between horses, nor can horses run against time, except upon a racecourse licensed by the County Council (Racecourses Licensing Act, 1879; Local Government Act, 1888, s. 3 (v)).

Racing Tips. Neither the giving, nor the publication of advertisements offering to give racing tips (or prophecies as to the winning of horse-races) is illegal.

Rackrent. See RENT.

Radknight; Radman. A Rodknight (q.v.).

Raffle. A sale of some chattel by way of a lottery (q.v.).

Rageman, Statute of. A statute under which justices were appointed to hear and determine complaints which had arisen throughout the kingdom during the twenty-five years preceding the Michaelmas of that year. These justices were sometimes described as juratores de rageman. The commission of Trailbaston (q.v.) dated from this statute. It is printed as 4 Edw. 1 in the Statutes of the Realm and as of uncertain date in the Statutes at Large, Vol. 9, App., p. 25.

Rag Flock. The Rag Flock Act, 1911, prohibits the sale and the possession for sale or use in upholstering or for bedding, etc., of flock [the substance produced by tearing rags into shreds] made from any rags which do not conform to the standard of cleanliness which is prescribed pursuant to the Act.

Ragged School. The Sunday and Ragged Schools (Exemption from Rating) Act, 1869, provides (s. 1) that any rating authority may exempt from any rate any building used exclusively as a Sunday School or a Ragged School. The Act (s. 2) defines a Sunday School as "any school used for giving religious instruction to children and young persons on Sundays and on weekdays for the holding of classes and meetings in furtherance of the same object and without pecuniary profit being derived therefrom": it also gives a definition of "ragged schools" which is omitted in view of the fact that the establishment of free education by the State has made such schools obsolete.

Ragler; Raglor. The sheriff or constable or other chief officer of a Welsh commote (q.v.).

Ragman = Rageman (q.v.).

Railway. Railways in England are generally constructed under private Acts of Parliament, which confer the power of compulsorily purchasing the lands required for the line. A railway Act also almost invariably incorporates the Clauses Acts (q.v.) as amended by subsequent Acts. Railways are further subject to numerous Acts of Parliament, the chief of which are the many Railway Regulation Acts passed between 1840 and 1898, the Railway and Canal Traffic Acts, 1854 to 1894, and the Railways Act, 1921; the last-mentioned Act has provided for the reorganisation of the entire railway system of England, Scotland and Wales. The provisions of some of these Acts are enforced by the Ministry of Transport and the Board of Trade, others by the Railway and Canal Commissioners, and the Railway Rates Tribunal (q.v.).

As to how far a railway company is a carrier, see CARRIER.

The Railways (Electrical Power) Act, 1903, provides facilities for the electrification of what have hitherto been steam railways.

See LIGHT RAILWAYS; CHEAP TRAINS.

Railway Commission. This was a body of three commissioners appointed under the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, principally to enforce the provisions of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, by compelling railway and canal companies to give reasonable facilities for traffic, to abstain from giving unreasonable preference to any company or person, and to forward through traffic at through rates. They also had the supervision of working agreements between companies. The statutory authority for the existence of the commission expired on 31st December, 1882, as from which date the Railway and Canal Commission (q.v.) was in operation and replaced it.

Railway and Canal Commission. This is a Court established by the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888 (s. 1). It consists of two non-judicial commissioners (one of them a person experienced in railway management) with salaries of £3,000 a year each, who are appointed on the recommendation of the President of the Board of Trade, and three ex-officio commissioners, consisting of an English judge nominated by the Lord Chancellor, a Scotch judge nominated by the Lord President of the Court of Session, and an Irish judge nominated formerly by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland (ss. 3, 4), but now possibly by the Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland. The ex-officio commissioners hold office for five years; and they act respectively in England, Scotland and Northern Ireland (s. 4). The commission deals with all such matters as were within the jurisdiction of the Railway Commission (q.v.), except in so far as those matters have been transferred to the Railway Rates Tribunal (q.v.); and it has jurisdiction not merely as regards matters directly relating to railways and canals but also as regards matters such as the construction of telegraphs and the water supply of the metropolis.

Railway Passenger Duty. A duty at the rate of 5 per cent. upon passenger fares imposed (with certain exceptions—see CHEAP TRAINS) by the Railway Passenger Duty Act, 1842.

Railway Rates Tribunal. The Railways Act, 1921, s. 20, provided for the establishment of a Court styled the Railway Rates Tribunal (which—see s. 84—is not concerned with Ireland), consisting of three permanent members of whom "one shall be a person of experience in commercial affairs, one a person experienced in railway business, and one, who shall be the president, shall be an experienced lawyer." Our law know a barrister: it knows a solicitor; but it knows nothing whatever of a "lawyer." If, as is presumably the case, it was intended that both barristers and solicitors should be eligible for the position of president, it is unfortunate that the statute does not say so in words known to the law. It is provided (s. 27) that this new tribunal shall, as from "the appointed day (see s. 31), exercise all the functions and powers of the Railway and Canal Commission which, under various sections of the Act, are made exercisable by the tribunal.

Railways Amalgamation Tribunal. The Railways Act, 1921, s. 9, established a temporary tribunal, styled the Railways Amalgamation Tribunal, to deal with schemes of amalgamation and absorption of railways in connection with the re-organisation to be effected under the Act.

Ram Alley. See PRIVILEGED PLACES.

Ranger. Anciently this was an officer of the forest, appointed by royal letters patent. He enquired about and prosecuted for trespass at the forest court and enforced the forest laws generally. Now the term merely means a keeper of a park, etc.

Rank. A claim to a prescriptive payment, such as a modus, is said to be rank when it is excessive, and therefore void. Thus if a modus set up is so large that it exceeds what would have been, in the time of Richard I., the value of the tithes in lieu of which it is claimed, the modus is rank and destroys itself.

Ransom. Anciently those who held by knight's tenure were under obligation to ransom, or pay money for the release of, their lord when he was captured in war.

Under the Naval Prize Act, 1864, s. 45, the King may by Order in Council prohibit, allow, or regulate the ransoming of ships or goods captured by an enemy. Nothing was heard of ransom during the war of 1914-1918.

Rape. In civil law, a rape is a division of the county of Sussex. The rapes are Chichester, Arundel, Bramber, Lewes, Pevensey and Hastings: they appear to have been military governments in early Norman times.

Rape. In criminal law, rape is the act of having carnal knowledge of a woman against her will or without her conscious permission, or where her permission has been extorted by force or fear of immediate bodily harm. Rape is a felony, punishable with penal servitude for life (Offences against the Person Act, 1861, s. 48). Connection with a married woman by personation of her husband is rape (Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, s. 4). Upon an indictment for rape the jury may convict for indecent assault (ib., s. 9). See AGE; CORROBORATION; INDECENT ASSAULT.

Rape of the Forest. Anciently this meant trespass, with violence, on the forest.

Rapid Successions. See ESTATE DUTY.

Rapine. Larceny with violence; robbery. The word occurs in the title ("An Act for the Prevention of Theft and Rapine upon the Northern Borders of England") of the statute 14 Car. 2, c. 22; but neither in that Act nor elsewhere is it used as a legal description of an offence.

Raptu heredis, De. The ancient writ subsequently known as the writ of RAVISHMENT DE GARD (q.v.).

Rasure. An obsolete form of erasure (q.v.): the act of erasing.

Rate; Rateable. A rate is a sum assessed or made payable by a body having local jurisdiction over the district in which the person on whom the rate is assessed dwells or has property. (See TAXATION.) There are also rates—such as water rates, charged by ordinary water companies—which are modes of charging for the sale of commodities, and therefore do not fall within the ordinary definition of rates. Rates are almost always, if not invariably, assessed in respect of the enjoyment or occupation of real property in proportion to its value (pro rata, whence the term "rate"); and when a person has such an occupation of property as to be liable to payment of rates, his occupation is said to be rateable. The oldest rate appears to be that imposed for the relief of the poor, and the principles on which it is assessed and levied have been followed (with certain modifications) in the case of other rates. Those principles may be shortly stated as follows:—It is only the beneficial occupation which is rateable, and therefore, in arriving at the value of it, repairs, insurance and other necessary outgoings are allowed to be deducted. For the same reason unoccupied houses (e.g., a house in the custody of a caretaker) and unfinished buildings are not rateable. On the other hand, the fact that the occupation of property is in effect unprofitable, because the occupier has a heavy rent or other outgoings to bear, or because the income arising from the occupation is devoted to charitable or public purposes, does not affect his liability to be rated.

See the Parochial Assessment Act, 1836, s. 1, which directs the rateable value of hereditaments rated for the relief of the poor to be calculated upon an estimate of the rent at which the same might reasonably be expected to let from year to year, free of all usual tenants' rates and taxes and tithe commutation rentcharge, if any, and deducting therefrom the probable average annual cost of the repairs, insurance and other expenses, if any, necessary to maintain them in a state to command such rent. Special provisions as to rating the owners instead of the occupiers of property in certain cases, and as to rating unoccupied property, are contained in the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 211. As to the rating of woods, plantations, mines, and sporting rights, see the Rating Act, 1874.

The principal kinds of rates are: (i) borough rates made by a borough council under ss. 144-9 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882; there are also special rates levied under s. 197 of the same Act in some boroughs, e.g., watch rates for defraying police expenses; (ii) county rates, assessed by the county councils for the respective counties of England, under s. 68 of the Local Government Act, 1888; (iii) county police rates, levied by county councils under the County Police Act, 1840, s. 3, and the Local Government Act, 1888, ss. 3 (i), 68 (5); (iv) poor rates, as to which see GUARDIANS OF THE POOR; OVERSEERS; POOR LAWS; (v) highway rates, levied in urban districts under the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 216 (3), for the repair of highways (q.v.); (vi) rates levied by urban authorities, of which the chief are—(a) the general district rate, leviable to defray the ordinary expenses of an urban authority in the execution of the Public Health Acts; (b) private improvement rates, levied under the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 213, on the occupiers of particular premises in respect of works executed by an urban authority for the benefit of such premises, or by a rural authority in the like circumstances under s. 232 of the same Act; (vii) rates which the metropolitan borough councils (who are now charged with the execution of the Metropolis Management Acts, 1855 to 1893), are authorised to levy to defray their expenses, namely, a sewers rate, a lighting rate, and a general rate (Metropolis Management Act, 1855, s. 158 et seq.); (viii.) a consolidated rate which the London County Council is authorised to levy, under the Metropolitan Board of Works, 1869, to defray their expenses in the execution of the Metropolis Management Acts, and for paying interest on and redeeming the moneys borrowed by them: the rate is levied by precept on the borough councils, who add the amount to their own expenses; (ix) a police rate, which in part covers the expenses of the Metropolitan Police, the balance being paid by the Treasury; (x) rates (known as watch rates), levied under the Lighting and Watching Act, 1833, for lighting and watching any parish in which the Act is adopted; "watching" means the employment of police or constables; (xi) various rates under Acts of local application, such as improvement rates, sewers and drainage rates, levied by improvement commissioners and other bodies.

See TOWNS IMPROVEMENT.

Rates Advisory Committee. The Ministry of Transport Act, 1919, s. 21, provided that, for the purpose of advising the Minister of Transport as to rates, fares, dues, tolls, etc., there should be a committee, with a legal member nominated by the Lord Chancellor, two members representing the trading and agricultural interests, nominated by the Board of Trade, two members representing the one the employers and the other the men in the transportation business, nominated by the Minister of Transport, and a further additional member also nominated by the Minister; that all or any of the members might be paid; and that the Committee might examine witnesses on oath. This Committee was duly created: but the Railways Act, 1921, s. 80 (4), provides that it shall continue to exist only so long as it may be necessary for the purposes of references under the Harbours, Docks and Piers (Temporary Increase of Charges) Act, 1920; and that Act expires on 15th February, 1923.

Rates Tribunal. The name used in the Railways Act, 1921, to describe the Railway Rates Tribunal (q.v.)

Rate-tithe. A tithe formerly payable pro rata for beasts kept in a parish during less than a year.

Ratification is where a person adopts a contract or other transaction which is not binding on him, because it was entered into by an unauthorised agent, or the like. Thus, if A enters into a contract on behalf of B, without having B's authority to do so, B may either repudiate or adopt the contract; if he adopts it he is said to ratify it, and it then takes effect as if it had been originally made with his authority. It is sometimes a question whether a person's act amounts to a ratification, or is a fresh contract altogether. A fresh contract between the same parties always requires a consideration to support it, while in the case of a ratification there may or may not be a new consideration. As to ratification by infants, see INFANT.

It follows from the nature of the thing that ratification, in the proper sense of the word, cannot take place where the party who professes to ratify a transaction was not in existence when it took place; as where a person enters into a contract as promoter or trustee on behalf of a company which is to be subsequently formed, and the company when formed adopts it. This is making a new contract, and not ratifying an existing one.

The doctrine of ratification is also applied to torts: as where a person ratifies a trespass.

See OMNIS RATIHABITIO RETROTRAHITUR, ETC.; ADOPT; REPUDIATION; AUTHORITY; ULTRA VIRES.

Ratihabitio mandato comparatur (D. 50, 17, 60). (Ratification is equivalent to a command.) That is to say, to a command given before the doing of the act which is ratified.

Ratio. Anciently this meant a cause or a judgment delivered therein. Ponere ad rationem meant to cite one to appear in judgment. Ratio, of course, means also a reason, as in the phrase ratio decidendi (the reason or ground of a decision).

Ratio legis est anima legis (Jenk. Cent. 45). (The reason for the law is the soul of the law.) That is to say, for the proper understanding of a statute or of a rule of the law, one must understand why the statute or the rule came into existence. Compare CESSANTE RATIONE, ETC.

Rationabile estoverium. Proper alimony: see ESTOVERS.

Rationabili parte, De. This writ lay for brothers in gavelkind and sisters and other coparceners. The writ claimed a certain portion of the land to be held in severalty or, in modern parlance, partition (q.v.). It was abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36.

Rationabili parte bonorum, De. Anciently where a custom existed—as was the case in some places—that one-third of a man's chattels should go to his wife, another third to his children, and the remaining third as he directed by his will, this writ de rationabili parte bonorum might be brought by the wife or the children to enforce their rights. This custom existed down to a late period. We have the statute 4 & 5 Will. & Mar. c. 2, entitled "An Act that the inhabitants of the Province of York may dispose of their personal Estates by their Wills, notwithstanding the custom of that province," that is to say the archbishopric of York. A few years afterwards the statute 7 & 8 Will. 3, c. 38, was passed "to take away the Custome of Wales which hinders persons from disposing of their personal Estates by their Wills."

Until 1st June, 1725, even freemen of the City of London were unable to dispose by will of their personal estates: see the statute 11 Geo. 1, c. 18, pream. and s. 17. This deterred citizens of the better class from becoming freemen; and the local and parliamentary franchises (see COMPANIES, CITY) were thus largely in the hands of an undesirable class.

Rationalibus divisis, De. This was a writ commanding the sheriff to delimit the boundaries of the lands of adjoining tenants for life or in fee simple: it belonged to the period of the grand assize and trial by battle.

Ratione tenuræ. This means "by reason or in respect of his tenure." Thus, when a person is liable to repair a highway by reason of his having the tenure or occupation of the adjoining lands, his obligation is said to be ratione tenuræ.

Rats and Mice. The Rats and Mice (Destruction) Act, 1919, makes the occupier of any land, house, etc., liable to a penalty not exceeding £20 if he fails to take reasonable steps for the destruction of rats and mice thereon. In default of his taking proper steps the local authority, or in their default, the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries, may take action: and the Act, in addition to applying to ships as if they were land, provides for the infliction of penalties on masters who fail, after receipt of the prescribed notice, to take steps to prevent rats and mice from getting ashore.

Rattening. This, in popular phraseology, is where the members of a trade union cause the tools, clothes or other property of a workman to be taken away or hidden, in order to compel him to join the union or cease working. Under s. 7 of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, it is an offence punishable by fine or imprisonment. (See MOLESTATION.) It is not now much practised; trades unions now employ other methods of intimidation.

Ravishment is the old name for the tortious act of taking away a wife from her husband, or a ward from his guardian.

Ravishment de gard. A writ which anciently lay for the guardian by knight service or in socage against one who deprived him of the custody of his ward. It was abolished in 1660 along with the Court of Wards and Liveries (q.v.). Also known as the writ de hæredе rapto.

Reader. These were ancients or benchers of the Inns of Court who were selected to give "readings" or dissertations in their Inns. A "double reader" was one who had been already a reader eight or nine years before. Bacon and Littleton were both double readers. Election as a "double reader" was a mark of distinction and, down to 1664, gave the right of calling at first four and then eight students to the Bar.

At the Temple Church there is a clergyman, known as the "Reader," who reads the lessons and preaches on Sunday afternoons. He is elected by the two Temples alternately, and they each pay half his salary. Compare MASTER OF THE TEMPLE.

Reading In. Every clergyman of the Church of England who is instituted or collated to any benefice or preachership must, on the first Sunday that he officiates in his church, publicly read the Thirty-nine Articles and then make a declaration in which he assents to the Articles and undertakes to use the forms in the Book of Common Prayer, "and none other except so far as shall be ordered by lawful authority" (Clerical Subscription Act, 1865, ss. 1, 7). If he does not go through these formalities (popularly known as "reading in") his institution or collation becomes void (ib. s. 7). No clear explanation appears to be forthcoming as to how certain clergymen with a pronounced taste for ritual reconcile the forms used in their churches with the undertaking mentioned above.

Re-afforest. This meant to turn again into forest land which had been disafforested: the statute 20 Car. 2, c. 3, did so as regards the Forest of Dean.

Real. See ACTION; COVENANT; EVIDENCE; PERSONAL; IN PERSONAM; IN REM; REAL PROPERTY; REPRESENTATIVE; SECURITY.

Real Composition. An agreement made between the owner of land and the incumbent of a parish, with the consent of the ordinary and the patron of the living, that the land should for the future be discharged from payment of tithes, by reason of some land or other real recompense given in lieu and satisfaction thereof. But since the enactment of the statute 13 Eliz. c. 10, no real composition can be made for any longer term than three lives or twenty-one years, and such compositions are now rarely heard of. See TITHES.

Real Property. Property which, on the death of the owner intestate, passes to his heir through the real representative. Real property is commonly divided into lands, tenements, and hereditaments. See those titles.

Real Representative. The Land Transfer Act, 1897, recites in the preamble that it is expedient to establish a real representative. It does not, however, then proceed to establish a real representative by that name, nor does it define the meaning of the expression; but in Part I. (entitled Establishment of a Real Representative) it enacts (s. 1) that realty shall, as personalty already did, vest in the personal representative of a deceased person; and this makes an executor or administrator a real representative, as regards realty.

Real Securities. First mortgages of real estate; freehold ground rents; and (Trustee Act, 1893, s. 5) first mortgages of property held for an unexpired term of not less than two hundred years, and not subject to any rent exceeding one shilling a year or to any condition of re-entry except for non-payment of rent. Trustees can invest in such securities unless expressly forbidden by the instrument creating the trust (ib. s. 1) or by statute (s. 50).

Realty is the same as real property. In the old books, an "action in the realty" is a real action.

Reapsilver. Formerly this was a yearly payment made by tenants to a lord for exemption from the duty of reaping for him.

Reasonable Parts. The shares in which the chattels of a deceased were divided in places where there was the custom mentioned under RATIONABILI PARTE BONORUM.

Re-assurance. See RE-INSURANCE.

Re-attachment. This was a second attachment of one who had formerly been attached and had been dismissed the Court without day by reason of the non-coming of the judges or some such casualty. A cause discontinued or put without day could be revived only by re-attachment or re-summons (q.v.).

Rebate is a deduction made from a payment. In bankruptcy a creditor who has proved for a debt payable in futuro does not receive the full amount of the dividends with the other creditors, but must deduct from each dividend a rebate of interest at five per cent. in respect of the period from the declaration of the dividend to the time when the debt becomes payable (Bankruptcy Act, 1914, Sch. II., par. 22).

Rebellion. This means the levying of war against the King by persons who owe allegiance to him.

Anciently it meant also disobedience to the orders of the Courts. See COMMISSION.

Rebinare. To plough for the second or third time arable land lying fallow: see Fleta, lib. 2, c. 73.

Rebut. To rebut is to defeat or take away the effect of something. Thus, when a plaintiff in an action produces evidence which raises a presumption of the defendant's liability, and the defendant adduces evidence which shows that the presumption is ill-founded, he is said to rebut it (see PRESUMPTION). So, on a trial, when a fresh case (that is, a case not merely answering the case of the party who began) is set up by the responding party, and evidence is adduced in support of such fresh case, the party who began may give evidence to rebut it, called rebutting evidence, or proof of a rebutting case.

Rebutter. Under the practice before the Judicature Acts, both at common law and in Chancery, the rebutter was the pleading which followed the surrejoinder. It was rare at common law, and had long been obsolete in Chancery; but the name is still applicable to the corresponding pleading under the new system. See PLEADING.

In the old law of real property, to rebut was to repel or bar a claim. Thus when a person was sued for land which had been warranted to him by the plaintiff or his ancestor, and he pleaded the warranty as a defence to the action, this was called a rebutter.

Recaption is a species of remedy by act of the party which may be resorted to when a man has deprived another of his goods, or wrongfully detains his wife, child or servant: then the person injured may lawfully claim and retake them, so it be not in a riotous manner, or attended with a breach of the peace: but except in the case of chattels and, occasionally, children, such remedy is now practically obsolete.

Recaption, Writ of. If pending an action of replevin for a distress, the defendant distrains again for the same rent or service, the owner of the goods is not driven to another action of replevin, but is allowed a writ of recaption, by which he recovers the goods and damages for the defendant's contempt of the process of the law in making a second distress while the matter is sub judice. (See REPLEVIN.) This writ has never been actually abolished, but now the remedy would be an application for an injunction or to have the defendant committed for contempt of Court.

Recapture. By the doctrine of postliminium (q.v.) property which has been captured by an enemy and recaptured within twenty-four hours or before being taken to a place of safety, reverts to its original owner; the rule, however, varies with different nations. Under the Naval Prize Act, 1864, s. 40, British property captured at sea and recaptured at any time afterwards by a British ship, is to be restored to the owner on his paying to the recaptor prize-salvage (q.v.) at a rate to be fixed by the Prize Court (q.v.).

Receditur a placitis juris potius quam injuriæ et delicta maneant impunita (Bac. Max. Reg. 12). (We dispense with the forms of law rather than that crimes and wrongs should be unpunished.) But this maxim cannot be applied generally except where the maxim inter arma, etc., comes into operation. Bacon quotes it as illustrating various propositions of law which are wholly obsolete, such as: "if a man recovers by erroneous judgment and hath issue two daughters, and one of them is attainted, the writ of error shall be brought against both parceners notwithstanding the privity fail in the one."

Receipt generally means an acknowledgment of the receipt of money paid in discharge of a debt (see ACCOUNTABLE RECEIPT). A receipt under hand alone is in general only primâ facie evidence, but a receipt under seal amounts to an estoppel, and is conclusive. The forgery of a receipt is felony, punishable on indictment under s. 4 of the Forgery Act, 1913. Under the Stamp Act, 1891, s. 1, Sch. I., s. 101, every receipt (with certain specified exceptions) for £2 or over was liable to a stamp duty of one penny, payable by the use of an adhesive or impressed stamp. This duty was increased to twopence by s. 34 of the Finance Act, 1920. The giving of an unstamped receipt where a stamped receipt is required by law renders the person giving such receipt liable to a fine of £10 (Stamp Act, 1891, s. 103).

Formerly, in certain real and mixed actions, if a man seised of land in right of his wife was sued in respect of the land and made default, the wife might be received or admitted as a feme sole to defend her right. This was called receipt or defensio juris.

Receipt of the Exchequer. The legal description of the Exchequer (on its revenue side) before it was reorganised on modern lines. See, for instance, the statutes 5 Geo. 3, c. 26, 57 Geo. 3, c. 84, and 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 15.

Receipt Rolls. "Rolls" in the Record Office in which the moneys received by the Exchequer were entered during the reigns of Henry II., Richard, John, and Henry III.

See PELLS.

Receiver. In an action in any Division of the High Court, a receiver is a person appointed by the Court, on an interlocutory application, to receive the rents and profits of real estate, or to get in and collect personal property affected by the proceedings, where it appears desirable that he should do so in lieu of the person then having the control of the property, or where the latter is incompetent to do so, as in the case of an infant. The object is to protect the property until the rights of the parties have been ascertained; thus, in an action for the dissolution of a partnership, a receiver is frequently appointed to get in or realise the partnership assets; and under s. 23 of the Partnership Act, 1890 (see also Ord. 46, r. 1A) a receiver may be appointed over the share of an individual partner. A receiver is an officer of the Court, and generally has to give security for the due performance of his duties (see, generally, Ord. 50, rr. 16-22). See MANAGER.

A receiver is also sometimes appointed to enforce a judgment when the property of the defendant is such that ordinary execution by fi. fa., elegit, or the like, is inapplicable. As to this, see EXECUTION.

In bankruptcy the official receiver may be appointed interim receiver, at any time after the presentation of the petition, if that course be necessary for the preservation of the estate (Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 8), and it is his duty to act as interim receiver after adjudication until a trustee is appointed (s. 74).

A receiver may be, and very frequently is, appointed in lunacy proceedings. See LUNACY.

Sometimes provision is made by agreement for the appointment of a receiver in an extra-judicial matter: thus, a mortgage deed may contain an appointment of, or a power for the mortgagee to appoint, a person to be receiver or receiver and manager of the mortgaged property, in order to secure to the mortgagee the payment of his interest out of the rents and profits. A debenture may contain a similar provision. (See DEBENTURE.) Under s. 19 (1) (iii) of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, a mortgagee may appoint a receiver when the mortgage money has become due and (s. 24 (1)) when he has become entitled to exercise the power of sale conferred by that Act: as to the conditions of the exercise of the power of sale see s. 20.

Receiver-General. An officer of the Duchy Court of Lancaster who receives the revenue of the Duchy.

Receiver-General of Inland Revenue. A former officer of the Inland Revenue: his office was abolished by the Public Accounts and Charges Act, 1891, s. 1; under that section moneys formerly receivable by this officer are now paid direct into the Bank of England.

Receiver-General of the Muster Rolls. An officer mentioned in the statute 35 Eliz., c. 4.

Receiver of the Fines. Anciently this was an officer who received the money of all such as compounded with the king upon original writs.

Receiver of the First Fruits. In 1798, this was an officer of the Court of Exchequer (nominated by the Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty and appointed by the Treasury) whose office was worth about £50 a year after payment of expenses (Commons Committees' Reports (1803), Vol. 13, p. 319). It seems to have been a sinecure (ib., p. 201).

Receivers of Wreck are persons appointed by the Board of Trade under ss. 5, 6 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. The duties of a receiver of wreck are to take steps for the preservation of any vessel stranded or in distress within his district (ss. 511-513); to receive and take possession of all articles washed on shore from the vessel (s. 519); to use force for the suppression of plunder and disorder (s. 514); to institute an examination on oath with respect to the vessel (s. 517); and, if necessary, to sell the vessel, cargo or wreck (s. 522.) See WRECK.

Receiving Order. Where a petition, whether by a creditor or by a debtor himself, is presented in bankruptcy, the Court, on proof of the existence of the essentials of bankruptcy, will make what is known as a receiving order, the primary effect of which is to constitute the official receiver the interim receiver of the property of the debtor, and to restrain all legal proceedings against the person or property of the bankrupt in respect of any debt provable in the bankruptcy (Bankruptcy Act, 1914,

s. 7). See also s. 37 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, and rr. 179-188A of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1915. See BANKRUPTCY NOTICE.

Receiving Stolen Goods is the short name usually given to the offence of receiving any property with the knowledge that is has been feloniously or unlawfully stolen, taken, extorted, obtained, embezzled or disposed of. The crime is a felony or misdemeanour according as the original stealing, etc., was, or if committed within the United Kingdom would have been, a felony or misdemeanour, and is punishable on indictment with penal servitude or imprisonment for various terms, the maximum being fourteen years (Larceny Act, 1916, s. 33). A number of the less serious forms of larceny are punishable summarily under various sections of the Larceny Act, 1861; and, under ss. 97, 99 of that Act, any person receiving or aiding, etc., the receiving of any property in respect of which such summary conviction can be had, is himself liable on summary conviction to the same punishment as if he were the principal offender.

On any prosecution for receiving or possessing stolen property, (1) the possession of other property stolen within twelve months preceding the offence charged, and (2) any conviction during five years preceding the offence charged of an offence involving fraud or dishonesty, may be proved as evidence of guilty knowledge, provided that the last-mentioned fact may not be proved without giving the prescribed notice, and unless the property referred to in the pending charge is proved to have been found in possession of the prisoner (Larceny Act, 1916, s. 43).

Recent Possession. See POSSESSION.

Reception Order. This is the authorisation without which (or a summary reception order (q.v.) or an urgency order (q.v.)) no person, not being a pauper or a lunatic so found by inquisition, can be received and detained as a lunatic (Lunacy Act, 1890, s. 1 (1)) except (see s. 22) by a relation or friend. It can be made only by two or more Commissioners in Lunacy (s. 23) or a "judicial authority," that is to say, a County Court judge (s. 9) or a justice specially appointed for the purpose (ss. 9 (1), 10). A patient can be received under it only within seven days from its date (s. 36 (3)). Except in the case of a lunatic so found, it lasts for only one year from its date, but it can be continued indefinitely on production to the Commissioners in Lunacy of the requisite certificates, etc. (ib. s. 38; Lunacy Act, 1891, s. 7).

Recipitur in modum recipientis (5 Bing. N. C. 461). See QUICQUID SOLVITUR, ETC.

Reciprocity. In our law this is the same as mutuality (q.v.). The term is used in international law to denote the relation existing between two States when each of them gives the subjects of the other certain privileges, on condition that its own subjects shall enjoy similar privileges at the hands of the latter State.

Recitals in a deed, agreement or other formal instrument are statements introduced to explain or lead up to the operative part of the instrument. They are generally divided into narrative recitals, which set forth the facts on which the instrument is based; and introductory recitals, which explain the motive for the operative part. Thus, in an assignment of leasehold property, the deed commences by reciting the lease, that is, by stating that by an indenture of such a date made between such and such parties the property was demised to the lessee for a certain term: this is a narrative recital; the deed then recites that the assignee has agreed with the assignor (the original lessee) for the purchase of the property for the residue of the term: this is an introductory recital, being followed immediately by the operative part or assignment. A formal recital always commences with the word "whereas." The modern tendency is to omit narrative recitals, unless it be desirable to make them evidence of the facts stated in them.

A recital is evidence as against the parties to the instrument and those claiming under them; and in an action on the instrument itself (though not on a collateral matter) the recitals operate as an estoppel (q.v.). By the Vendors and Purchasers Act, 1874, s. 2, recitals in deeds and other instruments twenty years old are made primâ facie evidence of the truth of the facts, matters and descriptions therein recited.

Recognisance.—I. At common law a recognisance is an obligation or bond acknowledged before some Court of record or magistrate duly authorised, or before special commissioners appointed by the King, and afterwards entered of record, that is, enrolled in some Court of record (q.v.). The person acknowledging it, that is, the person bound by it, is called the conusor (or cognisor), and the person in whose favour it is made, the conusee (or cognisee). The object of a recognisance is to secure the performance of some act by the conusor, such as to appear at the assises, to keep the peace, to pay a debt, to pay costs, etc. A receiver appointed by the Chancery Division is sometimes ordered to enter into a recognisance with sureties to secure the payment of the moneys received by him, the cognisees being (Ord. 60, r. 4) the two senior masters of the judge to whom the cause or matter is assigned. The recognisance need not be enrolled (Ord. 61, r. 8A). See ENROLMENT; PETTY BAG OFFICE; VACATE.

Formerly, a recognisance, like a judgment, bound the lands of the conusor, but this is no longer so. (See JUDGMENT.) A recognisance, however, still has priority over the ordinary debts of the conusor on his death. (See ASSETS.) The most usual way of enforcing a recognisance is by estreat (q.v.): procedure by way of scire facias (q.v.) no longer applies.

II. Recognisances by statute were those created under 23 Hen. 8, c. 6, and called recognisances in the nature of statute staples, because they had the same formalities and effects as statute staples, except that they were acknowledged before judges instead of mayors. They are obsolete. See STATUTE MERCHANT AND STAPLE.

III. In criminal law, a person who has been found guilty of an offence, may in many cases be required to enter into a recognisance by which he binds himself to keep the peace and be of good behaviour for a certain period. As to recognisances given in Courts of summary jurisdiction, and the mode of their enforcement, see the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 9. Recognisances are given verbally in Courts of record. See also BAIL.

Recognisee. The conusee in a recognisance (q.v.).

Recognisor. The conusor in a recognisance (q.v.).

Recognition. In early times this meant the inquiry held by recognitors (q.v.).

Recognitione adnullenda per vim et duritiem facta, De. A writ which anciently lay to the justices of the Common Bench directing them to send a record (q.v.) as to a recognisance which the recognisor alleges to have been acknowledged by force and duress, in order that, if such should appear, the recognisance should be annulled.

Recognitors of an assise were the jurors in an assise of novel disseisin or the like. See ASSISE.

Reconstruction of Company. A company which is being wound up voluntarily may be reconstructed under s. 192 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, by a transfer of its undertaking to another company. A company which is being wound up either voluntarily or by the Court may be reconstructed by arrangement with its creditors under s. 120 of the same Act.

Recontinuance seems to have been used to signify that a person had recovered an incorporeal hereditament of which he had been wrongfully deprived. Thus, Coke writes, "A is disseised of a mannor, whereunto an advowson is appendant, an estranger [i.e., neither A nor the disseisor,] usurpes to the advowson, if the disseisee [A] enter into the mannor, the advowson is recontinued again, which was severed by the usurpation. . . . And so note a diversitie betweene a recontinuance and a remitter; for a remitter cannot be properly, unlesse there be two titles; but a recontinuance may be where there is but one." (Co. Litt. 363B.) See REMITTER; DISCONTINUANCE.

Reconversion is that imaginary process by which a prior constructive conversion is annulled and the converted property restored in contemplation of law to its original state. Thus, if real estate is devised to A, upon trust to sell and to pay the proceeds to B, the realty, by virtue of this absolute trust, is constructively converted into personal estate; but if B, before the property is sold, elects to take it as land, it is then said to be reconverted, and A is bound to convey the land to him accordingly. This is called reconversion by act of the party. The right of reconversion cannot be exercised to the prejudice of other persons (e.g., joint owners or remaindermen). Reconversion by operation of law is where the property originally directed to be converted comes into the possession of a person absolutely entitled to dispose of it, and is left by him in its original condition, without any declaration of his intention regarding it. See RESULT.

Reconveyance takes place where a mortgage debt is paid off, and the mortgaged property is conveyed again to the mortgagor or his representatives free from the mortgage debt. The operative words used in a reconveyance are the same as those which would be used if it were an ordinary conveyance between the parties, the habendum expressing that the property is discharged from the debt. The reconveyance is usually endorsed on the mortgage. See REDEEM.

Record.—I. Records "are," in the words of Gilbert, "the memorials of the legislature, and of the King's Courts of justice, and are authentic beyond all matter of contradiction." "But," says Coke, "legally records are restrained to the rolles of such [courts] only as are courts of record, and not the rolles of inferiour, nor of any other courts which proceed not secundum legem et consuetudinem Angliæ. And the rolles being the records or memorialls of the judges of the courts of record, import in them such incontrollable credit and veritie, as they admit no averment, plea, or proofe to the contrarie. And if such a record be alleaged, and it be pleaded that there is no such record, it shall be tried only by it selfe." (Co. Litt. 260A.) See NUL TIEL RECORD; RES JUDICATA; TRIAL.

Records are of the following principal kinds:—(i) Acts of Parliament, attainders and other parliamentary proceedings; (ii) judgments, fines, inquisitions, extents, returns to writs of mandamus, habeas corpus, etc., and other proceedings of Courts of record; (iii) proceedings on the revenue side of the Exchequer, recognisances, Crown grants, letters patent, and other instruments of an extra-judicial nature which have been enrolled. See PUBLIC RECORDS.

II. Under the old common law practice, the nisi prius record was a copy of the issue (q.v.) as delivered in the action, engrossed on parchment. It was the official statement of the writ and pleadings for the use of the judge at nisi prius; to it were annexed the particulars of demand and set-off, if any (see PARTICULARS); and on it were subsequently entered the postea (q.v.) and judgment. The record was delivered to the proper officer of the Court (generally the associate), which was commonly called entering the record, and it was retained by him until the case was disposed of, unless the plaintiff was not prepared to proceed with the trial, in which case he could withdraw the record, so as to prevent the trial from going on. Now, in lieu of making up the record, the party entering the action for trial delivers to the officer two copies of the pleadings, one of which is for the use of the judge (Ord. 36, r. 30), and is sometimes referred to as the record. The practice of withdrawing the record has been abolished; but the Court may order the action to be discontinued, on terms. See DISCONTINUANCE.

Record and Writ Clerks. See CLERKS OF RECORDS AND WRITS.

Recordari facias loquelam was a writ used in the time of Fitzherbert (q.v.) to remove a suit from an inferior Court not of record into one of the superior Courts of common law: e.g., a suit of replevin in the sheriff's County Court. See now CERTIORARI.

Record, Conveyances by. These include (1) Acts of Parliament under which land passes, (2) Royal Grants, (3) Fines, and (4) Common Recoveries. All these are matters of record.

Record, Courts of. See COURT.

Record, Debts of. See DEBT.

Recorder of a borough is a barrister, of five years' standing at the least, appointed by the Crown under the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, to act as a justice of the peace in a borough having a separate Court of Quarter Sessions; he receives a salary, and takes precedence after the mayor. By virtue of his office he is sole judge of any Court of record existing within the borough, that is to say, of the Court of Quarter Sessions and the civil Court of record, if any. There is also the Recorder of the City of London, whose office has existed from time immemorial; he is appointed by the corporation, but (Local Government Act, 1888, s. 42 (14)) he cannot perform any judicial functions unless the Crown also appoints. He is not disqualified by office from being a member of the House of Commons; but it may be taken as having been now settled that he should not seek election or re-election as a member of that House, although he may retain his seat until the general election next following his appointment to the office, if he happens to have been a member at the time of his appointment. The salary is, at present, £4,000 a year. See MAYOR'S COURT OF LONDON.

Recorder's Act, The. A former popular title of the Larceny Act, 1868, which was passed at the instance of Mr. Russell Gurney, Recorder of the City of London, 1857-1878. In 1865 he had been elected to the House of Commons, of which he was a member until his death in 1878: and no Lord Chancellor protested.

Record Office. This office was established by the Public Record Office Act, 1838 (see PUBLIC RECORDS), which placed it under the superintendence of the Master of the Rolls (q.v.), and provided for the appointment of a Deputy Keeper of the Records, who is, for practical purposes, the head of the office. The office, the full title of which is the Public Record Office, has been accommodated since 1900 in a building in Chancery Lane popularly known as the Rolls Office.

Record, Trial by. Before the Judicature Acts, where it appeared on the pleadings in an action that one party alleged and the other party denied the existence of a record (such as a judgment) there was the issue known as Nul Tiel Record (q.v.), and the Court would thereupon order a trial by inspection and examination of the record. Failing proof of the record, judgment was given for the party who had denied its existence. See FAILURE OF RECORD.

Recoverer. Used in the fifteenth century as a synonym of recovery (q.v.) in the sense of common recovery.

Recovery, in its general sense, is where a person obtains something which has been wrongfully taken or withheld from him, or to which he is otherwise entitled. See REMEDY.

(i) Proceedings for the recovery of land from a person wrongfully in possession of it, are taken either in the High Court of Justice, or in the County Courts, or before justices. In the High Court the proceedings are of two kinds. The ordinary action for the recovery of land follows the same course as any other action, except in some cases as regards service of the writ (see SERVICE) and appearance (q.v., see also JOINDER). It is a substitute for the old action of ejectment (q.v.). An action for the recovery of land under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852 (ss. 213 et seq.), may be brought where there is a contract of tenancy in writing, and the tenant holds over after the determination of the tenancy. The chief peculiarity of this action is that the defendant may be ordered to give bail by recognisance with two sureties, in default of which judgment is given for the plaintiff. See BAIL.

(ii) An action may be brought in a County Court by a landlord against his tenant: (a) for the recovery of land, the yearly value or rent of which does not exceed £100, where no fine had been paid and the tenant holds over (County Courts Act, 1888, s. 138), and (b) where the yearly value or annual rent does not exceed £100 and there is half a year's rent in arrear and the landlord has a right of re-entry (ib s 139). In any action which is commenced in the High Court for the recovery of land against a tenant (or a person claiming through a tenant) overholding or whose term is liable to forfeiture for non-payment of rent, and the action could have been commenced in the County Court, then the High Court may, on application at any time, transfer the action to the County Court (County Courts Act, 1919, s. 1). As to ejectment in the County Courts, see EJECTMENT.

(iii) A summary mode of recovering the possession of land held for a term not exceeding seven years, and at a rent not exceeding £20, where the tenant holds over, is given by the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838, which empowers justices in petty session to grant a warrant for the eviction of the tenant. A similar remedy is given in the case of premises held at a rackrent which have been deserted by the tenant. See DESERTED PREMISES.

(iv) A recovery or common recovery was a mode of barring estates tail in use down to the year 1833. It was a judgment in a fictitious suit in the nature of a real action, brought by a friendly plaintiff against the tenant in tail, who, on being sued, vouched (that is, called upon) some person to defend the action, on the ground that he had granted the estate tail to the tenant in tail with warranty of title. (See WARRANTY; VOUCH.) This person (the vouchee) was accordingly called on, and, being a party to the scheme, admitted the imaginary grant and warranty, and then, after the plaintiff had craved leave to "imparl" (q.v.) with him, allowed judgment to go against him by default; whereupon judgment was given for the plaintiff to recover the lands from the tenant in tail, and the tenant in tail had judgment against the vouchee for lands of equal value The vouchee being a man of straw (generally the crier of the Court), the tenant in tail recovered no such lands, but his own land went to the plaintiff under the judgment, freed from the estate tail and the remainders and reversions expectant on it, and then the plaintiff conveyed it back to him in fee simple. In some manors estates tail in copyholds were barred by customary recoveries. Recoveries were also used for other purposes besides barring estates tail. They were abolished by the Fines and Recoveries Act, 1833, which substitutes a simpler disentailing assurance.

See PRÆCIPE; compare FINE.

Recreation Grounds. The village green was the primitive recreation ground: in it the villagers had such limited right of recreation as mentioned under Jus Spatiendi, etc. Provision was made by the later Inclosure Acts for the appropriation of commons or parts of commons as places of recreation for the inhabitants of the vicinity: see, for instance, the Inclosure Act, 1845, ss. 30, 73, and the Inclosure Act, 1846, s. 4, as extended by the Commons Act, 1876, ss. 22, 23. Under the Towns Improvement Clauses Act, 1847, the local authority, where the necessary provisions of that Act are in force, may provide places of resort and recreation. The Recreation Grounds Act, 1859, made provision for the formation and management of places of recreation in and near populous places. The Town Gardens Protection Act, 1863, contains provisions for turning into public gardens derelict squares, etc., in cities and boroughs. Meanwhile, the Public Improvements Act, 1860, had provided machinery for the formation of walks and playgrounds in parishes with a population of not less than 500: and the Act is still utilised in rural districts. The Public Health Act, 1875, s. 164, authorizes the formation and regulation of pleasure grounds by urban authorities; and this enactment has been applied by various subsequent enactments (which cannot be here enumerated) to rural district councils and parish councils. As to the regulation of pleasure grounds see ss. 76, 77 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1907.

The enactments above mentioned are only a few of those which have been passed with regard to recreation grounds during the last eighty years.

See Open Spaces; National Trust.

Recta prisa regis. The lawful due of the king: prisage (q.v.).

Rectification; Rectify. To rectify is to correct or define something which is erroneous or doubtful. Thus, where the parties to an agreement have determined to embody its terms in the appropriate and conclusive form, but the instrument meant to effect this purpose (e.g., a conveyance, settlement, etc.) is by mutual mistake so framed as not to express the real intention of the parties, an action may be brought in the Chancery Division of the High Court to have it rectified (Judicature Act, 1873, s. 34); but every Division can give effect to a claim for rectification in any action before it. The rectification is generally effected by endorsing on the instrument a copy of the judgment or order, declaring in what respects the instrument requires to be rectified. (See Mistake; Rescission.) County Courts have a like jurisdiction where the relief sought does not exceed £500 in value (County Courts Act, 1888, s. 67).

An action to rectify or ascertain the boundaries of two adjoining pieces of land may be brought in the Chancery Division of the High Court. The Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries have powers, under the Inclosure Acts, 1845 to 1878, to settle confused boundaries in certain cases: under the Copyhold Act, 1894, s. 52, they can also settle disputed boundaries of enfranchised copyholds. See Boundary.

Recto; Breve de recto. A writ of right (q.v.). These were of many kinds. Only a few are mentioned below. All except those relating to dower were abolished by s. 36 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833.

See Right Close.

Recto de advocatione ecclesiæ. A writ which formerly lay for the owner in fee of an advowson, where the clerk of the church died and a stranger presented a clerk to the church.

Recto de custodiæ terræ et hæredis. A writ which lay for the lord of a tenant holding by knight's service where the tenant died and a stranger both entered the land and took the body of the heir. It disappeared in 1660 with the Court of Wards and Liveries.

Recto de dote. A writ of right of dower which lay for a widow who alleged that she had received only part of her dower and claimed the residue against the heir of her husband. It was abolished by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, s. 26, which substituted a writ of summons.

Recto de dote unde nihil habet. A writ which lay for a widow who had received no part of her dower. It was abolished by the statute which abolished the recto de dote.

Recto de rationabili parte, De. The fuller title of the writ rationabili parte (q.v.)

Rector is an officer of the church, having a benefice with cure of souls, that is, spiritual charge of his parishioners, with the right and duty of celebrating services and sacraments in the church. He obtains his benefice by ordination, presentation, institution, and induction (q.v.). He has an exclusive title to all the emoluments of the living, that is, the parsonage house and glebe, the tithes, etc. An impropriator (q.v.) is sometimes called a lay rector; and an appropriator can properly be described as an appropriate rector. Rector ecclesiæ meant a clerk having the parsonage of a vicarage which is endowed, while rector ecclesiæ parochialis meant one having care and charge of a parish church. See Advowson; Appropriation; Benefice; Proprietary Chapel.

Rectory. A certain portion of land tithes and offerings established by law for the maintenance of an incumbent having the cure of souls within the parish of which he is rector. It is not essential that there should be a house, but the term is popularly applied only to the house, which almost invariably is upon the land or glebe.

A sinecure rectory was one in which there were both a rector and vicar, the latter being entrusted with the cure of souls. Such rectories were practically abolished by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners Act, 1840, ss. 48, 54, 55, 71.

Recto sur disclaimer. A writ which anciently lay in the Common Pleas for a lord whose tenant disclaimed to hold of him, that is to say, alleged that he did not hold of him. The question of title was tried upon this writ.

Rectum. This meant right, and it also was used as meaning a trial. Thus rectum rogare meant to petition the judge to do right, stare ad rectum meant to stand one's trial or to abide by the decision of a Court, and esse ad rectum in curia meant the same as stare ad rectum.

Rectus in curia. One who stood at the bar of a Court and no accusation was made against him: also one whose outlawry had been reversed. Either of such persons was "right in the law," which is what the expression literally meant.

Recusants. A generic term applied after the Reformation to those who denied the supremacy of the king in matters ecclesiastical and refused to attend the services of the Church of England. At first there was no clear distinction made between various kinds of recusants. Thus, the statute 1 Eliz. c. 2, s. 4, imposed penalties of small amount upon all persons failing to attend the parish church. The statute 35 Eliz. c. 2, entitled "An Act against Popish Recusants" was, however, as its title indicates, specially directed against Roman Catholics, to whom the title of recusant came more especially to be applied. That statute, together with the statute 3 Jac. 1, c. 4, imposed heavy penalties on Roman Catholics who failed to receive the Communion of the Established Church and to attend its services. An oath against transubstantiation was required by the statute 25 Car. 2, c. 2, entitled "An Act for Preventing Dangers which may happen from Popish Recusants"; and from this time other recusants came to be known distinctively as Protestant Dissenters. See NONCONFORMISTS; PAPIST; TEST ACT; ROMAN CATHOLIC.

Red Book of the Exchequer. This is believed to have been compiled before 1234 by Alexander de Swereford, who before that year was an official in the Exchequer, and from 1234 to his death in 1246 was a Baron of the Exchequer (q.v.). He compiled it, he tells us, in order that there might be a permanent record of the liability of Crown tenants for the various incidents of their tenure. But it was much more than that. It is a veritable encyclopædia of everything which might be useful to the officers of the Exchequer. It contained a register of documents relating to Crown property; forms of writs; directions as to procedure; and oaths to be taken by the officers of State, which were actually in use to quite recent times. Down to about 1375 numerous additions were made to the book, and during the subsequent two centuries some more were made.

The book was always of great authority, and was second only to Domesday in importance as a register. It was in the custody of the King's Remembrancer from the earliest times down to 1870, when it was transferred to the Master of the Rolls. It was edited (as No. 99 of the Rolls Series) by Mr. Hubert Hall in 1896.

Reddendo singula singulis. A clause in an instrument is said to be read reddendo singula singulis ("giving each to each") when one of two provisions in one sentence is appropriated to one of two objects in another sentence, and the other provision is similarly appropriated to the other object. Thus, if a testator makes a will in these terms: "I devise and bequeath all my real and personal property to A," it will be construed reddendo singula singulis by applying "devise" to "real property," and "bequeath" to "personal property."

Reddendum (="that which is to be paid or rendered") is that clause in a lease which specifies the amount of the rent and the time at which it is payable. It formerly always began with the words "yielding and paying."

Reddidit se. (He gave himself up.) In connection with the old law of bail, under which a defendant in a pending civil action was arrested in default of finding bail, the term was used where a defendant who had found bail afterwards surrendered himself so as to discharge his bailsmen.

Redditarius; Redditarium. Redditarius was a tenant, and redditarium the aggregate rental of an estate.

Reddition. Anciently this meant a formal admission in the course of legal proceedings that lands were the property, not of the person making the admission, but of him who sought to recover them.

Redditus. Rents. The more correct form of the word is reditus, but the form redditus is generally used in the old books.

Redditus albi. See ALBA FIRMA.

Redditus assisus. Assise rents (q.v.).

Redditus capitales. Chief rents: see RENT.

Redditus nigri. See ALBA FIRMA.

Redditus quieti. Quit rents: see RENT.

Redditus siccus. Rent-seck: see RENT.

Redeem; Redemption. Redeeming or redemption is where a person having the right to do so pays off a mortgage debt or charge upon property, and thus "buys back" (Latin redimit) the property; he thereupon becomes entitled to have it reconveyed to him by the mortgagee or creditor. (See EQUITY OF REDEMPTION.) An action or suit for redemption is one brought to compel the mortgagee to reconvey the property on payment of the debt and interest. See RECONVEYANCE.

By the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 15, where a mortgagor is entitled to redeem, he may require the mortgagee, instead of re-conveying, to assign the mortgage debt and convey the mortgaged property to any third person, as the mortgagor directs. This provision does not apply where the mortgagor is or has been in possession; but in all other cases it applies, notwithstanding any stipulation by the parties to the contrary.

As to the redemption of quit rents, etc., see RENT.

Redemise. See DEMISE AND REDEMISE.

Red Game. An obsolete name for grouse (q.v.) as distinguished from black game (q.v.).

Re-disseisin. Where a person, having been disseised, recovered seisin of his freehold and possession had been delivered by the sheriff, but the same person was again disseised by the same disseisor, then there was a re-disseisin, for which, under the Statute of Merton, the re-disseisors were liable to imprisonment. Proceedings were taken by way of the writ of re-disseisin.

Re-disseisin was also known as "disseisina facta super disseisinam" (one disseisin after another).

Reditus. See REDDITUS.

Reduction into Possession is the act of exercising the right conferred by a chose in action, so as to convert it into a chose in possession; thus a debt is reduced into possession by payment

The term was chiefly used with reference to the exercise by a husband of the right to reduce into possession choses in action belonging to his wife; and the question whether he had done so was of importance from the rule that his wife's choses in action did not vest in him, as her other chattels did, unless he had reduced them into possession during the coverture. Thus, if C owed a debt of £500 to A, a feme sole, and A married B, B had the right to receive the £500 from C, or to sue him for it: and if he did so, and obtained payment or judgment against C, he had reduced the chose in action into possession, and the £500 belonged to him; if, however, B died without having enforced his right to the £500, it survived to A as if she had never been married. Choses in action falling within this rule included debts, arrears of rent, legacies, residuary personal estate, money in the funds, shares, etc., but not chattels personal which at the time of the marriage were in the possession of third persons. In order that the act of the husband might operate as a reduction into possession, there had to be an intention to that end, coupled with some act giving effect to the intention. As a general rule, any act by which the property was brought into the exclusive control of the husband (in his character of husband, and not as trustee, or executor, etc.), was a reduction into possession. Thus, if a debt due to the wife was received by the husband, or he brought an action for the debt in his sole name and recovered judgment, the debt was reduced into possession. And although an assignment by the husband of a debt due to the wife did not defeat her right by survivorship, unless the assignee reduced it into possession during the husband's lifetime, yet if a bill of exchange or promissory note was made or endorsed to a married woman during coverture, and the husband endorsed it to a stranger, or if he caused stock belonging to his wife to be transferred into his sole name, this operated as a reduction into possession But if he transferred the stock into the joint names of himself and his wife, this did not operate as a reduction into possession.

As to the present law, see MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY ACTS.

Reduction of Capital. By the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, ss. 46-56, any company limited by shares may pass a special resolution to reduce its capital; it must then add the words "and reduced," as the last words of its name, unless the Court, for the reason specified in s. 48, dispenses with these words. The resolution is inoperative until the company has applied to the Court (e.g., to the High Court, by petition presented in the Chancery Division) to confirm the reduction; and the Court, if satisfied that the creditors of the company consent to the reduction, or that their claims have been discharged or secured, may make an order confirming the reduction.

Without the sanction of the Court, (1) a company limited by shares or guarantee may, if so authorised by its articles, reduce its capital by cancelling unissued shares (s. 41 (1)), and may return accumulated profits to shareholders in reduction of paid-up share capital, the unpaid capital being thereby decreased by a similar amount (s. 40); (2) a guarantee company registered before January 1, 1901, may, merely by special resolution altering its articles, reduce its capital (see the (repealed) Companies Act, 1862, Sch. 11, Form C); and (3) an unlimited company can provide by its articles and memorandum for any return of capital which may be considered advisable.

Re-entry. See RIGHT OF ENTRY; PROVISO.

Reeve; Reve. In Anglo-Saxon times this meant an official holding high rank under the king, but then and later it was applied to many minor officials. Thus the præpositus ecclesiæ, who was later known as the church-reeve and was still later represented by the churchwarden; and see FIELD-REEVE; DYKE-REEVE. Before the enactment of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1835, the borough reeve was the principal officer of many towns. The word meant literally a steward or bailiff. See PRÆPOSITUS; REEVELAND.

Re-examination. See EXAMINATION.

Re-exchange is the damages which the holder of a bill of exchange sustains by its being dishonoured in a foreign country where it was made payable. The theory of the transaction is thus stated by Byles: "A merchant in London indorses a bill for a certain number of Austrian florins, payable at a future date in Vienna. The holder is entitled to receive in Vienna, on the day of the maturity of the bill, a certain number of Austrian florins. Suppose the bill to be dishonoured. The holder is now, by the custom of merchants, entitled to immediate and specific redress—by his own act—in this way. He is entitled, being in Vienna, then and there to raise the exact number of Austrian florins, by drawing and negotiating a cross bill, payable at sight, on his indorser in London, for as much English money as will purchase in Vienna the exact number of Austrian florins, at the rate of exchange on the day of dishonour: and to include in the amount of that bill the interest and necessary expenses of the transaction. This cross bill in called in French the retraite. The amount for which it is drawn is called in low-Latin ricambrium, in Italian, ricambio, and in French and English re-exchange. If the indorser pay the cross or re-exchange bill, he has fulfilled his engagement of indemnity. If not, the holder of the original bill may sue him on it, and will be entitled to recover in that action the amount of the retraite or cross bill, with the interest and expenses thereon. The amount of the verdict will thus be an exact indemnity for the non-payment of the Austrian florins in Vienna on the day of the maturity of the original bill. According to English practice, the retraite or re-exchange bill is now seldom drawn, but the right of the holder to draw it is settled by the law merchant of all nations: and it is only by a reference to this supposed bill that the re-exchange, in other words, the true damages in an action on the original bill, can be scientifically understood and computed."

The Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 57, is declaratory of the law as above stated: s. 89 of the same Act makes re-exchange recoverable in respect of a promissory note.

Re-extent is a second execution by extent in respect of the same debt. See EXTENT.

Re. Fa. Lo. The popular abbreviation of the name of the obsolete writ Recordari facias Loquelam (q.v.).

Refare. To rob or steal (Leg. Hen. 1, c. 83).

Refer; Reference. To refer a question is to have it decided by a person nominated for the purpose, in lieu of the ordinary procedure by action, trial or other judicial proceedings. The person to whom the question is referred is sometimes called the referee, and the proceedings before him constitute the reference: these proceedings to a great extent resemble those on an ordinary trial, except that they are private; witnesses are examined, and the referee is addressed on behalf of each of the parties, and he makes an award or report containing his decision. See ARBITRATION.

In the practice of the Chancery Division, questions of detail arising in an action or suit are frequently "referred to chambers," that is, the judge's Chief Clerk is directed to inquire into them and certify the result to the Court. (See CERTIFICATE; INQUIRY.) Sometimes a petition, instead of being disposed of in Court, is referred to chambers to be dealt with by the judge in private; e.g., a petition for leave to marry a ward of Court.

Similarly, in the King's Bench Division, when damages have to be assessed under an interlocutory judgment (see JUDGMENT), and the amount is substantially a matter of calculation, the Court may direct it to be ascertained by an officer of the Court, who has the same powers as if he were acting under a writ of inquiry. Such a reference (which is cheaper and quicker than a writ of inquiry) is generally ordered when the damages consist of interest, calls on shares, a sum of foreign money, etc. See ORDER OF REFERENCE; ENQUIRY; ENQUIRY, WRIT OF.

Under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act,

1845, the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, the Agricultural Holdings Acts, 1908 to 1913, and similar Acts, questions of compensation are generally settled by a reference as provided by the Acts. See COMPENSATION.

Every appeal to the Privy Council is theoretically supposed to be first submitted to the King in Council, and then referred by him to the Judicial Committee, who report to him their opinion. But now a general Order in Council is made in the November of every year as a matter of course, directing all appeals presented within the next twelve months to be referred to the Judicial Committee.

Referee is a person to whom a question is referred for his decision or opinion (see REFER). In ordinary cases, the person to whom a question is referred is called an arbitrator, the name "referee" being generally used in cases under the Arbitration Act, 1889, which (see ARBITRATION) empowers the Court to refer any question arising in a cause or matter to an official or special referee for inquiry and report. (See REFER; TRIAL.) An official referee is a paid and permanent officer of the Court (Judicature Act, 1873, s. 83). A special referee is one who is agreed on between the parties and remunerated by them, the amount being determined by the Court (Arbitration Act, 1889, ss. 14, 15).

The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, s. 10, provides for the appointment of registered medical practitioners as medical referees for the purposes of that Act.

The National Insurance Act, 1911, s. 90, provides for the appointment of "courts of referees" in connection with that Act, and enacts that each such court shall consist of one or more members chosen to represent employers, an equal number chosen to represent workmen, and a chairman appointed by the Board of Trade. The Insurance Commissioners may authorise such courts of referees to decide disputes between an insured person and an Insurance Committee. (s. 67, (2), (3), (4)).

In parliamentary practice, referees on private bills are members who were appointed in 1864 by the House of Commons to report on engineering questions and questions of locus standi arising on private bills, but since 1868 they decide only questions of locus standi (q.v.). They are the Chairman and the Deputy Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means and not fewer than seven other members: collectively they are known as the Court of Referees: and three of them are necessary to constitute the Court.

Reference in Case of Need. When a person draws or endorses a bill of exchange, he sometimes adds the name of a person to whom it may be presented "in case of need," that is, in case it is dishonoured by the original drawee or acceptor. (See Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 15.) See ACCEPTANCE.

Reference of Action. See ARBITRATION.

Reference to Record. When an action is commenced, an entry of it is made in the cause-book according to the year, the initial letter of the surname of the first plaintiff, and the place of the action in numerical order among those commenced in the same year; e.g., "1876, A. 26"; and all subsequent documents in the action (such as pleadings, and affidavits) bear this mark, which is called the "reference to the record." (See Ord. 61, r. 19.) See CAUSE BOOKS; TITLE.

Referendarius. See PROLOCUTOR.

Referendum. The French plébiscite, that is to say, a direct vote of electors upon a particular matter or measure. It is unknown to our Constitution.

Reform. To reform an instrument is to rectify it. See RECTIFICATION.

The Reform Act is the statute 2 Will. 4, c. 45, more accurately described as the Reform Act, 1832. That statute and the Representation of the People Acts, 1867 and 1884, are popularly known by the collective title of the Reform Acts, which will now apparently include also the Representation of the People Act, 1918. See ELECTORAL FRANCHISE.

Reformatory. The Children Act, 1908, s. 44 (1), gives a definition of a reformatory school which is identical with that of an industrial school (q.v.), except that as regards a reformatory school the words "youthful offenders" are substituted for the word "children" used in the definition of an industrial school. There is no statutory definition of the expression "youthful offender": but it is evident from s. 57 that it means a person who is convicted, whether summarily or on indictment, and who, in the opinion of the Court, is over twelve and under sixteen. Such a person can be committed to a reformatory under s. 57. A child aged twelve may be transferred from an industrial to a reformatory school in the circumstances set forth in s. 71 (2): and it would appear that upon such transfer he becomes a "youthful offender."

Refresher is a fee paid to a counsel on the trial of an action in addition to the fee originally paid to him with his brief. It is paid for every clear day which is occupied by the trial after the first five hours: it varies normally from not more than ten guineas for a leader to not less than two guineas for a junior: but in special circumstances larger refreshers may be allowed (Ord. 65, r. 27 (48)).

Refreshing Memory. A witness is in some cases allowed to refresh his memory while under examination, by referring to a document which is not itself admissible as evidence. Thus, a witness who has made a memorandum of a transaction may in many cases use it to refresh his memory. So a tradesman may use his account books to refresh his memory when giving evidence in an action for goods supplied.

Refreshment Houses. This term includes all houses, rooms, shops or buildings kept open for public refreshment, resort, and entertainment at any time between the hours of 10 p.m. and 5 a.m., not being licensed for the sale of beer, cider, wine or spirits respectively (Refreshment Houses Act, 1860, s. 6, as amended by the Revenue (No. 2) Act, 1861, s. 8), and also such premises as are mentioned above when refreshment is consumed but not sold therein (ib.). Every such house requires a licence (Act of 1860, s. 9), which is merely an Inland Revenue licence, obtainable without application to any licensing authority. The licence costs 10s. 6d. a year where the rent and value are under £30 a year; where the rent and value are higher the licence costs £1 1s. (Revenue (No. 2) Act, 1861, s. 9). No such licence is required if the house is not kept open after 10 p.m. (ib. s. 8).

Regale episcoporum. Used anciently as meaning the temporal rights and privileges of a bishop.

Regalia seems to be an abbreviation of jura regalia (q.v.). Some old writers divide the royal prerogative into majora and minora regalia, the former including the regal dignity and power, the latter the revenue or fiscal prerogatives of the crown.

Regalities. Used by certain modern writers as a synonym for regalia (q.v.); but the word seems to belong rather to Scottish law (see the Heritable Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1746) than to English law.

Regardant seems originally to have had the same meaning as appendant (q.v.). By Littleton's time, however, it was only applied to villeins (q.v.).

Regard, Court of. A forest court, held every third year for the expeditation (q.v.) of dogs.

Regarder. A forest-officer whose duty it was to exercise supervision over the forest, and to make a triennial inspection with a view to enforcing the forest laws.

Regard of the Forest. This meant either the precise area which constituted the forest and which was therefore inspected by the regarder, or else the inspection made by the regarder.

Rege inconsulto. This was a writ which anciently issued from the king to the judges commanding them, in order to prevent prejudice to him, not to proceed with a cause until he had been advised. A late instance of such a writ was that issued during the reign of James I. in an assise brought by one Brownlow against one Mitchel. In that case it was argued against the writ that the Court might proceed because the writ did not allege that the King had any title to the thing in dispute, or that the King would be prejudiced if the Court preceeded. The parties compromised the matter; and the point raised was not decided (see Moor, 844).

Regency. A delegation, to one known as a regent, of the powers, or some of the powers, of the Sovereign during his youth, his incapacity or his absence from the kingdom. Such delegation is unusual, though not unknown, during the absence of the Sovereign overseas: in that case, the more usual course since the accession of William III. has been the appointment of Lords Justices. Lords Justices were frequently appointed between 1688 and 1760. There were no such appointments between 1760 and 1820, as neither George III. nor the Prince Regent ever left the kingdom. Between 1820 and 1837 such appointments were sometimes made. During the reign of Queen Victoria there were no Lords Justices, it being held that the Queen, who never left Europe, could, under modern conditions, exercise the royal functions in person while, for instance, on a short visit to France. But the necessity for the appointment of some equivalent for a regent or Lords Justices is still recognised when the Sovereign is absent for a long period at a remote place; and so, before the King went to India in 1911, he held a meeting of the Privy Council at which four "Counsellors of State," or members of that body, were nominated to "transact business" during the absence of the King. They were the Lord President of the Council (Viscount Morley), the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor and Prince Arthur of Connaught.

If the accession of a youthful Sovereign is probable or possible, the modern practice is to pass an Act providing for the appointment of a regent. Thus the Regency Act, 1910, provided that, in the event of any child of His present Majesty succeeding to the Throne whilst under eighteen years of age, Queen Mary should be regent.

No provision is made by the Constitution for the appointment of a regent in the event of the mental incapacity of the king. Upon such an occasion during the reign of George III., Parliament met informally and authorised the Lord Chancellor to affix the Great Seal, first to a Commission for opening Parliament, and, secondly, to a Commission for giving the Royal Assent to a Regency Bill.

Regimental Debts. The Regimental Debts Act, 1893, s. 1, provides that on the death of anyone subject to military law, the Committee of Adjustment (q.v.) shall, as soon as may be, secure such property of the deceased as is in camp or quarters, or, if the death be abroad, within a larger prescribed area, and ascertain and pay the preferential charges thereon. The Act and the Regulations made thereunder constitute a complete code on the subject. The Act, except as regards ss. 26, 27, and so much of s. 25 as relates to natives of India, was applied to the Air Force by the Air Force (Application of Enactments) (No. 2) Orders, made 7th May, 1918, pursuant to s. 13 of the Air Force Constitution Act, 1917.

Regio assensu. Anciently this was the writ by which the king assented to the election of a bishop.

Register of Writs. The collection of the various original writs which were prepared at an early period of our law. It was first printed in 1531. As to the early history of the Register, see the articles by Professor Maitland, Select Essays in Anglo-American Legal History.

See ACTIONS ON THE CASE.

Register of Writs and Orders. Under the Land Charges Registration and Searches Act, 1888, s. 5, there was established at the Land Registry (q.v.) a register of writs and orders of any Court which affected land; and any such writ or order was made void as against a purchaser for value unless registered in this register. A charge made by the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries upon land in favour of a landlord under ss. 15, 16 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908, is declared by s. 19 of that Act to be capable of registration under the Act of 1888. See LAND CHARGE.

Registrar and Merchants. In Admiralty actions, the Court itself does not enter into details relating to the assessment of damages or matters of account, unless the amount in dispute is small or unless the matter can easily be settled by the Court, and whenever in the course of a cause it becomes necessary that the Court should be informed upon such questions, it is usual to direct a reference to the registrar, assisted by merchants, usually two in number. After hearing the evidence the registrar draws up his report. If either party objects to it, he must file a notice of objection. The objection is argued either on motion (which is now the usual course) or on "petition in objection"; if it is sustained or held to be valid the report is overruled: otherwise it is confirmed. As to the practice, see R. S. C., Ord. 56.

Registrar-General of Births, Deaths and Marriages. The officer at the head of the system under which all births, deaths and marriages in the country are registered. His office was established by the Births and Deaths Registration Act, 1836, s. 2.

Registrar of Affidavits. This was an office in the Court of Chancery which was held in 1798 by the two daughters and co-heiresses of the second Earl of Northington, who between them received about £410 a year, out of which they paid £90 a year to a deputy for the actual performance of their duties. The duties consisted "in filing and registering affidavits and making office copies thereof" (Commons Committees Reports, Vol. 13, p. 233). The office was abolished by the statute 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 111, s. 1.

Registration. The reference to this title on p. 499, col. 1, should be to REGISTER OF WRITS AND ORDERS, supra.

Registration of Births. This is now governed, as regards children born alive in England or Wales, by the Births and Deaths Registration Act, 1874, ss. 1-8. Where any such child is born, the father (unless—see s. 7—the child be a bastard), or mother, or in their default, the occupier of the house in which the child is born, or any person present at the birth, or the person having charge of the child, must, within forty-two days after the birth give the specified particulars as to the birth to the registrar of births, deaths and marriages, and sign the register (s. 1). If default be made by all such persons, any of them must, on receipt of a written requisition from the registrar, attend and give the required particulars as to the birth (s. 2).

Any person finding or having charge of a new-born child which has been exposed, must within seven days of the child being found, give to the registrar any particulars known to him concerning the birth of the child (s. 3). Failure to comply with any of the above-mentioned sections is an offence punishable on summary conviction (s. 39). No fee is to be charged for registration unless the registrar attends at a private residence to register the birth (s. 4). The making to the registrar of false statements regarding the required particulars as to birth is an offence punishable either summarily or on indictment (Perjury Act, 1911, s. 4). Forgery in connection with the registration of births is dealt with in the Forgery Act, 1913, s. 3 (2); and also in the unrepealed part of s. 40 of the Act of 1874.

The particulars required to be registered as to a birth are the date, the Christian name and sex, the name of the father, the name and the maiden name of the mother, the rank or profession of the father, the signature, description and residence of the informant, the date of registration, the signature of the registrar, the baptismal name of the child if added after registration (Births and Deaths Registration Act, 1836, Sch. A), and the place of birth if the Registrar-General directs that it be entered (Births and Deaths Registration Act, 1837, s. 8); but in the case of an illegitimate child the name of any person is not to be entered in the register as being the father, unless such person acknowledges himself to be, and unless both he and the mother request that he be entered as the father, and unless both he and the mother sign the register (Act of 1874, s. 7).

The unrepealed parts of the Acts of 1836 and 1837 are to be construed as one with the Act of 1874 (Act of 1874, s. 52).

Births on His Majesty's ships at sea are dealt with in s. 37 of the Act of 1874, which section is repealed as regards other ships; and births on other British ships at sea are dealt with in the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 245.

Parochial registers of birth are evidence. So also, under the Non-Parochial Registers Act, 1840, except as stated in that Act, are non-parochial registers deposited in the General Register Office.

See also BIRTHS, NOTIFICATION OF.

Registration of Burials. The effect of the Burial Act, 1853, s. 8, the Cemeteries Clauses Act, 1847, s. 32, the Registration of Burials Act, 1864, ss. 1, 7, the Burial Laws Amendment Act, 1880, ss. 10, 11, Sch., the Burial and Registration Acts (Doubts Removal) Act, 1881, s. 2, and the Burial Act, 1900, s. 9, is that every burial in every cemetery or burial ground, must be registered in the register to be kept by the person or body having control of each cemetery or burial ground. Such registers are evidence (Act of 1853, s. 8; Act of 1847, ss. 32, 33; Act of 1864, s. 5). Forgery of, or of copies of, any such register is felony (Forgery Act, 1913, s. 3 (2)).

Cases occasionally occur of persons directing that their bodies be buried in ground not generally used for interments. No express provision would appear to be made for such cases: but the effect of s. 17 of the Registration of Births and Deaths Act (as amended by the Coroners Act, 1887, ss. 18 (6), 45, Sch. III.), is that a coroner's order or a registrar's certificate of the registration of death is normally issued before burial takes place, and that anyone who "performs any funeral or religious service" at a burial must notify the coroner or the registrar if he does not receive such order or certificate; and so the State keeps in touch with all burials on land. Now and then it happens that someone directs that his body be taken out to sea and sunk in deep water without any religious or other ceremony; and the law, having never contemplated any such proceeding, has never made provision for the registration of such "burial." It has, however, provided specially for the case of cremation (q.v.).

Registration of Business Names. See BUSINESS NAMES.

Registration of Deaths. Every death in England, and the cause thereof, must be registered in accordance with the Births and Deaths Registration Acts, 1836 to 1874 (Births and Deaths Registration Act, 1874, s. 9). Where the death occurs in a house, the nearest relatives present at the death or in attendance during the last illness, and, in default of such relatives, the nearest relatives in the sub-district; and, failing them, the persons present at the death and the occupier of the house, and, failing them, all inmates of the house and the persons causing the body to be buried, are bound to give the required particulars to the local register within five days of the death, and to sign the register (s. 10). Where the death occurs or a body is found elsewhere than in a house, all relatives having knowledge of the required particulars, and, failing them, every person present at death or finding or taking charge of or burying the body, is bound, within five days after the death or finding, to give the particulars to the registrar and to sign the register (s. 11). If a person bound to inform the registrar sends to him within the five days a written notice of the death and a medical certificate of its causes, then the specified particulars may be furnished within fourteen days instead of five days after the death (s. 12). After fourteen days and within twelve months from the death, the registrar may, if the death has not been registered, serve a written notice to register upon any person who is under an obligation so to do (s. 14). No fee is payable upon registration, unless the registrar has to attend at a house other than a public institution (s. 15). No death can be registered after twelve months without the written authority of the Registrar-General (s. 15). Where an inquest is held, the coroner must report the result to the registrar; and no other person is under any obligation to give information regarding the death (s. 16). Where a registered medical practitioner has attended the deceased, he is bound, unless there is an inquest, to give, without fee, a certificate of the cause of death to some person bound to register, and such person is bound, under a penalty, to deliver it to the registrar (s. 20). The making of false statements to the registrar concerning death is a misdemeanour (Perjury Act, 1911, s. 4); and forgery in connection with such registration is felony (Forgery Act, 1913, s. 3 (2)).

The registration of deaths occurring on King's ships is provided for by the Registration of Births and Deaths Act, s. 37: those occurring on merchant vessels are registered pursuant to s. 254 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894.

Entries in parochial registers, and (Non-Parochial Registers Act, 1840) in non-parochial registers, are evidence of burial and, inferentially, of death.

Registration of Designs. This is now governed by the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, ss. 49, 53, 58, 93. See DESIGNS.

Registration of Marriages. Canon 70 of 1603 directs that in every church and chapel there shall be kept one parchment book in which the "minister" is to enter particulars of christenings, weddings and burials, and that the minister shall annually send copies of each year's entries to the ecclesiastical officer of each diocese who is known as the registrar. The Parochial Registers Act, 1812, imposed on the minister the statutory duty (s. 1) of keeping three separate registers of the like events in (s. 5) an iron chest, and (s. 8) of sending copies annually to the registrar of the diocese. All the foregoing registers are evidence under the Non-Parochial Registers Act, 1840, s. 6, when deposited in the General Registrar Office.

Under the series of enactments mentioned in the next paragraph the "minister" remains in some cases the registering officer, but the registrar of the diocese is out of the matter altogether, and the official to whom each registering officer is ultimately responsible is the Registrar-General of Births, Deaths and Marriages.

Every marriage solemnised in England must be registered as follows:—(1) In the case of a marriage according to the rites of the Church of England, by the clergyman who solemnised it (Births and Deaths Registration Act, 1836, s. 30; Marriage Act, 1836, s. 30; Extra-Parochial Places Act, 1857, s. 10); (2) in the case of a marriage according to the practice of the Society of Friends, by the local registering officer (as defined by the Births and Deaths Registration Act, 1836, s. 30) of that Society, whether he be present at the marriage or not (ib., s. 31; Society of Friends Act, 1860, s. 2); (3) in the case of a marriage according to Jewish usage, by the secretary of the husband's synagogue (Births and Deaths Registration Act, 1836, s. 31) who need not be present, but must be certified in accordance with the Births and Deaths Registration Act, 1836, s. 30, or the Marriage Registration Act, 1856, s. 22; (4) in the case of a marriage in a registered building according to the usages of Christians not being members of the Church of England collectively known to the law as nonconformists—by the registrar, if present (Marriage Act, 1836, s. 23), or, if he is absent, by the person duly authorised by the governing body of the building (which includes, as regards Roman Catholic buildings, the bishop or vicar-general of the diocese—see the Marriage Act, 1898, s. 1 (3)), or by some person duly authorised in respect of some other registered building in the same registration district (Marriage Act, 1898, ss. 6 (3), 7 (1)); and (5) in the case of a marriage in the office of a superintendent registrar, by the registrar who solemnises it (Marriage Act, 1836, s. 23). The Acts above mentioned contain numerous provisions as to the machinery of registration in each of the above cases.

Marriages solemnised abroad, including (Foreign Marriage Act, 1892, s. 12) those on board H.M.'s ships on foreign stations, are (ib., s. 9 (2)) to be forthwith registered by any marriage officer (q.v.) by or before whom they are celebrated. The master of every British ship required to keep an official log, must register therein the particulars of any marriage taking place on board (Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, ss. 240 (6), 253 (1) (viii.).

Anyone who makes any false statement as to the particulars to be registered in connection with a marriage in order to have it entered in a register is guilty of misdemeanour (Perjury Act, 1911, s. 3 (1) (b)). Forgery of any marriage register or of any certified copy thereof is felony (Forgery Act, 1913, s. 3 (2)).

Registration of Title. See LAND REGISTRIES.

Regius Professor. A holder of one of the five professorships in Divinity, Greek, Hebrew, Civil Law and Physic founded at Cambridge by Henry VIII. in 1540, or of the five similar professorships founded by him at Oxford in 1546.

Regni populi. A name anciently applied to the inhabitants of Surrey and Sussex and to the maritime parts of Hampshire.

Regnum non est divisibile (Co. Litt. 165). (The kingdom is not divisible.) Quoted in connection with the rule that the king's daughters do not take as coparceners, and that the eldest succeeds in default of issue male.

Re-grant. In the law of real property, when, after a person has made a grant, the property granted comes back to him (e.g., by escheat or forfeiture) and he grants it again, he is said to re-grant it. The phrase is chiefly used in the law of copyholds. Thus, before the Fines and Recoveries Act, 1833, one mode of barring an entail in copyholds was a preconcerted forfeiture of the lands by the tenant, followed by a re-grant from the lord to him in fee simple (see ESTATE TAIL). As to other re-grants of copyholds, see GRANT.

Regrating was the offence of buying corn, etc., in any market and selling it again in the same place, so as to raise the price: the statute 7 & 8 Vict. c. 24, made this no longer an offence. See ENGROSSING; FORESTALL; JOURNEY-HOPPER.

Regress is used principally in the phrase "free entry, egress and regress" (q.v.), but it was also used to signify the re-entry of a person who has been disseised of land: see, for instance, Co. Litt. 318B. See RIGHT OF ENTRY.

Regula est, juris quidem ignorantiam cuique nocere, facti vero ignorantiam non nocere (D. 22, 6, 9). (It is the rule, that every man is prejudiced by ignorance of law, but is not prejudiced by ignorance of fact.) Compare IGNORANTIA FACTI, ETC.

Regulæ generales. The General Rules, those being the rules as to procedure and practice which were issued from time to time by the various Courts. Since the Judicature Acts they have been replaced by the Rules of the Supreme Court.

Rehabere facias seisinam. (That you cause him to have seisin again.) It was a judicial writ which issued when the sheriff, upon the habere facias seisinam (q.v.), had delivered more than he ought.

Rehabilitation. The re-enabling of a spiritual person to exercise his functions when he had incurred a disability. This was effected by a brief or other instrument from the Pope down to 1533: the obtaining from Rome of any such instrument was then prohibited by the statute 25 Hen. 8, c. 21.

Re-hearing is where a cause or matter which has been already adjudicated upon is re-argued and a second judgment pronounced. The term is derived from the practice of the Court of Chancery, in which an appeal from a Vice-Chancellor or the Master of the Rolls to the Lord Chancellor was looked upon as a re-hearing, because they were the delegates of the Chancellor and members of the same Court; the same practice was kept up when the Court of Appeal in Chancery (q.v.) was created.

Since the Judicature Acts every appeal to the Court of Appeal is by way of re-hearing (Ord. 58, r. 1). This means that the Court of Appeal is in the same position as if the re-hearing were the original hearing, and hence it may receive evidence in addition to that before the Court below, and it may review the whole case and not merely the points as to which the appeal is brought. See APPEAL.

The Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, s. 9, empowers the Court of Criminal Appeal to treat an appeal as a rehearing to such extent as they think fit; but evidence that was not given at the trial is not commonly received, this power notwithstanding.

Re-insurance is where an insurer procures the whole or part of the sum which he has insured (i.e., contracted to pay in case of loss, death, etc.) to be insured again to him by another person. This is commonly done in the case of marine insurance, either when the insurer is a company, because the sum which they have insured is larger than the constitution of the company allows, or for some similar reason; or, in the case of an underwriter, because subsequent events make the risk greater than he originally intended. See INSURANCE.

Under the statute 19 Geo. 2, c. 37, s. 4, re-insurance was illegal except in certain cases, but contracts of re-insurance were legalised by the Inland Revenue (Stamp Duties) Act, 1864, s. 1; and the Marine Insurance Act, 1906, s. 9 (1), provides that an insurance may be effected in respect of the interest of an insurer under a contract of marine insurance.

Re-insurance is most common in the case of maritime risks, but fire insurance companies can and do re-insure against the risks run under their policies, and under s. 20 of the National Insurance Act, 1911, the Insurance Commissioners can re-insure approved societies in respect of liabilities as to maternity benefit.

Re-issuable Notes. A bank note, duly stamped or issued by a bank authorised to issue unstamped notes, may be re-issued any number of times without any liability for stamp duty on such re-issue (Stamp Act, 1891, s. 30, replacing s. 46 of the Stamp Act, 1870). The Bank of England never avails itself of this privilege.

Rejoin; Rejoinder. In pleading, the rejoinder is the pleading which follows the reply (q.v.) It cannot be delivered without leave (Ord. 23).

Relate; Relation. The doctrine of relation is that by which an act is made to produce the same effect as if it had occurred at an earlier time. Thus, an adjudication in bankruptcy relates back to the act of bankruptcy on which the receiving order (q.v.) was made, or, if more acts of bankruptcy than one are proved, to the first act of bankruptcy committed within three months before the presentation of the petition (Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 37 (1)) so as to invalidate all alienations, executions, etc., made or suffered during that period fraudulently or in favour of any person having notice of the act of bankruptcy. So if a person has an authority to enter on land, and after entering he abuses the authority, he becomes a trespasser ab initio, because his wrongful act relates back to the time of his entry. See AB INITIO; OMNIS RATIHABITIO, ETC.; PROTECTED TRANSACTIONS.

Relation; Relator. In the practice of the Chancery Division of the High Court, where an action by way of information (q.v.) is instituted in the name of the Crown, but not immediately concerning its rights, the proceedings are taken on the relation, that is, on the narrative or information, of a private person, whose name is inserted in the proceedings, and who is called the relator. Thus, in the case of a public nuisance, anyone may act as relator in proceedings by the Attorney-General. A "relator for the purpose of answering costs" is sometimes introduced in proceedings directly concerning the rights of the Crown, in order to obviate the injustice arising from the Crown's immunity from costs in ordinary suits.

See EX RELATIONE.

Relativorum, cognito uno, cognoscitur et alterum (Cro. Jac. 539). (Of things relating to each other, one being known, the other is also known.) Thus when you know the cause you also know the inevitable result.

Release.—I. In the most general sense of the word, "a release" (Shepp. Touch. 320), "is the giving or discharging of the right or action which a man hath or may have or claim against another man or that which is his." Thus, if A. commits a breach of a contract which he has entered into with B., and B. gives up the right of action which he has thus acquired, he is said to release A. So a person may release property from a charge. See DISCHARGE.

When two persons have had several dealings, from which demands and rights of action, whether mutual or not, have arisen or may in future arise, a release of all such demands and rights of action is called a general release. When trustees or executors have wound up an estate they usually require a release from the persons beneficially entitled before handing over or dividing it, in order to clear themselves of responsibility: but neither a trustee nor an executor has any right to make the giving of a release a condition precedent to the performance of his duty.

A release sometimes takes place by operation of law Thus, if A. covenants not to sue B. for a debt which he owes him, this operates as a release, because otherwise A. might sue B. for the debt, and then B. might sue A. for breach of his covenant, which would cause a circuity of action. But if A. has a right of action against two or more, and covenants with one of them not to sue him, this does not operate as a release of the others, though an express release to him would have that effect (see JOINT). For the same reason, although a bankrupt who obtains his discharge, or a debtor who effects an arrangement with his creditors, is thereby released by operation of law from all his debts, with certain exceptions (see DISCHARGE), this does not release persons with whom he is jointly liable for any debt.

II. In the law of real property, a release is where a person having a right, title or claim in or to land, gives it up to someone else who has an interest in the land of such a nature as to qualify him for taking the right so relinquished. (See CONVEYANCE.) Examples are given below. A release may enure (that is, operate or take effect) in four ways. First, by way of mitter l'estate, that is, by giving or transferring an estate or interest; as where one of three joint tenants releases his interest in the land to one of his co-tenants. Secondly, by way of mitter le droit, that is, by giving or transferring a right of entry or similar right, as where a person who has been disseised of land releases his right of entry to the disseisor and thus vests the full title to the land in him. If a man is disseised by A. and B. and releases his right to A., this vests the title in A. to the exclusion of B. This is sometimes called a release by way of entry and feoffment, because it produces the same effect (for some purposes) as if the disseisee had entered and then made a feoffment. Thirdly, by way of extinguishment; thus, if the owner of a seignory which involves a service due from the tenant in fee releases it to the tenant, this operates by way of extinguishment, because the tenant cannot have a service to receive from himself. This is sometimes called a release by way of extinguishment as against all persons, as opposed to a release by which the right passes to the releasee, and which, therefore, operates by way of extinguishment only so far as the releasor is concerned, and does not otherwise affect the existing interests in the land; thus, if a man is disseised and the disseisor makes a feoffment to two men in fee, and the disseisee then releases to one of the feoffees, this shall enure to both of them by way of extinguishment. Fourthly, by way of creation or enlargement of an estate, as where the owner of the fee simple in land grants a lease for years and afterwards releases his estate to the lessee and his heirs so that the fee simple is vested in the lessee. But, in the case of release by creation or enlargement, the releasee must be in possession or seisin of the land to make such a release effectual: an interesse termini is not sufficient. See LEASE AND RELEASE.

III. In Admiralty actions, when a ship, cargo or other property has been arrested, the owner may obtain its release by giving bail or paying the value of the property into Court; upon this being done he obtains a release, which is a kind of writ under the seal of the Court, addressed to the marshal, commanding him to release the property. See BAIL; ADMIRALTY.

Relegation was said to be where a man was temporarily exiled or banished by special Act of Parliament (Co. Litt. 133A). It was never a civil death. See ABJURATION.

Relevancy; Relevant. In the law of evidence, a fact is said to be relevant when it is so connected, directly or indirectly, with a fact in issue in an action or other proceeding, that evidence given respecting it may reasonably be expected to assist in proving or disproving the fact in issue. Thus, if A. is tried for the murder of B. by poison, the fact that he had previously been guilty of other crimes would generally be irrelevant; but the fact that, before B.'s death, A. procured poison similar to that by which B. died would be relevant, and so also would the fact that A. had administered to G. poison of the same kind as that alleged to have been administered to B.; and where the question is whether C. murdered his wife D., the fact that E. and F., to whom also he had been married, had each, like D., been found drowned in a bath in circumstances almost identical with those proved in the case of D., has been held relevant as tending to disprove the theory of accident. So if the question in an action is whether A., the owner of land adjoining a river, owns the entire bed of it or only half the bed at a particular spot, the fact that he owns the entire bed a little down the river is relevant.

The question of the relevancy of a fact to a given inquiry is of importance, because evidence is not admissible to prove an irrelevant fact. A fact is relevant when it supports the contention of one of the parties. The use of the word in this sense seems to be modern.

Relics. The statute 3 Jac. 1, c. 26 authorised justices to search the houses of Papists for "reliques" of saints and to destroy any which they might find.

Relicta verificatione. Down to 1856, a defendant who had pleaded a plea which was demurred to, could withdraw it by entering a relicta verificatione. See COGNOVIT.

Relief.—I. In the law of real property, a relief was a payment which a tenant of full age was bound to pay to the feudal lord on succeeding to the land by descent. By the common law it was an incident to the service of every free tenure, and is hence sometimes called relief-service; but owing to the gradual extinction of seignories in ordinary cases, reliefs are now rarely met with, except where freehold land is held of the lord of the manor at a yearly quit rent of sufficient value to make it worth collecting, in which case the relief consists of one year's rent. This is a socage-relief: reliefs incident to knight's service were abolished by the statute 12 Car. 2, s. 24. A relief lies in render (q.v.) and may be distrained for. See INGRESSUS.

Improper reliefs differ from ordinary reliefs in being derived from custom, prescription or express reservation. A prescriptive relief is one which is presumed to have been reserved by a deed which has been lost (see LOST GRANT; PRESCRIPTION). A customary relief (or relief-custom) is due by the special custom of some manors on every descent, and in some cases on every purchase, of freehold tenements held of the manor, and in some manors the customary fines in respect of copyholds are called reliefs (see FINE). Reliefs due by custom and prescription are not recoverable by distress unless the custom or prescription warrants it.

A relief, like a heriot (q.v.) may, be extinguished, at the instance of either the lord or the tenant, under the Copyhold Act, 1894, s. 2.

The word is derived from the Norman-French, relef, reliefve, relief (late Latin, relevium, relevatio), because, it is said, the heir paid it to take up (relevare) his inheritance.

II. Every action (except actions for discovery and a few others) is instituted for the purpose of obtaining relief, that is, satisfaction for a past injury, or the prevention of a threatened injury, or the enforcement or protection of a right. Thus on the Chancery side a plaintiff usually claims not only a particular kind of relief (" specific relief "), but also " general relief," by asking for such " further or other relief " as the nature of the case may require, and he may ask for " alternative relief " : that is, he may mention two kinds of relief, and ask for one of them, e.g., either specific performance or damages.

III. As to the relief of paupers, see POOR LAW.

Relieve, in feudal law, was to depend: thus the seignory of a tenant in capite was said to relieve of the Crown, which meant that the tenant held of the Crown. The term is not common in English writers.

Religious Orders. The Roman Catholic Relief Act, 1829, ss. 28-37, is directed not merely against Jesuits (q.v.), but also against all " other religious orders, communities, or societies of the Church of Rome bound by monastic or religious vows " : and it is a dead letter in the case of all such orders, etc. See JESUITS.

Relinquishment. See HOLY ORDERS; RESIGNATION.

Rem. See IN REM.

Remainder. A remainder is defined (Co. Litt. 93A) as " remnant of an estate in lands or tenements, expectant upon a particular estate created together with the same at one time." Thus, if A., a tenant in fee simple, grants land to B. for life, and after B.'s decease to C. and his heirs, C.'s interest is termed a remainder in fee expectant on the decease of B.

As regards its incidents, a remainder chiefly differs from a reversion (q.v.) in this, that between the particular tenant (B.) and the remainderman (C.) no tenure exists, from which it follows that no rent-service can be incident to a remainder. See RENT; TENURE.

In the above instance, the remainder is said to be vested (that is, vested in interest), because it is ready to come into possession the moment B.'s estate happens to determine; in other words, the existence of B.'s estate is the only thing which prevents C.'s estate from coming into possession; and, therefore, whenever B. dies, the land passes to C., if he is living, or, through his representatives, to his heir or devisee if he is dead.

If, however, A. had limited the land after B.'s estate to the heir of C., a living person, the remainder would not be ready to come into possession at once, because until C. dies there is no one to take the remainder; for nemo est hæres viventis, and during C.'s life there is no such person as his heir. So if land is limited to B. for life, and after his death, if C. should then be living, to D., D.'s remainder is not vested, because its coming into possession depends not merely on the determination of B.'s estate, but on it's determination during C.'s life: hence such a remainder is termed a contingent remainder, being (see Fearne Cont. Rem. 216) " a remainder limited so as to depend on an event or condition which may never happen or be performed, or which may not happen or be performed till after the determination of the preceding estate." (See CONTINGENT.) When the uncertainty is removed, the remainder becomes vested. The possibility that a remainder may never come into possession at all, does not of itself make the remainder contingent: thus, if land be granted to A. for life, remainder to B. for life, B.'s remainder is vested, although he may die before A., and consequently never come into possession.

Every contingent remainder was formerly liable to destruction by the determination of the particular estate before the remainder vested: thus, suppose land to be limited to A., a bachelor, for life, and after his death to his eldest son and the heirs of his body, and in default of such issue to B. and his heirs, then if A. before the birth of a son, forfeited or surrendered his life estate, or merged it by purchasing B.'s remainder in fee, the contingent remainder to his son would have been destroyed. To prevent this, the following plan was adopted in settlements and similar instruments giving contingent remainders to the children of a tenant for life:—Following the limitation of the estate to the tenant for life, an estate, to commence on the determination of his estate by any means during his life, was given to certain persons and their heirs during his life as trustees to preserve the contingent remainders, for which purpose they were, if necessary to enter on the premises, but to permit the tenant for life to receive the rents and profits during the rest of his life. These were called trusts to preserve contingent remainders. But the Real Property Act, 1845, s. 8, enacted that contingent remainders should not in future be liable to be destroyed by the forfeiture, surrender or merger of any preceding estate of freehold; and now by the Contingent Remainders Act, 1877, no contingent remainder created by any instrument executed after the 2nd August, 1877, can be destroyed by the determination of the particular estate before the remainder vests, if the remainder would have been valid as a springing or shifting use, or executory devise, or other limitation, had it not had a sufficient estate to support it as a contingent remainder. Thus, if land is limited to A. for life, with remainder to his eldest son who shall attain twenty-one, and A. dies before any of his sons attains twenty-one, the remainder will nevertheless take effect as soon as a son attains twenty-one. If, however, land is limited to A. for life, with remainder to his eldest son who shall attain twenty-five, the remainder will only take effect if the son attains twenty-five before A.'s death, because such a limitation could not take effect as an executory limitation by way of use or trust, being contrary to the rule against perpetuities. So that the only difference now between a contingent remainder and an executory devise is, that the former is not affected by the rule against perpetuities, if it vests before the particular estate determines. But an equitable contingent remainder is void for remoteness if it infringes the rule against perpetuities.

Contingent remainders are subject to a rule resembling that against perpetuities, for an estate cannot be given to an unborn person for life, followed by any estate to any child of such unborn person; in such a case the estate given to the child of the unborn person is void. See PERPETUITY.

A remainder may be vested in interest and contingent as to the property comprised in it. Thus if land is limited to A. for life, remainder to the children of B. in common in fee, each child of B. on his birth in A.'s lifetime takes a vested remainder in an undivided share, the amount of which is contingent on the number of children of B. who may be born in A.'s lifetime. If the remainder is to the children of B. now or hereafter to be born, whether in the lifetime of A. or not, the time for ascertaining the persons to take will also be the death of A., unless the remainder is limited by an instrument executed after the passing (on 2nd August, 1877) of the Contingent Remainders Act, 1877, in which case the time will be the death of B.

Cross-remainders arise when land is given in undivided shares to two persons, A. and B., for particular estates, in such a manner that upon the determination of the particular estates in A.'s share, the whole of the land goes to B., and vice versâ, the remainderman or reversioner not being let in till the determination of all the particular estates in both shares. Perhaps the commonest instance of cross-remainders occurs in an ordinary settlement of land (whether by deed or will), where, after limiting an estate tail in the land to each of the sons of the tenant for life in succession, provision is made for the failure of male issue by limiting it to the daughters in equal shares as tenants in common in tail, with a clause that on the death of any daughter without issue, her share (both original and accrued) shall go to the other daughters in tail, so that if all the daughters but one die without issue, that one takes everything, and the remainderman or reversioner in fee takes nothing unless and until they all die without issue.

Remand. To remand a defendant or prisoner in a proceeding before a magistrate or justices of the peace, is to adjourn the hearing to a future date, and to order that the defendant, unless admitted to bail, be kept in custody in the meantime.

Remanentiam, Ad. An estate ad remanentiam meant in the time of Glanville, an estate in fee simple.

Remanent pro defectu emptorum. (They are left on my hands for want of buyers.) This is the return made in an appropriate case by a sheriff with regard to goods taken under a fieri facias.

Remanet, in the practice of the King's Bench Division, is an action which has been set down for trial at one sittings, but has not come on, so that it stands over to the next sittings.

Remanet in custodia (Rem. Custod.). (He remains in custody.) In the time of imprisonment on mesne process, an action in the King's Bench was properly commenced, when the defendant was in custody, by an entry of "rem custod." in the marshal's book.

Remedy is the means by which the violation of a right is prevented, redressed, or compensated. Remedies are of four kinds: (1) by act of the party injured, the principal of which are defence, recaption, distress, entry, abatement and seizure; (2) by operation of law, as in the case of retainer and remitter; (3) by agreement between the parties, e.g., by accord and satisfaction, and arbitration; and (4) by judicial remedy, e.g., action or suit. (See the various titles.) The last are called judicial remedies, as opposed to the first three classes, which are extra-judicial. As to the distinction between a remedy and a right, see LIMITATION; and as to equitable injuries and equitable remedies, see INJURY.

The minute variation (from the standard of weight and fineness prescribed for coins) which is permitted by the Coinage Acts is known as a remedy. See the Coinage Act, 1870, s. 3, Sch. I. See TOLERANCE.

Remembrancers. Anciently there were, in the Exchequer, three officers known as Remembrancers: the King's Remembrancer, the Lord Treasurer's Remembrancer, and the Remembrancer of the First Fruits. The office of the last-mentioned (who was concerned with the First Fruits: see Queen Anne's Bounty) was abolished by the Queen Anne's Bounty Act, 1838, s. 1. The office of the Lord Treasurer's Remembrancer (who was concerned with the collection of the hereditary revenues of the Crown) was abolished by the enactment which in 1833 abolished the office of the Clerk of the Pipe (q.v.), who had kept the accounts of those revenues.

The King's Remembrancer performed duties connected with recoveries of penalties and debts due to the Crown; he kept in his office the documents relating to the passing of lands to and from the Crown; and he had functions in connection with English Bills (see BILL OF COMPLAINT). The Queen's Remembrancer Act, 1859, s. 1, provided that he should cease to exist as a separate officer, and that he should be a Master of the Court of Exchequer. Under the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 77, he was attached to the Supreme Court, and under the Judicature (Officers) Act, 1879, ss. 6, 8, he was transferred to the Central Office and made a Master of the Supreme Court. His duties as King's Remembrancer now consist mainly of certain functions connected with the selection of sheriffs (q.v.) and swearing in of the Lord Mayor of London, the trial of the Pyx (q.v.), and acknowledgments of homage for Crown lands (Queen's Remembrancer Act, 1859, s. 43).

The Remembrancer of the City of London is an official receiving £1,500 a year. He represents the corporation before parliamentary committees; he accompanies the sheriffs when they wait on the Sovereign in connection of any address from the corporation; and he is bound to attend all Courts of aldermen and common council when required.

Remise. In old releases the operative words were "remise, surrender and quit claim," all of which, according to Coke, were of practically the same meaning (Co. Litt. 264B).

Remit; Remission. As in the majority of cases, a Court of Appeal sits merely to decide questions of law, and has not the machinery to carry its decisions into effect, it is obliged, when it reverses or varies the decision of an inferior tribunal in such a way as to make further steps necessary, to remit or send back the case to the inferior tribunal, so that such steps may be taken there as are necessary to carry the decision into effect. Thus, supposing a Court gives judgment for the defendant in an action in which, if the plaintiff were successful, inquiries would have to be taken, then, if the House of Lords or Privy Council reverses that decision and gives judgment for the plaintiff, it remits the case to the lower Court in order that the inquiries may be taken, or it may remit the case with directions as to the relief to be given to the plaintiff. This is sometimes called remitter.

In Privy Council practice, on a cause being remitted to the inferior Court, a document called a remission is in some cases (e.g., ecclesiastical appeals) required to be issued. It is a kind of writ commanding the judge to resume and proceed with the cause.

