the botanist, 1810–1888, won a permanent place in the annals of scientific achievement. As inhabitants of a new continent, beset with problems thrust upon them by a strange environment, Americans were intellectually hospitable to any and all increase of knowledge which might have a bearing upon the vicissitudes of life. They received gratefully the application of scientific principles to industry, the invention of devices to lighten human toil. The discoveries of mechanistic and other science and greater wealth improved standards of living. Use of the telegraph increased, and electric lighting, the telephone, steam heat, matches, elevators, and paved streets appeared or had wider use. On the other hand, when scientific studies challenged and apparently undermined long-held views, the acceptance of their conclusions was not so immediate or enthusiastic. Some of the implications suggested by the study of biology and geology which had a direct bearing upon human origins and destiny caused considerable perturbation. Darwin's On the Origin of Species (1859), which conflicted with orthodoxy, was read hesitantly and rejected or feared by many because of its implied attitude toward the traditional teachings of the church. Herbert Spencer applied the Darwinian theory of evolution to the study of sociology and psychology. Through his interpretations of various aspects, John Fiske, 1842–1901, philosopher and historian, presented a confident optimism grounded upon a new view of man's biological past and an expanding vision of his future, an optimism yielding later to a more pessimistic outlook. These two men and Edward Youmans, 1821–1887, who was the chief promoter of Spencer's publications in the United States, and who secured the establishment of the Popular Science Monthly in 1872, were largely instrumental in making the American mind science-conscious.<sup>1</sup>

The Gilded Age was not marked by high artistic or aesthetic taste. Domestic architecture implied lavish expenditure and sought impressiveness through size and ornamentation. A house built on massive proportions was looked on as a sign of financial stability, if not as a guarantee of social respectability. In many instances expenditure was carried to the point of absurdity. Exterior ornamentations, sometimes of wood, sometimes of metal, often of intricate pattern and design and exhibiting a multiplicity of pointless detail, deserved the name given them of "gingerbread decoration." In contrast with the beauty of simplicity and orderliness which characterized early American architecture and which has been to some extent restored in our day, although on different lines, these creations of the Gilded Age are masterpieces of ill-advised complexity and disorder.

Not all its achievements were accepted without protest. Such books as Mark Twain's The Gilded Age (1873) and W. D. Howells's The Rise of Silas Lapham (1885), read in the light of later perspective, are not mere representations of life but are as well rather pointed criticism of some of its tendencies. Henry George, 1839–1897, and Henry Adams, 1838–1918, were the professed critics of the period and the philosophy of life which characterized it. In his Progress and Poverty (1879–1880) George attacked it from the economic side. The tendency in American life as he viewed it made inevitable an ever-widening gap between wealth and poverty, as civilization advances. His contention was that land with all that it provides for the well-being of man belonged to the people as a gift of nature and that every human being has a right to as much of this gift as is necessary for his happiness and well-being. Henry Adams, writing somewhat later, felt keenly the smothering influence of the time upon the cultural and intellectual life of the nation. Scion of a renowned New England family, an intellectual by heritage and preference, he found the atmosphere of his age hostile to his ideals. In his bewilderment he sought to find a satisfying philosophy of history and of life in various ways, such as the study of American history and biography, and the interpretation of medieval French mysticism as represented in Mont-Saint-Michel and Chartres.

Two other trends deserve mention. Education gained in importance in the later century. Schools and colleges existed no longer merely for the clerical and learned professions but became more scientific and sought to give more emphasis to the practical, if not yet to the vocational. Education for women gained acceptance also. Oberlin opened its doors to women in 1835 and to coeducation on the college level in 1837, and it was the first institution to do so. Its example was followed in time by the state universities, and distinctive colleges for women, such as Vassar (1865) and Wellesley (1870), were founded.<sup>1</sup> By the end of the century the principle of feminine education was well established. Newspapers and popular magazines for home reading, for which this was a flourishing period, sprang into existence. Harper's Magazine (1850), the Atlantic Monthly (1857), Scribner's Monthly (1870), and the Century (1881), devoted to articles, essays, fiction, and travel sketches, competed in popularity and influence. The higher forms of literature became somewhat subordinated to science, popular interests, and the dissemination of news. The influence of the editorial, however, waned.

In the wake of great economic changes it was inevitable that the spirit of the people should change as well. Gone were the spacious idealistic pre-war days. The national mind tended as a whole toward continued and re-emphasized practicality. The measurement of industrial achievement in terms of profit focused attention on things rather than man. As interest in things became more pronounced, from romantic idealism with its confident optimism the pendulum slowly swung in the direction of artistic earthliness.

The new age was to be chiefly an age of prose; the age-old ascendancy of poetry was broken at last. It was marked by the entrance of unconventional, sometimes unliterary new work, much of it humorous. Changes in social and agricultural conditions were accompanied by literary changes and shifts of emphasis. New patterns of thought and new moods appeared and new topics displaced the old. After 1870 fiction became a more and more important form of literary art as it groped toward new subjects and a new technique. The literary frontier was extended beyond the Alleghenies over the Middle Border to the Pacific,<sup>1</sup> with Mark Twain and Bret Harte as leading pioneers in regional writing, local color, and the frontier spirit. The realistic movement got consciously under way in the 1880's, with W. D. Howells its avowed champion, though his proved to be the mild realism of the commonplace rather than the stern brand of European novelists like Zola, Flaubert, Turgenev, or Tolstoi. Later came naturalism, with Stephen Crane as its first exponent. Humanitarianism continued to have emphasis, and more attention was given to sociological problems and externalities. New political and other novels dealt with the phenomena of cities and with economic realism and psychology. A literature of protest<sup>2</sup> made its appearance, mirroring disillusionment and skepticism and exhibiting a new sense of political injustice, coercive regimentation, and class division. The passion for individual liberty dimmed. Romantic optimism, which had been a dominant trend from about 1850 to the Civil War, became outdated. Though the old authors continued to write, for the most part they merely echoed their earlier work. Culture still meant Europe and the past, but a new national culture struggled upward.<sup>3</sup> Preoccupation with fact, reality, things as they are, assumed the lead over sentimentality and the extravagant. The new realism was to influence all types of writing, fiction, drama, poetry, criticism, history.

The romanticism persisting in poetry was a paling romanticism of convention, its subject matter outworn. A group of younger poets, R. H. Stoddard, Bayard Taylor, E. R. Sill, E. C. Stedman, T. B. Aldrich, who came to maturity after the war, continued the declining tradition. Reared as they were in pre-war days, they did not realize the changed order and left unsung the beginnings of the new life. The bulk of the poetry continuing the Genteel Tradition is intellectually thin and devoid of ideas, emotionally somewhat forced and colorless, seeming at times artificial and insincere. Exotic old-world themes were preferred by these writers to native subject matter, and some of their best work dealt with foreign material. Keats and Tennyson strongly influenced several members of the group during their formative years, notably Taylor and Aldrich. Mere aestheticism, the striving for effects that are pretty and sentimental rather than beautiful or moving, almost assumed the proportions of a cult. Lanier, a romantic, though he was conscious of economic change, mainly continued to treat old themes. Post-war romanticism could not thrive long, however, in the new spiritual climate. The genteel tradition of sentimental cultured conformity to European models, a tradition often resulting in a false refinement,<sup>1</sup> was to end with Walt Whitman and Emily Dickinson.

The major poetic figure of the after-war period is Whitman, who broke loose from convention in both matter and form. Neither departure proved acceptable to his contemporaries, but both were to inspire later literature. Whitman realized that new form was necessary for the new indigenous democratic material he aspired to treat. He wished to be the laureate of democracy and to teach equality and comradeship. He was impressed, too, by the vast American scene, stretching from coast to coast and from Canada to Florida; and he left a sort of general canvas of its wide spaces and varied life. Whitman was a child of the transcendentalists, especially Emerson, to whom he owed the suggestion of the need of a newer, freer verse form. He had their optimism and their self-confidence. In common with the romanticists of the earlier period he had faith in the goodness and perfectibility of the people, in idealistic philosophy, and in the worship of a beautiful and edifying pre-Darwinian nature permeated with divinity; although, unlike them, he did not profess to prefer solitude to society but felt drawn to crowds. Whitman belonged with the realists, on the other hand, in his sympathy with laborers, artisans, pioneers, with the life of the farm and the life of the city, in his realistic treatment of sex, and when picturing American harbors, ferryboats, and the American countryside. Through identifying himself in his peculiar manner with persons and objects, and through his mannerism of addressing his readers as though face to face with them, he achieved extraordinary effects of intensity and reality. Whitman's democracy now seems more of the past than of the roseate future he prophesied; but such was the originality and force of his work that he will remain an outstanding literary personality of his day. His contribution to the growth of realism should not be minimized or overlooked.

The second salient poetic figure of the period is Emily Dickinson. Her work was preserved to us more or less by accident; only a few of her pieces were published in her lifetime, and not till the twentieth century did her recognition come. Her poetic ideas and comments belong, in any case, to no special era but are independent of time. She too rejected conventions, cared for no set technique, no formulas of versification, no fastidious rhyming. She was free from conventions of matter as well. There is no European imitation in her work, no consciousness of Keats or Tennyson. Nor did she need outside experience to inspire her. Her recluse life with its narrow opportunities seemed to be enough. She found her themes in her household duties, her flowers, the weather, and in her inner life. She concerned herself with abstractions regarding the age-old subjects: life, death, love, nature, eternity. She must be read for her thought, for audacious daring bits spontaneously presented, comments on life, flights of the imagination, and sudden transcendental glimpses. The usual conception of her as a blighted soul, shunning human contacts because of her thwarted love affair, is probably mistaken. Rather does her poetry leave an effect of gaiety, joy, and utter independence.

Much the same shifts of emphasis appear in the field of fiction as in the field of poetry. No one came forward to carry on the tradition of Cooper, Poe, and Hawthorne. In fiction, too, the romantic temper had lost its freshness and power and seemed to linger as a static aftermath. Even before Hawthorne's death in 1864 the stream of the novel began to thin. The Lamplighter (1854), by Maria S. Cummins, outsold The Scarlet Letter (1850), but is now forgotten. The so-called "domestic sentimentalists," Mrs. E. D. E. N. Southworth, Mary J. Holmes, Augusta Evans Wilson, produced a flood of lachrymose classics. The "evangelical sentimentalists," Dr. J. G. Holland, the first editor of Scribner's Magazine, and the Reverend E. P. Roe, one-time army chaplain, composed moralizing tales which conformed to the popular conception of poetic justice. Since the novel was forced to vindicate itself against popular prejudice by its emphasis on moral and religious sentiment<sup>1</sup> it is not hard to understand why Lew Wallace's Ben Hur (1880), a well-written story of the time of Christ, became one of the most widely read novels of the post-war period. In reality these writers represented the transition from the older romance to a new type of novel, the nature of which was yet undetermined. As romances, many were pallid reflections of a type that is past, love stories bathed in sweetness and sentimentalism and conveying moral lessons, but seldom penetrating beneath the surface of life and hence throwing little light upon its meaning and significance. Aside from touches of realism here and there, they were indifferent and unprophectic as omens of the novel that was to come.

Two definite phases of post-war literary development are mainly traceable to the western migration. One is the emergence of humor, culminating in Mark Twain; the other is the rise of local color, involving faithful details of region and scene, the "here and now," under the influence of Bret Harte.

literature. It is essentially the product of the frontier—of the frontier after it moved far enough west to escape the inhibiting hand of the Puritan tradition. New England had produced genuine native Yankee humor, seen in such works as Samuel Peters's "lying history" of Connecticut (1781), Royall Tyler's The Contrast (1787), and at a much later date Lowell's The Biglow Papers; but the fact should be emphasized that the humor which has persisted and which is in the direct line of development sprang largely from the colorful westward-moving frontier. The eastern frontier was relatively homogeneous, the settlers being largely of Anglo-Saxon stock and showing a limited variety of human types. When different racial stocks were thrown together, as Dutch and English were in New York, Irving could write his humorous Knickerbocker History (1809). As the frontier moved westward it became more and more picturesque. Contrasts became sharper and sharper, and humor thrives on contrasts. It is not surprising therefore that Artemus Ward, Josh Billings, and Petroleum V. Nasby, natives of the East, sought contact with the moving frontier, Ward traveling all the way to the Pacific coast, Billings and Nasby visiting the Mississippi valley. They brought to their writings freshness and freedom, a release from convention and restraint, and considerable democratic irreverence, qualities which a more settled state of culture could hardly have inspired or stimulated. In fact, the humor of an eastern writer like Seba Smith, whose Letters of Major Jack Downing (1839) were very popular in their day, seems thin and pale beside that of the more virile writers who drew material and inspiration from the West.

Mark Twain is in the direct line of development of this western humor, and became its most famous exponent. Born in Missouri he moved as a young man to the Pacific coast where he was in turn prospector, miner, and newspaper man, and emerged as a professional humorist, making use of the contrasts, exaggeration, and burlesque suggested to him by frontier life. But Mark Twain was more than a humorist and professional laughter-smith. He was a critic and satirist as well. The failure of his generation to recognize his serious purposes became in later life a real tragedy to him. As a document in social history, Life on the Mississippi (1883) is an accurate and vivid record of the steamboat era. The Gilded Age (1873) is a rather sharp attack against the crass materialism of the get-rich-quick variety of money-makers who dominated the seventies and eighties. The Prince and the Pauper (1882) is a venture into English history, with an anti-monarchical slant. A Connecticut Yankee at King Arthur's Court (1889) is not merely a burlesque staged in the Middle Ages but a pitiless exposure of what the author regarded as a highly inferior civilization, and incidentally an implied defense of American democratic institutions. The Mysterious Stranger (1916), published after his death, deals cynically with the problem of man's origin and destiny. Mark Twain's life seems to have been an unfolding disillusionment, leading to unmitigated pessimism, both of which find in this posthumous book pointed and bitter expression. His fame has rested hitherto on such more purely humorous books as The Adventures of Tom Sawyer (1876) and The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn (1884) rather than upon the more serious books just mentioned. Upon which it will ultimately rest it is too early to conjecture. Recent studies, however, indicate that many of his writings once superficially regarded as humorous only now are seen to carry a purpose beyond the mere provocation of laughter, and that the admittedly critical aspect of his thought is at the moment of paramount interest. He looms as one of the great figures in our literature, from whatever angle he is approached.

Bret Harte, who had coached Mark Twain, was one of the original "Argonauts" to journey from the East to the shores of the Pacific. Here he found employment in a variety of occupations and finally established himself as a writer of a new type of prose. He took the western scene as subject matter for his work and endeavored to represent it with meticulous regard to immediate local conditions, such as character, dialect, and setting. These he overlaid with something of the sentimentalism of Dickens, of whose novels he was a lifelong sympathetic reader. In "The Luck of Roaring Camp" (1868) and "The Outcasts of Poker Flat" and "Tennessee's Partner" (1869), he is generally credited with beginning the local-color school of American fiction. As over against his fiction, Harte's verse is mediocre and at times descends to doggerel. He achieved great vogue during his lifetime, but he did not seem to be able to maintain the pace he had set for himself in his earlier writings and his work gradually lost favor. During his later years he lived in Europe, in lonely isolation from family, friends, home, and country.

Western poetry of this period is represented further by the work and colorful personality of Cincinnatus Hiner Miller, who later adopted the name of Joaquin. Born in Indiana, he was taken as a child to Oregon, where he grew up. The influence of Byron, whose works he read eagerly, is noticeable in his personality as well as in his poetry. Discouraged by the neglect of his own people, he went to London and found himself lionized by London society. His poetry, uneven in quality, rises on occasion to lyrical heights. The themes are largely western and the best passages are mainly inspired by the poet's love of the western scene.

The two realists who dominated American fiction until the end of the century are William Dean Howells and Henry James. Howells grew up in Ohio but lived for the greater part of his life in Boston and New York. In his Criticism and Fiction (1891) and other critical writings he assailed the practices of the romanticists and extolled the virtues of realism; as a novelist he put his critical theories into practice. Because of very definite religious convictions and a high sense of ethical responsibility he closed his eyes to much that seeing life steadily and seeing it whole would naturally have prompted him to notice, and which later novelists saw and reported. He was careful not to offend popular taste or the moral sensitivity of his readers.

He aimed to portray life as it unfolded itself in ordinary routine experiences, and avoided for the most part themes that are unpleasant and problematical. This does not mean that Howells was a man of timid or lackluster thought. He treated socialistic ideals in fictionized form in A Traveller from Altruria (1894), really a tract, and Through the Eye of the Needle (1907). He dulled the controversial edge of his liberal thought by his mild-mannered treatment and thus escaped many of the dangers which befell some of the later realists. In The Rise of Silas Lapham (1885) and A Hazard of New Fortunes (1889) he not merely sets changing social conditions in contrast but is at the same time definitely critical of them. He was influenced by some of the continental realists, notably Tolstoi, Turgenev, and Zola, whose general attitude he shared but whose extremes he avoided with zealous care. To such persons as enjoy the calm unfolding of the panorama of life in its quieter phases, some of Howells's novels are still vitally interesting. For the moment, however, his reputation is dimmed by the work of his more audacious successors.

Henry James, the internationalist, is pre-eminently a psychologist. Educated mostly abroad, he came to look upon his native land as essentially crude and uncultured. The mellow atmosphere of old-world centers of culture was more conducive to his spiritual development and peace of mind than that of America with its multiplicity of enterprises, most of which were culturally undirected and therefore, it seemed to him, largely wasted. The scenes of many of his novels are laid, in whole or in part, in foreign lands. In many of them American and foreign characters are confronted, and the contrasts do not always reflect credit upon his fellow countrymen. James probes deep into the spiritual experiences and motives of his characters and reveals with extraordinary meticulousness their mental processes.

The essay did not play a very conspicuous or important role in the after-war period. Perhaps the nature writers,<sup>1</sup> John Burroughs and John Muir, deserve leading mention. Nor was the drama very distinctive. The leaders in stage literature were Augustin Daly, James A. Herne, Bronson Howard, William Gillette, Augustus Thomas, Clyde Fitch—none of these of salient importance.

In general the decades from the 1830's till the Civil War have remained the Golden Age of American literature. In the last part of the century the literary product bulked large and the level of execution was high. Printing presses turned out masses of reading matter and more persons wrote than ever before. Nevertheless the more significant names came, as in England, in the first half of the century. Except for a few poets and fiction writers, the work of the later authors was less distinctive and original and achieved less recognition in other countries.

IT WAS not until the twentieth century that Melville found acknowledgment as a major writer. His significance was suddenly recognized in the wake of a rising interest in the South Seas, fostered by Robert Louis Stevenson's residence in Samoa and Tahiti. It was Melville who first pointed out the romance of the islands of the South Pacific. He was an independent genius, owing little to the writers of New England or to the Knickerbocker school. Neither Hawthorne nor Poe had his vigor, breadth, and prodigality as a writer of fiction. His Moby Dick now ranks as one of our great works of fiction.

Herman Melville, a grandson of the old man of Holmes's "The Last Leaf," took pride in his New England ancestry. His family had been one of distinction in Scotland and had taken a prominent part in the Revolutionary War. He was born in New York on August 1, 1819. His father was a well-to-do merchant who traveled extensively. He died when Melville was still very young but not before the boy had developed a strong interest in foreign places and peoples. The family had reverses before his father died, and his mother was left with little or no support for herself and her small children. Melville was educated at the public schools and attended the Albany Academy until he was fifteen. He then tried clerking in a bank and teaching school, but he did not like teaching. In 1837 he ran off to sea and shipped on a boat that sailed to England. He tried once more to teach school but again gave it up. This was the age of fast sailing vessels, "clipper ships," and the spirit of the sea was strong within him.

The next years of his life were years of romance and adventure. In 1841, when he was twenty-one, he took ship for the South Pacific on the whaler Acushnet and remained on it for eighteen months. Because of the hardships of the life, he deserted, and with a comrade lived for four months among friendly cannibals, the Typees of the Marquesas Islands. He was rescued by an Australian whaler and put ashore at Tahiti, where he hired out for some time. He escaped once more and returned in an American ship to Boston. His "travel romances" or "sketch books of the South Seas" record these experiences. Typee (1846) gives an idyllic picture, probably influenced by Rousseau, of life in the Pacific Isles; and Omoo (1847) has its scenes laid in Tahiti and the Marquesas. In these tales of sea adventures, and in the later Moby Dick, both reality and imagination are relied upon as a basis for the incidents. Redburn (1849) and White Jacket (1850), books which belong to our naval history, are more or less autobiographical and tell of his life as a seaman on board a United States frigate. These early books brought him both celebrity and condemnation; for he was censured for his arraignment of missionaries and soldiers, and his account of the ill effects that the bringing of the white man's civilization had upon the islands.

Once more in America, Melville was conspicuous as the "man who had escaped from the cannibals." In 1847, he married the daughter of the chief justice of Massachusetts. He lived for a while in New York and continued to write. In 1849 he traveled in London and Paris; and Mardi, a medley of travel sketches, philosophy, and satire, was published. After his return to America, he moved to Arrowhead Farm at Pittsfield, Massachusetts. Here he came to know Hawthorne at Lenox and in 1851 dedicated Moby Dick to him. After the publication of Pierre (1852) his work declined in interest and power, and his later books, such as Israel Potter (1855) and Piazza Tales (1856), are little known. He printed some poetry and tried lecturing; but as he grew older, he withdrew more and more from society. In 1866 he was made customs inspector at New York City and held the post for nineteen years. He died on September 29, 1891, an almost forgotten author.

Moby Dick, an amazing prose-epic masterpiece, did not succeed when it first appeared. This sea classic, then termed "Bedlam literature," enshrines the bygone life of the whaling ship with its technicalities and dangers, doing for it what Cooper had done for the frontier and what Mark Twain was to do for the steamboat age of the Mississippi. It contains two memorable characters: the monomaniac Captain Ahab, who ruled over a grim, wild crew, and the gigantic, malevolent white whale, Moby Dick. The struggle between them has been termed an allegory, for the fierce pursuit of the white whale seems symbolic of the unremitting hatred and hunting down of the vast moral evil of the world; but the author said that no allegory had been intended. Writing to Hawthorne, he also hinted quite broadly just the opposite. His depiction of sea life and its exciting action has never been surpassed. For Melville, the sea is terrific and tremendous, and he treats it with the mystical, intense, and bitter quality that is seen in all his writings. The book is emotional and pictorial, not logical, and its style is extravagant. But its gusto and strength are unmistakable.

Melville read much as a youth in his father's carefully selected library, and he continued to read, with the zest of a booklover, in later life. Some of the authors influencing him were Sir Thomas Browne, whom he greatly admired, Robert Burton, and Carlyle. On his return voyage from the South Seas he read the Elizabethan dramatists, Marlowe of the "mighty line," and Ben Jonson. Others he mentions are Beaumont and Fletcher, Milton, Rousseau, Chesterfield, Byron, Moore, and Scott, and he was interested in the German metaphysicians. Cooper he knew among American writers. Dana's Two Years before the Mast, which appeared in 1840, may have given him the urge to sea adventure. Before his first books were written he read everything he could lay his hands on about the South Seas, accounts of voyages, missionaries' reports, and travelers' descriptions. For Moby Dick he read everything available to him about whales and whaling, making notes and collecting allusions. If much in his books comes from his personal experience, much too comes from his reading, especially in his earlier ones. Professor C. R. Anderson (Melville in the South Seas, 1939) cites from Melville's Redburn, ". . . for materials they use odds and ends of old rigging called junk, the yarns of which are picked to pieces and then twisted into new combinations," adding that this is something like the manner in which "most books are manufactured." Professor Anderson believes that Melville's books about the South Seas were put together in much this way. In these his style is simple and direct. In Moby Dick and elsewhere his unique manner of expression comes to its own. It is not an orderly or disciplined style. It has vehemence, emotional quality, is of prodigal richness, and often rises to great power. There is realism of detail, and, since Melville has an ear for rhythm, there are frequent passages of beautiful lavish music.

Melville was more conscious of his artistic powers and problems than has been believed of one who wrote so copiously and so easily. This is clear from a reading of his Pierre. He wanted complete freedom in fiction writing, to be frank and truthful and to cut athwart accepted conventions of composition. He cared little for conforming to the orthodox in themes, or handling, or in his characters. He was no advocate of consistency in every character in fiction. Distinctive of him was his liking for lone mighty figures, such as Ahab or Pierre, "originals" of striking stature. He seems to have wished to select a "mighty theme," and to produce a "mighty book." This he did in Moby Dick.

There is a collected edition, The Works of Herman Melville, 16 vols., London, 1922-24. Many separate editions of Moby Dick, Typee, and Pierre are available. V. G. Melville's masterpiece, one of the great sea tales of the world, and the world's greatest whaling story. It may be read as a treatise telling everything to be known of whales and the whaling of the period, or it may be read as an adventure story of the sea. To critics it suggests the allegory of man's pursuit of evil in the world, although Melville once said that he did not see the allegory in the book till it was pointed out to him. There are three leading dramatis personae. The monomaniac Captain Ahab, in command of a strange, sinister crew, sets forth on his last voyage, ostensibly on an ordinary whaling expedition, but really to track down and destroy the gigantic malevolent White Whale that in an earlier encounter had mutilated him. He pursues the whale with avenging energy, pouring on it rage and hate, until he and his ship are finally destroyed by it. The last chapters tell of the terrible three-day chase in which these two well-matched characters are involved. The third character is the Sea, which is far more than mere setting or background. "In that wild beautiful romance," says Masefield in an often quoted passage, "Melville seems to have spoken the very secret of the sea, and to have drawn into his tale all the magic, all the wild joy of many waters." It too can be ferocious and violent in its malign moments, like Captain Ahab and the White Whale. In structure the book is more carefully planned than at first appears. It abounds in interruptions, digressions, rhapsodies, and denunciations; but, if it is prodigal in its wealth of material, it is also singularly original and powerful.

CHAPTER XLII

Moby Dick

I, ISHMAEL, was one of that crew; my shouts had gone up with the rest; my oath had been welded with theirs; and stronger I shouted, and more did I hammer and clinch my oath, because of the dread in my soul. A wild, mystical, sympathetic feeling was in me; Ahab's quenchless feud seemed mine. With greedy ears I learned the history of that murderous monster against whom I and all the others had taken our oaths of violence and revenge.

For some time past, though at intervals only, the unaccompanied, secluded White Whale had haunted those uncivilized seas mostly frequented by the Sperm Whale fishermen; but not all of them knew of his existence; only a few of them, comparatively, had knowingly seen him; while the number who as yet had actually and knowingly given battle to him, was small indeed. For, owing to the large number of whale-cruisers; the disorderly way they were sprinkled over the entire watery circumference, many of them adventurously pushing their quest along solitary latitudes, so as seldom or never for a whole twelvemonth or more on a stretch, to encounter a single news-telling sail of any sort; the inordinate length of each separate voyage; the irregularity of the times of sailing from home; all these, with other circumstances, direct and indirect, long obstructed the spread through the whole world-wide whaling fleet of the special individualizing tidings concerning Moby Dick. It was hardly to be doubted, that several vessels reported to have encountered, at such or such a time, or on such or such a meridian, a Sperm Whale of uncommon magnitude and malignity, which whale, after doing great mischief to his assailants, had completely escaped them; to some minds it was not an unfair presumption, I say, that the whale in question must have been no other than Moby Dick. Yet as of late the Sperm Whale fishery had been marked by various and not unfrequent instances of great ferocity, cunning, and malice in the monster attacked; therefore it was, that those who by accident ignorantly gave battle to Moby Dick; such hunters, perhaps, for the most part, were content to ascribe the peculiar terror he bred, more, as it were, to the perils of the Sperm Whale fishery at large, than to the individual cause. In that way, mostly, the disastrous encounter between Ahab and the whale had hitherto been popularly regarded.

And as for those who, previously hearing of the White Whale, by chance caught sight of him; in the beginning of the thing they had every one of them, almost, as boldly and fearlessly lowered for him, as for any other whale of that species. But at length, such calamities did ensue in these assaults—not restricted to sprained wrists and ankles, broken limbs, or devouring amputations—but fatal to the last degree of fatality; those repeated disastrous repulses, all accumulating and piling their terrors upon Moby Dick those things had gone far to shake the fortitude of many brave hunters, to whom the story of the White Whale had eventually come.

Nor did wild rumors of all sorts fail to exaggerate, and still the more horrify the true histories of these deadly encounters. For not only do fabulous rumors naturally grow out of the very body of all surprising terrible events,—as the smitten tree gives birth to its fungi; but, in maritime life, far more than in that of terra firma, wild rumors abound, wherever there is any adequate reality for them to cling to. And as the sea surpasses the land in this matter, so the whale-fishery surpasses every other sort of maritime life, in the wonderfulness and fearfulness of the rumors which sometimes circulate there. For not only are whalers as a body unexempt from that ignorance and superstitiousness hereditary to all sailors; but of all sailors, they are by all odds the most directly brought into contact with whatever is appallingly astonishing in the sea; face to face they not only eye its greatest marvels, but, hand to jaw, give battle to them. Alone, in such remotest waters, that though you sailed a thousand miles, and passed a thousand shores, you would not come to any chiseled hearthstone, or aught hospitable beneath that part of the sun; in such latitudes and longitudes, pursuing too such a calling as he does, the whaler is wrapped by influences all tending to make his fancy pregnant with many a mighty birth.

No wonder, then, that ever gathering volume from the mere transit over the wildest watery spaces, the outblown rumors of the White Whale did in the end incorporate with themselves all manner of morbid hints, and half-formed foetal suggestions of supernatural agencies, which eventually invested Moby Dick with new terrors unborrowed from anything that visibly appears. So that in many cases such a panic did he finally strike, that few who by those rumors, at least, had heard of the White Whale, few of those hunters were willing to encounter the perils of his jaw.

But there were still other and more vital practical influences at work. Not even at the present day has the original prestige of the Sperm Whale, as fearfully distinguished from all other species of the leviathan, died out of the minds of the whalers as a body. There are those this day among them, who, though intelligent and courageous enough in offering battle to the Greenland or Right Whale, would perhaps—either from professional inexperience, or incompetency, or timidity, decline a contest with the Sperm Whale. At any rate, there are plenty of whalers, especially among those whaling nations not sailing under the American flag, who have never hostilely encountered the Sperm Whale, but whose sole knowledge of the leviathan is restricted to the ignoble monster primitively pursued in the North. Seated on their hatches, these men will harken with a childish fireside interest and awe, to the wild, strange tales of Southern whaling. Nor is the pre-eminent tremendousness of the great Sperm Whale anywhere more feelingly comprehended, than on board of those prows which stem<sup>1</sup> him.

And as if the now tested reality of his might had in former legendary times thrown its shadow before it; we find some book naturalists—Olassen and Povelson—declaring the Sperm Whale not only to be a consternation to every other creature in the sea, but also to be so incredibly ferocious as continually to be athirst for human blood. Nor even down to so late a time as Cuvier's, were these or almost similar impressions effaced. For in his Natural History, the Baron himself affirms that at sight of the Sperm Whale, all fish (sharks included) are "struck with the most lively terrors," and "often in the precipitancy of their flight dash themselves against the rocks with such violence as to cause instantaneous death." And however the general experiences in the fishery may amend such reports as these; yet in their full terribleness, even to the bloodthirsty item of Povelson, the superstitious belief in them is, in some vicissitudes of their vocation, revived in the minds of the hunters.

So that overawed by the rumors and portents concerning him, not a few of the fishermen recalled, in reference to Moby Dick, the earlier days of the Sperm Whale fishery, when it was oftentimes hard to induce long practiced Right whalemens to embark in the perils of this new and daring warfare; such men protesting that although other leviathans might be hopefully pursued, yet to chase and point lances at such an apparition as the Sperm Whale was not for mortal man—that to attempt it, would be inevitably to be torn into a quick eternity. On this head, there are some remarkable documents that may be consulted.

Nevertheless, some there were, who even in the face of these things were ready to give chase to Moby Dick; and a still greater number who, chancing only to hear of him distantly and vaguely, without the specific details of any certain calamity, and without superstitious accompaniments, were sufficiently hardy not to flee from the battle if offered.

One of the wild suggestions referred to, as at last coming to be linked with the White Whale in the minds of the superstitiously inclined, was the unearthly conceit that Moby Dick was ubiquitous; that he had actually been encountered in opposite latitudes at one and the same instant of time.

Nor, credulous as such minds must have been, was this conceit altogether without some faint show of superstitious probability. For as the secrets of the currents in the seas have never yet been divulged, even to the most erudite research; so the hidden ways of the Sperm Whale when beneath the surface remain, in great part, unaccountable to his pursuers; and from time to time have originated the most curious and contradictory speculations regarding them, especially concerning the mystic modes whereby, after sounding to a great depth, he transports himself with such vast swiftness to the most widely distant points.

It is a thing well known to both American and English whale ships, and as well a thing placed upon authoritative record years ago by Scoresby, that some whales have been captured far north in the Pacific, in whose bodies have been found the barbs of harpoons darted in the Greenland seas. Nor is it to be gainsaid, that in some of these instances it has been declared that the interval of time between the two assaults could not have exceeded very many days. Hence, by inference, it has been believed by some whalemens, that the Nor'-West Passage, so long a problem to man, was never a problem to the whale. So that here, in the real living experience of living men, the prodigies related in old times of the inland Strello mountain in Portugal (near whose top there was said to be a lake in which the wrecks of ships floated up to the surface); and that still more wonderful story of the Arethusa fountain near Syracuse (whose waters were believed to have come from the Holy Land by an underground passage); these fabulous narrations are almost fully equaled by the realities of the whalemens.

Forced into familiarity, then, with such prodigies as these; and knowing that after repeated, intrepid assaults, the White Whale had escaped alive; it cannot be much matter of surprise that some whalemens should go still further in their superstitions; declaring Moby Dick not only ubiquitous, but immortal (for immortality is but ubiquity in time); that though groves of spears should be planted in his flanks, he would still swim away unharmed; or if indeed he should ever be made to spout thick blood, such a sight would be but a ghastly deception; for again in unensanguined billows hundreds of leagues away, his unsullied jet would once more be seen.

But even stripped of these supernatural surmisings, there was enough in the earthly make and incontestable character of the monster to strike the imagination with unwonted power. For, it was not so much his uncommon bulk that so much distinguished him from other sperm whales, but, as was elsewhere thrown out—a peculiar snow-white wrinkled forehead, and a high, pyramidal white hump. These were his prominent features; the tokens whereby, even in the limitless, uncharted seas, he revealed his identity, at a long distance, to those who knew him.

The rest of his body was so streaked, and spotted, and marbled with the same shrouded hue, that, in the end, he had gained his distinctive appellation of the White Whale; a name, indeed, literally justified by his vivid aspect, when seen gliding at high noon through a dark blue sea, leaving a milky-way wake of creamy foam, all spangled with golden gleaming. Nor was it his unwonted magnitude, nor his remarkable hue, nor yet his deformed lower jaw, that so much invested the whale with natural terror, as that unexampled, intelligent malignity which, according to specific accounts, he had over and over again evinced in his assaults. More than all, his treacherous retreats struck more of 10 dismay than perhaps aught else. For, when swimming before his exulting pursuers, with every apparent symptom of alarm, he had several times been known to turn round suddenly, and, bearing down upon them, either stave their boats to splinters, or drive them back in consternation to their ship.

Already several fatalities had attended his chase. But though similar disasters, however little bruited<sup>1</sup> ashore, were by no means un- 20 usual in the fishery, yet in most instances, such seemed the White Whale's infernal forethought of ferocity, that every dismembering or death that he caused, was not wholly regarded as having been inflicted by an unintelligent agent.

Judge, then, to what pitches of inflamed, distracted fury the minds of his more desperate hunters were impelled, when amid the 30 chips of chewed boats, and the sinking limbs of torn comrades, they swam out of the white curds of the whale's direful wrath into the serene, exasperating sunlight, that smiled on, as if at a birth or a bridal.

His three boats stove around him, and oars and men both whirling in the eddies, one captain, seizing the line-knife from his broken prow, had dashed at the whale, as an Arkansas 40 duelist at his foe, blindly seeking with a six-inch blade to reach the fathom-deep life of the whale. That captain was Ahab. And then it was, that suddenly sweeping his sickle-shaped lower jaw beneath him, Moby Dick had reaped away Ahab's leg, as a mower a blade of grass in the field. No turbaned Turk, no hired Venetian or Malay, could have smote him with more seeing malice. Small reason was there to doubt, then, that ever since that almost fatal encounter, Ahab had cherished a wild vindictiveness against the whale, all the 50 more fell, for that in his frantic morbidity he at last came to identify with him, not only all his bodily woes, but all his intellectual and spiritual exasperations. The White Whale swam before him as the monomaniac incarnation of all those malicious agencies which some deep men feel eating in them, till they are left living on with half a heart and half a lung. That intangible malignity which has been from the beginning; which the ancient Ophites<sup>1</sup> of the east revered in their statue devil;—Ahab did not fall down and worship it like them; but deliriously transferring its ideas to the abhorred White Whale, he pitted himself, all mutilated, against it. All that most maddens and torments; all that stirs up the lees of things; all truth with malice in it; all that cracks the sinews and cakes the brain; all the subtle demonisms of life and thought; all evil, to crazy Ahab, were visibly personified, and made practically assailable in Moby Dick. He piled upon the whale's white hump the sum of all the general rage and hate felt by his whole race from Adam down; and then, as if his chest had been a mortar, he burst his hot heart's shell upon it.

It is not probable that this monomania in him took its instant rise at the precise time of his bodily dismemberment. Then, in darting 30 at the monster, knife in hand, he had but given loose to a sudden, passionate, corporal animosity; and when he received the stroke that tore him, he probably felt the agonising bodily laceration, but nothing more. Yet, when by this collision forced to turn towards home, and for long months of days and weeks, Ahab and anguish lay stretched together in one hammock, rounding in midwinter that dreary, howling Patagonian Cape; then it was, that his torn body and gashed soul bled into one another; and so interfusing, made him mad. That it was only then, on the homeward voyage, after the encounter, that the final monomania seized him, seems all but certain from the fact that, at intervals during the passage, he was a raving lunatic; and, though unlimbed of a leg, yet such vital strength yet lurked in his Egyptian chest, and was more-over intensified by his delirium, that his mates were forced to lace him fast, even there, as he sailed, raving in his hammock. In a strait-jacket, he swung to the mad rockings of the gales. And, when running into more sufferable latitudes, the ship, with mild stunsails spread, floated across the tranquil tropics, and, to all appearances, the old man's delirium seemed left behind him with the Cape Horn swells, and he came forth from his dark den into the blessed light and air; even then, when he bore that firm, collected front, however pale, and issued his calm orders once again; and his mates thanked God the direful madness was now gone; even then, Ahab, in his hidden self, raved on. Human madness is oftentimes a cunning and most feline thing. When you think it fled, it may have but become trans-figured into some still subtler form. Ahab's full lunacy subsided not, but deepeningly contracted; like the unabated Hudson, when that noble Northman flows narrowly, but unfathomably through the Highland gorge. But, as in his narrow-flowing monomania, not one jot of Ahab's broad madness had been left behind; so in that broad madness, not one jot of his great natural intellect had perished. That before living agent, now became the living instrument. If such a furious trope may stand, his special lunacy stormed his general sanity, and carried it, and turned all its concentrated cannon upon its own mad mark; so that far from having lost his strength, Ahab, to that one end, did now possess a thousand-fold more potency than ever he had sanely brought to bear upon any one reasonable object.

This is much; yet Ahab's larger, darker, deeper part remains unhinted. But vain to popularize profundities, and all truth is profound. Winding far down from within the very heart of this spiked Hotel de Cluny where we here stand—however grand and wonderful, now quit it;—and take your way, ye nobler, sadder souls, to those vast Roman halls of Thermes<sup>1</sup>; where far beneath the fantastic towers of man's upper earth, his root of grandeur, his whole awful essence sits in bearded state; an antique buried beneath antiquities, and throned on torsos! So with a broken throne, the great gods mock that captive king; so like a Caryatid,<sup>1</sup> he patient sits, upholding on his frozen brow the piled entablatures of ages. Wind ye down there, ye prouder, sadder souls! question that proud, sad king! A family likeness! aye, he did beget ye, ye young exiled royalties; and from your grim sire only will the old State-secret come.

Now, in his heart, Ahab had some glimpse of this, namely, all my means are sane, my motive and my object mad. Yet without power to kill, or change, or shun the fact; he likewise knew that to mankind he did long dissemble; in some sort, did still. But that thing of his dissembling was only subject to his perceptibility, not to his will determinate. Nevertheless, so well did he succeed in that dissembling, that when with ivory leg he stepped ashore at last, no Nantucketer thought him otherwise than but naturally grieved, and that to the quick, with the terrible casualty which had overtaken him.

The report of his undeniable delirium at sea was likewise popularly ascribed to a kindred cause. And so too, all the added moodiness which always afterwards, to the very day of sailing in the Pequod on the present voyage, sat brooding on his brow. Nor is it so very unlikely, that far from distrusting his fitness for another whaling voyage, on account of such dark symptoms, the calculating people of that prudent isle were inclined to harbor the conceit, that for those very reasons he was all the better qualified and set on edge, for a pursuit so full of rage and wildness as the bloody hunt of whales. Gnawed within and scorched without, with the infixed, unrelenting fangs of some incurable idea; such an one, could he be found, would seem the very man to dart his iron and lift his lance against the most appalling of all brutes. Or, if for any reason thought to be corporeally incapacitated for that, yet such an one would seem superlatively competent to cheer and howl on his underlings to the attack. But be all this as it may, certain it is, that with the mad secret of his unabated rage bolted up and keyed in him, Ahab had purposely sailed upon the present voyage with the one only and all-engrossing object of hunting the White Whale. Had any one of his old acquaintances on shore but half dreamed of what was lurking in him then, how soon would their aghast and righteous souls have wrenched the ship from such a fiendish man! They were bent on profitable cruises, the profit to be counted down in dollars from the mint. He was intent on an audacious, immitigable, and supernatural revenge.

Here, then, was this gray-headed, ungodly old man, chasing with curses a Job's whale<sup>1</sup> round the world, at the head of a crew, too, chiefly made up of mongrel renegades, and castaways, and cannibals—morally enfeebled also, by the incompetence of mere unaided virtue of right-mindedness in Starbuck, the invulnerable jollity of indifference and recklessness in Stubb, and the pervading mediocrity in Flask. Such a crew, so officered, seemed specially picked and packed by some infernal fatality to help him to his monomaniac revenge. How it was that they so abundantly responded to the old man's ire—by what evil magic their souls were possessed, that at times his hate seemed almost theirs; the White Whale as much their insufferable foe as his; how all this came to be—what the White Whale was to them, or how to their unconscious understandings, also, in some dim, unsuspected way, he might have seemed the gliding great demon of the seas of life,—all this to explain, would be to dive deeper than Ishmael can go. The subterranean miner that works in us all, how can one tell whither leads his shaft by the ever shifting, muffled sound of his pick? Who does not feel the irresistible arm drag? What skiff in tow of a seventy-four can stand still? For one, I gave myself up to the abandonment of the time and the place; but while yet all a-rush to encounter the whale, could see naught in that brute but the deadliest ill.

CHAPTER CXXXIII

The Chase—First Day

That night, in the mid-watch, when the old man—as his wont at intervals—stepped forth from the scuttle in which he leaned, and went to his pivot-hole,<sup>1</sup> he suddenly thrust out his face fiercely, snuffing up the sea air as a sagacious ship's dog will, in drawing nigh to some barbarous isle. He declared that a whale must be near. Soon that peculiar odor, sometimes to a great distance given forth by the living Sperm Whale, was palpable to all the watch; nor was any mariner surprised when, after inspecting the compass, and then the dog-vane, and then ascertaining the precise bearing of the odor as nearly as possible, Ahab rapidly ordered the ship's course to be slightly altered, and the sail to be shortened.

The acute policy dictating these movements was sufficiently vindicated at day-break by the sight of a long sleek on the sea directly and lengthwise ahead, smooth as oil, and resembling in the pleated watery wrinkles bordering it, the polished metallic-like marks of some swift tide-rip, at the mouth of a deep, rapid stream.

"Man the mastheads! Call all hands!"

Thundering with the butts of three clubbed handspikes on the fore-castle deck, Daggoo roused the sleepers with such judgment claps that they seemed to exhale from the scuttle, so instantaneously did they appear with their clothes in their hands.

"What d'ye see?" cried Ahab, flattening his face to the sky.

"Nothing, nothing, sir!" was the sound hailing down in reply.

"T'gallant-sails! stunsails aloof and aloft, and on both sides!"

All sail being set, he now cast loose the life-line, reserved for swaying him to the mainroyal masthead; and in a few moments they were hoisting him thither, when, while but two-thirds of the way aloft, and while peering ahead through the horizontal vacancy between the maintopsail and topgallant-sail, he raised a gull-like cry in the air, "There she blows!—there she blows! A hump like a snowhill! It is Moby Dick!"

Fired by the cry which seemed simultaneously taken up by the three lookouts, the men on deck rushed to the rigging to behold the famous whale they had so long been pursuing. Ahab had now gained his final perch, some feet above the other lookouts, Tashtego standing just beneath him on the cap of the topgallant-mast, so that the Indian's head was almost on a level with Ahab's heel. From this height the whale was now seen some mile or so ahead, at every roll of the sea revealing his high sparkling hump, and regularly jetting his silent spout into the air. To the credulous mariners it seemed the same silent spout they had so long ago beheld in the moonlit Atlantic and Indian Oceans.

"And did none of ye see it before?" cried Ahab, hailing the perched men all around him.

"I saw him almost that same instant, sir, that Captain Ahab did, and I cried out," said Tashtego.

"Not the same instant; not the same—no, the doubloon<sup>1</sup> is mine. Fate reserved the doubloon for me. I only; none of ye could have raised the White Whale first. There she blows! there she blows!—there she blows! There again!—there again!" he cried, in long-drawn, lingering, methodic tones, attuned to the gradual prolongings of the whale's visible jets. "He's going to sound! In stunsails! Down topgallant-sails! Stand by three boats. Mr. Starbuck, remember, stay on board, and keep the ship. Helm there! Luff, luff a point! So; steady, man, steady! There go flukes! No, no; only black water! All ready the boats there? Stand by, stand by! Lower me, Mr. Starbuck; lower, lower,—quick, quicker!" and he slid through the air to the deck.

"He is heading straight to leeward, sir," cried Stubb; "right away from us; cannot have seen the ship yet."

"Be dumb, man! Stand by the braces! Hard down the helm!—brace up! Shiver her!—shiver her! So; well that! Boats, boats!"

Soon all the boats but Starbuck's were dropped; all the boat-sails set—all the paddles plying; with rippling swiftness, shooting to leeward; and Ahab heading the onset. A pale, death-glimmer lit up Fedallah's sunken eyes; a hideous motion gnawed his mouth.

Like noiseless nautilus shells, their light

prows sped through the sea; but only slowly they neared the foe. As they neared him, the ocean grew still more smooth; seemed drawing a carpet over its waves; seemed a noon-meadow, so serenely it spread. At length the breathless hunter came so nigh his seemingly unsuspecting prey, that his entire dazzling hump was distinctly visible, sliding along the sea as if an isolated thing, and continually set in a revolving ring of finest, fleecy, greenish foam. He saw the vast involved wrinkles of the slightly projecting head beyond. Before it, far out on the soft Turkish-rugged waters, went the glistening white shadow from his broad, milky forehead, a musical rippling playfully accompanying the shade; and behind, the blue waters interchangeably flowed over into the moving valley of his steady wake; and on either hand bright bubbles arose and danced by his side. But these were broken again by the light toes of hundreds of gay fowls softly feathering the sea, alternate with their fitful flight; and like to some flagstaff rising from the painted hull of an argosy, the tall but shattered pole of a recent lance projected from the White Whale's back; and at intervals one of the cloud of soft-toed fowls hovering, and to and fro skimming like a canopy over the fish, silently perched and rocked on this pole, the long tail feathers streaming like pennons.

A gentle joyousness—a mighty mildness of repose in swiftness, invested the gliding whale. Not the white bull Jupiter swimming away with ravished Europa<sup>1</sup> clinging to his graceful horns; his lovely, leering eyes sideways intent upon the maid; with smooth bewitching fleetness, rippling straight for the nuptial bower in Crete; not Jove, not that great majesty Supreme! did surpass the glorified White Whale as he so divinely swam.

On each soft side—coincident with the parted swell, that but once laving him, then flowed so wide away—on each bright side, the whale shed off enticings. No wonder there had been some among the hunters who, namelessly transported and allured by all this serenity, had ventured to assail it; but had fatally found that quietude but the vesture of tornadoes. Yet calm, enticing calm, oh, whale! thou glidest on, to all who for the first time eye thee, no matter how many in that same way thou may'st have bejuggled and destroyed before.

<sup>1</sup> The story of how the maiden Europa was carried away to Crete by Jupiter, who had taken the form of a white bull, was told by the poet Moschus of about the second century, and may be found retold in Gayley's Classic Myths and other books of classic mythology.

And thus, through the serene tranquillities of the tropical sea, among waves whose hand-clappings were suspended by exceeding rapture, Moby Dick moved on, still withholding from sight the full terrors of his submerged trunk, entirely hiding the wrenched hideousness of his jaw. But soon the fore part of him slowly rose from the water; for an instant his whole marbled body formed a high arch, like Virginia's Natural Bridge, and warningly waving his bannered flukes in the air, the grand god revealed himself, sounded, and went out of sight. Hoveringly halting, and dipping on the wing, the white sea-fowls longingly lingered over the agitated pool that he left.

With oars apeak, and paddles down, the sheets of their sails adrift, the three boats now stilly floated, awaiting Moby Dick's reappearance.

"An hour," said Ahab, standing rooted in his boat's stern; and he gazed beyond the whale's place, towards the dim blue spaces and wide wooing vacancies to leeward. It was only an instant; for again his eyes seemed whirling round in his head as he swept the watery circle. The breeze now freshened; the sea began to swell.

"The birds!—the birds!" cried Tashtego.

In long Indian file, as when herons take wing, the white birds were now all flying towards Ahab's boat; and when within a few yards began fluttering over the water there, wheeling round and round, with joyous, expectant cries. Their vision was keener than man's; Ahab could discover no sign in the sea. But suddenly as he peered down and down into its depths, he profoundly saw a white living spot no bigger than a white weasel, with wonderful celerity uprising, and magnifying as it rose, till it turned, and then there were plainly revealed two long crooked rows of white, glistening teeth, floating up from the undiscoverable bottom. It was Moby Dick's open mouth and scrolled jaw; his vast, shadowed bulk still half blending with the blue of the sea. The glittering mouth yawned beneath the boat like an open-doored marble tomb; and giving one sidelong sweep with his steering oar, Ahab whirled the craft aside from this tremendous apparition. Then, calling upon Fedallah to change places with him, went forward to the bows, and seizing Perth's harpoon, commanded his crew to grasp their oars and stand by to stern.

Now, by reason of this timely spinning round the boat upon its axis, its bow, by anticipation, was made to face the whale's head while yet under water. But as if perceiving this stratagem, Moby Dick, with that malicious intelligence ascribed to him, sidelingly transplanted himself, as it were, in an instant, shooting his pleated head lengthwise beneath the boat.

Through and through; through every plank and each rib, it thrilled for an instant, the whale obliquely lying on his back, in the manner of a biting shark, slowly and feelingly taking its bows full within his mouth, so that the long, narrow, scrolled lower jaw curled high up into the open air, and one of the teeth caught in a rowlock. The bluish pearl-white of the inside of the jaw was within six inches of Ahab's head, and reached higher than that. In this attitude the White Whale now shook the slight cedar as a mildly cruel cat her mouse. With unastonished eyes Fedallah gazed, and crossed his arms; but the tiger-yellow crew were tumbling over each other's heads to gain the uttermost stern.

And now, while both elastic gunwales were springing in and out, as the whale dallied with the doomed craft in this devilish way; and from his body being submerged beneath the boat, he could not be darted at from the bows, for the bows were almost inside of him, as it were; and while the other boats involuntarily paused, as before a quick crisis impossible to withstand, then it was that monomaniac Ahab, furious with this tantalizing vicinity of his foe, which placed him all alive and helpless in the very jaws he hated; frenzied with all this, he seized the long bone with his naked hands, and wildly strove to wrench it from its gripe. As now he thus vainly strove, the jaw slipped from him; the frail gunwales bent in, collapsed, and snapped, as both jaws, like an enormous shears, sliding further aft, bit the craft completely in twain, and locked themselves fast again in the sea, midway between the two floating wrecks. These floated aside, the broken ends drooping, the crew at the stern-wreck clinging to the gunwales, and striving to hold fast to the oars to lash them across.

At that prelude moment, ere the boat was yet snapped, Ahab, the first to perceive the whale's intent, by the crafty upraising of his head, a movement that loosed his hold for the time; at that moment his hand had made one final effort to push the boat out of the bite. But only slipping further into the whale's mouth, and tilting over sideways as it slipped, the boat had shaken off his hold on the jaw; spilled him out of it, as he leaned to the push; and so he fell flat-faced upon the sea.

Ripplingly withdrawing from his prey, Moby Dick now lay at a little distance, vertically thrusting his oblong white head up and down in the billows; and at the same time slowly revolving his whole spindled body; so that when his vast wrinkled forehead rose—some twenty or more feet out of the water—the now rising swells, with all their confluent waves, dazzlingly broke against it; vindictively tossing their shivered spray still higher into the air. So, in a gale, the but half-baffled Channel billows only recoil from the base of the Eddystone, triumphantly to overleap its summit with their scud.

But soon resuming his horizontal attitude, Moby Dick swam swiftly round and round the wrecked crew; sideways churning the water in his vengeful wake, as if lashing himself up to still another and more deadly assault. The sight of the splintered boat seemed to madden him, as the blood of grapes and mulberries cast before Antiochus's elephants in the book of Maccabees.<sup>1</sup> Meanwhile Ahab half smothered in the foam of the whale's insolent tail and too much of a cripple to swim,—though he could still keep afloat, even in the heart of such a whirlpool as that; helpless Ahab's head was seen, like a tossed bubble which the least chance shock might burst. From the boat's fragmentary stern, Fedallah incuriously and mildly eyed him; the clinging crew, at the other drifting end, could not succor him; more than enough was it for them to look to themselves. For so revoltingly appalling was the White Whale's aspect, and so planetarily swift the ever-contracting circles he made, that he seemed horizontally swooping upon them. And though the other boats, unharmed, still hovered hard by, still they dared not pull into the eddy to strike, lest that should be the signal for the instant destruction of the jeopardized castaways, Ahab and all; nor in that case could they themselves hope to escape. With straining eyes, then, they remained on the outer edge of the direful zone, whose center had now become the old man's head.

Meantime, from the beginning all this had been descried from the ship's mastheads; and squaring her yards, she had borne down upon the scene; and was now so nigh, that Ahab in the water hailed her:—"Sail on the"—but that moment a breaking sea dashed on him from Moby Dick, and whelmed him for the time. But struggling out of it again, and chancing to rise on a towering crest, he shouted,—“Sail on the whale!—Drive him off!”

The Pequod's prows were pointed; and breaking up the charmed circle, she effectually parted the White Whale from his victim. As he sullenly swam off, the boats flew to the rescue.

Dragged into Stubb's boat with bloodshot, blinded eyes, the white brine caking in his wrinkles; the long tension of Ahab's bodily strength did crack, and helplessly he yielded to his body's doom for a time, lying all crushed in the bottom of Stubb's boat, like one trodden under foot of herds of elephants. Far inland, nameless wails came from him, as desolate sounds from out ravines.

But this intensity of his physical prostration did but so much the more abbreviate it. In an instant's compass, great hearts sometimes condense to one deep pang, the sum total of those shallow pains kindly diffused through feebler men's whole lives. And so, such hearts, though summary in each one suffering; still, if the gods decree it, in their lifetime aggregate a whole age of woe, wholly made up of instantaneous intensities; for even in their pointless centers, those noble natures contain the entire circumferences of inferior souls.

"The harpoon," said Ahab, halfway rising, and draggingly leaning on one bended arm—"is it safe?"

"Aye, sir, for it was not darted; this is it," 10 said Stubb, showing it.

"Lay it before me;—any missing men?"

"One, two, three, four, five;—there were five oars, sir, and here are five men."

"That's good.—Help me, man; I wish to stand. So, so, I see him! there! there! going to leeward still; what a leaping spout!—Hands off from me! The eternal sap runs up in Ahab's bones again! Set the sail; out oars; the helm!"

It is often the case that when a boat is stove, 20 its crew, being picked up by another boat, help to work that second boat; and the chase is thus continued with what is called double-banked oars. It was thus now. But the added power of the boat did not equal the added power of the whale, for he seemed to have treble-banked his every fin; swimming with a velocity which plainly showed, that if now, under these circumstances, pushed on, the chase would prove an indefinitely prolonged, 30 if not a hopeless one; nor could any crew endure for so long a period, such an unintermitted, intense straining at the oar; a thing barely tolerable only in some one brief vicissitude. The ship itself, then, as it sometimes happens, offered the most promising intermediate means of overtaking the chase. Accordingly, the boats now made for her, and were soon swayed up to their cranes— 40 the two parts of the wrecked boat having been previously secured by her—and then hoisting everything to her side, and stacking her canvas high up, and sideways outstretching it with stunsails, like the double-jointed wings of an albatross; the Pequod bore down in the leeward wake of Moby Dick. At the well-known, methodic intervals, the whale's glittering spout was regularly announced from the manned mastheads; and when he would be reported as just gone down, Ahab 50 would take the time, and then pacing the deck, binnacle-watch in hand, so soon as the last second of the allotted hour expired, his voice was heard.—"Whose is the doubloon now? D'ye see him?" and if the reply was, "No, sir!" straightway he commanded them to lift him to his perch. In this way the day wore on; Ahab, now aloft and motionless; anon, unrestingly pacing the planks.

As he was thus walking, uttering no sound, except to hail the men aloft, or to bid them hoist a sail still higher, or to spread one to a still greater breadth—thus to and fro pacing, beneath his slouched hat, at every turn he passed his own wrecked boat, which had been dropped upon the quarter-deck, and lay there reversed; broken bow to shattered stern. At last he paused before it; and as in an already over-clouded sky fresh troops of clouds will sometimes sail across, so over the old man's face there now stole some such added gloom 20 as this.

Stubb saw him pause; and perhaps intending, not vainly, though, to evince his own unabated fortitude, and thus keep up a valiant place in his Captain's mind, he advanced, and eyeing the wreck exclaimed—"The thistle the ass refused; it pricked his mouth too keenly, sir; ha! ha!"

"What soulless thing is this that laughs before a wreck? Man, man! did I not know thee brave as fearless fire (and as mechanical) I could swear thou wert a poltroon. Groan nor laugh should be heard before a wreck."

"Aye, sir," said Starbuck, drawing near, "'tis a solemn sight; an omen, and an ill one."

"Omen? omen?—the dictionary! If the gods think to speak outright to man, they will honorably speak outright; not shake their heads, and give an old wives' darkling hint.—Begone! Ye two are the opposite poles of one thing; Starbuck is Stubb reversed, and Stubb is Starbuck; and ye two are all mankind; and Ahab stands alone among the millions of the peopled earth, nor gods nor men his neighbors! Cold, cold—I shiver!—How now? Aloft there! D'ye see him? Sing out for every spout, though he spout ten times a second!"

The day was nearly done; only the hem of his golden robe was rustling. Soon, it was almost dark, but the lookout men still remained unset.

"Can't see the spout now, sir;—too dark"
—cried a voice from the air.

"How heading when last seen?"

"As before, sir,—straight to leeward."

"Good! he will travel slower now 'tis night.

Down royals and topgallant stunsails, Mr. Starbuck. We must not run over him before morning; he's making a passage now, and may heave-to a while. Helm there! Keep her full before the wind!—Aloft! come down!—
Mr. Stubb, send a fresh hand to the foremast head, and see it manned till morning."—
Then advancing towards the doubloon in the mainmast—"Men, this gold is mine, for I earned it; but I shall let it abide here till the White Whale is dead; and then, whosoever of ye first raises him, upon the day he shall be killed, this gold is that man's; and if on that day I shall again raise him, then, ten times its sum shall be divided among all of ye! Away now!—the deck is thine, sir."

And so saying, he placed himself halfway within the scuttle, and slouching his hat, stood there till dawn, except when at intervals rousing himself to see how the night wore on.

CHAPTER CXXXIV

The Chase—Second Day

At daybreak, the three mastheads were punctually manned afresh.

"D'ye see him?" cried Ahab, after allowing a little space for the light to spread.

"See nothing, sir."

"Turn up all hands and make sail! he travels faster than I thought for;—the topgallant-sails!—aye, they should have been kept on her all night. But no matter—'tis but resting for the rush."

Here he it said, that this pertinacious pursuit of one particular whale, continued through day into night, and through night into day, is a thing by no means unprecedented in the South Sea fishery. For such is the wonderful skill, prescience of experience, and invincible confidence acquired by some great natural geniuses among the Nantucket commanders, that from the simple observation of a whale when last descried, they will, under certain given circumstances, pretty accurately foretell both the direction in which he will continue to swim for a time, while out of sight, as well as his probable rate of progression during that period. And in these cases, somewhat as a pilot, when about losing sight of a coast, whose general trending he well knows, and which he desires shortly to return to again, but at some further point; like as this pilot stands by his compass, and takes the precise bearing of the cape at present visible, in order the more certainly to hit aright the remote, unseen headland, eventually to be visited: so does the fisherman, at his compass, with the whale; for after being chased, and diligently marked, through several hours of delight, then, when night obscures the fish, the creature's future wake through the darkness is almost as established to the sagacious mind of the hunter, as the pilot's coast is to him. So that to this hunter's wondrous skill, the proverbial evanescence of a thing writ in water, a wake, is to all desired purposes well-nigh as reliable as the steadfast land. And as the mighty iron Leviathan of the modern railway is so familiarly known in its every pace, that, with watches in their hands, men time his rate as doctors that of a baby's pulse; and lightly say of it, "the up train or the down train will reach such or such a spot, at such or such an hour," even so, almost, there are occasions when these Nantucketers time that other Leviathan of the deep, according to the observed humor of his speed; and say to themselves, "so many hours hence this whale will have gone two hundred miles, will have about reached this or that degree of latitude or longitude." But to render this acuteness at all successful in the end, the wind and the sea must be the whaleman's allies; for of what present avail to the becalmed or windbound mariner is the skill that assures him he is exactly ninety-three leagues and a quarter from his port? Inferable from these statements are many collateral subtle matters touching the chase of whales.

The ship tore on; leaving such a furrow in the sea as when a cannon-ball, missent, becomes a ploughshare and turns up the level field.

"By salt and hemp!" cried Stubb, "but this swift motion of the deck creeps up one's legs and tingles at the heart. This ship and I are two brave fellows!—Ha! ha! Some one take me up, and launch me, spine-wise, on the sea,—for by live-oaks! my spine's a keel. Ha, ha! we go the gait that leaves no dust behind!"

"There she blows—she blows!—she blows!—right ahead!" was now the masthead cry.

"Aye, aye!" cried Stubb; "I knew it—ye can't escape—blow on and split your spout, O whale! the mad fiend himself is after ye! 10 blow your trump—blister your lungs!—Ahab will dam off your blood, as a miller shuts his water-gate upon the stream!"

And Stubb did but speak out for well-nigh all that crew. The frenzies of the chase had by this time worked them bubblingly up, like old wine worked anew. Whatever pale fears and forebodings some of them might have felt before; these were not only now kept out of sight through the growing awe of Ahab, but 20 they were broken up, and on all sides routed, as timid prairie hares that scatter before the bounding bison. The hand of Fate had snatched all their souls; and by the stirring perils of the previous day; the rack of the past night's suspense; the fixed, unfeeling, blind, reckless way in which their wild craft went plunging towards its flying mark; by all these things, their hearts were bowled along. The wind that made great bellies of their sails, and 30 rushed the vessel on by arms invisible as irresistible; this seemed the symbol of that unseen agency which so enslaved them to the race.

They were one man, not thirty. For as the one ship that held them all; though it was put together of all contrasting things—oak, and maple, and pine wood; iron, and pitch, and hemp—yet all these ran into each other in the one concrete hull, which shot on its way, both 40 balanced and directed by the long central keel; even so, all the individualities of the crew, this man's valor, that man's fear; guilt and guiltiness, all varieties were welded into oneness, and were all directed to that fatal goal which Ahab their one lord and keel did point to.

The rigging lived. The mastheads, like the tops of tall palms, were outspreadingly tufted with arms and legs. Clinging to a spar with 50 one hand, some reached forth the other with impatient wavings; others, shading their eyes from the vivid sunlight, sat far out on the rocking yards; all the spars in full bearing of mortals, ready and ripe for their fate. Ah! how they still strove through that infinite blueness to seek out the thing that might destroy them!

"Why sing ye not out for him, if ye see him?" cried Ahab, when, after the lapse of some minutes since the first cry, no more had been heard. "Sway me up, men; ye have been deceived; not Moby Dick casts one odd jet that way, and then disappears."

It was even so; in their headlong eagerness, the men had mistaken some other thing for the whale-spout, as the event itself soon proved; for hardly had Ahab reached his perch; hardly was the rope belayed to its pin on deck, when he struck the keynote to an orchestra, that made the air vibrate as with the combined discharges of rifles. The triumphant halloo of thirty buckskin lungs was heard, as—much nearer to the ship than the place of the imaginary jet, less than a mile ahead—Moby Dick bodily burst into view! For not by any calm and indolent spoutings; not by the peaceable gush of that mystic fountain in his head, did the White Whale now reveal his vicinity; but by the far more wondrous phenomenon of breaching. Rising with his utmost velocity from the furthest depths, the Sperm Whale thus booms his entire bulk into the pure element of air, and piling up a mountain of dazzling foam, shows his place to the distance of seven miles and more. In those moments, the torn, enraged waves he shakes off seem his mane; in some cases this breaching is his act of defiance.

"There she breaches! there she breaches!" was the cry, as in his immeasurable bravadoes the White Whale tossed himself salmon-like to Heaven. So suddenly seen in the blue plain of the sea, and relieved against the still bluer margin of the sky, the spray that he raised, for the moment, intolerably glittered and glared like a glacier; and stood there gradually fading and fading away from its first sparkling intensity, to the dim mistiness of an advancing shower in a vale.

"Aye, breach your last to the sun, Moby Dick!" cried Ahab, "thy hour and thy harpoon are at hand!—Down! down all of ye, but one man at the fore. The boats!—stand by!”

Unmindful of the tedious rope-ladders of the shrouds, the men, like shooting stars, slid to the deck, by the isolated backstays and halyards, while Ahab, less dartingly, but still rapidly, was dropped from his perch.

“Lower away,” he cried, so soon as he had reached his boat—a spare one, rigged the afternoon previous. “Mr. Starbuck, the ship is thine—keep away from the boats, but keep near them. Lower, all!”

As if to strike a quick terror into them, by this time being the first assailant himself, Moby Dick had turned, and was now coming for the three crews. Ahab’s boat was central; and cheering his men, he told them he would take the whale head-and-head,—that is, pull straight up to his forehead,—a not uncommon thing; for when within a certain limit, such a course excludes the coming onset from the whale’s sidelong vision. But ere that close limit was gained, and while yet all three boats were plain as the ship’s three masts to his eye; the White Whale churning himself into furious speed, almost in an instant as it were, rushing among the boats with open jaws, and a lashing tail, offered appalling battle on every side; and heedless of the irons darted at him from every boat, seemed only intent on annihilating each separate plank of which those boats were made. But skillfully maneuvered, incessantly wheeling like trained chargers in the field; the boats for a while eluded him; though, at times, but by a plank’s breadth; while all the time, Ahab’s unearthly slogan tore every other cry but his to shreds.

But at last in his untraceable evolutions, the White Whale so crossed and recrossed, and in a thousand ways entangled the slack of the three lines now fast to him, that they foreshortened, and, of themselves, warped the devoted boats towards the planted irons in him; though now for a moment the whale drew aside a little, as if to rally for a more tremendous charge. Seizing that opportunity, Ahab first paid out more line; and then was rapidly hauling and jerking in upon it again—hoping that way to disencumber it of some snarls—when lo!—a sight more savage than the embattled teeth of sharks!

Caught and twisted—corkscrewed in the mazes of the line—loose harpoons and lances, with all their bristling barbs and points, came flashing and dripping up to the chocks in the bows of Ahab’s boat. Only one thing could be done. Seizing the boat-knife, he critically reached within—through—and then, without—the rays of steel; dragged in the line beyond, passed it, inboard, to the bowsman, and then, twice sundering the rope near the chocks—dropped the intercepted fagot of steel into the sea; and was all fast again. That instant, the White Whale made a sudden rush among the remaining tangles of the other lines; by so doing, irresistibly dragged the more involved boats of Stubb and Flask towards his flukes; dashed them together like two rolling husks on a surf-beaten beach, and then, diving down into the sea, disappeared in a boiling maelstrom, in which, for a space, the odorous cedar chips of the wrecks danced round and round, like the grated nutmeg in a swiftly stirred bowl of punch.

While the two crews were yet circling in the waters, reaching out after the revolving line-tubs, oars, and other floating furniture, while aslope little Flask bobbed up and down like an empty vial, twitching his legs upwards to escape the dreaded jaws of sharks; and Stubb was lustily singing out for some one to ladle him up; and while the old man’s line—now parting—admitted of his pulling into the creamy pool to rescue whom he could;—in that wild simultaneousness of a thousand concerted perils,—Ahab’s yet unstricken boat seemed drawn up towards Heaven by invisible wires,—as, arrow-like, shooting perpendicularly from the sea, the White Whale dashed his broad forehead against its bottom, and sent it, turning over and over, into the air; till it fell again—gunwale downwards—and Ahab and his men struggled out from under it, like seals from a seaside cave.

The first uprising momentum of the whale—modifying its direction as he struck the surface—involuntarily launched him along it, to a little distance from the center of the destruction he had made; and with his back to it, he now lay for a moment slowly feeling with his flukes from side to side; and whenever a stray oar, bit of plank, the least chip or crumb of the boats touched his skin, his tail swiftly drew back, and came sideways, smiting the sea. But soon, as if satisfied that his work for that time was done, he pushed his pleated forehead through the ocean, and trailing after him the intertangled lines, continued his leeward way at a traveler's methodic pace.

As before, the attentive ship having descried the whole fight, again came bearing down to the rescue, and dropping a boat, 10 picked up the floating mariners, tubs, oars, and whatever else could be caught at, and safely landed them on her decks. Some sprained shoulders, wrists, and ankles; livid contusions; wrenched harpoons and lances; inextricable intricacies of rope; shattered oars and planks; all these were there; but no fatal or even serious ill seemed to have befallen any one. As with Fedallah the day before, so Ahab was now found grimly clinging to his 20 boat's broken half, which afforded a comparatively easy float; nor did it so exhaust him as the previous day's mishap.

