VI A fund, store.

The senses grouped under this head are not found in the other Teut languages except by adoption from English Their origin is obscure, and possibly several different lines of development may have blended Thus the application of the word to a trader's capital may partly involve the notion of a trunk or stem (branch I) from which the gains are an outgrowth, and partly that of 'fixed basis or 'foundation' (branch II). Cf. Fund Sense 47 may be derived immediately from that of 'money-box', and have given rise to uses coincident with senses of different origin The application to cattle is primarily a specific use of the sense 'store', but the notion of 'race' or 'breed' (sense 3) has had some share in its development

Stole (stōul), sb 2 Also 5–6 stoole, 6 stoolle, stowle. [Commonly identified with Stole sb 1, to which the unauthenticated sense of 'royal robe' is assigned But there seems to be little doubt that the 'stole chamber', served by the Groom or Yeoman of the Stole, was originally the room containing the king's close-stool, and that the word is properly a variant of Stool sb 1 As, however, the word as thus used was for centuries entirely dissociated from stool, and latterly had a different spelling, it is necessary to treat it separately

In accounts of coronation ceremonies the king is said to have worn an ornament resembling a stole (Stole sb 1 2), but it does not appear that this was actually called a 'stole' until modern times The view that the Groom of the Stole derived his designation from this ornament is quite improbable

Sir H Nicolas's supposition, that the 'stole' was a kind of packing-chest, is a mistaken inference from the stola and male being mentioned together in certain documents.]

b In Great Britain from about 1850, the word has been current in the designation co-operative store, denoting the shop in which a co-operative trading society exposes goods for sale (originally to its own members only, but now usually also to the outside public). Now commonly in plural ('The Stores'), applied esp to the establishment of any of the larger London co-operative societies, which consists of a number of departments, each dealing in a separate class of goods. In imitation of this use, the plural ('—'s Stores', '— & Co's Stores') is often adopted as the designation of a trading establishment resembling 'The Stores' in extent and in multifariousness of business.

Story, sb 2, storey (stōʊ ri). Pl. stories, storeys Forms: 5 storye, 6 storie, (storrie, store), 7– storey, ? 4, 5– story. [First in AL. form historia; hence prob. the same word as STORY sb 1, though the development of sense is obscure

Possibly historia as an architectural term may originally have denoted a tier of painted windows or of sculptures on the front of a building see STORY sb 1 8, and cf. the Latin quot 1398 below and sense 2

The current view that the word is a OF estoree* (f estorer to build, furnish see FORBES p 8) is untenable on account of the AL. form historia (from 12th c)

The following are examples of the Anglo-Latin use of historia in the architectural sense —

1. Each of the stages or portions one above the other of which a building consists; a room or set of rooms on one floor or level.

In this use synonymous with FLOOR sb 5† but while in England the term FIRST-FLOOR is applied to the floor above the ground floor, the numbering of 'stories' (so named) usually begins with the ground floor, so that the 'first-floor' is identical with the 'second story,' and 'a house of one story' has a ground-floor only. A different usage is shown in quot. 1850, and appears to be not wholly obsolete.

Quot a 1400, though the reading is app the scribe's conjectural emendation of an obscure passage, may perh. be taken as attesting the existence of the sb at the date of the MS; the passage was prob supposed to refer to the addition of 'stories' or upper stages to towers.

This use is due to misunderstanding of the phrase 'strain at a gnat' in Matt xxiii 24. It has been asserted that 'strain at' in the Bible of 1611 is a misprint for 'strain out', the rendering of earlier versions (see sense 18). But quots 1583 and 1594 show that the translators of 1611 simply adopted a rendering that had already obtained currency It was not a mistranslation, the meaning intended being 'which strain the liquor if they find a gnat in it' The phrase, however, was early misapprehended (perh already by Shaks. in quot 1609), the verb being supposed to mean 'to make violent effort' (see sense 18).