Remitted Actions. The County Courts Act, 1919, s. 1 (which replaces s. 65 of the County Courts Act, 1888), provides that the High Court may remit to the County Court any action brought in the High Court (1) where the plaintiff's claim is founded either on contract or on tort and the amount claimed does not exceed £100, and whether the counterclaim, if any, does or does not exceed £100; (2) where the only matter to be tried is a counterclaim, founded either on contract or on tort, and the amount involved does not exceed £100; and (3) where the plaintiff's claim is for the recovery of land (with or without rent or mesne profits) against a tenant whose title has been determined and the action could have been brought (see ss. 138, 139 of the Act of 1888) in the County Court. Whether any of these actions are or are not to be remitted is in the discretion of the Court.

The County Courts Act, 1919, s. 2 (which replaces s. 66 of the Act of 1888), provides that the High Court may remit to the County Court any action founded on tort where an affidavit by or on behalf of the defendant avers that the plaintiff has no visible means of paying costs, unless the defendant satisfies the judge that the averment is not correct or unless he gives security for costs. But here also the matter is in the discretion of the judge.

Remitter, says Littleton, "is where a man hath two titles to lands or tenements, viz., one a more antient title, and another a more latter title; and if he comes to the land by a latter title, yet the law will adjudge him in by force of the elder title, because the elder title is the more sure and more worthie title" (Litt. § 659); but the second title must come to him without his own act or default (Co. Litt. 347B). Thus, if A disseised B, tenant in fee simple of land, and then made a lease of the land to him by deed poll for a term of years, and B entered under the lease, this entry was a remitter to B; that is, he regained his original estate in fee simple, and was not considered as entitled to the land by virtue of the lease to him by A. But if B took an estate from A by indenture, this would estop him from claiming any estate, except that given him by the deed, and would thus prevent a remitter, because, as Coke says, a "deed indented is the deed of both parties, and therefore as well the taker as the giver is concluded" (Co. Litt 363B). See RECONTINUANCE; REMIT.

Remittitur damna. When one of the parties to an action in the Court of King's Bench obtained judgment for damages which he was either not entitled to, or was willing to abandon, he made an entry on the record called a remittitur damna, by which he gave up or remitted those damages. Thus, if the jury gave greater damages than the plaintiff had claimed by his pleading, the mistake was rectified by entering a remittitur damna as to the excess. So when the defendant, in an action of replevin, obtained judgment by default, he was entitled not only to a return of the goods replevied, but also to damages for being deprived of them, which had to be assessed by a writ of inquiry; but the damages being usually trifling in amount, they were generally remitted, in order to save the expense of a writ of inquiry.

Remittitur of Record. Formerly when a judgment of the Court of King's Bench was affirmed or reversed in the Court of Exchequer Chamber on a writ of error, there was a "remittitur of record" (or transmission of the transcript of the record) to the King's Bench to be entered up at the foot of the judgment there. This was made unnecessary by a Rule of Court made in 1834.

Remoteness. Certain rules of the law of real property are directed against the validity of dispositions which take effect at too remote a period. The most important are the rules against perpetuities (q.v.) and against a possibility on a possibility (q.v.).

Where the damage sustained by a plaintiff is neither the necessary nor the probable result of the conduct of a defendant, the plaintiff cannot recover in respect of such damage; it is said to be too remote.

Remoto impedimento emergit actio (Wing. 20). (An impediment being removed, an action emerges.) Quoted by Wingate in support of various obsolete propositions such as: "A man shall not have execution against the king's debtor that hath a protection, because the king ought to be paid first; yet if the plaintiff will undertake to pay the king's debt, he shall have judgment and execution for both the debts."

Removal. The casual poor of a parish (as opposed to its "settled" poor) are only entitled to relief in that parish until they can be removed to their parish of birth or settlement, under an order of removal made by two justices of the peace, unless they have acquired the status of irremovability. See POOR; SETTLEMENT; IRREMOVABILITY.

An action commenced in the Central Office of the High Court may be removed from London to a district registry for any sufficient reason (Ord. 35, r. 17), and an action proceeding in a district registry may be removed into the Central Office by the defendant as of right at any time between appearance and defence (Ord. 35, r. 13), except in certain cases where the writ has been endorsed under Ord. 14, r. 6 (ib.). See JUDGMENT.

A cause may be removed from a County Court into the High Court by writ of certiorari if a judge of the High Court thinks it a fit case to be tried in the High Court upon such terms as to costs and giving security as the judge may think fit (County Courts Act, 1888, s. 126). As to the removal of judgments, see JUDGMENT.

A cause may be in general removed from an inferior Court not of record into the High Court by certiorari (q.v.); and s. 90 of the Judicature Act, 1873, provides that, where the relief claimed exceeds that which can be given by such inferior Courts as are mentioned in ss. 88, 89, then the High Court may remove a cause from any such Court into the High Court.

Remover. Formerly this meant the transfer of a suit or cause from one Court to another.

Render. To render is to yield or pay, as to render a rent. So some kinds of heriots are said to lie in render, that is, the tenant is bound to give the heriot to the lord. Hence profits are divided into profits lying in render, or those which the tenant is bound to yield or pay, such as rent, and profits lying in prender, which the person entitled to must take for himself. See PROFIT; PRENDER.

Where a mine, quarry or the like is leased, it is sometimes stipulated that a certain proportion of the minerals gotten shall be delivered to the lessor by way of rent or royalty. This is called a render. It is a royalty in kind. See ROYALTY.

Renewal. See WRIT OF SUMMONS.

Renounce; Renunciation. A renunciation is a document by which a person appointed by a testator as his executor, or a person who is entitled to take out letters of administration to the effects of an intestate in priority to other persons, renounces or gives up his right to take out probate or letters of administration; the document is filed in the registry. The word renunciation is also commonly used as synonymous with disclaimer (q.v.) where the latter word is used generally in connection with a right, interest, or office. See RETRACTATION.

Rent is a periodical payment due by a tenant of land or other corporeal hereditament; it is usually payable in money, but it may also be reserved in fowls, wheat, spurs or the like. When land is let free of rent and the landlord wishes to be able to obtain an acknowledgment of the tenancy when necessary, a nominal rent is frequently reserved, consisting of one peppercorn a year to be paid when demanded.

Rents are of several kinds:—

(i) Rent service is always incident to tenure; in other words, it is that which is due when one man holds land of another by fealty (or any other service) and rent; as where a man holds land of another in fee simple at a rent reserved before the Statute Quia Emptores (see FEE FARM), or where an owner of land in fee at the present day leases it to another for 99 years at a yearly rent. In the latter case the rent is an incident to the reversion of the lessor or reversioner and passes with it if he grants it to another. Payment of a rent service may be enforced by distress (q.v.). "It is called a rent service because it hath some corporall service annexed unto it, which at least is fealty" (Co. Litt. 142A), but at the present day fealty is never exacted. If the rent is severed from the reversion (as where either is assigned without the other) it becomes a rent in gross. A rack rent is a rent of the full annual value of the land, or near it. When land is leased to a person on condition that he erects certain buildings on it, the rent reserved (which is small in comparison with the rent of the land when built on) is called the ground rent. When the lessee has erected the building, he may sub-let at a rack rent (calculated at an amount sufficient to repay to him with a profit the amount expended in building the house and also to cover the ground rent), or he may take from the sub-lessee a fine amounting to not much less than what he has expended on the house, reserving a rent a little larger than the ground rent; this is generally called an improved ground rent. When a mine, quarry, brick-work or similar property is leased, the lessor usually reserves not only a fixed yearly rent but also a royalty or galeage rent, consisting of royalties (q.v.), varying with the quantity of minerals, bricks, etc., produced during each year. In this case the fixed rent is called a dead rent. A footage rent is a rent payable for every acre a foot thick of minerals, and so in proportion for a greater or less thickness. A spoil-bank rent is a sum payable according to the quantity of rubbish from a mine deposited on land belonging to the lessor.

(ii) A rent charge is where a rent is payable in respect of land to a person who has no reversion in it, and a right to distress is given him by express agreement between the parties: as where a man (since Quia Emptores) conveys land in fee to another, reserving to himself and his heirs a certain rent with the right of distress, or if a man seised of land grants to another a yearly rent issuing out of it with a clause of distress.

(iii) Formerly where a rent (not being a rent service) was reserved or created without a clause of distress, the grantee had no remedy by distress, and hence the rent was called a rent seck (redditus siccus, a dry rent). So if the owner of a rent service granted the rent to another, reserving the fealty to himself, the grantee had only a rent seck. But this distinction between rent charges and rent seck was abolished by the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1730, s. 5, which gave the owner of every rent seck a right of distress for it: so that every rent created by grant is now in effect a rent charge.

Under the Tithe Act, 1836, a rent charge varying with the price of corn was substituted for the right to take tithes in kind. An extraordinary tithe rent charge was also imposed by the same Act in respect of highly productive land, such as hop-grounds and market gardens, but this rent charge was abolished as from 25th June, 1886, by the Extraordinary Tithe Act, 1886, and is now replaced by an annual payment calculated at the rate of 4 per cent. on the capital value of the rent charge, as ascertained by the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries (Extraordinary Tithe Acts, 1886 and 1897), such annual payment being recoverable as was the rent charge. See TITHES.

Before the statute Quia Emptores, a person could convey land in fee simple to be held of him and his heirs, reserving a rent service from the grantee. Some instances of rents thus created still exist either under the name of fee farm rents (see FEE FARM) or of quit rents, so called because in consideration of their payment the tenants are quit or discharged of all other services. Such rents are now found almost only in manors, being frequently due both by the freeholders and the copyholders: they are sometimes called customary rents, being due by custom; or rents of assise, from being fixed in amount; and those of the freeholders are frequently called chief rents (q.v.). The fee farm rents payable to the Crown for the lands of religious houses were known as rents resolute.

Every rent, except a rent service incident to a reversion, is an incorporeal hereditament. It may belong to a man in fee, or in tail, or for any other estate.

The Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, s. 44, gives a right of entry and distress for the recovery of any annual sum charged on land or the income of land (not being rent incident to a reversion); and s. 45 of the same Act provides that quit rents, chief rents, rent charges and other perpetual charges on land may be redeemed at prices to be fixed by what is now the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries. See ANNUITY; APPORTIONMENT.

See ACCUSTOMED RENT.

Rental Value. For the purposes of mineral rights duty (q.v.) this means (1) the actual rent paid for the right to work minerals where that right is leased; (2) the rent which could be obtained for the right to work minerals which the proprietor is himself working; and (3) in the case of any mineral wayleave, the rent actually paid (Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, s. 20 (2)).

Rentcharge. See RENT.

Rents; Rents and Profits. A devise of the "rents and profits," or "rents," of land is, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, a devise of the land itself.

Renunciation. See RENOUNCE.

Reparatione facienda, De. This was a writ to enforce the duty of carrying out repairs. Thus it lay (for one who had a right of passage over a bridge) against another man who was under a duty to keep the bridge in repair but had failed to do so.

Repatriation. This is said to take place when a person regains a nationality which he had abandoned or lost (See STATUTORY ALIEN). It is the reverse process to expatriation (q.v.).

Repeal. The abrogation of a statute or part of a statute by a subsequent statute. It may be either express, that is to say, specially enacted, or it may be implied, that is to say the necessary result of the subsequent enactment. There is, moreover, the quasi repeal effected by the Statute Law Revision Acts: see S. L. R. Where an Act passed after 1850 repeals a repealing enactment, the enactments which had been repealed by the repealing enactment do not, in the absence of express provision, revive; and where an Act passed after 1850 repeals an enactment in whole or in part and substitutes other provisions, then the repealed enactment remains in force until the substituted provisions come into operation (Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 11). Where any Act passed after 1889 repeals and re-enacts earlier enactments, with or without modification, then references in any other Act to the repealed enactments are to be taken as references to the re-enacted enactments (ib., s. 38 (1)).

Repellitur à sacramento infamis (Co. Litt. 158). (An infamous person is not to be permitted to take the oath.) Coke is speaking of the challenge (q.v.) of a juror propter delictum: the maxim could also have been used to illustrate the old law under which

"infamy" resulted from conviction of perjury, forgery, gross cheats, etc., and disqualified a man from being a witness.

Repleader. In the old common law practice judgment of repleader was given in an action when the pleadings had failed to raise a definite and material issue. (See PLEADING.) Its effect was that the pleadings were begun again at the point where the defect first occurred.

Replegiare. To replevy: see REPLEVIN.

Replegiare de averiis. Another name for the writ Averiis replegiandis, De. (q.v.).

Replegiari facias. The writ of replevin (q.v.).

Replevin; Replevisor; Replevy. Replevin is the remedy which may be adopted by a person in almost all cases in which chattels are unlawfully taken from him; but it is not often adopted, except in cases of wrongful distress for rent or damage feasant, when it is brought for the purpose of trying the legality of the distress: it may also be used to decide a question of title to land or other hereditaments. See DISTRESS.

The first step is for the replevisor or distrainee (i.e., the person whose goods have been distrained) to obtain a replevy of the goods, which he does by procuring from the registrar of the County Court of the district a warrant directing the high bailiff to cause the goods to be delivered to him: this is granted on the replevisor giving security (usually a bond with two sureties) to commence and prosecute an action for the wrongful taking against the distrainor, either in the County Court or in the High Court, and to return the goods to the distrainor if a return shall be adjudged. Formerly, if this action (which is called an action of replevin) was brought in one of the superior Courts of common law, proceedings up to declaration were the same as in an ordinary action, the replevisor being the plaintiff (see ACTOR); but where, as was usually the case, the defendant claimed a return of the goods replevied, the subsequent pleadings were peculiar. If the defendant insisted that they were lawfully taken by him, he either made "avowry," i.e., he "avowed" taking the distress in his own right, and set forth the reason of it (as for rent in arrear), in which case he was known as an avowant, or he made "conusance" or "cognisance," i.e., he "acknowledged" the taking, but insisted that it was lawful, as he did it by the command of one who had a right to distrain; the plaintiff's next pleading was called a plea in bar, that of the defendant a replication, and so on. Under the present practice, the pleadings in an action of replevin are similar to those in ordinary cases. (See PLEADING.) If the plaintiff obtains judgment, he retains the goods and is awarded damages for the unlawful taking; if the defendant is successful, he obtains judgment for a return of the goods taken, formerly enforceable by a writ called de retorno habendo, now by a writ of delivery (q.v.) See also RECAPTION.

As to the practice in replevin see ss. 133-137 of the County Courts Act, 1888, and Order 34 of the County Court Rules.

Originally, the only remedy in cases of wrongful distress was the writ of replevin (replegiari facias), under which the proceedings were in the sheriff's County Court; but by 52 Hen. 3, c. 21, the sheriff was authorised to grant replevins without this writ. If the goods had been eloigned (q.v.), the replevisor might have a writ of capias in withernam (q.v.), under which the sheriff took the distrainor's own goods as a punishment. If the plaintiff in an action of replevin was nonsuited he was allowed a writ of second deliverance, under which the goods were again delivered to him; but if he was nonsuited in the second action, the defendant obtained a writ of return irreplevisable, which was an absolute bar to the plaintiff's claim. The two latter proceedings were impliedly abolished by the abolition of non-suits (q.v.). See GAGE; GAGER DE DELIVERANCE.

Replevisable. Goods for which replevin proceedings can be taken are said to be replevisable. Where goods are delivered under a contract, they are irreplevisable, because a wrongful taking is essential to replevin proceedings.

Replevish. Synonymous, as regards goods, with replevy: anciently used also as meaning to let one to mainprise (q.v.) upon surety.

Replication. In matrimonial suits in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division, the pleading delivered by the petitioner to the answer of the respondent was formerly termed the replication and is now known as either the replication or the reply.

In proceedings by English information (q.v.) on the Revenue Side of the King's Bench Division, the replication is the pleading delivered in reply to the defendant's answer or (as it would elsewhere be called) defence.

Under the old practice of the Chancery and common law Courts, the replication was the pleading filed or delivered by the plaintiff in answer to the defendant's plea or answer. In Chancery, however, the replication had for many years been merely a joinder of issue

(q.v.), special replications (which were used where the defendant introduced new matter into his plea or answer) having been superseded by the practice of amending the bill. See AMENDMENT; PLEADING; REPLY.

Reply. In its general sense, a reply is what the plaintiff, petitioner or other person who has instituted a proceeding says in answer to the defendant's case.

In an action in the High Court the reply is the pleading delivered in answer to the defendant's statement of defence. Usually the reply is delivered by the plaintiff, but if the defendant has set up a counter-claim against any person other than the plaintiff, the answer of that person to the counterclaim is called a reply, although it is rather in the nature of a statement of defence. In simple actions, instead of a reply, there is usually a mere joinder of issue (q.v.)': except in Admiralty actions a reply cannot be delivered without leave (Ord. 23).

When a case is tried or argued in Court, the speech or argument of the plaintiff in answer to that of the defendant is called his reply. See TRIAL; OPENING; RIGHT TO BEGIN.

In criminal cases, where any witness, other than the prisoner, is called for the defence, or any document is put in for the defence, counsel for the prosecution is entitled to reply (28 & 29 Vict. c. 18, s. 2; Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, s. 3), that is to say, to address the jury after counsel for the prisoner has addressed them. But where either of the Law Officers appears personally, he may, if he thinks fit, reply even though no witness, other than the prisoner, has been called for the defence.

As to affidavits in reply, see AFFIDAVIT.

Under the old practice of the Chancery and common law Courts, to reply was to file or deliver replication (q.v.).

Report.—I. When a question is referred to a referee under the Arbitration Act, 1889, his decision is given in the form of a report to the Court. See REFER; REFEREE.

As to reports in Admiralty actions, see REGISTRAR AND MERCHANTS.

Under the old practice in Chancery, when an inquiry was referred to the Master, he gave the result in a report, which was filed in an office, called for that reason the Report Office. In more modern practice, chief clerks' certificates, petitions, etc., were also filed there (see CERTIFICATE). After the abolition of the Masters in Chancery (q.v.), the Report Office was added to that of Records and Writs by the Court of Chancery Act, 1855, and has now been amalgamated with the Central Office (q.v.).

The judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on an appeal or reference is technically a report to the King in Council, giving the opinion of the Court on the question involved in the case. See JUDICIAL COMMITTEE; REFER.

Report, Law. A published account of a legal proceeding, giving a statement of the facts, the arguments on both sides, and the reasons the Court gave for its judgment. Reports by barristers published with the reporter's name or otherwise sanctioned by persons of standing in the profession are cited in argument as precedents, and are of more or less authority according to the reputation of the reporter and of the judges whose decisions are reported. Regular law reporting appears to have commenced about the end of the thirteenth century with the Year Books (q.v.). It was carried on by a succession of reporters in the various Courts until 1865. In that year the Council of Law Reporting commenced a series of reports covering all the superior Courts which took over the regular reporters. But this series is not official, as is sometimes thought. "All reports made by gentlemen of the Bar and published on their responsibility are equally regular. There is no superiority in the reports of the Council of Law Reporting. Counsel are as much entitled to use the one as the others" (per Lord Esher, M.R., 3 T. L. R. 641). The oldest existing series of reports covering all the superior Courts is the Law Journal Reports, which have been published continuously since 1822. A complete list of the various reports will be found in the list of abbreviations at the commencement of this Dictionary. For information regarding the authority of the various old reports, see Wallace, The Reporters, 1882; continued to 1865 by Fox, Handbook of the English Law Reports, 1913. See also Daniel, History and Origin of the Law Reports, 1884; Maxwell, Complete List of British and Colonial Law Reports, with Bibliographical Notes, 1913.

Report Office. See REPORT.

Reposition. In the law of the forest, this meant the re-afforesting of forest lands which had been made purlieu. (q.v.).

Representation.—I. One person is said to represent another when he takes his place. Thus, an agent represents his principal, an heir his ancestor, an executor his testator, and an administrator the intestate whose estate he administers. (See REPRESENTATIVE.) As to parliamentary representation, see HOUSE OF COMMONS; HOUSE OF LORDS.

In the law of intestacy, the rule of representation is that rule of law by which the children or other descendants of a deceased person, who, if he had lived, would have taken property by virtue of an intestacy, stand in his place, so as to take the property which he would have taken if he had lived. As regards realty, the rule of representation is universal, namely, that all lineal descendants represent their ancestor. See the fourth canon of descent, in DESCENT.

There is also another and, in the opinion of many, an incorrect use of the term representation in the law of descent. If A. acquires land by purchase and dies intestate, leaving two daughters, B. and C., his land descends to them as coparceners. If B. dies intestate, leaving a son D., the question arises to whom will her share descend? The Inheritance Act, 1833, says that in case of a descent, the title to inherit shall be traced from the purchaser, who in this case is A., so that the provisions of the Act would seem to be fulfilled by making B.'s share descend to C. and D. in equal shares, D. standing in the place of his deceased mother. No doubt this result would be absurd, the obvious conclusion being that the legislature did not contemplate such a case. It has (14 Jur. 214) been decided that in the case above supposed B.'s share descends to D. No reasons are given for the decision except that the same result would have followed under the old law, and that the Act did not intend to make an alteration. In addition to this reason, however, it is argued by Mr. Joshua Williams that the case is governed by the rule of representation, D. standing in the place of his deceased mother. It is quite clear that the rule of representation referred to is not the ordinary rule stated in the text, because that only applies to the case of a person pre-deceasing the intestate. It is true that under the old law, in certain cases, if a coparcener died intestate her share descended to her issue, but this was by virtue of a special rule which has never been adequately explained.

In the case of personalty, representation only takes place (i) where the intestate has left children and grandchildren by deceased children, in which case the grandchildren stand in their parents' place; and (ii) where the intestate has left a mother, or a brother, or sister, and also nephews or nieces by a deceased brother or sister, in which case the nephews or nieces take their parent's share. See DISTRIBUTION; NEXT OF KIN; PER CAPITA.

II. In the law of contracts, a representation is a statement or assertion made by one party to the other, before or at the time of the contract, of some matter or circumstance relating to it. In ordinary contracts a representation as such has no legal effect, even if untrue, and even if the person making it knew it to be so. Thus if a vendor of goods simply represents them as worth a high price, while in fact they are not, this gives the purchaser no right either to rescind the contract or to bring an action of damages. (See CAVEAT EMPTOR.) But a representation may take the form of a warranty or condition, or may amount to fraudulent or negligent misrepresentation, all of which have important legal effects. (See the respective titles.) Contracts of insurance being contracts uberrimæ fidei (q.v.), representations which relate to material facts connected with an insurance must be complied with, but a substantial compliance is sufficient. Thus where the assured asserted that his vessel mounted twelve guns and twenty men, and the ship sailed with less than this number of men and guns, but carried in addition a number of boys and swivels, which made her force in fact greater than that stated, it was held that, this being a representation and not a warranty, and having been substantially complied with, the underwriters were liable (3 B. & S. 751).

III. Under the Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874 (q.v.), complaints against incumbents, etc., on matters within that Act, are made by a document called a representation, containing a statement of the nature of the complaint, and signed by the person or persons making it.

Representative is a person who represents or takes the place of another. The executor or administrator of a deceased person is called his personal representative, because he represents him in respect of his personal estate; and where there is realty the executor or administrator is called the real representative (q.v.) because, since 1897, he represents the deceased as regards the realty. So also an heir was formerly sometimes called the real representative of his ancestor, because down to 1897 he represented the ancestor as regards realty.

As to representative peers, see HOUSE OF LORDS.

A representative action or suit is one brought on the Chancery side by a member of a class of persons on behalf of himself and the other members of the class. In the proceedings before judgment the plaintiff is, as a rule, dominus litis (q.v.). and may discontinue or compromise the action as he pleases; therefore a member of the class who is dissatisfied with an order obtained by the plaintiff cannot appeal against it; he may, however, apply to be made a defendant, and, in a proper case, might obtain the conduct of the proceedings. As soon as judgment is given for the plaintiff he ceases to be dominus litis, and all members of the class who are willing to contribute to the expenses of the suit may join in, and take the benefit of, the subsequent proceedings.

Representative Body. See WELSH CHURCH.

Reprieve, in criminal procedure, is the withdrawal of a sentence for a time, whereby the execution of it is suspended. It may be granted either by the Court or by the Crown. In two cases the Court is bound to grant a reprieve, namely, where a female prisoner under sentence of death is pregnant, and where a prisoner becomes insane after judgment. (See JURY.) On a conviction for murder no reprieve can be granted by the Court, whose only function is to pronounce sentence of death (Offences against the Person Act, 1861, s. 2). In the case of such other capital felonies as there still are, and in the case of minor offences, the Court may record (but not pronounce) sentence, and this is equivalent to a reprieve: but the adoption of this procedure is obsolete, the matter being almost invariably left to abide either the decision of the Court of Criminal Appeal or that of the Crown; the Crown can, of course, reprieve as well as pardon or commute.

Reprimand. Discharge, with reprimand, on payment of costs, is the penalty for a first offence against the Wild Birds' Protection Act, 1880: see s. 4.

In the Army an officer may be sentenced by court-martial to "reprimand" or "severe reprimand" (Army Act, s. 44 (g)), while a non-commissioned officer may be summarily reprimanded, severely reprimanded, or admonished by the commanding officer (ib., s. 46 (1): King's Regulations, 493 (vi), (vii), 499). In the Navy "severe reprimand" or "reprimand" is one of the punishments which may be inflicted by the sentence of a court-martial (Navy Discipline Act, 1866, s. 52 (8)). Reprimand by the captain of a ship is confined to chief and other petty officers and lower ranks (King's Regulations (for the Navy) 797).

Reprisal is the same thing as recaption (q.v).

Reprisals, in international law, include every species of means, short of war, employed by one State to procure redress for an injury committed by another State. The term therefore includes embargo and retorsion (q.v.). Reprisals are negative when a State refuses to fulfil an obligation, and positive when they consist in seizing the subjects or property of the offending State. The reprisals above described were sometimes called special, as opposed to general reprisals, which were only used in time of war, and consisted in authorising any individuals whatever, whether suffering from private grievances or not, to act against the subjects of the opposed State. See PRIVATEERS; LETTERS OF MARQUE.

The word is now more generally used as meaning acts of retaliation during the course of a war for breaches of the usages of war. Thus the execution of prisoners by one belligerent might result in like steps being taken by the other belligerent.

Reprise. A deduction, such as a rentcharge, from the gross annual rent or value of lands. The word is used chiefly in such expressions as "above all reprises": thus the Augmentation of Benefices Act, 1831, s. 1 (now repealed), speaks of "the clear yearly value, above all reprises, of the rectory."

Reprobata pecunia liberat solventem (9 Rep. 79). (Money refused frees him who tenders it.) This maxim is not to be taken literally: see TENDER.

Republication of a will or codicil is where it is re-executed by the testator. Re-execution may take place when the will or codicil has been revoked and the testator wishes to revive it. Such re-publication as is effected by re-execution is now the only re-publication known to the law. See PUBLICATION; REVIVAL.

Repugnant means contrary to or inconsistent with. Thus, if A. grants land to B. in fee, upon condition that he shall not alien it, this condition is "repugnant to the estate," that is, inconsistent with the nature of a fee simple, and therefore void.

As to repugnant gifts by deed or will, see INCONSISTENCY.

Reputation. In the law of evidence, matters of public and general interest, such as the boundaries of counties or parishes, rights of common, claims of highway, etc., are allowed to be proved by general reputation, e.g., by the declarations of deceased persons made ante litem motam, by old documents, etc., notwithstanding the general rule against secondary evidence. So evidence of the conduct of a family, as proved by a surviving member of it, is admissible in questions of pedigree.

As to a manor by reputation, see MANOR.

As to personal reputation, see LIBEL; CHARACTER; SLANDER.

Reputed Ownership. The doctrine of reputed ownership was first introduced into the bankrupt laws by the statute 21 Jac. 1, c. 19, s. 11, with the object of protecting the creditors of a trader from the consequences of the false credit which he might acquire by being suffered to have in his possession, as apparent owner, property which does not really belong to him. If the circumstances in which the property is in the trader's possession, order or disposition, are such as to lead to a fair and reasonable inference amongst persons likely to have dealings with him, that he is the owner, and if the real owner is a consenting party, then on the trader becoming bankrupt, that property is divisible among his creditors. The doctrine does not apply to property comprised in a registered bill of sale, nor does it apply in cases where (as in the case of furniture held by a hotel keeper upon the hire purchase system) there is a custom or usage of trade rebutting the presumption of ownership. (See ORDER AND DISPOSITION.) The Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 44 (iii), made the doctrine applicable to all goods possessed, etc., by any bankrupt, whether a trader or a non-trader in his trade or business; and that enactment is reproduced in s. 38 (2) (c) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. It is still inapplicable to a bankrupt who carries on no trade or business.

See TRUE OWNER.

Request. A request may give rise to an implied or tacit promise. Thus, if I request a workman to do work for me, I tacitly agree to pay him for it. And if I request a person to do something for me which would not of itself give rise to a tacit promise to pay him, and after he has done it I promise to pay him, this promise couples itself with the antecedent request and makes a good contract.

In some cases a request will itself be implied by the law (quasi-request): thus, if A. has been compelled to do that which B. is legally compellable to do, the law will imply a request by B. to A. to do the act. See CONTRACT; PROMISE; QUASI-CONTRACT; also COURTS OF REQUEST; LETTERS OF REQUEST.

Request Note. A document requesting the removal of dutiable goods from one warehouse (q.v.) to another: see the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, s. 88.

Requisitions on Title. When a contract for the sale of real property has been entered into, and the vendor has delivered the abstract of title to the purchaser, the latter goes through the abstract, and if there are any defects in or questions as to the vendor's title, he puts his objections into writing and delivers them to the vendor. These are called requisitions, because they require the vendor to remove the defects or doubts pointed out. A formal contract of sale always stipulates that the requisitions shall be made within a certain time after the delivery of the abstract. It also generally stipulates that the title shall commence with a certain document, and that no requisitions shall be made in respect of the earlier title; not unfrequently it is provided that no requisitions shall be made in respect of some specified defect in the title which the vendor is unable to remove. See VENDORS AND PURCHASERS.

Rere-county. A supplementary County Court anciently held by the sheriff on the day after the County Court. It was for, amongst other things, the receipt of the various moneys which the sheriff collected for the king.

Reredos. An ornamental facing, of stone or wood, on the wall at the back of the Communion Table. Its use is, per se, not illegal: but particular forms of reredos are of doubtful legality.

Rerum progressu offendunt multa, quæ in initio præcaveri seu prævideri non possunt (6 Rep. 40). (In the course of events many mischiefs arise which at the beginning could not be guarded against or foreseen.) Coke cites this as illustrating the danger of innovations in the common law.

Rerum suarum quilibet est moderator et arbiter (Co. Litt. 223). (Everyone is the manager and judge of his own affairs.) That is to say, a man may do as he likes with his own. But Coke had not anticipated the course of recent legislation.

Res, in an Admiralty action in rem, is the ship, cargo or other property proceeded against. See ACTION; ARREST; BAIL; IN PERSONAM.

Res accessoria sequitur rem principalem. (The accessory follows the principal.) In the Roman law this corresponded to our Accessorium non, etc.

Re-sale is where a person who has sold goods or other property to a purchaser sells them again to someone else. Sometimes (and in sales by auction under conditions of sale invariably) a vendor reserves the right of re-selling if the purchaser commits default in payment of the purchase-money, and in some cases (e.g., on a sale of perishable articles) the vendor may do so without having reserved the right.

Resceit. Where a cause had been commenced between two persons the admission of a third person to plead was anciently known as resceit or reception. The admittance of a plea by one or the other of the parties to a cause was also known as resceit.

Rescind; Rescission. Rescission, or the act of rescinding, is where a contract is put an end to by the parties, or one of them. Thus, a contract is said to be rescinded where the parties agree that it is to be at an end, or where one of the parties to a contract is entitled to avoid it by reason of the act or default of the other party, and elects to do so, either by giving notice of his election to the other party, by setting up the invalidity of the contract as a defence to proceedings taken by the other party, or by instituting proceedings to have the contract judicially set aside (judicial rescission). (See RESTITUTIO IN INTEGRUM.) The most frequent instances of rescission by one party occur where there is fraud or mistake (see FRAUD; MISTAKE), and in certain cases where there is a continuing contract, and a failure of performance by one of the parties in an essential part of the contract. Thus, if a person who has contracted to supply a certain quantity of goods every month fails to supply a sufficient quantity the first month, the other party is entitled to rescind the contract. Similarly, if a party to a contract fails to comply with a condition precedent, or by his own act makes the performance of the contract impossible, the other party may in general rescind the contract. See AFFIRM.

Rescous. The same as rescue (q.v.).

Rescriptum principis contra jus non valet (Reg. Civ. Jur.). (The prince's rescript avails not against legal right.) And so in our law no grant of the Crown can prejudice the course of justice, and the Crown can make no grant in violation of the common law or of the rights of the subject. See PROCLAMATIONS, ROYAL.

Rescue.—I. Rescue is the act of forcibly and knowingly freeing a person from an arrest or imprisonment. In the case of a person arrested in a civil action, the rescuer was liable to an action by the plaintiff for the loss thereby caused to him, and to attachment for contempt of Court. In the case of a prisoner arrested in criminal proceedings, the punishment for a rescue varies with the degree of the offence for which the person rescued was in custody. See ESCAPE.

II. Rescue also signifies the act of forcibly taking back goods which have been distrained and are being taken to the pound. If the distress was unlawful, the owner may lawfully rescue the goods; if the distress was lawful, the rescuer is liable to an action by the distrainor. (See DOUBLE DAMAGES; POUND; POUND-BREACH.) A rescue in law is where the cattle, etc., come again into the possession of the owner without his act, and he refuses to deliver them to the distrainor.

Reseiser. Where the king, or other lord of whom lands were held, resumed possession on the ground that the tenant had failed to comply with the conditions of his tenure there was said to be a reseiser.

Reservation, says Sheppard's Touchstone, "is a clause of a deed whereby the feoffor, donor, lessor, grantor, etc., doth reserve some new thing to himself out of that which he granted before [by the same deed]. And this doth most commonly and properly succeed the tenendum." See DEED.

The commonest instance of a reservation is the rent in an ordinary lease.

A reservation, in the proper sense of the word, cannot, it seems, be validly made in favour of a stranger to the deed, but the same effect may be produced by a grant, covenant or condition in favour of the stranger, for he need not, since 30th September, 1845 (Real Property Act, 1845, s. 5), be a party to the deed. And it is said that a reservation to a stranger creates an implied covenant in his favour.

As to the difference between a reservation and an exception, see EXCEPTION.

Reservation of Points of Law. See COURT FOR CROWN CASES RESERVED.

Reserve Forces (Army). These are (1) The Army Reserve, consisting of men who have served in the regular forces; when called out it is liable to serve anywhere (Reserve Forces Act, 1882, s. 3); (2) the Militia (q.v.); (3) the Army Motor Reserve; and (4) the Reserve of the Territorial Army.

Men of the Army Reserve enter it on the expiration of their service with the regular forces either by force of their original enlistment (Army Act, s. 90) or by special enlistment (Reserve Forces Act, 1882, s. 4) or by re-engagement (ib. s. 4). The officers are retired officers of the regular forces who have volunteered for the Army Reserve: see various provisions of the Pay Warrant, 1909.

The Army Motor Reserve consists of motor-car owners who place their cars and themselves at the disposal of the Army Council for six days in each year, and who may be called to army service during a national emergency: see provisions of the Pay Warrant, 1909.

Under the Territorial and Reserve Forces Act, 1907, s. 7 (6), the Crown is empowered to make orders and regulations constituting a reserve division of the Territorial Force (now the Territorial Army). This (consisting of three parts, known respectively as the Territorial Army Reserve, Technical Reserve, and the National Reserve) has been raised pursuant to the Provisional Regulations for the Territorial Reserve, issued with Special Army Order of 21st May, 1910, and the National Reserve Regulations, 1911, issued with Special Army Order of 7th March, 1913.

Reserve Forces (Naval). These consist of (1) the Royal Naval Reserve; (2) the Royal Fleet Reserve; and (3) the Royal Naval Volunteer Reserve. The Royal Naval Reserve, drawn from seafaring men generally, was constituted pursuant to the Royal Naval Reserve (Volunteer) Act, 1859, s. 1; service is for five years (s. 2) unless terminated earlier by the naval authorities (s. 14), and members are liable to actual service whenever called on (s. 4; Naval Reserve (Mobilization) Act, 1900, s. 1).

The Royal Fleet Reserve is a branch of the Royal Naval Reserve formed in 1900 pursuant to the Naval Reserve Act, 1900: it consists of men who have served in the Navy, the Marines, or other branches of the Government service.

The Royal Naval Volunteer Reserve, for admission to which no special seafaring qualification is required, was constituted pursuant to the Naval Forces Act, 1903. Members are in many respects on a footing analogous to that of members of the Territorial Army.

Re-settlement. Where land has been settled on a marriage, and the eldest son has attained twenty-one during his father's lifetime, and thus acquired an estate tail in remainder, it is usual for the father as protector (q.v.) to give his consent to the son's estate tail being barred on condition of a re settlement being made. The terms of such a re-settlement generally are that the estate of the son shall be cut down to an estate for life, with remainder to his children (if he should marry) successively in tail, subject to the usual provisions for his widow and younger children (see JOINTURE; PORTION), while the father on his side charges his life estate with an annuity for the son and a jointure for the son's widow, as a provision for them before the son's estate comes into possession. Such a re-settlement will not, however, be supported in equity, if it appears from the unfairness of its terms or otherwise not to have been understood by the son. See DISENTAILING DEED; ESTATE TAIL; OVERREACHING CLAUSE; SETTLEMENT.

Res gestæ are the facts surrounding or accompanying a transaction which is the subject of legal proceedings or, to put it another way, all facts so connected with a fact in issue as to introduce it, explain its nature, or form in connection with it one continuous transaction. The phrase is chiefly used in the law of evidence, the rule being, that evidence of words used by a person may be admissible (notwithstanding the general rule against derivative evidence), on the ground that they form part of the res gestæ, provided that the act which they accompanied is itself admissible in evidence, and that they reflect light upon or qualify that act. Therefore, where a woman went to be examined by a surgeon with a view to effecting a policy of insurance on her life, and a few days afterwards stated to a friend that she was ill when she went, and that she was afraid she would not live until the policy was made out, and then her husband could not get the money: evidence of these statements was held admissible in an action on the policy, on the ground that as the woman's previous statements to the surgeon were admissible in evidence, her statements to her friend were also admissible, being part of the res gestæ, that is, as following and explaining her previous statements. Similarly on an indictment for treason in leading on a riotous mob, evidence of the cry of the mob is admissible, because it forms part of the res gestæ.

Resiant is a resident. The term is chiefly used in speaking of manors. See COURT LEET.

Residence is used in law to denote the fact that a person dwells in a given place, or, in the case of a corporation, that its management is carried on there: thus, if a company is formed in England for the purpose of carrying on a trade (such as mining or manufacturing) in a foreign country, but its business is under the control of a board of directors in England, the company is said to have its residence in England. In the case of a person, residence connotes the idea of home, or at least of habitation, and need not necessarily be permanent or exclusive.

Residence is of importance in several ways: first, as an element in ascertaining a person's domicile (q.v.), and, secondly, as determining whether he is subject to the authorities having jurisdiction or powers within the district where he resides. Thus, where a person who was born and had long resided in Ireland came over to England, and shortly afterwards filed a petition for judicial separation in the Court of Divorce, it was held that his residence in England was not bonâ fide, and was therefore not sufficient to found the jurisdiction of the Court. Residence is, however, chiefly of importance as forming part of some of the qualifications for voting at parliamentary and municipal elections; and in ascertaining whether a pauper has acquired a settlement or irremovability in a parish.

Sometimes a distinction is drawn between actual and constructive residence, the latter term being used to mean that a person has the liberty of returning, and also the intention of returning, whenever he pleases, to the place at which he usually resides, although he may be actually absent from it for some time.

As to the residence of clergymen, see NON-RESIDENCE.

See PLACE OF ABODE.

Residens. Used in Leg. Hen. 1, c. 43, as meaning a tenant bound to live on the land of the lord.

Residue; Residuary. In administering the personal estate of a testator or intestate, the debts, funeral and testamentary expenses and the costs of the administration are first paid, and what remains is the residue in the sense of the net personal estate; then, in the case of a testator's estate, the legacies, annuities, etc., are paid, and what remains is the ultimate residue or residuary estate in the ordinary sense of the word. Sometimes there is a residue within a residue, or a particular residue as opposed to a general residue: as where a fund is given to A subject to the payment thereout of certain legacies, so that if any of those legacies fail, they fall into the particular residue given to A, while the general residue of the estate is given to B.

A residuary bequest, that is, a bequest of the testator's residuary personal estate, passes all the personalty belonging to the testator at his death and not otherwise disposed of, including lapsed legacies. As to the effect of a residuary devise, see DEVISE. Where a testator does not effectually dispose of the residue of his property he dies intestate as to it, and it goes to his heir or next of kin, according to its nature. See INTESTATE.

Resignation is where a parson, vicar or other beneficed clergyman voluntarily gives up and surrenders his charge and preferment to those from whom he received the same. It is usually done by an instrument attested by a notary. See HOLY ORDERS.

Resignation Bonds. A resignation bond is a bond given by a presentee to a benefice, binding himself to resign the benefice either within a certain time, or indefinitely, whenever the patron should require it. Such bonds were formerly held legal, and might be either general or in favour of a specified person or persons, but in 1826 it was decided that all resignation bonds were illegal. Shortly afterwards the Clergy Resignation Bonds Act, 1828, was passed, making valid, in certain cases, resignation bonds in favour of specified persons related by blood or marriage to the patron.

Res integra. A point, governed neither by any decision nor by any rule of law, which must be decided upon principle.

Res inter alios acta. The rule res inter alios acta alteri nocere non debet (Co. Litt. 132) means that persons are not to be prejudiced by the acts or words of others, to which they were neither party nor privy, and which they consequently had no power to prevent or control. In other words, a person is not to be affected by what is done behind his back. Compare JUSJURANDUM INTER, ETC.

Res ipsa loquitur. (The thing speaks for itself.) This maxim means only that one fact raises a primâ facie presumption of another fact unless and until the contrary is proved: thus where a ship under way collides with a ship at anchor, that is primâ facie evidence of negligence on the part of the ship which is in motion.

The principle embodied in this maxim applies in an action for damages resulting from the negligence of the defendant, and where it is shown (1) that the thing which caused the accident was under the management of him or of his servants; and (2) that the accident was such that in the ordinary course of things it would not have happened if proper care had been exercised by him or his servants.

Res judicata pro veritate accipitur (Co. Litt. 103). A judicial decision is conclusive until reversed, and its verity cannot be contradicted. (See RECORD.) But a judgment inter partes only binds the parties and privies to it; as regards other persons, it is res inter alios judicata. See IN PERSONAM; JUDGMENT; RES INTER ALIOS ACTA.

Resolution. A resolution is an expression of opinion or intention by a meeting (q.v.).

Under the Companies Acts, resolutions of the members of a company are either ordinary, special, or extraordinary. An ordinary resolution is one passed by a simple majority in number at an ordinary meeting. A special resolution requires first to be passed by a majority of three-fourths of the members present at a meeting summoned for the purpose, and then to be confirmed by a simple majority at a meeting held for the purpose pursuant to notice between a fortnight and a month from the first meeting (Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, s. 69). An extraordinary resolution is a resolution passed by a majority of three-fourths of the members present at a meeting summoned for the purpose; it is, therefore, the same as an unconfirmed special resolution (ib.).

In bankruptcy proceedings, an ordinary resolution is one decided by a majority in value of the creditors present (personally or by proxy) at the meeting, and voting on the resolution (Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (4 & 5 Geo. 5, c. 59), s. 167). A special resolution is one passed by a majority in number and three-fourths in value of the creditors present (personally or by proxy) at the meeting, and voting on the resolution (ib.).

Resoluto jure concedentis resolvitur jus concessum (Mackeld. 179). (The grant of a right comes to an end on the termination of the right of the grantor): unless, of course, a statute intervenes, as in the case of the enactments permitting a tenant for life to lease lands for longer than his own life. Compare NEMO POTEST PLUS, ETC.

Resort, Court of Last. A Court from which there is no appeal. As regards the United Kingdom—or what is left of it—the House of Lords is such a Court: as regards other parts of the Empire the term applies more peculiarly to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Respectu computi vicecomitis habendo, De. A writ anciently directed to the Treasurer and the Barons of the Exchequer; it commanded them to respite the account of a sheriff.

Respectum, Challenge propter. See JURY.

Res perit domino. Quoted as synonymous with damnum sentit, etc. (q.v.), by Blackburn, J., at p. 453 of L. R. 7 Q. B. See MORA DEBITORIS, ETC.

Respiciendum est judicanti, ne quid aut durius aut remissius constituatur quam causa deposcit; nec enim aut severitatis aut clementiæ gloria affectanda est (3 Inst. 220). (A judge should see to it that nothing either more lenient or more severe than the case itself warrants should be done; for no attempt should be made to achieve distinction either by severity or by leniency.) This is a quotation from Bracton, lib. 3, fo. 105.

Respite is to discharge or dispense with. Thus, a lord is said to respite fealty when he does not exact it from his tenant. (See FEALTY; HOMAGE.) It also means to delay, or a delay. Thus a Court of Quarter Sessions which adjourns an appeal from one sessions to another is said to respite the appeal, and such an adjournment is termed a respite. Respite is also colloquially used as a synonym of reprieve.

Respondeat Ouster, in criminal procedure, was that judgment which was given when a prisoner failed to substantiate a special plea in bar. Thus, if he pleaded auterfois acquit and failed to prove it, judgment was given that he "answer over," or plead to the indictment again, in which case he might plead the general issue—not guilty. (See PLEA.) Now a prisoner always pleads "not guilty," in addition to a special plea in bar; and therefore, if he fails to substantiate it, judgment of respondeat ouster is not necessary, but the trial proceeds as if no special plea had been pleaded.

In ordinary common law actions, judgment of respondeat ouster was formerly given when the defendant pleaded a dilatory plea (e.g., a plea in abatement) and failed, in which case he had to plead in bar. Now, however, pleas in abatement are abolished; the statement of defence contains all the defendant's objections to the action, and they are all tried at the same time; judgment of respondeat ouster therefore no longer exists; power, however, is given by Ord. 34, r. 2, to decide questions of law before the trial, and, by Ord. 36, r. 7, to order some questions of fact to be tried before the others. See also FACT.

Respondeat superior (4 Inst. 114). (Let the principal answer.) That is to say, that where—but only where and in so far as—there exists the relation of master and servant or of principal and agent, then Qui facit, etc., applies. Thus, if I agree with a builder to build me a house on land which in fact is not mine, I shall be liable for the trespass on the land; but I am not liable for any tortious act other than any trespass (such as the dropping of a brick on one lawfully using the highway) which may be done by him or his servants while the work is in progress and in the course thereof.

Respondent is a person against whom a petition—and more especially a petition in the Divorce Court—is presented, a summons issued, or an appeal brought, just as a defendant is a person against whom an action is brought. See CO-RESPONDENT; DEFENDANT; PETITION.

Respondentia was formerly used to denote the hypothecation of the cargo or goods on board a ship as security for the repayment of a loan, the term bottomry being confined to hypothecations of the ship herself; but now the term respondentia is seldom used, and the expression bottomry is generally employed whether the vessel or her cargo or both be the security. See BOTTOMRY; HYPOTHECATION; NECESSARIES.

Respondere non debet. (He is not bound to answer.) Under the old system of pleading this was a plea by which, for instance, privilege was claimed.

Responsalis, says Coke, "was he that was appointed by the tenant or defendant [in an action] in case of extremity and necessitie to alledge the cause of the parties absence, and to certifie the Court upon what tryall he will put himselfe." By the common law a party could not appear by attorney without the King's special warrant; when this rule was relaxed responsales became obsolete. See ATTORNEY.

Responsions. Annual payments due by the military orders of knights, such as the Hospitallars (q.v.): see the statute 32 Hen. 8, c. 24.

Res sua nemini servit (4 Macq. Sc. App. Cas. 151). (No one can have a servitude over his own property.) This maxim of the Roman law applies also in our law. See EASEMENT.

Rest. As regards the taking of accounts, this is defined by Stroud as "a pause at which the net balance between receipts and expenses is ascertained so that interest may be abated or charged according to the finding." There may be rests as between an unpaid vendor and a purchaser who has been let into possession, or as between a tenant for life and a remainderman.

Rest means the reserve fund of a bank, and more especially of the Bank of England.

Restitutio in integrum is a phrase borrowed from the Roman law, where it was applied to cases where a person who, according to strict law, had lost a right, was restored to his original position by the judgment of a Court acting on equitable principles. In English law it is sometimes used to denote the equitable relief which is given in rescinding contracts on the ground of fraud, and in similar cases, where both parties can be restored to their original position.

Restitution. In civil actions, where a defendant appeals and the judgment is reversed, he is entitled to be restored to all he has lost by the execution of the judgment. Under the present practice he may obtain redress by application to the Court or a judge, but a writ of restitution (formerly the only remedy) now lies only where no other remedy is available.

On a prosecution for larceny, embezzlement, etc., where the offender is prosecuted and convicted, the property is to be restored to the owner under, and subject to the exceptions set out in, s. 45 of the Larceny Act, 1916: see also s. 9 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1867. See REVESTING.

Restitutione extracti ab ecclesia, De. This was a writ which lay for one who had been forceably removed from a church in which he had taken sanctuary: it commanded the sheriff to see that such person was put back into the church from which he had been taken.

Restitutione temporalium, De. A writ which anciently issued to the sheriff commanding him to restore to a newly-consecrated bishop the temporalities of a see.

Restitution of Conjugal Rights. Where one of two married persons has without lawful cause withdrawn from living with the other, the latter may present a petition to the High Court in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division praying restitution of conjugal rights, on which the Court will, in a proper case, order the other to return to cohabitation within the time limited by the order. Where a husband fails to comply with such order, and is guilty of adultery, the wife is entitled to a decree for dissolution (q.v.) (Matrimonial Causes Act, 1884, s. 5) provided that she herself comes into Court with clean hands. The modern system of collusive divorce is the result of this state of the law.

Restitution, Writ of. See RESTITUTION.

Restraining Orders, in the practice of the Chancery Division of the High Court, are of two kinds. In the general sense of the term, a restraining order is an order of the High Court (under the original jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery) restraining a person from doing an act, e.g., obstructing ancient lights; such orders are now more commonly called injunctions (q.v.). In its special and more usual sense, a restraining order is an order under the Court of Chancery Act, 1841, s. 4, by which the Bank of England or any other public company may be restrained from permitting the transfer of stock or shares in their books or from paying dividends thereon; the application may be made in a summary way (without the institution of a suit or action) by any person interested in the stock, the object generally being to prevent any dealing with the stock until the rights of the parties have been ascertained by an action instituted in the regular manner. Either a restraining order or an injunction under the Transfer of Stock Act, 1800, must be obtained unless there be required only such temporary restraint as results from a NOTICE IN LIEU OF DISTRINGAS (q.v.) or a STOP ORDER (q.v.).

Restraint of Marriage. Marriage being an institution encouraged by the State, the general rule is that every contract, the object of which is to restrain a person from marrying at all, is void, and so is an agreement not to marry anyone except a specific person. As to conditions in restraint of marriage, the general rule is that such a condition is valid if it is a condition precedent. As to conditions subsequent, there is some difference in the case of real and personal estate. With regard to real estate, it would seem, on principle, that a condition subsequent is void, if in general restraint of marriage; but is valid if in partial restraint. With regard to personal estate, a condition subsequent in general restraint of marriage is bad, whether there is a gift over or not, while a condition subsequent in partial restraint of marriage is good if there is a gift over, but not otherwise. A condition restraining the second marriage of a man or a woman is valid. A limitation of property until marriage is good, whether to a widow, a widower, or an unmarried person; but in the case of an unmarried person, it seems that to make the restriction valid there must be a limitation over in the event of the donee marrying, because such gifts are construed rather as provisions for the donee until marriage, than as restraints on marriage. So that a condition in restraint of marriage may be void, while the same result might be attained by a limitation. See CONDITION.

Restraint of Princes. See PRINCES, RULERS AND PEOPLES.

Restraint of Ship. Where the part-owners of a ship who represent the majority of interest are about to send her on a voyage against the wishes of the minority of the part-owners, the minority may arrest the ship and have her detained until security is given for her safe return. This is called an action of restraint.

Under s. 30 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, an order may be made restraining any dealing with a ship, or any share therein: but this relates only to the ownership of the vessel and not to her movements.

Restraint of Trade. The general rule is that a man ought not to be allowed to restrain himself by contract from exercising any lawful trade or business at his own discretion and in his own way, the reason being that such a contract tends to deprive the public of the advantage of employing him, and would pro tanto create a monopoly (q.v.). A contract in general restraint of trade is one which provides that one of the parties shall not carry on a particular trade at all, or shall carry it on under the control of another person who has a rival business, or the like; such contracts are, as a general rule, void. A contract in restraint of trade may, however, be valid if it is limited to a certain district or area, and is not unreasonable in its terms; thus an agreement, for valuable consideration, not to carry on a business for a term of years, or within a certain district, may be valid. Such a stipulation is not infrequently inserted in an agreement of partnership, where the partner, who is the owner of the goodwill, wishes to be protected against a rival business being set up in his neighbourhood by the other partner when the partnership comes to an end.

Restraint on Alienation is where property is given to a married woman to her separate use without power of alienation. The validity of such a provision is allowed by law as an exception to the general rule that every owner of property is at liberty to alienate it, the object of the exception being to prevent a married woman from being induced by her husband to alienate her property for his benefit. The restraint takes effect only so long as she is married. It is in law the same thing as a restraint on anticipation (q.v.). If a married woman, subject to a restraint on alienation, attempts to alienate, her act has no effect. If a man, who is not an absolute owner but is merely entitled to an interest determinable on alienation, purports to alienate, his act brings into operation the gift over to another person which is always provided for in such a case.

Restraint on Anticipation. See ANTICIPATION.

Restriction. In the case of land registered under the Land Transfer Act, 1875, a restriction is an entry on the register made, under s. 58, on the application of the registered proprietor of the land, the effect of which is to prevent the transfer of the land or the creation of any charge upon it, unless notice of the application for a transfer or charge is sent by post to a certain address, or unless the consent of a certain person or persons to the transfer or charge is obtained, or unless some other thing is done. The object of this provision is not very clear; it has been suggested that it will be employed " by an owner who is fearful of his estate being conveyed away from him behind his back by means of forgery or personation." See CAUTION; INHIBITION.

Result. In law, a thing is said to result when, after having been ineffectually or only partially disposed of, it comes back to its former owner or his representatives. Thus, if A. conveys land to B. and his heirs to the use of C. for life, on C.'s death the use results to A., that is, A. or his heirs again become the owners of the land, because no disposition is made beyond C.'s life. This is a resulting use. A resulting trust is similar. See TRUST; USE.

When land is directed to be converted into money for a special purpose and the object fails, so that either the sale becomes unnecessary, or (if the sale has taken place) the proceeds are not required to be applied for the purpose directed, then the land or the proceeds of sale (as the case may be) result to the settlor, or his heir, residuary devisee, etc. The same rule applies to the converse case of a conversion of money into land. Thus, if a testator directs his real estate to be sold, and the purposes for which he has directed the conversion, or some of them, fail to take effect (e.g., by lapse), then the real estate, if it has not been sold, or the undisposed-of proceeds if it has, result to the heir or residuary devisee as if the conversion had not been directed; and this is none the less so where the testator has created a " blended fund " (see that title). In the case of a total failure of the objects for which the conversion is directed, there is no difference whether the instrument is inter vivos or testamentary; that is, the property results to the author of the trust or his representatives in its original state. Thus, if a testator directs his land to be sold, and the proceeds to be divided between A. and B., and they both predecease the testator, then the land goes to the testator's heir as land. But in case of a partial failure of the purposes for which conversion is directed, the general rule is that where the instrument is one inter vivos (e.g., a deed), the property results to the settlor in the condition into which he has directed it to be converted (whether realty or personalty), and therefore devolves as such on his death, unless he has otherwise disposed of it; while, where the instrument is a will, there is a distinction between a conversion of land into money, and money into land; for if a testator directs a conversion of land into money, and some of the purposes fail, that part of the proceeds which is undisposed of results to the testator's heir as money, so that on the heir's death it devolves with the rest of his personalty, unless specially disposed of by him; but if a testator directs a conversion of money into land, and some of the purposes fail, the money which is undisposed of results to the next of kin as personalty, and not as land.

See BLENDED FUND; CONVERSION; RECONVERSION.

Resummons. This is described by Jacob (1749) as " a second summons, or calling of a man to answer an action, when the first summons is defeated by any occasion "; and he adds, " when, by the death, etc., of the judges, they do not come on the day to which they were continued for the trial of causes, such causes may be revived or recontinued by resummons."

The demise of the Crown was an occasion which would have " defeated " the first summons.

Resumption. Used in the statute 31 Hen. 6, c. 7, as meaning the taking again into the king's hands of lands which, upon false suggestion or other error, he had made livery of to anyone or granted by letters patent.

The Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908, s. 23, provides for the resumption by a landlord upon notice to quit, for the purposes mentioned in that section, of lands held upon yearly tenancies; and the Allotments and Small Holdings Act, 1908, s. 46, provides for the resumption by a landowner of land hired from him under compulsory statutory powers.

Re-surrender. Where copyhold land has been mortgaged by surrender, and the mortgagee has been admitted, then on the mortgage debt being paid off, the mortgagor is entitled to have the land reconveyed to him, by the mortgagee surrendering it to the lord to his use. This is called a re-surrender. (Compare RE-CONVEYANCE.) It is not, however, usual for the mortgagee to be admitted; and when he has not been admitted there is no question of a re-surrender, the practice being to enter an acknowledgment of satisfaction on the court rolls.

Retable. A shelf or ledge, at the back and above the level of the Communion Table, upon which ornaments can be placed. Its use has been declared legal by the Privy Council.

Retainer.—I. The right of retainer is the right which the executor or administrator of a deceased person has to retain out of the assets sufficient to pay any debt due to him from the deceased in priority to the other creditors whose debts are of equal degree. The executor does not forfeit this right by instituting an administration suit in his character of creditor.

II. A retainer is the engagement of a barrister or solicitor to take or defend proceedings, or to advise or otherwise act for the client.

Retainers to solicitors are either general or limited to some particular matter. The retainer must be in writing when the client is to be next friend or a relator (Ord. 16, r. 20), or when the retainer is from a corporation.

Retainers to barristers can be given only by a solicitor. They are divided into general and special.

General retainers to counsel are themselves divided into (a) ordinary general retainers, applying to the Supreme Court and the House of Lords; (b) limited general retainers, applying only to the Courts specified therein; (c) separate general retainers, applying only to the Privy Council; and (d) separate general retainers, applying only to parliamentary committees. A general retainer gives counsel a right to, and puts him under a duty to, accept a brief in every proceeding by or against his client, and it lasts for the joint lives of counsel and client unless there be a failure on either side to comply with this rule.

A special retainer to counsel cannot be given until after the commencement of the proceeding to which it relates; it entitles counsel to receive, and binds him to accept, a brief in every stage of that proceeding. Circuit retainers, that is to say, retainers for a case at a particular assize, are included amongst special retainers.

The fees for retainers are as follows: General retainers, £10 10s. for parliamentary committees, and £5 5s. in all other cases; special retainers, £5 5s. for parliamentary committees, £2 2s. for the House of Lords and the Privy Council, and £1 1s. in all other cases.

Vol. II. of the Annual Practice, 1920, contains, under the heading of "Professional Etiquette" the Rules I.-XXIV. prepared by the Bar Committee and popularly known as the Retainer Rules. They deal exhaustively with the subject.

Retaliation. See LEX TALIONIS.

Retenementum. A withholding or deduction. In ancient conveyances of land the words sine ullo retenemento (without any deduction) were frequently used in order to make it absolutely clear that the grantor conveyed his entire estate in the lands.

Retire, as applied to a bill of exchange, usually means that an indorser has taken it up by paying his immediate or some subsequent indorsee, after which he is in a position to recover from the antecedent parties. But it is sometimes used in the case of an acceptor who has paid and extinguished the bill.

As to the retirement of a trustee, see TRUSTEE.

Retorno habendo, De, was a writ of execution issued in an action of replevin to compel the return of goods rightfully taken in distress and replevied. It has fallen into disuse, the ordinary writ of delivery (q.v.) being sufficient. See REPLEVIN; ELONGATA.

Retorsion. In international law, when a sovereign is not satisfied with the manner in which his subjects are treated by the laws and customs of another nation, he is at liberty to declare that he will treat the subjects of that nation in the same manner. This is called retorsion, but the term is little used. Compare REPRISALS; EMBARGO.

Retour sans protêt. (Return without protest.) The drawer of a bill of exchange may direct that there be a retour sans protêt if the bill is dishonoured. See SANS FRAIS.

Retractation, in probate practice, is a withdrawal of a renunciation (q.v.). A retractation is only allowed in special cases: it would apparently be permitted where the person in whose favour the renunciation was made has not availed himself of it, or has died.

Retraite. See RE-EXCHANGE.

Retraxit, in the old common law practice, was a mode of withdrawing from an action, and took place where a plaintiff or demandant abandoned his action at the trial, and thus lost his right of action altogether. (See NONSUIT.) It had long been practically obsolete.

Retreat. See DRUNKENNESS.

Retropannagium. After-pannage. See PANNAGE.

Return. A return is a report by an officer of a Court showing the manner in which he has performed a duty imposed on him. Thus, the sheriff or other officer executing a writ of execution theoretically has to return or report to the Court what he has done in pursuance of it, though in most cases it is not usual for a return to be made (unless ulterior proceedings are contemplated) except in the case of the writ of elegit (q.v.). If a return is required, an order calling upon the sheriff to make it (called formerly, in the language of common law practice, a rule to return) may be obtained. The return is usually written on the back of the writ, which is then filed. Returns to writs are commonly known by the first words of the old returns, which were given in Latin, e.g., "nulla bona," "fieri feci," "non est inventus," "tarde" (see the various titles). As to the return to a writ of mandamus, see MANDAMUS.

As to the consequences of a false return, see FALSE RETURN.

Companies and other associations established under Acts of Parliament are in many cases required to send in periodical returns to a public officer with reference to their condition. Thus every company formed under the Companies Acts, and having a share capital, is bound (Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, s. 26) to send in a yearly return to the Registrar of Companies, giving a list of it's shareholders, and showing the position of it's capital and the alterations in it's register of shareholders since the last return.

Returnable. Writs of execution, writs of mandamus, and many other kinds of writs, are returnable, that is, the person to whom they are directed is bound or may be required to make a return to them. The term is, however, chiefly used with reference to the time when the writ is returnable. Some writs are returnable at a date named in them, while others, such as writs of execution, are returnable as soon as they are executed. By analogy to this use of the word, a summons is said to be returnable on the day appointed for hearing it.

Return Days. Under the old practice there were four days in each of the Terms except Easter Term, and five days in Easter Term, on which writs were made returnable. These days were known as Return Days or Days in Bank.

Returning Officer. Returning officers are persons responsible for the conduct of the various parliamentary, municipal and local government, and other elections.

The persons who are to be returning officers at parliamentary elections (other than university elections) are set out in the Representation of the People Act, 1918, s. 28: speaking generally, the sheriff acts in counties and in parliamentary boroughs where there are sheriffs, while the mayor acts in other parliamentary boroughs. Those who are to be returning officers at university parliamentary elections are specified in Schedule V. to the same Act.

As regards municipal elections generally, the mayor is the returning officer when councillors for the whole borough are being elected; when the election is for only one ward the returning officer is an alderman selected for that purpose by the council on each 9th November (Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 53: see also ss. 62 (6), 67).

There are special provisions as regards returning officers at municipal elections in the City of London and at Metropolitan Borough Council Elections.

The appointment of returning officers at elections of county councillors is in the hands of the county council (Local Government Act, 1888, s. 75 (2)); that of returning officers at parish council, rural district council, urban district council and other elections under the Local Government Act, 1894, is regulated by rules contained in the Election Orders made from time to time by the Ministry of Health under s. 48 (2) of that Act.

As regards the Salmon Fishery Acts, the returning officer at elections of conservators is the chairman of each Board of Conservators or any person appointed in writing by such chairman (Salmon Fishery Act, 1873, s. 4).

Return Irreplevisable. See REPLEVIN.

Return Office. A branch of the office of the Clerk of Enrolment (q.v.) to the COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Returnum averium. An ancient writ similar to the writ de retorno habendo.

Returnum irreplegiabile. The writ of return irreplevisable. See REPLEVIN.

Returnus (or Returna) Brevium. (The Return of Writs.) A manorial right, also acquired by some of the more important boroughs. The sheriff, on receipt of a writ from the King's Court commanding him to summon a resident within the manor or borough, had to deliver the writ to the bailiff of the liberty for execution. See 1 P. & M. H. E. L. 583, 644.

Reveland. In Anglo-Saxon times this was land held ex officio by a reeve (q.v.), after whose death it reverted to the king.

Revenue. See EXCHEQUER.

Reverend. This prefix to the name of a clergyman is not appropriated by the law to the clergy of the Church of England alone. The use of the prefix is of comparatively modern origin. A parson in late mediæval times was styled Sir Oliver Martext, or as the case might be. In the early part of the seventeenth century the prefix "Reverend" came to be used by the Puritan and Presbyterian ministers: somewhat later it was adopted by the parochial clergy, to whom it is applied in the preamble to the statute 14 Car. 2, c. 4; but it has been expressly decided that the prefix may be used upon the tombstone, in a parish graveyard, of a Nonconformist minister.

A bishop or archbishop is entitled "Right Reverend"; a dean, "Very Reverend"; and the inferior clergy, "Reverend" simply.

Reversal. This was the making of a judgment void for error. When, upon the return of a writ of error, it appeared that a judgment was erroneous, the senior judge pronounced the reversal of it. Down to, at any rate, the middle of the eighteenth century he did this in the ancient French form, the words of the reversal being: Pur les errors evandit et auter errors manifest in le record, soit le judgment reverse. See ERROR.

Reverse. A judgment is said to be reversed when it is set aside by a Court of Appeal.

Reversion; Reversioner. Where a tenant in fee simple grants the land to another person for a term of years, or for life, or in tail, the estate so created is called a particular estate, being only a part (or particula) of the estate in fee, and the interest of the tenant in fee simple, which still remains undisposed of, is called his reversion. It is a present or vested estate, by virtue of which he will have the possession of the land again on the determination of the particular estate. Similarly, if a tenant for life grants a lease for years, or if a tenant for years grants an underlease for a shorter term, the estate which remains in him is called a reversion. The owner of a reversion is called the reversioner.

The relationship of tenure exists between the owner of the reversion and the particular tenant, and therefore fealty (q.v.) is nominally due from the latter to the former. A rent service or other service may also be reserved by the owner of the reversion, and thus made incident to the reversion, so that if the reversion is aliened the rent or service passes with it. The rent may be severed from the reversion, but the fealty cannot; therefore if the owner grants the reversion to another person, he may reserve the rent to himself, but not the fealty (see ATTORNMENT; RENT.) A condition of re-entry may also be annexed to a reversion, and will pass with it on an assignment. As to the difference between a reversion and a remainder, see REMAINDER.

If A, being a tenant in fee simple, grants a lease to B, and B grants an underlease to C, reserving a rent, this rent is incident to B's reversion: consequently if A grants his reversion to B, this causes a merger or destruction of B's reversion, and, at common law, C's rent, being incident to it, would also be destroyed. B. would be tenant in fee simple in reversion, but his right to the rent would be gone. To prevent this it has been enacted (in effect) by the Real Property Act, 1845, s. 9, that where the reversion expectant on a lease is surrendered or merges, the estate next in reversion or remainder shall, for the purpose of preserving the incidents to the reversion so merged, be deemed to be the reversion expectant on the lease. In the case supposed, therefore, the rent payable by C. would be converted into a rent incident to B's reversion in fee simple.

As to covenants running with the reversion, see COVENANT.

"Reversion" is also used to denote a reversionary interest (q.v.), e.g., an interest in personal property subject to the life interest of some other person.

As to sales of reversions, see REVERSIONARY INTEREST.

Reversionary Interest. Any right in property, the enjoyment of which is deferred, is a reversionary interest in the wide sense of the term; but reversionary interests, in the ordinary sense of the term, are interests in property which are not reversions or remainders in the strict sense, but are analogous to them. Thus, if personal property is limited to A for life, and after his death to B, this gives B a reversionary interest analogous to a remainder in land. Similarly, if A gives B a life interest in chattels, A retains a reversionary interest, analogous to a reversion in land.

Reversionary interests were formerly recognised only by the Court of Chancery, being equitable interests. (See EQUITY.) They are usually created by means of trusts, the legal estate in the property being conveyed to trustees, as in the case of an ordinary marriage settlement of personal property. See SETTLEMENT.

By the Married Women's Reversionary Interests Act, 1857, every married woman, with the concurrence of her husband, may by deed dispose of every future or reversionary interest in personal property, whether vested or contingent, to which she, or her husband in her right, may be entitled under any instrument made after the 31st December, 1857, or release or extinguish any power or equity to a settlement in regard to such personal property. Every such disposition must be acknowledged by her under the Fines and Recoveries Act, 1833. (See ACKNOWLEDGMENT.) The statute does not apply to marriage settlements, nor to reversionary interests which the married woman is restrained from alienating. It has no application to any woman married after 1st January, 1883: any such woman can deal with her property as if she were a feme sole.

Formerly there was a rule in equity, that in the case of the sale of a reversionary interest in real or personal estate, the purchaser was bound to show that he had given the fair market price for it, and if he was unable to do so, the sale was set aside; this rule was abolished by the Sale of Reversions Act, 1867, but, in cases of fraud or unfair dealing, equity still intervenes. See EXPECTANT HEIR; INADEQUACY.

Reversion Duty. See LAND VALUES DUTIES.

Revert. To revert is to return: thus when the owner of an estate in land has granted a smaller estate to another person, on the determination of the latter estate the land is said to revert to the grantor. See REVERSION; REVERTER.

Reverter. In feudal times, on every grant of land, as Mr. Butler explains, "a right remained in the grantor to the services of the grantee during the continuance of his estate, and to a return of the land on its expiration. Whether this right of the grantor depended on an estate for life or in fee, it was of the same nature and indifferently called his reverter or escheat; but from the remoter probability of the return when the fee was granted, it became customary to call it, after a grant of the fee, his possibility of reverter; by degrees that expression was applied to those cases only where a limited fee had been granted, and the word escheat was applied to those where the grant had conferred an absolute estate in fee simple. A grant to a man and the heirs of his body was at common law a limited fee; and therefore, after such a grant, a possibility of reverter was said to remain in the grantor. When the statute De Donis converted such estates into estates tail, the return of the land was secured by it to the donor and was called his reverter. In all these cases, the words reverter and reversion are synonymous" (Fearne on Cont. Rem. (10th ed.), p. 381). A reverter after an estate in fee simple conditional is still called a possibility of reverter. See FORMEDON; POSSIBILITY.

Revesting. Where goods have been stolen and the offender has been prosecuted to conviction, the property in the goods revests in the person who was the owner of the goods, or his personal representative, notwithstanding any intermediate dealing with them, whether by sale in market overt or otherwise; but there is no such revesting where the conviction has been for any offence not amounting to larceny (Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 4). See RESTITUTION.

Review. When a taxing master has taxed a bill of costs, any party who is dissatisfied with the taxation may, before the certificate or allocatur is signed, deliver to the opposite party and carry in before the taxing master an objection specifying the items of which he complains, and apply to the master to review the taxation accordingly (Ord. 65, r. 39). If any party is dissatisfied with the result of this preliminary review, he may apply to a judge at chambers for an order to review the taxation, and the judge thereupon gives such directions (if any) to the taxing master as he thinks proper (Ord. 65, r. 41).

As to bills of review, see BILL OF COMPLAINT: as to the Court of Review, see COMMISSIONERS IN BANKRUPTCY: as to Commissioners of Review, see DELEGATES.

See COMMISSION.

Reviling. Under the statute 1 Edw. 6, c. 1, s. 1, the reviling of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper is an indictable misdemeanour. This statute was repealed in the reign of Mary but was revived by the statute 1 Eliz. c. 1, s. 5. In the reign of Mary the statute 1 Mary Sess. 2, c. 3, s. 1, had made it an indictable misdemeanour to "disturb . . . any . . . priest . . . celebrating . . . Mass" or to "deface, spoile, abuse, breake or otherwise unreverentlye handle . . . the . . . Blessed . . . Sacrament" or otherwise to interfere with Roman Catholic worship; and this Act, by some curious chance, was never repealed.

Revising Assessors. Under the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 29, and Sch. 3, the burgesses of non-parliamentary boroughs elected every year two "revising assessors," whose function it was to revise the parish burgess lists. Their functions were transferred to the revising barristers by the County Electors Act, 1884, s. 4.

Revising Barristers were junior barristers appointed from 1843 to revise the lists of voters for parliamentary elections, and also, as from 1888, to perform what had been the functions of revising assessors. The appointment was for one year only: but in practice the same members of the Bar were reappointed year after year. There are now no revising barristers: all the statutes under which they had their being were repealed by the Representation of the People Act, 1918, s. 47, and Sch. 8. That Act (s. 12) substitutes for them the town clerks of boroughs and the clerks of county councils.

There were ninety-seven revising barristers

(Revising Barristers Act, 1873, s. 3; Order in Council dated 15th August, 1890); each of them received 250 guineas for his annual turn of duty (County Electors Act, 1888, s. 9); and the abolition of the office is deplored by the junior bar.

Revival; Revivor. The term "revival" is sometimes applied to wills. Thus, where a testator revokes a will, he is said to revive it if he subsequently re-executes it, or executes a will or codicil showing an intention to revive it.

In the law of divorce, condonation (q.v.) being forgiveness of a conjugal offence with an implied condition that the injury shall not be repeated, and that the condoning party shall be treated with conjugal kindness, it follows that on breach of the condition, even by the commission of a slighter offence, the right to a remedy for the former injury is revived: thus cruelty will revive condoned adultery.

Under the practice of the Court of Chancery before 1852, when a suit became defective by the death, marriage or bankruptcy of one of the parties, or by an assignment of the subject-matter of the suit pendente lite, or by some other change in the interest of some of the parties, it was necessary to revive it, that is, take steps for carrying on the proceedings: this was generally done by an order of revivor obtained as of course; but in some cases a new bill, called a bill of revivor, had to be filed. The Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, abolished bills of revivor (s. 52) and simplified the procedure on the subject in the Courts of common law as well as in the Court of Chancery. Now, Ord. 17 of the R. S. C. provides for the continuance of all causes or matters in all divisions of the High Court, notwithstanding the death, marriage, or bankruptcy of any party and notwithstanding any assignment, creation, or devolution of title; and Ord. 17 of the County Court Rules contains corresponding provisions. See SUGGESTION.

In the common law Courts, also, if six years had elapsed, or if one of the parties had died, after the recovery of a judgment, it was formerly necessary to revive it by writ of revivor, scire facias or suggestion (q.v.). Under the present practice in all the divisions, when six years have elapsed from the recovery of a judgment, or any change has taken place in the parties to the judgment (e.g., by death), an application must be made for leave to issue execution: on that application the Court or judge may either order execution to issue, or may direct any question necessary to determine the rights of the parties to be tried. (Ord. 42, r. 23: see JUDGMENT.) Ord. 25, r. 14, of the County Court Rules, contains corresponding provisions.

Revocation; Revoke. To revoke literally means to recall (Latin, revocare). Thus, to revoke an offer or authority is to withdraw it. Revocation is the operation of revoking. Revocation is of three kinds—by act of the party; by operation of law; and by order of a Court of justice (judicial revocation).

Revocation by act of the party is an intentional or voluntary revocation. The principal instances occur in the case of authorities and powers of attorney and wills. The two former require no particular form of revocation. A will may be revoked by a subsequent inconsistent will or codicil, or by a writing declaring an intention to revoke, and executed with the same formalities as a will, or by the burning, tearing, or otherwise destroying the same by the testator, or by some person in his presence and by his direction, with the intention of revoking it (Wills Act, 1837, s. 20). As to revocation by marriage, see INFRA; and as to alterations in wills, see ALTERATION.

A revocation in law, or constructive revocation, is produced by a rule of law, irrespectively of the intention of the parties. Thus, a power of attorney is in general revoked by the death of the principal. A will is always revoked by the subsequent marriage of the testator, except when made in exercise of a power of appointment under which the property appointed would not, in default of appointment, pass to the real or personal representatives or next of kin of the testator (Wills Act, 1837, s. 18). As to powers of revocation, see POWER. As to the revocation of a guarantee, see GUARANTEE. Lunacy revokes an authority given by a lunatic while sane; but, as regards persons having no notice of his insanity, he continues to be liable for the acts of his agent.

When a grant of probate or letters of administration has been improperly obtained, it may be revoked by the Court at the instance of a person interested: and a grant may also be revoked at the request of the grantee, in, for instance, a case where he had erroneously believed himself to be the next of kin of the deceased. After revocation the grant is produced at the registry, and cancelled.

— Rex est caput et salus reipublicæ (4 Co.

124). (The king is the head and guardian of the commonwealth.) Quoted by Coke as supporting the remarkable proposition that one non compos mentis is guilty of high treason if he kills or attempts to kill the king.

Rex est legalis et politicus (Lane, 27). (The king is both legal and politic.) This dictum was used in Bates' Case (q.v.) in support of the proposition that "reasons politick are sufficient to guide judges."

Rex n'est lie per ascun statute si il ne soit expressement nosme (Jenk. Cent. 307). (The king is not bound by any statute unless he is expressly named therein.)

Rex non debet esse sub homine sed sub Deo et lege, quia lex facit regem (Bract. lib. i. 605.) (The king ought not to be under any man; but under God and under the law, for the law makes the king.) This early conception of the king as a creation of the law is in marked contrast to the "divine right" theory which ("a deo rex, a rege lex") made the law a creature of the king.

Rex non potest fallere nec falli (Grounds of Law, 438). (The king cannot deceive or be deceived.) The judges represent the king, but if they go wrong they do so in their personal capacities and not as the representatives of the king.

Rex non potest peccare (2 Rolle. 240). (The king can do no wrong.) It is not to be presumed that the king will do or sanction anything contrary to law, to which he is subject. But if an evil act be done, it, though emanating from the king personally, will be imputed to his ministers, for whose acts the king is in no way responsible. Upon this principle, the Crown cannot be prejudiced by the wrongful acts of its servants nor by errors in letters patent, etc.

See EADEM MENS, ETC.: and compare REX NON DEBET ESSE.

Rex nunquam moritur (Branch, Max. 5th ed. 197). (The king never dies.) Compare IN ANGLIA, ETC.

Rex quod injustum est facere non potest (Jenk. Cent. 9). (The king cannot do what is unjust.)

Compare REX NON POTEST PECCARE.

Rhodes, Laws of. A code of sea laws compiled, or reputed to have been compiled, at a very early date in the island of Rhodes. They were declared by the Roman emperors to be binding on the world at large. The only one of them extant is the Lex Rhodia de Jactu, which declares that where goods are thrown overboard in order to lighten a ship so as to save the ship and the rest of her cargo, then all the owners of the ship and the cargo must share in the loss; and this is the general average of our own day. See AVERAGE.

Rial. See GOLD COINS.

Ricambio; Ricambrium. See RE-EXCHANGE.

Richmond. See HERALDS.

Rider; Rider-roll. Anciently a rider-roll meant an additional clause on a separate piece of parchment which was added to the parchment roll containing an Act of Parliament. Later, a rider meant merely a new clause in an Act. Now a rider means merely some addition, such as a recommendation to mercy, occasionally made by a jury to their verdict in a criminal case.

Riding. From before the Conquest, Yorkshire and Lincolnshire were each divided into three parts known as ridings, or trithings, that is to say, thirds. The ridings of Lincolnshire have for hundreds of years been known as Parts: they are Holland, Lindsey and Resteven. In Yorkshire we still have the North Riding, the West Riding, and the East Riding. For each county there is only one sheriff: in Lincolnshire there is only one Lord Lieutenant, but in Yorkshire there is a distinct Lord Lieutenant for each Riding; and in both counties there is a separate Commission of the Peace for each Riding or Part.

Riding Clerk. Formerly each of the six clerks (q.v.) in turn kept for one year at a time the Controlment Book of all grants that passed the Great Seal, and during that year he was known as the Riding Clerk. Whether he did or did not ride is not clear, but during his year of office he was at one time allowed "one horse-keep."

Riding Officers. See COAST BLOCADE.

Riens in arrere (="nothing in arrear") was the name of the plea in bar used by the plaintiff in an action of replevin when he alleged that the rent had been paid or satisfied before the distress was taken. The reply which has taken the place of the plea in bar under the present practice was sometimes called by the same name. See REPLEVIN.

Riens passe per fait. Literally, nothing passes by the deed. This was the form of an exception used in an action on a deed.

Riens per Descent. This is said to be pleaded when one who is sued as heir of G H pleads: "The defendant had not at the commencement of this action, nor has he since had, nor has he, any lands, tenements or hereditaments by descent from the said G H in fee simple," or other plea to the like effect. See the Debts Recovery Act, 1830, s. 7.

Riens per Devise. One who is sued as devisee under the will of G H, deceased, is said to plead riens per devise if he plead: "The defendant is not devisee of any lands or hereditaments under the last will of G H, deceased," or other plea to the like effect.

Rier-county. See RERE-COUNTY.

Right.—I. A right, in its most general sense, is either the liberty (protected by law) of acting or abstaining from acting in a certain manner, or the power (enforced by law) of compelling a specific person to do or abstain from doing a particular thing. "We may therefore," says Mr. Holland, "define a 'legal right' as a capacity residing in one man of controlling, with the assent and assistance of the State, the actions of others." It follows that every right involves (1) a person invested with the right, or entitled; (2) a person or persons on whom that right imposes a correlative duty or obligation; (3) an act or forbearance which is the subject-matter of the right. In some cases there is also (4) an object, that is, a person or thing to which the right has reference, as in the case of ownership.

With reference to their ultimate object or purpose, rights and duties are either primary [substantive, original], or secondary [adjective, sanctioning].

(i) Primary rights are those which can be created without reference to rights already existing. Thus, if A contracts to pay me £50, my right to the payment of that sum is a primary right. Primary rights are of two classes: (1) those rights to which every member of the community is primâ facie entitled; they consist of (a) personal (or absolute) rights, e.g., the right to life, health and liberty of action (see TORT), and (b) public rights, which are those rights by which every member of the community is primâ facie entitled to use certain things which either belong to the State, or, if they belong to private persons, are subject to the right of public user; such are the rights of the public in respect of the sea, nagivable rivers, highways, public parks, etc. (see the various titles, and PUBLICI JURIS); (2) those rights which arise from relations other than membership of a community, and include the ordinary rights arising from ownership, contract, marriage, and similar relations.

(ii) Secondary rights can arise only for the purpose of protecting or enforcing primary rights. They are either preventive [protective] or remedial [reparative].

(1) Preventive or protective secondary rights exist in order to prevent the infringement or loss of primary rights. They are judicial when they require the assistance of a Court of law for their enforcement, and extrajudicial when they are capable of being exercised by the party himself. The right to prevent a threatened injury by injunction, the right to take proceedings to obtain a judicial recognition of a right which might be lost by lapse of time or adverse user, the right to institute proceedings for the administration of the estate of a deceased person or the assets of an insolvent person or corporation, and the right to security against the commission of a crime, are instances of judicial preventive rights; and the right of self-defence is an instance of an extrajudicial preventive right. See also ADMINISTRATION; DE BENE ESSE; LEGITIMACY; NE EXEAT REGNO; PERPETUATION OF TESTIMONY.

(2) Remedial or reparative secondary rights are also either judicial or extrajudicial. They may further be divided into (a) rights of restitution or restoration, which entitle the person injured to be replaced in his original position; (b) rights of enforcement, which entitle the person injured to the performance of an act by the person bound; and (c) rights of satisfaction or compensation. A right of entry or re-entry is an extrajudicial right of restitution, a lien is an extrajudicial right of enforcement, a right of distress or retainer is an extrajudicial right of satisfaction, the right of bringing an action of ejectment or detinue is a judicial restitutive right, the right of obtaining an injunction for specific performance and the right to compel the payment of a debt are judicial rights of enforcement, and the right of bringing an action of damages for breach of contract or tort is a judicial right of satisfaction. See REMEDY.

With reference to the nature of the obligation which they impose, rights are either in rem [real rights, general rights, rights against the whole world, jura in rem] or in personam [personal rights, relative rights, rights against determinate persons, jura in personam].

(1) A right in rem is one which imposes an obligation on persons generally, that is, either on all the world or on all the world except certain determinate persons. Thus, if I am entitled to exclude all persons from a given piece of land, I have a right in rem in respect of that land; and if there are one or more persons, A, B and C, whom I am not entitled to exclude from it, my right is still a right in rem. So if I am entitled to the services of a servant, I have a right in rem which obliges all other persons not to interfere wrongfully with that relation. (See MASTER AND SERVANT; SERVICE.) A right in rem is always negative.

(2) A right in personam is one which imposes an obligation on a definite person. Thus, if A agrees to pay me £50, my right to that sum against A is a right in personam, belonging to the class of primary rights (supra). My right to liberty of action, so long as I do not interfere with other persons' rights, is a right in rem; if B infringes that right by imprisoning or assaulting me, I acquire a right to recover damages against him, which is a right in personam belonging to the class of secondary rights (supra). Primary rights in personam are either affirmative [positive] or negative, according as they require for their performance an act or a forbearance. Thus, if A contracts with B not to carry on business in a certain place, B has a negative right against A. Primary rights in personam are also subject to the following divisions:— absolute and conditional, legal and equitable, personal and transmissible, and of perfect and imperfect obligation. See the various titles, and CONTRACT; OBLIGATION.

II. "Right" is used by the old writers on real property law in the technical sense of a right which an owner of land had when he had been disseised, so that he had only the right of recovering possession either by entry or action. His estate was then said to be turned to a right. If A was disseised by B, and B died while in possession, so that the land descended to his heir, A could not recover possession by entry, but had to bring a possessory action (see DESCENT CAST); if A further suffered a certain time to elapse, or had judgment given against him in a possessory action, he could no longer recover by a possessory action, but only by an action on the right, meaning the right of ownership as opposed to the right to possession. Hence his estate was said to be turned to a mere, bare or naked right. These distinctions no longer exist, real actions having been abolished. See ACTIONS.

III. "Right," like "title" (q.v.), sometimes connotes the idea of a mode of acquisition. Thus, a person is said to hold or own property in his own right, or in right of another (in auter droit). If it descends to him, or he purchases it, he obtains it in his own right; but if he acquires it as representing another person, he is said to take it in auter droit. The principal mode of taking personal property in auter droit is by executorship or administration, for the executor or administrator holds the goods of the deceased as his representative. The difference is of importance as regards the law of merger (q.v.).

In the phrase "of common right," the word "right" seems to be used in a somewhat similar sense. Thus, when it is said that the remedy of distress for arrears of a rent-service exists of common right, and that every freehold tenant of a manor has a right of common of pasture appendant of common right, it is meant that the right is created by law, and not by agreement between the parties.

IV. "Right" is used in law, as well as in ethics, as opposed to "wrong." Thus a person may acquire a title by wrong. See TITLE.

Right Close, Writ of; Writ de recto clauso. One of the writs of right abolished in 1833: see RECTO. It lay only for tenants in ancient demesne (q.v.) who had been ousted of their lands. It was addressed to the lord and commanded him to do right in his court.

Right of Action is the right to bring an action. Thus, a person who is wrongfully dispossessed of land has a right of action to recover it. See CAUSE OF ACTION; CHOSE IN ACTION; ACTIO PERSONALIS MORITUR CUM PERSONÂ; REMEDY.

In the old writers, "right of action" was commonly used to denote that a person had lost a right of entry (q.v.), and had nothing but a right of action left. See RIGHT.

Right of Entry is the right of taking or resuming possession of land by entering on it in a peaceable manner. See ENTRY.

Rights of entry are of two kinds. An original or mere right of entry is a right of entry and nothing more. Thus, where a person has been disseised of land, or where an estate has determined, so that he becomes entitled to the possession of the land, he has an original right of entry. This kind of right was formerly inalienable, but may now (under s. 6 of the Real Property Act, 1845) be disposed of by deed. It is sufficient to support a contingent remainder, if the estate of the disseisee was itself sufficient.

A right of entry, by the exercise of which an existing estate is defeated, is a right attached to a reversion. It was formerly called a title of entry, to distinguish it from an original right of entry, because it could not be enforced by action, and was therefore not a right in the technical sense. It is also sometimes called a right of re-entry. The commonest instance of this kind of right occurs in an ordinary lease, in which it is usual to reserve to the lessor the right of determining the lease by re-entry, if the lessee fails to pay the rent or perform the covenants. This kind of right is inalienable by itself, although (under the statute 33 Hen. 8, c. 34) the benefit of the condition passes on an assignment of the reversion, so that the assignee can take advantage of any breach of the condition committed after the assignment. The exercise of a right of re-entry for breach of a covenant or condition contained in a lease is restricted by s. 14 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881; as to which see FORFEITURE.

See CONTINUAL CLAIM; DESCENT CAST; RIGHT OF ACTION; TITLE.

Right of Representation and Performance. See COPYRIGHT.

Right Patent, Writ of. A writ which lay for a tenant in fee simple, if, for instance, another had recovered the lands against him by default in a præcipe quod reddat (see PRÆCIPE). It was abolished in 1833: see RECTO.

Right to Begin, on the hearing or trial of a cause, or the argument of a petition, etc., is the right of first addressing the Court or jury. The right to begin is frequently of importance, as the counsel who begins has also the right of replying or having the last word after the counsel on the opposite side has addressed the Court or jury. This rule is subject to the exception that where the second counsel at a trial before a jury does not call witnesses, the counsel who began has no right of reply.

The general rule is, that the plaintiff has the right to begin if the affirmative of the issue is on him, or if the onus of proving any one material issue, or of proving the amount of damages, rests on him. Otherwise, if the affirmative of the issue lies on the defendant, he has the right to begin.

Right to Convey. See BENEFICIAL OWNER; COVENANTS.

Ring-dropping. A form of swindle worked by a rogue who deposits on the pavement a ring or other article apparently of value—but actually worthless—which he picks up afterwards in the view of some person to whom the ring, etc., is then offered at what seems to be a bargain price. It will amount to larceny if the victim merely deposits his watch, etc., as security while he takes the ring, etc., to be valued, and if, as always happens, the ring-dropper meanwhile disappears; and it will be obtaining by false pretences if there is a sale outright.

Ringing the Changes. Where a man is given a good coin in payment for goods, and by a sleight of hand substitutes for it a bad coin which he hands back to the purchaser and declares to be the coin which had been paid, and where he thereby obtains a second good coin from the purchaser, he is said to ring the changes. This, as regards the second good coin paid, is larceny by a trick, and, as regards the bad coin, is the offence of uttering counterfeit coin.

The swindle more usually known as ringing the changes consists in asking for change and then so confusing the person who gives the change that more than the proper amount is obtained. This is larceny by a trick.

Rings. See SERJEANT AT LAW.

Riot. A riot is an unlawful assembly which has actually begun to execute the purpose for which it assembled by a breach of the peace, and to the terror of the public. A lawful assembly may become a riot if the persons assembled form, and proceed to execute, an unlawful purpose, to the terror of the people, although they had not that purpose when they assembled. But a riot cannot take place unless three persons at least are present. Every person convicted of riot is liable to be sentenced to fine and imprisonment with or without hard labour (Hard Labour Act, 1822).

Where twelve or more persons are committing a riot, it is the duty, under the Riot Act, 1 Geo. 1, st. 2, c. 5, of the mayor, sheriff, and certain other officers to make a proclamation in the King's name, commanding them to disperse; and every person who obstructs the making of the proclamation, or continues to riot for one hour afterwards, is guilty of felony, and liable to penal servitude for life, or three years' imprisonment with hard labour. These provisions of the Riot Act do not, however, in the least affect the common law right and the common law duty of justices to suppress a riot at any moment with whatever degree of force may be necessary; nor do they affect the common law right of private persons, acting on their own initiative, to do the same.

The riotous demolition, or attempted demolition, of any building, machinery, or mining plant, is felony punishable with penal servitude for life (Malicious Damage Act, 1861, s. 11.) Riotous damage or injury to any building, machinery, or mining plant, is a misdemeanour, punishable with seven years' penal servitude (ib. s. 12).

Persons whose property is damaged in a riot can recover compensation under the Riot Damages Act, 1886, which superseded the ineffective and obsolete proceedings against the hundred previously available and made the police district the area liable. Where rioters damage a ship in distress, the remedy is under the same Act as applied by s. 515 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894.

See ASSEMBLY; ROUT; AFFRAY.

Riparian is that which relates to or is connected with the bank of a river. A riparian proprietor or owner is a person who owns land through or past which a river runs; and riparian rights are those arising from such a property. The riparian owner whose land is nearer the source of the river is called the upper riparian owner as compared with him whose land is more remote from the source.

As to the rights of riparian owners, see WATER.

Risk, in the law of marine insurance, denotes—I. A danger or peril insured against. II. The possibility of the loss happening under such circumstances as to make the underwriter liable; when this possibility has arisen (e.g., by the departure of the vessel), the risk is said to commence or attach, and the assured's interest is said to be at risk. When the insurance is of such a nature that the peril which would make the underwriter liable for a total loss may happen as soon as the risk commences, the risk is said to be entire; if, on the other hand, some circumstance which would have contributed to the happening of the peril insured against has not taken place, the risk is divided or apportionable. For instance, if the ship deviate, the underwriter is discharged, but inasmuch as if she had been lost before the deviation he would have been liable, he has run the whole risk, and it is therefore said to be entire; but if part of the risk insured against has not been run (as where part of the cargo insured has not been shipped), the risk is divided, and the assured is entitled to a return of that proportion of the premium which covered the risk not run.

When goods are declared in a charter-party to be carried at "merchant's risk" this does not exclude the charterer's right to general average (see AVERAGE) in respect of goods properly jettisoned; but it does exclude the right of the charterer to recover in respect of the improper or negligent acts of the master or crew. The "owner's risk rate" of a railway company, on the other hand, does not exempt the company from liability for the negligence of their servants. See RISK NOTE.

Risk Note. Under the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, s. 7, a railway company may make with anyone for whom they carry goods a contract which makes them, instead of being liable as carriers (q.v.), liable only for such loss or injury as results from the wilful misconduct of themselves or their servants. Such a contract, which must be signed by the consignor, is popularly known as a risk note. The company must, of course, if so required, carry as and with the full liabilities of common carriers: but they may quote lower rates to those signing risk notes.

Ritual. This means the prescribed method of conducting religious services. The subjects with which it deals are: (1) The decorations, whether temporary or permanent, of the church; (2) the ornaments of the church; (3) vestments (technically known as the ornaments) of the minister; (4) ceremonies, and (5) rites.

The Privy Council is the tribunal which decides cases on these points: it reserves the right to reconsider its decisions, which, therefore, are not absolutely final.

Rivers. A public navigable river is one which is actually navigable and in which the tide ebbs and flows; all other rivers on which navigation is carried on are private rivers over which the public have acquired a right or easement of navigation. The ownership of the bed of a public navigable river is primâ facie in the Crown. As to the right of navigation, see NAVIGABLE; as to the right of fishing in a public river, see FISHERY.

All rivers and streams above the flow and reflow of the tide are primâ facie private, although many have become by immemorial user or by Act of Parliament subject to public rights of navigation. The right of navigation gives no right of property, or of fishing. When a private river runs through land belonging to one person, he is primâ facie the owner of the bed; when a private river separates the lands of two owners, each is primâ facie owner of the soil of the bed to the middle of the stream (ad medium filum aquæ (q.v.)). As to the effect of alluvion and dereliction, see those titles; see further as to rivers, and as to the rights of riparian owners, title WATER.

The pollution of rivers is forbidden by the Rivers Pollution Act, 1876.

See CONSERVATORS OF RIVERS.

Road. See HIGHWAY.

Road Board. This was a body, consisting of such persons as the Treasury might appoint, constituted under the Development and Road Improvements Fund Act, s. 7 (now repealed), for the purposes of improving the facilities for road traffic. Under the Ministry of Transport Act, 1919, s. 2, its duties and powers were transferred, as from 23rd September, 1919, by the Ministry of Transport (Road Board Transfer of Powers) Order, 1919 (S. R. & O., 1919, II, p. 848), to the Ministry of Transport, and are now performed and exercised by the Roads Department of that Ministry.

Road Fund. A fund established pursuant to the Roads Act, 1920, s. 3, for the receipt and payment out (under the direction of the Minister of Transport) of moneys for road improvements under that Act and the Development and Road Improvement Funds Act, 1909.

Road, Rule of. The common law rule of the road, as between all traffic other than pedestrian traffic, is that everyone keeps to the left except when overtaking, in which latter case the overtaking horse or vehicle keeps to the right. Infractions of the rule are punishable summarily under the Highways Act, 1835, s. 78, for the purposes of which a motor car or other mechanically-propelled vehicle is, like a bicycle, a carriage.

As regards pedestrian traffic there is no rule of the road either at common law or under any statute. When meeting or overtaking one another pedestrians can take whichever side they please.

Pedestrians have, as against vehicular traffic, a primary right not merely to the footways, but also to the part of the road used by vehicular traffic; and there is no justification in law for the belief apparently entertained by many drivers that it is the business of pedestrians to get out of the way.

Roads Advisory Committee. The Ministry of Transport Act, 1919, s. 22, provides that, for the purpose of advising the Minister of Transport with respect to his duties in relation to road traffic, there shall be a committee, consisting of five members representing highway authorities, five representing the users of horse and mechanical traffic, and a secretary; all of whom are apparently to be appointed by the Minister.

Roads Department. This, as is stated under ROAD BOARD, has now replaced that body.

Robbery is where a person, either with violence or with threats of injury, takes and carries away a thing which is on the body or in the immediate presence of the person from whom it is taken, under such circumstances that in the absence of violence or threats the act committed would be a theft.

The enactment now dealing with robbery or attempted robbery is s. 23 of the Larceny Act, 1916.

Rod. See PERCH.

Rodknights. Those who held by the tenure of riding with their lord from one manor to another were known as rodknights in the time of Bracton, who uses the word rodknightes in a text which is otherwise Latin.

Roe, Richard. See RECOVERY.

Rogation Days. The Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday before Ascension Day (q.v.).

See FAST DAYS; GRASS-WEEK; PARISH BOUNDARIES.

Rogation Sunday. The fifth Sunday after Easter. It is the Sunday preceding Ascension Day.

Rogatio testium, in making a nuncupative will, is where the testator formally calls upon the persons present to bear witness that he has declared his will. See WILL.

Rogatory Letters. In the terminology of international law, this expression is used as a synonym for what in our law are known as "letters of request" (q.v.) addressed to foreign courts.

Rogues. See VAGRANCY.

Rolling Stock of a railway company cannot be taken in execution (see EXECUTION); and (Railway Rolling Stock Protection Act, 1872) the rolling stock of a railway company, when in use in a manufactory, pier, mine, or similar place belonging to some person or company other than the railway company, cannot be taken in distress for rent payable by the tenant of the manufactory, pier, mine, etc., provided it is conspicuously marked as belonging to the railway company.

Roll of the Temple. Dugdale, writing in 1666, says, at p. 199 of the Origines Juridiciales, that in the Middle Temple every Easter Term every Bencher paid 2s., every Barrister 1s. 6d., and every Student 1s., in order to provide a fund which was divided amongst the servants of the Inn. It was called either the Roll of the Temple or the Calves Head Roll. It had originated in a payment of 1s. a head made by members of the Inn who partook of a breakfast, provided by the chief cook, at which calves' heads were served.

Rolls. In ancient times all the principal records were written on pieces of parchment stitched together so as to form a long continuous piece, which was rolled up when not in use. Hence such records were called "rolls." This practice was followed up till modern times in the Court of Chancery. (See ENROLMENT.) Now, however, the practice of writing on rolls has been abandoned for the more convenient method of inscribing in books.

The Parliament Rolls are the records of the proceedings of Parliament, especially Acts of Parliament, and therefore when any misprint appears in a printed copy of a statute, the Parliament roll is consulted to correct the error.

The Patent Rolls contain grants of liberties, privileges, lands, offices, etc., creations of peers, and other letters patent (q.v.), while the Close Rolls are the records of letters close (q.v.). There are also numerous other kinds of rolls of a similar nature, such as the charter rolls, fine rolls, liberate rolls, perambulation rolls, hundred rolls, etc.

The rolls above described form part of the public records of the kingdom and are kept at the Public Record Office in London.

See RECORD OFFICE; MASTER OF THE ROLLS; DOMUS CONVERSORUM.

The court rolls of manors were in ancient times long pieces of parchment, rolled up into convenient bundles; but in modern times what is called the court roll is neither more nor less than a large book in which the steward enters every transaction relating to the copyhold lands of the manor. See COPYHOLD.

The admission of every solicitor of the Supreme Court requires to be enrolled in a roll or book kept for that purpose by the Law Society (q.v.). A solicitor is said to be struck off the rolls when his name is taken out of this roll by the Law Society, either on his own application, where he wishes to cease to be a solicitor, or on the application of some one else, when he has been guilty of misconduct. Compare DISBAR.