But when he was helped to the deck, all eyes were fastened upon him; as instead of standing by himself he still half-hung upon the shoulder of Starbuck, who had thus far been the foremost to assist him. His ivory leg had been snapped off, leaving but one short sharp splinter.

"Aye, aye, Starbuck, 'tis sweet to lean sometimes, be the leaner who he will; and would old Ahab had leaned oftener than he has."

"The ferrule has not stood, sir," said the carpenter, now coming up; "I put good work into that leg."

"But no bones broken, sir, I hope," said Stubb with true concern.

"Aye! and all splintered to pieces, Stubb!— 40 d'ye see it.—But even with a broken bone, old Ahab is untouched; and I account no living bone of mine one jot more me, than this dead one that's lost; Nor White Whale, nor man, nor fiend, can so much as graze old Ahab in his own proper and inaccessible being. Can any lead touch yonder floor, any mast scrape yonder roof?—Aloft there! which way?"

"Dead to leeward, sir."

"Up helm, then; pile on the sail again, ship-keepers! down the rest of the spare boats and rig them—Mr. Starbuck, away, and muster the boats' crews."

"Let me first help thee towards the bulwarks, sir."

"Oh, oh, oh! how this splinter gores me now! Accursed fate! that the unconquerable captain in the soul should have such a craven mate!"

"Sir?"

"My body, man, not thee. Give me something for a cane—there, that shivered lance will do. Muster the men. Surely I have not seen him yet. By heaven, it cannot be!—missing?—quick! call them all."

The old man's hinted thought was true. Upon mustering the company, the Parsee<sup>1</sup> was not there.

"The Parsee!" cried Stubb—"he must have 20 been caught in——"

"The black vomit wrench thee!—run all of ye above, aloft, cabin, forecabin—find him—not gone—not gone!"

But quickly they returned to him with the tidings that the Parsee was nowhere to be found.

"Aye, sir," said Stubb—"caught among the tangles of your line—I thought I saw him dragging under."

30 "My line? my line? Gone?—gone?— What means that little word?—What death-knell rings in it, that old Ahab shakes as if he were the belfry. The harpoon, too!—toss over the litter there,—d'ye see it?—the forged iron, men, the White Whale's—no, no, no,—blistered fool! this hand did dart it!—'tis in the fish!—Aloft there! Keep him nailed—Quick!—all hands to the rigging of the boats—collect the oars—harpooners! the irons, 40 the irons!—hoist the royals higher—a pull on all the sheets!—helm there! steady, steady for your life! I'll ten times girdle the unmeasured globe; yea and dive straight through it, but I'll slay him yet!"

"Great God! but for one single instant show thyself," cried Starbuck; "never, never wilt thou capture him, old man.—In Jesus' name no more of this, that's worse than devil's madness. Two days chased; twice stove to splinters; thy very leg once more snatched from under thee; thy evil shadow gone—all good angels mobbing thee with warnings:—what more wouldst thou have?—Shall we keep chasing this murderous fish till he swamps the last man? Shall we be dragged by him to the bottom of the sea? Shall we be towed by him to the infernal world? Oh, oh!—Impiety and blasphemy to hunt him more!"

"Starbuck, of late I've felt strangely moved to thee; ever since that hour we both saw—thou know'st what, in one another's eyes. But in this matter of the whale, be the front of thy face to me as the palm of this hand—a lipless, unfeatured blank. Ahab is for ever Ahab, man. This whole act's immutably decreed. 'Twas rehearsed by thee and me a billion years before this ocean rolled. Fool! I am the Fates' lieutenant; I act under orders. Look thou, underling! that thou obeyest mine.—Stand round me, men. Ye see an old man cut down to the stump; leaning on a shivered lance; propped up on a lonely foot. 'Tis Ahab—his body's part; but Ahab's soul's a centipede, that moves upon a hundred legs. I feel strained, half stranded, as ropes that tow dismantled frigates in a gale; and I may look so. But ere I break, ye'll hear me crack; and till ye hear that, know that Ahab's hawser tows his purpose yet. Believe ye, men, in the things called omens? Then laugh aloud, and cry encore! For ere they drown, drowning things will twice rise to the surface; then rise again, to sink for evermore. So with Moby Dick—two days he's floated—to-morrow will be the third. Aye, men, he'll rise once more—but only to spout his last! D'ye feel brave men, brave?"

"As fearless fire," cried Stubb.

"And as mechanical," muttered Ahab. Then as the men went forward, he muttered on:—"The things called omens! And yesterday I talked the same to Starbuck there, concerning my broken boat. Oh! how valiantly I seek to drive out of others' hearts what's clinched so fast in mine!—The Parsee—the Parsee!—gone, gone? and he was to go before:—but still was to be seen again ere I could perish—How's that?—There's a riddle now might baffle all the lawyers backed by the ghosts of the whole line of judges:—like a hawk's beak it pecks my brain. I'll, I'll solve it, though!"

When dusk descended, the whale was still in sight to leeward.

So once more the sail was shortened, and everything passed nearly as on the previous night; only, the sound of hammers, and the hum of the grindstone was heard till nearly daylight, as the men toiled by lanterns in the complete and careful rigging of the spare boats and sharpening their fresh weapons for the morrow. Meantime, of the broken keel of Ahab's wrecked craft the carpenter made him another leg; while still as on the night before, slouched Ahab stood fixed within his scuttle; his hid heliotrope glance anticipatively gone backward on its dial; set due eastward for the earliest sun.

CHAPTER CXXXV

The Chase—Third Day

The morning of the third day dawned fair and fresh, and once more the solitary nightman at the fore-masthead was relieved by crowds of the daylight lookouts, who dotted every mast and almost every spar.

"D'ye see him?" cried Ahab; but the whale was not yet in sight.

"In his infallible wake, though; but follow that wake, that's all. Helm there; steady, as thou goest, and hast been going. What a lovely day again! were it a new-made world, and made for a summer-house to the angels, and this morning the first of its throwing open to them, a fairer day could not dawn upon that world. Here's food for thought, had Ahab time to think; but Ahab never thinks; he only feels, feels, feels, that's tingling enough for mortal man! to think's audacity. God only has that right and privilege. Thinking is, or ought to be, a coolness and a calmness; and our poor hearts throb, and our poor brains beat too much for that. And yet, I've sometimes thought my brain was very calm—frozen calm, this old skull cracks so, like a glass in which the contents turn to ice, and shiver it. And still this hair is growing now; this moment growing, and heat must breed it; but no, it's like that sort of common grass that will grow anywhere, between the earthly clefts of Greenland ice or in Vesuvius lava. How the wild winds blow it; they whip it about me as the torn shreds of split sails lash the tossed ship they cling to. A vile wind that has no doubt blown ere this through prison corridors and cells, and wards of hospitals, and ventilated them, and now comes blowing hither as innocent as fleeces. Out upon it!—it's tainted. Were I the wind, I'd blow no more on such a wicked, miserable world. I'd crawl somewhere to a cave, and slink there. And yet, 'tis a noble and heroic thing, the wind! who ever conquered it? In every fight it has the last and bitterest blow. Run tilting at it, and you but run through it. Ha! a coward wind that strikes stark naked men, but will not stand to receive a single blow. Even Ahab is a braver thing—a nobler thing than that. Would now the wind but had a body; but all the things that most exasperate and outrage mortal man, all these things are bodiless, but only bodiless as objects, not as agents. There's a most special, a most cunning, oh, a most malicious difference! And yet, I say again, and swear it now, that there's something all glorious and gracious in the wind. These warm Trade Winds, at least, that in the clear heavens blow straight on, in strong and steadfast, vigorous mildness; and veer not from their mark, however the baser currents of the sea may turn and tack, and mightiest Mississippis of the land shift and swerve about, uncertain where to go at last. And by the eternal Poles! these same Trades that so directly blow my good ship on; these Trades, or something like them—something so unchangeable, and full as strong, blow my keeled soul along! To it! Aloft there! What d'ye see?"

"Nothing, sir."

"Nothing! and noon at hand! The doubloon goes a-begging! See the sun! Aye, aye, it must be so. I've oversailed him. How, got the start? Aye, he's chasing me now; not I, him—that's bad; I might have known it, too. Fool! the lines—the harpoons he's towing. Aye, aye, I have run him by last night. About! about! Come down, all of ye, but the regular look-outs! Man the braces!"

Steering as she had done, the wind had been somewhat on the Pequod's quarter, so that now being pointed in the reverse direction, the braced ship sailed hard upon the breeze as she recharged the cream in her now white wake.

"Against the wind he now steers for the open jaw," murmured Starbuck to himself, as he coiled the new-hauled main-brace upon the rail. "God keep us, but already my bones feel damp within me, and from the inside wet my flesh. I misdoubt me that I disobey my God in obeying him!"

"Stand by to sway me up!" cried Ahab, advancing to the hempen basket. "We should meet him soon."

"Aye, aye, sir," and straightway Starbuck did Ahab's bidding, and once more Ahab swung on high.

A whole hour now passed; gold-beaten out to ages. Time itself now held long breaths with keen suspense. But at last, some three points off the weather-bow, Ahab descried the spout again, and instantly from the three mast-heads three shrieks went up as if the tongues of fire had voiced it.

"Forehead to forehead I meet thee, this third time, Moby Dick! On deck there!—brace sharper up; crowd her into the wind's eye. He's too far off to lower yet, Mr. Starbuck. The sails shake! Stand over that helmsman with a topmaul! So, so; he travels fast, and I must down. But let me have one more good round look aloft here at the sea; there's time for that. An old, old sight, and yet somehow so young; aye, and not changed a wink since I first saw it, a boy, from the sandhills of Nantucket! The same!—the same!—the same to Noah as to me. There's a soft shower to leeward. Such lovely leewardings! They must lead somewhere—to something else than common land, more palmy than the palms. Leeward! the white whale goes that way; look to windward, then; the better if the bitterer quarter. But good-bye, good-bye, old masthead! What's this?—green? ay, tiny mosses in these warped cracks. No such green weather stains on Ahab's head! There's the difference now between man's old age and matter's. But ay, old mast, we both grow old together; sound in our hulls, though, are we not, my ship? Aye, minus a leg, that's all. By heaven! this dead wood has the better of my live flesh every way. I can't compare with it; and I've known some ships made of dead trees outlast the lives of men made of the most vital stuff of vital fathers. What's that he said? he should still go before me, my pilot; and yet to be seen again? But where? Shall I have eyes at the bottom of the sea, supposing I descend those endless stairs? and all night I've been sailing from him, wherever he did sink to. Aye, aye, like many more thou told'st direful truth as touching thyself, O Parsee; but, Ahab, there thy shot fell short. Good-bye, masthead—keep a good eye upon the whale, the while I'm gone. We'll talk tomorrow, nay, tonight, when the White Whale lies down there, tied by head and tail."

He gave the word; and still gazing round him, was steadily lowered through the cloven blue air to the deck.

In due time the boats were lowered; but as standing in his shallop's stern, Ahab just hovered upon the point of the descent, he waved to the mate,—who held one of the tackle-ropes on deck—and bade him pause.

"Starbuck!"

"Sir?"

"For the third time my soul's ship starts upon this voyage, Starbuck."

"Aye, sir, thou wilt have it so."

"Some ships sail from their ports, and ever afterwards are missing, Starbuck!"

"Truth, sir: saddest truth."

"Some men die at ebb tide; some at low water; some at the full of the flood;—and I feel now like a billow that's all one crested comb, Starbuck. I am old;—shake hands with me, man."

Their hands met; their eyes fastened; Starbuck's tears the glue.

"Oh, my captain, my captain!—noble heart—go not—go not!—see, it's a brave man that weeps; how great the agony of the persuasion then!"

"Lower away!"—cried Ahab, tossing the mate's arm from him. "Stand by the crew!"

In an instant the boat was pulling round close under the stern.

"The sharks! the sharks!" cried a voice from the low cabin-window there; "O master, my master, come back!"

But Ahab heard nothing; for his own voice was high-lifted then; and the boat leaped on.

Yet the voice spake true; for scarce had he pushed from the ship, when numbers of sharks, seemingly rising from out the dark waters beneath the hull, maliciously snapped at the blades of the oars, every time they dipped in the water; and in this way accompanied the boat with their bites. It is a thing not uncommonly happening to the whale-boats in those swarming seas; the sharks at times apparently following them in the same prescient way that vultures hover over the banners of marching regiments in the east. But these were the first sharks that had been observed by the Pequod since the White Whale had been first descried; and whether it was that Ahab's crew were all such tiger-yellow barbarians, and therefore their flesh more musky to the senses of the sharks—a matter sometimes well known to affect them,—however it was, they seemed to follow that one boat without molesting the others.

"Heart of wrought steel!" murmured Starbuck, gazing over the side, and following with his eyes the receding boat—"canst thou yet ring boldly to that sight?—lowering thy keel among ravening sharks, and followed by them, open-mouthed, to the chase; and this the critical third day?—For when three days flow together in one continuous intense pursuit; be sure the first is the morning, the second the noon, and the third the evening and the end of that thing—be that end what it may. Oh! my God! what is this that shoots through me, and leaves me so deadly calm, yet expectant,—fixed at the top of a shudder! Future things swim before me, as in empty outlines and skeletons; all the past is somehow grown dim. Mary, girl! thou fadest in pale glories behind me; boy! I seem to see but thy eyes grown wondrous blue. Strangest problems of life seem clearing; but clouds sweep between—Is my journey's end coming?"

My legs feel faint; like his who has footed it all day. Feel thy heart,—beats it yet?—Stir thyself, Starbuck!—stave it off—move, move, speak aloud!—Masthead there! See ye my boy's hand on the hill?—Crazed;—aloft there!—keep thy keenest eye upon the boats:—mark well the whale!—Ho! again!—drive off that hawk! see! he pecks—he tears the vane"—pointing to the red flag flying at the main-truck—"Ha! he soars away with it!— 10 Where's the old man now? sees't thou that sight, oh Ahab!—shudder, shudder!"

The boats had not gone very far, when by a signal from the mastheads—a downward pointed arm, Ahab knew that the whale had sounded; but intending to be near him at the next rising, he held on his way a little sideways from the vessel; the becharmed crew maintaining the profoundest silence, as the head-beat waves hammered and hammered against 20 the opposing bow.

"Drive, drive in your nails, oh ye waves! to their uttermost heads drive them in! ye but strike a thing without a lid; and no coffin and no hearse can be mine;—and hemp only can kill me! Ha! ha!"

Suddenly the waters around them slowly swelled in broad circles; then quickly upheaved, as if sideways sliding from a submerged berg of ice, swiftly rising to the surface. A low rumbling sound was heard; a subterranean hum; and then all held their breaths; as bedraggled with trailing ropes, and harpoons, and lances, a vast form shot lengthwise, but obliquely from the sea. Shrouded in a thin drooping veil of mist, it hovered for a moment in the rainbowed air; and then fell swamping back into the deep. Crushed thirty feet upwards, the waters flashed for an instant like heaps of fountains, 30 then brokenly sank in a shower of flakes, leaving the circling surface creamed like new milk round the marble trunk of the whale.

"Give way!" cried Ahab to the oarsmen, and the boats darted forward to the attack; but maddened by yesterday's fresh irons that corroded in him, Moby Dick seemed combinedly possessed by all the angels that fell from heaven. The wide tiers of welded tendons overspreading his broad white forehead, 40 beneath the transparent skin, looked knitted together; as head on, he came churning his tail among the boats; and once more flailed them apart; spilling out the irons and lances from the two mates' boats, and dashing in one side of the upper part of their bows, but leaving Ahab's almost without a scar.

While Daggoo and Queequeg were stopping the strained planks; and as the whale swimming out from them, turned, and showed one entire flank as he shot by them again; at that moment a quick cry went up. Lashed round and round to the fish's back; pinioned in the turns upon turns in which, during the past night, the whale had reeled the involutions of the lines around him, the half torn body of the Parsee was seen; his sable raiment frayed to shreds; his distended eyes turned full upon old Ahab.

The harpoon dropped from his hand.

"Befooled, befooled!"—drawing in a long lean breath—"Aye, Parsee! I see thee again.—Aye, and thou goest before; and this, this then is the hearse that thou didst promise. But I hold thee to the last letter of thy word. Where is the second hearse? Away, mates, to the ship! those boats are useless now; repair them if ye can in time, and return to me; if not, Ahab is enough to die—Down, men! the first thing that but offers to jump from this boat I stand in, that thing I harpoon. Ye are not other men, but my arms and my legs; and so obey me.—Where's the whale? gone down again?"

But he looked too nigh the boat; for as if bent upon escaping with the corpse he bore, and as if the particular place of the last encounter had been but a stage in his leeward voyage, Moby Dick was now again steadily swimming forward; and had almost passed the ship,—which thus far had been sailing in the contrary direction to him, though for the present her headway had been stopped. He seemed swimming with his utmost velocity, and now only intent upon pursuing his own straight path in the sea.

"Oh! Ahab," cried Starbuck, "not too late is it, even now, the third day, to desist. See! Moby Dick seeks thee not. It is thou, thou, that madly seekest him!"

Setting sail to the rising wind, the lonely boat was swiftly impelled to leeward, by both oars and canvas. And at last when Ahab was sliding by the vessel, so near as plainly to distinguish Starbuck's face as he leaned over the rail, he hailed him to turn the vessel about, and follow him, not too swiftly, at a judicious interval. Glancing upwards, he saw Tashtego, Queequeg, and Daggoo, eagerly mounting to the three mastheads; while the oarsmen were rocking in the two staved boats which had just been hoisted to the side, and were busily at work in repairing them. One after the other, through the port-holes, as he sped, he also caught flying glimpses of Stubb and Flask, busying themselves on deck among bundles of new irons and lances. As he saw all this; as he heard the hammers in the broken boats; far other hammers seemed driving a nail into his heart. But he rallied. And now marking that the vane or flag was gone from the main masthead, he shouted to Tashtego, who had just gained that perch, to descend again for another flag, and a hammer and nails, and so nail it to the mast.

Whether fagged by the three days' running chase, and the resistance to his swimming in the knotted hamper he bore; or whether it was some latent deceitfulness and malice in him: whichever was true, the White Whale's way now began to abate, as it seemed, from the boat so rapidly nearing him once more; though indeed the whale's last start had not been so long a one as before. And still as Ahab glided over the waves the un pitying sharks accompanied him; and so pertinaciously stuck to the boat; and so continually bit at the plying oars, that the blades became jagged and crunched, and left small splinters in the sea, at almost every dip.

"Heed them not! those teeth but give new rowlocks to your oars. Pull on! 'tis the better rest, the shark's jaw than the yielding water."

"But at every bite, sir, the thin blades grow smaller and smaller!"

"They will last long enough! pull on!—But who can tell"—he muttered—"whether these sharks swim to feast on the whale or on Ahab?—But pull on! Aye, all alive, now—we near him. The helm! take the helm; let me pass,"—and so saying, two of the oarsmen helped him forward to the bows of the still flying boat.

At length as the craft was cast to one side, and ran ranging along with the White Whale's flank, he seemed strangely oblivious of its advance—as the whale sometimes will—and Ahab was fairly within the smoky mountain mist, which, thrown off from the whale's spout, curled round his great Monadnock hump. He was even thus close to him; when, with body arched back, and both arms lengthwise high-lifted to the poise, he darted his fierce iron, and his far fiercer curse into the hated whale. As both steel and curse sank to the socket, as if sucked into a morass, Moby Dick sideways writhed; spasmodically rolled his nigh flank against the bow, and, without staving a hole in it, so suddenly canted the boat over, that had it not been for the elevated part of the gunwale to which he then clung, Ahab would once more have been tossed into the sea. As it was, three of the oarsmen—who foreknew not the precise instant of the dart, and were therefore unprepared for its effects—these were flung out; but so fell, that, in an instant two of them clutched the gunwale again, and rising to its level on a combing wave, hurled themselves bodily inboard again; the third man helplessly dropping astern, but still afloat and swimming.

Almost simultaneously, with a mighty volition of ungraduated, instantaneous swiftness, the White Whale darted through the weltering sea. But when Ahab cried out to the steersman to take new turns with the line, and hold it so; and commanded the crew to turn round on their seats, and tow the boat up to the mark; the moment the treacherous line felt that double strain and tug, it snapped in the empty air!

"What breaks in me? Some sinew cracks!—'tis whole again; oars! oars! Burst in upon him!"

Hearing the tremendous rush of the sea-crashing boat, the whale wheeled round to present his blank forehead at bay; but in that evolution, catching sight of the nearing black hull of the ship; seemingly seeing in it the source of all his persecutions; bethinking it—it may be—a larger and nobler foe; of a sudden, he bore down upon its advancing prow, smiting his jaws amid fiery showers of foam.

Ahab staggered; his hand smote his forehead. "I grow blind; hands! stretch out before me that I may yet grope my way. Is't night?"

"The whale! The ship!" cried the cringing oarsmen.

"Oars! oars! Slope downwards to thy depths, O sea, that ere it be for ever too late, Ahab may slide this last, last time upon his mark! I see: the ship! the ship! Dash on, my men! Will ye not save my ship?"

But as the oarsmen violently forced their boat through the sledge-hammering seas, the before whale-smitten bow-ends of two planks burst through, and in an instant almost, the temporarily disabled boat lay nearly level with the waves; its half-wading, splashing crew, trying hard to stop the gap and bale out the pouring water.

Meantime, for that one beholding instant, Tashtego's masthead hammer remained suspended in his hand; and the red flag, half-wrapping him as with a plaid, then streamed itself straight out from him, as his own forward-flowing heart; while Starbuck and Stubb, standing upon the bowsprit beneath, caught sight of the down-coming monster just as soon as he.

"The whale, the whale! Up helm, up helm! Oh, all ye sweet powers of air, now hug me close! Let not Starbuck die, if die he must, in a woman's fainting fit. Up helm, I say—ye fools, the jaw! the jaw! Is this the end of all my bursting prayers? All my life-long fidelities? Oh, Ahab, Ahab, lo, they work. Steady! helmsman, steady. Nay, nay! Up helm again! He turns to meet us! Oh, his unappeasable brow drives on towards one, whose duty tells him he cannot depart. My God, stand by me now!

"Stand not by me, but stand under me, whoever you are that will now help Stubb; for Stubb, too, sticks here. I grin at thee, thou grinning whale! Whoever helped Stubb, or kept Stubb awake, but Stubb's own unwinking eye? And now poor Stubb goes to bed upon a mattress that is all too soft; would it were stuffed with brushwood! I grin at thee, thou grinning whale! Look ye, sun, moon, and stars! I call ye assassins of as good a fellow as ever spouted up his ghost. For all that, I would yet ring glasses with ye, would ye but hand the cup! Oh, oh, oh, oh! thou grinning whale, but there'll be plenty of gulping soon! Why fly ye not, O Ahab? For me, off shoes and jacket to it; let Stubb die in his drawers! A most mouldy and over-salted death, though;—cherries! cherries! cherries! Oh, Flask, for one red cherry ere we die!"

"Cherries? I only wish that we were where they grow. Oh, Stubb, I hope my poor mother's drawn my part-pay ere this; if not, a few coppers will come to her now, for the voyage is up."

From the ship's bows, nearly all the seamen now hung inactive; hammers, bits of plank, lances, and harpoons, mechanically retained in their hands, just as they had darted from their various employments; all their enchanted eyes intent upon the whale, which from side to side strangely vibrating his predestinating head, sent a broad band of overspreading semicircular foam before him as he rushed. Retribution, swift vengeance, eternal malice were in his whole aspect, and spite of all that mortal man could do, the solid white buttress of his forehead smote the ship's starboard bow, till men and timbers reeled. Some fell flat upon their faces. Like dislodged trucks, the heads of the harpooners aloft shook on their bull-like necks. Through the breach, they heard the waters pour, as mountain torrents down a flume.

"The ship! The hearse!—the second hearse!" cried Ahab from the boat; "its wood could only be American!"

Diving beneath the settling ship, the whale ran quivering along its keel; but turning under water, swiftly shot to the surface again, far off the other bow, but within a few yards of Ahab's boat, where, for a time, he lay quiescent.

"I turn my body from the sun. What ho, Tashtego! let me hear thy hammer. Oh! ye three unsundered spires of mine; thou uncracked keel; the only god-bullied hull; thou firm deck, and haughty helm, and Pole-pointed prow,—death-glorious ship! must ye then perish, and without me? Am I cut off from the last fond pride of meanest shipwrecked captains? Oh, lonely death on lonely life! Oh, now I feel my topmost greatness lies in my topmost grief. Ho, ho! from all your furthest bounds, pour ye now in, ye bold billows of my whole foregone life, and top this one piled comber<sup>1</sup> of my death! Towards thee I roll, thou all-destroying but unconquering whale; to the last I grapple with thee; from hell's heart I stab at thee; for hate's sake I spit my last breath at thee. Sink all coffins and all hearses to one common pool! and since neither can be mine let me then tow to pieces, while still chasing thee, though tied to thee, 10 thou damned whale! Thus, I give up the spear!"

The harpoon was darted; the stricken whale flew forward; with igniting velocity the line ran through the groove; ran foul. Ahab stooped to clear it; he did clear it; but the flying turn caught him round the neck and, voicelessly as Turkish mutes bowstring their victim, he was shot out of the boat, ere the crew knew he was gone. Next instant, the heavy eyesplice in the rope's final end flew out of the stark-empty tub, knocked down an oarsman, and smiting the sea, disappeared in its depths.

For an instant, the tranced boat's crew stood still; then turned. "The ship? Great God, where is the ship?" Soon they through dim, bewildering mediums saw her sidelong fading phantom, as in the gaseous Fata Morgana,<sup>2</sup> only the uppermost masts out of water; 30 while fixed by infatuation, or fidelity, or fate, to their once lofty perches, the pagan harpooners still maintained their sinking look-outs on the sea. And now, concentric circles seized the lone boat itself, and all its crew, and each floating oar, and every lance-pole, and spinning, animate and inanimate, all round and round in one vortex, carried the smallest chip of the Pequod out of sight.

But as the last whelmings intermixingly poured themselves over the sunken head of the Indian at the mainmast, leaving a few inches of the erect spar yet visible, together with long streaming yards of the flag, which calmly undulated, with ironical coincidings, over the destroying billows they almost touched;—at that instant, a red arm and a hammer hovered backwardly uplifted in the open air, in the act of nailing the flag faster and yet faster to the subsiding spar. A sky-hawk that tauntingly had followed the main-truck downwards from its natural home among the stars, pecking at the flag, and incommoding Tashtego there; this bird now chanced to intercept its broad fluttering wing between the hammer and the wood; and simultaneously feeling that ethereal thrill, the submerged savage beneath, in his death-gasp, kept his hammer frozen there; and so the bird of heaven, with archangelic shrieks, and his imperial beak thrust upwards, and his whole captive form folded in the flag of Ahab, went down with his ship, which, like Satan, would not sink to hell till she had dragged a living part of heaven along with her, and helmeted herself with it.

Now small fowls flew screaming over the yet yawning gulf; a sullen white surf beat against its steep sides; then all collapsed, and the great shroud of the sea rolled on as it rolled five thousand years ago. 1851

1807 -- Henry Wadsworth Longfellow -- 1882

LONGFELLOW was influential in widening the American outlook and taste. He has been termed an inaugurator of the so-called "New England Renaissance of arts and letters." He did much to domesticate foreign literature and the cosmopolitan spirit, following Irving in popularizing antique legend and in interpreting to the

New World the mellow twilight of the European past. He also deserves credit for popularizing American themes in poetry, from his boyish verses on "The Battle of Lovell's Pond" to The New England Tragedies of his later life. Beyond question, he was the best-loved American man of letters of his day, partly because he was the interpreter of the life and emotions of the average man. No other poet has contributed so many favorite pieces to our literature, and no other has been translated into so many foreign languages. His range and variety as a narrative poet, his moral idealism and sentiment, and his gentle didacticism may not appeal to critics today, but they appealed to the generation of readers he addressed, the generation emerging from Calvinism. Longfellow is often called the "most national of our poets," not because he is the best interpreter of our national life, for he is not, but because he was and remains our leading household poet and because of the world-wide acceptance of his verse. His life was a fortunate one, for he enjoyed every advantage of culture, leisure, travel, social intercourse, and contemporary recognition.

Henry Wadsworth Longfellow was born in Portland, Maine, February 27, 1807. His mother came from an army and navy family, and on her side he was of Mayflower stock, descending from John Alden and Priscilla Mullins. His father was a leading citizen, a Harvard graduate, a judge, a man of affairs, a member of Congress. The youth grew up in a home atmosphere of refinement. His father's library contained many books. He knew Dante early and Cowper and Ossian. The appearance of Irving's Sketch Book and Bryant's "Thanatopsis" influenced him to write Outre-Mer and verses. His first poem was published when he was thirteen, in the Portland Gazette. He was educated in private schools, and at fifteen entered Bowdoin, of which his father was a trustee, attending it from 1822 till he was graduated in 1825. Hawthorne was a classmate. While at Bowdoin he became confirmed in his wish to become a man of letters. He is described as a modest boy, well-balanced and amiable, without self-righteousness, and with excellent manners. Along with these virtues he made an exceptional record as a scholar, especially in language and literature.

His father wished him to study law, and he did so half-heartedly for a year. Then at twenty he was offered and accepted a newly founded chair of modern languages at his Alma Mater, on the condition that he visit Europe. The college paid him $600 a year to do so, and he was gone three years, 1826-29, for study in France, Spain, Italy, and Germany, winning a reading knowledge of their languages. He was also in England. Returning to Bowdoin, he occupied the chair of Professor of Modern Languages and served also as Librarian. In September, 1831, he married Miss Mary Potter. In the six years that he remained at Bowdoin his interest turned to prose rather than verse. He published textbooks and magazine articles on European lands and literatures. In the fourth year of his professorship, 1833, he issued his first volume, Outre-Mer, a book of sketches and travel first written for the New England

Magazine. This book was not of a new type, and it was not on native themes. His early residence abroad, his professorial duties, and his later trips, though excellent for his teaching, made his mind run along traditional lines. Throughout his life his work was to rely chiefly on literary inspiration and to have a decidedly bookish flavor.

A year later, when he was twenty-seven, Longfellow was called to succeed George Ticknor as Professor of Modern Languages at Harvard. He spent another year and a half in Europe, 1835-36, visiting England, Scandinavia, Holland, Germany, Switzerland, France. After the death of his wife at Rotterdam, in 1835, he proceeded to Heidelberg and stayed there seven or eight months, absorbed in the European past and yielding to German romanticism, with its love of sadness, night, and susceptibility to sentiment and dreams. On his return to America he took up his residence in Cambridge, in the days when it was the chief center of culture for the country. He lived at Craigie House, once Washington's headquarters, which was to be his home for the rest of his life. He remained on the Harvard faculty, teaching foreign languages for the eighteen years 1836-54. In his thirty-second year, 1839, Longfellow published Hyperion, a prose romance of travel. He next gave increasing attention to poetry, issuing in the same year his first volume of verse, Voices of the Night. It appealed to the mood of his time and made its way at once to popularity. Two years later he published Ballads and Other Poems, containing many of his successful pieces.

At thirty-five, in 1842, Longfellow went again to Europe, visiting during his leave of absence Belgium, the Rhine, and England. He wrote his Poems of Slavery on the return voyage, poems that seemed rather bookish and perfunctory when compared with Whittier's. Shortly afterwards he married Miss Frances Appleton, and her father bought Craigie House for them. His salary as a professor, the profits from his work, and her property made them well-to-do. His first play, The Spanish Student, not intended for the stage, was published in 1843, the year of his marriage. During 1845-47 he edited several collections of verse, and in 1845 published his The Belfry of Bruges and Other Poems, a volume including many of his best-liked poems. When the poet was forty-seven he composed, from a tale told to Hawthorne, Evangeline, which became at once popular for its story, its background of American natural scenery, and its meter, adapted from the classic hexameter. Henceforth he was recognized as a national figure. He published Kavanagh, a Tale, a dreamy, not very successful prose work, in 1849, and soon after The Seaside and the Fireside, a collection of poems which included "The Building of the Ship." In 1854, at the age of forty-seven, Longfellow resigned his professorship, believing that teaching hampered his poetic inspiration. James Russell Lowell was appointed to succeed him. The rest of his life is mainly a record of successive books and continuing popularity.

After he resigned from Harvard he published Hiawatha (1855), expressed in the rhythm of an old Finnish epic; Drift Wood, a volume of essays, in 1857; and the next year his third long poem upon an American theme, The Courtship of Miles Standish, narrating the wooing of his Puritan ancestors. In 1859 Harvard gave him an LL.D. In 1861 his second wife was accidentally burned to death. For consolation he turned to translation, completing his version of Dante's Divine Comedy, which was published 1865-67. During and after these years he issued along with other poems the three parts of the Tales of a Wayside Inn, including some of his best-known poems such as "Paul Revere's Ride." The larger part of his sixty-first and sixty-second years, 1868-69, the poet spent with his daughter, traveling in Italy, France, and England, everywhere receiving an admiring welcome. Cambridge and Oxford gave him honorary degrees. After his return he finished Christus, a Mystery (1872), his largest and most ambitious work, made up of The Golden Legend of 1851, to which he added for completion two long pieces, The New England Tragedies (1868) and The Divine Tragedy (1871). Also in dramatic form were Judas Macabaeus (1871), The Masque of Pandora (1875), and Michael Angelo, left unfinished at his death and printed in 1883. No one of his dramas attained the popularity of his narratives and lyrics. His later poems showed no flagging of his powers. Among them were "Aftermath" (1873); "The Hanging of the Crane" (1874); "Morituri Salutamus" (1875), written for the fiftieth anniversary of his college class; and "Kéramos" (1877). His last volume, Ultima Thule, appeared in 1880. A rough grouping of his works shows five chief classes, of which the first and second were the most successful: ballads and lyrics of moral inspiration or sentiment, long narrative pieces, dramas, prose, and translations.

Longfellow died March 24, 1882, shortly after his seventy-fifth birthday. He and Lowell are the only American men of letters who are commemorated in Westminster Abbey. His bust was placed there not because English critical opinion thinks him our greatest poet but rather as an expression of the feeling that he had entered into the general stream of life abroad and had become more widely influential than any other American author.

Longfellow's reading was wide and discursive. He knew Shakespeare, Milton, Goethe, Carlyle, and Ruskin, but these authors had no deep influence on him. His debt was greater to Chaucer, Gray, Burns, the German romantic poets, and the works of essayists and travelers. His teaching of foreign languages familiarized him with French, German, Italian, and Spanish classics, especially with Dante, whom he translated. A lay acquaintance with science such as Emerson's, or Whittier's concern with the living issues of his own time, he does not exhibit. He thought of the poet as standing apart from the outer world of toil and action, preferring remote themes; he liked the effect of romantic distance. His primary wish, however, was to be fundamentally ethical, to inspire faith in an ideal, to soothe, to edify, and to instruct.

Art is the gift of God and must be used
 Unto his glory. That art is highest Which aims at this.

His own religious faith was simple and unquestioning, without incertitude or struggle. Longfellow early remarked that he was "better pleased with those pieces which touch the feelings and improve the heart." In 1832 he wished our poets to be "more original and national." He praised Hawthorne in 1837 for dealing with the American romantic past. By 1849 he did not care whether the past was American or European. "Nationality is a good thing to a certain extent, but universality is better." Ultimately he turned to "the conflict between good and evil" in the spirit of the individual man as his preferred theme. Though it is lacking in his own poetry, he thought "the tragic element in poetry" its fundamental. He remained the poet of reverie, of sentiment, and of preference for the bygone; but he gave America what it needed, more respect for the past, for tradition, for the artist, and for the beautiful.

Part of Longfellow's success was owing to the simple sincere feeling of his poetry. He was the poet of the masses in their better moods, the laureate of the common aspirations and sorrows of life. He was also the poet of good manners, dignity, and culture. A fluent craftsman, he tried a great variety of verse forms, exhibiting considerable skill and grace and a sense of melody. He was at his best as a narrator in verse, and he was an excellent sonneteer. Among his limitations were his lack of dramatic vigor, of profound notes, of intensity and ardor. His poems rarely need a second or third reading. His morality often seems stock and his thought and moods are restricted. There is no essential Americanism in his verse. He was somewhat aloof from the forces working in his own time, religious, political, economic, or social. He never liked to cross public opinion but rather to fall in with it. He shrank from controversy as he shrank from violence.

Like Tennyson, Longfellow has suffered from reaction and the growing popularity of verse of other types than his. He has been attacked for sentimentality, bookishness, leaning on European models, lack of originality, commonplace moralizing, and didacticism. He is now dealt with more fairly, however. It is recognized that, though he is indebted to foreign models, he never followed them slavishly. It is recognized, too, that he stimulated the popular taste for poetry, stimulated culture, and was an American poet who could reach the world.

The standard collected edition of Longfellow's work is the Complete Works, Riverside Edition (11 vols., 1886). The best one-volume edition of the poems is H. E. Scudder's Complete Poetical Works, Cambridge Edition (1893). A more recent collection, Longfellow's Boyhood Poems (1925), edited by R. W. Pettengill, makes available some early poems not included in preceding collections.

Samuel Longfellow, a brother of the poet, published The Life of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow

(2 vols., 1885-86). A third volume, Final Memorials, added in 1887, concerns the poet's last fifteen years. Among other biographies are E. S. Robertson's The Life of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, in the Great Writers Series (1887), a dependable and discerning piece of work; G. R. Carpenter's Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, in the Beacon Biography Series (1901), a good succinct account; T. W. Higginson's Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, in the American Men of Letters Series (1902); C. E. Norton's Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, A Sketch of His Life (1907); and H. S. Gorman's A Victorian American, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow (1926), somewhat disparaging but dependable as to facts. W. C. Bronson wrote of him in DAB, XI. Lawrance Thompson has given an interesting account of Longfellow's earlier years in Young Longfellow (1938).

Criticism concerning Longfellow is readily available. Some of it takes a deprecatory tone, although two more recent writers, G. R. Elliott and H. M. Jones, defend the poet. See Barrett Wendell in A Literary History of America (1900); Paul Elmer More, "The Centenary of Longfellow," in Shelburne Essays, Fifth Series (1908); Bliss Perry, "The Centenary of Longfellow," in Park Street Papers (1908); W. P. Trent, Longfellow and Other Essays (1908), who also has the section on Longfellow in CHAL, II (1917); Alfred Noyes, "Longfellow and Modern Critics," in Some Aspects of Modern Poetry (1924); and G. R. Elliott, "The Gentle Shades of Longfellow," in The Cycle of Modern Poetry (1929). Some more recent criticisms are H. M. Jones's "Longfellow," in American Writers on American Literature, edited by John Macy (1931); James T. Hatfield's valuable New Light on Longfellow, with Special Reference to His Relations to Germany (1933); Odell Shepherd's sound introduction to his Longfellow, in American Writers Series (1934); and Gay W. Allen's study of Longfellow's verse form, in American Prosody, Chap. VI (1935).

Bibliographies for Longfellow may be found in CHAL, II (1917), by H. W. L. Dana; in L. S. Livingston's A Bibliography of the First Editions in Book Form of the Writings of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow (1908); and in W. F. Taylor's A History of American Letters (1936).

THE SPIRIT OF POETRY

This early piece in blank verse, showing the influence of Bryant or Wordsworth, was composed by Longfellow soon after he left college, in the autumn of 1825. It was published in the Atlantic Souvenir for 1828.

THERE is a quiet spirit in these woods,
That dwells where'er the gentle south-wind
blows;
Where, underneath the white-thorn in the glade,
The wild flowers bloom, or, kissing the soft
air,
The leaves above their sunny palms out-
spread.
With what a tender and impassioned voice
It fills the nice and delicate ear of thought,
When the fast ushering star of morning comes
O'er-riding the gray hills with golden scarf;
Or when the cowed and dusky-sandalled
Eve,

In mourning weeds, from out the western gate,
Departs with silent pace! That spirit moves
In the green valley, where the silver brook,
From its full laver, pours the white cascade;
And, babbling low amid the tangled woods,
Slips down through moss-grown stones with endless laughter.
And frequent, on the everlasting hills,
Its feet go forth, when it doth wrap itself
In all the dark embroidery of the storm,
And shouts the stern, strong wind. And here, amid 20
The silent majesty of these deep woods,
Its presence shall uplift thy thoughts from earth,
As to the sunshine and the pure, bright air
Their tops the green trees lift. Hence gifted bards
Have ever loved the calm and quiet shades.
For them there was an eloquent voice in all
The sylvan pomp of woods, the golden sun,

The flowers, the leaves, the river on its way,
 Blue skies, and silver clouds, and gentle winds,
 The swelling upland, where the sidelong sun 30
 Aslant the wooded slope, at evening, goes,
 Groves, through whose broken roof the sky looks in,
 Mountain, and shattered cliff, and sunny vale,
 The distant lake, fountains, and mighty trees,
 In many a lazy syllable, repeating
 Their old poetic legends to the wind.

And this is the sweet spirit, that doth fill
 The world; and, in these wayward days of youth,
 My busy fancy oft embodies it,
 As a bright image of the light and beauty 40
 That dwell in nature; of the heavenly forms
 We worship in our dreams, and the soft hues
 That stain the wild bird's wing, and flush the clouds
 When the sun sets. Within her tender eye
 The heaven of April, with its changing light,
 And when it wears the blue of May, is hung,
 And on her lip the rich, red rose. Her hair
 Is like the summer tresses of the trees,
 When twilight makes them brown, and on her cheek
 Blushes the richness of an autumn sky, 50
 With ever-shifting beauty. Then her breath,
 It is so like the gentle air of Spring,
 As, from the morning's dewy flowers, it comes
 Full of their fragrance, that it is a joy
 To have it round us, and her silver voice
 Is the rich music of a summer bird, Heard in the still night, with its passionate cadence.

A PSALM OF LIFE

WHAT THE HEART OF THE YOUNG MAN
 SAID TO THE PSALMIST

Written July 26, 1838; published anonymously in the Knickerbocker Magazine, October, 1838; included in Voices of the Night (1839). The poet read it to his class of Harvard students at the close of an hour given to Goethe's Wilhelm Meister. Its leading doctrine is that of the German novel. Longfellow said of it, "I kept it some time in manuscript, unwilling to show it to anyone, it being a voice from my inmost heart, at a time when I was rallying from depression." He thought of it as a call to reality from his own nature, answering and refuting his despondency. In 1929 a poll of many thousands of newspaper readers over the United States was made to determine "America's favorite poem." It resulted, according to an announcement made on March 20, in the selection of "A Psalm of Life." Bryant's "Thanatopsis" and two other poems by Longfellow,

 "Evangeline" and "The Village Blacksmith," ranked high.

TELL me not, in mournful numbers,
 Life is but an empty dream!—
 For the soul is dead that slumbers,
 And things are not what they seem.

Life is real! Life is earnest!
 And the grave is not its goal;
 Dust thou art, to dust returnest,
 Was not spoken of the soul.

Not enjoyment, and not sorrow,
 Is our destined end or way; 10
 But to act, that each to-morrow
 Find us farther than to-day.

Art is long, and Time is fleeting,
 And our hearts, though stout and brave,
 Still, like muffled drums, are beating
 Funeral marches to the grave.

In the world's broad field of battle,
 In the bivouac of Life,
 Be not like dumb, driven cattle!
 Be a hero in the strife! 20

Trust no Future, howe'er pleasant!
 Let the dead Past bury its dead!
 Act,—act in the living Present!
 Heart within, and God o'erhead!

Lives of great men all remind us
 We can make our lives sublime,
 And, departing, leave behind us
 Footprints on the sands of time;

Footprints, that perhaps another,
 Sailing o'er life's solemn main, 30
 A forlorn and shipwrecked brother,
 Seeing, shall take heart again.

Let us, then, be up and doing,
 With a heart for any fate;
 Still achieving, still pursuing,
 Learn to labor and to wait.

THE VILLAGE BLACKSMITH

Written in 1839. Published in the Knickerbocker Magazine, November, 1840. Included in Ballads and Other Poems (1841). Longfellow wrote to his father that he could consider it as a song in praise of his ancestor, the first Stephen Longfellow of Cambridge, who was a blacksmith. It was suggested by a smithy which stood beneath a horse chestnut tree on Brattle Street near Longfellow's home in Cambridge. The tree was cut down in 1876 for the widening of the street, despite the poet's protest. Three years later the schoolchildren of Cambridge, on Longfellow's seventy-second birthday, gave him a chair made from the wood of the tree. See his poem, "From My Arm Chair."

UNDER a spreading chestnut-tree
 The village smithy stands;
 The smith, a mighty man is he,
 With large and sinewy hands;
 And the muscles of his brawny arms
 Are strong as iron bands.

His hair is crisp, and black, and long,
 His face is like the tan;
 His brow is wet with honest sweat,
 He earns whate'er he can,
 And looks the whole world in the face,
 For he owes not any man.

10

Week in, week out, from morn till night,
 You can hear his bellows blow;
 You can hear him swing his heavy sledge,
 With measured beat and slow,
 Like a sexton ringing the village bell,
 When the evening sun is low.

And children coming home from school
 Look in at the open door;
 They love to see the flaming forge,
 And hear the bellows roar,
 And catch the burning sparks that fly
 Like chaff from a threshing-floor.

He goes on Sunday to the church,
 And sits among his boys;
 He hears the parson pray and preach,
 He hears his daughter's voice,
 Singing in the village choir,
 And it makes his heart rejoice.

30

It sounds to him like her mother's voice,
 Singing in Paradise!
 He needs must think of her once more,
 How in the grave she lies;
 And with his hard, rough hand he wipes
 A tear out of his eyes.

Toiling,—rejoicing,—sorrowing,
 Onward through life he goes;
 Each morning sees some task begin,
 Each evening sees it close;
 Something attempted, something done,
 Has earned a night's repose.

40

Thanks, thanks to thee, my worthy friend,
 For the lesson thou hast taught!
 Thus at the flaming forge of life
 Our fortunes must be wrought;
 Thus on its sounding anvil shaped
 Each burning deed and thought.

THE WRECK OF THE HESPERUS

Originally published in Park Benjamin's The New World. Longfellow wrote his narrative in the form of the English and Scottish traditional ballads, reproducing from them such characteristics of their technique as the light accent on the last syllables of "daughter" and "sailor," their handling of narrative and dialogue, and a stock manner of closing, as well as the staple four-line ballad stanza. The fourth and fifth stanzas echo a passage in a text of "Sir Patrick Spens." In all but its ostensible localization the ballad is more an Old World than an American piece. Longfellow entered in his journal, December 30, 1839, "I wrote last evening a notice of Allston's poems. After which I sat till twelve o'clock by my fire smoking, when suddenly it came into my mind to write 'The Ballad of the Schooner Hesperus,' which I accordingly did. Then I went to bed but could not sleep. New thoughts were running in my mind, and I got up to add them to the ballad. . . . I feel pleased with the ballad. It hardly cost me an effort. It did not come into my mind by lines, but by stanzas." He had written in his journal for December 17, "News of shipwrecks horrible on the coast. Twenty bodies washed ashore near Gloucester, one lashed to a piece of the wreck. There is a reef called Norman's Woe where many of these took place; among others the schooner Hesperus. Also the Sea-flower on Black Rock. I must write a ballad upon this." Norman's Woe is a rock about 200 feet long, jutting out into the sea off Gloucester harbor.

H. Beston wrote of "The Real Wreck of the Hesperus" in the Bookman, 1925.

It was the schooner Hesperus,
That sailed the wintry sea;
And the skipper had taken his little daughter,
To bear him company.

Blue were her eyes as the fairy-flax,
Her cheeks like the dawn of day,
And her bosom white as the hawthorn buds,
That open in the month of May.

The skipper he stood beside the helm,
His pipe was in his mouth, <sup>10</sup>
And he watched how the veering flaw did blow
The smoke now West, now South.

Then up and spake an old Sailòr,
Had sailed to the Spanish Main,<sup>1</sup>
"I pray thee, put into yonder port,
For I fear a hurricane.

"Last night, the moon had a golden ring,
And to-night no moon we see!"
The skipper, he blew a whiff from his pipe,
And a scornful laugh laughed he. <sup>20</sup>

Colder and louder blew the wind,
A gale from the Northeast,
The snow fell hissing in the brine,
And the billows frothed like yeast.

Down came the storm, and smote amain
The vessel in its strength;
She shuddered and paused, like a frightened
steed,
Then leaped her cable's length.

<sup>1</sup> the northern coast of South America, or the adjoining waters

"Come hither! come hither! my little daughter,
And do not tremble so; <sup>30</sup>
For I can weather the roughest gale
That ever wind did blow."

He wrapped her warm in his seaman's coat
Against the stinging blast;
He cut a rope from a broken spar,
And bound her to the mast.

"O father! I hear the church-bells ring, Oh say, what may it be?"
"Tis a fog-bell on a rock-bound coast!"—
And he steered for the open sea. <sup>40</sup>

"O father! I hear the sound of guns,
Oh say, what may it be?"
"Some ship in distress, that cannot live
In such an angry sea!"

"O father! I see a gleaming light,
Oh say, what may it be?"
But the father answered never a word,
A frozen corpse was he.

Lashed to the helm, all stiff and stark,
With his face turned to the skies, <sup>50</sup>
The lantern gleamed through the gleaming
snow
On his fixed and glassy eyes.

Then the maiden clasped her hands and prayed
That savèd she might be;
And she thought of Christ, who stilled the wave,
On the Lake of Galilee.

And fast through the midnight dark and drear,
Through the whistling sleet and snow,
Like a sheeted ghost, the vessel swept Tow'rds the reef of Norman's Woe. <sup>60</sup>

And ever the fitful gusts between
A sound came from the land;
It was the sound of the trampling surf
On the rocks and the hard sea-sand.

The breakers were right beneath her bows,
She drifted a dreary wreck,
And a whooping billow swept the crew
Like icicles from her deck.

She struck where the white and fleecy waves
 Looked soft as carded wool, 70
 But the cruel rocks, they gored her side
 Like the horns of an angry bull.

Her rattling shrouds, all sheathed in ice,
 With the masts went by the board;
 Like a vessel of glass, she stove and sank,
 Ho! ho! the breakers roared!

At daybreak, on the bleak sea-beach,
 A fisherman stood aghast,
 To see the form of a maiden fair,
 Lashed close to a drifting mast. 80

The salt sea was frozen on her breast,
 The salt tears in her eyes;
 And he saw her hair, like the brown seaweed,
 On the billows fall and rise.

Such was the wreck of the Hesperus,
 In the midnight and the snow!
 Christ save us all from a death like this,
 On the reef of Norman's Woe!

THE SKELETON IN ARMOR

First published in the Knickerbocker Magazine, January, 1841. Reprinted in Ballads and Other Poems, 1841. The stanza form and meter are derived from Michael Drayton's poem on the battle of Agincourt. Longfellow wrote, December, 1840, to his father, "Have . . . prepared for the press another original ballad, which has been lying by me for some time. It is called 'The Skeleton in Armor,' and is connected with the old Round Tower at Newport. The skeleton in armor really exists. It was dug up near Fall River, where I saw it some two years ago. I suppose it to be the remains of one of the old Northern sea-rovers, who came to this country in the tenth century. Of course I make the tradition myself; and I think I have succeeded in giving the whole a Northern air." It was believed in 1840 that the Vikings under Leif Ericsson had visited the New World, a belief later given up and now held again. Probably it was southern Nova Scotia that Ericsson might have visited, hardly a region farther south. Longfellow had the idea of connecting the old round stone tower at Newport, generally known as the Old Windmill, with the skeleton bearing a breastplate of brass in Massachusetts. The skeleton was buried in an upright position and it is now believed that it was that of an Indian. Poe praised this poem highly in his review of Longfellow in Graham's Magazine, April, 1842.

"SPEAK! speak! thou fearful guest!
 Who, with thy hollow breast,
 Still in rude armor drest,
 Comest to daunt me!
 Wrapt not in Eastern balms,<sup>1</sup>
 But with thy fleshless palms
 Stretched, as if asking alms,
 Why dost thou haunt me?"

Then from those cavernous eyes
 Pale flashes seemed to rise, 10
 As when the Northern skies
 Gleam in December;
 And, like the water's flow
 Under December's snow,
 Came a dull voice of woe
 From the heart's chamber.

"I was a Viking old!
 My deeds, though manifold,
 No Skald in song has told,
 No Saga taught thee! 20
 Take heed that in thy verse
 Thou dost the tale rehearse,
 Else dread a dead man's curse;
 For this I sought thee.

"Far in the Northern Land,
 By the wild Baltic's strand,
 I, with my childish hand,
 Tamed the gerfalcon;
 And, with my skates fast-bound,
 Skimmed the half-frozen Sound, 30
 That the poor whimpering hound Trembled to walk on.

"Oft to his frozen lair
 Tracked I the grisly bear,
 While from my path the hare
 Fled like a shadow;
 Oft through the forest dark
 Followed the were-wolf's bark,
 Until the soaring lark
 Sang from the meadow. 40

<sup>1</sup> a reference to the ancient methods of preserving the dead, particularly in Egypt

“But when I older grew,
 Joining a corsair’s crew,
 O’er the dark sea I flew
     With the marauders.
 Wild was the life we led;
 Many the souls that sped,
 Many the hearts that bled,
     By our stern orders.

“Many a wassail-bout
 Wore the long winter out;
 Often our midnight shout
     Set the cocks crowing,
 As we the Berserk’s tale
 Measured in cups of ale,
 Draining the oaken pail
     Filled to o’erflowing.

“Once as I told in glee
 Tales of the stormy sea,
 Soft eyes did gaze on me,
     Burning yet tender;
 And as the white stars shine
 On the dark Norway pine,
 On that dark heart of mine
     Fell their soft splendor.

“I wooed the blue-eyed maid,
 Yielding, yet half afraid,
 And in the forest’s shade
     Our vows were plighted.
 Under its loosened vest
 Fluttered her little breast,
 Like birds within their nest
     By the hawk frightened.

“Bright in her father’s hall
 Shields gleamed upon the wall,
 Loud sang the minstrels all,
     Chanting his glory;
 When of old Hildebrand
 I asked his daughter’s hand,
 Mute did the minstrels stand
     To hear my story.

“While the brown ale he quaffed,
 Loud then the champion laughed,
 And as the wind-gusts waft
     The sea-foam brightly,
 So the loud laugh of scorn
 Out of those lips unshorn,
 From the deep drinking-horn
     Blew the foam lightly.

“She was a Prince’s child,
 I but a Viking wild,
 And though she blushed and smiled,
     I was discarded!
 Should not the dove so white
 Follow the sea-mew’s flight?
 Why did they leave that night
     Her nest unguarded?

“Scarce had I put to sea,
 Bearing the maid with me,
 Fairest of all was she
     Among the Norsemen!
 When on the white sea-strand,
 Waving his armèd hand,
 Saw we old Hildebrand,
     With twenty horsemen.

“Then launched they to the blast,
 Bent like a reed each mast,
 Yet we were gaining fast,
     When the wind failed us;
 And with a sudden flaw
 Came round the gusty Skaw,<sup>1</sup>
 So that our foe we saw
     Laugh as he hailed us.

“And as to catch the gale
 Round veered the flapping sail,
 ‘Death!’ was the helmsman’s hail,
     ‘Death without quarter!’
 Midships with iron keel
 Struck we her ribs of steel;
 Down her black hulk did reel
     Through the black water!

“As with his wings aslant,
 Sails the fierce cormorant,
 Seeking some rocky haunt,
     With his prey laden,—
 So toward the open main,
 Beating to sea again,
 Through the wild hurricane,
     Bore I the maiden.

“Three weeks we westward bore,
 And when the storm was o’er,
 Cloud-like we saw the shore
     Stretching to leeward;

There for my lady's bower
 Built I the lofty tower,
 Which, to this very hour,
 Stands looking seaward.

"There lived we many years;
 Time dried the maiden's tears;
 She had forgot her fears,
 She was a mother; 140
 Death closed her mild blue eyes;
 Under that tower she lies;
 Ne'er shall the sun arise
 On such another!

"Still grew my bosom then,
 Still as a stagnant fen!
 Hateful to me were men,
 The sunlight hateful!
 In the vast forest here,
 Clad in my warlike gear, 150
 Fell I upon my spear,
 Oh, death was grateful!

"Thus, seamed with many scars,
 Bursting these prison bars
 Up to its native stars
 My soul ascended!
 There from the flowing bowl
 Deep drinks the warrior's soul,
Skoal!<sup>1</sup> to the Northland! skoal!"
 Thus the tale ended. 160

THE SLAVE'S DREAM

When Longfellow was returning from Germany in 1842 the voyage was stormy and he was confined to his berth for fifteen days. He wrote to a friend that during this time he composed seven poems on slavery. They were published in the same year, receiving praise or criticism according to the anti- or pro-slavery sentiments of his readers. They lack Whittier's intensity, but show that Longfellow was willing to take a stand on a burning question.

BESIDE the ungathered rice he lay,
 His sickle in his hand;

His breast was bare, his matted hair
 Was buried in the sand.
 Again, in the mist and shadow of sleep,
 He saw his Native Land.

Wide through the landscape of his dreams
 The lordly Niger flowed;
 Beneath the palm-trees on the plain
 Once more a king he strode; 10
 And heard the tinkling caravans
 Descend the mountain road.

He saw once more his dark-eyed queen
 Among her children stand;
 They clasped his neck, they kissed his cheeks,
 They held him by the hand!—
 A tear burst from the sleeper's lids
 And fell into the sand.

And then at furious speed he rode
 Along the Niger's bank; 20
 His bridle-reins were golden chains,
 And, with a martial clank,
 At each leap he could feel his scabbard of steel
 Smiting his stallion's flank.

Before him, like a blood-red flag,
 The bright flamingoes flew;
 From morn till night he followed their flight,
 O'er plains where the tamarind grew,
 Till he saw the roofs of Caffre huts,
 And the ocean rose to view. 30

At night he heard the lion roar,
 And the hyena scream,
 And the river-horse, as he crushed the reeds
 Beside some hidden stream;
 And it passed, like a glorious roll of drums,
 Through the triumph of his dream.

The forests, with their myriad tongues,
 Shouted of liberty;
 And the Blast of the Desert cried aloud,
 With a voice so wild and free, 40
 That he started in his sleep and smiled
 At their tempestuous glee.

He did not feel the driver's whip,
 Nor the burning heat of day;
 For Death had illumined the Land of Sleep,
 And his lifeless body lay
 A worn-out fetter, that the soul
 Had broken and thrown away!

THE WARNING

BEWARE! The Israelite of old, who tore
 The lion in his path,—when, poor and blind,
 He saw the blessed light of heaven no more,
 Shorn of his noble strength and forced to grind
 In prison, and at last led forth to be
 A pander to Philistine revelry,—
 Upon the pillars of the temple laid
 His desperate hands, and in its overthrow Destroyed himself, and with him those who made
 A cruel mockery of his sightless woe; 10
 The poor blind Slave, the scoff and jest of all,
 Expired, and thousands perished in the fall!

There is a poor blind Samson in this land, Shorn of his strength and bound in bonds of steel,
 Who may, in some grim revel, raise his hand,
 And shake the pillars of this Commonweal,
 Till the vast Temple of our liberties
 A shapeless mass of wreck and rubbish lies.

MEZZO CAMMIN

WRITTEN AT BOPARD ON THE RHINE
 AUGUST 25, 1842, JUST BEFORE LEAVING FOR HOME

Suggested by the first line of Dante's Inferno:
Nel mezzo del cammin di nostra vita ("In midway of the road of our life").

HALF of my life is gone, and I have let
 The years slip from me and have not fulfilled
 The aspiration of my youth, to build
 Some tower of song with lofty parapet.
 Not indolence, nor pleasure, nor the fret
 Of restless passions that would not be stilled,
 But sorrow, and a care that almost killed,
 Kept me from what I may accomplish yet;
 Though, halfway up the hill, I see the Past Lying beneath me with its sounds and sights,— 10
 A city in the twilight dim and vast,
 With smoking roofs, soft bells, and gleaming lights,—

And hear above me on the autumnal blast
 The cataract of Death far thundering from the heights.

NUREMBERG

Written in the spring of 1844. Published in Graham's Magazine, June, 1844. Included in the Belfry of Bruges volume, 1845. Longfellow visited Nuremberg, a romantic old city in Bavaria, in 1842, and his poem for American readers emerged from his memories of it. He wrote from the town (Life, I, 436) to Freiligrath, telling of his enthusiasm for the place.

IN the valley of the Pegnitz, where across broad meadow-lands
 Rise the blue Franconian mountains, Nuremberg, the ancient, stands.

Quaint old town of toil and traffic, quaint old town of art and song, Memories haunt thy pointed gables, like the rooks that round them throng:

Memories of the Middle Ages, when the em-perors, rough and bold,
 Had their dwelling in thy castle, time-defying,
 centuries old;

And thy brave and thrifty burghers boasted,
 in their uncouth rhyme,
 That their great imperial city stretched its hand through every clime.

In the courtyard of the castle, bound with many an iron band,
 Stands the mighty linden planted by Queen
 Cunigunde's hand; 10

On the square the oriel window, where in old heroic days
 Sat the poet Melchior singing Kaiser Maximilian's praise.<sup>1</sup>

Everywhere I see around me rise the wondrous world of Art:
 Fountains wrought with richest sculpture
 standing in the common mart;

<sup>1</sup> "Melchior Plinzing was one of the most celebrated German poets of the sixteenth century. The hero of his Teuerdank was the reigning Emperor, Maximilian; and the poem was to the Germans of that day what the Orlando Furioso was to the Italians." [Longfellow's note.]

And above cathedral doorways saints and bishops carved in stone,
By a former age commissioned as apostles to our own.

In the church of sainted Sebald sleeps enshrined his holy dust,<sup>1</sup>
And in bronze the Twelve Apostles guard from age to age their trust;

In the church of sainted Lawrence stands a pix of sculpture rare,<sup>2</sup>
Like the foamy sheaf of fountains, rising through the painted air. 20

Here, when Art was still religion, with a simple, reverent heart,
Lived and labored Albrecht Dürer, the Evangelist of Art;

Hence in silence and in sorrow, toiling still with busy hand,
Like an emigrant he wandered, seeking for the Better Land.

Emigravit is the inscription on the tombstone
where he lies;
Dead he is not, but departed,—for the artist never dies.

Fairer seems the ancient city, and the sunshine seems more fair,
That he once has trod its pavement, that he once has breathed its air!

Through these streets so broad and stately,
these obscure and dismal lanes,
Walked of yore the Mastersingers, chanting rude poetic strains. 30

From remote and sunless suburbs came they
to the friendly guild, Building nests in Fame's great temple, as in spouts the swallows build.

As the weaver plied the shuttle, wove he too
the mystic rhyme,
And the smith his iron measures hammered to the anvil's chime;

Thanking God, whose boundless wisdom makes the flowers of poesy bloom
In the forge's dust and cinders, in the tissues of the loom.

Here Hans Sachs, the cobbler-poet, laurate of the gentle craft, Wisest of the Twelve Wise Masters,<sup>1</sup> in huge folios sang and laughed.

But his house is now an alehouse, with a nicely sanded floor,
And a garland in the window, and his face
above the door; 40

Painted by some humble artist, as in Adam Puschman's song,
As the old man gray and dove-like, with his great beard white and long.

And at night the swart mechanic comes to drown his cark and care, Quaffing ale from pewter tankards, in the master's antique chair.

Vanished is the ancient splendor, and before my dreamy eye
Wave these mingled shapes and figures, like a faded tapestry.

Not thy Councils, not thy Kaisers, win for thee the world's regard;
But thy painter, Albrecht Dürer, and Hans
Sachs thy cobbler bard.

Thus, O Nuremberg, a wanderer from a region far away,
 As he paced thy streets and courtyards, sang in thought his careless lay: 50

Gathering from the pavement's crevice, as a floweret of the soil,
 The nobility of labor,—the long pedigree of toil.

THE DAY IS DONE

Composed as a proem to a volume of selected minor poems (The Waif) assembled and edited by Longfellow in 1845.

THE day is done, and the darkness
 Falls from the wings of Night,
 As a feather is wafted downward
 From an eagle in his flight. 1844

I see the lights of the village
 Gleam through the rain and the mist,
 And a feeling of sadness comes o'er me
 That my soul cannot resist:

A feeling of sadness and longing,
 That is not akin to pain, 10
 And resembles sorrow only
 As the mist resembles the rain.

Come, read to me some poem,
 Some simple and heartfelt lay,
 That shall soothe this restless feeling,
 And banish the thoughts of day.

Not from the grand old masters,
 Not from the bards sublime,
 Whose distant footsteps echo
 Through the corridors of Time. 20

For, like strains of martial music,
 Their mighty thoughts suggest
 Life's endless toil and endeavor;
 And to-night I long for rest.

Read from some humbler poet,
 Whose songs gushed from his heart,
 As showers from the clouds of summer,
 Or tears from the eyelids start;

Who, through long days of labor,
 And nights devoid of ease, 30
 Still heard in his soul the music
 Of wonderful melodies.

Such songs have power to quiet
 The restless pulse of care,
 And come like the benediction
 That follows after prayer.

Then read from the treasured volume
 The poem of thy choice,
 And lend to the rhyme of the poet
 The beauty of thy voice. 40

And the night shall be filled with music,
 And the cares, that infest the day,
 Shall fold their tents, like the Arabs,
 And as silently steal away. 1844

THE ARSENAL AT SPRINGFIELD

Published in Graham's Magazine, April, 1844.
 Reprinted in The Belfry of Bruges and Other Poems (1845). In the summer of 1843, accompanied by his close friend Charles Sumner, Longfellow and his wife visited the United States
 Arsenal at Springfield, Massachusetts. Samuel Longfellow, the biographer of his brother, relates that "While Mr. Sumner was endeavoring to impress upon the attendant that the money expended upon these weapons of war would have been much better spent upon a great library, Mrs. Longfellow pleased her husband by remarking how like an organ looked the ranged and shining gun-barrels which covered the walls from floor to ceiling, and suggesting what mournful music Death would bring from them. 'We grew quite warlike against war,' she wrote, 'and I urged H. to write a peace poem.'" The poem was written some months later.

THIS is the Arsenal. From floor to ceiling,
 Like a huge organ, rise the burnished
 arms;
 But from their silent pipes no anthem
 pealing
 Startles the villages with strange alarms.

Ah! what a sound will rise, how wild and dreary,
 When the death-angel touches those swift keys!

What loud lament and dismal Miserere
Will mingle with their awful symphonies!

I hear even now the infinite fierce chorus,
The cries of agony, the endless groan, 10
Which, through the ages that have gone before us,
In long reverberations reach our own.

On helm and harness rings the Saxon hammer,
Through Cimbric forest roars the Norseman's song,
And loud, amid the universal clamor,
O'er distant deserts sounds the Tartar gong.

I hear the Florentine, who from his palace
Wheels out his battle-bell with dreadful din,
And Aztec priests upon their teocallis<sup>1</sup>
Beat the wild war-drum made of serpent's skin; 20

The tumult of each sacked and burning village;
The shout that every prayer for mercy drowns;
The soldiers' revels in the midst of pillage;
The wail of famine in beleaguered towns;

The bursting shell, the gateway wrenched asunder,
The rattling musketry, the clashing blade;
And ever and anon, in tones of thunder,
The diapason of the cannonade.

Is it, O man, with such discordant noises,
With such accursed instruments as these, 30
Thou drownest Nature's sweet and kindly voices,
And jarrest the celestial harmonies?

Were half the power, that fills the world with terror,
Were half the wealth, bestowed on camps and courts,
Given to redeem the human mind from error,
There were no need of arsenals or forts:

<sup>1</sup> mounds of pyramid shape on which temples were built

The warrior's name would be a name abhorred!

And every nation, that should lift again
Its hand against a brother, on its forehead
Would wear forevermore the curse of Cain! 40

Down the dark future, through long generations,
The echoing sounds grow fainter and then cease;
And like a bell, with solemn, sweet vibrations,
I hear once more the voice of Christ say,
"Peace!"

Peace! and no longer from its brazen portals
The blast of War's great organ shakes the skies!
But beautiful as songs of the immortals,
The holy melodies of love arise.

From THE BELFRY OF BRUGES

CARILLON

Composed in 1842, and included in The Belfry of Bruges volume (1845) as a prelude. An entry in Longfellow's diary for May 30, 1842, notes that he stopped at the Fleur-de-Blé, attracted by the name, and an entry for the next day describes the carillon. In a letter to the German poet, Ferdinand Freiligrath, Longfellow tells of his pleasure in this old city. His interest in bells is shown in many poems in which they figure: "The Bells of Lynn" (1859), "Christmas Bells" (1864), "The Bell of Atri" (1870), "The Chimes" (1879), "The Bells of San Blas" (1882).

In the ancient town of Bruges,
In the quaint old Flemish city,
As the evening shades descended,
Low and loud and sweetly blended,
Low at times and loud at times,
And changing like a poet's rhymes,
Rang the beautiful wild chimes
From the Belfry in the market
Of the ancient town of Bruges.

Then, with deep sonorous clangor 10
Calmly answering their sweet anger,

When the wrangling bells had ended,
 Slowly struck the clock eleven,
 And, from out the silent heaven,
 Silence on the town descended.
 Silence, silence everywhere,
 On the earth and in the air,
 Save the footsteps here and there
 Of some burgher home returning,
 By the street lamps faintly burning, 20
 For a moment woke the echoes
 Of the ancient town of Bruges.

But amid my broken slumbers
 Still I heard those magic numbers,
 As they loud proclaimed the flight
 And stolen marches of the night;
 Till their chimes in sweet collision
 Mingled with each wandering vision,
 Mingled with the fortune-telling
 Gypsy-bands of dreams and fancies, 30
 Which amid the waste expanses
 Of the silent land of trances
 Have their solitary dwelling;
 All else seemed asleep in Bruges,
 In the quaint old Flemish city.

And I thought how like these chimes
 Are the poet's airy rhymes,
 All his rhymes and roundelays,
 His conceits, and songs, and ditties,
 From the belfry of his brain, 4
 Scattered downward, though in vain,
 On the roofs and stones of cities!
 For by night the drowsy ear
 Under its curtains cannot hear,
 And by day men go their ways,
 Hearing the music as they pass,
 But deeming it no more, alas!
 Than the hollow sound of brass.

