6 The vapour into which water is converted when heated In popular language, applied to the visible vapour which floats in the air in the form of a white cloud or mist, and which consists of minute globules or vesicles of liquid water suspended in a mixture of gaseous water and air (Also sometimes applied to the vapour arising from other liquids when heated.) In modern scientific and technical language, applied only to water in the form of an invisible gas.

The invisible 'steam', in the modern scientific sense, is, when its temperature is lowered, converted into the white vapour called 'steam' in popular language, and this under continued cooling, becomes 'water' in the liquid form

1. A general name for certain artificially produced varieties of iron, distinguished from those known as 'iron' by certain physical properties, esp greater hardness and elasticity, which render them suitable as material for cutting instruments, and for various other industrial purposes

Chemically steel is a nearly pure iron, the proportion of other substances varying from less than 1 to 3 per cent Formerly 'steel' could be defined as containing more carbon than wrought iron, and less than cast iron, but since about 1860 the name has been extended to certain products containing very little carbon

Steep (stīp), v.[1] Forms 5–6 stepe, stipe, 5–7 steepe, 6 stiep(e, stype, (steyp), pa. pple stept, 6–7 steap, 6– steep [Of difficult etymology. On the assumption that (notwithstanding the late date at which it is recorded) the vb. represents an OE. stiepan*, stépan*, it would be the formal equivalent of Sw. stopa, Da. stobe, Norw. steypa, to steep (seeds, barley for malting) —OTent. type staupjan*, perhaps f. staupo-m* (OE. steap ON. staup, STOUP) vessel for liquor. Cf. Norw. setja korn i staup = to put corn in steep (see STEEP sb.[1])

The mod. Scandinavian words cited coincide in form with a verb meaning to cast down, to cast (metals), to run (candles, etc.) into a mould, which descends from ON. steypa of the same meaning, a causative of ON. stupa (once), Sw. stupa to STOOP. It is phonologically impossible that, as is usually supposed, the Eng. word can be a ON. steypa, and even if it be referred to an OE. stiepan* corresponding to the ON. vb., the development of sense appears less natural on this view than on that suggested above.]

steppen; the strong pa. t. in OS. stōp and in WFris. stoep, which is the only trace of the strong inflexion surviving in any mod.Teut. dialect. The continental WGer langs. have a synonymous wk. vb. with pp and without umlaut, (M)LG , (M)Du. stappen, mod.Fris. stappe, OHG. staphōn (MHG., mod G. staɔfen) —WGer. *stappōjan, where the doubled p appears to be due to derivation from the sb. WGer. *stappon- (see Step sb.); in LG. and Du., however, the history of the form may be complicated with that of the original p- present.

In OE. the normal form steppan was Anglian, while WS. had the form steppan, the anomalous vowel of which has not been satisfactorily accounted for. In ME. the forms with a are confined to certain southern writers (cf. mod. Somerset staap). The present Sc. stap, recorded from the 17th c., appears to be a late development.

The normal strong pa. t. and pa pple. survive into the 14th and 15th centuries, but beside them appear two analogical formations: steop, stepen, app. modelled on the reduplicating verbs (cf. the similar development in MDu. stoep pa. t); and stap, stappe of uncertain origin. Beside the regular stapen there is also a new pa. pple. stopen. Weak forms are found from the end of the 13th century, and from the 16th century are universal.

The affinities of the Teut. root *staɔ are uncertain On the assumption that the form with single p has been affected by some analogy from *staɔp, with pp representing Indogermanic pn, possible cognates are OSl. (and Russian) stopa, step, pace, stepenĭ step, degree]

Step-, OE. stōp- (earlier stēap-, Northumb. stēap-), corresponding to OFris. stap-, step- (NFris. stjap-, syap-, stīp-, WFris. stiep-), MLG (irreg) stēp- (mod LG. staif-), (M)Du (irreg.) stuef-, OHG stuf- (MHG., mod G. stief-), ON stjūp-, (MSw. stiup-, struf-, mod Sw stuf-, styf-, Da. stif-, stiv-, now superseded by stød-).—OTeut steupo-*; a Com Teut combining element (not recorded in Gothic), prefixed to terms of relationship (as son, father, brother) to form designations for the degrees of affinity resulting from the remarriage of a widowed parent The primitive sense of the word is indicated by the use of OE stōpbearn, -cild (STEPBAIRN, STEPCHILD) for 'orphan', and by the cognates, OE dstleped bereaved, OHG stiufen (also as-, bistiufen) to bereave. Etymologically, stepfather (stepmother) might be rendered 'one who becomes a father (mother) to an orphan', and stepson (stepdaughter) 'an orphan who becomes a son (a daughter)' by the marriage of the surviving parent It is uncertain which of these two applications of the prefix is the original one; all branches of Teut (exc Gothic) have both, and also the extended use in stepbrother, stepsister ON had shortened forms, stjūpa stepmother, stjūp-r (mod Icel. stjúpi) stepson. In Du and LG, and in later Scandinavian, the p of O Teut. steupo-* is anomalously represented by f instead of p This is prob not due to HG influence, but to assimilation to the following f in the compound stepfather (cf the early ME. form steffadyr). A solitary OE. example of this anomaly occurs in the form stēfdohtor (quot. 912 s.v. STEPDAUGHTER). Occasional forms of the prefix in ME. are stīp- (styp-), sts-, ste-, stappe-.