In the old common law practice the steps in every action were entered on a roll, which was called the plea roll, the issue roll, and the judgment roll, according to the stage which the action had reached. This kind of roll no longer exists, the cause book (q.v.) and the books in which (see Ord. 41, r. 1) judgments are entered having taken its place.

Rolls of the Exchequer. These are the records of the Exchequer (q.v.) on both its administrative and its judicial side. They are now in the Record Office (q.v.).

Rolt's Act. A former popular title of the Chancery Regulation Act, 1862, which was passed at the instance of Mr. Rolt, M.P., who in 1867 became Lord Justice of Appeal.

Roly-poly. An obsolete name for a kind of roulette, and also a synonym of an old game called half-bowl. Half-bowl (see Brand; Gaming, p. 24), seems to have been a pleasing combination of bowls and skittles.

Roman Catholics. Apart from the provisions of the Act of Settlement (q.v.) the only disabilities to which Roman Catholics are now subject seem to be (under so much of the Roman Catholic Relief Act, 1829, as is still unrepealed) inability to present to a benefice, and incapacity to hold certain public offices, especially that of Lord Chancellor, or any office in the Church of England or Scotland, or in the ecclesiastical Courts. No one in Holy orders of the Church of Rome can be a member of the House of Commons (Act of 1829, s. 9); but neither can anyone in Holy orders of the Church of England. A Roman Catholic is, reasonably enough, debarred from holding in the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge or Durham any professorship of Divinity, or any office for which membership of the Church of England or Holy orders of that Church is required (Universities Tests Relief Act, 1871, ss. 1, 8), and also from holding any office in the colleges of Eton, Westminster or Winchester or, probably, in the other public schools properly so-called (Act of 1829, s. 16).

Rome-scot; Rome-fee. Peter Pence (q.v.).

Romilly's Act. The popular title of the Charity Procedure Act, 1812.

Romney Marsh. A large area of marsh land in Kent. At a very early period it was placed under the government of a body incorporated as "the bailiff, jurats and commonalty of Romney," but it does not now exist as a separate unit for any purpose of local government. The management of the sea walls and the drains which preserved it from inundation by the sea was anciently in the hands of twenty-three lords of manors known as the "Lords of the Marsh" or "Lords of the Levels"; they also have ceased to exercise functions; but the special drainage laws of the marsh have to a large extent been preserved in modern Acts of Parliament.

The town of Romney, from which the marsh is named, is one of the Cinque Ports.

Roncaria; Runcaria. Land grown with brambles or briar: scrub (1 Inst. 5).

Rood. This measure of land contains forty square perches (q.v.) of land, and is precisely one-fourth of an acre (Weights and Measures Act, 1878, s. 12).

Rood; Roodloft. The Rood was the Holy Cross and was anciently known as the Holy Rood.

In ecclesiastical law, the rood is a representation of the Crucifixion, placed over the line dividing the choir or the chancel of a church from the nave, and the roodloft is the structure supporting the rood. The legality of either the one or the other depends upon whether they do or do not lead to what is regarded by the ecclesiastical Courts as superstitious worship.

Rood Day. This meant either the 14th September, which was the Feast of the Exaltation of the Cross, or the 3rd May, which was the Feast of the Invention (or Finding) of the Cross.

Root of Descent is the same as "stock of descent." See DESCENT.

Root of Title. See TITLE.

Rose Noble. See FARTHING OF GOLD.

Rota. A list showing the order in which persons are to be selected to perform particular duties. As to the selection of judges who are to be placed upon the rota for the trial of election petitions, see s. 13 of the Judicature Act, 1881.

Rotelanda; Rotelandia. Rutland. The statute mentioned under Rutland is also known as the Statutum de Rotelanda (Rothlan)

Rothlan. An abbreviated form of Rotelanda (q.v.).

Rotuli. The rolls (q.v.).

Rotulus Wintoniæ. The Roll of Winton. In the "Descriptio compilata per Dominum Ingulphum, Abbatem Monasterii Croyland," it is alleged that King Alfred had caused a survey of England, somewhat on the lines of Domesday, to be made, and that this had been recorded in a roll, kept at Winton or Winchester, which had been lost before the time of Ingulf. Ingulf, who died in 1109, was the Abbot of Croyland; but the work alleged to have been compiled by him is now generally regarded as a forgery dating from the early part of the fifteenth century, and there is no reason for believing that the Roll of Winton ever existed.

Roulette. See GAMING.

Roundabouts. See WHIRLIGIG.

Rout. A rout is an unlawful assembly which has made some motion towards the execution of the common purpose of the persons assembled. It is, therefore, intermediate between an unlawful assembly and a riot (q.v.).

Taking part in a rout seems to be a misdemeanour at common law, but prosecutions for it are unknown, the persons who might be charged with rout being always charged with unlawful assembly, if with anything. See ASSEMBLY, UNLAWFUL.

Royal Arms. See ARMORIAL BEARINGS.

Royal College of Physicians. This body was incorporated by royal charter dated 23rd September, 1618, which is still in force. The charter empowers the college to make bye-laws (of which a large number have been made) to regulate the affairs of the college and the conduct of its members.

The college consists of fellows (F.R.C.P.), members (M.R.C.P.) and licentiates (L.R.C.P.). A fellow cannot sue for his fees (see MEDICAL PRACTITIONER); and he, like a member, cannot engage in trade, or dispense medicines, or practise in partnership, or buy or sell a partnership (Bye-Law clxxviii).

Under an agreement made in 1883 pursuant to s. 19 of the Medical Act, 1858, the college and the Royal College of Surgeons (q.v.) have set up a joint examination board, and every person passed by that board is entitled to become L.R.C.P. or M.R.C.S. as the case may be.

Royal College of Surgeons of London. This body now exists under a royal charter granted in 1843. It consists of fellows (F.R.C.S.) and members (M.R.C.S.).

Neither fellows nor members of the Royal College of Surgeons would appear to be, as such, under the same restrictions as to fees, partnerships, etc., as apply to fellows and members of the Royal College of Physicians. See BARBERS AND CHIRURGEONS; MEDICAL PRACTITIONERS.

Royal Courts of Justice. The statutory description of the Law Courts in the Strand (Judicature (Officers) Act, 1879, s. 28).

Royal Fish are whale and sturgeon, and these, when either thrown ashore or caught near the coast, are theoretically the property of the king. See PREROGATIVE.

Royal Marines. A force first raised in 1755 to replace the soldiers of the army who since 1664 had been detailed for duty on ships of war. They are included in the regular forces for whose maintenance the annual sanction of Parliament is required (Army Act, s. 190). They are under the control of the Admiralty (ib. s. 179). When on land they are subject to the Army Act (ib. s. 179 (15) (16) (17)), but when afloat they are subject to the Naval Discipline Act (Army Act, s. 179 (15)) and to the ships' officers (King's Regulations and Admiralty Instructions, art. 1134), and perform ships' duties generally (ib. art. 1156).

Royal Marine Volunteers. The Naval Forces Act, 1903, s. 2 (1), authorised the raising of this force, which, when on duty, was to be on the same footing as the Royal Marines (ib. s. 2 (2) (3)); but the force has not in fact been raised.

Royal Military Asylum. See DUKE OF YORK'S SCHOOL.

Royal Mines. See MINERALS.

Royal Victorian Order, The. This Order was founded in 1896. It includes Knights Grand Cross (G.C.V.O.); Knights Commanders (K.C.V.O); Commanders (C.V.O.); and Members (M.V.O.).

Royal Warrant. This expression has long been in popular use as meaning a writing, issued by some royal official, under which a tradesman is authorised to act in such and such a capacity (as chemist or tailor, for instance) for some member of the royal family. No such writing has any force in law, but the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, s. 20, makes it an offence to falsely pretend that goods are made by a person holding such a warrant. The royal warrant more particularly known to the law is one of the instruments by which the Sovereign exercises his executive authority under either statute or the common law. Such a royal warrant is generally used as a mere working part of the machinery of government, but it can occasionally be used as a substitute for an Act of Parliament. Thus, the purchase of commissions in the Army was abolished by Royal Warrant of July 20, 1871, after the Government of the day had failed to secure the same result by Act of Parliament.

Rubric of a Statute. The title of a statute; it was anciently inscribed in red letters. See A RUBIO AD MIGRUM.

Rubrics. In ecclesiastical law, these are the rules, prescribing the manner in which services are to be conducted, which are printed in the Book of Common Prayer. In the pre-reformation missals such rules were inscribed in red characters, and to this fact the name is due.

Rudmas Day. The same as Rood Day (q.v.). Both terms are now obsolete.

Rule.—I. A rule is a regulation made by a Court of justice or a public office with reference to the conduct of business therein. Most rules are made under the authority of an Act of Parliament, and then have the same effect as an enactment of the legislature; such are the supplemental rules of Court made by the judges under the Judicature Acts.

II. "Rule" also signifies an order or direction made by a Court of justice in an action or other proceeding. The term "order" includes "rule" (Judicature Act, 1873, s. 100). The term is confined to the King's Bench Division of the High Court, being borrowed from the practice of the old common law Courts. Since the Judicature Acts rules have been used mainly in connection with writs of certiorari, mandamus, habeas corpus, quo warranto, and similar matters.

A rule is either—(1) absolute in the first instance, or (2) calling upon the opposite party to show cause why the rule applied for should not be granted; a rule of the latter kind is called a rule to show cause, or a rule nisi, because if no sufficient cause is shown, the rule is made absolute; otherwise it is discharged. Thus (Crown Office Rule 217) the Court in the first instance may make an order absolute ex parte for the issue of a writ of habeas corpus or it may grant an order nisi. See MOTION.

See SIDE-BAR; OF COURSE.

III. "Rule" sometimes means a rule of law. Thus we speak of the rule against perpetuities, the rule in Shelley's Case, etc. See LAW; PERPETUITY; SHELLEY'S CASE.

Rule of Court generally means a rule of procedure. (See RULE.) Sometimes, however, it means an order made by a Court in a particular action or matter: thus, if a compromise of an action in the Divorce Court provides for the payment of taxed costs, the compromise may be made a rule of Court in the King's Bench Division, and a compromise of an action in any Court may, if approved by the Court, be made an order of the Court in which the action was brought. The making of a compromise a rule of Court gives it the same effect as if the terms of the compromise were contained in an order of the Court.

Rules. See LIBERTY OF THE RULES.

Rump Acts. This was the term used, by Blount, for instance, to describe the ordinances, or Acts, passed by Parliament, without the concurrence of the King, between 26th August, 1642, and the Restoration in 1660.

Running Days. In a charterparty either "days" or "running days" means, in the absence of custom, all days, whether working or non-working, and includes Sundays and holidays. But custom may, as in the City of London, make either "running days" or "days" equivalent to working days, that is to say, may make "running days" or "days" exclude Sundays and holidays.

Running with the Land; Running with the Reversion. See COVENANT.

Rural Chapters. CAPITULA RURALIA (q.v.).

Rural Dean. Rural deans, or decani rurales, certainly existed during the Anglo-Saxon period. It was then their duty to exercise many of the functions subsequently exercised by the archdeacon. About the thirteenth century, the archdeacon took over most of the work of the rural deans, and comparatively little was heard of them until within the last hundred years. Now they form part of the machinery of every diocese. The preparation of children for confirmation is the most important part of their work. They are required also to execute all processes and writs directed to them by the bishop, and to report to him on the lives of the clergy of the various parishes within the respective rural deaneries; but these latter duties are largely theoretical.

Every archdeaconry is an aggregation of rural deaneries. See KALENDAE.

Russell Gurney's Act. A former popular title both of the Recorders Act (q.v.) and of the Medical Act, 1876.

Russia Company. See MUSCOVY COMPANY.

Rutland, Statute of. This is a statute, "Touching the Recovery of the King's Debts," which is printed in the Statutes at Large as 10 Edw. 1, and in the Statutes of the Realm (under the title of Provisiones factæ in Scaccario) as 12 Edw. 1. It was repealed in 1888.

Rutter of the Sea. See OLERON, LAWS OF. Rutter was a form of ruttier, derived from the French routier, which itself was a derivative of route. But the Rutter of the Sea was more than a mere set of sailing directions.

S

"S." See BRANDING.

Sabbatum. Used in Domesday as meaning 'peace."

Sabbulonarium. This meant gravel, a gravel-pit, or money paid for the privilege of digging gravel.

Sac. Jurisdiction, more especially manorial jurisdiction. It was usually joined with "soc," and sometimes also with "toll" and "theam." All the four words had a meaning practically identical.

Sacabere. Another form is sakaburth which according to Bracton (lib. 2, c 32, fol. 150), means one who, having been robbed, gave surety to prosecute the offender.

Saccus. A sack. See BROCHIA.

Sack. As regards wool, the statute 14 Edw. 3, st. 2, c. 4, enacted that "the sack ought to contain twenty stone, and each stone fourteen pounds."

Sacrament. The reservation of the Holy Sacrament is illegal in the Church of England. See REVILING.

Sacrilege. A person who breaks into a place of divine worship and commits any felony therein, or who being in a place of divine worship commits any felony therein and breaks out of it, is liable under s. 24 of the Larceny Act, 1916, to penal servitude for life as a maximum punishment. And under the statute 1 Mary, Sess. 2, c. 3 (which was passed for the protection of Roman Catholic places of worship), any person who unlawfully pulls down, defaces, or breaks any altar, crucifix or cross in any church, chapel or churchyard is liable, on summary conviction, to imprisonment for three months, or until he repents.

Safe Conduct. In the ancient collections of original writs there are given forms of safe conducts issued by the King to aliens desirous of entering the kingdom. These safe conducts directed the royal officers to provide for the security of those holding them. They had to be enrolled in the Chancery and to be produced on demand. As to them, see the statutes 9 Hen. 3, c. 30; 25 Hen. 6, c. 5; 28 Hen. 8, c. 1.

At present, a safe conduct is merely a pass issued to an enemy subject by the authorities of a belligerent State.

Safe Pledge. See SALVUS PLEGIUS.

Saint-German, Christopher. A legal writer, born about 1460, who published in 1523 a handbook of English law entitled "Dialogus de Fundamentes Legum et de Conscientia." There were numerous editions, at first in Latin and afterwards in English; and for more than two hundred years the book was in general use by law students. The English edition of 1721 is, like others, entitled "Doctor and Student or Dialogues between a Doctor of Divinity and a Student in the Laws of England," etc.; and the work is generally known as Doctor and Student.

St. John of Jerusalem, Knights of. A synonym for Hospitallers (q.v.).

St. John of Jerusalem, Order of. An Order connected with ambulance work. It comprises Knights of Justice, Chaplains, Knights of Grace, and Esquires, as well as Ladies of Justice and Ladies of Grace. The fact that persons have been appointed (nominally by the King, who is the "Sovereign Head" of the Order) to these positions is notified in the London Gazette: but such appointment confers no rank or dignity and no duties seem to be imposed thereby.

St. Leonard's Act, Lord. The popular title of the Law of Property Amendment Act, 1859.

Saint Michael and Saint George, Order of. The Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George was founded in 1818 in order to provide titles of reward for public service in the Mediterranean. It is now used for all the overseas dominions. It includes Knights Grand Cross (G.C.M.G.), Knights Commanders (K.C.M.G.), and Companions (C.M.G.).

Saint Patrick, Order of. The Most Illustrious Order of Saint Patrick was founded in 1788. The Grand Master was formerly the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; and the order consists of Knights (K.P.), who are the Sovereign, Royal Princes, and Irish peers or peers connected with Ireland.

St. Peter ad Vincula, Feast of. The 1st August: see GULE OF AUGUST.

Saints' Days. See FEASTS.

Saladine Tax (Tenth, Tithe). A tax imposed in 1188 by Henry II. at the request of Pope Innocent III., to defray the expenses of the Crusade against Saladin, the Sultan of Egypt and Syria. Persons who went on the Crusade were exempt, as also were religious communities. The tax was one-tenth of all goods and chattels; it did not extend to land. Juries were employed to assist in the assessment. It was the first tax on personal property.

Sale. A sale is a transfer of property or of a right from one man to another, in consideration of a sum of money, as opposed to barters, exchanges and gifts (q.v.). Almost any right may be transferred for a price, but the term "sale" is only applied to cases where the whole right of the vendor is transferred, not to cases where he creates a new or limited right in consideration of a money payment: thus a mortgage or lease is not a sale. Every sale includes (a) the agreement or bargain, (b) the payment of the price, and (c) the delivery or conveyance of the property. Sometimes the three transactions take place simultaneously, as where I go into a shop, select an article, pay the price and take it away, and then the transaction is a simple sale. But either the payment of the price, or the delivery (or conveyance) of the property, or both, may be postponed to a future time, giving rise to a contract or agreement to do something in futuro. In the case of chattels, such a postponement does not prevent the property or ownership from passing from the vendor to the vendee, provided that the thing sold is existent and ascertained, and that the contract of sale fulfils the legal requisites (see STATUTE OF FRAUDS), and therefore the "sale" is complete as soon as the contract has been entered into: such a transaction is called a "bargain and sale" (q.v.) or an executed contract of sale, although the contract has not been performed. But in the case of an agreement for the sale of land or of unascertained goods (e.g., ten sheep to be selected from a given flock), the ownership does not pass, and therefore the sale is not complete until the land has been conveyed, or the goods ascertained: such a transaction is an executory contract of sale. See APPROPRIATION.

Ordinarily the person who sells is the owner of the property or his agent, but in some cases a person may sell property which does not belong to him, e.g., a sheriff who has taken goods in execution. So a person may have a power of sale over property without having the ownership in it; as in the case of an ordinary mortgagee of land or a pledgee of chattels. (See MORTGAGE; POWER.) So when a person has a charge on property, he may take proceedings in the High Court to have it sold in satisfaction of the debt. This is sometimes called a judicial sale. See HYPOTHECATION.

Again, a sale is usually a voluntary act, but in some cases the owner of property may be compelled to sell it by the order of a Court: thus in an action for partition the Court may order a sale instead of a partition (q.v.) if the nature of the property makes that course preferable, and then even the non-assenting co-owners are ordered to join in the conveyance, or the conveyance is effected without their concurrence. (See VESTING ORDER.) Railway and other companies are frequently empowered to purchase land, etc., from the owners against their will. See POWER.

Sale or Return. A contract of sale or return differs from an ordinary contract of sale in one respect only, namely, that the buyer has the right of returning the goods to the seller within a reasonable time, and that the seller, upon such return, is re-invested with property in the goods and is bound to accept them in satisfaction of the buyer's liability.

Salford Hundred Court of Record is an inferior and local Court of Record having jurisdiction, if the cause of action arise wholly or in part within the Hundred of Salford. (See HUNDRED.) Its jurisdiction and procedure correspond to those of a County Court. See the Salford Hundred Court of Record Acts, 1868 and 1911, 31 & 32 Vict. c. cxxx. and 1 & 2 Geo. 5; c. clxx. Appeal lies to the Court of Appeal (Act of 1911, s. 8).

Salisbury Court. See PRIVILEGED PLACES.

Salmon. This includes all migratory fish of the genus salmon by whatever name they are called; see the Salmon Fishery Act, 1861, s 4, which enumerates the various names, including "sea trout," "white trout" and "peal."

The ordinary "brown trout" is not migratory.

Salt. See GRAINAGE.

Salt Silver. A payment of one penny made by some tenants to the lord at Martinmas, as commutation of their duty to carry salt from the market to his larder.

Salus populi est suprema lex (Bac. Max. Reg. 12). (The welfare of the people, or of the public, is the paramount law.) Compare NECESSITAS PUBLICA, ETC.

Salute. The salute or salus was a gold coin, of the value of twenty shillings, coined by Henry V. and Henry VI., not as part of the English coinage, but for circulation in the parts of France held by them. There was also a half-salute. Compare BLANK.

Salvage; Salvors.—I. Salvage is the compensation allowed to persons (salvors) by whose assistance a ship, or boat, or the cargo of a ship, or the lives of the persons belonging to her, are saved from danger or loss, in cases of shipwreck, dereliction, capture, or the like. The assistance must be voluntary, and not under any contract or duty, and must involve skill, enterprise and risk on the part of the salvors. Salvors have a retaining lien for their remuneration on the property rescued. (See LIEN.) In the absence of an agreement between the salvors and the owners of the property salved, the Court will assess the amount which ought to be paid to the salvors. In doing so the Court will have regard to the skill, enterprise and risk involved, and to the fact that if their efforts had been unsuccessful, they would not have been paid anything. The Court will refuse to enforce an exorbitant salvage agreement. See TOWAGE.

Claims for salvage are usually enforced in Courts having Admiralty jurisdiction.

II. By analogy, the term salvage is also used in cases which have nothing to do with maritime perils, but in which property has been preserved from loss by the last of several advances by different persons. In such a case, the person making the last advance is frequently entitled to priority over the others, on the ground that, without his advance, the property would have been lost altogether. This right, which is sometimes called that of equitable salvage, and is in the nature of a lien, is chiefly of importance with reference to payments made to prevent leases or policies of insurance from being forfeited, or to prevent mines and similar undertakings from being stopped or injured.

See CINQUE PORTS; PRIZE SALVAGE.

Salvage Money. Money paid as salvage. Officers and men of the Royal Navy get it for salvage services to ships other than king's ships.

Salvus plegius. Safepledge, or bail, for appearance. See Bracton, lib. 4, c. 2.

Sanction. In the original sense of the word a sanction is a penalty or punishment provided as a means of enforcing obedience to a law. In jurisprudence a law is said to have a sanction when there is a State which will intervene if it is disobeyed or disregarded. Therefore, international law has no legal sanction; and this was abundantly proved during and after the War of 1914-1918 to be so in practice.

Sanctuary. This meant any place in which neither the civil nor the criminal process of the law could be executed. But, against a man in sanctuary, civil proceedings could be taken and effect given to them, except by the taking of the defendant's body in execution.

Sanctuary originated in the ecclesiastical claim for immunity for all persons taking refuge in consecrated buildings or consecrated ground; and it was afterwards extended to various other places. Sanctuary (see ABJURATION) was finally abolished in 1623, but quasi-sanctuaries existed for nearly another hundred years: see PRIVILEGED PLACES, and, for an extended account, Mazzinglie, Sanctuaries (1887).

Sanctus Bell. At the Sanctus of the Mass (which is anterior to the Consecration and, therefore, also to the Elevation) a bell is rung at each of the three repetitions of the word "sanctus." In the modern development of the Communion Service in the Church of England, a bell is sometimes rung at the elevation of each of the Elements during the consecration prayer; it has been decided that it is illegal to fit the church bell so that, from inside the Church, it can be tolled for this purpose or, to use the words of the judgment, be used as a sanctus bell.

Sand Gavel. A payment made by tenants to their lord for liberty to dig gravel.

Sand Grouse. These are birds, frequenting sandy tracts in various parts of Europe, Asia and Africa, with feet feathered like those of the British grouse. They are not, however, grouse for legal purposes, nor, indeed, are they generally found in these islands. A number of them, having migrated over to England about 1888, were promptly exterminated; and the Sand Grouse Act, 1888, was passed for the protection of any future visitants; but none seem ever to have come since. The Act was of limited duration; but it has been extended from time to time by various Expiring Laws Continuance Acts.

Sanguinem emere. This, as regards villeins, meant to purchase freedom.

Sanitary Acts. The Public Health Act, 1875, s. 4, defines this expression as meaning the enactments specified in Schedule V., Pt. 1 of the Act, and repealed by s. 343.

Sanitary Authorities are bodies having jurisdiction over their respective districts in regard to sewerage, drainage, scavenging, the supply of water, the prevention of nuisances and offensive trades, etc., all of which come under the head of "sanitary matters" in the special sense of the word. Sanitary authorities also have jurisdiction in matters coming under the head of "local government" (q.v.). Urban sanitary authorities are the corporations or the urban district councils which respectively have jurisdiction in boroughs, towns, and urban districts (Public Health Act, 1875, s. 6; Local Government Act, 1894, s. 21 (2)). Rural sanitary authorities are the rural district councils which have jurisdiction in poor law parishes and unions not being within an urban district (Public Health Act, 1875, ss. 5, 9; Local Government Act, 1894, s. 21 (2)). A port sanitary authority is one having jurisdiction over a port (Public Health Act, 1875, s. 287; Public Health (Ports) Act, 1896). London is subject to special Acts, as to which, see PUBLIC HEALTH. See LOCAL BOARDS OF HEALTH; METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS; NUISANCE; RATE.

Sans ceo que. See WITHOUT THIS.

Sans frais. (Without expense.) Sometimes used as an equivalent for RETOUR SANS PROTÊT (q.v.).

Sans nombre, as applied to rights of common, means not a common for innumerable beasts, but for a number not certain, the limit being fixed by some other standard than that of number. Common of pasture in gross sans nombre is a right to turn on the common so many cattle as the common will maintain beyond the cattle of the lord and those who have common appendant and appurtenant there. As applied to common of pasture appurtenant, the term "sans nombre" can mean no more than that the measure of the right is levancy and couchancy (q.v.).

Sans recours. (Without recourse) (q.v.).

Sarcle. (To hoe.) The statute 25 Edw. 3, c. 1, speaks (in the English version) of the "time of sarcling."

Sark. One of the Channel Islands (q.v.).

Sarkellus. A medieval unlawful engine for taking fish.

Sart. An abbreviated form of "assart" (q.v.).

Satisfaction is the exhaustion of an obligation by performance (q.v.), or some act equivalent to performance. Thus, where a debt is due by one person to another, payment by the debtor or retainer by the creditor produces satisfaction of the debt. A judgment may be satisfied by payment or execution, and when this has been done the defendant is entitled to have satisfaction entered, upon the order of a master obtained ex parte at chambers on affidavit (P. M. R. (17); Ord. 61, rr. 26, 27).

In equity, the doctrine of satisfaction is chiefly made use of in cases where satisfaction is implied from the ambiguous acts or language of testators or settlors. Thus, if a parent bequeaths a legacy to a child by way of portion, and afterwards (e.g., upon the marriage of the child) gives him a sum by way of portion, the latter sum operates as a satisfaction of the former, either completely or pro tanto; that is, the child cannot claim the legacy on the death of the parent. So if a testator gives a legacy to his creditor, it operates as a satisfaction of the debt, provided that the legacy is equal to or greater than the debt, and that no contrary intention appears. Sometimes "satisfaction" is distinguished from "ademption" (q.v.), the former being applied to cases where a person has entered into an agreement or covenant to settle property on another, and afterwards gives that person an equal or greater benefit by his will, in such a manner that he must be presumed to have intended the gift to operate as a satisfaction of his agreement or covenant, and not to be an additional benefit; while "ademption" is the converse case of a person giving property by will and afterwards giving a similar benefit by deed impliedly in satisfaction of the former gift. The distinction lies in the difference between revocable and irrevocable instruments, and is of importance in this respect, that in cases of satisfaction the persons intended to be benefited have the right to elect which gift they will take, whereas in cases of ademption there is no such right.

See CUMULATIVE; DEBITOR NON, ETC.; ELECTION; PERFORMANCE.

Satisfied Term. See TERM.

Saturday's Stop. A popular name in the North of England of what is now known as the weekly close time for salmon. See CLOSE SEASON.

Saunkefin. (Sang qui fin.) Anciently this meant a failure of issue.

Saver Default. Anciently this meant to excuse default, as where a man having made default in appearance came afterwards and showed a good cause—such as the fact that he had been in prison when he should have appeared.

Savigny. Friedrich Carl von Savigny, the greatest modern jurist, was born 21st February, 1779, at Frankfort-on-the-Main; became professor at Marburg, Landshut and Berlin, where he was made minister for the revision of the statutes; and died 25th October, 1861. He founded the historical school of jurisprudence. His principal works are:—The Right of Possession (translated into English by Sir Erskine Perry); The Capacity of our Age for Legislation and Jurisprudence (translated into English by A. Hayward, under the title of "The Vocation of our Age, etc."); History of Roman Law in the Middle Ages; System of Modern Roman Law; and the Law of Obligations.

Savings Banks. There are (1) Trustee Savings Banks; (2) Post Office Savings Banks; (3) Military, Air Force and Naval Savings Banks, and certain other savings banks with a statutory origin (all of which are under Government control); and (4) voluntary savings banks not under Government control.

Trustee savings banks are regulated by a series of enactments commencing with the Trustee Savings Banks Act, 1863, and ending with the Trustee Savings Bank Act, 1918.

Post Office Savings Banks are regulated by another series of enactments, commencing with the Post Office Savings Bank Act, 1861, and ending with the Post Office Savings Bank Act, 1908.

Military Savings Banks were established pursuant to the Military Savings Bank Act, 1859, for the purpose of receiving deposits from non-commissioned officers and men of the Army. Naval Savings Banks, for ranks other than the commissioned ranks of the Navy and the Royal Marines, were established pursuant to the Naval Savings Bank Act, 1868. The Air Force (Application of Enactments) (No. 2) Order, 1918, made 7th May, 1918, applied the Military Savings Bank Act, 1859, to the Air Force, and so, amongst other things, authorised the establishment of savings banks for what is now the Royal Air Force.

A savings bank is an institution which receives small deposits at a fixed rate of interest and to a limited aggregate amount in any one year or in all. Thus, in the case of the Post Office Savings Bank the limits are £50 in one year and £200 in all.

Trustee Savings Banks are expressly forbidden by the Savings Banks Act, 1891, s. 1, to describe the Government as being responsible to depositors with them, but they are required to pay over to the Government the deposits which they receive; and the State, as the result of this, and of the system of inspection which exists, is really responsible to the depositors in such banks to practically the same extent as it is for deposits lodged in either the Post Office Savings Bank or in the savings banks maintained for the Army, etc. There has, however, been a great diminution in the number of trustee savings banks since the Post Office Savings Bank was established in 1861.

Under various statutes, there are also Railway Savings Banks for the men employed on railways: they are under the supervision of the Registrar of Friendly Societies. For seamen in the Merchant Service there are special savings banks regulated by ss. 148-154 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, so as to make the depositors secure. For the smallest depositors there are Penny Savings Banks, which were first recognised by s. 27 of the Savings Bank Investment Act, 1863, and which have since been the subject of such statutory regulation as, while not making them by any means as safe for depositors as is the Post Office (which also accepts very small sums), puts them on a different level from the voluntary savings banks. The latter include, of course, many perfectly respectable and solvent bodies, but they include also the "farthing clubs" and the "share-out clubs" which periodically come under public notice when a treasurer fails to repay the depositors.

Savour of. In the law, this means to partake of the character of. Thus personal estate consisting of an interest in or arising out of land is said to "savour of the realty."

Savoy. See PRIVILEGED PLACES.

Scabini. In a charter of Henry VIII., the wardens of King's Lynn are termed scabini.

Scalam, Ad. Payment was said to be by the scales (ad scalam) when, upon a payment into the Exchequer, sixpence was added to each twenty shillings in order to compensate for deficiency in weight: and this was said though no scales were used.

Scandal; Scandalous. In pleading, "scandal consists," as Mr. Daniell says, "in the allegation of anything which is unbecoming the dignity of the Court to hear, or is contrary to good manners, or which charges some person with a crime not necessary to be shown in the cause: to which may be added, that any unnecessary allegation, bearing cruelly upon the moral character of an individual, is also scandalous."

Scandalous matter in a pleading (Ord. 19, r. 27) or in an affidavit (Ord. 38, r. 11) is liable to be struck out.

Objection may be taken to an interrogatory on the ground that it is scandalous (Ord. 31, r. 6).

Scandalum magnatum. The making of defamatory statements regarding persons of high rank, such as peers, judges, or great officers of State, was anciently known as scandalum magnatum, and the person guilty of it was liable, not only in damages, but also to punishment under the statutes 3 Edw. 1, c. 34, 2 Rich. 2, c. 5, and 12 Rich. 2, c. 11. The action for damages lay, without proof of special damages, in respect of words which ordinarily were not actionable. Thus where a clergyman unwarily said from the pulpit: "The Lord of Leicester is a wicked and cruel man and an enemy to the Reformation," the Earl of Leicester recovered a verdict for £500. There have, however, been no proceedings for scandalum magnatum during the last two hundred years, and the statutes on the subject were all repealed in 1887.

Scavage. See PACKAGE.

Scavenger. In the City of London, and in several other of the unreformed corporations, "scavengers" were formerly included amongst the minor municipal officers. An Act introduced in 1695 was entitled, "An Act for exempting Apothecaries from serving as Constable, Scavenger, and other Parish and Ward Officers." The scavenger in this sense did not himself clean the streets, but he saw, or was supposed to see, that it was done. Thus in Aberystwith in 1835, churchwardens and overseers of the poor were selected for the office, and they got paupers to do the actual scavenging.

Sceat. In the Anglo-Saxon period this was a coin corresponding approximately to a penny.

Scharnpenny. A composition paid by some tenants for non-observance of the duty of penning their cattle at night in the lord's yard, as in some cases they were obliged to do for the benefit of the lord's manure pit.

Scheme. A scheme is a document containing provisions for regulating the management or distribution of property, or for making an arrangement between persons having conflicting rights. Thus, in the practice of the Chancery Division, where the execution of a charitable trust in the manner directed by the founder is difficult or impracticable, or requires supervision, a scheme for the management of the charity will be settled by the Court.

Under the Charitable Trusts Acts (q.v.), the Charity Commissioners are empowered to provisionally approved and certify schemes which cannot be carried into effect without the authority of Parliament, and report them to Parliament to be included in a general Act; but this is rarely done, as most schemes can be settled under the cy-près (q.v.) doctrine, either by the Commissioners, or by the Board of Education, or by the Chancery Division.

Under the Railway Companies Act, 1867, ss. 6-20, when a company is unable to meet its engagements with its creditors, the directors may prepare a scheme of arrangement between the company and the creditors, and file it in the Chancery Division; if it is assented to by three-fourths of each class of creditors and a majority of the shareholders, it may be confirmed by the Court and enrolled, and then has the force of an Act of Parliament.

See INCLOSURE.

Schetes. In the fifteenth century this meant usury: see Rot. Parl., 14 Rich. 2.

Schism Act. The popular title of the statute 13 Ann. c. 7.

School. The Elementary Education Act, 1870, defined (s. 3) an elementary school as one at which elementary education was the principal part of the education there given, but there is no definition, either in this Act or elsewhere, of the expression "elementary education," which therefore must be taken to have its ordinary colloquial meaning. The Education Act, 1921, s. 170 (1) enacts: "The expression 'elementary school' means (except in the case of courses of advanced instruction given in pursuance of this Act) a school or department of a school at which elementary education is the principal part of the education there given, and does not include any school or department of a school at which the ordinary payment in respect of the instruction from each scholar exceeds ninepence a week, or any school carried on as an evening school under the regulations of the Board of Education, or a continuation school." A public elementary school was defined by s 7 of the Act of 1870 as an elementary school at which a child, if the parent so desired, received no religious instruction, which was at all times open to inspection by the official inspectors, and which was conducted in accordance with the Education Code (q.v.): and s. 27 of the Education Act, 1921, is to the same effect. The expression "certified efficient school," includes a public elementary school (Education Act, 1921, s. 170 (2)); and also (if certified as efficient by the Board of Education) schools for blind, deaf, dumb, or epileptic children, workhouse schools, and any elementary schools not conducted for private profit (ib.).

As to other kinds of schools, see under EDUCATION. See also COUNCIL SCHOOL.

School Attendance Committee. A body formed, for the purpose indicated by its name, in every school district which was not within the jurisdiction of a school board (Elementary Education Act, 1876, s. 7 (2)). Its powers and duties were transferred in 1902 to the local education authority (q.v.) by the Education Act, 1902, s. 5.

School Boards. These were bodies corporate which were created by the Elementary Education Act, 1870, for the purpose of providing and conducting public elementary schools other than those provided by the various religious denominations and by private persons.

The school boards were elected in boroughs by the burgesses and elsewhere by the ratepayers. Their powers and duties were transferred in 1902 to the local education authorities (Education Act, 1902, s. 5).

School District. Under s. 4 and Schedule I. (both repealed by the Education Act, 1902) of the Elementary Education Act, 1870, England was divided into school districts consisting, in London, of the Metropolis, in boroughs, of the borough, and in parishes, of the parish. By Schedule III., par. 1, of the Education Act, 1902, it was provided that any reference to a school district should be construed as a reference to the area for which a local education authority (q.v.) acted. It will now be construed as a reference to the area for which the present local education authority acts.

Science and Art Department. This was, from its origin in 1837 down to 1856, a branch of the Board of Trade. In 1856, when the Education Department was formed, it became a branch of that department; but it received a charter of incorporation in 1864, and from that time it was practically a distinct department. Its place was, however, taken in 1899 by the Board of Education (Board of Education Act, 1899, s. 2 (1)), and it ceased to exist.

Scienter is an allegation in a pleading that the defendant or accused person did a thing knowingly. Thus, in an indictment for receiving stolen goods, the allegation that the prisoner knew them to have been stolen is called the scienter. So, where a person keeps an animal of a savage disposition, he is answerable for any injury it may do (even though he has done his best to keep it from doing harm), if reasonable ground can be shown for presuming that its ferocious character was known to him: this knowledge is technically called the scienter. See ANIMALS, LIABILITY FOR.

Scientia utrinque par pares contrahentes facit (3 Burr. 1910). (Equal knowledge on both sides makes the contracting parties equal.) That is to say, they are put on the footing essential to the conclusion of a valid contract of marine insurance, with regard to which the settled law is that the insurer has a right to know every material fact known to the insured, unless (Marine Insurance Act, 1906, s. 18 (c)) where disclosure is waived by the insurer.

Scilicet. This is used as meaning "to wit," "that is to say."

Scintilla juris. (A spark or fragment of right.) If a conveyance of land is made to A and his heirs to the use of B and his heirs until the happening of a certain event and then to the use of C and his heirs, the use is executed in B and his heirs, so that A has no seisin left in him. If then the event happens, who is seised to the use of C? Formerly it was supposed that on the happening of the event the original seisin reverted back to B, so that he was seised to the use of C, and that meantime a possibility of seisin, or scintilla juris, remained in him. This doctrine was always discountenanced by the best authorities, and was formally abolished by the Law of Property Amendment Act, 1860, s. 7

Scire facias. In proceedings in the High Court of Justice, a scire facias is a writ founded upon some record, such as a judgment, letters patent, etc., and directs the sheriff to make known to (scire facias) or warn the person against whom it is brought to show cause why the person bringing it should not have advantage of the record, or (as in the case of a scire facias to repeal letters patent, Crown grants, charters and franchises) why the record should not be annulled and vacated It is in all cases considered in law as an action, because the defendant may plead to it, but in some cases it is an original writ, while in others it is rather a writ of execution.

Formerly the writ always issued from the Court in which the record on which it was founded was supposed to remain, so that a scire facias on a judgment in the Queen's Bench would be issued out of the Court of Queen's Bench. At the present day, therefore, it would seem that such a scire facias would be brought in the King's Bench Division.

Scire facias is now rare, and the learning with regard to it is not of much practical importance. It is generally used only to repeal letters patent other than those for inventions; in case of further breaches after judgment in an action on a bond under the statute 8 & 9 Will. 3, c. 11; and under the Forfeiture Act, 1870, s. 27, in order to enforce orders and judgments against the estate of a convict.

If the sheriff executes the writ by warning the defendant, he returns scire feci ("I have caused to be warned"); if he does not warn him, he returns nihil. After the return the plaintiff enters a rule to appear (see RULE); if the defendant fails to appear, judgment goes against him by default. If, however, he appears, the plaintiff delivers a declaration praying execution, and the pleadings proceed as in an action at law under the old practice before the Judicature Act, 1873 (see PLEADING); every issue of fact on a scire facias is tried in the King's Bench Division.

A scire facias is an original action when it is issued to repeal letters patent; thus, if the King by his letters patent has granted one and the selfsame thing to several persons, the first patentee may sue out a scire facias to repeal the subsequent letters patent; or, when the King has been deceived or mistaken, he may by scire facias repeal his own grant. This does not apply to letters patent for an invention, scire facias with regard to which was abolished by the Patents, Designs and Trade Marks Act, 1883, s. 26 (1).

A scire facias was sometimes a continuation of a former action, being merely an interlocutory proceeding and in the nature of process or execution, as in the case of a scire facias quare executionem non (infra); sometimes a proceeding after the action had terminated, as in the case of a scire facias ad rehabendam terram (infra). The most important recent instance of a scire facias of this kind was where it was required to enforce a judgment against the shareholders of a company. By the Country Bankers Act, 1826, s. 13, the Chartered Companies Act, 1837, s. 24, the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and other Acts, if execution had been issued against a company subject to one of those Acts (e.g., a railway company), and the property was insufficient, a scire facias might (with certain limitations as to past members, the amount for which each shareholder was liable, obtaining leave of the Court, etc.) be issued against any of the shareholders, requiring them to show cause why execution should not be awarded against their property; but since 1883 the remedy of the creditor has been by way of an application under R. S. C., Ord. 42, r. 23.

The other kinds of scire facias in the nature of process or execution are either obsolete or very rare. Thus a simple application to the Court under Ord. 42, r. 23 has been substituted for the scire facias formerly required to revive a judgment, or to issue execution on a judgment of assets quando acciderint. (See JUDGMENT; REVIVAL.) The following are or were the principal kinds of scire facias having distinctive names: A scire facias ad rehabendam terram lies to enable a judgment debtor to recover back his lands taken under an elegit when the judgment creditor has satisfied or been paid the amount of his judgment (see ELEGIT); but simpler means are now available. A scire facias in the nature of execution is sometimes required by the Crown, e.g., to issue execution on an office found (q.v.); if it is determined in favour of the Crown, an extent may be issued. (See EXTENT.) Proceedings by way of scire facias upon recognizances were abolished by the Crown Office Rules, 1886, r. 127 (116 of the 1906 rules). Scire facias quare restitutionem non lies where execution on a judgment has been levied, but the money has not been paid over to the plaintiff, and the judgment is afterwards reversed on appeal; in such a case a scire facias is necessary before a writ of restitution can issue, but now, whether the money has or has not been paid over, restitution can be effected on an order of the Court which decides the appeal.

Scire facias ad audiendum errores and quare executionem non were writs used in proceedings in error, the first by the plaintiff, the second by the defendant in error, to compel the opposite party to plead; they are both obsolete, error (q.v.) in civil proceedings having been practically abolished in 1875.

Scire facias was sometimes employed in proceedings in the Mayor's Court of London. In proceedings in foreign attachment (q.v.), when a certain period had elapsed after the attachment had been served, the plaintiff was at liberty to issue a scire facias, which was a warning to the garnishee to appear to show cause why the plaintiff should not have execution of the money, etc. attached; the garnishee either appeared or suffered judgment to go by default. If in a suit in the Mayor's Court the defendant's property had been attached and execution issued against the garnishee, the defendant could not appear to the plaint in the ordinary course, because the proceedings in attachment were founded on his fictitious default in appearing to the plaint; and therefore, if he wished to dispute the plaintiff's claim, he had to issue a writ of scire facias ad disprobandum debitum: when the plaintiff had appeared to the writ the defendant declared, and the action proceeded as in ordinary cases unless the plaintiff prayed stet billa (q.v.).

Scire feci. See SCIRE FACIAS.

Scire Fieri Inquiry was a writ issued against an executor against whom judgment had been obtained for a debt due by his testator when the property of the testator had been found insufficient (technically when the sheriff had returned nulla bona to a fi. fa. de bonis testatoris without returning a devastavit), and the executor was supposed to have committed a devastavit. It commanded the sheriff that in case there should be no goods of the testator remaining in the hands of the executor, he should summon a jury to inquire if the defendant had wasted the goods of the testator; and if a devastavit were found, that he should warn the defendant to show cause why the plaintiff should not have a fieri facias de bonis propriis against him. The name is compounded of the names of the three proceedings, scire facias, fieri facias, and inquiry, of which the process consists. The writ is now obsolete. See DEVASTAVIT; FIERI FACIAS; JUDGMENT.

Scold. The old writers define this as meaning a troublesome and angry woman who, by her brawling and wrangling among her neighbours, broke the public peace and increased discord. Such a woman was anciently indictable at the sheriff's tourn (q.v.), where she was punishable with the cucking-stool (q.v.); but this jurisdiction is now obsolete.

Scotale. An alehouse kept by an officer of the forest, at which inhabitants of the forest had to drink in order to secure the favour of the officer. The keeping of such a house was prohibited by the Carta de Foresta (q.v.). The word is derived from scot, in the sense of a tax, and ale.

Scot and Lot. The inhabitants of a borough who were liable for the rates were anciently described as "paying scot and bearing lot" therein. The reference to such persons in s. 6 of the Disorderly Houses Act, 1751, is now read as a reference to inhabitant ratepayers.

The word "scot" was used alone as meaning a tax. Compare CHURCH SCOT; SCOTTARE; SCOTALE.

See ELECTORAL FRANCHISE.

Scotare; Scottare. To pay scots or customary dues; said anciently of tenants.

"Scraping the Defendant's Conscience." The amendment of the interrogatory part of the old Bill in Chancery in order to make the defendant give plain answers instead of the evasive answers previously given by him.

Scribere est agere (2 Rol. Rep. 89). (To write is to act): That is to say, to write anything is to do an overt act within the meaning of the law relating to treason, if the writing be published. In the case in which these words are cited the accused "inclosed son liver in a box sealed up and sic secretment conveyed it al Roy"—which was held to be publication of the manuscript.

Scrip. A scrip certificate (or shortly "scrip") is an acknowledgment by the projectors of a company or the issuers of a loan that the person named therein (or more commonly the holder for the time being of the certificate) is entitled to a certain specified number of shares, debentures, bonds, etc. It is usually given in exchange for the letter of allotment, and in its turn is given up for the shares, debentures or bonds which it represents. Scrip is chiefly used in the case of bonds and shares which are payable by instalments, so that they cannot be issued until all the instalments are paid; therefore as soon as bonds or shares have been allotted to a subscriber or applicant, a scrip certificate, certifying that, on due payment of the unpaid instalments, the bearer will be entitled to receive bonds or shares to the amount of the certificate, is given to the allottee (see ALLOT.) Scrip certificates are negotiable instruments.

There are companies (called scrip companies) in which the scrip is not required to be exchanged for shares, the scripholders being the shareholders. These "unincorporated companies with shares transferable by delivery" (to use the words of Lord Lindley) are, to quote Sir Francis Palmer "in contemplation of law nothing but great partnerships with some special features," and the members are liable in the same way as members of any other partnership.

"Scrip certificate" seems to be a contraction for "subscriptions certificate," that is, a certificate of the amount subscribed for by the applicant.

See COMPANY.

Script, in probate practice, is a will, codicil, draft of will or codicil, or written instructions for the same. If the will is destroyed, a copy or any paper embodying its contents becomes a script, even though not made under the direction of the testator. See AFFIDAVIT.

Scriptæ obligationes scriptis tolluntur, et nudi consensus obligatio contrario consensu dissolvitur (Jur. Civ.). (Written obligations are superseded by writings, and an obligation of naked assent is dissolved by naked assent to the contrary.) Compare QUOMODO, ETC.

Scrivener. A scrivener was one who received the money of his clients for investment. Pending its investment, he could use it for his own purposes without having to account for any profits which he might make. He, like a banker, traded in money, and, like other traders, he could be made a bankrupt under the statute 21 Jac. 1, c. 19, s. 2; but it was decided in 1814 that an attorney who occasionally acted as a scrivener could not, qua scrivener, be made a bankrupt.

Scriveners ceased to exist as a separate class about 1760. Sched. I. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, however, included amongst traders "persons using the trade or profession of a scrivener, receiving other mens monies or estates into their trust or custody." But though there are now no scriveners eo nomine, the Scriveners Company of the City of London still exists; and any notary who practises within its jurisdiction must take up the freedom of the Company (Public Notaries Act, 1801, s. 13) at a cost of, in some cases, £6 16s. 3d. and, in others, £14 14s. This explains the fact that there are approximately fifty members of the Company. The jurisdiction of the Company extends over the City of London, the Liberties of Westminster—its hall is at 56, Victoria Place, S.W. 1—the Borough of Southwark, and the area within three miles of the City of London (Public Notaries Act, 1801, s. 13).

Scrope's Inn. See SERJEANTS-AT-LAW.

Scruple. See APOTHECARIES' WEIGHT.

Scrutiny. A scrutiny is an inquiry into the validity of the votes recorded for the successful candidate at an election—whether parliamentary, municipal or local government—and may be claimed if the unsuccessful candidate alleges in his petition that he has in fact a majority of lawful votes. It involves a trial of the validity of each vote objected to.

Sculpture. The work of a sculptor is "artistic work," and is the subject of copyright. See the Copyright Act, 1911, s. 35.

Scutage. Escuage (q.v.).

Scutagio habendo. A writ which anciently lay to enforce the performance of the service obligatory on one who held by escuage (q.v.).

Scute. A fifteenth-century French gold coin worth one-half of the English noble (q.v.): see Rot. Parl. 1 Hen. 6.

Scyldwit. Used in Leg. Hen. 1, as meaning a pecuniary penalty for any wrongdoing.

Sea. See HIGH SEAS; KING'S CHAMBERS; NAVIGATION; TERRITORIAL WATERS. As to the seashore, see FORESHORE; as to sea-walls, see FRONTAGE.

Seal. The formality of affixing a seal to a document is one of the oldest modes of expressing the intention to be bound by it, derived from the times when few persons could sign their own names. It is still a solemn mode of expressing assent to a written instrument, and when done with that intention makes the instrument a deed: the intention is generally expressed by the additional formality of delivery (q.v.; and see DEED; EXECUTION; SIGN).

Every corporation aggregate must have a common seal (see, for instance, the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, s. 63 (1) (b)), for being an invisible body, it cannot manifest its intention by any personal act or discourse, but only acts and speaks by its common seal (see ss. 76, 78, 79 of the same Act), except where it is represented by an officer, agent or attorney, and in a few cases where it would be inconvenient to require the seal, e.g., in everyday matters of business.

As to the seals of the Crown, see GREAT SEAL; PRIVY SEAL: also SIGN MANUAL; SIGNET.

As to the forgery of seals, see the Forgery Act, 1913, s. 5.

Seal Day. Formerly this meant motion day in the Court of Chancery. On motion day the Great Seal was brought into Court for the purpose of sealing motion papers.

Sealer. An officer of the Court of Chancery who sealed writs, etc. According to the Sealer of the year 1798, his attendance was "Perpetual"; he did business at "All Hours" and he had "No Holidays" (Commons Committees Reports, 1803, Vol. 13, p. 252): but nevertheless he, along with the Deputy Sealer and the Chaff Wax (q.v.) and the Deputy Chaff Wax, was abolished by s. 23 of the Court of Chancery Act, 1852. See SPIGURNEL.

Sea Letter; Sea Brief. A document which must be carried by every neutral vessel in waters where she is liable to meet the warship of any nation which is at war with another. It is issued by the Government of the State to which the neutral ship belongs, and specifies the name of the master, the name and description of the vessel, her cargo, the port of departure and the port of destination. It is used to protect her from capture.

Seal Fishery Act, 1875. By an Order in Council dated 5th February, 1876, made (in conjunction with certain foreign States) in pursuance of this statute, a close season, beginning 1st January and ending 2nd April in every year, was established for seals of all kinds in an area along and off the east coast of Greenland. Compare GREY SEAL.

Sealing Up. Where a party to an action has been ordered to produce a document, part of which is either irrelevant to the matters in question or is privileged from production, he may, by leave of the Court, seal up that part, if he makes an affidavit stating that it is irrelevant or privileged. The sealing up is generally done by fastening pieces of paper over the part with gum or wafers. But where books are in constant use the party producing them will, as a matter of convenience, be allowed merely to cover up the irrelevant or the privileged parts during the inspection, subject, if so required, to his making an affidavit that nothing relevant has been covered up.

Seal Paper. Before the Judicature Acts there was issued before the commencement of each of the sittings a list—known as the Seal Paper—specifying the business to be done each day in the Courts of the Lord Chancellor, the Master of the Rolls, the Lords Justices, and the Vice-Chancellors.

Seamen. The principal statutory enactments for the protection of seamen are those contained in the portions of the Merchant Shipping Acts (q.v.) requiring agreements for service on board ship to contain certain particulars, and requiring vessels to carry proper provisions, water, lime or lemon juice, and medicines. The enactments with regard to wages, advance notes, etc., are referred to under title ALLOT and ADVANCE NOTE; those with regard to unseaworthy ships are referred to under title SEAWORTHINESS.

For the purpose of the Merchant Shipping Acts, the term seaman includes everyone employed in any capacity on board ship except masters, pilots, and duly indentured and registered apprentices (Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 742). The effect of the Employers' Liability Act; 1880, s. 8, and the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, s. 13, is to exclude "seamen" from the operation of the Act of 1880; but the term seamen is not defined in either the Act of 1875 or in that of 1880, and must be read in its ordinary colloquial meaning, which is much less comprehensive than that given to it by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. Seamen, as well as masters and apprentices, are within the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (see s. 7), provided that they are workmen as defined in s 13 of that Act, which gives the word seaman the same meaning as the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894; and special provisions with regard to them, and also with regard to masters and apprentices, are contained in the National Insurance Act, 1911, s. 48, as amended by the National Health Insurance Act, 1918, s. 27.

Search. In international law, the right of search is the right on the part of ships of war to visit and search merchant vessels during war, in order to ascertain whether the ship or cargo is liable to seizure. Resistance to visitation and search by a neutral vessel makes the vessel and cargo liable to confiscation.

Numerous treaties regulate the manner in which the right of search must be exercised. See CONTRABAND.

Searchers. Officials, known by this name, were appointed under the statute 9 Edw. 3, st. 2, c. 9, to see that no sterling or bullion should be exported, and that no base money should be imported at the various ports.

The term was also applied generally to officers appointed to search ships, etc., for dutiable or contraband goods: see, for instance, the statute 11 Hen. 7, c. 13 See AULNAGER; CUSTOMER; TRONOUR.

Searches. On a contract for the sale of real estate, it is usual for the purchaser, before the completion of the purchase, to examine certain records and registers for the purpose of seeing whether they contain notice of any fact affecting the title to the property. This is called searching for incumbrances. The searches generally made are for judgments, writs, orders, bankruptcies, lites pendentes, deeds of arrangement, executions and annuities; also a general search in the Land Registry (if the land is registered), and in the customary court rolls (if the property is copyhold). Sometimes also the register of bills of sale is searched, if any doubt exists as to the pecuniary circumstances of the vendor; and in appropriate cases, search will be made for disentailing assurances or in the index of certificates of acknowledgment by married women Similarly on the sale or mortgage of a ship, the register of ships is searched, to ascertain the condition of the title.

See ANNUITY; JUDGMENT; LIS PENDENS; LAND CHARGE; LAND REGISTRIES.

Search Warrant. At common law this is an order under the hand of a justice of the peace authorising a person therein named to enter a specified building and to seize certain specified goods; and it can be issued only on a sworn information to the effect that the applicant believes that the property in question has been stolen and is in such building. A similar warrant may be issued under s. 103 of the Larceny Act, 1861, to search for property in respect of which it is sworn that an offence under that Act, or under the Larceny Act, 1916, has been committed.

Such a warrant must be in the possession of the person executing it. He can, if need be, enter by force, but he should first demand admission.

Under very many Acts, search warrants may be issued to search for many things ranging from adulterated bread to explosives, or to search for persons such as gamblers in a gaming house or girls detained in a brothel.

Sea-reeve. In ancient times this, according to Spelman, was one who in a seaport looked after the maritime jurisdiction of the lord, kept the foreshore clean, and collected wreck.

Seashore. See FORESHORE.

Seaworthiness. The question whether a ship is or was at a given time seaworthy is chiefly of importance with reference to the liability of the owner and the underwriters or insurers in the event of her loss. In this use of the term, " seaworthiness " means that the vessel is in a fit state, at the time of sailing, as to repair, equipment, and crew, and in all other respects, to encounter the ordinary perils of the voyage insured. Where there is no agreement to the contrary, a shipowner who contracts for the conveyance of merchandise in his ship, or contracts for her insurance, impliedly warrants that she is seaworthy; that is to say, if she is lost, and it turns out that she was not seaworthy at the time of sailing, in the one case the owner is liable to the owner of the goods for their loss, and in the other case the insurers or underwriters are discharged from liability under the policy, notwithstanding the bona fides and honesty of the shipowner.

If, in the course of proceedings for desertion, it is alleged by one-fourth or, if the crew is over twenty, by five, of the seamen belonging to a ship that by reason of unseaworthiness, overloading, defective equipment, or the like, she is not in a fit condition to go to sea, the Court having cognisance of the case may have the ship surveyed (Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 463). A naval Court (q.v.) may order a survey of any ship which is the subject of investigation (s. 483 (1) (j)).

Provision is made by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, Part III., for the proper equipment and survey of ships in the interest of passengers.

Every person who sends or attempts to send, or is party to the sending of, or takes a ship to sea in an unseaworthy state, so as to endanger the life of any person on board, is guilty of a misdemeanour, unless he proves that he used all reasonable means to make her seaworthy (Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 457).

Seck is technically applied to certain services and obligations to signify that they create no tenure between the person from whom and the person to whom they are due, as opposed to what Coke calls those services of " homage, fealty, and escuage, which cannot become secke or dry, but make tenure whereunto distresses, escheats and other profits be incident." At the present day, the term is hardly ever used except in the phrase "rent seck." See RENT.

Secondary. See CONVEYANCE; EVIDENCE; USE. The Secondary of the City of London or, more shortly, the Secondary, is a permanent officer of the Corporation. He holds also the office of High Bailiff of Southwark and receives a salary of £1,300 a year. He occupies a position analogous to that of a sub-sheriff, and he performs, in the name of the sheriffs, duties which would elsewhere devolve upon the sub-sheriff. Down to 1871 there were two Secondaries; now there is only one. Except in the City of London the office of Secondary is obsolete, but formerly an officer immediately subordinate to a principal officer was commonly described as a Secondary, there being the Secondary of the Fine Office, the Secondary of the Office of Privy Seal, etc. There is now the deputy chairman of the Board of Customs and Excise; such an officer, if the ancient terminology were still used, would be the Secondary of the Board of Customs and Excise.

Second Deliverance. See REPLEVIN.

Secretary at War. This was an official whose office dates from the reign of Charles II. He was always a member of one House of Parliament or the other, and had some control over Army finances. He is to be distinguished from the Secretary of State (q.v.) for War, who took over his duties when the Colonial Office was formed in 1854. The office of Secretary at War was formally abolished by the Secretary at War Abolition Act, 1863.

Secretary of Bankrupts. An officer of the Lord Chancellor's. He was abolished by the statute 15 & 16 Vict. c. 77, s. 2.

Secretary of Decrees and Injunctions. One of the officials of the Court of Chancery whose office was abolished by the Court of Chancery Act, 1852, s. 23. The duties were performed in 1798 by a firm of law stationers, who acted as deputies for the holders of the office (Commons Committees Reports, 1803, Vol. 13, p. 260).

Secretary of Presentations. See PRESENTATION OFFICE.

Secretary of State. Acts of Parliament frequently speak of "the Secretary of State" as if there were only one. But the expression means "one of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State for the time being," unless a contrary intention appears (Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 12 (3)). The Principal Secretaries of State are those for the Home Department, for Foreign Affairs, for the Colonies, for the War Department, for Air, and for India. Not more than five of them, and not more than five of their under-secretaries—each of them has a parliamentary under-secretary—may sit in the House of Commons at the same time (Government of India Act, 1858, s. 4.; Air Force (Constitution) Act, 1917, s. 11). The offices of the Principal Secretaries of State are all included in Sched. H. to the Representation of the People Act, 1867. See OFFICE OF PROFIT.

The first Secretary of State whom we know of was John Maunsell, in the reign of Henry III. The title Principal Secretary of State first occurs in 1476 Soon afterwards the Secretary of State ceased to be a mere writer of the royal orders and became a minister. The Secretary of State for the Home Department — better known as the Home Secretary—is the lineal official descendant of the original Secretary of State, and exercises all of his functions which have not been specifically transferred to the Secretaries of State other than the Home Secretary. Until 1539 there was but one Principal Secretary of State; for the next two hundred years there were only two, one for the Northern Department, who was concerned with the Northern European Powers, and the other, for the Southern Department, who was concerned with the other European Powers, domestic affairs, Ireland and the Colonies.

From 1707 to 1746 there was a third Secretary of State, this being the Secretary of State for Scotland; and from 1768 to 1782 there was a fourth Secretary, this being the Secretary of State for the Colonies, the latter being, as regards the "plantations" (q.v.) the successor of the Board of Trade and Plantations (see BOARD OF TRADE), and being himself replaced in 1782 by the Home Secretary.

In 1782 the Northern Department became the Foreign Office, and the Southern Department became the Home Office with Ireland and the Colonies under its charge. A Secretary of State for War was created in 1794, the Colonies being put under his care. In 1854 two more Secretaries of State, one for India and the other for the Colonies, were created, the Secretary for War being left with only the Army to look after; the Secretary of State for Air was created by the Air Force (Constitution) Act, 1917, s. 8; and that made up the six Secretaries of State now existing.

Down to 1921 the Home Office was, in theory, the channel of communication between the Crown and the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, who, in theory, was responsible for the government of that country, but the Home Office had in fact nothing to do with Ireland.

In a well-known annual publication, the Secretary for Scotland is given as one of the Principal Secretaries of State; this is, however, a mistake.

Each Secretary of State can do anything which any one of the others is empowered to do; but for purposes of administrative convenience each of them confines himself to such matters as properly appertain to his own department.

Secretary of the Briefs. An officer (receiving about £80 a year in fees) of the old Court of Chancery whose duty it was to make out "briefs" for applicants (Commons Committees Reports, 1803, Vol. 13, p. 262). The brief was a process commanding the sheriff to summon or attach a defendant: see Termes de la Ley.

Secret Profits. Profits made by an agent (q.v.), as such, for which he has not accounted to his principal.

Secret Trusts. Where a testator gives property to a person, on a verbal promise by the legatee or devisee that he will hold it in trust for another person, this is called a secret trust. The rule is, that if the secret trust would have been valid as an express trust, it will be enforced against the legatee or devisee, while if it would have been invalid as an express trust, e.g., by contravening the provisions of the Mortmain Act, the gift fails altogether, so that neither the devisee or legatee, nor the object of the trust, takes any benefit by it.

Secta, literally, means a following. The word was chiefly used to denote a service, due by custom or prescription, which obliged the inhabitants of a particular place to make use of a mill, oven, kiln or similar structure (secta ad molendinum, ad furnum, ad torrale, etc.). In such a case the owner of the mill, oven or kiln, had an action against any inhabitant who "withdrew his suit," that is, went to another mill, oven or kiln. The theory was that the mill or other structure had been erected by the ancestors of the owner for the convenience of the inhabitants, on condition that they should use it to the exclusion of any other.

In the old common law practice, secta meant the followers or witnesses whom the plaintiff brought into Court with him to prove his case. The actual production of the secta has been disused since the reign of Edward III.; but the declaration in every action contained a fictitious statement on the subject, until comparatively modern times.

Secta ad curiam, De. A writ which anciently lay against one who failed to perform suit at the Sheriff's County Court or at the Court Baron.

Secta curiæ. Suit and service done by tenants at the Court of the lord.

Secta facienda per illam qui habet enitiam partem, De. A writ which lay to compel the eldest of coparceners to perform suit and service for the others. The eldest had the enitia pars (q.v.).

Secta regalis. The obligation to attend twice a year at the Sheriff's Tourn, which was in theory the King's Leet.

Secta unica tantum facienda pro pluribus hæreditatibus. A writ under which a man was exempted from doing more than one suit and service in respect of lands which he held of one lord, not as the heir of one, but as the heir of several.

Sectis non faciendis, De. A writ of exemption from suit and service which lay for a doweress.

Secunda superoneratione pasturæ, De. This was a writ which lay where one against whom a writ of admeasurement had been sued out again surcharged the common (Stat. West. 2, 13 Edw. 1, c. 8). See SURCHARGE.

Secundum naturam est, commoda cujusque rei eum sequi, quem sequuntur incommoda (D. 50, 17, 10). (It is natural that the advantages of anything should follow him whom the disadvantages follow.) This is practically the same as Qui sentit, etc.

Secured Creditor. See CREDITOR.

Secured Debts. See DEBT.

Securitatem inveniendi quod se non divertat ad partes exteras sine licentia regis, De. Anciently the king could issue against any man a writ requiring him to "find security that he would not betake himself to foreign parts without licence from the king." It was superseded by the writ of Ne exeat regno (q.v.).

Securitate pacis, De. This writ of security for the peace anciently issued out of the Chancery for anyone threatened with death or bodily harm by another. The modern procedure is to bind to the peace before a justice.

Security.—I. A security is something which makes the enjoyment or enforcement of a right more secure or certain.

A. With reference to its nature, a security is either a personal security; or a security on property (called in jurisprudence a real security); or a judicial security.

(1) A personal security consists in a promise tion of the prerogative right to seigniorage never arose in connection with it.

Seignory.—I. A seignory is the relation of a feudal lord to his tenant, and to the land held by him. Thus, if before the statute of Quia Emptores (q.v.), A, a tenant in fee simple, conveyed his land to B to hold of A as his tenant, then A's rights against B in respect of services, fealty, etc., and his interest in the land in the event of an escheat or forfeiture by B or his successors in title, would constitute a seignory. Since the statute of Quia Emptores no seignory can be created. Owing to the feudal incidents of tenure (fealty, etc.) having now become obsolete, and to the rent services anciently reserved having become almost valueless, seignories in freehold land are seldom of any practical importance; in most cases indeed they cannot be traced. (See MORTMAIN.) Consequently almost the only seignories now in existence are those of lords of manors, for a manor does not exist unless there are at least two free tenants, that is, tenants of freehold land forming part of the manor who hold of the lord by a service of some kind. Hence a manor is sometimes said to consist of demesnes and seignories.

A seignory is sometimes distinguished by the services incident to it, e.g., a seignory by fealty and rent-service; or by the position of the lord, e.g., seignories paramount and mesne seignories. (See MESNE; PARAMOUNT.) A seignory may also be either appendant, that is, attached to a manor; or in gross, when it has been severed from the manor to which it originally belonged. On the conveyance of a manor the seignories appendant to it pass with it, a seignory in gross must be conveyed by a deed of grant, a seignory being an incorporeal hereditament. Originally, a seignory differed but little from a reversion.

II. Seignory sometimes means the land or district over which the rights of the lord extend. Compare FRANCHISE; LIBERTY.

Seised in Demesne as of Fee. See DEMESNE.

Seisin; Seised. Seisin is feudal possession; in other words, it is the relation in which a person stands to land or other hereditaments, when he has in them an estate of freehold in possession; such a person is said to be seised of the land. "Seisin" is opposed (1) to "possession," which, in its technical sense, is only applied to leaseholds and other personal property; and (2) to "occupation," which signifies actual possession. See OCCUPATION; POSSESSION.

With reference to its nature, seisin is either actual, or in law. Actual seisin, or seisin in deed, is where the freeholder is himself in possession or occupation of the land, or where it is occupied by a person claiming under him, and not having an estate of freehold in the land, e.g., a lessee for years. Seisin in law is that seisin which an heir has when his ancestor dies intestate seised of land, and neither the heir nor any other person has taken actual possession of the land. Thus, if a man has two farms, Blackacre and Whiteacre, the former of which he lets to a tenant for years, and the latter he occupies himself, then, on his death intestate, his heir has actual seisin of Blackacre from the moment of the death, because the possession of the tenant is looked upon as the possession of the freeholder; but of Whiteacre the heir has merely a seisin in law until he enters and takes possession, and then he has actual seisin of Whiteacre too. The term "seisin in law" is sometimes applied to the interest of a reversioner or remainderman expectant on an estate of freehold, but inaccurately, because the seisin is in the tenant of the estate of freehold. Actual seisin of incorporeal hereditaments is obtained by exercising the rights of which they consist, e.g., receiving a rentcharge or presenting to an advowson.

With reference to the nature of the property, a tenant in fee simple is said to be seised in his demesne as of fee "of such things whereof a man may have a manuall occupation, possession or receipt, as of lands, tenements, rents and such like. . . But of such things which do not lie in such manuall occupation, etc., as of an advowson of a church and such like, there he shall say that he was seised as of fee and not in his demesne as of fee." The distinction was of importance only under the old system of pleading. See DEMESNE.

Since the abolition of the rules as to descent cast and "seisina facit stipitem" (q.v.), and the introduction of modern forms of conveyance, which do not require livery of seisin (q.v.), the doctrine of seisin has lost almost all its importance. Under the old law, when an heir obtained seisin of land on the death of his ancestor, and then himself died intestate, the land went to his heirs and not to the heirs of his ancestor. This was called a "mesne seisin," because it was intermediate between the two deaths, and the heir was called a "mesne heir" or "mesne person." See POSSESSIO FRATRIS.

Another kind of seisin was the "simple seisin" spoken of by Britton (178 b), namely, that nominal or formal possession which a lord was entitled to take on the death of a tenant in fee simple in order to assert his right of seignory, as opposed to the full or beneficial seisin of the tenant's heir. This has long been obsolete.

Quasi-seisin is the possession which a copyholder has of the land to which he has been admitted. The freehold in copyhold lands being in the lord, the copyholder cannot have seisin of them in the proper sense of the word, but he has a customary or quasi-seisin, analogous to that of a freeholder.

Equitable seisin is analogous to legal seisin, that is, it is seisin of an equitable estate in land. Thus, a mortgagor is said to have equitable seisin of the land by receipt of the rents. See DISSEISIN; POSSESSION. Actual possession, clothed with the receipt of the rents and profits, is the highest instance of an equitable seisin.

Seisina facit stipitem (Fleta, 6; c. 14), in the law of descent means "seisin makes the stock of descent." The old rule used to be that when a person died intestate as to his land, it descended to the heir of the person who was last seised of it. Now descent is traced from the last purchaser. See DESCENT; NON JUS, ETC.

Seisina habenda, De. The fuller title of this writ was De seisina habenda quia rex habuit annum, diem, et vastum. (For having seisin because the King is entitled to a year, a day and waste.) This was the writ by which the king anciently enforced his right to year, day and waste (q.v.).

Seisin, Covenant for. In a conveyance of an estate in fee simple this was a covenant to the effect that the vendor was, at the date of the conveyance, seised of a good and indefeasible estate of inheritance in fee simple. This came in course of time to be generally omitted, as it was always followed by a covenant for the right to convey in fee simple; and the latter covenant was in itself sufficient for all purposes. See COVENANT.

Seizure. In the law of copyholds, seizure is where the lord of copyhold lands takes possession of them in default of a tenant. It is either seizure quousque, or absolute seizure. When a copyhold tenant dies intestate, his heir is bound to come to the lord for admittance within a certain time, and pay the fine on admittance; if he does not appear, the lord may seize the land quousque (i.e., "until" he does appear), and enjoy the rents and profits in the meantime. Where the lord seizes land for a forfeiture, escheat, etc., this is an absolute seizure. The lord may also take heriots by seizure, and the same remedy is given for things which lie in franchise, as waifs, wrecks, estrays, etc.

In the law of procedure, seizure is sometimes a species of execution. Thus, a sheriff executes a writ of fi. fa. by taking possession of the chattels of the debtor. (See FIERI FACIAS.) Seizure also takes place when goods are confiscated as a punishment for smuggling or carrying contraband of war.

Selborne's Act, Lord. A popular title of the Powers of Appointment Act, 1874.

Selden. John Selden was born in 1584, and died in 1654. He wrote Mare clausum, in reply to the De mari libero of Grotius (q.v.); Dissertatio historica ad Fletam; Notes on Fortescue; and numerous other works on tithes, titles of honour, etc.

Select Committee. See COMMITTEE.

Self-defence. See HOMICIDE.

Self-raising Flour. See BREAD.

Selion. This seems to have been the strip of uncultivated land lying between the parts of open fields which, before the general enclosure of the country, were allotted to different persons.

Semble. "It appears." Used in judgments and text-books to introduce a proposition of law which is not intended to be stated definitely.

Semper in dubiis benigniora præferenda (11 Moo. P. C. C. 343). (In doubtful matters the more liberal construction should always be preferred.) This, said Lord Justice Knight Bruce, "we believe as true in the law of England as it was in the Roman law."

Semper in obscuris, quod minimum est sequimur (D. 50, 17, 9). (In obscure matters we should always follow that which is the least obscure.) But where the words of a document are obscure to such a degree that they have no meaning, the Court will not invent a meaning. Compare AMBIGUITY.

Semper ita fiat relatio ut valeat dispositio (6 Rep. 76). (A word is, if possible, always made to relate back to antecedent words in such a way as to give effect to a disposition in a will.) This maxim is part of a much longer maxim quoted in connection with the construction of a will.

Semper paratus. (Always ready.) In an action of assumpsit (q.v.) the form in which tender was pleaded was known as a semper paratus. Compare UNCORE PRIST.

Semper præsumitur pro legitimatione puerorum. (It is always to be presumed that children are legitimate.) This dictum is a condensed version of passages from Bracton which are quoted at Co. Litt. 126. Compare FILIATIO NON, ETC.

Semper præsumitur pro negante (10 Cl. & F. 907). (The presumption is always in favour of the negative)—when a Court is equally divided. See PARIBUS SENTENTIIS, ETC.

Semper specialia generalibus insunt (D. 50, 17, 147). (Specialities are always included in generalities.) Compare GENERALIA SPECIALIBUS, ETC.; SPECIALIA GENERALIBUS, ETC.; MAJUS CONTINET, ETC.

Seneschal. A steward. We read of the High Seneschal, that is to say, the Lord High Steward (q.v.), and the Seneschal de la Hotel de Roy, that is to say, the Lord Steward of the King's Household. (q.v.).

Seneschallo et mareshallo quod non teneant placita de libero tenemento. A writ which lay to the Court of the Marshalsea (q.v.) prohibiting it from entertaining any action relating to freehold.

Senior. The expression "senior counsel" (or "senior") means a barrister who is a King's Counsel. Compare JUNIOR.

Sentence, in ecclesiastical procedure, is analogous to judgment (q.v.) in an ordinary action. A definitive sentence is one which puts an end to the suit, and regards the principal matter in question. An interlocutory sentence determines only some incidental matter in the proceedings.

"Sentence" is commonly used to signify the judgment in a criminal proceeding. See JUDGMENT.

Upon a conviction on indictment of several offences, whether on separate indictments or on separate counts in the one indictment, the Court may, in general, order that the sentences be either consecutive or concurrent; but sentences of imprisonment and of penal servitude cannot be concurrent. Upon summary conviction at the one time of several offences, justices may order that not more than two terms of imprisonment be consecutive (Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, s. 25), but if the sentences are for assaults they may not in the aggregate exceed six months (Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 18).

See DECREE.

Sententia contra matrimoniam nunquam transit in rem judicatam (7 Rep. 43). (A sentence against marriage never becomes res judicata.) But this maxim is cited merely in argument, and it is, in fact, the reverse of the truth; for the judgment of a matrimonial Court is conclusive.

Sententia interlocutoria revocari potest, definitiva non potest (Bac. Max. Reg. 20). (An interlocutory sentence may be recalled, but not a final.) This is a rule of the civil law which is quoted to illustrate ACTUS INCEPTUS, ETC.

Sententia non fertur de non liquidis (Jenk. Cent. 7). (A Court does not decide except upon clearly defined points.) Compare OPORTET, ETC.

Separate Estate; Separate Use. Separate estate, or property belonging to a woman to her separate use, is property which belongs to a married woman as if she were a feme sole. The doctrine of separate estate may be described generally as giving a married woman the power of acting with respect to her separate property as if she were a feme sole; thus she is entitled to the income of it, and may dispose of it by deed or will, and mortgage or charge it without the concurrence or consent of her husband, unless she is restrained from anticipation or alienation. (See ANTICIPATION; RESTRAINT ON ALIENATION.) Her separate estate is liable for all engagements contracted by her with reference to and on the credit of it. See ENGAGEMENT.

Property may become the separate estate of a married woman either by provision of the party or under a statute. It may be settled upon her, or devised, bequeathed or otherwise given to her to her separate use, whether by a stranger or by her husband, and whether it is given to trustees for her or not, and whether it is given to her absolutely or subject only to a power of appointment by her. Where the legal estate in the property is vested in the husband, he is a trustee for her. Property becomes the separate estate of a married woman by statute (i) under the Married Women's Property Acts; (ii) under a decree of judicial separation (q.v.); (iii) under a protection order (q.v.); or (iv) under a separation order (q.v.).

Now, under s. 2 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, every woman married after 1st January, 1883, holds as her separate property everything which she had before marriage or acquired after it: and under s. 5, every woman married before the same date holds as her separate property everything her title to which accrued due after that date.

Where property is given to a married woman to her separate use absolutely (that is, without a limitation over after her death), and she dies without having disposed of it, her husband takes it jure mariti. See JUS MARITI.

As to the separate estate of partners, see JOINT.

See COVERTURE; ENGAGEMENT; USE.

Separation. A provision or agreement for the future separation of a husband and wife is void, being in derogation of the marriage contract. See DEROGATION.

An agreement for immediate separation is valid, because it is made to meet a state of things which, however undesirable in itself, has in fact become inevitable. An agreement of this kind generally takes the form of a separation deed.

See JUDICIAL SEPARATION; SEPARATION ORDER.

Separation Deed. Owing to the rule that a wife cannot in general contract with her husband, the deed is made between the husband and a trustee for the wife, and generally contains provisions for the allowance by the husband of an annuity for the wife, for his indemnification by the trustee against the wife's debts, for the custody and education of the children, etc. It follows from the nature of a separation deed, that it is avoided by subsequent reconciliation and cohabitation, but while it remains in force, it is a bar to a suit for restitution of conjugal rights.

Separation Order. Where a husband is convicted of an aggravated assault (q.v.) upon his wife, or has deserted her (see DESERTION), she may obtain from a Court of summary jurisdiction an order popularly known as a separation order (Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, s. 4), as to the terms of which, see DESERTION. And either a husband or a wife may obtain such an order on the ground that the other of them is a habitual drunkard within the meaning of the Habitual Drunkards Act, 1879, s. 3 (Licensing Act, 1902, s. 5). Where the order is made in favour of the wife and gives her custody of any child it may (in addition to the provisions mentioned under DESERTION) include a provision that the husband shall pay not more than ten shillings a week for the maintenance of each such child until it attains the age of sixteen (Married Women (Maintenance) Act, 1920).

Septuagesima Sunday. The Sunday which is twenty-one days before Quadragesima Sunday (q.v.).

Sequatur suo sub periculo. A writ (the title of which meant "Let him come or take the consequences") anciently used where three successive summonses ad warrantizandum (to warranty (q.v.)) had been ineffectual.

Sequela causæ. A cause or action.

Sequela curiæ. Anciently this meant suit of Court, that is to say, the Court of the lord.

Sequela villanorum. Everything that villeins (q.v.) had. Where a lord sold his villein he sold "nativum meum cum tota sequela sua" and the sequela included the children of the villein.

Sequendum et prosequendum. Anciently this meant to prosecute a cause or action. Thus a guardian was admitted "ad prosequendum" for his ward.

Sequestrari facias is a writ issued for the purpose of enforcing a judgment against a beneficed clergyman, when a fi. fa. has been issued and returned nulla bona (Ord. 43, r. 3). It commands the bishop (see Ord. 43, r. 4) of the diocese to enter into the benefice and sequester the rents, tithes, and profits until the debt is satisfied. The bishop executes the writ by issuing a sequestration (q.v.; see LEVARI FACIAS; WRIT).

Sequestration; Sequestrator. A sequestration is where, by some judicial or quasi-judicial process, property is temporarily placed in the hands of one or more persons called sequestrators, who manage it and receive the rents and profits.

In the procedure of the High Court of Justice, a sequestration is a means of enforcing obedience to a judgment or order requiring a person to do an act (e.g., pay money into Court, deliver up a chattel, etc.). As to the cases in which it is issued, see Ord. 42, rr. 4, 6, 31; Ord. 43, rr. 6, 7. It can be issued against a debtor as if he had been arrested (Debtors Act, 1869, s. 8). It is a writ or commission directed to certain persons (usually four in number and one of them being usually a sheriff's officer) nominated by the person prosecuting the judgment, and empowering them to enter upon the real estate of the disobedient person, and receive the rents and profits thereof, and take his chattels, and keep them in their hands, until he performs the act required. The sequestrators are officers of the Court, and are bound to account for what they receive. See WRIT OF ASSISTANCE.

When a fi. fa. de bonis ecclesiasticis or a sequestrari facias (see those titles) is directed to a bishop, he issues a sequestration, which is in the nature of a warrant addressed to the churchwardens, requiring them to levy the debt out of the profits of the debtor's benefice.

In ecclesiastical law, where a benefice becomes vacant, a sequestration is usually granted by the bishop to the churchwardens, who manage all the profits and expenses of the benefice, plough and sow the glebe, receive tithes, and provide for the necessary cure of souls. They are bound to account for the profits to the new incumbent. Sequestration is also usually granted in a cause of spoliation

(q.v.), or as a punishment (e.g., for non-residence), or as a mode of compelling payment of money for dilapidations, or the like.

In the Mayor's Court of London, a sequestration was an attachment of the property of a person in a warehouse or other place belonging to and abandoned by him. It had the same object as the ordinary attachment, viz. to compel the appearance of the defendant to an action, and in default to satisfy the plaintiff's debt by appraisement and execution. See FOREIGN ATTACHMENT.

Sequestration, Writ of. See SEQUESTRATION; ASSISTANCE.

Serjeants-at-Arms are officers of the Crown, whose duty is nominally to attend the person of the Sovereign, to arrest traitors, to attend the Lord High Steward (q.v.) when sitting in judgment on traitors, and the like. "Two of them," says Blount, writing in 1670, "by the king's allowance, do attend on the two Houses of Parliament, whose office in the House of Commons is the keeping of the doors and (as of late it hath been used) the execution of such commands, especially touching the apprehension of any offender, as that House shall enjoyn him. Another of them attends on the Lord Chancellor or Lord Keeper, in the Chancery, and one on the Lord Treasurer of England." The Serjeant-at-Arms of the House of Lords attends the Lord Chancellor or other person acting as Speaker of that House; this is his only duty as an official of that House except, very occasionally, the attachment of offenders: but he also invariably holds the unpaid office of Lord Chancellor's Serjeant-at-Arms, and in the latter capacity he is the "Serjeant-at-Arms attending the Court" of each of the Judges of the Chancery, and may be ordered by any of them to enforce orders as to the custody of wards or to arrest persons in contempt.

Serjeants-at-Law were barristers of superior degree, to which they are called by writ under the Great Seal. They formed an Inn called Serjeants' Inn. Formerly they were supposed to serve the Crown (hence their name, serjeants or servientes ad legem); but in more modern times the degree was conferred on eminent counsel as a distinction, without reference to their services to the Crown. Serjeants had precedence over junior barristers; but only serjeants with patents of precedence (q.v.) took precedence of King's Counsel. They formerly had a right of exclusive audience in the Court of Common Pleas, which was abolished in 1846 by the statute 9 & 10 Vict. c. 54; an attempt to do this by royal warrant under the Sign Manual had been declared illegal in 1840. When a serjeant was appointed, it was customary for him to appear in the Court of Common Pleas and to go through the form of opening a real action by reading the "count" (q.v.) therein: this was called "counting." It was also customary for him to present gold rings, bearing a motto, to the other serjeants; this was called "giving rings." Of late years the degree of King's Counsel (q.v.), or Queen's Counsel, had gradually supplanted that of serjeant, and the abolition (by s. 8 of the Judicature Act, 1873), of the rule requiring every judge of the superior Courts of common law to be a serjeant made the extinction of the order of serjeants merely a question of time.

For some unknown period at some unknown date before 1497, the serjeants had, as an Inn, certain premises opposite the Church of St. Andrew in Holborn. These premises were subsequently known as Scrope's Inn. They were, in 1497, the property of Lord Scrope. From 1443 to 1758 the serjeants held, as an Inn, the buildings in Fleet Street which are still known as Serjeants' Inn. When the last renewal of the Fleet Street lease expired in 1758, the serjeants who had lived in that Inn migrated to the other Serjeants' Inn in Chancery Lane. The Chancery Lane Inn (known as Old Serjeants' Inn) was held from 1416 upon a series of leases renewed from time to time, until in 1854 the freehold was acquired from the Bishop of Ely. Old Serjeants' Inn was sold in 1877, and the proceeds were divided among the serjeants. The site is now occupied by Nos. 5, 6 and 7, Chancery Lane.

Lord Lindley, who became a serjeant in 1875 and died in 1921, was the last survivor of the Order of the Coif. That was the collective title of the serjeants: see COIF.

See FARYNDON INN.

Serjeanty (Norman-French, serjantie, from Latin, serviens, a servant) literally means service. "Serjeantia idem est quod servitium," says Coke.

See GRAND SERJEANTY; PETTY SERJEANTY.

Sermo est animi index (3 Bulst. 260). (Speech discloses what is in the mind.) Compare OS DEMONSTRAT, ETC.

Sermones semper accipiendi sunt secundum subjectum materiam et conditionem personarum. (Words are always to be taken in the sense which they would ordinarily have in relation to the subject-matter and to the occupation of the persons spoken of.) Thus the word "layman" ordinarily means one who is not a clergyman: but it means one who is not a barrister or a solicitor when, for instance, it is said that laymen are in general not acquainted with such and such a proposition of law.

Sermo relatus ad personam intelligi debet de conditione personæ. (Words referring to any man must be taken as referring to him in his occupation.) Thus to say of an attorney that he deals corruptly, means prima facie that he does so qua attorney.

Servage. There was said to be servage when tenants, besides paying rent, had to provide labour for the lord. In the law of tenure it was in fact a particular kind of service (q.v.).

Service.—I. In the law of tenure, a service is a duty due from a tenant to his lord. Services are or were of various kinds.

Divine or spiritual services are services of a religious nature, either certain, as in the case of tenure by divine service (q.v.), or uncertain, as in the case of frankalmoign (q.v.). Temporal services are services which can be performed by a secular person, and were formerly either (1) free, namely such as were not unbecoming the character of a soldier or a freeman to perform, as to serve under his lord in the wars, to pay him rent, etc. (see RENT), and also those incident to tenure in grand serjeanty (q.v.); or (2) base or villein services, namely such as were fit only for peasants or persons of a servile rank, as to plough the lord's land, to make his hedges. Certain services were such as were fixed in quantity, as to pay a certain rent, or to plough a field for three days every year; examples of uncertain services were, to do military service, or to plough the lord's land when called upon. Accidental or casual services are wardship, relief, heriots and other things, more commonly called incidents (q.v.). In the tenure of knight-service, some services due by the tenant were called foreign, servitia forinseca, because they were due to the king and not to the lord: such was the military service in the field due by a tenant by knight's service. See FOREIGN.

Customary services arose by immemorial custom, as where the inhabitants of a place had from time immemorial been accustomed to grind their corn at a certain mill: such a custom gave rise to the obligation on the part of the mill-owner to maintain the mill and all provisions for grinding (servants, etc.), and on the part of the residents to take their corn to be ground there and not elsewhere. See SECTA; SUBTRACTION.

II. In the law of contract, service is the relation between master and servant. A contract by which one person binds himself to serve another is called a contract of service. As to the rights and duties arising from such a contract, see MASTER AND SERVANT.

In order to support claims for damages against seducers and abductors, the definition of "service" has been somewhat strained; thus, if a daughter lives with her father, this is a sufficient service to support an action by the father against a man who seduces her. See SEDUCTION.

III. In procedure, service is the operation of bringing the contents or effect of a document to the knowledge of the persons concerned. It is of two kinds. Writs of summons, orders for disobedience to which process of contempt may be issued, and some other judicial documents, require either direct or substituted service. Direct service is effected by actually bringing the document to the person or thing to be served. In the case of a person such service is called personal. Thus, in an ordinary action, personal service of the writ of summons is effected by showing the original writ to the defendant, and tendering him a copy. An example of direct service on a thing (which might be called real service) occurs in an ordinary admiralty action in rem against a ship; here (Ord. 9, r. 12) service of the writ of summons is effected by nailing the original writ for a short time to the mast of the vessel, and taking it off, leaving a copy nailed in its place. Analogous to this is the mode of serving a writ for the recovery of land in the case of vacant possession; here (Ord. 9, r. 9) a copy of the writ is posted on some conspicuous part of the property; this mode of service also partakes of the nature of substituted service.

Service (out of the jurisdiction) of a writ of summons, or of notice thereof, is dealt with in Ord. 11; and r. 8A of that Order deals with the like service in the case of origination summonses and other origination proceedings.

The object of substituted service is to provide the best means available under the circumstances for bringing the effect of the document to the knowledge of the party, when he is keeping out of the way, or his whereabouts is not known. The usual mode of effecting substituted service is by directly serving the document on some person likely to bring it to the knowledge of the party (e.g., his wife, agent, etc.), or by advertising notice of it, or by sending a copy by post to the party's address: see Ord. 10, and notes thereto, and Ord. 67, rr. 5, 6. See NOTICE; NOTICE OF WRIT.

Analogous to substituted service is the practice called "accepting service," which is done by the solicitor for the party to be served giving a personal undertaking (generally written on the original writ) that he will enter an appearance for him, in order to save his client from the annoyance of being personally served: see Ord. 9, r. 1.

Certain documents which are merely the foundation for other proceedings do not require direct or substituted service, but are left at the address of the person for whom the document is intended, or of his solicitor, if he is represented by a solicitor. (See ADDRESS FOR SERVICE.) Summonses, notices of motion, petitions, and certain other documents, are served in this manner; if served after 6 o'clock P.M. on ordinary days (or after 2 P.M. on Saturdays), the service counts from the following day (or Monday) (Ord. 64, r. 11). As to pleadings, see DELIVERY.

Service Franchise. A franchise which existed under the Representation of the People Act, 1884, s. 3. See ELECTORAL FRANCHISE.

Serviens ad legem. See SERJEANT-AT-LAW.

Servient Tenement. See EASEMENT.

Servitia personalia sequuntur personam (2 Inst. 374). (Personal services follow the person.) Quoted by Coke as showing that where there was a lord paramount, a mesne lord and a tenant, and the mesne lord had made default in rendering the customs and services due to the lord paramount, then the customs and services to be rendered to the lord paramount (Statute of Westminster II. c. 9) by the tenant in order to obviate distraint did not include services, such as homage, fealty, etc., which were annexed to the person of the mesne lord. See MESNE.

Servitiis acquietandis, De. This would appear to have been a writ by means of which in early times a tenant obtained redress when he had been distrained for services by a lord to whom he owed no service.

Servitium. In the law of tenure, this meant service. It might be servitium intrinsecum or servitium forinsecum (see FORINSECUS), servitium liberum (see SERVICE) or servitium regale where he who held from the king had jura regalia (q.v.).

Servitors of Bills. Messengers sent by the Marshal of the King's Bench to serve bills or writs. See the statute 2 Hen. 4, c. 23.

Servitude. This means such apprenticeship as gives a right of admission to the freedom of a borough or to the City Companies. See FREEDOM; CITY COMPANIES.

Seskyn; Sesken. The same as suskin (q.v.).

Session. The period between the opening of Parliament and its prorogation (q.v.).

As to the Court of Great Sessions, see WALES.

See PETTY SESSIONS; QUARTER SESSIONS.

Session of the Peace is a sitting of justices of the peace for the exercise of their powers. There are four kinds, petty, special, quarter and general sessions (see those titles).

Set. See BILL OF EXCHANGE.

Set-off. In an action to recover money, a set-off is a cross claim for money by the defendant, for which he might maintain an action against the plaintiff, and which has the effect of extinguishing the plaintiff's claim pro tanto, so that he can only recover against the defendant the balance of his claim, after deducting what is due by him to the defendant (Ord. 19, r. 3). Thus, if A sues B for £100, while he owes B £75, a set-off would have the effect of reducing A's claim to £25. The object of this is to prevent cross-actions. See CIRCUITY OF ACTION.

The right of set-off was introduced by the statutes 2 Geo. 2, c. 22, and 8 Geo. 2, c. 24; but was restricted to mutual debts. Under the Judicature Acts mutual claims of any kind, whether for debts or damages, can be set off against one another; but in practice the term "set-off" is generally applied to mutual debts or claims for liquidated amounts, so that one can be deducted from the other: while cross claims in respect of damages, which are unliquidated, are distinguished as "counter-claims" (q.v.).

As to the limitation of a set-off or counterclaim, see LIMITATION.

In the practice of the old common law Courts, where there were cross judgments in the same or different actions, in the same or different Courts, between parties substantially the same, whether for debt (or damages) and costs, or for costs alone, either party might set off the amount of his judgment against that of the other by obtaining a rule or order to enter satisfaction in both actions for the amount of the smaller debt. This practice was made obsolete by the full powers of set-off given by the Judicature Acts.

As to set-off in the County Court, see County Court Rules, Ord. 10, rr. 2, 10-21.

As to set-off in bankruptcy, see MUTUAL CREDITS.

See COUNTERCLAIM.

Settle.—I. To settle property is to limit it, or the income of it, to several persons in succession, so that the person for the time being in the possession or enjoyment of it has no power to deprive the others of their right of future enjoyment. See SETTLEMENT.

II. The term "settle" is also applied to paupers. See SETTLEMENT.

III. To settle a document is to make it right in form and in substance. Documents of difficulty or complexity, such as mining leases, settlements by will or deed, partnership agreements, etc., are generally settled by counsel. (See CONVEYANCER.) In some cases a document requires to be settled by a judge or judicial officer; thus, when issues are directed to be prepared in an action, and the parties cannot agree on them, they are settled by the judge (Ord. 33, r. 1). In Chancery practice every order (except orders for time and a few others) is settled by the registrar in the presence of the parties, unless they agree as to its form, in which case the "settling" consists in their signing the draft as approved. See MINUTES; PASS; REGISTRAR.

Settled Account. See ACCOUNT SETTLED.

Settled Land. The Settled Estates Act, 1877, repealed all the earlier enactments enabling settled land to be sold, that is to say, the Acts 19 & 20 Vict. c. 120 (The Leases and Sales of Settled Estates Act, 1856); 21 & 22 Vict. c. 77; 27 & 28 Vict. c. 45; 37 & 38 Vict. c. 33, and 39 & 40 Vict. c. 30. Apart from those Acts, the earliest of which was passed only in 1856, settled land could be sold only under an express power of sale in a settlement or under the authority of a special Act of Parliament. The Act of 1877 enables the tenant for life (see TENANT FOR LIFE) of settled land (that is (see s. 2), of land limited to or in trust for any persons by way of succession) to grant leases not exceeding twenty-one years (subject to certain restrictions as to the amount of rent, etc.), so as to make them binding on the reversioner (ss. 46, 47). It also empowers the Chancery Division of the High Court (1) to authorise long leases of settled land (s. 4); (2) to order sales of settled land, or of timber on settled land (s. 16); and (3) to direct any part of a settled estate to be laid out for streets, gardens, sewers, etc. (s. 20). Provision is made for giving notice to the persons interested of any application to the Court under the Act (s. 24).

This Act is still on the statute book, but it is now of little importance. The Settled Land Acts, 1882, 1884, 1887, 1889 and 1890 (collectively entitled the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890) have replaced it in practice. A tenant for life can himself now give building leases for ninety-nine years, mining leases for sixty years, and other leases for twenty-one years (Act of 1882, s. 6), except as regard the principal mansion house and its park; and he can himself, with the like exception, sell any part of the settled land (ib. s. 4), but the principal mansion house and its park cannot be sold or leased without the consent of the trustees of the settlement or an order of the Court (Act of 1890, s. 10). The tenant for life is, in fact, now given practically all the powers which an absolute owner generally exercises, but any money realised upon a sale or (Act of 1884, s. 4) received as a fine for a lease must (Act of 1882, s. 22) be paid at the option of the tenant for life either to the trustees of the settlement or into Court to be invested according to his directions in such securities as are specified in s. 21 of the Act of 1882, and (s. 22) to be held upon the same trusts as those contained in the settlement. The Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890, apply to every settlement whether made before or after 1882 (Act of 1882, s. 2 (1)).

The Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 41, makes land to which an infant is absolutely entitled "settled land" for the purposes of the Settled Estates Act, 1877; and s. 42 provides for the management of such settled land, if the settlement came into operation after 1881 and expresses no contrary intention. The Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 59, provides that (for the purposes of that Act) land to which an infant is absolutely entitled shall be deemed "settled land."

Under the Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 21 (iii), moneys arising from sales, etc., in pursuance of that Act may, with (s. 26) the approval of the Court or of the trustees, be applied in payment for the improvements authorised by s. 25 thereof, as extended by s. 13 of the Settled Land Act, 1890; such improvements include many in addition to those specified in the IMPROVEMENT OF LAND ACTS (q.v.).

Settlement.—I. A settlement is an instrument by which property, or the enjoyment of property, is limited to several persons in succession. (See SETTLE.) Generally, the word "settlement" implies a deed or an instrument equivalent to a deed (such as articles or agreement for a settlement); but a settlement may be and often is made by will, and occasionally by private Act of Parliament.

The Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 2 (1), provides that, for the purposes of that Act, a settlement may consist of any number of documents under which land stands limited to, or in trust for, any person by way of succession. As the result of the decision in [1893],

2 Ch. 345, the settlement constituted by any such documents came to be described as a "compound settlement"; and the term has since been in common use.

The most important kinds of settlements are: marriage, or ante-nuptial settlements, post-nuptial and voluntary settlements, and family settlements, more usually called re-settlements (q.v.). Settlements are also sometimes directed by a Court to be entered into by the parties to a proceeding, such as those ordered by the Chancery Division upon the marriage of wards of Court, and, less frequently, the settlement which the Court in a matrimonial case may (under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, s. 45, or the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1884, s. 3) order a wife who is in fault to make in favour of her husband or her children if she has property of her own. There is also the quasi-settlement which the Court itself, after a final decree of nullity or dissolution of marriage, may make by way of varying (under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, s. 5, or the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, s. 3) any settlement or settlements in favour either of the children of the marriage or of one or other of the parties to the marriage.

A marriage, or ante-nuptial settlement, as its name implies, is an instrument executed before a marriage, and wholly or partly in consideration of it, for the purpose of regulating the enjoyment and devolution of real or personal property. Such settlements are sometimes distinguished as real and personal settlements, a real settlement being one in which the property is throughout treated as land, so that if a person entitled under it dies, his share goes to his heir or devisee, while a personal settlement is one in which the property is either personalty, or realty directed to be turned into money, and therefore treated as personalty. See CONVERSION.

An ordinary settlement of personalty or realty directed to be sold (the object of which is to make an equal provision for all the children) consists of a conveyance of (or agreement to convey) the property to trustees, to be held by them in trust for the settlor until the marriage takes place (which generally is a few hours after the execution of the settlement); followed by a declaration of the trusts on which it is to be held after the marriage, namely, to pay the income to the husband for life (assuming that the property is brought into trust by him), and after his death to the wife for life, and after the death of the survivor to hold the property in trust for the issue of the marriage in such shares as the husband and wife jointly, or the survivor of them, shall have appointed, or in default of and subject to any appointment upon trust for all the issue who attain twenty-one, or (being daughters) marry, in equal shares, with an ultimate trust, by which, if there is no issue of the marriage, the property reverts to the husband or settlor. If the property is brought into settlement by the wife, the income is first given to the wife for her life for her separate use, generally with a restraint on anticipation (q.v.). In addition to these, the fundamental clauses, there are provisions as to the securities in which the trustees are to be at liberty to invest the settled property; covenants to settle after-acquired property (infra); hotchpot, advancement clauses; and provisions for the appointment of new trustees (see the various titles, and ACCUMULATION; MAINTENANCE).

A marriage settlement of real property, where the object is to retain the estate in the family (hence sometimes called a family settlement, or, more commonly, a strict settlement) has, in the most simple case, where the intended husband is seised in fee of the property, the following principal objects:—"First, to make provision for the wife: this is effected by securing the payment to her of two annuities; the one, payable during her husband's lifetime, called 'pin-money'; the other, payable after his death, called a 'jointure.' Second, to provide for the payment of gross sums of money, called 'portions,' to such of the younger children of the marriage as attain majority. Third, to provide that the property charged with these provisions for the wife and younger children should go as a whole to the eldest son." These objects are effected by limiting a long term to trustees to secure the pin-money, followed by another long term to other trustees to secure the jointure; followed by another long term to secure the portions; subject to these terms, the land is limited to the husband for life, with remainder to the sons of the marriage successively in tail; failing sons and their issue, it is limited to the daughters as tenants in common in tail, and failing daughters and their issue, it is limited to the settlor in fee.

A marriage settlement often contains a covenant by the husband or wife to settle all property exceeding a certain amount in value which shall be acquired by him or her after the marriage. Such a covenant generally binds the covenantor to settle not only property in which he (or she) has no interest at the time of the marriage, but also interests which were contingent, and, in some cases, even vested at the time of the marriage, such as reversions.

