Pan, obs. form of PANE, obs. 3c form of PAIN

Pan-, combining form and formative element, repr Gr παν- from πᾶν, neuter of πᾶς all, which was freely used in Greek, esp with adjs to which it stood in adv. relation in the sense 'all wholly, entirely, altogether, by all, of all', as in πανάγαθον altogether good, πανάγιος all holy, πανακὴς all-healing, πανάριστον best of all, πανάρμενος suited to all musical modes, πανδήμιος pertaining to all the people, public, πανοπλία fully-armed, πανοπλίαρχος of the full moon, πάνσοφος all-wise, so from national names, as πανελλήνιος of the Greeks, πανάνειος of all the Latins, also in sbs., etc. derived from these adjs, and some other sbs., as πανδέκτης an all-receiver, πανηγυρμὸς ruler of all, πανήγυρις a universal or general assembly, πανοπλία panoply.

Hence pan- occurs in English in words taken or derived from Greek, and in many others formed more or less on the same analogy either in English, or of mod Latin, or French. It is especially common with national names, after πανελλήνιος, πανωνιος, etc, where it has become a living suffix, prefixed whenever needed. Before a labial παν- became παμ-, and before a guttural παγ- (= παγ), as πάμφυλος, παμφλογίτος beloved of all, πάγχρηστος the sweetbread, the pancreas, the former of these is retained in some English derivatives (see PAM-).

The following are examples of the uses of pan-, the more important words will be found in their places as Main words

1 With national names, and words formed in imitation of them, with the sense 'Of, pertaining to, or comprising all (those indicated in the body of the word)', with sbs. in -ism and -ist, generally expressing the notion of or aspiration for the political union of all those indicated in the sense which also tends to colour the adj. Of modern formations of this kind, PANSLAVISM and PANSLAVIST, with their related words, appear to have been the earliest. Among others are Pan-Anglo-Saxon a., of or including all of 'Anglo-Saxon' race. Pan-anthropological a., of all anthropological topics. Pan-Arabic a., consisting of all the atoms (humorous). Pan-Buddhism a., of or embracing all Buddhists; so Pan-Buddhism. Pan-Celtic a., of all Celts, or all the Celtic peoples, hence Pan-Celticism. Pan-Christian a., universal Christian. Pan-denominational a., of or embracing all religious denominations. Pan-ecclesiastical a., representing a whole church or ecclesiastical body. Pan-Gothic a., common to or including all the Gothic or Teutonic races or languages, Germanic. Pan-human a., of or per-

6 Scots Law In the phrase on or upon the panel = upon (his, one's) trial Also, in later use, in the panel, etc
The original sense of panel here is conjectural It seems most probable that (on the analogy of sense 4) it meant a slip of parchment containing the indictment, or the name or names of the persons indicted To be on the panel would thus be to be indicted, and so on one a trial. It would also be easy to use the term elliptically for the name or names and so, the person or persons, on the panel, as in b, where it is that the word is collective In later times, the panel has been sometimes understood as a place, viz. that bar of the court (so Jamieson) or the dock Cf the phrases to the panel, to put or bring into the panel, to enter the panel

Papyrography (pæpiro grăfi) [f as prec + GRAPHY] A term applied to a process of writing or drawing on paper and transferring the design to a zinc plate whence it is printed

The name had already been given in French (papyro graphie) to various transfer processes introduced in 1819 1822 and 1829 respectively More recently it has been loosely applied in E. glish to Capten Abney s papyrotype etc

Parabanic (parăbæ·nik) a Chem [f PARA see below] In parabanic acid, a dibasic acid, $CO_2(NH.CO)_2$, produced by the action of nitric acid on uric acid or alloxan crystallizing in colourless prisms. When boiled with dilute acids, it is converted into oxalic acid and urea, whence it is sometimes called oxalyl carbamide or oxalyl urea. Hence Pa·banate, a proposed substitute for the name parabanic acid, to express its partialism to alloxan Pa·rabanate, a salt of parabanic acid, as argentic parab nate $CO_2(NAg.CO)_2$
1857 MILLER Elem Chem III 635 Parabanic acid forms salts which are exceedingly unstable parabanate of silver being the only salt which is permanent. 1866 ODLING Anim Chem 93 Paraban and alloxan are products of the oxidation of uric acid. 1869 ROSCOE & SCHORLEMMER Treatise Chem II 1128 Kreatin is a monure de and so are paraba i and alloxan which are obtained by the oxidation of uric acid 1888 KENNER Org Chem 201 Parabanic acid is formed by the oxidation of uric acid with strong nitric a id and other ox dizing agents.
(Note The term parabia ic was introduced by Liebig and Wöhler in 1838 (Annalen XXVI 289) but without any explanation of its formation As they made parabanic acid by a reaction in which they expected to obtain alloxan it is prob. that para was used in the sense instead of 'opposite to the ending being that of allox an, -anic and the b merely euphonic It has been suggested that the latter is a residue of carb, and that the term was formed to express parallelism of constitution to urea or carbamide $CO(NH_2)_2$ and to alloxan, $CO_2(NH.CO)CO$ but as a fact it was not till much later that the identity of urea and carbamide was discovered.]