In 1755 Johnson says that stepmother is the only one of the compounds of step that has survived in general use As the present day stepfather is hardly less frequently used, and stepson, -daughter, -child, brother, -sister are by no means rare, while stepdame occurs in somewhat archaistic language (chiefly fig.). In the 16th and 17th c a few writers employed the prefix in nonce-formations which would now seem unEnglish, as step devil, a term of abhorrence for a stepmother; step-duchess, the stepmother of a duke's children; step-lord, one who has the position of a lord without the true lord's affection for his subjects; step-Lully, one who assumes the function of a Cicero New formations with the prefix, denoting actual relations of affinity, do not appear earlier than the 19th c; in the latter part of the century they became somewhat common, chiefly as more or less jocular nonce-words, though one or two of them, as stepneighbour, -niece, have obtained some currency in serious use. The older compounds of step- are in this Dictionary treated as main words, the following examples illustrate the extended applications of the prefix from the 16th c onwards

Ster, obs. form of Star, Steer, Stir.

-ster, suffix (Forms: 1 -istre, -estre, later -ystre, -istre, 2-4 -estre, 4-5 -estir, 5 -ister, 4-7 -star(e, 4-5 -estere, -stere, 4- -ster), corresponding to MLG. -(e)ster, (M)Du and mod Frs. -ster, represents a W Ger. type -strjōn, forming feminine agent-nouns, prob a derivative of the O Teut -tro- forming nouns of action, as in ON. bakstr masc, act of baking, OHG galstar neut, incantation.

The existence of the suffix is not attested for High German, OS or OFris, the supposed examples sometimes cited, OHG wagastrâ lance, agalastra (OS agastria) magpie, OS hamstra marmot, ramistra some plant, are very doubtful, even if the suffix be formally identical with the agential suffix, it has not the same function In Du ster regularly forms feminine agent-nouns corresponding to masculines in -er, e g schrijfster fem of schrijver a writer In MLG and in mod Frs, although most of the nouns in -ster are fem, several occur as masc, e g MLG bedriegelster deceiver, N Frs greuwster gravedigger, nätster weaver

In the original types of the formation the suffix was probably preceded by the thematic vowel of the word to which it was attached, thus becoming astjon-, -stjon-, -stjōn- In the historical forms, however, there is no evidence of this (unless in the OE. hyrdistre, see below), in Du and Frs the suffix is ster without prefixed vowel, in MLG usually -ster, sometimes -ester, app merely for euphony In OE it is -estre, which does not produce umlaut, though it is often added to a stem containing an umlaut-vowel

In OE -estre was freely used to form fem agent-nouns, in exactly the same manner in which -ere (-fr[1]) was used to form masc agent-nouns Thus it was appended to the pres -stems of verbs, as in lārestre female teacher, hoppestre female dancer, and to certain monosyllabic nouns of action as in sangestre songstress, sēamestre sempstress, lybbestre female poisoner or witch. In a few instances fem agent-nouns were formed by the substitution of -estre for the masc suffix -a (— -jon-), as in bigengestre fem of bigenga cultivator, worshipper, webbestre (Websters) beside webbe as fem of webba weaver. Lættewe, leader, functionally an agent-n. though without agential suffix, gave rise to a fem. lættewestre. An anomalous formation is huntigestre (instead of huntestre*) huntress, which occurs once as a variant reading for huntuge.

In OE the suffix may be said to have retained its original function, for the few instances in which it is used as a masculine are renderings of Latin designations of men exercising functions which among the English were peculiar to women, as byrdastræ embroiderer (gl. blaciarius, primiciarius), bwcestre baker (gl. pistor), sēamestre tailor (gl sartor), wæscestre washer (gl fullo).

