2 Phrases. a. To make bricks without straw said with allusion to Exodus v.

The current form and application of the saying are hardly justified by the narrative. The Israelites were not required to make bricks without straw (which was an indispensable binding material for sun dried bricks), but to gather the straw for themselves instead of having it furnished to them The phrase, however, now commonly means 'to be required to produce results without the means usually considered necessary'. b With prefixed word, forming the proper name of a street. Abbreviated St, st

In early examples these appellations were originally descriptive, as in the Broad street, the HIGH STREET (In some towns, a name of this type still retains the definite article) In modern nomenclature, the choice of the prefixed word is often arbitrary

Modern usage is divided as to the writing of these names with hyphen or as two words (In the 16–17th c they were not unfrequently written as one word, e g 'Limestreete', Stow Surv ed 1603, p 158) It is to be observed that names ending in street are always stressed on the prefixed element, while those ending in road or lane have level stress cf, e.g, Park-street with Park-lane, Park-road. c 1275 in Trans Shropsh Archæol Soc Ser 1. 1855 W. J. M. Rankine Misc Sci Papers (1881) 120 In this paper, the word 'Strain' will be used to denote the change of volume and figure constituting the deviation of a molecule of a solid from that condition which it preserves when free from the action of external forces; and the word 'Stress' will be used to denote the force, or combination of forces, which such a molecule exerts in tending to recover its free condition, and which, for a state of equilibrium, is equal and opposite to the combination of external forces applied to it. 1856 Thomson in Phil Trans CXLVI 481 A stress is an equilibrating application of force to a body Ibid. note, It will be seen that I have deviated slightly from Mr Rankine's definition of the word 'stress,' as I have applied to the direct action experienced by a body from the matter around it, and not, as proposed by him, to the elastic reaction of the body equal and opposite to that action. 1873 R. H. Bow Economics of Construction 45 note, The term stress expresses the condition of a part of the structure to the extremities of which are applied compressing or extending forces; the amount of the stress is measured by the magnitude of the force acting on either extremity. The strain is the change of length from elasticity which the part undergoes when subjected to the stress. 1873 Maxwell Electr & Magn. I 59 The nature of this stress [in dielectrics] is a tension along the lines of force combined with an equal pressure in all directions at right angles to these lines. 1896 Greener Gun (ed 6) 545 The stresses upon a gun are a radial stress or 'pressure,' a tangential stress, or hoop tension, a longitudinal stress. 1911 J. A. Ewing in Encycl Brit XXV 1007/1 Stress is the mutual action between two bodies, or between two parts of a body, whereby each of the two exerts a force upon the other. A body is said to be in a state of stress when there is a stress between the two parts which lie on opposite sides of an imaginary surface of section

LG. bestriden to bestride (a horse) The vb. is not found elsewhere in Teut with similar sense, but is formally coincident and probably identical with the str. vb. meaning to strive, quarrel ORris. strîda, (M)Du. strijden, MLG strîden, OHG strîtan (MHG strîten, mod.G streiten); of the same or similar meaning are the weak verbs, OS strîdian (MLG strîden), ON. strîða (Norw , Sw. strida, Da stride is now conjugated strong), cf. OFris , OS strîd, Du. strijd, OHG. strît (mod G streit) masc strife, quarrel, ON. strîð neut strife, grief, affliction (Norw., Sw , Da strid), strîða fem. adversity, severity, strîð-r stubborn, severe (Norw., Sw., Da. strid).

The primary meaning of the Teut root strît- is commonly assumed to be 'contention' or 'strong effort'. On this view the Fng sense of the vb , 'to take long steps' (sense 2 below), would be a development from the continental sense 'to strive' This would in itself be possible, but sense 1 would remain unexplained. The assumption of a primary sense 'to diverge' (cf Skr strdh to go astray) would account plausibly on the one hand for the sense 'to quarrel', and on the other hand for the sense 'to straddle', from which the sense 'to take long steps' would be a natural development

The recent examples show much uncertainty with regard to the conjugation Perhaps (though this is far from certain) most people would give strode, stridden in answer to a grammatical question, but in actual speech and writing there is often hesitation as to the correct form The pa pple rarely occurs, our material includes hardly any 19th or 20th c examples of stridden, and not many of strided In the pa t strode is certainly the usual form; but where the reference is to a single act and not to a manner of progression there seems to be a tendency to say strided ('I strided over the ditch')