Yet perchance a sleepless wight,
 Lodging at some humble inn 50
 In the narrow lanes of life,
 When the dusk and hush of night
 Shut out the incessant din
 Of daylight and its toil and strife,
 May listen with a calm delight
 To the poet's melodies,
 Till he hears, or dreams he hears,
 Intermingled with the song,
 Thoughts that he has cherished long;

Hears amid the chime and singing 60
 The bells of his own village ringing,
 And wakes, and finds his slumberous eyes
 Wet with most delicious tears.

Thus dreamed I, as by night I lay
 In Bruges, at the Fleur-de-Blé,<sup>1</sup>
 Listening with a wild delight
 To the chimes that, through the night,
 Rang their changes from the Belfry
 Of that quaint old Flemish city.

SEAWEED

The first four stanzas of this poem have had very high praise. The later stanzas may have appealed to readers of the poet's time, but today the analogy they elaborate seems forced and the expression commonplace.

WHEN descends on the Atlantic
 The gigantic
 Storm-wind of the equinox,
 Landward in his wrath he scourges
 The toiling surges,
 Laden with seaweed from the rocks:

From Bermuda's reefs; from edges
 Of sunken ledges,
 In some far-off, bright Azore;
 From Bahama, and the dashing, 10
 Silver-flashing
 Surges of San Salvador;

From the tumbling surf, that buries
 The Orkneyan skerries,
 Answering the hoarse Hebrides;
 And from wrecks of ships, and drifting
 Spars, uplifting
 On the desolate, rainy seas;—

Ever drifting, drifting, drifting 20
 On the shifting
 Currents of the restless main;
 Till in sheltered coves, and reaches
 Of sandy beaches,
 All have found repose again.

<sup>1</sup> "Flower-of-Grain," the name of an inn

So when storms of wild emotion
 Strike the ocean
 Of the poet's soul, erelong
 From each cave and rocky fastness,
 In its vastness,
 Floats some fragment of a song: 30

From the far-off isles enchanted,
 Heaven has planted
 With the golden fruit of Truth;
 From the flashing surf, whose vision
 Gleams Elysian
 In the tropic clime of Youth;

From the strong Will, and the Endeavor
 That forever
 Wrestle with the tides of Fate;
 From the wreck of Hopes far-scattered, 40
 Tempest-shattered,
 Floating waste and desolate;—

Ever drifting, drifting, drifting
 On the shifting
 Currents of the restless heart;
 Till at length in books recorded,
 They, like hoarded
 Household words, no more depart.

THE OLD CLOCK ON THE STAIRS

An entry in Longfellow's journal for November 12, 1845, reads, "Began a poem on a clock with the words 'forever, never' as the burden; suggested by the words of Bridaine, the old French missionary, who said of eternity, 'It is a clock whose pendulum utters and repeats without ceasing these two words only, in the silence of the tomb—Forever, never! Never, forever!'" Jacques Bridaine, a noted Catholic preacher, lived 1710–1767.

L'éternité est une pendule, dont le balancier dit et reedit sans cesse ces deux mots seulement, dans le silence des tombeaux, "Toujours, jamais! Jamais, toujours!"

JACQUES BRIDAINE

SOMEWHAT back from the village street
 Stands the old-fashioned country-seat.
 Across its antique portico
 Tall poplar-trees their shadows throw,

And from its station in the hall
 An ancient timepiece says to all,—
 "Forever—never!
 Never—forever!"

Half-way up the stairs it stands,
 And points and beckons with its hands 10
 From its case of massive oak,
 Like a monk, who, under his cloak,
 Crosses himself, and sighs, alas!
 With sorrowful voice to all who pass,—
 "Forever—never!
 Never—forever!"

By day its voice is low and light;
 But in the silent dead of night,
 Distinct as a passing footstep's fall
 It echoes along the vacant hall, 20
 Along the ceiling, along the floor,
 And seems to say, at each chamber-door,—
 "Forever—never!
 Never—forever!"

Through days of sorrow and of mirth,
 Through days of death and days of birth,
 Through every swift vicissitude
 Of changeful time, unchanged it has stood,
 And as if, like God, it all things saw,
 It calmly repeats those words of awe,— 30
 "Forever—never!
 Never—forever!"

In that mansion used to be Free-hearted Hospitality;
 His great fires up the chimney roared;
 The stranger feasted at his board;
 But, like the skeleton at the feast,
 That warning timepiece never ceased,—
 "Forever—never!
 Never—forever!" 40

There groups of merry children played,
 There youths and maidens dreaming strayed.
 O precious hours! O golden prime,
 And affluence of love and time!
 Even as a miser counts his gold,
 Those hours the ancient timepiece told,—
 "Forever—never!
 Never—forever!"

From that chamber, clothed in white,
 The bride came forth on her wedding night;
 There, in that silent room below, 51
 The dead lay in his shroud of snow;
 And in the hush that followed the prayer,
 Was heard the old clock on the stair,—
 "Forever—never!
 Never—forever!"

All are scattered now and fled,
 Some are married, some are dead;
 And when I ask, with throbs of pain,
 "Ah! when shall they all meet again?" 60
 As in the days long since gone by,
 The ancient timepiece makes reply,—
 "Forever—never!
 Never—forever!"

Never here, forever there,
 Where all parting, pain, and care,
 And death, and time, shall disappear,—
 Forever there, but never here!
 The horologe of Eternity
 Sayeth this incessantly,— 70
 "Forever—never!
 Never—forever!"

THE BRIDGE

First entitled "The Bridge over the Charles River." The Charles River runs between Boston and Cambridge. Published in The Belfry of Bruges volume. Longfellow wrote in a journal entry for March 15, 1838, that when walking from Boston to Cambridge "I always stop on the bridge; tide-waters are beautiful. From the ocean up into the land they go, like messengers, to ask why tribute has not been paid."

I STOOD on the bridge at midnight,
 As the clocks were striking the hour,
 And the moon rose o'er the city,
 Behind the dark church-tower.

I saw her bright reflection
 In the waters under me,
 Like a golden goblet falling
 And sinking into the sea.

And far in the hazy distance
 Of that lovely night in June, 10
 The blaze of the flaming furnace
 Gleamed redder than the moon.

Among the long, black rafters
 The wavering shadows lay,
 And the current that came from the ocean
 Seemed to lift and bear them away;
 As, sweeping and eddying through them,
 Rose the belated tide,
 And, streaming into the moonlight,
 The seaweed floated wide. 20

And like those waters rushing
 Among the wooden piers,
 A flood of thoughts came o'er me
 That filled my eyes with tears.
 How often, oh how often,
 In the days that had gone by,
 I had stood on that bridge at midnight
 And gazed on that wave and sky!

How often, oh how often,
 I had wished that the ebbing tide 30
 Would bear me away on its bosom
 O'er the ocean wild and wide!

For my heart was hot and restless,
 And my life was full of care,
 And the burden laid upon me
 Seemed greater than I could bear.

But now it has fallen from me,
 It is buried in the sea;
 And only the sorrow of others
 Throws its shadow over me. 40

Yet whenever I cross the river
 On its bridge with wooden piers,
 Like the odor of brine from the ocean
 Comes the thought of other years.

And I think how many thousands
 Of care-encumbered men,
 Each bearing his burden of sorrow,
 Have crossed the bridge since then.

I see the long procession
 Still passing to and fro, 50
 The young heart hot and restless,
 And the old subdued and slow!

And forever and forever,
 As long as the river flows,
 As long as the heart has passions,
 As long as life has woes;

The moon and its broken reflection
 And its shadows shall appear,
 As the symbol of love in heaven,
 And its wavering image here. 60

KING WITLAF'S DRINKING-HORN

Written September 30, 1848. Longfellow quoted in his diary the part of the charter granted by King Witlaf (Wichtlaf) of Mercia to the Abbey of Croyland relating to his drinking horn, cited in Maitland's The Dark Ages (1844): "I also offer to the refectory at Croyland the horn of my table, that the elders of the monastery may drink out of it on the festivals of the Saints, and may sometimes amid their benedictions remember the soul of the donor, Witlaf."

WITLAF, a king of the Saxons,
 Ere yet his last he breathed,
 To the merry monks of Croyland
 His drinking-horn bequeathed,—

That, whenever they sat at their revels
 And drank from the golden bowl,
 They might remember the donor,
 And breathe a prayer for his soul.

So sat they once at Christmas,
 And bade the goblet pass; 10
 In their beards the red wine glistened
 Like dewdrops in the grass.

They drank to the soul of Witlaf,
 They drank to Christ the Lord,
 And to each of the Twelve Apostles,
 Who had preached his holy word.

They drank to the Saints and Martyrs
 Of the dismal days of yore,
 And as soon as the horn was empty
 They remembered one Saint more. 20

And the reader droned from the pulpit,
 Like the murmur of many bees,
 The legend of good Saint Guthlac,
 And Saint Basil's homilies;

Till the great bells of the convent,
 From their prison in the tower,
 Guthlac and Bartholomaeus,
 Proclaimed the midnight hour.

And the Yule-log cracked in the chimney,
 And the Abbot bowed his head, 30
 And the flamelets flapped and flickered,
 But the Abbot was stark and dead.

Yet still in his pallid fingers
 He clutched the golden bowl,
 In which, like a pearl dissolving,
 Had sunk and dissolved his soul.

But not for this their revels
 The jovial monks forbore,
 For they cried, "Fill high the goblet!
 We must drink to one Saint more!" 40

RESIGNATION

THERE is no flock, however watched and tended,
 But one dead lamb is there!
 There is no fireside, howso'er defended,
 But has one vacant chair!

The air is full of farewells to the dying,
 And mournings for the dead;
 The heart of Rachel for her children crying,<sup>1</sup>
 Will not be comforted!

Let us be patient! These severe afflictions
 Not from the ground arise, 10
 But oftentimes celestial benedictions
 Assume this dark disguise.

We see but dimly through the mists and vapors;
 Amid these earthly damps
 What seem to us but sad, funereal tapers
 May be heaven's distant lamps.

There is no Death! What seems so is transition;
 This life of mortal breath
 Is but a suburb of the life elysian,<sup>2</sup>
 Whose portal we call Death. 20

She is not dead,—the child of our affection,—
 But gone unto that school
 Where she no longer needs our poor protection,
 And Christ himself doth rule.

<sup>1</sup> Jeremiah 31:15    <sup>2</sup> pertaining to Elysium, the dwelling place, in classic myth, of happy souls after death

In that great cloister's stillness and seclusion,
 By guardian angels led,
 Safe from temptation, safe from sin's pollution,
 She lives, whom we call dead.

Day after day we think what she is doing
 In those bright realms of air; 30
 Year after year, her tender steps pursuing,
 Behold her grown more fair.

Thus do we walk with her, and keep unbroken
 The bond which nature gives,
 Thinking that our remembrance, though unspoken,
 May reach her where she lives.

Not as a child shall we again behold her;
 For when with raptures wild
 In our embraces we again enfold her,
 She will not be a child; 40

But a fair maiden, in her Father's mansion,<sup>1</sup>
 Clothed with celestial grace;
 And beautiful with all the soul's expansion
 Shall we behold her face.

And though at times impetuous with emotion
 And anguish long suppressed,
 The swelling heart heaves moaning like the ocean,
 That cannot be at rest,—

We will be patient, and assuage the feeling
 We may not wholly stay; 50
 By silence sanctifying, not concealing,
 The grief that must have way.

From EVANGELINE

A TALE OF ACADIE

Written 1845-47; published October 30, 1847.
 Many think the poem Longfellow's masterpiece.
 The story it develops was told at the poet's dinner table by the Reverend H. L. Conolly of Boston, who had it in turn from a French Canadian.
 Conolly offered it to Hawthorne. When the latter did not adopt it for a tale, Longfellow asked if he might not have it for a poem. Many criticized the verse form of the narrative, an American experiment in hexameter, as unlike the Greek; but it proved to be a popular and successful venture.

 Longfellow's chief source for the setting and events of the first part was T. C. Haliburton's An Historical and Statistical Account of Nova Scotia
 (1829), which in turn relied heavily upon the Abbé Raynal's biased account, from the French side, of the deportation. Acadie, called Nova Scotia after 1621, was colonized in 1604 and ceded to Britain in 1713 by the treaty of Utrecht, and the cession was later confirmed by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle. Yet the settlement remained the seat of plots and raids by the French and the Indians. History somewhat vindicates the British.
 The inhabitants had the choice of taking an oath of allegiance or of expatriation. The embarkation of 1755 was not a wild scramble but really occupied two weeks. The British commander tried hard to carry out his painful task humanely, especially to place members of the same family on the same transport. Some 6000 French inhabitants were deported.

Longfellow never visited Nova Scotia or the Mississippi or Louisiana. For his scenes and descriptions he relied on Banvard's diorama of the Mississippi, which he saw in Boston, December 17 and 19, 1846, and on such guidebooks as Darby's Guide to Louisiana and Watson's Annals of Philadelphia. His chief literary model for the poem, in general character and form, was Goethe's
Hermann und Dorothea (1798), a story of expulsion and wandering told in hexameter lines.

THIS is the forest primeval. The murmuring pines and the hemlocks,
 Bearded with moss, and in garments green,
 indistinct in the twilight,
 Stand like Druids of eld, with voices sad and prophetic,
 Stand like harpers hoar, with beards that rest
 on their bosoms.
 Loud from its rocky caverns, the deep-voiced neighboring ocean Speaks, and in accents disconsolate answers
 the wail of the forest.

This is the forest primeval; but where are the hearts that beneath it Leaped like the roe, when he hears in the woodland the voice of the huntsman?
 Where is the thatch-roofed village, the home of Acadian farmers,—

Men whose lives glided on like rivers that water the woodlands, 10
 Darkened by shadows of earth, but reflecting an image of heaven?
 Waste are those pleasant farms, and the farmers forever departed!
 Scattered like dust and leaves, when the mighty blasts of October Seize them, and whirl them aloft, and sprinkle them far o'er the ocean.
 Naught but tradition remains of the beautiful village of Grand-Pré.

Ye who believe in affection that hopes, and endures, and is patient,
 Ye who believe in the beauty and strength of woman's devotion,
 List to the mournful tradition, still sung by the pines of the forest;
 List to a Tale of Love in Acadie, home of the happy.

PART THE FIRST

I

In the Acadian land, on the shores of the Basin of Minas, 20
 Distant, secluded, still, the little village of Grand-Pré
 Lay in the fruitful valley. Vast meadows stretched to the eastward, Giving the village its name, and pasture to flocks without number.
 Dikes, that the hands of the farmers had raised with labor incessant,
 Shut out the turbulent tides; but at stated seasons the flood-gates Opened, and welcomed the sea to wander at will o'er the meadows.
 West and south there were fields of flax, and orchards and cornfields
 Spreading afar and unfenced o'er the plain;
 and away to the northward
 Blomidon rose, and the forests old, and aloft on the mountains
 Sea-fogs pitched their tents, and mists from the mighty Atlantic 30 Looked on the happy valley, but ne'er from their station descended.
 There, in the midst of its farms, reposed the Acadian village.

Strongly built were the houses, with frames
 of oak and of hemlock,
 Such as the peasants of Normandy built in the reign of the Henries.
 Thatched were the roofs, with dormer-windows; and gables projecting Over the basement below protected and shaded the doorway.
 There in the tranquil evenings of summer,
 when brightly the sunset Lighted the village street, and gilded the vanes on the chimneys,
 Matrons and maidens sat in snow-white caps
 and in kirtles
 Scarlet and blue and green, with distaffs spinning the golden 40
 Flax for the gossiping looms, whose noisy shuttles within doors
 Mingled their sound with the whirl of the wheels and the songs of the maidens.
 Solemnly down the street came the parish priest, and the children Paused in their play to kiss the hand he extended to bless them.
 Reverend walked he among them; and up
 rose matrons and maidens, Hailing his slow approach with words of affectionate welcome.
 Then came the laborers home from the field,
 and serenely the sun sank Down to his rest, and twilight prevailed. Anon
 from the belfry
 Softly the Angelus sounded, and over the roofs of the village Columns of pale blue smoke, like clouds of incense ascending, 50
 Rose from a hundred hearths, the homes of peace and contentment.
 Thus dwelt together in love these simple
 Acadian farmers,— Dwelt in the love of God and of man. Alike were they free from Fear, that reigns with the tyrant, and envy,
 the vice of republics.
 Neither locks had they to their doors, nor bars to their windows;
 But their dwellings were open as day and the hearts of the owners;
 There the richest was poor, and the poorest lived in abundance.

Somewhat apart from the village, and nearer the Basin of Minas, Benedict Bellefontaine, the wealthiest farmer of Grand-Pré,
 Dwelt on his goodly acres; and with him,
 directing his household, 60 Gentle Evangeline lived, his child, and the pride of the village.
 Stalwart and stately in form was the man of seventy winters;
 Hearty and hale was he, an oak that is covered with snow-flakes;
 White as the snow were his locks, and his cheeks as brown as the oak-leaves.
 Fair was she to behold, that maiden of seventeen summers;
 Black were her eyes as the berry that grows on the thorn by the wayside,
 Black, yet how softly they gleamed beneath the brown shade of her tresses!
 Sweet was her breath as the breath of kine that feed in the meadows.
 When in the harvest heat she bore to the reapers at noontide
 Flagons of home-brewed ale, ah! fair in sooth was the maiden. 70
 Fairer was she when on Sunday morn, while the bell from its turret Sprinkled with holy sounds the air, as the priest with his hyssop
 Sprinkles the congregation, and scatters blessings upon them,
 Down the long street she passed, with her chaplet of beads and her missal, Wearing her Norman cap and her kirtle of blue, and the earrings Brought in the olden time from France, and since, as an heirloom, Handed down from mother to child, through long generations.
 But a celestial brightness—a more ethereal beauty—
 Shone on her face and encircled her form,
 when, after confession,
 Homeward serenely she walked with God's benediction upon her. 80
 When she had passed, it seemed like the ceasing of exquisite music.

Firmly builded with rafters of oak, the house of the farmer

Stood on the side of a hill commanding the sea; and a shady
 Sycamore grew by the door, with a woodbine wreathing around it.
 Rudely carved was the porch, with seats
 beneath; and a footpath
 Led through an orchard wide, and disappeared in the meadow.
 Under the sycamore-tree were hives overhung by a penthouse,
 Such as the traveler sees in regions remote by the roadside,
 Built o'er a box for the poor, or the blessed image of Mary.
 Farther down, on the slope of the hill, was the well with its moss-grown 90
 Bucket, fastened with iron, and near it a trough for the horses.
 Shielding the house from storms, on the north, were the barns and the farmyard.
 There stood the broad-wheeled wains and the antique plows and the harrows;
 There were the folds for the sheep; and there,
 in his feathered seraglio,
 Strutted the lordly turkey, and crowed the cock, with the selfsame Voice that in ages of old had startled the penitent Peter.<sup>1</sup> Bursting with hay were the barns, themselves a village. In each one Far o'er the gable projected a roof of thatch;
 and a staircase,
 Under the sheltering eaves, led up to the odorous corn-loft.
 There too the dove-cot stood, with its meek and innocent inmates 100
 Murmuring ever of love; while above in the variant breezes Numberless noisy weathercocks rattled and sang of mutation.

Thus, at peace with God and the world,
 the farmer of Grand-Pré Lived on his sunny farm, and Evangeline governed his household.
 Many a youth, as he knelt in the church and opened his missal,
 Fixed his eyes upon her as the saint of his deepest devotion;

<sup>1</sup> Matthew 26:74-75

Happy was he who might touch her hand or the hem of her garment!
 Many a suitor came to her door, by the darkness befriended,
 And, as he knocked and waited to hear the sound of her footsteps,
 Knew not which beat the louder, his heart or the knocker of iron; 110
 Or, at the joyous feast of the Patron Saint of the village,
 Bolder grew, and pressed her hand in the dance as he whispered Hurried words of love, that seemed a part of the music.
 But among all who came young Gabriel only was welcome;
 Gabriel Lajeunesse, the son of Basil the blacksmith,
 Who was a mighty man in the village, and honored of all men;
 For, since the birth of time, throughout all ages and nations,
 Has the craft of the smith been held in repute
 by the people.
 Basil was Benedict's friend. Their children from earliest childhood
 Grew up together as brother and sister; and Father Felician, 120
 Priest and pedagogue both in the village, had taught them their letters
 Out of the selfsame book, with the hymns of the church and the plain-song.
 But when the hymn was sung, and the daily
 lesson completed,
 Swiftly they hurried away to the forge of
 Basil the blacksmith.
 There at the door they stood, with wondering eyes to behold him
 Take in his leathern lap the hoof of the horse
 as a plaything,
 Nailing the shoe in its place; while near him
 the tire of the cart-wheel
 Lay like a fiery snake, coiled round in a circle of cinders.
 Oft on autumnal eves, when without in the gathering darkness
 Bursting with light seemed the smithy, through every cranny and crevice, 130
 Warm by the forge within they watched the laboring bellows,

And as its panting ceased, and the sparks expired in the ashes,
 Merrily laughed, and said they were nuns going into the chapel.
 Oft on sledges in winter, as swift as the swoop
 of the eagle,
 Down the hillside bounding, they glided away o'er the meadow.
 Oft in the barns they climbed to the populous nests on the rafters,
 Seeking with eager eyes that wondrous stone,
 which the swallow
 Brings from the shore of the sea to restore the sight of its fledglings;<sup>1</sup> Lucky was he who found that stone in the nest of the swallow!
 Thus passed a few swift years, and they no longer were children. 140
 He was a valiant youth, and his face, like the face of the morning,
 Gladdened the earth with its light, and ripened thought into action.
 She was a woman now, with the heart and hopes of a woman.
 "Sunshine of Saint Eulalie,"<sup>2</sup> was she called;
 for that was the sunshine
 Which, as the farmers believed, would load their orchards with apples;
 She too would bring to her husband's house
 delight and abundance, Filling it with love and the ruddy faces of children.

II

Now had the season returned, when the nights grow colder and longer,
 And the retreating sun the sign of the Scorpion enters.
 Birds of passage sailed through the leaden air,
 from the ice-bound, 150

<sup>1</sup> French folklore belief that if the eyes of a fledgling swallow be put out the mother bird will bring from the seashore a little stone that will restore the sight. When found in the swallow's nest such stones were supposed to work wonderful cures. Longfellow had his French folklore from the citations from Pluquet's Contes Populaires included in Thomas Wright's Essays on Subjects Connected with the Literature, Popular Superstitions, and History of England in the Middle Ages (1846). <sup>2</sup> an allusion to the folk-saying that if the sun shone on Saint Eulalie's Day (February 12) there would be apples and cider in abundance

Desolate northern bays to the shores of tropical islands.
Harvests were gathered in; and wild with the winds of September Wrestled the trees of the forest, as Jacob of old with the angel.<sup>1</sup>
All the signs foretold a winter long and inclement.
Bees, with prophetic instinct of want, had hoarded their honey
Till the hives overflowed; and the Indian hunters asserted
Cold would the winter be, for thick was the fur of the foxes.
Such was the advent of autumn. Then followed that beautiful season,
Called by the pious Acadian peasants the Summer of All-Saints!
Filled was the air with a dreamy and magical light; and the landscape 160
Lay as if new-created in all the freshness of childhood.
Peace seemed to reign upon earth, and the restless heart of the ocean
Was for a moment consoled. All sounds were in harmony blended.
Voices of children at play, the crowing of
cocks in the farm-yards,
Whir of wings in the drowsy air, and the cooing of pigeons,
All were subdued and low as the murmurs of love, and the great sun Looked with the eye of love through the golden vapors around him;
While arrayed in its robes of russet and scarlet and yellow,
Bright with the sheen of the dew, each glittering tree of the forest
Flashed like the plane-tree the Persian adorned with mantles and jewels.<sup>2</sup> 170

Now recommenced the reign of rest and affection and stillness.
Day with its burden and heat had departed,
and twilight descending
Brought back the evening star to the sky, and the herds to the homestead.

Pawing the ground they came, and resting their necks on each other,
And with their nostrils distended inhaling the freshness of evening.
Foremost, bearing the bell, Evangeline's beautiful heifer,
Proud of her snow-white hide, and the ribbon
that waved from her collar, Quietly paced and slow, as if conscious of human affection.
Then came the shepherd back with his bleat-ing flocks from the seaside,
Where was their favorite pasture. Behind them followed the watchdog, 180 Patient, full of importance, and grand in the pride of his instinct,
Walking from side to side with a lordly air,
and superbly
Waving his bushy tail, and urging forward
the stragglers;
Regent of flocks was he when the shepherd
slept; their protector,
When from the forest at night, through the starry silence, the wolves howled.
Late, with the rising moon, returned the wains from the marshes,
Laden with briny hay, that filled the air with its odor.
Cheerily neighed the steeds, with dew on their manes and their fetlocks,
While aloft on their shoulders the wooden and ponderous saddles,
Painted with brilliant dyes, and adorned with tassels of crimson, 190
Nodded in bright array, like hollyhocks
heavy with blossoms.
Patiently stood the cows meanwhile, and yielded their udders Unto the milkmaid's hand; whilst loud and in regular cadence
Into the sounding pails the foaming stream-lets descended.
Lowling of cattle and peals of laughter were heard in the farmyard, Echoed back by the barns. Anon they sank into stillness;
Heavily closed, with a jarring sound, the valves of the barn-doors,
Rattled the wooden bars, and all for a season was silent.

In-doors, warm by the wide-mouthed fireplace, idly the farmer
 Sat in his elbow-chair, and watched how the flames and the smoke-wreaths 200 Struggled together like foes in a burning city. Behind him,
 Nodding and mocking along the wall, with gestures fantastic,
 Darted his own huge shadow, and vanished away into darkness.
 Faces, clumsily carved in oak, on the back of his arm-chair
 Laughed in the flickering light, and the pewter plates on the dresser Caught and reflected the flame, as shields of armies the sunshine.
 Fragments of song the old man sang, and carols of Christmas,
 Such as at home, in the olden time, his fathers before him
 Sang in their Norman orchards and bright Burgundian vineyards.
 Close at her father's side was the gentle
 Evangeline seated, 210
 Spinning flax for the loom that stood in the corner behind her.
 Silent awhile were its treadles, at rest was its diligent shuttle,
 While the monotonous drone of the wheel,
 like the drone of a bagpipe,
 Followed the old man's song, and united the fragments together.
 As in a church, when the chant of the choir
 at intervals ceases, Footfalls are heard in the aisles, or words of the priest at the altar,
 So, in each pause of the song, with measured motion the clock clicked.

Thus as they sat, there were footsteps heard,
 and, suddenly lifted,
 Sounded the wooden latch, and the door
 swung back on its hinges.
 Benedict knew by the hobnailed shoes it was
 Basil the blacksmith, 220
 And by her beating heart Evangeline knew who was with him.
 "Welcome!" the farmer exclaimed, as their footsteps paused on the threshold,
 "Welcome, Basil, my friend! Come, take thy place on the settle

Close by the chimney-side, which is always empty without thee;
 Take from the shelf overhead thy pipe and the box of tobacco;
 Never so much thyself art thou as when,
 through the curling Smoke of the pipe or the forge, thy friendly and jovial face gleams
 Round and red as the harvest moon through the mist of the marshes."
 Then, with a smile of content, thus answered
 Basil the blacksmith,
 Taking with easy air the accustomed seat
 by the fireside:— 230
 "Benedict Bellefontaine, thou hast ever thy jest and thy ballad!
 Ever in cheerfullest mood art thou, when others are filled with Gloomy forebodings of ill, and see only ruin before them.
 Happy art thou, as if every day thou hadst picked up a horseshoe."
 Pausing a moment, to take the pipe that Evangeline brought him,
 And with a coal from the embers had lighted,
 he slowly continued:—
 "Four days now are passed since the English ships at their anchors Ride in the Gaspereau's mouth, with their cannon pointed against us.
 What their design may be is unknown; but all are commanded
 On the morrow to meet in the church, where his Majesty's mandate 240
 Will be proclaimed as law in the land. Alas!
 in the mean time
 Many surmises of evil alarm the hearts of the people."
 Then made answer the farmer:—"Perhaps some friendlier purpose Brings these ships to our shores. Perhaps the harvests in England
 By untimely rains or untimelier heat have been blighted,
 And from our bursting barns they would feed their cattle and children."
 "Not so thinketh the folk in the village," said
 warmly the blacksmith,
 Shaking his head as in doubt; then, heaving a sigh, he continued:—

"Louisburg is not forgotten, nor Beau Séjour, nor Port Royal.
 Many already have fled to the forest, and lurk
 on its outskirts, 250
 Waiting with anxious hearts the dubious fate of tomorrow.
 Arms have been taken from us, and warlike weapons of all kinds;
 Nothing is left but the blacksmith's sledge and the scythe of the mower."
 Then with a pleasant smile made answer the jovial farmer:—
 "Safer are we unarmed, in the midst of our flocks and our cornfields, Safer within these peaceful dikes besieged by the ocean,
 Than our fathers in forts, besieged by the enemy's cannon.
 Fear no evil, my friend, and tonight may no shadow of sorrow
 Fall on this house and hearth; for this is the night of the contract.
 Built are the house and the barn. The merry lads of the village 260
 Strongly have built them and well; and, breaking the glebe round about them,
 Filled the barn with hay, and the house with food for a twelvemonth.
 René Leblanc will be here anon, with his papers and inkhorn.
 Shall we not then be glad, and rejoice in the joy of our children?"
 As apart by the window she stood, with her hand in her lover's,
 Blushing Evangeline heard the words that her father had spoken,
 And, as they died on his lips, the worthy notary entered.

III

Bent like a laboring oar, that toils in the surf of the ocean,
 Bent, but not broken, by age was the form of
 the notary public;
 Shocks of yellow hair, like the silken floss of the maize, hung 270
 Over his shoulders; his forehead was high;
 and glasses with horn bows
 Sat astride on his nose, with a look of wisdom supernal.

Father of twenty children was he, and more than a hundred
 Children's children rode on his knee, and heard his great watch tick.
 Four long years in the times of the war had he languished a captive, Suffering much in an old French fort as the friend of the English.
 Now, though warier grown, without all guile or suspicion,
 Ripe in wisdom was he, but patient, and simple, and childlike.
 He was beloved by all, and most of all by the children;
 For he told them tales of the Loup-garou in the forest, 280
 And of the goblin that came in the night to water the horses,
 And of the white Létiche, the ghost of a child who unchristened
 Died, and was doomed to haunt unseen the chambers of children;
 And how on Christmas eve the oxen talked in the stable,
 And how the fever was cured by a spider shut up in a nutshell,
 And of the marvelous powers of four-leaved clover and horseshoes,
 With whatsoever else was writ in the lore of
 the village.
 Then up rose from his seat by the fireside
 Basil the blacksmith,
 Knocked from his pipe the ashes, and slowly
 extending his right hand,
 "Father Leblanc," he exclaimed, "thou hast heard the talk in the village, 290
 And, perchance, canst tell us some news of these ships and their errand."
 Then with modest demeanor made answer the notary public,—
 "Gossip enough have I heard, in sooth, yet am never the wiser;
 And what their errand may be I know not better than others.
 Yet am I not of those who imagine some evil intention Brings them here, for we are at peace; and why then molest us?"
 "God's name!" shouted the hasty and somewhat irascible blacksmith;

"Must we in all things look for the how, and the why, and the wherefore?
 Daily injustice is done, and might is the right of the strongest!"
 But, without heeding his warmth, continued
 the notary public,— 300
 "Man is unjust, but God is just; and finally justice
 Triumphs; and well I remember a story that often consoled me,
 When as a captive I lay in the old French fort at Port Royal."
 This was the old man's favorite tale, and he loved to repeat it
 When his neighbors complained that any injustice was done them.
 "Once in an ancient city, whose name I no longer remember,
 Raised aloft on a column, a brazen statue of Justice
 Stood in the public square, upholding the scales in its left hand,
 And in its right a sword, as an emblem that justice presided
 Over the laws of the land, and the hearts and homes of the people. 310
 Even the birds had built their nests in the scales of the balance,
 Having no fear of the sword that flashed in the sunshine above them.
 But in the course of time the laws of the land
 were corrupted;
 Might took the place of right, and the weak were oppressed, and the mighty Ruled with an iron rod. Then it chanced in a nobleman's palace
 That a necklace of pearls was lost, and ere long a suspicion
 Fell on an orphan girl who lived as maid in the household.
 She, after form of trial condemned to die on the scaffold,
 Patiently met her doom at the foot of the statue of Justice.
 As to her Father in heaven her innocent spirit ascended, 320
 Lol o'er the city a tempest rose; and the bolts of the thunder
 Smote the statue of bronze, and hurled in wrath from its left hand

Down on the pavement below the clattering
 scales of the balance,
 And in the hollow thereof was found the nest
 of a magpie,
 Into whose clay-built walls the necklace of pearls was inwoven."
 Silenced, but not convinced, when the story was ended, the blacksmith Stood like a man who fain would speak, but findeth no language;
 All his thoughts were congealed into lines on his face, as the vapors
 Freeze in fantastic shapes on the window-panes in the winter.

Then Evangeline lighted the brazen lamp
 on the table, 330
 Filled, till it overflowed, the pewter tankard with home-brewed
 Nut-brown ale, that was famed for its strength in the village of Grand-Pré; While from his pocket the notary drew his
 papers and inkhorn,
 Wrote with a steady hand the date and the age of the parties,
 Naming the dower of the bride in flocks of sheep and in cattle.
 Orderly all things proceeded, and duly and well were completed,
 And the great seal of the law was set like a sun
 on the margin.
 Then from his leathern pouch the farmer threw
 on the table
 Three times the old man's fee in solid pieces of silver;
 And the notary rising, and blessing the bride and the bridegroom, 340
 Lifted aloft the tankard of ale and drank to their welfare.
 Wiping the foam from his lip, he solemnly bowed and departed,
 While in silence the others sat and mused by the fireside,
 Till Evangeline brought the draught-board
 out of its corner.
 Soon was the game begun. In friendly contention the old men
 Laughed at each lucky hit, or unsuccessful maneuver,
 Laughed when a man was crowned, or a breach was made in the king-row.

Meanwhile apart, in the twilight gloom of a window's embrasure,
 Sat the lovers and whispered together, beholding the moon rise
 Over the pallid sea and the silvery mist of the meadows. 350
 Silently one by one, in the infinite meadows of heaven,
 Blossomed the lovely stars, the forget-me-nots of the angels.

Thus was the evening passed. Anon the bell
 from the belfry
 Rang out the hour of nine, the village curfew, and straightway
 Rose the guests and departed; and silence reigned in the household.
 Many a farewell word and sweet good-night on the doorstep
 Lingered long in Evangeline's heart, and filled
 it with gladness.
 Carefully then were covered the embers that glowed on the hearthstone,
 And on the oaken stairs resounded the tread of the farmer.
 Soon with a soundless step the foot of Evangeline followed. 360
 Up the staircase moved a luminous space in the darkness,
 Lighted less by the lamp than the shining face of the maiden.
 Silent she passed the hall, and entered the door
 of her chamber.
 Simple that chamber was, with its curtains of white, and its clothespress
 Ample and high, on whose spacious shelves were carefully folded Linen and woollen stuffs, by the hand of Evangeline woven.
 This was the precious dower she would bring to her husband in marriage, Better than flocks and herds, being proofs of her skill as a housewife.
 Soon she extinguished her lamp, for the mellow and radiant moonlight
 Streamed through the windows, and lighted
 the room, till the heart of the maiden Swelled and obeyed its power, like the tremulous tides of the ocean. 371
 Ah! she was fair, exceeding fair to behold, as she stood with

Naked snow-white feet on the gleaming floor
 of her chamber!
 Little she dreamed that below, among the trees of the orchard,
 Waited her lover and watched for the gleam of her lamp, and her shadow.
 Yet were her thoughts of him, and at times a feeling of sadness
 Passed o'er her soul, as the sailing shade of clouds in the moonlight
 Flitted across the floor and darkened the room for a moment.
 And, as she gazed from the window, she saw serenely the moon pass Forth from the folds of a cloud, and one star follow her footsteps, 380
 As out of Abraham's tent young Ishmael wandered with Hagar!<sup>1</sup>

THE BUILDING OF THE SHIP

Composed June–September, 1840, twelve years before the Civil War; published as the leading poem in the Seaside and Fireside volume, 1849.
 Although it is a thoroughly American poem in content, it owes much in pattern and handling to Schiller's Das Lied von der Glocke (1799), in which the poet follows with technical details the casting of the bell and the hanging of it in a tower, and so treats it that it becomes a symbol of humanity.
 Longfellow's technical interest in shipbuilding came no doubt from his boyhood in Portland.
 The poem had no little influence in arousing support of the Union. The conclusion that Longfellow substituted for the originally weaker ending was recited and quoted far and wide. Longfellow records, February 12, 1850, hearing the famous actress Fanny Kemble read the poem "before the Mercantile Library Association, to an audience of more than three thousand . . . standing out upon the platform, book in hand, trembling, palpitating, and weeping, and giving every word its true weight and emphasis." Noah Brooks tells (in Scribner's Monthly, August, 1879) of reading the poem to President Lincoln. "He did not speak for some minutes, but finally said, 'It is a wonderful gift to be able to stir men like that.'"

"BUILD me straight, O worthy Master!
 Stanch and strong, a goodly vessel,
 That shall laugh at all disaster,
 And with wave and whirlwind wrestle!"

<sup>1</sup> Genesis 21:14-22

The merchant's word
 Delighted the Master heard;
 For his heart was in his work, and the heart
 Giveth grace unto every Art.
 A quiet smile played round his lips,
 As the eddies and dimples of the tide 10
 Play round the bows of ships
 That steadily at anchor ride.
 And with a voice that was full of glee,
 He answered, "Erelong we will launch
 A vessel as goodly, and strong, and stanch,
 As ever weathered a wintry sea!"
 And first with nicest skill and art,
 Perfect and finished in every part,
 A little model the Master wrought,
 Which should be to the larger plan 20
 What the child is to the man,
 Its counterpart in miniature;
 That with a hand more swift and sure
 The greater labor might be brought To answer to his inward thought.
 And as he labored, his mind ran o'er
 The various ships that were built of yore,
 And above them all, and strangest of all
 Towered the Great Harry,<sup>1</sup> crank and tall, 30
 Whose picture was hanging on the wall,
 With bows and stern raised high in air,
 And balconies hanging here and there,
 And signal lanterns and flags afloat,
 And eight round towers, like those that frown
 From some old castle, looking down
 Upon the drawbridge and the moat.
 And he said with a smile, "Our ship, I wis, Shall be of another form than this!"
 It was of another form, indeed;
 Built for freight, and yet for speed, 40
 A beautiful and gallant craft;
 Broad in the beam, that the stress of the blast,
 Pressing down upon sail and mast,
 Might not the sharp bows overwhelm;
 Broad in the beam, but sloping aft
 With graceful curve and slow degrees,
 That she might be docile to the helm,
 And that the currents of parted seas,

<sup>1</sup> A famous three-masted, two-decked warship ordered for the English navy by Henry VII in 1488, but not completed until 1509 at the beginning of the reign of Henry VIII. The word "crank" as applied to a ship usually means top-heavy, or easily inclined by the force of wind or wave, but Longfellow may use the word in its archaic sense of sturdy or vigorous.

Closing behind, with mighty force,
 Might aid and not impede her course. 50

In the shipyard stood the Master,
 With the model of the vessel,
 That should laugh at all disaster,
 And with wave and whirlwind wrestle!

Covering many a rood of ground,
 Lay the timber piled around;
 Timber of chestnut, and elm, and oak,
 And scattered here and there, with these,
 The knarred and crooked cedar knees;
 Brought from regions far away, 60
 From Pascagoula's sunny bay,
 And the banks of the roaring Roanoke!
 Ah! what a wondrous thing it is
 To note how many wheels of toil
 One thought, one word, can set in motion!
 There's not a ship that sails the ocean,
 But every climate, every soil,
 Must bring its tribute, great or small,
 And help to build the wooden wall!<sup>1</sup>

The sun was rising o'er the sea, 70
 And long the level shadows lay,
 As if they, too, the beams would be
 Of some great, airy argosy,
 Framed and launched in a single day.
 That silent architect, the sun,
 Had hewn and laid them every one,
 Ere the work of man was yet begun.
 Beside the Master, when he spoke,
 A youth, against an anchor leaning,
 Listened, to catch his slightest meaning, 80
 Only the long waves, as they broke
 In ripples on the pebbly beach,
 Interrupted the old man's speech.

Beautiful they were, in sooth,
 The old man and the fiery youth!
 The old man, in whose busy brain

"Zeus the sire of all Hath safety promised in a wooden wall."

The Greeks interpreted this to mean that they should depend upon their ships, and by doing so they defeated the Persians in the sea battle of Salamis.

Many a ship that sailed the main
 Was modelled o'er and o'er again;
 The fiery youth, who was to be
 The heir of his dexterity, 90
 The heir of his house, and his daughter's hand,
 When he had built and launched from land
 What the elder head had planned.

"Thus," said he, "will we build this ship!
 Lay square the blocks upon the slip,
 And follow well this plan of mine.
 Choose the timbers with greatest care;
 Of all that is unsound beware;
 For only what is sound and strong
 To this vessel shall belong. 100
 Cedar of Maine and Georgia pine
 Here together shall combine.
 A goodly frame, and a goodly fame,
 And the UNION be her name!
 For the day that gives her to the sea
 Shall give my daughter unto thee!"

The Master's word
 Enraptured the young man heard;
 And as he turned his face aside,
 With a look of joy and a thrill of pride 110
 Standing before
 Her father's door,
 He saw the form of his promised bride.
 The sun shone on her golden hair,
 And her cheek was glowing fresh and fair,
 With the breath of morn and the soft sea air.
 Like a beauteous barge was she,
 Still at rest on the sandy beach,
 Just beyond the billow's reach;
 But he 120
 Was the restless, seething, stormy sea!
 Ah, how skilful grows the hand
 That obeyeth Love's command!
 It is the heart, and not the brain,
 That to the highest doth attain,
 And he who followeth Love's behest
 Far excellet all the rest!

Thus with the rising of the sun
 Was the noble task begun,
 And soon throughout the shipyard's bounds
 Were heard the intermingled sounds 131
 Of axes and of mallets, plied
 With vigorous arms on every side;
 Plied so deftly and so well,
 That, ere the shadows of evening fell,

The keel of oak for a noble ship,
 Scarfed and bolted, straight and strong,
 Was lying ready, and stretched along
 The blocks, well placed upon the slip.
 Happy, thrice happy, every one 140
 Who sees his labor well begun,
 And not perplexed and multiplied,
 By idly waiting for time and tide!

And when the hot, long day was o'er,
 The young man at the Master's door
 Sat with the maiden calm and still,
 And within the porch, a little more
 Removed beyond the evening chill,
 The father sat, and told them tales 100
 Of wrecks in the great September gales, 150
 Of pirates coasting the Spanish Main,
 And ships that never came back again,
 The chance and change of a sailor's life,
 Want and plenty, rest and strife,
 His roving fancy, like the wind,
 That nothing can stay and nothing can bind,
 And the magic charm of foreign lands,
 With shadows of palms, and shining sands,
 Where the tumbling surf,
 O'er the coral reefs of Madagascar, 160
 Washes the feet of the swarthy Lascar,<sup>1</sup>
 As he lies alone and asleep on the turf.
 And the trembling maiden held her breath
 At the tales of that awful, pitiless sea,
 With all its terror and mystery,
 The dim, dark sea, so like unto Death,
 That divides and yet unites mankind!
 And whenever the old man paused, a gleam
 From the bowl of his pipe would awhile illumine

The silent group in the twilight gloom, 170
 And thoughtful faces, as in a dream;
 And for a moment one might mark
 What had been hidden by the dark,
 That the head of the maiden lay at rest,
 Tenderly, on the young man's breast!

Day by day the vessel grew,
 With timbers fashioned strong and true,
 Stemson and keelson and sternson-knee,
 Till, framed with perfect symmetry,
 A skeleton ship rose up to view! 180
 And around the bows and along the side
 The heavy hammers and mallets plied,
 Till after many a week, at length,

<sup>1</sup> an East Indian sailor

Wonderful for form and strength,
 Sublime in its enormous bulk,
 Loomed aloft the shadowy hulk!
 And around it columns of smoke, upwreath-
 ing,
 Rose from the boiling, bubbling, seething
 Caldron, that glowed,
 And overflowed 190
 With the black tar, heated for the sheathing.
 And amid the clamors
 Of clattering hammers,
 He who listened heard now and then
 The song of the Master and his men:—

“Build me straight, O worthy Master,
 Stanch and strong, a goodly vessel,
 That shall laugh at all disaster,
 And with wave and whirlwind wrestle!”

With oaken brace and copper band, 200
 Lay the rudder on the sand,
 That, like a thought, should have control
 Over the movement of the whole;
 And near it the anchor, whose giant hand
 Would reach down and grapple with the land,
 And immovable and fast
 Hold the great ship against the bellowing blast!

And at the bows an image stood,
 By a cunning artist carved in wood,
 With robes of white, that far behind 210
 Seemed to be fluttering in the wind.
 It was not shaped in a classic mould,
 Not like a Nymph or Goddess of old,
 Or Naiad rising from the water,
 But modelled from the Master's daughter!
 On many a dreary and misty night,
 'Twill be seen by the rays of the signal light,
 Speeding along through the rain and the dark,
 Like a ghost in its snow-white sark,
 The pilot of some phantom bark, 220
 Guiding the vessel, in its flight,
 By a path none other knows aright!

Behold, at last,
 Each tall and tapering mast
 Is swung into its place;<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> “I wish to anticipate a criticism on this passage, by stating that sometimes, though not usually, vessels are launched fully sparred and rigged. I have availed myself of the exception as better suited to my purposes than the general rule; but the reader will see that it is neither a blunder nor a poetic license. On this subject

Shrouds and stays
 Holding it firm and fast!

Long ago,
 In the deer-haunted forests of Maine,
 When upon mountain and plain 230
 Lay the snow,
 They fell,—those lordly pines!
 Those grand, majestic pines!
 'Mid shouts and cheers
 The jaded steers,
 Panting beneath the goad,
 Dragged down the weary, winding road
 Those captive kings so straight and tall,
 To be shorn of their streaming hair,
 And naked and bare, 240
 To feel the stress and the strain
 Of the wind and the reeling main,
 Whose roar
 Would remind them forevermore
 Of their native forests they should not see again.

And everywhere
 The slender, graceful spars
 Poise aloft in the air,
 And at the mast-head,
 White, blue, and red, 250
 A flag unrolls the stripes and stars.
 Ah! when the wanderer, lonely, friendless,
 In foreign harbors shall behold
 That flag unrolled,
 'Twill be as a friendly hand
 Stretched out from his native land, Filling his heart with memories sweet and endless!

All is finished! and at length
 Has come the bridal day
 Of beauty and of strength. 260
 Today the vessel shall be launched!
 With fleecy clouds the sky is blanched,
 And o'er the bay,
 Slowly, in all his splendors dight,

a friend in Portland, Maine, writes me thus: ‘In this state, and also, I am told, in New York, ships are sometimes rigged upon the stocks, in order to save time, or to make a show. There was a fine large ship launched last summer at Ellsworth, fully sparred and rigged. Some years ago a ship was launched here, with her rigging, spars, sails, and cargo aboard. She sailed the next day and—was never heard of again! I hope this will not be the fate of your poem!’ ” [Longfellow's note.]

The great sun rises to behold the sight.
 The ocean old,
 Centuries old,
 Strong as youth, and as uncontrolled,
 Paces restless to and fro,
 Up and down the sands of gold. 270
 His beating heart is not at rest;
 And far and wide,
 With ceaseless flow,
 His beard of snow
 Heaves with the heaving of his breast.
 He waits impatient for his bride.
 There she stands,
 With her foot upon the sands,
 Decked with flags and streamers gay,
 In honor of her marriage day, 280
 Her snow-white signals fluttering, blending,
 Round her like a veil descending,
 Ready to be
 The bride of the gray old sea.

On the deck another bride
 Is standing by her lover's side.
 Shadows from the flags and shrouds,
 Like the shadows cast by clouds,
 Broken by many a sudden fleck,
 Fall around them on the deck. 290

The prayer is said,
 The service read,
 The joyous bridegroom bows his head;
 And in tears the good old Master
 Shakes the brown hand of his son,
 Kisses his daughter's glowing cheek
 In silence, for he cannot speak,
 And ever faster
 Down his own the tears begin to run.
 The worthy pastor— 300
 The shepherd of that wandering flock,
 That has the ocean for its wold,
 That has the vessel for its fold,
 Leaping ever from rock to rock—
 Spake, with accents mild and clear,
 Words of warning, words of cheer,
 But tedious to the bridegroom's ear.
 He knew the chart
 Of the sailor's heart,
 All its pleasures and its griefs, 310
 All its shallows and rocky reefs,
 All those secret currents, that flow
 With such resistless undertow,
 And lift and drift, with terrible force,

The will from its moorings and its course.
 Therefore he spake, and thus said he:—
 "Like unto ships far off at sea,
 Outward or homeward bound, are we.
 Before, behind, and all around,
 Floats and swings the horizon's bound, 320
 Seems at its distant rim to rise
 And climb the crystal wall of the skies,
 And then again to turn and sink,
 As if we could slide from its outer brink.
 Ah! it is not the sea,
 It is not the sea that sinks and shelves,
 But ourselves
 That rock and rise
 With endless and uneasy motion,
 Now touching the very skies, 330
 Now sinking into the depths of ocean.
 Ah! if our souls but poise and swing
 Like the compass in its brazen ring,
 Ever level and ever true
 To the toil and the task we have to do,
 We shall sail securely, and safely reach
 The Fortunate Isles, on whose shining beach
 The sights we see, and the sounds we hear,
 Will be those of joy and not of fear!"

Then the Master, 340
 With a gesture of command,
 Waved his hand;
 And at the word,
 Loud and sudden there was heard,
 All around them and below,
 The sound of hammers, blow on blow,
 Knocking away the shores and spurs.
 And see! she stirs!
 She starts,—she moves,—she seems to feel
 The thrill of life along her keel, 350
 And, spurning with her foot the ground,
 With one exulting, joyous bound,
 She leaps into the ocean's arms!

And lo! from the assembled crowd
 There rose a shout, prolonged and loud,
 That to the ocean seemed to say,
 "Take her, O bridegroom, old and gray,
 Take her to thy protecting arms,
 With all her youth and all her charms!"

How beautiful she is! How fair 360
 She lies within those arms, that press
 Her form with many a soft caress
 Of tenderness and watchful care!

Sail forth into the sea, O ship!
Through wind and wave, right onward steer!
The moistened eye, the trembling lip,
Are not the signs of doubt or fear.

Sail forth into the sea of life,
O gentle, loving, trusting wife,
And safe from all adversity 370
Upon the bosom of that sea
Thy comings and thy goings be!
For gentleness and love and trust
Prevail o'er angry wave and gust;
And in the wreck of noble lives
Something immortal still survives!

Thou, too, sail on, O Ship of State!
Sail on, O UNION, strong and great!
Humanity with all its fears,
With all the hopes of future years, 380
Is hanging breathless on thy fate!
We know what Master laid thy keel,
What Workmen wrought thy ribs of steel,
Who made each mast, and sail, and rope,
What anvils rang, what hammers beat,
In what a forge and what a heat
Were shaped the anchors of thy hope!
Fear not each sudden sound and shock,
'Tis of the wave and not the rock;
'Tis but the flapping of the sail, 390
And not a rent made by the gale!
In spite of rock and tempest's roar,
In spite of false lights on the shore,
Sail on, nor fear to breast the sea!
Our hearts, our hopes, are all with thee,
Our hearts, our hopes, our prayers, our tears,
Our faith triumphant o'er our fears,
Are all with thee,—are all with thee!

MY LOST YOUTH

Written in 1855; published in Putnam's Monthly, August, 1855; reprinted in the Courtship of Miles Standish and Other Poems (1858). Highly praised by Alfred Noyes, Some Aspects of Modern Poetry, pp. 256–257. The ultimate source of the refrain is Lapponia (1673), a Latin treatise on Finland by Johannes Scheffer, Professor at Upsala. Longfellow, however, took his refrain from the translation of the Lapland song made by Herder and included in his Stimmen der Völker in Liedern (1778–1779) of which Longfellow owned a copy. The American poet literally translates—“Knabenwille ist Windeswille, Jünglingsgedanken lange Gedanken.”

See J. T. Hatfield's “Longfellow's Lapland Song,” in Publications of the Modern Language Association of America, XLV, 1188–92, and his “Longfellow a Transmitter of German Culture,” in German Culture in the United States (1936).

OFTEN I think of the beautiful town<sup>1</sup>
That is seated by the sea;
Often in thought go up and down
The pleasant streets of that dear old town,
And my youth comes back to me.
And a verse of a Lapland song
Is haunting my memory still:
“A boy's will is the wind's will,
And the thoughts of youth are long, long
thoughts.”

I can see the shadowy lines of its trees, 10
And catch, in sudden gleams,
The sheen of the far-surrounding seas,
And islands that were the Hesperides<sup>2</sup>
Of all my boyish dreams.
And the burden of that old song,
It murmurs and whispers still:
“A boy's will is the wind's will,
And the thoughts of youth are long, long
thoughts.”

I remember the black wharves and the slips,
And the sea-tides tossing free; 20
And Spanish sailors with bearded lips,
And the beauty and mystery of the ships,
And the magic of the sea.
And the voice of that wayward song
Is singing and saying still:
“A boy's will is the wind's will,
And the thoughts of youth are long, long
thoughts.”

I remember the bulwarks by the shore,
And the fort upon the hill;
The sunrise gun, with its hollow roar, 30
The drumbeat repeated o'er and o'er,
And the bugle wild and shrill.
And the music of that old song
Throbs in my memory still:
“A boy's will is the wind's will,
And the thoughts of youth are long, long
thoughts.”

<sup>1</sup> Portland, Maine, the poet's birthplace    <sup>2</sup> island home of the mythological Hesperides, the nymphs who guarded the garden of the golden apples

I remember the sea-fight<sup>1</sup> far away,
 How it thundered o'er the tide!
 And the dead captains, as they lay
 In their graves, o'erlooking the tranquil bay 40
 Where they in battle died.
 And the sound of that mournful song
 Goes through me with a thrill:
 "A boy's will is the wind's will,
 And the thoughts of youth are long, long
 thoughts."

I can see the breezy dome of groves,
 The shadows of Deering's Woods;
 And the friendships old and the early loves
 Come back with a Sabbath sound, as of doves
     In quiet neighborhoods. 50
 And the verse of that sweet old song,
 It flutters and murmurs still:
 "A boy's will is the wind's will,
 And the thoughts of youth are long, long
 thoughts."

I remember the gleams and glooms that dart
 Across the schoolboy's brain;
 The song and the silence in the heart,
 That in part are prophecies, and in part
     Are longings wild and vain.
 And the voice of that fitful song 60
 Sings on, and is never still:
 "A boy's will is the wind's will,
 And the thoughts of youth are long, long
 thoughts."

There are things of which I may not speak;
 There are dreams that cannot die;
 There are thoughts that make the strong heart weak,
 And bring a pallor into the cheek,
 And a mist before the eye.
 And the words of that fatal song
 Come over me like a chill: 70
 "A boy's will is the wind's will,
 And the thoughts of youth are long, long
 thoughts."

Strange to me now are the forms I meet,
 When I visit the dear old town;

<sup>1</sup> between the British brig Boxer and the American Enterprise off the harbor of Portland in 1813

But the native air is pure and sweet,
 And the trees that o'ershadow each well-known street,
 As they balance up and down,
 Are singing the beautiful song,
 Are sighing and whispering still:
 "A boy's will is the wind's will, 80
 And the thoughts of youth are long, long
 thoughts."

And Deering's Woods are fresh and fair,
 And with joy that is almost pain
 My heart goes back to wander there,
 And among the dreams of the days that were,
 I find my lost youth again.
 And the strange and beautiful song,
 Sings on, and is never still:
 "A boy's will is the wind's will,
 And the thoughts of youth are long, long
     thoughts." 90

From THE SONG OF HIAWATHA

Begun June 25, 1854, and finished March 29, 1855; published November 10, 1855, in twenty-two parts with an introduction. It was popular at once and has remained so, although its romantic anthropology is not admired by the learned. Children like it for its vividness and simplicity of expression, and the mature like it for its ethnic significance as preserving, however idealized, some of the traditions of a vanishing race.

One of Longfellow's notes accompanying the poem reads: "This Indian Edda—if I may so call it—is founded on a tradition, prevalent among the North American Indians, of a personage of miraculous birth, who was sent among them to clear their rivers, forests, and fishing-grounds, and to teach them the arts of peace. He was known among different tribes by the several names of Michabou, Chiabo, Manabozho, Tarenawagon, and Hiawatha. Mr. Schoolcraft gives an account of him in his Algic Researches, Vol. I, p. 134; and in his History, Condition, and Prospects of the Indian Tribes of the United States, Part III, p. 314, may be found the Iroquois form of the tradition, derived from the verbal narrations of an Onondaga chief. Into this old tradition I have woven other curious Indian legends, drawn chiefly from the various and valuable writings of Mr. Schoolcraft, to whom the literary world is greatly indebted for his indefatigable zeal in rescuing from oblivion so much of the legendary lore of the Indians. The scene of the poem is among the Ojibways on the southern shore of Lake Superior, in the region between the Pictured Rocks and the Grand Sable."

In addition to the works of Henry Rowe Schoolcraft (1794-1863), Longfellow relied, like Cooper, on that of the Rev. John Gottlieb Ernestus Heckewelder (1743-1825), Moravian missionary among the Delaware Indians, whose book he read in his college days; on The Narrative of the Adventures of John Tanner (1830); on Mary Eastman's Dakotah, or Life and Legends of the Sioux around Fort Snelling (1847), and other works. Following a blunder of Schoolcraft, he confused the historic Hiawatha of the Iroquois tribe and Manabozho, an Algonquin or Chippewa deity. See A. Keiser, The Indian in Literature (1933), pp. 189-208; also Stith Thompson, "The Indian Legend of Hiawatha," Publications of the Modern Language Association, XXXVII (1922). Longfellow acknowledged that the metrical form of the poem (unrhymed trochaic tetrameter) was suggested to him by the Finnish Kalevala, a collection of heroic poetry, the originals dating from the Middle Ages, which was organized into a national epic by Elias Lönnrot and published in 1849.

Pau-Puk-Keewis

You shall hear how Pau-Puk-Keewis,
He, the handsome Yenadizze,
Whom the people called the Storm-Fool,
Vexed the village with disturbance;
You shall hear of all his mischief,
And his flight from Hiawatha,
And his wondrous transmigrations,
And the end of his adventures.

On the shores of Gitche Gumee,
On the dunes of Nagow Wudjoo, 10
By the shining Big-Sea-Water
Stood the lodge of Pau-Puk-Keewis.
It was he who in his frenzy
Whirled these drifting sands together,
On the dunes of Nagow Wudjoo,
When, among the guests assembled,
He so merrily and madly
Danced at Hiawatha's wedding,
Danced the Beggar's Dance to please them.

Now, in search of new adventures, 20
From his lodge went Pau-Puk-Keewis,
Came with speed into the village,

Found the young men all assembled
In the lodge of old Iagoo,
Listening to his monstrous stories,
To his wonderful adventures.

He was telling them the story
Of Ojeeg, the Summer-Maker,
How he made a hole in heaven,
How he climbed up into heaven, 30
And let out the summer-weather,
The perpetual, pleasant Summer;
How the Otter first essayed it;
How the Beaver, Lynx, and Badger
Tried in turn the great achievement,
From the summit of the mountain
Smote their fists against the heavens,
Smote against the sky their foreheads,
Cracked the sky, but could not break it;
How the Wolverine, uprising, 40
Made him ready for the encounter,
Bent his knees down, like a squirrel,
Drew his arms back, like a cricket.

"Once he leaped," said old Iagoo,
"Once he leaped, and lo! above him
Bent the sky, as ice in rivers
When the waters rise beneath it;
Twice he leaped, and lo! above him
Broke the shattered sky asunder,
And he disappeared within it, 50
And Ojeeg, the Fisher Weasel,
With a bound went in behind him!"

"Hark you!" shouted Pau-Puk-Keewis
As he entered at the doorway;
"I am tired of all this talking,
Tired of old Iagoo's stories,
Tired of Hiawatha's wisdom.
Here is something to amuse you,
Better than this endless talking."

Then from out his pouch of wolfskin 60
Forth he drew, with solemn manner,
All the game of Bowl and Counters,<sup>1</sup>
Pugasaing, with thirteen pieces.
White on one side were they painted,
And vermilion on the other;
Two Kenabeeks or great serpents,
Two Ininewug or wedge-men,
One great war-club, Pugamaugun,
And one slender fish, the Keego,
Four round pieces, Ozawabeeks, 70
And three Sheshebwug or ducklings.

<sup>1</sup> the principal game of hazard among the northern Indians, according to Schoolcraft

All were made of bone and painted,
 All except the Ozawabeeks;
 These were brass, on one side burnished,
 And were black upon the other.

In a wooden bowl he placed them,
 Shook and jostled them together,
 Threw them on the ground before him,
 Thus exclaiming and explaining:
 "Red side up are all the pieces,
 80 And one great Kenabeek standing
 On the bright side of a brass piece,
 On a burnished Ozawabeek;
 Thirteen tens and eight are counted."

Then again he shook the pieces,
 Shook and jostled them together,
 Threw them on the ground before him,
 Still exclaiming and explaining:
 "White are both the great Kenabeeks,
 White the Ininewug, the wedge-men,
 90 Red are all the other pieces;
 Five tens and an eight are counted."

Thus he taught the game of hazard,
 Thus displayed it and explained it,
 Running through its various chances,
 Various changes, various meanings:
 Twenty curious eyes stared at him,
 Full of eagerness stared at him.

"Many games," said old Iagoo,
 100 "Many games of skill and hazard
 Have I seen in different nations,
 Have I played in different countries.
 He who plays with old Iagoo
 Must have very nimble fingers;
 Though you think yourself so skilful,
 I can beat you, Pau-Puk-Keewis,
 I can even give you lessons
 In your game of Bowl and Counters!"

So they sat and played together,
 110 All the old men and the young men,
 Played for dresses, weapons, wampum,
 Played till midnight, played till morning,
 Played until the Yenadizze,
 Till the cunning Pau-Puk-Keewis,
 Of their treasures had despoiled them,
 Of the best of all their dresses,
 Shirts of deerskin, robes of ermine,
 Belts of wampum, crests of feathers,
 Warlike weapons, pipes and pouches.
 120 Twenty eyes glared wildly at him,
 Like the eyes of wolves glared at him.

Said the lucky Pau-Puk-Keewis:

"In my wigwam I am lonely,
 In my wanderings and adventures
 I have need of a companion,
 Fain would have a Meshinauwa,
 An attendant and pipe-bearer.
 I will venture all these winnings,
 All these garments heaped about me,
 All this wampum, all these feathers,
 130 On a single throw will venture
 All against the young man yonder!"
 'Twas a youth of sixteen summers,
 'Twas a nephew of Iagoo;
 Face-in-a-Mist, the people called him.

As the fire burns in a pipe-head
 Dusky red beneath the ashes,
 So beneath his shaggy eyebrows
 Glowed the eyes of old Iagoo.
 "Ugh!" he answered very fiercely;
 140 "Ugh!" they answered all and each one.

Seized the wooden bowl the old man,
 Closely in his bony fingers
 Clutched the fatal bowl, Onagon,
 Shook it fiercely and with fury,
 Made the pieces ring together
 As he threw them down before him.

Red were both the great Kenabeeks,
 Red the Ininewug, the wedge-men,
 Red the Sheshebwug, the ducklings,
 150 Black the four brass Ozawabeeks,
 White alone the fish, the Keego;
 Only five the pieces counted!

Then the smiling Pau-Puk-Keewis
 Shook the bowl and threw the pieces;
 Lightly in the air he tossed them,
 And they fell about him scattered;
 Dark and bright the Ozawabeeks,
 Red and white the other pieces,
 And upright among the others
 160 One Ininewug was standing,
 Even as crafty Pau-Puk-Keewis
 Stood alone among the players,
 Saying, "Five tens! mine the game is!"

Twenty eyes glared at him fiercely,
 Like the eyes of wolves glared at him,
 As he turned and left the wigwam,
 Followed by his Meshinauwa,
 By the nephew of Iagoo,
 By the tall and graceful stripling,
 170 Bearing in his arms the winnings,
 Shirts of deerskin, robes of ermine,
 Belts of wampum, pipes and weapons.

“Carry them,” said Pau-Puk-Keewis,
Pointing with his fan of feathers,
“To my wigwam far to eastward,
On the dunes of Nagow Wudjoo!”

Hot and red with smoke and gambling
Were the eyes of Pau-Puk-Keewis
As he came forth to the freshness 180
Of the pleasant Summer morning.
All the birds were singing gayly,
All the streamlets flowing swiftly,
And the heart of Pau-Puk-Keewis
Sang with pleasure as the birds sing,
Beat with triumph like the streamlets,
As he wandered through the village,
In the early gray of morning,
With his fan of turkey-feathers,
With his plumes and tufts of swan’s down, 190
Till he reached the farthest wigwam,
Reached the lodge of Hiawatha.

Silent was it and deserted;
No one met him at the doorway,
No one came to bid him welcome;
But the birds were singing round it,
In and out and round the doorway,
Hopping, singing, fluttering, feeding,
And aloft upon the ridgepole
Kahgahgee, the King of Ravens, 200
Sat with fiery eyes, and, screaming,
Flapped his wings at Pau-Puk-Keewis.

“All are gone! the lodge is empty!”
Thus it was spake Pau-Puk-Keewis,
In his heart resolving mischief;—
“Gone is wary Hiawatha,
Gone the silly Laughing Water,
Gone Nokomis, the old woman,
And the lodge is left unguarded!”

By the neck he seized the raven, 210
Whirled it round him like a rattle,
Like a medicine-pouch he shook it,
Strangled Kahgahgee, the raven,
From the ridgepole of the wigwam
Left its lifeless body hanging,
As an insult to its master,
As a taunt to Hiawatha.

With a stealthy step he entered,
Round the lodge in wild disorder
Threw the household things about him, 220
Piled together in confusion
Bowls of wood and earthen kettles,
Robes of buffalo and beaver,
Skins of otter, lynx, and ermine,

As an insult to Nokomis,
As a taunt to Minnehaha.

Then departed Pau-Puk-Keewis,
Whistling, singing through the forest,
Whistling gayly to the squirrels,
Who from hollow boughs above him 230
Dropped their acorn-shells upon him,
Singing gayly to the wood birds,
Who from out the leafy darkness
Answered with a song as merry.

Then he climbed the rocky headlands,
Looking o’er the Gitche Gumee,
Perched himself upon their summit,
Waiting full of mirth and mischief
The return of Hiawatha.

Stretched upon his back he lay there; 240
Far below him plashed the waters,
Plashed and washed the dreamy waters;
Far above him swam the heavens,
Swam the dizzy, dreamy heavens;
Round him hovered, fluttered, rustled
Hiawatha’s mountain chickens,
Flock-wise swept and wheeled about him,
Almost brushed him with their pinions.

And he killed them as he lay there,
Slaughtered them by tens and twenties, 250
Threw their bodies down the headland,
Threw them on the beach below him,
Till at length Kayoshk, the sea-gull,
Perched upon a crag above them,
Shouted: “It is Pau-Puk-Keewis!
He is slaying us by hundreds!
Send a message to our brother,
Tidings send to Hiawatha!”

The Hunting of Pau-Puk-Keewis

Full of wrath was Hiawatha
When he came into the village,
Found the people in confusion,
Heard of all the misdemeanors,
All the malice and the mischief,
Of the cunning Pau-Puk-Keewis.

Hard his breath came through his nostrils,
Through his teeth he buzzed and muttered
Words of anger and resentment,
Hot and humming, like a hornet. 10
“I will slay this Pau-Puk-Keewis, Slay this mischief-maker!” said he.
“Not so long and wide the world is,

Not so rude and rough the way is,
That my wrath shall not attain him,
That my vengeance shall not reach him!"

Then in swift pursuit departed
Hiawatha and the hunters
On the trail of Pau-Puk-Keewis,
Through the forest, where he passed it, 20
To the headlands where he rested;
But they found not Pau-Puk-Keewis,
Only in the trampled grasses,
In the whortleberry-bushes,
Found the couch where he had rested,
Found the impress of his body.

From the lowlands far beneath them,
From the Muskoday, the meadow,
Pau-Puk-Keewis, turning backward, 30
Made a gesture of defiance,
Made a gesture of derision,
And aloud cried Hiawatha,
From the summit of the mountains:
"Not so long and wide the world is,
Not so rude and rough the way is,
But my wrath shall overtake you,
And my vengeance shall attain you!"

Over rock and over river,
Thorough bush, and brake, and forest,
Ran the cunning Pau-Puk-Keewis; 40
Like an antelope he bounded,
Till he came unto a streamlet
In the middle of the forest,
To a streamlet still and tranquil,
That had overflowed its margin,
To a dam made by the beavers,
To a pond of quiet water,
Where knee-deep the trees were standing,
Where the water-lilies floated,
Where the rushes waved and whispered. 50

On the dam stood Pau-Puk-Keewis,
On the dam of trunks and branches,
Through whose chinks the water spouted,
O'er whose summit flowed the streamlet.
From the bottom rose the beaver,
Looked with two great eyes of wonder,
Eyes that seemed to ask a question,
At the stranger, Pau-Puk-Keewis.

On the dam stood Pau-Puk-Keewis, 60
O'er his ankles flowed the streamlet,
Flowed the bright and silvery water,
And he spake unto the beaver,
With a smile he spake in this wise:
"O my friend Ahmeek, the beaver,

Cool and pleasant is the water;
Let me dive into the water,
Let me rest there in your lodges;
Change me, too, into a beaver!"

Cautiously replied the beaver,
With reserve he thus made answer: 70
"Let me first consult the others,
Let me ask the other beavers."
Down he sank into the water,
Heavily sank he, as a stone sinks,
Down among the leaves and branches,
Brown and matted at the bottom.

On the dam stood Pau-Puk-Keewis,
O'er his ankles flowed the streamlet,
Spouted through the chinks below him,
Dashed upon the stones beneath him, 80
Spread serene and calm before him,
And the sunshine and the shadows
Fell in flecks and gleams upon him,
Fell in little shining patches,
Through the waving, rustling branches.

From the bottom rose the beavers,
Silently above the surface
Rose one head and then another,
Till the pond seemed full of beavers,
Full of black and shining faces. 90

To the beavers Pau-Puk-Keewis
Spake entreating, said in this wise:
"Very pleasant is your dwelling,
O my friends! and safe from danger;
Can you not, with all your cunning,
All your wisdom and contrivance,
Change me, too, into a beaver?"