3 Chem A general name, introduced by Watts 1872, for the saturated hydrocarbons of the series C_nH_{2n+2}, of which the first four members methane, ethane, propane, quartane (see ANE) are at ordinary temperatures gaseous, those higher in the series oily liquids, and those higher still, solids, all are remarkable for their chemical indifference, the hydrogen being combined in the highest proportion possible with the carbon 1872 WATTS Dict Chem VI 705 This substance is a hydro carbon or a mixture of hydrocarbons of the series C_nH_{2n+2}; the name paraffin may therefore be conveniently used as a generic term for the whole series 1877 — Fownes' Chem 545 Many of the paraffins occur ready formed in American petroleum. 1894 Schorlemmer's Rise & Devel Org Chem 50 Henry Watts proposed to call all the whole series the paraffins and this name has been accepted.

In Astronomy there are two kinds of parallax viz. Diurnal and annual, the former when a celest al object is observed from opposite points on the earth's surface the latter when observed from opposite points of the earth's orbit As the mean or proper position of the body at that which it would have if viewed in the one case from the earth's centre (or a point in a line with it), in the other case from the centre of its orbit, the parallax is accurately calculated and stated from these central points, as I called geocentric and heliocentric respectively the latter of these being the earth s radius and the radius of its orbit Horizontal parallax the diurnal parallax of a heavenly body seen on the horizon.

The name occurs in Norman French in the Laws of William I, c 1075, but has not been found in Eng before the 13th c Although the parochial system was more or less developed in many (perhaps most parts of England before the year 1000 there is no word formed from parish a, nor any directly answering to it, in OE the nearest equivalents being preost-scir 'priest shire' (Eccles Inst xiv in Liebe Laws) and scrift-scir 'shrift shire' (canons of Ihelr vi, Ecel Laws of Cnut xviii) both of 11th or late 10th c, the latter rendered parochia in the 13th c la version a orig A township or cluster of townships having its own church, and ministered to by its own priest, parson, or parish clergyman, to whom its tithes and ecclesiastical dues are (or originally were) paid. b A later division of such an original parish for ecclesiastical purposes only, having its own church and clergyman.

The latter includes the ancient parochial chapelries of some of the large northern parishes (Cowper 1th, Chalmers 1) and the more recent ecclesiastical districts constituted under the powers given by the various Church Building Acts distinguished as new districts and parishes In Scotland these are called parishes quoad sacra while the original parishes which remain such for all purposes are parishes quoad omnia. The original parish when retained for civil, although subdivided for ecclesiastical purposes, is commonly distinguished as the civil parish, in Scotland a parish proper or landward.

Most of the older colonies have parishes, both for ecclesiastical and civil purposes, frequently as electoral districts or divisions in the newer colonies where the area of the established church the parish has often no official existence, though the Church of England (and in some cases other Churches) has applied the name to areas formed for the organization of its own work and the term is used in the same way by the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States.