Voluntary settlements are settlements made otherwise than for valuable consideration. (See VOLUNTARY.) A post-nuptial settlement (i.e., one made by a husband on his wife or family after the marriage without some new consideration) is a voluntary settlement. Formerly, under the statute 27 Eliz. c. 4, a voluntary settlement of land was defeated by a subsequent conveyance by the settlor to a purchaser for value, but the Voluntary Conveyances Act, 1893, provides that no voluntary conveyance of any date, which was made in good faith and without fraudulent intent, shall be liable to be defeated by any later conveyance made after 28 June, 1893. A voluntary settlement of any property is void if the settlor becomes bankrupt within two years from its date (Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 42), and it is also void if he becomes bankrupt within ten years from its date, unless it is proved that at the time of making it he was able to pay all his debts without the aid of the property comprised in it (ib.). A voluntary settlement is also void if it falls within the purview of the statute 13 Eliz. c. 5; as to which see FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE.

As to the payment of estate duty on property passing under voluntary disposition, see VOLUNTARY.

II. A pauper is said to be settled in a parish (or union) when he has acquired a right to permanent relief there, as opposed to casual (q.v.) and irremovable paupers. (See POOR LAW; IRREMOVABILITY.) A settlement is either original or derivative. An original settlement is one acquired by the pauper without reference to other persons, and that (a) at common law, by birth in the parish, unless he has some other settlement, original or derivative; (b) under the Poor Relief (Settlement) Act, 1825, s. 2, the Poor Relief (Settlement) Act, 1831, s. 1, the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, s. 66, and the Poor Relief Act, 1662, by renting a tenement of the value of £10 a year at least for one whole year, and residing in the parish for forty days; (c) in the case of an apprentice (under the Poor Relief Act, 1691, s. 7, and the Apprentices (Settlement) Act, 1757, s. 1), by inhabiting in the parish for forty days; (d) under the Poor Relief Act, 1662, s. 1, by having an estate in the parish of any nature or value, and inhabiting within 10 miles thereof; (e) under the Poor Relief Act, 1691, s. 5, and the Poor Relief (Settlement) Act, 1825, s. 2, by paying parochial rates and taxes in respect of a tenement within the parish of the yearly value of £10 a year at least; (f) under the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876, s. 34, by residing in the parish for three years. (See RESIDENCE.) A derivative settlement is one derived from some other person, and under the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876, s. 34, is either (a) by parentage, the rule being that every child under the age of sixteen takes the settlement of its father or widowed mother (or, if illegitimate, of its mother) until it acquires the age of sixteen, and retains that settlement until it acquires another, unless its parent had a derivative settlement, in which case the child's settlement is ascertained without reference to the parent; or (b) by marriage, a female pauper always taking the settlement of her husband.

Settlement Estate Duty. This was a stamp duty imposed by the Finance Act, 1894, s. 5, on, with certain exceptions, property which was settled by the will of a deceased person, or which, if settled otherwise, passed on the death of the deceased to some other person not competent to dispose of it. It, along with estate duty (q.v.), was payable once only during the continuance of the settlement. Thus, if A by his will bequeathed personalty in trust successively for, say, his four sons, B, C, D and E, during the life of each of them one after the other, with remainder to some person unborn at the date of A's death, then in such a case estate duty and settlement estate duty would be payable on the death of A, but no further estate or settlement estate duty would be payable on the successive deaths of B, C, D and E, though the property successively passed on the death of each of those persons.

In reliance on this relief from estate duty during the continuance of the settlement, many dispositions of property similar to that suggested above were made; but the legislature saw fit to abolish that relief by the Finance Act, 1914, s. 14, and to enact that, in the case of any person dying after the 11th May, 1914, no settlement estate duty should be levied, and that, in the case of any person dying after the 15th August, 1914, there should be no relief, except in the cases of property passing on death between husband and wife, from estate duty in respect of settled property on which settlement estate duty had been paid; so that on each devolution of settled property (except as between husband and wife) estate duty is payable in full: but the section went on to provide that, where death duty had been paid, credit for the amount thereof, with simple interest at 3 per cent. from the 15th August, 1914, should be allowed on the next occasion when estate duty became payable under the section.

Settlement Estate Duty was fixed by the Finance Act, 1894, s. 17, at 1 per cent. on the principal value of the property. The rate was increased by the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, s. 54, to 2 per cent.

"Settlor, As." See COVENANTS.

Sever—Severable—Severance. To sever is to divide, and severable is that which is divisible. Thus a joint tenancy is severed when one of two joint tenants conveys his interest to a stranger, because the other tenant and the stranger are then tenants in common. See JOINT TENANCY.

Again, when a claim is composed of several parts, and some of them may be put forward or enforced without the others, the latter are said to be severable, and the act of severing them is called severance; thus where A had brought an action in an inferior Court for causes which were partly within and partly without the jurisdiction of the Court, he was allowed to sever them by abandoning the latter part of his case, so as to keep the action in the inferior Court. And when two or more defendants to an action put in separate defences, instead of joining in one defence, they are said to sever. See ENTIRE; APPORTIONMENT OF CONTRACTS; SEVERAL; SEVERALTY.

Severance is also the act of removing fixtures, growing crops, or minerals from land. A tenant who is entitled to remove fixtures must sever them during his term, or he loses his right. As to the effect of severance on growing crops and minerals, see those titles.

Several is opposed to "joint." Thus tenants in common of land are said to be seised by several titles, so that (see Co. Litt. 191A), if they are disseised each has a separate right of action, while joint tenants are seised by a joint title, and therefore if they are disseised they ought to bring one action to recover the land; and a covenant by several persons may be several, the effect being as if each had covenanted by a separate instrument, or joint, the effect in the latter case being that any covenantor who is sued can require the others, or the survivors of the others, to be sued also. In deeds, covenants by more than one person for the doing of a certain thing are commonly expressed to be both joint and several, or other words to the like effect. See JOINT.

As to a several fishery, see FISHERY; as to several hereditaments and inheritances, see HEREDITAMENT; INHERITANCE; as to a several pasture, see PASTURE.

See SEVERALTY.

Severalty. Property is said to belong to persons in severalty when the share of each is ascertained (so that he can exclude the others from it) as opposed to joint ownership, ownership in common, and coparcenary, where the owners hold in undivided shares (see ESTATE). Usually when land is held in severalty, it is divided so that each of the owners has a part to himself, but they may agree that one shall have the land for one part of the year, another for another, and so on, and in this case also they are said to hold in severalty (see INHERITANCE). The term severalty is especially applied to the case of adjoining meadows undivided from each other, but belonging, either permanently or in what are called shifting severalties (infra), to separate owners, and held in severalty until the crops have been carried, when the whole is thrown open as pasture for the cattle of all the owners, and in some cases for the cattle of other persons as well: each owner is called a severalty owner, and his rights of pasture are called severalty rights, as opposed to the rights of persons not owners. See COMMON; COMMONABLE; DOLE; LAMMAS LANDS; OPEN FIELDS; SHACK.

When a number of persons are the owners of land, and an exclusive share is allotted to each for a certain time, at the expiration of which the shares are again distributed, so that the occupation varies or shifts from time to time, they are said to hold by shifting severalties. The most usual instance of shifting severalties occurs in the case of open fields and other commonable lands (see COMMONABLE; DOLE; LOT-MEAD; SHACK), where the severalty holding of each owner varies sometimes by rotation, sometimes by lot, while in some places the choice was formerly awarded to the best runner or wrestler, or determined by other fantastic methods, but since the general inclosure of the country such instances have become rare.

Sewer.—I. "Sewer" originally meant an open trench or channel, made for carrying off surplus water from land near the sea or a river, or from marshy ground. Commissioners of Sewers are officials appointed by the Crown, formerly by prerogative, but subsequently under various Acts of Parliament commencing with the statute 23 Hen. 8, popularly known as the Bill of Sewers, to survey, repair and keep in order sewers, streams, sluices and embankments within their district; they form

Courts of record and have power to make orders and assess rates. See COURTS OF SEWERS.

Bodies corporate or unincorporated, which are practically local Commissioners of Sewers, may be constituted by the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries under the Land Drainage Act, 1914, by means of provisional orders giving such bodies powers to construct land drainage works within their respective areas of action. The Act provides for their being invested with the necessary ancillary powers as to rating, acquisition of land, etc.

II. In its modern and more usual sense, a sewer means an underground or covered channel used for the drainage of two or more separate buildings, as opposed to a "drain," which is a channel used for carrying off the drainage of one building or set of buildings in one curtilage. (See DRAIN.) In London the main sewers were formerly vested in the Metropolitan Board of Works which has been superseded by the London County Council, and the local or branch sewers were formerly vested in the local authorities, namely, the vestries and district boards (q.v.), both of which have now been superseded by the metropolitan boroughs. Sewers in the country are, as a rule, vested in the local sanitary authority.

The Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers were created by the statute 11 & 12 Vict. c 112; they were abolished by the statute 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, and their functions transferred partly to the metropolitan vestries and district boards, and partly to the Metropolitan Board of Works (q.v.).

Sexagesima Sunday. The last Sunday but one before Lent. It intervenes between Septuagesima (q.v.) and Quinquagesima (q.v.) Sundays.

Sexton. The name of this functionary is a corruption of sacristan, the person who in pre-Reformation times had charge of the sacred vessels, the vestments and the like. In some of the cathedrals, the office of sacristan or sexton, in its ancient sense, is still held by a minor canon. Now, the sexton is sometimes merely a person who has charge of the church and its contents, and who rings the church bell, in which case the appointment generally lies with the churchwardens; but the incumbent generally appoints if, as is sometimes the case, the sexton is clerk as well as sexton, or if, as happens in some parishes, the sexton merely looks after the churchyard and digs graves. In many places, however, the sexton, without regard to the particular nature of his duties, is elected by the parishioners in select vestry or by the churchwardens and the parishioners. His tenure of office, like everything else connected with him, also depends upon local custom; in some cases he holds merely during pleasure, while in others it is a freehold for life except in case of proved misconduct. In 1739 it was decided that a woman could hold the office.

The above relates to ancient parishes. In modern parishes the sexton is appointed by the incumbent, who, with the consent of the bishop, may remove him for misconduct (New Parishes Act, 1856, s. 9).

Shack. It sometimes happens that a number of adjacent fields, though held in severalty, that is, by separate owners, and cultivated separately, are, after the crop on each parcel has been carried in, thrown open as pasture to the cattle of all the owners. "Arable lands cultivated on this plan," says Mr. Elton, "are called 'shack fields,' and the right of each owner of a part to feed cattle over the whole during the autumn and winter is known in law as common of shack, a right which is distinct in its nature from common because of vicinage, though sometimes said to be nearly identical with it." It is also known as "shackage" and "common of shacker," and the shack lands are sometimes called "the known lands," to distinguish them from an ordinary common, in which there is no distinction of property, and more frequently "half-year lands," from the period during which they are open to pasture.

Common of pasture in open meadows (q.v.) is of very much the same nature as common of shack.

Mr. Elton explains that "'shack,' in the dialect of Norfolk, signifies to ramble or go at large, and that the name has been adopted in speaking of half-year lands in other counties, probably because the leading case on the subject (7 Co. 5) was concerned with lands in Norfolk."

Shaftesbury's Act, Lord. A popular title of the Liberty of Religious Worship Act, 1855.

Share. In the law of companies, a share is a definite portion of the capital of a company. With very few exceptions, shares in companies are personal estate, whatever the nature of the company's property or business may be. The ownership of a share entitles the holder to receive a proportionate part of the profits of the company, and to take part in the management of its business, in accordance with the articles of association or other regulations of the company, which also regulate the mode in which shares may be transferred. (See MEETING; RESOLUTION; SHAREHOLDER.) When the amount of a share has been paid to the company, it is said to be fully paid up. And if the company is a limited one, the liability of the holder of the share is then at an end. (See COMPANY.) Shares may be issued by a company as fully paid up (e.g., in consideration of services or works rendered to the company by the person to whom they are issued), but in the case of a company formed under the Companies Acts, the agreement under which they are so taken must be made in writing and filed with the registrar within one month after the issue of the shares (Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, s. 88 (1)). A company formed under the Companies Acts (q.v.) may at any time convert its fully paid shares into stock (q.v.) (ib., s. 41 (1) (a)). A share-certificate is an instrument under the seal of the company, certifying that the person therein named is entitled to a certain number of shares: it is primâ facie evidence of his title thereto (ib., s. 23), but it is not a negotiable instrument. Compare SCRIP. A share-warrant to bearer is a warrant or certificate under the seal of the company, stating that the bearer of the warrant is entitled to a certain number or amount of fully paid-up shares or stock; coupons for payment of dividends may be annexed to it; delivery of the share-warrant operates as a transfer of the shares or stock (ib., s. 37 (1) (2)). It is a negotiable instrument.

As to shares in ships, see SHIP.

Shareholder. In the strict sense of the term, a shareholder is a person who has agreed to become a member of a company, and with respect to whom all the required formalities have been gone through (e.g., signing of deed of settlement, registration, or the like). A shareholder by estoppel is a person who has acted and been treated as a shareholder, and consequently has the same liabilities as if he were an ordinary shareholder. Thus, a person who has acted as a shareholder may be liable for the debts of the company, although he has never been registered as a shareholder, and is therefore not a shareholder in the full sense of the word. So also a person will be treated as a shareholder if he has entered into a valid contract to take shares.

She. See HE.

Sheading. The Isle of Man is divided into six divisions (somewhat in the nature of ridings) known as sheadings.

Sheep-heaves are small plots of pasture, often in the middle of the waste of a manor, of which the soil may or may not be in the lord, but the pasture is private property and leased or sold as such. They principally occur in the northern counties, and seem to be corporeal hereditaments, although they are sometimes classed with rights of common, but erroneously, the right being an exclusive right of pasture. See PASTURE.

Sheep-scab. This is one of the diseases of animals, with regard to which, orders may be made by the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries: see ANIMALS, DISEASES OF.

Sheepwalk. A right of sheepwalk is the same thing as a foldcourse (q.v.).

Sheffield Registry. See TRADE MARKS.

Shelley's Case. If land is given to A for his life, or for any estate of freehold, and by the same gift or conveyance the land is limited either mediately or immediately to his heirs in fee (or in tail), the result is that A takes an estate in fee (or in tail), and not merely the particular estate first limited to him. Thus, if land is given "to A for his life, and after his death to his heirs," or "to A for his life, and after his death to B for his life, and after his death to the heirs of A," in either of these cases A takes an estate in fee simple: in the first case an estate in fee simple in possession, and in the second case an estate for life in possession, followed by an estate in fee simple in remainder expectant on the death of B. A's heirs take nothing, unless he dies intestate and allows the land to go by descent. In technical language, the word "heirs" is here a word of limitation, and not a word of purchase. This rule is called the rule in Shelley's Case (1 Rep. 94), a case in which the subject was much discussed, although the rule itself is of much more ancient date.

Sheppard's Touchstone. See DODERIDGE.

Sheriff is the chief officer of the Crown in every county in England (except Cambridge and Huntingdon, which have only one sheriff between them) including (Local Government Act, 1888, ss. 46 (1), 113) what is left of the ancient county of Middlesex. He is appointed by the Crown every year. He must hold some land within the county. The duties of sheriffs are very various, including the charge of Parliamentary elections, the execution of process issuing from the High Court and the Criminal Courts, the summoning of jurors and the levying of forfeited recognizances. Most of his ordinary duties are performed by the undersheriff and deputy.

The law as to sheriffs is consolidated by the Sheriffs Act, 1887, which repealed all earlier Acts on the subject.

The sheriffs of the City of London are in a class by themselves. They are two in number and are elected by the City Corporation (Sheriffs Act, 1887, s. 33). The Sheriffs Act, 1887, except as is provided in s. 33, applies to them (ib.). The ancient Sheriff's Courts of the City (see COMMON PLEADER) have fallen into disuse.

Formerly the sheriff had judicial duties to perform as judge of the Sheriff's County Court; but these are entirely obsolete. (See COUNTY COURT; OUTLAWRY.) He also held a Court of record called the Sheriff's Tourn twice every year, which had the same functions and jurisdiction as the Court Leet (q.v.): it also has fallen into desuetude.

See ANGLO-SAXON LAWS; BAILIFF; BAILIWICK; ELEGIT; INQUIRY, WRIT OF; PRICKING FOR SHERIFFS; SHIRE-REEVE; WESTMORELAND.

Sheriff-geld. The rent or payment which the King received from the sheriff at the time when the office of sheriff was a source of profit: see Rot. Parl., 50 Edw. 3.

Sheriff-tooth. This seems to have been a rent paid at an early period by certain tenants who held by the tenure of providing entertainment for the sheriff when sitting in his county court.

Sherman; Shearman. One who used to shear woollen cloth, that is to say, remove the nap from it. See the statutes 19 Hen. 7, c. 17, and Eliz. c. 7.

Shew Cause. When an order, rule, decree or the like, has been made nisi, the person who appears before the Court and contends that it should not be allowed to take effect, is said to shew cause against it. See ABSOLUTE; DECREE; NISI; RULE.

Shewer; Shower. In the practice of the High Court, when a view by a jury is ordered, persons are named by the Court to shew the property to be viewed, and are hence called shewers. There is usually a shewer on behalf of each party. See VIEW.

Shifting Clause, in a settlement, is a clause by which some other mode of devolution is substituted for that primarily prescribed. Examples of shifting clauses are—the ordinary name and arms clause (q.v.)—and the clause of less frequent occurrence by which a settled estate is destined as the foundation of a second family, in the event of the elder branch becoming otherwise enriched. These shifting clauses take effect under the Statute of Uses. See USE.

Shifting Use. See USE.

Shilling. See SILVER COINS.

Shilwite. The same as childwite (q.v.).

Ship. Under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 1, a vessel cannot be registered as a British ship unless she belongs wholly to British subjects, or to a corporation formed under and subject to the laws of, and having its principal place of business in, the British Empire. A British ship is personal property, but, so long as she is on the high seas, she is deemed to be part of the soil of England: thus, persons born on board a British ship, whether in foreign territorial waters or not (British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914, s. 1 (1) (c)), are natural-born British subjects, and the British Courts have jurisdiction in respect of crimes committed on the high seas on board British vessels.

The ownership of every registered ship is divided into sixty-four shares, all of which may belong to one person, or they may be divided among several persons; but not more than sixty-four persons can be registered as part-owners of any one ship. (See PART-OWNER.) Although not more than five persons may be registered as joint-owners of any ship or of any share or shares therein (Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 5), a corporation may be registered as owners (ib.). Any part-owner can transfer or mortgage any or all of the shares held by him; but to do so he must comply with the statutory provisions on these heads (as to which, see BILL OF SALE; MORTGAGE), as ships are not within the ordinary rules governing the assignment and hyopthecation of chattels.

As to the hypothecation of ships, see BOTTOMRY; HYPOTHECATION; NECESSARIES; RESPONDENTIA.

As to the employment of ships, see AFFREIGHTMENT; BILL OF LADING; CHARTER-PARTY; DEMURRAGE; FREIGHT; INSURANCE; LAY DAYS; LOSS; MANAGING OWNER; MERCHANT SHIPPING; PILOTAGE; POLICY OF ASSURANCE; RUNNING DAYS; SEAMEN; SEAWORTHINESS; SHIP'S HUSBAND; TRANSIRE.

Ship's Agent. Under the Naval Agency and Distribution Act, 1864, as applied by the Naval Prize Act, 1918, every ship of His Majesty's when in commission must have an agent—who may not be in His Majesty's service nor be a solicitor or proctor—to look after the claims of the officers and crew to special payments (such as those in salvage or in prize, or for the capture or destruction of enemy ships, etc.), to which they may become entitled. He receives as his remuneration 2½ per cent. on moneys recovered. He must have a place of business within five miles of the General Post Office, London. He is subject to the Court of Admiralty as if he were an officer thereof.

Ship's Husband is a person to whom the owner or part-owners of a ship delegate the management of her while she is in the home port. He is usually the general agent of the owners in regard to all affairs of the ship in the home port, such as repairs, equipment, hiring officers and crew, affreightment, etc., but not insurance; sometimes his authority is limited to specific things See AGENT; MANAGING OWNER.

Ship's Papers. A ship's registry certificate, her bill of lading, her bill of health, her charter-party, her log, and other documents which show the character of the ship and her cargo, are known by this name.

Shire. A county. The word is now used only colloquially, except in compound names such as Yorkshire.

Shire Clerk. It was in the capacity of shire clerk that the sheriff held the old county court. The office was never held except by the sheriff.

Shire-ground; Shire-land. Such parts of the kingdom as had been formed into shires: see the statute 27 Hen. 8, c. 26, s. 24.

Shiremote. See FOLCMOTE; COUNTY COURT.

Shire-reeve. An early form of the word sheriff. See REEVE.

Shooting.—I. The right of shooting over land is a variety of the right of sporting (q.v.).

II. In criminal law, shooting, or attempting to shoot, a person with intent to commit murder, or to maim, disfigure, or do grievous bodily harm to him, or to prevent the lawful apprehension or detainer of any person, is felony, punishable with penal servitude for life (maximum) (Offences against the Person Act, 1861, ss. 14, 18) Shooting at vessels or boats belonging to the Navy or in the service of the Revenue, or at any officer employed in the prevention of smuggling, is felony punishable with penal servitude for any term not less than five years, or imprisonment not exceeding three years (Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, s. 193).

Shop-lifting Act. The popular title of the statute 10 Will. 3, c. 12, which made it felony without benefit of clergy (that is to say, a capital offence) to steal goods to the value of 5s. from any shop, warehouse, coach-house or stable. The Act (except ss. 7, 8, dealing with the Clerk of Assise) was repealed by the statute 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 27, s. 1.

Shops. The carrying on of business in shops is now regulated by the Shops Acts, 1912 and 1913, which (Act of 1912, s. 22 (3)) repealed the Shops Acts, 1892 to 1911, but re-enacted them in a consolidated form. The term "'shop' includes any premises where any retail trade or business is carried on"; the term "'shop-assistant' means any person wholly or mainly employed in a shop in connection with the serving of customers or the receipt of orders for the despatch of goods" (Act of 1912, s. 19 (1)).

The main provisions of the Acts are: On one day in each week—with an exception as to the week preceding a bank holiday—a shop assistant cannot be kept employed after 1.30 p.m., and all assistants must be given intervals for meals (Act of 1912, s. 1; Sch. 1); no person under the age of eighteen can be employed in or about a shop, whether wholesale or retail, for more than seventy-four hours (including meal intervals) in any week (s. 2); every shop (except shops for the sale of intoxicants, refreshments, motor cycles, etc., newspapers, etc., perishable food, tobacco, medicines, etc.) must be closed at 1 p.m. on one day in each week, except when a bank holiday occurs (s. 4, Sch. II.); and orders may be made by the local authority (see s. 13 (2)) with the approval of the Home Secretary, for the closing at particular hours—not earlier than 7 p.m.—of shops other than those for the sale of intoxicants, refreshments, newspapers, tobacco and medicines, or those used for post office business (s. 5, Sch. III.).

The Act of 1913 exempts public-houses and other such establishments from the operation of s. 1 of the Act of 1912, and contains substituted provisions which give to shop assistants employed therein intervals of leisure at periods suitable to the business carried on.

Short Cause. In the Chancery Division, when the hearing of an action (whether on motion for judgment, further consideration, or otherwise) involves no question of difficulty, and is not likely to take up much time in argument, or is such that the subject-matter of it would authorise the Court to make an order as of course, or is one in which all parties consent to the order or judgment, it may, on a certificate by the plaintiff's counsel that it is fit to be heard as a short cause, be marked as "short" in the registrar's book, instead of being set down in the ordinary cause list. One day in each week is appointed for hearing short causes, and as each is disposed of in from five minutes to a quarter of an hour, an action which has been marked "short" may be brought to a hearing with great despatch.

In the King's Bench Division, Ord. 14, r. 8, a special list is kept of cases in which, under that order, a defendant has been given leave to defend; and such cases are also known as short causes.

Short Entry. See ENTERING SHORT.

Shortford. Anciently, in the City of Exeter, this was a procedure by means of which the owner of a tenement, the rent of which was in arrear, could recover possession if no distress could be levied.

Shorthand-writers' Notes of the evidence or arguments on the trial or hearing of an action are frequently taken for future use on a motion for new trial or an appeal. As a general rule, the party taking them has to bear the expense himself. But in a special case (as where the evidence is exceptionally voluminous), the costs will be allowed by special direction of the Court. The costs of shorthand notes of the judgment of an inferior Court are allowed, as of course, by the Court of Appeal; which, moreover will ordinarily allow the costs of the summing up in the Court below, but will allow the costs of shorthand notes of the evidence below only in special cases.

The Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, s. 16, provides that shorthand notes are to be taken at the trial of any person having a right of appeal under that Act, and that transcripts of such notes are to be furnished to either party on payment of the prescribed charges. See also r. 5 of the Criminal Appeal Rules, 1908.

Short Notice of Trial. See NOTICE OF TRIAL.

Short Title. In 1845 the statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, enacted (s. 4) as follows: "In citing this Act in other Acts of Parliament, and in legal instruments, it shall be sufficient to use the expression 'The Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.'" This originated the modern practice of giving short titles to Acts of Parliament. The practice is now invariably followed; but for years after 1845 a short title might or might not be given to an Act. Thus the statute 56 & 57 Vict. c. 31, had no short title until the Short Titles Act, 1896, gave it the short title of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1893.

Now, under an order of the House of Lords, every Bill must contain a section giving it a short title.

The Short Titles Act, 1892, gave short titles to about 800 Acts. It was repealed and re-enacted by the Short Titles Act, 1896; and the latter Act gave short titles to about another 1,300 Acts. There are still, however, many Acts without short titles. Neither of the Short Titles Acts gave a short title to any Act which had been repealed at the date of their respective enactment; and in the event of its being necessary to refer to any such repealed Act in a statute or a legal instrument it must, unless it happens to have been passed since 1845, and to have had a short title, be referred to as, for instance, "An Act of the session of the 5th and 6th years of the reign of Her late Majesty Queen Victoria, chapter 52, intituled, 'An Act to Indemnify Witnesses who may give Evidence before the Lords Spiritual and Temporal on a Bill to exclude the Borough of Sudbury from sending Burgesses to serve in Parliament.'" See COLLECTIVE TITLE.

Show of Hands. Since 1872 (see HUSTING) the mode of election known as a show of hands (that is to say, by counting the hands of the electors which may be held up to indicate the candidate for whom each elector votes) has formed no part of the procedure at any election for which the use of the ballot (q.v.) is prescribed. For University elections the ballot is not prescribed, and the decision of the electors may be taken either by a show of hands, or by a poll; but the show of hands is never used. The show of hands is, however, the prescribed method of electing parish councillors—unless a poll be demanded by a certain number of the electors present at the parish meeting (Parish Councillors Election Order, 1901, rr. 12, 13).

Shrove Tuesday. The day before Ash Wednesday (q.v.); anciently called also Fasten Tuesday, that is to say, the Tuesday which was the eve of the fast.

Si actionem, etc. Before Latin (see FRENCH) ceased to be used in pleadings, these words were part of the conclusion of a plea in bar; and from 1733 until Hilary Term, 1834, the use of the same conclusion in English was obligatory. In English the conclusion was "prays judgment if the said plaintiff ought to have or maintain his aforesaid action against him": see Stephen, Pleading, 5th ed., p. 435. Compare ACTIO NON.

Si autem sacramentum fuerit, licet falsum, tamen non committit perjurium (3 Inst. 167). (But if an oath be foolish, he who takes it, does not commit perjury, even though it be false.) This is a quotation from Bracton (lib. 4, f. 188): it shows that even from an early date the law did not concern itself with the question of the truth or falsity of any oath taken without legal sanction.

Sicut alias. See ALIAS WRIT.

Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas (9 Rep. 59). (Use your own property so as not to injure your neighbour's, or (less literally, but more accurately), so as not to interfere with the rights of your neighbour.) Any man can build a reservoir on his land; but he is bound to see that it does not burst and flood his neighbour's land. Compare ÆDIFICARE IN, ETC. See OWNERSHIP.

Side-bar Rules; Side-bar. Over a hundred years ago there was in Westminster Hall a bar or partition—known as the side-bar—from within which attorney each morning of term, moved the judges, on their way to the respective Courts, for common rules known as side-bar rules. Such motions were made ex parte, and were granted as of course. Before 1825 the practice of moving at the side-bar had been discontinued, and common rules were obtainable in the rule office; but each such rule was expressed to have been obtained upon a side-bar motion and continued to be known as a side-bar rule.

The common rules were such as the rule to plead, the rule to reply, the rule to rejoin, etc.

Sidesmen. In ancient parishes—as distinguished from parishes created under the New Parishes Acts—it is lawful, under Canon 90, to appoint annually, along with the churchwardens, "sidesmen," that is to say, two or three discreet persons who are required (Statutory Declarations Act, 1835, s. 9) to sign a declaration that they will faithfully assist the churchwardens. In many places no sidesmen are appointed. In others, the appointment is quasi-permanent, the same persons being re-elected each year; and this is more particularly the case where the sidesmen are paid salaries and are supplied with gowns.

Sierra Leone Company. See COMPANIES, CHARTERED.

Sign; Signature. In the primary sense of the word, a person signs a document when he writes or marks something on it in token of his intention to be bound by its contents. In the case of an ordinary person, signature is commonly performed by his subscribing his name to the document, and hence "signature" is frequently used as equivalent to "subscription"; but any mark is sufficient if it shows an intention to be bound by the document: illiterate people commonly sign by making a cross. (See MARKSMAN.) The provisions of the 17th section of the Statute of Frauds (which requires a contract for the sale of goods in certain cases to be signed by the party to be bound) have been held to be satisfied where the party writes the memorandum forming the contract on a piece of paper on which his name is printed.

The only signature which a corporation aggregate can make is by its seal. In practice ordinary contracts by a trading company are generally signed by an agent or officer of the company on its behalf. See SEAL.

Signet is a seal with which certain documents are sealed by the principal Secretary of State on behalf of the King. Formerly, every Bill for letters patent, after being signed with the Sign Manual (q.v.), was sealed with the Signet, as a warrant or authority to the proper officer to affix the Privy Seal or Great Seal (as the case might be) to the grant. But the necessity of affixing the Signet in such cases was abolished by the statute 14 & 15 Vict. c. 82, s. 2, and the use of the signet seems practically to have ceased. (See CLERKS OF THE PRIVY SEAL.) Coke says, however, that a writ of ne exeat regno may be issued under the Signet, "for this is but a signification of the king's commandment, and nothing passeth from him" (2 Inst. 556); and this would appear to be still the case.

In the Colonial Office the Signet is still affixed to commissions.

The Signet (or Privy Signet) is the principal of the three seals—the smallest of which is called the Cachet—by the delivery of which a Secretary of State is appointed to his office, and which he surrenders on ceasing to hold the office.

Significavit is used in two senses: (i) to denote the bishop's certificate on which a writ de excommunicato or contumace capiendo is, or was, issued (Ecclesiastical Courts Act, 1813, s. 1, Sch. A), and (ii) the writ itself. The former seems to be the original and proper use of the word. The certificate is directed to the King in Chancery (that is to say, to the Lord Chancellor), and specifies the offence for which it is desired to imprison the offender (ib. s. 1). See DE CONTUMACE CAPIENDO.

Signing Judgment. In the King's Bench Division, when judgment is given in an action after the trial, the successful party draws up two forms of judgment in accordance with the certificate of the associate (see CERTIFICATE), and takes them to the proper officer, who signs one form of judgment and files it; after stamping the other with the seal of the Court, he returns it to the party. Hence the process is called "signing judgment," though the proper term is "entering." (Ord. 41, r. 1; see ENTER.) The process of signing judgment under an order, or on default, is similar.

Sign Manual is the signature or "royal hand" of the King. It is called the "sign manual" because it is the actual signature of the Crown, as distinguished from the operation of signing documents by the Signet (q.v.). Warrants for the use of the Great Seal or Wafer Great Seal are signed with the Sign Manual. See GREAT SEAL.

Silentium in senatu est vitium (12 Co. 94). Silence in the senate is a fault.) This dictum s not to be read as applying to the member f Parliament who suffers from constitutional nability to refrain from disorderly interruption. It was merely quoted by the judges in Lady Shrewsbury's Case in extenuation of their conduct in venturing to advise the Council with regard to points of law upon which many peers had already expressed opinions.

Silk Gown. See KING'S COUNSEL.

Silver Coins, Ancient. The period of the Roman occupation being left out of consideration, the earliest silver coin in general circulation was the silver penny coined by Offa in the eighth century. This, and the succeeding pennies coined up to the time of the Conquest, were of much the same weight as those coined from 1066 to 1377, which again were practically of the same weight as the threepenny piece coined in the reign of Victoria, which weighs a little more than twenty-one grains.

Down to 1272 the penny was the only silver coin. Between 1272 and 1307 Edward I. issued halfpennies and farthings, the weights of which were proportionate to their denominations. The penny continued to be issued down to some years after 1600; but its weight had gradually diminished. From twenty-two grains in 1272, it had dropped to eighteen grains in 1322; in 1412 it weighed only fifteen grains. Its weight after 1485 never exceeded twelve grains. From twelve grains it gradually sank to ten grains in 1527, to eight grains in 1552, and there was no further material reduction until the issue ceased soon after 1660. The farthing which, like the halfpenny, varied in weight with the penny, was not issued after 1543; and the halfpenny disappeared after the Protectorate. The penny, the halfpenny, and the farthing were the only silver coins down to 1327, soon after which year Edward III. issued the groat. On its first appearance, the groat was only slightly smaller than the florin of Victoria which weighs 174 grains. In 1380 the groat weighed seventy-two grains, from which it gradually sank to thirty-one grains in the reign of Charles II. The half-groat was contemporaneous with the groat down to this time. In 1831 the groat was re-issued with a weight of twenty-nine grains; but it was not again coined after 1856. This latest issue was popularly known as the fourpenny piece.

The shilling, weighing 144 grains (or just twelve times the weight of the contemporaneous silver penny), was first issued in 1504; and by the reign of Elizabeth it weighed only ninety-two grains, which does not much differ from the present weight of eighty-seven grains. In 1543, when at the intermediate weight of 120 grains, the shilling was also known as the testoon.

The crown, weighing 480 grains as against the ninety-six grains contained in the shilling of the period, the half-crown, the sixpence and the threepence, weighing 24 grains, first appeared in 1552. The crown and the half-crown, with slightly varying weights, have been issued during nearly every subsequent reign as well as during the Commonwealth and the Protectorate. The threepence continued to be issued occasionally down to 1685; but it was not coined from then until the reign of Victoria. The sixpence has been issued concurrently with every issue of the shilling.

The twopenny, the three-halfpence and the three-farthing pieces were silver coins issued only during the reign of Elizabeth. The twopenny was of practically the same weight as the half-groat.

Cromwell issued a two shilling piece or double shilling, weighing 163 grains, in 1658. It was the nearest early equivalent of the modern florin, which did not appear until the reign of Victoria.

The pound, the shilling and the mark, were in use as measures of money before the Norman Conquest; the first two are still used; and, in an order of the High Court, the mark was used to measure a penalty so late as 1770. Yet a writer of 1575 who said "Poundes markes and shillings, which though they have no coynes, yet there is no name more in use than they," was quite correct, except as regards the shilling, the issue of which in 1504 (see supra) he perhaps had overlooked. There never was such a coin as the mark, and, except as regards a few pounds weighing 1,858 grains (exactly twenty times the weight of the contemporaneous shilling), which, along with half-pound pieces, were coined by Charles I. during the Civil War, there has never been such a coin as the pound. Originally a pound meant about 5,760 grains (the pound troy) of pure silver, a mark meant so much silver as weighed a mark or two-thirds of a pound weight, and a shilling meant one-twentieth part of a pound weight of silver; while a shilling was the equivalent of twelve of the early silver pennies, each of which was therefore approximately one two-hundred and fortieth part of the pound. By the reign of Charles I. the pound, the shilling and the penny, as will be seen from the earlier part of this article, were, or represented, only about one-third of their original weight in silver; and the same applied to the mark, which all through was two-thirds of the pound for the time being. But from the earliest times, the pound, the mark and the shilling were used as measures of money in Acts of Parliament, charters, deeds, etc., in the reservation of rents of land and in the buying and selling of goods, the gold coinage (see GOLD COINS, ANCIENT) never being mentioned either then or nowadays in any such matter.

Similiter. That set form of words used by the plaintiff or defendant in an action by which he signified his acceptance of the issue tendered by his opponent, was so called. When simply added to the adversary's pleading, containing the tender of issue, it was in the following form: "And the plaintiff [or defendant, as the case might be] doth the like." When instead of being simply added to the pleading as above explained, it was delivered to the opposite party as a separate instrument, it then ran in the following form: "And the plaintiff, as to the plea of the defendant by him above pleaded, and whereof he hath put himself upon the country, doth the like;" in which latter case it was called a "special similiter." The use of the similiter was applicable only to issues of fact which were triable by the country (i.e., a jury). The resort to a jury in ancient times could in general be had only by the mutual consent of each party; and it appears to have been with the object of expressing such consent, that the similiter was in those times added in drawing up the record; and from the record it afterwards found its way into the written pleadings. Accordingly, no similiter or other acceptance of issue was ever necessary, when recourse was had to any of the other modes of trial (Steph. Pl. 265, 266, 4th ed.). Under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 79, the similiter ceased to be necessary.

Simoniacal; Simony. "Simony," says Stephen, "according to the canonists, is defined to be a deliberate act, or a premeditated will and desire of selling such things as are spiritual, or of anything annexed unto spirituals, by giving something of a temporal nature for the purchase thereof." Thus it is simony for anyone to purchase the next presentation to a living when it is vacant; and it is simony for a clergyman to purchase a next presentation even when the church is full; but, with these exceptions, the buying and selling of advowsons and next presentations is not illegal, provided that the next presentation is not dealt with separately from the advowson.

All simoniacal contracts, presentations, collations, etc., are void; and the persons guilty of the offence are subject to penalties.

See NEXT PRESENTATION; RESIGNATION BONDS.

Simple. See CONTRACT; HOMAGE; LARCENY; SALE.

Simplex beneficium. A minor dignity in a cathedral or collegiate church without a cure of souls. The holding of such a dignity along with a parochial cure of souls never amounted to a plurality.

Simplex justicianus, At an early period this meant a judge other than the chief judge of a Court. It corresponded to the later puisne (q.v.) judge.

Simplex obligatio non obligat (D. 4, 3, 37). (A simple commendation of goods, etc., by a vendor involves him in no liability.) See EA QUÆ COMMENDANDI, ETC.

Simplicitas est legibus amica (4 Rep. 5). (Simplicity is the friend of the laws): that is to say, a natural interpretation is to be preferred to a forced construction. Compare NIMIA, ETC.

Simul cum. (Together with.) Used formerly in indictments, as where the doing of an act was by "A simul cum divers others unknown," or in declarations (q.v.) where the writ was against two persons and the plaintiff declared against one of them simul cum the other.

Sine assensu capitali. An obsolete writ of entry which lay where a bishop or other dignitary had aliened church lands without the assent of the chapter or other body whose assent should have been obtained.

Sinecure. In former times the rector of an advowson had power, with the proper consent, to entitle (that is, appoint) a vicar to officiate under him; so that two persons were instituted to the same church. By degrees, the rectors who had entitled vicars got themselves excused from residence, and devolved the whole spiritual cure upon the vicars. In such a case the rectory became merely nominal, without cure of souls (sine curâ), and was hence called a sinecure.

Provision for the suppression of sinecure rectories and for the endowment out of their revenues of the vicarages or the perpetual curacies previously dependent on them was made by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners Act, 1840, ss. 48, 54, 55.

Sine die. (Without day.) See ADJOURNMENT; EAT INDE SINE DIE.

Singular. Unless the contrary intention appears, the singular includes the plural in every Act of Parliament passed after the year 1850 (Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 1).

Si non omnes. Where a writ of oyer and terminer had been issued it was anciently customary to issue to the justices named therein a further writ, entitled si non omnes, which authorised any two of them to act in the absence of the others. See F. N. B. 111.

Sipessocna. This meant a hundred (of land): see Leg. Hen. 1, c. 6.

Si quidem in nomine, cognomine, prænomine, legatarii testator erraverit, cum de personâ constat, nihilominus valet legatum (Inst. 2, 20, 29). (Though a testator may have made a mistake as to the name or names of the legatee, when it is certain who is the person meant, the legacy is nevertheless valid.) Compare FALSA DEMONSTRATIONE, ETC.

Si quid universitati debetur singulis non debetur nec quod debet universitas singuli debent (D. 3, 4, 7, 1). (If anything is owed to an entire body it is not owed to the individual members, nor do the individual members owe what is owed by the entire body.) But partners are individually liable for every debt due by their firm. The maxim is, however, true of corporations aggregate.

Si quis. (If any one.) The si quis is a notice posted in the parish church of a candidate for Holy orders, stating that "if any one" knows of any just cause why the candidate should not be ordained, then the bishop is to be informed of such just cause.

Si quis unum percusserit, cum alium percutere vellet, in felonîâ tenetur (3 Inst. 51). (If a man kill one, meaning to kill another, he is held guilty of felony.) The law holds him guilty of murder or manslaughter, provided, of course, that the killing is unlawful.

Si recognoscant. A writ which anciently lay for a creditor against a debtor who had acknowledged in the old County Court that he owed such and such a sum for money lent.

Sittings. The sittings of the Supreme Court are four in number: the Hilary Sittings, commencing on the 11th January and ending on the Wednesday before Easter; the Easter Sittings, commencing on the Tuesday after Easter Week and ending on the Friday before Whit Sunday; the Trinity Sittings, commencing on the Tuesday after Whitsun Week and ending on 31st July, and the Michaelmas Sittings, commencing on 24th October and ending on 31st December (Ord. 63, r. 1). Formerly the sittings of the Courts of Chancery and Common Law were regulated by the terms (q.v.), and hence were distinguished as sittings in and sittings after term. Terms were abolished and sittings substituted for them by the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 26.

The sittings of the officers of the Supreme Court extend over the whole year (Ord. 63, r. 3), with the exception (ib., r. 6), of Sundays, Christmas Day, Good Friday and six other specified days.

Six Acts, The. The popular title of the group of Acts 60 Geo. 3, and 1 Geo. 4, cc. 1, 2, 4, 6, 8, 9: portions of c. 1 (the Unlawful Drilling Act, 1819), c. 4 (the Pleading in Misdemeanour Act, 1819), and c. 8 (the Criminal Libel Act, 1819), are still unrepealed. The "Gagging Acts" was another popular title.

The six Acts in effect prohibited the training of persons to arms; authorised general searches and seizure of arms; prohibited meetings of more than fifty persons for the discussion of public grievances; repressed with heavy penalties and confiscation seditious and blasphemous libels; and checked pamphleteering by extending the newspaper stamp duty to political pamphlets.

Six Articles, Law of the. A popular title of the statute 31 Hen. 8, c. 14, entitled "An Act abolishing Diversity in Opinyons." Any person who expressed any opinion, either orally or in writing, contrary to the Real Presence was (s. 1) to be burned as a heretic; anyone who spoke or wrote against communion in one kind only for the laity, against the celibacy of the clergy, against the binding force of vows of chastity, or against private masses or against auricular confession was (s. 2) to suffer death as a felon without benefit of clergy. These were the Six Articles. Anyone bound by vows of celibacy who married, was also (s. 2) a felon without benefit of clergy. The Act was repealed by the statute 1 Edw. 6, c. 12, s. 2.

Six Clerks. Formerly there were in the Court of Chancery six officials, collectively known as the Six Clerks. Each of them was known as a Six Clerk. They seem to have descended from the six clerici prænotarii of the Chancery whom Fleta (lib. 2, cc. 13, 15) mentions. In the reign of Elizabeth they were, in theory, "the only attornies" of the Court; but in practice they were the intermediaries between solicitors and the Court. Later their duties corresponded to those subsequently performed by the Clerks of Records and Writs (q.v.). The statute 3 & 4 Will 4, c. 94, provided that until the number of six clerks had been reduced to two, no vacancies should be filled, and there were in fact only five Six Clerks when the Court of Chancery Act, 1842, s. 1, abolished them. The Act of 1842 transferred some of their duties to the Clerk of Enrolments in Chancery (q.v.), and others to the Clerks of Records and Writs (q.v.).

See The "Six Clerks in Chancery," by T. W. Braithwaite, 8vo. London, 1879.

Sixpenny Writ Office. An office of the old Court of Chancery. The head of the office was known as the deputy. He received in 1798 a salary of £100 a year, in return for which he had "to attend every public day at the Cursitors, Six Clerks and Subpœna Offices, and to take an account of the writs sealed; to receive the duty on the same, also the duty on extra writs at the Crown Office; and to receive from the Purse Bearer the duty on all writs received at private seals; to pay the Sealer, the Deputy Sealer, the Chaff Wax, the Deputy Chaff Wax, the Gentlemen of the Chamber, and the Messenger of the Great Seal, their respective salaries out of the said duty each Term, and to pay the surplus, after deducting the receiver's salary, to the Clerk of the Hanaper." He collected duties to an average annual amount of about £600 (see Reports from Committees of the House of Commons, 15 vols., fol. Lond. 1803, p. 250). The office seems to have been abolished about 1852 at the time that the Sealer (q.v.) and the Chaff Wax (q.v.) and other such officials disappeared.

Sixty Clerks, The. From an early period, the Six Clerks employed assistants, who had, however, no legal status until in 1596 they were made officers of the Court, eight of them being assigned to each of the Six Clerks. This number of eight was increased a little later to first nine and then ten, so that in fact they became "the Sixty Clerks." They received a percentage of the fees payable to the Six Clerks. They were later known as the Sworn Clerks, under which designation they were abolished by the Court of Chancery Act, 1842, s. 1.

"Six-Wheelers." See TRAILERS.

Sky Signs. An advertisement consisting of letters, etc., so attached to a house, etc., that the letters, etc., stand out against the sky. A fuller definition is given in s. 125 of the London Building Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. coxiii.); s. 127 of that Act prohibits the erection of any sky sign after the commencement of the Act; but ss. 128, 129 permit the maintenance of existing sky signs during a limited period which has long since expired. The Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1907, s. 91, which applies outside the area governed by the Act of 1904, contains provisions to the same effect as ss. 125, 127, 128, 129 of the Act of 1904.

Slander. A false and malicious statement concerning a person made by word of mouth is a slander, giving rise to a right of action for damages: (i) if it imputes to the plaintiff the commission of a crime for which a corporal punishment may be inflicted, or the having some contagious disorder which may exclude him from society, or has reference to his trade, office, or profession, and is calculated to injure him therein or (Slander of Women Act, 1891) if it imputes unchastity or adultery to any plaintiff being a woman or girl; or (ii) if it has caused him special damage. The first kind is called slander per se, and the latter kind is called slander by reason of special damage. Thus, if one man falsely and maliciously says of another that he is [illegible] (v.) See E a swindler, or a leper, or that, being [illegible] e is a rogue, this is slander per se. In Rep nce of special damage, words imputing unchastity to a man are not actionable unless it is averred or unless the innuendo is that the misconduct in question was committed in the course of professional duties or under colour of an office. In the case of words imputing unchastity to a woman, the costs are as the costs in other actions, if there has been special damage, but if they are actionable only under the Act of 1891, then that Act provides that the plaintiff can recover no more costs than damages unless the judge certifies that there was reasonable cause for the action. Mere words of abuse are not actionable. In the class of slander on a person with reference to his occupation may also be included what is called slander of quality of goods, namely, a false and malicious statement throwing discredit on the commodity in which the party deals; as where a man said of a trader: "He hath nothing but rotten goods in his shop."

A statement in itself defamatory is not actionable if it is privileged: see PRIVILEGED.

See APOLOGY; DEFAMATION; JUSTIFICATION; LIBEL; MALICE.

Slander of title is a false and malicious statement, whether by word of mouth or in writing, with reference to a person's title to some right or property belonging to him, as where a person alleges that the plaintiff has a defective title to land, or to a patent. It seems that slander of title is not actionable unless special damage results from it.

A written slander of title is sometimes called a "libel in the nature of slander of title."

Slaughter-houses. Provisions for the registration, licensing and regulation of slaughter-houses or places for killing sheep and cattle, are contained in the sections (125-131) of the Towns Improvement Clauses Act, 1847, incorporated by the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 169, and, in places where Pt. III. of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, has been adopted, by s. 29 of the last-named Act. In the Metropolis, slaughter-houses must be licensed by the county council (Public Health (London) Act, 1891, s. 20), and since 31st December, 1891, can be established anew only with the consent of that body (ib. 19).

Slave. In 1705 it was held by the King's Bench, where one Gould had taken a negro, alleged to be the slave of one Smith, that the action of trover did not lie, inasmuch as the negro was not the slave, that is to say, the chattel, of his alleged master, but that an action lay in trespass quare captivum suum cepit, inasmuch as the negro, if a captive, was therefore a villein; but it does not appear that any further action was taken. In 1772 it was held in Sommersett's Case that once a negro slave had set foot on English soil he was a free man.

Slave Trading is a felony, punishable with, as a maximum, penal servitude for fourteen years (Slave Trade Act, 1824, s. 10).

Piratical slave trading is the offence ("piracy, felony and robbery") of carrying away or assisting in carrying away any person from any part of His Majesty's dominions, for the purpose of his being dealt with as a slave (ib., s. 9). It is punishable with, as a maximum, penal servitude for life.

The Slave Trade Act, 1873, is "an Act for consolidating the Acts for carrying into effect treaties for the more effectual suppression of the slave trade."

The Kidnapping Act, 1872, makes it an offence to decoy any native of any Pacific island (not subject to the jurisdiction of any civilised power) for the purpose of removing him elsewhere; but the offence is triable in the Courts of the Australian Colonies or (see the Pacific Islanders' Protection Act, 1875), in the Pacific Islands.

Slip. In negotiations for a policy of marine insurance, the agreement is in practice concluded between the parties by a memorandum called the slip, containing the terms of the proposed insurance, and initialed by the underwriters. Although, under the Marine Insurance Act, 1906, s. 22 (which requires every contract of marine insurance to be expressed in a policy) the slip is not itself enforceable, it is for many other purposes of legal effect; thus, where a slip has been initialed, the assured need not communicate to the insurer facts which afterwards come to his knowledge material to the risk insured against, and the non-disclosure of those facts will not vitiate the policy afterwards executed, although it would do so if there were no slip. The slip is in fact a binding contract for the issue of the policy.

Slip Order. A colloquial title for Ord. 28, r. 11, under which clerical mistakes and accidental slips in judgments or orders, and consequential errors, may be corrected in a summary way on motion or summons.

Slough-silver. A rent formerly paid to the owner of the castle of Wigmore in commutation of the service of rendering certain days work in harvest.

"S.L.R." The Statute Law Revision Act [1875, or as the case may be] which, since 1861 has been passed every few years to remove from the statute book Acts or parts of Acts, which have become wholly obsolete (see, e.g., POUR PROCLAIMER, ETC.) or which have been impliedly repealed by subsequent legislation or—as has been the case since 1890 as regards many preambles to statutes—which Parliament thinks superfluous.

The quasi-repeal effected by the S.L.R. Acts differs from other repeals. It is in the main clerical only. The Acts have been passed chiefly in order to cut down the vast body of statute law to such dimensions as will permit of its publication in the comparatively small number of volumes known as the Statutes Revised; and the legal effect—if any—of anything "repealed" by the Acts remains notwithstanding such "repeal."

Small Dwellings. The Small Dwellings Acquisition Act, 1899, enables local authorities to make advances not exceeding £320 in any case to enable persons to acquire small houses for residential purposes.

Small Holding. This expression is defined by the Small Holdings and Allotments Act, 1908, s. 61, as meaning, for the purposes of that Act, "an agricultural holding which exceeds one acre" [if it did not exceed one acre it would be an allotment (q.v.)], "and either does not exceed fifty acres, or, if exceeding fifty acres, is at the date of sale or letting of an annual value, for the purposes of income tax, not exceeding £50." Part I. (ss. 1-22) of the Act enables county councils, or councils of boroughs and urban districts, to purchase or hire land and to sell or let it for small holdings, and to make advances up to four-fifths of the purchase-money to tenants buying small holdings from landlords.

Small Holdings Commissioners. Two or more persons whom the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries may appoint (Small Holdings and Allotments Act, 1908, s. 2 (1)) for the purpose of aiding in the provision of small holdings and (s. 24 (4)), where the county council makes default, of allotments. These Commissioners are mere executive officers of the Minister.

Small Pox. See VACCINATION.

Smoke. The production of smoke in large quantities may be a ground for a civil action or for a prosecution for a nuisance at common law.

Under the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 114 (as amended by the Regulation of Railways Act, 1868, s. 19), railway companies are liable to a penalty for any locomotive not constructed so as to consume its own smoke, so far as is practicable. There are like enactments as regards steam locomotives on highways (Locomotive Act, 1861, s. 8), and as regards steam vessels on the Thames above the Nore (Public Health (London) Act, 1891, s. 23). But these enactments, like those regarding smoke from chimneys (q.v.), are not always enforced.

Smoke-farthing. See FUMAGE; PENTECOSTALS.

Smoking Carriages. All railways, other than the Metropolitan, must, unless exempted by the Board of Trade, provide on every passenger train smoking compartments for each class of passengers (Regulation of Railways Act, 1868, s. 20); and persons smoking in other carriages are liable to penalties under bye-laws made by the companies pursuant to the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, ss. 108 and 109, and approved by the Board of Trade pursuant to the Railway Regulation Act, 1840, s. 7.

Smugglers Act. A former popular title of the statute 19 Geo. 2, c. 34. It was repealed by the S. L. R. Act, 1867.

Smuggling is the offence of importing or exporting prohibited goods, or of importing or exporting goods without paying the duties imposed on them. Goods so imported are liable to confiscation, and the offenders are liable to forfeit treble the value of the goods, or the penalty of £100. Persons assembling together for the purpose of smuggling are liable to imprisonment. The main enactment on the subject is the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876. See SHOOTING.

See DRUGS, DANGEROUS.

Socage is a kind of tenure, distinguished from the tenure of frankalmoign (q.v.) by its services being certain and of a temporal nature, and from the tenure of knight's service (q.v.), by its services having been originally agricultural. See SERVICE; TENURE.

Socage was orginally of two kinds, free socage and villein socage, according as the services were free or base. Thus, where a man held land by fealty and a fixed rent, the tenure was free socage. Free socage was of two kinds, socage in capite and common socage, but the former has been abolished. (See IN CAPITE.) Common free socage is the modern ordinary freehold tenure. (See FREEHOLD.) It has in theory the incidents of fealty, relief and wardship; but in practice they rarely occur. (See INCIDENT.) The tenures of petty serjeanty (q.v.), burgage (q.v.) and gavelkind (q.v.) are varieties of free socage. Villein socage is now represented by tenure in ancient demesne (q.v.). It differed from ordinary villenage in its services being certain. See VILLENAGE.

Bracton, Littleton, and other old writers, derive socage from the French soc, a ploughshare, because much land was anciently held by the service of ploughing the lord's land for so many days in the year. Some modern writers, on the other hand, incline to the derivation from the Anglo-Saxon soc, or rather sôcn, in the sense of "jurisdiction," because tenants in socage were the free suitors of the lord's Courts.

Socagium idem est quod servitium socæ; et soca idem est quod caruca (Litt. § 119). (Socage is the same thing as the service of the soc; and the soc is the same thing as the plough.) Littleton is probably wrong as regards the first of these statements: it is immaterial whether he is right or wrong as regards the second. See SOCAGE.

Societies, Unlawful. Unlawful societies are (1) those whose members are obliged to take any oath or enter into any engagement prohibited by the Unlawful Oaths Acts, 1797 and 1812; and (2) societies prescribing any oath, etc., not authorised by law, or having members or officers not known to all the members, or having distinct branches or delegates who induce persons to join (Unlawful Societies Act, 1799, s. 2; Seditious Meetings Act, 1817, s. 25). There are exceptions, subject to conditions, in favour of Freemasons' lodges (Act of 1799, ss. 5-7; Act of 1817, s. 26), Quakers and religious and charitable societies not going outside their ostensible objects (Act of 1917, s. 27), and registered friendly societies which confine themselves to their own business (Friendly Societies Act, 1896, s. 32).

Socii mei socius meus socius non est (D. 50, 17, 47). (The partner of my partner is not my partner.) See PARTNER.

Socman. One who held in socage (q.v.).

Socome. A custom of grinding corn at the lord's mill. Where the grinding was obligatory the custom was known as bond socome, and where it was voluntary the custom was called love socome.

Sodomy. See ABOMINABLE CRIME.

Soke-land. See BOND-LAND.

Sokemanry. The tenure of land by a sokeman or socman (q.v.); and also the socmen collectively.

Solicitor is a person employed to conduct the prosecution or defence of an action or other legal proceeding on behalf of another, or to advise him on legal questions, or to frame documents intended to have a legal operation, or generally to assist him in matters affecting his legal position. To enable a person to practise as a solicitor, he must serve a term as an articled clerk (q.v.), pass certain examinations (see EXAMINATION), be admitted and enrolled as a solicitor of the Supreme Court of Judicature (see ROLLS; LAW SOCIETY), and take out a yearly certificate (granted by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue) authorising him to practise (Solicitors Act, 1843, ss. 21, 26). The usual period of service as an articled clerk is five years (ib. s. 3); but the judges may make rules reducing the period to four years in the cases of articled clerks having passed certain examinations (q.v.) at certain universities and educational institutions (Solicitors Act, 1922, s. 3); and the period is only three years in the cases of persons who have taken the degree of Bachelor of Arts or Bachelor of Science at any such university (ib. s. 4). As to the universities in question, see s. 9. As to the effect of bankruptcy, see that title.

Solicitors are not only bound to use reasonable diligence and skill in transacting the business of their clients, but they also occupy a fiduciary position towards their clients, so that a dealing (such as a purchase of property) between a solicitor and his client, is always liable to be impugned unless the client was able to protect himself, or had independent advice. (See FIDUCIARY; FRAUD; UNDUE INFLUENCE.) On the other hand, a solicitor is entitled to remuneration for his services, which he may recover not only by action (subject to the provisions of the Solicitors Acts; see TAXATION), but also by a lien on the property of his client to the extent of his costs, or by obtaining a declaration of charge on it. (See CHARGE; LIEN.) Solicitors are also considered as officers of the Courts in which they practise, and consequently the Courts have always exercised summary jurisdiction over them. If a solicitor is guilty of gross professional misconduct, the Law Society (q.v.) will order his name to be struck off the roll of practising solicitors; and if a solicitor institutes frivolous or vexatious proceedings in the name of a client, he may be ordered by the Court to pay the costs of them personally. Solicitors are subject to special provisions as to the delivery and taxation of their bills of costs against their clients, as to which, see TAXATION.

Solicitors have now very extensive rights of audience. The principal exceptions to their right are the House of Lords, the Supreme Court, and Quarter Sessions where barristers attend.

The professional services of a barrister can be obtained only through a solicitor except (1) in practice, where a judge requests a barrister to defend gratuitously a prisoner about to be tried on indictment or where a barrister undertakes a dock-defence (q.v.), or where the Court of Criminal Appeal, without assigning a solicitor, assigns counsel to an appellant under s. 10 of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907; and (2), in theory, as regards non-contentious business.

A barrister is not forbidden by any express rule of professional etiquette from, for instance, accepting instructions, and a fee, direct from a client for the drafting of a marriage settlement; but the General Council of the Bar has expressed the view that such a course is undesirable. See ATTORNEY.

Solicitor-General is the second of the Law Officers (q.v.). His functions are political as well as legal, for he is almost invariably a member of the House of Commons, where he acts as the deputy or assistant of the Attorney-General (q.v.). The office is conferred by patent, and is held at the pleasure of the Crown. The Solicitor-General receives £6,000; he cannot since 1895 take private business.

Solinus terræ. A measure of land in Kent at the time of Domesday. The acreage is uncertain. Coke says that it meant rather less than two plough-lands and a half which (see PLOUGH; CARUCATE) still leaves the area uncertain. Jacob (1749), who probably had no accurate knowledge on the subject, says that it was about 160 acres.

Solitary Confinement. Many statutes (such as the Criminal Law Consolidation Act of 1861) of the middle of the last century empowered the Court, when sentencing a prisoner convicted on indictment, to order that during part of the sentence he should be kept in solitary confinement; but the isolation of prisoners is now provided for generally by s. 17 of the Prison Act, 1865; and particular sections which deal with the matter in other Acts have for the most part been repealed.

Solutione feodi militis parliamenti (or Bargensis parliamenti), De. A writ which anciently lay for a knight of the shire or for a burgess (borough member) whose constituents did not pay him the wages to which a member of Parliament was anciently entitled: see the statute 35 Hen. 8, c. 11.

Solutio pretii emptionis loco habetur (Jenk. Cent. 56). (The payment of the price stands in the place of the purchase.) This maxim is cited in connection with a decision that where A had bailed goods to B in such a way as to pass the property in them, then A, where he took the goods "clam et noctanter," was guilty of felony.

Solvendo esse. To be solvent.

Solvere pœnas. To undergo the punishment prescribed for an offence.

Solvit ad diem. While Latin was the language of pleadings (see FRENCH) this was the name of the plea by the defendant, in an action on a bond bill, etc., that he had "paid on the day" the money was due.

Solvitur in modum solventis (5 Bing. N. C. 461). See QUICQUID SOLVITUR, ETC.

Somerset. See HERALDS.

Son assault demesne (His own assault) was formerly the name given to that plea or defence by which a person against whom an action is brought for assault justifies himself by saying that the plaintiff or prosecutor assaulted him first, and that the assault complained of was committed in self-defence.

Sontage. This is said by Stow to have been a tax of forty shillings or every knight's fee.

Sound. An action which is brought to recover damages is said to "sound in damages," as opposed to an action for debt.

Soup. At certain Courts where prisoners are tried on indictment, it is the custom, in cases which are not privately prosecuted, to hand out the briefs to counsel who are members of the bar-mess connected with the Court and who regularly attend. In some cases only counsel who have been members of the mess for two or three years are eligible for such briefs, which are known as "soup," the reference being to the soup which used to be supplied, either gratuitously or at a low cost, to the poor or the unemployed at institutions known as soup-kitchens.

Southern Ireland. See NORTHERN IRELAND.

South Sea Company. A company incorporated in 1711 under a Royal Charter giving it a monopoly of trade to the South Seas pursuant to the statute 9 Ann. c. 15. The exclusive privilege of the company was abolished by the statute 55 Geo. 3, c. 57. The company, which was largely engaged in the whale fishery, continued to exist until 1850.

Sovereign. See GOLD COINS.

Spatæ placitum. (The plea of the sword.) A species of military Court mentioned in a document of the reign of Henry III. as having been held in Normandy by Henry II. and Richard I. Cowell (1749) states that it was a Court for the speedy punishment of military delinquents, but this may be merely a surmise. The spata (or more correctly spatha) was the short sword of the Roman legionary. This "plea of the sword" seems to have been distinct from the PLEAS OF THE SWORD (q.v.) anciently known as placita gladii.

Speaker. The Lord Chancellor (see CHANCELLOR) is ex officio the Speaker of the House of Lords, but he is never spoken of by that title. The Speaker of the Lords has no such position of authority as is held by the Speaker of the Commons. In the Lords the Speaker has, for instance, no control over a disorderly peer. "The Speaker" always means the Speaker of the House of Commons. That officer is the member of the House through whom it communicates with the Sovereign; but the substantial modern part of his duties it to preside over the proceedings of the House and enforce obedience to its orders (see also the Parliament Act, 1911). He is always a member of the House of Commons, and is elected, subject to the approval of the Crown, on the first day that a new Parliament assembles.

When the House is in Committee of the Whole House the Chairman of Ways and Means (whose salary is £2,500) or the Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (whose salary is £1,000) presides. Both of them, like the Speaker, are members, and like him are elected by the House; but in their case the Royal approval is not required. The Chairman, or in his unavoidable absence, the Deputy Chairman, can act as Deputy Speaker in the absence of the Speaker.

The Speaker receives £5,000 a year (House of Commons (Officers) Act, 1854, s. 1) and the use of a commodious house in the Palace of Westminster (q.v.). He neither takes part in debates nor votes—the Lord Chancellor does both the one thing and the other in the Lords, and down to 1835 the Speaker of the Commons used sometimes to take part in debates when the House was in committee—and his authority and his impartiality are practically unquestioned. In point of precedence outside the House he ranks next after the Prime Minister (q.v.). He is officially described as Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker's tenure of office is only during the continuance of the Parliament which elects him. For certain purposes connected with officers of the House he is, however, deemed to be Speaker between the dissolution of one Parliament and the meeting of the next (House of Commons (Officers) Act, 1846, s. 5), and in practice since 1835 the same Speaker is re-elected until, at the end of ten or fifteen years, he intimates his desire to retire. Then the House prays the Sovereign to grant him " some signal mark " of favour; the Sovereign replies that he is only too willing, but that he cannot act without the " concurrence " of the House; the House votes the retiring Speaker an annuity for his life of £4,000, and the Sovereign makes him a viscount. See, for instance, Mr. Speaker's Retirement Act, 1921.

Special. See AGENCY; AUTHORITY; BAIL; DAMAGE; DEFENCE; DEMURRER; EXAMINER; INDORSEMENT; JUDGMENT; JURY; LICENCE; OCCUPANCY; PAPER; PLEA; PLEADER; POWER; REFEREE; RESOLUTION; VERDICT.

Special Act. An Act directed towards a special object or a special class of objects. Thus, for instance, the various Clauses Acts (q.v.) frequently described as " special Acts " the particular Acts which might subsequently be passed regarding particular undertakings of the kind contemplated by the Clauses Acts.

Special Allowances. In taxing the costs of an action as between party and party, the master is, in certain cases, empowered to make special allowances, that is, to allow the party costs which the ordinary scale does not warrant. See Ord. 65, r. 27.

Special Case, in procedure, is a mode of obtaining a judicial decision on a statement of facts submitted to the Court by the parties without the aid of pleadings (q.v.). The parties to an action may, after the writ of summons has been issued, concur in stating the questions of law arising in the action in the form of a special case for the opinion of the Court (Ord. 34, r. 1). But independently of the agreement of the parties, if it appears from the pleadings or otherwise in an action that there is a question of law which it would be convenient to have decided before any other proceedings are taken, the Court may direct it to be raised by special case (ib. r. 2). See VERDICT.

A special case is set down for hearing, and argued in Court, after which judgment is given according to the rights of the parties. The Court has power to draw inferences of fact, that is, to deduce from facts stated the existence of facts not expressly stated.

See DEMURRER; QUESTIONS OF LAW. Compare ADVICE OF COURT.

Special Finding. See VERDICT.

Specialia generalibus derogant (L. R. 1 C. P. 546). (Special words derogate from general ones.) Compare GENERALIA SPECIALIBUS, ETC.

Special Limits. In the Metropolitan Streets Act, 1867, this expression (see s. 2) means such streets and portions of streets as may be declared to be " special limits " in manner provided by that Act. The making of special limits is authorised by s. 10 and s. 11, and enables the police to make special regulations as to traffic within such limits, while ss. 14-16 contain provisions which apply to any place which may be declared a special limit. The corresponding enactment for the City is the City of London (Street Traffic) Act, 1909 (9 Edw. 7, c. lxvii.).

Special Paper Days. In the Common Law Courts this formerly meant days on which cases in the Special Paper were argued. See PAPER DAYS.

Special Pleader. See DRAFTSMAN; PLEADER.

Special Reserve. This is now called the militia (q.v.).

Special Sessions are meetings of two or more justices of the peace held for the purpose of executing some jurisdiction (such as the licensing of ale-houses) which can be exercised by justices out of quarter sessions. They are held either upon dates fixed by the statute applicable to the matter, or, where quarter sessions are empowered to fix the dates, upon dates fixed by quarter sessions. Notice of the holding of special sessions must be given to all justices who act for the division in which such sessions are to be held (County Rates Act, 1844, s. 7).

Special Tail. See ESTATE TAIL.

Special Traverse. A form of plea (or defence as we should now say) abolished by s. 65 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852. It consisted of two parts. The first part (known as the inducement) consisted of affirmative matter; the second part (known as the absque hoc) consisted of a denial, that is to say, a traverse in the proper sense of the word, and was introduced by the words "Without this, that." See Stephen on Pleading (5th ed.), pp. 193 et seq.; SANS CEO QUE.

Specialty. A contract under seal. Specialty debts are debts due on such a contract. See DEBTS; ASSETS

Specificatio, in Roman law, was a mode by which one person could acquire property belonging to another by making it into something different; as where a man made wine out of another's grapes: but the specificator was liable to make compensation to the original owner. Specificatio or specification is treated by Blackstone and others as a variety of accession (q.v.).

Specification. When a person applies for a patent (see PATENTS), he must (Patents and Designs Act, 1907, s. 1 (3)) leave with his petition a statement in writing describing the nature of his invention and called the specification. The specification may be either complete or provisional (ib.). If it be provisional the specification as a whole will consist of (1) the title (q.v.); (2) the provisional specification; (3) the complete specification; (4) the claims (q.v.); and (5) the drawings or, in the case of a chemical invention, the samples or specimens. Specifications require to be framed with great care, neither covering more than is the proper subject of the patent, nor omitting anything necessary to make the description intelligible. See DISCLAIMER; MEMORANDUM OF ALTERATION.

Specific Performance. The doctrine of specific performance is that where damages would be an inadequate compensation for the breach of an agreement, the contractor will be compelled to perform specifically what he has agreed to do. The principal instances of the jurisdiction occur in contracts for the sale, purchase or lease of land, or for the recovery of unique chattels, of which the Pusey Horn (see CORNAGE) is a well-known example. In such cases the Court (e.g., the High Court, in an action instituted in the Chancery Division) will order the defendant to carry out the sale, purchase, or lease, or deliver up the chattel, and will imprison him until he does so. But the Court will not order specific performance of a personal contract, such as a contract to sing or paint a picture. See CONTRACT.

See CAIRNS' ACT.

Spes recuperandi. (The hope of recovery.) If it be entertained by a person in danger of death it makes a declaration by him inadmissible in evidence even though he in fact dies.

Spigurnel. The early name of an officer of the Chancery corresponding to the sealer (q.v.) of a later date. The office was one of dignity; thus it was for a long time held hereditarily by the great family of Bohun.

Spinning House. This was a prison at Cambridge used by the University authorities for the detention of light women convicted (under a royal charter of 26th April, 1561, as confirmed by the statute 13 Eliz. c. 29) of associating for immoral purposes with undergraduates. This jurisdiction was taken away in 1894 by the statute 57 & 58 Vict. c. lx, ss. 4-12. That enactment applied to Cambridge the Act 6 Geo. 4, c. 97, s. 3, which up to then had applied only to Oxford. The Act of George IV. provides that any woman guilty of conduct such as had been punishable with detention in the Spinning House, should be deemed an idle and disorderly person within the meaning of the Vagrancy Act, 1824. The effect is that any such person is now punishable only under the Vagrancy Act.

Spinster. The "addition," or description, in deeds of a woman who has never been married. She is described, e.g., as "Jane Brown, Spinster."

Spiritual; Spiritualities. See CORPORATION; GUARDIAN OF THE SPIRITUALITIES; SERVICE; TEMPORALITIES.

Spiritualism. Used loosely as meaning alleged communication with the spirits of dead persons. The law seems to have committed itself to the position that no such communications in fact take place. A person professing to effect such communications has been held to be within the provisions against fortune-telling, etc., contained in s. 4 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824; if he obtains money for effecting them, he runs the risk of a prosecution for obtaining money by false pretences; and if he obtains a legacy from a testator who has acted on the alleged advice of the spirits, the will has no chance of standing.

Spoliation is a suit in a spiritual Court by which an incumbent of a benefice suggests that his adversary has wasted (spoliavit) the fruits of the benefice, or received them to his prejudice. Such a suit lies by one incumbent against another to try which of them is the rightful incumbent where they both claim by one patron, and where the right of patronage does not come in question: e.g., where a patron, erroneously believing his clerk to be dead, presents another; there the first incumbent may have a spoliation against the other. If, however, each of the incumbents claims by a different patron, so that the question of the ownership of the advowson is involved, the matter is for the civil Courts.

Spoliatus debet ante omnia restitui (2 T. R. 753). (The despoiled ought to get his property back before anything else.) This is the maxim governing the law as to the disposal of stolen goods. See MARKET OVERT; RESTITUTION; REVESTING.

Sponsions. In international law, these mean engagements entered into ultra vires by naval or military officers. They are invalid without ratification by the Governments concerned.

Sporting. As to the right of sporting, that is, of killing and taking game, on a man's own land, see GAME. The right of sporting on another man's land is a profit à prendre, and, therefore, an incorporeal hereditament; it can only be conveyed by deed of grant. It is generally an exclusive or several right, that is, excluding the owner of the land from its exercise; but it may be a right of common. See COMMON.

The Rating Act, 1874, s. 4, makes the right of sporting, when severed from the occupation of the land, a rateable hereditament. See RATE.

See CHASE; FOREST; PARK; WARREN

Spring-gun. See MAN-TRAP.

Springing Use. See USE.

Spur Rial. See GOLD COINS.

Squatter's Title. The term colloquially used in the law as meaning the title acquired by one who, having wrongfully entered upon land, has occupied it without paying rent or otherwise acknowledging any superior title for such time that he acquires an indefeasible title. See LIMITATIONS.

Squirrels are "vermin" for the purposes of s. 4 of the Forestry Act, 1919. See RABBITS.

S.S., Collar of. A collar or necklace of gold, weighing about four pounds, worn over his official robes by the Lord Chief Justice on State occasions. It consists of twenty-eight "S" shaped links, with what is known as a "garter-knot" between each two links, and with the Beaufort Badge of the portcullis and the rose—the badge of Henry VII—as a pendant. Formerly the Chief Justices of the Exchequer and the Common Pleas wore similar collars: that used by Sir Edward Coke descended to the successive Chief Justices of the Common Pleas until the Common Pleas ceased to exist. That used by Sir Alexander Cockburn has been in use by the Lord Chief Justices of England down to the present day. Sir Alexander (who died in 1880) left it to his successors as an "office-loom": but the law would not appear to recognise such an entity—the case of the Pusey Horn (see CORNAGE) is quite different—and there would appear to be nothing in law to prevent a Chief Justice, or his personal representative, from disposing of the collar. Lord Ellenborough, when he retired in 1818, retained for himself the collar which had been worn for a hundred and fifty years by the Chief Justices of the King's Bench.

Stabilia, De. A writ which in the time of Henry I. ran in Normandy. The law of England was never conversant with it.

Stabit præsumptio donec probetur in contrarium (4 Rep. 71*b*). (A presumption will stand good until the contrary is proved): provided, of course, it be a rebuttable presumption.

Stable-stand. One of the four matters upon proof of which there was primâ facie evidence of, as the case might be, killing, or attempting to kill, or to steal, deer in the royal forest. It consisted in being found with bent bow or cross-bow, or with hounds in a leash. The other three matters were Dog-Draw (actually hunting with hounds), Back-Bear (being in possession of a dead deer), and Bloody-Hand (being with bloody hands, etc.).

Staff-herding. Under the forest law this was a right not merely to turn cattle into a forest to graze, but also the right to send a herdsman with them. The first right could be held without the second.

Stage Carriage. See CAB.

Stage Play. For definition, see THEATRE. No stage play can be performed in any part of Great Britain until it has been licensed by the Lord Chamberlain (Theatres Act, 1843, ss. 12, 15).

Stage-right. Attempts have been made to introduce this word as a substitute for "the right of representation and performance" (q.v.), but it can hardly be said to be an accepted term of English law.

Stakeholder primarily means a person with whom money is deposited pending the decision of a bet or wager (q.v.); but it is more often used to mean a person who holds money or property which is claimed by rival claimants, but in which he himself claims no interest. See INTERPLEADER.

Stallage is a payment due to the owner of a market in respect of the exclusive occupation of a portion of the soil within the market. See MARKETS AND FAIRS.

Stallions. See HORSE BREEDING.

Stamps. Stamps are used for two purposes; first, as a convenient mode of collecting fees payable in Courts of justice (e.g., on filing documents, issuing writs and summonses, etc.); and secondly, as a mode of raising taxes on written instruments, such as receipts, conveyances, leases, etc., by virtue of various enactments generally known as the Stamp Acts. (See COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE.) Stamps of the latter kind are either fixed in amount, or ad valorem, that is, proportionate to the value of the property dealt with by the instrument. Thus, the stamp on every receipt, cheque, and power of attorney, is fixed; while the stamps on bills of exchange, conveyances, leases, etc., vary with the amount of money or value of property which they deal with. Formerly deeds were liable to a progressive stamp of a fixed sum for every skin of parchment beyond the first, but this duty no longer exists.

Adhesive stamps are sold separately, and are affixed and cancelled by the person whose duty it is to have the instrument stamped. Others are impressed with a die on the parchment or paper on which the instrument is written. Adhesive stamps can be used only where their use is expressly provided for (Stamp Act, 1891, s. 2). Provision is made by the Stamp Duties Management Act, 1891, ss. 9, 10, for the allowance (or repayment of the amount) of a stamp which has been "spoiled," that is, where, by some accident or mistake, the stamp itself has been rendered unfit for use, or the instrument on which it has been affixed or impressed has become useless before it came into operation; and in certain other cases. Appropriated stamps are stamps which can only be used for instruments of a particular description, e.g., bills of lading: see the Stamp Act, 1891, s. 10. An adjudication stamp is used to signify that the instrument has been submitted to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, and that they are of opinion (if it is unstamped) that it is not chargeable with duty, or (if it is stamped) that it is duly stamped; and no question as to the proper stamp can then arise (ib., s. 12). Where the stamp duty on an instrument depends upon the stamp on another instrument, the fact that the latter stamp duty has been paid may be evidenced by a stamp impressed for that purpose on the first instrument: this is called a denoting stamp (ib., s. 11). No instrument executed in the United Kingdom, or relating to any property situate, or to anything done or to be done, in the United Kingdom, can be given in evidence or made use of, except in criminal proceedings, unless duly stamped (ib., s. 14 (4)). In the case of the following documents—bills of exchange and promissory notes other than those at sight (s. 38 (1)), bills of lading (s. 40) and proxies (s. 80)—they cannot be stamped after execution; and charterparties (s. 51), attested copies (s. 63), receipts (s. 102), can only be stamped after execution within a limited time, or on payment of a special penalty. Marine policies cannot be stamped after execution except in the cases of mutual policies and of policies executed abroad (s. 95 (1)). Bonds, etc., conveyances, leases, mortgages, etc., and settlements must be stamped within thirty days of execution (s. 15 (2)). In the case of all other documents, the stamp may be affixed at any time after execution on payment of the unpaid duty, a penalty of £10, and interest on the duty at 5 per cent. per annum, so that the interest does not exceed the amount of the duty (s. 15 (1)). But any instrument executed out of the United Kingdom may be stamped within thirty days from its arrival in this country, without payment of any penalty (s. 15 (3) (a)). The Commissioners are also empowered to stamp any instrument, without payment of a penalty (s. 15 (3) (b)); and under this provision, the practice of the Commissioners is to stamp simple agreements, etc., within a fortnight, and deeds and instruments bearing an ad valorem duty within two months, after execution, without penalty, as a matter of course.

Where a document unstamped or insufficiently stamped is produced in a judicial proceeding, it may be received in evidence on payment to the officer of the Court of the unpaid duty, the penalty, and a further sum of £1 (s. 14 (1)).

Standard Charges; Standard Revenue. The Railways Act, 1921, s. 58, provides that the charges which each of the four amalgamated companies (formed pursuant to that Act) make to customers are, in the first instance, to be such as will yield to each such company a net revenue equal to the total net revenue in the year 1913 of the constituent and subsidiary companies of each amalgamated company. For the purposes of that Act, those charges are known as the standard charges (ib. s. 32), and that revenue is known as the standard revenue (ib. s. 58).

"Stand by." See CHALLENGE.

Standing Orders are rules and forms regulating the procedure of the two Houses of Parliament, each having its own. They are of equal force in every Parliament, except so far as they are altered or suspended from time to time.

Stannaries. The stannaries are a district which includes all parts of Devon and Cornwall where any tin works are situate and in actual operation. The tin-miners of the stannaries have certain peculiar customs and privileges, some of which are referred to under the head of TINBOUNDING. Civil actions in respect of matters arising as to mines within the stannaries might formerly be brought in the Stannary Court, which was a Court of record held before a judge called the Vice-Warden of the Stannaries: it also had power to wind up cost-book mining companies. Formerly an appeal lay to the Lord Warden of the Stannaries, and from him to the Privy Council, but this jurisdiction was transferred to the Court of Appeal by s. 18 of the Judicature Act, 1873. As from 1st January, 1897, the Stannary Court was abolished by the Stannaries Court (Abolition) Act, 1896; and the jurisdiction of the Court was transferred to the County Courts of Cornwall by an order of the Lord Chancellor made pursuant to that Act.

The Stannaries Acts, 1869 and 1887, contain provisions relating to the regulation of mining partnerships working mines in the stannaries.

Staple. The seaports from which wool, leather, tin and lead (collectively termed the staple) were exported, were from an early period called the staple, or estaple, towns; and the merchants of those towns had, from the reign of Edward I., a monopoly in the staple and were called the Merchants of the Staple, or, more shortly, the Staplers. The King decided what should from time to time be the staple towns. The chief staple from 1390 to 1558 was at Calais. In each staple town there was a mayor of the staple (appointed at first by the King, but subsequently for the most part by the mayor of the town), and two constables of the staple. These mayors of the staple held Staple Courts (long since obsolete), for the decision of matters touching the staple. Jacobs (1749) speaks of these Staple Courts as still being held; but it does not appear that they transacted any business in his time.

The Statute of the Staple (see CORRECTOR) regulated the staple towns. It was quite distinct from the Statute Staple (q.v.).

The Merchants of the Staple were incorporated as a merchant guild by a charter of Edward III.; Elizabeth renewed their charter; and Charles II. finally incorporated them as "The Mayor, Constables and Company of the Staple of England." The company still exists; but its monopoly (q.v.) had been destroyed even before the grant of the final charter: it has long since ceased to exercise any functions; and it has, within recent years, been judicially described as merely a dining club. In 1888 there were about thirty members.

Staple Inn. See INNS OF CHANCERY.

Star. An abbreviated form of the mediaeval Latin starrum, a derivative of the Hebrew word shetar, which meant a deed or contract.

Anciently, the deeds, obligations, etc., executed by the Jews before their expulsion from this country, were known as starra or stars; they were written in Hebrew or in Hebrew and Latin. One is preserved in the Record Office; it dates from the reign of John, and is written in Hebrew with a Latin translation appended.

Star-Bowkett Society. See BUILDING SOCIETY.

Star Chamber. The Court called by this name is commonly regarded as being the Aula Regis (q.v.), sitting in the Star Chamber, a room at Westminster The jurisdiction of the Court would, therefore, be all or some part of that residuary jurisdiction which remained after the severance of the Courts of Exchequer, Common Pleas, Queen's Bench, and Chancery.

By the statute 3 Hen. 7, c. 1, the Court was remodelled, and its jurisdiction placed upon a lawful and permanent basis. That Act empowered the Chancellor, Treasurer, and Keeper of the Privy Seal, or any two of them, with one spiritual and one temporal peer, and the Chief Justices of the Courts of Queen's Bench and Common Pleas, or in their absence, two other justices, to call before them and to punish the following offences:—(1) Combinations of the nobility and gentry, supported by liveries (that is to say, by retinues of followers wearing distinctive liveries); (2) Partiality on the part of sheriffs in making up the panels of jurors, or in making untrue returns of members; (3) Bribery in jurors; and (4) Riots and unlawful assemblies.

By the statute 21 Hen. 8, c. 20, the President of the King's Council was added to the list of judges; and by the statute 31 Hen. 8, c. 8 (which gave to the King's proclamations in ecclesiastical matters the force of law), all persons offending against such proclamations were to be tried before the Star Chamber, and punished with fine and imprisonment.

The jurisdiction of the Court is defined by Lord Bacon as extending to "forces, frauds, crimes various of stellionate, and the incohations or middle acts towards crimes capital or heinous not actually committed or perpetrated."

The Star Chamber was of utility during the reigns of Henry VII. and subsequent monarchs: (1) In its repression of the turbulence of the nobility and gentry in the provinces; and (2) In its supplying a Court of jurisdiction for matters which, as being of novel origin, were unprovided for by the existing tribunals, e.g., in the case of offences against proclamations in ecclesiastical matters.

The effect of the Court was to enhance the royal authority, which it did by supplying the executive with a speedy and effective machinery. Cardinal Wolsey has the credit of having improved and extended the jurisdiction of the tribunal.

But the very nature of the jurisdiction of the Court of Star Chamber rendered its process liable to great abuses; and Wolsey's connection with it was one of the principal causes of his unpopularity. The Court was abolished in 1640 by the statute 16 Car. 1, c. 10.

Star of India, Order of. The Most Exalted Order of the Star of India was founded in 1861. It consists of Knights Grand Commanders (G.C.S.I.); Knights Commanders (K.C.S.I.); and Companions (C.S.I.). It is used to reward services in connection with India.

State.—I. A State is a collection of persons occupying a certain territory, and having a legislative and executive organisation free from the control of any other human power. The name "State" is sometimes given to bodies which are really only parts of a State, such as the separate organisations which collectively make up the United States of America, or to Governments, such as those of Monaco, San Marino and Andorra, which are under the protection or control of other States; hence a "State," in the ordinary and proper sense of the word, is described as an independent or sovereign State.

Every State consists of two parts, the sovereign part (which in England is the Crown and Houses of Parliament) and the subject part. In its external relations or dealings with other States the sovereign part, or a branch of it (in England the Crown), represents the State. The relations between independent States are governed by what is called international law (q.v.). In its internal relations, that part of the sovereign Government of a State which is entrusted with the executive power enforces the law dealing with the relations between it and the subject members of the State. It is, therefore, considered as representing the whole State, and hence the term "State" is frequently used in the sense of "executive power in a State," as when we say that public law deals (among other things) with the relations between the State and the private members of the community. (See LAW.) As the State has the power of enforcing the law, it cannot be subject to legal duties, for otherwise it would have to enforce the law against itself. See ACT OF STATE; PETITION OF RIGHT.

It has been already mentioned that the relations between independent States are governed by international law, the nature of which is explained under that title. As one State cannot enforce a claim against another by legal procedure, it follows that no member of any State can enforce a claim against another State by legal proceedings in any Court of justice external to the latter State. Therefore, if a foreign State borrows money from an English subject, or commits what in the case of a private individual would be a tort against an English subject, no proceedings can be taken in the English Courts to enforce the claim thus arising, even although the foreign State may have property within the jurisdiction of the English Courts. This rule is subject to two apparent exceptions: (1) that if proceedings are taken by A against B in the English Courts in respect of property in which a foreign State claims or is believed to have an interest, it may be made a party to those proceedings as defendant to enable it to come forward and sustain its claim; here, however, it is obvious that the foreign State, though in form a defendant, is really a plaintiff: (2) that if a foreign State takes proceedings in an English Court against a private individual, the defendant can institute a cross-action or set up a set-off or counterclaim against the plaintiff as if the foreign State were a private person.

II. "State" in the old books sometimes stands for "estate." Conversely, Cecil, in the reign of Elizabeth, was termed Secretary of Estate instead of Secretary of State.

Statement. See ANSWER; BILL OF COMPLAINT.

Statement of Affairs. In bankruptcy practice under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, a bankrupt or debtor who had presented a petition for liquidation or composition was required by

s. 19 of the Act to produce at the first meeting of creditors a statement of his affairs, giving a list of his creditors, secured and unsecured, with the value of the securities, a list of bills discounted, and a statement of his property. This enactment was replaced by s. 16 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. Now, under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, every debtor against whom a receiving order is made must furnish a like statement, verified by affidavit, to the Official Receiver (Act of 1914, s. 14; see Form 33 in Appendix of Forms to Bankruptcy Rules, 1915).

Making a material omission in a statement of affairs is a misdemeanour, punishable with imprisonment for two years (Debtors Act, 1869, s. 11).

Statement of Claim. This is to be distinguished from the statement of the nature of the claim which is required in every writ of summons by Ord. 2, r. 1. It is a written or printed statement by the plaintiff in an action in the High Court, showing the facts on which he relies to support his claim against the defendant, and the relief which he claims. It is delivered to the defendant or his solicitor.

If the writ is specially indorsed under Ord. 3, r. 6, the indorsement is deemed to be the statement of claim, and no further statement of claim can be delivered. Where the writ is not specially indorsed, and an order is made for the delivery of pleadings (see DIRECTIONS, SUMMONS FOR), then the statement of claim must be delivered within the time limited by such order, or within twenty-one days if no time be limited; and apart from such order no statement of claim may be delivered except where the defendant fails to appear (Ord. 20, r. 1).

If the defendant does not enter an appearance when the writ is not specially indorsed, and the action is one in which the plaintiff cannot sign judgment for default of appearance (as where it is an action for an account, redemption or the like), the plaintiff must file the statement of claim with the proper officer of the Court and set down the action on motion for judgment (Ord. 13, r. 12). See RELIEF; WRIT OF SUMMONS.

In a commercial cause (q.v.) a notification termed "point of claim" corresponds to the statement of claim.

Statement of Defence. In the practice of the High Court, the defendant delivers in reply to the statement of claim a pleading called a statement of defence. The statement of defence deals with the allegations contained in the statement of claim (or the indorsement on the writ if it be specially indorsed and leave to defend be given under Ord. 14), admitting or denying them, and, if necessary, stating fresh facts in explanation or avoidance of those alleged by the plaintiff. If the defendant wishes to set up a counter-claim (q.v.), he adds it to his defence, and the pleading is then called a statement of defence and counter-claim. See PLEADING.

In a commercial cause (q.v.) the notification termed "points of defence" corresponds to the statement of defence.

Statement of Particulars. When the plaintiff in an action claimed a debt or liquidated demand, but had not indorsed the writ specially (i.e., indorsed on it the particulars of his claim under Ord. 3, r. 6), and the defendant failed to appear, the plaintiff might, under the R.S.C., Ord. 13, r. 6, as it stood in 1880, file a statement of the particulars of his claim, and after eight days enter judgment for the amount, as if the writ had been specially indorsed. (See WRIT OF SUMMONS.) Now in a like case the plaintiff can, under the present Ord. 13, r. 3, enter final judgment.

State of Facts and Proposal. In lunacy practice, when a person has been found a lunatic, the next step was formerly to submit to the Master a scheme, called a "State of Facts and Proposal," showing what was the position in life, property and income of the lunatic, who were his next-of-kin and heir-at law, who were proposed as his committees, and what annual sum was proposed to be allowed for his maintenance, etc. From the state of facts and the evidence adduced in support of it, the Master framed his report. As to the present practice, see LUNACY.

Stationers' Hall. The Hall of the Stationers' Company, in the City of London. Under the Copyright Act, 1842, s. 24, registration at Stationers' Hall was necessary, not to secure copyright, but as a condition precedent to the right to sue for an infringement. The Copyright Act, 1911, repealed all enactments referring to Stationers' Hall: it contains no reference to Stationers' Hall; and no registration there is now required for any purpose.

See COPYRIGHT.

Stationery Office. A Government office, established in 1786, which supplies the stationery and the books and other publications required by Parliament and the various public departments. It also has control of the printing required by Parliament and the departments. By letters patent dated 3rd October, 1888, the Controller [that is to say, the chief officer] of the Stationery Office, is printer of all Acts of Parliament. The Office has no statutory origin: it is dependent for its existence on the annual vote of Parliament.

Status. The status of a person is his legal position or condition; thus, when we say that the status of a woman after a decree nisi for the dissolution of her marriage with her husband has been made, but before it has been made absolute, is that of a married woman, we mean that she has the same legal rights, liabilities, and disabilities as an ordinary married woman. The term is chiefly applied to persons under disability (q.v.), or persons who have some peculiar condition which prevents the general law from applying to them in the same way as it does to ordinary persons.

The question of status is of importance in jurisprudence, because it is generally treated as a basis for the classification of law, according as it applies to ordinary persons (general law, normal law, law of things), or to persons having a status, that is, a disability or peculiar legal condition, such an infants, married women, lunatics, convicts, bankrupts, aliens, public officers, etc. (particular law, abnormal law, law of persons).

"Status" is sometimes applied by analogy to things, as where we speak of a house having acquired the status of an ancient building.

See ANCIENT MESSUAGE.

Status de manerio. (The "state of a manor.") This meant the assembly of the tenants in the Court of the lord to do suit and claim their rights and privileges.

Status quo. (The state in which [things are, or were].) The expression is also found in the combinations in statu quo (in the state in which) and in statu quo ante bellum (in the state in which [it was] before the war); all the three expressions are common in the language of diplomacy.

Statuta armorum. (The Statutes of Arms.) An enactment regulating the number of esquires whom a knight might take with him to a tournament. It is printed in the Statutes of the Realm (Vol. 1, p. 230), s.v. Statutes of Uncertain Date; in the Statutes at Large (Vol. 9, App. p. 26), it is printed as of uncertain date under the title of Statutum Armorum ad Torniamenta

Statuta de moneta. (Statutes Concerning Money.) An enactment, consisting of several "statutes" (corresponding to what are now called sections), printed under these titles in the Statutes of the Realm (Vol. 1, p. 219), s.v. Statutes of Uncertain Date, and in the Statutes at Large as 20 Edw. 1, sts. 4, 6.

Statutable or Statutory is that which is introduced or governed by statute law, as opposed to the common law or equity. Thus, a Court is said to have statutory jurisdiction when jurisdiction is given to it in certain matters by Act of Parliament. (See PETITION.) For other examples, see CONVEYANCE; DECLARATION; MORTGAGE.

Statute.—I. A statute is technically the same thing as an Act of Parliament (q.v.), though in practice the term is usually confined to public Acts. In this sense statutes are of the following kinds:

A statute is said to be "declaratory," when it does not profess to make any alteration in the existing law, but merely to declare or explain what it is; "remedial," when it alters the common law; "amending," when it alters the statute law; "consolidating," when it consolidates or throws together, into one statute, several previous statutes relating to the same subject-matter, with or without alterations of substance; "disabling" or "restraining," when it restrains the alienation of property, and "enabling," when it removes a restriction or disability; "penal," when it imposes a penalty or forfeiture, as in the case of the statutes relating to game, smuggling, the profanation of the Lord's day, etc. See INFORMER; PENALTY; SUNDAY.

Sessional publication of the statutes began in 1484 with 1 Richard 3, printed by Maclinia. About the same time Maclinia printed a volume entitled Nova Statuta, containing the statutes from Edw. 3 to 22 Edw. 4. This was followed about 1540 by The Great Book of the Statutes, in which they were brought down to date. In 1543 there was issued a volume containing all the statutes from Magna Charta to the end of Henry VII. In 1587 The Whole Volume of Statutes at Large from Magna Charta to 29 Eliz. was printed, and this was several times reprinted with additions to the date of publication. Later editions of the Statutes at Large were compiled by Keble, 1676 (several times reprinted and brought down to date); by Hawkins (to 7 Geo. 2); by Cay (to 30 Geo. 2); by Pickering to 1761 in 23 volumes 8vo; and to the Union (41 Geo. 3) by Ruffhead in 18 volumes, by Runnington in 14 volumes, and by Tomlins and Raithby in 10 volumes quarto and 20 volumes 8vo. The Statutes at Large means all the public general statutes, as distinguished from a collection of selected statutes, such as the old Abridgments and Chitty's Statutes of Practical Utility of our own time. An edition of the statutes from Magna Charta to the end of Queen Anne's reign was printed between 1810 and 1822 in 10 volumes by the Record Commissioners from the original records, under the title of the Statutes of the Realm; alphabetical and chronological indexes were issued in 1824 and 1828. An edition of the statutes, prepared by the Statute Law Committee, with all repealed Acts and parts of Acts omitted (see S. L. R.), coming down to 1878, was published by Government under the title of the Statutes Revised; and a second edition brought down to 1900 has since been issued in 20 volumes. As to the merits and the defects of various editions of the statutes, see Cooper, Account of the Public Records, ch. vi.

As to statute law, see LAW.

The principal works on statutes and their interpretation are: Coke's Second Institute, Barrington on the Statutes; and Dwarris on Statutes, and, in modern times, Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes, and Craies on Statute Law.

II. "Statute," also, sometimes means a kind of bond or obligation of record, being an abbreviation for "statute-merchant" or "statute-staple" (q.v.).

See STATUTES OF UNCERTAIN DATE.

Statute Fair. This meant the half-yearly assemblage of labourers at which the rates of hiring fixed pursuant to the Statute of Labourers (q.v.) were proclaimed. That Act has long been repealed: "hiring fairs" or "mops" are still, however, referred to as statute fairs. See MARKETS AND FAIRS.

Statute Labour. Under various ancient statutes the inhabitants of each parish were required either to do certain work—known as statute labour—annually upon the highways repairable by the parish, or to pay a composition. The last of these statutes was the 13 Geo. 3, c. 78; it was repealed by the Highway Act, 1835.

Statute Law Revision. See "S.L.R."

Statute Merchant; Statute Staple. A statute merchant was a bond acknowledged before the chief magistrate of some trading town pursuant to the statute De mercatoribus, 13 Edw. 1 (whence the name). A statute staple was a bond acknowledged pursuant to 27 Edw. 3, c. 9, before the mayor of the staple, that is to say, the grand mart for the principal commodities or manufactures of the kingdom, formerly held by Act of Parliament in certain trading towns. They were both originally intended to encourage trade by providing a speedy remedy for recovering debts. Every statute merchant or statute staple had to be sealed with the seals of the debtor and of the king, and enrolled. It was therefore a bond of record (see RECORD; ROLLS), and the addition of the king's seal made it of so high a nature that on failure of payment by the debtor at the day assigned, the writ of De statuto stabulæ might issue, and under that writ not only the body of the debtor might be imprisoned and his goods seized in satisfaction of the debt, but also his lands might be delivered to the creditor till out of the rents and profits the debt was satisfied; during that time the creditor was called tenant by statute merchant or statute staple, and had a chattel interest in the lands. (See ESTATE.) Statutes merchant and statutes staple formerly charged the land of the debtor; but this privilege was abolished by the Judgments Act, 1864. (See JUDGMENT.) It seems that statutes merchant and staple are, in theory, still payable, on the death of the debtor, in priority to his ordinary debts (see ASSETS). Statutes merchant and statutes staple are, however, now quite obsolete. See RECOGNIZANCE; STATUTO MERCATORIO.

Statute of Agreement. This was a popular alternative title of the statute (generally called the Statute of Kenilworth) 51 & 52 Hen. 3.

Statute of Frauds is the statute 29 Car. 2, c. 3, passed "for the prevention of frauds and perjuries." With this object it enacts (ss. 1 and 2) that leases of lands, tenements or hereditaments (except leases not exceeding three years, reserving a rent of at least two-thirds the value of the land) shall have the force of leases at will only, unless they are put in writing and signed by the parties or their agents. S. 3 requires assignments and surrenders of leases and interests in land (not being copyholds, etc.) to be in writing. Under the Real Property Act, 1845, the leases and other instruments specified in ss. 1, 2 and 3, must, unless they relate to copyhold, be under seal. S. 4 enacts that no action shall be brought upon any special promise by an executor or administrator to answer damages out of his own estate, or upon a guarantee, or upon an agreement made in consideration of marriage, or upon any contract or sale of lands, etc., or any interest in or concerning them, or upon any agreement that is not to be performed within a year, unless the agreement is in writing and signed by the party to be charged, or his agent; but the consideration for such guarantee need not (Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, s. 3) appear in the writing. Ss. 5 and 6, and 19 to 23, as to wills, etc., are no longer in force (see WILL). Ss. 7 and 9 require declarations or creations of trusts of lands, etc., and all assignments of trusts, to be in writing, signed by the party, but s. 8 exempts trusts arising by implication of law. S. 10 and 11 make the lands of a cestui que trust, when in the hands of his real representative, liable to his judgments and obligations. S. 12 (which made estates pur autre vie devisable, liable to the owner's debts, and descendible, unless otherwise disposed of, to his personal representative) was supplemented by the statute 14 Geo. 2, c. 20, s. 9, and was superseded by ss. 3, 6 of the Wills Act, 1837 (see OCCUPANCY). S. 16 enacted that no writ of execution against goods should bind the property therein until the writ was delivered to the sheriff to be executed; and this section, although it was repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1881, and the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, is practically still in force, as it has been in substance re-enacted by s. 26 (1) of the Act of 1893, which provides also that a bona fide purchaser shall have a good title to goods purchased before actual execution of the writ. S. 17 enacted that no contract for the sale of any goods, wares and merchandises for the price of £10 or upwards should be good unless the buyer accepted and received part of the goods so sold, or gave something in earnest or part payment, or unless some note or memorandum of the contract were made and signed by the parties to be charged, or their agents; this section, although repealed by the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, was substantially re-enacted by s. 4 (1) of that Act, which substitutes "value" for "price." See also TENTERDEN'S ACT.

Statutes of Uncertain Date. These are a number of statutes made before the reign of Edward III., to some of which no date has been assigned by anyone, while others are by some authorities attributed to dates which cannot be regarded as certain. See the Statutes of the Realm (Vol. 1, pp. 197-250), and the Statutes at Large (Vol. 9, Appendix).