"Yes!" replied Ahmeek, the beaver,
He the King of all the beavers,
"Let yourself slide down among us, 100
Down into the tranquil water."

Down into the pond among them
Silently sank Pau-Puk-Keewis;
Black became his shirt of deerskin,
Black his moccasins and leggings,
In a broad black tail behind him
Spread his foxtails and his fringes;
He was changed into a beaver.

"Make me large," said Pau-Puk-Keewis, 110
"Make me large and make me larger,
Larger than the other beavers."
"Yes," the beaver chief responded,
"When our lodge below you enter,
In our wigwam we will make you
Ten times larger than the others."

Thus into the clear, brown water
 Silently sank Pau-Puk-Keewis:
 Found the bottom covered over
 With the trunks of trees and branches,
 Hoards of food against the winter, 120
 Piles and heaps against the famine;
 Found the lodge with arching doorway,
 Leading into spacious chambers.

Here they made him large and larger,
 Made him largest of the beavers,
 Ten times larger than the others.
 "You shall be our ruler," said they;
 "Chief and King of all the beavers."

But not long had Pau-Puk-Keewis
 Sat in state among the beavers, 130
 When there came a voice of warning
 From the watchman at his station
 In the water-flags and lilies, Saying, "Here is Hiawatha!
 Hiawatha with his hunters!"

Then they heard a cry above them,
 Heard a shouting and a tramping,
 Heard a crashing and a rushing,
 And the water round and o'er them
 Sank and sucked away in eddies, 140
 And they knew their dam was broken.

On the lodge's roof the hunters
 Leaped, and broke it all asunder;
 Streamed the sunshine through the crevice,
 Sprang the beavers through the doorway,
 Hid themselves in deeper water,
 In the channel of the streamlet;
 But the mighty Pau-Puk-Keewis
 Could not pass beneath the doorway;
 He was puffed with pride and feeding, 150
 He was swollen like a bladder.

Through the roof looked Hiawatha,
 Cried aloud, "O Pau-Puk-Keewis!
 Vain are all your craft and cunning,
 Vain your manifold disguises!
 Well I know you, Pau-Puk-Keewis!"
 With their clubs they beat and bruised him,
 Beat to death poor Pau-Puk-Keewis,
 Pounded him as maize is pounded,
 Till his skull was crushed to pieces. 160

Six tall hunters, lithe and limber,
 Bore him home on poles and branches,
 Bore the body of the beaver;
 But the ghost, the Jeebi in him,
 Thought and felt as Pau-Puk-Keewis,
 Still lived on as Pau-Puk-Keewis.

And it fluttered, strove, and struggled,
 Waving hither, waving thither,
 As the curtains of a wigwam
 Struggle with their thongs of deerskin, 170
 When the wintry wind is blowing;
 Till it drew itself together,
 Till it rose up from the body,
 Till it took the form and features
 Of the cunning Pau-Puk-Keewis
 Vanishing into the forest.

But the wary Hiawatha
 Saw the figure ere it vanished,
 Saw the form of Pau-Puk-Keewis
 Glide into the soft blue shadow 180
 Of the pine-trees of the forest;
 Toward the squares of white beyond it,
 Toward an opening in the forest,
 Like a wind it rushed and panted,
 Bending all the boughs before it,
 And behind it, as the rain comes,
 Came the steps of Hiawatha.

To a lake with many islands
 Came the breathless Pau-Puk-Keewis,
 Where among the water-lilies 190
 Pishnekuh, the brant, were sailing;
 Through the tufts of rushes floating,
 Steering through the reedy islands.
 Now their broad black beaks they lifted,
 Now they plunged beneath the water,
 Now they darkened in the shadow,
 Now they brightened in the sunshine.

"Pishnekuh!" cried Pau-Puk-Keewis,
 "Pishnekuh! my brothers!" said he,
 "Change me to a brant with plumage, 200
 With a shining neck and feathers,
 Make me large, and make me larger,
 Ten times larger than the others."

Straightway to a brant they changed him,
 With two huge and dusky pinions,
 With a bosom smooth and rounded,
 With a bill like two great paddles,
 Made him larger than the others,
 Ten times larger than the largest,
 Just as, shouting from the forest, 210
 On the shore stood Hiawatha.

Up they rose with cry and clamor,
 With a whirl and beat of pinions,
 Rose up from the reedy islands,
 From the water-flags and lilies.
 And they said to Pau-Puk-Keewis:
 "In your flying, look not downward,

Take good heed and look not downward,
Lest some strange mischance should happen,
Lest some great mishap befall you!" 220

Fast and far they fled to northward,
Fast and far through mist and sunshine,
Fled among the moors and fen-lands,
Slept among the reeds and rushes.

On the morrow as they journeyed,
Buoyed and lifted by the South-wind,
Wafted onward by the South-wind,
Blowing fresh and strong behind them,
Rose a sound of human voices,
Rose a clamor from beneath them, 230
From the lodges of a village,
From the people miles beneath them.

For the people of the village
Saw the flock of brant with wonder,
Saw the wings of Pau-Puk-Keewis
Flapping far up in the ether,
Broader than two doorway curtains.

Pau-Puk-Keewis heard the shouting,
Knew the voice of Hiawatha,
Knew the outcry of Iagoo, 240
And, forgetful of the warning,
Drew his neck in, and looked downward,
And the wind that blew behind him
Caught his mighty fan of feathers,
Sent him wheeling, whirling downward!

All in vain did Pau-Puk-Keewis
Struggle to regain his balance!
Whirling round and round and downward,
He beheld in turn the village
And in turn the flock above him, 250
Saw the village coming nearer,
And the flock receding farther,
Heard the voices growing louder,
Heard the shouting and the laughter;
Saw no more the flocks above him,
Only saw the earth beneath him;
Dead out of the empty heaven,
Dead among the shouting people,
With a heavy soul and sullen,
Fell the brant with broken pinions. 260

But his soul, his ghost, his shadow,
Still survived as Pau-Puk-Keewis,
Took again the form and features
Of the handsome Yenadizze,
And again went rushing onward,
Followed fast by Hiawatha,
Crying: "Not so wide the world is,
Not so long and rough the way is,

But my wrath shall overtake you,
But my vengeance shall attain you!" 270

And so near he came, so near him,
That his hand was stretched to seize him,
His right hand to seize and hold him,
When the cunning Pau-Puk-Keewis
Whirled and spun about in circles,
Fanned the air into a whirlwind,
Danced the dust and leaves about him,
And amid the whirling eddies
Sprang into a hollow oak-tree,
Changed himself into a serpent, 280
Gliding out through root and rubbish.

With his right hand Hiawatha
Smote amain the hollow oak-tree,
Rent it into shreds and splinters,
Left it lying there in fragments.
But in vain; for Pau-Puk-Keewis,
Once again in human figure,
Full in sight ran on before him,
Sped away in gust and whirlwind,
On the shores of Gitche Gumees, 290
Westward by the Big-Sea-Water,
Came unto the rocky headlands,
To the Pictured Rocks of sandstone,
Looking over lake and landscape.

And the Old Man of the Mountain,
He the Manito of Mountains,
Opened wide his rocky doorways,
Opened wide his deep abysses,
Giving Pau-Puk-Keewis shelter
In his caverns dark and dreary, 300
Bidding Pau-Puk-Keewis welcome
To his gloomy lodge of sandstone.

There without stood Hiawatha,
Found the doorways closed against him,
With his mittens, Minjekahwun,
Smote great caverns in the sandstone,
Cried aloud in tones of thunder,
"Open! I am Hiawatha!"
But the Old Man of the Mountain
Opened not, and made no answer 310
From the silent crags of sandstone,
From the gloomy rock abysses.

Then he raised his hands to heaven,
Called imploring on the tempest,
Called Waywassimo, the lightning,
And the thunder, Annemeekée;
And they came with night and darkness,
Sweeping down the Big-Sea-Water
From the distant Thunder Mountains;

And the trembling Pau-Puk-Keewis 320
 Heard the footsteps of the thunder,
 Saw the red eyes of the lightning,
 Was afraid, and crouched and trembled.

Then Waywassimo, the lightning,
 Smote the doorways of the caverns,
 With his war-club smote the doorways,
 Smote the jutting crags of sandstone,
 And the thunder, Annemeekee,
 Shouted down into the caverns,
 Saying, "Where is Pau-Puk-Keewis!" 330
 And the crags fell, and beneath them
 Dead among the rocky ruins
 Lay the cunning Pau-Puk-Keewis,
 Lay the handsome Yenadizze,
 Slain in his own human figure.

Ended were his wild adventures,
 Ended were his tricks and gambols,
 Ended all his craft and cunning,
 Ended all his mischief-making, 340
 All his gambling and his dancing,
 All his wooing of the maidens.

Then the noble Hiawatha
 Took his soul, his ghost, his shadow,
 Spake and said: "O Pau-Puk-Keewis,
 Never more in human figure
 Shall you search for new adventures;
 Never more with jest and laughter
 Dance the dust and leaves in whirlwinds;
 But above there in the heavens
 You shall soar and sail in circles; 350
 I will change you to an eagle,
 To Keneu, the great war-eagle,
 Chief of all the fowls with feathers,
 Chief of Hiawatha's chickens."

And the name of Pau-Puk-Keewis
 Lingers still among the people,
 Lingers still among the singers,
 And among the storytellers;
 And in Winter, when the snowflakes
 Whirl in eddies round the lodges, 360
 When the wind in gusty tumult
 O'er the smoke-flue pipes and whistles,
 "There," they cry, "comes Pau-Puk-Keewis;
 He is dancing through the village,
 He is gathering in his harvest!"

THE CHILDREN'S HOUR

First published in the Atlantic Monthly, September, 1860. Though it is a poem of Longfellow's own home in Cambridge, the imagery from the fifth stanza onward takes the reader to the feudal past. The poet perhaps had in mind, in the seventh stanza, Southey's poem "God's Judgment on a Wicked Bishop"; he knew, however, from his stay in Germany, the legend of Archbishop Hatto of the tenth century, who built a high tower on the Rhine for protection against mice, yet was eaten by them as a punishment for his cruelty to the common people who stole grain during a famine.

BETWEEN the dark and the daylight,
 When the night is beginning to lower,
 Comes a pause in the day's occupations,
 That is known as the Children's Hour.

I hear in the chamber above me
 The patter of little feet,
 The sound of a door that is opened,
 And voices soft and sweet.

From my study I see in the lamplight,
 Descending the broad hall stair, 10
 Grave Alice, and laughing Allegra,
 And Edith with golden hair.

A whisper, and then a silence:
 Yet I know by their merry eyes
 They are plotting and planning together
 To take me by surprise.

A sudden rush from the stairway,
 A sudden raid from the hall!
 By three doors left unguarded
 They enter my castle wall! 20

They climb up into my turret
 O'er the arms and back of my chair;
 If I try to escape, they surround me;
 They seem to be everywhere.

They almost devour me with kisses,
 Their arms about me entwine,
 Till I think of the Bishop of Bingen
 In his Mouse-Tower on the Rhine!

Do you think, O blue-eyed banditti,
 Because you have scaled the wall, 30
 Such an old mustache as I am
 Is not a match for you all!

I have you fast in my fortress,
 And will not let you depart,
 But put you down into the dungeon
 In the round-tower of my heart.

And there will I keep you forever,
 Yes, forever and a day,
 Till the walls shall crumble to ruin,
 And molder in dust away.

From TALES OF A WAY-SIDE INN

First entitled "The Sudbury Tales." The Wayside Inn was the old Red Horse Inn at Sudbury, Massachusetts, about twenty miles from Boston. Members of the Howe family, from England, had kept the inn for a hundred and seventy-five years. After the death of Lyman Howe, a personal friend of Longfellow, the inn was closed until 1897, when E. R. Lemon restored and reopened it. It was bought in 1923 by Henry Ford to preserve it as a memorial. The Tales are in three parts, the first published November 25, 1863. The second part appeared in Three Books of Song (1872), and the last series in Aftermath (1873). The collection of tales and the manner of their telling is modeled somewhat upon Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. The poet gathered together at the Red Horse Inn a group of friends, much as Chaucer gathered his pilgrims at the Tabard Inn. The musician was Ole Bull, the Norwegian violinist; the student, Henry Ware Wales; the Sicilian, Luigi Monti; the Spanish Jew, Israel Edrehi, a Boston merchant; the theologian, Professor Daniel Treadwell of Harvard; the poet, T. W. Parsons.

PRELUDE

The Wayside Inn

ONE autumn night, in Sudbury town,
 Across the meadows bare and brown,
 The windows of the wayside inn
 Gleamed red with firelight through the leaves
 Of woodbine, hanging from the eaves
 Their crimson curtains rent and thin.

As ancient is this hostelry
 As any in the land may be,
 Built in the old Colonial day,
 When men lived in a grander way,
 With ampler hospitality;

10

A kind of old Hobgoblin Hall,
 Now somewhat fallen to decay,
 With weather-stains upon the wall,
 And stairways worn, and crazy doors,
 And creaking and uneven floors,
 And chimneys huge, and tiled and tall.

A region of repose it seems,
 A place of slumber and of dreams,
 Remote among the wooded hills!
 For there no noisy railway speeds,
 Its torch-race scattering smoke and gleeds;
 But noon and night, the panting teams
 Stop under the great oaks, that throw
 Tangles of light and shade below,
 On roofs and doors and window-sills.
 Across the road the barns display
 Their lines of stalls, their mows of hay,
 Through the wide doors the breezes blow,
 The wattled cocks strut to and fro,
 And, half effaced by rain and shine,
 The Red Horse prances on the sign.
 Round this old-fashioned, quaint abode
 Deep silence reigned, save when a gust
 Went rushing down the county road,
 And skeletons of leaves, and dust,
 A moment quickened by its breath,
 Shuddered and danced their dance of death,
 And through the ancient oaks o'erhead
 Mysterious voices moaned and fled.

But from the parlor of the inn
 A pleasant murmur smote the ear,
 Like water rushing through a weir:
 Oft interrupted by the din
 Of laughter and of loud applause,
 And, in each intervening pause,
 The music of a violin.
 The firelight, shedding over all
 The splendor of its ruddy glow,
 Filled the whole parlor large and low;
 It gleamed on wainscot and on wall,
 It touched with more than wonted grace
 Fair Princess Mary's pictured face;
 It bronzed the rafters overhead,
 On the old spinet's ivory keys
 It played inaudible melodies,
 It crowned the somber clock with flame,
 The hands, the hours, the maker's name,
 And painted with a livelier red
 The Landlord's coat-of-arms again;
 And, flashing on the window-pane,

50

60

Emblazoned with its light and shade
 The jovial rhymes, that still remain,
 Writ near a century ago
 By the great Major Molineaux,
 Whom Hawthorne has immortal made.<sup>1</sup>

Before the blazing fire of wood
 Erect the rapt musician stood;
 And ever and anon he bent
 His head upon his instrument, 70
 And seemed to listen, till he caught
 Confessions of its secret thought,—
 The joy, the triumph, the lament,
 The exultation and the pain;
 Then, by the magic of his art,
 He soothed the throbbings of its heart,
 And lulled it into peace again.

Around the fireside at their ease
 There sat a group of friends, entranced
 With the delicious melodies; 80
 Who from the far-off noisy town
 Had to the wayside inn come down,
 To rest beneath its old oak trees.
 The firelight on their faces glanced,
 Their shadows on the wainscot danced,
 And, though of different lands and speech,
 Each had his tale to tell, and each
 Was anxious to be pleased and please.
 And while the sweet musician plays,
 Let me in outline sketch them all, 90
 Perchance uncouthly as the blaze
 With its uncertain touch portrays
 Their shadowy semblance on the wall.

But first the Landlord will I trace;
 Grave in his aspect and attire;
 A man of ancient pedigree,
 A Justice of the Peace was he,
 Known in all Sudbury as "The Squire."
 Proud was he of his name and race,
 Of old Sir William and Sir Hugh, 100
 And in the parlor, full in view,
 His coat-of-arms, well framed and glazed,
 Upon the wall in colors blazed;
 He beareth gules upon his shield,<sup>2</sup>
 A chevron argent in the field,

With three wolf's heads, and for the crest
 A Wyvern part-per-pale addressed
 Upon a helmet barred; below
 The scroll reads, "By the name of Howe."
 And over this, no longer bright, 110
 Though glimmering with a latent light,
 Was hung the sword his grandsire bore
 In the rebellious days of yore,
 Down there at Concord in the fight.

A youth was there, of quiet ways,
 A Student of old books and days,
 To whom all tongues and lands were known,
 And yet a lover of his own;
 With many a social virtue graced,
 And yet a friend of solitude; 120
 A man of such a genial mood
 The heart of all things he embraced,
 And yet of such fastidious taste,
 He never found the best too good.
 Books were his passion and delight,
 And in his upper room at home
 Stood many a rare and sumptuous tome,
 In vellum bound, with gold bedight,
 Great volumes garmented in white, 130
 Recalling Florence, Pisa, Rome.
 He loved the twilight that surrounds
 The borderland of old romance;
 Where glitter hauberk, helm, and lance,
 And banner waves, and trumpet sounds,
 And ladies ride with hawk on wrist,
 And mighty warriors sweep along,
 Magnified by the purple mist,
 The dusk of centuries and of song.
 The chronicles of Charlemagne,
 Of Merlin and the Mort d'Arthur,<sup>1</sup> 140
 Mingled together in his brain
 With tales of Flores and Blanchefleur,
 Sir Ferumbras, Sir Eglamour,
 Sir Launcelot, Sir Morgadour,
 Sir Guy, Sir Bevis, Sir Gawain.

A young Sicilian, too, was there;
 In sight of Etna born and bred,
 Some breath of its volcanic air
 Was glowing in his heart and brain,
 And, being rebellious to his liege, 150
 After Palermo's fatal siege,
 Across the western seas he fled,
 In good King Bomba's<sup>2</sup> happy reign.

<sup>1</sup> "Death of Arthur" <sup>2</sup> familiar name of Ferdinand II, King of the Two Sicilies

His face was like a summer night,
 All flooded with a dusky light;
 His hands were small; his teeth shone white
 As sea-shells, when he smiled or spoke;
 His sinews supple and strong as oak;
 Clean shaven was he as a priest,
 Who at the mass on Sunday sings,      160
 Save that upon his upper lip
 His beard, a good palm's length at least,
 Level and pointed at the tip,
 Shot sideways, like a swallow's wings.
 The poets read he o'er and o'er,
 And most of all the Immortal Four
 Of Italy; and next to those,
 The story-telling bard of prose,
 Who wrote the joyous Tuscan tales
 Of the Decameron, that make      170
 Fiesole's green hills and vales
 Remembered for Boccaccio's sake.
 Much too of music was his thought;
 The melodies and measures fraught
 With sunshine and the open air,
 Of vineyards and the singing sea
 Of his beloved Sicily;
 And much it pleased him to peruse
 The songs of the Sicilian muse,—
 Bucolic songs by Meli sung      180
 In the familiar peasant tongue,
 That made men say, "Behold! once more
 The pitying gods to earth restore Theocritus of Syracuse!"

A Spanish Jew from Alicant
 With aspect grand and grave was there;
 Vender of silks and fabrics rare,
 And attar of rose from the Levant.
 Like an old Patriarch he appeared,
 Abraham or Isaac, or at least      190
 Some later Prophet or High-Priest;
 With lustrous eyes, and olive skin,
 And, wildly tossed from cheeks and chin,
 The tumbling cataract of his beard.
 His garments breathed a spicy scent
 Of cinnamon and sandal blent,
 Like the soft aromatic gales
 That meet the mariner, who sails
 Through the Moluccas and the seas
 That wash the shores of Celebes.      200
 All stories that recorded are
 By Pierre Alphonse he knew by heart,
 And it was rumored he could say

The Parables of Sandabar,
 And all the Fables of Pilpay,
 Or if not all, the greater part!
 Well versed was he in Hebrew books
 Talmud and Targum, and the lore
 Of Kabala; and evermore
 There was a mystery in his looks;      210
 His eyes seemed gazing far away,
 As if in vision or in trance
 He heard the solemn sackbut play,
 And saw the Jewish maidens dance.

A Theologian, from the school
 Of Cambridge, on the Charles was there;
 Skilful alike with tongue and pen,
 He preached to all men everywhere
 The Gospel of the Golden Rule,
 The New Commandment given to men,      220
 Thinking the deed, and not the creed,
 Would help us in our utmost need.
 With reverent feet the earth he trod,
 Nor banished nature from his plan,
 But studied still with deep research
 To build the Universal Church,
 Lofty as in the love of God,
 And ample as the wants of man.

A Poet, too, was there, whose verse
 Was tender, musical, and terse;      230
 The inspiration, the delight,
 The gleam, the glory, the swift flight,
 Of thoughts so sudden, that they seem
 The revelations of a dream,
 All these were his; but with them came
 No envy of another's fame;
 He did not find his sleep less sweet
 For music in some neighboring street,
 Nor rustling hear in every breeze
 The laurels of Miltiades.<sup>1</sup>      240
 Honor and blessings on his head
 While living, good report when dead,
 Who, not too eager for renown,
 Accepts, but does not clutch, the crown!

Last the Musician, as he stood
 Illumined by that fire of wood;
 Fair-haired, blue-eyed, his aspect blithe,
 His figure tall and straight and lithe,

<sup>1</sup> According to Plutarch, the Athenian general Themistocles was envious of the successes of Miltiades, the famous commander of the Greeks at the Battle of Marathon.

And every feature of his face
Revealing his Norwegian race; 250
A radiance, streaming from within,
Around his eyes and forehead beamed,
The Angel with the violin,
Painted by Raphael, he seemed.

He lived in that ideal world
Whose language is not speech, but song;
Around him evermore the throng
Of elves and sprites their dances whirled;
The Strömkarl<sup>1</sup> sang, the cataract hurled
Its headlong waters from the height; 260
And mingled in the wild delight
The scream of sea-birds in their flight,
The rumor of the forest trees,
The plunge of the implacable seas,
The tumult of the wind at night,
Voices of eld, like trumpets blowing,
Old ballads, and wild melodies
Through mist and darkness pouring forth,
Like Elivagar's river flowing
Out of the glaciers of the North. 270

The instrument on which he played
Was in Cremona's workshops made,
By a great master of the past,
Ere yet was lost the art divine;
Fashioned of maple and of pine,
That in Tyrolian forests vast
Had rocked and wrestled with the blast:
Exquisite was it in design,
Perfect in each minutest part,
A marvel of the lutist's art; 280
And in its hollow chamber, thus,
The maker from whose hands it came
Had written his unrivaled name,—
"Antonius Stradivarius."

And when he played, the atmosphere
Was filled with magic, and the ear
Caught echoes of that Harp of Gold,
Whose music had so weird a sound,
The hunted stag forgot to bound,
The leaping rivulet backward rolled, 290
The birds came down from bush and tree,
The dead came from beneath the sea,
The maiden to the harper's knee!

The music ceased; the applause was loud,
The pleased musician smiled and bowed;
The wood-fire clapped its hands of flame,

<sup>1</sup> river spirit

The shadows on the wainscot stirred,
And from the harpsichord there came
A ghostly murmur of acclaim,
A sound like that sent down at night 300
By birds of passage in their flight,
From the remotest distance heard.

Then silence followed; then began
A clamor for the Landlord's tale,—
The story promised them of old,
They said, but always left untold;
And he, although a bashful man,
And all his courage seemed to fail,
Finding excuse of no avail,
Yielded; and thus the story ran. 310

THE LANDLORD'S TALE

Paul Revere's Ride

"Paul Revere's Ride" stands first in the series of Tales. Its source may be Revere's own account in a letter to Dr. Jeremy Belknap (Massachusetts Historical Society Collections, V). Revere rode from Boston to Lexington in Middlesex County on the night of April 18, 1775, to summon the militia. There is some question concerning the church from which the lanterns were hung, signals that the British had left Boston for Concord, and concerning the identity of the "friend." Longfellow believed the church to be the Old North Church. The signals may rather have been hung in the North Meeting House, in North Square, which was destroyed in the siege of Boston, 1775-76. According to his diary, Longfellow climbed the tower of the Old North Church April 5, 1860.

Listen, my children, and you shall hear
Of the midnight ride of Paul Revere,
On the eighteenth of April, in Seventy-five;
Hardly a man is now alive
Who remembers that famous day and year.

He said to his friend, "If the British march
By land or sea from the town tonight,
Hang a lantern aloft in the belfry arch
Of the North Church tower as a signal light,—
One, if by land, and two, if by sea; 10
And I on the opposite shore will be,
Ready to ride and spread the alarm
Through every Middlesex village and farm,
For the country folk to be up and to arm."

Then he said, "Good night!" and with muffled oar

Silently rowed to the Charlestown shore,
Just as the moon rose over the bay,
Where swinging wide at her moorings lay
The Somerset, British man-of-war;
A phantom ship, with each mast and spar 20
Across the moon like a prison bar,
And a huge black hulk that was magnified
By its own reflection in the tide.

Meanwhile, his friend, through alley and street,

Wanders and watches with eager ears,
Till in the silence around him he hears
The muster of men at the barrack door,
The sound of arms, and the tramp of feet,
And the measured tread of the grenadiers,
Marching down to their boats on the shore.

Then he climbed the tower of the Old North Church, 31

By the wooden stairs, with stealthy tread,
To the belfry chamber overhead,
And startled the pigeons from their perch
On the somber rafters, that round him made
Masses and moving shapes of shade,—
By the trembling ladder, steep and tall,
To the highest window in the wall,
Where he paused to listen and look down
A moment on the roofs of the town, 40
And the moonlight flowing over all.

Beneath, in the churchyard, lay the dead,
In their night-encampment on the hill,
Wrapped in silence so deep and still
That he could hear, like a sentinel's tread,
The watchful night-wind, as it went
Creeping along from tent to tent,
And seeming to whisper, "All is well!"
A moment only he feels the spell
Of the place and the hour, and the secret 50
dread

Of the lonely belfry and the dead;
For suddenly all his thoughts are bent
On a shadowy something far away,
Where the river widens to meet the bay,—
A line of black that bends and floats
On the rising tide, like a bridge of boats.

Meanwhile, impatient to mount and ride,
Booted and spurred, with a heavy stride

On the opposite shore walked Paul Revere.
Now he patted his horse's side, 60
Now gazed at the landscape far and near,
Then, impetuous, stamped the earth,
And turned and tightened his saddle-girth;
But mostly he watched with eager search
The belfry-tower of the Old North Church,
As it rose above the graves on the hill,
Lonely and spectral and somber and still.
And lo! as he looks, on the belfry's height
A glimmer, and then a gleam of light! 69
He springs to the saddle, the bridle he turns,
But lingers and gazes, till full on his sight
A second lamp in the belfry burns!

A hurry of hoofs in a village street,
A shape in the moonlight, a bulk in the dark,
And beneath, from the pebbles, in passing, a spark

Struck out by a steed flying fearless and fleet:
That was all! And yet, through the gloom and the light,

The fate of a nation was riding that night;
And the spark struck out by that steed, in his flight,
Kindled the land into flame with its heat. 80

He has left the village and mounted the steep,
And beneath him, tranquil and broad and deep,

Is the Mystic, meeting the ocean tides;
And under the alders, that skirt its edge,
Now soft on the sand, now loud on the ledge,
Is heard the tramp of his steed as he rides.

It was twelve by the village clock
When he crossed the bridge into Medford town.

He heard the crowing of the cock,
And the barking of the farmer's dog, 90
And felt the damp of the river fog,
That rises after the sun goes down.

It was one by the village clock
When he galloped into Lexington.
He saw the gilded weathercock
Swim in the moonlight as he passed,
And the meetinghouse windows, blank and bare,

Gaze at him with a spectral glare,
As if they already stood aghast
At the bloody work they would look upon.

It was two by the village clock 101
When he came to the bridge in Concord
town.

He heard the bleating of the flock,
And the twitter of birds among the trees,
And felt the breath of the morning breeze
Blowing over the meadows brown.
And one was safe and asleep in his bed<sup>1</sup>
Who at the bridge would be first to fall,
Who that day would be lying dead,
Pierced by a British musket-ball. 110

You know the rest. In the books you have read,
How the British Regulars fired and fled,—
How the farmers gave them ball for ball,
From behind each fence and farmyard wall,
Chasing the red-coats down the lane,
Then crossing the fields to emerge again
Under the trees at the turn of the road,
And only pausing to fire and load.

So through the night rode Paul Revere;
And so through the night went his cry of alarm 120
To every Middlesex village and farm,—
A cry of defiance and not of fear,
A voice in the darkness, a knock at the door,
And a word that shall echo forevermore!
For, borne on the night-wind of the Past,
Through all our history, to the last,
In the hour of darkness and peril and need,
The people will waken and listen to hear
The hurrying hoof-beats of that steed, 129
And the midnight message of Paul Revere.

HAWTHORNE

MAY 23, 1864

How beautiful it was, that one bright day
In the long week of rain!
Though all its splendor could not chase away
The omnipresent pain.

The lovely town was white with apple-blooms,
And the great elms o'erhead
Dark shadows wove on their aerial looms,
Shot through with golden thread.*

* Captain Isaac Davis of Acton

Across the meadows, by the gray old manse,
The historic river flowed: 10
I was as one who wanders in a trance,
Unconscious of his road.

The faces of familiar friends seemed strange;
Their voices I could hear,
And yet the words they uttered seemed to change
Their meaning to my ear.

For the one face I looked for was not there,
The one low voice was mute;
Only an unseen presence filled the air,
And baffled my pursuit. 20

Now I look back, and meadow, manse, and stream
Dimly my thought defines;
I only see—a dream within a dream—
The hilltop hearsed with pines.

I only hear above his place of rest
Their tender undertone,
The infinite longings of a troubled breast,
The voice so like his own.

There in seclusion and remote from men
The wizard hand lies cold, 30
Which at its topmost speed let fall the pen,
And left the tale half told.<sup>1</sup>

Ah! who shall lift that wand of magic power,
And the lost clew regain?
The unfinished window in Aladdin's tower<sup>2</sup>
Unfinished must remain!

DANTE

TUSCAN, that wanderest through the realms
of gloom,
With thoughtful pace, and sad, majestic
eyes,
Stern thoughts and awful from thy soul
arise,
Like Farinata from his fiery tomb.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Two romances, Septimius Felton and Dr. Grimshawe's Secret, were left unfinished by Hawthorne.<sup>2</sup> One of the windows was left unfinished in the tower built by magic by Aladdin in The Arabian Nights.<sup>3</sup> See Inferno, X.

Thy sacred song is like the trump of doom;
 Yet in thy heart what human sympathies,
 What soft compassion glows; as in the skies
 The tender stars their clouded lamps relume!
 Methinks I see thee stand with pallid cheeks
 By Fra Hilario in his diocese, 10
 As up the convent-walls, in golden streaks,
 The ascending sunbeams mark the day's decrease;
 And, as he asks what there the stranger seeks,
 Thy voice along the cloister whispers,
 "Peace!"

DIVINA COMMEDIA

These six sonnets were written during the time that Longfellow was making his translation of Dante's Divina Commedia. They were first published in the Atlantic Monthly at various times from December, 1864, to November, 1866. The first and second sonnets were then used to preface the Inferno, the third and fourth to preface the Purgatorio, and the fifth and sixth to preface the Paradiso.

I

OFt have I seen at some cathedral door
 A laborer, pausing in the dust and heat,
 Lay down his burden, and with reverent feet
 Enter, and cross himself, and on the floor
 Kneel to repeat his paternoster o'er;
 Far off the noises of the world retreat;
 The loud vociferations of the street
 Become an undistinguishable roar.
 So, as I enter here from day to day,
 And leave my burden at this minster gate, 10
 Kneeling in prayer, and not ashamed to pray,
 The tumult of the time disconsolate
 To inarticulate murmurs dies away,
 While the eternal ages watch and wait.

How strange the sculptures that adorn these towers!
 This crowd of statues, in whose folded sleeves
 Birds build their nests; while canopied with leaves

Parvis<sup>1</sup> and portal bloom like trellised
 bowers,
 And the vast minster seems a cross of flowers!
 But fiends and dragons on the gargoyled eaves
 Watch the dead Christ between the living thieves,
 And, underneath, the traitor Judas lowers!
 Ah! from what agonies of heart and brain,
 What exultations trampling on despair, 10
 What tenderness, what tears, what hate of wrong,
 What passionate outcry of a soul in pain,
 Uprose this poem of the earth and air,
 This mediæval miracle of song!

I enter, and I see thee in the gloom
 Of the long aisles, O poet saturnine!
 And strive to make my steps keep pace with thine.
 The air is filled with some unknown perfume;
 The congregation of the dead make room
 For thee to pass; the votive tapers shine;
 Like rooks that haunt Ravenna's groves of pine
 The hovering echoes fly from tomb to tomb.
 From the confessionals I hear arise
 Rehearsals of forgotten tragedies, 10
 And lamentations from the crypts below;
 And then a voice celestial that begins
 With the pathetic words, "Although your sins
 As scarlet be," and ends with "as the snow."

With snow-white veil and garments as of flame,
 She stands before thee, who so long ago Filled thy young heart with passion and the woe
 From which thy song and all its splendors came;
 And while with stern rebuke she speaks thy name,

<sup>1</sup> courtyard before a church

The ice about thy heart melts as the snow
On mountain heights, and in swift overflow Comes gushing from thy lips in sobs of shame.

Thou makest full confession; and a gleam,
As of the dawn on some dark forest cast, 10
Seems on thy lifted forehead to increase;
Lethe and Eunoë<sup>1</sup>—the remembered dream
And the forgotten sorrow—bring at last
That perfect pardon which is perfect peace.

I lift mine eyes, and all the windows blaze
With forms of Saints and holy men who died,
Here martyred and hereafter glorified;
And the great Rose<sup>2</sup> upon its leaves displays Christ's Triumph, and the angelic round-lays,
With splendor upon splendor multiplied;
And Beatrice again at Dante's side
No more rebukes, but smiles her words of praise.

And then the organ sounds, and unseen choirs
Sing the old Latin hymns of peace and love
And benedictions of the Holy Ghost; 11
And the melodious bells among the spires O'er all the housetops and through heaven above
Proclaim the elevation of the Host!

O star of morning and of liberty!
O bringer of the light, whose splendor shines
Above the darkness of the Apennines,
Forerunner of the day that is to be!
The voices of the city and the sea,
The voices of the mountains and the pines,
Repeat thy song, till the familiar lines
Are footpaths for the thought of Italy!
Thy flame is blown abroad from all the heights,
Through all the nations, and a sound is heard, 10
As of a mighty wind, and men devout,

<sup>1</sup> the rivers of forgetfulness and remembrance    <sup>2</sup> See the mystic celestial rose in Paradiso, XXX-XXXI. A conventionalized stained-glass rose design was often placed in Gothic churches.

Strangers of Rome, and the new proselytes,
In their own language hear the wondrous word,
And many are amazed and many doubt.

GIOTTO'S TOWER

How many lives, made beautiful and sweet
By self-devotion and by self-restraint,
Whose pleasure is to run without complaint
On unknown errands of the Paraclete,<sup>1</sup>
Wanting the reverence of unshodden feet,
Fail of the nimbus which the artists paint
Around the shining forehead of the saint,
And are in their completeness incomplete!
In the old Tuscan town stands Giotto's tower,
The lily of Florence blossoming in stone,—
A vision, a delight, and a desire,— 11
The builder's perfect and centennial flower,
That in the night of ages bloomed alone,
But wanting still the glory of the spire.<sup>2</sup>

THE THREE SILENCES OF MOLINOS

TO JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER

THREE Silences there are: the first of speech,
The second of desire, the third of thought;
This is the lore a Spanish monk, distraught
With dreams and visions, was the first to teach.
These Silences, commingling each with each,
Made up the perfect Silence that he sought
And prayed for, and wherein at times he caught
Mysterious sounds from realms beyond our reach.
O thou, whose daily life anticipates
The life to come, and in whose thought and word 10
The spiritual world preponderates,
Hermit of Amesbury! thou too hast heard
Voices and melodies from beyond the gates,
And speakest only when thy soul is stirred!

MORITURI SALUTAMUS

Written in 1874, when the poet was sixty-seven, for the fiftieth anniversary of the class of 1825 of Bowdoin College, the reunion to be held the next summer. The idea and name of the poem came from a famous picture, "Gladiators Saluting Caesar," 1859, by the noted French artist, Jean Léon Gérôme (1824-1904). The gladiators, about to enter mortal combat, salute the emperor. Below it the artist placed their legendary words: Ave, Caesar Imperator, Morituri Te Salutant ("Hail, imperial Caesar, they who are about to die salute thee").

"O CAESAR, we who are about to die Salute you!" was the gladiators' cry In the arena, standing face to face With death and with the Roman populace.

O ye familiar scenes,—ye groves of pine,
That once were mine and are no longer mine,—

Thou river, widening through the meadows
green

To the vast sea, so near and yet unseen,—
Ye halls, in whose seclusion and repose
Phantoms of fame, like exhalations, rose 10
And vanished,—we who are about to die,
Salute you; earth and air and sea and sky,
And the Imperial Sun that scatters down
His sovereign splendors upon grove and town.

Ye do not answer us! ye do not hear!
We are forgotten; and in your austere
And calm indifference, ye little care
Whether we come or go, or whence or where.
What passing generations fill these halls,
What passing voices echo from these walls,
Ye heed not; we are only as the blast, 21
A moment heard, and then forever past.

Not so the teachers who in earlier days
Led our bewildered feet through learning's maze;

They answer us—alas! what have I said?
What greetings come there from the voiceless dead?

What salutation, welcome, or reply?
What pressure from the hands that lifeless lie?
They are no longer here; they all are gone
Into the land of shadows,—all save one. 30
Honor and reverence, and the good repute

That follows faithful service as its fruit,
Be unto him, whom living we salute.<sup>1</sup>

The great Italian poet, when he made
His dreadful journey to the realms of shade,
Met there the old instructor of his youth,
And cried in tone of pity and of ruth:<sup>2</sup>
"Oh, never from the memory of my heart
Your dear, paternal image shall depart,
Who while on earth, ere yet by death surprised, 40
Taught me how mortals are immortalized;
How grateful am I for that patient care
All my life long my language shall declare."

Today we make the poet's words our own,
And utter them in plaintive undertone;
Nor to the living only be they said,
But to the other living called the dead,
Whose dear, paternal images appear
Not wrapped in gloom, but roped in sunshine
here;
Whose simple lives, complete and without flaw, 50
Were part and parcel of great Nature's law;
Who said not to their Lord, as if afraid,
"Here is thy talent in a napkin laid,"
But labored in their sphere, as men who live
In the delight that work alone can give.
Peace be to them; eternal peace and rest,
And the fulfilment of the great behest:
"Ye have been faithful over a few things,
Over ten cities shall ye reign as kings."

And ye who fill the places we once filled, 60
And follow in the furrows that we tilled,
Young men, whose generous hearts are beating high,
We who are old, and are about to die,
Salute you; hail you; take your hands in ours,
And crown you with our welcome as with flowers!

How beautiful is youth! how bright it gleams
With its illusions, aspirations, dreams!
Book of Beginnings, Story without End,
Each maid a heroine, and each man a friend!

Aladdin's Lamp, and Fortunatus' Purse,<sup>1</sup> 70
 That holds the treasures of the universe!
 All possibilities are in its hands,
 No danger daunts it, and no foe withstands;
 In its sublime audacity of faith,
 "Be thou removed," it to the mountain saith,
 And with ambitious feet, secure and proud,
 Ascends the ladder leaning on the cloud!

As ancient Priam at the Scæan gate<sup>2</sup>
 Sat on the walls of Troy in regal state
 With the old men, too old and weak to fight,
 Chirping like grasshoppers in their delight 81
 To see the embattled hosts, with spear and shield,
 Of Trojans and Achaians in the field;
 So from the snowy summits of our years
 We see you in the plain, as each appears,
 And question of you; asking, "Who is he
 That towers above the others? Which may be Atreides, Menelaus, Odysseus,
 Ajax the great, or bold Idomeneus?"

Let him not boast who puts his armor on 90
 As he who puts it off, the battle done.
 Study yourselves; and most of all note well
 Wherein kind Nature meant you to excel.
 Not every blossom ripens into fruit;
 Minerva, the inventress of the flute,
 Flung it aside, when she her face surveyed
 Distorted in a fountain as she played;
 The unlucky Marsyas found it, and his fate
 Was one to make the bravest hesitate. 99
 Write on your doors the saying wise and old,
 "Be bold! be bold!" and everywhere, "Be bold;
 Be not too bold!" Yet better the excess
 Than the defect; better the more than less;
 Better like Hector in the field to die,
 Than like a perfumed Paris turn and fly.

And now, my classmates; ye remaining few
 That number not the half of those we knew,
 Ye, against whose familiar names not yet
 The fatal asterisk of death is set,<sup>4</sup>

Ye I salute! The horologe of Time 110
 Strikes the half-century with a solemn chime,
 And summons us together once again,
 The joy of meeting not unmixed with pain.

Where are the others? Voices from the deep Caverns of darkness answer me: "They sleep!"

I name no names; instinctively I feel Each at some well-remembered grave will kneel,
 And from the inscription wipe the weeds and
 moss,
 For every heart best knoweth its own loss.
 I see their scattered gravestones gleaming
 white 120
 Through the pale dusk of the impending night;

O'er all alike the impartial sunset throws
 Its golden lilies mingled with the rose;
 We give to each a tender thought, and pass
 Out of the graveyards with their tangled grass,
 Unto these scenes frequented by our feet
 When we were young, and life was fresh and sweet.

What shall I say to you? What can I say
 Better than silence is? When I survey
 This throng of faces turned to meet my own,
 Friendly and fair, and yet to me unknown, 131
 Transformed the very landscape seems to be;
 It is the same, yet not the same to me.
 So many memories crowd upon my brain,
 So many ghosts are in the wooded plain,
 I fain would steal away, with noiseless tread,
 As from a house where some one lieth dead.
 I cannot go;—I pause;—I hesitate;
 My feet reluctant linger at the gate;
 As one who struggles in a troubled dream 140
 To speak and cannot, to myself I seem.

Vanish the dream! Vanish the idle fears!
 Vanish the rolling mists of fifty years!
 Whatever time or space may intervene,
 I will not be a stranger in this scene.
 Here every doubt, all indecision, ends;
 Hail, my companions, comrades, classmates,
 friends!

Ah me! the fifty years since last we met
 Seem to me fifty folios bound and set
 By Time, the great transcriber, on his shelves,

Wherein are written the histories of ourselves. 151

What tragedies, what comedies, are there;
What joy and grief, what rapture and despair!
What chronicles of triumph and defeat,
Of struggle, and temptation, and retreat!
What records of regrets, and doubts, and fears!
What pages blotted, blistered by our tears!
What lovely landscapes on the margin shine,
What sweet, angelic faces, what divine
And holy images of love and trust, 160
Undimmed by age, unsoiled by damp or dust!

Whose hand shall dare to open and explore
These volumes, closed and clasped forever-more?

Nor mine. With reverential feet I pass;
I hear a voice that cries, "Alas! alas!
Whatever hath been written shall remain,
Nor be erased nor written o'er again;
The unwritten only still belongs to thee:
Take heed, and ponder well what that shall be."

As children frightened by a thunder-cloud 170
Are reassured if some one reads aloud
A tale of wonder, with enchantment fraught,
Or wild adventure, that diverts their thought,
Let me endeavor with a tale to chase
The gathering shadows of the time and place,
And banish what we all too deeply feel
Wholly to say, or wholly to conceal.

In mediaeval Rome, I know not where,<sup>1</sup>
There stood an image with its arm in air,
And on its lifted finger, shining clear, 180
A golden ring with the device, "Strike here!"
Greatly the people wondered, though none guessed

The meaning that these words but half expressed,
Until a learned clerk, who at noonday
With downcast eyes was passing on his way, Paused, and observed the spot, and marked it well,
Whereon the shadow of the finger fell;

And, coming back at midnight, delved, and found

A secret stairway leading underground.
Down this he passed into a spacious hall, 190
Lit by a flaming jewel on the wall;
And opposite, in threatening attitude,
With bow and shaft a brazen statue stood.
Upon its forehead, like a coronet,
Were these mysterious words of menace set:
"That which I am, I am; my fatal aim None can escape, not even yon luminous
flame!"

Midway the hall was a fair table placed,
With cloth of gold, and golden cups enchased
With rubies, and the plates and knives were gold, 200

And gold the bread and viands manifold.
Around it, silent, motionless, and sad,
Were seated gallant knights in armor clad,
And ladies beautiful with plume and zone,
But they were stone, their hearts within were stone;

And the vast hall was filled in every part
With silent crowds, stony in face and heart.

Long at the scene, bewildered and amazed,
The trembling clerk in speechless wonder gazed;

Then from the table, by his greed made bold, 210

He seized a goblet and a knife of gold,
And suddenly from their seats the guests up-sprang,

The vaulted ceiling with loud clamors rang,
The archer sped his arrow, at their call,
Shattering the lambent jewel on the wall,
And all was dark around and overhead;—
Stark on the floor the luckless clerk lay dead.

The writer of this legend then records
Its ghostly application in these words:
The image is the Adversary old, 220 Whose beckoning finger points to realms of
gold;

Our lusts and passions are the downward stair
That leads the soul from a diviner air;
The archer, Death; the flaming jewel, Life;
Terrestrial goods, the goblet and the knife;
The knights and ladies, all whose flesh and bone

By avarice have been hardened into stone;
The clerk, the scholar whom the love of pelf
Tempts from his books and from his nobler self.

The scholar and the world! The endless strife, 230
The discord in the harmonies of life!
The love of learning, the sequestered nooks,
And all the sweet serenity of books;
The market-place, the eager love of gain,
Whose aim is vanity, and whose end is pain!

But why, you ask me, should this tale be told
To men grown old, or who are growing old?
It is too late! Ah, nothing is too late
Till the tired heart shall cease to palpitate.
Cato learned Greek at eighty; Sophocles 240
Wrote his grand Ædipus, and Simonides
Bore off the prize of verse from his compeers,
When each had numbered more than fourscore years,

And Theophrastus, at fourscore and ten,
Had but begun his "Characters of Men."
Chaucer, at Woodstock with the nightin-gales,

At sixty wrote the Canterbury Tales;
Goethe at Weimar, toiling to the last,
Completed Faust when eighty years were past.
These are indeed exceptions; but they show
How far the gulf-stream of our youth may flow 251

Into the arctic regions of our lives,
Where little else than life itself survives.

As the barometer foretells the storm
While still the skies are clear, the weather
warm,

So something in us, as old age draws near,
Betrays the pressure of the atmosphere.
The nimble mercury, ere we are aware,
Descends the elastic ladder of the air;
The telltale blood in artery and vein 260
Sinks from its higher levels in the brain;
Whatever poet, orator, or sage

May say of it, old age is still old age.
It is the waning, not the crescent moon;
The dusk of evening, not the blaze of noon;
It is not strength, but weakness; not desire,
But its surcease; not the fierce heat of fire,
The burning and consuming element,

But that of ashes and of embers spent, 269
In which some living sparks we still discern,
Enough to warm, but not enough to burn.

What then? Shall we sit idly down and say
The night hath come; it is no longer day?
The night hath not yet come; we are not quite
Cut off from labor by the failing light;
Something remains for us to do or dare;
Even the oldest tree some fruit may bear;
Not Ædipus Coloneus, or Greek Ode,
Or tales of pilgrims that one morning rode
Out of the gateway of the Tabard Inn, 280
But other something, would we but begin;
For age is opportunity no less
Than youth itself, though in another dress,
And as the evening twilight fades away
The sky is filled with stars, invisible by day.

VICTOR AND VANQUISHED

As one who long hath fled with panting breath
Before his foe, bleeding and near to fall,
I turn and set my back against the wall,
And look thee in the face, triumphant Death.

I call for aid, and no one answereth;
I am alone with thee, who conquerest all;
Yet me thy threatening form doth not ap-pall,

For thou art but a phantom and a wraith.
Wounded and weak, sword broken at the hilt,

With armor shattered, and without a shield, 10

I stand unmoved; do with me what thou wilt;

I can resist no more, but will not yield.
This is no tournament where cowards tilt;
The vanquished here is victor of the field.

NATURE

As a fond mother, when the day is o'er,
Leads by the hand her little child to bed,
Half willing, half reluctant to be led,
And leave his broken playthings on the floor,
Still gazing at them through the open door,

Nor wholly reassured and comforted
 By promises of others in their stead,
 Which, though more splendid, may not please him more;
 So Nature deals with us, and takes away
 Our playthings one by one, and by the hand 10
 Leads us to rest so gently, that we go
 Scarce knowing if we wish to go or stay,
 Being too full of sleep to understand How far the unknown transcends the what we know. 1877

THE CROSS OF SNOW

IN the long, sleepless watches of the night,
 A gentle face—the face of one long dead—
 Looks at me from the wall, where round its head
 The night-lamp casts a halo of pale light.
 Here in this room she died; and soul more
 white
 Never through martyrdom of fire was led
 To its repose; nor can in books be read
 The legend of a life more benedight.
 There is a mountain in the distant West,<sup>1</sup>
 That, sun-defying, in its steep ravines 10
 Displays a cross of snow upon its side.
 Such is the cross I wear upon my breast

<sup>1</sup> probably the Mount of the Holy Cross in the Rocky Mountains near Red Cliff, Eagle County, Colorado

These eighteen years, through all the changing scenes
 And seasons, changeless since the day she died.<sup>1</sup>

JUGURTHA

Composed in 1879; published in the Ultima Thule volume, 1880. The poet's source was Plutarch's life of Marius. Jugurtha, a captive king of Numidia, after a triumphal procession, was thrown into a Roman prison and died there of starvation, B.C. 104. Longfellow changed Hercules, addressed in Plutarch's story, to Apollo, as more suitable.

How cold are thy baths, Apollo!
 Cried the African monarch, the splendid,
 As down to his death in the hollow
 Dark dungeons of Rome he descended,
 Uncrowned, unthroned, unattended;
 How cold are thy baths, Apollo!
 How cold are thy baths, Apollo!
 Cried the Poet, unknown, unbefriended,
 As the vision that lured him to follow
 With the mist and the darkness blended, 10
 And the dream of his life was ended;
 How cold are thy baths, Apollo!

1809 ~ Oliver Wendell Holmes ~ 1894

HOLMES was, even more unmistakably than Longfellow or Bryant or Hawthorne, the son and laureate of New England, and his and Lowell's were the last of its noted literary names. He was conscious of his distinguished ancestry and his connection with families prominent in colonial and Revolutionary days. He was a lineal descendant of Anne Bradstreet, the Phillips family, the Wendells, an old Dutch family, the Quincys, and the Hancocks, one of whom married Dorothy Quincy, the daughter of "Dorothy Q." Wendell Phillips was his cousin. His grandfather, David Holmes, of Connecticut Puritan stock, supposed to be the original of the deacon who built the "one-hoss shay," served in the Revolutionary army. His father, the Reverend Abiel Holmes, a Yale graduate, had a good library and was a writer of both verse and prose. A man of the strict Edwardian Calvinistic faith, pastor for forty years of the first church, Cambridge, he brought up his son in a religious, bookish atmosphere.

Holmes had a happy, successful life, without handicaps or tragedies. He was born in Cambridge, August 29, 1809, in the "house with the gambrel roof" near the old Harvard gymnasium, the house in which the Bunker Hill fight was planned. He was fond of remarking that Lincoln, Gladstone, Darwin, Tennyson, Poe, Chopin, and Mendelssohn were born in the same year. After youthful schooling at Cambridge he attended for one year the orthodox Phillips Academy at Andover, where he made a translation in heroic couplets of the first book of Virgil's Æneid. He described himself as a boy who liked to think and read, though he did not often read a book through. Among his early friends were Richard H. Dana and Margaret Fuller.

At the age of sixteen Holmes entered Harvard, and four years later was graduated with the famous class of 1829, for the anniversary of which he wrote many poems, the last in 1888. Besides his own classmates who later became illustrious, James Freeman Clark, writer and clergyman, and Samuel F. Smith, author of "America," he knew in college Charles Sumner of the class of 1830 and J. L. Motley of the class of 1831. At Harvard he came under Unitarian influence and belonged to a rather gay dramatic club, the Hasty Pudding. He made a good record, and like Emerson and Lowell was class poet. He remained a skipping reader, trying many books but rarely going through them as wholes. He showed his tendency toward literary expression by his connection with a college periodical and by the conscious literary form of his early letters. He liked especially the English classics, Pope's Homer, and the Encyclopaedia, then a comparative novelty.

After graduation he spent a year in the Law School but, disliking law, gave it up to study medicine. It was while he was studying law, in 1830, that he wrote "Old Ironsides," as well as some twenty other poems, humorous and sentimental, for the Harvard Collegian. After studying medicine in a private school in Boston, he went abroad in April, 1833, and studied for a year in Paris, traveling a little also in England, Germany, and Italy. Holmes's stay in Paris is thought to have increased the natural vivacity of his disposition and to have enhanced his "sparkle."

The next year he began the practice of medicine in Boston and published some creditable medical essays and presented discoveries of some importance. He was not of imposing presence, did not have the professional look or manner, and seemed too literary, or perhaps too given to levity, to acquire a large practice. Appointed professor of anatomy and physiology at Dartmouth College, he did not remain there but soon returned to Boston. In 1840 he married Amelia Lee Jackson.

He became Parkman Professor of anatomy and physiology in the medical school of Harvard in 1847, a post that he held for thirty-five years, delivering four lectures a week. He could enliven any subject he treated and even had a successful course at five in the afternoon. A considerable part of his time was devoted to lecturing about the country, for which he was in demand. Holmes achieved his literary reputation late, his place as a writer being established after 1857. In that year he began a series in the Atlantic Monthly through the influence of Lowell, who assumed the editorship on the condition that Holmes contribute. The Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table appeared in 1857-58 in that periodical, and The Professor at the Breakfast-Table in 1859-60. The Poet at the Breakfast-Table came next, in 1872, and Over the Teacups in 1891, when the poet was over eighty. Many of his best poems appeared in these series. His series of class poems, more than forty, were written from 1851 onward. At the age of seventy-seven he visited England and Europe, and honorary degrees were conferred on him by Oxford, Cambridge, and Edinburgh. He remained at Harvard as professor and professor emeritus for forty-seven years.

Holmes's three novels are concerned with problems of moral responsibility, especially with accountability for crime. They deal with inherited tendencies. Elsie Venner was published in 1861, The Guardian Angel in 1867, and A Mortal Antipathy in 1885. His friends called these books "medicated novels," and Holmes conceded the justness of the epithet. They impress their readers as thought out by a physician and written by an essayist. They lack close-knit structure and often plausibility. Holmes also wrote two biographies, a life of Motley in 1879 and a life of Emerson in 1885. As his life went on, his time went more and more to literary pursuits and less to medicine. He died October 7, 1894.

Holmes's ideas concerning prosody may be found in his essay, "The Physiology of Versification," in Pages from an Old Volume of Life (1892). He finds a physiological connection between the laws of versification and the respiration and the pulse. Holmes believed the octosyllabic couplet singularly easy to read aloud because "it follows more exactly than any other measure the natural rhythm of expiration." His views of poetry may be found here and there in his verse ("The Voiceless," "At the Saturday Club," "Poetry: a Metrical Essay," and pieces concerning various poets) and in stray passages from the volumes of the Breakfast-Table series. He believed in the association of sentiment and humor in a poem, and insisted on the distinction between scientific truth and imaginative truth, the latter the province of the poet. He dealt with his own thoughts and emotions, but felt that the true poet should try to penetrate through his subjectivity to "the bedrock of human nature which he has." H. H. Clark writes of him (Major American Poets, p. 892): "As a scientist and religious thinker, Holmes was radically hostile toward European traditionalisms and radiantly optimistic about the possibilities of the New World and of Boston. . . . As a literary theorist, however, he held that, 'aesthetically speaking, America is after all a penal colony,' that our writers can profit not only by our 'couple of centuries of half-starved civilization' but also by the rich literary tradition of Europe extending back to the ancients such as his favorite Horace, a tradition that he likened to 'a still lakelet, a mountain tarn, fed by springs that never fail.' Ultimately, then, although Holmes's literary theory is touched by some of the current romantic doctrines, it has an interesting kinship with that of such neoclassicists as Pope and the Augustans, of whose urbanity and cheer Holmes is our most eminent spokesman."

Holmes was almost as versatile as Lowell. He was a man of science, physician, poet, professor, essayist, and novelist, had many social interests, and was personally very popular. He experimented with the microscope before this was held necessary in the study of anatomy, and he liked amateur photography. He was hardly a genuine investigator, yet he invented several useful instruments. Theology was another of his especial interests. His favorite subject was moral responsibility for sin, in the light of determining influences of environment and heredity. In all but religion he was a conservative. Here he was a militant Unitarian, in reaction from the strictness of his father. Boston he thought of as the home of free thought and speech and the intellectual center of the America of his day, and he had the highest confidence in his own caste, the "Brahmins." He expected Boston to retain its dominating position in the future.

Holmes's best prose appears in the Breakfast-Table series. He wrote light prose with facility and finish and made his papers both entertaining and instructive. The advantage of the method he employed, that of the monologist, enabled him to treat topics briefly and informally and from the point of view of both the literary man and the scientist. Gifted in delivery, bubbling with vivacity, and accounted the chief wit of Boston, he preserved in his series the talk of his city's stellar conversationalist. He treats a variety of subjects whimsically and discursively, and his topics have been little touched by time. If he left followers, they are the newspaper columnists of today, writing verse and prose for daily entertainment.

Much of his verse was made to order for occasions; for his muse was very facile and it was available for inaugurations, commemorative services, dedications of public buildings, anniversary meetings, dinners, the arrivals and departures of celebrities, birthdays, elegies, and tributes. His favorite forms are the couplet and the quatrain. Unlike other poets of his time, he did not write of the Old World or the past or of nature or contemporary public topics. He was less an admirer of the romantic themes that attracted Longfellow and Lowell than he was of eighteenth-century wit and satire. His was chiefly rationalistic verse coming from observation and experience: serious lyrical poems, seriocomic and comic poems, narrative poems, and occasional poems. Those that began gravely might end in jest, and those that began in jest might end in pathos. Holmes's speeches or recitals are said to have been almost a dramatic entertainment in which his whole personality expressed and interpreted what he presented. Read, instead of heard as he delivered them, his verses seem thinner and less vital; but many of them have lasting popular appeal and he has won himself a secure niche in American literature.

The standard collected edition of Holmes's works is the Riverside (13 vols., 1891-1892). The addition of J. T. Morse's Life and Letters increased it to 15 vols. in 1896. Horace E. Scudder edited Holmes's Complete Poetical Works, Cambridge Edition (1895).

Biographies are J. T. Morse, Jr., Life and Letters of Oliver Wendell Holmes (1896), and L. W. Townsend, Oliver Wendell Holmes (1907). Among articles may be mentioned E. E. Hale's "Some Personal Recollections of Oliver Wendell Holmes," in the Arena, XV (Dec., 1895), and J. T. Trowbridge's "Recollections," in the Atlantic, XCI (May, 1903). M. A. De Wolfe Howe wrote of Holmes in the DAB, IX (1932).

George B. Ives published A Bibliography of Oliver Wendell Holmes (1907), listing his contributions to periodicals.

OLD IRONSIDES

When the secretary of the navy proposed, in September, 1830, that the naval ship Constitution, popularly called Old Ironsides, which had done remarkable historic service, be broken up and sold, Holmes, then a student in law school, wrote this impromptu outburst. Feeling was aroused, and the ship was saved. As late as 1931, rebuilt by the pennies of schoolchildren, the old ship (it was begun in 1794 and launched in 1797) revisited many American ports.

AYE, tear her tattered ensign down!
 Long has it waved on high,
 And many an eye has danced to see
 That banner in the sky;
 Beneath it rung the battle shout,
 And burst the cannon's roar;—
 The meteor of the ocean air
 Shall sweep the clouds no more!

Her deck, once red with heroes' blood,
 Where knelt the vanquished foe,                   10
 When winds were hurrying o'er the flood
 And waves were white below,
 No more shall feel the victor's tread,
 Or know the conquered knee;—
 The harpies of the shore shall pluck
 The eagle of the sea!

O better that her shattered hulk
 Should sink beneath the wave;
 Her thunders shook the mighty deep,
 And there should be her grave;                   20
 Nail to the mast her holy flag,
 Set every threadbare sail,
 And give her to the god of storms,—
 The lightning and the gale!

THE LAST LEAF

The old man of this poem was Major Thomas Melville, called the "last of the cocked hats," who was a participant in the "Boston Tea Party." He was the grandfather of Herman Melville. In old age he still wore the colonial costume described in the poem, and was a well-known figure about the streets of Boston. President Lincoln greatly liked this poem, especially the fourth stanza.

I saw him once before,
As he passed by the door,
And again
The pavement stones resound
As he totters o'er the ground
With his cane.

They say that in his prime
Ere the pruning-knife of Time
Cut him down,
Not a better man was found 10
By the Crier on his round
Through the town.

But now he walks the streets,
And looks at all he meets
Sad and wan,
And he shakes his feeble head,
That it seems as if he said,
"They are gone."

The mossy marbles rest
On the lips that he has prest 20
In their bloom,
And the names he loved to hear
Have been carved for many a year
On the tomb.

My grandmamma has said,—
Poor old lady, she is dead
Long ago,—
That he had a Roman nose,
And his cheek was like a rose
In the snow; 30

But now his nose is thin,
And it rests upon his chin
Like a staff,
And a crook is in his back,
And a melancholy crack
In his laugh.

I know it is a sin
For me to sit and grin
At him here;
But the old three-cornered hat, 40
And the breeches, and all that,
Are so queer!

And if I should live to be
The last leaf upon the tree
In the spring,
Let them smile, as I do now,
At the old forsaken bough
Where I cling.

MY AUNT

First printed in the New England Magazine, October, 1831. Light is thrown in this poem on the educational methods, fortunately now long outdated, in the girls' "finishing schools" of Holmes's day.

My aunt! my dear unmarried aunt!
Long years have o'er her flown,
Yet still she strains the aching clasp
That binds her virgin zone;
I know it hurts her, though she looks
As cheerful as she can;
Her waist is ampler than her life,
For life is but a span.

My aunt! my poor deluded aunt!
Her hair is almost gray; 10
Why will she train that winter curl
In such a spring-like way?
How can she lay her glasses down
And say she reads as well,
When through a double convex lens
She just makes out to spell?

Her father—grandpapa! forgive
This erring lip its smiles—
Vowed she should make the finest girl
Within a hundred miles; 20
He sent her to a stylish school—
'Twas in her thirteenth June—
And with her, as the rules required,
"Two towels and a spoon."

They braced my aunt against a board,
To make her straight and tall;
They laced her up, they starved her down,
To make her light and small;

They pinched her feet, they singed her hair,
 They screwed it up with pins;— 30
 Oh, never mortal suffered more
 In penance for her sins.

So when my precious aunt was done,
 My grandsire brought her back
 (By daylight, lest some rabid youth Might follow on the track).
 "Ah!" said my grandsire as he shook
 Some powder in his pan,
 "What could this lovely creature do Against a desperate man?" 40

Alas! nor chariot, nor barouche,
 Nor bandit cavalcade,
 Tore from the trembling father's arms
 His all-accomplished maid.
 For her how happy had it been!
 And Heaven had spared to me
 To see one sad, ungathered rose
 On my ancestral tree.

ON LENDING A PUNCH-BOWL

"This 'punch-bowl' was, according to old family tradition, a caudle-cup. It is a massive piece of silver, its cherubs and other ornaments of coarse repoussé work, and has two handles like a loving-cup, by which it was held, or passed from guest to guest." [Holmes's note.]

THIS ancient silver bowl of mine, it tells of good old times,
 Of joyous days, and jolly nights, and merry
 Christmas chimes;
 They were a free and jovial race, but honest,
 brave, and true,
 That dipped their ladle in the punch when this old bowl was new.

A Spanish galleon brought the bar,—so runs the ancient tale;
 'Twas hammered by an Antwerp smith, whose arm was like a flail;
 And now and then between the strokes, for fear his strength should fail,
 He wiped his brow, and quaffed a cup of good old Flemish ale.

'Twas purchased by an English squire to please his loving dame,
 Who saw the cherubs, and conceived a longing for the same; 10

And oft as on the ancient stock another twig was found,
 'Twas filled with caudle spiced and hot, and handed smoking round.

But, changing hands, it reached at length a
 Puritan divine,
 Who used to follow Timothy, and take a little wine,
 But hated punch and prelacy; and so it was,
 perhaps,
 He went to Leyden, where he found conventicles and schnapps.

And then, of course, you know what's next,
 —it left the Dutchman's shore
 With those that in the Mayflower came,—a hundred souls and more,— Along with all the furniture, to fill their new abodes,—
 To judge by what is still on hand, at least a hundred loads. 20

'Twas on a dreary winter's eve, the night was closing dim,
 When brave Miles Standish took the bowl,
 and filled it to the brim;
 The little Captain stood and stirred the posset with his sword,
 And all his sturdy men-at-arms were ranged about the board.
 He poured the fiery Hollands in,—the man that never feared,—
 He took a long and solemn draught, and wiped his yellow beard;
 And one by one the musketeers—the men that fought and prayed—
 All drank as 'twere their mother's milk, and not a man afraid.

That night, affrighted from his nest, the screaming eagle flew,
 He heard the Pequot's ringing whoop, the soldier's wild halloo; 30
 And there the sachem learned the rule he taught to kith and kin,
 "Run from the white man when you find he smells of Hollands gin!"

A hundred years, and fifty more, had spread their leaves and snows,
 A thousand rubs had flattened down each little cherub's nose;

When once again the bowl was filled, but not in mirth or joy,—

'Twas mingled by a mother's hand to cheer her parting boy.

"Drink, John," she said, "'twill do you good,
—poor child, you'll never bear

This working in the dismal trench, out in the midnight air;

And if—God bless me!—you were hurt,
'twould keep away the chill";

So John did drink,—and well he wrought that night at Bunker's Hill! 40

I tell you, there was generous warmth in good old English cheer;

I tell you, 'twas a pleasant thought to bring its symbol here.

'Tis but the fool that loves excess; hast thou a drunken soul?

Thy bane is in thy shallow skull, not in my silver bowl!

I love the memory of the past,—its pressed yet fragrant flowers,—

The moss that clothes its broken walls,—the ivy on its towers;—

Nay, this poor bauble it bequeathed,—my eyes grow moist and dim,

To think of all the vanished joys that danced around its brim.

Then fill a fair and honest cup, and bear it straight to me;

The goblet hallows all it holds, whate'er the liquid be; 50

And may the cherubs on its face protect me
from the sin,

That dooms one to those dreadful words,—
"My dear, where have you been?"

THE DEACON'S MASTERPIECE;

OR, THE WONDERFUL "ONE-HOSS SHAY."

A LOGICAL STORY

From The Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table, No. XI, printed in the Atlantic Monthly, September, 1858. Professor Barrett Wendell interpreted the poem as a satirical allegory of Calvinism and its breakdown, an explanation that would be much clearer to hearers when Holmes recited it than to readers now. All that logic could compass went into the making of the "wonderful one-hoss shay";

yet finally, all of a sudden, it went to pieces.

HAVE you heard of the wonderful one-hoss
shay,

That was built in such a logical way
It ran a hundred years to a day,

And then, of a sudden, it—ah, but stay,
I'll tell you what happened without delay,
Scaring the parson into fits,
Frightening people out of their wits,—
Have you ever heard of that, I say?

Seventeen hundred and fifty-five.

Georgius Secundus was then alive,— 10
Snuffy old drone from the German hive!

That was the year when Lisbon-town
Saw the earth open and gulp her down,
And Braddock's army was done so brown,
Left without a scalp to its crown.

It was on the terrible Earthquake-day
That the Deacon finished the one-hoss shay.

Now in building of chaises, I tell you what,
There is always somewhere a weakest spot,—
In hub, tire, felloe, in spring or thill, 20
In panel, or crossbar, or floor, or sill,
In screw, bolt, thoroughbrace,—lurking still,
Find it somewhere you must and will,—
Above or below, or within or without,—
And that's the reason, beyond a doubt,
That a chaise breaks down, but doesn't wear out.

But the Deacon swore (as Deacons do,
With an "I dew vum," or an "I tell yeou")
He would build one shay to beat the taown
'N' the keounty 'n' all the kentry raoun'; 30
It should be so built that it couldn' break
daown:

—"Fur," said the Deacon, "'t's mighty plain
That the weakes' place mus' stan' the strain;
'N' the way t' fix it, uz I maintain,
Is only jest

T' make that place uz strong uz the rest."

So the Deacon inquired of the village folk
Where he could find the strongest oak,
That couldn't be split nor bent nor broke,—
That was for spokes and floor and sills; 40
He sent for lancewood to make the thills;
The crossbars were ash, from the straightest
trees;

The panels of white-wood, that cuts like cheese,
But lasts like iron for things like these;
The hubs of logs from the "Settler's ellum,"—
Last of its timber,—they couldn't sell 'em,
Never an axe had seen their chips,
And the wedges flew from between their lips,
Their blunt ends frizzled like celery-tips;
Step and prop-iron, bolt and screw, 50
Spring, tire, axle, and linchpin too,
Steel of the finest, bright and blue;
Thoroughbrace bison-skin, thick and wide;
Boot, top, dasher, from tough old hide
Found in the pit when the tanner died.
That was the way he "put her through."
"There!" said the Deacon, "naow she'll dew!"

Do! I tell you, I rather gues
She was a wonder, and nothing less!
Colts grew horses, beards turned gray, 60
Deacon and deaconess dropped away,
Children and grandchildren—where were they?

But there stood the stout old one-hoss shay
As fresh as on Lisbon-earthquake-day!

EIGHTEEN HUNDRED;—it came and found
The Deacon's masterpiece strong and sound.
Eighteen hundred increased by ten;—
"Hahnsum kerridge" they called it then.
Eighteen hundred and twenty came;—
Running as usual; much the same. 70
Thirty and forty at last arrive,
And then come fifty, and FIFTY-FIVE.

Little of all we value here
Wakes on the morn of its hundredth year
Without both feeling and looking queer.
In fact, there's nothing that keeps its youth,
So far as I know, but a tree and truth.
(This is a moral that runs at large;
Take it.—You're welcome.—No extra charge.)

FIRST OF NOVEMBER,—the Earthquake-day.—
There are traces of age in the one-hoss shay,
A general flavor of mild decay, 82
But nothing local, as one may say.
There couldn't be,—for the Deacon's art
Had made it so like in every part
That there wasn't a chance for one to start.
For the wheels were just as strong as the thills,
And the floor was just as strong as the sills,

And the panels just as strong as the floor,
And the whippletree neither less nor more, 90
And the back crossbar as strong as the fore,
And spring and axle and hub encore.
And yet, as a whole, it is past a doubt
In another hour it will be worn out!

