PREFACE

THE shorthand student who begins this book has already learned almost all he needs to know about shorthand He has at least a working knowledge of the alphabetic characters, the brief forms, the prefixes and suffixes, and the phrasing principles of Gregg Shorthand But he still has not mastered the art of shorthand writing In a sense, the art of shorthand writing is never mastered As with any other art, the more completely we master it, the more fascinating it becomes—and the more we realize how far we are from perfection

Fortunately, though, the stenographer's goal is not perfection The stenographer's goal is the ability to write shorthand rapidly and to transcribe it accurately This goal is easily attainable with reasonable diligence. How?

We must constantly refine our style of writing, because beauty and legibility are inseparable in shorthand The more beautiful your notes become, the more legible they will be, and the more rapid and accurate your transcripts will be Therefore, a "style study" has been provided for each day's assignment The objective of these style studies is quality rather than quantity Practice them thoughtfully Before you write each shorthand outline, decide definitely what you are trying to accomplish Your teacher will tell you what points to watch for

An "outline drill" is given with each assignment to call special attention to those outlines in the day's assignment that may need extra practice because they present some difficulty either of execution or of construction These outline drills should be read and reread until you are thoroughly familiar with the forms They should then be copied once or twice before proceeding to read and copy the reading and dictation practice

So large an amount of connected matter is presented in shorthand because it is only by reading and copying large amounts of well-written shorthand that you will rapidly increase your own shorthand vocabulary and improve your shorthand penmanship by the imitation of the printed shorthand.

Although it is important that you write much new material from dictation, to develop your ability to handle new matter, it is equally important that you copy much material from well-written shorthand on which you may model your own style. The two types of practice must go hand in hand.

Remember that your teacher has probably helped hundreds or thousands of pupils to attain shorthand speed. Follow the teacher's suggestions for practice. Consult your teacher immediately if that practice does not seem to help you as it should. Your teacher will know whether you are really having special difficulty or whether you are simply passing through one of the customary stages of skill development.

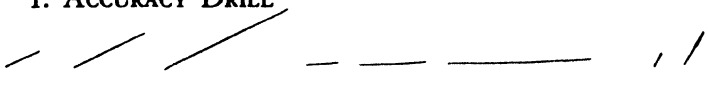

The authors are indebted to Mr. Martin J. Dupraw, World's Champion Shorthand Writer, for the artistic manner in which he has written the shorthand for Assignments 79 and 80.