Statuto mercatorio, De. There were anciently two forms of this writ—one directed against a layman and the other against an ecclesiastical person. Where default was made in payment of a statute merchant by a layman, the writ commanded the sheriff to imprison him until the debt was satisfied: in the case of like default by an ecclesiastical person, the writ commanded the sheriff to levy the amount of the debt off the goods of such person.

Statutory Alien. A natural-born British subject who had become an alien pursuant to the Naturalization Act, 1870, was by s. 8 of that Act entitled a "statutory alien," and could, under that section, re-obtain his British nationality upon terms the same as those governing the naturalization of other aliens. The whole of that Act has been repealed by the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914, which contains no substituted section. There is now, therefore, no difference, even in name, between a de-naturalized British subject and any other alien.

Statutory Rules and Orders. Very many modern Acts of Parliament contain provisions authorising the King in Council, a Government department, a local authority, a corporation, or some individual to make Rules and Orders on particular subjects. The Rules of the Supreme Court and the scores of Orders which have been made with regard to diseases of animals are instances of the result of this delegation of authority. Such Rules and Orders, if validly made, have the same effect as if they were expressly enacted by Parliament. Where the Act provides that any Rule or Order shall be laid before Parliament and shall become of no effect if either House resolve that it be annulled, then, in the absence of such a resolution, no Court can question the validity of the Rule or Order, but if no such reference to Parliament be provided, and if there be no section declaring that the Rule or Order cannot be questioned in any Court, then it is open to any Court, before which the Rule or Order may come, to decide whether the Rule or Order has been made intra vires or ultra vires.

This delegation of authority by Parliament had taken place in a few instances during the first hundred and fifty years after the Revolution of 1688. But it became common only after the accession of Queen Victoria; and during recent years it has been practised on a wholesale scale. It is now of everyday occurrence for Parliament to pass Acts in skeleton form and to leave Departments free to equip the skeletons as they think fit.

The Rules Publication Act, 1893, deals with Statutory Rules and Orders.

Since 1890 it has been customary to publish under official sanction from time to time the public and general Rules and Orders in force. These are known as the Statutory Rules and Orders Revised. There are then annual volumes which keep the collection up to date until another collection is published—as was the case in 1905—of the public and general Rules and Orders in force on a later date.

Statuto stabulæ, De. An obsolete writ, as to which see STATUTE MERCHANT.

Statutum affirmativum non derogat communi legi. (An affirmative statute does not derogate from the common law.) If a statute be really only affirmative, that is to say, declaratory, it obviously makes no alteration in either the common or the statute law. Compare QUÆ COMMUNI, ETC.

Statutum de Admensuratione Terre. (Statute for the Measuring of Land.) An enactment printed under these titles in the Statutes of the Realm (Vol. 1, p. 206), s.v. Statutes of Uncertain Date, and in the Statutes at Large as 33 Edw. 1, st. 6.

Statutum de Conspiratoribus. (Statute concerning Conspirators.) An enactment printed under these titles in the Statutes of the Realm (Vol. 1, p. 216), s.v. Statutes of Uncertain Date, and in the Statutes at Large as 33 Edw. 1, st. 3.

Statutum de Finibus et Attornatis. (Statute concerning Fines and Attorneys.) An enactment printed under these titles in the Statutes of the Realm (Vol. 1, p. 216), s.v. Statutes of Uncertain Date, and in the Statutes at Large as 15 Edw. 2.

Statutum de Gaveleto in Londinio. (The Statute of Gavelet in London.) An enactment printed under these titles in the Statutes of the Realm (Vol. 1, p. 222), s.v. Statutes of Uncertain Date; printed also in the Statutes at Large as 10 Edw. 2. See GAVELET.

Statutum de Judeismo. See LES ESTATUS DE LA JEUERIE.

Statutum de Justic assign quod vocatur Rageman. See RAGEMAN.

Statutum de laboriis. A writ which anciently lay for the arrest of a labourer who refused to work as required by the Statute of Labourers. See LABOURERS.

Statutum de Magnis Assisis et Duellis. (Statute concerning the Great Assises and Battle.) An enactment printed under these titles in the Statutes of the Realm (Vol. 1, p. 218), s.v. Statutes of Uncertain Date; printed also in the Statutes at Large (Vol. 9, App., p. 30). It is not really a statute, and is in fact merely an extract from the Brevia Placitata (q.v.).

Statutum de Mercatoribus. See ACTON BURNELL.

Statutum de Nova Custuma. See CARTA MERCATORIA.

Statutum de Pistoribus. (A Statute concerning Bakers, etc.) An enactment printed under these titles in the Statutes of the Realm (Vol. 1, p. 203), s.v. Statutes of Uncertain Date, and also in the Statutes at Large (Vol. 9, App., p. 28) as of uncertain date.

Statutum de Protectionibus non allocandis. (Statute against allowing Protections.) An enactment printed under these titles in the Statutes of the Realm (Vol. 1, p. 217), s.v. Statutes of Uncertain Date, and in the Statutes at Large as 33 Edw. 1, st. 1. See PROTECTION, WRIT OF.

Statutum de Respectu Militiæ habendo. (Statute for Respiting of Knighthood.) An enactment printed under these titles in the Statutes of the Realm (Vol. 1, p. 229), s.v. Statutes of Uncertain Date, and in the Statutes at Large as the Statutum de militibus, 1 Edw. 2. It purported to give some relief from the hardship of compulsory knighthood.

Statutum de Rotelanda. See ROTELANDA.

Statutum de Sacramento Ministrorum Regis (Statute for Oaths of the King's Officers in the Eyre.) An enactment printed under these titles in the Statutes of the Realm (Vol. 1, p. 232), s.v. Statutes of Uncertain Date; printed also in the Statutes at Large (Vol. 9, App., p. 30) as of uncertain date.

Statutum de Tenentibus per Legem Angliæ. (Statute concerning Tenants by the Curtesy of England.) Under these titles what Rastall calls "no statute but only one man's opinion," is printed in the Statutes of the Realm (Vol. 1, p. 220), s.v. Statutes of Uncertain Date; printed also in the Statutes at Large (Vol. 9, App., p. 29) as of uncertain date. It is really no more than an extract from Glanvil, lib. 7, c. 18.

Statutum de Viris Religiosi. See MORTMAIN.

Statutum de Wardis et Releviis. (Statute concerning Wards and Releviis.) An enactment printed under these titles in the Statutes of the Realm (Vol. 1, p. 228), s.v. Statutes of Uncertain Date; printed in the Statutes at Large as 28 Edw. 1.

Statutum Domini Regis de Terris vendendis et emendis. (Statute of our Lord the King concerning the Selling and Buying of Land.) The title under which Quia Emptores (q.v.) is printed in the Statutes at Large.

Statutum Hibernie de Coheredibus. (The Statute of Ireland concerning Coparceners.)

An enactment (printed in the Statutes of the Realm as 20 Hen. 3, and in the Statutes at Large as 14 Hen. 3) which applied to Ireland the law of England as to land descending to coparceners.

Statutum sessionum. This meant the General Session held next, or within six weeks, after Easter, sitting under the statute 5 Eliz. c. 4, s. 11, to settle the rates of wages of artificers, husbandmen, labourers and workmen.

Stay. A stay of proceedings in an action is a suspension of them: thus, if the plaintiff is ordered to do something and fails to do it, the proceedings may, under the inherent jurisdiction of the Court, be ordered to be stayed until he complies with the order. So (under Ord. 58, r. 16) the Court may order execution to be stayed until an appeal to the Court of Appeal is decided. So also at any time after the presentation of a bankruptcy petition the Court may, under s. 9 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, stay any action, execution or other legal process against the debtor, unless the claim be one from which the debtor would not be released by discharge or unless the plaintiff is a secured creditor. An action shown by the pleadings to be frivolous or vexatious may be stayed under Ord. 25, r. 4. A stay of proceedings is sometimes produced ipso facto, without an express order to that effect, as where a party obtains an order for a new trial.

"Stay of proceedings" also sometimes means a total discontinuance of the action: thus, if an action in the King's Bench is compromised, an order staying the proceedings is generally obtained. In the Chancery Division the term is also so used, but in strictness it is only accurate when a decree or judgment has been given, for in such a case the suit or action cannot be dismissed, because the Court has adjudicated on it, and therefore all that can be done is to stay proceedings under the decree or judgment. Before decree or judgment the proper way of disposing of an action is either by discontinuance (q.v.), or by an order dismissing the action.

Stealing. See LARCENY; EMBEZZLEMENT; ROBBERY.

Steam Engines. At common law, steam engines were nuisances if and in so far as anyone was inconvenienced by such noise and smoke as emanated from them. The various Acts under which their use is legal on railways have taken away the remedy of proceedings for nuisance in respect of their use on a railway. Proceedings for damages are still available in case of negligent user; the production of smoke (q.v.) is, in theory, restrained by statute; and a remedy for fires caused by railway engines is provided by the Railway Fires Act, 1905.

The Acts (see LOCOMOTIVES) authorising the use of locomotives on highways do not exempt owners from liability for nuisance.

Steam Launch. For the purposes of the Thames Conservancy Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. clxxxvii.), this means, not merely every steam launch properly so called, but any vessel propelled by any mechanical power whatever, which is not being used solely as a tug or for cargo and is not certified for 200 passengers (see s. 3).

Steam Whistles. No one can, without the sanction of the sanitary authority, use a steam whistle for the purpose of summoning or dismissing workmen; and any such sanction may be revoked by the Ministry of Health (Steam Whistles Act, 1872).

Steelyard; Stilyard; Stylehouse. The name of this place was derived from the German stâl (a sample), which was pronounced in much the same way as the German Stael (steel), and, through a mis-derivation, it came to be known as the Steelyard, although the proper name would have been Sample-yard.

The Steelyard was established about 1250 by certain Hanse merchants near what is now Ironbridge Wharf in the City of London, as a mart for their goods. The Hanse was deprived of its privileges by Edward VI., but remained in occupation of the Steelyard until it was expelled from England in 1597. The Hanseatic towns of Lubeck, Bremen, and Hamburg continued to own the Steelyard down to 1852, when they sold it to the South Eastern Railway Company. Part of Cannon Street Station stands on the site. See GUILDHALDA.

Stellionate. In the Scots law this, according to Erskine, includes every kind of fraud which had not a special name. It seems to have resembled, in its comprehensiveness, our common law cheat. The term is unknown to either our common or our statute law; but it was used in the Star Chamber, which, says Bacon, dealt with "crimes various of Stellionate."

Sterbrech; Strebrech. According to the Termes de la Ley, this was "the breaking obstructing, or making less of a highway."

Sterling. An early synonym of the penny, or denarius, as it was in mediæval Latin. Fleta writes of "denar Angliæ qui sterling appellatur," and Stow writes: "Paid in starlings which were pence so called."

"Sterling" was used subsequently as meaning coin of standard weight and fineness.

Stet billa. If the plaintiff in a plaint in the Mayor's Court of London had attached property belonging to the defendant and obtained execution against the garnishee, the defendant, if he wished to contest the plaintiff's claim, and to obtain restoration of his property, had to issue a scire facias ad disprobandum debitum (see SCIRE FACIAS); if the only question to be tried was the plaintiff's debt, the plaintiff in appearing to the scire facias prayed stet billa, "that his bill original," i.e., his original plaint, "might stand, and that the defendant might plead thereto"; the action then proceeded in the usual way as if the proceedings in attachment (which were founded on a fictitious default of the defendant in appearing to the plaint) had not taken place. See FOREIGN ATTACHMENT.

Stet processus, in the practice, before the Judicature Acts, of the old common law Courts, was an entry on the record in an action whereby it was ordered, with the consent of the parties, that all further proceedings in the action be stayed. It could only be made with the consent of both parties, and apparently could only be entered as to the whole record. As there is now, under the present practice, no record in an action, it is difficult to see how a stet processus can be entered, though it is believed that orders to that effect were made since the Judicature Acts; they took effect as an ordinary stay of proceedings. But no modern judge would think of entering a stet processus.

Stew. Used only in the plural, as in the expression "the stews," which meant brothels, whose existence was tolerated down to the reign of Henry VIII. In the Rolls of Parliament for 1436 we find: "No person that had dwelled in the common Stywes": but the word is not used in any statute.

Steward was formerly used to denote an officer of the Crown, or of a feudal lord, who acted as keeper of a Court of justice; as, for example, the Lord High Steward (q.v.); and there is still the Lord Steward (q.v.) of the Royal Household. At the present day, the only other important example of the office occurs in the case of manors, for every manor has a steward, appointed by the lord, who theoretically acts as judge of the Customary Court Baron and the Court Leet, and as registrar of the freeholders' Court Baron. Practically, however, his duties are rather ministerial than judicial, for his chief function is to receive surrenders and grant admittances to the copyhold lands of the manor, and keep the Court roll. See COPYHOLD; COURT BARON; COURT LEET; MANOR.

Stick of Eels. Anciently this meant twenty-five eels. Ten sticks made a "bind."

Stickler. In the Rolls of Parliament, IV., 179/1, there is mention of a "stikker" (that is to say, "sticker") or woodcutter. Cowell (1607), through a clerical error, inserted the word as "stickler" in his dictionary, and the error has been repeated in dictionary after dictionary. Compare CORAAGE; JOURNEY HOPPER; MALETENT.

Stifling a Prosecution is agreeing, in consideration of receiving a pecuniary or other advantage, to abstain from prosecuting a person for a misdemeanour not giving rise to a civil remedy, e.g., perjury. As a general rule, such an agreement is void and invalidates any transaction of which it forms part. (See COMPOUND; MISPRISION.) Where, as in the case of perjury, the offence is not a felony but is of public concern, the stifling of the prosecution is probably a misdemeanour at common law.

Stint.—I. A stint is a limit, and therefore a stinted right of common of pasture is one where the number of beasts allowed to be put on the common by each commoner is limited, as opposed to common sans nombre. (See SANS NOMBRE.) A right of pasture may also be stinted in respect of time. See VIEW AND DELIVERY.

II. Stint is also used in a special sense to denote the right of pasture of one of several persons who are tenants in common of land which they use as a common pasture ground for their cattle. Stinted pastures are grazing lands in moors, downs and wastes, which produce no crop, and which are open to each person who has a share in the pasture for a stinted or limited number of cattle. They are usually closed at certain seasons of the year for the better growth of the pasture, but are never held in severalty. The right of each joint owner of the herbage is known as a stint or cattle gate.

A stint is not a common, but a corporeal hereditament, and may be held for either freehold or customary estates. See COMMON; HEREDITAMENT.

Sometimes the lord of a manor has a "stint" or limited right of pasture on the waste, during a certain part of the year. See SHEEPWALK.

Stipendiary Magistrate. There is a general power to appoint "stipendiary magistrates," that is to say, salaried magistrates (to act instead of, or along with, justices of the peace) for boroughs under the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 161 (1), and for urban districts with populations of more than 25,000 under the Stipendiary Magistrates Act, 1863, s. 3. The last-mentioned enactment refers, not to "urban districts," but to "cities or places"; and such "cities or places" are now known as "urban districts" under the Public Health Act, 1875, and the Local Government Act, 1894, s. 21.

There are particular powers to appoint stipendiaries (1) for the Staffordshire Potteries under the Staffordshire Potteries Stipendiary Justice Acts, 1839 to 1895, as amended by the Local Government Board Provisional Order Confirmation (No. 3) Act, 1908; (2) for Manchester and Salford under the statute 7 & 8 Vict. c. 30, as amended by the statute 17 & 18 Vict. c. 20; (3) for Wolverhampton, and the surrounding district, under the statute 9 & 10 Vict. c. 65; and (4) for Chatham and Sheerness and the Thames Estuary under the Chatham and Sheerness Stipendiary Magistrate Act, 1867. The persons who may be appointed as stipendiary magistrates must be barristers of seven years' standing in the case of boroughs generally (Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 161 (1)); of six years' standing in the case of the Potteries (Staffordshire Potteries Stipendiary Justice Act, 1839, s. 1) and Wolverhampton (9 & 10 Vict. c. 65, s. 1); of five years' standing in the case of urban districts generally (Stipendiary Magistrates Act, 1863, s. 3) and Chatham and Sheerness (Chatham and Sheerness Stipendiary Magistrate Act, 1867, s. 2); and of four years' standing in the case of Manchester and Salford (17 & 18 Vict. c. 20, s. 4). In no case is it necessary that the person to be appointed should ever have been a practising barrister. The Acts under which the various stipendiary magistrates are appointed provide that the office is held at the pleasure of the Crown.

The most important distinctions between the powers of a stipendiary magistrate and those of an ordinary justice are (1) that the stipendiary can do all things for which two ordinary justices are required (Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, s. 33; Indictable Offences Act, 1848, s. 29; Stipendiary Magistrates Act, 1858, s. 3; Stipendiary Magistrates Act, 1863, s. 5; Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 20 (10)); and (2) that the stipendiary cannot act at any Court of gaol delivery or general or quarter sessions (Stipendiary Magistrates Act, 1858, s. 3; Stipendiary Magistrates Act, 1863, s. 5). With these exceptions his powers are those of an ordinary justice. He can act at licensing sessions as regards the grant or confirmation of licences (Licensing Act, 1872, s. 39).

As to London, see METROPOLITAN POLICE MAGISTRATE.

Stirpes. See PER STIRPES.

Stoc and Stovel. A forfeiture anciently incurred by one taken in the act of unlawfully carrying stoc (sticks) and stovel (fodder) out of woods.

Stock.—I. "Stock" primarily means a common fund belonging to a partnership or trading company, and used to enable it to carry on its business. (See FUND.) Thus what is now generally called the capital of a company was formerly called its "joint-stock," meaning the common or joint fund contributed by the members. (See JOINT-STOCK COMPANY.) The capital of a company is generally divided into shares (q.v.), so that "shares" and "stock" are in one sense the same thing: at the present day, however, "stock" is generally used in its secondary sense (infra) as opposed to "shares": but the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, s. 285, expressly enacts that "share means share in the share capital of a company and includes stock except where a distinction between stock and shares is expressed or implied."

II. In its secondary sense, "stock" signifies a fund or capital which is capable of being divided into and held in any irregular amount. Thus, the ordinary Government funds (Consols, India Threes, etc.) are called stocks, because a person can buy them in any amount (such as £99 19*s.* 11*d.* as well as £100). A share or debenture, on the other hand, is of a fixed amount (such as £10, £50, £100), and is incapable of sub-division or consolidation. Many companies, however, have (under the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, s. 41 (1), and the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 61) the power of converting paid-up shares into stock, and of converting debentures into debenture stock. See DEBENTURE STOCK.

Stock Exchange. The London Stock Exchange is an unincorporated private company. It has many rules which, unless they are recognised by the law, are binding upon its members only to such extent as they can be enforced by disciplinary action—such as expulsion—on the part of the committee. Upon persons who are not members the rules are not binding, unless in the eye of the law they are reasonable. And the law will not regard as reasonable any custom which is in violation of law. Thus, under Leeman's Act (q.v.), all contracts for the sale of bank shares must set out the distinguishing number of each share sold. Members of the Stock Exchange habitually, as between themselves, disregard this enactment; but the custom under which they do this is not binding on persons who are not members of the Stock Exchange and who have no knowledge of the custom. It is indeed a question whether any such contract is not void to all intents and for all purposes. See CUSTOM; WAGER.

Stock-jobbing Act. A popular title of the statute 7 Geo. 2, c. 8, which was officially entitled, "An Act to prevent the infamous Practice of Stock-jobbing." It was repealed by the statute 23 & 24 Vict. c. 28; and stock-jobbing, if and when it amounts to wagering, is now dealt with like other kinds of wagers (q.v.). See BARNARD'S ACT; PUTTS AND REFUSALS; CONTANGO; BACKWARDATION.

Stockland. The same as soke-land. See BONDLAND.

Stocks, The. These consisted of two boards; on one side of each there were two semi-circular holes; and, when the boards were fastened together, there were two circular apertures just large enough to encircle the ankles of an offender sitting behind the boards.

Sitting in the stocks for a certain number of hours was from very early times a common punishment for minor offences. It was ordered every day by the Court leet (q.v.). Subsequently it was prescribed by various statutes. Under the statute 4 Jac. 1, c. 5, s. 1 (made perpetual by the statute 21 Jac. 1, c. 7, but repealed by the Licensing Act, 1872), a person fined for drunkenness was, in default of payment, to sit in the stocks for six hours; and under the Sunday Observance Act, 1677, s. 2, a criminal who, for instance, sells cigarettes on a Sunday must, in default of payment of a fine or in default of sufficient distress, "be set publicly in the stocks for the space of two hours"—unless indeed so much of the section as relates to the stocks has been impliedly repealed by the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1884, s. 3.

There are now no stocks except such as are preserved as curiosities. None of them are ever used.

Stolen Goods. See ADVERTISEMENTS; POSSESSION; RECEIVING STOLEN GOODS; RESTITUTION; REVESTING.

Stone. "A stone shall consist of fourteen standard pounds" (Weights and Measures Act, 1878, s. 14). Formerly the stone varied enormously. The statute 11 Hen. 7, c. 4, s. 2, had enacted that there should "be but only xiiii [14] lb. to the stone of Wolle"; yet even in 1845 the customary stone for wool was twenty-four pounds in some places. The customary stone for which the prices of beef and of mutton are quoted is, in some places, still only eight pounds. And there were, and still are, many other variations of the weight. Of course (see WEIGHTS AND MEASURES) the law recognises only the statutory stone.

Stop Order. In Chancery practice, when a fund (in cash, stock or other securities) is in Court in a cause or proceeding, any person claiming an interest in it may apply to the Court for an order to prevent it from being paid out or otherwise dealt with, without notice to the applicant. The application is made by petition where a fund exceeding £1,000 has been paid into Court under the Trustee Act, 1893, and in other cases is made by summons, which (if opposed) must be supported by an affidavit showing the applicant's interest in the fund. Stop orders differ from restraining orders and distringas notices (q.v.) in being applicable only to funds in Court. Stop orders are also applicable to documents or securities deposited with an officer of the Court. (See PAYMENT INTO COURT.) See Ord. 46, rr. 12, 13.

Stoppage in transitu is the right which an unpaid vendor has to resume the possession of goods sold upon credit and to retain them until tender of the price where the vendee has become insolvent before they come into his possession (Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 44). Thus if A orders goods of B, and B despatches them by carrier to A's address, but before they have been actually delivered he hears that A has stopped payment (s. 62 (3)), then B is allowed to countermand delivery before or at the place of destination, and to resume the possession of the goods, according to that equitable principle in the law of contract by which one party may withhold performance on the other becoming unable to fulfil his part of the contract. But it is not an unlimited right; for the vendor cannot exercise it if he has parted with documents sufficient to transfer the property, and the vendee, upon the strength of them, has sold the goods to a bonâ fide purchaser without notice (s. 47). The vendor's right ceases as soon as the transitus is determined, whether by the goods arriving at their destination, or by being delivered to a person on behalf of the vendee, or by the carrier agreeing, between himself and the vendee, to hold the goods for him, not as carrier, but as his agent (s. 45).

There is also a so-called right of stoppage in transitu in cases where there is in fact no transit, as where goods are sold whilst in the possession of a warehouseman, and some act remains to be done for the completion of the sale. (See DELIVERY ORDER; DOCK WARRANT.) As to this see the Factors Act, 1889, s. 10.

Story. Joseph Story was born in 1779 at Marblehead near Boston, in the United States of America, became member of Congress in 1809, judge of the Supreme Court in 1811, professor at Harvard in 1829, and died 10 September, 1845. His principal works are: Equity Jurisprudence; Law of Bailments; Agency; Bills of Exchange; Promissory Notes; Partnership; and the Conflict of Laws.

Stranding. Under the memorandum (q.v.) in an ordinary policy of marine insurance, the underwriters are not liable for damage sustained by certain perishable articles, unless in consequence of a general average, or a stranding of the ship. "Stranding" does not occur when a vessel takes the ground in the ordinary and usual course of navigation, in a tideway or harbour, upon the ebbing of the tide or the like, so that she will float again on the flow of the tide; but it occurs if the vessel takes the ground by reason of some unusual or accidental occurrence, e.g., in consequence of an unknown and unusual obstruction in the harbour.

Stranger. In law a person is said to be a stranger to a transaction when he takes no part in it, or no part producing any legal effect. Thus a person who is not a party to a deed, contract, etc., is said to be a stranger to it. (See PART; PRIVY.) So when a promise is made to a person, but he has neither taken any trouble or charge upon himself, nor conferred any benefit on the promsior, but the trouble has been sustained or benefit conferred by another, the promisee is said to be a stranger to the consideration. See CONSIDERATION.

A "stranger in blood" means no relation. The Schedule to the Stamp Act, 1815, speaks of "any stranger in blood to the deceased." A bastard (q.v.) is a "stranger in blood" for certain purposes unless legitimised per subsequens matrimonium.

Straw, Man of. A person without means. The term is not known, otherwise than colloquially, to the law. It is, however, much used in connection with the transfer to a man, absolutely without means, of shares to escape calls and of leases in order to escape liability in respect of covenants. In respect of shares such a transfer, for a nominal or without consideration, will not relieve the transferor of liability if the shares be those of a mine within the Stannaries Act, 1869 (see s. 35); but in every other case the transfer, if it completely vests the shares in the transferee as absolute owner, will relieve the transferor of all liability except such as may, in the event of a winding-up, attach to him as being on the "B" list (see A AND B LISTS). As regards leases, such an assignment, unless it be in breach of a covenant not to assign without the consent of the lessor, will completely relieve the lessee of all liability in respect of covenants running with the land, amongst which are included, of course, the covenant to repair or to put or leave in repair.

Street. In the law, as elsewhere, this, in the absence of statutory definition, means a road with continuous houses on each side of it. But statutory definitions have very much extended the meaning of the term for the purposes of various Acts. The Towns Improvement Clauses Act, 1847, s. 3, declares it to include "any road, square, court, alley and thoroughfare within the limits" to which that Act applies. Definitions to much the same effect, but in different words, are contained in the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, s. 3, the Towns Police Clauses Act, 1847, s. 3, and the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 4. The Public Health (London) Act, 1891, s. 141, is equally comprehensive, and goes even further by declaring that a road is not outside the definition merely because there are no houses along it.

Street Betting. See BETTING.

Street Musician. A street musician who makes himself a public nuisance is indictable as such; but, of course, no one is so foolish as to indict him; and the householder remained practically at the mercy of the street musician and the street singer until Bass' Act (q.v.) was enacted. Under that Act any street musician, organ grinder or singer can be arrested and summarily convicted if, on being required by any householder (personally or through a servant or a constable) to go away, for any reasonable or sufficient cause (which must be stated to him), such as illness or interference with the occupation or pursuits of the household, he continues to perform near the house.

Under various bye-laws made under statutory powers of the London County Council and the metropolitan boroughs, the performance of street musicians, etc., in various streets, etc., is an offence punishable summarily. In towns other than London, music, etc., in the streets can be regulated or prohibited under various local Acts, or under bye-laws made in pursuance of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 23, and the Local Government Act, 1888, s. 16.

Street Performances; Street Trading. See CRUELTY TO CHILDREN.

Strict Settlement. See SETTLEMENT.

Strike. There is, of course, no question as to the right of an individual workman to cease to work, provided that he does so without breach of contract and without making himself or his family chargeable to the parish. As to the cessation of work by workmen acting in conjunction with one another, which constitutes a strike, see COMBINATION.

Striking. Striking a jury is what is more commonly known as nominating and reducing (q.v.).

Striking out a pleading or part of a pleading takes place when the Court makes an order to that effect, either for the purpose of amendment (q.v.) or to compel one of the parties to do some act. Thus if a defendant fails to comply with an order for discovery, he is liable (under Ord. 21, r. 21) to have his defence struck out, and to be placed in the same position as if he had not defended the action.

Striking off the Roll. See SOLICITOR.

Stuff Gown is the robe worn in Court by utter barristers. See KING'S COUNSEL.

Sturges-Bourne's Act. A popular title of the Vestries Act, 1818, and also of the Poor Relief Act, 1819.

Sub-agent; Sub-contractor. When an agent employs a person as his agent, to assist him in transacting the affairs of his principal, the person so employed is called a sub-agent. In the absence of an agreement to the contrary, there is no privity between the principal and the sub-agent; therefore, the principal is not liable to the sub-agent for his remuneration, and he cannot sue the sub-agent for negligence or misconduct; he must sue the agent. But if the agent has an express or implied authority to employ a sub-agent, privity of contract arises between the principal and the sub-agent, and the principal may sue the sub-agent for misconduct.

Similarly, when a contractor makes a contract with a sub-contractor to carry out his contract, or part of it, there is no privity between the principal contractee and the sub-contractor.

Subduct. In probate practice, to subduct a caveat is to withdraw it.

Subinfeudation, while it was allowed, was what took place when a tenant in fee simple of land granted the whole or part of it to another person in fee simple, to hold of him as his tenant, so that the relation of tenure, with its incidents of fealty, services, etc., was created between them. The practice of subinfeudation being found to decrease the power and wealth of the great landholders (the barons), it was abolished in Edward the First's reign by the statute known as Quia Emptores (q.v.). Therefore, at the present day, if A holds land of B in fee simple, and wishes to grant it to C, he can only do so on the term that C shall hold it of B, and not of himself (A). See FEUDAL SYSTEM; SEIGNORY; TENURE.

Subjacent. See SUPPORT.

Sublato fundamento cadit opus (Jenk. Cent. 106). (If the foundation be removed, the building comes down.)

Sublato principali tollitur adjunctum (Co. Litt. 389). (The principal being taken away, its adjunct is also taken away.) Thus, under the old law, when the estate to which a warranty was annexed was defeated, the warranty was also defeated.

Sub-lease. See LEASE.

Submission. A submission to arbitration is an instrument by which a dispute or question is referred to arbitration. (See ARBITRATION.) When the reference is made by the order of a Court or judge, the order is called a reference; submission denotes an agreement between the parties. Such an agreement may be either general (that is, an agreement to refer to arbitration all future disputes arising out of a specified matter), or a particular submission (that is, an agreement to refer to arbitration a dispute which has already arisen). A general submission is commonly contained in articles of partnership and other agreements extending over a long period. A particular submission may be revoked by either party, unless there is an agreement to make the submission a rule of Court. A general submission cannot be revoked in any case. See RULE OF COURT.

Sub-mortgage. See MORTGAGE.

Subnervare. To hamstring. It would appear to have been anciently the custom—if Jacob is correct—Meretrices et impudicas mulieres sub-nervare; but it is not clear whether this was done under colour of the law or by zealous social reformers acting without authority.

Subornation of Perjury. This consists of the procuring of a person to commit perjury. At common law it was, and under the Perjury Act, 1911, s. 7 (1), it still is, punishable in the same way as perjury. The attempt to suborn perjury is also a misdemeanour under s. 7 (2) of that Act, just as it was at common law.

Subpœna is a writ issued in an action or suit requiring the person to whom it is directed to be present at a specified place and time, and for a specified purpose, under a penalty (sub pœna) of £100. The varieties of subpœna now is common use are: (i) the subpœna ad testificandum, used for the purpose of compelling a witness to attend and give evidence, either in Court or before an examiner or referee; and (ii) the subpœna duces tecum, used to compel a witness to attend in Court or before an examiner or referee, to give evidence and also bring with him certain documents in his possession specified in the subpœna. There are also (iii) the subpœna to show cause, which must be served upon an infant when he comes of age if a judgment against him during infancy has given him a day to show cause against it; and (iv) the subpœna to name a solicitor which the one party to an action can serve upon the failure of the other party to appoint a solicitor in the place of a solicitor who has died or become incapable of acting. These last two subpœnas are issued under the old Chancery practice: see Ord 72, r. 2.

Under the old Chancery practice, every suit was commenced by a writ of subpœna requiring the defendant to appear; hence in the old books "subpœna" is equivalent to "suit in equity" or "bill of complaint." Under the more modern practice, the subpœna was endorsed on the bill of complaint. Now every action is commenced by writ of summons. The subpœna to hear judgment was another kind used in Chancery practice: it was issued by the party setting down a cause for hearing and was served on the opposite party. If the party served did not appear at the hearing, the Court might make a decree against him.

Subpœna Office in Chancery. This office (like the Sealer (q.v.), etc.) was abolished by s. 28 of the Court of Chancery Act, 1852, which transferred to the Clerks of Records and Writs such work as there was to be done.

Subreption. In ecclesiastical law this means the obtaining of a faculty, dispensation, etc., by a suppression of any material fact. Compare OBREPTION.

Subrogation in its general sense is the substitution of one person or thing for another, so that the same rights and duties which attached to the original person or thing attach to the substituted one. Thus, if a person insures a ship which is lost by a collision caused by the negligence of another ship, he may recover the value of the ship from the underwriters, and then they are subrogated to his rights so as to be able to bring an action against the persons who caused the collision. (See INSURANCE.) There is no subrogation as regards life or accident insurance; the insurances to which it applies are only marine and fire insurances. Compare SURROGATE, who is a person subrogated, quoad certain matters, for the bishop.

Subscribe; Subscription. To subscribe is literally to "write under," and is sometimes opposed to "sign," because a signature is not necessarily placed at the end or bottom of an instrument. (See SIGN; WILL.) A subscribing witness is the same thing as an attesting witness. See ATTEST.

Subsequens matrimonium tollit peccatum præcedens (Reg. Jur. Civ.). (A subsequent marriage removes the previous sin.) But in our law it does not legitimate children born before the marriage. See BASTARD.

Subsidy. From about the year 1300 to the reign of Anne this word had several different meanings. During the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries it generally meant the import and export duties on cloth, wool, leather and skins, and the tonnage and poundage granted to the king for special occasions (see Parl. Rolls, 1340, the statute 27 Edw. 3, st. 1, c. 4; the statute 5 Rich. 2, st. 2, c. 3, etc.). This meaning was preserved even after the Restoration (see the statutes 12 Car. 2, c. 4, and 6 Anne, c. 48). In the sixteenth century it meant mainly the tax of 4*s.* in the pound on land and 2*s.* 8*d.* in the pound on moveables from time to time voted, and all through it had the wider general meaning of any tax imposed by Parliament.

The term was extended by Coke and others to the taxes known as tenths (q.v.) and fifteenths (q.v.). They also classified the duties on cloth, wool and leather as "perpetual subsidies" (apparently because they were granted almost as of course) and other taxes as "temporary subsidies" (apparently because their grant was not so common), but both the one kind and the other were in fact payable only when Parliament voted them.

Substantive Law. See ADJECTIVE.

Substituted Service. See SERVICE.

Substitution; Substitutional; Substitutionary. Where a will contains a gift of property to a class of persons with a clause providing that, on the death of a member of the class before the period of distribution, his share is to go to his issue (if any), so as to substitute them for him, the gift to the issue is said to be substitutional or substitutionary. A bequest to such of the children of A as shall be living at the testator's death, with a direction that the issue of such as shall have died shall take the shares which their parents would have taken, if living at the testator's death, is an example. Under such a gift the issue of children dead at the date of the will cannot take anything.

Subtraction is where a person refuses or neglects to perform a duty. The term is chiefly used in connection with services and tithes. In the law of real property, subtraction is where a person who owes any suit, duty, custom or other service to another, withdraws or neglects to perform it; the principal services which are the subject of subtraction are fealty, suit of Court, rent, and customary services. (See SECTA.) In the case of fealty, suit of Court, and rent, the remedy is by distress; an action also lies for rent and for subtraction of customary services. (See SERVICE.) In practice, however, the wrong of subtraction is not of common occurrence.

In ecclesiastical law, subtraction is the injury of withholding tithes from the rector or vicar. For this injury, a suit lies in the ecclesiastical Courts, unless the tithes only amount to £50 or under, or unless there is a dispute whether they are payable. But now almost all tithes have been commuted into rent-charges, for recovering which a special mode of proceeding by distress has been provided, so that suits of subtraction are now quite obsolete. See TITHES.

Sub voce (s.v.). Under the title.

Succession; Successor.—I. In the primary meaning of the word, succession is where property passes on the death of a corporation sole to his successor; "for," (Co. Litt. 8B) "as the heire doth inherit to the ancestor, so the successor doth succeed to the predecessor." Therefore, in a conveyance of land to a bishop, parson, or any other sole corporation, the limitation must be to him "and his successors"; if it were "to him and his heirs" or "in fee simple," he would take in his personal capacity, and if there were no words of limitation he would take for his life only. (See FEE; HEIR; WORDS OF LIMITATION.) In some cases a corporation sole can also take personal property by succession. See CHURCHWARDEN.

There are also statutory modes of succession: thus, where land is conveyed to trustees for persons associated together for religious, educational, literary, scientific or artistic purposes, it passes to their successors in office without conveyance.

The succession of the Crown (the sovereign being a corporation sole) resembles the descent of land, except (i) that in the case of a sovereign dying and leaving no son but several daughters, the Crown descends to the eldest alone; and (ii) that it can only descend to Protestants. See DEMISE.

II. A succession takes place, within the meaning of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, where a person becomes beneficially entitled to or interested in property upon the death of another. The person so becoming entitled is called "the successor," and the person from whom he derives his title or interest is called "the predecessor." Thus, if A by deed settles property on B for life, and after his death on C, then on B's death a succession takes place, C being the successor and A the predecessor. So, if A dies intestate and entitled to land, a succession to his heir-at-law takes place. Where a person exercises a general power of appointment which he has become entitled to on the death of another person, he is deemed to be entitled to the property so appointed as a succession derived from the donor of the power (s. 4). If, therefore, he exercises it by will, two successions take place on his death, one from the donor to the donee (appointor), and another from the appointor to the appointee. But where a person exercises a limited power which he has become entitled to on the death of another person, the appointee (and not the appointor) is deemed to take the property as a succession derived from the donor of the power (s. 4). The object of the Act being to impose a duty on all dispositions and devolutions of property not chargeable under the Legacy Duty Acts, the terms "succession," "successor" and "predecessor" are in effect applicable only to successions arising from settlements inter vivos of real and personal property, and from descents or testamentary dispositions of real and leasehold estates. (See LEASEHOLDS.) Where a testator directs real estate to be sold, the proceeds are chargeable (under the Legacy Duty Act, 1805) with legacy, and not with succession, duty. See SUCCESSION DUTY; LEGACY DUTY.

Succession Duty. This is a duty which was first imposed by the Succession Duty Act, 1853, on gratuitous acquisition, on death, of property in respect of which no legacy (q.v.)

duty is payable, unless the property is specially exempted from succession duty. Since 1853 a large number of statutes, which cannot be enumerated here, have dealt with the duty. Under the Succession Duty Act, 1853, s. 10 (as amended by the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, s. 58 (1)), the rate is now, in the case of acquisition (1) by a husband, wife, lineal ancestor or lineal descendant of the deceased, or the husband or wife of any such person, 1 per cent.; (2) by a brother of sister of the deceased or a descendant of such brother or sister, or the husband or wife of any such person, 5 per cent.; and (3) by any other person, 10 per cent. Under the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, s. 41, and under the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888 (as amended by the Finance Act, 1894, s. 1, Sch. 1), where neither probate (q.v.) nor estate (q.v.) duty is payable, class (1) pays an additional 10s. per cent., and each of the remaining classes pays an additional 1½ per cent.

No succession duty is payable where the principal value of all successions on the same death does not amount to £100 (Succession Duty Act, 1853, s. 18). As to other cases in which succession duty is not payable see LEGACY DUTY; that title requires to be amended by inserting after the word "payable" in line 4, col. 1, p. 524, the words "by class (1) of the above-mentioned persons."

In the case of deaths since 1st August, 1894, succession duty on property of which the successor is competent to dispose, is payable on the market value thereof less the amount of estate duty payable (Finance Act, 1894, s. 18 (1)), and succession duty on property of which the successor is not competent to dispose is payable on the value—calculated according to the tables annexed to the Succession Duty Act, 1853—of an annuity equal to the annual income of the property (Succession Duty Act, 1853, ss. 21, 31).

As to the meaning of "successor," and the correlative "predecessor," see SUCCESSION.

Succurritur minori: facilis est lapsus juventutis (Jenk. Cent. 47). (A minor is to be assisted: a mistake of youth is easy.) Compare IN JUDICIIS, ETC; MELIOREM CONDITIONEM, ETC. See EXPECTANT HEIR.

Sue.—I. To sue a person is to bring an action, suit or other civil proceeding against him.

II. In the suing and labouring clause in a policy of insurance, the meaning of the word "sue" is not clear, although the meaning of the clause as a whole is well settled. See SUING AND LABOURING.

Sufferance. See TENANT AT SUFFERANCE.

Sufferance Wharf. A place appointed by order under the hands of the Commissioners of Customs and Excise (made pursuant to s. 14 of the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876) for the lading and unlading of goods liable to customs duties.

Suffragan. See BISHOP.

Suggestio falsi is an active misrepresentation, as opposed to a suppressio veri, or passive misrepresentation. See MISREPRESENTATION: compare OBREPTION; SUBREPTION.

Suggestion. Formerly, changes of the parties to an action in the King's Bench Division could be entered on the roll (or record of the proceedings in an action) by a "suggestion" (that is to say, an allegation) of them; and this made the action continue in the names of the new parties so as to prevent abatement (q.v.). Now the practice in such a case is as mentioned under REVIVOR.

As to suggestion of breaches, see BREACH.

Suicide is where a person kills himself. Deliberate suicide by a sane person is a felony, formerly punishable by forfeiture of the offender's goods and chattels to the Crown, and by an ignominious burial in the highway with a stake driven through his body, and without Christian rites of sepulture; but after 1824 the only consequences were burial in a churchyard or other burying ground between 9 and 12 at night without Christian rites; and since 1882 interment is as described under BURIAL. In practice, very slight evidence is sufficient to induce a coroner's jury to return a verdict of temporary insanity, which makes the suicide no crime. See INQUEST; FELO DE SE.

Sui juris. In Roman law, persons were divided into two classes, according as they were sui or alieni juris. Persons subject to the potestas of a father, or the manus of a husband, or the mancipium of a master, were said to be alieni juris; the class, therefore, included all persons having a father or other ascendant living (unless they had been emancipated or otherwise freed from the patria potestas); all married women who had been married with certain formalities; and all slaves. All other persons were sui juris, so that a child of a few years old, if he had no father or other ascendant living, and had not been adopted by anyone, was sui juris, although he was under disability.

In English law, the term "sui juris" (though taken from the Roman law) is used in quite a different sense. A person is said to be sui juris if he is not subject to any general disability. Therefore, infants, lunatics, convicts and a few other persons, are not sui juris, because they cannot enter into contracts or dispose of their property with the same freedom as ordinary persons. (See DISABILITY; GUARDIAN; INFANT; NEXT FRIEND; CURATOR.) Married Women, under the common law, were for certain purposes classed with infants and lunatics: the Married Women's Property Acts (q.v.) have entirely altered their position.

Suing and Labouring Clause is a clause in a policy of marine insurance, generally in the following form: "In case of any loss or misfortune, it shall be lawful to the assured, their factors, servants and assigns, to sue, labour and travel for, in, and about the defence, safeguard and recovery of the" property insured, "without prejudice to this insurance; to the charges whereof we the assurers will contribute." The object of the clause is to encourage the assured to exert themselves in preserving the property from loss. They are now under a statutory duty to do so (Marine Insurance Act, 1906, s. 78 (4)).

Suit is a generic term, and denotes any legal proceeding of a civil kind brought by one person against another. Suit includes action (Judicature Act, 1873, s. 100). The term is, however, used in opposition to "action." Formerly the most important kinds of suit in this sense were those brought by bill of complaint (q.v.) and information (q.v.) in the Court of Chancery, now abolished. A proceeding for nullity or dissolution of marriage, etc., in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division of the High Court is called a suit.

In the technical sense of the word, a bond or recognisance given to a public officer as security is said to be put in suit when proceedings are taken to enforce it. Thus, in the practice of the Chancery Division a bond which has been given as security for costs is put in suit by leave of the Court, when the occasion arises, by the person whose costs were intended to be secured.

As to suit in the sense of a service, see SECTA; SUIT OF COURT.

Suit of Court is a service theoretically due from every tenant of land forming part of, or held of, a manor, and consists in the duty of attending the Courts held by the lord. Free tenants or tenants of freehold land are bound (either personally or by attorney) to attend their lord's Court Baron (q.v.), while copyhold tenants are bound to attend personally at the Customary Court. These Courts are still held in some manors. See SECTA; SERVICE; SUBTRACTION.

Suit of the Peace. Prosecution. Thus, in the statute 5 Hen. 4, c. 15, it was declared that the king had "pardoned" (or agreed to stop) "the suit of his peace" for all offences with certain specified exceptions.

Suitors' Deposit Account. Formerly suitors in the Court of Chancery derived no income from their cash paid into Court, unless it was invested at their request and risk; now, however, it is provided by the Chancery (Funds) Act, 1872, that all money paid into Court, and not required by the suitor to be invested, shall be placed on deposit and shall bear interest at 2 per cent. per annum for the benefit of the suitor entitled to it. The sum required for the payment of this interest is produced by placing all money in Court not required for meeting current demands in the hands of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, who invest it in Government securities. This arrangement was called the "Suitors' Deposit Account," and, though the name is no longer in use, the money held on the account is still there.

Suitors' Fee Fund was a fund arising partly from the fees of the Court of Chancery, and partly from the surplus income of the Suitors' Fund (q.v.). Out of it the salaries and other expenses of the Court of Chancery were paid. By the Courts of Justice (Salaries and Funds) Act, 1869, the Suitors' Fee Fund was transferred to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, and the salaries and expenses formerly paid out of it were charged on the Consolidated Fund.

Suitors' Fund was a fund belonging to the Court of Chancery which consisted of two parts. Fund "A" consisted of Government stocks resulting from the investment of so much of the money in Court belonging to the suitors as was not required for current purposes. Part of the income arising from these investments was employed in paying certain expenses of the Court, and the balance was invested in Government stocks, which formed Fund "B." Subsequently the surplus income of both funds was annually added to the Suitors' Fee Fund (q.v.). By the Courts of Justice, etc., Act, 1869, the Suitors' Fund was transferred to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, and the Consolidated Fund was made liable for the due payment of the money which belonged to the suitors and had been invested as above stated. See PAYMASTER-GENERAL.

The Official Solicitor of the Court of Chancery (q.v.) was originally called the Solicitor to the Suitors' Fund, by reason of his duties in connection with that fund.

Suit Silver. A small annual sum paid by the tenants of some manors as a commutation for appearance at the Court of the lord.

Suling. A ploughland.

Sullereye. Stated by Coke to have been a ploughland (q.v.). Murray suggests that the word has no existence except as the result of typographical error, and that sullinge (=suling (q.v.)) was what Coke wrote.

Sumage. A toll levied from persons on horseback.

Summa est ratio quæ pro religione facit (Co. Litt. 341) (An argument which is in the interest of religion carries very great weight.)

Summary. In procedure, proceedings are said to be summary when they are short and simple in comparison with regular proceedings, that is, in comparison with the proceedings which alone would have been applicable, either in the same or analogous cases, if summary proceedings had not been available. Summary proceedings are sometimes concurrent with regular proceedings, that is, either may be adopted.

Petitions, special cases, motions, and summonses, not being interlocutory proceedings in an action or suit, are instances (chiefly occurring in the Chancery Division, under the statutory jurisdiction of the High Court) of summary proceedings in civil cases, as opposed to suits or actions. For examples see PETITION; SUMMONS. There are also summary modes of putting an end to an action, without carrying it on to trial, e.g., by obtaining judgment where the defendant has no defence (see JUDGMENT) or by interpleader proceedings.

In criminal cases, summary proceedings are those which may be had and concluded before a magistrate or justices of the peace, as opposed to regular proceedings by indictment or information and trial by a jury. The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, has much extended the power of magistrates to dispose of cases summarily, provided that the accused, if an adult, consents, and that the offence is one of minor gravity, e.g., larceny. (See COMPLAINT; JUSTICE OF THE PEACE; INFORMATION; QUARTER SESSIONS.) The Probation of Offenders (q.v.) Act, 1907, has given the justices large powers of dealing leniently with suitable cases; and the Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, has much facilitated the release on bail (q.v.) pending trial, has materially extended the power to deal summarily with offenders, and has given justices wide powers of mitigating the severity of their sentences.

As to summary process, see PROCESS and the Summary Jurisdiction (Process) Act, 1881.

As to summary proceedings in ecclesiastical matters, see CAUSE.

Summary Reception Order. This, in a case where there is no petition, is an order for reception as a lunatic, which can be made, as regards a lunatic not under proper care and control or who is cruelly treated or neglected, by a judicial authority (q.v.) (Lunacy Act, 1890, s. 13), and, as regards lunatics at large or pauper lunatics who ought to be sent to an asylum, by any justice or by a chairman of a board of guardians who is duly authorised by the Lord Chancellor (ib. ss. 14-22). See RECEPTION ORDER; URGENCY ORDER.

Summer Time. The Summer Time Act, 1922, provides that (s. 1): "the time for general purposes in Great Britain shall, during the period of summer time, be one hour in advance of Greenwich mean time"; that (s. 2 (1)) the "Act shall apply to Northern Ireland, the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man in like manner as to Great Britain"; and that (s. 3 (1)) "the period of summer time shall be taken to be the period beginning at two o'clock, Greenwich mean time, in the morning of the day next following the third Saturday in April, or, if that day is Easter Day, the day next following the second Saturday in April, and ending at two o'clock Greenwich mean time, in the morning of the day next following the third Saturday in September."

The Act expires on 31st December, 1923, unless Parliament otherwise determines (s. 3 (3)). It replaces the Summer Time Act, 1916, which was in force only up to the end of the Great War: see War of 1914-18. The Act of 1916 first established summer time. Under it the summer time of 1916 was from 21st May to 1st October, and that of each subsequent year during the currency of the Act was between such dates as were fixed by Order in Council

Summing-up, on the trial of an action by a jury, is a recapitulation of the evidence adduced, in order to draw the attention of the jury to the salient points. The counsel for each party has the right of summing-up his evidence, if he has adduced any, and the judge finally sums up the whole. (See REPLY; RIGHT TO BEGIN; TRIAL.) The expression "summing-up" always means the summing-up of the judge.

Summoneas. The initial word of a number of obsolete writs such as the summoneas ad warrantizandum (the process whereby the vouchee in a common recovery was brought in), the summoneas in auxilium (the old Aid Prayer (q.v.)), etc.

Summoner. From the fourteenth to the eighteenth century this meant an officer who summoned persons to appear in various Courts. Compare APPARITOR.

Summonitores scaccarii. The summoners of the Exchequer.

Summons. A summons is a document issued from the office of a Court of justice, calling upon the person to whom it is directed to attend before a judge or officer of the Court for a certain purpose. See WRIT OF SUMMONS; MOTION; PETITION; SUMMONS FOR DIRECTIONS.

I. In the High Court of Justice, a summons is a mode of making an application to a judge or master in chambers (q.v.). Summonses are therefore only used on applications which are either of subsidiary importance or which can be conveniently disposed of in chambers, such as applications for enlarging the time to take certain steps, for discovery and production of documents, for appointing examiners and receivers, for leave to sign judgment under Ord. 14 (see JUDGMENT), for the committal of a judgment debtor, etc., etc. In simple cases, the solicitors of the parties attend on their behalf: in difficult or important cases counsel are instructed.

In the King's Bench Division some summonses must be heard in the first instance by a master, and others by a judge. An appeal lies from a master to a judge in chambers, and from the judge to the Divisional Court: as to this see CHAMBERS.

In the Chancery Division every summons is heard in the first instance before a master, but either party, if dissatisfied with the decision, is entitled to have the summons heard by the judge in chambers. This is called adjourning the summons to the judge. The judge may also adjourn the summons to be argued in Court; or if he refuses to do so, the dissatisfied party may either move before the judge in Court to rescind the order made in chambers, or may appeal to the Court of Appeal. See CHAMBERS.

Summonses in the Chancery Division are of two kinds:—

(1) Summonses in pending actions and matters. These are of infinite variety, as already indicated (supra). An important kind is the summons to proceed. When a judgment or order has been made in Court directing accounts, inquiries, or other steps to be taken in chambers, the matter is brought before a master under Ord. 55, r. 33, by a summons "to proceed under the judgment (or order), dated the, etc." Appointments before the master are obtained on this summons, from time to time, until the matter is disposed of, and the certificate made. See CERTIFICATE.

(2) Originating summonses:—

The term originating summons includes "Every summons other than a summons in a pending cause or matter" (Ord. 71, r. 1A). This kind of summons was first introduced in 1852 by the statute 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s 45 (now repealed), under which an order for the administration of the personal estate of a deceased person might be made on the application, by way of originating summons, of a creditor, legatee or next of kin. The use of originating summonses has been much extended by the R. S. C., as made in 1885, and subsequently, which now provide for four kinds of those summonses:—(i) the general form, which is that issued under Ord. 54A (to obtain a declaration as to the construction of an instrument), under Ord. 55, r. 3 (for the determination, without any administration of the estate or trust, of the rights of persons interested, the ascertainment of any class of creditors, etc., or the furnishing of accounts), under Ord. 55, r. 4 (for the administration of a trust or of the real as well as the personal estate of a deceased person), under Ord. 55, r. 5A (for the foreclosure or redemption, etc., of a mortgage); (ii) an originating summons, not inter partes, as in the case of an application for the appointment of new trustees, in which case there is a respondent but no plaintiff or defendant; (iii) an originating summons under Ord. 54, r. 4F, in cases, such as those under the Arbitration Act, 1889, where no appearance is required; and (iv) an ex parte originating summons (where, as in the case of an infant absolutely entitled, there is no one who can be served) for the appointment under the Settled Land Acts of trustees of the settlement. It will thus be seen that many matters may now be brought before the Court by originating summons in which before the introduction of that method of procedure an action would have been necessary. The Courts will not, as a rule, allow the costs of an action if an originating summons—the Super-tax. See INCOME TAX.

Supervision. See WINDING-UP.

Supervisor. Another name for the "overseer" whom a testator sometimes used to name in his will. See EXECUTOR.

Super visum corporis. (Upon view of the body.) See CORONER.

Supplemental Bill. See BILL OF COMPLAINT.

Supplemental Deed. A deed which is expressed to be supplemental to a previous deed. Such a deed has the same effect as one endorsed (q.v.) on the previous deed (Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 53).

Supplicavit. When a justice of the peace refuses to compel a person to give security to keep the peace, the person exhibiting the articles (that is, the person making complaint) may apply to the High Court for a supplicavit, which is a mandatory writ compelling the justice to require security. But as the High Court may make an order for security to be given without the intervention of a justice of the peace, this writ is not used now. See ARTICLES OF THE PEACE; BREACHES OF THE PEACE.

Supply, Committee of. The House of Commons sits in Committee of Supply when resolutions are passed in favour of making to the Crown such grants as are necessary for all services (known as Supply Services) other than those services (known as Consolidated Fund Services) the expenses of which are charged on the Consolidated Fund (q.v.).

Support. The right of support to land is either a natural right or an easement.

I. Every proprietor of land is entitled to so much lateral support from his neighbour's land as is necessary to keep his soil at its natural level, that is, his neighbour must not excavate so close to the boundary as to cause his land to fall or subside. Similarly, if one person is entitled to the surface of land, and the land beneath the surface belongs to another proprietor, the owner of the surface is entitled to vertical support as against him; that is, the owner of the subjacent land must not cause subsidence of the surface unless he has an easement entitling him to do so. (See EASEMENT.) This natural right to support, whether lateral or vertical, does not extend to the case of land, the weight of which has been increased by buildings, unless it can be shown that the land would have sunk if there had been no buildings on it.

II. The right to extraordinary support, that is, to the support of land on which buildings have been erected, and which consequently, requires more support than it did in its natural condition, is an easement. It was formerly considered that such an easement was not within the provisions of the Prescription Act (q.v.), on the grounds that it is a negative easement; and that the second section of the Act only applies to positive easements. Both these propositions were discredited, if not overruled, in 1877; and it is now established that the easement of support may not only exist by virtue of an express grant, or in the case of an ancient messuage, but may also be acquired by twenty years' uninterrupted enjoyment.

The easement of support to a building by a building, or the right of the owner of a building to have it lean against and be supported by a building belonging to his neighbour, seems to stand in the same position. It may also arise by implied grant under a disposition by the owner of two tenements. See EASEMENT.

See EASEMENT; LOST GRANT; PRESCRIPTION; ANCIENT MESSUAGES.

Suppressio veri. See SUGGESTIO FALSI.

Supreme Court of Judicature is the Court formed by the Judicature Act, 1873 (as modified by the other Acts which, together with the Acts of 1873 and 1875, are collectively entitled the Judicature Acts, 1873 to 1910), in substitution for the various superior Courts of law, Equity, Admiralty, Probate and Divorce, existing when the Act was passed, including the Court of Appeal in Chancery and Bankruptcy, and the Exchequer Chamber. It consists of two permanent divisions, viz., a Court of original jurisdiction, called the High Court of Justice, and a Court of appellate jurisdiction, called the Court of Appeal. Its title "supreme" is now a misnomer, as the superior appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords and Privy Council, which was originally intended to be transferred to it, has been allowed to remain. See COURT.

The full title of the Court of Appeal is His Majesty's Court of Appeal (Judicature Act, 1873, s. 4); but the customary title is recognised by the Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 13 (2). The Court consists of the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice, the Master of the Rolls (Judicature Act, 1875, s. 4), five ordinary judges (Judicature Act, 1881, s. 3) entitled "Lords Justices of Appeal" (Judicature Act, 1877, s. 4), the President of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division (Judicature Act, 1881, s. 4), and every person who has held the office of Lord Chancellor (Judicature Act, 1891, s. 1). The Lord Chancellor is ex officio the president of the Court (Judicature Act, 1875, s. 6).

The effect of ss. 18 and 19 of the Judicature Act, 1873, is to give a right of appeal to the Court of Appeal from every judgment or order of the High Court except in criminal matters (ib., s. 47) or in matters relating to costs (ib., s. 49), and except in cases where the right is taken away either by statute or by rules made under statutory authority. An appeal direct to the Court of Appeal also lies in some cases from decisions of inferior Courts. Thus, under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908, s. 13 (3), there is an appeal to the Court of Appeal from the opinion of the County Court judge on a case stated by an arbitrator as to a point of law. The judges are the Lords Justices of Appeal (q.v.), who are to be distinguished from the Lords of Appeal in Ordinary (q.v.). As to appeals from decisions of the Court of Appeal, see APPELLATE JURISDICTION ACT.

The High Court of Justice is that branch of the Supreme Court of Judicature (q.v.) which exercises (i) the original jurisdiction formerly exercised by the Court of Chancery, the Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas and Exchequer, the Courts of Probate, Divorce and Admiralty, the London Court of Bankruptcy, the Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster, the Court of Pleas at Durham, and the Courts of the judges or commissioners of assize, and (ii) the appellate jurisdiction of such of those Courts as heard appeals from inferior Courts. It is a Superior Court of Record (see COURT), and was originally composed of the Lord Chancellor (who is the president but never (except occasionally, as in the case of Lord Birkenhead, for the purpose of dealing with accumulation of work) sits as a judge in the High Court), the Lord Chief Justice of England, the Master of the Rolls, the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer, the three Vice-Chancellors of the former Court of Chancery, such of the puisne judges of the old common law Courts as had not been transferred to the Court of Appeal, the judge of the former Probate and Divorce Court, the judge of the former Admiralty Court; and subsequently has consisted of the Lord Chancellor and the judges of Her Majesty's High Court of Justice who were appointed after the Judicature Act came into operation.

The High Court was also originally divided into five temporary divisions, corresponding to, and composed of the same judges as, the old Courts which it replaced, viz., the Chancery Division, the Queen's Bench Division, the Common Pleas Division, the Exchequer Division, and the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division, and it was enacted that most of the business which before the Act was within the exclusive jurisdiction of any one of the old Courts should be assigned to the corresponding Division of the High Court, that is, the action or matter was to be commenced in that Division: thus actions for the execution of trusts were to be assigned to the Chancery Division, and proceedings relating to the revenue to the Exchequer Division, provision being made for the transfer of business from one Division or judge to another when necessary.

On the death in 1880 of the Lord Chief Justice of England and the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer, who were in office when the Judicature Act came into operation, a council of judges was held, and on the resolution then passed an Order in Council (which came into effect on the 26th February, 1881) was made under the 32nd section of the Judicature Act, 1873, abolishing the offices of the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas and the Lord Chief Baron, and consolidating the "three common law divisions," that is, the Queen's Bench, Common Pleas and Exchequer Divisions, into one division called the Queen's Bench Division, under the presidency of a Lord Chief Justice. (See COUNCIL OF JUDGES; KING'S BENCH DIVISION.) The High Court, therefore, now consists of three divisions, namely, the Chancery Division, the King's Bench Division, and the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division. The rules as to the distribution of business above mentioned have not been altered, except in so far as the business of the three former common law Courts is now all allocated to the King's Bench Division.

Under the practice of the old common law Courts, almost every question of law arising in an action, such as demurrers, motions for new trials, for leave to enter verdicts, etc., had to be heard by the full Court (or Court sitting in banc) composed of at least three judges. To allow of the continuance of this practice, at all events for some time, the Judicature Act, 1873, ss. 40, 41, provided for the sittings of divisional Courts (see DIVISIONAL COURTS) of the High Court (not to be confounded with the Divisions of the High Court), to be composed of two or three (but not more) judges of the High Court, including, if practicable, one or more judges of the Division to which the business to be heard was assigned. In the Chancery, Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Courts, on the other hand, all the business was transacted before a single judge, each cause or matter in chancery business being marked for a judge by name, who heard all applications and questions in it from its commencement to its end. This practice is continued in the divisions corresponding to those Courts. With the view of extending this practice to the "common law" divisions of the High Court, the Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1876, s. 17, provided that in future every action and proceeding in the High Court and all business arising out of the same, should, so far as is practicable and convenient, be heard and disposed of before a single judge, and that all proceedings in an action subsequent to the trial or hearing, should be taken before the judge before whom the trial or hearing took place.

An appeal lies to the Court of Appeal from all judgments and orders of the High Court in its ordinary jurisdiction. See APPEAL: compare CRIMINAL APPEAL.

Sur; Sur Disclaimer; Sur Disseisin. "Sur" = "upon." In the titles of real actions "sur" was used to point out what the writ was founded upon. Thus a real action brought by the owner of a reversion or seignory, in certain cases where his tenant repudiated his tenure, was called a writ of right sur disclaimer. So a writ of entry sur disseisin was a real action to recover the possession of land from a disseisor. See also CUI IN VITÂ; CUI ANTE DIVORTIUM; WRIT OF ENTRY.

Sur cui in vita. See CUI IN VITA.

Surcharge. To surcharge a common is to put more cattle thereon than the pasture and herbage will sustain, or than the commoner has a right to do. As to the remedy for this injury, see ADMEASUREMENT. Where an account is being investigated in the Chancery Division, and the party at whose instance it is taken shows that an item has been omitted for which the accounting party ought to give credit, he is said to surcharge the accounting party. (See ACCOUNT SETTLED; FALSIFY.) Under the Public Health Acts, where an auditor disallows an item of expenditure by an urban authority as being illegal, he surcharges it on the person who made or authorised it (Public Health Act, 1875, s. 247 (7)); in other words, he makes him personally liable for the amount; and other statutes relating to local authorities give like power of surcharge.

Sureties of the Peace and Good Behaviour. A person may be ordered to find sureties for his keeping the peace upon conviction on indictment of any felony under the Criminal Law Consolidation Act, 1861. He may be ordered to find sureties both for the peace and for good behaviour upon conviction on indictment of any misdemeanour. An offender released upon probation (q.v.) may be required to find sureties for good behaviour; and so also a child or young person convicted of any offence may be released under s. 107 of the Children Act, 1908, upon surety being given for his good behaviour.

Upon a substantive application before justices, a person may be required to find sureties of the peace if Articles of the Peace (q.v.) are exhibited against him; and he may be required to find sureties for his good behaviour in cases where, even though no fear of violence is proved, it is shown that he has incited to breaches of the law or is a common breaker of the peace, or is otherwise not of good behaviour. In both cases the procedure is that indicated under ARTICLES OF THE PEACE.

At common law a justice may require sureties of the peace from anyone committing a breach of the peace in his view, and any Court having criminal jurisdiction may take the like course with either a complainant or a defendant in any case where the circumstances warrant it, even though no formal application comes before the Court.

"Good behaviour" includes "the peace," but "the peace" does not include "good behaviour." Thus one bound to the peace will not commit a breach of his recognisance if he incites to violation of the law; but one bound to good behaviour will commit a breach of his recognisance if he assaults another.

Surety. A surety is a person who binds himself to satisfy the obligation of another person, if the latter fails to do so: thus, if A owes B money, and C, for good consideration, promises B that he will pay him the money if A does not, here C is a surety for A, the principal debtor, and his promise constitutes a contract of suretyship. In the general sense of the word, therefore, a surety is the same thing as a guarantor (q.v.), but in practice the term is usually restricted to the case of a person who binds himself by a bond: thus, it is frequently necessary for a person who enters upon an office to obtain one or more sureties who bind themselves by a bond to answer for his acts and defaults in the performance of the office, either generally, or to a limited amount or a limited time. A security given in a judicial proceeding also generally takes the form of a bond or recognisance with sureties. See BAIL; RECOGNISANCE; SECURITY.

If a surety satisfies the obligation for which he has made himself liable, he is entitled to recover the amount from the principal debtor. If one of several sureties is compelled to pay the whole amount or more than his share, he is entitled to contribution from his co-sureties (see CONTRIBUTION); and if one of them has become insolvent, the solvent sureties may be compelled to contribute towards payment of the whole debt, as if the insolvent surety had never been liable.

It is also a general rule that a surety is entitled to the benefit of all the securities which the creditor has against the principal; so that if a debt is secured by a bond with a surety, and also by a mortgage, and the surety pays the debt, he is entitled to stand in the place of the mortgagee and obtain repayment out of the mortgaged property. And by the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, s. 5, every surety who pays the debt or performs the duty for which he is liable, is entitled to have assigned, to himself or a trustee, every judgment, specialty or other security held by the creditor, and to use the name of the creditor in any action or other proceeding.

If the creditor releases the principal debtor, this will discharge the surety from liability, unless the creditor reserves his rights against the surety; such a release is then in effect merely a covenant not to sue the principal debtor. (See RELEASE; JOINT.) The surety may also be discharged by a variation of the contract by the creditor, or by the substitution of a new contract before breach of the old one.

Surgeons. See MEDICAL PRACTITIONERS.

Surmise is a suggestion or allegation.

In ecclesiastical practice, an allegation in a libel (q.v.) is called a surmise. A collateral surmise is a surmise of some fact not appearing in the libel.

Surname. The name (such as Smith or Jones) borne by all the members of a family in addition to their Christian names. A man cannot change his Christian name, but, unless he be an alien, he can adopt any surname he pleases, provided of course he does so for no dishonest purpose; and he can do so without taking any formal steps in the matter, though it is usual to execute a deed-poll declaring the fact, and to enroll the deed-poll at the Central Office, and to advertise the change in the newspapers. A more expensive course is to change the name and then to get a royal licence to use the new name: the licence costs £50 if the change be made in compliance with a name and arms clause (q.v.) or £10 if made for any other reason (Stamp Act, 1891, Sch. I.), and, moreover, heavy fees are payable at the Heralds' College.

Under the Aliens Restriction (Amendment) Act, 1919, s. 7, no alien can use for any purpose any name other than that by which he was ordinarily known on 4th August, 1914, unless the Home Secretary gives him permission, or unless he has obtained a royal licence; but a married woman may use any name lawfully used by her husband.

See BASTARD; TRADE NAMES.

Surplice Fees. Customary payments made to clergymen officiating at marriages, baptisms and funerals.

Surplusage is where there is something over or in excess. In pleading, surplusage is the allegation of unnecessary matter, and is forbidden. See Ord. 19, r. 27.

Where A holds land of B in fee at a certain rent (e.g., five shillings), and B holds the same land of C at a less rent (e.g., one shilling), and C purchases A's estate, so that B's seignory or mesnalty (q.v.) becomes extinct; here C is bound to pay to B a rent equal to the difference between A's rent and B's rent (i.e., four shillings), and this is called, in the old books, a rent by surplusage.

When, upon a sheriff lodging his account with the Clerk of the Pipe (q.v., and QUIETUS), it appeared that there was a balance due to him he could, down to 1716, obtain payment only by means of a "record of surplusage," which was dilatory and expensive The statute 3 Geo. 1, c. 15, s. 7, enacted that in such case any sheriff (other than the sheriffs of the Welsh counties and of the Counties Palatine of Chester, Durham and Lancaster, none of whom passed their accounts before the Clerk of the Pipe) could obtain payment from the Treasury upon producing a certificate of surplusage from the Clerk of the Pipe, unless the surplusage was occasioned by the payment, under various statutes then in force, of rewards for the arrest of "clippers, coiners, highwaymen and house-breakers." The certificate of surplusage, like the quietus (q.v.) is now obsolete.

Surplusagium non nocet (Branch. Max. 5th ed., 216). (Surplusage does no harm.) Compare UTILE, ETC.

Surprise. Where a person enters into a contract, conveyance, or the like, with excessive haste or want of deliberation, this fact may give rise to the inference that there was no true consent, or that the consent was not free, and that the transaction ought therefore to be set aside on the ground of surprise or improvidence. See CATCHING BARGAINS; UNDUE INFLUENCE.

In procedure, a judgment or order may be set aside, or a new trial ordered, on the ground of surprise, if the Court thinks that substantial injustice has been done. Thus, if a verdict is obtained as the result of the trial coming on unexpectedly so that defendant's witnesses were not in attendance, a new trial may be granted upon terms under Ord. 39, r. 6.

Surrebutter, under the common law practice before the Judicature Acts, was the pleading which followed the rebutter. See PLEADING.

Surrejoinder, under the practice, before the Judicature Acts, both at common law and in Chancery, was the pleading which followed the rejoinder. It had long been obsolete in Chancery. See PLEADING.

Surrender, in the law of real property, is, in the words of Coke, "a yeelding up an estate for life or yeares to him that hath an immediate estate in reversion or remainder, wherein the estate for life or yeares may drowne [i.e., merge] by mutuall agreement betweene them." Thus, if A, being tenant in fee of land, grants a lease for years to B, and B surrenders the term to A, it ceases to exist, being merged in A's reversion. Surrenders are of two kinds—in deed and in law. A surrender in deed is one made by express words. It must now, in every case, be effected by a deed. Surrenders in law take effect by implication or operation of law, without express words. Thus, if a lessee accepts a new lease incompatible with his existing lease, this operates as a surrender in law of the latter. See MERGER.

A surrender is the principal mode of alienating copyholds. Every tenancy in copyholds, though practically amounting to more or less absolute ownership, is in theory merely a tenancy at will, which is, of course, incapable of being transferred as such by the tenant; for if he attempted to convey his interest by a common law conveyance, he would forfeit his estate. (See TENANT AT WILL.) Hence, when a copyholder wishes to transfer his interest in the land, he surrenders it into the hands of the lord, in favour of (technically, to the use of) the intended transferee, or surrenderee, as he is called; and the lord thereupon admits the surrenderee, that is, accepts him as tenant in lieu of the surrenderor. (See ADMITTANCE.) "The essential part of a surrender appears," says Elton, "to be the giving up of the customary seisin to the lord; and where this is effectually done, the form of relinquishment is not, as it seems, essential, unless the rights of a third person are injured." Formal surrenders are made by the surrenderor delivering to the lord, steward, or other person taking the surrender, a rod, straw, glove, or other symbol which represents the seisin of the land. A memorandum of the surrender is entered on the court rolls, and a copy of it signed by the surrenderor and steward, and formerly on parchment, is delivered to the surrenderee. A mortgage of copyholds is generally effected by a conditional surrender, or surrender made upon condition that, on payment of the mortgage debt on a certain day, the surrender shall be void. If the debt is not paid on the day fixed, the mortgagor still has an equity of redemption in the same way as if the land were freehold.

As to surrenders of copyholds for estates tail, and as disentailing assurances, see ESTATE TAIL.

Formerly, copyholds in some manors were not devisable at all, or devisable subject to restrictions. In many manors they were devisable only by the testator making a surrender to the use of his will, and then devising the land as he wished; but this necessity was abolished by the statute 55 Geo. 3, c. 192; and, by the Wills Act, 1837, full provision was made for the devise of copyholds in all cases.

Formerly, surrenders were usually made in Court, that is, at a customary Court Baron (q.v.); and surrenders made "out of Court" (that is, at any other place or time), were in some cases invalid, unless they were afterwards presented in Court by the homage. Now, however, the entry of the surrender on the rolls of the manor is sufficient: see the Copyhold Act, 1894, s. 85, which replaces s. 89 of the Copyhold Act, 1841.

The late Mr. Elton says, at p. 79 of the first edition of his work on Copyholds: "In the extensive district comprised in the manor of Taunton Deane in Somersetshire, there is a peculiar conveyance known as a Dayne Surrender, which is used when a copyholder alienes his tenement, but desires to retain a part for his own life. The purchaser is admitted to the whole of the land (which is called the Dayne Tenement), and pays a fine of one-third of the amount of an ordinary admittance fine, and further makes himself responsible for the heriot to be paid on the death of the tenant for life. On the death of the surrenderor, the whole land belongs to the Dayne tenant." He adds that, in the manor of Yetminster, in Dorset, a somewhat similar custom existed.

A corporation created by charter may give up or surrender its charter to the Crown, unless the charter was granted under an Act of Parliament (e.g., the repealed Municipal Corporations Act, 1835) imposing indefeasible duties on the bodies to which it applies.

Surreption. A form of the word subreption (q.v.).

Surrogate is a person appointed by a bishop or an ecclesiastical judge to act for him, e.g., to grant licences of marriage.

Survey. See COURTS OF SURVEY.

Survivorship is where a person becomes entitled to property by reason of his having survived another person who had an interest in it. The most familiar example is in the case of joint tenants, the rule being that on the death of one of two joint tenants the whole property passes to the survivor (but see JOINT; JUS ACCRESCENDI). See COMMORIENTES.

Suskin. A Dutch coin which was in use about the year 1400. It seems to have been of the same value as the English silver farthing. See GALLEY HALFPENNY.

Suspension.—I. An estate, interest, right or remedy is said to be suspended when it is extinguished for a time, but may afterwards revive: thus, if a copyholder in his own right becomes seised of the manor in right of his wife, the copyhold interest in his land will be suspended during the coverture; so if a person holding land in fee by certain rents or services, acquires the seignory during his life, the rents, services, etc., are suspended during his life. See UNITY OF POSSESSION.

II. In ecclesiastical law, suspension is of two kinds. Suspension relating only to the clergy is where a clergyman is temporarily deprived either of his office or his benefice, or both: suspension from office prevents him from officiating as a minister; suspension from benefice deprives him of the profits of the living. The other sort of suspension, which extends to the laity as well as the clergy, is suspension ab ingressu ecclesiæ, or from the hearing of divine service and receiving the holy sacrament.

Sus. per coll. An abbreviation for suspendatur per collum (let him be hanged by the neck), which, while Latin was used in the Courts (see FRENCH), was written by the judge opposite the name of each prisoner against whom sentence of death had been pronounced.

Swainmote. See ATTACHMENT OF THE FOREST.

Swans. The white swan on other than private waters is a royal bird and the property of the King, unless it bears "a swan mark" indicating that it is the property of a subject. A "swan mark" is a distinguishing mark which some person has, either by royal grant or prescription, acquired the right to use. A subject has also such property in a swan which is tame and kept on private waters as to make the stealing of the swan larceny at common law. The taking of swans' eggs by any person on land where he has not the right to kill game is punishable summarily (penalty 5*s*. for each egg) under the Game Act, 1831, s. 24; but it is to be noted that swans are not game. See BIRDS.

Swearing. See OATHS; CURSING.

Swearing the Peace. See ARTICLES OF THE PEACE.

Sweep. See CHIMNEY SWEEPER

Sweets. "The expression 'sweets' means any liquor which is made from fruit and sugar, or from fruit or sugar mixed with any other material, and which has undergone a process of fermentation in the manufacture thereof, and includes British wines, made wines, mead and metheglin" (Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, s. 52).

Swings. See WHIRLIGIGS.

Sworn Clerks. See SIXTY CLERKS, THE.

Syndic. Where a testator appointed a corporation aggregate to be his executor, administration with the will annexed used to be granted to their "syndic," that is, a person specially appointed by the corporation for the purpose.

This procedure was found to be inconvenient when it became an ordinary thing for a testator to appoint as his executor one of the insurance or other companies (see PUBLIC TRUSTEE) which are prepared to act as trustees and also as executors: and now any such company can itself take out a grant of probate in its corporate name (Administration of Justice Act, 1920, s. 17; S. R. & O., 1921, No. 649).

The term syndic means generally a person appointed by a corporation to act for it as regards a particular matter. The University of Cambridge appoints various syndics; these persons are members of the committees known as syndicates, and would elsewhere be described as members of the Library Committee and so forth.

Syndicate is a mercantile term which came into use about fifty years ago to denote an association of persons for a temporary purpose. Thus, if several persons unite to subscribe for, or guarantee the subscription of, an issue of shares or bonds, with a view to dividing the risk and the profit, they are said to form a syndicate. Sometimes a syndicate is formed by persons who are individually possessed of property of the same description (generally shares, or the like), and wish to subject it to a common management, with a view to its realisation, after which each member takes the profit or loss accruing in respect of his proportion. A syndicate will obviously be in law a mere partnership unless it be registered as a company.

The word is also used as meaning a council or body of syndics (q.v.); and it is so used at Cambridge: thus there is the Library Syndicate, which really means no more than the Library Committee.

Syngraph. This was the same thing as the chirograph (q.v.) except that the word Syngraphum was written in the middle of the deed instead of Chirographum.

Synod. A synonym of "council" as the latter word is used in ecclesiastical law. Apart from the General Councils held at Rome (with which our law is not concerned), there was in England down to 1555 the National Council of all the English bishops and archbishops. Now there are the Convocations (q.v.) of the two Provinces, and in each diocese there is the Diocesan or Episcopal Council at which the bishop meets his clergy in conference.

Synodal. The contributions anciently paid by the clergy to the bishop or the archdeacon upon the occasion of the Easter visitation. In the statute 34 Hen. 8, c. 16, synodals are termed synodics.

Synodales testes. Literally, those who gave evidence at the synod. Anciently the urban and rural deans were the synodales testes, one of their duties being to inform the diocesan synod of notorious cases of misconduct amongst both laity and clergy. Subsequently the testes were a priest and two or three laymen for every parish; and later the churchwardens or the sidesmen performed, or were supposed to perform, similar functions.

T

Table Rents. Such of the revenues of a bishopric as were appropriated to household expenses. Compare BORDLANDS.

Table Waters. This expression is defined by the Finance (New Duties) Act, 1916, as meaning (s. 4 (2)) "any aerated waters and any beverages sold or kept for sale in bottles other than (a) any liquor for the sale of which an excise licence is required, and (b) syrups or other liquors intended to be used only in a diluted form. The Act (s. 4 (1)) imposed an excise duty of fourpence per gallon on such waters when they are sweetened or fermented, and of eightpence a gallon when they are of any other kind. The makers or vendors of such waters must take out annual licences, on which there is an excise duty of ten shillings (ib., s. 6; Finance Act, 1916, s. 10). On imported table waters there are customs duties at the same rate as the excise duties of fourpence and eightpence above mentioned (Finance Act, 1916, s. 7 (1)).

These were the first taxes on soda water and other such waters.

Tabula de Amalfa, La. See AMALPHI, ETC.

Tacit. A communication of intention is said to be tacit when it consists of mere silence.

As to the distinction between "tacit" and "constructive," "express" and "implied," see those titles.

Tacking. In the law of mortgages, where land is mortgaged by ordinary deeds of mortgage to several persons in succession, each ignorant of the security granted to the other, the general rule is that they rank in order of date. But the first mortgagee, who alone obtains the legal estate, has this advantage over the others, that if he takes a further charge on a subsequent advance to the mortgagor, without notice of any intermediate second mortgage, he will have priority in respect of his subsequent advance over the second mortgagee: in other words, he will be in the same position as if he had made his subsequent advance at the same time that he made his original advance. And if a third mortgagee, who has made his advance without notice of a second mortgage, can procure a transfer to himself of the first mortgage, and thus acquire the legal estate, he may tack or annex his third mortgage to the first mortgage, and so postpone the second mortgagee: in other words, he is in the same position as if he had advanced the amounts of both the first and third mortgages at the date when the first mortgage was made. The term "tacking," though especially applied to the case of a subsequent mortgagee getting in the legal estate, is also applied to the first case given above, namely, that of a first mortgagee adding a subsequent advance to his first mortgage. The essentials to the operation of tacking are—(i) possession of the legal estate;

(ii) absence of notice, at the time of making the advance to be tacked, of the existence of the incumbrance which will be postponed.

Tacking was abolished from the 7th August, 1874, to the 1st January, 1876, by the operation of the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874; it was restored as from the latter date by the Land Transfer Act, 1875, without prejudice to anything done in the interval.

See CONSOLIDATION OF SECURITIES; MORTGAGE; PRIORITY.

Tail. See ESTATE TAIL.

Take and Carry Away. After 1733 (see FRENCH) it was, until 1916 (see INDICTMENTS), necessary, in an indictment for the common law offence of larceny, to aver that the prisoner "did feloniously take and carry away." See ASPORTATION.

Tales (dissyllabic). If, when a jury has been summoned, a sufficient number of jurors do not appear, or, if by reason of challenges or exemptions, a sufficient number do not remain to make up the proper number, either party may pray a tales, that is, ask the Court to make up the deficiency. A tales (Latin = such) is a supply of such men as were summoned upon the first panel. For this purpose a writ of decem tales, octo tales, used to be issued to the sheriff; but by the County Juries Act, 1825, s. 37, the judge is empowered to award a tales de circumstantibus, that is, to command the sheriff to return so many other men duly qualified as shall be present or can be found, to be taken first from those summoned on the common jury panel, if the deficiency is of special jurors, and if there are not enough common jurors, then from any persons who are present in Court or can be found. The jurors so added are called talesmen; and that word is pronounced as tailsmen.

Talfourd's Act. A popular title both of the statute 2 & 3 Vict. c. 54 ("relating to the Custody of Infants"—repealed and replaced by the Custody of Infants Act, 1873), and of the Copyright Act, 1842 (repealed and replaced by the Copyright Act, 1911).

Taliation, Sureties of. See LEX TALIONIS.

Talis interpretatio in ambiguis semper fienda est, ut evitetur inconveniens et absurdum (4 Inst. 328). (Ambiguous words should be interpreted in such a way that inconvenience and absurdity is avoided.) At 1 Rep. 52 the same maxim is quoted with the omission of the words in ambiquis and the addition of the words et ne judicium sit illusorium (and that the decision is not illusory).

Talis non est eadem. (The like is not the same.) Another version of NULLUM SIMILE, ETC.

Tallage. Taxes generally. See HIDAGE; DE TALLAGIO.

Tally. A stick of rectangular section across one side of which were cut notches denoting payments. The stick being split lengthwise so that on each half there was one half of each notch, the debtor retained one half of the stick as evidence of the payment and the creditor kept the other half as a record.

Tallies were used in the Exchequer (q.v.) from the earliest times: the two Deputy Chamberlains of the Exchequer and the Talley-Cutter attended the Talley Court to deal with them. The statute 23 Geo. 3, c. 82, s. 2, provided that, when the then two Chamberlains of the Exchequer should have ceased to hold office, the use of tallies should cease also; but tallies still continued in use until 1826, when the last of the chamberlains died.

Tally Trade; Tallyman. A form of trade under which goods are sold upon credit and are paid for by weekly instalments; and a man carrying on such a trade.

Taltarum's Case. A case decided in 1473 in which the judges laid it down that an estate tail might be barred by a common recovery See RECOVERY.

Tam quam; Tanquam. The action generally called a qui tam action. The name tam quam, like qui tam, is formed of words found in the phrase "qui tam pro domino rege quam pro se ipso."

Tarde. A return made formerly upon a writ by the sheriff when it came to him so late that he could not execute it in time: see Dalton, Office of Sheriffs, p. 163, and Fitzherbert N. B., 38.

Tavole Amalfitane. The Laws of AMALFI (q.v.).

Taxation; Taxes.—I. In public law, taxation signifies the system of raising money for public purposes by compelling the payment by individuals of sums of money called taxes.

Taxation is of two kinds. Some taxes are imposed on persons generally, without reference to locality, to raise money for the public expenses of the United Kingdom; other taxes are imposed on persons residing, or owning or occupying property, within a certain district, to raise money for the public expenses of that district. Taxes of the first class are sometimes called imperial, being required for the imperium or supreme Government; sometimes parliamentary, because their amount is fixed by Parliament. Taxes of the second class are called local, parochial, municipal, etc., to denote that they are assessed and levied by local authorities. More often still they are called "rates," and the term "taxes" is confined to imperial taxes. (See RATES.) Tithes (q.v.) are in the nature of local taxes, but are not usually so classified.

Imperial or parliamentary taxes include—customs, excise duties, stamp duties (including probate, legacy and succession duties), land tax, and income tax (see the various titles, also CONSOLIDATED FUND). As to "assessed taxes" (popularly called "King's taxes," to distinguish them from local taxes or rates, see EXCISE.

II. In procedure, taxation is the process of going through, and, if necessary, reducing, the bill of costs of an attorney or solicitor by a judicial officer. In the King's Bench and Chancery Divisions this process is performed by the Masters of the Supreme Court (q.v.) Taxing Office (Ord. 61, r. 1 (B)); in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division, and in the Court of Bankruptcy and the County Courts, by the respective registrars.

Taxation is of two kinds, taxation in an action, matter or other judicial proceeding, and taxation under the Solicitors Act, 1843.

Taxation of the former kind takes place where costs are awarded to a party and made payable either—(i) by his opponent, or (ii) out of a trust fund or the estate of a deceased person, etc. In the former case, the taxation is optional, that is, the person who is ordered to pay the costs is entitled to have them taxed, but he may pay them without taxation if he likes: in the latter case, the taxation is generally compulsory, that is, the costs must be taxed for the protection of the persons interested in the fund or estate, unless they are all sui juris and dispense with taxation. Taxation of the latter kind appears to occur only in Chancery and Probate actions.

When a party has reason to complain of the manner in which the master (or other officer) has taxed the costs, he may carry in objections before the master (or other officer), showing the items objected to, and apply to the master to review his taxation (Ord. 65, r. 27 (39)). If the objecting party is dissatisfied with the decision of the master, he may apply to a judge at chambers for an order to review the taxation, and the judge then decides whether the objection is well founded (ib., r. 27 (41)).

In the Chancery Division, when an interlocutory order directs the payment of costs by one party to another, the latter is entitled to have them taxed and paid at once. In the King's Bench Division, there is generally only one taxation of costs in an action, however many interlocutory applications there may have been; but this rule does not apply to orders of the Court of Appeal.

As to taxation between party and party, and between solicitor and client, see COSTS.

Taxation under the Solicitors Act, 1843, is the remedy for a person who is dissatisfied with a bill of costs rendered to him by his solicitor, whether for services in an action, etc., or in non-contentious business, such as conveyancing. The general rule is that a client can tax an unpaid bill only within a year after it has been delivered, unless there are special circumstances (s. 37), and that he cannot tax it after it has been paid, unless it was paid under pressure or under protest, etc., and in no case after a year from the payment (s. 41). On the other hand, a solicitor cannot commence an action for the recovery of costs until a month after he has delivered to the client a signed bill, that is, a bill signed by him or enclosed in or accompanied by a letter signed by him, and if the client applies for taxation the solicitor is restrained from commencing an action for his costs pending the taxation (s. 37).

See HIGHER AND LOWER SCALE.

The regulations applying to taxation generally are given in Ord. 65, r. 27.

Taxatores. See AFFEERORS.

Taxers. From the foundation of the University of Cambridge until well into the nineteenth century there were two university officers called taxers, who fixed the rents of students' lodgings and the prices of commodities, and kept the standards of weights and measures.

Taxing Officer. Each House of Parliament has a taxing officer, whose duty it is to tax the costs incurred by the promoters or opponents of private bills. See TAXATION.

Tea. The Sale of Tea Act, 1922, contains provisions to the effect that sales of tea, in quantities of or exceeding two ounces, shall be by net weight and in multiples of ounces or pounds.

Team; Theame. In the Anglo-Saxon period this meant the right to possess and exercise jurisdiction over bondsmen.

Teding Penny. See TITHING PENNY.

Telegraphs and Telephones. A telegraph means "a wire or wires used for the purpose of telegraphic communication, with any casing, coating, tube, or pipe enclosing the same, and any apparatus connected therewith for the purpose of telegraphic communication"

(Telegraph Act, 1863, s. 3), and "also any apparatus for transmitting messages or other communications by means of electric signals" (Telegraph Act, 1869, s. 3). It was held in 1880 that—as indeed is obvious—these definitions include the telephone. The Postmaster-General has the exclusive right of sending through his deputies messages by telegraph within the United Kingdom (Telegraph Act, 1869, s. 4) other than certain excepted messages (ib., s. 5), of which the most important are messages sent over privately maintained telegraphs by the owners thereof upon their private business.

Wireless telegraphy, if electricity be employed, is clearly within the definition of a telegraph. It is distinguished from other forms of telegraphy by being carried on "without the aid of any wire connecting the points from and at which the messages or other communications are sent and received" (Wireless Telegraphy Act, 1904, s. 1 (7)); and no apparatus for wireless telegraphy may be installed or worked at any place in the British Isles (ib., s. 3 (2)) or on any British ship without the licence of the Postmaster-General (ib., s. 1 (1)).

As to malicious interference with telegraph poles, wires, etc., see the Malicious Damage Act, 1861, ss. 37, 38.

See WIRELESS TELEGRAPHY.

Tellers. In the Exchequer there were four "considerable officers" known as Tellers, who received all moneys due to the king. They, with the auditor (q.v.) and the Clerk of the Pells, were abolished by the statute 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 15, s. 1.

Telligraph. This is derived from the Latin tellus (land) and -graph. It is of the same meaning as terrier (q.v.).

Temple. See INNS OF COURT; MASTER OF THE TEMPLE.

Temporalities of a bishop are all such things as he has by livery from the Crown, as castles, manors, lands, tenements, tithes, etc. During a vacancy of a bishopric the Crown has the custody of the temporalities, and (nominally) the rents and profits thereof. See GUARDIAN OF THE SPIRITUALITIES.

Temporary Estate Duty. This was a duty of 1 per cent. on any estate or succession exceeding £100, which was made payable, in addition to probate duty (q.v.) or succession duty (q.v.), by the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, ss. 5, 6, 7. The duty was not payable, in respect of any death after 1st August, 1894, upon property on which estate duty (q.v.) was payable (Finance Act, 1894, s. 1, Sch. I. (1)); and it therefore practically ceased when estate duty became payable, but, under the Revenue Act, 1889, it existed in theory until 1896.

Tempus est edax rerum (12 Rep. 5). (Time is a devourer of things.) And so "in the case of a charter of feoffment, if all the witnesses to the deed be dead . . . then violent presumption, which stands for a proof, is continual and quiet possession" (Grounds of Law, 320). Compare EX DIUTURNITATE, ETC.

Tenancy is the relation of a tenant to the land which he holds. Hence it signifies (1) the estate of a tenant, as in the expressions "joint tenancy," "tenancy in common"; (2) the term or interest of a tenant for years or at will, as when we say that a lessee must remove his fixtures during his tenancy. (See FIXTURES.) In old writers, "tenancy" sometimes denotes the land itself: "the tenant may plead that the tenancy is extra feudum of him"; this use of the word is obsolete. See TENANT; TENURE.

See AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS ACTS.

Tenancy in Common, in the strict sense of the term, is where two or more persons are entitled to land in such a manner that they have an undivided possession but several freeholds: that is, no one of them is entitled to the exclusive possession of any particular part of the land, each being entitled to occupy the whole in common with the others, or to receive his share of the rents and profits; and on the death of any one of them his share passes, not to the survivors, but to his heir or devisee, who then becomes tenant in common with the survivors. Tenants in common may acquire land by several titles, or in several rights, or at different times, and hence the only characteristic common to joint tenants and tenants in common is that of undivided possession.

Persons may also be tenants in common of chattels real or personal, so that on the death of one of them his share passes to his personal representatives.

See COPARCENARY; JOINT TENANCY; ESTATE; PARTITION; PRESCRIPTION; SEVERALTY; UNITY OF POSSESSION.

Tenant. Strictly speaking, a tenant is a person who holds land; but the term is also applied by analogy to personalty: thus we speak of a person being tenant for life or tenant in common of stock.

In its proper use, "tenant" connotes either estate or tenure. Every person who has an estate in land is a tenant; thus, a person who has an estate in fee simple is a tenant in fee simple, and a person who has an estate in joint tenancy is a joint tenant (see the following titles). Again, every tenant holds the land by tenure, "because," says Coke, "all the lands and tenements in England in the hands of subjects are holden mediately or immediately of the king. . . . And therefore the king in this sense cannot be said to be a tenant, because he hath no superior but God Almighty." (Co. Litt. 1A.) In this sense "tenant" is opposed to "lord" (q.v., and see TENURE).

In its more popular sense, "tenant" signifies a lessee of land or buildings for occupation, agriculture, etc. See LEASE; LANDLORD AND TENANT; TERM.

Tenant at Sufferance is a person who has originally come into possession of land by a lawful title, and holds such possession after his title has determined. "A tenant at sufferance," says Coke, "is he that at the first came in by lawfull demise, and after his estate ended continueth in possession and wrongfully holdeth over. As [where] tenant pur terme d'auter vie continueth in possession after the decease of cestui que vie, or [where] tenant for yeares holdeth over his terme." (Co. Litt. 57B.) A tenancy at sufferance is a chattel interest. See CHATTEL; ESTATE.

At common law, a tenant at sufferance is not a trespasser until the lessor or person entitled to the possession enters on the land, because his continuance in possession is imputed to the laches of the lessor in not entering at once (Co. Litt. 57B); but this doctrine has been modified by statute. See HOLDING OVER.

Tenant at Will, says Littleton, "is where lands or tenements are let by one man to another, to have and to hold to him at the will of the lessor, by force of which lease the lessee is in possession. In this case the lessee is called tenant at will, because he hath no certain nor sure estate, for the lessor may put him out at what time it pleaseth him." (Litt. § 68.) Similarly the tenant may leave when he likes. He has a right to emblements (q.v.), and to remove his goods, etc., if he is turned out by the landlord. He is liable for voluntary waste.

A tenancy at will may be created by parol (if followed by entry) or by deed. It may be determined not only by the will of either party, but also if the tenant should assign his estate to another, or if he should commit waste. As this kind of letting is very inconvenient to both parties, it is scarcely ever adopted; and in construction of law, a lease at an annual rent, made generally without expressly stating it to be at will, and without limiting any certain period, is not a lease at will, but a lease from year to year. See TENANCY FROM YEAR TO YEAR.

A tenancy at will is a chattel interest in land. See CHATTEL; ESTATE.

Copyholds were originally, and in theory still are, tenancies at will; but they are in fact no such thing. See COPYHOLD; SURRENDER.

Tenant by Copy of Court Roll (shortly, "tenant by copy") is the old-fashioned name for a copyholder. See COPYHOLDS.

Tenant by the Curtesy. See CURTESY.

Tenant for Life is a person who is entitled to land or tenements either for the term of his own life or for that of another person. In the latter case he is called tenant pur autre vie, and the person for whose life the land is holden is called the cestui que vie. See OCCUPANCY.

An estate for life may be created by deed of grant or feoffment, or by will. At the present day estates for life are principally created by settlements and wills: as where property is given to a man for his life, and after his death to his children. See ASSIGNMENT; HEIR; SURRENDER.

An ordinary tenant for life is not allowed to commit waste, but if his estate is given to him without impeachment of waste he may cut timber and open mines, etc., so long as he does not commit equitable waste. (See WASTE.) As to leases by tenants for life, see SETTLED LAND. See also EMBLEMENTS; IMPROVEMENT OF LAND ACTS.

Where a person has a life interest in a chattel (e.g., in a sum of stock), he is sometimes called a tenant for life.

Tenant for Years. "Tenant for terme of yeares," says Littleton, "is where a man letteth lands or tenements to another for terme of certaine yeares, after the number of yeares that is accorded between the lessor and the lessee. And when the lessee entreth by force of the lease, then is he tenant for terme of yeares; and if the lessor in such case reserve to him a yearely rent upon such lease, he may chuse for to distraine for the rent in the tenements letten, or else he may have an action of debt for the arrerages against the lessee." (Litt. § 5B.) A tenant for years is liable for waste (q.v.).

The expression "tenant for years" is not much used at the present day. Where a term is created by an ordinary lease, the tenant is called lessee. As to his rights and liabilities, see LEASE; LANDLORD AND TENANT;

FIXTURES; INTERESSE TERMINI. If the term is one of those long terms created by settlements and the like, under which no rent, covenants, etc., are reserved, the tenant is called a "trustee of the term." See TERM.

Tenant from Year to Year is a tenant of land whose tenancy can only be determined by a notice to quit expiring at that period of the year at which it commenced. In the case of ordinary tenancies from year to year a six months' notice to quit is required. Thus, if a house is held on a tenancy from year to year, beginning at Midsummer, and either the landlord or the tenant wishes to determine it, he must, at or before Christmas, give notice to the other to quit at Midsummer following.

A tenancy from year to year of land subject to the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Acts (q.v.) requires such notice to quit as is specified under NOTICE TO QUIT.

Whenever one person holds land of another, and there is no express limitation or agreement as to the term for which it is to be held, then, if the rent is payable with reference to divisions of the year (e.g., quarterly), the tenancy is deemed to be a tenancy from year to year. See TENANT AT WILL.

Tenant in Fee. See FEE.

Tenant in Tail. See ESTATE TAIL.

Tenant in Tail after Possibility of Issue Extinct, says Littleton, "is where tenements are given to a man and his wife in especiall taile. If one of them die without issue, the survivor is tenant in taile after possibility of issue extinct," because there is no possibility of issue being born capable of inheriting the estate. And so if tenements are given to a man and the heirs of his body by his present wife, and the wife dies without issue, then the husband is tenant in tail after possibility of issue extinct, because no issue by another wife could inherit the estate tail. Such a tenant is, in effect, only a tenant for his own life, for he cannot bar the entail (Fines and Recoveries Act, 1833, s. 18); and on his death the estate will pass to the person next entitled in remainder or reversion. The tenancy has, however, some of the privileges of an estate tail, e.g., the tenant is not punishable for waste. See ESTATE TAIL.

Tenant in Tail ex provisione viri. A woman was said to be tenant in tail ex provisione viri where she had an estate tail, either alone or jointly with her husband, in any lands or hereditaments inherited or purchased by her husband, or given to the husband and herself by any of the ancestors of the husband. Such a tenant in tail could not bar the entail after the death of the husband except with the consent of the issue in tail (statutes 11 Hen. 7, c. 20; 32 Hen. 8, c. 36). This kind of estate no longer exists: see s. 16 of the Fines and Recoveries Act, 1833.

Tenant-right.—I. In agricultural districts, tenant-right signifies the right of a tenant to claim a beneficial interest in the land, notwithstanding the expiration of his lease. In England, different usages have long prevailed in different counties and districts, conferring on an outgoing agricultural tenant a claim to remuneration for various operations of husbandry, from reaping the advantage of which he is prevented by the termination of his tenancy. Thus, by what is called the Lincolnshire tenant-right custom, if a tenant spreads chalk or bones upon the land, the money expended in this operation is divided by a certain number of years (three to seven); and if the tenant quits before the expiration of that period, he receives from the landlord a part of his outlay, proportionate to the number of years of the period remaining unexpired. (See CUSTOM.) Where this or any analogous custom exists, the tenant may claim under it instead of under the Agricultural Holdings Acts (see s. 1 (3) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908), which entitle the tenant to compensation not only for chalking but for many other improvements. These Acts (q.v.) have established a statutory tenant-right generally.

II. Tenant-right estates are a peculiar kind of customary freeholds, found in the north of England. Although they appear to have many qualities and incidents which do not properly and ordinarily belong to villenage or copyhold tenure: and also to have originally had some which savoured more of military tenure by knight-service: and to want some of the characteristic qualities and circumstances which belong to copyhold tenure (namely, in not being holden at the will of the lord and in not being alienable by surrender and admittance): it seems to be settled that these customary tenant-right estates are not freehold, but copyhold. See CUSTOMARY FREEHOLDS.

Tenant to the Præcipe. Before the Fines and Recoveries Act, 1833, if land was conveyed to a person for life with remainder to another in tail, the tenant in tail in remainder was unable to bar the entail without the concurrence of the tenant for life, because a common recovery could be suffered only by the person seised of the land. In such a case, if the tenant for life wished to concur in barring the entail, he usually conveyed his life estate to some other person in order that the præcipe in the recovery might be issued against the latter, who was therefore called the tenant to the præcipe. See PRÆCIPE; RECOVERY.