First of November, 'Fifty-five!
This morning the parson takes a drive.
Now, small boys, get out of the way!
Here comes the wonderful one-hoss shay,
Drawn by a rat-tailed, ewe-necked bay.
"Huddup!" said the parson.—Off went
they. 100

The parson was working his Sunday's text,—
Had got to fifthly, and stopped perplexed
At what the—Moses—was coming next.
All at once the horse stood still,
Close by the meet'n'-house on the hill.
—First a shiver, and then a thrill,
Then something decidedly like a spill,—
And the parson was sitting upon a rock,
At half-past nine by the meet'n'-house clock,—

Just the hour of the Earthquake shock! 110
—What do you think the parson found,
When he got up and stared around?
The poor old chaise in a heap or mound,
As if it had been to the mill and ground!
You see, of course, if you're not a dunce,
How it went to pieces all at once,—
All at once and nothing first,—
Just as bubbles do when they burst.

End of the wonderful one-hoss shay.
Logic is logic. That's all I say. 120

THE VOICELESS

In an introductory paragraph to this poem in the Autocrat, Holmes said, "Read what the singing-women—one to ten thousand of the suffering women—tell us, and think of the griefs that die unspoken! Nature is in earnest when she makes a woman; and there are women enough lying in the next churchyard with very commonplace blue slate-stones at their head and feet, for whom it was just as true that 'all sounds of life assumed one tone of love,' as for Letitia Landon, of whom Elizabeth Browning said it; but she could give words to her grief, and they could not."

WE count the broken lyres that rest
 Where the sweet wailing singers slumber,
 But o'er their silent sister's breast
 The wild flowers who will stoop to number?
 A few can touch the magic string,
 And noisy Fame is proud to win them:—
 Alas for those that never sing,
 But die with all their music in them!

Nay, grieve not for the dead alone
 Whose song has told their hearts' sad story,—<sup>10</sup>
 Weep for the voiceless, who have known
 The cross without the crown of glory!
 Not where Leucadian breezes<sup>1</sup> sweep
 O'er Sappho's memory-haunted billow,
 But where the glistening night-dews weep
 On nameless sorrow's churchyard pillow.

O hearts that break and give no sign
 Save whitening lip and fading tresses,
 Till Death pours out his longed-for wine
 Slow-dropped from Misery's crushing presses,—<sup>20</sup>
 If singing breath or echoing chord
 To every hidden pang were given,
 What endless melodies were poured,
 As sad as earth, as sweet as heaven!

THE BOYS

Read by Holmes at the thirtieth reunion of the class of 1829 of Harvard, held January 6, 1859. Published as part of The Professor at the Breakfast-Table in the Atlantic Monthly, February, 1859. Some of the classmates alluded to were George T. Davis (the member of Congress), James Freeman Clarke (the "Reverend"), B. R. Curtis (the "Judge"), George T. Bigelow (the "Justice"), Benjamin Peirce (the Harvard mathematician), the Reverend S. F. Smith (the author of "America"), and the Reverend Samuel May (the abolitionist). For a complete roll call of this distinguished class at Harvard, see the Cambridge edition of Holmes's poems, p. 340.

HAS there any old fellow got mixed with the boys?
 If there has, take him out, without making a noise.

<sup>1</sup> According to legend, the Greek poet Sappho (about B.C. 600) threw herself into the sea from a cliff in Leucadia, one of the Ionian Islands.

Hang the Almanac's cheat and the Catalogue's spite!
 Old Time is a liar! We're twenty tonight!

We're twenty! We're twenty! Who says we are more?
 He's tipsy,—young jackanapes!—show him the door!
 "Gray temples at twenty?"—Yes! white if we please;
 Where the snowflakes fall thickest there's nothing can freeze!

Was it snowing I spoke of? Excuse the mistake!
 Look close,—you will see not a sign of a flake;
 We want some new garlands for those we have shed,—<sup>10</sup>
 And these are white roses in place of the red!

We've a trick, we young fellows, you may have been told,
 Of talking (in public) as if we were old:—
 That boy we call "Doctor," and this we call "Judge";
 It's a neat little fiction,—of course it's all fudge.

That fellow's the "Speaker,"—the one on the right;
 "Mr. Mayor," my young one, how are you tonight?
 That's our "Member of Congress," we say when we chaff;
 There's the "Reverend" What's his name?
 —don't make me laugh.<sup>20</sup>

That boy with the grave mathematical look
 Made believe he had written a wonderful book,
 And the ROYAL SOCIETY thought it was true!
 So they chose him right in; a good joke it was,
 too!

There's a boy, we pretend, with a three-decker brain,
 That could harness a team with a logical chain;
 When he spoke for our manhood in syllabled fire,
 We called him "The Justice," but now he's "The Squire."

And there's a nice youngster of excellent pith,—
Fate tried to conceal him by naming him
Smith; 30
But he shouted a song for the brave and the free,—
Just read on his medal, "My country," "of thee!"

You hear that boy laughing?—You think he's all fun;
But the angels laugh, too, at the good he has done;
The children laugh loud as they troop to his call,
And the poor man that knows him laughs loudest of all!

Yes, we're boys,—always playing with tongue or with pen,—
And I sometimes have asked,—Shall we ever be men?
Shall we always be youthful and laughing and gay,
Till the last dear companion drops smiling
away? 40

Then here's to our boyhood, its gold and its gray!
The stars of its winter, the dews of its May!
And when we have done with our life-lasting toys,
Dear Father, take care of thy children, THE Boys!

BROTHER JONATHAN'S LAMENT FOR SISTER CAROLINE

Occasioned by the secession of South Carolina, December 20, 1860. Compare Lowell's "Jonathan to John" in the Biglow Papers. Holmes dated his poem March 25, 1861; it was written shortly before the bombardment of Fort Sumter.

SHE has gone,—she has left us in passion and pride.—
Our stormy-browed sister, so long at our side!
She has torn her own star from our firma-
ment's glow,
And turned on her brother the face of a foel

Oh, Caroline, Caroline, child of the sun,
We can never forget that our hearts have been one,—
Our foreheads both sprinkled in Liberty's
name,
From the fountain of blood with the finger of
flame!

You were always too ready to fire at a touch;
But we said, "She is hasty,—she does not mean much." 10
We have scowled, when you uttered some turbulent threat;
But Friendship still whispered, "Forgive and forget!"

Has our love all died out? Have its altars grown cold?
Has the curse come at last which the fathers foretold?
Then Nature must teach us the strength of the chain
That her petulant children would sever in vain.

They may fight till the buzzards are gorged
with their spoil,
Till the harvest grows black as it rots in the soil,
Till the wolves and the catamounts troop
from their caves,
And the shark tracks the pirate, the lord of the waves: 20

In vain is the strife! When its fury is past,
Their fortunes must flow in one channel at last,
As the torrents that rush from the mountains of snow
Roll mingled in peace through the valleys
below.

Our Union is river, lake, ocean, and sky:
Man breaks not the medal, when God cuts the die!
Though darkened with sulphur, though cloven
with steel,
The blue arch will brighten, the waters will heal!

Oh, Caroline, Caroline, child of the sun,
 There are battles with Fate that can never be won! 30
 The star-flowering banner must never be furled,
 For its blossoms of light are the hope of the world!

Go, then, our rash sister! afar and aloof,
 Run wild in the sunshine away from our roof;
 But when your heart aches and your feet have grown sore,
 Remember the pathway that leads to our door!

DOROTHY Q.

A FAMILY PORTRAIT

Holmes's great-grandmother was a niece of Josiah Quincy, Jr., father of the statesman, orator, and historian, Josiah Quincy of the post-Revolutionary period. Holmes is concerned in this poem with the question, "What should I have been if one of my great-grandmothers had married another man?"

GRANDMOTHER'S mother: her age, I guess,
 Thirteen summers, or something less;
 Girlish bust, but womanly air;
 Smooth, square forehead with uprolled hair;
 Lips that lover has never kissed;
 Taper fingers and slender wrist;
 Hanging sleeves of stiff brocade;
 So they painted the little maid.

On her hand a parrot green
 Sits unmoving and broods serene. 10
 Hold up the canvas full in view,—
 Look! there's a rent the light shines through,
 Dark with a century's fringe of dust,—
 That was a Red-Coat's rapier-thrust!
 Such is the tale the lady old,
 Dorothy's daughter's daughter, told.

Who the painter was none may tell,—
 One whose best was not over well;
 Hard and dry, it must be confessed,
 Flat as a rose that has long been pressed; 20
 Yet in her cheek the hues are bright,
 Dainty colors of red and white,
 And in her slender shape are seen
 Hint and promise of stately mien.

Look not on her with eyes of scorn,—
 Dorothy Q. was a lady born!
 Ay! since the galloping Normans came,
 England's annals have known her name;
 And still to the three-hilled rebel town
 Dear is that ancient name's renown, 30
 For many a civic wreath they won,
 The youthful sire and the gray-haired son.

O Damsel Dorothy! Dorothy Q.!
 Strange is the gift that I owe to you;
 Such a gift as never a king
 Save to daughter or son might bring,—
 All my tenure of heart and hand,
 All my title to house and land;
 Mother and sister and child and wife
 And joy and sorrow and death and life! 40

What if a hundred years ago
 Those close-shut lips had answered No,
 When forth the tremulous question came
 That cost the maiden her Norman name,
 And under the folds that look so still
 The bodice swelled with the bosom's thrill?
 Should I be I, or would it be
 One tenth another, to nine tenths me?

Soft is the breath of a maiden's YES:
 Not the light gossamer stirs with less; 50
 But never a cable that holds so fast
 Through all the battles of wave and blast,
 And never an echo of speech or song
 That lives in the babbling air so long!
 There were tones in the voice that whispered
 then
 You may hear today in a hundred men.

O lady and lover, how faint and far
 Your images hover,—and here we are,
 Solid and stirring in flesh and bone,—
 Edward's and Dorothy's—all their own,— 60
 A goodly record for Time to show
 Of a syllable spoken so long ago!—
 Shall I bless you, Dorothy, or forgive
 For the tender whisper that bade me live?

It shall be a blessing, my little maid!
 I will heal the stab of the Red-Coat's blade,
 And freshen the gold of the tarnished frame,
 And gild with a rhyme your household name
 So you shall smile on us brave and bright
 As first you greeted the morning's light, 70

And live untroubled by woes and fears
Through a second youth of a hundred years.

AT THE SATURDAY CLUB

The Saturday Club came to life in the late 1850's. Its members dined together once a month at the Parker House. Holmes was deeply attached to it and attended it regularly. He wrote of it: "The Saturday Club was founded, or rather found itself in existence without any organization, almost without parentage. It was natural enough that such men as Emerson, Longfellow, Agassiz, Peirce, with Hawthorne, Motley, Sumner when within reach, and others who would be good company for them, should meet and dine together once in a while, as they did, in point of fact. . . . The club deserves being remembered for having no constitution, or by-laws, for making no speeches, reading no papers, observing no ceremonies, coming and going at will without remark, and acting out, though it did not proclaim the motto, 'Shall I not take mine ease in mine inn?'"

THIS is our place of meeting: opposite That towered and pillared building: look at it;

King's Chapel in the Second George's day,
Rebellion stole its regal name away,—
Stone Chapel sounded better; but at last
The poisoned name of our provincial past
Had lost its ancient venom; then once more
Stone Chapel was King's Chapel as before.
(So let rechristened North Street, when it can,

Bring back the days of Marlborough and Queen Anne!) 10

Next the old church your wandering eye will meet—

A granite pile that stares upon the street—
Our civic temple; slanderous tongues have said

Its shape was modelled from St. Botolph's
head,

Lofty, but narrow; jealous passers-by
Say Boston always held her head too high.

Turn halfway round, and let your look survey

The white façade that gleams across the way,—
The many-windowed building, tall and wide,
The palace-inn that shows its northern side 20

In grateful shadow when the sunbeams beat
The granite wall in summer's scorching heat.
This is the place; whether its name you spell
Tavern, or caravansera, or hotel.

Would I could steal its echoes! you should find Such store of vanished pleasures brought to mind:

Such feasts! the laughs of many a jocund hour
That shook the mortar from King George's tower;

Such guests! What famous names its record boasts,

Whose owners wander in the mob of ghosts!
Such stories! Every beam and plank is filled 31
With juicy wit the joyous talkers spilled,
Ready to ooze, as once the mountain pine
The floors are laid with oozed its turpentine!

A month had flitted since The Club had met;

The day came round; I found the table set,
The waiters lounging round the marble stairs,
Empty as yet the double row of chairs.

I was a full half hour before the rest,
Alone, the banquet-chamber's single guest. 40
So from the table's side a chair I took,
And having neither company nor book
To keep me waking, by degrees there crept
A torpor over me,—in short, I slept.

Loosed from its chain, along the wreckstrorn track

Of the dead years my soul goes travelling back;

My ghosts take on their robes of flesh; it seems
Dreaming is life; nay, life less life than dreams,
So real are the shapes that meet my eyes.

They bring no sense of wonder, no surprise, 50

No hint of other than an earth-born source;
All seems plain daylight, everything of course.

How dim the colors are, how poor and faint
This palette of weak words with which I paint!
Here sit my friends; if I could fix them so
As to my eyes they seem, my page would glow
Like a queen's missal, warm as if the brush
Of Titian or Velasquez brought the flush
Of life into their features. Ay de mi!<sup>1</sup>

If syllables were pigments, you should see 60
Such breathing portraitures as never man
Found in the Pitti or the Vatican.

<sup>1</sup> Spanish for "Alas, poor me!"

Here sits our POET, Laureate, if you will.
Long has he worn the wreath, and wears it still.

Dead? Nay, not so; and yet they say his bust
Looks down on marbles covering royal dust,
Kings by the Grace of God, or Nature's grace;
Dead? No! Alive! I see him in his place,
Full-featured, with the bloom that heaven denies

Her children, pinched by cold New England skies, 70

Too often, while the nursery's happier few
Win from a summer cloud its roseate hue.
Kind, soft-voiced, gentle, in his eye there shines

The ray serene that filled Evangeline's.

Modest he seems, not shy; content to wait
Amid the noisy clamor of debate
The looked-for moment when a peaceful word
Smooths the rough ripples louder tongues have stirred.

In every tone I mark his tender grace
And all his poems hinted in his face; 80
What tranquil joy his friendly presence gives!
How could I think him dead? He lives! He lives!

There, at the table's further end I see
In his old place our Poet's vis-à-vis,
The great PROFESSOR, strong, broad-shouldered, square,

In life's rich noontide, joyous, debonair.
His social hour no leaden care alloys,
His laugh rings loud and mirthful as a boy's,—
That lusty laugh the Puritan forgot,—
What ear has heard it and remembers not? 90

How often, halting at some wide crevasse
Amid the windings of his Alpine pass,
High up the cliffs, the climbing mountaineer,
Listening the far-off avalanche to hear,
Silent, and leaning on his steel-shod staff,
Has heard that cheery voice, that ringing laugh,

From the rude cabin whose nomadic walls
Creep with the moving glacier as it crawls!

How does vast Nature lead her living train
In ordered sequence through that spacious brain, 100

As in the primal hour when Adam named
The new-born tribes that young creation claimed!—

How will her realm be darkened, losing thee,
Her darling, whom we call our AGASSIZ!

But who is he whose massive frame belies
The maiden shyness of his downcast eyes?
Who broods in silence till, by questions
pressed,
Some answer struggles from his laboring breast?

An artist Nature meant to dwell apart,
Locked in his studio with a human heart, 110
Tracking its caverned passions to their lair,
And all its throbbing mysteries laying bare.

Count it no marvel that he broods alone
Over the heart he studies,—'tis his own;
So in his page, whatever shape it wear,
The Essex wizard's shadowed self is there,—
The great ROMANCER, hid beneath his veil
Like the stern preacher of his somber tale;
Virile in strength, yet bashful as a girl,
Prouder than Hester, sensitive as Pearl. 120

From his mild throng of worshippers released,

Our Concord Delphi sends its chosen priest,
Prophet or poet, mystic, sage, or seer,
By every title always welcome here.
Why that ethereal spirit's frame describe?
You know the race-marks of the Brahmin tribe,—

The spare, slight form, the sloping shoulders'
droop,

The calm, scholastic mien, the clerkly stoop,
The lines of thought the sharpened features
wear,

Carved by the edge of keen New England
air. 130

List! for he speaks! As when a king would choose

The jewels for his bride, he might refuse
This diamond for its flaw,—find that less bright

Than those, its fellows, and a pearl less white
Than fits her snowy neck, and yet at last,
The fairest gems are chosen, and made fast
In golden fetters; so, with light delays
He seeks the fittest word to fill his phrase;
Nor vain nor idle his fastidious quest, 139
His chosen word is sure to prove the best.

Where in the realm of thought, whose air is song,
Does he, the Buddha of the West, belong?

He seems a wingèd Franklin, sweetly wise,
 Born to unlock the secrets of the skies;
 And which the nobler calling,—if 'tis fair
 Terrestrial with celestial to compare,—
 To guide the storm-cloud's elemental flame,
 Or walk the chambers whence the lightning
 came,
 Amidst the sources of its subtile fire,
 And steal their effluence for his lips and lyre?
 If lost at times in vague aerial flights, 151
 None treads with firmer footstep when he lights;
 A soaring nature, ballasted with sense,
 Wisdom without her wrinkles or pretence,
 In every Bible he has faith to read,
 And every altar helps to shape his creed.

Ask you what name this prisoned spirit bears
 While with ourselves this fleeting breath it shares?
 Till angels greet him with a sweeter one
 In heaven, on earth we call him EMERSON. 160

I start; I wake; the vision is withdrawn;
 Its figures fading like the stars at dawn;
 Crossed from the roll of life their cherished names,
 And memory's pictures fading in their frames;
 Yet life is lovelier for these transient gleams
 Of buried friendships; blest is he who dreams!

From THE AUTOCRAT OF THE BREAKFAST-TABLE

EVERY MAN HIS OWN BOSWELL

The first number of the Autocrat series appeared in the Atlantic Monthly, November, 1857. Holmes had published two essays under this title in the New England Magazine in 1831 and 1832, and reverted to these as he opened his series. The "table talk" of the Autocrat, a monologue with the occasional effect of a dialogue, is supposed to take place in a Boston boardinghouse, where boarders representing a diversity of interests gather. This enables a miscellany of topics to be brought up for brief treatment, and any method of approach.

I

I WAS just going to say, when I was interrupted, that one of the many ways of classifying minds is under the heads of arithmetical and algebraical intellects. All economical and practical wisdom is an extension or variation of the following arithmetical formula:  $2 + 2 = 4$ . Every philosophical proposition has the more general character of the expression  $a + b = c$ . We are mere operatives, empirics, and egotists, until we learn to think in letters instead of figures.

They all stared. There is a divinity student lately come among us to whom I commonly address remarks like the above, allowing him to take a certain share in the conversation, so far as assent or pertinent questions are in-olved. He abused his liberty on this occasion by presuming to say that Leibnitz had the same observation.—No, sir, I replied, he has not. But he said a mighty good thing about mathematics, that sounds something like it, and you found it, not in the original, but quoted by Dr. Thomas Reid. I will tell the company what he did say, one of these days.

—If I belong to a Society of Mutual Admiration?—I blush to say that I do not at this present moment. I once did, however. It was the first association to which I ever heard the term applied; a body of scientific young men in a great foreign city who admired their teacher, and to some extent each other. Many of them deserved it; they have become famous since. It amuses me to hear the talk of one of those beings described by Thackeray—about a social development which belongs to the very noblest stage of civilization. All generous companies of artists, authors, philanthropists, men of science, are, or ought to be, Societies of Mutual Admiration. A man of genius, or any kind of superiority, is not debarred from admiring the same quality in another, nor the other from returning his admiration. They may even associate together and continue to think highly of each other. And so of a dozen such men, if any one place is fortunate enough to hold so many.

"Letters four do form his name"—

The being referred to above assumes several false premises. First, that men of talent necessarily hate each other. Secondly, that intimate knowledge or habitual association destroys our admiration of persons whom we esteemed highly at a distance. Thirdly, that a circle of clever fellows, who meet together to dine and have a good time, have signed a constitutional compact to glorify themselves and to put down him and the fraction of the human race 10 not belonging to their number. Fourthly, that it is an outrage that he is not asked to join them.

Here the company laughed a good deal, and the old gentleman who sits opposite said: "That's it! that's it!"

I continued, for I was in the talking vein. As to clever people's hating each other, I think a little extra talent does sometimes make people jealous. They become irritated by perpetual attempts and failures, and it hurts 20 their tempers and dispositions. Unpretending mediocrity is good, and genius is glorious; but a weak flavor of genius in an essentially common person is detestable. It spoils the grand neutrality of a commonplace character, as the rinsings of an unwashed wineglass spoil a draught of fair water. No wonder the poor fellow we spoke of, who always belongs to this class of slightly flavored mediocrities, is 30 puzzled and vexed by the strange sight of a dozen men of capacity working and playing together in harmony. He and his fellows are always fighting. With them familiarity naturally breeds contempt. If they ever praise each other's bad drawings, or broken-winded novels, or spavined verses, nobody ever supposed it was from admiration; it was simply a contract between themselves and a publisher or dealer.

If the Mutuals have really nothing among them worth admiring, that alters the question. But if they are men with noble powers and qualities, let me tell you, that, next to youthful love and family affections, there is no human sentiment better than that which unites the Societies of Mutual Admiration. And what would literature or art be without such associations? Who can tell what we owe to the Mutual Admiration Society of which Shak- 50 spere, and Ben Jonson, and Beaumont and Fletcher were members?<sup>1</sup> Or to that of which Addison and Steele formed the center,<sup>2</sup> and which gave us the Spectator? Or to that where Johnson, and Goldsmith, and Burke, and Reynolds, and Beauclerk, and Boswell,<sup>3</sup> most admiring among all admirers, met together? Was there any great harm in the fact that the Irvings and Paulding wrote in company<sup>4</sup>? or any unpardonable cabal in the literary union of Verplanck and Bryant and Sands,<sup>5</sup> and as many more as they chose to associate with them?

The poor creature does not know what he is talking about when he abuses this noblest of institutions. Let him inspect its mysteries through the knot-hole he has secured, but not use that orifice as a medium for his popgun. Such a society is the crown of a literary metropolis; if a town has not material for it, and spirit and good feeling enough to organize it, it is a mere caravansary, fit for a man of genius to lodge in, but not to live in. Foolish people hate and dread and envy such an association of men of varied powers and influence, because it is lofty, serene, impregnable, and, by the necessity of the case, exclusive. Wise ones are prouder of the title M.S.M.A. than of all their other honors put together.

—Have I ever acted in private theatricals? Often. I have played the part of the "Poor Gentleman," before a great many audiences, —more, I trust, than I shall ever face again. I did not wear a stage-costume, nor a wig, nor mustaches of burnt cork; but I was placarded and announced as a public performer, and at the proper hour I came forward with the ballet-dancer's smile upon my countenance, and made my bow and acted my part. I have seen my name stuck up in letters so big that I was ashamed to show myself in the place by daylight. I have gone to a town with a sober literary essay in my pocket, and seen myself everywhere announced as the most desperate of buffos,<sup>1</sup>—one who was obliged to restrain himself in the full exercise of his powers, from prudential considerations. I have been through as many hardships as Ulysses, in the pursuit of my histrionic vocation.<sup>2</sup> I have traveled in cars until the conductors all knew me like a brother. I have run off the rails, and stuck all night in snowdrifts, and sat behind females that would have the window open when one could not wink without his eyelids freezing together. Perhaps I shall give you some of my experiences one of these days;—I will not now, for I have something else for you.

Private theatricals, as I have figured in them in country lyceum-halls, are one thing,—and private theatricals, as they may be seen in certain gilded and frescoed saloons of our metropolis, are another. Yes, it is pleasant to see real gentlemen and ladies, who do not think it necessary to mouth, and rant, and stride, like most of our stage heroes and heroines, in the characters which show off their graces and talents; most of all to see a fresh, unrouged, unspoiled, highbred young maiden, with a lithe figure, and a pleasant voice, acting in those love-dramas which make us young again to look upon, when real youth and beauty will play them for us.

—Of course I wrote the prologue I was asked to write. I did not see the play, though. I knew there was a young lady in it, and that somebody was in love with her, and she was in love with him, and somebody (an old tutor, I believe) wanted to interfere, and, very naturally, the young lady was too sharp for him. The play of course ends charmingly; there is a general reconciliation, and all concerned form a line and take each other's hands, as people always do after they have made up their quarrels,—and then the curtain falls,—if it does not stick, as it commonly does at private theatrical exhibitions, in which case a boy is detailed to pull it down, which he does, blushing violently.

Now, then, for my prologue. I am not going to change my cæsuras and cadences for anybody; so if you do not like the heroic, or iambic trimeter brachycatalectic,<sup>1</sup> you had better not wait to hear it.

THIS IS IT

A Prologue? Well, of course the ladies know;—

I have my doubts. No matter,—here we go!

10 What is a Prologue? Let our Tutor teach:

Pro means beforehand; logos stands for speech.

'Tis like the harper's prelude on the strings,
The prima donna's courtesy ere she sings;—

Prologues in meter are to other pros

As worsted stockings are to engine-hose.

“The world's a stage,”—as Shakespeare said,
one day;

The stage a world—was what he meant to say.

20 The outside world's a blunder, that is clear;

The real world that Nature meant is here.

Here every foundling finds its lost mamma;

Each rogue, repentant, melts his stern papa;

Misers relent, the spendthrift's debts are paid;

The cheats are taken in the traps they laid;

One after one the troubles all are past

Till the fifth act comes right side up at last,

When the young couple, old folks, rogues, and all,

Join hands, so happy at the curtain's fall.

30 —Here suffering virtue ever finds relief,

And black-browed ruffians always come to grief,

—When the lorn damsel, with a frantic speech,

And cheeks as hueless as a brandy-peach,

Cries, “Help, kyind Heaven!” and drops upon her knees

On the green—baize,—beneath the (canvas)
trees,—

See to her side avenging Valor fly:—

40 “Ha! Villain! Draw! Now, Terraitorr, yield or die!”

—When the poor hero flounders in despair,

Some dear lost uncle turns up millionaire,—

Clasps the young scapegrace with paternal joy,

Sobs on his neck, “My boy! MY BOY!! MY BOY!!!”

Ours, then, sweet friends, the real world tonight

Of love that conquers in disaster's spite.

<sup>1</sup> a technical description of blank verse

Ladies, attend! While woful cares and doubt Wrong the soft passion in the world without,
 Though fortune scowl, though prudence interfere,
 One thing is certain: Love will triumph here!

Lords of creation, whom your ladies rule,—
 The world's great masters, when you're out of school,—

Learn the brief moral of our evening's play:
 Man has his will,—but woman has her way!
 While man's dull spirit toils in smoke and fire,

Woman's swift instinct threads the electric wire,—

The magic bracelet stretched beneath the waves

Beats the black giant with his score of slaves.
 All earthly powers confess your sovereign art

But that one rebel,—woman's wilful heart.
 All foes you master; but a woman's wit
 Lets daylight through you ere you know you're hit.

So, just to picture what her art can do,
 Hear an old story made as good as new.

Rudolph, professor of the headsman's trade,
 Alike was famous for his arm and blade.

One day a prisoner Justice had to kill
 Knelt at the block to test the artist's skill.
 Bare-armed, swart-visaged, gaunt, and shaggy-browed,

Rudolph the headsman rose above the crowd.
 His falchion lightened with a sudden gleam,
 As the pike's armor flashes in the stream.

He sheathed his blade; he turned as if to go;

The victim knelt, still waiting for the blow.
 "Why strikest not? Perform thy murderous act,"

The prisoner said. (His voice was slightly cracked.)

"Friend, I have struck," the artist straight replied;

"Wait but one moment, and yourself decide."

He held his snuff-box,—“Now then, if you please!”

The prisoner sniffed, and, with a crashing sneeze,

Off his head tumbled,—bowed along the floor,—

Bounced down the steps;—the prisoner said no more!

Woman! thy falchion is a glittering eye;
 If death lurks in it, oh, how sweet to die!
 Thou takest hearts as Rudolph took the head;
 We die with love, and never dream we're dead!

The prologue went off very well, as I hear.
 No alterations were suggested by the lady to whom it was sent, so far as I know. Sometimes people criticize the poems one sends them, and suggest all sorts of improvements. Who was that silly body that wanted Burns to alter “Scots wha hae,” so as to lengthen the last line, thus?—

“Edward!” Chains and slavery!

Here is a little poem I sent a short time since to a committee for a certain celebration. I understood that it was to be a festive and convivial occasion, and ordered myself accordingly. It seems the president of the day was what is called a “teetotaller.” I received a note from him in the following words, containing the copy subjoined, with the emendations annexed to it.

“Dear Sir,—Your poem gives good satisfaction to the committee. The sentiments expressed with reference to liquor are not, however, those generally entertained by this community. I have therefore consulted the clergyman of this place, who has made some slight changes, which he thinks will remove all objections, and keep the valuable portions of the poem. Please to inform me of your charge for said poem. Our means are limited, etc., etc., etc.

“Yours with respect.”

Here it is,—with the slight alterations.

Come! fill a fresh bumper,—for why should we go

The company said I had been shabbily treated, and advised me to charge the committee double,—which I did. But as I never got my pay, I don't know that it made much difference. I am a very particular person about having all I write printed as I write it. I require to see a proof, a revise, a re-revise, and a double re-revise, or fourth-proof rectified impression of all my productions, especially                      30 verse. A misprint kills a sensitive author. An intentional change of his text murders him.
No wonder so many poets die young!

I have nothing more to report at this time, except two pieces of advice I gave to the young women at table. One relates to a vulgarism of language, which I grieve to say is sometimes heard even from female lips. The other is of more serious purport, and applies to such as contemplate a change of condition,—matrimony, in fact.

—The woman who "calc'lates" is lost.

—Put not your trust in money, but put your money in trust.

III

. . . . .

—You need not get up a rebellion against what I say, if you find everything in my sayings is not exactly new. You can't possibly                      50 mistake a man who means to be honest for a literary pickpocket. I once read an introductory lecture that looked to me too learned for its latitude. On examination, I found all its erudition was taken ready-made from D'Israeli. If I had been ill-natured, I should have shown up the little great man, who had once belabored me in his feeble way. But one can generally tell these wholesale thieves easily enough, and they are not worth the trouble of putting them in the pillory. I doubt the entire novelty of my remarks just made on telling unpleasant truths, yet I am not conscious of any larceny.

Neither make too much of flaws and occasional overstatements. Some persons seem to think that absolute truth, in the form of rigidly stated propositions, is all that conversation admits. This is precisely as if a musician should insist on having nothing but perfect chords and simple melodies,—no diminished fifths, no flat sevenths, no flourishes, on any account. Now it is fair to say, that,
just as music must have all these, so conversation must have its partial truths, its embellished truths, its exaggerated truths. It is in its higher forms an artistic product, and admits the ideal element as much as pictures or statues.
One man who is a little too literal can spoil
the talk of a whole tableful of men of esprit.—
"Yes," you say, "but who wants to hear fanciful people's nonsense? Put the facts to it, and then see where it is!"—Certainly, if a man is too fond of paradox,—if he is flighty and empty,—if instead of striking those fifths and sevenths, those harmonious discords, often so much better than the twinned octaves, in the music of thought,—if, instead of striking these, he jangles the chords, stick a fact into him like a stiletto. But remember that talking is one of the fine arts,—the noblest, the most important, and the most difficult,—and that its fluent harmonies may be spoiled by the intrusion of a single harsh note. Therefore conversation which is suggestive rather than argumentative, which lets out the most of each talker's results of thought, is commonly the pleasantest and the most profitable. It is not easy, at the best, for two persons talking together to make the most of each other's thoughts, there are so many of them.

[The company looked as if they wanted an explanation.]

When John and Thomas, for instance, are talking together, it is natural enough that among the six there should be more or less confusion and misapprehension.

[Our landlady turned pale;—no doubt she thought there was a screw loose in my intellects,—and that involved the probable loss of a boarder. A severe-looking person, who wears a Spanish cloak and a sad check, fluted by the passions of the melodrama, whom I understand to be the professional ruffian of the neighboring theater, alluded, with a certain lifting of the brow, drawing down of the corners of the mouth, and somewhat rasping voce di petto,<sup>1</sup> to Falstaff's nine men in buckram.<sup>2</sup> Everybody looked up. I believe the old gentleman opposite was afraid I should seize the carving-knife; at any rate, he slid it to one side, as it were carelessly.]

I think, I said, I can make it plain to Benjamin Franklin here, that there are at least six personalities distinctly to be recognized as taking part in that dialogue between John and Thomas.

- Three Johns {
  - 1. The real John; known only to his Maker.
  - 2. John's ideal John; never the real one, and often very unlike him.
  - 3. Thomas's ideal John; never the real John, nor John's John, but often very unlike either.

- Three Thomases {
  - 1. The real Thomas.
  - 2. Thomas's ideal Thomas.
  - 3. John's ideal Thomas.

Only one of the three Johns is taxed; only one can be weighed on a platform-balance; but the other two are just as important in the conversation. Let us suppose the real John to be old, dull, and ill-looking. But as the Higher Powers have not conferred on men the gift of seeing themselves in the true light, John very possibly conceives himself to be youthful, witty, and fascinating, and talks from the point of view of this ideal. Thomas, again, believes him to be an artful rogue, we will say; therefore he is, so far as Thomas's attitude in the conversation is concerned, an artful rogue, though really simple and stupid. The same conditions apply to the three Thomases. It follows, that, until a man can be found who knows himself as his Maker knows him, or who sees himself as others see him, there must be at least six persons engaged in every dialogue between two. Of these, the least important, philosophically speaking, is the one that we have called the real person. No wonder two disputants often get angry, when there are six of them talking and listening all at the same time.

[A very unphilosophical application of the above remarks was made by a young fellow answering to the name of John, who sits near me at table. A certain basket of peaches, a rare vegetable, little known to boarding-houses, was on its way to me via this unlettered Johannes. He appropriated the three that remained in the basket, remarking that there was just one apiece for him. I convinced him that his practical inference was hasty and illogical, but in the meantime he had eaten the peaches.]

IV
. . . . .

So you will not think I mean to speak lightly of old friendships, because we cannot help instituting comparisons between our present and former selves by the aid of those who were what we were, but are not what we are. Nothing strikes one more, in the race of life, than to see how many give out in the first half of the course. "Commencement day" always reminds me of the start for the "Derby," when the beautiful highbred three-year-olds of the season are brought up for trial. That day is the start, and life is the race. Here we are at Cambridge, and a class is just "graduating." Poor Harry! he was to have been there too, but he has paid forfeit; step out here into the grass back of the church; ah! there it is:—

But this is the start, and here they are,—coats bright as silk, and manes as smooth as eau lustrale<sup>1</sup> can make them. Some of the best of the colts are pranced round, a few minutes each, to show their paces. What is that old gentleman crying about? and the old lady by him, and the three girls, what are they all covering their eyes for? Oh, that is their colt which has just been trotted up on the stage. Do they really think those little thin legs can do anything in such a slashing sweepstakes as is coming off in these next forty years? Oh, this terrible gift of second-sight that comes to some of us when we begin to look through the silvered rings of the arcus senilis!<sup>2</sup>

Ten years gone. First turn in the race. A few broken down; two or three bolted. Several show in advance of the ruck. Cassock, a black colt, seems to be ahead of the rest; those black colts commonly get the start, I have noticed, of the others, in the first quarter. Meteor has pulled up.

Twenty years. Second corner turned. Cassock has dropped from the front, and Judex, an iron-gray, has the lead. But look! how they have thinned out? Down flat—five,—six,—how many? They lie still enough! they will not get up again in this race, be very sure! And the rest of them, what a “tailing off!” Anybody can see who is going to win,—perhaps.

Thirty years. Third corner turned. Dives, bright sorrel, ridden by the fellow in a yellow jacket, begins to make play fast; is getting to be the favorite, with many. But who is that other one that has been lengthening his stride from the first, and now shows close up to the front? Don't you remember the quiet brown colt Asteroid, with the star in his forehead? That is he; he is one of the sort that lasts; look out for him! The black “colt,” as we used to call him, is in the background, taking it easily in a gentle trot. There is one they used to call the Filly, on account of a certain feminine air he had; well up, you see; the Filly is not to be despised, my boy!

Forty years. More dropping off,—but places much as before.

Fifty years. Race over. All that are on the course are coming in at a walk; no more running. Who is ahead? Ahead? What! and the winning-post a slab of white or gray stone standing out from that turf where there is no more jockeying or straining for victory! Well, the world marks their places in its betting-book; but be sure that these matter very little, if they have run as well as they knew how!

—Did I not say to you a little while ago that the universe swam in an ocean of similitudes and analogies? I will not quote Cowley, or Burns, or Wordsworth, just now, to show you what thoughts were suggested to them by the simplest natural objects, such as a flower or a leaf; but I will read you a few lines, if you do not object, suggested by looking at a section of one of those chambered shells to which is given the name of Pearly Nautilus. We need not trouble ourselves about the distinction between this and the Paper Nautilus, the Argonauta<sup>1</sup> of the ancients. The name applied to both shows that each has long been compared to a ship, as you may see more fully in Webster's Dictionary, or the “Encyclopædia,” to which he refers. If you will look into Roget's Bridgewater Treatise, you will find a figure of one of these shells and a section of it. The last will show you the series of enlarging compartments successively dwelt in by the animal that inhabits the shell, which is built in a widening spiral. Can you find no lesson in this?

THE CHAMBERED NAUTILUS

This is the ship of pearl, which, poets feign,
Sails the unshadowed main,—
The venturous bark that flings
On the sweet summer wind its purpled wings
In gulfs enchanted, where the siren sings,
And coral reefs lie bare,
Where the cold sea-maids rise to sun their streaming hair.

Its webs of living gauze no more unfurl;
Wrecked is the ship of pearl!

<sup>1</sup> I have now and then found a naturalist who still worried over the distinction between the Pearly Nautilus and the Paper Nautilus, or Argonauta. As the stories both are mere fables, attaching to the Physalia, or Portuguese man-of-war, as well as to these two molluscs, it seems over-nice to quarrel with the poetical handling of a fiction sufficiently justified by the name commonly applied to the ship of pearl as well as the ship of paper. [Holmes's note.]

And every chambered cell,
Where its dim dreaming life was wont to dwell,
As the frail tenant shaped his growing shell,
    Before thee lies revealed,—
Its irised ceiling rent, its sunless crypt unsealed!

Year after year beheld the silent toil
    That spread his lustrous coil;
    Still, as the spiral grew,
He left the past year's dwelling for the new,
Stole with soft step its shining archway
    through,
    Built up its idle door,
Stretched in his last-found home, and knew the old no more.

Thanks for the heavenly message brought by thee,
    Child of the wandering sea,
    Cast from her lap forlorn!
From thy dead lips a clearer note is born
Than ever Triton blew from wreathèd horn!
    While on mine ear it rings,
Through the deep caves of thought I hear a voice that sings:—

Build thee more stately mansions, O my soul,
    As the swift seasons roll!
    Leave thy low-vaulted past!
Let each new temple, nobler than the last,
Shut thee from heaven with a dome more vast,
    Till thou at length art free,
Leaving thine outgrown shell by life's unrest-ing seal!

VI

. . . . .

—Every person's feelings have a front-door and a side-door by which they may be entered.
The front-door is on the street. Some keep it always open; some keep it latched; some, 40 locked; some, bolted,—with a chain that will let you peep in, but not get in; and some nail it up, so that nothing can pass its threshold.
This front-door leads into a passage which opens into an anteroom and this into the interior apartments. The side-door opens at once into the sacred chambers.

There is almost always at least one key to this side-door. This is carried for years hidden in a mother's bosom. Fathers, brothers, sisters, 50 and friends, often, but by no means so universally, have duplicates of it. The wedding-ring conveys a right to one; alas, if none is given with it!

If nature or accident has put one of these keys into the hands of a person who has the torturing instinct, I can only solemnly pronounce the words that Justice utters over its doomed victim—The Lord have mercy on your soul! You will probably go mad within a 10 reasonable time,—or, if you are a man, run off and die with your head on a curb-stone, in Melbourne or San Francisco,—or, if you are a woman, quarrel and break your heart, or turn into a pale, jointed petrification that moves about as if it were alive, or play some real life-tragedy or other.

Be very careful to whom you trust one of these keys of the side-door. The fact of possessing one renders those even who are dear 20 to you very terrible at times. You can keep the world out from your front-door, or receive visitors only when you are ready for them; but those of your own flesh and blood, or of certain grades of intimacy, can come in at the side-door, if they will, at any hour and in any mood. Some of them have a scale of your whole nervous system, and can play all the gamut of your sensibilities in semitones,— touching the naked nerve-pulps as a pianist 30 strikes the keys of his instrument. I am satisfied that there are as great masters of this nerve-playing as Vieuxtemps<sup>1</sup> or Thalberg<sup>2</sup> in their lines of performance. Married life is the school in which the most accomplished artists in this department are found. A delicate woman is the best instrument; she has such a magnificent compass of sensibilities! From the deep inward moan which follows pressure on the great nerves of right, to the sharp cry as the filaments of taste are struck with a crashing sweep, is a range which no other instrument possesses. A few exercises on it daily at home fit a man wonderfully for his habitual labors, and refresh him immensely as he returns from them. No stranger can get a great many notes of torture out of a human soul;
it takes one that knows it well,—parent, child, brother, sister, intimate. Be very careful to whom you give a side-door key; too many 50 have them already.

From ELSIE VENNER

Elsie Venner was written, Holmes said, "to test the doctrine of 'original sin' and human responsibility." It was published as The Professor's Story in the Atlantic Monthly, beginning January, 1860. When it was republished it was given its present title. Elsie's mother was bitten by a rattlesnake before the birth of her daughter, and Elsie had serpent-woman characteristics, against which she struggled and was humanized; but the struggle was too much for her and she died. She stands, then, for those who "receive a moral poison from a remote ancestor, and should be objects of pity."

The first chapter, given here, is an essay on New England aristocracy. Brahmins are members of the highest sacerdotal caste among the Hindus. Originally they were individuals distinguished for wisdom and sanctity, but ultimately they became a strictly hereditary caste. At the present time "Brahmin" is used satirically of highly cultured or intellectual persons, with an implication of exclusiveness and perhaps of superciliousness. The second chapter "introduces a youth belonging to the Brahmin caste of New England," who is to be a leading character.

I

The Brahmin Caste of New England

THERE is nothing in New England corresponding at all to the feudal aristocracies of the Old World. Whether it be owing to the stock from which we were derived, or to the practical working of our institutions, or to the abrogation of the technical "law of honor," which draws a sharp line between the personally responsible class of "gentlemen" and the unnamed multitude of those who are not expected to risk their lives for an abstraction, —whatever be the cause, we have no such aristocracy here as that which grew up out of the military systems of the Middle Ages.

What our people mean by "aristocracy" is merely the richer part of the community, that live in the tallest houses, drive real carriages (not "kerridges"), kid-glove their hands, and French-bonnet their ladies' heads, give parties where the persons who call them by the above title are not invited, and have a provokingly easy way of dressing, walking, talking, and nodding to people, as if they felt entirely at home, and would not be embarrassed in the least, if they met the Governor, or even the President of the United States, face to face. Some of these great folks are really well-bred, some of them are only purse-proud and assuming,—but they form a class, and are named as above in the common speech.

It is in the nature of large fortunes to diminish rapidly, when subdivided and distributed. A million is the unit of wealth, now and here in America. It splits into four handsome properties; each of these into four good inheritances; these, again, into scanty competences for four ancient maidens,—with whom it is best the family should die out, unless it can begin again as its great-grandfather did. Now a million is a kind of golden cheese, which represents in a compendious form the summer's growth of a fat meadow of craft or commerce; and as this kind of meadow rarely bears more than one crop, it is pretty certain that sons and grandsons will not get another golden cheese out of it, whether they milk the same cows or turn in new ones. In other words, the millionocracy, considered in a large way, is not at all an affair of persons and families, but a perpetual fact of money with a variable human element, which a philosopher might leave out of consideration without falling into serious error. Of course, this trivial and fugitive fact of personal wealth does not create a permanent class, unless some special means are taken to arrest the process of disintegration in the third generation. This is so rarely done, at least successfully, that one need not live a very long life to see most of the rich families he knew in childhood more or less reduced, and the millions shifted into the hands of the country-boys who were sweeping stores and carrying parcels when the now decayed gentry were driving their chariots, eating their venison over silver chafing-dishes, drinking Madeira chilled in embossed coolers, wearing their hair in powder, and casing their legs in white-topped boots with silken tassels.

There is, however, in New England, an aristocracy, if you choose to call it so, which has a far greater character of permanence. It has grown to be a caste,—not in any odious sense,—but, by the repetition of the same influences, generation after generation, it has acquired a distinct organization and physiognomy, which not to recognize is sheer stupidity, and not to be willing to describe would show a distrust of the good-nature and intelligence of our readers, who like to have us see all we can and tell all we see.

If you will look carefully at any class of students in one of our colleges, you will have no difficulty in selecting specimens of two different aspects of youthful manhood. Of course I shall choose extreme cases to illustrate the contrast between them. In the first, the figure is perhaps robust, but often otherwise,—inelegant, partly from careless attitudes, partly from ill-dressing,—the face is uncouth in feature, or at least common,—the mouth coarse and unformed,—the eye unsympathetic, even if bright,—the movements of the face are clumsy, like those of the limbs,—the voice unmusical,—and the enunciation as if the words were coarse castings, instead of fine carvings. The youth of the other aspect is commonly slender,—his face is smooth, and apt to be pallid,—his features are regular and of a certain delicacy,—his eye is bright and quick,—his lips play over the thought he utters as a pianist's fingers dance over their music,—and his whole air, though it may be timid, and even awkward, has nothing clownish. If you are a teacher, you know what to expect from each of these young men. With equal willingness, the first will be slow at learning; the second will take to his books as a pointer or a setter to his field-work.

The first youth is the common country-boy, whose race has been bred to bodily labor. Nature has adapted the family organization to the kind of life it has lived. The hands and feet by constant use have got more than their share of development,—the organs of thought and expression less than their share. The finer instincts are latent and must be developed. A youth of this kind is raw material in its first stage of elaboration. You must not expect too much of any such. Many of them have force of will and character, and become distinguished in practical life; but very few of them ever become great scholars. A scholar is, almost always, the son of scholars or scholarly persons.

That is exactly what the other young man is. He comes of the Brahmin caste of New England. This is the harmless, inoffensive, untitled aristocracy to which I have referred, and which I am sure you will at once acknowledge. There are races of scholars among us, in which aptitude for learning, and all these marks of it I have spoken of, are congenital and hereditary. Their names are always on some college catalogue or other. They break out every generation or two in some learned labor which calls them up after they seem to have died out. At last some newer name takes their place, it may be,—but you inquire a little and you find it is the blood of the Edwardses or the Chaunceys or the Ellerys or some of the old historic scholars, disguised under the altered name of a female descendant.

I suppose there is not an experienced instructor anywhere in our Northern States who will not recognize at once the truth of this general distinction. But the reader who has never been a teacher will very probably object, that some of our most illustrious public men have come direct from the homespun-clad class of the people,—and he may, perhaps, even find a noted scholar or two whose parents were masters of the English alphabet, but of no other.

It is not fair to pit a few chosen families against the great multitude of those who are continually working their way up into the intellectual classes. The results which are habitually reached by hereditary training are occasionally brought about without it. There are natural filters as well as artificial ones; and though the great rivers are commonly more or less turbid, if you will look long enough, you may find a spring that sparkles as no water does which drips through your apparatus of sands and sponges. So there are families which refine themselves into intellectual aptitude without having had much opportunity for intellectual acquirements. A series of felicitous crosses develops an improved strain of blood, and reaches its maximum perfection at last in the large uncombed youth who goes to college and startles the hereditary class-leaders by striding past them all. That is Nature's republicanism; thank God for it, but do not let it make you illogical. The race of the hereditary scholar has exchanged a certain portion of its animal vigor for its new instincts, and it is hard to lead men without a good deal of animal vigor. The scholar who comes by Nature's special grace from an unworn stock of broad-chested sires and deep-bosomed mothers must always overmatch an equal intelligence with a compromised and lowered vitality. A man's breathing and digestive apparatus (one is tempted to add muscular) are just as important to him on the floor of the Senate as his thinking organs. You broke 10 down in your great speech, did you? Yes, your grandfather had an attack of dyspepsia in '82, after working too hard on his famous Election Sermon. All this does not touch the main fact: our scholars come chiefly from a privileged order, just as our best fruits come from well-known grafts,—though now and then a seedling apple, like the Northern Spy, or a seedling pear, like the Seckel, springs from a nameless ancestry and grows to be the pride of all the gardens in the land.

1809 -- Abraham Lincoln -- 1865

A FEW supplementary details will complete the account of Lincoln's life sketched below in his "Autobiography." In 1860 the Republicans nominated him for President, and he was elected in November. He passed the next four difficult years in the White House, giving his best efforts to the preservation of the Union. He was re-elected to the Presidency in 1864, and a little more than a month after his second inauguration he was shot by John Wilkes Booth, during a performance in a Washington theater. His successful leadership of the country in its time of crisis and the tragic circumstances of his death combined to make him a heroic figure in American history.

Although, like Franklin, Lincoln had no formal education or stimulus to learn, he early had a zest for reading and study. He amassed from books a body of exact general information. He knew Shakespeare, and he had favorite authors and poems. The humor of P. V. Nasby and Artemus Ward attracted him and doubtless influenced him. He could think clearly and express himself clearly, organize his material logically, and adapt his style to those he addressed, whether a bereaved mother, his townfolk in Springfield, or the cultivated audiences of the East. His grasp of a situation was sure, and he was rich in ideas. He wrote and spoke in direct and vigorous idiom, often the homely idiom of farm life, and sometimes he relied on shrewd anecdote; but he could rise to dignity, sometimes to poetry of expression. His style had terseness, emotional appeal, and strength. The matter was more important to him than the manner, but his manner was effective. Time has awarded him a permanent place among the great writers of American prose.

The best collected edition of Lincoln's works is the Complete Works of Abraham Lincoln, edited by J. G. Nicolay and John Hay (12 vols., 1905). There are innumerable studies and reminiscences of special phases of his career. Some leading biographies are Abraham Lincoln: A History, by J. G. Nicolay and John Hay (10 vols., 1890); and Herndon's Lincoln: The True Story of a Great Life, by W. H. Herndon and J. W. Weik, edited by P. M. Angle (1930). Other biographical works are Ida M. Tarbell, The Life of Abraham Lincoln (2 vols., 1900, 1917); Brand Whitlock, Abraham Lincoln (1909, 1916); Lord Charnwood, Abraham Lincoln (1917); N. W. Stephenson, Lincoln: an Account of His Personal Life (1924); C. Sandburg, Abraham Lincoln: The Prairie Years (2 vols., 1926), and Abraham Lincoln: The War Years (2 vols., 1939), a somewhat pictorial and imaginative account; L. A. Warren, Lincoln's Parentage and Childhood (1926); Albert J. Beveridge, Abraham Lincoln, 1809-1858 (2 vols., 1928); and E. L. Masters, Lincoln the Man (1931), one of few adverse, disparaging treatments of Lincoln. N. W. Stephenson treated Lincoln as an author in CHAL, III (1921), and J. G. Randall wrote the account in DAB (1933). L. E. Robinson wrote Abraham Lincoln as a Man of Letters (1923), and D. K. Dodge, Lincoln, Master of Words (1924). Daniel Fish made a Lincoln Bibliography (1906), included in Complete Works, XI.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY

I WAS born February 12, 1809, in Hardin County, Kentucky. My parents were both born in Virginia, of undistinguished families—second families, perhaps I should say. My mother, who died in my tenth year, was of a family of the name of Hanks, some of whom now reside in Adams, and others in Macon County, Illinois. My paternal grandfather, Abraham Lincoln, emigrated from Rockingham County, Virginia, to Kentucky about 1781 or 1782, where a year or two later he was killed by the Indians, not in battle but by stealth, when he was laboring to open a farm in the forest. His ancestors, who were Quakers, went to Virginia from Berks County, Pennsylvania. An effort to identify them with the New England family of the same name ended in nothing more definite than a similarity of Christian names in both families, such as Enoch, Levi, Mordecai, Solomon, Abraham, and the like.

My father, at the death of his father, was but six years of age, and he grew up literally without education. He removed from Kentucky to what is now Spencer County, Indiana, in my eighth year. We reached our new home about the time the state came into the Union. It was a wild region, with many bears and other wild animals still in the woods. There I grew up. There were some schools, so called, but no qualification was ever required of a teacher beyond "readin', writin', and cipherin'," to the rule of three. If a straggler supposed to understand Latin happened to sojourn in the neighborhood, he was looked upon as a wizard. There was absolutely nothing to excite ambition for education. Of course, when I came of age I did not know much. Still, somehow, I could read, write, and cipher to the rule of three, but that was all. I have not been to school since. The little advance I now have upon this store of education, I have picked up from time to time under the pressure of necessity.

I was raised to farm work, which I continued till I was twenty-two. At twenty-one I came to Illinois, Macon County. Then I got to New Salem, at that time in Sangamon, now in Menard County, where I remained a year as a sort of clerk in a store. Then came the Black Hawk War; and I was elected a captain of volunteers, a success which gave me more pleasure than any I have had since. I went the campaign, was elated, ran for the legislature the same year (1832), and was beaten—the only time I ever have been beaten by the people. The next and three succeeding biennial elections I was elected to the legislature. I was not a candidate afterward. During this legislative period I had studied law, and removed to Springfield to practice it. In 1846 I was once elected to the lower House of Congress. Was not a candidate for re-election. From 1849 to 1854, both inclusive, practiced law more assiduously than ever before. Always a Whig in politics; and generally on the Whig electoral tickets, making active canvasses. I was losing interest in politics when the repeal of the Missouri Compromise aroused me again. What I have done since that is pretty well known.

If any personal description of me is thought desirable, it may be said I am, in height, six feet four inches, nearly; lean in flesh, weighing on an average one hundred and eighty pounds; dark complexion, with coarse black hair and gray eyes. No other marks or brands recollected.

THE GETTYSBURG ADDRESS

FOUR score and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal.

Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure. We are met on a great battlefield of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field as a final resting-place for those who here gave their lives that that nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this.

But in a larger sense we cannot dedicate, we cannot consecrate, we cannot hallow this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here have consecrated it, far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note, nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us, the living, rather, to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us,—that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion; that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain; that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom; and that government of the people, by the people, and for the people, shall not perish from the earth.

THE SECOND INAUGURAL ADDRESS

FELLOW-COUNTRYMEN: At this second appearing to take the oath of the presidential office, there is less occasion for an extended address than there was at the first. Then a statement, somewhat in detail, of a course to be pursued, seemed fitting and proper. Now, at the expiration of four years, during which public declarations have been constantly called forth on every point and phase of the great contest which still absorbs the attention and engrosses the energies of the nation, little that is new could be presented. The progress of our arms, upon which all else chiefly depends, is as well known to the public as to myself; and it is, I trust, reasonably satisfactory and encouraging to all. With high hope for the future, no prediction in regard to it is ventured.

On the occasion corresponding to this four years ago, all thoughts were anxiously directed to an impending civil war. All dreaded it—all sought to avert it. While the inaugural address was being delivered from this place, devoted altogether to saving the Union without war, insurgent agents were in the city seeking to destroy it without war—seeking to dissolve the Union, and divide effects, by negotiation. Both parties deprecated war; but one of them would make war rather than let the nation survive; and the other would accept war rather than let it perish. And the war came.

One eighth of the whole population were colored slaves, not distributed generally over the Union, but localized in the southern part of it. These slaves constituted a peculiar and powerful interest. All knew that this interest was, somehow, the cause of the war. To strengthen, perpetuate, and extend this interest was the object for which the insurgents would rend the Union, even by war; while the government claimed no right to do more than to restrict the territorial enlargement of it.

Neither party expected for the war the magnitude or the duration which it has already attained. Neither anticipated that the cause of the conflict might cease with, or even before, the conflict itself should cease. Each looked for an easier triumph and a result less fundamental and astounding. Both read the same Bible, and pray to the same God; and each invokes his aid against the other. It may seem strange that any men should dare to ask a just God's assistance in wringing their bread from the sweat of other men's faces; but let us judge not, that we be not judged. The prayers of both could not be answered—that of neither has been answered fully.

The Almighty has his own purposes. “Woe unto the world because of offenses! for it must needs be that offenses come; but woe to that man by whom the offense cometh.” If we shall suppose that American slavery is one of those offenses which in the providence of God, must needs come, but which, having continued through his appointed time, he now wills to remove, and that he gives to both North and South this terrible war, as the woe due to those by whom the offense came, shall we discern therein any departure from those divine attributes which the believers in a living God always ascribe to him? Fondly do we hope—fervently do we pray—that this mighty scourge of war may speedily pass away. Yet, if

God wills that it continue until all the wealth piled by the bondman’s two hundred and fifty years of unrequited toil shall be sunk, and until every drop of blood drawn with the lash shall be paid by another drawn with the sword, as was said three thousand years ago, so still it must be said, “The judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether.”

With malice toward none; with charity for all; with firmness in the right, as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in; to bind up the nation’s wounds; to care for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow and his orphan—to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace among ourselves, and with all nations.

Civil War Songs and Lyrics

MANY LITERARY lyrics and popular songs emerged from the long, intense struggle of the Civil War period. There were more of them, and they were of better literary quality than those of the Revolution and most of those of World War days, with which it is of interest to compare them. They were published in magazines and newspapers, and were circulated as broadsides and in paper-covered “songsters.” Many were sung by the soldiers, comic songs as well as serious pieces, and entered widely into popular tradition.

Stephen Collins Foster (1826–1864), a Pennsylvanian, was the most gifted song writer of his period. He wrote for Christy’s Minstrels and other troupes in the days when Negro minstrels were in vogue as entertainers, and his songs were more widely sung than those of any other composer. He was addicted to drink, and, despite his popularity and his unceasing composition, he died in poverty and obscurity. Mainly his songs are of Negro life, some humorous but the majority touched with melancholy. The best known are “O Susanna” (1848), “The Old Folks at Home” (1851), “Massa’s in the Cold, Cold Ground” (1852), “My Old Kentucky Home” (1853), and “Old Black Joe” (1860).

James Ryder Randall (1839–1908), a native of Baltimore, when a teacher of literature in a college in Louisiana, composed “My Maryland” at white heat, on reading the news of the attack upon Massachusetts troops passing through Baltimore. The Cary sisters, Jennie and Hetty, of Baltimore, adapted the words to the music of the German college tune "Lauriger Horatius," which was itself based on the older "Tannenbaum, O Tannenbaum." It was so effective when sung that the South adopted it as its war song. Randall tried to enlist in the Civil War, but his health was not adequate. Later he was a successful journalist and remained in newspaper work till the end of his life.

Henry Timrod (1828-1867) of Charleston, South Carolina, was the ablest Southern poet of the time between Poe and Lanier. With his friend Paul Hamilton Hayne, he joined the group of young writers who gathered about William Gilmore Simms, wrote verses, and contributed to magazines. A small collection of his poems appeared in 1860. Reduced to dire straits when his property was swept away in the War, he continued to fight poverty and illness till his death. His early pieces were conventional, mostly love poems marked by sentimentalism. His "Spring" and "The Cotton Boll" were nature pieces, and in 1861 he wrote the ode "Ethnogenesis." These were followed by a series of war poems which are his best. "A Cry to Arms" and "Charleston" show fire and force as well as clear thought. Timrod left but a small body of work, restricted in range, but of fine taste, delicacy of feeling, and often of lyrical power. His poems were collected and published by P. H. Hayne in 1873.

Julia Ward Howe (1819-1910), author, reformer, and lecturer of distinction, was a native of New York City who lived mostly in Boston. She was of distinguished colonial family and well educated. She early allied herself with the abolitionists, afterwards supported woman's suffrage and other reform movements, and showed herself to be a gifted organizer. She wrote "The Battle Hymn of the Republic" to furnish more worthy words to the melody of "John Brown's Body." It appeared in the Atlantic Monthly, February, 1862. Her first volume of lyrics was published in 1854, and her Poems Old and New in 1898. She wrote many volumes of prose essays, travel sketches, and addresses.

Francis Orray Ticknor (1822-1874) was a country physician and poet in Georgia. He contributed verse to newspapers and minor periodicals. "Little Giffen" was composed during his supervision of Confederate hospital work at Columbus, Georgia. It was based on the true story of a lad he and his wife nursed back to life. His collected verse, Poems of Frank O. Ticknor, M.D., was not published in book form till 1879. An appreciative sketch by Paul Hamilton Hayne was prefixed.

The minor lyric poet Paul Hamilton Hayne (1830-1886) was a native of Charleston and came from an old Southern family. He was graduated at the University of South Carolina, and like Timrod he drifted into the group about William Gilmore Simms. He tried law and then gave himself to journalism and poetry. He published three volumes of verse before the War. During the War period he served as a newspaper writer and wrote patriotic wartime pieces. When Charleston was burned and his property swept away, he retired to a cottage in the pine barrens of Georgia, depending on poetry for his meager income. His best volume, Legends and Lyrics, appeared in 1872. His Collected Poems was published in 1882. Hayne edited Timrod's poems before he collected his own. His carefully polished pieces show grace of craftsmanship and a lyric sweetness that sometimes becomes sentimentalism, but they display no marked originality. His reputation rests on a few poems.

Thomas Buchanan Read (1822–1872), painter, poet, and lecturer, was a Pennsylvanian of Scotch-Irish descent. After 1846 he lived in Philadelphia. Alongside his career as a painter he wrote many volumes of verse. These he gathered into three volumes in 1866. He wrote with facility, but imitatively and uncritically. His most popular poem, almost the only one that has lasted, was "Sheridan's Ride." Read was a major in the Union army during the War.

Francis Miles Finch (1827–1907) was a native of Ithaca, New York, of New England stock. He was educated at Yale and became associate judge of the New York Court of Appeals. He was active in founding Cornell University, was a trustee, a nonresident lecturer in the Law School, and later dean of the Law School. He composed "The Blue and the Gray," published in the Atlantic for September, 1867, on hearing that the women of Columbus, Mississippi, had "strewn flowers alike on the graves of the Confederate and the National soldiers." The poem is said to have done much to allay partisan feeling and bring reconciliation. At the end of his life he collected his verse, and it was published after his death as The Blue and the Gray and Other Verses (1909).

For collections of lyrics and songs of the Civil War period, see the four books edited by Frank Moore, Songs of the Soldiers, Lyrics of Loyalty, Personal and Political Ballads (all 1864), and Songs and Ballads of the Southern People, 1861–1865 (1886); R. G. White, Poetry, Lyrical, Narrative, and Satirical of the Civil War (1866); William Gilmore Simms, War Poetry of the South (1867); F. F. Browne, Bugle Echoes, a Collection of Poems of the Civil War, Northern and Southern (1886); G. E. Eggleston, American War Ballads and Lyrics (2 vols., 1889); Esther P. Ellinger, Southern Poetry of the Civil War (1918). The music as well as the texts may be found in "Sound Off": Soldier Songs, by E. A. Dolph (1929), pp. 226–367. Southern Poets (1936), edited by E. W. Parks, contains selections from Southern poets of the Civil War period, with an introduction and bibliography.

Sketches of most of the lyricists and song writers of the period may be found in DAB. For Stephen C. Foster, consult Morrison Foster's Biography, Songs, and Musical Compositions of Stephen C. Foster (1896) and H. V. Milligan's Stephen Collins Foster (1920). G. C. Perine treated James Ryder Randall in The Poets and Verse-Writers of Maryland (1898), and M. P. Andrews edited The Poems of James Ryder Randall (1910); see also Brander Matthews, "The Songs of the Civil War," in Pen and Ink (1888), pp. 172 ff. For Timrod, see H. T. Thompson, Henry Timrod, Laureate of the Confederacy (1928), which has a bibliography; and G. A. Wauchope, Henry Timrod: Man and Poet (1915). For Julia Ward Howe consult L. E. Richards and M. H. Elliott, Julia Ward Howe (2 vols., 1915). There is no good biography of Paul Hamilton Hayne; material concerning him may be found in S. A. Link's Pioneers of Southern Literature (1903), in C. W. Hubner's Representative Southern Poets (1906), and in

The Library of Southern Literature (1909). For Thomas Buchanan Read, see H. C. Townsend and Others, A Memoir of T. Buchanan Read (1889); and R. H. Stoddard, Recollections, Personal and Literary (1903), Chapter XIV. There is an account of Francis Miles Finch in A. P. Stokes's Memorials of Eminent Yale Men (2 vols., 1914).

MY MARYLAND

By James Ryder Randall

THE despot's heel is on thy shore,
Maryland!

His torch is at thy temple door,
Maryland!

Avenge the patriotic gore
That flecked the streets of Baltimore,
And be the battle queen of yore,
Maryland, my Maryland!

Hark to an exiled son's appeal,
Maryland! 10

My Mother State, to thee I kneel,
Maryland!

For life and death, for woe and weal,
Thy peerless chivalry reveal,
And gird thy beauteous limbs with steel,
Maryland, my Maryland!

Thou wilt not cower in the dust,
Maryland!

Thy beaming sword shall never rust,
Maryland! 20

Remember Carroll's<sup>1</sup> sacred trust,
Remember Howard's warlike thrust.
And all thy slumberers with the just,
Maryland, my Maryland!

Come! 'tis the red dawn of the day,
Maryland!

Come with thy panoplied array,
Maryland!

With Ringgold's<sup>2</sup> spirit for the fray,
With Watson's blood at Monterey, 30
With fearless Lowe and dashing May,
Maryland, my Maryland!

Dear Mother, burst the tyrant's chain,
Maryland!

Virginia should not call in vain,
Maryland!

She meets her sisters on the plain,—
"Sic semper!"<sup>1</sup> 'tis the proud refrain
That baffles minions back amain,
Maryland! 40

Arise in majesty again,
Maryland, my Maryland!

Come! for thy shield is bright and strong,
Maryland!

Come! for thy dalliance does thee wrong,
Maryland!

Come to thine own heroic throng,
Stalking with Liberty along,
And chant thy dauntless slogan-song,
Maryland, my Maryland! 50

I see the blush upon thy cheek,
Maryland!

For thou wast ever bravely meek,
Maryland!

But lo! there surges forth a shriek,
From hill to hill, from creek to creek,
Potomac calls to Chesapeake,
Maryland, my Maryland!

Thou wilt not yield the Vandal toil,
Maryland! 60

Thou wilt not crook to his control,
Maryland!

Better the fire upon thee roll,
Better the shot, the blade, the bowl,
Than crucifixion of the soul,
Maryland, my Maryland!

I hear the distant thunder-hum,
Maryland!

The Old Line's bugle, fife, and drum,
Maryland! 70

<sup>1</sup> the first words of the motto of Virginia's coat of arms, Sic semper tyrannis ("Thus always to tyrants")

She is not dead, nor deaf, nor dumb;
 Huzza! she spurns the Northern scum!
 She breathes! she burns! she'll come! she'll come!
 Maryland, my Maryland!

CHARLESTON<sup>1</sup>

By Henry Timrod

CALM as that second summer which precedes
 The first fall of the snow,
 In the broad sunlight of heroic deeds,
 The city bides the foe.

As yet, behind their ramparts, stern and proud,
 Her bolted thunders sleep,—
 Dark Sumter, like a battlemented cloud,
 Looms o'er the solemn deep.

No Calpe<sup>2</sup> frowns from lofty cliff or scar
 To guard the holy strand;      10
 But Moultrie holds in leash her dogs of war
 Above the level sand.

And down the dunes a thousand guns lie
 couched,
 Unseen, beside the flood—
 Like tigers in some Orient jungle crouched
 That wait and watch for blood.

Meanwhile, through streets still echoing with trade,
 Walk grave and thoughtful men,
 Whose hands may one day wield the patriot's blade
 As lightly as the pen.      20

And maidens, with such eyes as would grow dim
 Over a bleeding hound,
 Seem each one to have caught the strength of him
 Whose sword she sadly bound.

Thus girt without and garrisoned at home,
 Day patient following day,
 Old Charleston looks from roof and spire and dome,
 Across her tranquil bay.

<sup>1</sup> Here began the Civil War, April 12, 1861. Forts Sumter and Moultrie are in Charleston harbor.      <sup>2</sup> old name for the rock of Gibraltar

Ships, through a hundred foes, from Saxon lands
 And spicy Indian ports,      30
 Bring Saxon steel and iron to her hands,
 And summer to her courts.

But still, along yon dim Atlantic line,
 The only hostile smoke
 Creeps like a harmless mist above the brine,
 From some frail floating oak.

Shall the spring dawn, and she, still clad in smiles,
 And with an unscathed brow,
 Rest in the strong arms of her palm-crowned isles,
 As fair and free as now?      40

We know not; in the temple of the Fates
 God has inscribed her doom;
 And, all untroubled in her faith, she waits
 The triumph or the tomb.

BATTLE-HYMN OF THE REPUBLIC

By Julia Ward Howe

MINE eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord:
 He is trampling out the vintage where the grapes of wrath are stored;
 He hath loosed the fateful lightning of his terrible swift sword;
 His truth is marching on.

I have seen him in the watch-fires of a hundred circling camps;
 They have builded him an altar in the evening
 dews and damps;
 I can read his righteous sentence by the dim and flaring lamps:
 His day is marching on.

I have read a fiery gospel, writ in burnished rows of steel:
 "As ye deal with my contemners, so with you my grace shall deal;      10
 Let the Hero, born of woman, crush the serpent with his heel,
 Since God is marching on."

He has sounded forth the trumpet that shall never call retreat;
 He is sifting out the hearts of men before his judgment-seat;
 Oh, be swift, my soul, to answer him! be jubilant, my feet!
 Our God is marching on.

In the beauty of the lilies Christ was born across the sea,
 With a glory in his bosom that transfigures
 you and me:
 As he died to make men holy, let us die to make men free,
 While God is marching on. 20

LITTLE GIFFEN

By Francis Orray Ticknor

Out of the focal and foremost fire,
 Out of the hospital walls as dire;
 Smitten of grape-shot and gangrene,
 (Eighteenth battle, and he sixteen!)
 Specter! such as you seldom see,
 Little Giffen, of Tennessee!

"Take him and welcome!" the surgeons said;
 Little the doctor can help the dead!
 So we took him; and brought him where
 The balm was sweet in the summer air; 10
 And we laid him down on a wholesome bed,—
 Utter Lazarus, heel to head!