The verb is not found outside Fr , the alleged Pr. estribar cited by etymologists having no existence It is commonly believed to be of Teut etymology According to some scholars, OF estriver (estrif (whence STRIFE sb), which is regarded as a modification of the older OF (and Pr) estrel, (= OIt stridо, strivo), a OTeut strīdan* strife, combat, related to strīdan* to fight see STRIDE v. According to others, the OF verb (of which, on this view, the sb estrif is a derivative) is a OTeut strībhan* str vb (Mid G strīben, early mod Du strijven, though these are prob of secondary origin), f root strībh* , of which the ablaut variant strīdh-* is represented by the weak verb MLG strīven (mod LG strēwen), (MDu strāven, MHG , mod G streben, to endeavour, struggle (= sense 9 below), also (from LG) Sw strīfva, Da. strœle Both explanations present some unsolved difficulties, the former is more satisfactory with regard to sense, but the notions of 'conflict 'and 'endeavour' easily pass the one into the other

The strong conjugation (on the analogy of drive etc) is found somewhat earlier than the weak conjugation which would be normal for a verb adopted from Fr , and has always been the more frequent of the two, though many examples of strived pa t and pa pple occur in writers of every period from the 14th to the 19th c The Bible of 1611 has always strove in the pa t , the pa pple is strived, striven (one example each) The irregular pa pple strove (after the pa t , of the form stroven of the 16-17th c) appears first in the 17th c, and remained somewhat common down to the middle of the 19th c, but is now confined to illiterate use]

22 Gram In various applications (opposed to weak). a. Of Teutonic sbs. and adjs, their inflexions, etc: Belonging to any of those declensions in which the OTeut stem ended otherwise than in n b Of Teut verbs and their inflexions Forming the past and participle, by means of vowel-gradation in the root-syllable, as the Eng give, break Hence occas used with reference to other Indo-Germanic langs, e g in strong aorist, applied in Gr grammar to the 'second aorist' (ἔλιπον) in contradistinction to the 'weak' or sigmatic aorist (ἔλειψα). c In Sanskrit grammar, applied to the unreduced form of noun-stems, and to those cases which are formed on the 'strong' stem.

In these uses strong and weak are translations of the G stark and schwach, the grammatical senses of which are due to Jakob Grimm. The reason for the choice of these terms to denote the two classes of declension was prob. that in German the formal distinction of case is weakened in the n declensions by the disappearance of the original case-endings (Some scholars, following the letter of Grimm's own definition, inconveniently restrict the term 'strong' to the vocalic stems, so that the stems ending in other consonants than n form a third class, neither 'strong' nor 'weak') The ablaut-verbs were designated as 'strong' because in them the form of the root suffixed to express past time without the adventitious aid of a tense suffix a 1841 Latham Eng Lang 58 In A. S, there is the Weak, or Simple Declension for words ending in a Vowel (as Eage, Steorra, Tunga), and the Strong, or Complex Declension for words ending in a Consonant (Smið, Sprec, Leof)

b 1841 Latham Eng Lang 277 The German Grammarians call the Tenses formed by a change of vowel, the Strong Tenses, the Strong Verbs, the Strong Conjugation, or the Strong Order Ibid 278 The Strong Præterites are formed from the Present by changing the vowel, as sing, sang, speak, spoke. 1871 Earle Philol Eng Tongue § 274 There is a slow continual tendency in these strong verbs to merge themselves gradually into the more numerous class of the weak verbs

c 1863 Benfey Sansk Gram § 220 There are some nouns which have a strong and a weak form Some have even three, a strong, a weak, and a weakest form.

1. In Greek choral and lyric poetry, and imitations of this· A series of lines forming a system the metrical structure of which is repeated in a following system called the ANTISTROPHE Also, in wider sense, one of two or more metrically corresponding series of lines forming divisions of a lyric poem Hence occas (after Fr.) used with reference to modern poetry as equivalent to STANZA.

Originally the word στροφή, 'turning', was applied to the movement of the chorus from right to left, and ἀντιστροφή, 'counter turn', to its returning movement from left to right; hence these terms became the designations of the portions of the choric ode sung during these movements respectively

The commonly assumed derivation from Stub sb presents no great difficulty with regard to the sense ('as if immovable as a stub or stock'), but is not easy to justify morphologically It has been suggested that the word represents an OE stybborf* stybb* Stub sb , the final n being supposed to be due to a false analysis of stybbornesse, stobornesse etc (see Stubbornness) But -or was only a living suffix in OE ; the words containing it are inherited from O Icel , and are not formed on noun stems but on verbal roots The early spelling of stubbornness with only one n is of no significance, more noteworthy, however, is the spelling stobe- in our first example of the adv The fluctuation in the vowel (see the Forms above) might be supposed to be an argument in favour of derivation from Icel *stybbr, *stubbr, *stobbr, but it should be noted that a similar fluctuation appears in the forms of Stubble sb , which is of Romanic origin]

Stuff (stʌf), sb^{1} Forms: 4–5 stof, 5–6 stoffe, 4–7 stuffe, 5–6 stuf, 5–8 stufe, (6 stoufe), 4– stuff. [ME stoffe, stof, a. OF estoffe fem., material, furniture, provision (mod. F. étoffe material, stuff, esp. textile material) = Pr., Sp., Pg. estofa, cloth, quality, It. stoffa piece of rich textile fabric. From the OF. word are med.L. estoffa, stoffa, Du stoffe, stof fem., G. stoff masc., matter, stuff, whence Sw stoff, Da. stof neut.