Tenants by the Verge. Such tenants "are in the same nature as tenants by copy of court roll [that is, copyholders]. But the reason why they be called tenants by the verge, is, for that when they will surrender their tenements into the hands of their lord to the use of another they shall have a little rod (by the custome) in their hand, the which they shall deliver to the steward or to the bailife . . . and the steward or bailife according to the custome shall deliver to him that taketh the land the same rod, or another rod, in the name of seisin; and for this cause they are called tenants by the verge, but they have no other evidence [title deed] but by copy of court roll." (Litt. § 78.) See SURRENDER.

Tenants Compensation Act, 1890. Provision is made by s. 2 of this Act for compensation for improvements by tenants where a mortgagee is in possession. This enactment (except in so far as relates to compensation under the Allotments and Cottage Gardens (Compensation) Act, 1887—see ALLOTMENTS), is repealed by s. 49, Sched. IV. of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908; but the latter Act (s. 12) proceeds to re-enact the section as regards holdings within the meaning of the Agricultural Holdings Acts.

Tender. A tender is an offer by a debtor to his creditor of the amount of the debt. The offer must be in money, which must be actually produced to the creditor, unless by words or acts he waives production: therefore, a mere statement by the debtor that he has the money in his possession ready for payment is not sufficient, even if the creditor says he will not receive it. But if the debtor brings the money in purses or bags, it is not necessary to show or count it, because, according to Coke, that is "the usuall manner to carry money in, and then it is the part of the party that is to receive it to put it out and tell it." The offer must also be unconditional. If the debtor requires a receipt, he must, if the amount is £2 or more, prepare and stamp it, and ask the creditor to sign it, and if the latter refuses to do so he is liable to a penalty under s. 102 (2) of the Stamp Act, 1891: but if the amount is under £2, the creditor is under no obligation to give a receipt. See RECEIPT.

If a debtor has made a tender, and continues ready to pay, he is exonerated from liability for the non-payment, but the debt is not discharged. Therefore if he is sued he should plead the tender, and also allege that he always was and still is ready to pay the debt, and he must pay the money into Court under Ord. 22, r. 3, or, in the County Court, under Ord. 9, r. 12 of the County Court Rules: if he can maintain the defence of tender and readiness to pay, he will be entitled to judgment for his costs.

Money is said to be legal tender when a creditor cannot refuse to accept it in payment of a debt. Coins issued by the Royal Mint for circulation in the United Kingdom are legal tender; gold coins up to any amount, silver up to £2, and bronze coins up to 1s. (Coinage Act, 1870, s. 4). Gold coins coined at certain colonial mints are also legal tender in this country. Notes of the Bank of England (q.v.) are legal tender: so also are Treasury notes (see CURRENCY NOTES).

The term "tender" is also applied to goods when they are offered to a person in performance of a contract for their delivery.

Tender of Issue. This was the equivalent, in the old common law practice, of what is now termed joinder of issue.

Tenel le Roy. Used in the statute 13 Rich. 2, c. 3, as meaning the abode for the time being of the king.

Tenement signifies a thing which is the subject of tenure (q.v.). The term, says Coke, "includeth not only all corporate inheritances [i.e., corporeal hereditaments] which are or may be holden, but also all inheritances issuing out of any of those inheritances, or concerning, or annexed to, or exercisible within the same, though they lie not in tenure . . . as rents, estovers, commons, or other profits whatsoever granted out of land; or uses, offices, dignities, which concerne lands or certain places . . . because all these savour of the recovery could be suffered only by the realtie." (Co. Litt. 19B, 20A.) But a personal hereditament, such as an annuity granted to a man and his heirs, is not a tenement. See HEREDITAMENT; ESTATE TAIL; LAND.

In popular language, "tenement" means a house. (See MESSUAGE.) And in modern statutes it sometimes has that meaning: see, for instance, the Towns Improvement Clauses Act, 1847, s. 167.

As to "dominant" and "servient" tenements, see EASEMENT.

Tenementary Lands. Spelman states that these were the outlying parts of manors granted by thanes in the Saxon period to tenants at arbitrary rents. They seem to have been farms let to tenants as distinguished from what would now be called the home-farm.

Tenement Factory; Tenement Workshop. These expressions are defined in s. 149 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901.

Tenementis legatis. A writ which anciently lay for the determination of disputes as to wills of lands and tenements in the City of London and other corporate towns.

Tenendas. In ancient charters granting lands this was the clause (commencing with the words tenendas prædictas) which set out the tenure upon which the lands were to be held. It corresponded to the tenendum of a deed.

Tenendum. (Latin = "to be held.") In a deed of conveyance of land, the tenendum is the clause which formerly indicated the tenure by which the grantee was to hold the land of the grantor—"tenendum de me et hæredibus meis sibi et hæredibus suis, per servitium," etc. When the statute Quia Emptores abolished subinfeudation, the clause was altered to indicate that the grantee was to hold of the superior lords—"tenendum de capitalibus dominis;" but now it simply says that the land is to be held by the grantee, without mentioning of whom. See TENURE; HABENDUM; QUIA EMPTORES.

Tenentibus in assisa non onerandis. The full title of this writ was "Tenentibus in Assisa non onerandis de damnis quamdiu disseisitores habeant unde damna levari possunt," which indicates (as was the case) that where one had disseised another and then put a tenant into possession, the writ lay for the tenant in order to prevent his being sued by the person disseised as long as the disseisor had chattels upon which the person disseised could levy.

Ten Hours Act. The popular title of the statute 10 & 11 Vict. c. 29 (repealed and replaced by the later Factory Acts) which first regulated the hours during which women and children could be employed in factories.

Tenmanetale; Tenmentale. Stated in a law of Edward the Confessor to have been used in Yorkshire as meaning frithborg (q.v.), and also as meaning the tithing (q.v.). Used also in Northern England during the 12th and 13th centuries as an equivalent for carucage (q.v.).

Tenor; Tenour. The tenor of a document means, in ordinary conversation, its purport and effect, as opposed to the exact words of it. In law, the reverse is the case, and tenor means the exact words of the document.

As to an executor according to the tenor of the will, see EXECUTOR.

Tenores indictamenti mittendo. This was a writ by which an indictment was removed into the King's Bench from another Court. Compare CERTIORARI.

Tenor est pactio contra communem feudi naturam ac rationem in contractu interposita (Wright, Ten. (2nd ed.) 21). (Tenure is a compact contrary to the common nature of the fee, which is introduced into the contract [between the lord and his tenant].

Tenor est qui legem dat feudo (Craig, Jus. Feud. (3rd ed.) 66). (It is the tenor of the feudal grant which regulates it.) Compare CUJUS EST, ETC.; MODUS LEGEM, ETC.

Tentates panis. The assay (q.v.) of bread.

Tenterden's Act is the popular title of the Statute of Frauds Amendment Act, 1828. It is a supplement to the Statute of Frauds (q.v.) and requires the following promises and engagements to be in writing: (i) an acknowledgment of a debt barred by the Statute of Limitations; the Act further provides that an acknowledgment by one joint contractor shall not affect the others (see ACKNOWLEDGMENT; LIMITATION): (ii) a promise to pay a debt incurred, or a ratification of a contract made, during infancy (see INFANT): (iii) a representation as to a person's character, ability, etc., made to enable him to obtain money or goods upon credit: (iv) executory contracts for the sale of goods, as to which see STATUTE OF FRAUDS.

Tenths are the tenth part of the annual profit of an ecclesiastical benefice according to the valuation contained in the Valor beneficiorum or King's Books, compiled in Henry VIII.'s reign. As to the origin of tenths, see FIRST FRUITS AND TENTHS, COURT OF: as to their present application, see QUEEN ANNE'S BOUNTY. By Order in Council made 27th November, 1852, pursuant to Queen Anne's Bounty Act, 1858, s. 19, tenths were commuted for an annual payment of 17s. 6d. on each £100 of the clear annual value of a living. Benefices of a clear annual value not exceeding £50 had been freed from tenths by the statute 7 Eliz. c. 4 and subsequent Acts.

Ecclesiastical tenths must not be confounded with the tax consisting of one-tenth of every man's whole personal property, formerly levied by the Crown under the name of tenths. As in the case of fifteenths (q.v.) the amount payable was fixed in the reign of Edward III.: so that when this tax disappeared in the reign of James I. it was not anything like a tenth of the national personalty.

Tenure.—I. Tenure in its general sense is a mode of holding or occupying: thus we speak of the tenure of an office, meaning the manner in which it is held, especially with regard to time (tenure for life, tenure during good behaviour), and of tenure of land in the sense of occupation or tenancy, especially with reference to cultivation and questions of political economy, e.g., tenure by peasant proprietors, cottiers, etc.

II. In its more technical sense, tenure signifies the mode in which all land in England is theoretically owned and occupied. The rule is that no person except the king can be the absolute owner of land in England, because all lands in the hands of subjects are held of some superior, and mediately or immediately of the Crown; that is, every person who is possessed of land is theoretically merely a tenant and owes obligations in respect of it either to the Crown or to an intermediate lord. The manner of his possession is called tenure, and the extent of his interest is called an estate (q.v.). The rule is a relic of the feudal system, and can only be understood with reference to it; in practice it has but little effect except in respect of manors and copyhold land, an ordinary tenant in fee simple of freehold land being to all intents and purposes absolute owner. See FEUDAL SYSTEM; ESCHEAT; COPYHOLD; LORD; TENANT; TENEMENT; FEALTY; HOMAGE; SERVICE; MANOR.

A. With reference to the relation between the lord and the tenant, a tenure is either perfect or imperfect. A perfect tenure is where one person holds land of another, or of the Crown, in fee simple, and this is accordingly subdivided into (a) tenure in capite or in chief, which is the tenure existing between the Crown and those who hold land of it directly; and (b) mesne tenure, which is where one subject holds land of another. (See MESNE.) When land is held of a private person merely by reason of his having the seignory of that particular land, the tenure is technically called a tenure in gross, as opposed to the case of land being held of a person in his capacity of owner of a manor, county-palatine or the like. Imperfect tenure is that which exists between a tenant of land and a person to whom he has granted a smaller estate than his own, as where a tenant in fee simple creates an estate in tail or for years. An imperfect tenure may be created by anyone at the present day, while a perfect tenure can now only be created by the Crown. See SUBINFEUDATION.

B. With reference to the services to which they give rise, tenures are of various kinds. See SERVICE.

1. Temporal or lay tenures are those by which land is or used to be held by secular persons. They are of two kinds according as their services were originally free or base. (A) To the former class (frank or freehold tenure) belong (a) knight's service with its varieties (grand serjeanty, escuage, castle ward and cornage, which are commonly called feudal tenures par excellence, and have all been abolished by being converted into common socage), and (b) free socage with its varieties (petty serjeanty, burgage tenure, borough-English and gavelkind). (B) Base or villein tenures are (a) pure villenage, which no longer exists, except in the form of copyhold and customary freehold tenures; and (b) the obsolete privileged villenage or villein socage, from which is derived tenure in ancient demesne. (See the various titles; also TENANT-RIGHT.) Copyhold, ancient demesne and customary freehold are sometimes called customary tenures, because they depend on local custom, and not on the general law.

2. Ecclesiastical or spiritual tenures are: tenure in frankalmoign, and tenure by divine service (q.v.).

Tenure by Divine Service is where an ecclesiastical corporation, sole or aggregate, holds land by a certain divine service, as to say prayers on a certain day in every year, "or," in the case mentioned at Litt. § 137, "to distribute in almes to an hundred poore men an hundred pence at such a day." It was originally called tenure in alms, as distinguished from tenure in free alms (frankalmoign). It differs from frankalmoign in the service being certain, in consequence of which the lord may distrain if the service is not performed. Fealty is also due by the tenant. See FRANKALMOIGN; SERVICE; TENURE.

Term.—I. In the law of real property, a term of years is where a man lets lands or tenements to another for a certain number of years, as in the case of an ordinary lease for seven years; the word "term" not only signifies the limit of time, but also the estate and interest that pass for that time, so that if a lease is surrendered before the expiration of the time, the term is at an end. A tenant for term of years is called in the old books a termor.

A term is personal property (see CHATTELS; ESTATE; SURVIVORSHIP), except in the respects mentioned in the title LEASEHOLDS.

In practice, the word "term" is seldom applied to a term of years granted for the purpose of occupation by the termor, such a term being described as a lease (q.v.), while "term" generally signifies a long term of years granted, not for the purpose of occupation by the grantee, but as security for the performance of an obligation, such as the payment of money. For this purpose it is often more convenient to limit a long term to the person in whose favour the obligation is created, and to allow the ownership of the property, subject to the term, to remain in the person entitled to the enjoyment of it, than to transfer the whole ownership as security, as in the case of a mortgage (q.v.). Thus, when land is settled on the marriage of the owner, it is usual to provide for the payment of a jointure to the wife, and of portions for the younger children, without interfering with the possession of the estate by the husband. This is done by vesting long terms of years (from 99 to 1,000) in trustees, upon trust, out of the rents and profits of the estate, or by sale or mortgage thereof for the whole or any part of the term, to raise the money required, and upon trust to permit the tenant for life to receive the residue of the rents and profits. In practice, however, the power thus created of receiving the rents directly from the tenants, or of selling or mortgaging the term, is rarely exercised, except for raising gross sums (e.g., portions), as it is to the advantage of the tenant for life to keep down the annuities so that he may not be disturbed in the possession of the land. Terms created in this manner are called pin-money-terms, jointure-terms, portions-terms, etc., according to the purposes for which they are created. See SETTLEMENT.

When the purpose for which a term has been created is accomplished, the term is said to be satisfied. See CESSOR.

Formerly, when a term had become satisfied, it was usual in some cases to keep it on foot "in trust to attend the inheritance," as it was expressed. Thus, if property subject to a long term was sold, so that the powers of raising portions, etc., out of the land were no longer exercisable, the purchaser often preferred to keep the term on foot, because it protected him from any unknown incumbrances on the freehold created by the former owner since the commencement of the term, such incumbrances being postponed until the expiration of the term. The purchaser, therefore, would have the term assigned to a trustee in trust for him, his heirs and assigns, and to attend the inheritance. Such a term was called an attendant term, while an ordinary term was called a term in gross. Now, by the Satisfied Terms Act, 1845, every term becoming attendant upon the inheritance of land immediately ceases and determines; but the protection afforded by attendant terms existing before the Act is preserved.

By the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 65, where a residue unexpired of not less than 200 years of a term which, as originally created, was for not less than 300 years, is subsisting in land, without any trust or right of redemption affecting the term in favour of the freeholder or reversioner, and without any rent having a money value, then (i) any person beneficially entitled, in right of the term, to possession of any land comprised in the term, or (ii) any person who is in receipt of the income of the land in right of the term, or in whom the term is vested in trust for sale, or (iii) any person in whom the term is vested as personal representative of any deceased person, may by deed declare that the term shall be enlarged into a fee simple. Thereupon the term is enlarged accordingly, and the person in whom the term was vested acquires the fee simple, subject to the same trusts, powers, rights, obligations, etc., as the term would have been subject to. Numerous instances had occurred in practice in which estates really held merely for the residue of long terms were practically treated as freehold. This section enabled such terms, when the residue was not less than 200 years and the original term had been not less than 300 years, to be enlarged into a fee simple. It does not (Conveyancing Act, 1882, s. 11) apply to any term liable to be determined by re-entry for condition broken, or to any term created by sub-demise out of a superior term which is itself incapable of being enlarged.

II. "Term" also signifies a portion of the year during which alone, according to the former practice of the Courts, judicial business could be transacted By modern statutes, however, a considerable part of the intervening vacations was made available for the sittings of the Courts and other business; and by the Judicature Acts, 1873, 1875, the division of the year into terms was abolished, so far as relates to the administration of justice, the year being now divided into sittings and vacations (q.v.); but the terms still exist for some purposes, e.g., in computing the period required for a call to the bar by the Inns of Court. The terms for judicial business were—(1) Hilary, from 11th to 31st January; (2) Easter, from 15th April to 8th May; (3) Trinity, from 22nd May to 12th June; and (4) Michaelmas, from 2nd to 25th November: the modern terms are—(1) Hilary, for the twenty-one days commencing 11th January; (2) Easter, for the twenty-eight days commencing the second Tuesday after Easter Sunday; (3) Trinity, for the twenty-one days commencing the second Tuesday after Whit Sunday; and (4) Michaelmas, for the twenty-four days commencing 2nd November.

III. In ecclesiastical procedure, term signifies a period. Thus, a term probatory is the time assigned by the Court for the examination of witnesses.

Termes de la Ley. The title of a book (first published in 1624) which was founded upon the work published in 1567 as "An Exposition of Certaine Difficult and Obscure Wordes and Termes of the Law." This "Exposition" was a translation by William Rastell (a justice of the Queen's Bench, 1558-1563) of the "Expositiones Terminorum Legum Anglorum," published in 1527 by his father, John Rastell, a member of Lincoln's Inn and also a printer.

Terminal Charges. These are the charges at each end of a journey—such as those for collecting, loading, unloading and delivery—which a railway company is generally authorised to make over and above the maximum charge which they are authorised to make for the actual conveyance of goods.

Terminus ad quem. The finishing point..

Terminus annorum certus debet esse et determinatus (Co. Litt. 45). (A term of years ought to be certain and determinate.) And so a lease of glebe lands by the incumbent for as many years as he shall be parson is not a lease for a term of years; for no one can foretell the date on which his incumbency will be terminated by death or otherwise.

Terminus a quo. The starting point.

Terminus et feodum non possunt constare simul in una et eadem persona (Grounds of Law, 321). (The term and the fee cannot simultaneously exist in full force in one and the same person.) This is a condensed version of a quotation from Bracton at p. 29 of Plowden's Commentaries. See MERGER.

Term of Years; Termor. See TERM.

Terra extenuenda. A writ which anciently lay to an escheator commanding him to enquire as to the annual value of the lands of one whose lands had been forfeited to the king.

Terre-tenant or Ter-tenant, which in Norman French literally means "land-holder," is used in the old books to signify a person who has the seisin of land, as opposed either (i) to the lord of whom he holds it, and who merely has a seignory (q.v.), or (ii) to a person to whose use he was seised of the land, before the Statute of Uses. Thus, if before the Statute of Uses, A conveyed land by feoffment to B and his heirs, to the use of C and his heirs, B was called the terre-tenant or feoffee to uses, and C was called the cestui que use. (See USE.) The word is now obsolete. In the law of execution a "terre-tenant" is an owner in fee of land which he has acquired from a defendant, who has suffered judgment. Formerly every judgment charged the land of the defendant, and if he died after judgment, execution might be issued against his heirs and terre-tenants. See JUDGMENT.

See LAND TENANT.

Terriers. A register or survey of lands setting out the tenures and boundaries. Terriers of the church lands in every parish have from time to time been made pursuant to Canon 87 of 1603. When coming from proper custody—such as the registry of the bishop or the archdeacon, or the chest in the parish church—they are evidence of the facts properly stated in them.

Telligraph (q.v) is an early synonym.

Terris, bonis et catallis rehabendis post purgationem. Anciently, when a clerk, who had been charged before the King's justices with a felony, had, at the request of his bishop, been handed over to an ecclesiastical Court and had been acquitted by that Court, this writ lay for him to "get back his lands, goods and chattels after his acquittal."

Terris, catallis et tenementis ultra debitum levatum. A writ which anciently lay for one whose lands, chattels and tenements had been distrained for more than the amount due by him.

Terris liberandis. A writ which anciently lay for one against whom there had been successful proceedings by attaint (q.v.): it enabled him to have a fine substituted for the various punishments to which he had become liable. A different writ of the same name was for the delivery of lands to an heir after homage and relief had been performed.

Territorial; Territoriality. These terms are used to signify connection with, or limitation with reference to, a particular country or territory. Thus, "territorial law" is the correct expression for the law of a particular country or state (e.g., England), although "municipal law" is more common (see LAW). "Territorial waters" are that part of the sea adjacent to the coast of a given country which is by international law deemed to be within the sovereignty of that country, so that its Courts have jurisdiction over offences committed on those waters, even by a person on board a foreign ship. The ordinary limits of territorial waters are a distance of one marine league from low-water mark. See HIGH SEAS; KING'S CHAMBERS.

As to territorial jurisdiction, see JURISDICTION: see also EXTRA-TERRITORIALITY.

Territorial Army. The Crown is empowered by the Territorial and Reserve Forces Act, 1907, s. 6, to raise and maintain a force to be called the Territorial Force, the strength of which to be as Parliament may fix from time to time. Enlistment is for a term of not exceeding four years, with a possible re-engagement for a like period, subject, as regards the entire period of service, to the right of discharge on giving three months' notice and making certain payments (s. 9). Every man must undergo such preliminary training as is required by s. 14 (1) and such subsequent annual training as is prescribed by s. 15 (1) of the Act. The force may be called out whenever the Army Reserve (q.v.) is called out (s. 17 (1)). Officers of the force at all times (Army Act, s. 50; Army (Annual) Act, 1919, s. 15) and non-commissioned officers and men when serving (Army Act, s. 176 (6) (b); Territorial Force Reg., 1912, par. 214) are subject to military law.

The Territorial Force has since 1st October, 1921, been called the Territorial Army (Territorial Army and Militia Act, 1921, ss. 1, 5 (2)).

Test Act. The popular title of the statute 25 Car. 2, c. 2. (See RECUSANTS). After various mitigations, of which the most important was that contained in the Roman Catholic Relief Act, 1829, the Test Act was finally repealed in 1863.

Testable. Anyone is said to be testable when he has capacity to make a will. Anyone over twenty years of age and of sound mind is testable. The capacity to make a will must be distinguished from a special power to dispose of property by will. Thus a power given to a married woman by a settlement to dispose of property by will did not make her testable; before the Married Women's Property Acts (q.v.) she was testable only as regards property settled on her for her separate use. Under the Wills Act, 1837, s. 11, as amended and extended by the Wills (Soldiers and Sailors) Act, 1918, anyone authorised by those Acts to make a will otherwise than in accordance with requirements of the Act of 1837 as to wills generally, is testable even though not twenty-one years of age. He is in fact testable, under the law before 1837, at the age of fourteen.

Testa de Nevill (Liber fœdorum). A register, consisting of two volumes, containing transcripts of inquisitions (as to knights' fees, sergeanties, fees held in frankalmoyn, escheats, etc.) made between 1190 and 1250). It appears to derive its name either from Jollan de Nevill, one of the justices in eyre who died in 1246, or from Ralph de Nevill, who was Accountant of the Exchequer and Collector of Aids about the same time. The original Testa has disappeared; but a copy of a portion was made in the fourteenth century and after being for long in the chapter-house of Westminster, is now in the Public Record Office. It was printed in 1807 by the Record Commissioners.

Testament is, strictly speaking, a will of personal property: a will of land is not called a testament. The word "testament" is now seldom used, except in the heading of a formal will, which usually begins—"This is the last will and testament of me, A. B., etc."

Coke's derivation (testatio mentis) is of course erroneous: the word is derived from testatum (a declaration).

Testamenta latissimam interpretationem habere debent (Jenk. Cent. 81). (Wills ought to have the broadest interpretation.) Compare ULTIMA VOLUNTAS; ETC.

Testamentary. "Testamentary power" is the power of making a valid will, either generally, or with reference to particular kinds or dispositions of property. "Testamentary capacity" usually refers to the absence of some disability which prevents a person from making a valid will: thus, infants and lunatics have not testamentary capacity.

A paper, instrument, document, gift, appointment, etc., is said to be testamentary when it is written or made so as not to take effect until after the death of the person making it, and to be revocable and retain the property under his control during his life, although he may have believed that it would operate as an instrument of a different character. Thus, deeds of gift, marriage settlements, letters, etc., when executed with the formalities of a will, have been admitted to probate as testamentary instruments. The term "testamentary documents" of course includes wills and codicils, which are in form as well as in effect testamentary. See SCRIPT.

As to testamentary guardians, see GUARDIAN.

Testate. A person is said to die testate when he leaves a will. See INTESTATE.

Testator is a person who makes a will.

Testatum. The part of an indenture beginning with the words "Now this indenture witnesseth": it is also known as the witnessing clause.

Testatum Writ. Formerly a writ of execution could not be issued into a county different from that in which the venue in the action was laid, without first issuing a writ called a "ground writ" into the latter county, and then another writ, which was called a testatum writ, into the former. This was abolished in ordinary cases by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 121. Now a testatum writ means merely a writ which is issued into a county other than that in which the venue was laid.

A testatum writ in the old sense seems to be still necessary when a fieri facias de bonis ecclesiasticis has been issued into one diocese, but the entire debt is not levied on it, and the plaintiff wishes to have the residue levied from the defendant's ecclesiastical goods and chattels in another diocese.

Teste is the concluding part of a writ, giving the date and place of its issue. It is so called because it begins with the words "Witness ourself" (in Latin, Teste meipso), or similar words. Every writ of summons and other writ issued in the High Court of Justice is tested (that is, the teste runs) in the name of the Lord Chancellor, or, if the office be vacant, in that of the Lord Chief Justice (Ord. 2, r. 8) unless it be the practically obsolete mittimus, which is tested by the Master of the Rolls in the name of the King.

Testibus deponentibus in pari numero dignioribus est credendum (4 Inst. 279). (Where the number of witnesses is equal on both sides, the more worthy are to be believed.) This related even in the time of Coke more to the old system of compurgation than to the contemporary law.

Testimony is the evidence of a witness given vivâ voce in a Court of justice or other tribunal. (See EVIDENCE.) In the old books, such as Coke, "testimony" means "witness."

Testmoignes ne poent testifie le negative, mes l'affirmative (4 Inst. 279). (Witnesses cannot prove a negative, but an affirmative.) If a man is charged with being drunk, the evidence of witnesses who can prove merely that they have never seen him drunk is inadmissible.

Testoon. See SILVER COINS.

Textile Factory. Defined in s. 149 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901.

Thalweg. A German word meaning the medium filum of a river. See AD MEDIUM FILUM.

Thames Conservancy. See CONSERVATORS OF RIVERS.

Thanksgiving, Public, Day of. Such a day may be fixed by Royal Proclamation. (See FASTS.) When the last of the days of grace for a bill of exchange falls on any such day—or on a day of public fast—the bill is payable on the preceding business day (Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 14 (1) (a)).

Thavies' Inn. See INNS OF CHANCERY.

Theame. See TEAM.

Theatre. This means "any house or other place of public resort in Great Britain for the public performance of stage plays" (Theatres Act, 1843, s. 2); and "stage play" means any "tragedy, comedy, farce, opera, burletta interlude, melodrama, pantomime, or other entertainment of the stage or any part thereof" (ib., s. 23), unless performed by leave of the proper authority in a booth, etc., at any fair, etc. (ib.)

No theatre can be conducted except (1) under letters patent, (2) under licence from the Lord Chamberlain, or (3) under licence from the county council.

Letters patent are granted under the royal prerogative. The only theatre now possessing letters patent is Covent Garden Opera House, London.

The Lord Chamberlain is the licensing authority for the Cities of London and Westminster, and for the Boroughs of Finsbury, Marylebone, the Tower Hamlets, Lambeth, Southwark, New Windsor, and Brighthelmstone (Brighton) as existing for parliamentary purposes in 1843 (Theatres Act, 1843, s. 3). Elsewhere the licensing authority is the County Council (ib. s. 5; Local Government Act, 1888, s. 7); but a licence for a theatre in or within fourteen miles of the City of Oxford or the town of Cambridge can be granted only with the consent of the Chancellor or Vice-Chancellor of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge respectively and may be annulled by such Chancellor or Vice-Chancellor if the theatre be conducted in contravention of rules approved by them respectively (Theatres Act, 1843, s. 10).

See STAGE PLAY.

Theft is larceny (q.v.) or the act of stealing. The word is, however, never used in English law, which is conversant only with "larceny."

Theftbote. Hush-money (q.v.) for larceny.

The word is found in the Statutum Walliæ (12 Edw. 1, c. 4) and in Britton; in both cases theftbote is mentioned as being illegal.

Thellusson Act. See ACCUMULATION.

Thelonium. Toll (q.v.). The Breve essendi quieti de thelonio (writ to establish freedom from toll) anciently lay for burgesses of a town exempt by charter from toll, for lords in ancient demesne who were exempt from toll, for ecclesiastical persons as regards toll on ecclesiastical goods, for merchant strangers as regards tolls from which they were exempted by charter, etc. There was also the writ De thelonio rationabili habendo, which lay for one holding of the king in fee to recover tolls from those holding under him.

Themmagium. Stated to have been a commutation paid by bondsmen to one possessing TEAM (q.v.)

Theoden. Stated by Spelman to have meant a husbandman in Anglo-Saxon times.

Thereabouts. See MORE OR LESS.

Thereupon. Where a statute directs that a person "shall thereupon" do so and so, this means "shall immediately."

Therm. A British thermal unit is the amount of heat required to raise one pound of water one degree Farenheit. For the purposes of the Gas Regulation Act, 1920, 100,000 thermal units are a therm (s. 1 (3)); the Board of Trade can make orders permitting undertakers (see GAS) to sell gas at such and such a maximum or standard rate per therm (s. 1 (2)); and sale by therm is illegal in the absence of an order (s. 3). Applications for such orders are regulated by S. R. & O., 1920, No. 1826.

Thesaurus inventus est vetus dispositio pecuniæ, etc., cujus non extat modo memoria, adeo ut jam dominum non habeat (3 Inst. 132.) (Treasure-trove is an ancient hiding of money, etc., of which no recollection exists, so that it has now no owner.)

Thesaurus non competit regi, nisi quando nemo scit qui abscondit thesaurum (3 Inst. 132.) (Treasure does not belong to the king, unless no one knows who hid it.)

Thirdborrow. This word, which was derived from the name of the head man in a frank-pledge, was formerly used as meaning a conservator of the peace in a borough or manor.

Third Night Awne-Hinde. In Saxon times this was a man who stayed for a third night in the house of another. The host was responsible for offences committed by him. Compare TWA-NIGHT GESTE.

Third Party. "Third party" is a colloquial and not very logical phrase, signifying a person who is a stranger to a transaction or proceeding; in other words, someone who is not a party at all. (See STRANGER.) It is chiefly used in the expressions "notice to third party," (as to which see CITATION), and "third party risk policy," that is to say, a policy of insurance which protects the person taking it out against liability in respect of injury caused by him or his servants to the property or persons of third parties.

Thirty-nine Articles. See ARTICLES, THE THIRTY-NINE.

Thistle, Order of. The Most Ancient and Most Noble Order of the Thistle was founded in 1687. The Knights (K.T.) are the Sovereign, certain Royal Princes, and peers having property in or being otherwise specially connected with Scotland.

Threats. In criminal law, the sending of a letter threatening to kill or murder a person (Offences against the Person Act, 1861, s. 16), or to commit arson, or to injure cattle (Malicious Damage Act, 1861, s. 50), is a felony punishable with ten years' penal servitude (maximum). (See also BLACKMAIL; MENACES.) Threats of personal injury, etc., are a ground for exhibiting Articles of the Peace (q.v.).

Ticket of Leave. The colloquial name of the "licence to be at large," which the Home Secretary may at any time grant, upon such condition as he may think fit and with power of revocation, to anyone undergoing penal servitude (Penal Servitude Act, 1853, s. 9). The conditions usually imposed are those specified in the Penal Servitude Act, 1864, s. 10, Sch. A.: they are merely such as are calculated to make the released convict lead a useful and honest life. Property acquired by the convict while on licence does not vest in the administrator, if any, appointed by the Crown (see ADMINISTRATION) to manage his property (Forfeiture Act, 1870, s. 30); and he can sue or contract like any ordinary person (ib., s. 8). He must keep the police informed of his residence for the time being (Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, ss. 5, 8; Penal Servitude Act, 1891, s. 4); but even this condition is not onerous, as it may be complied with through the post.

A well conducted convict can obtain a ticket of leave when he has served three-fourths of his sentence (Rules for Convict Prisons, s. 33). In cases of penal servitude for life the question of a ticket of leave is specially considered after twenty years (ib.).

See PENAL SERVITUDE.

Tidal Rivers. See NAVIGATION; RIVERS.

Tidal Water. Defined, for the purpose of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, in s. 742 of that Act.

Tidesman; Tidewaiter. A Customs' officer who, as ships came into port with the tide (as they generally did before the dredging of ports and the advent of steam) was placed on board to enforce the Customs regulations. Compare LANDWAITER.

Tide Surveyor; Tide Supervisor. The tide surveyors used formerly to supervise the tide-waiters, and the tide supervisors supervised the tide surveyors.

Timber. Timber, strictly speaking, includes only oak, ash and elm; but, according to Co. Litt. 53A, "in places where timber is scant, and beeches or the like are converted to building for the habitation of man, or the like, they are all accounted timber." All trees used for what is popularly known as "timber" are now included.

Timber and other trees form part of the land, and on the death of the owner intestate they pass with it to the heir, therein differing from growing crops. Timber when severed is personal estate.

Cutting down timber is a form of waste (q.v.), except so far as it is required for estovers (q.v.). If a tenant without impeachment of waste cuts timber in a husbandlike manner it vests in him; otherwise, if timber is cut or blown down, it belongs to the tenant in fee. Under the Settled Estates Act, 1877, s. 16, timber generally (other than ornamental timber) may be sold by order of the Court; and where timber is ripe for cutting a tenant for life impeachable for waste may sell with the consent of the trustees or of the Court, and retain one-fourth of the proceeds for himself (Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 35).

Where a person takes by succession land with timber or other trees, not being coppice or underwood, he must pay succession duty on all sums (exceeding £10 in any one year) from time to time received from any sales of such timber, unless he commutes the duty (Succession Duty Act, 1853, s. 23), and if the timber be on land in respect of which estate duty is payable on the death of a person dying after 29th April, 1910, estate duty at the rate appropriate to the total value of the estate is payable on the timber as it is sold (Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, s. 61 (5)).

See SUCCESSION; SUCCESSION DUTY; ESTATE DUTY.

Timberlode. A service due by tenants to a lord. It consisted in carrying to the lord's house timber felled in his woods.

Time. As to the meanings of the expressions day, month, year, etc., when used in statutes or legal instruments, see the respective titles. By the Definition of Times Act, 1880 (as amended by the Time (Ireland) Act, 1916), whenever any expression of time occurs in any Act of Parliament, deed, or other legal instrument, the time referred to shall, unless otherwise specifically stated, be held to be Greenwich mean time.

The Courts take judicial notice of the calendar, as settled by the statute 24 Geo. 2, c. 23. See CALENDAR; NOTICE.

Tinbounding is a custom regulating the manner in which tin is obtained from waste land, or land which has formerly been waste land, within certain districts in Cornwall and Devon. The custom is described as follows by an authority on the subject:—"Any person may enter on the waste land of another, and may mark out by four corner boundaries a certain area; a written description of the plot of land so marked out with metes and bounds, and the name of the person, is recorded in the local Stannaries Court, and is proclaimed on three successive court-days. If no objection is sustained by any other person, the Court awards a writ to the bailiff to deliver possession of the said 'bounds of tin-work' to the 'bounder,' who thereupon has the exclusive right to search for, dig, and take for his own use all tin and tin-ore within the enclosed limits, paying as a royalty to the owner of the waste a certain proportion of the produce under the name of toll-tin." (Bainbridge on Mines (4th ed.), p. 146). The County Court was substituted in 1897 for the Stannaries (q.v.) Court. The right of tin-bounding is not a right of common (see COMMON), but is an interest in land, and, in Devonshire, a corporeal hereditament. In Cornwall tin bounds are personal estate. See FOREST OF DEAN; STANNARIES.

Tin Coinage. See COPPER COINAGE.

Tinet. Used in a charter of Henry VI. as meaning brushwood, etc., for making up fences.

Tinkerman. A misprint for trinkerman: see TRINK.

Tippling Act. The popular title of the Sales of Spirits Act, 1850, which (s. 12), as amended by the Sale of Spirits Act, 1862, provides that no proceedings can be taken for the recovery of sums under 20s. due for spirituous liquor unless delivered at the purchaser's residence in quantities of not less than one reputed quart. By the County Courts Act, 1888, s. 182, no proceedings can be taken in the County Court in respect of beer, ale, porter, cider or perry, consumed on the premises, where such beer, etc., was supplied.

Tipstaff. Tipstaves are officers, in the nature of constables, attached to the Supreme Court. They were originally appointed for the Court of King's Bench by the Marshal of the King's Bench Prison, and for the Courts of Chancery, Common pleas and Exchequer by the Warden of the Fleet Prison (Queen's Prison Act, 1842, s. 5); but in 1842 the functions, in this respect, of those officials were transferred to the Lord Chief Justice (of the Queen's Bench as he then was) and to the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer (ib.). The appointment now lies with the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Chief Justice. Since the abolition of imprisonment on mesne process, the functions of the tipstaves have been confined to arresting persons guilty of contempt of Court, except in the King's Bench Division, where the tipstaff also has in theory charge of any prisoner brought before the Court, or committed by the Court, in the exercise of its criminal jurisdiction. Writs of attachment are executed by the sheriff: and the tipstaff never in fact acts unless the offender is actually in Court.

Tithe Commissioners. A body created by the Tithe Act, 1836, s. 2. See COPYHOLD COMMISSIONERS.

Tithe-hay. See MEAD-SILVER.

Tithe Rentcharge. See TITHES.

Tithes are payments due by the inhabitants of a parish for the support of the parish church, and generally payable to the parson of the parish. In extra-parochial places the King is entitled to the tithes. Tithes payable to a rector are called rectorial tithes, those payable to a vicar are vicarial tithes, and those payable to a lay person are lay tithes; the last belong to the class of incorporeal hereditaments. As to exemptions from tithes, see DE NON DECIMANDO; MODUS; REAL COMPOSITION.

Originally tithes were paid in kind, and consisted of the tenth part of all yearly or periodical profits of certain descriptions, tithes being divisible into prædial, mixed and personal. Prædial tithes (so called from Latin prædium, a farm) were profits arising immediately from the soil, e.g., corn, grass, etc.; mixed tithes were those arising from animals deriving their nutriment from the soil, e.g., tithes of wool, milk, etc.; personal tithes are those arising entirely from the personal industry of man; these last exist only in a few instances, as in the case of fish caught in the sea, or, by special custom, for fish caught in rivers. Tithes payable in respect of corn-mills were personal tithes, but they have been commuted (infra). Tithes of mineral may also be payable by custom.

Tithes were also divided into (a) great tithes, comprehending the tithes of corn, peas, beans, hay and wood, and (b) small (or privy) tithes, which included all other kinds of tithes. The distinction is important, because vicars are frequently endowed with small tithes only.

Tithes have now ceased to be paid in kind, except in a very few instances, for by a series of voluntary agreements and compulsory awards made under the Tithe Acts, 1836 to 1891, a rent-charge varying with the price of corn has been substituted for almost all tithes, whether payable in kind or under a modus or composition. (See RENT.) Mineral tithes, tithes of fish and other personal tithes (except mill-tithes) are not liable to compulsory commutation (Tithe Act, 1836, s. 90).

Tithe rentcharges do not merge in the lands out of which they are payable by mere unity of ownership; but the owner may by deed or declaration approved by the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries, cause a merger to take place.

Under the Tithe Act, 1891, s. 1, tithe rentcharge is payable by the owner of the land; any contract made after 26th March, 1891, for payment by the occupier is void; any such contract existing on that date ceased to be binding on the occupier, who, however, became liable to repay to the owner the amount of any tithe rentcharge which previously had been paid by the occupier, and which then became payable by the owner—such amount to be recoverable by distress only. The same Act, by s. 2, provides that unpaid tithe rentcharge can be recovered, in the case of land occupied by a tenant, only by receiver proceedings in the County Court, and, in the case of land occupied by the owner, by distress made by an officer of that Court. Before then, distress had applied in the case of any land out of which tithe rentcharge was overdue.

Neither tithe nor tithe rent-charge is recoverable unless distress be levied or proceedings taken within two years of the time when the tithe or tithe rent-charge became due (Tithe Act, 1836, s. 81; Tithe Act, 1891, s. 10 (2)).

The Tithe Act, 1891, s. 8, provides that where the County Court is satisfied that the tithe rentcharge exceeds two-thirds of the annual value of the lands (as assessed in "Schedule B." for income tax purposes) in respect of the twelve months next preceding the date on which the tithe rentcharge claimed had become due, then the Court is to remit the amount of such excess and a proportionate part of any current rate assessed on the owner of the tithe rentcharge.

See OCCUPIER'S LIABILITY NOTICE.

Tithing is a local division or district forming part of a hundred (q.v.), and is so called because every tithing formerly consisted of ten freeholders with their families. See FRANKPLEDGE.

Tithing Man. Anciently this meant the chief member of a tithing, or group of ten men associated in the frankpledge. Later the word came to mean the same as HEADBOROUGH (q.v.). See the statute 13 & 14 Car. 2, c. 12, s. 15.

Tithing Penny. Anciently this meant both a customary payment by the tenants of a manor to the lord and also a customary payment by the lords of manors at the old hundred court.

Title.—I. In the primary sense of the word, a title is a right. Thus a title of presentation is the right to present to a benefice. (See NEXT PRESENTATON.) This use of the word, however, is comparatively rare, and generally "title" means a right to property considered with reference either to the manner in which it has been acquired, or to its capacity of being effectively transferred.

In this sense of the word, titles are of the following kinds:—

With reference to the modes by which they are acquired, titles are of two kinds, namely, (1) original, where the person entitled does not take with reference to any predecessor; as in the case of title by occupancy, by capture, by invention (patent, copyright, trade mark, etc.), and by creation (as where the Crown grants a peerage): and (2) derivative, where the person entitled takes the place of a predecessor; this latter class is divisible into (a) title by the lawful and voluntary act of one or both of the parties; e.g., title by conveyance, gift, devise, bequest, etc.; in the case of realty this is called title by purchase: (b) title by operation or act of the law, including title by descent, intestacy, succession, survivorship, escheat, forfeiture, marriage, dower, curtesy, limitation, prescription, bankruptcy, etc.: and (c) title by wrong or tort, which occurs in the case of wrongful possession, abatement, disseisin, intrusion, deforcement, usurpation, and purpresture. This last kind of title differs from the others in being liable to be defeated by the person rightfully entitled, until the title of the wrongdoer has become absolute by lapse of time (see LIMITATION.): subject to this, a title by wrong is always deemed to be the most extensive right which the subject-matter admits of; thus a disseisor of land is seised of an estate in fee simple by wrong.

With reference to their capacity of being effectually transferred, titles to land are of various kinds. Thus, a marketable title is one which goes back forty years; that is, the vendor must show a chain or transmission of title, by conveyance, descent or other lawful means, from his predecessor or predecessors, commencing at least forty years ago. A safe holding title is one resting on the undisturbed possession of the vendor for twenty years adversely to persons not under disability. Where a person agrees to sell land without making any stipulation as to the title, he must show a forty years' title (Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, s. 1). In almost all cases, however, the contract of sale stipulates that the title shall commence at a more recent date than forty years. In any case, the conveyance or other document with which the title commences is called the root of title, and if the vendor shows that he has the title which he is bound to prove, he is said to show a good title.

The Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, and the Conveyancing Act, 1881, contain a number of provisions similar to those usually inserted in ordinary contracts for sale of real property and leaseholds, so that a person who enters into an open contract now runs less risk of failing to show a good title than formerly. But these provisions are obviously inadequate to meet special defects.

Under the Land Transfer Act, 1875, ss. 5-9, a person entitled to land may prove and register either (1) an absolute title, being a title good against all the world (except incumbrancers and cestui que trusts, if any); or (2) a qualified title, being a title subject to specified reservations; or (3) a possessory title, being a title subject to all estates, rights, and interests existing at the time of registration. See LAND REGISTRIES.

The investigation of titles is one of the principal branches of conveyancing (q.v.); and in that practice the word "title" has acquired the sense of "history" rather than of "right." Thus, we speak of an abstract of title (see ABSTRACT), and of investigating a title, and describe a document as forming part of the title to property.

II. "Title" formerly had the technical sense of a right to avoid an estate by entry, as opposed to the remedy by action. Thus if A conveyed land to B upon condition not to alien it in mortmain, and B broke the condition, A was said to have a title of entry, or title of mortmain; but he could not bring an action, and therefore had no right in the technical sense. See RIGHT OF ENTRY.

III. In ecclesiastical law "title" signifies (1) a cause for which a person may be ordained. The most common title is either a presentation to a vacant benefice or the fact that the candidate for ordination is about to be appointed by the bishop to some vacant benefice or curacy. Hence, title signifies (2) a presentation to a benefice; and (3) the church or living to which the minister is presented. In the Roman Catholic Church, titles or tituli are the churches in and near Rome which are assigned to cardinals.

IV. "Title" also signfies an appellation or address indicative of honour or dignity. Such titles are to a certain extent dependent on courtesy. Thus, no person can compel another to address or describe him by his title; but, so far as their use by the person himself is concerned, titles are matters of right, and, as it were, of property. The law, however, recognises the right of anyone to call himself by any name that he pleases; and so a peeress who has divorced her husband will not be restrained from using the title which was legally hers only during the continuance of the marriage. Some titles are hereditary and descend in fee simple or in tail, according to the nature of their creation. See DIGNITY.

V. Hence "title" signifies a description. Thus, in procedure, every action, petition or other proceeding, has a title, which consists of the name of the Court in which it is pending, the names of the parties, and (in the High Court of Justice) also the "reference to the record" (q.v.); administration actions are further distinguished by the name of the deceased person whose estate is being administered. Every pleading, summons, affidavit, etc., commences with the title. In many cases it is sufficient to give what is called the "short title" of an action, namely, the Court, the reference to the record, and the surnames of the first plaintiff and the first defendant: "In the High Court of Justice, Chancery Division. 1875. S. 311. Smith v. Jones."

VI. The title of a patent is the short description of the subject-matter of an invention which must (Patents and Designs Act, 1907, s. 2 (4)) be prefixed to every specification (see PATENTS), whether provisional or complete, of an invention. This is referred by the Comptroller to an examiner, and if the examiner reports that it does not sufficiently indicate the subject-matter of the invention, the Comptroller may refuse to accept the application for a patent or require amendment (s. 3 (2)), but there is an appeal to the law officers (q.v.) against any such decision (s. 3 (3)).

Title-deeds, says Mr. Williams, "though moveable articles, are not strictly speaking chattels. They have been called," [by Coke] "the sinews of the land, and are so closely connected with it that they will pass, on a conveyance of the land, without being expressly mentioned: the property in the deeds passes out of the vendor to the purchaser simply by the grant of the land itself. In like manner a devise of lands by will entitles the devisee to the possession of the deeds; and if a tenant in fee simple should die intestate, the title deeds of his lands will descend along with them to his heir-at-law." But where a vendor of lands has other lands to which the deeds relate, or retains any legal interest in the lands conveyed, he has a right to keep the deeds (Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, s. 2 (5)) unless he be a mortgagor. The purchaser, however, is entitled to a covenant for the production of the deeds whenever required in support of his title, if the vendor can give such a covenant (ib., s. 2 (3) (4)). But this right is practically obsolete, for in the case of sales of land after the 31st December, 1881, a purchaser can get a written acknowledgment of his right to production, and to delivery of copies, of the deeds, in lieu of, but with the same effect as, an ordinary covenant for production (Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 9); and if he requires attested copies of the title deeds retained by the vendor, he will have to bear the expense of making them (ib., s. 3 (6)).

A tenant for life, or for any greater estate, is entitled to the possession of the title deeds of the land, but he must not injure or part with them.

It is felony to steal (Larceny Act, 1861, s. 28) or to forge (Forgery Act, 1913, s. 2 (2) (b)) any title deed.

Any seller or mortgagor of property real or personal who conceals, etc., title deeds from a purchaser or mortgagee in order to get the transaction through is guilty of misdemeanour (Law of Property Amendment Act, 1859, s. 24; 1860, s. 8).

Tobacco. The cultivation of tobacco in England was illegal under the statutes 12 Car. 2, c. 34, 15 Car. 2, c. 7, ss. 15-17, and under the Tobacco Cultivation Act, 1831, ss. 1, 2. All these enactments were repealed by the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, s. 83 (5), and anyone with an excise licence, costing 5s. annually, can now "grow, cultivate and cure" tobacco (ib., s. 83 (2)). Under the Finance Act, 1912, s. 4, the Commissioners of Customs and Excise may authorise "responsible persons" who hold such licences, "to grow tobacco for the sole purpose of obtaining an extract therefrom to be used, without payment of duty, in the manufacture of insecticides or sheepwash or for other purely agricultural or horticultural purposes." On all other tobacco grown in the country duty is levied, under s. 83 (2) of the Act of 1910, at the rates specified in Part II. of Sch. IV of that Act.

The Children Act, 1908, Part III., imposes penalties on persons selling cigarettes and cigarette papers to persons apparently under the age of sixteen—with some exceptions—and selling tobacco of any kind to them for their own use. Other provisions empower constables and park-keepers to search any boy (but no girl) apparently under sixteen who is found smoking in any public place, and to confiscate any cigarettes, etc., found in his mouth or elsewhere; but this power does not seem to be extensively used.

Toft. "When land is built upon," (see Plowd. 170), "it is a messuage, and, if the building afterwards fall to decay, yet it shall not have the name of land, although there be nothing in substance left but the land, but it shall be called a toft, which is a name superior to land, and inferior to messuage: and this name it shall have in respect of the dignity which it once bore." The term "toft" is specially applied to ancient tenements within a parish or other district, the owners or occupiers of which are entitled to rights of common or commonable rights over land situate in the parish. (See ANCIENT MESSUAGES; LAMMAS LANDS.) The word, in its Latinised form, is found in old fines (q.v.) in collocation with the Latinised form of croft (q.v.): we read "cum toftis et croftis," "toftum et croftum," and so forth.

To Have and to Hold were the words in a conveyance which show the estate intended to be conveyed. Thus, in a conveyance of land in fee simple, the grant in the days of long forms was to "A and his heirs to have and to hold the said [land] unto and to the use of the said A, his heirs and assigns for ever." Now the grant is to "A to hold the same unto and to the use of the said A his heirs and assigns"; or, if the short form authorised by the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 57, Sch. IV., be adopted, the grant is to "A to hold to and to the use of the said A in fee simple." See HABENDUM.

Tokens. Small metallic discs which were issued from time to time by traders during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries and the early part of the last century. Each bore the name of the person issuing it; and he pledged himself to redeem it in silver, on demand, for the amount stated on its face. They came into circulation owing to the scarcity of coins of small values. The use of them was prohibited by various enactments, of which that now in force is s. 5 of the Coinage Act, 1870.

Tolerance. As regards the coinage, "tolerance" is synonymous with "remedy" (q.v.).

Toll.—I. A toll is a payment for passing over or using a bridge, road, ferry, railway, market, port, anchorage, etc. Frequently the right to demand tolls forms part of a franchise (q.v.), as in the case of ferries, markets, ports, etc. Turnpike, harbour and railway tolls are generally created by Act of Parliament.

Toll traverse was a sum payable for passing over the private soil of another, or over a private road, bridge, ferry, or the like. Toll thorough was a sum payable for passing over the public highway: to support a claim for such a toll (which is a franchise) a consideration must be shown, e.g., repairs to the highway by the owner of the franchise. Port toll was a charge on goods brought into a port. Turn toll was a charge made for every beast brought to a market but not sold.

A right of distress is incident to every toll, but the distress cannot be sold.

See PRESCRIPTION; STALLAGE.

II. As to "toll" in the sense of taking away, see DESCENT CAST.

Toll Dish. At an early period, when tolls on grain were paid in kind, this was a measure which held just the amount to be taken from each sack as toll.

Toller. One who gathered tolls.

Toll-tin. See TINBOUNDING.

Tolsey. A place at which tolls were collected.

Tolt. An obsolete writ by which a cause was removed from the Court Baron to the Sheriff's County Court. See PONE.

Tolzey Court of Bristol. This, originally, was the court of the bailiffs of the Hundred of Bristol. Subsequently it became merged in the Court of the Lord Steward of the King's Household (q.v.); Richard II. in 1395 revived its separate jurisdiction by charter; and it now sits under the authority of a charter of Anne, dated 24th July, 1710. Its jurisdiction includes mixed and personal actions to any amount, provided the cause of action arises within the city. Its procedure has been modernised by Orders in Council made 1871, 1873, 1878, 1883, and 1890. The Recorder is ex officio the judge.

Tombstones. Tombstones in churchyards, it seems, can only be erected with the consent of the incumbent, and he may refuse to allow objectionable inscriptions on tombs. Tombstones in the body of the church can only be erected by leave of the ordinary, given by a faculty, though it seems that the consent of the incumbent is usually sufficient, or that of the rector, if the stone is to be erected in the chancel. A tombstone, when properly erected, does not vest in the incumbent, although annexed to the church or churchyard, the freehold of which is in him; therefore the person who set it up, or the heirs of the deceased, have an action of trespass against anyone who defaces or removes it. Gifts by will for the erection or maintenance of tombstones in churchyards are void, if unlimited in point of time, being contrary to the rule against perpetuities: gifts for the maintenance of tombstones or monuments forming part of the fabric of a church are valid because they are for the public benefit, and are therefore charitable within Part II. of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888, or within the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891, or, formerly, within the enactments repealed by those statutes. See BURIAL; CHARITY; CHURCHYARD.

Ton. This consists of twenty hundredweights (q.v.) (Weights and Measures Act, 1878, s. 14).

Tonnage was anciently a duty on imported wines, imposed by Parliament, in addition to prisage (q.v.). The duty was at the rate of so much for every ton or cask of wine; and tunnage would appear to be the more correct form of the word. It was first levied in the fourteenth century and was granted for life to several kings. It became practically a fixed tax in the reign of Anne: see the statute 9 Anne, c. 6, s. 1. It was finally abolished by the statute 27 Geo. 3, c. 13. The present duties on wines are regulated by the Customs Acts.

Tonnage-rent. When the rent reserved by a mining lease or the like consists of a royalty on every ton of minerals gotten in the mine, it is often called a tonnage-rent. There is generally a dead-rent in addition. See RENT.

Tontine. A financial arrangement under which subscribers to a loan each receive for life an annuity, which increases as other subscribers die, so that ultimately the last survivor receives for whatever is left of his life an annuity amounting in the aggregate to the total of the original annuities.

The system was used on several occasions during the eighteenth century by the British Government. The last Act passed for the purpose was the statute 29 Geo. 3, c. 41, entitled "An Act for raising a certain Sum of Money, by way of Annuities, to be attended with the Benefit of Survivorship, in Classes."

Torrens' Act. The popular title of the Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings Act, 1868, passed at the instance of Mr. William McCullagh Torrens, M.P. It and other Acts on the same subject were repealed and replaced by the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1885.

Torrens' System. A system of registration of title to land which was introduced into the legal system of South Australia in 1858 at the instance of Sir Robert Torrens, the first Premier of the colony. It was subsequently adopted in all the other Australian colonies, as well as in Canada; and it is the foundation of the system which has been in part established here under the Land Transfer Acts, 1875 and 1897. See LAND REGISTRIES.

Tort.—I. In its original and most general sense, "tort" is any wrong—as in the phrase "executor de son tort." See EXECUTOR.

II. More commonly, however, "tort" signifies an act which gives rise to a right of action, being a wrongful act or injury consisting in the infringement of a right created otherwise than by a contract. Torts are divisible into three classes, according as they consist in the infringement of a jus in rem, or in the breach of a duty imposed by law on a person towards another person, or in the breach of a duty imposed by law on a person towards the public.

The first class includes (a) torts to the body of a person — such as assault, battery, nuisance; or to his reputation—such as libel, slander, malicious prosecution; or to his liberty—as in the case of false imprisonment and malicious arrest; (b) torts to real property—such as ouster, trespass, nuisance, waste, subtraction, disturbance; (c) torts to personal property, consisting (i) in the unlawful taking of or detaining of or damage to corporeal personal property or chattels (see REPLEVIN; DETINUE; TROVER); or (ii) in the infringement of a right to a patent, trademark, copyright, etc. (see INFRINGEMENT; PIRACY): (d) slander of title: (e) deprivation of service and consortium (see MASTER AND SERVANT; PER QUOD).

The second class includes deceit and fraud (q.v.), and negligence in the discharge of a private duty. Thus, if A., a stage-coach proprietor, contracts with B. to carry his servant C., and, in performing his contract, is guilty of negligence which causes bodily hurt to C., and consequent damage, by loss of his services, to his master; then A. may be sued by B. for breach of contract, and by C. for negligence, that is for a tort. So, if a physician is guilty of negligence in treating a patient, he may be sued either for breach of contract or for tort. This kind of tort is called a tort arising out of contract, in opposition to a pure tort (e.g., an assault).

The third class includes those cases in which special damage is caused to an individual by the breach of a duty to the public, whether the breach consist of malfeasance, nonfeasance, or misfeasance. The principle instances of this class of torts fall under the heads of negligence and nuisance. Thus, if a person does something, which is not only a public nuisance, but also causes special damage to an individual, he is liable to that individual for a tort.

These divisions are of importance with reference to the question whether, on the death of the person injured, or of the tortfeasor, his personal representatives can sue or be sued for the tort; the general rule being, that the right to sue, and the liability to be sued, for torts to property passes to the personal representatives of the injured person, or of the tortfeasor, but that in other cases it does not, except where the death of the deceased was caused by the tort. See ACTIO PERSONALIS, ETC.

The distinction between tort and contract is important with reference to the limitation of actions (q.v.), and in the law of bankruptcy, claims for damages from torts not being provable. See DEBT.

See DAMAGE; DAMNUM SINE INJURIÂ; INJURY; NEGLIGENCE; QUASI-TORT.

Tortfeasor is a wrongdoer, or one who commits a tort, especially a trespass. See CONTRIBUTION; OMNIA PRÆSUMUNTUR, ETC.

Tortious means wrongful. Formerly certain modes of conveyance (e.g., feoffments, fines, etc.) had the effect of passing not merely the estate of the person making the conveyance, but the whole fee simple, to the injury of the person really entitled to the fee, and they were hence called tortious conveyances. But this operation has been taken away. See FEOFFMENT; FINE.

Torture. It has been constantly said that the law of England has never recognised torture as a permissible means of extracting evidence. It is indeed true that there has never been any statute or any decision expressly legalising it, and that in 1628 the judges declared it to be illegal. But it was commonly and notoriously inflicted during the reigns of the Tudors and of the first two Stuarts; and the Legislature and the Courts practically acquiesced. The statute 27 Hen. 8, c. 4, recited in the preamble that pirates could not be convicted unless upon the evidence of witnesses—whom the pirates were careful not to leave alive—or unless they confessed, "which they will never do without torture or paynes"; and Coke, although he wrote "there is no law to warrant tortures in this land," went out of his way to say in 1600, at the trial of Essex for treason, that the Queen had shown "over much clemency" inasmuch as no man had been "racked, tortured or pressed." The use of torture was, in fact, habitually carried on under orders of the king, of the Star Chamber and of the Privy Council down to the outbreak of the Civil War. It was finally suppressed by the Bill of Rights.

Torture as a punishment was down to recent times a part of the legal system. The peine forte et dure (q.v.), branding (q.v.) with a red-hot iron, and the pillory (q.v.) were practically torture.

Tot; Totted; Totting. To "tot" an item in the sheriff's account was to write opposite it the word "tot" or the letter "T" in order to indicate that he had levied the money and must account for it. Such an item was said to be totted; and the marking of an item in this manner was called totting. The word "totted" (or rather its Norman-French equivalent tottee) is to be found in the statute 42 Edw. 3, c. 9; and it was used in textbooks only a hundred years ago.

Compare NIHIL.

Total Loss. See LOSS.

Toties quoties. (As often as something happens; as often as occasion arises.) See for instance the statute 19 & 20 Car. 2, c. 4, where it was enacted that "such assignee may in like manner assign again and so toties quoties."

Tourn. See SHERIFF.

Tout temps presz et encore est. The Norman-French form of the averment that a defendant "always was and still is ready" to pay the debt. See TENDER; SEMPER PARATUS; UNCORE PRIST.

Towage. In Admiralty law, a towage service is where one vessel is employed to expedite the voyage of another, when nothing more is required than to accelerate her progress, as opposed to a salvage service, which implies danger or loss. (See SALVAGE.) A towage service gives a right to remuneration; but, although in many cases where salvage has been claimed the Court has decreed only towage remuneration, there are comparatively few cases in which suits have been instituted for mere towage. Claims for towage remuneration are generally enforced in Courts having admiralty jurisdiction. Anciently the word was also used as meaning money paid to the owner of land for the use of land as a tow-path.

Town, in the technical sense of the word, is a collection of houses, which "hath, or in time past hath had, a church and celebration of divine service, sacraments and burials," but, says Coke, "if a towne be decayed so as no houses remaine, yet it is a towne in law." Some towns are cities or boroughs (q.v., and see MUNICIPAL CORPORATION). In the old books, "upland town" seems to mean a town which is neither a city nor a borough. See VILL.

In the popular sense of the word, a town is a congregation of houses so near to one another that the inhabitants may fairly be said to dwell together. The word is so used in the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 128. (See PRE-EMPTION.) The name of such a town is a matter of reputation.

Township seems to mean a district of land containing a town, and under the same administration as the town itself. Blackstone says, that when a hamlet or other small collection of houses is adjacent to a town, but governed by separate officers, it is, to some purposes in law, looked upon as a distinct township (Com. I., 115).

Towns Improvement. The Towns Improvement Clauses Act, 1847, was passed to consolidate in one Act certain provisions usually contained in Acts for paving, draining, cleansing, lighting and improving towns. Local Acts appointing commissioners for the improvement of towns generally incorporate the provisions of this Act, but such Acts are now rarely passed, as the provisions of the Local Government Acts and the Public Health Acts (see the various titles) have practically superseded them.

Traction Engine. The popular name of what is known to the law as a heavy locomotive. See LOCOMOTIVES.

Trade. See RESTRAINT OF TRADE; TRADE-MARK; TRADER. As to usages of trade, see CUSTOM.

Trade Boards. Bodies established under the Trade Boards Act, 1909, for the purpose of fixing minimum wages (q.v.) under that Act.

Trade Description. "Any description, statement or other indication, direct or indirect as to (a) the number, quantity, measure, gauge, or weight of any goods; (b) the place or country where any goods were made or produced; (c) the mode of manufacturing or producing any goods; (d) the material of which the goods are composed; (e) any goods being the subject of an existing privilege, patent or copyright, and the use of any figure or mark which, according to the custom of the trade, is commonly taken to be an indication or any of the above matters" (Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, s. 3). See FALSE TRADE DESCRIPTION.

Trade Label. A small piece of paper, etc., affixed to goods with a design of some kind printed thereon. The use of a trade label too closely resembling one already in use will be restrained by injunction.

"Trade Mark." This expression has different meanings for the purposes of different Acts. As to its meaning for the purposes of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, see that title; as to its meaning for the purposes of the Trade Marks Act, 1905, see TRADE MARKS.

Trade Marks. The Trade Marks Acts, 1905 to 1919 are the Trade Marks Act, 1905, the Trade Marks Act, 1914, the Trade Marks Act, 1919, and so much of the Patents and Designs Acts, 1907 to 1919, as relates to trade marks (Trade Marks Act, 1914, s. 3; Trade Marks Act, 1919, s. 13 (1)). That part of the Patents and Designs Acts, 1907 to 1919, which relates to trade marks is the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, s. 91 (as amended by the Patents and Designs Act, 1919, s. 20, sch.); it relates to international and colonial arrangements regarding, amongst other things, trade marks. By virtue of these Acts the Board of Trade have made various Rules, of which those now in force are the Trade Marks Rules, 1920, dated 9th March, 1920.

In the widest common-law sense of the expression, "trade mark" denotes any means of showing that a certain trade or occupation is carried on by a particular person or firm, including, therefore, not only trade marks in the narrower sense of the word (infra), but also trade names (q.v.) and marks which are not in themselves, or in their origin, distinctive, but which have become known by custom and reputation as showing that goods or implements of trade are made, sold or employed by a particular person or firm.

In a narrower common-law sense of the word, a trade mark is a distinctive mark or device affixed to or accompanying an article intended for sale for the purpose of indicating that it is manufactured, selected, or sold by a particular person or firm. Trade marks of this kind were required to be registered under the Trade Marks Registration Act, 1875, now repealed and replaced by the Trade Marks Acts, 1905 to 1919; and the effect of the Act of 1875, and the Acts replacing it, is that no one can enforce his right to a trade mark which is registrable but is not registered.

The Act of 1905, s. 3, defines a trade mark as being, for the purposes of that Act, "a mark used or proposed to be used upon or in connection with goods for the purpose of indicating that they are the goods of the proprietor of such marks by virtue of manufacture, selection, certification, dealing with, or offering for sale." A registrable trade mark must consist of one or more of the following things: "(1) The names of a company, individual or firm represented in a special or particular manner; (2) the signature of the applicant for registration or of some predecessor in his business; (3) an invented word or invented words; (4) a word or words having no direct reference to the character or quality of the goods and not being in its ordinary signification a geographical name or a surname; (5) any other distinctive mark." (s. 9).

Colour may form one of the particulars which is specified with regard to a trade mark (s. 10). There is in the Patent Office (q.v.) a register of trade marks in which all registered trade marks, and the proprietors thereof, are entered (s. 4). The registration of trade marks which are obviously improper is prohibited (s. 11). Registration is for a period of fourteen years, but may be renewed from time to time (s. 28).

Under s. 63, the Company of Cutlers in Hallamshire (see CUTLERS) have at Sheffield a branch register, known as the Sheffield Register, for trade marks used on metal goods and registered by persons carrying on business in or within six miles of Hallamshire (q.v.); and under s. 64 there exists at Manchester a branch, known as the Manchester Registry, of the Patent Office for the registration of trade marks for cotton yarn, sewing cotton, cotton piece goods and other cotton goods not being articles of clothing.

The Act of 1919 (ss. 1, 13 (2)) provides that, as from 1st April, 1920, the register of trade marks, including the Manchester Registry but not the Sheffield Register, is divided into two parts—Part A. to consist of marks registered under the Act of 1905 whether before or after 1st April, 1920, and Part B. to consist of marks registered under the Act of 1919 and of all marks entered in or removed to it under the Act of 1919.

The Act of 1919, s. 2, provides that certain marks not registrable under the Act of 1905 may be registered in Part B.; s. 6 provides for the removal from the register of trade marks consisting of a word which is the only practicable name of an article in respect of which no patent exists and contains other provisions to prevent the abuse of trade marks.

A trade mark cannot be assigned or exist in gross, that is to say, apart from the goodwill of the business connected with the goods to which it relates: see s. 22 of the Act of 1905

The right of the owner of a registered trade mark is clear; he is entitled to prevent anyone else from applying it, or any device closely resembling it, to goods of the same class as those in connection with which he himself uses it. (As to his remedies, see INFRINGEMENT.) This right is an absolute one, and does not depend on the state of mind of the infringer: A. may bonâ fide invent a trade mark which has already been used by B., but the fact that he never heard of B.'s trade mark is no defence to proceedings for infringement Again, where goods are sold under a false trade mark, even if the purchaser is told that the goods are the goods of the actual seller, but the imitated mark is upon them, there is ground for interference [by the Court], since the goods may be resold bearing the mark, but without the information necessary to correct the statement thereby made. From its absolute and negative nature, the right to a trade mark is frequently called a property (q.v.). An action for infringement cannot be brought in the County Court.

The true nature of a trade mark in the wide sense of the word, that is, of trade marks not capable of registration, is not yet settled. It was formerly considered that the right of the owner of a trade mark of this kind (e.g., a trade name) was entirely dependent on the question of misrepresentation, so that a person who without fraud used a name or mark which had been previously used by another person, could not be made liable for doing so. This doctrine has been recently shaken, but the point is still open.

See GOODWILL; MERCHANDIZE MARKS ACT; PUBLICI JURIS.

Trade Name. A trade name is a name which by user and reputation has acquired the property of indicating that a certain trade or occupation is carried on by a particular person. (See GOODWILL.) The name may be that of a person, place or thing, or it may be what is called a fancy name (that is, a name having no sense as applied to the particular trade), or a word invented for the occasion, and having no sense at all. It may be applied to goods, to a magazine, or any other subject of trade.

A trade name gives the person entitled to use it the right of preventing any other person from using it so as to induce purchasers to believe that his goods are the goods sold or manufactured by the original maker, and thus to injure the latter. Thus, where a firm had obtained a reputation for a particular kind of goods distinguishel by the word "Glenfield," which was the name of the place where the goods had originally been manufactured, a person who sold the same kind of goods under the name "Glenfield" was restrained by injunction from so doing, although he had a small manufactory at the place called Glenfield, because it was apparent on the evidence that he used the word to induce the public to believe that in buying his goods they were buying the goods of the plaintiff, the original manufacturer.

As to whether an action will lie where a trade name is used wrongfully but without fraud, see TRADE MARKS.

Trader. Traders were formerly subject to special provisions of the bankruptcy law: thus, for instance, until s. 69 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, made all debtors subject to the provisions of that Act, only traders could be made bankrupt; under s. 6 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, the time allowed for compliance with a debtor's summons (q.v.) was shorter in the case of a trader than in the case or other persons; and under s. 15 (5) of the Act of 1869, the doctrine of reputed ownership (q.v.) was confined to traders. "Trader" within the bankruptcy law included not only persons carrying on trades in the ordinary sense, but also bankers, shipowners, and many similar classes, enumerated in the First Schedule to the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. Now all these distinctions between traders and non-traders have been abolished, and the only remaining exception affects married women, who still can be adjudicated bankrupt only when carrying on trade or business, whether separately from their husbands or not (Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 125 (1)).

Trade Secret. The disclosure of trade secrets obtained by breach of confidence or obtained under a contract, whether implied (as in the case of employees) or express, not to divulge them, will be restrained by injunction; and an action with regard to trade secrets may be heard in camera if a public hearing would defeat the ends for which the action is brought. See CAMERA, IN.

Trade-unions were originally mere friendly societies consisting of artisans, engaged in a particular trade, such as carpenters, bricklayers, etc.; but in course of time they acquired the character of associations for the protection of the interests of workmen against their employers. The principal objects of such societies at the present day are to increase the rate of wages, reduce the hours of labour, and bring about an equal division of work among a large number of workmen by establishing a uniform minimum rate of wages. They attain these objects principally by the legal means of "strikes," i.e., the stoppage of work by all the members until their demands are complied with, and the process known as picketing (q.v.). The members are supported during strikes by the funds of the society, which are obtained by weekly subscriptions during periods of work. Many trade-unions are also friendly societies.

Formerly trade-unions were not recognised by law; and, as a general rule, their regulations, being in restraint of trade, were illegal, and incapable of being enforced; but, by the Trade Union Act, 1871, this doctrine was abolished, and provisions (analogous to those applying to friendly societies (q.v.)) are made for the registration of trade-unions, for the regulations to be contained in their rules, and for the appointment of trustees in whom the property of the union is to vest, etc. But (ib. s. 4) no agreements between the members as to the conditions on which they are to work, or as to the payment of subscriptions or application of the funds, are enforceable in any Court of law.

It was decided in 1911 that trade-union funds could not be applied to the support of members of the House of Commons or of other elected bodies. The Trade Union Act, 1913, permits a union to resolve, by a majority of the members voting at a ballot, to raise a fund for the purposes mentioned above; and it also provides that any member can secure exemption from contributing to such fund if he objects to contributing; but when a union spends money on political purposes means are in fact found of getting all members to contribute whether they like it or not.

Traditio loqui chartam facit (5 Rep. 1). (Delivery makes a deed speak): that is to say, without delivery it is of no effect. Compare ESCROW; IN TRADITIONIBUS, ETC.

Trafalgar Square. As this square is within one mile of Westminster Hall, no public meeting (q.v.) can be held there during any session of Parliament. It is the property of the Crown, which consequently can at any time refuse to allow any meeting to be held there. In practice the regulation of meetings within the Square is left to the Commissioner of Police. The Square is (under the Trafalgar Square Act, 1844) part of the Metropolitan Police District.

Trail-baston. This was a commission to make enquiry as to persons who ill-treated jurors, sheltered malefactors or otherwise disturbed the peace. The commissioners were known as Justices of Trail-baston. It was first issued about 1296 and fell into disuse before the end of the fourteenth century. It was the connecting link between the commission IN EYRE (q.v.) and the commission of OYER AND TERMINER (q.v.).

Trailers and Six-wheelers. Until the making of the Heavy Motor Car (Amendment) Order, 1922, the speed of a heavy motor car could not legally (Heavy Motor Car Order, 1904, art. vii.) exceed five miles an hour when it drew a trailer. But under the Order of 1922 the speed may be twelve miles an hour, when the trailer is a two-wheeled vehicle connected with the motor car by a turntable and gimbals (so that the car and the trailer together form a flexible six-wheeler) and when the combined length does not exceed thirty-three feet and certain limits as to weight are observed.

Article X. (5) of the Order of 1904 provides that no heavy motor car used for the conveyance of passengers for hire may draw a trailer: and that is still law.

Tramps. See CASUAL POOR; VAGABOND.

Tramway. There is no statutory definition of this term, which must be taken as bearing in law its popular meaning of a line of rails level with the surface of the ground, which is, or may be, laid along a public road so that the space occupied by the line is available for ordinary wheeled traffic as well as for tramway cars. A tramway is constructed under a provisional order made pursuant to the Tramways Act, 1870, or under a private Act of Parliament, unless it is such a tramway as comes within the meaning of the term "light railway" (q.v.).

Trani, Laws of. A code of maritime law which originated in 1063 at the Italian seaport of Trani, situate on the Adriatic about eighty miles north of Brindisi. They are printed, with a translation, in Vol. 4 of Sir Francis Twiss' edition of the Black Book of the Admiralty. The full title of the code is the "Ordinamenta et Consuetudo Maris, edita per Consules Civitatis Trani."

Transcript is an official copy of certain proceedings in a Court. Thus, any person interested in an account in the books of the Paymaster-General can obtain a transcript of it (S. C. F. R., r. 100).

In the Privy Council, when an appeal was brought to the Judicial Committee, the appellant had formerly to see that a transcript of the proceedings and evidence in the Court below was prepared and transmitted to the Colonial Office by the proper officer. What was formerly called the transcript is now known as the record, which is transmitted to the Registrar of the Privy Council: see Judicial Committee Rules, 1908, rr. 12 et seq.

Transcripto pedis finis levati mittendo in cancellarium, De. A writ anciently used for certifying to the Court of Chancery the foot (or chirograph) of a fine (q.v.) levied before the justices in eyre.

Transcripto recognitionis factæ coram justiciariis itinerantibus, De. A writ anciently used to certify a recognisance taken before the itinerant justices (or justices in eyre).

Transept. The part of a church between the nave and the choir. In churches of the Gothic style the ends of the transept project on each side of the edifice. Primâ facie the transept belongs to the incumbent and the churchwardens.

Transfer.—I. In the law of property, a transfer is where a right passes from one person to another, either (1) by virtue of an act done by the transferor with that intention, as in the case of a conveyance or assignment by way of sale or gift, etc.; or (2) by operation of law, as in the case of forfeiture, bankruptcy, descent, or intestacy. A transfer may be absolute or conditional, by way of security, etc. See ASSIGNMENT; BILL OF SALE; CONVEYANCE.

In practice, "transfer" is used principally in the sense of voluntary transfer, and is applied especially to the operation of changing the ownership of stock, shares, etc., whether by registering an assignment or other instrument, or by making a simple entry in the register kept for that purpose. The person making the transfer is called the transferor, and the person to whom it is made the transferee. See SHARE; STOCK.

In chancery and lunacy practice, stocks and other securities standing in the names of trustees, lunatics, and other persons, are sometimes ordered to be transferred into the name of the Paymaster-General pending the proceedings, in order that they may be kept in safety until the time comes for them to be transferred out of Court to the parties entitled. See PAYMENT INTO COURT; CERTIFICATE.

Land registered under the Land Transfer Act, 1875, is transferred or conveyed by the execution of an instrument of transfer in the statutory form, and by the entry of the transfer on the register (see ss. 29, 34). The transfer of registered charges is similar (s. 40). See CHARGE; LAND REGISTRIES.

A transfer of a mortgage takes place when the mortgaged property and the right to receive the mortgage debt are conveyed by the mortgagee, either alone or with the concurrence of the mortgagor, to a third person. Before the Judicature Acts, it was an advantage to obtain the concurrence of the mortgagor, in order that he might covenant with the transferee for payment of the debt, for otherwise the transferee was obliged to sue for the debt as attorney of the mortgagee; but now, under s. 25 (6) of the Judicature Act, 1873, the assignee of a debt can sue in his own name. See CHOSE.

As to the transfer of judgments, see JUDGMENT.

II. In procedure, "transfer" is applied to an action or other proceeding, when it is taken from the jurisdiction of one Court or judge and placed under that of another. Any action in the High Court may be transferred from one division to another, or (in the case of an action in the Chancery Division) from one judge to another, by order of the Lord Chancellor (Ord. 49, r. 1); in the case of a transfer from one division to another, the consent of the president of each division is required (ib.). A division may also transfer an action to any other division with the consent of the president of the latter division (ib. r. 3). In the Chancery Division, a transfer of a cause from one judge to another may be either for all purposes, or for the purpose of trial or hearing only (ib. r. 2). A particular application in any cause or matter pending in any Court or in any division may be disposed of, by direction of the Lord Chancellor, by any judge of the High Court willing to deal with it (ib. r. 4). Any judge of the Chancery Division may dispose of any cause or matter pending before any other judge of the division; and this is done merely by arrangement between the judges (ib. r. 4A). Any judge of the Chancery Division before whom an estate is being administered or a company is being wound up may transfer into his Court any action pending elsewhere against the estate or the company (ib. r. 5).

See REMITTED ACTIONS.

Transgressione, De. Anciently the general name of the various writs with which the various actions of trespass were commenced.

Transhipment. If a ship is in distress in a foreign port, and the master is unable to carry the cargo further, he is generally entitled to tranship it, that is, put it on board another vessel and forward it to its destination, and thus earn the freight. But he is not justified in doing so if it would increase the freight payable by the shipper of the cargo, or cause a loss to the owners of the ship.

Transire. In the law of merchant shipping, when a coasting vessel is about to sail from her port of lading, an account giving particulars of the ship and her cargo must be delivered in duplicate to the Customs Collector of the port. He returns the original account, dated and signed by him, and this constitutes the "clearance" of the ship, and the "transire" or pass for the cargo; that is, it is an authority to the Custom House officers to let the vessel sail. The transire must be delivered up to the collector at the port of discharge before any of the cargo is unladen. A general transire may be granted to a coasting ship. See the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, ss. 145, 146.

Transit; Transitus. See STOPPAGE IN TRANSITU.

Transit in rem judicatam, "It passes into or becomes a res judicata," is a short mode of saying that when a person has obtained a judgment in respect of a given right of action, he cannot bring another action for the same right, but must take proceedings to enforce his judgment. See MERGER; RES JUDICATA

Transitory. See ACTIONS.

Transit terra cum onere (Co. Litt. 231*a*). (Land passes with its burthen.) Compare QUI SENTIT; ETC.

Translation. In ecclesiastical law, this means the transfer of a bishop from one diocese to another. There is, of course, no consecration; but all the other formalities required for the creation of a bishop are observed.

Transport, Ministry of. This Ministry was established pursuant to the Ministry of Transport Act, 1919, s. 1. The powers of a number of Government Departments regarding transport were transferred to it (see BOARD OF TRADE); and a separate road construction department of the Ministry was authorised (s. 2 (4)). The head of the Ministry is the Minister of Transport (s. 1) who has a Parliamentary Secretary. The salary of the Minister is £5,000 a year and that of the Parliamentary Secretary is £1,500 a year (s. 25 (2)). Both of them can be members of the House of Commons (s. 27). The Minister is, and apparently will be, a member of the Cabinet. See OFFICE OF PROFIT.

Transportation. This began in the reign of Elizabeth with the sending of offenders to the North American plantations, where they were employed in a servile capacity under royal warrant or under indentures entered into by them in order to escape other punishment. The practice was recognised by the statute 39 Eliz. c. 4. This transportation by consent was superseded in 1717 (see the statute 4 Geo. 1, c. 11) by a system, which continued until 1853, under which a number of felonies were expressly made punishable by transportation. After 1776 transportation was at first to Africa and subsequently to Australia. Under the Transportation Act, 1824, which revised and consolidated the previous Acts on the subject, the Crown was enabled to appoint places beyond the seas to which offenders might be conveyed and kept to hard labour, and the same statute empowered the Crown to substitute transportation for capital punishment without its being necessary to obtain the consent of the convict. During the early part of the reign of Victoria the punishment of transportation was abolished, and that of penal servitude (q.v.) substituted.

Traverse. In the ordinary practice of the High Court, to traverse is to deny an allegation of fact. The term is used both in pleadings and in affidavits: thus if a plaintiff replies by simply joining issue on the statement of defence he traverses, that is, denies, all the material allegations in the defence. (See Ord. 19, r. 18.) See CONFESSION AND AVOIDANCE; QUÆ EST EADEM.

So, in an answer to interrogatories, a denial of the allegation impliedly contained in an interrogatory is a traverse, and may be either simple or subject to an explanation or admission previously given. (See ANSWER.) In an affidavit of documents, again, the paragraph stating that the deponent has no documents in his possession except those specified in the affidavit used sometimes to be called the traverse, because the affidavit was in the same form as if it were made in answer to an interrogatory.

Traverse of office or inquisition is a mode by which a subject can, in certain cases, dispute an office or inquisition finding the Crown entitled to property claimed by him. It was formerly a convenient remedy, on account of the difficulty of obtaining redress against the Crown by petition of right, but since the amendment and extension of the latter mode of proceeding, traverses of office have fallen into disuse. One of the most usual instances of their use was in resisting extents (see EXTENT), in which case the defendant or traverser (i.e., the person claiming the property) entered an appearance and claim, followed by a plea or traverse disputing the debt alleged by the Crown, to which the Crown replied or demurred, and so on, until issue joined, when the cause was tried by a jury at Westminster. Judgment for the Crown on a traverse is, "that the subject take nothing by his traverse"; if for the subject, it is judgment of amoveas manus—"that the King's hands be amoved, etc."

This procedure by traverse was extended to inquisitions in lunacy by the statute 2 & 3 Edw. 6, c. 8. Under the present practice, where a person has been found lunatic by inquisition (q.v.), and he, or the husband or wife of the lunatic, or someone having an interest in his estate, wishes to vacate it on the ground that he was of sound mind and capable of managing himself and his property when it was returned, he files a petition (Lunacy Rules, 1892, r. 17) for leave to traverse the inquisition at the Master's Office within three months after the inquisition has been returned (Lunacy Act, 1890, s. 101). The petition is heard by the judge in lunacy (rr. 23, 18), and if he grants leave there is drawn up and filed in the Crown Office a traverse or plea alleging the insufficiency of the inquisition, to which issue is joined in the name of the Attorney-General representing the Crown. The traverse then comes into the King's Bench Division for trial, and is tried before a jury in the same manner as an ordinary issue. The result is either to affirm or vacate the inquisition unless the judge in lunacy directs a new trial under s. 103. It is, however, to be noted that under s. 104 no traverse is allowed to the verdict of a jury upon an issue tried in the High Court, but a new trial or a new inquisition may be applied for. See INQUIRY.

Formerly, where a person indicted of a misdemeanour, but not actually in custody, traversed the indictment by pleading not guilty, the trial was postponed until the next assizes or sessions, and hence "traverse" came to mean "postpone." The Criminal Procedure Act, 1851, s. 27, provides that no person shall be entitled to traverse, that is, postpone, the trial of any indictment.

Traversing Answer; Traversing Note. In suits under the old practice in Chancery, where the defendant refused or neglected to file an answer to the bill, the plaintiff might file either a traversing answer or a traversing note, which produced the same effect as if the defendant had filed an answer traversing the case made by the bill. (See PRO CONFESSO.) Now, in the corresponding case, the plaintiff sets the action down on motion for judgment under Ord. 27, r. 11.

Treadmill. A wheel which, in principle, was the same as the water-wheel used in old flour-mills. The treadmill was set in motion by the weight of prisoners treading on steps. It was introduced into English prisons in 1818, and was for long a recognised means of causing prisoners to perform hard labour. By 1910 it had fallen into complete disuse.

Treason, in its most general sense, is a crime committed by one person against another to whom he is bound by some tie of allegiance or subjection. It was formerly of two kinds, high treason and petit treason. The former now alone exists.

I. Under the Treason Act, 1351, a person commits high treason who does an overt act showing an intention to kill or depose the King, or to do him any bodily harm tending to death or destruction, maim or wounding, imprisonment or restraint; or to kill the wife of a king regnant; or to kill the heir-apparent to the throne; or who levies war against the King; or who attempts by insurrection to intimidate the King or the Houses of Parliament; or who actively assists the King's enemies; or who violates the wife of a king regnant, or the eldest daughter of the Sovereign, or the wife of the heir-apparent; or who kills the Lord Chancellor, or one of certain other high officials of the Crown. See OVERT ACT.

High treason is punishable by hanging, or by beheading, if so directed by the Crown (Treason Act, 1814, ss. 1, 2).

The offence is an exception to the ordinary criminal law (i) in being subject to limitation in respect of time (Treason Act, 1695, ss. 5, 6, providing that no person shall be prosecuted for treason committed in Great Britain but within three years after the offence, except in the case of a designed assassination of the Sovereign); (ii) in two witnesses being required for a conviction, unless the prisoner freely confesses his crime (ib., s. 2); and (iii) in the prisoner being entitled to have a copy of the indictment (ib., s. 1) and lists of the witnesses and jurors delivered to him ten days before the trial (ib., s. 7; Treason Act, 1708, s. 11). The Treason Act, 1842, s. 1, provides that these enactments of William III. and Anne shall not apply to attempts upon the life of the Sovereign; and it further provides (s. 2) that assaults upon the person of the Sovereign shall be misdemeanours punishable with penal servitude and whipping.

II. Petty treason was where a servant killed his master, a wife her husband, or an ecclesiastical person his superior, such a crime being considered a violation of private allegiance. Petty treason was abolished by the statute 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 2 (replaced by s. 8 of the Offences against the Person Act, 1861) which converted it into the crime of murder, from which it had differed only in its punishment: see BURNING TO DEATH.

See ACCESSORY; DE FACTO.

Treason Felony. A general desire to provide, in respect of treason and acts of a treasonable nature, a punishment less rigorous than that provided for treason by the existing law, led to the enactment of the Treason Felony Act, 1848, which declares that treason felony consists in an intention to depose or levy war upon the Sovereign or compel him to change his measures or counsels, or to terrorise either House of Parliament, or to incite any foreigner to invade the King's dominions, coupled with an expression of such intention by any printing or writing or by open and advised speech or by any overt Act; and the statute provides that penal servitude for life shall be the maximum punishment for treason felony.

Treasurer. In each county there is an officer so entitled, who takes charge of the county funds and accounts. Formerly he was appointed by the justices: now (Local Government Act, 1888, s. 3 (10)) he is appointed by and holds office during the pleasure of the county council. See TREASURER; UNDER TREASURER.

Treasurer's Remembrancer. An official of the Exchequer who prepared the financial business which was to be brought before the barons at the time when they and the Treasurer managed the king's revenues. See TREASURY.

Treasure Trove is where any money, coin, gold, silver, plate, or bullion, is found hidden in the earth or other private place. It belongs to the Crown, unless the owner appears to claim it. The Crown may grant the right to treasure trove found within a certain district to a private person, e.g., the lord of a manor. (See FRANCHISE; MANOR; PREROGATIVE; DERELICT; WRECK.) In the absence of such a grant anyone concealing treasure trove which he may find is guilty of a common law misdemeanour.

The coroner has jurisdiction to hold an inquest, under s. 36 of the Coroners Act, 1887, as to treasure trove; but his function is confined to ascertaining whether any given thing is or not within the definition, and he cannot enquire as to who is entitled to it.

See THESAURUS, ETC.

Treasury is that fiscal department of the Government which controls the payments of the public money in accordance with the votes of the House of Commons. For this purpose it issues directions to the Exchequer (q.v.). The head of the Treasury on the financial side is the Chancellor of the Exchequer: see CHANCELLOR.

The Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 12 (2), defines the expression "The Treasury" as meaning the Lord High Treasurer for the time being, or the Commissioners, for the time being, of His Majesty's Treasury.

The Lord High Treasurer represents the Treasurer, who together with the Chancellor and the Barons of the Exchequer exercised, under the Norman kings, general control over the royal revenues. See LORD TREASURER.

Treasury Bills. Under the Treasury Bills Act, 1877, the Treasury, when authorised by any other Act to raise money, may do so by means of bills (known as Treasury Bills) payable not more than twelve months after date. Such bills have superseded Exchequer bills (q.v.).

Treasury Board. See LORD TREASURER.

Treasury Chest Fund. A fund not exceeding £1,000,000, which the Treasury may employ to make advances for any public service, to be repaid out of moneys appropriated by Parliament to such service (Treasury Chest Fund Act, 1877, ss. 2, 3).

Treasury Notes. The popular title of Currency Notes (q.v.).

Treasury Solicitor. This is the abbreviated title of "the solicitor for the affairs of His Majesty's Treasury": see the Treasury Solicitor Act, 1876, which deals exhaustively with his position and powers. They are much more extensive than those of a solicitor in the ordinary sense of the word. He need not, in point of law, be a qualified solicitor (Solicitors Act, 1843, s. 47); but when acting within his powers he can perform all the functions and claim all the rights which, in ordinary cases, are peculiar to a qualified solicitor. The office has in recent years generally been held by a barrister. See DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC PROSECUTIONS.

The Treasury Solicitor is also His Majesty's Procurator-General. "Procurator" is the Latin form of "proctor." The Treasury Solicitor, qua Procurator-General, has now no functions to perform. The King's Proctor (q.v.) however, belongs to his department.

Treaties of Washington Act, 1922. See FOREIGN ENLISTMENT; PIRACY.

Treating. The giving or the receiving of food, drink, etc., at an election for the purpose of influencing votes. For the full definition, see the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, s. 1. See CORRUPT PRACTICES.

Treaty.—I. In private law, treaty signifies the discussion of terms which immediately precedes the conclusion of a contract or other transaction. A warranty on the sale of goods, to be valid, must be made during the treaty preceding the sale.

II. In public and international law, a treaty is an agreement between the governments of two States. (See STATE.) Such an agreement is, of course, not enforceable by legal proceedings. (See LAW; INTERNATIONAL LAW.) In England, the power of making treaties with foreign States is vested in the Crown as part of its prerogative; but after the Great War of 1914-18, the Crown adopted a course which had previously been quite unknown in agreeing to a treaty with France which stipulated that it, before ratification by the King, should be submitted to Parliament for approval (Anglo-French Treaty (Defence of France) Act, 1919). In some cases, however, treaties made by the Crown are not valid in the Courts of this country unless concluded under the powers of an Act of Parliament. For an instance, see EXTRADITION.

Treble Costs; Treble Damages. See COSTS; DOUBLE DAMAGES.

Trebucket. The cucking-stool (q.v.).

Trees. See ADJOINING OWNERS as to overhanging trees.

As to stealing trees see the Larceny Act, 916, s. 8 (2).

Tremagium. See HYPERAGIUM.

Tresayle. A great-great-grandfather; the randfather of a grandfather. The writ of resayle was identical with the writ of cosinge: see COSINAGE. Compare AIEL; BESAIEL.

Trespass is a generic name for various torts, nost of them being distinguished by the Latin vords formerly used in the appropriate vrits.

Trespass vi et armis ("with force and rms") includes injuries to the person accomanied with actual force or violence, as in the ase of battery and imprisonment, and the ct of entering on another man's land without awful authority. This latter kind of trespass in which the "force" is implied or fictitious) s also called trespass quare clausum fregit, because he [the defendant] broke or entered nto the close" or land of the plaintiff. Not nly entering a man's land, but also the acts f allowing cattle to stray into his land, or driving nails into his wall, or digging the minerals under his land, constitute trespass uare clausum fregit. To enable a person to ring an action of trespass "qu. cl. fr.," he nust have actual possession of the land. Therefore, an heir of land cannot maintain an ction for a trespass committed before he took ossession by entry. See POSSESSION.

Where a person has by law the right to nter on the lands of another for a certain purose, and, after entry, he does something vhich he is not entitled to do, then he is considered a trespasser ab initio, or as if his ntry had been unlawful. A continuing trespass is one which is permanent in its nature; s, where a person builds on his own land so hat part of the building overhangs his neighbour's land.

Another variety of trespass vi et armis is respass de bonis asportatis, for the wrongful aking of chattels. Injuries committed to hattels while in the owner's possession e.g., by poisoning his cattle) are also classed nder the head of trespass vi et armis.

As to trespass on the case, see ACTION ON HE CASE. The principal action for trespass n the case, having a specific name, is trover q.v.), but the class also includes a large umber of torts having no specific name, specially those arising from negligence, fraud, tc.

Trespass gives rise to a right of action for lamages. See TORT.

Trial is that step in an action, prosecution or ther judicial proceeding, by which the questions of fact in issue are decided. See FACT; ISSUE; QUESTIONS OF LAW.

I. In actions in the High Court, there are five principal modes of trial, viz., trial before a judge and jury, before a judge alone, before a judge with assessors, before a referee alone, and before a referee with assessors (Ord. 36, r. 2).

Trial before a judge and jury (formerly called trial per pais) is a mode of trial which was formerly peculiar to the superior Courts of common law. By the Chancery Amendment Act, 1858, power was given to the Court of Chancery to summon juries to try questions of fact; but the power was seldom exercised. Now, causes or matters assigned to the Chancery Division are tried by a judge without a jury unless the Court or a judge otherwise order (Ord. 36, r. 3); and if a trial by jury be ordered it takes place in the King's Bench Division. In both the Admiralty and the Chancery Divisions trial without a jury may be ordered of any issue which before the Judicature Acts could, without consent of the parties, be so tried (ib., r. 4). And any case involving prolonged examination of documents which cannot be conveniently made by a jury may be ordered to be tried without a jury (ib., r. 5). But with these exceptions (which are few in number) the right of trial by jury is now governed by the Administration of Justice Act, 1920, s. 2, and the rules made thereunder. That section provides that where in any action or matter whatsoever in the High Court, "the Court or a judge is satisfied" on application made by either party, that the action, etc., "cannot be as conveniently tried with a jury as without a jury" then an order may be made for trial without a jury, provided, however, (1) that no such order shall be made without the consent of both parties in any case in which fraud, libel, slander, malicious prosecution, false imprisonment, seduction or breach of promise of marriage is involved; and (2) that the right of parties to divorce proceedings to trial by jury of contested issues of fact, and the right of an heir-at-law to such trial when he is a party to a probate action are both to be preserved. The section further provides for the making of rules of Court to give effect to it: and, accordingly, as from 1st March, 1922, rules 2 and 6 of Order 36 have been annulled and new rules substituted.

The Court of Appeal will not review the decision of a master or a judge as to whether a case can or "cannot be as conveniently tried with as without a jury."

A trial by jury consists of the operation of calling and swearing the jury (see JURY; CHALLENGE), of a speech by the counsel for the plaintiff (see OPEN), the examination, cross-examination and re-examination of his witnesses: a speech by the counsel for the defendant, followed by the examination, cross-examination and re-examination of his witnesses, and a summing up of their evidence by him: the reply or speech by the plaintiff's counsel: occasionally a "view" (q.v.) by the jury; the summing up of the whole case by the judge for the jury: and, lastly, the jury's verdict. (See the various titles; also RIGHT TO BEGIN.) It sometimes happens, however, that the trial comes to a premature end by the non-appearance of one of the parties, or by nonsuit (q.v.), or the withdrawal of a juror (q.v.). If the plaintiff does not appear at the trial, the action is dismissed; if the defendant does not appear, the plaintiff must prove his case, so far as the burden of proof lies upon him. A verdict or judgment so obtained may under Ord. 39 be set aside by the Court of Appeal upon terms. Sometimes a trial is ordered to take place before several judges and a jury: this was formerly called a trial at bar (see BAR), as opposed to the ordinary trial, which is sometimes called, by way of distinction, "trial at nisi prius." See NISI PRIUS.

Where the judge who tried the action has misdirected the jury in point of law, or admitted evidence which ought to have been refused, or rejected evidence which ought to have been admitted, and by so doing has caused a miscarriage of justice, or where the jury have found against the weight of the evidence, or given excessive damages, and generally wherever it is clear that a fair trial has not been had, the party aggrieved may obtain an order for a new trial on motion made for that purpose. The whole proceedings on the trial are then gone through afresh, and, if the case is again not properly tried, a third trial may be ordered, and so on (see Ord. 39).

The other modes of trial are similar to trial before a judge and jury, except that the calling and swearing of the jury, and the summing up by the judge, are necessarily absent. Where the trial is before a judge alone, the evidence is sometimes taken by affidavit. See AFFIDAVIT; EVIDENCE.

Admiralty actions involving nautical questions, e.g., actions of collision, are generally tried before a judge with Trinity Masters sitting as assessors (q.v.).

As to trial before a referee, see ARBITRATION.

The following kinds of trial are obsolete:— Trial by the record was where issue is joined as to the existence of a particular record (q.v.): such an issue was tried by the Court itself on production of the record. Trial by certificate was where a fact could only be proved by the certificate of a public official: thus, the custom of the City of London in respect of foreign attachment was proved by the oral certificate of the Recorder.

II. In County Court actions, the plaintiff appears in Court on the return day of the summons, and the defendant must appear to answer the plaint. On answer being made in Court, the judge proceeds to try the cause in a summary way: in small cases the plaintiff and defendant are sworn and make their statements to the judge, being asked questions by him when necessary; but in cases where counsel or solicitors are employed, and a jury summoned, the course of proceeding resembles that on a trial in the High Court.

III. In criminal cases, the trial of a person accused of a crime usually takes place before a judge and petty jury at the assizes, or at the Central Criminal Court, or at bar, that is, by a jury before three or more judges of the King's Bench Division: this last mode of trial is only used in important cases. (See KING'S BENCH.) The steps on a criminal trial are substantially the same as those above described, substituting "prosecutor" for "plaintiff," and "prisoner" for "defendant." (See also ACQUITTAL; CONVICTION.) The obsolete modes of trial by ordeal, by the corsned, and by battle, will be found described under those titles.

In cases of treason and felony, a nobleman is entitled to be tried by his peers, that is, by members of the House of Lords. See CERTIORARI; LORD HIGH STEWARD; HOUSE OF LORDS.

Trial, Writ of. The statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 17, empowered the Superior Courts to order that the issues joined in any action of debt for not more than £20 should be tried before the sheriff or any judge of any inferior Court of the county in which the action had been brought, and provided that effect should be given to such order by the issue of a writ known as a writ of trial. This enactment was repealed in 1867 by s. 6, the statute 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, as being unnecessary in view of the jurisdiction which the County Court had by then acquired.

Tribunal of the Hague. See HAGUE CONFERENCE.

Triding; Tridingmote. The trithing or triding was the same as the riding (q.v.), and the tridingmote was the Court of the riding.

Triers or Triors are persons appointed by the Court (when necessary) to decide challenges to jurors, where no jurors have been already sworn on the jury. As soon as two jurors are sworn, they decide all subsequent challenges. Challenges to the array may be tried by the Court itself. See CHALLENGE; ELISORS.

Trinity House. The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 742, provides that for the purposes of that Act "'The Trinity House' shall mean the Master, Wardens, and Assistants of the Guild, Fraternity, or Brotherhood of the Most Glorious and Undivided Trinity and of St. Clement, commonly called 'The Corporation of the Trinity House of Deptford Stroud.'" As a matter of fact, "The Trinity House" is, and for long has been, the title in general use. It consists of ten Acting Masters (one of whom is a retired officer of the Royal Navy, the other nine being retired officers of the Mercantile Marine) and of a number of other Masters, some of whom have been Acting Masters who have ceased to perform active duties, the rest being peers, prominent politicians and members of the Royal Family. All the Masters are known as Elder brethren.

The Trinity House received its charter from Henry VIII. in 1514. Under that and various subsequent charters and various Acts of Parliament it has been entrusted with many duties relating to pilotage (q.v.) and lighthouses, beacons and sea marks. The enactment under which it deals with lighthouses, etc., is the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 634 (1) (a). The actual work of the Trinity House is done by the Acting Masters.

There are also Trinity Houses at Hull and Newcastle respectively, which, under various charters and the Pilotage Act, 1913, act instead of the main Trinity House as regards pilotage in districts adjoining those towns.

Trinity House Outport Districts. This expression is defined by s. 52 (1) of the Pilotage Act, 1913.

Trinity Masters are Acting Elder Brethren of the Trinity House. If the decision of a question arising in an Admiralty action requires technical knowledge and experience in navigation, the judge or Court is usually assisted at the hearing by two Trinity Masters, who sit as assessors and advise the Court on questions of a nautical character. (See Assessor.) Trinity Masters also act as assessors of Prize Courts (Prize Rules, Ord. 16).

Trinity Sittings; Trinity Term. See SITTINGS; TERM.

Trinity Sunday. The Sunday next after Whit Sunday (q.v.).