And we watched the war with bated breath,—
 Skeleton Boy against skeleton Death.
 Months of torture, how many such?
 Weary weeks of the stick and crutch;
 And still a glint of the steel-blue eye
 Told of a spirit that wouldn't die,

And didn't. Nay, more! in death's despite
 The crippled skeleton "learned to write." 20
 "Dear mother," at first, of course; and then
 "Dear captain," inquiring about the men.
 Captain's answer: "Of eighty-and-five,
 Giffen and I are left alive."

Word of gloom from the war, one day;
 Johnston pressed at the front, they say.
 Little Giffen was up and away;

A tear—his first—as he bade good-by,
 Dimmed the glint of his steel-blue eye.
 "I'll write, if spared!" There was news of the fight; 30
 But none of Giffen.—He did not write.

I sometimes fancy that, were I king
 Of the princely Knights of the Golden Ring,<sup>1</sup>
 With the songs of the minstrel in mine ear,
 And the tender legend that trembles here,
 I'd give the best on his bended knee,
 The whitest soul of my chivalry,
 For "Little Giffen," of Tennessee.

SHERIDAN'S RIDE

By Thomas Buchanan Read

Up from the South at break of day,
 Bringing to Winchester fresh dismay,
 The affrighted air with a shudder bore,
 Like a herald in haste, to the chieftain's door,
 The terrible grumble, and rumble, and roar,
 Telling the battle was on once more,
 And Sheridan twenty miles away.

And wider still those billows of war,
 Thundered along the horizon's bar;
 And louder yet into Winchester rolled 10
 The roar of that red sea uncontrolled,
 Making the blood of the listener cold,
 As he thought of the stake in that fiery fray,
 And Sheridan twenty miles away.

But there is a road from Winchester town,
 A good broad highway leading down;
 And there, through the flush of the morning light,
 A steed as black as the steeds of night,
 Was seen to pass, as with eagle flight,
 As if he knew the terrible need; 20
 He stretched away with his utmost speed;
 Hills rose and fell; but his heart was gay,
 With Sheridan fifteen miles away.

Still sprung from those swift hoofs, thundering south,
 The dust, like the smoke from the cannon's mouth;

<sup>1</sup> evidently alluding to King Arthur and his Knights of the Round Table

Or the trail of a comet, sweeping faster and faster,
Foreboding to traitors the doom of disaster.
The heart of the steed, and the heart of the master
Were beating like prisoners assaulting their walls,
Impatient to be where the battlefield calls; 30
Every nerve of the charger was strained to full play,
With Sheridan only ten miles away.

Under his spurning feet the road
Like an arrowy Alpine river flowed,
And the landscape sped away behind
Like an ocean flying before the wind;
And the steed, like a bark fed with furnace ire,
Swept on, with his wild eye full of fire.
But lo! he is nearing his heart's desire;
He is snuffing the smoke of the roaring fray,
With Sheridan only five miles away. 41

The first that the general saw were the groups
Of stragglers, and then the retreating troops,
What was done? What to do? A glance told him both,
Then striking his spurs, with a terrible oath,
He dashed down the line, 'mid a storm of huzzas,
And the wave of retreat checked its course
there, because
The sight of the master compelled it to pause.
With foam and with dust, the black charger was gray;
By the flash of his eye, and the red nostril's play, 50
He seemed to the whole great army to say,
"I have brought you Sheridan all the way
From Winchester, down to save the day!"

Hurrah, hurrah, for Sheridan!
Hurrah, hurrah, for horse and man!
And when their statues are placed on high,
Under the dome of the Union sky
(The American soldiers' Temple of Fame),
There with the glorious general's name,
Be it said, in letters both bold and bright, 60
"Here is the steed that saved the day

By carrying Sheridan into the fight,
From Winchester, twenty miles away!"

THE BLUE AND THE GRAY

By Francis Miles Finch

By the flow of the inland river,
Whence the fleets of iron have fled,
Where the blades of the grave grass quiver,
Asleep are the ranks of the dead:
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment day;
Under the one, the Blue,
Under the other, the Gray.

These in the robings of glory,
Those in the gloom of defeat, 10
All with the battle-blood gory,
In the dusk of eternity meet:
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment day;
Under the laurel, the Blue,
Under the willow, the Gray.

From the silence of sorrowful hours
The desolate mourners go,
Lovingly laden with flowers
Alike for the friend and the foe: 20
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment day;
Under the roses, the Blue,
Under the lilies, the Gray.

So with an equal splendor,
The morning sun-rays fall,
With a touch impartially tender,
On the blossoms blooming for all:
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment day; 30
Brodered with gold, the Blue,
Mellowed with gold, the Gray.

So, when the summer calleth,
On forest and field of grain,
With an equal murmur falleth
The cooling drip of the rain:
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment day;
Wet with the rain, the Blue,
Wet with the rain, the Gray. 40

Sadly, but not with upbraiding,
 The generous deed was done,
 In the storm of the years that are fading
 No braver battle was won:
 Under the sod and the dew,
 Waiting the judgment day;
 Under the blossoms, the Blue,
 Under the garlands, the Gray.

No more shall the war cry sever,
 Or the winding rivers be red; 50
 They banish our anger forever
 When they laurel the graves of our dead!
 Under the sod and the dew,
 Waiting the judgment day:
 Love and tears for the Blue,
 Tears and love for the Gray.

1819 -- Walt Whitman -- 1892

WHITMAN thought his chief mission was to be the spokesman and champion of democratic nationalism. He was a contemporary of Lowell but contrasted strongly with Lowell in temperament, in ideals, and in his attitude toward the past. America seemed to him a new and free place with boundless opportunities for development, and he had optimistic faith in the new race which should emerge from its equalitarian conditions. An apostle of American cultural independence, he strove to give expression to the collective attainments, institutions, and destiny of the new democracy.

Whitman was born May 31, 1819, at the hamlet of West Hills, Huntington, Long Island, of English and Dutch ancestry. He was early called "Walt" to distinguish him from his father Walter, a farmer, carpenter, and builder. His parents had Quaker leanings, and were somewhat under the influence of the unorthodox Quaker preacher Elias Hicks. The family moved to Brooklyn when Walt was about five years of age. He had only a few years of formal schooling, worked as office boy for a lawyer, then for a doctor, and when about thirteen began work as a printer. For several years he worked here and there in newspaper offices as typesetter and occasional contributor, and taught several brief terms in country schools.

Whitman engaged in journalism as reporter and editor in New York and Brooklyn from 1842 to 1851. His most important position was as editor of the Brooklyn Eagle from 1846 to 1848. On losing this position, partly for political reasons, he was appointed by chance to an editorial job on the recently founded New Orleans Daily Crescent and made the long journey there by rail, stage, and steamboat. The next year he was back in Brooklyn, still in newspaper work and writing for periodicals. Metropolitan life fascinated him, and he took deep interest in the stage, in concerts, in operatic and orchestral music, and in the human life of the streets and the ferries. In 1852 he followed his father's occupation of building and selling houses in Brooklyn. He must have had in mind for some years the composition of Leaves of Grass, which he published in 1855 when he was thirty-six, setting up the type for it himself. It had no sale, but a gift copy sent to Emerson brought a personal letter recognizing it as a revolutionary book. "I am not blind to the worth of the wonderful gift of Leaves of Grass. I find it the most extraordinary piece of wit and wisdom that America has yet contributed . . . I greet you at the beginning of a great career"—a statement that Whitman printed across the back of the next edition, somewhat perhaps to Emerson's embarrassment.

The decade from 1863 to 1873 Whitman spent mostly in Washington. On hearing that his brother George, who had enlisted in the Union army, had been wounded in Virginia, he went South to him. Next he served as a volunteer nurse to the wounded and sick in the Washington hospitals. He made hundreds of visits trying to help the soldiers. His personal experiences are set forth in Specimen Days (1882), the oftenest reprinted of his prose works. At the close of the War he had a clerkship in the Department of the Interior, but lost it when his superior officer came upon a copy of Leaves of Grass which he was revising, and thought it an objectionable book. His friends came to his defense and obtained for him another position in the office of the Attorney General, but for a long time his reputation was clouded by this happening.

His volume of poems on the Civil War, Drum Taps, appeared in 1866, and the fourth edition of Leaves of Grass in 1867. Publication of selections from his poetry by William Rossetti aroused interest in him in England. His prose work, Democratic Vistas, setting forth his main theses of democracy and individualism, appeared in 1871.

The twenty years from 1872 to 1892 he spent mainly as an invalid or semi-invalid with his brother George at Camden, New Jersey, at first nearly in poverty. Though Europe had welcomed him with appreciation and fame, in his own country recognition of him as one of the most original and stimulating of poets came mainly after the 1880's, when his books began to bring him an income and the number of his friends and admirers increased. His influence was not striking till after 1900, and was at its height in the World War period. He made a leisurely excursion to Denver and the Rocky Mountains in 1877, went to Canada to visit his friend Dr. R. M. Bucke in 1880, revisited Long Island and New York City, and went to Boston in 1881. He died in Camden in 1892 at the age of seventy-three. The last of successively enlarged editions of Leaves of Grass was published in 1891-92 and the Complete Prose Works in 1892.

Whitman was the last of the major poets emerging from the period of romantic idealism in America. Many of its doctrines—such as faith in the goodness of man, worship of nature as a benign influence, belief in the leadership of the poet—and something of its mysticism appear in his pages. But in much he broke away from European models and existing literary forms and vogues. He thought our literature too imitative and discarded elegance and sentiment, themes of love and war, and legends of old heroes. Some of the ideas he reiterates are that the poet who glorifies himself glorifies everybody; that there is divinity in all created things, hence everything is suitable material for poetry, the body as well as the soul; and that death is to be welcomed as leading to a new and more spiritual existence. To fit the matter of his verse, he sought to create a new kind of poetical manner, rejecting metrical form and rhyme and conventional stanzaic structure. Many writers in the succeeding age were to follow him. They imitated his loose form, free verse, linguistic audacities, and long catalogues and detailed lists, and went further than he in the cult of informality and the free admission to poetry of all topics, ugly as well as beautiful, physical as well as spiritual.

Whitman's poetical expression seems to have been influenced by his love of music, especially his intense devotion to Italian opera. He thought of poetry as a kind of musical utterance. He describes it as "vocalism" and "recitatif." He speaks of "uttering" his verse, of "caroling," "warbling," "trilling" his "songs," and he refers to himself as a "chansonnier." He seems to have wished to reach his readers with his voice, like singers at the opera, or like actors or orators. His pages are sprinkled with Italian, French, and Spanish terms. There is even some resemblance between the look of his verse on a page and operatic librettos.

Whitman's prose is not wide in range, but it serves as a key to his poetry and supplements it. Specimen Days, made up of notebook jottings, reads quickly and easily. Democratic Vistas, his most ambitious prose work, because of its more abstract subject matter and loose structure and its long repetitional and parenthetical periods, is less easy to follow.

Although Whitman thought himself the poet of the common people and tried to live out his doctrines of equality, sympathy, and comradeship with all human beings, he was first recognized by the sophisticated, and it is to them that he still has the strongest appeal. The position of popular poet was retained by Longfellow. Whitman's verse has been translated into many languages, and European recognition of American poets has gone chiefly to him and to Poe. He proved to be an original and vital force, a major dominating influence in the decades that succeeded him, and he will endure probably as the best poetic interpreter of the American nineteenth-century democratic dream.

Whitman had an unexpectedly extensive and various background of reading. Homer and Shakespeare were his favorites in youth. He had some knowledge of the major classics of Greece and Rome, and of Dante, the Arabian Nights, and Cervantes. In German literature he knew Goethe and was interested in the idealistic philosophers of the eighteenth century, especially Hegel. Among French authors he showed acquaintance with Rousseau and Voltaire, and he praised Dumas and George Sand. To the latter he seems to have owed some of his democratic ideas, his pose as a workingman's poet, and his borrowings of vocabulary from the French language. Among English writers he singled out for special discussion Shakespeare, Tennyson, Scott, Dickens, Carlyle, and Burns, and among American writers Emerson, Bryant, Longfellow, and Whittier. He expressed distaste for Poe and Henry James, and strangely enough left no references to Mark Twain. Of Whitman as a critic, M. O. Johnson says: "In every piece of literature Whitman looked for artistic excellence, but he also looked for democratic purpose. If he found a combination of the two, as he almost never did, then the work deserved praise with reservation. For great literature Whitman prescribed restraint, originality, purpose, optimism, universality, concern with nature, concern with contemporary life, and emphasis upon democracy. In the main, they are the essentials of literature of which Whitman spoke in his preface and elsewhere." Whitman held the literary belief that all literature of the past was the expression of "feudalism" and "superstition." He expected the literature of the dawning new day to be the greatest because it emerged from the forces of Democracy, or faith in the self-reliant spirituality of the individual, and of science, with its exaltation of the physical. For such a literature he thought new forms of expression necessary and inevitable.

The standard edition of the complete writings of Whitman is the Camden (10 vols., 1902), edited by R. M. Bucke, H. L. Traubel, and O. L. Triggs. Emory Holloway edited The Uncollected Poetry and Prose of Walt Whitman (2 vols., 1921), an inclusive edition of Leaves of Grass (1924), and a convenient Walt Whitman's Complete Poetry and Selected Prose and Letters (1938). Other Whitman material may be found in The Gathering of the Forces (2 vols., 1920), edited by Cleveland Rodgers and John Black; in Walt Whitman's Workshop, A Collection of Unpublished Manuscripts (1928), edited by C. J. Furness; and in Walt Whitman and the Civil War (1933), by C. I. Glicksberg. The first edition of Leaves of Grass has been edited for the Facsimile Text Society (1939) by C. J. Furness.

Biographies include With Walt Whitman in Camden (3 vols., 1906-14), an intimate account of the poet's later years, presented in diary form, by his friend and disciple, Horace Traubel; R. M. Bucke, Walt Whitman (1883), with the help of Whitman himself; and Bliss Perry, Walt Whitman, His Life and Work, in the American Men of Letters Series (1906). The English Men of Letters Series devotes two volumes to Whitman, by G. R. Carpenter (1909) and by John Bailey (1926). A French life by Léon Balzquette, Walt Whitman and His Work, was abridged and translated into English by Ellen Fitzgerald in 1920. E. Holloway's Whitman, an Interpretative Narrative received the Pulitzer prize for biography in 1926. Floyd Stovall's Whitman (revised, 1939), in American Writers Series, has an admirable introduction.

Of an immense number of critical books and articles, only a few may be mentioned. J. A. Symonds's laudatory Walt Whitman: a Study (1893) did much to arouse interest in the poet, as did the critical study, Whitman: a Study (1896), written by his friend, John Burroughs. In contrast to these complimentary views is George Santayana's hostile "The Poetry of Barbarism," in Interpretations of Poetry and Religion (1900). P. E. More wrote of Whitman in the Shelburne Essays, 4th series (1906). Other commentators are John Macy, in The Spirit of American Literature (1908); Basil de Sélincourt, in Walt Whitman: a Critical Study (1914); E. Holloway, in his chapter on Whitman in CHAL, II (1918); and Stuart Pratt Sherman, in Americans (1922). Norman Foerster treated Whitman in both his Nature in American Literature (1923) and American Criticism (1928). A discussion of Whitman by V. L. Parrington is included in his Main Currents in American Thought, III (1927). A recent treatment is by Louise Pound in the introduction to Whitman's Specimen Days, Democratic Vistas and Other Prose (1935). Edgar Lee Masters published a study of Whitman (1937), of especial interest as relating Whitman to American history. Esther Shepherd, in Walt Whitman's Pose (1938), indicates his indebtedness to George Sand. Maurice O. Johnson treats Whitman's critical views in Walt Whitman as a Critic (1938). Newton Arvin's Whitman (1938) is concerned with the social implications of his poetry. G. W. Allen deals with Whitman's verse technique in American Prosody (1935). Bibliographies of Walt Whitman are by E. Holloway, in CHAL, II; Frank Shay, The Bibliography of Walt Whitman (1920), which includes no criticism but lists only the works of Whitman himself; O. L. Triggs, in The Complete Writings of Walt Whitman, X; and Carolyn Wells and A. F. Goldsmith, A Concise Bibliography of Walt Whitman (1922).

From SONG OF MYSELF

This is the first and longest poem in Leaves of Grass (1858). It was preceded by a ten-page Preface treating of the nature of poetry and extolling the inspiration which America offers to the poet. Neither this poem nor the eleven that followed had headings. The title "Song of Myself" was given it later. Underlying it is the cult of self of Rousseau and the transcendentalists. The Song reflects Whitman's experiences, his zest for the spectacles of cities and for the out-of-doors, and many of the larger questions of life, faith, death, immortality, and happiness. It is better when read in detached passages than consecutively. Later, Whitman became less crude and incoherent as an artist. He realized the individual character of his work. "I know perfectly well my road is different. Most of the great poets are impersonal; I am personal. They portray characters, events, passions, but never mention themselves. In my poems, all revolves round, concentrates in, radiates from myself. But my book compels, absolutely necessitates, every reader to transpose himself or herself into the central position and become the living fountain, actor, experiencer himself or herself of every page, every aspiration, every line."

I

I CELEBRATE myself, and sing myself,
And what I assume you shall assume,
For every atom belonging to me as good belongs to you.

I loafe and invite my soul,
I lean and loafe at my ease observing a spear of summer grass.

My tongue, every atom of my blood, form'd from this soil, this air,
Born here of parents born here from parents the same, and their parents the same,
I, now thirty-seven years old in perfect health begin,
Hoping to cease not till death.

Creeds and schools in abeyance,
Retiring back a while sufficed at what they are, but never forgotten,
I harbor for good or bad, I permit to speak at every hazard,
Nature without check with original energy.

10

Alone far in the wilds and mountains I hunt,
Wandering amazed at my own lightness and glee,
In the late afternoon choosing a safe spot to pass the night,
Kindling a fire and broiling the fresh-kill'd game,
Falling asleep on the gather'd leaves with my dog and gun by my side.

The Yankee clipper is under her sky-sails, she cuts the sparkle and scud,
 My eyes settle the land, I bend at her prow or shout joyously from the deck.
 The boatmen and clam-diggers arose early and stopt for me,
 I tuck'd my trowser-ends in my boots and went and had a good time;
 You should have been with us that day round the chowder-kettle. 10

I saw the marriage of the trapper in the open air in the far west, the bride was a red girl,
 Her father and his friends sat near cross-legged and dumbly smoking, they had moccasins to their feet and large thick blankets hanging from their shoulders,
 On a bank lounged the trapper, he was drest mostly in skins, his luxuriant beard and curls protected his neck, he held his bride by the hand,
 She had long eyelashes, her head was bare, her coarse straight locks descended upon her voluptuous limbs and reach'd to her feet.

The runaway slave came to my house and stopt outside,
 I heard his motions crackling the twigs of the woodpile,
 Through the swung half-door of the kitchen I saw him limpsy<sup>1</sup> and weak,
 And went where he sat on a log and led him in and assured him,
 And brought water and fill'd a tub for his sweated body and bruis'd feet,
 And gave him a room that enter'd from my own, and gave him some coarse clean clothes, 20
 And remember perfectly well his revolving eyes and his awkwardness,
 And remember putting plasters on the galls of his neck and ankles;
 He staid with me a week before he was recuperated and pass'd north,
 I had him sit next me at table, my fire-lock lean'd in the corner.

16

I am of old and young, of the foolish as much as the wise,
 Regardless of others, ever regardful of others,
 Maternal as well as paternal, a child as well as a man,
 Stuff'd with the stuff that is coarse and stuff'd with the stuff that is fine,
 One of the Nation of many nations, the smallest the same and the largest the same,
 A Southerner soon as a Northerner, a planter nonchalant and hospitable down by the Oconee I live,
 A Yankee bound my own way ready for trade, my joints the limberest joints on earth and the sternest joints on earth,
 A Kentuckian walking the vale of the Elkhorn in my deer-skin leggings, a Louisianian or Georgian,
 A boatman over lakes or bays or along coasts, a Hoosier, Badger, Buckeye;
 At home on Kanadian snow-shoes or up in the bush, or with fishermen off Newfoundland, 10
 At home in the fleet of ice-boats, sailing with the rest and tacking.
 At home on the hills of Vermont or in the woods of Maine, or the Texan ranch, Comrade of Californians, comrade of free North-Westerners, (loving their big proportions,) Comrade of raftsmen and coalmen, comrade of all who shake hands and welcome to drink and meat,
 A learner with the simplest, a teacher of the thoughtfulest,
 A novice beginning yet experient of myriads of seasons,
 Of every hue and caste am I, of every rank and religion,
 A farmer, mechanic, artist, gentleman, sailor, quaker,
 Prisoner, fancy-man, rowdy, lawyer, physician, priest.
 I resist any thing better than my own diversity, 20

<sup>1</sup> dialectal or colloquial for the adjective "limp"

Breathe the air but leave plenty after me,
 And am not stuck up, and am in my place.
 (The moth and the fish-eggs are in their place,
 The bright suns I see and the dark suns I cannot see are in their place,
 The palpable is in its place and the impalpable is in its place.)

21

I am the poet of the Body and I am the poet of the Soul,
 The pleasures of heaven are with me and the pains of hell are with me,
 The first I graft and increase upon myself, the latter I translate into a new tongue.

I am the poet of the woman the same as the man,
 And I say it is as great to be a woman as to be a man,
 And I say there is nothing greater than the mother of men.

I chant the chant of dilation or pride,
 We have had ducking and deprecating about enough,
 I show that size is only development.

Have you outstript the rest? are you the President? 10
 It is a trifle, they will more than arrive there every one, and still pass on.

I am he that walks with the tender and growing night,
 I call to the earth and sea half-held by the night.

Press close bare-bosom'd night—press close magnetic nourishing night!
 Night of south winds—night of the large few stars!
 Still nodding night—mad naked summer night.

Smile O voluptuous cool-breath'd earth!
 Earth of the slumbering and liquid trees!
 Earth of the departed sunset—earth of the mountains misty-topt!
 Earth of the vitreous pour of the full moon just tinged with blue! 20
 Earth of shine and dark mottling the tide of the river!
 Earth of the limpid gray of clouds brighter and clearer for my sake!
 Far-swooping elbow'd earth—rich apple-blossom'd earth!
 Smile, for your lover comes.

Prodigal, you have given me love—therefore I to you give love!
 O unspeakable passionate love.

31

I believe a leaf of grass is no less than the journey-work of the stars,
 And the pismire is equally perfect, and a grain of sand, and the egg of the wren,
 And the tree-toad is a chef-d'œuvre for the highest,
 And the running blackberry would adorn the parlors of heaven,
 And the narrowest hinge in my hand puts to scorn all machinery,
 And the cow crunching with depress'd head surpasses any statue,
 And a mouse is miracle enough to stagger sextillions of infidels.

I find I incorporate gneiss, coal, long-threaded moss, fruits, grains, esculent roots,
 And am stucco'd with quadrupeds and birds all over,
 And have distanced what is behind me for all good reasons, 10
 But call any thing back again when I desire it.

In vain the speeding or shyness,
 In vain the plutonic rocks send their old heat against my approach,
 In vain the mastodon retreats beneath its own powder'd bones,
 In vain objects stand leagues off and assume manifold shapes,
 In vain the ocean settling in hollows and the great monsters lying low,
 In vain the buzzard houses herself with the sky,
 In vain the snake slides through the creepers and logs,
 In vain the elk takes to the inner passes of the woods,
 In vain the razor-bill'd auk sails far north to Labrador,
 I follow quickly, I ascend to the next in the fissure of the cliff.

Space and Time! now I see it is true, what I guess'd at,
 What I guess'd when I loaf'd on the grass,
 What I guess'd while I lay alone in my bed,
 And again as I walk'd the beach under the paling stars of the morning.

My ties and ballasts leave me, my elbows rest in sea-gaps,
 I skirt sierras, my palms cover continents,
 I am afoot with my vision.

By the city's quadrangular houses—in log huts, camping with lumbermen,
 Along the ruts of the turnpike, along the dry gulch and rivulet bed, Weeding my onion-patch or hoeing rows of carrots and parsnips, crossing savannas, trailing in forests, 10
 Prospecting, gold-digging, girdling the trees of a new purchase,
 Scorch'd ankle-deep by the hot sand, hauling my boat down the shallow river,
 Where the panther walks to and fro on a limb overhead, where the buck turns furiously at the hunter,
 Where the rattlesnake suns his flabby length on a rock, where the otter is feeding on fish,
 Where the alligator in his tough pimples sleeps by the bayou,
 Where the black bear is searching for roots or honey, where the beaver pats the mud with his paddle-shaped tail;
 Over the growing sugar, over the yellow-flower'd cotton plant, over the rice in its low moist field,
 Over the sharp-peak'd farm house, with its scallop'd scum and slender shoots from the gutters,
 Over the western persimmon, over the long-leav'd corn, over the delicate blue-flower flax,
 Over the white and brown buckwheat, a hummer and buzzer there with the rest, 20
 Over the dusky green of the rye as it ripples and shades in the breeze;
 Scaling mountains, pulling myself cautiously up, holding on by low scragged limbs,
 Walking the path worn in the grass and beat through the leaves of the brush,
 Where the quail is whistling betwixt the woods and the wheat-lot,
 Where the bat flies in the Seventh-month eve, where the great gold-bug drops through the dark,
 Where the brook puts out of the roots of the old tree and flows to the meadow,
 Where cattle stand and shake away flies with the tremulous shuddering of their hides,
 Where the cheese-cloth hangs in the kitchen, where andirons straddle the hearth-slab, where cobwebs fall in festoons from the rafters;
 Where trip-hammers crash, where the press is whirling its cylinders,
 Wherever the human heart beats with terrible throes under its ribs, 30

Where the pear-shaped balloon is floating aloft, (floating in it myself and looking composedly down,)

Where the life-car<sup>1</sup> is drawn on the slip-noose, where the heat hatches pale-green eggs in the dented sand,

Where the she-whale swims with her calf and never forsakes it,
 Where the steam-ship trails hind-ways its long pennant of smoke,
 Where the fin of the shark cuts like a black chip out of the water,
 Where the half-burn'd brig is riding on unknown currents,
 Where shells grow to her slimy deck, where the dead are corrupting below;
 Where the dense-starr'd flag is borne at the head of the regiments,
 Approaching Manhattan up by the long-stretching island,
 Under Niagara, the cataract falling like a veil over my countenance, 40
 Upon a door-step, upon the horse-block of hard wood outside,
 Upon the race-course, or enjoying picnics or jigs or a good game of base-ball,
 At he-festivals, with blackguard gibes, ironical license, bull-dances, drinking, laughter,
 At the cider-mill tasting the sweets of the brown mash, sucking the juice through a straw,
 At apple-peelings wanting kisses for all the red fruit I find,
 At musters, beach-parties, friendly bees, huskings, house-raising;
 Where the mocking-bird sounds his delicious gurgles, cackles, screams, weeps,
 Where the hay-rick stands in the barn-yard, where the dry-stalks are scatter'd, where the brood-cow waits in the hovel,
 Where the bull advances to do his masculine work, where the stud to the mare, where the cock is treading the hen,

Where the heifers browse, where geese nip their food with short jerks, 50
 Where sun-down shadows lengthen over the limitless and lonesome prairie,
 Where herds of buffalo make a crawling spread of the square miles far and near,
 Where the humming-bird shimmers, where the neck of the long-lived swan is curving and winding,
 Where the laughing-gull scoots by the shore, where she laughs her near-human laugh,
 Where bee-hives range on a gray bench in the garden half hid by the high weeds,
 Where band-neck'd partridges roost in a ring on the ground with their heads out,
 Where burial coaches enter the arch'd gates of a cemetery,
 Where winter wolves bark amid wastes of snow and icicled trees,
 Where the yellow-crown'd heron comes to the edge of the marsh at night and feeds upon small crabs,

Where the splash of swimmers and divers cools the warm noon, 60
 Where the katy-did works her chromatic reed on the walnut-tree over the well,
 Through patches of citrons and cucumbers with silver-wired leaves,
 Through the salt-lick or orange glade, or under conical firs,
 Through the gymnasium, through the curtain'd saloon, through the office or public hall,
 Pleas'd with the native and pleas'd with the foreign, pleas'd with the new and old,
 Pleas'd with the homely woman as well as the handsome,
 Pleas'd with the quakeress as she puts off her bonnet and talks melodiously,
 Pleas'd with the tune of the choir of the whitewash'd church, Pleas'd with the earnest words of the sweating Methodist preacher, impress'd seriously at the camp-meeting;

Looking in at the shop-windows of Broadway the whole forenoon, flattening the flesh of my nose on the thick plate-glass, 70
 Wandering the same afternoon with my face turn'd up to the clouds, or down a lane or along the beach,

<sup>1</sup> watertight boat or chamber traveling on a rope

My right and left arms round the sides of two friends, and I in the middle;
 Coming home with the silent and dark-cheek'd bush-boy, (behind me he rides at the drape of the day,)

Far from the settlements studying the print of animals' feet, or the moccasin print,
 By the cot in the hospital reaching lemonade to a feverish patient,
 Nigh the coffin'd corpse when all is still, examining with a candle;
 Voyaging to every port to dicker and adventure,
 Hurrying with the modern crowd as eager and fickle as any,
 Hot toward one I hate, ready in my madness to knife him,
 Solitary at midnight in my back yard, my thoughts gone from me a long while, 80
 Walking the old hills of Judæa with the beautiful gentle God by my side,
 Speeding through space, speeding through heaven and the stars,
 Speeding amid the seven satellites and the broad ring, and the diameter of eighty thousand miles,
 Speeding with tail'd meteors, throwing fire-balls like the rest,
 Carrying the crescent child that carries its own full mother in its belly,
 Storming, enjoying, planning, loving, cautioning,
 Backing and filling, appearing and disappearing,
 I tread day and night such roads.

I visit the orchards of spheres and look at the product,
 And look at quintillions ripen'd and look at quintillions green. 90

I fly those flights of a fluid and swallowing soul,
 My course runs below the soundings of plummets.

I help myself to material and immaterial,
 No guard can shut me off, no law prevent me.

I anchor my ship for a little while only,
 My messengers continually cruise away or bring their returns to me.

I go hunting polar furs and the seal, leaping chasms with a pike-pointed staff, clinging to topples of brittle and blue.

I ascend to the foretruck,
 I take my place late at night in the crow's-nest,
 We sail the arctic sea, it is plenty light enough, 100
 Through the clear atmosphere I stretch around on the wonderful beauty,
 The enormous masses of ice pass me and I pass them, the scenery is plain in all directions,
 The white-topt mountains show in the distance, I fling out my fancies toward them,
 We are approaching some great battle-field in which we are soon to be engaged,
 We pass the colossal outposts of the encampment, we pass with still feet and caution,
 Or we are entering by the suburbs some vast and ruin'd city,
 The blocks and fallen architecture more than all the living cities of the globe.

I am a free companion, I bivouac by invading watchfires,
 I turn the bridegroom out of bed and stay with the bride myself,
 I tighten her all night to my thighs and lips. 110

My voice is the wife's voice, the screech by the rail of the stairs,
 They fetch my man's body up dripping and drown'd.

I understand the large hearts of heroes,
 The courage of present times and all times,
 How the skipper saw the crowded and rudderless wreck of the steam-ship, and Death chasing it up and down the storm,
 How he knuckled tight and gave not back an inch, and was faithful of days and faithful of nights,
 And chalk'd in large letters on a board, Be of good cheer, we will not desert you;
 How he follow'd with them and tack'd with them three days and would not give it up,
 How he saved the drifting company at last, 119
 How the lank loose-gown'd women look'd when boated from the side of their prepared graves,
 How the silent old-faced infants and the lifted sick, and the sharp-lipp'd unshaven men;
 All this I swallow, it tastes good, I like it well, it becomes mine,
 I am the man, I suffer'd, I was there.

The disdain and calmness of martyrs,
 The mother of old, condemn'd for a witch, burnt with dry wood, her children gazing on,
 The hounded slave that flags in the race, leans by the fence, blowing, cover'd with sweat,
 The twinges that sting like needles his legs and neck, the murderous buckshot and the bullets,
 All these I feel or am.

I am the hounded slave, I wince at the bite of the dogs,
 Hell and despair are upon me, crack and again crack the marksmen, 130
 I clutch the rails of the fence, my gore dribs, thinn'd with the ooze of my skin,
 I fall on the weeds and stones,
 The riders spur their unwilling horses, haul close,
 Taunt my dizzy ears and beat me violently over the head with whip-stocks.

Agonies are one of my changes of garments,
 I do not ask the wounded person how he feels, I myself become the wounded person,
 My hurts turn livid upon me as I lean on a cane and observe.

I am the mash'd fireman with breast-bone broken,
 Tumbling walls buried me in their debris,
 Heat and smoke I inspired, I heard the yelling shouts of my comrades, 140
 I heard the distant click of their picks and shovels,
 They have clear'd the beams away, they tenderly lift me forth.

I lie in the night air in my red shirt, the pervading hush is for my sake,
 Painless after all I lie exhausted but not so unhappy,
 White and beautiful are the faces around me, the heads are bared of their fire-caps,
 The kneeling crowd fades with the light of the torches.

Distant and dead resuscitate,
 They show as the dial or move as the hands of me, I am the clock myself.

I am an old artillerist, I tell of my fort's bombardment,
 I am there again. 150

Again the long roll of the drummers,
 Again the attacking cannon, mortars,
 Again to my listening ears the cannon responsive.

I take part, I see and hear the whole,
 The cries, curses, roar, the plaudits for well-aim'd shots,

The ambulanza<sup>1</sup> slowly passing trailing its red drip,
 Workmen searching after damages, making indispensable repairs,
 The rent of grenades through the roof, the fan-shaped explosion,
 The whizz of limbs, heads, stone, wood, iron, high in the air.

Again gurgles the mouth of my dying general, he furiously waves with his hand, 160
 He gasps through the clot Mind me not—mind—the entrenchments.

Would you hear of an old-time sea-fight?
 Would you learn who won by the light of the moon and stars?
 List to the yarn, as my grandmother's father the sailor told it to me.

Our foe was no skulk in his ship I tell you, (said he,)
 His was the surly English pluck, and there is no tougher or truer, and never was, and never will
 be;
 Along the lower'd eve he came horribly raking us.

We closed with him, the yards entangled, the cannon touch'd,
 My captain lash'd fast with his own hands.

We had receiv'd some eighteen pound shots under the water,
 On our lower-gun-deck two large pieces had burst at the first fire, killing all around and blowing up overhead. 10

Fighting at sun-down, fighting at dark,
 Ten o'clock at night, the full moon well up, our leaks on the gain, and five feet of water reported,
 The master-at-arms loosing the prisoners confined in the afterhold to give them a chance for themselves.

The transit to and from the magazine is now stopt by the sentinels,
 They see so many strange faces they do not know whom to trust.

Our frigate takes fire,
 The other asks if we demand quarter?
 If our colors are struck and the fighting done?

Now I laugh content, for I hear the voice of my little captain,
We have not struck, he composedly cries, we have just begun our part of the fighting. 20

Only three guns are in use,
 One is directed by the captain himself against the enemy's mainmast,
 Two well serv'd with grape and canister silence his musketry and clear his decks.

The tops alone second the fire of this little battery, especially the main-top,
 They hold out bravely during the whole of the action.

Not a moment's cease,
 The leaks gain fast on the pumps, the fire eats toward the powder-magazine.

One of the pumps has been shot away, it is generally thought we are sinking.
 Serene stands the little captain,
 He is not hurried, his voice is neither high nor low, 30
 His eyes give more light to us than our battle-lanterns.

Toward twelve there in the beams of the moon they surrender to us.

Stretch'd and still lies the midnight,
 Two great hulls motionless on the breast of the darkness,
 Our vessel riddled and slowly sinking, preparations to pass to the one we have conquer'd,
 The captain on the quarter-deck coldly giving his orders through a countenance white as a sheet,
 Near by the corpse of the child that serv'd in the cabin,
 The dead face of an old salt with long white hair and carefully curl'd whiskers,
 The flames spite of all that can be done flickering aloft and below,
 The husky voices of the two or three officers yet fit for duty,
 Formless stacks of bodies and bodies by themselves, dabs of flesh upon the masts and spars,
 Cut of cordage, dangle of rigging, slight shock of the soothe of waves, 10
 Black and impassive guns, litter of powder-parcels, strong scent,
 A few large stars overhead, silent and mournful shining, Delicate sniffs of sea-breeze, smells of sedgy grass and fields by the shore, death-messages given in charge to survivors,
 The hiss of the surgeon's knife, the gnawing teeth of his saw,
 Wheeze, cluck, swash of falling blood, short wild scream, and long, dull, tapering groan,
 These so, these irretrievable.

43

I do not despise you priests, all time, the world over,
 My faith is the greatest of faiths and the least of faiths,
 Enclosing worship ancient and modern and all between ancient and modern,
 Believing I shall come again upon the earth after five thousand years,
 Waiting responses from oracles, honoring the gods, saluting the sun,
 Making a fetich of the first rock or stump, powowing with sticks in the circle of obis, Helping the lama or brahmin as he trims the lamps of the idols,
 Dancing yet through the streets in a phallic procession, rapt and austere in the woods a gymnos-ophist,
 Drinking mead from the skull-cup, to Shastas and Vedas admirant, minding the Koran, Walking the teokallis, spotted with gore from the stone and knife, beating the serpent-skin drum, 10
 Accepting the Gospels, accepting him that was crucified, knowing assuredly that he is divine,
 To the mass kneeling or the puritan's prayer rising, or sitting patiently in a pew,
 Ranting and frothing in my insane crisis, or waiting dead-like till my spirit arouses me,
 Looking forth on pavement and land, or outside of pavement and land,
 Belonging to the winders of the circuit of circuits.

One of that centripetal and centrifugal gang I turn and talk like a man leaving charges before a journey.

Down-hearted doubters dull and excluded,
 Frivolous, sullen, moping, angry, affected, dishearten'd, atheistical,
 I know every one of you, I know the sea of torment, doubt, despair and unbelief.

How the flukes splash! 20
 How they contort rapid as lightning, with spasms and spouts of blood!

Be at peace bloody flukes of doubters and sullen mopers,
 I take my place among you as much as among any,
 The past is the push of you, me, all, precisely the same,
 And what is yet untried and afterward is for you, me, all, precisely the same.

I do not know what is untried and afterward,
 But I know it will in its turn prove sufficient, and cannot fail.
 Each who passes is consider'd, each who stops is consider'd, not a single one can it fail.

It cannot fail the young man who died and was buried,
 Nor the young woman who died and was put by his side, 30
 Nor the little child that peep'd in at the door, and then drew back and was never seen again,
 Nor the old man who has lived without purpose, and feels it with bitterness worse than gall,
 Nor him in the poor-house tubercled by rum and the bad disorder,
 Nor the numberless slaughter'd and wreck'd, nor the brutish koboo call'd the ordure of humanity,
 Nor the sacs merely floating with open mouths for food to slip in,
 Nor any thing in the earth, or down in the oldest graves of the earth,
 Nor any thing in the myriads of spheres, nor the myriads of myriads that inhabit them,
 Nor the present, nor the least whisp that is known.

47

I am the teacher of athletes,
 He that by me spreads a wider breast than my own proves the width of my own,
 He most honors my style who learns under it to destroy the teacher.

The boy I love, the same becomes a man not through derived power, but in his own right,
 Wicked rather than virtuous out of conformity or fear,
 Fond of his sweetheart, relishing well his steak,
 Unrequited love or a slight cutting him worse than sharp steel cuts,
 First-rate to ride, to fight, to hit the bull's eye, to sail a skiff, to sing a song or play on the banjo,
 Preferring scars and the beard and faces pitted with small-pox over all latherers,
 And those well-tann'd to those that keep out of the sun. 10

I teach straying from me, yet who can stray from me?
 I follow you whoever you are from the present hour,
 My words itch at your ears till you understand them.

I do not say these things for a dollar or to fill up the time while I wait for a boat,
 (It is you talking just as much as myself, I act as the tongue of you, Tied in your mouth, in mine it begins to be loosen'd.)

I swear I will never again mention love or death inside a house,
 And I swear I will never translate myself at all, only to him or her who privately stays with me in the open air.

If you would understand me go to the heights or water-shore,
 The nearest gnat is an explanation, and a drop or motion of waves a key, 20
 The maul, the oar, the hand-saw, second my words.

No shutter'd room or school can commune with me,
 But roughs and little children better than they.

The young mechanic is closest to me, he knows me well,
 The woodman that takes his axe and jug with him shall take me with him all day,
 The farm-boy ploughing in the field feels good at the sound of my voice,
 In vessels that sail my words sail, I go with fishermen and seamen and love them.

The soldier camp'd or upon the march is mine,
 On the night ere the pending battle many seek me, and I do not fail them,
 On that solemn night (it may be their last) those that know me seek me. 30

My face rubs to the hunter's face when he lies down alone in his blanket,
 The driver thinking of me does not mind the jolt of his wagon,
 The young mother and old mother comprehend me,
 The girl and the wife rest the needle a moment and forget where they are,
 They and all would resume what I have told them.

48

I have said that the soul is not more than the body,
 And I have said that the body is not more than the soul,
 And nothing, not God, is greater to one than one's self is,
 And whoever walks a furlong without sympathy walks to his own funeral drest in his shroud,
 And I or you pocketless of a dime may purchase the pick of the earth,
 And to glance with an eye or show a bean in its pod confounds the learning of all times,
 And there is no trade or employment but the young man following it may become a hero,
 And there is no object so soft but it makes a hub for the wheel'd universe,
 And I say to any man or woman, Let your soul stand cool and composed before a million universes.

And I say to mankind, Be not curious about God, 10
 For I who am curious about each am not curious about God,
 (No array of terms can say how much I am at peace about God and about death.)

I hear and behold God in every object, yet understand God not in the least,
 Nor do I understand who there can be more wonderful than myself.

Why should I wish to see God better than this day?
 I see something of God each hour of the twenty-four, and each moment then,
 In the faces of men and women I see God, and in my own face in the glass,
 I find letters from God dropt in the street, and every one is sign'd by God's name,
 And I leave them where they are, for I know wheresoe'er I go,
 Others will punctually come for ever and ever. 20

52

The spotted hawk swoops by and accuses me, he complains of my gab and my loitering.

I too am not a bit tamed, I too am untranslatable,
 I sound my barbaric yawp over the roofs of the world.

The last scud of day holds back for me,
 It flings my likeness after the rest and true as any on the shadow'd wilds,
 It coaxes me to the vapor and the dusk.

I depart as air, I shake my white locks at the runaway sun,
 I effuse my flesh in eddies, and drift it in lacy jags.

I bequeath myself to the dirt to grow from the grass I love,
 If you want me again look for me under your boot-soles. 10

You will hardly know who I am or what I mean,
 But I shall be good health of you nevertheless,
 And filter and fibre your blood.

Failing to fetch me at first keep encouraged,
 Missing me one place search another,
 I stop somewhere waiting for you.

MIRACLES

WHY, who makes much of a miracle?

As to me I know of nothing else but miracles,

Whether I walk the streets of Manhattan,

Or dart my sight over the roofs of houses toward the sky,

Or wade with naked feet along the beach just in the edge of the water,

Or stand under trees in the woods,

Or talk by day with any one I love, or sleep in the bed at night with any one I love,

Or sit at table at dinner with the rest,

Or look at strangers opposite me riding in the car,

Or watch honey-bees busy around the hive of a summer forenoon,

10

Or animals feeding in the fields,

Or birds, or the wonderfulness of insects in the air,

Or the wonderfulness of the sundown, or of stars shining so quiet and bright,

Or the exquisite delicate thin curve of the new moon in spring;

These with the rest, one and all, are to me miracles,

The whole referring, yet each distinct and in its place.

To me every hour of the light and dark is a miracle,

Every cubic inch of space is a miracle,

Every square yard of the surface of the earth is spread with the same,

Every foot of the interior swarms with the same.

20

To me the sea is a continual miracle,

The fishes that swim—the rocks—the motion of the waves—the ships with men in them,

What stranger miracles are there?

CROSSING BROOKLYN FERRY

I

FLOOD-TIDE below me! I see you face to face!

Clouds of the west—sun there half an hour high—I see you also face to face.

Crowds of men and women attired in the usual costumes, how curious you are to me!

On the ferry-boats the hundreds and hundreds that cross, returning home, are more curious to me than you suppose,

And you that shall cross from shore to shore years hence are more to me, and more in my meditations, than you might suppose.

2

The impalpable sustenance of me from all things at all hours of the day,

The simple, compact, well-join'd scheme, myself disintegrated, every one disintegrated yet part of the scheme,

The similitudes of the past and those of the future,

The glories strung like beads on my smallest sights and hearings, on the walk in the street and the passage over the river,

The current rushing so swiftly and swimming with me far away,

10

The others that are to follow me, the ties between me and them,

The certainty of others, the life, love, sight, hearing of others.

Others will enter the gates of the ferry and cross from shore to shore,
 Others will watch the run of the flood-tide,
 Others will see the shipping of Manhattan north and west, and the heights of Brooklyn to the south and east,
 Others will see the islands large and small;
 Fifty years hence, others will see them as they cross, the sun half an hour high,
 A hundred years hence, or ever so many hundred years hence, others will see them,
 Will enjoy the sunset, the pouring-in of the flood-tide, the falling-back to the sea of the ebb-tide.

3

It avails not, time nor place—distance avails not, 20
 I am with you, you men and women of a generation, or ever so many generations hence,
 Just as you feel when you look on the river and sky, so I felt,
 Just as any of you is one of a living crowd, I was one of a crowd,
 Just as you are refresh'd by the gladness of the river and the bright flow, I was refresh'd,
 Just as you stand and lean on the rail, yet hurry with the swift current, I stood yet was hurried,
 Just as you look on the numberless masts of ships and the thick-stemm'd pipes of steamboats, I look'd.
 I too many and many a time cross'd the river of old,
 Watched the Twelfth-month sea-gulls, saw them high in the air floating with motionless wings, oscillating their bodies,
 Saw how the glistening yellow lit up parts of their bodies and left the rest in strong shadow,
 Saw the slow-wheeling circles and the gradual edging toward the south, 30
 Saw the reflection of the summer sky in the water,
 Had my eyes dazzled by the shimmering track of beams,
 Look'd at the fine centrifugal spokes of light round the shape of my head in the sunlit water,
 Look'd on the haze on the hills southward and south-westward,
 Look'd on the vapor as it flew in fleeces tinged with violet,
 Look'd toward the lower bay to notice the vessels arriving,
 Saw their approach, saw aboard those that were near me,
 Saw the white sails of schooners and sloops, saw the ships at anchor,
 The sailors at work in the rigging or out astride the spars,
 The round masts, the swinging motion of the hulls, the slender serpentine pennants, 40
 The large and small steamers in motion, the pilots in their pilot-houses,
 The white wake left by the passage, the quick tremulous whirl of the wheels,
 The flags of all nations, the falling of them at sunset,
 The scallop-edged waves in the twilight, the ladled cups, the frolicsome crests and glistening,
 The stretch afar growing dimmer and dimmer, the gray walls of the granite storehouses by the docks,
 On the river the shadowy group, the big steam-tug closely flank'd on each side by the barges, the hay-boat, the belated lighter,
 On the neighboring shore the fires from the foundry chimneys burning high and glaringly into the
 night,
 Casting their flicker of black contrasted with wild red and yellow light over the tops of houses, and down into the clefts of streets.

4

These and all else were to me the same as they are to you,
 I loved well those cities, loved well the stately and rapid river, 50
 The men and women I saw were all near to me,

Others the same—others who look back on me because I look'd forward to them,
(The time will come, though I stop here today and tonight.)

5

What is it then between us?
What is the count of the scores or hundreds of years between us?

Whatever it is, it avails not—distance avails not, and place avails not,
I too lived, Brooklyn of ample hills was mine,
I too walk'd the streets of Manhattan island, and bathed in the waters around it,
I too felt the curious abrupt questionings stir within me,
In the day among crowds of people sometimes they came upon me, 60
In my walks home late at night or as I lay in my bed they came upon me,
I too had been struck from the float forever held in solution,
I too had receiv'd identity by my body,
That I was I knew was of my body, and what I should be I knew I should be of my body.

6

It is not upon you alone the dark patches fall,
The dark threw its patches down upon me also,
The best I had done seem'd to me blank and suspicious,
My great thoughts as I supposed them, were they not in reality meager?
Nor is it you alone who know what it is to be evil,
I am he who knew what it was to be evil, 70
I too knitted the old knot of contrariety,
Blabb'd, blush'd, resented, lied, stole, grudg'd,
Had guile, anger, lust, hot wishes I dared not speak,
Was wayward, vain, greedy, shallow, sly, cowardly, malignant,
The wolf, the snake, the hog, not wanting in me,
The cheating look, the frivolous word, the adulterous wish, not wanting,
Refusals, hates, postponements, meanness, laziness, none of these wanting,
Was one with the rest, the days and haps of the rest,
Was call'd by my nighest name by clear loud voices of young men as they saw me approaching or passing,
Felt their arms on my neck as I stood, or the negligent leaning of their flesh against me as I sat, 80
Saw many I loved in the street or ferry-boat or public assembly, yet never told them a word,
Lived the same life with the rest, the same old laughing, gnawing, sleeping,
Play'd the part that still looks back on the actor or actress,
The same old role, the role that is what we make it, as great as we like,
Or as small as we like, or both great and small.

7

Closer yet I approach you,
What thought you have of me now, I had as much of you—I laid in my stores in advance,
I consider'd long and seriously of you before you were born.

Who was to know what should come home to me?
Who knows but I am enjoying this? 90
Who knows, for all the distance, but I am as good as looking at you now, for all you cannot see me?

8

Ah, what can ever be more stately and admirable to me than mast-hemm'd Manhattan?
 River and sunset and scallop-edg'd waves of flood-tide?
 The sea-gulls oscillating their bodies, the hay-boat in the twilight, and the belated lighter?

What gods can exceed these that clasp me by the hand, and with voices I love call me promptly and loudly by my nighest name as I approach?

What is more subtle than this which ties me to the woman or man that looks in my face?
 Which fuses me into you now, and pours my meaning into you?

We understand then do we not?

What I promis'd without mentioning it, have you not accepted?

What the study could not teach—what the preaching could not accomplish is accomplish'd, is it not? 100

9

Flow on, river! flow with the flood-tide, and ebb with the ebb-tide!

Frolic on, crested and scallop-edg'd waves!

Gorgeous clouds of the sunset! drench with your splendor me, or the men and women generations after me!

Cross from shore to shore, countless crowds of passengers!

Stand up, tall masts of Mannahatta! stand up, beautiful hills of Brooklyn!

Throb, baffled and curious brain! throw out questions and answers!

Suspend here and everywhere, eternal float of solution!

Gaze, loving and thirsting eyes, in the house or street or public assembly!

Sound out, voices of young men! loudly and musically call me by my nighest name!

Live, old life! play the part that looks back on the actor or actress! 110

Play the old role, the role that is great or small according as one makes it!

Consider, you who peruse me, whether I may not in unknown ways be looking upon you;

Be firm, rail over the river, to support those who lean idly, yet haste with the hasting current;

Fly on, sea-birds! fly sideways, or wheel in large circles high in the air;

Receive the summer sky, you water, and faithfully hold it till all downcast eyes have time to take it from you!

Diverge, fine spokes of light, from the shape of my head, or any one's head, in the sunlit water!

Come on, ships from the lower bay! pass up or down, white-sail'd schooners, sloops, lighters!
 Flaunt away, flags of all nations! be duly lower'd at sunset!

Burn high your fires, foundry chimneys! cast black shadows at nightfall! cast red and yellow light over the tops of the houses!

Appearances, now or henceforth, indicate what you are, 120

You necessary film, continue to envelop the soul,

About my body for me, and your body for you, be hung our divinest aromas,

Thrive, cities—bring your freight, bring your shows, ample and sufficient rivers,

Expand, being than which none else is perhaps more spiritual,

Keep your places, objects than which none else is more lasting.

You have waited, you always wait, you dumb, beautiful ministers,

We receive you with free sense at last, and are insatiate henceforward,

Not you any more shall be able to foil us, or withhold yourselves from us,

We use you, and do not cast you aside—we plant you permanently within us,

We fathom you not—we love you—there is perfection in you also, 130

You furnish your parts toward eternity,

Great or small, you furnish your parts toward the soul. 1856

THERE WAS A CHILD WENT FORTH

THERE was a child went forth every day,
 And the first object he look'd upon, that object he became,
 And that object became part of him for the day or a certain part of the day,
 Or for many years or stretching cycles of years.

The early lilacs became part of this child,
 And grass and white and red morning-glories, and white and red clover, and the song of the phœbe-bird,
 And the Third-month lambs and the sow's pink-faint litter, and the mare's foal and the cow's calf,
 And the noisy brood of the barnyard or by the mire of the pond-side,
 And the fish suspending themselves so curiously below there, and the beautiful curious liquid,
 And the water-plants with their graceful flat heads, all became part of him. 10

The field-sprouts of Fourth-month and Fifth-month became part of him,
 Winter-grain sprouts and those of the light-yellow corn, and the esculent roots of the garden,
 And the apple-trees cover'd with blossoms and the fruit afterward, and wood-berries, and the commonest weeds by the road,
 And the old drunkard staggering home from the outhouse of the tavern whence he had lately risen,
 And the schoolmistress that pass'd on her way to the school,
 And the friendly boys that pass'd, and the quarrelsome boys,
 And the tidy and fresh-cheek'd girls, and the barefoot Negro boy and girl,
 And all the changes of city and country wherever he went.

His own parents, he that had father'd him and she that had conceiv'd him in her womb and birth'd
 him,
 They gave this child more of themselves than that, 20
 They gave him afterward every day, they became part of him.

The mother at home quietly placing the dishes on the supper-table,
 The mother with mild words, clean her cap and gown, a wholesome odor falling off her person and clothes as she walks by,
 The father, strong, self-sufficient, manly, mean, anger'd, unjust,
 The blow, the quick loud word, the tight bargain, the crafty lure,
 The family usages, the language, the company, the furniture, the yearning and swelling heart, Affection that will not be gainsay'd, the sense of what is real, the thought if after all it should prove unreal,

The doubts of day-time and the doubts of night-time, the curious whether and how,
 Whether that which appears so is so, or is it all flashes and specks?
 Men and women crowding fast in the streets, if they are not flashes and specks what are they? 30
 The streets themselves and the façades of houses, and goods in the windows,
 Vehicles, teams, the heavy-plank'd wharves, the huge crossing at the ferries,
 The village on the highland seen from afar at sunset, the river between,
 Shadows, aureola and mist, the light falling on roofs and gables of white or brown two miles off,
 The schooner near by sleepily dropping down the tide, the little boat slack-tow'd astern,
 The hurrying tumbling waves, quick-broken crests, slapping,
 The strata of color'd clouds, the long bar of maroon-tint away solitary by itself, the spread of purity it lies motionless in,
 The horizon's edge, the flying sea-crow, the fragrance of salt marsh and shore mud,
 These became part of that child who went forth every day, and who now goes, and will always go forth every day.

OUT OF THE CRADLE ENDLESSLY ROCKING

A man's reverie over a boy's experience. A new kind of elegy discarding preceding patterns, and making older bird poetry with its usual assumption of the unalloyed happiness of birds compared with the tragedies of human beings seem hollow make-believe and convention. (See L. Pound, "Whitman and Bird Poetry," English Journal, XIX, January, 1930.) Interwoven are a trio of themes, the bird's lament (one of the most poignant songs of loss ever written), the accompanying surge of the sea "endlessly rocking," and the boy's questioning soul, bringing him a realization of death and starting his poetic spirit. The bird is his genius of song. The poem is mannered in form, marked especially by incessant dangling present participles and suspended, or periodic, sentences.

Out of the cradle endlessly rocking,
 Out of the mocking-bird's throat, the musical shuttle,
 Out of the Ninth-month midnight,
 Over the sterile sands and the fields beyond, where the child leaving his bed wander'd alone, bareheaded, barefoot,
 Down from the shower'd halo,
 Up from the mystic play of shadows twining and twisting as if they were alive,
 Out from the patches of briers and blackberries,
 From the memories of the bird that chanted to me,
 From your memories sad brother, from the fitful risings and fallings I heard,
 From under that yellow half-moon late-risen and swollen as if with tears,      10
 From those beginning notes of yearning and love there in the mist,
 From the thousand responses of my heart never to cease,
 From the myriad thence-arous'd words,
 From the word stronger and more delicious than any,
 From such as now they start the scene revisiting,
 As a flock, twittering, rising, or overhead passing,
 Borne hither, ere all eludes me, hurriedly,
 A man, yet by these tears a little boy again,
 Throwing myself on the sand, confronting the waves,
 I, chanter of pains and joys, uniter of here and hereafter,      20
 Taking all hints to use them, but swiftly leaping beyond them,
 A reminiscence sing.

Once Paumanok,<sup>1</sup>
 When the lilac-scent was in the air and Fifth-month grass was growing,
 Up this seashore in some briers,
 Two feather'd guests from Alabama, two together,
 And their nest, and four light-green eggs spotted with brown,
 And every day the he-bird to and fro near at hand,
 And every day the she-bird crouch'd on her nest, silent, with bright eyes,
 And every day I, a curious boy, never too close, never disturbing them,      30
 Cautiously peering, absorbing, translating.

Shine! shine! shine!
Pour down your warmth, great sun!
While we bask, we two together,

Two together!
Winds blow south, or winds blow north,
Day come white, or night come black,

<sup>1</sup> the Indian name for Long Island

*Home, or rivers and mountains from home,
Singing all time, minding no time,
While we two keep together.*

40

Till of a sudden,
May-be kill'd, unknown to her mate,
One forenoon the she-bird crouch'd not on the nest,
Nor return'd that afternoon, nor the next,
Nor ever appear'd again.

And thenceforward all summer in the sound of the sea,
And at night under the full of the moon in calmer weather,
Over the hoarse surging of the sea,
Or flitting from brier to brier by day,
I saw, I heard at intervals the remaining one, the he-bird,
The solitary guest from Alabama.

50

*Blow! blow! blow!
Blow up sea-winds along Paumanok's shore;
I wait and I wait till you blow my mate to me.*

Yes, when the stars glisten'd,
All night long on the prong of a moss-scallop'd stake,
Down almost amid the slapping waves,
Sat the lone singer wonderful causing tears.
He call'd on his mate,
He pour'd forth the meanings which I of all men know.

60

Yes my brother I know,
The rest might not, but I have treasur'd every note,
For more than once dimly down to the beach gliding,
Silent, avoiding the moonbeams, blending myself with the shadows,
Recalling now the obscure shapes, the echoes, the sounds and sights after their sorts,
The white arms out in the breakers tirelessly tossing,
I, with bare feet, a child, the wind wafting my hair,
Listen'd long and long.

Listen'd to keep, to sing, now translating the notes,
Following you my brother.

70

*Soothe! soothe! soothe!
Close on its wave soothes the wave behind,
And again another behind embracing and lapping, every one close,
But my love soothes not me, not me.*

*Low hangs the moon, it rose late,
It is lagging—O I think it is heavy with love, with love.*

*O madly the sea pushes upon the land,
With love, with love.*

*O night! do I not see my love fluttering out among the breakers?
What is that little black thing I see there in the white?*

80

Loud! loud! loud!
Loud I call to you, my love!
High and clear I shoot my voice over the waves,
Surely you must know who is here, is here,
You must know who I am, my love.

Low-hanging moon!
What is that dusky spot in your brown yellow?
O it is the shape, the shape of my mate!
O moon do not keep her from me any longer.

Land! land! O land!
Whichever way I turn, O I think you could give me my mate back again if you only would,
For I am almost sure I see her dimly whichever way I look.

90

O rising stars!
Perhaps the one I want so much will rise, will rise with some of you.

O throat! O trembling throat!
Sound clearer through the atmosphere!
Pierce the woods, the earth,
Somewhere listening to catch you must be the one I want.

Shake out carols!
Solitary here, the night's carols!
Carols of lonesome love! death's carols!
Carols under that lagging, yellow, waning moon!
O under that moon where she droops almost down into the sea!
O reckless despairing carols.

100

But soft! sink low!
Soft! let me just murmur,
And do you wait a moment you husky-nois'd sea,
For somewhere I believe I heard my mate responding to me,
So faint, I must be still, be still to listen,
But not altogether still, for then she might not come immediately to me.

110

Hither my love!
Here I am! here!
With this just-sustain'd note I announce myself to you,
This gentle call is for you my love, for you.

Do not be decoy'd elsewhere,
That is the whistle of the wind, it is not my voice,
That is the fluttering, the fluttering of the spray,
Those are the shadows of leaves.

O darkness! O in vain!
O I am very sick and sorrowful.

120

O brown halo in the sky near the moon, drooping upon the sea!
O troubled reflection in the sea!
O throat! O throbbing heart!
And I singing uselessly, uselessly all the night.

*O past! O happy life! O songs of joy!
 In the air, in the woods, over fields,
 Loved! loved! loved! loved! loved!
 But my mate no more, no more with me!
 We two together no more.*

The aria sinking, 130
 All else continuing, the stars shining,
 The winds blowing, the notes of the bird continuous echoing,
 With angry moans the fierce old mother incessantly moaning,
 On the sands of Paumanok's shore gray and rustling,
 The yellow half-moon enlarged, sagging down, drooping, the face of the sea almost touching,
 The boy ecstatic, with his bare feet the waves, with his hair the atmosphere dallying,
 The love in the heart long pent, now loose, now at last tumultuously bursting,
 The aria's meaning, the ears, the soul, swiftly depositing,
 The strange tears down the cheeks coursing,
 The colloquy there, the trio, each uttering, 140
 The undertone, the savage old mother incessantly crying,
 To the boy's soul's questions sullenly timing, some drown'd secret hissing,
 To the outsetting bard.

Demon or bird (said the boy's soul,
 Is it indeed toward your mate you sing? or is it really to me?
 For I, that was a child, my tongue's use sleeping, now I have heard you,
 Now in a moment I know what I am for, I awake,
 And already a thousand singers, a thousand songs, clearer, louder and more sorrowful than yours,
 A thousand warbling echoes have started to life within me, never to die.

O you singer solitary, singing by yourself, projecting me, 150
 O solitary me listening, never more shall I cease perpetuating you,
 Never more shall I escape, never more the reverberations,
 Never more the cries of unsatisfied love be absent from me,
 Never again leave me to be the peaceful child I was before what there in the night,
 By the sea under the yellow and sagging moon,
 The messenger there arous'd, the fire, the sweet hell within,
 The unknown want, the destiny of me.

O give me the clew! (it lurks in the night here somewhere,)
 O if I am to have so much, let me have more!

A word then, (for I will conquer it,) 160
 The word final, superior to all,
 Subtle, sent up—what is it?—I listen;
 Are you whispering it, and have been all the time, you sea waves?
 Is that it from your liquid rims and wet sands?

Whereto answering, the sea,
 Delaying not, hurrying not,
 Whisper'd me through the night, and very plainly before daybreak,
 Lisp'd to me the low and delicious word death,
 And again death, death, death, death,

Hissing melodious, neither like the bird nor like my arous'd child's heart, 170
 But edging near as privately for me rustling at my feet,
 Creeping thence steadily up to my ears and laving me softly all over,
 Death, death, death, death, death.

Which I do not forget,
 But fuse the song of my dusky demon and brother,
 That he sang to me in the moonlight on Paumanok's gray beach,
 With the thousand responsive songs at random,
 My own songs awaked from that hour,
 And with them the key, the word up from the waves,
 The word of the sweetest song and all songs, 180
 That strong and delicious word which, creeping to my feet,
 (Or like some old crone rocking the cradle, swathed in sweet garments, bending aside,)
 The sea whisper'd me.

ME IMPERTURBE

ME imperturbe,<sup>1</sup> standing at ease in Nature,
 Master of all or mistress of all, aplomb in the midst of irrational things, Imbued as they, passive, receptive, silent as they,
 Finding my occupation, poverty, notoriety, foibles, crimes, less important than I thought,
 Me toward the Mexican sea, or in the Mannahatta or the Tennessee, or far north or inland,
 A river man, or a man of the woods or of any farm-life of these States or of the coast, or the lakes or Kanada,
 Me wherever my life is lived, O to be self-balanced for contingencies,
 To confront night, storms, hunger, ridicule, accidents, rebuffs, as the trees and animals do.

FOR YOU O DEMOCRACY

COME, I will make the continent indissoluble,
 I will make the most splendid race the sun ever shone upon,
 I will make divine magnetic lands,
 With the love of comrades,
 With the life-long love of comrades.

I will plant companionship thick as trees along all the rivers of America, and along the shores of the great lakes, and all over the prairies,
 I will make inseparable cities with their arms about each other's necks,
 By the love of comrades,
 By the manly love of comrades.

For you these from me, O Democracy, to serve you ma femme! 10
 For you, for you I am trilling these songs.

I SAW IN LOUISIANA A LIVE-OAK GROWING

I SAW in Louisiana a live-oak growing,
 All alone stood it and the moss hung down from the branches,
 Without any companion it grew there uttering joyous leaves of dark green,

<sup>1</sup> undisturbed, calm—one of Whitman's coinages

And its look, rude, unbending, lusty, made me think of myself,
 But I wonder'd how it could utter joyous leaves standing alone there without its friend near, for
   I knew I could not,
 And I broke off a twig with a certain number of leaves upon it, and twined around it a little
   moss,
 And brought it away, and I have placed it in sight in my room,
 It is not needed to remind me as of my own dear friends,
 (For I believe lately I think of little else than of them,)
 Yet it remains to me a curious token, it makes me think of manly love; 10
 For all that, and though the live-oak glistens there in Louisiana solitary in a wide flat space, Uttering joyous leaves all its life without a friend, a lover near,
 I know very well I could not.

I HEAR AMERICA SINGING

I HEAR America singing, the varied carols I hear,
 Those of mechanics, each one singing his as it should be blithe and strong,
 The carpenter singing his as he measures his plank or beam,
 The mason singing his as he makes ready for work, or leaves off work,
 The boatman singing what belongs to him in his boat, the deck-hand singing on the steamboat deck,
 The shoemaker singing as he sits on his bench, the hatter singing as he stands,
 The wood-cutter's song, the plowboy's on his way in the morning, or at noon intermission or at sundown,
 The delicious singing of the mother, or of the young wife at work, or of the girl sewing or washing,
 Each singing what belongs to him or her and to none else,
 The day what belongs to the day—at night the party of young fellows, robust, friendly, 10
 Singing with open mouths their strong melodious songs.

POETS TO COME

POETS to come! orators, singers, musicians to come!
 Not today is to justify me and answer what I am for,
 But you, a new brood, native, athletic, continental, greater than before known,
 Arouse! for you must justify me.

I myself but write one or two indicative words for the future,
 I but advance a moment only to wheel and hurry back in the darkness.

I am a man who, sauntering along without fully stopping, turns a casual look upon you and then averts his face,
 Leaving it to you to prove and define it,
 Expecting the main things from you.

FROM PAUMANOK STARTING I FLY LIKE A BIRD

FROM Paumanok starting I fly like a bird,
 Around and around to soar to sing the idea of all,
 To the north betaking myself to sing there arctic songs,

To Kanada till I absorb Kanada in myself, to Michigan then,
 To Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota, to sing their songs (they are inimitable);
 Then to Ohio and Indiana to sing theirs, to Missouri and Kansas and Arkansas to sing theirs,
 To Tennessee and Kentucky, to the Carolinas and Georgia to sing theirs,
 To Texas and so along up toward California, to roam accepted everywhere;
 To sing first (to the tap of the war-drum if need be),
 The idea of all, of the Western world one and inseparable, 10
 And then the song of each member of these States.

BIVOUAC ON A MOUNTAIN SIDE

I SEE before me now a traveling army halting,
 Below a fertile valley spread, with barns and the orchards of summer,
 Behind, the terraced sides of a mountain, abrupt, in places rising high,
 Broken, with rocks, with clinging cedars, with tall shapes dingily seen,
 The numerous camp-fires scatter'd near and far, some away up on the mountain,
 The shadowy forms of men and horses, looming, large-sized, flickering,
 And over all the sky—the sky! far, far out of reach, studded, breaking out, the eternal stars.
 1865

AN ARMY CORPS ON THE MARCH

WITH its cloud of skirmishers in advance,
 With now the sound of a single shot snapping like a whip, and now an irregular volley,
 The swarming ranks press on and on, the dense brigades press on,
 Glittering dimly, toiling under the sun—the dust-cover'd men,
 In columns rise and fall to the undulations of the ground,
 With artillery interspers'd—the wheels rumble, the horses sweat,
 As the army corps advances.

1865—1866

RECONCILIATION

WORD over all, beautiful as the sky,
 Beautiful that war and all its deeds of carnage must in time be utterly lost,
 That the hands of the sisters Death and Night incessantly softly wash again, and ever again, this soil'd world;
 For my enemy is dead, a man divine as myself is dead,
 I look where he lies white-faced and still in the coffin—I draw near,
 Bend down and touch lightly with my lips the white face in the coffin.

1865

CAVALRY CROSSING A FORD

A LINE in long array where they wind betwixt green islands,
 They take a serpentine course, their arms flash in the sun—hark to the musical clank,
 Behold the silvery river, in it the splashing horses loitering stop to drink,
 Behold the brown-faced men, each group, each person a picture, the negligent rest on the saddles,
 Some emerge on the opposite bank, others are just entering the ford—while,
 Scarlet and blue and snowy white,
 The guidon flags flutter gayly in the wind.

1865

COME UP FROM THE FIELDS FATHER

COME up from the fields father, here's a letter from our Pete,
And come to the front door mother, here's a letter from thy dear son.

Lo, 'tis autumn,
Lo, where the trees, deeper green, yellower and redder,
Cool and sweeten Ohio's villages with leaves fluttering in the moderate wind,
Where apples ripe in the orchards hang and grapes on the trellis'd vines, (Smell you the smell of the grapes on the vines?
Smell you the buckwheat where the bees were lately buzzing?)

Above all, lo, the sky so calm, so transparent after the rain, and with wondrous clouds,
Below too, all calm, all vital and beautiful, and the farm prospers well. 10

Down in the fields all prospers well,
But now from the fields come father, come at the daughter's call,
And come to the entry mother, to the front door come right away.

Fast as she can she hurries, something ominous, her steps trembling,
She does not tarry to smooth her hair nor adjust her cap.