[Note (1) Of παροικία was the abstract sb from παροικος adj (παρά by beside + οἶκος house, dwelling) in sil Gr = dwelling beside or near, neighbouring a neighbour in LXX, N T and Christian writers, 'dwelling temporarily or sojourning in a foreign land a sojourner As to which of these notions was present when παροικια passed into ecclesiastical use opinions differ, the earlier etymologists (Iher, etc.) have taken it as 'the body of persons dwelling beside and near to the district lying about, a church or ecclesiastical centre; but more recent writers, founding their conclusions upon the usage of the LXX, N T, and the Fathers, as 'a sojourn', holding the appellation to have been primarily applied to colonies of Jews of the Dispersion sojourning in Alexandria and other Gentile cities, and to have been from them continued or adopted as a name for 'the Christian brotherhood sojourning in a town or district, perh not without reference to the spiritual use of παροικος, παροικια (1 Pet i 17, ii 11) see Lightfoot S Clement II 6, Hatch in Dict Chr Antiq s v Parish (2) According to Light foot, παροικια was at first used in a much more general sense than διοικησις diocese of which it was later a synonym as were its L representatives parœcia, parochia down even to the 12th c The modern sense 'parish' appears already in St Basil a 379 Although parochia was used in the wider sense at the Councils of Celchyth A D 816, and Clovesho 825, and is so rendered even in 12th c glossaries (cf Wr Wülcker 537/10 Diœcesis vel parochia, bisopriche), parish, as an E (Anglish word), is found only with the modern meaning (exc when used = 'diocese') later writers as a free rendering of the Gr or L word sense 3) (3) The relation to the original παροικια, parœcia, of later and med L gri xoia, presents difficulties The latter could not survive (as of the former by any normal phonetic process) and it has been suggested by various scholars independently that parochia is really a derivative from L parochus (= παροχος), the name of a local official in the country parts of Italy who supplied public personages with entertainment, etc, when they came into his district; and that this familiar term was popularly substituted for the unfamiliar parœcia Cf what is said under Parrock, as to the OHG rendering of par. hus by the appropriate pfarrhof (pfarre).]

3 The Great Council of the nation, which forms, with the Sovereign, the supreme legislature of the United Kingdom (formerly of the Realm of England), consisting of the three Estates, namely the Lords Spiritual and Temporal (forming together the House of Lords), and the representatives of the counties, cities, boroughs, and universities (forming the House of Commons). By some legal writers, the Sovereign, as part of the Legislature, is included in the Parliament, but this is not usual

a. Viewed as a temporary assemblage of persons, summoned by the Sovereign, and after a time (the length of which is now limited) again dissolved, to be succeeded (formerly at an uncertain and often distant interval, but now within a very short period) by another assemblage similarly constituted

This is, in its origin, merely a development of sense 2, corresponding to the gradual evolution of the modern parliament from the Great Council. Stubbs Const Hist, following the chroniclers, uses 'parliament' from 1242 onwards; but the 'parliaments' previous to 1295 belong rather to our sense 2, with progressive approaches to this sense

In this sense the word may be preceded by a or the, and have a plural; so we speak of a new parliament, or of the first, second, or third parliament of Edward I, or of Queen Victoria, and historians individualize many parliaments by distinctive appellations, as in 8.

[Note The ecclesiastical use of L persona does not appear before the 11th c. It was app. still new at the Council of Clermont 1096, when it was said, c. 11 ' Ecclesiæ vel decimæ sæpius ab Episcopis sub pallium aventia venduntur monstrum nimium, seu mutatis Clericis quos Personas vocant (Mansi Concilia XX 909). Various views have been taken of its genesis English legal writers, Coke, Blackstone, etc., have referred it to the Civil Law sense of persona, the parson being viewed as the legal person by whom the property of God, the Patron Saint, or the church, in the parish, was actually held ; the person to use and be sued in respect of this property Du Cange (ed 1766), pointing to the early equivalent use of persona and dignitas, would start from the sense 'personage, great or dignified person, dignitary'. Dr H Schaefer, Pfarrkirche und Stift im Deutschen Mittelalter (1903) § 19, shows that persona was primarily applied to the holder of a parochial living who was non-resident, being either a conventual body, a chapter, or member of one, or often a mere layman, the spiritual duties being in either case discharged by a sidarius or substitute, who received a small portion of the revenues. He refers the designation to the fact that the holder of the living merely figured in the character or rôle (cf. L. persona) of parish clergyman, without actually discharging the duties. He explains the frequent early equivalence of persona and dignitas, adduced by Du Cange, in the case of conventual or collegiate rectors, by the usual application of dignitas to the superior personages or 'dignitaries' of a chapter, and the fact that it was by these that the parochial parsonages were held. It would appear however that in England the appellation must have been early interpreted in the Civil Law sense; else how should it have been extended from the persona immortalis to the persona mortalis or resident rector, and hence become in England the legal designation?]