Trink; Trinker; Trinkerman. The trink (statutes 2 Hen. 6, c. 12, s. 1; 2 Hen. 6, c. 19) was a kind of fixed net used in the tidal part of the Thames; trinker was another form of the same word; and trinker or trinkerman meant a man who worked such a net.

Trinoda necessitas. The threefold obligation. It consisted of brighote, burghbote and expeditio (see those titles).

No matter who held the land, the liability to the trinoda necessitas still attached.

Triptych. A set of three pictures or carvings, set side by side in separate compartments, the outside compartments being hinged so that they can fold in over the central one. A faculty is required for the use of a triptych in connection with the altar of a parish church.

Tristis. Under the forest laws, this meant immunity from attending and assisting one who had the right of chase.

Trithing. See TRIDING.

Tron; Trona; Tronage; Tronagium. In the time of Fleta the trona was the public weighing machine of a city or burgh. Such a machine was later known in Scotland as the trone, or the king's trone, but these words do not seem to have been used in England.

The charge for weighing at the trona was known at first as tronagium and subsequently as tronage.

Tronator. An officer of the City of London who weighed all the wool brought into the City. See the Book of Oaths, p. 129, edition of 1689.

Tronour. An official in charge of the tron (q.v.). In this sense the word is Scotch rather than English and does not seem to have been used south of Newcastle-on-Tyne.

In the statutes 18 Edw. 3 and 14 Rich. 2, c. 10, the tronour is mentioned along with the finder (q.v.) and other such officers: he was some kind of customs officer.

Trover. In common law practice, the action of trover (or trover and conversion) was a species of action on the case (see TRESPASS), and originally lay for the recovery of damages against a person who had found another's goods and wrongfully converted them to his own use; subsequently the allegation of the loss of the goods by the plaintiff and the finding of them by the defendant was merely fictitious, and the action became the remedy for any wrongful interference with or detention of the goods of another. The name "trover" is sometimes applied to an action brought for the same purpose under the present practice, though, at the present day, it is more usual in such a case to bring an action claiming delivery of the goods and damages for the wrongful detention. In an action of trover the plaintiff could recover only the value of the goods, not the goods themselves. See DETINUE; TORT; DELIVERY, WRIT OF.

Troy Weight. The name given to a measure of weight stated to have originated in the French town of Troyes. It consisted of twelve ounces to the pound.

An ounce troy now consists of 480 of the 7,000 grains which go to the imperial pound (Weights and Measures Act, 1878, s. 14). The only customary subdivision of the ounce troy is the pennyweight, twenty of which go to the ounce. There is no troy pound. As to the use of troy weight, see AVOIRDUPOIS.

Truck Acts. The Truck Act, 1831, was passed to abolish what is commonly called the "truck system." Under that system employers were in the practice of paying the wages of their workpeople in goods, or of requiring them to purchase goods at certain shops, which led to labourers being compelled to take goods of inferior quality at a high price. The Act made payment in money compulsory; and it applied to all artificers, workmen and labourers, except those engaged in certain trades, especially iron and metal works, quarries, cloth, silk and glass manufactories. It did not apply to domestic or agricultural servants. The Truck Act Amendment Act, 1887, s. 2, now, however, provides that the Act of 1831 shall apply to workmen as defined by the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, s. 10, that is to say, to all persons (other than domestic servants) under a contract to perform manual labour. This brought in agricultural labourers, but s. 4 of the Act of 1887, provides that a contract may be made with an agricultural labourer "for giving him food, drink, not being intoxicating, a cottage or other allowances or privileges in addition to money wages."

The Truck Act, 1896, regulates the conditions under which deductions may be made from wages for fines, for bad or negligent work or injury to materials, and for materials, tools, machines, etc., supplied by the employer.

True Bill. See INDICTMENT.

True Owner. Quoad the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 38 (2) (c), the "true owner" of goods in the "reputed ownership" (q.v.) of a bankrupt is the person, whether he be the legal owner, who is entitled to determine the state of things under which the bankrupt is the apparent owner.

As to the meaning of the term quoad bills of sale, see that title.

Trust.—I. A trust, in its simplest form, is a relation between two persons, by virtue of which one of them (the trustee) holds property for the benefit of the other (the cestui que trust), while as regards the rest of the world he (the trustee) is, for most purposes, absolute owner of it. The right of the cestui que trust to that benefit is enforceable as a personal right against only the trustee and those who have acquired interests in the trust property with notice of the trust. As between the trustee and cestui que trust, and those claiming under them, the cestui que trust is in effect beneficial owner of the trust property, either absolutely or with restrictions according to the nature of the trust. As trusts were formerly enforced only in equity, he is sometimes called equitable owner. (See OWNERSHIP; EQUITY; ESTATE.) This equitable ownership or interest is assignable, except in the case of a restraint on alienation or anticipation (see those titles), or of a discretionary trust (infra). By the Statute of Frauds (q.v.) all grants and assignments of trusts must be in writing, signed by the grantor or assignor. No particular form of words is required for an assignment of a trust, but it is the custom to employ the same kind of instrument and the same form of words as if the interest were legal instead of equitable.

The devolution of a trust, that is, of an equitable estate or interest in property, follows the rules of law applicable to a corresponding legal estate or interest: therefore if A holds land in trust for B absolutely, and B dies intestate, his heir (whether heir at law, or heir in gavelkind or borough-English, according to the tenure of the land), becomes cestui que trust, or beneficial owner, of the land; in the case of personal property, B's interest would pass to his executors, and be distributed, after payment of his debts, amongst his next of kin. (See ASSETS.) Trust property is liable to be taken in execution (see ELEGIT; EXECUTION; STATUTE OF FRAUDS), and, if the cestui que trust becomes bankrupt, it vests in the trustee in his bankruptcy. The ownership of the trustee, on the other hand, is not subject to his debts, does not pass to his trustee if he becomes bankrupt, and is not liable to succession duty or to estate duty on his death.

Trusts arise either by the act of the party or by operation of law.

A. Trusts by act of the party are either express or implied.

(a) An express trust is one created by clear words: as where A gives property to B in trust for C, or otherwise expresses a clear intention that C shall have the benefit of it. A is called the author of the trust, or the settlor, testator, etc., according to the instrument by which the trust is created. As to where writing is required for the creation of trusts, see STATUTE OF FRAUDS; DECLARATION. See also SECRET TRUSTS.

(1) With reference to the completeness with which they are expressed by the author of the trust, trusts are of two classes, viz., (i) those in which the objects of the trust are completely indicated, and (ii) those in which they are not. (i) Trusts of the former class are again divisible into trusts executed and trusts executory. An executed trust is one in which the limitations of the equitable interest are complete and final; as if A conveys property in trust for C for life, and after his death in trust for D absolutely. In an executory trust the limitations of the equitable interest are intended to serve merely as minutes or instructions for perfecting the settlement at some future period; thus, a trust in marriage articles to settle land on the intended husband for life, with remainder to the heirs of the body of the husband and wife, is executory, because it contemplates a future settlement in accordance with the intention expressed by the articles, which is that such a limitation may be made as will give the husband a life estate only, with remainder to the eldest and other sons successively in tail; —the distinction is important, for if the limitations in the articles were treated as final (in other words, as an executed trust) they would, under the rule in Shelley's Case (q.v.), give the husband an estate tail, which would enable him to defeat the interests of the issue. (ii) A trust in which the objects are not completely indicated is sometimes called a power in the nature of a trust, or a mixture of a trust and power; in other words, a trust of which the outline only is sketched by the settlor, while the details are to be filled up by the good sense of the trustees; as if A gives property to B with power (or upon trust) to dispose of it among A's relations, then in default of a disposal by B the property will be divisible among A's next of kin. "A disposition of this kind," said the Master of the Rolls in 1807, "contains a mixture of trust and power. The trust must be exercised for relations and kindred of some description or other. The power of selection belongs to those to whom the testator has thought right to confide it. . . . If there is any person entitled to exercise the power, the trust will be for those of the relations and kindred whom such person shall select; if the power is extinct the trust is for those who answer the description of relations and kindred according to the construction this Court may put upon these words" (16 Ves. 43).

(2) With reference to their purposes, trusts are either public or private. "By public," says Mr. Lewin, "must be understood such as are constituted for the benefit either of the public at large or of some considerable portion of it answering a particular description. To this class belong all trusts for charitable purposes, and indeed public trusts and charitable trusts may be considered in general as synonymous expressions. In private trusts the beneficial interest is vested absolutely in one or more individuals who are, or within a certain time may be, definitely ascertained, and to whom therefore collectively, unless under some legal disability, it is, or within the allowed limit will be, competent to control, modify or determine the trust." Public trusts are necessarily administrative (q.v.); private trusts, on the other hand, may be simple [passive] or special [active].

"The simple trust," says Mr. Lewin, "is where property is vested in one person upon trust for another, and the nature of the trust not being prescribed by the settlor, is left to the construction of law. In this case the cestui que trust has jus habendi, or the right to be put in actual possession of the property, and jus disponendi, or the right to call upon the trustee to execute conveyances as the cestui que trust directs"; he is, in short, absolute equitable owner of the property. See TRUSTEE.

"The special trust," says Mr. Lewin, "is where the machinery of a trustee is introduced for the execution of some purpose particularly pointed out, and the trustee is not, as before, a mere passive depositary of the estate, but is called upon to exert himself actively in the execution of the settlor's intention; as where a conveyance is to trustees upon trust to sell for payment of debts," or to pay the income to a given person during his life. (See SETTLEMENT.) With reference to the obligations of the trustee, special trusts are divisible into imperative and discretionary. An imperative trust is where the trustee is bound to act in the manner directed; thus, if the property is given upon trust to sell, the trustee is bound to sell. A discretionary trust is where the performance or exercise of the trust and not merely the mode of its exercise is left to the discretion of the trustee: as if property is given to B upon trust to apply it for the benefit of C or his wife and children during his life in such manner and so long as B in his discretion shall think best; such trusts are not unfrequently inserted in wills and settlements when it is desired to prevent an allowance given to a spendthrift and his family from being assigned by him or taken by his creditors on his bankruptcy, because, as the trust cannot be enforced against the trustee, C has no interest capable of being sold or otherwise dealt with for the benefit of his creditors. With reference to the mode in which they are to be exercised, special trusts are divisible into ministerial (or instrumental) and discretionary. "Ministerial trusts," says Mr. Lewin, "are such as demand no further exercise of reason or understanding than every intelligent agent must necessarily employ; such is a trust to convey an estate to a certain person. Discretionary trusts (in the general sense of the word) are such as cannot be duly administered without the application of a certain degree of prudence and judgment; as where a fund is vested in trustees upon trust to distribute among such charitable objects as the trustees shall think fit. So a trust for sale must be considered discretionary. [See DISCRETION.] To this class belongs what is called a trust with a power annexed, where the trust itself is complete, and the power being but an accessory may be exercised or not as the trustee may deem it expedient; as where lands are limited to trustees with a power of varying the securities."

(b) An implied trust is where the intention to create the trust is inferred. Thus, if A gives property to B, "not doubting," "entreating," or "hoping" that B will employ it for the benefit of C, a trust is implied in favour of C, the execution of which C can enforce, although it is given in a precatory form. This is called a precatory trust.

An honorary trust is where A gives property to B "relying on his honour" (or using equivalent words) that he will employ it for the benefit of C. Such a trust is not legally enforceable.

B. Trusts by operation of law are such as are not declared by the party at all, either directly or indirectly, but result from the effect of a rule of equity. They are of two kinds, resulting and constructive.

A resulting trust arises where a trust is created which does not dispose of the property. Thus, if an estate is devised to A and his heirs upon trust to sell and pay the testator's debts, then the surplus of the beneficial interest constitutes a resulting trust in favour of the testator's heir. (See RESULT.) As a general rule, where in a conveyance or will the legal estate is given to a person, but no trust is expressed, and an intention can be collected that the grantee or devisee should not take the beneficial interest (as where a person purchases property in the name of another), the interest will result to the grantor, purchaser, etc.; similarly, if part of the beneficial interest is disposed of, the residue will result. (See ADVANCEMENT; CONVERSION.) Where a private trust wholly fails, and there are no heir, next of kin or other persons representing the settlor, then the whole of the trust property goes to the Crown—the realty by escheat under the Intestate Estates Act, 1884, s. 4, and the personalty as bona vacantia (q.v.). As to charitable trusts, see CY-PRÈS.

A constructive trust is one which the Court creates by a construction put upon certain acts of the parties: thus, when a tenant for life of leaseholds renews the lease on his own account, the law gives the benefit of the renewed lease to those who were interested in the old lease. As soon as a valid contract for the sale of land has been entered into, the vendor becomes in equity a trustee of the land for the purchaser, to whom the beneficial ownership passes. The vendor has a lien for his purchase-money, and is entitled to retain possession until he is paid; but he is accountable to the purchaser for the rents and profits, and for any wilful waste or neglect.

II. "Trust" is used in a peculiar sense to denote a mode of carrying on a business for purposes of profit. Thus a "share investment trust" is an agreement between a small number of persons (the trustees) and a comparatively large and fluctuating body of persons (generally called subscribers, certificate holders, or the like), that the trustees shall acquire and hold certain shares in companies and receive the income for the benefit of the subscribers, with power to sell any shares and re-invest the proceeds in other shares. Such an arrangement does not constitute the subscribers an association within the meaning of the Companies (Consolidation)

Act, 1908, s. 1, and therefore does not require registration, even though the subscribers exceed twenty in number unless, possibly, the trustees exceed that number.

Trustee.—I. In the strict sense of the word a trustee is a person who holds property upon trust (q.v.).

A. As to private trustees, or trustees acting under wills, settlements, and similar instruments.

Any person (whether it be a woman, married or unmarried, an alien, or an infant) or any corporation may hold property as trustee. Great inconvenience may result from an infant being a trustee; and the Court will not hesitate, if such inconvenience arises, to appoint a trustee of full age in his place. (See TRUSTEE ACTS.) Corporations (unless they be such as come within Rule 30 of the Public Trustee Rules, 1912), cannot, as a rule, hold land without the licence of the Crown, and therefore are unfit to be trustees of land; they also cannot be cestui que trusts of land without the licence of the Crown or statutory powers. See MORTMAIN.

The office of a trustee is a personal one, and does not necessarily devolve or pass with the trust property. If one of several trustees dies, the office devolves on the survivors; the property also passes to the survivors, trustees being always made joint tenants. (See JOINT TENANCY.) Formerly, when a sole trustee died, the property passed to his heir or devisee if it was realty, or to his personal representatives or legatee if it was personalty. This rule was altered in 1874 as regards bare trustees; and now (under s. 30 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881) when any sole trustee or mortgagee of real estate dies after the 31st December, 1881, the same shall, notwithstanding any testamentary disposition, devolve to his personal representatives as if it were a chattel real. When a new trustee was appointed in the place of the deceased, his real or personal representatives formerly had to convey the property to the new trustee by the same modes of conveyance (deed of grant, assignment, etc.) as those used in conveyances by absolute owners, and until that was done they held the property upon trust so to convey it, but they were not clothed with the office of trustee under the instrument creating the trust, unless it so provided, and therefore they could not exercise any of the powers conferred by the trust. Now, however, under s. 12 of the Trustee Act, 1893 (replacing s. 34 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881), the deed appointing a new trustee contains a declaration which vests the trust property in the new trustee or trustees, as joint tenants, as effectually as a conveyance formerly did. Trusteeship is also different from executorship. Therefore if a testator appoints A to be executor and trustee of his will, and A renounces the executorship, he remains trustee unless he executes a disclaimer of the office. See DISCLAIM; RENOUNCE.

Most instruments creating trusts contain a power of appointing new trustees: the power is generally vested either in the beneficiaries (cestui que trusts) or some of them, or in the trustees themselves, including the last survivor, and his executors or administrators. As regards any instrument executed after 28th August, 1860, under which there is no person having a power of appointing new trustees, and able and willing to act, a power of appointing new trustees to supply any vacancy by death, retirement, etc., was, by s. 27 of Lord Cranworth's Act (q.v.), vested in the surviving or continuing trustees or trustee or the acting executors or administrators of the last surviving or continuing trustee, or the last retiring trustee. These provisions were extended by the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 31; and that enactment has been replaced by s. 10 of the Trustee Act, 1893, which applies to trusts created either before or after 31st December, 1881. It therefore applies to trusts which were not within the provisions of s. 27 of Lord Cranworth's Act, by reason of their having been created before the 28th August, 1860. It contains the power and provisions which had usually been inserted before 1860 in any properly drawn will or deed creating a settlement. Under the Judicial Trustee Act, 1896, s. 1, a "judicial trustee" (q.v.), under the Public Trustee Act, 1906, s. 2 (1), the "Public Trustee," and (by force of Rule 30 of the Public Trustee Rules, 1912), any such body corporate as is mentioned in that rule may be new trustees of a settlement; the Public Trustee or such body corporate may be so appointed by anyone having power to appoint a private person as new trustee, but a judicial trustee can be appointed only by order of the Court. Bodies corporate can hold property in joint tenancy with an individual (Bodies Corporate (Joint Tenancy) Act, 1899): so also can the Public Trustee (Public Trustee Act, 1906, s. 2 (2)), but in practice he insists on having the sole management of the trust, as also indeed, do the companies which act as trustees.

As to the powers of the Court with regard to appointing new trustees and with regard to vesting orders upon such appointment and in other cases, see TRUSTEE ACTS.

In addition to the powers given to trustees by the instruments creating the trusts, powers have been conferred on them by statute, especially by s. 13 of the Trustee Act, 1893 (replacing s. 35 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, which itself had replaced s. 1 of Lord Cranworth's Act), giving trustees power in relation to the sale of real property. As to their statutory powers of investment, see INVESTMENT. The Trustee Act, 1893, s. 21 (which re-enacts s. 37 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881), empowers trustees to compound and compromise debts, claims, etc. Lord St. Leonards' Act, s. 31, gave trustees a statutory indemnity for losses not caused by their own acts or defaults, and a power to reimburse themselves for their expenses: it has been repealed by the Trustee Act, 1893, and is re-enacted by s. 24 of that Act. As to the power of trustees of wills to pay debts, and as to the power of trustees to apply to the Court for advice, see EXECUTOR.

If a trustee cannot safely administer a trust, he may take out an originating summons or institute an action to have it executed by the Court; and, in a proper case, the trustees or a majority of them may place the trust fund in the hands of the Court under s. 42 of the Trustee Act, 1893. If a trustee refuses or neglects to administer the trust, or is guilty of a breach of trust, or the like, any beneficiary may institute an action for the execution of the trust by the Court. (See ADMINISTRATION ACTION; EXECUTOR; DISCRETION.) The powers of trustees are suspended by the institution of a suit for the execution of the trusts, and they can only act with the sanction of the Court.

Except in cases of fraud or of trust property wrongfully retained or converted, a trustee may plead the Statutes of Limitation (Trustee Act, 1888, s. 8). Such fraud is punishable under the Larceny Act, 1916, s. 21.

Trustees are of two kinds, active and passive.

An active trustee is one who has to perform administrative duties, such as managing the trust property, receiving income and paying it over to the cestui que trusts, etc. The duties and liabilities of such trustees are of infinite variety; but it may be said generally that a trustee is bound to take the same care in acting for his cestui que trust as he would, if a prudent man, in acting for himself: and that he must not derive or attempt to derive any benefit from the trust, unless he is authorised to do so by the terms of the trust. See BREACH OF TRUST; DISCRETION; NEGLIGENCE.

A passive trustee is one in whom property is vested simply for the benefit of another person. In such a case the trustee is bound to convey the property to the cestui que trust, or to dispose of it as he may direct, when the time comes for the cestui que trust to deal with it, and in the meantime to hold it on his behalf.

When the duties of an active trustee have come to an end, or when the time for the cestui que trust to claim possession of the trust property has come, so that in either case the trustee is compellable to convey the property to the cestui que trust, or deal with it according to his directions, then the trustee is called a bare or dry trustee.

B. As to trustees acting on behalf of the public, or a section of the public, or a large body of persons. Such trustees, if they have any active duties to perform, are usually remunerated for their trouble, while ordinary trustees (supra) rarely are. An important example of this kind of trustee is the trustee in a bankruptcy. See TRUSTEE IN BANKRUPTCY.

When a company is intended to be formed, it is sometimes found convenient to appoint a person as "trustee on behalf of the intended company" to enter into contracts, etc., on behalf of the company, the trustee having no personal interest in them. The object generally is to enter into such arrangements for the purchase of property as may serve as a basis for the operations of the company, but so as not to be binding until the company is formed and adopts them. See FRAUD; PROMOTER; RATIFICATION.

When an issue of debentures is intended to be secured by a charge on property, trustees are frequently appointed on behalf of the holders of the bonds or stock to receive and administer the property or the income thereof for their benefit, subject to provisions contained in a document called a trust deed.

As to trustees of charities, see CHARITABLE TRUSTS ACTS; OFFICIAL TRUSTEE OF CHARITY LANDS; OFFICIAL TRUSTEE OF CHARITABLE FUNDS; SUCCESSION.

II. Trustee is also used in a wide and, perhaps, inaccurate sense to denote that a person has the duty of carrying out a transaction, in which he and another person are interested, in such manner as will be most for the benefit of the latter, and not in such a way that he himself might be tempted, for the sake of his personal advantage, to neglect the interests of the other. In this sense directors of companies are said to be trustees for the shareholders. The essential difference is, that a trustee owns the trust property and deals with it as principal, subject to his equitable obligation towards his cestui que trust, while a director is rather an agent with a limited authority; and, moreover, a director is not debarred from using for his own personal benefit knowledge which he has acquired as director.

Trustee Acts. These were the statutes 13 & 14 Vict. c. 60 and 15 & 16 Vict. c. 55, passed to enable the Court of Chancery (now the High Court of Justice, on petition presented in the Chancery Division) to appoint new trustees of a settlement, will or other instrument creating a trust, whenever a trustee's death, lunacy, conviction of felony, absence or refusal to act, or other reason, made it necessary to apply to the Court; in other words, when the power of appointing new trustees contained in the instrument, or provided by statute, could not be exercised. As regards these matters they are replaced by s. 25 of the Trustee Act, 1893, which also applies to the case of a bankrupt trustee. They also empowered the Court, where property was held upon trust by a lunatic or person of unsound mind or out of the jurisdiction of the Court, to transfer it by a vesting order (q.v.) to some other person, or to make an order appointing some person to execute a deed in the place of a trustee, so as to give it the same effect as if the trustee had executed it. The Trustee Act, 1893, ss. 26, 35, now give the Court power to make a vesting order where it has appointed a new trustee, or where the trustee is an infant or out of the jurisdiction of the Court or cannot be found, etc.; and the Lunacy Act, 1890, ss. 135-143 (as amended by the Lunacy Act, 1911, s. 1) gives the Court power to make such order in the case of a lunatic trustee. See VESTING ORDER.

"Trustee, As." See COVENANTS.

Trustee in Bankruptcy. A trustee in bankruptcy is a person in whom the property of a bankrupt is vested in trust for the creditors; his duty is to discover, realise and distribute it among the creditors, and for that purpose to examine the bankrupt's property, accounts, etc., to investigate proofs made by creditors, and to admit, reject, expunge or reduce them according to circumstances. (See PROOF.) He also has to keep various accounts of his dealings with the property, and of the course of the bankruptcy, which are audited by the committee of inspection and the Board of Trade (Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 92; Bankruptcy Rules, 1915, rr. 362, 364). Until a trustee is specially appointed in a bankruptcy, and during any vacancy in the office, the registrar having jurisdiction in the matter is ex officio trustee (Bankruptcy Act, 1912, ss. 74, 78 (4)). The appointment of the trustee is regulated by s. 19 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914.

Trustee Relief Acts. These were the statutes 10 & 11 Vict. c. 96 and 12 & 13 Vict. c. 74, which were repealed by s. 51 and are re-enacted by s. 42 of the Trustee Act, 1893.

Tubman. A junior barrister whose place in the old Court of Exchequer was by the tub anciently used as a measure of capacity in excise cases. Except in Crown business, he took precedence in motions of all juniors, except the postman (q.v.). Like the postman, he disappeared when the Court of Exchequer ceased to exist.

Tumbril. The cucking-stool (q.v.).

Tun. A cask containing four hogsheads (see the statute 1 Rich. 3, c. 12); a measure of timber containing forty cubic feet (see the statute 12 Car. 2, c. 14); twenty hundredweight of coals (see the statute 9 & 10 Will. 3, c. 13). None of these measures are now recognised by the law.

Tunnage. See TONNAGE.

Turbary. Common of turbary is the right of digging peat for fuel upon another man's ground.

Turkey Company. The Levant Company (q.v.).

Turn. Another form of Tourn (q.v.).

Turner's Act, Sir George. The popular title of the statute 13 & 14 Vict. c. 35: it related to the Court of Chancery.

Turnpike. Turnpike roads were roads the cost of maintaining which was defrayed out of tolls levied upon passengers; turnpikes were the gates across such roads, which were opened so as to allow the passage of those who had paid toll; and the Turnpike Acts was the title of a large number of enactments for legalising the turnpike system, which originated early in the eighteenth century and came to an end before the termination of the nineteenth century. For details, see Okes' Turnpike Laws (2nd ed.).

Turnpike roads were generally in the nature of by-roads. The highways (q.v.) were the great arterial roads.

Turpis causa. See EX TURPI CAUSA.

Turpis est pars quæ non convenit cum suo toto (Plow. 161). (A part [of a deed] which does not fit in with the rest is out of place); for EX ANTECEDENTIBUS, ETC. (q.v.), and a properly drawn deed should admit of such interpretation as will make the part consonant with the whole.

Tutius semper est errare acquietando quam in puniendo, ex parte misericordiæ quam ex parte justitiæ (2 H. P. C. 290). (It is always safer to err, at the instance of mercy rather than of justice.)

Twanight Geste. In Saxon times this meant a guest staying for a second night at the house of another. He, and not the host, was responsible for injuries inflicted by him on a third person. Compare THIRD NIGHT, ETC.

Twelfhinde. In Anglo-Saxon law this meant persons whose property was valued at twelve hundred shillings or upwards.

Twelfth Day. The Epiphany (q.v.).

Twelve-day Writ. The popular title for the writ issued in pursuance of Keating's Act (q.v.). The plaintiff was entitled to judgment unless the defendant within twelve days from service obtained leave to defend.

Twyhinde. In Anglo-Saxon law this meant those whose property was worth two hundred shillings but did not exceed twelve hundred shillings.

Tymborella. The tumbril (q.v.).

U

Uberrimæ fidei (Latin = "of the fullest confidence"): A contract is said to be uberrimæ fidei when the promisee is bound to communicate to the promisor every fact and circumstance which may influence him in deciding to enter into the contract or not. Thus a policy of marine insurance is a contract uberrimæ fidei. (See INSURANCE.) And a barrister moving the Court ex parte is under a strict obligation of uberrima fides.

Ubi aliquid conceditur, conceditur et id sine quo res ipsa esse non potest. (Where anything is granted, that is also granted without which the thing itself is not able to exist.) This is merely another version of CUICUNQUE, ETC. (q.v.)

Ubi cessat remedium ordinarium ibi decurritur ad extraordinarium (4 Rep. 93). (When the ordinary remedy fails, then recourse is had to the extraordinary remedy.) But this maxim is not law. It was quoted in support of the contention that where the action of debt —which was an ordinary remedy—and an action on the case—which was an extraordinary remedy—both lay, then the plaintiff could bring only the action of debt; but the King's Bench held that the plaintiff could avail himself of whichever of the remedies he chose.

Ubi damna dantur, victus victori in expensis condemnari debet (2 Inst. 289). (Where damages are given, the losing party ought to pay the costs of the victor.) This maxim is taken from the Roman law (C. 3, 1. 13). Quoted by Coke in his commentary on the Statute of Gloucester, c. 1, which made costs payable to anyone recovering damages.

Ubi eadem ratio ibi idem jus (Co. Litt. 191, 232). (Like reasons make like law.) Compare DE SIMILIBUS, ETC.

Ubi jus ibi remedium. (Where there is a right, there is a remedy.) This is a maxim analogous to Lex semper dabit, etc. Compare DAMNUM SINE INJURIA, ETC.

Ubi lex aliquem cogit ostendere causam necesse est quod causa sit justa et legitima (2 Inst. 269). (Where the law compels a man to show cause, it is incumbent that the cause be just and lawful.) This is an obvious truism.

Ubi lex non distinguit, nec nos distinguere debemus (7 Rep. 5). (We ought not to distinguish where the law does not do so.) Coke cites the maxim as a warning against dividing allegiance into kinds other than those recognised by the law. Compare NEMINEM OPORTET, ETC.

Ubi non est principalis non potest esse accessorius (4 Rep. 43). (Where there is no principal, there cannot be an accessory.) Quoted by the King's Bench in support of their decision that if a principal were pardoned or "had his clergy," then no person could be arraigned as his accessory. But see ACCESSORY.

Ubi nullum matrimonium, ibi nulla dos est (Co. Litt. 32). (Where there is no marriage there is no dower.) And so, says Coke, the right to dower goes when there is a divorce a vinculo.

Ubi quid generaliter conceditur inest hæc exceptio si non aliquid sit contra jus fasque (11 Rep. 78*b*). (Where a grant is in general terms there is always an implied provision that it shall not include anything which is unlawful or immoral.)

Ubi verba conjuncta non sunt, sufficit alterutrum esse factum (D. 50, 17, 110). (Where alternative conditions are imposed it is sufficient if one or the other of them be complied with.) Compare IN DISJUNCTIVES, ETC.

Ulna ferrea. The standard ell, made of iron, which was formerly kept in the Exchequer.

Ulnage; Ulnager. Forms of alnage and alnager (q.v.) respectively.

Ultimatum. In diplomacy this means a demand the refusal to comply with which will be immediately followed by war with the nation which refuses.

Ultima voluntas testatoris est perimplenda secundum veram intentionem suam (Co. Litt. 322). (Effect is to be given to the last will of a testator according to his true intention.) Compare MENS TESTATORIS, ETC.; BENIGNÆ, ETC.

Ultimogeniture. A suggested modern synonym for borough-English (q.v.).

Ultra vires, in the law of corporations, is used in two senses.

I. A contract or similar act is said to be ultra vires (that is to say, outside the powers) of a corporation when it purports to be entered into or done in pursuance of the powers conferred on the corporation, but is really beyond them. Thus, if a company is incorporated for the purpose of constructing a railway, it cannot, under the powers thereby conferred on it, construct a harbour, and any act done in the name of the company with that object is wholly void, even if sanctioned by all the members of the company: à fortiori, therefore, a majority of the shareholders cannot bind a dissentient minority by any such act. But the doctrine does not apply to those things which are fairly incidental to what the company is empowered to do, although they may not be expressly authorised.

The term "ultra vires" is used in another sense to signify that a certain act is not void as being beyond the powers of the corporation, but that it is not binding on the members who dissent from it because it is contrary to some provision, express or implied, for the protection of the shareholders; on this principle, if a company, being possessed of funds appropriated for a certain purpose, applied them to another purpose within their general powers, that appropriation would be ultra vires and only binding on the shareholders who consented to it.

II. "Ultra vires" is also sometimes applied to an act which, though within the powers of a corporation, is not binding on it because the consent or agreement of the corporation has not been given in the manner required by its constitution. Thus where a company delegates certain powers to its directors, all acts done by the directors beyond the scope of those powers are ultra vires, and not binding on the company, unless it subsequently ratifies them. An act which is ultra vires in the primary sense of the word is incapable of ratification.

Where a corporation acts ultra vires the remedy for a member is injunction; for a stranger who has suffered injury the like remedy is available; and the Attorney-General can always take proceedings, even though no person has suffered injury.

Umpirage. The performance of the duties of an umpire: also used formerly as a synonym for arbitration.

Umpire. When there is a reference by consent out of Court to two arbitrators, they have, under s. 2 and Sch. I. of the Arbitration Act, 1889, power (unless the submission otherwise provides) to appoint an umpire, that is to say, a person who is to make the award if the arbitrators cannot agree.

Una cum omnibus aliis. (Along with all the other things.) A form used in the granting part of old conveyances to add something to what has been already described.

Unborn Persons. See IN VENTRE SA MÈRE; PERPETUITY.

Uncertainty. In the law of wills, the general rule is that where a testator has so expressed himself that it is impossible to ascertain what his intention was, the gift or provision so made is void for uncertainty. Thus, a will consisting merely of these words, "I leave and bequeath to all my grandchildren, and share and share alike," is too uncertain to be operative, although it may be conjectured that the word "all" was meant to precede the word "to."

In pleading, the general rule is that whatever is alleged must be alleged with certainty. An allegation suffering from the defect of uncertainty is liable to be struck out as embarrassing under Ord. 19, r. 27.

Unconscionable Bargain. See CATCHING BARGAIN.

Uncore prist. (Still ready.) Where the defence to an action was that the money had been tendered on the day that it became due, the defendant formerly pleaded uncore prist and brought the money into Court. Compare SEMPER PARATUS.

Unde nihil habet. See DOWER, WRIT OF.

Underlease; Underlessor; Underlessee. An underlease is a lease granted by a lessee or tenant for years; in speaking with reference to the underlease he is called the underlessor, and the person to whom the underlease is granted is called the underlessee. As the underlessee is not liable to the original lessor on the covenants, etc., of the original lease, a mortgage of leaseholds is generally made by underlease, and not by assignment. See MORTGAGE.

Another common instance of an underlease is where land is let on building lease, and the lessee grants underleases of the houses erected by him. See RENT.

On forfeiture of the original lease, an underlease was formerly determined; but now, under s. 4 of the Conveyancing Act, 1892, the Court may in such a case make an order vesting in the underlessee the premises comprised in the underlease for any term not exceeding the term of the underlease upon such conditions as to payment of rent, etc., as the Court may deem fit.

See ASSIGNMENT; LEASE; FORFEITURE.

Undertaking.—I. In the primary sense of the word, an undertaking is a promise. In the old books "undertaker" means a promisor.

"Undertaking" is frequently used in the special sense of a promise given in the course of legal proceedings by a party or his counsel, generally as a condition to obtaining some concession from the Court or the opposite party. Thus, where an interim or ex parte injunction is granted, the Court generally requires the plaintiff to give an undertaking as to damages; that is, he must undertake that if it should subsequently turn out that he was not entitled to the injunction, and that its operation has caused injury to the defendant, he will pay to the defendant damages for the injury so sustained.

So, if an application is made for an injunction, and the defendant asks that it may be adjourned, he is generally required to give an undertaking not to commit the acts complained of in the meantime; if it is a question of infringement of a patent or the like, he sometimes undertakes to keep an account of all articles made or sold by him during the period of the adjournment.

An undertaking may be enforced by attachment, or otherwise, in the same manner as an injunction.

An undertaking to appear in an action is a promise by a solicitor that he will enter an appearance for his client; such an undertaking is given when a solicitor accepts service of a writ of summons in order to save his client the annoyance of personal service. (See SERVICE.) It is enforceable by attachment (Ord. 12, r. 18).

II. In the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, and similar Acts, applying to companies incorporated for the construction of railways, docks and similar works, "undertaking" means the works or undertaking, of whatever nature, which are authorised by the special Act incorporating the particular company. The question what is included in the "undertaking" of a company principally arises in cases where a company has created a mortgage or charge on its undertaking to secure debentures, or the like. The wording of the instrument creating the charge will determine whether the charge operates only on such property as was in existence at the date of its execution or whether it operates on all the property and revenues of the company, as a going concern, at the time when the security requires to be enforced. See DEBENTURE; SECURITY.

Under-Treasurer of England. This officer, who is mentioned in the statute 39 Eliz. c. 7, was the principal assistant of the Treasurer, and acted in that office when a vacancy occurred. See TREASURY.

Underwriter is a person who joins with others in entering into a marine policy of insurance as insurer. Except where an insurance is effected with a company, a policy of marine insurance is generally entered into by a number of persons, each of whom makes himself liable for a certain sum, so as to divide the risk; they subscribe or underwrite the policy in lines one under the another, and hence to subscribe a policy is sometimes called "taking a line." Policies are usually effected through brokers. See INSURANCE; POLICY; ADJUSTMENT.

Undeveloped Land Duty. See LAND VALUES DUTIES.

Undischarged Bankrupt. See BANKRUPT; DISCHARGE. As to the protection of persons who acquire property from an undischarged bankrupt bona fide and for value, even with notice of his bankruptcy, see s. 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914; as to transactions without notice, see PROTECTED TRANSACTIONS; and as to various offences by an undischarged bankrupt, see ss. 154, 155 of the same Act.

Undres. Used by Fleta as meaning persons not yet of the age to bear arms.

Undue Influence. The equitable doctrine of undue influence is that where a person enters into an agreement or makes a disposition of property under such circumstances as to show or give rise to the presumption that he has not been allowed to exercise a free and deliberate judgment on the matter, the Court will set it aside. Such a presumption chiefly arises in cases where the parties stand in a relation implying mutual confidence; e.g., parent and child, guardian and ward, trustee and cestui que trust, legal adviser and client; but it may be rebutted by showing that the transaction was in fact reasonable and entered into in good faith.

Where a person is induced to execute a will by undue influence, it is liable to be invalidated, or at least so far as the undue influence extends. Such cases chiefly arise where a testator is in feeble health, bodily or mentally, and therefore liable to be influenced by those near him. The burden of proving undue influence is always on the party alleging it.

Undue influence at parliamentary, municipal and local government elections is where anyone interferes with the free exercise of a voter's franchise, by violence, intimidation or otherwise. It is a misdemeanour. See CORRUPT PRACTICES.

Unemployed Workmen Act, 1905. This Act (which was of temporary duration but which has been continued by various Expiring Laws Continuance Acts) is that under which Distress Committees (q.v.) and the Central Body (q.v.) are constituted.

Uniformity, Acts of. These are the statutes popularly known as the Book of Common Prayer Act, 1548, the Uniformity of Common Prayer, etc., Act, 1551-2, the Act of Uniformity, 1558-9, and the Book of Common Prayer Act of Uniformity, 1662. They are the statutes 2 & 3 Edw. 6, c. 1; 5 & 6 Edw. 6, c. 1; 1 Eliz. c. 2; and 14 Car. 2, c. 4.

The first of them (s. 2) makes it compulsory to use the Prayer Book (q.v.) in all churches and makes clergymen liable to various punishments (running up to imprisonment for life in the case of a third offence) who use any service not found in the Book. See PRAYER BOOK.

Uniformity of Process Act. The statute 2 Will. 4, c. 39. See BILL OF MIDDLESEX; QUO MINUS.

Union. In the poor law, this means "any parish or union of parishes in which there is a separate Board of Guardians" (Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 16).

In ecclesiastical law, a union consists of two or more benefices which have been united into one benefice. Such a union may be made under the Pluralities Act, 1838, passed "to abridge the holding of benefices in plurality," and amended by the Pluralities Act, 1850; and under the Union of Benefices Act, 1860 (passed in substitution for the statute 18 & 19 Vict. c. 127, "to make better provision for the union of contiguous benefices in cities, towns and boroughs," and amended by the Union of Benefices Act Amendment Act, 1871), or under the Union of Benefices Act, 1919.

As to the union of parishes, see PARISH.

Unite. See SILVER COINS.

Unity of Interest is applied to joint tenants, to signify that no one of them can have a greater interest in the property than each of the others, while, in the case of tenants in common, one of them may have a larger share than any of the others. See UNITY OF POSSESSION.

Unity of Possession, in the proper sense of the word, is where a piece of land which is subject to an easement, profit à prender, rent, or similar right, comes into the possession of the person entitled to the easement or other right. At the present day, "unity of possession" is applied only to cases where the possession is temporary: as where the owner of land subject to an easement takes a lease of the dominant tenement, so that the easement is suspended by unity of possession during the lease; or where the owner of a rent disseises the tenant of the land, out of which it issues, so that the rent is suspended by unity of possession. In the old books, "unity of possession" has a wider sense, and includes what is now more commonly called "unity of seisin" (q.v.).

As applied to joint tenants, tenants in common, etc., "unity of possession" is sometimes used to signify that they have an undivided possession. This use of the term seems to have been invented by Blackstone.

See JOINT TENANCY; TENANCY IN COMMON; PRIVITY.

Unity of Seisin is where a person seised of land which is subject to an easement, profit à prendre, or similar right, also becomes seised of the land to which the easement or other right is annexed. The term is usually applied to cases where the seisin is that of a tenant in fee simple, and is equally high or "perdurable" in both pieces of land, so that the easement or other right is extinguished by the unity of seisin: as where a tenant in fee simple of land, subject to an easement, acquires an estate in fee simple in the dominant tenement. But if one piece of land is held by a conditional or determinable estate, then the unity of seisin is insufficient to work an extinguishment. See UNITY OF POSSESSION.

Unity of Time is applied to joint tenants, to signify that the estate of each of them must arise at the same time: that is, one cannot take his share first, and then another come in after him. This rule, however, does not apply to estates created under the Statute of Uses, or by will. See UNITY OF INTEREST; UNITY OF POSSESSION.

Unity of Title is applied to joint tenants, to signify that they hold their property by one and the same title, while tenants in common may take property by several titles. See UNITY OF INTEREST; UNITY OF POSSESSION.

University Courts. The Universities of Oxford and Cambridge from a very early date exercised, through the courts of their chancellors, a jurisdiction both civil and criminal, the jurisdiction being derived partly from numerous royal charters, which were confirmed by the statute 13 Eliz. c. 29, and partly, in the case of Cambridge, from the Bishops of Ely, and, in the case of Oxford, from the Bishops of Lincoln.

The Chancellor's Court of the University of Cambridge has fallen into abeyance, except as regards disciplinary matters, since the enactment of the Cambridge Award Act, 1856, 19 & 20 Vict. c. xvii., which by s. 18 excludes from its jurisdiction all actions to which any person not a member of the University is a party and all criminal proceedings against any such person.

The Chancellor's Court of the University of Oxford is still active. Its ecclesiastical jurisdiction is obsolete; its functions in connection with probate were abolished by the Oxford University Act, 1860, s. 2; there is doubt as to whether it can exercise now the criminal jurisdiction which it formerly had in all cases (except treason, felony or mayhem, as to which see HIGH STEWARD), arising within the area of its jurisdiction, in which a resident member of the university was either prosecutor or defendant; but its civil jurisdiction is still exercised. That jurisdiction is exclusive, it extends to all forms of action (other than actions relating to freehold) no matter what amount may be involved, and it extends to all parts of England. Thus in 1886 it was held that the court had exclusive jurisdiction in an action for libel, where the alleged libel was published in London by a member of the university, and the plaintiff had never been in any way connected with the university or the city of Oxford. The vice-chancellor or commissary of the university or his deputy presides over the court, which is held once a week. The deputy must now be a barrister of five years' standing. Procedure is regulated by the Rules of the Vice-Chancellor's Court of the University of Oxford (see S. R. and O., Rev., Vol. VI., Inferior Courts (England)).

Unlawful. "Unlawful" and "illegal" are frequently used as synonymous terms, but in the proper sense of the word, "unlawful," as applied to promises, agreements, considerations and the like, denotes that they are ineffectual in law because they involve acts which, although not illegal (that is to say, positively forbidden), are disapproved of by the law, and are therefore not recognised as the ground of legal rights, either because they are immoral (q.v.), or because they are against public policy. (See POLICY.) It is on this ground that contracts in restraint of marriage or of trade are generally void. As a general rule, an unlawful agreement cannot be enforced, or set aside, nor can money paid or property delivered under it be recovered back: potior est conditio defendentis (q.v.).

Unlawful Assembly. See ASSEMBLY.

Unliquidated is that which is not ascertained. See DAMAGES; JUDGMENT; LIQUIDATED; WRIT OF SUMMONS.

Unnatural Crimes. The same as abominable (q.v.) crime.

Unques prist. (Still ready.) The same as UNCORE PRIST (q.v.).

Unseaworthy. See SEAWORTHINESS.

Urari. A drug producing immobility, but not insensibility. It is not an anæsthetic for the purposes of the Cruelty to Animals Act, 1876, s. 5.

Urban Sanitary Authorities. See SANITARY AUTHORITIES.

Ure means operation or effect. To put in ure, therefore, is to put in operation. See ENURE.

Urgency Order. This is a means, under the Lunacy Act, 1890, s. 11, by which a person not being a pauper can be provisionally detained for seven days as a lunatic, in order to secure his own welfare or the safety of others. It is signed by a relative and must be supported by one medical certificate (ib.). See RECEPTION ORDER; SUMMARY RECEPTION ORDER.

Usage is a uniformity of conduct on the part of two or more persons in respect to certain matters of common interest. Hence Coke says, in speaking of custom and prescription,

" as for usage, that is the efficient cause or rather the life of both; for custom and prescription lose their being, if usage fail " (Co. Cop. § 33). See CUSTOM; PRESCRIPTION.

Usance signifies the time in which all bills of exchange between this country and a foreign country were formerly payable. The time varied for different countries. Thus, a usance between this country and Venice being three calendar months, a bill drawn on Venice at two usances and dated the 1st January, would fall due on the 1st July, subject to the allowance of days of grace. The practice of drawing bills at usances is quite obsolete, the same result being attained by specifying the time for which the bill is to run, but the term " usance " is still employed to signify the period for which bills on a foreign country are by the practice of merchants almost invariably drawn.

Use. There are two words " use " in law, which though spelled alike are etymologically and historically distinct. It is of importance to distinguish clearly between them.

I. In law, as in ordinary language, " use " denotes the act of employing a thing: thus, to cultivate land, to read a book, to inhabit a house, is to use those things. The word in this sense is derived from the Latin usus (use).

In the case of corporeal things, use is one of the modes of exercising ownership. (See OWNERSHIP; USE AND OCCUPATION.) In the case of incorporeal things, use is a mode of acquiring and retaining certain rights. (See ENJOYMENT.) Thus, if A publicly makes use of his name or some peculiar word or token (not being a trade-mark in the strict sense) in connection with his trade or occupation, he acquires the right to prevent other persons from using that name, word or token in such a way as to induce the public to believe that their business is carried on by A, and loses that right so soon as he discontinues the use. In the case of trade-marks, registration is substituted for public user as a mode of acquiring title. See TRADE-MARK; PUBLICI JURIS.

II. Use, as the word is employed in conveyancing, is derived from the Norman-French oes, which itself was derived from the Latin opus (benefit). The word, in fact, literally means " benefit "; thus, in an ordinary assignment of chattels the assignor transfers the property to the assignee for his " absolute use and benefit." In the expressions " separate use," " superstitious use," and " charitable use " (q.v.), use has the same meaning. More often, however, " use " has a technical meaning which can only be explained historically.

Before the year 1536, if one man (A) conveyed land by feoffment (then almost the only mode of conveyance) to another (B), with the intention, express or implied, that B should not hold it for his own benefit, but for the benefit of a third person (C), or of A himself, then B was said to hold the land " to the use," that is, for the benefit, of C or A. In the Courts of common law the feoffee to uses (B) was looked upon as the owner of the land for almost all purposes, the seisin or legal estate being in him. In the Court of Chancery, on the other hand, he was looked upon as merely the nominal owner; he was bound to allow the cestui que use (C) to have the profits and benefit of the land and to deal with it as he pleased. C was therefore the equitable or beneficial owner of the land. The " use " or beneficial ownership was treated like an estate, and descended on the intestacy of the cestui que use to his heir in the same way as the land would have done. A use was also devisable by will, although the land was not.

The effect of a conveyance to uses was twofold. First, it enabled interests in land to be created and transferred with a flexibility and secrecy unknown to the common law: this effect of uses still exists (infra). Secondly, it enabled the owners of land to evade certain inconvenient incidents of common law ownership, especially escheats, forfeitures and other feudal obligations. After several attempts to prevent these effects by various Acts of Parliament, the statute known as the Statute of Uses was passed (27 Hen. 8, c. 10). This statute in effect enacts that where any person is seised of any lands or other hereditaments to the use, confidence or trust of another, the latter shall be in lawful seisin, estate and possession of the lands for the same estate as he had in the use, and that the estate of the feoffee to uses shall be deemed to be in the cestui que use. The effect of this Act was to convert uses into possession, or to make the cestui que use legal instead of equitable owner. The result is that if, since the passing of this statute, land is conveyed to A and his heirs to the use of B and his heirs, so that A acquires the seisin of the land, then the statute is said to execute the use by turning it into a legal estate; the seisin passes out of A and vests in B, who thus becomes legal owner of the land in fee simple. See SCINTILLA JURIS.

All estates which before the statute would have been good in equity and to which the statute applies are, since the statute, good estates in law.

It will be observed that the statute only applies to cases where one person is seised of land or other hereditaments to the use of another. If, therefore, A is possessed of a term of years or a chattel, or is in quasi-seisin of copyhold land (all of which are incapable of true seisin), to the use of B, the statute does not execute this use, and the legal estate remains in A. The statute also does not execute a second use, or a "use upon a use," nor does it execute active uses, or uses which impose some active duty on the grantee. If, therefore, land is conveyed to A to the use of B to the use of C (which is a use upon a use), only the first use is executed. B becomes seised of the land in accordance with the statute, but he holds it to the use of C as if the statute had never been passed. Again, if land is conveyed to A to the use (or upon trust) to pay over the rents and profits to B, this use is not executed, and therefore the legal estate remains in A.

Hence uses are of two kinds, uses at common law, or those which remain unaffected by the statute, and uses which operate under the statute.

A. Uses at common law include (a) all uses of leasehold and copyhold land and chattels, and (b) uses of freehold land or other hereditaments which are not executed by the statute because they are either "uses on uses" or active uses. A use at common law is now seldom created under that name, almost the only instance being where a copyhold tenant surrenders his land to the lord to the use of some other person; here the lord is merely a trustee or instrument for carrying the intended alienation into effect. When lands or chattels are conveyed to a person to be held by him for the benefit of another, the word "trust" is now always used. See TRUST.

B. Uses which operate under the statute are those declared of land held by a freehold tenure for an estate of freehold, or of rents, services and most other hereditaments, except those (such as easements and profits à prendre) of which the enjoyment is inseparable from the possession. They are of the following kinds:

(1) Expressed or implied. If A conveys land to B and his heirs to the use of C for life, without more, then the land vests in C for an estate for life, and the reversion in fee after C's estate results or returns to A, because it is not otherwise disposed of. Here the use to B is an express use, and the use to A is an implied or resulting use.

(2) Executed or executory. An executed use is one which takes effect immediately, as where land is conveyed to A and his heirs to the use of B and his heirs. An executory use is one which is to take effect at some future time. Executory uses are of four kinds. (a) A springing use is one which is limited so as to commence in futuro, independently of any preceding estate; as where land is conveyed to A and his heirs to the use of B and his heirs from to-morrow or on the death of C. Such a use does not take effect in derogation of any estate except that which results to the grantor or remains in him in the meantime. (b) A shifting or secondary use is one which is limited so as to shift from one person to another on the happening of a given event; in other words, such a use takes effect in derogation of a preceding use; as where land is conveyed to A and his heirs to the use of B and his heirs, with a proviso that when C returns from Rome the land shall be to the use of C and his heirs. (See EXECUTORY INTERESTS; LIMITATION.) (c) Uses which are limited or declared under powers. (See POWER.) (d) Future or contingent uses, being those which are limited to take effect as remainders: thus, if land is conveyed to A and his heirs to the use of B (a bachelor) for life, and after his death to his eldest son, this is a contingent use.

At common law, a person could not make any conveyance to himself, so that if A wished to convey property to himself and B jointly, he was obliged to make a conveyance to some third person, C, and then C made a re-conveyance to A and B jointly. The Statute of Uses made it possible to evade this rule in the case of freehold estates in land, because if A, the owner of land, conveyed it to C, to the use of A and B and their heirs, the statute executed the use, and at once vested the land in A and B for a joint estate in fee simple. The same method is availible if A wishes to convey land to B in fee simple, reserving to himself a life estate, or if A wishes to convey land to his wife. As the Statute of Uses does not apply to leaseholds or other chattels, it became necessary to pass s. 21 of the Law of Property Amendment Act, 1859, enabling any person to assign personal property to himself jointly with another. In conveyances executed after the 31st December, 1881, freehold land, or a thing in action, may be conveyed by a person to himself jointly with another person, by the like means by which it might be conveyed by him to another person, and may be similarly conveyed by a husband to his wife, and by a wife to her husband, alone or jointly with another person (Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 50).

Formerly a thing could not be granted by way of use if the enjoyment of it was inseparable from the possession, such as annuities, ways, commons and authorities. Hence, where land was sold subject to an express reservation or exception of such rights, privileges or easements, the object had to be attained either by a re-grant, or by a declaration that the land should remain to such uses as should give full effect to the reservation or exception, and (subject thereto) to the uses declared to vest the land in the purchaser. In conveyances made after 31st December, 1881, a limitation of freehold land to the use that a person may have an easement, right, liberty, or privilege over the land operates to vest in possession in that person the easement, etc., so limited to him (Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 62).

As to deeds to lead and declare uses, and generally as to conveyances operating under the statute, see CONVEYANCE.

Use and Occupation. A claim for use and occupation arises where a person has used and occupied the land of another with his permission but without any actual lease or agreement for a lease at a fixed rent (Distress for Rent Act, 1737, s. 14). It is sometimes said that the claim is one for damages, but this is hardly correct, for permissive occupation is not a wrongful act; the claim is really based on an implied or tacit contract to pay for the use of the land. The action does not lie against a mere wrongdoer or trespasser.

User is the same thing as "use" in the ordinary sense of the word. See USE.

User de action. This anciently meant the bringing of an action in the proper venue (q.v.).

Uses to Bar Dower. When a conveyance of land was made to a person who was married to his present wife on or before the 1st January, 1834, and he wished to prevent her right to dower from attaching to the land, it was conveyed to the following uses: (1) to such uses as the purchaser should appoint; (2) in default of appointment to the use of him and his assigns during his life; (3) in the event of the determination of that estate by forfeiture or otherwise in his lifetime, to the use of a trustee during the life of the purchaser in trust for him, with (4) an ultimate limitation to his heirs and assigns for ever. By this means the purchaser had a full power of alienation without having a greater estate in possession than an estate for life, to which the wife's dower did not attach, and the intermediate estate of the trustee prevented the remainder in fee simple from vesting in the purchaser in possession (and so becoming liable to dower) by any accidental merger of the life estate. See DOWER.

Usher. An official appointed to keep silence and order in a Court.

The full title of Black Rod (q.v.) is the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod.

The Usher of the White Rod or Principal Usher for Scotland is connected with England to the extent only that he is entitled to be present at a coronation. Under the Walker Trust Act, 1877, 40 & 41 Vict. c. viii. (not printed), the office (which is hereditary) is vested in trustees under that Act; and when occasion arises a deputy is appointed by the sovereign.

Usucapio constituta est ut aliquis litium finis esset. (Usucaption was instituted in order that there might be some end put to legal proceedings.) The Roman "usucaption" was ownership resulting from prolonged possession.

Usura maritima. The same as fœnus nauticum (q.v.).

Usurpation. In the law of real property, usurpation is where a subject uses a royal franchise without lawful warrant.

In ecclesiastical law, when a stranger who has no right presents to a church, and his clerk is admitted and instituted, he is said to be a usurper, and the wrongful act which he has done is called a usurpation. To recover his presentment and possession of the advowson, the patron must bring his action within six months from the induction of the usurper's presentee (Statute Westminster II., 13 Edw. 1, c. 5). Compare NE ADMITTAS; QUARE IMPEDIT.

Usury. Originally usury had the same meaning as interest has at the present day, viz., a periodical payment in consideration of a loan. "Purchases, estates and contracts may be avoided," says Coke, " . . . by certain Acts of Parliament against usurie above ten in the hundred." Many attempts were made to evade these statutes by making the interest payable in the form of rents, annuities, etc., and in such cases the question was whether the stipulated payment was bona fide a rent or annuity, etc., or whether it was usury and the contract a usurious one within the statute. Hence "usury" acquired the sense of interest above the rate allowed by those Acts of Parliament, and the Acts making all such usurious contracts void became known as the Usury Laws. They were repealed by the Usury Laws Repeal Act, 1854; but the Moneylenders (q.v.) Act, 1900, has given the Courts certain powers with regard to oppressive rates of interest (q.v.).

Utas. Octave (q.v.): see Les estatuz del Eschekere where "la chise Pasche" is translated as "The Utas of Easter."

Utfangtheft. The same as outfangtheft (q.v.).

Utile per inutile non vitiatur (Co. Litt. 227). (That which is useful is not marred by that which is useless.) Compare SUPERFLUA, ETC.

Uti possedetis. Literally, "as you possess." The rule known as uti possedetis is that under which all property, whether moveable or immoveable, not specially provided for in the treaty terminating a war is to remain in the hands of the belligerent who happened to have possession of it when hostilities ceased.

Utlagato capiendo quando utlagatur in uno comitatu et postea fugit in alium, De. A writ which anciently lay, in the words of its title, "to take an outlaw when he is outlawed in one county and afterwards flies into another county."

Utlary. The same as outlawry. It is a form of the Norman French, utlagarie, which itself was derived from the Anglo-Saxon, ûtlaga. See OUTLAW.

Utlepe. Used by Fleta as meaning the escape of a felon from prison.

Ut pœna ad paucos, metus ad omnes perveniat (Grounds of Law, 515). (Though few are punished, the fear of punishment affects all.) Compare IMPUNITAS, ETC.

Ut res magis valeat quam pereat (Noy, Max. 50). (It is better for a thing to have effect than to be made void.) This is a free translation of part of BENIGNÆ, ETC. (q.v.).

Utrum. See ASSISA DE UTRUM.

Utter. In criminal law, to utter a forged document, die or seal, etc., or counterfeit coin, is to pass or attempt to pass it off as genuine when it is known to be forged. Uttering a forged document, seal or die is in general the same offence as that of forging the same document (Forgery Act, 1913, s. 6). Uttering counterfeit money (knowing it to be counterfeit) is a misdemeanour under the Coinage Offences Act, 1861.

Utter Barristers. See BARRISTER.

Uxor non est sui juris sed sub potestate viri (Grounds of Law, 516). (A wife is not sui juris (q.v.), but is under the government of her husband.) Compare OMNIA QUAE SUNT, ETC.

V

"V." See BRANDING.

V.A. See VICTORIA AND ALBERT, ETC.

Vacantia bona. See BONA VACANTIA.

Vacant Possession. See POSSESSION; SERVICE.

Vacarius, commonly called Magister Vacarius, was a Lombard by birth. He introduced the study of Roman law into England and gave lectures on that subject at Oxford from 1149 to 1170. He compiled for the use of his students, a digest of Justinian which was popularly known as the Liber pauperum: an almost complete copy of this manuscript is preserved at Worcester.

Vacation.—I. The vacations are the periods of the year during which the Courts and chambers of the Supreme Court of Judicature are closed for ordinary business. There are, however, certain kinds of business which may be transacted during vacation (e.g., applications for injunctions, for extension of time, etc.); and for this purpose two vacation judges and a staff of officials attend in Court periodically during the vacations (Ord. 63, r. 11). Provision is made by Ord. 63, r. 4 (2) (3), for the trial or hearing during the Long Vacation of urgent causes, actions or matters in the King's Bench Division.

The vacations are four, namely, the Easter Vacation, commencing on Good Friday and ending on Easter Tuesday; the Whitsun Vacation, commencing on the Saturday before Whit Sunday and ending on the Tuesday after; the Long Vacation, commencing on the 1st August and ending on the 11th October; and the Christmas Vacation, commencing on the 24th December and ending on the 6th January (Ord. 63, r. 4). See SITTINGS; TERM.

II. Vacation also signifies, in ecclesiastical law, that a church or benefice is vacant; e.g., on the death or resignation of the incumbent, until his successor is appointed. See PLENARTY; SEQUESTRATION.

Vaccination. This process (which consists in inoculation with the virus of cow-pox as a preventative of small-pox) has been compulsory in England since the enactment of the statute 16 & 17 Vict. c. 100. The enactments now in force are the Vaccination Acts, 1867 to 1907. Under the Vaccination Acts, 1898 and 1907, the person having lawful custody of an infant is not liable to any penalty for failure to have the infant vaccinated if he makes a statutory declaration that he believes vaccination to be prejudicial to the health of the child.

Vadium. A pledge or security: the word is not used in our law.

Vadium mortuum; Vadium vivum. See MORTGAGE.

Vagabonds; Vagrancy. The provisions of the law with respect to vagrancy are directed against (i) "idle and disorderly persons," e.g., persons who refuse to work, unlicensed pedlars, beggars, etc.; (ii) "rogues and vagabonds," e.g., fortune-tellers, persons lodging in deserted buildings or the open air without visible means of subsistance, sellers of obscene prints, etc.; (iii) "incorrigible rogues," e.g., persons twice convicted of being rogues and vagabonds, persons who escape from imprisonment as rogues and vagabonds, etc. These offences are punishable with imprisonment, and (in some cases) with whipping (Vagrancy Act, 1824).

The sellers of obscene prints, etc., amenable under the Act of 1824, are those who trade in a public place; the Vagrancy Act, 1838, put on the same footing those who exposed their wares in shop windows.

The Vagrant Act Amendment Act, 1873, provides that those gaming or betting in a public street shall be deemed rogues and vagabonds. The Vagrancy Act, 1898, contains a similar provision with regard to men or women persistently soliciting in public places for immoral purposes and with regard to men living on the earnings of prostitution. The Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1912, s. 7 (1), extends and amends the provisions of s. 1 (3) of the Act of 1898 as to the state of facts in which a man will be presumed to live upon the earnings of prostitution, unless he satisfies the Court to the contrary effect; and it further provides (s. 7 (4)) that a female who makes money out of the prostitution of another female can be dealt with as a rogue and a vagabond.

Vagabonds, Statute of. The popular title of the statute 1 Edw. 6, c. 3. See BRANDING.

Valor beneficiorum. See TENTHS.

Valor ecclesiasticus. A record of the whole of the property held by the Church in England, made in 1535 by a commission appointed by Henry VIII. pursuant to the statute 26 Hen. 8, c. 3. It has been printed in six folio volumes (1810-1834) as part of the Record Commission Series. The Valor was prepared for the purpose of enabling the Crown to collect the annates effectively (q.v.): and it was also most useful when the property of the monasteries came to be confiscated. The MS. of the Valor is defective: for instance, those parts relating to the whole diocese of Ely and to the counties of Berks, Rutland and Northumberland, and to much of the diocese of London, are missing. But along with the Valor is preserved another contemporary MS., entitled the Liber valorum, which covers the whole of England, though with less full details; and the blanks in the Valor have been filled in from the Liber, as far as may be.

Valore maritagii, De. See VALUE OF MARRIAGE.

Valuable Consideration. See CONSIDERATION; VALUE.

Valuation. As to valuation for rates and taxes, see ASSESSMENT; RATE.

As to valuation of securities in administrative proceedings, see CREDITOR.

Valuation and Appraisement. An appraiser is any person who values any description of property for, or in expectation of, any hire, gain, fee, or reward (Appraisers' Licences Act, 1806, s. 4). Any person appraising without an annual licence is liable to a penalty of £50 (s. 6) unless he be a licensed auctioneer (s. 7) or a licensed house agent (Revenue (No. 1) Act, 1861, s. 11). A licensed appraiser may act as a house agent (ib. s. 13). The appraiser's licence costs £2 (Revenue Act, 1845, s. 1).

Valuation List. This is a list of all the rateable hereditaments in a parish which, in the area outside the Metropolis, is made out each year under the direction of the Assessment Committee (Union Assessment Committee Act, 1862, s. 24). It shows (I.) the rateable value of (1) agricultural land; (2) other land; and (3) other rateable hereditaments (ib. ss. 14, 27; Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, s. 5 (a)); (II.) the totals of (1) (2) and (3) (Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, s. 5 (b); Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868, s. 30); and (III.) the annual value of Crown land on which rates are not paid (Agricultural Rates Order, 1896, art. 16, Sch. W).

As regards the metropolitan area (see ASSESSMENT) a somewhat similar list is made out every five years by the overseers of each parish; this list (known as the quinquennial list) is amended by a supplementary list made out by them each year in order to provide for the alterations taking place during the period of five years, and there are, moreover, provisional lists made from time to time during each year to provide for alterations between one supplementary list and the next. See the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, and the Valuation (Metropolis) Amendment Act, 1884.

Value is often used as an abbreviation for "valuable consideration," especially in the phrases "purchaser for value," "holder for value," etc. The question whether a person acting in good faith has given value for property is often of importance when the person from whom he acquired it had not a perfect title as against some other person. Thus, if a trustee fraudulently sells the trust property to a "bona fide purchaser for value," that is, to a person who had no reason to believe that it was affected with a trust, and gave a fair price for it, the cestui que trust has no claim against the purchaser. See BONA FIDES; CONSIDERATION; NEGOTIABLE.

Valued Policy. See POLICY OF ASSURANCE.

Value of Marriage. A writ (anciently known as Valore maritagii) which until 1660 lay against one who, holding by knight service and being under age and unmarried, refused a marriage without disparagement offered by his lord. See DISPARAGEMENT; MARRIAGE, VALUE OF.

Compare FORFEITURE OF MARRIAGE.

Value Received. These words are usually inserted in a bill of exchange or promissory note, but they are of no effect. If the bill or note is given for an illegal or an immoral consideration or without consideration, they do not make it any the better; and if it is given for good consideration they are superfluous.

Variance, in procedure, was a discrepancy between a material statement in a pleading and the evidence adduced in support of it at the trial. At common law a variance, whether in a civil or a criminal proceeding, was a fatal defect, incapable of amendment; but this is no longer so. See AMENDMENT.

Vasto, De. A writ which anciently lay against a tenant for life or for years who committed waste.

Vastum. Waste (q.v.). Anciently it meant also common land which was open to the cattle of the commoners.

Vattel. Emerich von Vattel was born at Couret, in Switzerland, in 1714 and died in 1767. He wrote Droit de Gens and Questions de Droit naturel.

Vavasor. In Norman times this was a feudal tenant ranking next below a baron. They seem to have been vassals of the barons, their title being a corruption of the low Latin vassi vassorum (vassals of vassals).

Vavasory. Lands held by a vavasor.

Veal-money. An annual payment formerly made by the tenants of the manor of Bradford in Wiltshire as a commutation for the duty of actually bringing veal to the lord.

Vectigal judiciarium. This anciently meant pecuniary penalties paid to the king and used to defray the expenses of the Courts of Justice.

Vejours. This is a corruption of the word visores, that is to say, viewers. It was formerly used as meaning persons sent by the Court to view the corpse of a murdered man or to view a place in dispute in order to inform the Court regarding it.

Venary. In the forest law, beasts of venary meant such as were got by hunting.

Venditioni exponas. When a writ of fieri facias has been issued and the sheriff returns that he has taken goods, but that they remain in his hands for want of buyers, a writ of venditioni exponas ("that you expose for sale") may be sued out (Ord. 43, r. 2) to compel a sale of the goods for any price they will fetch. See DISTRINGAS.

When a writ of extent in chief or in aid has been returned and no one appears to claim the goods, etc., mentioned in the inquisition, a venditioni exponas issues directing the sheriff to sell them.

Venditor regis. (The King's Salesman.) He exposed to sale goods and chattels which had been seized to answer any debt due to the king. The office was abolished in the reign of Edward II.

Vendors and Purchasers. The law relating to vendors and purchasers of real property includes such subjects as the particulars and conditions of sale, the contract of sale, the abstract of title, requisitions, searches, etc., and the preparation and completion of the conveyance. See the various titles, and also COVENANT; SALE; SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE; TITLE; TITLE-DEEDS.

Venereal Diseases. The treatment of these diseases by anyone other than a duly qualified medical practitioner is illegal (Venereal Disease Act, 1917, s. 1). The advertisement of any remedy for any such disease is illegal except in publications circulating amongst medical practitioners and chemists (s. 2). Contravention of any provision of the Act can be punished summarily or on indictment (s. 3). "Venereal Disease" means syphilis, gonorrhea or soft chancre (s. 4). See INDECENT ADVERTISEMENTS.

The imputation of venereal disease is actionable per se.

The communication of venereal disease by one spouse to another is cruelty as regards matrimonial law.

Venire, Court of. A civil Court at Kingston-upon-Hull having jurisdiction in all actions to any amount. It is held under the authority of charters granted by Henry VII., Henry VIII. and Charles II.

Venire de novo, in criminal practice, was a writ issued by the King's Bench on a writ of error (q.v.) from a verdict given in an inferior Court, vacating the verdict and directing the sheriff to summon jurors anew, whence the name of the writ. It was in fact a mode of directing a new trial.

Venire facias. An ancient writ in the nature of a summons to appear. It is practically obsolete. Where, however, an indictment has been removed into the King's Bench at the instance of the prosecutor, the writ may be moved for by the prosecutor (Crown Office Rules, r. 83) if the defendant fails to appear; and where application is made to the King's Bench to amend a coroner's inquisition under its common law jurisdiction, the writ is in strictness necessary in order to bring the coroner before the Court.

Anciently there were many forms of the writ. Their purposes were described by the various words following the words venire facias.

Venire facias ad respondendum is, or was, a writ to summon a person, against whom an indictment for a misdemeanour has been found, to appear and be arraigned for the offence. It may, in theory, be issued by the King's Bench, by a judge of assize, or a Court of quarter sessions. A warrant is now used instead. See DISTRINGAS; OUTLAWRY; WARRANT.

Venire facias juratores. A writ commanding the sheriff to summon a jury; it was abolished by s. 104 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852.

Venire facias tot matronas. A writ which formerly was issued to the sheriff commanding him to summon a jury of matrons to execute the writ de ventre inspiciendo. See VENTRE INSPICIENDO, DE.

Venter in the old books is equivalent to mother; as when Littleton speaks of a man having issue two sons "by divers venters," that is, by different wives; or of two brothers "by divers venters," meaning two brothers having different mothers.

Ventre inspiciendo, De. Where the widow of an owner of land is suspected of feigning herself with child in order to produce a supposititious heir to the estate, the heir presumptive may have a writ de ventre inspiciendo, to examine whether she be with child or not; and if she be, to keep her under proper restraint until delivered. It is, however, obsolete.

Venue. In criminal procedure, the venue was a note in the margin of an indictment, giving the name of the county or district within which the Court in which the indictment is preferred has jurisdiction. Now there is no such note; but the commencement of the indictment (see the Indictments Act, 1915, Sch. I., r. 2) indicates the place at which the accused it to be tried. The common law rule is that the venue must be laid (that is, the indictment must be preferred in a Court having jurisdiction) in the county where the offence was committed, but in many cases it may by statute be laid in the county in which the offender was apprehended, or in some cases, in any county. If a man is wounded in one county and dies in another, the venue may be laid in either.

In the former common law practice, the venue was that part of the declaration in an action which designated the county in which the action was to be tried. It was inserted in the margin of the declaration thus: "Middlesex to wit." "London to wit," etc. Venue was of two kinds: "transitory" or "local." It was transitory when the cause of action was of a sort which might have happened anywhere, in which case the plaintiff might adopt any county he pleased as a venue. It was local when the cause of action could have happened in one county only, and then the venue must have been laid in that county. Thus if the action were trespass for breaking the plaintiff's close, the venue must have been laid in the county where the close was situated; for such a trespass could have happened nowhere else. If it were trespass for assaulting the plaintiff, the venue was transitory, for such a cause of action might happen anywhere, and so, in general, in all cases of contract. Under the present rules (see Ord. 36, r. 10), venue is expressly abolished, and the place of trial is entirely a matter for the judge (ib.), but the plaintiff, if he wish the action tried elsewhere than in Middlesex, must name in his statement of claim a place for its trial, subject to the place being altered by a judge's order.

See ACTIONS.

Verba accipienda sunt secundum subjectum materiem (6 Rep. 62). (Words are to be interpreted in accordance with the subject-matter.)

Verba æquivoca ac in dubio sensu posita intelliguntur digniori et potentiori sensu (6 Rep. 20; Co. Litt. 73). (Words which are equivocal, and which are used in a doubtful sense, are to be taken in their more weighty and effectual sense.) Thus tenure in capite might be either of the king or of a subject; but when it was mentioned without qualification it was held to mean tenure of the king. And where a statute made a penalty recoverable in any Court of record it was held that this meant only one of the four Courts at Westminster although many minor Courts were also Courts of record.

Verba aliquid operari debent (Bac. Max. Reg. 3). (Words ought to have some effect.) Compare VERBA CUM, ETC.

Verba chartarum fortius accipiuntur contra proferentem (Co. Litt. 36). (The words of deeds are to be interpreted most strongly against him who uses them.) At 6 Ch. D. 280, Jessel, M.R., is reported to have said: "I do not see how, according to the now established rules of construction as settled by the House of Lords in the well-known case of Grey v. Pearson, followed by Roddy v. Fitzgerald and Abbott v. Middleton, the maxim can be considered as having any force at the present day. The rule is to find out the meaning of the instrument according to the ordinary and proper rules of construction. If we can thus find out its meaning, we do not want the maxim. If, on the other hand, we cannot find out its meaning, then the instrument is void for uncertainty, and in that case it may be said that the instrument is construed in favour of the grantor, for the grant is annulled."

Compare CONSTRUCTIO, ETC.

Verba cum effectu accipienda sunt (Bac. Max. Reg. 3). (Words are to be interpreted in such a way as to give them some effect.) Compare VERBA ALIQUID, ETC.; VERBA DEBENT, ETC.

Verba debent intelligi ut aliquid operentur (8 Rep. 94). (Words ought to be interpreted in such a way as to give them some effect.)

Verba de præsenti; Verba de futuro. A declaration in the presence of witnesses by A and B was known in the ecclesiastical law as a contract of matrimony per verba de præsenti when it was to the effect that they were man and wife, and as a contract of matrimony per verba de futuro when it was to the effect that they were betrothed, or, in modern parlance, engaged. See BREACH.

Verba generalia restringuntur ad habilitatem rei vel aptitudinem personæ (Bac. Max. Reg. 10). (General words are restricted to the nature of the subject-matter or the aptitude of the person.) This is how Willes, J., briefly translates the maxim at 6 C. B. N. S. 320:—"And so if I grant to A on annuity of £10 'pro concilio impenso et impendendo' (for past and future advice); this means his advice as to medicine if he be a physician and his advice as to law if he be a lawyer."

Verba illata inesse videntur. (Words referred to are deemed to be incorporated.) This is the abbreviated version of verba relata, etc., which Heath, G., uses at 5 Taunt, 337.

Verba intentioni, non e contra, debent inservire (8 Rep. 94). (Words ought to be made subservient to the intent, and not the other way about.) Compare MENS TESTATORIS, ETC.

Verba ita sunt intelligenda ut res magis valeat quam pereat (Bac. Max. Reg. 5). (Words should be read in such a way—if that be possible—as rather to give effect to the deed, etc., in which they are used than to render it nugatory). Compare BENIGNÆ, ETC.

Verba posteriora, propter certitudinem addita, ad priora, quæ certitudine indigent, sunt referenda (Wing.). (Subsequent words, added for the purpose of certainty, are to be referred to preceding words which need certainty.) Compare EX ANTECEDENTIBUS, ETC; PARTEM ALIQUAM, ETC.; OPTIMA STATUTI, ETC.

Verba relata hoc maximè operantur per referentiam ut in eis inesse videntur (Co Litt. 359). (Words to which reference is made in an instrument have the same operation as if they were inserted in the instrument referring to them.) As Crompton, J. (9 H. L. Cas. 99) said, "by referring, in a document signed by the party, to another document, the person so signing in effect signs a document containing the terms of the one referred to. Incorporation by reference has, in fact, the same effect as literal incorporation; and this applies to Acts of Parliament as well as to deeds, contracts and agreements generally."

Verborum obligatio verbis dissolvitur (D. 50, 17, 35). (An obligation created by words is dissolved by words; and so a verbal release of a verbal contract is effectual.) Compare EODEM LIGAMINE, ETC.

Verderer. An officer of the forest who was sworn to maintain the assise of the forest. He was chosen by the freeholders of the county

Verdict. A verdict is the opinion of a jury on a question of fact in a civil or criminal proceeding. The verdict of a jury must be unanimous. A general verdict (formerly sometimes called a verdict at large) is where the jury find the point in issue generally, as where in a civil case they find for the plaintiff or defendant, or where, in a criminal case, they return a verdict of guilty or not guilty. A special verdict is where they find the facts of the case specially, that is, they say that certain facts have been proved, leaving to the Court the application of the law to the facts thus found. The jury is entitled to find a general verdict in any case whether civil or criminal; and in any criminal case they may, if they think fit, find a special verdict. But special verdicts, although they are the rule in civil cases, are very unusual in criminal cases.

When a jury have found a prisoner guilty of one offence and the facts prove another offence, the Court of Criminal Appeal may alter the verdict and sentence for such other offence (Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, s. 5 (2)); and where a prisoner is convicted and sentenced on a special verdict, the Court of Criminal Appeal may, if they decide that the Court below has drawn a wrong conclusion from the verdict, record such conclusion as is warranted by law and pass the appropriate sentence (ib. s. 5 (3)).

When a coroner's jury find the death of a person without saying how he came by it, this is called an open verdict. See INQUEST.

In an action in the High Court, when the jury have found their verdict, the judge could formerly direct that judgment should be entered for any party, or adjourn the case for further consideration, or leave any party to move for judgment, but now he must direct judgment to be entered as he thinks right. (See MOTION FOR JUDGMENT.) Any party may also move for a new trial (see TRIAL), or apply to the Court of Appeal to set aside the judgment (see Ord. 58, r. 4).

See CONVICTION; ACQUITTAL; INQUISITION; FINDING.

Veredictum, quasi dictum veritatis, ut judicium quasi juris dictum (Co. Litt. 226). (The verdict is, as it were, the dictum of truth, as the judgment is the dictum of law.) This maxim is quoted in collocation with another which is practically the same as AD QUÆSTIONEM, ETC.

Verge. "At common law," says Mr. Jervis, "the coroner of the county had no jurisdiction within the compass of the King's Court, which bounds the jurisdiction of the Lord High Steward of the Household, and comprehends a circuit of twelve miles round the residence of the Court [wherever held]. This jurisdiction is usually called the verge, within which the Coroner of the King's Household, or, as commonly called, the Coroner of the Verge, had jurisdiction over all matters within the duty of a coroner, exclusive of the coroner of the county. A jurisdiction so exclusive, particularly as the King's Court was moveable, was found to be attended with many inconveniences . . . and therefore it was found expedient to impart, in some cases, to the coroner of the county, a jurisdiction concurrent with that of the Coroner of the Verge." The Lord Steward (q.v.) now exercises a mere domestic jurisdiction over the members of the Royal Household; and the Coroner of the King's Household (see s. 29 of the Coroners Act, 1887) holds inquests only on the bodies of those dying within the limits of any place where the King is residing.

As to the Royal Household, see Pegge, Curialia, 1782-91, and his Collection of Ordinances, etc., 1790.

A verge of land is the same as a virgate (q.v.).

See TENANTS BY THE VERGE.

Vergers. Formerly there were vergers or porters of the verge, who carried white wands before the judges of the King's Bench and of the Common Pleas. Now the term is confined to the minor official who carries the mace before the dean in a cathedral and before the vice-chancellor in the two ancient English universities.

Verification. Part of the system of pleading used before the enactment of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852. Any pleading subsequent to the declaration (q.v.) and alleging new matter, concluded with a "verification," consisting of the words: "And this the defendant [or plaintiff] is ready to verify" or (if it was intended that the matter pleaded should be tried otherwise than by a jury) of the words: "And this the defendant [or plaintiff] is ready to verify by the said record or to verify when, where and in such manner as the Court shall order, direct or appoint." See GO TO THE COUNTRY.

Veritas, à quocunque dicitur, à Deo est (4 Inst. 153). (Truth, by whomsoever pronounced, is from God.) Quoted by Coke when citing the practice of heathens, Saracens and Turks as to the inviolability of the persons of ambassadors and others ejusdem generis. It might also be quoted as showing that once the truth of evidence is accepted, the character of the witness who gives it is immaterial; his character is a relevant matter only in so far as it tends to show whether he is or is not telling the truth.

Veritas nihil veretur nisi abscondi (9 Rep. 20). (Truth fears nothing but concealment.)

Veritas nominis tollit errorem demonstra-

tionis (Bac. Max. Reg. 24). See PRÆSENTIA, ETC.

Vermin. Rabbits are not vermin within the meaning of the Gun Licence Act, 1870, s. 7 (4), which exempts an occupier of land from taking out a gun licence if he uses a gun only for the purpose of "scaring birds or killing vermin" on his land. Squirrels are vermin for the purposes of the Forestry Act, 1919, s. 4, as to which see RABBITS. There is no statutory or other definition of vermin. It would appear to include rats, mice, stoats, weasels, and cats which have gone wild; but it certainly does not include any bird no matter how destructive, for the Gun Licence Act, s. 7 (4), impliedly excludes all birds from the category of vermin.

See RATS AND MICE.

Versificator. The versificator regis, or verse-maker to the king, certainly existed as early as the time of Richard I. His versificator was Gulielmus Peregrinus, that is to say, Wandering William. One Master Henry was the versificator in 1250. By the reign of James I. the versificator had been definitely replaced by the poet laureate (q.v.); but the precise period at which the change took place is uncertain.

Vert. In the law of the forest, this meant anything, from a small shrub to a tree, which bore leaves and was in a forest. The trees were known as over-vert and the shrubs as nether-vert.

Vert also meant the right, under a royal grant, of cutting green wood in the forest.

Very Lord and Very Tenant means an immediate lord and tenant, as where A holds land of B without any mesne lord. See LORD.

Vest; Vested. When a person becomes entitled to a right, estate, etc., it is said to vest in him.

An estate or interest may vest in one of two manners, namely, in possession or in interest. An estate is said to be vested in possession when it gives a present right to the immediate possession of property; while an estate which gives a present right to the future possession of property is said to be vested in interest: thus, if land is given to A for life, and after his death to B in fee, then A's estate is vested in possession, while B's estate is vested in interest. If B dies before his estate vests in possession, it passes to his representatives (his heir or devisee). As a general rule, "vested" means "vested in interest," as opposed to "contingent" (q.v.). Thus, remainders are divided into vested and contingent. See REMAINDER.

An estate or interest is said to be "vested subject to being divested" when it is vested, but is defeasible on the happening of a particular event. Thus, where property is given to A, an infant, absolutely, with remainder over to some one else if he dies under twenty-one, he takes a vested interest determinable on his death under age. See CONDITION.

"Vest" is used specially to denote a transfer by or under an Act of Parliament. Thus, by the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 18 (1), as soon as a person is adjudicated bankrupt, his property vests in the trustee for the time being: that is, the property is transferred to the trustee in the same way as if the bankrupt had executed a conveyance of it. A statutory transfer of this kind may be either absolute (as in the above example) or limited: thus, where an Act of Parliament enacts that a street shall vest in an urban sanitary authority, this means that the surface of the land, and so much of the soil as is necessary for its use as a street, shall be transferred to the authority.

Vested is also applied in a semi-popular sense to rights, interests and expectancies with which it is considered the legislature ought not to interfere without giving compensation. Such are the rights of landowners, which are interfered with when an Act of Parliament is passed authorising the compulsory purchase of their land for the purposes of a railway. The Endowed Schools Act, 1869, ss. 18, 39, enumerates various kinds of "vested interests" for which compensation is to be made, such as the interest of a child on the foundation of an endowed school, by which seems to be meant the child's expectation or hope that it will be kept in the school. Such interests are obviously not of a legal nature.

Vesting Order. This is an order of a Court under which property passes as effectually as it would under a conveyance. As is said under TRUSTEE ACTS, such order may be made under the Trustee Act, 1893, and under the Lunacy Act, 1890.

Lands held upon trust for a charity may be transferred by vesting order to the treasurer or the acting trustee thereof (Charitable Trust Act, 1853, ss. 48-50).

When, in an action or suit, a judgment or decree is made directing the sale or conveyance of lands, the Court may, under s. 30 of the Trustee Act, 1893, make vesting orders for carrying the same into effect.

Vestments. It has been decided by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council that the effect of the Ornaments Rubric (q.v.), construed along with Advertisements of Queen Elizabeth (q.v.) and the Act of Uniformity, 1662 (13 & 14 Car. 2, c. 4), is to make the use at the Communion Service of the vestments known as the alb, the chasuble and the cope (all of which came into modern use only during the middle of the last century, about the time of what is popularly known as the Ritualistic Movement) illegal, except in cathedral and collegiate churches. They are, however, extensively used elsewhere.

Vestry. A vestry, properly speaking, is the assembly of the whole of a parish, met together in some convenient place, for the despatch of the affairs and business of the parish, the repair of the church, etc.: and this meeting being formerly commonly held in the vestry adjoining to or belonging to the church, it thence takes the name of vestry, as the place itself does, from the priest's vestments, which are usually deposited and kept there. Meetings in the vestry room of a church may be forbidden by the Poor Law Commissioners (now the Ministry of Health) under s. 1 of the Vestries Act, 1830, where the population of the parish exceeds 2,000 persons.

In ordinary cases, the vestry consists of all persons, whether resident or non-resident and whether members of the Church of England or dissenters, who are rated for the relief of the poor in the parish, but in some parishes there exists a custom by which a certain number of persons (in many cases self-elected) manage the concerns of the parish in lieu of the whole body of parishioners: these are called select vestries. Under the adoptive Vestries Act, 1831, every parish could establish a select vestry (known as a "statutory select vestry"), and the statutory select vestry supersedes the vestry proper in every parish where it is established: but that Act was repealed as regards metropolitan parishes by the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, s. 1, although it is still in force elsewhere.

Down to 1894 the vestry transacted in all rural parishes the business which was transferred to the parish councils by the Local Government Act, 1894; the vestries of the metropolitan area were superseded for non-ecclesiastical purposes in 1899 by the borough councils established by the London Government Act, 1899; but in urban parishes the vestry still exercises such non-ecclesiastical functions as appertained to it before 1894 (unless such functions have been transferred to the urban or other authority) and exercises in fact an authority in secular matters corresponding to that of the parish council in rural parishes.

Vesture. If a man, being seised in fee of land, grants the vesture of the land to another man in fee, the land itself will not pass to the grantee, but only a particular right in the land; "for," says Coke, "thereby he shall not have the houses, timber-trees, mines, and other reall things parcell of the inheritance, but he shall have the vesture of the land (that is), the corne, grass, underwood, swepage and the like, and he shall have an action of trespasse quare clausum fregit" (Co. Litt. 4B), for any infringement of his right.

"A man" (see Co. Litt. 122A), "may prescribe or alledge a custome to have and enjoy solam vesturam terræ from such a day till such a day, and hereby the owner of the soyle shall be excluded to pasture or feed there"; and it seems that a person may also prescribe for a sole vesture, excluding the owner from year's end to year's end. A right of prima vestura gives the right of mowing the first crop (Palm, 174).

The right of vesture seems to be an incorporeal hereditament.

Vetera statuta. The ANTIQUA STATUTA (q.v.).

Veterinary Surgeons. A veterinary surgeon is one skilled in the medical and surgical treatment of horses, cattle, sheep, dogs and other domesticated animals. Down to 1881 any person could practise, and describe himself, as a veterinary surgeon. There had, indeed, been founded in 1791 an association which in the year 1845 was incorporated by royal charter as the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons; and it received supplemental royal charters in 1876 and 1879; but it had no control over the profession until the enactment of the Veterinary Surgeons Act, 1881. That Act provided that (s. 17 (2)) no person could recover for veterinary services unless he was on the register (see ss. 2, 3) of veterinary surgeons or had held before August 27, 1881, the certificate of the Highland and Agricultural Society of Scotland; that (s. 16) any person falsely pretending to be a fellow or member of the college should be liable to a fine of not more than £20; and (s. 17 (1)) that anyone holding himself out as a veterinary surgeon should be liable to a like penalty unless he was on the register or held the Scotch certificate. The Act of 1881 (s. 6) gave the college power to remove from the register persons convicted of serious offences or guilty of conduct professionally disgraceful.

The Veterinary Surgeons Amendment Act, 1900, empowered the college, in appropriate cases, to put holders of the Scotch certificate in the same position as persons who had been on the register but who had been removed from it; and the Veterinary Surgeons Act (1881) Amendment Act, 1920, gave the college like powers with regard to "existing practitioners," that is to say, persons (see s. 15 of the Act of 1881) who for five years before 27 August, 1881, had been practising as veterinary surgeons without being registered as such by the college before that date but who subsequently were registered separately as existing practitioners.

Except as regards "existing practitioners" and holders of the Scotch certificate (both of whom are now very few) the effect of s. 4 of the Act of 1881 is that since 27 August, 1881, no person can become a veterinary surgeon unless he has passed professional examinations corresponding to those which a medical practitioner has to pass.

The Act of 1920, s. 4, makes companies registered under the Companies Acts and societies registered under the Industrial and Provident Societies Acts, liable to penalties for offences against the Act of 1881 in like manner as are individuals.

Vetitum namium. See NAM.

Veto. In constitutional law this has come to be popularly applied to the rejection of a Bill by the House of Lords, or to the withholding of the Royal Assent. (See ACT OF PARLIAMENT.) This use of the word is, however, quite modern and is unknown to our law.

Vexatious. A proceeding is said to be vexatious when the party bringing it is not acting bona fide, and merely wishes to annoy or embarrass his opponent, or when it is not calculated to lead to any practical result. Such a proceeding is often described as "frivolous and vexatious," and the Court may stay it on that ground, both under its inherent jurisdiction and under Ord. 25, r. 4. (See ABUSE OF PROCESS.)

At common law any member of the public could send up to a grand jury a bill (known as a voluntary bill) for any crime. This right has been much restricted by the Vexatious Indictments Act, 1859, which provides that no bill shall be presented to or found by a grand jury (unless the person presenting it is a prosecutor who has been bound over to prosecute, or unless the accused has been committed for trial) except by leave of the High Court or of the Law Officers of the Crown in the case of offences specified in the Act. To these offences a large number of other offences have been added by subsequent Acts: see Archbold (25th ed.), p. 68. As to notice of intention to present a "voluntary bill," see the Assizes and Quarter Sessions Act, 1908, s. 1 (5).

— Via trita est tutissima (10 Rep. 142). (The much used road is the safest.) Tindal, C.J., uses an alternative form when he says, in reply to an application to alter the settled practice of the Common Pleas (B. N. C. 45), "Getting rid of a judgment of the Court is so solemn a thing that I think you should pursue the usual course. Via trita via tuta."

Compare CURSUS, ETC.; OMNIS INNOVATIO, ETC.; NOVITAS NON TAM, ETC.

Vicar. In the original sense of the word, a vicar is an incumbent appointed to an appropriated church. A vicar is therefore, in effect, a perpetual curate with a standing salary. (See APPROPRIATION; IMPROPRIATION; RECTOR; CURATE; TITHES.) Every incumbent of a parish church, not being a rector, who is authorised to solemnise marriage, baptisms, etc., and to take for his sole benefit the fees payable thereon, is a vicar for the purpose of style and designation, but not for any other purpose, and his benefice is a vicarage for the same purpose (Incumbents Act, 1868).

Vicar-General. This was formerly an ecclesiastical officer appointed by a bishop to act by his authority and under his direction in matters purely spiritual, as visitation, correction of manners, etc., "with," as Gibson, writing in 1713, says at p. xxii. of the Introduction to his Codex, "a general inspection of men and things, in order to the preserving of discipline and good government in the church." But the vicar-general of this type —who was a survival from the Pre-Reformation period—is obsolete. The modern vicar-general is a purely ministerial or judicial officer, not necessarily in Holy Orders, who, except in the Province and Diocese of Canterbury, holds also the office of official principal or of chancellor, and is designated as chancellor or official principal. The vicar-general of the Archbishop of Canterbury is known as vicar-general: he grants special marriage licences for all England, and he has an office for that purpose in London, at 3, Creed Lane, Ludgate Hill. See CHANCELLOR; OFFICIAL PRINCIPAL.

Vicarial Tithes. See TITHES.

Vicario deliberando occasione cujusdam recognitionis capto, etc. A writ which anciently lay for a spiritual person imprisoned upon forfeiture of a recognisance.

Vicarius non habet vicarium (Branch, Max. 5th ed., 380). (A delegate has no delegate.) See DELEGATUS NON, ETC.

Vicars Choral. Those minor dignitaries of the choir of a cathedral or collegiate church who act as assistants to the canons. They are appointed by the chapter or the dean of their respective churches (Ecclesiastical Commissioners Act, 1840, ss. 44, 45).

Vice-Admiral. See ADMIRAL.

Vice-Admiralty Courts are, or rather were, Courts having admiralty jurisdiction in British possessions overseas. From the early part of the seventeenth century they were gradually established as various possessions fell into our hands. They acted under commissions from the Crown authorising governors of colonies to exercise such powers as in England appertained to the Lord High Admiral. Subsequently they were regulated by various statutes, the last of which was the Vice-Admiralty Courts Act, 1863. The Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act, 1890, provided (s. 2) for the establishment of Colonial Courts of Admiralty with (s. 6) a right of appeal to the King in Council in all British possessions (other than the Channel Islands—see s. 11 (1)—to which (s. 16) it was applied by order of the King in Council. On such application the local Vice-Admiralty Court was abolished (s. 17) and the Act of 1863 was repealed as regards the particular possession in question. The Act of 1890 has now been applied to all the great self-governing dominions. The Sovereign has power (s. 11 (2)) to declare that the Act of 1890 shall apply either not at all or only to a limited extent to possessions which are not self-governing.

Vice-Chamberlain. The deputy of the Lord Chamberlain. (See CHAMBERLAIN, LORD.) He goes in and out with the Ministry of the day and is usually a member of the House of Commons.

Vice-Chancellor. The first Vice-Chancellor (styled Vice-Chancellor of England) was appointed in 1813 to relieve the Lord Chancellor of some of his duties as a judge of first instance of the Court of Chancery; in 1841, two more Vice-Chancellors were appointed, partly to take over the equity business of the Court of Exchequer, but the number of three was not made permanent until 1852. So far back as the reign of Henry II. there had been deputies who kept the Great Seal during the absence of the Chancellor and were known as Vice-Chancellors; but they were not Vice-Chancellors in the modern sense.

The Vice-Chancellor and the Master of the Rolls (q.v.) were the judges of first instance of the Court of Chancery, and on the formation of the Supreme Court of Judicature they were transferred to the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice by the Judicature Act, 1873, ss. 5, 31 (1). The judges appointed as successors to the Vice-Chancellors do not bear that title, but are called justices of the High Court (ib. s. 5).

One of the Vice-Chancellors (usually the senior Vice-Chancellor) constituted a Court of Appeal in equity business from the County Courts and the Chancery Court of Lancaster. All appeals from inferior Courts are now heard by Divisional Courts of Appeal of the High Court (Judicature Act, 1873, s. 45).

There is also a Vice-Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (see CHANCELLOR), and at each of the two ancient universities there is a Vice-Chancellor as deputy for the Chancellor. See UNIVERSITY COURTS.

Vice-comes. The ancient Latin equivalent for sheriff. The word is literally the equivalent of viscount, but the sheriff was the vice-comes for hundreds of years before viscounts (q.v.) were first created.

Vice-dominus. The same as vice-comes (q.v.) Vice-dominus episcopi anciently meant a vicar-general (q.v.).

Vicinage. See COMMON.

Vicis et venellis mundandis. A writ which anciently lay to the mayor and bailiffs of a town to compel them to cleanse the streets and lanes thereof.

Vicontiel; Vicountiel. Appertaining to the sheriff or vice-comes. Vicontiel writs were such as were triable in the old county court of the sheriff. Vicontiel rents were those which the sheriffs collected and accounted for to the Crown; the Fines Act, 1833, s. 12, made them part of the revenue of the Crown and collectable by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests.

Victoria and Albert, Order of. Founded in 1862 for ladies, who bear the appendix V. A. No members have been appointed recently. It is of course quite distinct from the Victoria Cross.

Victor Townley Act. The popular title of the statute 27 & 28 Vict. c. 29. It was passed in order to amend the statute 3 & 4 Vict. c. 54, under which a murderer named Victor George Townley, who had been duly convicted, was reprieved upon the ground of alleged insanity, although it was generally believed that he was in fact perfectly sane.

Victualler. This, or the term "licensed victualler," is commonly used as meaning a publican. Anciently the word had a wider meaning: thus the statute 22 Hen. 8, c. 13, makes it include "bere bruers and bakers."

Victualling House. There is no statutory definition of this term. It appears to mean a house at which food for consumption on the premises, but not lodging, is supplied to the public generally. The term applies to such places as the old-fashioned "eating-house" and the modern "tea-shop," as well as to restaurants, etc., but it is not commonly used. A public-house at which luncheons, etc., are supplied is also a victualling-house; but a hotel is not.

Videlicet. (Namely; that is to say.) Under the ancient system, when a pleader did not wish to be put upon strict proof of an averment as to time he introduced it with a videlicet—"videlicet on the first day of December, etc.," or as the case might be. This was called "laying the time under a videlicet."

Vidimus. The same as inspeximus (q.v.).

Vi et armis. "With force and arms." See TRESPASS.

View. When an action or other proceeding concerns an immoveable thing, such as land or houses, it is frequently desirable to have it seen and examined by the judge, jury, referee, etc., before the trial. A judge may view any such property under Ord. 50, r. 4, and a referee, either with or without his assessors, can also view under Ord. 36, r. 48. An order that a jury shall view may be made under Ord. 50, r. 5. In the County Court, the judge may view, or order that a jury shall view, under Ord. 22, r. 17, of the County Court Rules.

In any criminal case the judge may order that the jury or some of them (called "viewers") may view a place in question (Juries Act, 1825, s. 23). See SHOWERS.

The old writ of view, which had formerly to be issued as a preliminary to any place being viewed by a jury in a civil action, was abolished by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 114, which provided that all things which used to be done upon the writ could be done upon a rule or order to view.

View and Delivery. When a right of common is exercisable, not over the whole waste, but only in convenient places indicated from time to time by the lord of the manor or his bailiff, it is said to be exercisable after "view and delivery." See COMMON; ASSIGNMENT OF WASTE; STINT.

View of Frankpledge. See FRANKPLEDGE.

Vigilantibus, non dormientibus, jura subveniunt (2 Inst. 690; Wing. 692). (The laws give help to those who are watchful and not to those who go to sleep.) This is quoted by Coke (at 4 Rep. 10) in connection with conduct described as crassa et supina negligentia, which, as he says, the statute under consideration never intended to relieve. But this maxim does not apply to the Crown. As is said at 347 Hob: "It is no reason that the negligence of his officers . . . should defeat the King. Vigilantibus, etc., is a rule for the subject. But nullum tempus, etc., is the King's plea."

Compare CAVEAT EMPTOR. See also ACQUIESCENCE; LIMITATION; PRESCRIPTION.

Viis et modis. In the Ecclesiastical Courts, service of a decree or citation viis et modis, that is, by all "ways and means" likely to affect the party with knowledge of its contents, is equivalent to substituted service in the temporal Courts, and is opposed to personal service. See SERVICE.

Vi laicâ removendâ De. ("For the removal of lay force")—is an obsolete writ, which seems to have been applicable where an incumbent was hindered or disturbed in his possession of the benefice.

Vill is in law the same thing as "town" in the technical sense of that word. (See TOWN.) A "vill" seems originally to have been used in the same sense as the Latin villa, and to have signified a mere collection of houses in the country, such as buildings on a farm or a manor (villa ruralis), in opposition to a walled town (villa muralis), namely a city or borough. (See VILLEIN.) "Villa ruralis" appears to be the same thing as an "upland town." (See TOWN.) The word "vill" is not used now except in dealing with the records of manors and with copyhold customs. The parish, in the civil sense, has superseded the vill.

Village Green. See RECREATION GROUNDS.

Villainous Judgment. A sentence anciently passed in, for instance, cases of conspiracy. It made the offender unworthy of credit; it debarred him from access to the king's Courts, that is to say it made him legem liberam amittere; and it involved the forfeiture of his lands and goods as well as imprisonment. The Termes de la Ley (1641) describes it, without saying whether it was then in use. Blackstone (1759) says that in his time it was obsolete, "it not having been pronounced for some ages."

Villein. Formerly there existed a class of persons in a position which, as Blackstone says, was "superior to downright slavery, but inferior to every other condition." They belonged principally to lords of manors, and were either villeins regardant, that is, annexed to the manor or land, or else they were in gross, or at large, that is, annexed to the person of the lord; thus, where a lord granted a villein regardant by deed to another person, he became a villein in gross. Villeins could not leave their lord without his permission, nor acquire any property; but they could sue anyone except their lord, and were protected against atrocious injuries by him.

Villeinage has never been formally abolished, but it had become rare in Edward the Sixth's reign, and it disappeared altogether under the Stuarts.

See VILLENAGE; NEIFE; MANUMISSION; COPYHOLD; MARKET; CONFESSION; PRESCRIPTION; SERVICE; TENURE.

The word is derived from the Norman-French vileyn, which itself came from the low Latin villanus, that is to say one appertaining to a villa, or farm.

Villein Socage. See SOCAGE.

Villein Tenure. See TENURE; SERVICE.