Open the envelope quickly,
O this is not our son's writing, yet his name is sign'd,
O a strange hand writes for our dear son, O stricken mother's soul!
All swims before her eyes, flashes with black, she catches the main words only,
Sentence broken, gunshot wound in the breast, cavalry skirmish, taken to hospital,
At present low, but will soon be better. 20

Ah now the single figure to me,
Amid all teeming and wealthy Ohio with all its cities and farms,
Sickly white in the face and dull in the head, very faint,
By the jamb of a door leans.

Grieve not so, dear mother (the just-grown daughter speaks through her sobs,
The little sisters huddle around speechless and dismay'd),
See, dearest mother, the letter says Pete will soon be better.

Alas poor boy, he will never be better (nor may-be needs to be better, that brave and simple soul),
While they stand at home at the door he is dead already, 30
The only son is dead.

But the mother needs to be better,
She with thin form presently drest in black,
By day her meals untouched, then at night fitfully sleeping, often waking,
In the midnight waking, weeping, longing with one deep longing,
O that she might withdraw unnoticed, silent from life escape and withdraw,
To follow, to seek, to be with her dear dead son.

PIONEERS! O PIONEERS!

COME my tan-faced children,
 Follow well in order, get your weapons ready,
 Have you your pistols? have you your sharp-edged axes?
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

For we cannot tarry here,
 We must march my darlings, we must bear the brunt of danger,
 We the youthful sinewy races, all the rest on us depend,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

O you youths, Western youths,
 So impatient, full of action, full of manly pride and friendship,
 Plain I see you Western youths, see you tramping with the foremost,
 Pioneers! O pioneers! 10

Have the elder races halted?
 Do they droop and end their lesson, wearied over there beyond the sea?
 We take up the task eternal, and the burden and the lesson,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

All the past we leave behind,
 We debouch upon a newer mightier world, varied world,
 Fresh and strong the world we seize, world of labor and the march,
 Pioneers! O pioneers! 20

We detachments steady throwing,
 Down the edges, through the passes, up the mountain steep,
 Conquering, holding, daring, venturing as we go the unknown ways,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

We primeval forests felling,
 We the rivers stemming, vexing we and piercing deep the mines within,
 We the surface broad surveying, we the virgin soil upheaving,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

Colorado men are we,
 From the peaks gigantic, from the great sierras and the high plateaus,
 From the mine and from the gully, from the hunting trail we come,
 Pioneers! O pioneers! 30

From Nebraska, from Arkansas,
 Central inland race are we, from Missouri, with the continental blood intervein'd,
 All the hands of comrades clasping, all the Southern, all the Northern,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

O resistless restless race!
 O beloved race in all! O my breast aches with tender love for all!
 O I mourn and yet exult, I am rapt with love for all,
 Pioneers! O pioneers! 40

Raise the mighty mother mistress,
 Waving high the delicate mistress, over all the starry mistress (bend your heads all),
 Raise the fang'd and warlike mistress, stern, impassive, weapon'd mistress,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

See my children, resolute children,
 By those swarms upon our rear we must never yield or falter,
 Ages back in ghostly millions frowning there behind us urging,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

On and on the compact ranks,
 With accessions ever waiting, with the places of the dead quickly fill'd,
 Through the battle, through defeat, moving yet and never stopping,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

50

O to die advancing on!
 Are there some of us to droop and die? has the hour come?
 Then upon the march we fittest die, soon and sure the gap is fill'd,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

All the pulses of the world,
 Falling in they beat for us, with the Western movement beat,
 Holding single or together, steady moving to the front, all for us,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

60

Life's involv'd and varied pageants,
 All the forms and shows, all the workmen at their work,
 All the seamen and the landsmen, all the masters with their slaves,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

All the hapless silent lovers,
 All the prisoners in the prisons, all the righteous and the wicked,
 All the joyous, all the sorrowing, all the living, all the dying,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

I too with my soul and body,
 We, a curious trio, picking, wandering on our way,
 Through these shores amid the shadows, with the apparitions pressing,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

70

Lo, the darting bowling orb!
 Lo, the brother orbs around, all the clustering suns and planets,
 All the dazzling days, all the mystic nights with dreams,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

These are of us, they are with us,
 All for primal needed work, while the followers there in embryo wait behind,
 We to-day's procession heading, we the route for travel clearing,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

80

O you daughters of the West!
 O you young and elder daughters! O you mothers and you wives!
 Never must you be divided, in our ranks you move united,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

Minstrels latent on the prairies!
 (Shrouded bards of other lands, you may rest, you have done your work,)
 Soon I hear you coming warbling, soon you rise and tramp amid us,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

Not for delectations sweet,
 Not the cushion and the slipper, not the peaceful and the studious, 90
 Not the riches safe and palling, not for us the tame enjoyment,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

Do the feasters gluttonous feast?
 Do the corpulent sleepers sleep? Have they lock'd and bolted doors?
 Still be ours the diet hard, and the blanket on the ground,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

Has the night descended?
 Was the road of late so toilsome? did we stop discouraged nodding on our way?
 Yet a passing hour I yield you in your tracks to pause oblivious, 100
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

Till with sound of trumpet,
 Far, far off the daybreak call—hark! how loud and clear I hear it wind,
 Swift! to the head of the army!—swift! spring to your places,
 Pioneers! O pioneers! 1865

TO A CERTAIN CIVILIAN

DID you ask dulcet rimes from me?
 Did you seek the civilian's peaceful and languishing rimes?
 Did you find what I sang erewhile so hard to follow?
 Why I was not singing erewhile for you to follow, to understand—nor am I now;
 (I have been born of the same as the war was born,
 The drum-corps' rattle is ever to me sweet music, I love well the martial dirge,
 With slow wail and convulsive throb leading the officer's funeral;)
 What to such as you anyhow such a poet as I? therefore leave my works,
 And go lull yourself with what you can understand, and with piano tunes,
 For I lull nobody, and you will never understand me. 10

BEAT! BEAT! DRUMS!

BEAT! beat! drums!—blow! bugles! blow!
 Through the windows—through doors—burst like a ruthless force,
 Into the solemn church, and scatter the congregation,
 Into the school where the scholar is studying;
 Leave not the bridegroom quiet—no happiness must he have now with his bride,
 Nor the peaceful farmer any peace, plowing his field or gathering his grain,
 So fierce you whirr and pound you drums—so shrill you bugles blow.

Beat! beat! drums!—blow! bugles! blow!

Over the traffic of cities—over the rumble of wheels in the streets;
 Are beds prepared for sleepers at night in the houses? no sleepers must sleep in those beds, 10
 No bargainers' bargains by day—no brokers or speculators—would they continue?
 Would the talkers be talking? would the singer attempt to sing?
 Would the lawyer rise in the court to state his case before the judge?
 Then rattle quicker, heavier drums—you bugles wilder blow.

Beat! beat! drums!—blow! bugles! blow!

Make no parley—stop for no expostulation,
 Mind not the timid—mind not the weeper or prayer,
 Mind not the old man beseeching the young man,
 Let not the child's voice be heard, nor the mother's entreaties,
 Make even the trestles to shake the dead where they lie awaiting the hearses, 20
 So strong you thump O terrible drums—so loud you bugles blow.

THE WOUND-DRESSER

I

AN old man bending I come among new faces,
 Years looking backward resuming in answer to children,
 Come tell us old man, as from young men and maidens that love me, (Arous'd and angry, I'd thought to beat the alarum, and urge relentless war,
 But soon my fingers fail'd me, my face droop'd and I resign'd myself,
 To sit by the wounded and soothe them, or silently watch the dead;)
 Years hence of these scenes, of these furious passions, these chances,
 Of unsurpass'd heroes, (was one side so brave? the other was equally brave;)
 Now be witness again, paint the mightiest armies of earth,
 Of those armies so rapid so wondrous what saw you to tell us? 10
 What stays with you latest and deepest? of curious panics,
 Of hard-fought engagements or sieges tremendous what deepest remains?

2

O maidens and young men I love and that love me,
 What you ask of my days those the strangest and sudden your talking recalls,
 Soldier alert I arrive after a long march cover'd with sweat and dust,
 In the nick of time I come, plunge in the fight, loudly shout in the rush of successful charge,
 Enter the captur'd works—yet lo, like a swift-running river they fade,
 Pass and are gone, they fade—I dwell not on soldiers' perils or soldiers' joys,
 (Both I remember well—many the hardships, few the joys, yet I was content.)

But in silence, in dreams' projections, 20
 While the world of gain and appearance and mirth goes on,
 So soon what is over forgotten, and waves wash the imprints off the sand,
 With hinged knees returning I enter the doors, (while for you up there, Whoever you are, follow without noise and be of strong heart.)

Bearing the bandages, water and sponge,
 Straight and swift to my wounded I go,
 Where they lie on the ground after the battle brought in,
 Where their priceless blood reddens the grass the ground,

Or to the rows of the hospital tent, or under the roof'd hospital,
 To the long rows of cots up and down each side I return, 30
 To each and all one after another I draw near, not one do I miss,
 An attendant follows holding a tray, he carries a refuse pail,
 Soon to be fill'd with clotted rags and blood, emptied, and fill'd again.

I onward go, I stop,
 With hinged knees and steady hand to dress wounds,
 I am firm with each, the pangs are sharp yet unavoidable,
 One turns to me his appealing eyes—poor boy! I never knew you,
 Yet I think I could not refuse this moment to die for you, if that would save you.

3

On, on I go, (open doors of time! open hospital doors!)
 The crush'd head I dress, (poor crazed hand tear not the bandage away,) 40
 The neck of the cavalry-man with the bullet through and through I examine,
 Hard the breathing rattles, quite glazed already the eye, yet life struggles hard, (Come sweet death! be persuaded O beautiful death!
 In mercy come quickly.)

From the stump of the arm, the amputated hand,
 I undo the clotted lint, remove the slough, wash off the matter and blood,
 Back on his pillow the soldier bends with curv'd neck and side-falling head,
 His eyes are closed, his face is pale, he dares not look on the bloody stump,
 And has not yet look'd on it.

I dress a wound in the side, deep, deep, 50
 But a day or two more, for see the frame all wasted and sinking,
 And the yellow-blue countenance see.

I dress the perforated shoulder, the foot with the bullet-wound,
 Cleanse the one with a gnawing and putrid gangrene, so sickening, so offensive,
 While the attendant stands behind aside me holding the tray and pail.

I am faithful, I do not give out,
 The fractur'd thigh, the knee, the wound in the abdomen,
 These and more I dress with impassive hand, (yet deep in my breast a fire, a burning flame).

4

Thus in silence in dreams' projections,
 Returning, resuming, I thread my way through the hospitals, 60
 The hurt and wounded I pacify with soothing hand,
 I sit by the restless all the dark night, some are so young,
 Some suffer so much, I recall the experience sweet and sad,
 (Many a soldier's loving arms about this neck have cross'd and rested,
 Many a soldier's kiss dwells on these bearded lips).

O CAPTAIN! MY CAPTAIN!

O CAPTAIN! my Captain! our fearful trip is done,
 The ship has weather'd every rack, the prize we sought is won,
 The port is near, the bells I hear, the people all exulting,
 While follow eyes the steady keel, the vessel grim and daring;

But O heart! heart! heart!
 O the bleeding drops of red,
 Where on the deck my Captain lies,
 Fallen cold and dead.

O Captain! my Captain! rise up and hear the bells;
 Rise up—for you the flag is flung—for you the bugle trills, 10
 For you bouquets and ribbon'd wreaths—for you the shores a-crowding,
 For you they call, the swaying mass, their eager faces turning;
 Here Captain! dear father!
 This arm beneath your head!
 It is some dream that on the deck,
 You've fallen cold and dead.

My Captain does not answer, his lips are pale and still,
 My father does not feel my arm, he has no pulse nor will,
 The ship is anchor'd safe and sound, its voyage closed and done,
 From fearful trip the victor ship comes in with object won; 20
 Exult O shores, and ring O bells!
 But I with mournful tread,
 Walk the deck my Captain lies,
 Fallen cold and dead.

WHEN LILACS LAST IN THE DOORYARD BLOOM'D

An elegy, or burial hymn, composed in a manner independent of all earlier models, this ranks as our best poem on President Lincoln. Some, indeed, have termed it "the high-water mark of American poetry." It lacks clear structure and finish, but is perhaps the more powerful emotionally because of this, as though the poet's grief was too intense for concern with expression. As in "Out of the Cradle Endlessly Rocking," there are interwoven motives. Three accidental experiences, the scent of the lilac, the solitary night song of the wood thrush, and the symbolical falling star, seem to Whitman to associate themselves with the time of Lincoln's death. Other striking features of the poem are the account of the progress of the funeral train, the unique apostrophe to death, and the sense conveyed of the grief of the whole nation.

1

WHEN lilacs last in the dooryard bloom'd,
 And the great star early droop'd in the western sky in the night,
 I mourn'd, and yet shall mourn with ever-returning spring.

Ever-returning spring, trinity sure to me you bring,
 Lilac blooming perennial and drooping star in the west,
 And thought of him I love.

2

O powerful western fallen star!
 O shades of night—O moody, tearful night!
 O great star disappear'd—O the black murk that hides the star!
 O cruel hands that hold me powerless—O helpless soul of me! 10
 O harsh surrounding cloud that will not free my soul.

3

In the dooryard fronting an old farm-house near the white-wash'd palings,
 Stands the lilac-bush, tall-growing with heart-shaped leaves of rich green,

With many a pointed blossom rising delicate, with the perfume strong I love,
 With every leaf a miracle—and from this bush in the dooryard,
 With delicate-color'd blossoms and heart-shaped leaves of rich green,
 A sprig with its flower I break.

4

In the swamp in secluded recesses,
 A shy and hidden bird is warbling a song.

Solitary the thrush,
 The hermit withdrawn to himself, avoiding the settlements,
 Sings by himself a song.

20

Song of the bleeding throat,
 Death's outlet song of life (for well dear brother I know,
 If thou wast not granted to sing thou would'st surely die).

5

Over the breast of the spring, the land, amid cities, Amid lanes and through old woods, where lately the violets peep'd from the ground, spotting
 the gray débris,
 Amid the grass in the fields each side of the lanes, passing the endless grass;
 Passing the yellow-spear'd wheat, every grain from its shroud in the dark-brown fields uprisen,
 Passing the apple-tree blows of white and pink in the orchards,
 Carrying a corpse to where it shall rest in the grave,
 Night and day journeys a coffin.

30

6

Coffin that passes through lanes and streets,
 Through day and night with the great cloud darkening the land,
 With the pomp of the inloop'd flags with the cities draped in black,
 With the show of the States themselves as of crape-veil'd women standing,
 With processions long and winding and the flambeaus of the night,
 With the countless torches lit, with the silent sea of faces and the unbared heads,
 With the waiting depot, the arriving coffin, and the somber faces,
 With dirges through the night, with the thousand voices rising strong and solemn,
 With all the mournful voices of the dirges pour'd around the coffin,
 The dim-lit churches and the shuddering organs—where amid these you journey,
 With the tolling tolling bells' perpetual clang,
 Here, coffin that slowly passes,
 I give you my sprig of lilac.

40

7

(Nor for you, for one alone,
 Blossoms and branches green to coffins all I bring.
 For fresh as the morning, thus would I carol a song to you O sane and sacred death.

All over bouquets of roses,
 O death, I cover you over with roses and early lilies,
 But mostly and now the lilac that blooms the first,
 Copious I break, I break the sprigs from the bushes.
 With loaded arms I come, pouring for you,
 For you and the coffins all of you O death.)

50

8

O western orb sailing the heaven,
 Now I know what you must have meant as a month since I walk'd,
 As I walk'd in silence the transparent shadowy night,
 As I saw you had something to tell as you bent to me night after night,
 As you droop'd from the sky low down as if to my side (while the other stars all look'd on),
 As we wander'd together the solemn night (for something I know not what kept me from sleep),
 As the night advanced, and I saw on the rim of the west how full you were of woe, 61
 As I stood on the rising ground in the breeze in the cold transparent night,
 As I watch'd where you pass'd and was lost in the netherward black of the night,
 As my soul in its trouble dissatisfied sank, as where you sad orb,
 Concluded, dropt in the night, and was gone.

9

Sing on there in the swamp,
 O singer bashful and tender, I hear your notes, I hear your call,
 I hear, I come presently, I understand you,
 But a moment I linger, for the lustrous star has detain'd me,
 The star my departing comrade holds and detains me. 70

10

O how shall I warble myself for the dead one there I loved?
 And how shall I deck my song for the large sweet soul that has gone?
 And what shall my perfume be for the grave of him I love?

Sea-winds blown from east and west,
 Blown from the Eastern sea and blown from the Western sea till there on the prairies meeting:
 These and with these and the breath of my chant,
 I'll perfume the grave of him I love.

11

O what shall I hang on the chamber walls?
 And what shall the pictures be that I hang on the walls,
 To adorn the burial-house of him I love? 80

Pictures of growing spring and farms and homes,
 With the Fourth-month eve at sundown, and the gray smoke lucid and bright,
 With floods of the yellow gold of the gorgeous, indolent, sinking sun, burning, expanding the air,
 With the fresh sweet herbage under foot, and the pale green leaves of the trees prolific,
 In the distance the flowing glaze, the breast of the river, with a wind-dapple here and there;
 With ranging hills on the banks, with many a line against the sky, and shadows;
 And the city at hand with dwellings so dense, and stacks of chimneys,
 And all the scenes of life and the workshops, and the workmen homeward returning.

12

Lo, body and soul—this land,
 My own Manhattan with spires, and the sparkling and hurrying tides, and the ships, 90
 The varied and ample land, the South and the North in the light—Ohio's shores and flashing
 Missouri,
 And ever the far-spreading prairies cover'd with grass and corn.
 Lo, the most excellent sun so calm and haughty,
 The violet and purple morn with just-felt breezes,

The gentle soft-born measureless light,
 The miracle spreading bathing all, the fulfill'd noon,
 The coming eve delicious, the welcome night and the stars,
 Over my cities shining all, enveloping man and land.

13

Sing on, sing on you gray-brown bird,
 Sing from the swamps, the recesses, pour your chant from the bushes; 100
 Limitless out of the dusk, out of the cedars and pines.

Sing on dearest brother, warble your reedy song,
 Loud human song, with voice of uttermost woe.

O liquid and free and tender!
 O wild and loose to my soul—O wondrous singer!
 You only I hear—yet the star holds me (but will soon depart,)
 Yet the lilac with mastering odor holds me.

14

Now while I sat in the day and look'd forth,
 In the close of the day with its light and the fields of spring, and the farmers preparing their crops,
 In the large unconscious scenery of my land with its lakes and forests, 110
 In the heavenly aerial beauty (after the perturb'd winds and the storms,)
 Under the arching heavens of the afternoon swift passing, and the voices of children and women,
 The many-moving sea-tides, and I saw the ships how they sail'd,
 And the summer approaching with richness, and the fields all busy with labor,
 And the infinite separate houses, how they all went on, each with its meals and minutia of daily usages;
 And the streets how their throbbings throb'd, and the cities pent—lo, then and there,
 Falling upon them all and among them all, enveloping me with the rest,
 Appear'd the cloud, appear'd the long black trail;
 And I knew death, its thought, and the sacred knowledge of death.

Then with the knowledge of death as walking one side of me, 120
 And the thought of death close-walking the other side of me,
 And I in the middle as with companions, and as holding the hands of companions,
 I fled forth to the hiding receiving night that talks not,
 Down to the shores of the water, the path by the swamp in the dimness,
 To the solemn shadowy cedars and ghostly pines so still.

And the singer so shy to the rest receiv'd me,
 The gray-brown bird I know receiv'd us comrades three,
 And he sang the carol of death, and a verse for him I love.

From deep secluded recesses,
 From the fragrant cedars and the ghostly pines so still, 130
 Came the carol of the bird.

And the charm of the carol rapt me,
 As I held as if by their hands my comrades in the night;
 And the voice of my spirit tallied the song of the bird.

*Come lovely and soothing death,
Undulate round the world, serenely arriving, arriving,
In the day, in the night, to all, to each,
Sooner or later delicate death.*

*Prais'd be the fathomless universe,
For life and joy, and for objects and knowledge curious,
And for love, sweet love—but praise! praise! praise!
For the sure-enwinding arms of cool-enfolding death.*

140

*Dark mother always gliding near with soft feet,
Have none chanted for thee a chant of fullest welcome?
Then I chant it for thee, I glorify thee above all,
I bring thee a song that when thou must indeed come, come unfalteringly.*

*Approach strong deliveress,
When it is so, when thou hast taken them, I joyously sing the dead,
Lost in the loving floating ocean of thee,
Laved in the flood of thy bliss O death.*

150

*From me to thee glad serenades,
Dances for thee I propose saluting thee, adornments and feastings for thee,
And the sights of the open landscape and the high-spread sky are fitting,
And life and the fields, and the huge and thoughtful night.*

*The night in silence under many a star,
The ocean shore and the husky whispering wave whose voice I know,
And the soul turning to thee O vast and well-veil'd death,
And the body gratefully nestling close to thee.*

*Over the tree-tops I float thee a song,
Over the rising and sinking waves, over the myriad fields and the prairies wide,
Over the dense-pack'd cities all and the teeming wharves and ways,
I float this carol with joy, with joy to thee O death!*

15

To the tally of my soul.
Loud and strong kept up the gray-brown bird,
With pure, deliberate notes spreading filling the night.

Loud in the pines and cedars dim,
Clear in the freshness moist and the swamp-perfume,
And I with my comrades there in the night.

While my sight that was bound in my eyes unclosed,
As to long panoramas of visions.

170

I saw askant the armies;
And I saw as in noiseless dreams hundreds of battle-flags,
Borne through the smoke of the battles and pierc'd with missiles I saw them,
And carried hither and yon through the smoke, and torn and bloody,
And at last but a few shreds left on the staffs (and all in silence,)
And the staffs all splinter'd and broken.

I saw battle-corpses, myriads of them,
 And the white skeletons of young men, I saw them,
 I saw the débris and débris of all the slain soldiers of the war,
 But I saw they were not as was thought, 180
 They themselves were fully at rest, they suffer'd not,
 The living remain'd and suffer'd, the mother suffer'd,
 And the wife and the child and the musing comrade suffer'd,
 And the armies that remain'd suffer'd.

16

Passing the visions, passing the night,
 Passing, unloosing the hold of my comrades' hands,
 Passing the song of the hermit bird and the tallying song of my soul,
 Victorious song, death's outlet song, yet varying ever-altering song,
 As low and wailing, yet clear the notes, rising and falling, flooding the night,
 Sadly sinking and fainting, as warning and warning, and yet again bursting with joy, 190
 Covering the earth and filling the spread of the heaven,
 As that powerful psalm in the night I heard from recesses,
 Passing, I leave thee lilac with heart-shaped leaves,
 I leave thee there in the dooryard blooming, returning with spring.

I cease from my song for thee,
 From my gaze on thee in the west, fronting the west, communing with thee,
 O comrade lustrous with silver face in the night.

Yet each I keep and all, retrievements out of the night,
 The song, the wondrous chant of the gray-brown bird,
 The tallying chant, the echo arous'd in my soul, 200
 With the lustrous and drooping star with the countenance full of woe,
 With the holders holding my hand hearing the call of the bird,
 Comrades mine and I in the midst, and their memory ever to keep, for the dead I loved so well,
 For the sweetest, wisest soul of all my days and lands—and this for his dear sake;
 Lilac and star and bird twined with the chant of my soul,
 There in the fragrant pines and the cedars dusk and dim.

VIGIL STRANGE I KEPT ON THE FIELD ONE NIGHT

VIGIL strange I kept on the field one night;
 When you my son and my comrade dropt at my side that day,
 One look I but gave which your dear eyes return'd with a look I shall never forget,
 One touch of your hand to mine O boy, reach'd up as you lay on the ground,
 Then onward I sped in the battle, the even-contested battle,
 Till late in the night reliev'd to the place at last again I made my way, Found you in death so cold dear comrade, found your body son of responding kisses, (never again on earth responding,)
 Bared your face in the starlight, curious the scene, cool blew the moderate night-wind,
 Long there and then in vigil I stood, dimly around me the battle-field spreading,
 Vigil wondrous and vigil sweet there in the fragrant silent night, 10
 But not a tear fell, not even a long-drawn sigh, long, long I gazed,
 Then on the earth partially reclining sat by your side leaning my chin in my hands, Passing sweet hours, immortal and mystic hours with you dearest comrade—not a tear, not a word,

Vigil of silence, love and death, vigil for you my son and my soldier,
 As onward silently stars aloft, eastward new ones upward stole,
 Vigil final for you brave boy, (I could not save you, swift was your death,
 I faithfully loved you and cared for you living, I think we shall surely meet again,)
 Till at latest lingering of the night, indeed just as the dawn appear'd,
 My comrade I wrapt in his blanket, envelop'd well his form,
 Folded the blanket well, tucking it carefully over head and carefully under feet, 20
 And there and then and bathed by the rising sun, my son in his grave, in his rude-dug grave I deposited,
 Ending my vigil strange with that, vigil of night and battle-field dim,
 Vigil for boy of responding kisses, (never again on earth responding,) Vigil for comrade swiftly slain, vigil I never forget, how as day brighten'd,
 I rose from the chill ground and folded my soldier well in his blanket,
 And buried him where he fell.

ONE'S-SELF I SING

ONE'S-SELF I sing, a simple separate person,
 Yet utter the word Democratic, the word En-Masse.

Of physiology from top to toe I sing,
 Not physiognomy alone nor brain alone is worthy for the Muse, I say the Form complete is worthier far,
 The Female equally with the Male I sing.

Of Life immense in passion, pulse, and power,
 Cheerful, for freest action form'd under the laws divine,
 The Modern Man I sing.

1867

DAREST THOU NOW O SOUL

DAREST thou now O soul,
 Walk out with me toward the unknown region,
 Where neither ground is for the feet nor any path to follow?

No map there, nor guide,
 Nor voice sounding, nor touch of human hand,
 Nor face with blooming flesh, nor lips, nor eyes, are in that land.

I know it not O soul,
 Nor dost thou, all is a blank before us,
 All waits undream'd of in that region, that inaccessible land.

Till when the ties loosen, 10
 All but the ties eternal, Time and Space,
 Nor darkness, gravitation, sense, nor any bounds bounding us.

Then we burst forth, we float,
 In Time and Space O soul, prepared for them,
 Equal, equipt at last, (O joy! O fruit of all!) them to fulfil O soul.

PASSAGE TO INDIA

The Atlantic cable was laid in 1866, in 1869 the Suez Canal was completed, and also in 1869 the tracks of the Union Pacific extending westward from Omaha were connected with the Central Pacific built eastward from San Francisco. Whitman thought of the crossing of the American continent as completing a world circuit, starting eastward from India, and this brought him a vision of world unity. Bret Harte curtly rejected this poem when it was submitted to the Overland Monthly.

I

SINGING my days,
Singing the great achievements of the present,
Singing the strong, light works of engineers,
Our modern wonders, (the antique ponderous Seven outvied,)
In the Old World, the east, the Suez canal,
The New by its mighty railroad spann'd,
The seas inlaid with eloquent, gentle wires,
I sound, to commence, the cry, with thee, O soul,
The Past! the Past! the Past!

The Past! the dark, unfathom'd retrospect! 10
The teeming gulf! the sleepers and the shadows!
The past! the infinite greatness of the past!
For what is the present, after all, but a growth out of the past?
(As a projectile, form'd, impell'd, passing a certain line, still keeps on,
So the present, utterly form'd, impell'd by the past.)

2

Passage, O soul, to India!
Eclaircise <sup>1</sup> the myths Asiatic—the primitive fables.

Not you alone, proud truths of the world!
Nor you alone, ye facts of modern science!
But myths and fables of eld—Asia's, Africa's fables! 20
The far-darting beams of the spirit!—the unloos'd dreams!
The deep diving bibles and legends;
The daring plots of the poets—the elder religions;
—O you temples fairer than lilies, pour'd over by the rising sun!
O you fables, spurning the known, eluding the hold of the known, mounting to heaven!
You lofty and dazzling towers, pinnacled, red as roses, burnish'd with gold!
Towers of fables immortal, fashion'd from mortal dreams!
You too I welcome, and fully, the same as the rest;
You too with joy I sing.

3

Passage to India! 30
Lo, soul! seest thou not God's purpose from the first?
The earth to be spann'd, connected by net-work,
The people to become brothers and sisters,
The races, neighbors, to marry and be given in marriage,
The oceans to be cross'd, the distant brought near,
The lands to be welded together.

<sup>1</sup> Make clear. Whitman likes to borrow or to manipulate French words.

(A worship new, I sing;
 You captains, voyagers, explorers, yours!
 You engineers! you architects, machinists, yours!
 You, not for trade or transportation only,
 But in God's name, and for thy sake, O soul.)

40

4

Passage to India!
 Lo, soul, for thee, of tableaux twain,
 I see, in one, the Suez canal initiated, open'd,
 I see the procession of steamships, the Empress Eugenie's leading the van;
 I mark, from on deck, the strange landscape, the pure sky, the level sand in the distance;
 I pass swiftly the picturesque groups, the workmen gather'd,
 The gigantic dredging machines.

In one, again, different, (yet thine, all thine, O soul, the same,)
 I see over my own continent the Pacific Railroad, surmounting every barrier;
 I see continual trains of cars winding along the Platte, carrying freight and passengers;
 I hear the locomotives rushing and roaring, and the shrill steam-whistle,
 I hear the echoes reverberate through the grandest scenery in the world;
 I cross the Laramie plains—I note the rocks in grotesque shapes—the buttes;
 I see the plentiful larkspur and wild onions—the barren, colorless, sage-deserts;
 I see in glimpses afar, or towering immediately above me, the great mountains—I see the Wind
 River and the Wahsatch mountains;
 I see the Monument mountain and the Eagle's Nest—I pass the Promontory—I ascend the Nevadas;
 I scan the noble Elk mountain, and wind around its base;
 I see the Humboldt range—I thread the valley and cross the river,
 I see the clear waters of Lake Tahoe—I see forests of majestic pines, Or, crossing the great desert, the alkaline plains, I behold enchanting mirages of waters and meadows;
 Marking through these, and after all, in duplicate slender lines,
 Bridging the three or four thousand miles of land travel,
 Tying the Eastern to the Western sea,
 The road between Europe and Asia.

(Ah Genoese, thy dream! thy dream!
 Centuries after thou art laid in thy grave,
 The shore thou foundest verifies thy dream!)

5

Passage to India!
 Struggles of many a captain—tales of many a sailor dead!
 Over my mood, stealing and spreading they come,
 Like clouds and cloudlets in the unreach'd sky.

70

Along all history, down the slopes,
 As a rivulet running, sinking now, and now again to the surface rising,
 A ceaseless thought, a varied train—Lo, soul! to thee, thy sight, they rise,
 The plans, the voyages again, the expeditions:
 Again Vasco da Gama sails forth;
 Again the knowledge gain'd, the mariner's compass,
 Lands found, and nations born—thou born, America, (a hemisphere unborn,)

For purpose vast, man's long probation fill'd,
Thou, rondure of the world, at last accomplish'd.

80

6

O, vast Rondure, swimming in space!
Cover'd all over with visible power and beauty!
Alternate light and day, and teeming, spiritual darkness;
Unspeakable, high processions of sun and moon, and countless stars, above;
Below, the manifold grass and waters, animals, mountains, trees;
With inscrutable purpose—some hidden, prophetic intention;
Now, first, it seems, my thought begins to span thee.

Down from the gardens of Asia, descending, radiating,
Adam and Eve appear, then their myriad progeny after them,
Wandering, yearning, curious—with restless explorations,
With questionings, baffled, formless, feverish—with never-happy hearts,
With that sad, incessant refrain, Wherefore, unsatisfied Soul? and Whither, O mocking Life?

90

Ah, who shall soothe these feverish children?
Who justify these restless explorations?
Who speak the secret of impassive Earth?
Who bind it to us? What is this separate Nature, so unnatural?
What is this Earth, to our affections? (unloving earth, without a throb to answer ours; Cold earth, the place of graves.)

Yet, soul, be sure the first intent remains—and shall be carried out;
(Perhaps even now the time has arrived.)

100

After the seas are all cross'd, (as they seem already cross'd,)
After the great captains and engineers have accomplish'd their work,
After the noble inventors—after the scientists, the chemist, the geologist, ethnologist,
Finally shall come the Poet, worthy that name;
The true Son of God shall come, singing his songs.

Then, not your deeds only, O voyagers, O scientists and inventors, shall be justified,
All these hearts, as of fretted children, shall be sooth'd,
All affection shall be fully responded to—the secret shall be told;
All these separations and gaps shall be taken up, and hook'd and link'd together;
The whole Earth—this cold, impassive, voiceless Earth, shall be completely justified;
Trinitas divine shall be gloriously accomplish'd and compacted by the true Son of God, the poet,
(He shall indeed pass the straits and conquer the mountains,
He shall double the Cape of Good Hope to some purpose;)
Nature and Man shall be disjoin'd and diffused no more,
The true Son of God shall absolutely fuse them.

110

7

Year at whose open'd, wide-flung door I sing!
Year of the purpose accomplish'd!
Year of the marriage of continents, climates and oceans!
(No mere Doge of Venice now, wedding the Adriatic;)<sup>1</sup>

120

<sup>1</sup> In the great days of Venice, it was the custom for the Doge, or chief magistrate, to throw a golden ring yearly into the Adriatic to symbolize the wedding of Venice to the sea that had enriched it.

I see, O year, in you, the vast terraqueous globe, given, and giving all,
 Europe to Asia, Africa join'd, and they to the New World;
 The lands, geographies, dancing before you, holding a festival garland,
 As brides and bridegrooms hand in hand.

8

Passage to India!

Cooling airs from Caucasus far, soothing cradle of man,
 The river Euphrates flowing, the past lit up again.

Lo, soul, the retrospect, brought forward;
 The old, most populous, wealthiest of Earth's lands,
 The streams of the Indus and the Ganges, and their many affluents; 130
 (I, my shores of America walking to-day, behold, resuming all,)
 The tale of Alexander, on his warlike marches, suddenly dying,
 On one side China, and on the other side Persia and Arabia,
 To the south the great seas, and the Bay of Bengal;
 The flowing literatures, tremendous epics, religions, castes,
 Old occult Brahma, interminably far back—the tender and junior Buddha,
 Central and southern empires, and all their belongings, possessors,
 The wars of Tamerlane, the reign of Aurungzebe,
 The traders, rulers, explorers, Moslems, Venetians, Byzantium, the Arabs, Portuguese,
 The first travelers, famous yet, Marco Polo, Batouta the Moor, 140
 Doubts to be solv'd, the map incognita, blanks to be fill'd,
 The foot of man unstay'd, the hands never at rest,
 Thyself, O soul, that will not brook a challenge.

9

The medieval navigators rise before me,
 The world of 1492, with its awaken'd enterprise;
 Something swelling in humanity now like the sap of the earth in spring,
 The sunset splendor of chivalry declining,

And who art thou, sad shade?
 Gigantic, visionary, thyself a visionary,
 With majestic limbs, and pious, beaming eyes, 150
 Spreading around, with every look of thine, a golden world,
 Enhuing it with gorgeously hues.

As the chief histrion,
 Down to the footlights walks, in some great scena,
 Dominating the rest, I see the Admiral himself,
 (History's type of courage, action, faith);
 Behold him sail from Palos, leading his little fleet;
 His voyage behold—his return—his great fame,
 His misfortunes, calumniators—behold him a prisoner, chain'd,
 Behold his dejection, poverty, death. 160

(Curious, in time, I stand, noting the efforts of heroes;
 Is the deferment long? bitter the slander, poverty, death?
 Lies the seed unreck'd for centuries in the ground? Lo! to God's due occasion, Uprising in the night, it sprouts, blooms.
 And fills the earth with use and beauty.)

10

Passage indeed, O soul, to primal thought!
 Not lands and seas alone—thy own clear freshness,
 The young maturity of brood and bloom;
 To realms of budding bibles.

O soul, repressless, I with thee, and thou with me,
 Thy circumnavigation of the world begin;
 Of man, the voyage of his mind's return,
 To reason's early paradise,
 Back, back to wisdom's birth, to innocent intuitions,
 Again with fair Creation.

170

11

O we can wait no longer!
 We too take ship, O soul!
 Joyous, we too launch out on trackless seas!
 Fearless, for unknown shores, on waves of ecstasy to sail,
 Amid the wafting winds, (thou pressing me to thee, I thee to me, O soul,) 180
 Caroling free—singing our song of God,
 Chanting our chant of pleasant exploration.

With laugh, and many a kiss,
 (Let others deprecate—let others weep for sin, remorse, humiliation;)
 O soul, thou pleasest me—I thee.

Ah, more than any priest, O soul, we too believe in God;
 But with the mystery of God we dare not dally.

O soul, thou pleasest me—I thee;
 Sailing these seas, or on the hills, or waking in the night,
 Thoughts, silent thoughts, of Time, and Space, and Death, like waters flowing, 190
 Bear me, indeed, as through the regions infinite,
 Whose air I breathe, whose ripples hear—lave me all over;
 Bathe me, O God, in thee—mounting to thee,
 I and my soul to range in range of thee.

O Thou transcendent!
 Nameless—the fibre and the breath!
 Light of the light—shedding forth universes—thou centre of them!
 Thou mightier centre of the true, the good, the loving!
 Thou moral, spiritual fountain! affection's source! thou reservoir!
 (O pensive soul of me! O thirst unsatisfied! waitest not there? 200 Waitest not haply for us, somewhere there, the Comrade perfect?)
 Thou pulse! thou motive of the stars, suns, systems,
 That, circling, move in order, safe, harmonious,
 Athwart the shapeless vastnesses of space!
 How should I think—how breathe a single breath—how speak—if, out of myself,
 I could not launch, to those, superior universes?

Swiftly I shrivel at the thought of God,
 At Nature and its wonders, Time and Space and Death,
 But that I, turning, call to thee, O soul, thou actual Me,
 And lo! thou gently masterest the orbs,
 Thou matest Time, smilest content at Death,
 And fillest, swellest full, the vastnesses of Space.

210

Greater than stars or suns,
 Bounding, O soul, thou journeyest forth;
 —What love, than thine and ours could wider amplify?
 What aspirations, wishes, outvie thine and ours, O soul?
 What dreams of the ideal? what plans of purity, perfection, strength?
 What cheerful willingness, for others' sake, to give up all?
 For others' sake to suffer all?

Reckoning ahead, O soul, when thou, the time achiev'd,
 (The seas all cross'd, weather'd the capes, the voyage done,) Surrounded, copest, frontest God, yieldest, the aim attain'd,
 As, fill'd with friendship, love complete, the Elder Brother found,
 The Younger melts in fondness in his arms.

220

12

Passage to more than India!
 Are thy wings plumed indeed for such far flights?
 O Soul, voyagest thou indeed on voyages like these?
 Disportest thou on waters such as these?
 Soundest below the Sanscrit and the Vedas?
 Then have thy bent unleash'd.

230

Passage to you, your shores, ye aged fierce enigmas!
 Passage to you, to mastership of you, ye strangling problems!
 You, strew'd with the wrecks of skeletons, that, living, never reach'd you.

13

Passage to more than India!
 O secret of the earth and sky!
 Of you, O waters of the sea! O winding creeks and rivers!
 Of you, O woods and fields! Of you, strong mountains of my land!
 Of you, O prairies! Of you, gray rocks!
 O morning red! O clouds! O rain and snows!
 O day and night, passage to you!

240

O sun and moon, and all you stars! Sirius and Jupiter!
 Passage to you!

Passage—immediate passage! the blood burns in my veins!
 Away, O soul! hoist instantly the anchor!
 Cut the hawsers—haul out—shake out every sail!
 Have we not stood here like trees in the ground long enough?
 Have we not grovell'd here long enough, eating and drinking like mere brutes?
 Have we not darken'd and dazed ourselves with books long enough?

Sail forth! steer for the deep waters only!

Reckless, O soul, exploring, I with thee, and thou with me;

250

For we are bound where mariner has not yet dared to go,
And we will risk the ship, ourselves and all.

O my brave soul!

O farther, farther sail!

O daring joy, but safe! Are they not all the seas of God?

O farther, farther, farther sail!

THOU MOTHER WITH THY EQUAL BROOD

1

Thou Mother with thy equal brood,

Thou varied chain of different States, yet one identity only,

A special song before I go I'd sing o'er all the rest,

For thee, the future.

I'd sow a seed for thee of endless Nationality,

I'd fashion thy ensemble including body and soul,

I'd show away ahead thy real Union, and how it may be accomplish'd.

The paths to the house I seek to make,

But leave to those to come the house itself.

Belief I sing, and preparation;

10

As Life and Nature are not great with reference to the present only,

But greater still from what is yet to come,

Out of that formula for thee I sing.

2

As a strong bird on pinions free,

Joyous, the amplest spaces heavenward cleaving,

Such be the thought I'd think of thee America,

Such be the recitative I'd bring for thee.

The conceits of the poets of other lands I'd bring thee not,

Nor the compliments that have served their turn so long,

Nor rhyme, nor the classics, nor perfume of foreign court or indoor library;

20

But an odor I'd bring as from forests of pine in Maine, or breath of an Illinois prairie,

With open airs of Virginia or Georgia or Tennessee, or from Texas uplands, or Florida's glades,

Or the Saguenay's black stream, or the wide blue spread of the Huron,

With presentment of Yellowstone's scenes, or Yosemite,

And murmuring under, pervading all, I'd bring the rustling sea-sound,

That endlessly sounds from the two Great Seas of the world.

And for thy subtler sense subtler refrains dread Mother,

Preludes of intellect tallying these and thee, mind-formulas for thee, real and sane and large as these and thee,

Thou! mounting higher, diving deeper than we knew, thou transcendental Union!

By thee fact to be justified, blended with thought,

30

Thought of man justified, blended with God,

Through thy idea, lo, the immortal reality!

Through thy reality, lo, the immortal idea!

3

Brain of the New World, what a task is thine,
 To formulate the Modern—out of the peerless grandeur of the modern,
 Out of thyself, comprising science, to recast poems, churches, art, (Recast, may-be discard them, end them—may-be their work is done, who knows?)
 By vision, hand, conception, on the background of the mighty past, the dead,
 To limn with absolute faith the mighty living present.

And yet thou living present brain, heir of the dead, the Old World brain, 40
 Thou that lay folded like an unborn babe within its folds so long,
 Thou carefully prepared by it so long—haply thou but unfoldest it, only maturest it,
 It to eventuate in thee—the essence of the by-gone time contain'd in thee,
 Its poems, churches, arts, unwitting to themselves, destined with reference to thee;
 Thou but the apples, long, long, long a-growing,
 The fruit of all the Old ripening to-day in thee.

4

Sail, sail thy best, ship of Democracy,
 Of value is thy freight, 'tis not the Present only,
 The Past is also stored in thee,
 Thou holdest not the venture of thyself alone, not of the Western continent alone, 50
 Earth's résumé entire floats on thy keel O ship, is steadied by thy spars,
 With thee Time voyages in trust, the antecedent nations sink or swim with thee,
 With all their ancient struggles, martyrs, heroes, epics, wars, thou bear'st the other continents,
 Theirs, theirs as much as thine, the destination-port triumphant;
 Steer then with good strong hand and wary eye O helmsman, thou carriest great companions,
 Venerable priestly Asia sails this day with thee,
 And royal feudal Europe sails with thee.

5

Beautiful world of new superber birth that rises to my eyes,
 Like a limitless golden cloud filling the western sky, Emblem of general maternity lifted above all, 60
 Sacred shape of the bearer of daughters and sons,
 Out of thy teeming womb thy giant babes in ceaseless procession issuing,
 Acceding from such gestation, taking and giving continual strength and life,
 World of the real—world of the twain in one,
 World of the soul, born by the world of the real alone, led to identity, body, by it alone,
 Yet in beginning only, incalculable masses of composite precious materials,
 By history's cycles forwarded, by every nation, language, hither sent,
 Ready, collected here, a freer, vast, electric world, to be constructed here,
 (The true New World, the world of orbic science, morals, literatures to come.)
 Thou wonder world yet undefined, unform'd, neither do I define thee, 70
 How can I pierce the impenetrable blank of the future?
 I feel thy ominous greatness evil as well as good,
 I watch thee advancing, absorbing the present, transcending the past,
 I see thy light lightning, and thy shadow shadowing, as if the entire globe,
 But I do not undertake to define thee, hardly to comprehend thee,
 I but thee name, thee prophesy, as now,
 I merely thee ejaculate!
 Thee in thy future,

Thee in thy only permanent life, career, thy own unloosen'd mind, thy soaring spirit,
 Thee as another equally needed sun, radiant, ablaze, swift-moving, fructifying all, 80
 Thee risen in potent cheerfulness and joy, in endless great hilarity,
 Scattering for good the cloud that hung so long, that weigh'd so long upon the mind of man,
 The doubt, suspicion, dread, of gradual, certain decadence of man;
 Thee in thy larger, saner brood of female, male—thee in thy athletes, moral, spiritual, South,
 North, West, East,
 (To thy immortal breasts, Mother of All, thy ever daughter, son, endear'd alike, forever equal.)
 Thee in thy own musicians, singers, artists, unborn yet, but certain, Thee in thy moral wealth and civilization, (until which thy proudest material civilization must remain in vain.)
 Thee in thy all-supplying, all-enclosing worship—thee in no single bible, saviour, merely,
 Thy saviours countless, latent within thyself, thy bibles incessant within thyself, equal to any, divine as any,
 (Thy soaring course thee formulating, not in thy two great wars, nor in thy century's visible growth, 90
 But far more in these leaves and chants; thy chants, great Mother!)
 Thee in an education grown of thee, in teachers, studies, students, born of thee,
 Thee in thy democratic fêtes en-masse, thy high original festivals, operas, lecturers, preachers,
 Thee in thy ultimata, (the preparations only now completed, the edifice on sure foundations tied,) Thee in thy pinnacles, intellect, thought, thy topmost rational joys, thy love and godlike aspiration,
 In thy resplendent coming literati, thy full-lung'd orators, thy sacerdotal bards, kosmic savans,
 These! these in thee, (certain to come,) to-day I prophesy.

6

Land tolerating all, accepting all, not for good alone, all good for thee,
 Land in the realms of God to be a realm unto thyself,
 Under the rule of God to be a rule unto thyself. 100

(Lo, where arise three peerless stars,
 To be thy natal stars my country, Ensemble, Evolution, Freedom, Set in the sky of Law.)

Land of unprecedented faith, God's faith,
 Thy soil, thy very subsoil, all upheav'd,
 The general inner earth so long so sedulously draped over, now hence for what it is boldly laid bare,
 Open'd by thee to heaven's light for benefit or bale.

Not for success alone,
 Not to fair-sail unintermitted always,
 The storm shall dash thy face, the murk of war and worse than war shall cover thee all over,
 (Wert capable of war, its tug and trials? be capable of peace its trials, 111
 For the tug and mortal strain of nations come at last in prosperous peace, not war;)
 In many a smiling mask death shall approach beguiling thee, thou in disease shalt swelter,
 The livid cancer spread its hideous claws, clinging upon thy breasts, seeking to strike thee deep within,
 Consumption of the worst, moral consumption, shall rouge thy face with hectic,
 But thou shalt face thy fortunes, thy diseases, and surmount them all,
 Whatever they are to-day and whatever through time they may be,

They each and all shall lift and pass away and cease from thee,
 While thou, Time's spirals rounding, out of thyself, thyself still extricating, fusing,
 Equable, natural, mystical Union thou, (the mortal with immortal blent,) 120
 Shalt soar toward the fulfilment of the future, the spirit of the body and the mind,
 The soul, its destinies.

The soul, its destinies, the real real,
 (Purport of all these apparitions of the real;)
 In thee America, the soul, its destinies,
 Thou globe of globes! thou wonder nebulous!
 By many a throe of heat and cold convuls'd, (by these thyself solidifying,) Thou mental, moral orb—thou New, indeed new, Spiritual World!
 The Present holds thee not—for such vast growth is thine,
 For such unparallel'd flight as thine, such brood as thine, 130
 The FUTURE only holds thee and can hold thee.

1872

A PRAIRIE SUNSET

SHOT gold, maroon and violet, dazzling silver, emerald, fawn,
 The earth's whole amplitude and Nature's multiform power consign'd for once to colors;
 The light, the general air possess'd by them—colors till now unknown,
 No limit, confine—not the Western sky alone—the high meridian—North, South, all,
 Pure luminous color fighting the silent shadows to the last.

1888

GOOD-BYE MY FANCY!

GOOD-BYE my Fancy!
 Farewell dear mate, dear love!
 I'm going away, I know not where,
 Or to what fortune, or whether I may ever see you again,
 So Good-bye my Fancy.

Now for my last—let me look back a moment;
 The slower fainter ticking of the clock is in me,
 Exit, nightfall, and soon the heart-thud stopping.
 Long have we lived, joy'd, caress'd together;
 Delightful!—now separation—Good-bye my Fancy. 10

Yet let me not be too hasty,
 Long indeed have we lived, slept, filter'd, become really blended into one;
 Then if we die we die together (yes, we'll remain one),
 If we go anywhere we'll go together to meet what happens,
 May-be we'll be better off and blither, and learn something,
 May-be it is yourself now really ushering me to the true songs, (who knows?)
 May-be it is you the mortal knob really undoing, turning—so now finally,
 Good-bye—and hail! my Fancy.

From DEMOCRATIC VISTAS

I SAY that democracy can never prove itself beyond cavil, until it founds and luxuriantly grows its own forms of art, poems, schools, theology, displacing all that exists, or that has been produced anywhere in the past, under opposite influences. It is curious to me that while so many voices, pens, minds, in the press, lecture-rooms, in our Congress, &c.,<sup>10</sup> are discussing intellectual topics, pecuniary dangers, legislative problems, the suffrage, tariff and labor questions, and the various business and benevolent needs of America, with propositions, remedies, often worth deep attention, there is one need, a hiatus the profoundest, that no eye seems to perceive, no voice to state. Our fundamental want to-day in the United States, with closest, amplest reference to present conditions, and to the future, is of a class, and the clear idea of a class, of native authors, literatuses, far different, far higher in grade than any yet known, sacerdotal, modern, fit to cope with our occasions, lands, permeating the whole mass of American mentality, taste, belief, breathing into it a new breath of life, giving it decision, affecting politics far more than the popular superficial suffrage, with results inside and underneath the elections of Presidents or Congresses—radiating, begetting appropriate teachers, schools, manners, and, as its grandest result, accomplishing, (what neither the schools nor the churches and their clergy have hitherto accomplish'd, and without which this nation will no more stand, permanently, soundly, than a house will stand without a substratum,) a religious and moral character beneath the political and productive and intellectual bases of the States. For know you not, dear, earnest reader, that the people of our land may all read and write, and may all possess the right to vote—and yet the main things may be entirely lacking?<sup>20</sup>—(and this to suggest them.)

View'd, to-day, from a point of view sufficiently over-arching, the problem of humanity all over the civilized world is social and religious, and is to be finally met and treated by literature. The priest departs, the divine literatus comes. Never was anything more wanted than, to-day, and here in the States, the poet of the modern is wanted, or the great literatus of the modern. At all times, perhaps, the central point in any nation, and that whence it is itself really sway'd the most, and whence it sways others, is its national literature, especially its archetypal poems. Above all previous lands, a great original literature is surely to become the justification and reliance, (in some respects the sole reliance,) of American democracy.

Few are aware how the great literature penetrates all, gives hue to all, shapes aggregates and individuals, and, after subtle ways, with irresistible power, constructs, sustains, demolishes at will. Why tower, in reminiscence, above all the nations of the earth, two special lands, petty in themselves, yet unexpressibly gigantic, beautiful, columnar? Immortal Judah lives, and Greece immortal lives, in a couple of poems.

Nearer than this. It is not generally realized, but it is true, as the genius of Greece, and all the sociology, personality, politics and religion of those wonderful states, resided in their literature or esthetics, that what was afterwards the main support of European chivalry, the feudal, ecclesiastical, dynastic world over there—forming its osseous structure, holding it together for hundreds, thousands of years, preserving its flesh and bloom, giving it form, decision, rounding it out, and so saturating it in the conscious and unconscious blood, breed, belief, and intuitions of men, that it still prevails powerful to this day, in defiance of the mighty changes of time—was its literature, permeating to the very marrow, especially that major part, its enchanting songs, ballads, and poems.

To the ostent<sup>1</sup> of the senses and eyes, I know, the influences which stamp the world's history are wars, uprisings or downfalls of dynasties, changeful movements of trade, important inventions, navigation, military or civil governments, advent of powerful personalities, conquerors, &c. These of course play their part; yet, it may be, a single new thought, imagination, abstract principle, even literary style, fit for the time, put in shape by some great literatus, and projected among mankind, may duly cause changes, growths, removals, greater than the longest and bloodiest war, or the most stupendous merely political, dynastic, or commercial overturn.

In short, as, though it may not be realized, it is strictly true, that a few first-class poets, philosophers,<sup>1</sup> and authors, have substantially settled and given status to the entire religion, education, law, sociology, &c., of the hitherto civilized world, by tinging and often creating 10 the atmospheres out of which they have arisen, such also must stamp, and more than ever stamp, the interior and real democratic construction of this American continent, to-day, and days to come. Remember also this fact of difference, that, while through the antique and through the mediæval ages, highest thoughts and ideals realized themselves, and their expression made its way by other arts, as much as, or even more than by, 20 technical literature, (not open to the mass of persons, or even to the majority of eminent persons,) such literature in our day and for current purposes, is not only more eligible than all the other arts put together, but has become the only general means of morally influencing the world. Painting, sculpture, and the dramatic theatre, it would seem, no longer play an indispensable or even important part in the workings and mediumship of 30 intellect, utility, or even high esthetics. Architecture remains, doubtless with capacities, and a real future. Then music, the combiner, nothing more spiritual, nothing more sensuous, a god, yet completely human, advances, prevails, holds highest place; supplying in certain wants and quarters what nothing else could supply. Yet in the civilization of to-day it is undeniable that, over all the arts, literature dominates, serves beyond all—shapes the 40 character of church and school—or, at any rate, is capable of doing so. Including the literature of science, its scope is indeed unparallel'd.

Before proceeding further, it were perhaps well to discriminate on certain points. Literature tills its crops in many fields, and some may flourish, while others lag. What I say in these Vistas has its main bearing on imaginative literature, especially poetry, the stock of 50

all. In the department of science, and the specialty of journalism, there appear, in these States, promises, perhaps fulfilments, of highest earnestness, reality, and life. These, of course, are modern. But in the region of imaginative, spinal and essential attributes, something equivalent to creation is, for our age and lands, imperatively demanded. For not only is it not enough that the new blood, new frame of democracy shall be vivified and held together merely by political means, superficial suffrage, legislation, &c., but it is clear to me that, unless it goes deeper, gets at least as firm and as warm a hold in men's hearts, emotions and belief, as, in their days, feudalism or ecclesiasticism, and inaugurates its own perennial sources, welling from the centre forever, its strength will be defective, its growth doubtful, and its main charm wanting. I suggest, therefore, the possibility, should some two or three really original American poets, (perhaps artists or lecturers,) arise, mounting the horizon like planets, stars of the first magnitude, that, from their eminence, fusing contributions, races, far localities, &c., together, they would give more compaction and more moral identity, (the quality to-day most needed,) to these States, than all its Constitutions, legislative and judicial ties, and all its hitherto political, warlike, or materialistic experiences. As, for instance, there could hardly happen anything that would more serve the States, with all their variety of origins, their diverse climes, cities, standards, &c., than possessing an aggregate of heroes, characters, exploits, sufferings, prosperity or misfortune, glory or disgrace, common to all, typical of all—no less, but even greater would it be to possess the aggregation of a cluster of mighty poets, artists, teachers, fit for us, national expressers, comprehending and effusing for the men and women of the States, what is universal, native, common to all, inland and seaboard, northern and southern. The historians say of ancient Greece, with her ever-jealous autonomies, cities, and states, that the only positive unity she ever own'd or receiv'd, was the sad unity of a common subjection, at the last, to foreign conquerors. Subjection, aggregation of that sort, is impossible to America; but the fear of conflicting and irreconcilable interiors, and the lack of a common skeleton, knitting all close, continually haunts me. Or, if it does not, nothing is plainer than the need, a long period to come, of a fusion of the States into the only reliable identity, the moral and artistic one. For, I say, the true nationality of the States, the genuine union, when we come to a mortal crisis, is, and is to be, after all, neither the written law, nor, (as is generally supposed,) 10 either self-interest, or common pecuniary or material objects—but the fervid and tremendous IDEA, melting everything else with resistless heat, and solving all lesser and definite distinctions in vast, indefinite, spiritual, emotional power.

It may be claim'd, (and I admit the weight of the claim,) that common and general worldly prosperity, and a populace well-to-do, and with all life's material comforts, is the 20 main thing, and is enough. It may be argued that our republic is, in performance, really enacting to-day the grandest arts, poems, &c., by beating up the wilderness into fertile farms, and in her railroads, ships, machinery, &c. And it may be ask'd, Are these not better, indeed, for America, than any utterances even of greatest rhapsode,<sup>1</sup> artist, or literatus?

I too hail those achievements with pride and joy: then answer that the soul of man will 30 not with such only—nay, not with such at all—be finally satisfied; but needs what, (standing on these and on all things, as the feet stand on the ground,) is address'd to the loftiest, to itself alone.

From SPECIMEN DAYS

My Passion for Ferries

Living in Brooklyn or New York city from this time forward, my life, then, and still more the following years, was curiously identified with Fulton ferry, already becoming the greatest of its sort in the world for general importance, volume, variety, rapidity, and picturesqueness. Almost daily, later, ('50 to '60,) I cross'd on the boats, often up in the pilot-houses where I could get a full sweep, absorbing shows, accompaniments, surround- 50

ings. What oceanic currents, eddies, underneath—the great tides of humanity also, with ever-shifting movements. Indeed, I have always had a passion for ferries; to me they afford inimitable streaming, never-failing, living poems. The river and bay scenery, all about New York Island, any time of a fine day—the hurrying, splashing sea-tides—the changing panorama of steamers, all sizes, often a string of big ones outward bound to distant ports—the myriads of white-sail'd 10 schooners, sloops, skiffs, and the marvelously beautiful yachts—the majestic sound boats as they rounded the Battery and came along towards five, afternoon, eastward bound—the prospect off towards Staten island, or down the Narrows, or the other way up the Hudson—what refreshment of spirit such sights and experiences gave me years ago (and many a time since.) My old pilot friends, the Balsirs, Johnny Cole, Ira Smith, William White, and my young ferry friend, Tom Gere—how well I remember them all.

Broadway Sights

Besides Fulton ferry, off and on for years, I knew and frequented Broadway—that noted avenue of New York's crowded and mixed 20 humanity, and of so many notables. Here I saw, during those times, Andrew Jackson, Webster, Clay, Seward, Martin Van Buren, filibuster Walker, Kossuth, Fitz Greene Halleck, Bryant, the Prince of Wales, Charles Dickens, the first Japanese ambassadors, and lots of other celebrities of the time. Always something novel or inspiring; yet mostly to me the hurrying and vast amplitude of those never-ending human currents. I remember seeing James Fenimore Cooper in a court-room in Chambers street, back of the city hall, where he was carrying on a law case (I think it was a charge of libel he had brought against some one). I also remember seeing Edgar A. Poe, and having a short interview with him, (it must have been in 1845 or '6,) in his office, second storey of a corner building, (Duane or Pearl street.) He was editor and owner or part owner of The Broadway Journal. The visit was about a piece of mine he had publish'd. Poe was very cordial, in a quiet way, appear'd well in person, dress, etc. I have a distinct and pleasing remembrance of his looks, voice, manner and matter; very kindly and human but subdued, perhaps a little jaded.

For another of my reminiscences, here on the west side, just below Houston street, I once saw (it must have been about 1832, of a sharp bright January day) a bent, feeble but stout-built very old man, bearded, swathed in rich furs, with a great ermine cap on his head, led and assisted, almost carried down the steps of his high front stoop (a dozen friends and servants, emulous, carefully holding, guiding him) and then lifted and tuck'd in a gorgeous sleigh, envelop'd in other furs, for a ride. The sleigh was drawn by as fine a team of horses as I ever saw. (You needn't think all the best animals are brought up nowadays; never was such horseflesh as fifty years ago on Long Island, or south, or in New York City; folks look'd for spirit and mettle in a nag, not tame speed merely.) Well, I, a boy of perhaps thirteen or fourteen, stopp'd and gazed long at the spectacle of that fur-swathed old man, surrounded by friends and servants, and the careful seating of him in a sleigh. I remember the spirited, champing horses, the driver with his whip, and a fellow-driver by his side, for extra prudence. The old man, the subject of so much attention, I can almost see now. It was John Jacob Astor.

The years 1846, '47, and there along, see me still in New York city, working as writer and printer, having my usual good health, and a good time generally.

Omnibus Jaunts and Drivers

One phase of those days must by no means go unrecorded—namely, the Broadway omnibuses, with their drivers. The vehicles still (I write this paragraph in 1881) give a portion of the character of Broadway—the Fifth avenue, Madison avenue, and Twenty-third street lines yet running. But the flush days of the old Broadway stages, characteristic and copious, are over. The Yellow-birds, the Red-birds, the original Broadway, the Fourth avenue, the Knickerbocker, and a dozen others of twenty or thirty years ago, are all gone.

And the men specially identified with them, and giving vitality and meaning to them—the drivers—a strange, natural, quick-eyed and wondrous race—(not only Rabelais and Cervantes would have gloated upon them, but Homer and Shakspeare would)—how well I remember them, and must here give a word about them. How many hours, forenoons and afternoons—how many exhilarating night-times I have had—perhaps June or July, in cooler air—riding the whole length of Broadway, listening to some yarn, (and the most vivid yarns ever spun, and the rarest mimicry)—or perhaps I declaiming some stormy passage from Julius Cæsar or Richard, (you could roar as loudly as you chose in that heavy, dense, uninterrupted street-bass.) Yes, I knew all the drivers then, Broadway Jack, Dressmaker, Balky Bill, George Storms, Old Elephant, his brother Young Elephant, (who came afterward,) Tippy, Pop Rice, Big Frank, Yellow Joe, Pete Callahan, Patsy Dee, and dozens more; for there were hundreds. They had immense qualities, largely animal—eating, drinking, women—great personal pride, in their way—perhaps a few slouches here and there, but I should have trusted the general run of them, in their simple good-will and honor, under all circumstances. Not only for comradeship, and sometimes affection—great studies I found them also. (I suppose the critics will laugh heartily, but the influence of those Broadway omnibus jaunts and drivers and declamations and escapades undoubtedly enter'd into the gestation of Leaves of Grass.)

Some Specimen Cases

June 18. In one of the hospitals I find Thomas Haley, company M, 4th New York cavalry—a regular Irish boy, a fine specimen of youthful physical manliness—shot through the lungs—inevitably dying—came over to this country from Ireland to enlist—has not a single friend or acquaintance here—is sleeping soundly at this moment, (but it is the sleep of death)—has a bullet-hole straight through the lung. I saw Tom when first brought here, three days since, and didn't suppose he could live twelve hours—(yet he looks well enough in the face to a casual observer). He lies there with his frame exposed above the waist, all naked, for coolness—a fine built man, the tan not yet bleach'd from his cheeks and neck. It is useless to talk to him, as with his sad hurt, and the stimulants they give him, and the utter strangeness of every object, face, furniture, etc., the poor fellow, even when awake, is like some frighten'd, shy animal. Much of the time he sleeps, or half sleeps. (Sometimes I thought he knew more than he show'd.) I often come and sit by him in perfect silence; he will breathe for ten minutes as softly and evenly as a young babe asleep. Poor youth, so handsome, athletic, with profuse beautiful shining hair. One time as I sat looking at him while he lay asleep, he suddenly, without the least start, awaken'd, open'd his eyes, gave me a long steady look, turning his face very slightly to gaze easier—one long, clear, silent look—a slight sigh—then turn'd back and went into his doze again. Little he knew, poor death-stricken boy, the heart of the stranger that hover'd near.

W. H. E., Co. F., 2nd N. J. His disease is pneumonia. He lay sick at the wretched hospital below Aquia creek, for seven or eight days before brought here. He was detail'd from his regiment to go there and help as nurse, but was soon taken down himself. Is an elderly, sallow-faced, rather gaunt, grey-hair'd man, a widower, with children. He express'd a great desire for good, strong green tea. An excellent lady, Mrs. W., of Washington, soon sent him a package; also a small sum of money. The doctor said give him the tea at pleasure; it lay on the table by his side, and he used it every day. He slept a great deal; could not talk much, as he grew deaf. Occupied bed 15, ward I, Armory. (The same lady above, Mrs. W., sent the men a large package of tobacco.)

J. G. lies in bed 52, ward I; is of company B, 7th Pennsylvania. I gave him a small sum of money, some tobacco, and envelopes. To a man adjoining also gave twenty-five cents; he flush'd in the face when I offer'd it—refused at first, but as I found he had not a cent, and was very fond of having the daily papers to read, I pressed it on him. He was evidently very grateful, but said little.

J. T. L., of company F., 9th New Hampshire, lies in bed 37, ward I. Is very fond of tobacco. I furnish him some; also with a little money. Has gangrene of the feet; a pretty bad case; will surely have to lose three toes. Is a regular specimen of an old-fashion'd, rude, hearty, New England countryman, impressing me with his likeness to that celebrated singed cat, who was better than she look'd.

Bed 3, ward E, Armory, has a great hankering for pickles, something pungent. After consulting the doctor, I gave him a small bottle of horse-radish; also some apples; also a book. Some of the nurses are excellent. The woman-nurse in this ward I like very much. (Mrs. Wright—a year afterwards I found her in Mansion house hospital, Alexandria—she is a perfect nurse.)

In one bed a young man, Marcus Small, company K, 7th Maine—sick with dysentery and typhoid fever—pretty critical case—I talk with him often—he thinks he will die—looks like it indeed. I write a letter for him home to East Livermore, Maine—I let him talk to me a little, but not much; advise him to keep very quiet—do most of the talking myself—stay quite a while with him, as he holds on to my hand—talk to him in a cheering, but slow, low and measured manner—talk about his furlough, and going home as soon as he is able to travel.

Thomas Lindly, 1st Pennsylvania cavalry, shot very badly through the foot—poor young man he suffers horribly, has to be constantly dosed with morphine, his face ashy and glazed, bright young eyes—I give him a large handsome apple, lay it in sight, tell him to have it roasted in the morning, as he generally feels easier then, and can eat a little breakfast. I write two letters for him.

Opposite, an old Quaker lady is sitting by the side of her son, Amer Moore, 2nd U.S. artillery—shot in the head two weeks since, very low, quite rational—from hips down paralyzed—he will surely die. I speak a very few words to him every day and evening—he answers pleasantly—wants nothing—he told me soon after he came about his home affairs: his mother had been an invalid, and he fear'd to let her know his condition). He died soon after she came.

1842 ~ Sidney Lanier ~ 1881

THE LITERARY life of Sidney Lanier is associated with Baltimore, but by birth and bringing up he belongs to Georgia. He takes a leading rank among the distinguished writers of the South after the Civil War, and next to Whitman and Emily Dickinson, is the most important poet of the seventies.

Lanier was born at Macon, Georgia, in 1842, descended from a family of musicians of Huguenot stock. The poet's branch of the family, which had settled first in Virginia, removed to Alabama and Georgia, where his father practiced law in Macon. His mother had come to Georgia from Virginia. As a child Lanier is said to have been able to learn readily any musical instrument. He could play the flute, violin, organ, piano, and guitar, as early as he could read. He cared most for the violin, but was persuaded by his father to devote himself chiefly to the flute, since "the tones of the violin brought over-excitement to his sensitive, responsive nature."

At the age of fourteen Lanier entered the sophomore class of Oglethorpe University, a small sectarian institution at Midway, Georgia. After spending a year in outside work he was graduated at eighteen, standing highest, with one of his classmates, in scholarship. In 1860, the year of his graduation, he was made tutor. He was ambitious to study in Germany and become a professor, as had Longfellow and Lowell, but was swerved from his normal development by the outbreak of the Civil War. In 1861 he gave up his profession to enlist at the first call as a private in the Confederate army. His younger brother also volunteered, and to remain together they both refused promotions, serving in the line as scouts and then in the signal service. Lanier was finally captured with his vessel in blockade-running and was imprisoned at Point Lookout. He was released in 1865 and returned to Georgia, weakened from a dangerous illness of six weeks. His mother had died shortly before of consumption, and the beginning of that disease was already upon Lanier.

Now, at twenty-three, he served as clerk in a hotel and finished a novel, Tiger Lilies, begun while he was in the army. After its failure he taught school, becoming principal of an academy. In 1867 he was married to Mary Day of Macon, and from 1868 to 1872 he was an assistant in his father's law office. During these years he wrote verse but no great quantity of it. In the winter of 1872-73 he decided to give up the law, especially since he wished to devote himself to music and literature and to live in an atmosphere of culture. He went to New York but finally settled in Baltimore in December, 1873, having attained the position of first flute in the Peabody Symphony Orchestra. Music was his most dependable means of support, and he was in great demand for extra local engagements. At Baltimore he had the opportunity he craved to hear good music and to have access to large libraries—the Peabody library and that of the newly organized Johns Hopkins University. “Corn” was written in 1874 and published in 1875. Soon after, he began and finished “The Symphony,” published, as was “Corn,” in Lippincott’s Magazine. It was a poem of “real harmonic structure” and better sustained than “Corn.” Through Bayard Taylor he received the invitation to write the words of the cantata for the opening of the Centennial Exposition in 1876, the music for which was composed by Dudley Buck. In this year he wrote also his “Evening Song” and in 1878 “The Revenge of Hamish,” an excellent narrative poem produced at a time when there was little of this type of verse.

Meanwhile he was struggling against illness, and was forced to interrupt his work to seek health in Florida or Pennsylvania or the mountains of North Carolina, and to do hack work for a living. He was also lecturing for schools and for private classes of ladies. In 1879 he was appointed lecturer in English literature in Johns Hopkins University. This brought him the assurance of a fixed though small income. He planned more scholarly works, of which but one, The Science of English Verse (1880), was issued. Unripe and hastily written, it is nonetheless one of the most suggestive books yet published on the subject. Its main thesis—that English verse has strict quantity like music and may be scanned on the basis of time, not accent—is, however, probably not sound. Lanier died in 1881, his final years being a race with death to see how much he could produce before the end came. The poem “Sunrise” was penciled at a fever temperature of 104. Lanier was an author who could not complete his work. He was fundamentally an artist, endowed with an artist’s imagination and ambition. His talent was growing when he died.

