This is its specific quality as a fine art. The element of pattern (in its tech nical use as applied to the arts as distinct from composition generally is that it is composition which has what is technically called a repeat and it is the repeat which tech nically differentiates poetry from non poetry both being (as arts) composition The repeat may be obv ous, as in the case of lines of equal length or it may be more implicit, to any degree of subtlety but if it does not exist there is technically no poetry The artistic power of the pattern designer is shown in the way he deals with the problem of 'repeat' and this is true of poetry likewise and is probably the key (so far as one exists) to any technical definition or discussion of the art

b The product of this art as a form of literature, the writings of a poet or poets, poems collectively or generally, metrical work or composition, verse (Opp to prose)

It has been conjectured that point-blank represents a F point blanc* meaning the white point or white spot on the target, but no such use is found in Fr. or in any Roma ic lang. The phrase appears exclusively of English origin and use; and there is no evidence that in Eng the 'blank' or 'white' was ever called the point blank. The probability therefore is that blank is here the vb. (BLANK vb 3) and point the vb (POINT *v*¹ 12) referring to the pointing of the arrow or gun at the blank or white: point blank being a combination of the same class as break neck or cut throat (CUT sb 42, 43) etc. It may have started as an adj., in point blank shot distance reach or range i e that in which one points or aims at the blank or white spot]

Clin. Diagn.* v. (ed. 4) 162 The rotatory power of each of the four fluids is ascertained by means of the polarimeter.

Hence Polarimetric (pōlərĭmĕ·trĭk) a., of or pertaining to a polarimeter or polarimetry. Polarist metry, the art or process of measuring or analysing the polarizing power of light.

1864 Webster, Polarimetry. 1899 Cagney in Jahrb. f. Clin. Diagn. v. (ed. 4) 88 The polarimetric test may be applied. Ibid. v. 163 This method requires a very accurate polarimeter, high polarimetric examinations, and a highly complicated calculation

Polariscope (pōlə·rĭskōp) [f. med. L. polāris Polar (cf. prec.) + -scope. Cf. F. polariscope.] An instrument for showing the polarization of light, or viewing objects in polarized light, consisting essentially of two plates or prisms, a polariser and an analyser; made in various forms, simple or complex, according to the special use. Also attrib.

1842 G. Francis Dict. Arts etc., Polarising Apparatus, Polariscope, any instrument which is capable of showing the phenomena of polarised light. 1854 Ferrara's Polarised Light (ed. 2) 228 The plates of topaz sold in the opticians' shops, for polariscope purposes, have been obtained by cutting the crystal perpendicularly to one of the optic axes. c 1865 J. Wylde in Circ. Sc. I. 81/1 In every polariscope there are two essential parts; namely the polariser and the analyser, the former receives and polarises the incident rays of light, and the latter presents to the eye the polarised ray either by reflection or by refraction. 1866 Brande & Cox Dict. Sc., etc. II. 951/1 The polariscope proposed by Arago is formed of a tube closed at one extremity by a plate of rock crystal cut perpendicularly to the optical axis, and about five millimetres in thickness, and having at the other end, where the eye is applied, a prism possessing the property of double refraction placed transversely to the axis of the tube.

Hence Pola riscopist, one skilled in the use of a polariscope, Polariscopy (pōlərĭ·skŏpi), the art of using a polariscope.

2. Hence generalized sense. A property of matter or force, analogous or compared to that of a magnet or magnetism. a. The having of an axis with reference to which certain physical properties are determined; the disposition of a body or an elementary molecule to place its mathematical axis in a particular direction

1694 Ray Dissol. Diluv. Preparation 108 All Atoms by their Motion of Verticity or Polarity, would draw themselves, like Magnets, into a straight Line, by setting all their Axes in directum to each other. 1819 Arnott Physics 33 When atoms are allowed to cohere according to their natural tendencies, they always assume a certain regular arrangement and form, which we call crystalline. Because in this circumstance they seem to resemble the magnets, which attract each other only by their poles the fact has been called the polarity of atoms. 1854 Ferrara's Polarised Light (ed. 2) 38 In crystals it is necessary to admit besides ordinary attraction and repulsion, a third molecular force called polarity. Ibid., A molecule endowed with unequal attractive forces in different directions may be said to be possessed of polarity

b. The quality of exhibiting opposite or contrasted properties or powers in opposite or contrasted directions, the possession of two points called poles having contrary qualities or tendencies.