In northern ME, however, perh. owing to the frequent adoption by men of trades like weaving, baking, tailoring, etc, the suffix came very early to be used, indiscriminately with -er[1], as an agential ending irrespective of gender; thus in the Cursor Mundi (a 1300) demestre (see Dempster) appears instead of demere (Deemer), a judge, bemestre instead of bemer a trumpeter. It is probable that -ster was often preferred to -er as more unambiguously referring to the holder of a professional function, as distinguished from the doer of an occasional act. In Scotland, baxter and webster survived as masculines down to the 19th c. The only word of this formation that in Scotland has remained exclusively feminine is Sewster.

In the south the suffix continued to be predominantly feminine throughout the ME. period. The OE. formations, baxter, seamster, tapster, were in southern English usually feminine before 1500; many new designations of occupation, originally feminine, arose in ME, as bellringestre, hordestre treasurer (Winteney Rule St. Benet, 13th c.), hotestre fem. of hotere commander (Ayenbite), brewster, dyester, litster, throwster, huckster; also spinster, which alone of the group has survived (though with change of sense) solely as a feminine. A few feminines in -estere were formed to correspond to masculines in -er(e of French origin: frutestere, tumbestere, tumblestere, wafestere. As a feminine suffix of purely agential import, -ster was in the 14th c still used for new formations by some writers, but was generally replaced by the French -eresse. Thus MS. Bodl 277 of the Wyclif Bible has chesster, daunster, dwelster, wevlster, where other copies have cheseresse, dauneresse (leperesse), dwelleresse, weileresse

From the 16th c. onwards the older words in -ster, so far as they survived, have been regarded as masculines, and several of them have given rise to feminines in -ess, as backstress, seamstress, songstress, huckstress. In the modern English period the suffix has been very productive, but it is doubtful whether any of the new formations are really derived from verbs, in every instance in which this would be formally possible there is a sb of the same form as the vb., and the derivative is (in present feeling at least) associated rather with the sb than the vb. so in gamester, rhymester (late 16th c), druggster (1611, but cf druggester), and the much later dabster, jokester, punster, truckster, tipster. The formation here imitates that of trade designations, hence the disparaging sense, e.g. in rhymester, jokester, as compared with rhymer, joker An anomalous use is that in rubster (17th c) something used to rub with.

In the 16th c. two formations on adjs occur youngster (after which oldster was formed later) and lewdster

Stereobate (ste·rɪobēt). Arch [= F. stéréobate, It. stereobate, ad L. stereobata, ad Gr. "στερεοβατης, f στερεός solid + -βάτης as in στυλοβάτης STYLOBATE] A solid mass of masonry serving as a base for a wall or a row of columns. (See also quots)

The term occurs only once in ancient use (Vitruvius III iii) Vitruvius explains it as a massive wall built from the ground as a support for a row of columns. Modern writers (Latin in the 15–16th c, Italian, French, and English) have used it in various applications According to some, stereobate is the generic term for a basement either under a wall or a row of columns, and a 'stylobate' is a stereobate of which the superstructure is columnar Others restrict stereobate to the basement of a wall, as distinguished from stylobate, a basement under a row of columns Others, again, use stereobate for the whole basement, and stylobate for the upper portion of this, which is added when there are columns.

1836 PARKER Gloss Archit (1840) 206 Stylobate, Stereobate, the basement or substructure of a temple below the columns. a 1840 HOSKING Archit in Encycl. Brit (ed 7) III 470 Stereobate, a basement It is sought to make a distinction between this term and Stylobate q v, by restricting the latter to its real import, and applying stereobate to a basement in the absence of columns. 1875 Encycl Brit. II 441/1 [Italian Architecture] A basement is either a low stereobate or a lofty story, according as it is intended to support a single ordinance [etc].

Hence Stereoba tic a, pertaining to or having the character of a stereobate

Stereochemistry (ste·rɪokĕ·mɪstrɪ). [f STEREO- + CHEMISTRY] That department of chemistry which deals with theoretical differences in the relative position in space of atoms in a molecule, in relation to differences in the optical and chemical properties of the substances.

1890 V MEYER in Smithsonian Rep 366 Le Bel and van't Hoff considering those substances which turn the plane of polarization of light, arrived at a conception of the aggregation of the atoms within the molecules in space Thus a field of study was created which van't Hoff called 'la chimie dans l'espace' and which we now call Stereochemistry. 1899 Dublin Rev Oct 340 This is called Geometrical Isomerism or Stereochemistry

In the original form of the instrument (reflecting stereoscope), invented by Wheatstone, the images were combined by means of mirrors placed at a suitable angle, the common form (refracting or lenticular stereoscope), invented afterwards by Brewster, has two tubes each containing a lens, through which the two pictures are viewed by the corresponding eyes.