Villenage signified I. the status of a villein (q.v.), and II. an obsolete tenure, which existed where land was held of a lord of a manor by a villein, or by a free person by villein or base service. It has gradually become either extinct or converted into copyhold tenure. There was also a kind of tenure in villenage known as privileged villenage or villein-socage, which existed in certain lands of the Crown. The tenants of these lands could not be removed from their lands so long as they did their services, which differed from ordinary villein services in being certain. This kind of tenure gradually became converted into tenure in ancient demesne (q.v.). See COPYHOLD.

Vinculo matrimonii, De. See DIVORCE.

Vinter. This (see 24 L. T. 312) means one who sells wine for consumption whether on or off the premises.

Vintners Company. One of the City Companies. Freemen of the company are, under an ancient custom, entitled to sell foreign wines without licence anywhere in England. This privilege has been recognised by several statutes, commencing with the Excise Licence Act, 1825, s. 30, and ending with the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, s. 111 (2) (c); but the last-mentioned enactment declares that privilege does not extend to freemen by redemption. See COMPANIES, CITY.

Violenta præsumptio is maniefestmes plena probatio (Co. Litt. 6). (Violent presumption is often proof.) Compare PRÆSUMPTIO VIOLENTA, ETC.

Viperina est expositio quæ corrodit viscera textus (11 Rep. 34). (An interpretation which eats out the bowels of the text is like a snake.) Coke uses this maxim in a judgment reported at 2 Bulst. 179. MALEDICTA, ETC., is another version.

Vir et uxor censentur in lege una persona (Jenk. Cent. 27). (Husband and wife are considered one person in law.) This can scarcely be regarded as generally true nowadays. See OMNIA QUÆ SUNT, ETC.; UXOR NON, ETC.; MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY). But the common law liability of a husband for torts committed by his wife during coverture still remains

Virga; Virge. See VERGE.

Virgate. A yardland (q.v.).

Virginia Company. See COMPANIES, CHARTERED.

Viridario eligendo, De. A writ which anciently lay to the sheriff commanding him to hold an election of a verderer (q.v.).

Viscount. This is the fourth in rank of the peers; he ranks above a baron and below an earl. The title dates from 1440, when Henry VI. conferred a viscounty on John, Baron Beaumont.

The sons and daughters of a viscount are all known simply as "The Honourable," and this is the case even when the viscount holds a barony. See PEERAGE

Visible Means. In the County Courts Act, 1919 (substituted for s. 66 of the County Courts Act, 1888), this is to be taken as meaning means apparent to or capable of being ascertained by the plaintiff.

Visit and Search. See SEARCH.

Visitation; Visitor. Ecclesiastical and eleemosynary corporations are visitable, or subject to visitation, that is, the law has appointed proper persons (called visitors) to visit, inquire into and correct all irregularities that arise in them. With regard to ecclesiastical corporations, the Crown is the visitor of the archbishops, the archbishops of the bishops within their diocese, and the bishops are the visitors of all subordinate corporations, sole and aggregate. Hence, when an archbishop or bishop makes a circuit through his district to inquire into matters of Church discipline, this is called a visitation. As regards lay eleemosynary corporations, and other charities, the visitor is the founder, and his heirs, or a person appointed by him, or, in default of all of them, the Crown. The visitors of a charity superintend its internal management, but not (as a rule) the management of its estates and revenue.

The Lunacy Regulation Act, 1853, s. 16, established three "chancery visitors," one of them being a medical man and the other two being barristers. The Lunacy Act, 1890, s. 163, replaces that section and continues the chancery visitors. They visit and report as to both lunatics so found (ib.) and those not so found, in respect of whom proceedings in lunacy (q.v.) have been taken (Rules in Lunacy, 1893, r. 5), and, by order of the judge in Lunacy, persons alleged to be lunatics (Lunacy Act, 1890, s. 184). Together with the masters in lunacy (q.v.) they form a board (s. 167).

As to visiting justices, see PRISONS.

Visitation Books. These are records, made under royal authority by the Heralds College between 1528 and 1686, of the pedigrees and arms of peers, baronets and gentry. They would appear, at least as regards pedigrees, to be evidence of the fact that such and such statements were made to the heralds; but they scarcely appear to be evidence of the truth of those statements.

Visitor of Manners. Another name for the Regarder (q.v.).

Vis major is such a force as it is practically impossible to resist, e.g., a storm, earthquake, the acts of a large body of men, etc. The doctrine of vis major is, that a person is not liable for damage which he has been instrumental in producing, if it was directly caused by vis major. "Vis major" includes many things described as "the act of God" (q.v.), the latter term being perhaps more used in the law of contracts.

Visne was an old name for a jury, because formerly the jurors were taken de vicineto, that is, out of the neighbourhood where the matters in question had taken place.

Visus franciplegii. (The View of Frankpledge.) An enactment printed under these titles in the Statutes of the Realm (Vol. 1, p. 246), s.v. Statutes of Uncertain Date, and printed in the Statutes at Large as 17 Edw. 2, st. 2.

Vitium clerici nocere non debet (Jenk. Cent. 23). (An error of a clerk ought not to hurt.) This maxim, which is quoted only in connection with a clerical error by a clerk of the Court in entering a judgment, is not generally true. If I devise Blackacre to John Smith, then John Smith will take even though it be clearly proved under my own hand, but dehors the will, that I had intended the devise to be to James Smith: but as to inaccuracies which are of no substance, see FALSA, ETC. See AMBIGUITY.

Viva voce. See EXAMINATION; EVIDENCE.

Vivary, says Coke, "signifieth fish-ponds or waters wherein fish are kept or nourished. If a man buy divers fishes, as carps, breames, tenches, etc., and put them in his pond, and dyeth [intestate], in this case the heire shall have them, and not the executors, but they shall goe with the inheritance, because they were at libertie, and could not be gotten without industrie, as by nets, and other engines. Otherwise it is, if they were in a trunke or the like"; for in that case they go as personalty. A man has a qualified property in fish confined in a small pond, tank, or stew, so that they can be caught at pleasure, and they may therefore be the subject of larceny. "Vivary" seems to mean a place of this kind. See ANIMALS FERÆ NATURÆ; FISHERY.

Vivisection. The Cruelty to Animals Act, 1876, provides that (s. 1) it shall be an offence to perform any painful experiment on any animal except subject to the restrictions imposed by the Act, or (s. 6) to exhibit to the general public or to advertise any such experiment; that (s. 3) such experiment can be performed only by a person holding a licence from the Secretary of State, only for various specified purposes and under conditions as to anæsthetics insuring a minimum of pain; that (s. 7) such experiments must be made only in registered places; and that (s. 5) experiments on dogs, cats, horses, asses or mules shall be specially restricted. There are also various ancillary provisions. See URARI.

Vix ulla lex fieri potest quæ omnibus commoda sit, sed si majori parti prospiciat utilis est (Plow. 369). (Scarcely any law can be made which is applicable to all things; but it is useful if it regard the greater part.) Compare AD EA, ETC.

Void.—I. In the proper sense of the word, an agreement or other act is said to be void when it has no legal effect, or not the legal effect which it was intended to produce. Thus, an agreement which is void on account of its being made for an immoral consideration cannot be enforced. (See UNLAWFUL.) But an instrument which is void may subject the parties to penal consequences. Thus, an agreement amounting to a conspiracy would be admissible as evidence in criminal proceedings.

An act may be void either ab initio or ex postfacto. Thus, if a contract is made without the true consent of the parties, or for an immoral consideration, or in fraud of third persons, or by an infant (unless for necessaries), it is void ab initio. No person's rights can be affected by it, whether he be a party or a stranger. In the case of a contract which is void for illegality, immorality, or on a similar ground, if money has been paid as the consideration of its performance, the party who has paid it may repudiate the contract and recover it back at any time before performance. But when an unlawful contract has been executed, money paid either in consideration or performance of the contract cannot be recovered back, for IN PARI DELICTO MELIOR EST CONDITIO POSSIDENTIS (q.v.).

If a contract or deed is properly entered into, and is afterwards altered in a material point by the fraud or laches of either party, it becomes void ex postfacto as against him, so that he cannot enforce or take abvantage of it. Another example of a transaction becoming void ex postfacto occurs in the case of a transaction which was originally voidable, and has been avoided by the election of the party or otherwise. See AVOID; VOIDABLE.

A peculiar kind of void transaction is one the validity of which one of the parties is, as against the other, estopped from denying. Thus, if A by fraud induces B to sign a contract for the sale of land while he thinks he is signing one for the purchase of goods, the contract is void as against B, but he can nevertheless enforce it against A, because A is estopped from setting up his own fraud as a defence. Such a contract is said to be void as against third persons, and voidable as between the parties. See ESTOPPEL; MISTAKE; VOIDABLE.

II. "Void" is frequently used in the sense of "void ab initio," as opposed to "voidable" (q.v.).

Voidable. An agreement or other act is said to be voidable when either of the parties is entitled to rescind it, while until that happens it has the legal effect which it was intended to have. (See RESCIND; AVOID.) It can, however, be disputed only by certain persons and under certain conditions, and the right of rescission may be abandoned by the party entitled to exercise it. (See ADOPT; RATIFICATION.) If third persons acquire rights under a voidable contract or other transaction without notice and for value, they cannot afterwards be put in a worse position by its being set aside. Herein a voidable contract differs from a void contract, the nullity of which one of the parties is estopped from asserting (see VOID), for in the latter case no third person can acquire rights under the contract unless the party against whom it is void elects to affirm it.

The principal examples of voidable transactions occur in the case of fraud (q.v.), collateral mistakes (see MISTAKE), and lunacy (see LUNATIC). As to the contracts of infants, see INFANT.

Void and of None Effect. The same as void (q.v.).

Voire dire (Vrai dire; Veritatem dicere). This is a sort of preliminary examination of a witness by the judge, in which he is required to "speak the truth" with respect to the questions put to him; if his incompetency appears from this examination or from extrinsic evidence, e.g., on the ground that he is not of sound mind, he is rejected. The term applies also in the criminal law to sworn statements made to a judge (after a prisoner has been convicted or has pleaded guilty) as to character or previous convictions.

Volenti non fit injuria (Wing. Max. 482). – (That to which a man consents cannot be considered an injury.) This maxim is illustrated by the rule that no man can maintain an action of tort in respect of any act to the doing whereof he has consented. And so where a man connived at or condoned the adultery of his wife, the old action of crim. con did not lie; and in a like case now a husband cannot obtain a divorce. But there can be no consent to a battery, and therefore a prize fight is always illegal. See WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION.

Volumus. (We will.) A clause commencing with this word was formerly used in the writ of protection and was called the volumus See the statute 13 Rich. 2, c. 16, and PROTECTION.

Voluntary. A conveyance, settlement, gift or similar transaction is said to be voluntary when there is no valuable consideration for it See CONSIDERATION.

As a general rule a voluntary gift, conveyance or other executed transaction is valid as between the parties, and so is a voluntary contract, if under seal (see CONSIDERATION CONTRACT); but this rule is subject to exceptions, principally in favour of the creditors of the person bound by the transaction. Thus, in the administration of the estate of a deceased person, his voluntary bonds and covenants are postponed to his other debts and obligations. (See ASSETS.) The Court will not enforce specific performance of a voluntary covenant. As to the avoiding of voluntary conveyances and settlements, see SETTLEMENT; FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE.

Property passing under a voluntary settlement is liable to estate duty, if the settlement be for public or charitable purposes, unless the settlor lives for twelve months after the execution of the settlement (Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, s. 59 (1)), and is also so liable, if the settlement be for any other purpose, unless, in the case of a settlor dying after 29th April, 1909, the settlor has lived for three years after the execution of the settlement (ib.). Other dispositions of property, not being for valuable consideration, are subject to the like liability. See ESTATE DUTY.

In equity it is a rule that in every case where one person obtains, by voluntary donation (gift, settlement, contract, etc.), a large pecuniary benefit from another, he is bound to show that the donor understood what he was doing, and that, if he cannot, the donation may be set aside at the instance of the donor or his representatives. (See RESCISSION.) It is also a rule of equity that although no consideration is required for the validity of a complete declaration of trust, or a complete transfer of any legal or equitable interest in property, yet an incomplete voluntary gift creates no right which can be enforced. Thus, where a person possessed of a leasehold house and stock in trade purported to make a voluntary gift in favour of his grandson E by indorsing and signing the following memorandum on the lease, "This deed and all thereto belonging I give to E from this time forth, with all the stock in trade"; and by delivering the lease to E's mother on his behalf; it was held that there was no valid declaration of trust in favour of E (L. R. 18 Eq. 11). See OATHS; WASTE; WINDING-UP.

Voluntary Contributor. Defined in the National Insurance Act, 1911, s. 1 (1) (3), as amended by the National Insurance Act, 1913, s. 4, and the National Health Insurance Act, 1918, ss. 7 (1), 18 (2).

Voluntary School. The popular description of a public elementary school other than a provided (q.v.). school.

Voluntas donatoris in charta doni sui manifeste expressa observetur (Co. Litt. 21). (The will of the donor, clearly expressed in his deed of gift, is to be observed.)

Voluntas facit quod in testamento scriptum valeat (D. 30, 1, 12). (The intention [of the testator] is what gives effect to a will.) As to when the intention can be proved by evidence extrinsic to the will, see AMBIGUITY. Compare MENS TESTATORIS, ETC, but see VITIUM CLERICI, ETC.

Voluntas in delictis non exitus spectatur (3 Inst. 57.) (In crimes, the intention, and not the result, is looked to.) This maxim is of limited application. Unsuccessful attempts to commit crime are generally punished less severely than successful attempts (see AFFECTUS, ETC.); and there may be an offence even without criminal intent (see ACTUS NON, ETC.); but where A, intending to murder B, kills C by mistake, then A is guilty of murder (ib.) and compassing the death of the King is treason the moment it is evidenced by an overt act.

Voluntas reputabatur pro facto (3 Inst. 69). (The will is to be taken for the deed); but not always. See VOLUNTAS IN, ETC.

Voluntas testatoris est ambulatoria usque ad extremum vitæ exitum (4 Rep. 61). (The will of a testator is ambulatory [that is to say, it may be altered] down to the very end of his life.) But there are occasional exceptions to this rule: see AMBULATORIA, ETC. Compare OMNE TESTAMENTUM, ETC.

Voluntas testatoris habuit interpretationem latam et benignam (Jenk. Cent. 260). (The intention of a testator has [always] had a broad and benignant interpretation.) Compare IN TESTAMENTIS, ETC.; TESTAMENTA LATISSIMAM, ETC.; IN CONTRACTIBUS, ETC.

Volunteer is used in law in two senses. A person who gives his services without any express or implied promise of remuneration in return is called a volunteer, and is entitled to no remuneration for his services, nor to any compensation for injuries sustained by him in performing what he has undertaken. But a person who, though he is not obliged to do an act, yet has an interest in doing it, is not necessarily a volunteer. Thus, where the owner of goods assisted the servants of a railway company with the assent of the company in delivering them, and was injured by the servants' negligence, it was held that he was entitled to damages.

In the law of settlements and wills, a volunteer is a person who is merely an object of bounty, as opposed to a person who takes an interest for valuable consideration. Thus, an ordinary devisee or legatee is a volunteer; and if an appointment be made under a general power without consideration the appointee is a volunteer. So, in the case of a voluntary settlement or conveyance, the person on whom the voluntary settlement is made is called a volunteer. See VOLUNTARY.

Volunteers. All military service in this country is voluntary: the Militia (q.v.) ballot was not used after 1815, and compulsory military service was, in modern times, known only in connection with the war of 1914-18. The members of such supplementary forces as have from time to time been voluntarily raised for military purposes at times of emergency were known as volunteers. More than 400,000 volunteers were enrolled during the Napoleonic wars under various Acts of George III. In 1859 fears of a French invasion led to the formation of many volunteer units; and their position was regularised by the Volunteer Act, 1863, and the later Acts extending and amending it. They (with insignificant exceptions such as the volunteer corps at Oxford, Cambridge and Eton) were in 1908 all transferred to the Territorial Force (q.v.) by Orders in Council made pursuant to the Territorial and Reserve Forces Act, 1907.

Vouch; Voucher. To vouch is to call upon, rely on, or quote as an authority. Thus, in the old writers, to vouch a case or report is to quote it as an authority.

Hence, a "voucher" is a document which evidences a transaction, especially a receipt for the payment of money. In the practice of the Chancery Division, when an account is being taken in chambers, the accounting party has to produce vouchers for all payments of £2 or over claimed to have been made by him; smaller payments may be proved by the oath of the accounting party. This is called "vouching the account." Under Ord. 33, r. 3, the Court or a judge may give special directions as to vouching, etc., and under Ord. 33, r. 4*a*, it may be ordered that vouching, except in the case of contested items, be done in the office of the solicitor for the accounting party.

In the old law of real property, voucher (or "voucher to warranty") was where a person who was being sued for the recovery of land held by him called into Court the person who had warranted the land to him, and required him either to defend the title against the demandant or to yield him land of equal value; the person thus called into Court was called the vouchee. Double voucher was where the vouchee vouched the person who had warranted the land to him; and so with treble voucher, etc. A foreign voucher was where the vouchee was a foreigner, that is, a person out of the jurisdiction of the Court in which the action was brought. In the fictitious proceedings called common recoveries, the vouchee (or ultimate vouchee if there were more than one) was usually the crier of the Court, who was hence called the common vouchee. (See RECOVERY; PRÆCIPE.) Real actions were abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36, and the proceeding by voucher no longer exists. See WARRANTY; WARRANTIA CHARTÆ.

W

Wafer Seal. See GREAT SEAL; PRIVY SEAL.

Waftors. Edward IV. appointed certain officials styled waftors, custodes, and conductores to guard English fishing vessels off the east coast. To "waft" meant to convoy or safeguard a vessel on her voyage.

Wage. This was the same as gage. To wage one's law meant to proceed to compurgation (q.v.). It also meant to plead. See NON-SUMMONS.

Wager. A wager consists of mutual promises between two persons that one will pay the other a certain sum of money if a certain event happens or is ascertained to have happened. At common law a wager constituted a good contract, unless it was contrary to public policy, morality or the like; but by the Gaming Act, 1845, s. 18, all contracts by way of gaming or wagering are null and void, except so far as concerns subscriptions or contributions for prizes or money to be awarded to the winner of any lawful game, sport, pastime or exercise. There is nothing illegal in a wager: it is merely not enforceable. See UNLAWFUL.

Numerous questions have arisen as to the lawfulness of speculative transactions on the Stock Exchange, especially as regards "time-bargains" and "differences." A time-bargain is in form a contract to buy or sell shares or other securities, with an agreement (contemporaneous or subsequent) that the sale shall not be really carried out by delivery of the securities, but that one party shall pay to the other the difference between the market price of the security on the day when the contract was made and the day fixed for its performance. It is, therefore, a wager on the price of the security. The term "difference" is generally applied to the case where a person employs a broker to buy or sell stock for him on the understanding that when the day for completing the transaction arrives, the broker shall re-sell or re-buy the stock, and that the employer shall take the profit or bear the loss.

A time-bargain is void as between the parties to it, but if a broker is employed to speculate in stocks, he can recover from his employer brokerage and "differences" in respect of all genuine contracts for buying and selling stock which he enters into with other persons.

Wagering Policy. A policy effected on a life, ship, house, etc., in which the insurer has no insurable interest. See INTEREST.

Wager of Law. Compurgation (q.v.). Another "wager by law" was trial by battle See BATTLE.

Wages are money payable by a master to his servant in respect of services. (See MASTER AND SERVANT; SERVICE; TRUCK ACTS.) Some wages are preferential debts in bankruptcy (see DEBT). With reference to seamen's wages, the general rule used to be "freight is the mother of wages," so that if no freight was received no wages were payable; but this rule was abolished by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, s 183, which is now replaced by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 157. Seamen have a lien on the ship and freight for their wages. Claims for wages may be enforced by action in rem or in personam. Justices of the peace have jurisdiction in claims for wages up to £50 (Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 164). The wages of a master are on the same footing as those of ordinary seamen (ib. s 167).

No "wages of any servant, labourer or workman" can be attached by order of "any Court of record or inferior Court" (Wages Attachment Abolition Act, 1870).

Waifs, bona waviata, are stolen goods which are waived or thrown away by the thief in his flight, for fear of being apprehended. They belong to the owner, if he follows and apprehends the thief or prosecutes him to conviction; otherwise they belong to the Crown. (See PREROGATIVE; FRANCHISE; FUGITIVES' GOODS.) In very ancient times a woman who failed to answer an accusation was waived, that is to say, was declared a waif. This had the effect of making the Crown, or lord of franchise, entitled to seize the woman as if she were bona waviata. A woman could never be outlawed. See WAIVE; OUTLAWRY.

Wainable. Gainable (q.v.).

Wainagium; Wainage. Implements of husbandry. See GAINAGE.

Waiting Clerks. These were officials of the Court of Chancery who, having served under articles of apprenticeship for three years with one of the Sixty Clerks, were admitted to perform duties analogous to those of their masters, and they were appointed as sworn clerks when vacancies arose. They, along with the Six Clerks and the Sixty Clerks (see those titles), were abolished by the Court of Chancery Act, 1842, s. 1.

Waive; Waiver.—I. A person is said to waive a benefit when he renounces or disclaims it, and he is said to waive a tort or injury when he abandons the remedy which the law gives him for it. A waiver may be either express or implied. Thus, if a tenant commits a breach of covenant, and thereby makes the lease liable to forfeiture, the lessor may waive the breach either by promising not to take advantage of it, or by receiving rent after knowing of the breach: the former is an express, the latter an implied, waiver. Formerly, if a lessor waived a right of re-entry for a breach of covenant, or the like, this operated as a waiver in law of all future breaches, so that the right of re-entry was destroyed. This rule was abolished in 1859: see APPORTIONMENT.

II. "A man," says Coke, "which is outlawed is called outlawed, and a woman which is outlawed is called waived, waviata and not utlegata or exlex, for that women are not sworne in leets or tornes, as men which be of the age of twelve yeares or more be: and therefore men may be called utlegati, id est, extrà legem positi, but women are waviatæ, id est, derelictæ, left out or not regarded, because they were not sworne to the law" (Co. Litt. 122B). See WAIFS.

Waiver Clause. This was a clause frequently found in an application for shares in a company registered under the Companies Acts, until it was made void by s. 81 (4) of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908. The clause bound the applicant to forego all claims or damages which, apart from the clause, would arise by reason of the non-disclosure in the prospectus of material contracts, etc.

Wake. An assemblage of persons, especially at night, to watch round a corpse between the death and the burial. Now practically unknown in England. Forbidden, in case of death from infectious disease, by s. 68 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1907.

Wakeman. Literally, a watchman. Before the Reformation it was the title of certain officers of the town of Ripon, in Yorkshire, who, amongst other things, looked after the shrine of St. Wilfrid: afterwards, until 1604, it was the title of the official in Ripon who corresponded to the mayor of later times.

Wales. The Statutum Walliæ (1284) (12 Edw. I. st. 1) created the counties of Anglesea, Carnarvon, Merioneth, Flint, Carmarthen and Cardigan out of the "Land of Snowdon" (that is to say, the territory held down to 1282 by Llewelyn), and enacted that the "Justice of Snowdon" should have jurisdiction within them. The rest of Wales was under the jurisdiction of the Lords Marchers (q.v.) who had been given the right of holding their own Courts.

In 1536 the statute 27 Hen. 8, c. 26, which incorporated Wales with England, established the English county of Monmouth and the Welsh counties of Brecon, Radnor, Montgomery and Denbigh, and the same statute regularised the position of the Welsh counties of Pembroke and Glamorgan.

In 1543 the statute 34 & 35 Hen. 8, c. 26, established the "King's Great Sessions in Wales," which (see ss. 3-6) performed in all the twelve Welsh counties functions corresponding to those of assizes in England. These two Acts of 1536 and 1543 made the English law, but not the authority of the English Courts, prevail in Wales, and practically abolished the jurisdiction of the Lords Marchers. The Court of Great Sessions came to an end in 1830. In 1798 it was divided into four circuits, and there were eight judges with salaries amounting in the aggregate to £6,580 a year (Commons Committees Reports, 1803, Vol. 13, p. 203, 209-219).

See CHESTER; COUNCIL OF WALES; MARCHERS, LORDS; MONMOUTHSHIRE; RATIONABILE PARTE; WELSH CHURCH.

Walescheria. In the statute 12 Edw. 1 (Stat. Walliæ), cc. 3, 5, this word is defined to mean the [Welsh] kindred of a murdered man.

Waltham Black Act. A fuller popular title of the Black Act (q.v.).

Waltham Blacks. A popular name for the gang against which the Black Act (q.v.) was directed.

Wapentake in the northern counties is equivalent to a hundred (q.v.).

War Charities. The War Charities Act, 1916, s. 10, defines "war charity" as meaning "any fund, institution or association . . . having for its object or amongst its objects the relief of suffering or distress, the supply of needs or comforts or any other charitable purpose connected with the present war." To make any appeal, except in a place of public worship, for any war charity, unless the charity is registered or exempted from registration pursuant to the Act, is an offence (s. 1) punishable summarily with not more than three months' imprisonment or a fine not exceeding £100 (s. 9). The Act provides for registration and for the proper management of war charities. The Charity Commissioners are given extensive powers. See BLIND PERSONS.

Ward; Wardship. A ward is an infant who is under the care of a guardian (q.v.). Wardship is the condition or status of a ward.

If an action, suit or other proceeding relative to an infant's estate or person, and for his benefit, be instituted in the Chancery Division of the High Court, the infant, whether plaintiff or defendant, immediately becomes a ward of Court, although its father or testamentary guardian may be living. Thus, the institution of an action for the administration of property in which an infant is interested, or the payment into Court, under the Trustee Act, 1893, s. 42, of a fund in which he is interested, makes him a ward of Court. A ward of Court cannot be taken out of the jurisdiction of the Court, nor can any change be made in his or her position in life (as by marriage, adoption of a profession, etc.), without leave of the Court, and the details of his or her education and maintenance are regulated by the Court, namely, a judge of the Chancery Division sitting in chambers.

In the law of tenure, wardship was the right to the custody of the land, and in some cases also of the person, of an infant heir of land. The right was a chattel real. As to its nature and varieties, see GUARDIAN.

See COURT OF WARDS, ETC.

Wardage. Payments made for the maintenance of WATCH AND WARD (q.v.).

Warden literally means a keeper; but generally the term is used to denote an officer of the Crown. (See CINQUE PORTS; STANNARIES; MARCHES; DIES MARCHIÆ.) The master of a city company is sometimes termed a prime warden, and other members of the "court of assistants," or governing body of the company, are also termed wardens. In the Society of Apothecaries (q.v.) there are a master, two wardens, etc. (Apothecaries Act, 1815, Preamble).

Warden of the Forest. See FOREST.

Wardens of the Peace. The same as CONSERVATORS OF THE PEACE (q.v.). See Lamb: Eiren. Lit. 1, c. 3.

Wardmote. See LONDON.

Wardpenny. Wardage (q.v.), also an annual payment made to a feudal superior as a commutation of military service.

Wards. The City of London has from an early period been divided into wards. See LONDON.

In all boroughs except those of minute size

there are also for electoral purposes divisions known as wards. The Municipal Corporations Act, 1835, provided (s. 40) in appropriate cases for the delimitation of such divisions and (s. 40) for the allotment to each of them of various numbers (divisible by three) of councillors. That Act was repealed (with, of course, a saving for the arrangements made under it) by the Municipal Corporations Act which by s. 30 (as altered by the Municipal Corporations Act, 1893, s. 2) provided for future division into wards and for the alteration of existing wards; by s. 45 (5) for the preparation of a separate roll of burgesses in each ward; by s. 50 for a separate election of councillors for each ward; and, by s. 51, that no burgess should vote in more than one ward.

Wards have been formed in the larger parishes and the larger urban districts, for the purposes of various local government elections, in pursuance of various provisions of the Local Government Acts, 1888 and 1894.

Wardwit; Warwit. This seems to have meant, in some contexts, freedom from wardage and, in others, a fine for not maintaining watch (q.v.) and ward.

Warehouse. As used in, for instance, the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, this means a store in which dutiable goods may be deposited without payment of duty until they are re-exported—in which case no duty is payable—or until they are taken out for consumption in this country. See DRAWBACK.

Warehousing System. The use of warehouses (q.v.) for Customs purposes. It has been in operation since 1803. See the statute 43 Geo. 3, c. 132.

Waring, Ex parte. This case (reported 19 Ves. 345) was as follows:—Bracken & Co. had an account with bankers named Brickwood, drawing upon them by bill, and lodging in their hands from time to time securities against their drafts. Brickwoods became bankrupt on the 7th July, 1810, being then liable on acceptances for Bracken & Co. to the amount of £24,000, and having in their hands a cash balance of £6,700, and securities worth a considerable sum. On the 2nd August, 1810, Bracken & Co. also became bankrupt. Almost all the acceptances were proved against both estates, and the holders received dividends on Brickwoods' estate to the amount of £3,400. An application was then made by Waring and other holders of Brickwoods' acceptances, that the assignees (or the trustee in bankruptcy, as we should say now) of Brickwoods' estate might be ordered to pay to the petitioners and the other holders of the acceptances, the cash balance, less the dividends received by the petitioners (£6,700, less £3,400 = £3,300), and also the proceeds of the securities held by Brickwoods, towards satisfaction of the amount due on the acceptances. An order to this effect was accordingly made, on the ground that the securities were applicable in clearing the estate of Brickwoods from the liability on the acceptances, and that therefore, to avoid circuity, the securities should be given up to the holders of the acceptances: in other words, the securities held by the banker were made available to the bill holders, not directly, or as having a claim on the securities in respect of the acceptances by them, but through the equity (that is, the equitable rights and obligations) between the banker and the customer.

The rule in Ex parte Waring only applies—(i) where there is a double insolvency; and (ii) where there has been a specific appropriation of securities.

Warning. See CAVEAT.

War of 1914-18. For legal purposes this terminated on 31st August, 1921. See DEFENCE OF THE REALM.

War Office. The Government department of which the Secretary of State for War is the head. See SECRETARY OF STATE.

Warping. A means of fertilising land adjoining a tidal river and lying below high-water mark and above low-water mark. The land is artificially flooded through a sluice in an embankment and the water is not discharged until any sediment suspended therein has been deposited on the land. Capital moneys arising under the Settled Land Acts may be expended on warping (Settled Land Act, 1882, ss. 21 (iii), 25 (ii)). Warping by a tenant is an improvement in respect of which the tenant cannot claim unless the landlord had consented in writing to the warping (Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908, s. 2, Sch. I., Pt. I.).

Warrant. In its primary sense, a warrant is an authority.

As to the warrant required for the use of the GREAT SEAL, see that title.

As to warrants for the delivery of goods, see DOCK WARRANT; DELIVERY ORDER. As to share warrants, see SHARE. See also WARRANT OF ATTORNEY.

Warrants are used in executing process both in civil and criminal cases.

In ordinary actions, when a sheriff does not execute a writ either personally or by his under-sheriff, he must authorise a bailiff to execute it; and this authority is given by a document called a warrant. See BAILIFF.

The Criminal Procedure Act, 1853, s. 9, enables a judge of the High Court to issue a warrant for bringing up any prisoner or person committed for trial, to be examined as a witness in any Court; and the Prisons Act, 1898, s. 11, gives like power to the Home Secretary. See HABEAS CORPUS.

Under the old practice of the Admiralty Court, a warrant in a cause in rem corresponded to and was almost in the same words as the writ of summons in an Admiralty action in rem under the present practice. As to the warrant of arrest in an Admiralty action, see ARREST.

A warrant may be issued by a justice to arrest:—

(1) A person accused of an indictable offence (Indictable Offences Act, 1848, s. 1).

(2) A person accused of an offence punishable summarily (Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, s. 2).

(3) A witness who will not voluntarily attend a hearing before justices (Indictable Offences Act, 1848, s. 16; Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, s. 7).

Under the Acts governing the hearing before justices of charges triable summarily or on indictment there are other warrants, which cannot be dealt with here, such as distress warrants (authorising the levy of a penalty by distraint and sale of a defendant's goods), warrants of commitment of a defendant to prison, etc.

See ARREST; BACKING A WARRANT; BENCH WARRANT; EXTRADITION; SEARCH WARRANT.

Warrantia chartæ was a real action which lay to enforce a warranty of title to land where the tenant was unable to avail himself of the warranty by voucher (q.v.). It was abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36. See WARRANTY.

Warrantia diei. A writ which formerly lay for the protection of one who was bound to appear on a certain day in an action but who was employed on the king's service so that he could not come.

Warrant of Attorney originally meant the same thing as a power or letter of attorney, but at the present day the term is used only to denote a written authority from a person enabling the person to whom it is given (the attorney) to enter an appearance for him in an action, and to allow judgment to be entered for the plaintiff, or to suffer judgment to go by default. Such a warrant is usually given to secure the payment of a sum of money, and is therefore qualified by a condition that it shall only be put in force if the debt is not paid by a certain day; this condition is expressed in a document called the defeasance, which also usually contains various stipulations designed to facilitate the execution of the judgment when obtained. The defeasance must be written on the same paper or parchment as the warrant (Debtors Act, 1869, s. 26), and its execution requires to be attested by a solicitor, who must explain the nature of the document to the debtor before he signs it (ib. s. 24). It must be filed within twenty-one days of its execution (ib. s. 26). Warrants of attorney are not now of such frequent occurrence as formerly.

A warrant of attorney is given in contemplation of proceedings being necessary. A cognovit (q.v.) is given after proceedings have been commenced.

Warranty. This means "an agreement with reference to goods which are the subject of a contract of sale, but collateral to the main purpose of such contract, the breach of which gives rise to a claim for damages, but not to a right to reject the goods and treat the contract as repudiated" (Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 62 (1)); but "whether a stipulation in a contract of sale is a condition, the breach of which may give rise to a right to treat the contract as repudiated, or a warranty, depends in each case on the construction of the contract"; and "a stipulation may be called a condition though called a warranty in the contract" (ib. s. 11 (1) (b)). For further particulars see ss. 10-15 generally of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893.

A warranty of goods may constitute a defence to a criminal charge: see, for instance, the Rag Flock Act, 1911, s. 1.

In the law of marine insurance, what is called a warranty is in fact a condition. See the Marine Insurance Act, 1906, ss. 33-41, and especially s. 33, which provides for the release of the insurer from liability, unless the policy contains a provision to the contrary, if the warranty is not exactly complied with. The most usual express warranties are, that a ship is safe on a given day, and that she will sail or depart on a given day. The most important implied warranty is that the vessel is seaworthy at the commencement of the risk (see s. 39). Warranty of documentation is a warranty that she has those documents which are required by international law or treaty to establish her national character. A continuing warranty is one which applies to the whole period during which the contract is in force:

thus, an undertaking in a charterparty that a vessel shall continue to be of the same class that she was at the time the charterparty was made is a continuing warranty.

When a man holds himself out as the agent of another he is deemed to warrant his authority to act as agent, and if, and in so far as, he is without such authority as he purports to have, an action for breach of warranty of authority will lie against him for one damnified by such absence of authority.

In the old law of real property, warranty was an obligation by the feoffor or donor of land (or other hereditaments) to defend the feoffee or donee in the possession of the land, and to give him land of equal value if he was evicted from it. A warranty was a real covenant. (See COVENANT.) Warranties were either in deed, that is, expressed; or in law, that is, implied. Warranties in deed were of three kinds. (1) Lineal warranty was where the heir of the warrantor was, or might by possibility have been, entitled to the land by descent from the warrantor; this happened if a man seised of lands in fee made a feoffment of them by deed and bound himself and his heirs to warranty, and died, so that the warranty descended to his heir, who would otherwise have inherited the land. (2) Collateral warranty was where the heir of the warrantor could not by any possibility have been entitled to the land by descent from the warrantor; thus, if a younger son released with warranty to his father's disseisor, this warranty was collateral to his elder brother, because by no possibility could the latter in such a case claim the land as heir to his younger brother. (3) Where the conveyance to which the warranty was annexed immediately followed a disseisin, or operated itself as such (as where a father, being tenant for years with remainder to his son in fee, aliened in fee simple with warranty), this was called a warranty commencing by disseisin, and did not bar the heir of the warrantor.

The operation of a warranty as against the heir of a warrantor in case the warrantee was evicted from the land was to compel him to yield the warrantee other lands in its stead, to the extent of any land which had descended to him from the ancestor; and if he had no land by descent, then he was barred of all claim to the land warranted. This operation, however, was from time to time restrained by various statutes; and voucher (q.v.) and the writ of warrantia chartæ (q.v.) were both abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 36, so that a warranty of land is now entirely inoperative. A fictitious warranty was the foundation of the proceeding called a common recovery (q.v.), now also abolished. (See RECOVERY.) Warranty was implied in certain cases; thus, the word "give" in a feoffment created a warranty binding on the feoffor during his life; and an exchange at common law created an implied warranty (see EXCHANGE); these and all other implied warranties were abolished by the Real Property Act, s. 3. See ASSETS BY DESCENT; REBUTTER.

Warren is the privilege of keeping and killing certain kinds of animals (especially hares and rabbits) on a piece of ground. As to what are beasts of warren, see GAME. A warren in the hands of a private person (sometimes called a free warren) is a franchise (q.v.); it may be claimed either by royal grant or prescription, and may exist either in the lands of the owner of the warren, or in those of another person.

The owner of a warren has a qualified property in the animals belonging to it, so that no other person can acquire a property in them either by taking them within the warren, or by chasing them thence and taking them on other ground. See ANIMALS FERÆ NATURÆ; FOREST; GAME.

The word warren, as used in s. 17 of the Larceny Act, 1861, is impliedly defined by that section as "ground lawfully used for the breeding or keeping of hares or rabbits, whether enclosed or not."

Waste.—I. In the law of real property, waste is, properly speaking, land which has never been cultivated, as opposed to pasture and arable land, etc. The most important kind of waste is manorial waste, or that part of a manor which is subject to the tenants' rights of common, and hence "waste" is sometimes used improperly to denote any land subject to rights of common or similar rights, although under cultivation. (See COMMON; COMMONABLE; LAMMAS LANDS; MANOR; OPEN FIELDS; SHACK.) The soil of a manorial waste is vested in the lord of the manor, and he therefore is entitled to pasture his cattle on it. He is also entitled to the minerals under the waste, and may work them so that he do not unduly interfere with the commonable rights of the tenants. As to the inclosure of waste lands, see APPROVEMENT; INCLOSURE.

II. In the law of torts, waste is whatever does lasting damage to the freehold or inheritance of land, or anything which alters the nature of the property so as to make the proof of ownership more difficult, or to destroy or weaken the proof of identity, or diminish the value of the estate, or increase the burden upon it. It is either voluntary or permissive—the former being an offence of commission, such as pulling down a house, converting arable land into pasture, opening new mines or quarries, etc.: the latter is one of omission, such as allowing a house to fall for want of necessary repairs, allowing land to remain flooded with water, etc.

A copyhold tenant may not commit waste upon the lands he holds. A freehold tenant in fee simple or fee tail, on the other hand, may commit as much waste as he likes; but the general rule is, that a tenant for life of freehold land is impeachable for waste, that is, he may not commit waste unless his estate is without impeachment of waste (or sans waste), as where it is expressly so given to him. (See TENANT IN TAIL AFTER POSSIBILITY OF ISSUE EXTINCT.) But there are certain kinds of waste which Courts of Equity would always prevent, even where the tenant for life was unimpeachable for waste, and which are hence known as equitable waste: cutting down ornamental timber, and pulling down buildings, are instances of equitable waste: where, however, a tenant for life pulls down a building and erects a new one in such a way as to effect an improvement, the Court will not interfere, this being what is called "meliorating" or "ameliorating waste."

The remedy for waste is an action for damages or an injunction.

Watch and Ward. In the old books, one of the principal duties of constables is described as that of keeping watch and ward; "ward" being used to signify the duty of apprehending rioters and robbers during the day-time, while "watch" is properly applicable to the night. See CONSTABLE; RATE.

Watch Committee. In a borough with a population exceeding 10,000 according to the census of 1881 (see the Local Government Act, 1888, s. 39 (1) (a)), which is subject to the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, the town council appoint not more than one third of their body to form, along with the mayor, the Watch Committee (s. 190), which controls the borough police (ss. 191, 192).

Watches. A customs duty at the rate of thirty-three and one-third per cent. is payable on imported watches and clocks (Finance (No. 2) Act, 1915, s. 12). See also MERCHANDISE MARKS.

Water is either public or private. Public waters are the sea and its branches, and navigable rivers, the beds of which belong primâ facie to the Crown. As a rule the soil of estuaries and of rivers (whether navigable or not) in which the tide ebbs and flows is vested in the Crown. (See HIGH SEAS; KING'S CHAMBERS; RIVERS.) Private waters are rivers, streams, lakes and ponds, etc., the beds of which belong to private persons. Prima facie the soil of non-tidal rivers and lakes belongs to the owners of the adjoining land. Public waters are, as a rule, subject only to the public right of navigation, and to the right of access possessed by the owners of the adjoining shores or banks. (See ACCESS; FRONTAGE; NAVIGABLE; RIPARIAN.) As to the right of fishing in public waters, see FISHERY. As to territorial waters, see TERRITORIAL.

Private waters may be subject to a right of navigation by the public, as in the case of the Severn and other rivers.

The distinction between public waters and private waters subject to a public right of navigation is that in the case of the latter the owners of the soil may (as against the public) do what they like with the water and its bed so long as they do not obstruct the navigation.

Private waters passing through or between the lands of different proprietors may be subject to two kinds of rights, natural and acquired. Natural or proprietary rights are those possessed by every riparian proprietor, and consist principally in the right to have the water flow in its accustomed manner, without sensible disturbance or diminution by the superior and inferior riparian proprietors, and the right to the reasonable use of the water while it is flowing past his land, including its use for domestic purposes, for turning mills, etc. The law is the same with regard to subterranean water flowing through a defined channel: but with regard to water which merely percolates through gravel, etc., the law is different, and a landowner can appropriate such water to the exclusion of a neighbour under whose land it would otherwise percolate, although he may not so deal with it that it flows under his neighbour's land in a polluted state. Acquired rights are those easements which entitle a riparian proprietor to interfere with a natural stream of water to an extent not justified by his natural or proprietary rights, e.g., by diminishing or obstructing the flow of water, or by polluting it, etc., or which entitle him to the use of an artificial watercourse (q.v.) Acquired rights in respect of water may exist in the inhabitants of a district by virtue of a custom. As to the right of fishing in private waters, see FISHERY.

Water covering and surrounded by land belonging to one proprietor is not the subject of any special rights. It is not considered as part of the soil, and therefore a right to go on a man's land and take water from it is an easement and not a profit à prendre; and if a man grant to another a piece of water on his land, all that the grantee takes is the right of fishing in it. The proper legal description of a pond or the like is "land covered with water."

Water supplied through pipes in return for payment is, like gas, capable of being stolen so that the offence of larceny is committed.

For other points connected with water, see ACCRETION; ALLUVION; CONSERVATORS OF RIVERS; DERELICTION; FERRY; FORESHORE; FRONTAGE; SHIP.

Water-bailiff. Formerly this meant an officer in a seaport town whose duty it was to search ships; and in the City of London it was the title of an official who supervised fishing boats coming to the Thames, collected river tolls, acted as master of the ceremonies to the Lord Mayor, and arrested, for debt or in criminal matters, persons on the river. Now it means an official entrusted with the enforcement of the Acts for the preservation of salmon (Salmon Fishery Act, 1873, s. 36), and all freshwater fish (Freshwater Fisheries Act, 1884, s. 3).

Watercourse. In the proper sense of the word, a watercourse is an artificial channel (whether above or below ground) by which water is led from or over the land of one person to or over that of another. The right of watercourse, in this sense of the word, is therefore the right of receiving or discharging water through another person's land, and is an easement, the tenement for the benefit of which the watercourse exists being the dominant tenement. (See EASEMENT.)

In some cases, however, it seems that where a watercourse passes over land for the discharge of water from the dominant tenement, the owner of the servient tenement may be entitled to have the flow of water through the watercourse uninterrupted, so that the dominant owner cannot stop or divert it. In such a case there are correlative easements, each tenement and owner being dominant or servient, according to the easement which is in question: and the watercourse is, in law, practically undistinguishable from a natural stream.

The term "watercourse" is also sometimes applied to natural streams. The rights of receiving and discharging the water of a natural stream over the land of adjoining proprietors are not easements, but natural rights. See WATER.

Water Gavel. A rent paid for water or for fishing rights. See GAVEL.

Water-guard. See COASTGUARD.

Water Measure. A measure formerly used for the sale of coals in the Pool of London. It was larger than Winchester measure (q.v.).

Watermen. The Thames watermen were persons who used to ply upon the Thames, from Gravesend to Windsor, with small rowing boats, for the conveyance of passengers from shore to shore and up and down the river. They had from ancient times a monopoly of this business, and were a company known as the Company of Watermen. They and the lightermen, or men who worked with lighters, were formed into one company, under the name of the Watermen's and Lightermen's Company, by the statute 11 & 12 Will. 3, c. 21, which, together with nine other Acts, is recited in the preamble to the statute 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. lxxv. The Act of George IV., after repealing most of the Acts recited in it, made the company a body corporate with important powers of registering boats, licensing watermen and lightermen, and regulating water traffic. All these powers—or such of them as had survived intermediate legislation—were transferred to the Port Authority by the Port of London Act, 1908, s. 11, which, however, still left the company their Hall—known as Watermen's Hall—a couple of adjoining houses and certain funds to the value of about £10,000. The company is not, and never was, one of the Livery Companies. See COMPANIES, CITY.

Waveson. Floating wreckage: apparently the same as flotsam. See JETSAM.

Waviata. See WAIFS.

Waxscot. See CERAGE.

Way. A right of way is where a person has the right of passing through or over land not belonging to him.

Ways are either public or private. Public ways are more commonly called highways (q.v.).

Private rights of way are of various kinds. They may be limited (1) as to the intervals at which they may be used, e.g., a way to church or market; (2) as to the actual extent of the user authorised, e.g., a foot-way, horse-way, cart-way, carriage-way, a way for driving cattle, or drift-way, a way for carrying coals, etc.; and (3) as to the nature of the tenement to which the way is claimed, e.g., a way to a shed used for storing wood.

As to ways of necessity, see EASEMENT.

A private right of way is either an easement (q.v.) or a customary right.

The obstruction of a private way is a disturbance (q.v.); the obstruction of a public way is a nuisance (q.v.).

Way-going Crop. See AWAY-GOING.

Wayleave is a right of way over or through land for the carriage of minerals from a mine or quarry. It is an easement (q.v.), being a species of the class called rights of way (see WAY), and is generally created by express grant or by reservation. A wayleave rent may be a fixed annual sum, or a sum payable according to the quantity of minerals drawn over the way, or a combination of the two. See RENT.

"'Mineral wayleave' means any wayleave, airleave, waterleave or right to use a shaft granted to or enjoyed by a working lessee, whether above or under ground, for the purpose of access to or for the conveyance of the minerals, or the ventilation or drainage of the mine, or otherwise in connection with the working of the minerals" (Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, s. 24).

Waynagium. The same as Wainagium.

Waywardens. The Highways Acts provided that in every parish forming part of a highway district there should annually be elected one or more waywardens. The waywardens so elected, and the justices for the county residing within the district, formed the highway board for the district. Each waywarden also represented his parish in regard to the levying of the highway rates, and in questions arising concerning the liability of his parish to repairs, etc. But now there are no waywardens and no highway board, the rural district council (Local Government Act, 1894, s. 25 (1)) being now the highway authority.

Weald. A wood. The Weald of Kent is a part of the county which formerly was densely wooded.

Weights and Measures. The Weights and Measures Act, 1878, enacts that the same weights and measures shall be used throughout the United Kingdom. It established standards of weights and measures, and provides that all contracts, sales, etc., made in the United Kingdom for any work, goods, etc., by weight or measure, shall be deemed to be made and had according to those weights and measures, and if not so made shall be void. It also imposes penalties on persons using or having in their possession unjust measures or weights. It has been amended by the Weights and Measures Acts, 1889, 1892, 1893 and 1904. See also METRIC SYSTEM.

Before 1824 there was no uniform system of weights and measures. Sale by customary and local weights and measures was usual and legal. The Weights and Measures Act, 1824, enacted by s. 15, that, as from 1st May, 1825, all contracts for the sale of goods should, unless the contrary was specified, relate to the standards of weights and measures established by that Act. The Act of 1824 (except s. 25, which is unimportant) and the various Acts extending and amending it, were all repealed by the Act of 1878, which for the first time made it impossible to sell except by standard weights and measures.

See the titles of the various weights and measures. See also ASSISA DE PONDERIBUS.

From time immemorial corn has been sold in England by the bushel and the quarter (q.v.), that is to say, by measure of capacity. Now under the Corn Sales Act, 1921, ss. 1, 7, corn in any quantity weighing not less than one hundredweight must (except in certain specified cases) be sold by weight only, as from 1st January, 1923; and s. 6, in addition to giving a comprehensive definition of "corn," provides that many other things, such as potatoes and flax, must be sold in like manner.

Weiring. The same as warping (q.v.).

Welsh Church. The Church of England, in so far as it existed in Wales (including Monmouthshire) was, as from 31st March, 1920, disestablished by the Welsh Church (Temporalities) Act, 1919, s. 2. As to the dioceses affected, see BISHOPRICS. This disestablishment was provided for by the Welsh Church Act, 1914, the operation of which had been postponed by the Suspensory Act, 1914. As from 31st March, 1920, every ecclesiastical corporation in Wales became dissolved pursuant to the Welsh Church Act, 1914, s. 2; and, under s. 3 of that Act the ecclesiastical law and the ecclesiastical courts ceased from that date to operate in Wales.

Under the two Acts the Church in Wales was deprived of its emoluments, but provision was made for the transfer to a "representative body" of churches, parsonages, certain of the endowments and also a sum of £1,000,000 in respect of the commutation of existing interests of individuals: and the representative body has been authorised, by Royal Charter (granted 15th April, 1919, pursuant to s. 13 (2) of the Welsh Church Act, 1914), to hold land in mortmain. Reference should be made to the Acts of 1914 and 1919, the Welsh Church Rules, 1919, and the Charter for further details.

Welsh Commissioners. Three persons, of whom one at least must be a member of the Church of England, appointed (at salaries of £1,500 for one of them and of £1,000 for the two others) pursuant to the Welsh Church Act, 1914, s. 1, for the purpose of carrying out the disestablishment of the Welsh Church. They are to hold office up to such date as may be fixed by Order in Council (Welsh Church (Temporalities) Act, 1919, s. 1).

Welsher. One who takes from another money as a deposit for a bet made with him, intending not to pay what the other may win and to retain the deposit for himself, and who, in fact, carries out this course of business. This is larceny by a trick: and if the word is used in its accurate sense it is actionable without proof of special damage. But to call a politician a welsher because he gets into power by promises which he does not keep, is not actionable per se.

Welsh Insurance Commissioners. See INSURANCE COMMISSIONERS.

Welsh Mortgage. See MORTGAGE.

Wer; Were. Money paid as compensation for injury under the Anglo-Saxon Laws.

Wergild. Compensation for personal injury.

Westbury's Act, Lord. The popular title of the Land Registry Act, 1862. See LAND REGISTRIES.

Westminster the First, Statute of. This is the name of the fifty-one chapters (each corresponding to what is now called an Act of Parliament) passed in 1275.

Westminster the Second, Statute of. The fifty "chapters" passed in 1285. The first of them is the statute DE DONIS, ETC.; see ESTATE TAIL.

Westminster the Third, Statute of. See QUIA EMPTORES.

Westmorland. The office of sheriff of this county was granted by King John to Robert de Veteripont and his heirs. Under this grant and various conveyances the office descended to Henry, Earl of Thanet, who died in 1849 without issue. He purported to devise the office by his will, but doubts arose as to whether it passed under this devise, or whether it passed to his heir, or whether it escheated to the Crown. The matter was settled by the statute 13 & 14 Vict. c. 30, which abolished all hereditary claim to the office and vested the appointment in the Crown as in other counties. The Sheriffs Act, 1887, s. 31, finally put the sheriff of Westmorland in precisely the same legal position in all respects as other sheriffs.

While the shrievalty was hereditary, it descended to females as well as to males; and Coke states that one female holder of the office performed it in person.

West Saxonlage. The laws of the West Saxons. See DANELAGE.

Whales. See ROYAL FISH.

Wharf. This expression is defined, for the purposes of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, by s. 492 of that Act. The Larceny Act, 1916, s. 15, deals with larceny from wharves, and the Malicious Damage Act, 1861, s. 31, with malicious damage to them.

Wharfinger. For definition see the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 492, and the Port of London Act, 1908, s. 49.

Whip. The whip (or more fully, the whipper-in) of a pack of hounds is a man whose function it is to keep hounds from skirting, hunting rabbits, and doing other things which lessen the efficiency of the pack. The term is also applied to the members of Parliament who are detailed by the leaders of the various political parties for the duty of keeping other members of their party up to their work. See LORD TREASURER.

Whipping. This was a recognised part of the common law punishment for misdemeanours, and down to the enactment of the Whipping Act, 1820, it could be inflicted on women as well as on men. Now, under s. 36 of the Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, no person can be whipped except under a statutory enactment. Such enactments are very numerous, more especially as regards boys under sixteen. As regards adult males, see, for instance, GARROTTING and TREASON.

No offender can now be whipped more than once for the same offence (Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, s. 36). See CAT.

Whirligig. See s. 36 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, as to the powers of urban authorities regarding steam-driven whirligigs, swings, roundabouts and merry-go-rounds. As to rural authorities, see ss. 5, 50.

White Book of London. Printed under the title of the Liber Albus in No. 12 of the Rolls Series. It sets out the mediæval customs and laws, including the maritime laws, of the City of London.

Whitecross Street Prison. A debtors' prison belonging to the sheriffs of London and Middlesex, to which the debtors, etc., confined in the Queen's Prison (q.v.) were removed in 1862. It ceased to be used after Holloway Prison was substituted in pursuance of s. 12 of the Queen's Prison Discontinuance Act, 1862.

Whitefriars. See PRIVILEGED PLACES.

White Lyon Prison. See COURT OF CHIVALRY.

White Meats. These are milk, eggs, butter and cheese and anything of which any of those things is an ingredient. The use of white meats during Lent was prohibited before the Reformation and up to 1643, when Henry VIII. sanctioned it by proclamation. See PROCLAMATIONS, ROYAL.

White Phosphorus. See MATCHES.

White Rent. See ALBA FIRMA.

White Rod. See USHER.

White Spur. A kind of esquire was formerly so described.

Whit Sunday. The seventh Sunday after Easter Sunday (q.v.). See FAST DAYS; FEASTS.

Whitsuntide Farthings. The same as Pentecostals (q.v.).

Widow of the King. The same as king's widow (q.v.).

Widow's Chamber. Until the statute 19 & 20 Vict. c 94, abolished all special customs as to the distribution of the estates of intestates, the widow of an intestate freeman of the City of London was entitled to the "widow's chamber," that is to say, her wearing apparel and the furniture of her bedchamber.

Wife, Coercion of. A wife committing any crime in the presence of her husband is, as a general rule, presumed to have acted under the coercion of her husband and therefore not be criminally responsible. This presumption never applied to specially heinous crimes, such as treason, murder or manslaughter, or to crimes, such as the keeping of a brothel, which involve an abuse of peculiarly feminine functions. It has been extended to some misdemeanours, such as the uttering of base coin: but to them it does not apply as certainly as it does to felonies generally. The presumption may in every case be rebutted; it does not arise where the husband is proved to have been physically incapable of coercion; and it does not apply where the wife commits a crime by the order of her husband but not in his presence.

The presumption dates from the period when the average wife did in fact obey her husband. It has in recent years led to the acquittal of women in cases where, apart from the presumption, there would have been no question of coercion; and an alteration of the law is evidently desirable.

Wild Animals. See ANIMALS FERÆ NATURÆ.

Wild Birds. All birds other than game and domestic fowl are wild birds for the purposes of the Wild Birds Protection Acts, 1880 to 1908. The Wild Birds Protection Act, 1880, s. 3, makes it an offence to kill between 1st March and 1st August any wild bird which is included in the Schedule to that Act, or which is added to that Schedule pursuant to s. 3 of the Wild Birds Protection Act, 1894; but s. 3 of the Act of 1880 authorises the owner or occupier of any land, or any one authorised by him, to kill on such land any other wild bird at any time, although it prohibits the killing of any wild bird by other persons between 1st March and 1st August. The Wild Birds Protection Act, 1894, provides for the protection of the eggs of any wild bird specified in an order made pursuant to that Act. The use of pole traps (that is to say, spring traps on the tops of poles, etc.) was prohibited by the Wild Birds Protection Act, 1904. The Wild Birds Protection Act, 1908, forbids the capture of wild birds with lines and baited hooks.

Wildes. In the statute 14 Car. 2, c. 6, s. 17, "wildes" is a misprint for "wealds."

Wild's Case, Rule in. Wild's Case is reported 6 Co. Rep. 17, and the rule established by it is as follows: Where there is a devise to a person and his children, then, if there were children actually born at the time when the will was made, the parent and the children take a fee simple concurrently as joint tenants, unless there be words in the context to show that the children are not intended to take immediately; if there be such words, then, according to such intention as is disclosed, the parent either takes an estate tail or else the parent takes for life and the children take in succession to him as purchasers: if there were no children born at the date of the will, then the parent takes an estate tail unless the context shows that he is to take for life and that unborn children are to take in succession to him as purchasers.

Wilful means intentional or deliberate. Thus if a person accidentally strikes another, this is a battery giving rise to a right of action for damages, while, if he does it intentionally it is a wilful battery, for which the party injured may have an action of damages or a criminal prosecution. (See BATTERY.) Similarly a "wilful default" is an act of omission done with intention. Mortgagees and other persons holding securities are liable for losses caused by their wilful default; hence if a mortgagee of land in possession does not avail himself of an opportunity of letting the land beneficially, he is bound to give credit for what he has thus lost by his wilful default. (See MORTGAGEE IN POSSESSION.) Wilful default is a species of contributory negligence. See NEGLIGENCE.

Will. A will is a disposition or declaration by which the person making it (who is called the testator) provides for the distribution or administration of property after his death. It does not take effect until the testator's death, and is always revocable by him.

Formerly "will" signified a testamentary disposition of land, as opposed to a testament (q.v.), but this distinction is now obsolete. In the strict sense of the word, a will includes all testamentary dispositions by the testator in force at the time of his death; but in practice "will" signifies a testamentary document which is in form complete in itself, while additional or supplementary dispositions are called "codicils." See CODICIL; TESTAMENTARY.

A will of fixed or immoveable property (including leaseholds) is generally governed by the lex loci rei sitæ. (See LEX LOCI.) Thus, a will made in Holland in the Dutch language must, in order to operate on lands in England, be executed and attested according to English law, and must contain expressions which, being translated into English, would comprise and pass the lands in question. In regard to personal, or rather moveable property, the will is governed by the law of the place where the person was domiciled at the time of his death. But as regards formalities of execution, this rule is now subject to some exceptions, as to which see DOMICILE.

Infants and lunatics are wholly incapable of making wills while their disability lasts. A married woman (married before 1st January, 1883) may make a will in respect of property which is her separate estate, or, with the assent of her husband, in respect of personal estate other than separate estate. (See SEPARATE ESTATE; TESTABLE.) A woman married after 31st December, 1882, has complete testamentary power with regard to all her property of every kind. The will of a woman dying a widow after 5th December, 1893, even if it is executed during coverture, speaks as from the date of her death (Married Women's Property Act, 1893, s. 3). All other persons have complete testamentary capacity. A person may also have a power of appointment by will over property not belonging to him (see POWER; TESTABLE): the rule of the High Court (in its probate jurisdiction) as to such wills is that it will grant probate of any instrument of a testamentary character if duly executed, leaving the question whether it is a valid exercise of the power to be decided by the proper tribunal, so that a testamentary document purporting to be made in execution of a power may be proved as a will and yet be invalid, because it has not complied with the power. By the Wills Act, 1837, s. 10, every will executed in accordance with its provisions (infra) is declared to be, so far as respects the execution and attestation thereof, a valid execution of a power of appointment by will, although the power may have expressly required that a will made in exercise of it should be executed with some additional or other form of execution or solemnity. See APPOINTMENT; EXECUTE.

A person having testamentary capacity may dispose by will of all real and personal estate which he shall be entitled to, either at law or in equity, at the time of his death, and which, if not so disposed of, would devolve upon his heir, executor or administrator, including estates pur auter vie, and all contingent, executory and future interests in property, and all rights of entry (Wills Act, 1837, s. 3). See OCCUPANCY; RIGHT OF ENTRY.

A will may be joint, or joint and mutual, and the wills of two or more persons may be mutual but not joint. A will is joint when two persons by the one instrument dispose of the things over which they respectively have testamentary power; a will is joint and mutual when made jointly by two persons who each takes benefits under the will of the other; and wills are mutual but not joint when each makes a separate will under which the other takes benefits. A joint will is the will of each testator, and will be admitted to probate as soon as he dies. Each maker of a mere joint will can at any time before his death revoke it in so far as it relates to what he personally can dispose of; a joint and mutual will or mutual wills can be revoked by either party during the lifetime of the other, but a joint and mutual will, or a mutual will, cannot be revoked by a survivor who takes benefits under the will of the testator who first died, and the survivor is in equity a trustee for the personal representatives of the deceased testator as regards whatever the deceased was to have taken under the will as it stood when the first of the testators died.

As to devises in mortmain, see that title.

As to the descent of trust and mortgage estates, notwithstanding a testamentary disposition, see DESCENT.

No particular form of words is required to make a valid will so long as the testator's intention can be ascertained; otherwise its provisions will fail from uncertainty (q.v.).

A will must in ordinary cases be in writing, and signed at the foot or end by the testator, or by some one in his presence and by his direction, and the signature must be made or acknowledged by the testator in the presense of two or more witnesses, who must be present together at the same time, and must attest and subscribe the will in the presence of the testator (Wills Act, 1837, s. 9; Wills Act Amendment Act, 1882). See ATTESTATION CLAUSE.

A devise or bequest to an attesting witness, or to his or her wife or husband, does not affect the validity of the will, but the gift is void (Wills Act, 1837, s. 15) unless the will be one made under s. 11 of the Wills Act, 1837, and requiring no attestation, that is to say, a will made by a soldier in actual military service or by a mariner or seaman at sea (ib. s. 11), or by a member of His Majesty's naval or marine forces in such circumstances that if he were a soldier he would be in actual military service (Wills (Soldiers and Sailors) Act, 1918, s. 1). Such a soldier's or sailor's will could dispose only of personalty under s. 11 of the Act of 1837, but now, under the Act of 1918, s. 3 (1), it can dispose of realty as well as of personalty. Such a will may be in the form of a letter or of anything else, provided it shows the intention of the testator.

A nuncupative will is when the testator without any writing declares his will before a sufficient number of witnesses. Before the Statute of Frauds, such wills were as valid for disposing of personalty as written wills; but by that statute they were laid under several restrictions, except (s. 22) when made by soldiers in actual service, or seamen or mariners at sea. And by the Wills Act, 1837, nuncupative wills are altogether rendered invalid, except (s. 11) those made by soldiers or seamen in accordance with the old law. The Wills (Soldiers and Sailors) Act, 1918, s. 1 (supra), applies to nuncupative wills as well as to other wills under s. 11 of the Wills Act, 1837; and s. 3 (1) of the Act of 1918, makes realty devisable by any nuncupative will valid as regards personalty. As to the Acts restricting the right of the non-commissioned ranks of the Navy and Marines to make nuncupative or other informal wills, see NAVAL TESTAMENT.

As to the revocation and revival of wills, see those titles.

Every will is construed, with reference to the real and personal property comprised in it, to speak and take effect as if it had been executed immediately before the death of the testator, unless a contrary intention shall appear. As to the effect of this rule, see DEVISE; LAPSE; LEGACY; RESIDUE: for a quasi-exception to this rule, see WILD'S CASE.

Wills are not required to be in any particular form, but a well-drawn will usually contains the following clauses (or as many of them as may be required) in the following order:—(i) commencement ("This is the last will of me, A B, etc."): (ii) revocation of former wills: (iii) specific legacies: (iv) general legacies: (v) annuities: (vi) specific devises: (vii) residuary gift: (viii) clauses relating to property settled or given in trust (if any): (ix) devise and bequest of trust and mortgage estates: (x) appointment of executors and guardians: (xi) testimonium. (See the various titles; and as to settlements made by will, see SETTLEMENT; TRUST.).

As soon as possible after the testator's death, it is the duty of the executor to prove his will, either in common or in solemn form. (See PROBATE.) If there is no executor, letters of administration with the will annexed are granted. (See LETTERS OF ADMINISTRATION.) Before the probate is obtained, an executor may act as effectually in almost everything as if probate had been granted, and when granted it has relation back to the death of the testator. In the case of an administrator, on the other hand, acts done before the grant of administration are, as a general rule, not binding. Both rules are subject to exceptions.

See ESTABLISHMENT, ETC.; ALIENATION.

William I., Laws of. William made but few changes in the national laws. He renewed the law of Edward the Confessor with certain additions made by himself. Normans and English were in theory equal before the law, but the distinction of personal law was, for some purposes, allowed. The Normans were accustomed to the wager of battle (q.v.), the English to the ordeal and compurgation (q.v.). William allowed the man of each race to be tried by the customs of his own country. He abolished the punishment of death and substituted for it that of mutilation. The forest laws which he introduced were marked by extraordinary harshness. He separated the ecclesiastical from the civil jurisdiction of the Courts of law. See Taswell Langmead, Constitutional History.

Win. In a covenant in a mining lease, to "win" a mineral means to put the ore in such a state that working can go on in the ordinary way.

It is doubtful whether it is necessary, in order to constitute the offence under s. 17 of the Gaming Act, 1845, of "winning" money by cheating at play, that the person who has been cheated should actually pay over what he has lost.

Winchester Measure. Measure according to the standards kept at Winchester until the enactment in 1835 of the statute 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 63.

Winchester, Statute of. This is the statute 13 Edw. 1, st. 1. It dealt with the preservation of the peace. See ARTICULI INQUISITIONES SUPER STATUTUM WINTONIÆ.

Windfalls. In the law, this term is understood as meaning only trees blown down by the wind, though ordinarily it includes fruit, etc. Windfalls of timber (q.v.) belong, as between landlord and tenant, to the landlord if they are sound and to the tenant if they are dead, and, in the case of settled land, windfalls of dead timber go to the tenant for life, while the proceeds of the sale of sound windfalls are treated as capital moneys.

Winding-up, as applied to a partnership or company, is the operation of stopping the business, realising the assets and discharging the liabilities of the concern, settling any questions of account or contribution between the members, and dividing the surplus assets (if any) among the members. The term "winding-up" was also sometimes applied to the estates of deceased persons, but "administration" (q.v.) is now the usual expression.

(1) The winding-up of a partnership is either—(1) voluntary (i.e., by agreement between the partners), or (2) by order of a Court made in an action for the dissolution of the partnership. (See DISSOLUTION.) A partnership consisting of more than seven members may be wound up by an order obtained on a petition under the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, ss. 267, 268, in which case the winding-up is almost the same as if the partnership were a company.

(2) The winding-up of companies before 1862 was effected under the Winding-up Acts of 1848-49, and the Joint Stock Companies Acts 1856-58, which provided a machinery partly in Chancery, and partly in Bankruptcy; after 1862 all companies, except railway companies incorporated by Act of Parliament, were wound up under the provisions of the Companies Act, 1862, in one of the three manners in which companies are now wound up under the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908. These three manners were, and are:—compulsory winding-up by the Court; voluntary winding-up without the intervention of the Court; and voluntary winding-up under the supervision of the Court. A compulsory winding-up takes place when the Court having jurisdiction in the matter makes an order for winding-up on a petition presented by the company itself, or by a creditor or a contributory. The commonest case of compulsory winding-up occurs where a company cannot pay its debts (Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, s. 129). Companies not registered under the Act can only be wound up compulsorily (ib., s. 268). All the proceedings in a compulsory winding-up are taken under the direction of the Court. A voluntary winding-up takes place when the period fixed for the duration of the company by its articles has expired or when the company passes a resolution to wind-up (ib., s. 182). Such a resolution must, in certain cases, be either a special or extraordinary resolution. (See RESOLUTION.) A voluntary winding-up is conducted without the intervention of any Court. A winding-up may be voluntary, but subject to the supervision of the Court: that is, the winding-up is determined on by resolution of the company, but an order is subsequently made by the Court that it shall be carried out subject to such restrictions as the Court may impose, and with such liberty for persons interested to apply to the Court, and generally in such manner as the Court thinks just (ib., s. 199).

By the doctrine of relation (see RELATE) a compulsory winding-up is deemed to commence at the time of the presentation of the petition. Voluntary winding-up (whether under supervision or not) commences at the time of the passing of the resolution to wind up (s. 183). All dispositions of the property of the company, and every transfer of shares or alteration in the status of the members of the company, made after the commencement of the winding-up, are void, except in certain cases.

The principal effects of a winding-up are: 1st. Nothing can be done after its commencement, except in order to realise the company's assets, enforce contributions from its members if necessary, and distribute them among its creditors and then, if there is any surplus, among the members. 2nd. Liquidators must be appointed to carry out these objects. 3rd. Legal proceedings against the company can be stayed or restrained once the winding-up petition has been presented (s. 140). Where a company is being wound up compulsorily or subject to supervision in the High Court, the judge before whom it is pending may order any actions by or against the company pending in any other division or in any other Court to be transferred to him (Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1909, rr. 42, 43), and judges of inferior Courts have like powers (ib. r. 44). See CLAIM; CONTRIBUTORY; DISSOLUTION; LIQUIDATOR; and compare ADMINISTRATION; BANKRUPTCY.

Window. See LIGHT.

Window Cleaning. The Public Health Act, 1875, s. 171, incorporates s. 28 of the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, which provides a penalty for anyone permitting a window cleaner to stand on the outside of any window other than one in the basement of a house.

Window Tax. A tax first imposed by the statute 7 & 8 Will. 3, c. 18. It was levied upon the occupants of houses with more than a certain number of windows and increased as the number of windows in the house rose. It was continued, increased and diminished under a number of statutes, the last of which was the statute 48 Geo. 3, c. 55. That Act was repealed by the House Duty Act, 1851, which substituted Inhabited House Duty (q.v.) for the window tax.

Windsor. See HERALDS.

Windsor Forest. A royal forest covering an area of about 60,000 acres in the vicinity of Windsor Castle. It was disafforested by the statute 52 Geo. 3, c. 71.

Windsor, Knights of. Retired military officers who have apartments and pensions at Windsor Castle. Some of them are in fact knights, but not in their capacity of Knights of Windsor, who, as such, are not knighted. From 1797 to 1892 there were also Naval Knights of Windsor.

Wine. Adulteration of wine is now dealt with under the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts. (See ADULTERATION.) Formerly it was punishable under special Acts such as the statute 12 Car. 2, c. 25, repealed in 1863. The prices of various wines were anciently regulated by various Acts which, unfortunately, have all been repealed. Thus, for instance, the statutes 28 Hen. 8, c. 14, s. 2, and 12 Car. 2, c. 25, s. 13, empowered the Lord Chancellor, etc., to fix prices, and the statute 12 Car. 2, c. 25, s. 12, enacted that Spanish wines were not to be sold at more than eighteenpence a quart, nor French wine at more than eightpence per quart, unless a higher price had been fixed.

Winter Heyning. A season, extending from 11th November to 23rd May during which, in some of the royal forests, the commoners were deprived of rights of pasture in order that there might be sufficient feeding for the deer.

Winton Domesday (Liber Wintoniæ). This is an account or survey of the City of Winchester made by order of Henry I. It is, or was, in possession of the Society of Antiquaries.

Wireless Telegraphy. Under the Merchant Shipping (Convention) Act, 1914, all British ships ordinarily carrying more than fifty persons in all must be provided with wireless apparatus of the prescribed efficiency (s. 15), unless they be ships not going more than 150 miles from land or sailing ships incapable of working the apparatus, both of which classes of ships may be exempted under rules made by the Board of Trade (s. 16). Under the Merchant Shipping (Wireless Telegraphy) Act, 1919, every British steamer carrying more than 12 passengers, and every British ship of 1,600 tons gross, must have wireless installed unless the Board of Trade gives her an exemption on the ground that such installation is unnecessary or unreasonable (ss. 1 (1), 3 (2)). See TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES.

Wisby (or Wisbuy, or Visby), Laws of. These are the Water-Recht, or sea-law, of the Hanse town of Wisby in the Island of Gotland. They contain the maritime mercantile code which, as a Copenhagen copy (dating from the fifteenth century) puts it, the skippers and merchants had resolved unto themselves as sea-law. These Laws of Wisby appear to have been based partly upon a code drawn up at Lubeck, of which a copy dated 1240 still exists, partly upon the Laws of Oleron (q.v.), and partly upon the maritime ordinances of Amsterdam, the latter being the mediæval sea-code of those trading out of Amsterdam; and they formed the mercantile sea law of the Baltic. They, like the Laws of Oleron, the Consolato del Mare (q.v.) and other similar compilations, were cited as authorities by the English Courts so late as 1759. These compilations, like the rest of the law merchant (q.v.), consisted of working rules drawn up by practical men of business, and the Courts wisely accepted these rules as law.

The Laws of Wisby are known in England chiefly through an abbreviated and somewhat inaccurate French version contained in Cleirac's Us et Coustumes de la Mer, published in 1641. A translation of portion of the Laws of Wisby and of portion of the Laws of Oleron is given in Malynes Lex Mercatoria, published in 1686.

See HANSEATIC LAWS.

Wit; Wite; Wyte. In Anglo-Saxon times this meant a penalty for murder or other serious offence against the person: see, for instance, BLODWYTE.

Witchcraft. Much the same as conjuration (q.v.).

Witenagemot. The mote or meeting of the wise men. In Anglo-Saxon times it was the great council, consisting of bishops, abbots, ealdermen and other notables, which was associated with the king in the government of the country. See GREAT COUNCIL.

Withdrawal. Where the plaintiff in an action does not wish to proceed with a portion of his claim, he may withdraw that part of his statement of claim either (i) by giving notice to the defendant, if no step subsequent to the delivery of the statement of defence has been taken (Ord. 26, r. 1); or (ii) at any other time by leave of the Court or a judge (ib.). A defendant may also, by similar leave, withdraw the whole or any part of his defence or counterclaim (ib.). When a cause has been entered for trial, it may be withdrawn by consent (Ord. 26, r. 2). See DISCONTINUANCE.

Withdrawal of a Juror. At the trial of an action, when neither party feels sufficient confidence to render him anxious to persevere till verdict, or when the judge recommends that the action should not proceed further, the parties may by consent, for it cannot be done otherwise, withdraw a juror; and as that leaves the jury incomplete, there can be no verdict, and the trial comes to an end. The withdrawal of a juror in this way always puts an end to the cause unless the withdrawal be upon terms which are not carried out; and if the action be afterwards proceeded with, an application may be made to the Court or a judge to stay the proceedings. Compare DISCHARGE.

Withernam. A taking again. See AVERIIS CAPTIS IN WITHERNAM; CAPIAS.

Without Day. Formerly, when a defendant in an action succeeded on a plea, the judgment in certain cases was that he should "go without day," or "go quit without day," that is, go free from the action without a continuance to any certain day; in other words, be discharged of further attendance. In some cases (e.g., in case of nonsuit) this disposed of the action altogether, while in other cases it only suspended the action until the plaintiff remedied some defect in his title. See SINE DIE.

Without Prejudice. See PREJUDICE.

Without Recourse to Me. An agent who expresses his endorsement of a bill of exchange to be "without recourse to me" protects himself from liability.

"Without Reserve." See AUCTION.

Without This That. The words "without this that" (or the earlier forms "absque hoc" or "sans ceo que") were the words used at the commencement of special traverses (q.v.).

Witness.—I. In the primary sense of the word, a witness is a person who has knowledge of an event. As the most direct mode of acquiring knowledge of an event is by seeing it, "witness" has acquired the sense of a person who is present at and observes a transaction.

Hence, when a deed or other instrument is executed in the presence of a person, and he records the fact by signing his name on it, he is said to witness it, or to be an attesting witness. The rule is that if there be an attesting witness within the jurisdiction, the document cannot be put in evidence unless he has been called to prove it: but to this rule there are exceptions. As to gifts to attesting witnesses in the case of wills, see WILL.

II. In procedure, a witness is a person who makes a viva voce statement to a judicial tribunal on a question of fact. (See EVIDENCE; EXAMINATION; FACT.) Witnesses require to be sworn before their evidence is given (see OATH), unless they have conscientious objections to taking an oath, or have no religious belief, in which case they make a solemn affirmation. See AFFIRM.

The general rule is that all persons are competent to give evidence, provided they have sufficient mental understanding. See COMPETENCY; CREDIBILITY; VOIRE DIRE.

Every witness has a right to refuse to answer certain questions, such as a question the answer to which would have a tendency to expose the witness to criminal proceedings, or to a forfeiture or penalty. Liability to civil proceedings is not a ground of privilege. See further on this subject, ACCUSARE NEMO, ETC.; see also CONFIDENTIAL COMMUNICATIONS; PRIVILEGE.

As a general rule, every witness ought, in the first instance at least, to be presumed to be favourably disposed towards the party by whom he is called, and his examination should be conducted on that theory: but see HOSTILE WITNESS. A zealous witness is one who endeavours to shape his testimony so as to make it as favourable as possible for one of the parties. One of the most dangerous kinds of witness for the party calling him is a witness who " proves too much."

Witnessing Part, in a deed or other formal instrument, is that part which comes after the recitals, or where there are no recitals, after the parties. It usually commences with a reference to the agreement or intention to be effectuated, then states or refers to the consideration, and concludes with the operative words and parcels, if any (q.v.). Where a deed effectuates two distinct objects there are two witnessing parts.

The witnessing part is so called because in indentures it commences with the words " This Indenture Witnesseth," meaning that the instrument is intended as a record of the transaction.

Wolfeshead; Wolferhefod. In Anglo-Saxon times this was what afterwards was called caput lupinum (q.v.).

Women. The Sex Disqualification (Removal) Act, 1919, s. 1, provides that " a person shall not be disqualified by sex or marriage from the exercise of any public function, or from being appointed to or holding any civil or judicial office or post, or from entering or assuming or carrying on any civil profession or vocation, or for admission to any incorporated society . . . and a person shall not be exempted by sex or marriage from the liability to serve as a juror." This enactment, it will be noted, does not apply to the military or naval forces of the Crown.

Women had been given votes at parliamentary elections in 1918 (see ELECTORAL FRANCHISE), and later in the same year the incapacity of a woman to be a member of Parliament was removed by the Parliament (Disqualification of Women) Act, 1918.

See MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY ACTS.

Women and Children, Offences as to. As to sexual offences, see ABDUCTION; ABORTION; BROTHEL; EXPOSURE; CARNAL KNOWLEDGE; INDECENT ASSAULT; INDECENCY; PROCURATION; PROSTITUTE; RAPE. As to other offences and various enactments, see ASSAULT; ABDUCTION; CRUELTY TO CHILDREN; BEGGAR; MINE.

Wood-coln. A payment formerly made by the tenants on certain manors for the right of gathering dead wood.

Wood-geld. This meant either money paid for wood cut in a forest, or money paid in order to secure the right of cutting wood therein.

Wood-mote. See FORTY-DAYS' COURT.

Wood Plea Court. A Court anciently held in the Forest of Clun, in Shropshire, to settle all questions as to wood and agistments.

Woods and Forests. See COMMISSIONERS OF WOODS, ETC.

Woodward. An official who looked after the vert (q.v.), venison (q.v.) and wood in a forest. He was permitted to carry the weapon known as a forest bill, but not a bow and arrows.

Woolsack. The seat on which the Lord Chancellor sits in his capacity of Speaker of the House of Lords. It is not technically part of the House: and persons—such as members of Parliament—who are not peers occasionally sit upon part of it. If, as is theoretically possible, the Lord Chancellor were not a peer, he could not go beyond the Woolsack and the small space surrounding it. When the Lord Chancellor votes as a peer, he votes from the Woolsack; but if he desires to speak as a peer, he leaves the Woolsack and goes to his place in the House.

See the statute 31 Hen. 8, c. 10, s. 8.

Words of Limitation; Words of Procreation; Words of Purchase. In a conveyance or will, words which have the effect of marking the duration of an estate are termed words of limitation. (See LIMITATION.) Thus, in a grant to A and his heirs, the words " and his heirs " are words of limitation, because they show that A is to take an estate in fee simple, and do not give his heirs anything. In a deed executed after the 31st December, 1881, it is sufficient, in the limitation of an estate in fee simple, to use the words " in fee simple," without the word " heirs " (Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 51). To create an estate tail by deed, it is necessary that certain words, known as words of procreation, should be used in order to confine the estate to the descendants of the first grantee, as in the usual form of limitation—" to A and the heirs of his body." Hence, a limitation to A and his heirs male would not create an estate tail, for want of words of procreation. In a deed executed after the 31st December, 1881, it is sufficient to use the words " in tail " without the words " heirs of the body " (ib.). Only those words of procreation above mentioned are effectual in the case of a deed. Thus a gift to A and his children, or his issue or his offspring, will not, if used in a deed, create more than a life estate; but if used in a will they create an estate tail.

Words of purchase are words which denote the person who is to take the estate. Thus, if I grant land to A for twenty-one years, and after the determination of that term to A's heirs, the word " heirs " does not denote the duration of A's estate, but the person who is to take the remainder on the expiration of the term, and is therefore called a word of purchase. Hence, "words of purchase" and "words of limitation" are opposed to one another. (See SHELLEY'S CASE; PURCHASE.) But there are cases in which words operate partly as words of purchase, and partly as words of limitation; thus, if an estate is limited to the heirs of the body of A, A being dead, these words are words of purchase to the extent that they give the estate to the person who fills the character of heir of the body of A (e.g., his eldest son B) by purchase and not by descent; but as they also have the effect of giving B an estate tail, they are to this extent words of limitation.

Workhouse is a building for the accommodation of paupers in a parish or union. See POOR LAW; VESTRY.

Working Classes. The Settled Land Act, 1890, s. 18, provides that, as regards buildings of a rateable value not exceeding £100, the expression "working classes" in s. 11 of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1885 (which allowed settled land to be let at a rate lower than the market rate for the erection thereon of working-class dwellings) should include "all classes of persons who earn their livelihood by wages or salaries." Section 11 of the Act of 1885 has been repealed, but is repeated verbatim and replaced by s. 74 of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890. Compare LABOURING CLASSES.

Working Days. See RUNNING DAYS.

Working-men's Clubs are societies established and registered under the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, s. 8 (4), for purposes of social intercourse, mutual helpfulness, moral improvement and rational recreation, or for any one or more of those purposes. According to a report of the Commission on Friendly Societies made over forty years ago, the members of these clubs "meet and read newspapers, and have lectures and tea and coffee, and sometimes beer." See FRIENDLY SOCIETIES.

Workmen. See COMMON EMPLOYMENT; MASTER AND SERVANT; TRADE UNIONS; TRUCK ACT; UNEMPLOYED WORKMEN; WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION.

Workmen's Compensation. The Employers' Liability Act, 1880 (see COMMON EMPLOYMENT), made an employer liable for accidental injury to one workman through the negligence of a fellow-workman. The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, s. 1, went much further, and provided that "If in any employment personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman, his employer shall . . . be liable to pay compensation . . ." Section 13 defines "workman" as anyone under a contract of service who is not a person employed otherwise than by way of manual labour at a remuneration exceeding £250 a year, and who is not a member of a police force, a person in the military or naval service of the Crown, an outworker, a member of the employer's family living with him, or a person employed casually otherwise than in the course of the employer's trade or business.

The Act (as amended in small points by the Workmen's Compensation (Illegal Employment) Act, 1918, and the Workmen's Compensation (Silicosis) Act, 1918) forms a complete code of great length and complexity. See Willis's Workmen's Compensation, of which a new edition appears in or about every year. See GLANDERS.

Workshop. Defined for the purposes of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, in s. 149 (1) of that Act. See FACTORIES.

Wort; Worth. A farm.

Worthing. A quantity of land in the manor of Kingsland, in Herefordshire, the tenants of which were called worthies.

Wounding and Maiming, as civil offences, are merely aggravated forms of battery (q.v., and see MAYHEM).

As to felonious wounding and maiming, see MALICIOUS INJURIES TO THE PERSON; MAYHEM.

Wreck. By the common law, if a ship was lost at sea, and the cargo or a portion of it came to land, the goods saved belonged to the Crown under the name of wreck. (See PREROGATIVE.) This privilege was frequently granted to lords of manors. See FRANCHISE; MANOR.

The strictness of the prerogative right to wreck was relaxed by early charters and by the statutes 3 Edw. 1, c. 4 and 27 Edw. 3, st. 2, under which the owners of shipwrecked goods were allowed to reclaim them within a year and a day, if they could identify them.

At the present day, "wreck" includes not only wreck at common law, but also jetsam, flotsam, ligan and derelict (q.v.); and statutory provision has been made for the appointment of officers called Receivers of Wreck (q.v.), whose duty it is to preserve wreck until it is claimed by the owner, or, if he does not claim it within a year, then to sell it and pay the proceeds into the Exchequer (Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 521). Provision has also been made for holding investigations as to wrecks and casualties (see WRECK COMMIS-SIONERS), under the general superintendence of the Board of Trade.

Malicious injuries to wreck are punishable under the Malicious Damage Act, 1861, s. 49: the Larceny Act, 1916, s. 15, deals with larceny of wreck: other offences in connection with wreck are dealt with in ss. 17, 37 of the Offences Against the Person Act, 1861, and others again in ss. 519, 535-7, of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894.

As to the removal of wrecks which obstruct navigation, see ss. 530-4 of the same Act.

Wreck Commissioners are persons appointed by the Lord Chancellor under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 477, to hold investigations (s. 466 (2)) at the request of the Board of Trade into shipping casualties, which are defined in s. 464. Similar investigations are in some cases made by stipendiary magistrates (s. 476). Preliminary investigations are also held by various officers of the Coastguard and Customs Services, etc. (s. 465). See COURTS OF SURVEY.

Writ. A writ is a document in the King's name and under the seal of the Crown, a Court or an officer of the Crown, commanding the person to whom it is addressed to do or forbear from doing some act. As to the issue and service of writs, see ISSUE; SERVICE.

Writs are of two principal kinds—prerogative and of right.

I. Prerogative writs are so called because they are issued by virtue of the Crown's prerogative, and not as part of the public administration of justice; writs belonging to the latter class are called writs of right, because the Crown is bound by Magna Charta to issue them, while prerogative writs are granted at the discretion of the Court, and only on a primâ facie case being shown. The writs of mandamus, procedendo, prohibition, quo warranto, habeas corpus and certiorari, are prerogative writs. (See the titles.) There are also statutory writs of mandamus (q.v.), which are grantable as a matter of right.

II. Writs of right are of two kinds—original and judicial.

An original writ was anciently the mode of commencing every action at common law. It issued out of the common law side of the Chancery (see OFFICINA JUSTITIÆ) and was under the Great Seal. To avoid the expense of original writs, other modes of beginning actions were devised with the connivance of the Courts; but they were all abolished, and the modern writ of summons introduced, by the statute 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 39. Original writs, however, continued some time longer to be used as modes of appealing from one Court to another (as in the case of writs of error, writs of false judgments, etc.), and the writ of error used in criminal proceedings, which (see ERROR) was abolished in 1907. See CURSITOR.

A judicial writ seems to be any writ which is issued by a Court under its own seal, as opposed to an original writ. Judicial writs may be be divided into—(1) writs originating actions and other proceedings, of which the ordinary writ of summons (q.v.) is the commonest instance; (2) interlocutory writs, issued during the course of an action before final judgment, such as writs of inquiry, mandamus and recaption, and writs for enforcing obedience to interlocutory orders by attachment, sequestration, etc.; (3) writs of execution. Writs of execution are of two kinds: some are issued in the first instance (e.g., writs of fieri facias, elegit, sequestration, delivery, possession, levari facias, etc, etc.): while others are only issued in aid of other writs, that is, when a writ of execution has been issued without producing the desired effect: such are writs of venditioni exponas, distringas, fi. fa. de bonis ecclesiasticis, sequestrari facias, and the writ of assistance. See the various titles.

In the old books, "writ" is used as equivalent to "action": hence writs are sometimes divided into real, personal and mixed. See ACTIONS.

As to alias and pluries writs, see those titles.

See also RETURN; TESTE; DETAINER; EXECUTION; MANDATORY; TESTATUM; CURSITORS; CLOSE ROLLS.

As to the various writs, such as the writs of assistance, attachment, delivery, dower, entry, error, false judgment, habere facias possessionem, see the various titles denoting the object of each respective writ.

For forms of writs now in use see App. H. to the Rules of the Supreme Court.

Writing—Written.—I. In the most general sense of the word, "writing" denotes a document, whether manuscript or printed, as opposed to mere spoken words. Writing is essential to the validity of certain contracts and other transactions (as to which see BILL OF EXCHANGE; CONTRACT; STATUTE OF FRAUDS; TENTERDEN'S ACT; WILL), while some legal transactions require the additional formality of a deed (q.v.). As to written and spoken defamation, see LIBEL; SLANDER; SEDITION. As to written evidence, see EVIDENCE.

II. Writing is sometimes opposed to printing: thus, in the practice of the High Court, pleadings not exceeding ten folios in length may be written or printed, while those exceeding that length must be printed, unless otherwise ordered under the Poor Persons Rules (Ord. 19, r. 9).

III. In the old books, "writing" sometimes signifies a "writing sealed," that is, a deed, as opposed to "parol" (q.v.).

Writ of Right.—I. In the general sense of the term, a writ of right is one which is grantable as a matter of right, as opposed to a prerogative writ, which is issued only as a matter of grace or discretion. See WRIT.

II. In the old real property law, a writ of right was a real action which lay to recover lands in fee simple, unjustly withheld from the owner. It might be brought in any case of disseisin, but was in practice only used where the disseisee had lost his right of entry or right to the possession, as in other cases a possessory action (such as a writ of entry) was more convenient. It was called a writ of right, because it was brought to assert the right of property remaining in the owner, which, as already mentioned, was usually a mere right (see RIGHT). There were also writs in the nature of writs of right, such as the writ of right of dower. See WRIT OF DOWER.

See RECTO; RIGHT CLOSE; RIGHT PATENT.

Writ of Summons. In actions in the High Court, the writ of summons is a process issued at the instance of the plaintiff for the purpose of giving the defendant notice of the claim made against him and of compelling him to appear and answer it if he does not admit it. It is the first step in the action (Ord. 1, r. 1; Ord. 2, r. 2). It is issued in probate actions from the Central Office, and in other actions either from that office or from a district registry (Ord. 5, rr. 1, 2). See ACTIONS AND MATTERS.

The writ consists of the body, the memoranda and the indorsements. The body contains the "title" (that is, the reference to the record, the name of the Court, division (and judge if necessary) and the names of the parties, see TITLE), the mandatory part (by which the defendant is ordered to enter an appearance), and the teste (q.v.). The memoranda specify the time within which the writ must be served and the place where the defendant may enter an appearance. The indorsements are of four kinds. First, in the case of a writ not specially indorsed, the indorsement of claim, being a brief statement of the nature of the plaintiff's claim (Ord. 2, r. 1; Ord. 3, r. 2). Secondly, in the case of a specially indorsed writ, the special indorsement, which may be employed where the plaintiff's claim consists of a debt or liquidated (q.v.) demand (Ord. 3, r. 6). This special indorsement is termed the statement of claim in Ord. 3, r. 6, and it is expressly provided in Ord. 20, r. 1 (a) that it shall be deemed the statement of claim. It must show the plaintiff's case as clearly as a separate statement of claim (q.v.) should do. Thus, in an action for money lent, the special indorsement would give the amount of the loan, the arrears of interest and any repayments made on account, and would claim payment of the balance. The principal object of the special indorsement is to enable the plaintiff to obtain "judgment under Order XIV." (see JUDGMENT). Thirdly, the indorsement of address, giving the name and address of the plaintiff and his solicitor, with an address for service if necessary (see ADDRESS FOR SERVICE). Fourthly, the endorsment of service made by the person who serves the writ.

In addition to these indorsements there are others used in special cases: such are the indorsement that the plaintiff sues or that the defendant is sued in a representative capacity (Ord 3, r. 4), such as executor; that the plaintiff claims to have an account taken in the first instance (Ord. 3, r. 18) that is to say, immediately after appearance, etc.; and in probate actions, the indorsement of the character in which the plaintiff claims (Ord. 3, r. 5), e.g., as next of kin, creditor, executor, etc.

In Admiralty actions in rem the writ of summons is in a special form (Ord. 2, r. 7); it is addressed to the owners of the ship or other property, and commands them to enter an appearance; and at any time after it's issue a warrant may be issued authorising the arrest of the ship, etc. (Ord. 5, r. 16). The service (q.v.) of the writ and the execution of the warrant are effected simultaneously.

A writ remains in force for twelve months from its issue, but if service has not been effected within that time it may (if a judge so orders) be renewed for six months, by being sealed by the proper officer (Ord. 8, r. 1).

If there are several defendants to be served, or the whereabouts of a defendant is doubtful, or some similar reason exists, one or more concurrent writs (that is, writs to the same effect as the original writ and remaining in force for the same time) may be issued, so as to facilitate service: see Ord. 6.

Before the Judicature Acts the Court of Probate had power to cause questions of fact arising in suits or proceedings to be tried by a jury by means of an issue directed to one of the superior Courts of law: the issues were contained in a document called a writ of summons.

Writs Close. See CLOSE ROLLS.

Wrong is that which takes place when a right is violated or infringed.

Wrongs are generally divided into private and public. A private wrong is one which confers a remedy or right of redress on an individual: such are breaches of contract, torts, etc. A public wrong is one which renders the wrongdoer responsible to the community: such are crimes (q.v.) and other offences (q.v.), and generally all infringements of the rules of public law. See LAW.

As to estates or titles by wrong, see TITLE.

Y

Yachts are vessels navigated solely for purposes of pleasure. The provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, with regard to the engagement and qualification of the crew do not apply to sea-going yachts (s. 262). Yachts not exceeding fifteen tons do not require to be registered (Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 3 (1)) unless they be used for sea-fishing and have not been exempted from registration by Order in Council (ss. 370, 373). Yachts belonging to the principal yacht clubs are exempted from the obligation of having their names and other particulars painted on them (Board of Trade Circular of December, 1909), and from compulsory pilotage (Pilotage Act, 1913 (s. 11 (3)). The limitation of liability provided by s. 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, does not apply to a yacht of which the owner is in command, or which is racing under rules which make the owner impliedly contract to pay full damages.

Yard. The standard measure of length. It is thirty-six inches, and its precise length is ascertained in accordance with s. 10 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878.

As to the yard of a house, see CURTILAGE.

Yardland, or virgata terræ, is a quantity of land, said by some to be twenty acres, but by Coke to be of uncertain extent. See PLOUGHLAND.

Year. A year consists of twelve calendar months; that is, 365 days in ordinary years, and 366 days in leap-year. By the statute 21 Hen. 3 (40 Hen. 3 in the Statutes of the Realm) the increasing day in the leap-year, as well as the preceding day, were accounted for one day only. The 1st January is the first day of the year by the Calendar (New Style) Act, 1750; before that enactment the 25th March was the first day of the year.

See TIME. As to leases for years, see LEASE; TENANT FOR YEARS; TERM.

Year and Day. The owners of estrays (q.v.) must claim them within a year and a day, otherwise they belong to the Crown or a grantee from the Crown. As to wreck see that title; see also CONTINUAL CLAIM.

In order to make killing murder, it is requisite that the party die within a year and a day after the stroke received, or cause of death administered; in the computation of which period the whole day upon which the hurt was done shall be reckoned the first.

Year Books. A series of reports of cases written in the Anglo-Norman language, commencing in the thirteenth century and extant either in manuscript copies or in print from 1290 to 1535—with very few gaps. There has been considerable controversy as to their origin. Plowden stated that there were four reporters who had an annual stipend paid by the king, but doubts were cast on this in the nineteenth century by Sir Frederick Pollock, Mr. L. O. Pike and others. It appears to be now generally agreed that they were notes of cases taken by apprentices to the law (q.v.) and, as suggested by Mr. W. C. Bolland, probably copied by scribes in scriptoria; for there are varying manuscripts of the same years. At first the years were issued as separate volumes, some years of Henry VI. being among the first books printed in England. Between the years 1587 and 1638 the separate years were reprinted as a collection in ten small folio volumes misnamed the "quarto" edition, covering the reigns of Edward III. to Henry VIII. In 1678-80 an edition in large folio, known as Maynard's edition, was issued. This contained eleven parts, some cases in the reigns of Edward I. and Edward II. being printed for the first time. In recent times, Years 20 to 35, Edward I. were printed with a translation by A. J. Horwood in five volumes, and 11 to 20 Edward III., with a translation by L. O. Pike in fifteen volumes. The Selden Society are now filling other gaps by the issue of original texts with translations. Citations of the Year Books are by the regnal years and placita (q.v.)., e.g., 14 Henry VI., 18, which so closely resembles the citation of a statute as occasionally to lead to confusion. See Liber assisarum; Long quinto. For an account of the origin and contents of the Year Books, see Bolland, The Year Books, 1921; for a list of the various editions see 14 Harvard Law Re- ciew, 73, and Maxwell, Complete List of British and Colonial Law Reports, 1918.

Year, Day and Waste, in the law of forfeiture (q.v.), is the right which the Crown had to hold the lands of felons for a year and a day, and to pull down the houses, cut down the woods and commit other waste thereon. This right was restricted by the Corruption of Blood Act, 1814, and ceased to exist (except, theoretically, on attainder for treason), when forfeiture was abolished.

Year to Year. See TENANT FROM YEAR TO YEAR.

Yeoman. "A yeoman," says Blackstone, "is he that hath free land of forty shillings by the year: who was anciently thereby qualified to serve on juries, vote for knights of the shire, and do any other act where the law requires one that is probus et legalis homo." Yeomen ranked next after gentlemen in order of precedence. Nowadays the word has no meaning in the law.

Yeomanry. For many years preceding the South African War of 1899-1902, this term was applied to the cavalry units of the Volunteers (q.v.). These units—which in many cases retain their original designation—were, by Order in Council made pursuant to the Territorial and Reserve Forces Act, 1909, transferred to the Territorial Force, now called the Territorial Army (q.v.).

Yeoman Usher. The deputy of Black Rod (q.v.), who appoints him.

Yeomen of the Guard. A corps of 140 old soldiers or non-commissioned officers appointed by the Constable of the Tower. The Captain of the Yeomen of the Guards is appointed by the King and goes in and out with the Ministry of the day. The other officers are appointed by the King on the recommendation of the captain; they are the lieutenant (who must have held the rank of lieutenant-colonel), the ensign (who must have been a major), and the "Clerk of the Cheque and Adjutant" and four "exors" or corporals, who must have held the rank of captain. The corps is not subject to military law and is under the Lord Chamberlain. Forty of the yeomen are warders of the Tower of London; the remainder are, in theory, the body-guard of the King; in reality, they are mere picturesque figures at State functions. They are and always have been, privileged from arrest on civil process.

Yield, in the law of real property, is to perform a service due by a tenant to his lord. Hence the usual form of reservation of a rent in a lease used to begin with the words "yielding and paying," (see RENDER), though now the words "yielding and" are always omitted.

Ymbringe Days. See EMBRING.

Yoke. The same, in Kent, as yardland (q.v.).

York. In the archbishopric of York there were formerly special customs as to the distribution of the estates of intestates. These customs were expressly preserved by the Statute of Distributions in 1672, but were abolished by the statute 19 & 20 Vict. c. 94. As to restrictions on testamentary powers, see RATIONABILE PARTE, ETC. The York Court of Record (formerly known as the York Sheriff's Court of Pleas) was originally created by a charter of 1396, and is now held under a charter of 1664. It has, within the City of York, a jurisdiction which originally was unlimited but which now, under an Order in Council of 17th May, 1890, is limited to claims not exceeding £10.

In ecclesiastical law, the provincial Court of the Archbishop of York is called the Chancery Court of York.

York (Herald). See HERALDS.

York-Antwerp Rules. The rules according to which questions as to general average (see AVERAGE) are generally settled by underwriters.

Yorkshire Land Registries are regulated by the Yorkshire Registry Act, 1884, which repeals and replaces the various Acts of Anne and George II., under which they had been established and carried on in each of the three ridings, exclusive of the City of York. See LAND REGISTRIES; MEMORIAL.

York, Statute of. The statute 12 Edw. 2, st. 1, repealed in 1881. See SUPER STATUTO QUE NUL SOIT, ETC.

Young Person. The Children Act, 1908, s. 131, defines this expression as meaning for the purposes of that Act, a person between fourteen and sixteen years of age. As regards an AGRICULTURAL GANG (q.v.), there is a different definition.

Youthful Offender. See REFORMATORY.