1828 Coleridge Method in Encycl. Metrop. (1845) I. Polarise (pōʊlărəiz), v. In sense 1, F polariser (Malus, 11 March 1811), in form from polaris POLAR + -iser, -IZE, but referred by its author directly to F pôle POLE sb.[2] In other senses, F POLAR + -IZE

See Malus in Annales Bulletin des Sciences No 49, March 1811 p 252 Sur un nouveau polarisation June 1811 p 292 Sur la polarisation In giving to these sides [of the vertical ray] the name of pôles, he calls the modification which imparts to light properties relative to these poles, polarisation His new expression signifies simply the modification that light has undergone in acquiring new properties relative not to the direction of the ray but solely to its sides considered at a right angle and in a plane perpendicular to its direction But this unfortunately assumed a sense of pole quite different from its use in astronomy geography, and magnetism with the consequence that polarisation as applied to light and radiant heat has nothing in common with magnetic polarity or polarization

I 1 Optics (trans.) To cause the vibrations of light (radiant heat, etc.) to be modified in a particular way, so that the ray exhibits different properties on different sides, opposite sides being alike, and those at right angles to each other showing the maximum of difference

A ray of polarized light is reflected in different degrees in different positions of the reflecting body and transmitted by certain crystals in different degrees in different positions of the crystal and (in each case) completely quenched in one particular position This is accounted for by supposing the ethereal vibrations to be restricted to one plane (plane polarization), instead being, as in ordinary light, performed in all directions perpendicular to that of the ray Light is also said to be circularly or elliptically polarized, or to undergo circular or elliptic polarization, when it exhibits (in a polariscope) certain colour phenomena, or modifications of the phenomena of plane polarization, which are accounted for by supposing the ethereal particles to move in circles or ellipses Polarization is produced (variously in the case of different media) by reflection or by ordinary or double refraction

3 The regulation, discipline, and control of a community, civil administration, enforcement of law, public order

The early quotations refer to France, and other foreign countries, and to Scotland, where Commissioners of Police for the general internal administration of the country consisting of six noblemen and four gentlemen, were appointed by Queen Anne in 1714 (Act 1714 c. 54). She was the first official use of the word in Great Britain. In England, it was still viewed with disfavour after 1760. Even in the British Magazine, April 1763, p. 542 opines that from an observation of French and something under the name of police being already established in Scotland, English prejudice will not soon be reconciled to it. (The name Commissioners of Police of the Cities and Towns was in the 19th c. given to the local bodies having control of the Police Force in Burghs and Police Burghs in Scotland.)

Polymer (pŏ·limə), Chem [mod (Berzelius 1830) f Gr πολυμερής having many parts, manifold, f πολυ-, Poly- + μέρος part, share; so mod F polymère adj See Isomer] A substance polymeric with another, any one of a series of polymeric compounds

1866 Roscoe Elem Chem 324 Cinnamic Acid. This polymer of cumarin was in solid crystalline substance formed on heating urea 1889 Croll Stellar Evol 95 The bodies thus formed are known as polymers

Polymeric (pŏlimĕ·rik), a Chem [f as prec + -ic, after Ger polymerisch (Berzelius, 1830)] Of two or more compounds, or of one compound in relation to another (const with) Composed of the same elements in the same proportions, but so that the numbers of atoms of the several elements in the molecule in one substance are some multiple of those in another, and thus the molecular weight of the one is the same multiple of that of the other (Distinguished from Isomeric.)

1847 Turner Elem Chem. (ed 8) 175 The second case of isomerism is that of bodies in which, while the relative proportion of the elements are the same, the absolute number of atoms of each element and consequently the equivalent or atomic weights of the compounds differ Such compounds are called polymeric 1850 Daubeny Atom Theory viii (ed 2) 261 Olefiant gas and cetene are polymeric bodies 1880 J W Laslett Pract Assay 23 Asserted to be polymeric with bilirubin

Polymeride (pŏli mĕrəid) Chem [f as Polymer + -ide] = Polymer

1857 Miller Elem Chem III. 5 The formation of bimerides, tetramerides and polymerides will be considered by supposing that differences of chemical arrangement occur in these different cases 1864 Spencer Biol I. ii. 70 Essential oil of turpentine having a molecule consisting of several of these polymerides, by simple exposure to a heat of 360°

Polymerism (pŏli·mĕrizm) [f as Polymer + -ism, cf F polymérisme]