The earliest known example (in the Fr form esterlin) is believed to occur in a charter of the Norman abbey of Préaux (Round Cal Documents, France, p. 111) The date is supposed to be either 1085 or 1104, on the evidence of the golden number, but so far as this is concerned it might be later by 19 years or a multiple of 19, the cartulary is of the 13th c Ordericus Vitalis (a 1145) has in Latin libra sterlensium, and libra sterlensis monetæ, as if he took the word for an -ing derivative of a placename A Anglo-Latin sterlingus is cited by Ducange from the year 1180. Continental examples are frequent in the 13th c., the excellence of the English penny having procured for it extensive currency in foreign countries, in Oct 1202, Baldwin Count of Flanders contracts to pay to certain Venetian nobles 'the sum of 121 ounces in marks sterling (marcas sterlinorum) at the rate of 13 "solidi" and 4 "denarii" for each silver mark' (Rawdon Brown, Cal State Papers, Venice I. 2).

The word, if of English origin, presumably was descriptive of some peculiar characteristic of the new Norman penny. The most plausible explanation is that it represents a late OE steorling*, 'coin with a star' (f steorra star), some of the early Norman pennies having on them a small star An old conjecture is that the word is derived from stare a starling (STARE sb [1]), and alludes to the four birds (usually called 'martlets') on some coins of Edward the Confessor; but if this were so the early form would normally have been starling Until recently, the prevailing view was that the word was a shortening of EASTERLING Walter de Pinchebek (c 1300) gives this explanation, saying that the coin was originally made by Easterling moneyers, but the stressed first syllable would not have been dropped

In Scotland the word was confused with the name of the town of Stirling, anciently Strveiin, hence the β forms common in the 15th and 16th centuries]

3. a. (Lord High) Steward or †Great Steward of England. Recorded since the 15th cent. as

The title of a high officer of state, the earlier senescallus Angliae Since the accession of Henry IV this officer has been appointed only on the occasion of a coronation, at which he presides, or for the trial of a peer, which takes place in the Court of the Lord High Steward if Parliament be not sitting.

Originally this office seems to have carried little more than the privilege of waiting on the king's table, especially on state occasions But it soon became hereditary in the earls of Leicester, and powers similar to those of the French seneschal were claimed for it by Simon de Montfort. This development was checked by the attainder of Simon, and the office finally fell in to the crown by the accession of its holder Henry IV

[OE. stician wk. v., f. Teut. root stik-* to pierce, be sharp (whence Stick, Stitch sbs.) — Indogermanic stig-* (steg-) found in Gr στίζειν (—stigy-) to prick, στιγμή, στίγμα prick, point (see Stigma), L instigāre to spur on, Instigate, also with nasal infix, in Goth stiggan to thrust, L. -stinguĕre to prick (distinguĕre to distinguish); and without initial s in Skr. tyj- to be sharp, tigmá sharp. The Teut. root chiefly appears in the altered form stek-* (stak-* stæk-), as in the Com WGer. strong verb stekan to prick, thrust: see Steek v. The formal equivalent of OE. stician* (WGer type stikôjan, stekîjan, prob. denominative) occurs in OHG. stehhôn to prick, stab, cut the throat of, a parallel formation (WGer type stikkjan*, also prob denominative) is found as (M)Du., (M)LG. stikken to prick, pierce, stab, also to embroider (Sw sticka, Da stikke from LG.), OHG stecchen in the same senses (MHG, mod.G sticken to embroider)

It is impossible accurately to separate the history of this originally weak verb from that of the originally strong Steek v.? The latter was from an early period sometimes conjugated weak, while on the other hand the strong inflexions of steek became associated with stick, which, moreover, in the 16th c formed a new strong pa t and pa pple stuck (cf dig, dug). It is therefore often doubtful to which verb forms like stack, stuken, should be referred. Further, in some northern dialects the ME stike is normally represented by stēke, and therefore coincides (at least graphically) with Steek v.? The wk form sticked remained somewhat common use until the 17th c, and still survives (in certain senses) in Sc and various dialects (see Eng Dial Dict.).]

In stand, sit, lie still the word may be taken either as adj or adv In OE, however, there is evidence that in these collocations it was sometimes adv, and no evidence that it was ever adj, the constant form being stille (which always admits of being regarded as adv), never stillu, which would be the proper form of the adj when the subj is fem sing or neut pl Further, in OS and OHG the adv stille, not the adj, is used with the verb 'to stand' These phrases are therefore treated under STILL adv. 1