The ultimate etymology is obscure. Diez conjectured that the Rom stoffa and the related vb stoffare (Stuff v) are derived from the OHG. stoffôn* (MHG., mod G stopfen) to stop with oakum, which is explained (Stuff v) represents a WGer adoption of med L stuppâre to plug, stop up, f stuppa tow, oakum. This is open to strong objections, the likelihood of a specifically HG etymon for a Com. Rom. word is questionable, and the original sense of the Rom. verb appears to be, not 'to plug or stop up', but 'to garnish or store with something.' Whether the sb. is the source of the verb derived from it, is uncertain, the masc. form in It. stoffo, Pg estofo quilted material, is undoubtedly a verbal noun.]

Stump (stʊmp), *sb.*2 [Of obscure history

The late appearance of the word suggests that it is an adaptation (influenced by STUMP *sb.*1) of the far older Fr. synonym estomper, which, along with the related vb estomper, †estomber, appears a 1700 in De la Hire Traité de la Pratique de la Peinture, published in Mém de l'Acad. Roy des Sciences 1666–1699 (1730) IX 658 De la Hire evidently regarded the words as established in use; he suggests that estompe may be a corruption of étoupe (earlier estoupe) tow, link This is impossible, most etymologists regard the sb as derived from the vb, which some believe to be ad. Du stompen or afstompen to dull, blunt, though there seems to be no evidence that either of these vbs. was ever used in the sense of Fr. estomper

The stump for crayon drawing is elaborately described, as an instrument used by Fr pastellists, in A Browne's Appendix Art Painting (1675), but without mention of either the English or the Fr name. Browne says (in this copy) W Sanderson Graphice II. 78, published 1658) that a 'stubbed pencil' (app. = 'brush', not 'crayon' or 'lead pencil'), sometimes 'stuffed with cotton or bombast', was employed by some artists for the same purpose Obviously a 'stubbed pencil' could be called in English a 'stump' (STUMP *sb.*1 3); and the equivalent Du. stompe could be employed in the same way On the whole, considering that in the 17th c the art of crayon drawing received much improvement in Holland, the likeliest view seems to be that the word stompe was applied (with no intention of using a technical term) to the 'stubbed pencil' by Dutch artists working in French studios, and that in the adapted form estompe it became the Fr name for the improved instrument invented in France. On this view the Eng. word would be an adaptation of the Fr, as the relative chronology suggests.]

A kind of pencil consisting of a roll of paper or soft leather, or of a cylindrical piece of indiarubber or other soft material, usually cut to a blunt point at each end, used for rubbing down hard lines in pencil or crayon drawing, for blending the lines of shading so as to produce a uniform tint, and for other similar purposes.

Stunt (stʌnt), *sb.*2 colloq. [Of obscure origin.]

One belonging to the slang of American college athletics, not in the Century Dict 1891 or in Webster 1897, in 1895 the word (as our first quot. shows) seems to have been still current only among college students. Its general colloquial currency, and its extension of application, seems to have begun early in the 20th c. In British use it was at first regarded as mainly a soldiers' word. It has been conjectured that the word may be a G. stunde, lit. hour, or a variant of Stunt *sb.*1 neither of these suggestions seems impossible. A notion which is app. prevalent in the U.S. is that the word is a variant of Stump *sb.*1, but in spite of the remarkable affinity of meaning, etymological connexion between the words is very unlikely.]

a. A prescribed item in an athletic competition or display, an 'event'; a feat undertaken as a defiance in response to a challenge; 'an act which is striking for the skill, strength, or the like, required to do it, a feat' (W. Suppl 1900), something performed as an item in an entertainment, a (theatrical, etc.) 'turn'. b. In recent use, An enterprise set on foot with the object of gaining reputation or signal advantage. In soldiers' language often vaguely. An attack or advance, a 'push', 'move'.

1895 Dial Notes (Amer. Dial. Soc.) I viii 400 Stunt (stʌnt) one of those convenient words which may be used in almost any connection and the exact meaning of which must be determined largely by the context; 'It would be a great stunt to go to a dance without a girl' (i.e. an unpleasant thing to do). 'He performed various stunts for the prof' (i.e. did things that would win him the professor's favor, give him a 'pull'). [Editor's note Doing stunts is used in N.Y. City by boys in the sense of performing some feat in rivalry,—a long jump for instance,—one boy 'stumping' or challenging another.] 1897 Outing Aug 440/2 A lamprey fastened upon a bare leg.