1 Chem The condition or quality of being polymeric

1847 Turner Elem Chem (ed 8 679 It is by the assumption of cases of polymerism that we are enabled to explain the numerous cases of isomerism and polymerism which occur in organic chemistry 1850 Daubeny Atom Theory (ed 2) 263 The former case Berzelius has distinguished by the term polymerism in the latter by that of metamerism 1882 Watts Lo cepts Mod Physics 302 This rule applies like wise to cases of allotropy and polymerism

2. A thin tall stack of corn in the sheaf, in shape a steep cone, 9 or 10 feet high, built up temporarily in the harvest field in wet seasons, for drying the corn before it is carried to the main rick. So generally in s w, but in central Dorset called more definitely a 'wind-mow'. (T. Hardy)

a 1722 Ihle Husb. (1757) 221 In making the wheat pooks in Wiltshire the sheaves are set [etc.]. Ibid. In 1 p ok may be put a load or two. 1766 Complete Farmer s v Harvest In their wheat pooks in Wiltshire, the sheaves are set in a circle with their ears uppermost and on their circle of sheaves is placed upon that, and so on contracting each round till the pole ends in a point upon which a sheaf opened, and turned with the ears downward, is placed like the shackle of a hive. A load or two loads may be thus put into a pook, which is a very good way to secure corn against rain. 1829 Kent Rural Anal. 28 Saving our crops in bad and catching seasons, by securing the hay in windcocks and wheat in pooks.

[Note In Eng use this word has undoubtedly from the 1870's been identified with pool sb.[1] see quots. 17 ... 1766 in sense 2, with their references to the fish in the pool But the French use of poule for the same thing, with the fact that the French is found earlier, makes it almost certain that the term was taken from Fr and associated with the Eng. word pool. F poule is held to be a sense of poule hen, chicken being dealt at first sitting for 'boot', pool, game. Mme de Sévigné in a letter of 29 July 1676 uses poule exactly in the sense of Eng pool; and in a letter of 30 June 1680 says 'Si Denjean est de ce jeu, il prendra toutes les poules: c'est un aigle' a play upon the sense 'hen' The DICT of the Académie, ed. 1 1694, and that of Furetière, ed. 2, 1701, also explain poule almost in the words in which it stands in the DICT Acad ed 7 1878 'Poule se dit, à certains jeux, de la quantité d'argent ou de jetons qui résulte de la mise de chacun des joueurs et qui appartient à celui qui gagne le coup. Il a gagné cet argent. Mettre à la poule. Gagner la poule'. There is perh a similar relation between F biche a fish at cards, and the Eng 'fish' in the 'pool']

On account of the ambiguity of the letter u and its variant v before 1600, it is uncertain whether ME. powere power power meant pou or pow- the phonetic series pauperem, pauper pauber, pabre, powre shows that poure preceded powre which may have been reached in late OF, and is the form in various mod.F dialects. But the 15th and early 16th c literary Fr form was pouvre artificially spelt in 15th c pauvre after L. pauper, and ME pore (the source of mod Eng poor) seems to have been reduced from powre like o'er from over lord from lowerd Cf also Poortith, Poraii, Poverty But some Eng dialects now have pour (paur), which prob represents ME. poure (pōər).]

In the times of licensed mendicancy, the duty of holding and attending to the fir-candle was usually imposed upon the 'bedesman or vagrant' poor man, who was granted a night's shelter; and it is generally believed that from him the name peer-man passed to the mechanical holder

Custom will have the word to signify born in the purple palace or the palace of porphyry, a palace so called in Constantinople wherein the empresses used to lie in. Others derive the appellation hence that the imperial children, as soon as born, were wrapped in purple robes; that the chamber wherein they were born was hung with purple hangings. 1788 GIBBON Decl. & F. (1790) IX. xlvii. 57 In the Greek language purple and porphyry are the same word: an apartment of the imperial palace was hung with purple; it was reserved for the use of the pregnant empresses: and the royal birth of their children was expressed by the appellation of Porphyrogenetes, or born in the purple. By modern poets often used vaguely, in the sense of 'a beautiful and valuable purple stone taking a high polish, including red granite and marble

The site of the ancient quarries after being lost, was discovered by Burton and Wilkinson at Gebel Dokhan, near the Red Sea, in lat 27° 20′ N.

There is no direct contemporary evidence as to the origin of the name. Statements going back to c 1750 attribute the first brewing of the liquor to Ralph Harwood at the place afterwards called Doctor's Brewhouse, on the east side of High Street, Shoreditch; but these statements concern the origin not of the appellations porter's ale, porter's beer, but of the term entire. The probability is that porter's ale or beer arose as a popular descriptive appellation.]