Lanier was especially concerned with commercialism, with religion, and with the worth of human aspiration. He had wide interests and sympathies, and he responded to contemporary influences, such as that of scientific thought, then not strong in American verse. As a nature poet he was original and a regionalist. Nature was, for him, bound up with a feeling of lofty pantheism; it was not merely a pretty background but a passion. He made much of the Southern scene, the corn, the cotton, the marshes, the Georgia hills. Trees especially were his delight; the forest inspired him to rhapsodies.

Poetry, to Lanier, was invested with the sacredness of religion. His passion for music, stronger even than his passion for books, inspired him to give us verse richer in music than that of any other poet except Poe. Lanier was an investigator of artistic technique and the author of a treatise on prosody in which he tried to explain English versification by the principles of musical composition. He thought that music and poetry were closely related, that they follow the same general laws, and that poetry appeals chiefly to the emotional nature, depending on sound rather than sense for its impression. His work is intricate, full of ingenious devices, literary allusions, and archaic forms. He experimented with "tone color," rhythm, alliteration, and phrasing. In trying to obtain effects belonging to music, he did not sharply sever these arts, and he sacrificed lucidity and ease. Yet, though he deliberately sought effects of sound in his poetry, he held that "wherever there is a contest as between artistic and moral beauty, unless the moral side prevail, all is lost." In 1880 he wished "the sharpest distinction . . . between Technique and Inspiration." In theory he was devoted to the "beauty of holiness" and the traditional unity of beauty, truth, and goodness. His most cherished aim was to be a thinker, moralist, and social reformer.

Although Lanier had great ethical earnestness and fervor, he was not a guiding influence in his own time. Fired with the romantic spirit, he came late, in a post-war, unromantic age. He achieved a distinctive manner; but his technique was too refined, his verse somehow lacked vitality, and the more virile Whitman, not Lanier, was to sway and inspire a generation. Yet an unusual interest attaches to him. His letters reveal a pleasing personality and his last years testify to his ambition and fortitude. A recent biographer describes him as fastidious, dreamlike, and high-minded, and makes much of his manliness, his charm, his antagonism to all that he thought despicable, and his courage in the face of poverty.

The inclusive edition of Lanier's poems is that edited by his wife, with a brief memorial by W. H. Ward (1884; later edition, 1916). M. Callaway, Jr. edited Select Poems of Sidney Lanier (1895). The Letters of Sidney Lanier: Selections from His Correspondence, 1866-1881 was edited by H. W. Lanier (1899). D. C. Gilman published "Sidney Lanier: Reminiscences and Letters" in the South Atlantic Quarterly, IV, April, 1905; M. H. Northup, "Sidney Lanier: Recollections and Letters" in Lippincott's Magazine, LXXV, March, 1905; and G. H. Clarke, Some Reminiscences and Early Letters of Sidney Lanier (pamphlet, 1907).

The best biography of Lanier is that by A. H. Starke, Sidney Lanier: A Biography and Critical Study (1933). W. P. Woolf contributed "Sidney Lanier as Revealed in His Letters" to the Sewanee Review, VIII, July, 1900. Edwin Mims's Sidney Lanier, in the American Men of Letters Series (1905), was the best biography before Starke's; Mims also wrote of Lanier in DAB, X (1933). L. Lorenz issued a sympathetic Life of Sidney Lanier (1935).

Among critical articles may be noted: C. W. Kent, "A Study of Lanier's Poems," in PMLA, VII, April-June, 1892; C. Furst, "Concerning Sidney Lanier," in Modern Language Notes, XIV, Nov., 1899; P. Graham, "Lanier's Reading," in University of Texas Studies in English, No. 11, 1931; W. M. Baskervill, in Southern Writers: Biographical and Critical Studies, I (1896-97); J. Macy, in The Spirit of American Literature (1913); F. W. Cady, "Sidney Lanier," in the South Atlantic Quarterly, III, April, 1914; A. H. The best bibliographies of Lanier may be found in A. H. Starke's Life, and by H. Hartwick in W. F. Taylor's A History of American Letters (1936).

THAR'S MORE IN THE MAN THAN THAR IS IN THE LAND

Composed in 1866, and said to have been printed first in a Georgia newspaper. The first of Lanier's dialect poems, it teaches that it is the efforts of the individual, not external conditions, that bring success or failure. Lanier was much concerned about the overproduction of cotton in the South and the consequent bankruptcy of the farmers. He wished them to cultivate the land more intelligently.

I KNOWED a man, which he lived in Jones,
Which Jones is a country of red hills and stones,
And he lived pretty much by gittin' of loans,
And his mules was nuthin' but skin and bones,
And his hogs was flat as his corn-bread pones,
And he had 'bout a thousand acres o' land.

This man—which his name it was also Jones—
He swore that he'd leave them old red hills and stones,
Fur he couldn't make nuthin' but yallerish
cotton,
And little o' that, and his fences was rotten, 10
And what little corn he had, hit was boughten
And dinged ef a livin' was in the land.

And the longer he swore the madder he got,
And he riz and he walked to the stable lot,
And he hollered to Tom to come thar and hitch
Fur to emigrate somewhar whar land was rich,
And to quit raisin' cock-burrs, thistles and sich,
And a wastin' ther time on the cussed land.

So him and Tom they hitched up the mules,
Pertestin' that folks was mighty big fools 20
That 'ud stay in Georgy ther lifetime out,
Jest scratchin' a livin' when all of 'em mought
Git places in Texas whar cotton would sprout
By the time you could plant it in the land.

And he driv by a house whar a man named
Brown
Was a livin', not fur from the edge o' town,
And he bantered Brown fur to buy his place,
And said that bein' as money was skace,
And bein' as sheriffs was hard to face,
Two dollars an acre would git the land. 30

They closed at a dollar and fifty cents,
And Jones he bought him a waggin and tents,
And loaded his corn, and his wimmin, and truck,
And moved to Texas, which it tuck
His entire pile, with the best of luck,
To git thar and git him a little land.

But Brown moved out on the old Jones farm,
And he rolled up his breeches and bared his arm,
And he picked all the rocks from off'n the groun',
And he rooted it up and he plowed it down, 40
Then he sowed his corn and his wheat in the land.

Five years glid by, and Brown, one day, (Which he's got so fat that he wouldn't weigh),
Was a settin' down, sorter lazily,
To the bulliest dinner you ever see,
When one of the children jumped on his knee
And says, "Yan's Jones, which you bought his land."

And thar was Jones, standin' out at the fence,
And he hadn't no waggin, nor mules, nor tents,
For he had left Texas afoot and cum 50
To Georgy to see if he couldn't git sum Employment, and said he was lookin' as hum-
Ble as ef he had never owned any land.

But Brown he axed him in, and he sot
Him down to his vittles smokin' hot,

And when he had filled hisself and the floor
 Brown looked at him sharp and riz and swore
 That, "whether men's land was rich or poor Thar was more in the man than thar was in the land."

CORN

Published in Lippincott's Magazine, February, 1875. A succession of pictures, it opens with a forest rhapsody, touched with the mystical ("faint bridal-sighs of brown and green," "vague purports sweet") and expressing Lanier's strong, ecstatic love of trees. There follows the description of corn, with two elaborated analogies, that of the poet who, following the romantic tradition, is viewed as the prophet and leader of his day, and that of the "home-fond heart." The third picture is that of the worn-out hill, associated with the story of the unthrifty cotton-grower who spent his money before his crop was raised and borrowed at heavy interest. The poem ends as a sermon on Georgia agriculture. W. D. Howells did not accept "Corn" for the Atlantic Monthly, remarking that there was no "connection between the apostrophe at the beginning and the bit of narrative at the close," and adding that "neither was striking enough to stand alone." Yet it was "Corn" that brought Lanier recognition as a poet, and it has held its popularity well.

TODAY the woods are trembling through and through
 With shimmering forms, that flash before my view,
 Then melt in green as dawn-stars melt in blue.
 The leaves that wave against my cheek caress
 Like women's hands; the embracing boughs express
 A subtlety of mighty tenderness;
 The copse-depths into little noises start,
 That sound anon like beatings of a heart,
 Anon like talk 'twixt lips not far apart.
 The beech dreams balm, as a dreamer hums
 a song; 10
 Through that vague wafture, expirations strong
 Throb from young hickories breathing deep and long
 With stress and urgency bold of prisoned
 spring
 And ecstasy of burgeoning.

Now, since the dew-plashed road of morn is dry,
 Forth venture odors of more quality
 And heavenlier giving. Like Jove's locks awry,
 Long muscadines
 Rich-wreathe the spacious foreheads of great pines,
 And breathe ambrosial passion from their vines. 20
 I pray with mosses, ferns and flowers shy
 That hide like gentle nuns from human eye
 To lift adoring perfumes to the sky.
 I hear faint bridal-sighs of brown and green
 Dying to silent hints of kisses keen
 As far lights fringe into a pleasant sheen.
 I start at fragmentary whispers, blown
 From undertalks of leafy souls unknown,
 Vague purports sweet, of inarticulate tone.

Dreaming of gods, men, nuns and brides, between 30
 Old companies of oaks that inward lean
 To join their radiant amplitudes of green
 I slowly move, with ranging looks that pass
 Up from the matted miracles of grass
 Into yon veined complex of space,
 Where sky and leafage interlace
 So close, the heaven of blue is seen
 Inwoven with a heaven of green.

I wander to the zigzag-cornered fence
 Where sassafras, intrenched in brambles dense, 40
 Contests with stolid vehemence
 The march of culture, setting limb and thorn
 As pikes against the army of the corn.

There, while I pause, my fieldward-faring eyes Take harvests, where the stately corn-ranks rise
 Of inward dignities
 And large benignities and insights wise,
 Graces and modest majesties.
 Thus, without theft, I reap another's field;
 Thus, without tith, I house a wondrous yield, 50
 And heap my heart with quintuple crops concealed.

Look, out of line one tall corn-captain stands
Advanced beyond the foremost of his bands,

And waves his blades upon the very edge
And hottest thicket of the battling hedge.

Thou lustrous stalk, that ne'er mayst walk nor talk,

Still shalt thou type the poet-soul sublime
That leads the vanward of his timid time
And sings up cowards with commanding rhyme—

Soul calm, like thee, yet fain, like thee, to grow 60

By double increment, above, below;

Soul homely, as thou art, yet rich in grace
like thee,

Teaching the yeomen selfless chivalry

That moves in gentle curves of courtesy;

Soul filled like thy long veins with sweetness
tense,

By every godlike sense

Transmuted from the four wild elements.

Drawn to high plans,

Thou lift'st more stature than a mortal man's,

Yet ever piercest downward in the mold 70

And keepest hold

Upon the reverend and steadfast earth

That gave thee birth;

Yea, standest smiling in thy future grave,

Serene and brave,

With unremitting breath

Inhaling life from death,

Thine epitaph writ fair in fruitage eloquent,

Thyself thy monument.

As poets should 80

Thou hast built up thy hardihood

With universal food,

Drawn in select proportion fair

From honest mold and vagabond air;

From darkness of the dreadful night,

And joyful light;

From antique ashes, whose departed flame

In thee has finer life and longer fame;

From wounds and balms,

From storms and calms, 90

From potsherds and dry bones

And ruin-stones.

Into thy vigorous substance thou hast wrought

Whate'er the hand of Circumstance hath brought;

Yea, into cool solacing green hast spun

White radiance hot from out the sun.

So thou dost mutually leaven

Strength of earth with grace of heaven;

So thou dost marry new and old

Into a one of higher mold; 100

So thou dost reconcile the hot and cold,

The dark and bright,

And many a heart-perplexing opposite:

And so,

Akin by blood to high and low,

Fitly thou playest out thy poet's part,

Richly expending thy much-bruisèd heart

In equal care to nourish lord in hall

Or beast in stall:

Thou took'st from all that thou might'st

give to all. 110

O steadfast dweller on the selfsame spot

Where thou wast born, that still repinest not—

Type of the home-fond heart, the happy lot!—

Deeply thy mild content rebukes the land

Whose flimsy homes, built on the shifting sand

Of trade, forever rise and fall

With alternation whimsical,

Enduring scarce a day,

Then swept away

By swift engulfments of incalculable tides

Whereon capricious Commerce rides. 121

Look, thou substantial spirit of content!

Across this little vale, thy continent,

To where, beyond the moldering mill,

Yon old deserted Georgian hill

Bares to the sun his piteous aged crest

And seamy breast,

By restless-hearted children left to lie

Untended there beneath the heedless sky,

As barbarous folk expose their old to die.

Upon that generous-rounding side, 131

With gullies scarified

Where keen Neglect his lash hath plied,

Dwelt one I knew of old, who played at toil,

And gave to coquette Cotton soul and soil.

Scorning the slow reward of patient grain,

He sowed his heart with hopes of swifter gain,

Then sat him down and waited for the rain.

He sailed in borrowed ships of usury—

A foolish Jason on a treacherous sea, 140

Seeking the Fleece and finding misery.

Lulled by smooth-rippling loans, in idle trance
He lay, content that unthrift Circumstance Should plow for him the stony field of Chance.
Yea, gathering crops whose worth no man might tell,
He staked his life on games of Buy-and-Sell,
And turned each field into a gambler's hell.
Aye, as each year began,
My farmer to the neighboring city ran;
Passed with a mournful anxious face 150
Into the banker's inner place;
Parleyed, excused, pleaded for longer grace;
Railed at the drought, the worm, the rust,
the grass;
Protested ne'er again 'twould come to pass;
With many an oh and if and but alas
Parried or swallowed searching questions
rude,
And kissed the dust to soften Dives's mood.
At last, small loans by pledges great renewed,
He issues smiling from the fatal door,
And buys with lavish hand his yearly store 160
Till his small borrowings will yield no more.
Aye, as each year declined,
With bitter heart and ever-brooding mind
He mourned his fate unkind.
In dust, in rain, with might and main,
He nursed his cotton, cursed his grain,
Fretted for news that made him fret again,
Snatched at each telegram of Future Sale,
And thrilled with Bulls' or Bears' alternate wail—
In hope or fear alike forever pale. 170
And thus from year to year, through hope and fear,
With many a curse and many a secret tear,
Striving in vain his cloud of debt to clear,
At last
He woke to find his foolish dreaming past,
And all his best-of-life the easy prey
Of squandering scamps and quacks that lined his way
With vile array,
From rascal statesman down to petty knave;
Himself, at best, for all his bragging brave, 180
A gamester's catspaw and a banker's slave.
Then, worn and gray, and sick with deep unrest,

He fled away into the oblivious West,
Unmourned, unblest.

Old hill! old hill! thou gashed and hairy Lear
Whom the divine Cordelia of the year,
E'en pitying Spring, will vainly strive to cheer—

King, that no subject man nor beast may own,

Discrowned, undaughtered and alone—
Yet shall the great God turn thy fate, 190
And bring thee back into thy monarch state
And majesty immaculate.

Lo, through hot waverings of the August morn,

Thou givest from thy vasty sides forlorn
Visions of golden treasuries of corn—
Ripe largesse lingering for some bolder heart
That manfully shall take thy part,
And tend thee,

And defend thee,

With antique sinew and with modern art. 200

THE SYMPHONY

In this poem Lanier turns again to social questions. He arraigns Trade, i.e., commercialism and industrialism, and praises the Music Master Love. He voices his condemnation and encomium through the personified musical instruments of an orchestra: the violins (ll. 15 ff.); the flute (ll. 86 ff.); the clarinet (ll. 216 ff.); the horn (ll. 253 ff.), the hautboy (ll. 325 ff.). The last line has been widely quoted.

"O TRADE! O Trade! would thou wert dead!
The Time needs heart—'tis tired of head:

We're all for love," the violins said.

"Of what avail the rigorous tale
Of bill for coin and box for bale?

Grant thee, O Trade! thine uttermost hope:

Level red gold with blue sky-slope,

And base it deep as devils grope:

When all's done, what hast thou won

Of the only sweet that's under the sun? 10

Ay, canst thou buy a single sigh

Of true love's least, least ecstasy?"

Then, with a bridegroom's heart-beats trembling,

All the mightier strings assembling
Ranged them on the violins' side

As when the bridegroom leads the bride,
 And, heart in voice, together cried:
 "Yea, what avail the endless tale
 Of gain by cunning and plus by sale?
 Look up the land, look down the land, 20
 The poor, the poor, the poor, they stand
 Wedged by the pressing of Trade's hand
 Against an inward-opening door
 That pressure tightens evermore:
 They sigh a monstrous foul-air sigh
 For the outside leagues of liberty,
 Where Art, sweet lark, translates the sky
 Into a heavenly melody.
 'Each day, all day' (these poor folks say),
 'In the same old year-long, drear-long way, 30
 We weave in the mills and heave in the kilns,
 We sieve mine-meshes under the hills,
 And thieve much gold from the Devil's bank
 tills,
 To relieve, O God, what manner of ills?—
 The beasts, they hunger, and eat, and die;
 And so do we, and the world's a sty;
 Hush, fellow-swine: why nuzzle and cry?
Swinehood hath no remedy
 Say many men, and hasten by,
 Clamping the nose and blinking the eye. 40
 But who said once, in the lordly tone,
Man shall not live by bread alone
But all that cometh from the Throne?
 Hath God said so?
 But Trade saith No:
 And the kilns and the curt-tongued mills say
Go!
There's plenty that can, if you can't: we know.
Move out, if you think you're underpaid.
The poor are prolific; we're not afraid;
Trade is trade.'" 50
 Thereat this passionate protesting Meekly changed, and softened till
 It sank to sad requesting
 And suggesting sadder still:
 "And oh, if men might some time see
 How piteous-false the poor decree
 That trade no more than trade must be!
 Does business mean, Die, you—live, I?
 Then 'Trade is trade' but sings a lie:
 'Tis only war grown miserly. 60
 If business is battle, name it so:
 War-crimes less will shame it so,
 And widows less will blame it so.

Alas, for the poor to have some part
 In yon sweet living lands of Art,
 Makes problem not for head, but heart.
 Vainly might Plato's brain revolve it:
 Plainly the heart of a child could solve it."

And then, as when from words that seem but rude

We pass to silent pain that sits abrood 70
 Back in our heart's great dark and solitude,
 So sank the strings to gentle throbbing
 Of long chords change-marked with sobbing—

Motherly sobbing, not distinctlier heard
 Than half wing-openings of the sleeping bird,
 Some dream of danger to her young hath stirred.

Then stirring and demurring ceased, and lo!
 Every least ripple of the strings' song-flow
 Died to a level with each level bow
 And made a great chord tranquil-surfaced
 so, 80

As a brook beneath his curving bank doth go
 To linger in the sacred dark and green
 Where many boughs the still pool overlean
 And many leaves make shadow with their sheen.

But presently

A velvet flute-note fell down pleasantly
 Upon the bosom of that harmony,
 And sailed and sailed incessantly,
 As if a petal from a wild-rose blown
 Had fluttered down upon that pool of tone
 And boatwise dropped o' the convex side 90
 And floated down the glassy tide
 And clarified and glorified
 The solemn spaces where the shadows bide.
 From the warm concave of that fluted note
 Somewhat, half song, half odor, forth did float,

As if a rose might somehow be a throat:

"When Nature from her far-off glen
 Flutes her soft messages to men,

The flute can say them o'er again; 100

Yea, Nature, singing sweet and lone,
 Breathes through life's strident polyphone
 The flute-voice in the world of tone.

Sweet friends,

Man's love ascends

To finer and diviner ends

Than man's mere thought e'er comprehends:

For I, e'en I,
 As here I lie,
 A petal on a harmony, 110
 Demand of Science whence and why
 Man's tender pain, man's inward cry,
 When he doth gaze on earth and sky?
 I am not overbold:
     I hold
 Full powers from Nature manifold.
 I speak for each no-tongued tree
 That, spring by spring, doth nobler be,
 And dumbly and most wistfully
 His mighty prayerful arms outspreads 120
 Above men's oft-unheeding heads,
 And his big blessing downward sheds.
 I speak for all-shaped blooms and leaves,
 Lichens on stones and moss on eaves,
 Grasses and grains in ranks and sheaves;
 Broad-fronded ferns and keen-leaved canes,
 And briery mazes bounding lanes,
 And marsh-plants, thirsty-cupped for rains,
 And milky stems and sugary veins;
 For every long-armed woman-vine 130
 That round a piteous tree doth twine;
 For passionate odors, and divine
 Pistils, and petals crystalline;
 All purities of shady springs,
 All shynesses of film-winged things
 That fly from tree-trunks and bark-rings;
 All modesties of mountain-fawns
 That leap to covert from wild lawns,
 And tremble if the day but dawns;
 All sparklings of small beady eyes 140
 Of birds, and sidelong glances wise
 Wherewith the jay hints tragedies;
 All piquancies of prickly burs,
 And smoothnesses of downs and furs
 Of eiders and of minevers;
 All limpid honeys that do lie
 At stamen-bases, nor deny
 The humming-birds' fine roguery,
 Bee-thighs, nor any butterfly;
 All gracious curves of slender wings, 150
 Bark-mottlings, fiber-spiralings,
 Fern-wavings and leaf-flickerings;
 Each dial-marked leaf and flower-bell
 Wherewith in every lonesome dell
 Time to himself his hours doth tell;
 All tree-sounds, rustlings of pine-cones,
 Wind-sighings, doves' melodious moans,
 And night's unearthly under-tones;

All placid lakes and waveless deeps,
 All cool reposing mountain-steeps, 160
 Vale-calms and tranquil lotos-sleeps;—
 Yea, all fair forms, and sounds, and lights,
 And warmths, and mysteries, and mights,
 Of Nature's utmost depths and heights,
 —These doth my timid tongue present,
 Their mouthpiece and leal instrument
 And servant, all love-eloquent.
 I heard, when 'All for love' the violins cried:
 So, Nature calls through all her system wide,
Give me thy love, O man, so long denied. 170 Much time is run, and man hath changed his ways,
 Since Nature, in the antique fable-days,
 Was hid from man's true love by proxy fays,
 False fauns and rascal gods that stole her praise.
 The nymphs, cold creatures of man's colder
     brain,
 Chilled Nature's streams till man's warm heart was fain
 Never to lave its love in them again.
 Later, a sweet Voice Love thy neighbor said;
 Then first the bounds of neighborhood out-
     spread
 Beyond all confines of old ethnic dread. 180
 Vainly the Jew might wag his covenant head:
 'All men are neighbors,' so the sweet Voice
     said.
 So, when man's arms had circled all man's race,
 The liberal compass of his warm embrace Stretched bigger yet in the dark bounds of space;
 With hands a-grope he felt smooth Nature's grace,
 Drew her to breast and kissed her sweetheart face:
 Yea, man found neighbors in great hills and trees
 And streams and clouds and suns and birds and bees,
 And throbbed with neighbor-loves in loving these. 190
 But oh, the poor! the poor! the poor!
 That stand by the inward-opening door
 Trade's hand doth tighten ever more,
 And sigh their monstrous foul-air sigh
 For the outside hills of liberty,
 Where Nature spreads her wild blue sky
 For Art to make into melody!

Thou Trade! thou king of the modern days!
 Change thy ways,
 Change thy ways; 200
 Let the sweaty laborers file
 A little while,
 A little while,
 Where Art and Nature sing and smile.
 Trade! is thy heart all dead, all dead?
 And hast thou nothing but a head?
 I'm all for heart," the flute-voice said,
 And into sudden silence fled,
 Like as a blush that while 'tis red
 Dies to a still, still white instead. 210

Thereto a thrilling calm succeeds,
 Till presently the silence breeds
 A little breeze among the reeds
 That seems to blow by sea-marsh weeds:
 Then from the gentle stir and fret
 Sings out the melting clarionet,
 Like as a lady sings while yet
 Her eyes with salty tears are wet.
 "O Trade! O Trade!" the Lady said,
 "I too will wish thee utterly dead 220
 If all thy heart is in thy head.
 For O my God! and O my God!
 What shameful ways have women trod
 At beckoning of Trade's golden rod!
 Alas when sighs are traders' lies,
 And heart's-ease eyes and violet eyes
 Are merchandise!
 O purchased lips that kiss with pain!
 O cheeks coin-spotted with smirch and stain!
 O trafficked hearts that break in twain! 230
 —And yet what wonder at my sisters' crime?
 So hath Trade withered up Love's sinewy prime,
 Men love not women as in olden time.
 Ah, not in these cold merchantable days
 Deem men their life an opal gray, where plays
 The one red Sweet of gracious ladies'-praise.
 Now, comes a suitor with sharp prying eye—
 Says, Here, you Lady, if you'll sell, I'll buy:
Come, heart for heart—a trade? What! weeping?
why?
 Shame on such wooers' dapper mercery! 240
 I would my lover kneeling at my feet
 In humble manliness should cry, O sweet!
I know not if thy heart my heart will greet:
I ask not if thy love my love can meet:
Whate'er thy worshipful soft tongue shall say,
I'll kiss thine answer, be it yea or nay:

*I do but know I love thee, and I pray
 To be thy knight until my dying day.*
 Woe him that cunning trades in hearts contrives!
 Base love good women to base loving drives.
 If men loved larger, larger were our lives; 251
 And wooed they nobler, won they nobler wives."

There thrust the bold straightforward horn
 To battle for that lady lorn,
 With heartsome voice of mellow scorn,
 Like any knight in knighthood's morn.
 "Now comfort thee," said he,
 "Fair Lady.
 For God shall right thy grievous wrong,
 And man shall sing thee a true-love song,
 Voiced in act his whole life long, 261
 Yea, all thy sweet life long,
 Fair Lady.
 Where's he that craftily hath said,
 The day of chivalry is dead?
 I'll prove that lie upon his head,
 Or I will die instead,
 Fair Lady.
 Is Honor gone into his grave?
 Hath Faith become a caitiff knave, 270
 And Selfhood turned into a slave
 To work in Mammon's cave,
 Fair Lady?
 Will Truth's long blade ne'er gleam again?
 Hath Giant Trade in dungeons gleam
 All great contempts of mean-got gain
 And hates of inward stain,
 Fair Lady?
 For aye shall name and fame be sold,
 And place be hugged for the sake of
 gold,
 And smirch-robed Justice feebly scold 281
 At Crime all money-bold,
 Fair Lady?
 Shall self-wrapt husbands aye forget
 Kiss-pardons for the daily fret
 Wherewith sweet wifely eyes are wet—
 Blind to lips kiss-wise set—
 Fair Lady?
 Shall lovers higgie, heart for heart,
 Till wooing grows a trading mart 290
 Where much for little, and all for part,
 Make love a cheapening art,
 Fair Lady?"

Shall woman scorch for a single sin
 That her betrayer may revel in,
 And she be burnt, and he but grin
     When that the flames begin,
         Fair Lady?
 Shall ne'er prevail the woman's plea,
We maids would far, far whiter be 300
If that our eyes might sometimes see
     Men maids in purity,
         Fair Lady?
 Shall Trade aye salve his conscience-aches
 With jibes at Chivalry's old mistakes—
 The wars that o'erhot knighthood makes
     For Christ's and ladies' sakes,
         Fair Lady?
 Now by each knight that e'er hath prayed
 To fight like a man and love like a maid, 310
 Since Pembroke's life, as Pembroke's blade,
     I' the scabbard, death, was laid,
         Fair Lady,
 I dare avouch my faith is bright
 That God doth right and God hath might.
 Nor time hath changed His hair to white,
     Nor His dear love to spite,
         Fair Lady.
 I doubt no doubts: I strive, and shrive my clay,
 And fight my fight in the patient modern way 320
 For true love and for thee! ah me! and pray
     To be thy knight until my dying day,
         Fair Lady."
 Made end that nightly horn, and spurred away
 Into the thick of the melodious fray.

And then the hautboy played and smiled,
 And sang like any large-eyed child,
 Cool-hearted and all undefiled.
     "Huge Trade!" he said,
 "Would thou wouldst lift me on thy head
 And run where'er my finger led! 331
 Once said a Man—and wise was He—
Never shalt thou the heavens see,
Save as a little child thou be."
 Then o'er sea-lashings of commingling tunes
 The ancient wise bassoons,
     Like weird
     Gray-beard
 Old harpers sitting on the high sea-dunes,
     Chanted runes: 340

"Bright-waved gain, gray-waved loss,
 The sea of all doth lash and toss,
 One wave forward and one across:
 But now 'twas trough, now 'tis crest,
 And worst doth foam and flash to best,
     And curst to blest.

"Life! Life! thou sea-fugue, writ from east to west,
     Love, Love alone can pore
     On thy dissolving score
     Of harsh half-phrasings, 350
         Blotted ere writ,
     And double erasings
         Of chords most fit.

Yea, Love, sole music-master blest,
 May read thy weltering palimpsest.
 To follow Time's dying melodies through,
 And never to lose the old in the new,
 And ever to solve the discords true—
     Love alone can do.
 And ever Love hears the poor-folks' crying, 360
 And ever Love hears the women's sighing,
 And ever sweet knighthood's death-defying,
 And ever wise childhood's deep implying,
 But never a trader's glozing and lying.

"And yet shall Love himself be heard,
 Though long deferred, though long deferred:
 O'er the modern waste a dove hath whirred:
 Music is Love in search of a word."

1875

FROM THE FLATS

WHAT heartache—ne'er a hill!
 Inexorable, vapid, vague and chill
 The drear sand-levels drain my spirit low.
 With one poor word they tell me all they know;
 Whereat their stupid tongues, to ease my pain,
 Do drawl it o'er again and o'er again.
 They hurt my heart with griefs I cannot name:
     Always the same, the same.

Nature hath no surprise,
 No ambuscade of beauty 'gainst mine eyes 10
 From brake or lurking dell or deep defile;
 No humors, frolic forms—this mile, that mile;

No rich reserves or happy-valley hopes
 Beyond the bend of roads, the distant slopes.
 Her fancy fails, her wild is all run tame:
 Ever the same, the same.

Oh might I through these tears
 But glimpse some hill my Georgia high uprears,
 Where white the quartz and pink the pebble shine,
 The hickory heavenward strives, the musca-dine 20
 Swings o'er the slope, the oak's far-falling shade
 Darkens the dogwood in the bottom-glade,
 And down the hollow from a ferny nook
 Bright leaps a living brook!

EVENING SONG

Look off, dear Love, across the sallow sands,
 And mark yon meeting of the sun and sea,
 How long they kiss in sight of all the lands.
 Ah! longer, longer, we.

Now in the sea's red vintage melts the sun,
 As Egypt's pearl dissolved in rosy wine,
 And Cleopatra night drinks all. 'Tis done,
 Love, lay thine hand in mine.

Come forth, sweet stars, and comfort heaven's heart;
 Glimmer, ye waves, round else-unlighted
 sands. 10

O night! divorce our sun and sky apart
 Never our lips, our hands.

THE STIRRUP-CUP

This poem was written in Florida, where Lanier had gone for his health. A stirrup-cup is a drink taken by a rider before his departure; hence a farewell or parting cup.

DEATH, thou'rt a cordial old and rare:
 Look how compounded, with what care!
 Time got his wrinkles reaping thee
 Sweet herbs from all antiquity.

David to thy distilling went,
 Keats and Gotama excellent,
 Omar Khayyám, and Chaucer bright,
 And Shakespere for a king-delight.

Then, Time, let not a drop be spilt:
 Hand me the cup whene'er thou wilt; 10
 'Tis thy rich stirrup-cup to me;
 I'll drink it down right smilingly.

THE REVENGE OF HAMISH

Lanier's most ambitious narrative poem. It is told with dramatic intensity and effectiveness. Professor Morgan Callaway, Jr., pointed out sources for the poem. One is an inserted tale, nearly identical in incident, in the third chapter of William Black's McLeod of Dare. There is much greater indebtedness, however, to Charles Mackay's dramatic ballad in quatrain form, "Maclaime's Child, a Legend of Lochbuy-Mull," included in his Egeria and Other Poems (1850). Lanier's Hamish corresponds to Mackay's Evan.

It was three slim does and a ten-tined buck
 in the bracken lay;
 And all of a sudden the sinister smell of a man,
 Awaft on a wind-shift, wavered and ran Down the hill-side, and sifted along through the bracken and passed that way.

Then Nan got a-tremble at nostril; she was the daintiest doe;
 In the print of her velvet flank on the velvet fern
 She reared, and rounded her ears in turn.
 Then the buck leaped up, and his head as a king's to a crown did go

Full high in a breeze, and he stood as if Death had the form of a deer;
 And the two slim does long lazily stretching arose, 10
 For their day-dream slower came to a close,
 Till they woke and were still, breath-bound with waiting and wonder and fear.

Then Alan the huntsman sprang over the hillock, the hounds shot by,
 The does and the ten-tined buck made a marvelous bound,
 The hounds swept after with never a sound,
 But Alan loud winded his horn in sign that the quarry was nigh.

For at dawn of that day proud Maclean of Lochbuy to the hunt had waxed wild,
And he cursed at old Alan till Alan fared off with the hounds

For to drive him the deer to the lower glen-grounds:

"I will kill a red deer," quoth Maclean, "in the sight of the wife and the child." 20

So gayly he paced with the wife and the child to his chosen stand;

But he hurried tall Hamish the henchman ahead: "Go turn,"—

Cried Maclean—"if the deer seek to cross to the burn,

Do thou turn them to me: nor fail, lest thy back be red as thy hand!"

Now hard-fortuned Hamish, half blown of his breath with the height of the hill,

Was white in the face when the ten-tined buck and the does

Drew leaping to burn-ward; huskily rose
His shouts, and his nether lip twitched, and his legs were o'er-weak for his will.

So the deer darted lightly by Hamish and bounded away to the burn.

But Maclean never bating his watch tarried waiting below. 30

Still Hamish hung heavy with fear for to go

All the space of an hour; then he went, and his face was greenish and stern,

And his eye sat back in the socket, and shrunken the eyeballs shone,

As withdrawn from a vision of deeds it were shame to see.

"Now, now, grim henchman, what is't with thee?"

Brake Maclean, and his wrath rose red as a beacon the wind hath upblown.

"Three does and a ten-tined buck made out,"
spoke Hamish, full mild,

"And I ran for to turn, but my breath it was blown, and they passed;

I was weak, for ye called ere I broke me
my fast."

Cried Maclean: "Now a ten-tined buck in the sight of the wife and the child 40

I had killed if the gluttonous kern had not wrought me a snail's own wrong!"

Then he sounded, and down came kinsmen and clansmen all:

"Ten blows, for ten tine, on his back let fall,

And reckon no stroke if the blood follow not at the bite of the thong!"

So Hamish made bare, and took him his strokes; at the last he smiled.

"Now I'll to the burn," quoth Maclean,
"for it still may be

If a slimmer-paunched henchman will hurry with me,

I shall kill me the ten-tined buck for a gift to the wife and the child!"

Then the clansmen departed, by this path and that; and over the hill

Sped Maclean with an outward wrath for an inward shame; 50

And that place of the lashing full quiet became;

And the wife and the child stood sad; and bloody-backed Hamish sat still.

But look! red Hamish has risen; quick about and about turns he.

"There is none betwixt me and the cragtop!" he screams under breath.

Then, livid as Lazarus lately from death,
He snatches the child from the mother, and climbers the crag toward the sea.

Now the mother drops breath; she is dumb,
and her heart goes dead for a space,

Till the motherhood, mistress of death,
shrieks, shrieks through the glen,

And that place of the lashing is live with men,

And Maclean, and the gillie that told him, dash up in a desperate race. 60

Not a breath's time for asking; an eye-glance reveals all the tale untold.

They follow mad Hamish afar up the crag toward the sea,

And the lady cries: "Clansmen, run for a fee!—

Yon castle and lands to the two first hands that shall hook him and hold Fast Hamish back from the brink!"—and ever she flies up the steep,

And the clansmen pant, and they sweat,
and they jostle and strain.

But, mother, 'tis vain; but, father, 'tis vain;
Stern Hamish stands bold on the brink, and dangles the child o'er the deep.

Now a faintness falls on the men that run, and they all stand still.

And the wife prays Hamish as if he were
God, on her knees, 70

Crying: "Hamish! O Hamish! but please, but please

For to spare him!" and Hamish still dangles
the child, with a wavering will.

On a sudden he turns; with a sea-hawk scream, and a gibe, and a song,

Cries: "So; I will spare ye the child if, in sight of ye all,

Ten blows on Maclean's bare back shall fall,
And ye reckon no stroke if the blood follow not at the bite of the thong!"

Then Maclean he set hardly his tooth to his lip that his tooth was red,

Breathed short for a space, said: "Nay, but it never shall be!

Let me hurl off the damnable hound in the sea!"

But the wife: "Can Hamish go fish us the child from the sea, if dead? 80

Say yea!—Let them lash me, Hamish?"— "Nay!"—"Husband, the lashing will
heal;

But, oh, who will heal me the bonny sweet bairn in his grave?

Could ye cure me my heart with the death of a knave?

Quick! Love! I will bare thee—so—kneel!"
Then Maclean 'gan slowly to kneel

With never a word, till presently downward
he jerked to the earth.

Then the henchman—he that smote Hamish
—would tremble and lag;

"Strike, hard!" quoth Hamish, full stern,
from the crag;

Then he struck him, and "One!" sang Hamish, and danced with the child in his mirth.

And no man spake beside Hamish; he counted
each stroke with a song.

When the last stroke fell, then he moved him a pace down the height, 90

And he held forth the child in the heart-aching sight

Of the mother, and looked all pitiful grave,
as repenting a wrong.

And there as the motherly arms stretched out with the thanksgiving prayer—

And there as the mother crept up with a fearful swift pace,

Till her finger nigh felt of the bairnie's face—

In a flash fierce Hamish turned round and lifted the child in the air,

And sprang with the child in his arms from the horrible height in the sea,

Shrill screeching, "Revenge!" in the windrush; and pallid Maclean,

Age-feeble with anger and impotent pain,
Crawled up on the crag, and lay flat, and locked hold of dead roots of a tree—

And gazed hungrily o'er, and the blood from his back drip-dripped in the brine, 101

And a sea-hawk flung down a skeleton fish
as he flew,

And the mother stared white on the waste
of blue,

And the wind drove a cloud to seaward, and the sun began to shine.

SONG OF THE CHATTAHOOCHEE

The best known of Lanier's poems. Its successful onomatopœia, or echoism, recalls Tennyson's "The Brook" of more than twenty years before (1855). The Chattahoochee passes through Habersham and Hall counties of Georgia. The second stanza is notable for its ingenious effects of rhyme, meter, changing length of line, alliteration, assonance, and skillful use of vowels and liquids and of stop consonants. The last stanza, stressing the River's response to the call of duty, shows the poem to be one of conscience and purpose.

OUT of the hills of Habersham,

Down the valleys of Hall,

I hurry amain to reach the plain,

Run the rapid and leap the fall,

Split at the rock and together again,
 Accept my bed, or narrow or wide,
 And flee from folly on every side
 With a lover's pain to attain the plain
     Far from the hills of Habersham,
     Far from the valleys of Hall.                     10

    All down the hills of Habersham,
 All through the valleys of Hall,
 The rushes cried Abide, abide,
 The wilful water weeds held me thrall,
 The laving laurel turned my tide,
 The ferns and the fondling grass said Stay,
 The dewberry dipped for to work delay,
 And the little reeds sighed Abide, abide,
     Here in the hills of Habersham,
     Here in the valleys of Hall.                     20

    High o'er the hills of Habersham,
 Veiling the valleys of Hall,
 The hickory told me manifold
 Fair tales of shade, the poplar tall
 Wrought me her shadowy self to hold,
 The chestnut, the oak, the walnut, the pine,
 Overleaning, with flickering meaning and sign,
 Said, Pass not, so cold, these manifold
     Deep shades of the hills of Habersham,
     These glades in the valleys of Hall.             30

    And oft in the hills of Habersham,
 And oft in the valleys of Hall,
 The white quartz shone, and the smooth brook-stone
 Did bar me of passage with friendly brawl,
 And many a luminous jewel lone —Crystals clear or a-cloud with mist,
 Ruby, garnet, and amethyst—
 Made lures with the lights of streaming stone
     In the clefts of the hills of Habersham,
     In the beds of the valleys of Hall.             40

    But oh, not the hills of Habersham,
 And oh, not the valleys of Hall
 Avail: I am fain for to water the plain.
 Downward the voices of Duty call—
 Downward, to toil and be mixed with the main,
 The dry fields burn, and the mills are to turn,
 And a myriad flowers mortally yearn,
 And the lordly main from beyond the plain
     Calls o'er the hills of Habersham,
     Calls through the valleys of Hall.             50

THE MARSHES OF GLYNN

The theme is the influence of the marshes on the spirit. Lanier's overwrought feeling for trees appears in the first fifty lines, celebrating the live-oak woods. Towards sunset he leaves their "green colonnades" for the marshes, and from these he derives a sense of freedom and faith.

GLOOMS of the live-oaks, beautiful-braided and woven
 With intricate shades of the vines that myriad-cloven
 Clamber the forks of the multiform boughs,—
     Emerald twilights,— Virginal shy lights,
 Wrought of the leaves to allure to the whisper of vows,
 When lovers pace timidly down through the green colonnades
 Of the dim sweet woods, of the dear dark woods,
     Of the heavenly woods and glades,
 That run to the radiant marginal sand-beach
     within                     10
     The wide sea-marshes of Glynn;—
 Beautiful glooms, soft dusks in the noon-day fire,—
 Wildwood privacies, closets of lone desire,
 Chamber from chamber parted with wavering
     arras of leaves,—
 Cells for the passionate pleasure of prayer to the soul that grieves,
 Pure with a sense of the passing of saints
     through the wood,
 Cool for the dutiful weighing of ill with good;—
 O braided dusks of the oak and woven shades of the vine,
 While the riotous noon-day sun of the June-day long did shine
 Ye held me fast in your heart and I held you fast in mine;                     20
 But now when the moon is no more, and riot is rest,
 And the sun is a-wait at the ponderous gate
     of the West,
 And the slant yellow beam down the wood-aisle doth seem Like a lane into heaven that leads from a dream,—

Ay, now, when my soul all day hath drunken the soul of the oak,
 And my heart is at ease from men, and the wearisome sound of the stroke
 Of the scythe of time and the trowel of trade is low,
 And belief overmasters doubt, and I know that I know,
 And my spirit is grown to a lordly great compass
 within,
 That the length and the breadth and the sweep
 of the marshes of Glynn 30
 Will work me no fear like the fear they have wrought me of yore
 When length was fatigue, and when breadth was but bitterness sore,
 And when terror and shrinking and dreary
 unnamable pain
 Drew over me out of the merciless miles of the plain,—
 Oh, now, unafraid, I am fain to face
 The vast sweet visage of space.
 To the edge of the wood I am drawn, I am drawn,
 Where the gray beach glimmering runs, as a belt of the dawn,
     For a mete and a mark
     To the forest-dark:— 40
     So:
 Affable live-oak, leaning low,—
 Thus—with your favor—soft, with a reverent
 hand,
 (Not lightly touching your person, Lord of the land!)
 Bending your beauty aside, with a step I stand
 On the firm-packed sand,
     Free
 By a world of marsh that borders a world of
 sea.
 Sinuous southward and sinuous northward
 the shimmering band
 Of the sand-beach fastens the fringe of the marsh to the folds of the land. 50 Inward and outward to northward and southward the beach-lines linger and curl
 As a silver-wrought garment that clings to and follows the firm sweet limbs of a girl.

Vanishing, swerving, evermore curving again
 into sight,
 Softly the sand-beach wavers away to a dim gray looping of light.
 And what if behind me to westward the wall of the woods stands high?
 The world lies east: how ample, the marsh and the sea and the sky!
 A league and a league of marsh-grass, waist-
 high, broad in the blade,
 Green, and all of a height, and unflecked with a light or a shade,
 Stretch leisurely off, in a pleasant plain,
 To the terminal blue of the main. 60
 Oh, what is abroad in the marsh and the terminal sea?
 Somehow my soul seems suddenly free
 From the weighing of fate and the sad discussion of sin,
 By the length and the breadth and the sweep
 of the marshes of Glynn.
 Ye marshes, how candid and simple and nothing-withholding and free
 Ye publish yourselves to the sky and offer yourselves to the sea!
 Tolerant plains, that suffer the sea and the rains and the sun,
 Ye spread and span like the catholic man who hath mightily won God out of knowledge and good out of infinite pain
 And sight out of blindness and purity out of a stain. 70
 As the marsh-hen secretly builds on the watery sod,
 Behold I will build me a nest on the greatness
 of God:
 I will fly in the greatness of God as the marsh-hen flies
 In the freedom that fills all the space 'twixt
 the marsh and the skies:
 By so many roots as the marsh-grass sends in the sod
 I will heartily lay me a-hold on the greatness
 of God:
 Oh, like to the greatness of God is the greatness within
 The range of the marshes, the liberal marshes of Glynn.

And the sea lends large, as the marsh: lo, out of his plenty the sea

Pours fast: full soon the time of the flood-tide must be: 80

Look how the grace of the sea doth go
About and about through the intricate channels that flow

Here and there,

Everywhere,

Till his waters have flooded the uttermost creeks and the low-lying lanes,

And the marsh is meshed with a million veins,
That like as with rosy and silvery essences
flow

In the rose-and-silver evening glow.

Farewell, my lord Sun!

The creeks overflow: a thousand rivulets run 90

'Twi'x the roots of the sod; the blades of the marsh-grass stir;

Passeth a hurrying sound of wings that westward whir;

Passeth, and all is still; and the currents cease
to run;

And the sea and the marsh are one.

How still the plains of the waters be!

The tide is in his ecstasy.

The tide is at his highest height:

And it is night.

And now from the Vast of the Lord will the waters of sleep

Roll in on the souls of men, 100

But who will reveal to our waking ken

The forms that swim and the shapes that creep

Under the waters of sleep?

And I would I could know what swimmeth below when the tide comes in

On the length and the breadth of the marvelous marshes of Glynn.

A BALLAD OF TREES AND THE MASTER

INTO the woods my Master went,
Clean forspent, forspent.
Into the woods my Master came,
Forspent with love and shame.
But the olives they were not blind to Him,
The little gray leaves were kind to Him:
The thorn-tree had a mind to Him
When into the woods he came.

Out of the woods my Master went,
And He was well content. 10

Out of the woods my Master came,
Content with death and shame.

When Death and Shame would woo Him
last,

From under the trees they drew Him last:

'Twas on a tree they slew Him—last

When out of the woods he came.

MARSH SONG—AT SUNSET

OVER the monstrous shambling sea,

Over the Caliban sea,

Bright Ariel-cloud, thou lingerest:

Oh wait, oh wait, in the warm red West,—

Thy Prospero I'll be.

Over the humped and fishy sea,

Over the Caliban sea

O cloud in the West, like a thought in the heart

Of pardon, loose thy wing, and start,

And do a grace for me. 10

Over the huge and huddling sea,

Over the Caliban sea

Bring hither my brother Antonio,—

Man,—

My injurer: night breaks the ban:

Brother, I pardon thee.

1830 ~ Emily Dickinson ~ 1886

EMILY DICKINSON, the chief woman poet of America, was born in Amherst, Massachusetts, December 10, 1830. The belated publication of her poems—until 1914 less than half of her work was available to the public—has tended to obscure the facts that she was sixteen when Emerson's first volume of poems was published; that her poetry was written during the same period with Longfellow's Tales of a Wayside Inn, Whittier's Snow-Bound, Lowell's Commemoration Ode, Holmes's Breakfast-Table series, and Whitman's successive editions of Leaves of Grass; and that all these writers except Longfellow survived her. She was thus a slightly younger contemporary of these men, and any estimate of nineteenth-century New England literature must take her and her work into consideration.

Her geographical background was the same Massachusetts county of Hampshire in which Bryant had spent his youth and young manhood; and her family background was colored by a Calvinism somewhat less liberal and more genteel than his. If her father, the Honorable Edward Dickinson, treasurer of Amherst College and once Member of Congress, dominated the household with his austere dignity, Emily was clearly its chief ornament. As a girl she was rather vivacious and not averse to social life, with talents which early aroused the interest and encouragement of her teacher at Amherst Academy and other young men friends. The early deaths of two of these in 1851 intensified in her a sense of tragedy in life and a preoccupation with the subject of death that recur throughout her work. After a year at the rather severely religious South Hadley Female Seminary, near by, she spent the spring of 1854 with her father in Washington. On a visit to Philadelphia at this time she met a young Presbyterian minister, the Reverend Charles Wadsworth, for whom she conceived a devoted affection which according to her closest contemporaries was mutual and which was to be a dominating motive in much of her poetry. He probably called on her at least twice at Amherst but in 1862 removed with his family to remote California. The general trend of her emotional experience seems to be reflected in the concluding series of verses in the volume of Further Poems (1929). The remainder of her life was spent in increasing seclusion at her home in Amherst, with the exception of a few months in Boston for treatments for her eyes. During the latter years, shadowed by the deaths of close relatives and friends and the long illness of her mother, she kept herself to her house and garden, but maintained a correspondence with neighbors and young kinsfolk by little gifts of flowers or preserves, accompanied by verses. Though a dozen or so of her poems have been identified as written before 1860, the great bulk of her work belongs to the 1860's. Some of her verses were scribbled as notes for relatives and friends, but no such casual origin can account for those which reflect most poignantly her mind and experiences. Though her life was outwardly devoid of exciting incident, it is clear that in the comradeship of her flowers, the day's weather, and her round of household duties, she was constantly encountering adventures which filled her moments with wonder, delight, or a sense of tragedy, reflected in her verses. "If I feel physically as if the top of my head were taken off," she wrote, "I know this is poetry." This emotional intensity, perhaps, is responsible for the fact that only three of her poems were printed, without her consent or knowledge, during her lifetime. For understanding and criticism as a poet, she turned to her brother's wife, Susan Gilbert Dickinson, to whom her verses were usually sent as soon as written; to her girlhood friend Helen Hunt Jackson; and to three appreciative critics, Samuel Bowles of the Springfield Republican, Josiah G. Holland, poet and novelist, and Colonel Thomas Wentworth Higginson, whose advice and judgment she courted and disregarded. Her letters to these and other friends are a delightful compound of quizzical whimsey, hyperbole, and self-revelation, unreliable for factual biography but invaluable for an understanding of her personality. She was a semi-invalid from 1884 to her death, May 16, 1886.

Her literary reputation has been a posthumous one, a circumstance which has produced the strange impression that her own time neglected or failed to appreciate her verse. As a matter of fact the first fragmentary selection of her poetry, published in 1890, called for six reprintings and for two further selections in 1891 and 1896. These, however, and a volume of her Letters, edited by Mabel Loomis Todd, in 1894, were too slight a basis for permanent fame, and by 1912 the Forum could refer to her as "a forgotten poet." The release of a large body of new poems as The Single Hound in 1914, at the height of the "New Poetry" movement, followed by the Further Poems (1929) and Unpublished Poems (1936), gave to our generation the first opportunity to know her full output. In the meantime, also, her niece, Martha Dickinson Bianchi, through her biographical works named below, and especially the more than one hundred and fifty additional letters and notes made available in Emily Dickinson Face to Face (1932), has presented an adequate basis for study and appreciation.

The chief literary influences upon her seem to have been those of Emerson, Shakespeare, and Robert and Elizabeth Browning. In the lives and novels of the Brontë sisters she also felt certain parallels to her own experiences and thoughts. Emerson she resembles in ecstatic love of nature, electric sharpness of phrase, effective use of homely metaphor, and oracular brevity. Like Browning's, her thinking leaps from idea to idea—

. . . I only said the syntax,
And left the verb and the pronoun out,

—leaving slow readers perplexedly fumbling for omitted connections. Essentially her own, however, are her whimsical, almost perverse play of fancy and humor, the inevitableness of her descriptive terms—e.g., “the distance on the look of death,”—the feminineness of her point of view, her jestingly reverent intimacy with God and the universe, and the poignancy, intensified by innate reserve, of her personal feelings.

Certain critics who have not understood the technique which she consciously or unconsciously evolved have been annoyed by her “carelessness of rhyme” and “lapses of grammar.” With Emily Dickinson, rhyming is the gesture of a magnanimous spirit acknowledging an indebtedness which she has no intention of actually paying. What she found in Emerson as an occasional impatience or fault of ear became with her often an obvious technique of eye-rhyme or assonance, as in “I Like to See It Lap the Miles,” whose eight “rhymes” are up-step, peer-pare, while-hill, and star-door—not one of them a genuine rhyme. No allowance for fault or carelessness can account for such totality of irregularity. Moreover, easily nine-tenths of her supposed lapses of grammar are to be accounted for by a stenographic terseness of expression which eliminates customary connectives and suffixes, as in her poem about a secret,

Better of it
Continual be afraid
Than it and whom
You told it to, beside.

(note the carefully grammatical accuracy of whom); and by a habitual subjunctive or optative use of the verb in oblique or concessive senses no longer common in our speech. Thus in her self-revealing quatrain

Publication is the auction
Of the mind of man,
Poverty be justifying
For so foul a thing,

the sensitive reader will naturally expand the third line to the full interpretation which a Henry James might express as “Let the pressure of poverty, to be sure, in some instances be allowed as a sort of justification.”

Such preliminary explanations are perhaps necessary to the appreciation of a poet the full wealth of whose thought is not to be gained by a superficial reading. Let the reader, however, remember that, as she herself wrote,

The thought beneath so slight a film
Is more distinctly seen,—
As laces just reveal the surge
Or mists the Apennine.

All the successive editions of Miss Dickinson's published poems are included in The Collected Poems of Emily Dickinson (1937), edited by the poet's niece, Martha Dickinson Bianchi, and Alfred Leete Hampson; six "Unfinished Poems" were printed in the New England Quarterly, IV, 217-220. The letters may best be studied in Martha Dickinson Bianchi's Emily Dickinson Face to Face, with a Foreword by Alfred Leete Hampson (1932), and her Life and Letters of Emily Dickinson (new revised and expanded edition, in preparation); see also Mabel Loomis Todd's Letters of Emily Dickinson (revised edition, 1931). Biographical studies include Martha Dickinson Bianchi's indispensable Life and Letters of Emily Dickinson (1924), Emily Dickinson Face to Face (1932), and preface to The Single Hound (1914); Alfred Leete Hampson's introduction to the Collected Poems (1937); Josephine Pollitt's Emily Dickinson: The Human Background of Her Poetry; Genevieve Taggard's The Life and Mind of Emily Dickinson; George F. Whicher's This Was a Poet (1938); and MacGregor Jenkins's Emily Dickinson, Friend and Neighbor (revised edition, 1939, with Introductory Note by Alfred Leete Hampson). Separate bibliographies are those of Alfred Leete Hampson (1930) and G. F. Whicher (revised edition, 1931), both entitled Emily Dickinson: a Bibliography. Helpful brief articles of biography or criticism are Conrad Aiken, preface to Selected Poems of Emily Dickinson (1924); G. W. Allen, American Prosody (1935), 307-320; P. H. SUCCESS is counted sweetest

To comprehend a nectar
Requires sorest need.

Not one of all the purple host
Who took the flag today
Can tell the definition,
So clear, of victory,

As he, defeated, dying,
On whose forbidden ear           10
The distant strains of triumph
Break, agonized and clear.       1866

[The Snake]

A NARROW fellow in the grass
Occasionally rides;
You may have met him,—did you not?
His notice sudden is.

The grass divides as with a comb,
A spotted shaft is seen;
And then it closes at your feet
And opens further on.

He likes a boggy acre,
A floor too cool for corn.       10
Yet when a child, and barefoot,
I more than once, at morn,

Have passed, I thought, a whiplash
Unbraiding in the sun,—
When, stooping to secure it,
It wrinkled, and was gone.

Several of nature's people
 I know, and they know me;
 I feel for them a transport
 Of cordiality; 20

But never met this fellow,
 Attended or alone,
 Without a tighter breathing,
 And zero at the bone. 1878

[Much Madness Is Divinest Sense]<sup>1</sup>

MUCH madness is divinest sense
 To a discerning eye;
 Much sense the starkest madness.
 'Tis the majority
 In this, as all, prevails.
 Assent, and you are sane;
 Demur,—you're straightway dangerous,
 And handled with a chain.

[The Soul Selects Her Own Society]

THE soul selects her own society,
 Then shuts the door;
 On her divine majority
 Obtrude no more.
 Unmoved, she notes the chariot's pausing
 At her low gate;
 Unmoved, an emperor is kneeling
 Upon her mat.
 I've known her from an ample nation
 Choose one; 10
 Then close the valves of her attention
 Like stone.

[To Fight Aloud Is Very Brave]

To fight aloud is very brave,
 But gallanter, I know,
 Who charge within the bosom,
 The cavalry of woe.
 Who win, and nations do not see,
 Who fall, and none observe,
 Whose dying eyes no country
 Regards with patriot love.

<sup>1</sup> This and all the following poems from Emily Dickinson are reprinted from The Poems of Emily Dickinson, Centenary Edition (1930), edited by Martha Dickinson Bianchi and Alfred Leete Hampson, by permission of Little, Brown & Company, publishers.

We trust, in plumed procession,
 For such the angels go, 10
 Rank after rank, with even feet
 And uniforms of snow.

[The Show Is Not the Show]

THE show is not the show,
 But they that go.
 Menagerie to me
 My neighbor be.
 Fair play—
 Both went to see.

[Inebriate of Air]

I TASTE a liquor never brewed,
 From tankards scooped in pearl;
 Not all the vats upon the Rhine
 Yield such an alcohol!

Inebriate of air am I,
 And debauchee of dew,
 Reeling, through endless summer days,
 From inns of molten blue.

When landlords turn the drunken bee
 Out of the foxglove's door, 10
 When butterflies renounce their drams,
 I shall but drink the more!

Till seraphs swing their snowy hats,
 And saints to windows run,
 To see the little tippler
 Leaning against the sun!

[The Brain]

THE brain within its groove
 Runs evenly and true;
 But let a splinter swerve,
 'Twere easier for you
 To put the water back
 When floods have slit the hills,
 And scooped a turnpike for themselves,
 And blotted out the mills!

[The Locomotive]

I LIKE to see it lap the miles,
 And lick the valleys up,
 And stop to feed itself at tanks;
 And then, prodigious, step

Around a pile of mountains,
And, supercilious, peer
In shanties by the sides of roads;
And then a quarry pare

To fit its sides, and crawl between,
Complaining all the while 10
In horrid, hooting stanza;
Then chase itself down hill

And neigh like Boanerges;<sup>1</sup>
Then, punctual as a star,
Stop—docile and omnipotent—
At its own stable door.

I did not know the ample bread,
'Twas so unlike the crumb 10
The birds and I had often shared
In Nature's dining-room.

The plenty hurt me, 'twas so new,—
Myself felt ill and odd,
As berry of a mountain bush
Transplanted to the road.

Nor was I hungry; so I found
That hunger was a way
Of persons outside windows,
The entering takes away. 20

[A Thought Went Up My Mind Today]

This is Emily Dickinson's characteristic treatment of the same experience that forms the basis for Wordsworth's "Ode on the Intimations of Immortality."

A THOUGHT went up my mind today
That I have had before,
But did not finish,—some way back,
I could not fix the year,

Nor where it went, nor why it came
The second time to me,
Nor definitely what it was,
Have I the art to say.

But somewhere in my soul, I know
I've met the thing before; 10
It just reminded me—'twas all—
And came my way no more.

[Hunger]

I HAD been hungry all the years;
My noon had come, to dine;
I, trembling, drew the table near,
And touched the curious wine.

'Twas this on tables I had seen,
When turning, hungry, lone,
I looked in windows, for the wealth
I could not hope to own.

<sup>1</sup> literally "sons of thunder," a nickname applied by Jesus to two vociferous preachers among his followers

[Just Lost When I Was Saved]

JUST lost when I was saved!
Just felt the world go by!
Just girt me for the onset with eternity,
When breath blew back,
And on the other side
I heard recede the disappointed tide!

Therefore, as one returned, I feel,
Odd secrets of the Line to tell!
Some sailor, skirting foreign shores
Some pale reporter from the awful doors
Before the seal! 11

Next time, to stay!
Next time, the things to see
By ear unheard,
Unscrutinized by eye.

Next time, to tarry,
While the ages steal,—
Slow tramp the centuries,
And the cycles wheel.

[There Is No Frigate Like a Book]

THERE is no frigate like a book
To take us lands away,
Nor any coursers like a page
Of prancing poetry.

This traverse may the poorest take
Without oppress of toll;
How frugal is the chariot
That bears a human soul!

[Self-Reliance]

WE never know how high we are
Till we are called to rise;
And then, if we are true to plan,
Our statures touch the skies.

The heroism we recite
Would be a daily thing,
Did not ourselves the cubits warp
For fear to be a king.

[Disillusioned]

It dropped so low in my regard
I heard it hit the ground,
And go to pieces on the stones
At bottom of my mind;
Yet blamed the fate that fractured, less
Than I reviled myself
For entertaining plated wares
Upon my silver shelf.

[What Soft, Cherubic Creatures]

WHAT soft, cherubic creatures
These gentlewomen are!
One would as soon assault a plush
Or violate a star.

Such dimity convictions,
A horror so refined
Of freckled human nature,
Of Deity ashamed,—

It's such a common glory,
A fisherman's degree!
Redemption, brittle lady,
Be so ashamed of thee.

[To Hear an Oriole Sing]

To hear an oriole sing
May be a common thing,
Or only a divine.

It is not of the bird
Who sings the same, unheard,
As unto crowd.

The fashion of the ear
Attireth that it hear
In dun or fair.

So whether it be rune,
Or whether it be none,
Is of within;

The "tune is in the tree,"
The sceptic showeth me;
"No, sir! In thee!"

[The Hummingbird]

A ROUTE of evanescence
With a revolving wheel;
A resonance of emerald,
A rush of cochineal;
And every blossom on the bush
Adjusts its tumbled head,—
The mail from Tunis, probably,
An easy morning's ride.

[A Bird Came Down the Walk]

A BIRD came down the walk:
He did not know I saw;
He bit an angle-worm in halves
And ate the fellow, raw.

And then he drank a dew
From a convenient grass,
And then hopped sidewise to the wall
To let a beetle pass.

He glanced with rapid eyes
That hurried all abroad,—
They looked like frightened beads, I thought
He stirred his velvet head

Like one in danger; cautious,
I offered him a crumb,
And he unrolled his feathers
And rowed him softer home

Than oars divide the ocean,
Too silver for a seam,
Or butterflies, off banks of noon,
Leap, plashless, as they swim.

[Keeping the Sabbath]

SOME keep the Sabbath going to church;
I keep it staying at home,
With a bobolink for a chorister,
And an orchard for a dome.

Some keep the Sabbath in surplice;
I just wear my wings,
And instead of tolling the bell for church,
Our little sexton sings.

God preaches,—a noted clergyman,—
And the sermon is never long;
So instead of getting to heaven at last,
I'm going all along!

[The Frost]

APPARENTLY with no surprise
To any happy flower,
The frost beheds it at its play
In accidental power.

The blond assassin passes on,
The sun proceeds unmoved
To measure off another day
For an approving God.

[Indian Summer]

THESE are the days when birds come back,
A very few, a bird or two,
To take a backward look.

These are the days when skies put on
The old, old sophistries of June,—
A blue and gold mistake.

Oh, fraud that cannot cheat the bee,
Almost thy plausibility
Induces my belief,

Till ranks of seeds their witness bear,
And softly through the altered air
Hurries a timid leaf!

Oh, sacrament of summer days,
Oh, last communion in the haze,
Permit a child to join,

Thy sacred emblems to partake,
Thy consecrated bread to break,
Taste thine immortal wine!

[The Sky Is Low]

THE sky is low, the clouds are mean,
A travelling flake of snow
Across a barn or through a rut
Debates if it will go.

A narrow wind complains all day
How some one treated him;
Nature, like us, is sometimes caught
Without her diadem.

[To Make a Prairie]

To make a prairie it takes a clover and one bee,—
And revery.
The revery alone will do
If bees are few.

[Elysium Is as Far]

ELYSIUM is as far as to
The very nearest room,
If in that room a friend await Felicity or doom.

What fortitude the soul contains,
That it can so endure
The accent of a coming foot,
The opening of a door!

[Going to Him! Happy Letter!]

“GOING to him! Happy letter! Tell him—
Tell him the page I didn't write;
Tell him I only said the syntax,
And left the verb and the pronoun out.
Tell him just how the fingers hurried,
Then how they waded, slow, slow, slow;
And then you wished you had eyes in your pages,
So you could see what moved them so.

“Tell him it wasn't a practised writer,      9
You guessed, from the way the sentence toiled;
You could hear the bodice tug, behind you,
As if it held but the might of a child;

You almost pitied it, you, it worked so.
Tell him—No, you may quibble there,
For it would split his heart to know it,
And then you and I were silent.

“Tell him night finished before we finished,
And the old clock kept neighing ‘Day!’
And you got sleepy and begged to be ended—
What could it hinder so, to say? <sup>20</sup>
Tell him just how she scaled you, cautious,
But if he ask where you are hid
Until to-morrow,—happy letter!
Gesture, coquette, and shake your head!”

[A Letter Received]

THE way I read a letter's this:
'Tis first I lock the door,
And push it with my fingers next,
For transport it be sure.

And then I go the furthest off
To counteract a knock;
Then draw my little letter forth
And softly pick its lock.

Then, glancing narrow at the wall,
And narrow at the floor, <sup>10</sup>
For firm conviction of a mouse
Not exorcised before,

Peruse how infinite I am
To—no one that you know!
And sigh for lack of heaven,—but not
The heaven the creeds bestow.

[Exultation Is the Going]

EXULTATION is the going
Of an inland soul to sea,—
Past the houses, past the headlands,
Into deep eternity!

Bred as we, among the mountains,
Can the sailor understand
The divine intoxication
Of the first league out from land?

[I Never Saw a Moor]

I NEVER saw a moor,
I never saw the sea;
Yet know I how the heather looks,
And what a wave must be.

I never spoke with God,
Nor visited in heaven;
Yet certain am I of the spot
As if the chart were given.

[The Last Night That She Lived]

THE last night that she lived,
It was a common night,
Except the dying; this to us
Made nature different.

We noticed smallest things,—
Things overlooked before,
By this great light upon our minds
Italicized, as 'twere.

That others could exist
While she must finish quite, <sup>10</sup>
A jealousy for her arose
So nearly infinite.

We waited while she passed;
It was a narrow time,
Too jostled were our souls to speak,
At length the notice came.

She mentioned, and forgot;
Then lightly as a reed
Bent to the water, shivered scarce,
Consented, and was dead. <sup>20</sup>

And we, we placed the hair,
And drew the head erect;
And then an awful leisure was,
Our faith to regulate.

[The Bustle in a House]

THE bustle in a house
The morning-after death
Is solemnest of industries
Enacted upon earth,—

The sweeping up the heart,
And putting love away
We shall not want to use again
Until eternity.

[If I Shouldn't Be Alive]

If I shouldn't be alive
 When the robins come,
 Give the one in red cravat
 A memorial crumb.

If I couldn't thank you,
 Being just asleep,
 You will know I'm trying
 With my granite lip!

[I Heard a Fly Buzz When I Died]

I HEARD a fly buzz when I died;
 The stillness round my form
 Was like the stillness in the air
 Between the heavens of storm.

The eyes beside had wrung them dry,
 And breaths were gathering sure
 For that last onset, when the king
 Be witnessed in his power.

I willed my keepsakes, signed away
 What portion of me I Could make assignable,—and then
 There interposed a fly, 10

With blue, uncertain, stumbling buzz,
 Between the light and me;
 And then the windows failed, and then
 I could not see to see.

[For Charlotte Brontë]

ALL overgrown by cunning moss,
 All interspersed with weed,
 The little cage of "Currer Bell,"
 In quiet Haworth laid.

This bird, observing others,
 When frosts too sharp became,
 Retire to other latitudes,
 Quietly did the same.

But differed in returning;
 Since Yorkshire hills are green, 10
 Yet not in all the nests I meet
 Can nightingale be seen.

Gathered from any wanderings,
 Gethsemane can tell
 Through what transporting anguish
 She reached the asphodel!

Soft fall the sounds of Eden
 Upon her puzzled ear;
 Oh, what an afternoon for heaven,
 When Brontë entered there! 20

[Publication Is the Auction]

This poem gives her reason for not allowing her verses to be printed. See also the letter to T. W. Higginson dated April 20, 1862, below.

PUBLICATION is the auction
 Of the mind of man,
 Poverty be justifying
 For so foul a thing.

Possibly,—but we would rather
 From our garret go
 White unto the White Creator,
 Than invest our snow.

Thought belongs to Him who gave it—
 Then to him who bear 10
 Its corporeal illustration.
 Sell the royal air

In the parcel,—be the merchant
 Of the Heavenly Grace,
 But reduce no human spirit
 To disgrace of price!

[A Secret]

A SECRET told
 Ceases to be a secret then.
 A secret kept—
 That can appal but one.

Better of it
 Continual be afraid
 Than it and whom
 You told it to, beside.

[Revolution]

REVOLUTION is the pod
 Systems rattle from
 When the winds of Will are stirred.
 Excellent is bloom,

But except its russet base,
Every summer be
The entomber of itself.
So of Liberty:

Left inactive on the stalk,
All its purple fled,                   10
Revolution shakes it
For test if it be dead.

[The Tint I Cannot Take Is Best]

THE tint I cannot take is best,
The color too remote
That I could show it in bazaar
A guinea at a sight—

The fine impalpable array
That swaggers on the eye
Like Cleopatra's company
Repeated in the sky—

The moments of dominion
That happen on the Soul                   10
And leave it with a discontent
Too exquisite to tell—

The eager look in the landscapes
As if they just repressed
Some secret that was pushing,
Like chariots, in the breast—

The pleasing of the Summer,
That other prank of snow
That covers mystery with tulle
For fear the squirrels know—                   20

Their grasplless manners mock us,
Until the cheated eye
Shuts arrogantly in the grave,
Another way to see.

[I Took One Draught of Life]

The remaining poems, mostly taken from Further Poems (1929), form a unit, dealing with the central and motivating experience in Emily Dickinson's life.

I TOOK one draught of life,
I'll tell you what I paid,
Precisely an existence—
The market price, they said.

They weighed me, dust by dust,
They balanced film with film,
Then handed me my being's worth—
A single dram of Heaven.

[So the Eyes Accost and Sunder]

So the eyes accost and sunder
In an audience,
Stamped in instances forever,
So may countenance
Entertain without addressing Countenance of One
In a neighboring horizon,
Gone as soon as known.

[It Was a Quiet Way]

It was a quiet way
He asked if I was his.
I made no answer of the tongue
But answer of the eyes.

And then he bore me high
Before this mortal noise,
With swiftness as of chariots
And distance as of wheels.

The world did drop away
As countries from the feet                   10
Of him that leaneth in the balloon
Upon an ether street.

The gulf behind was not—
The continents were new.
Eternity it was—before
Eternity was due.

No seasons were to us—
It was not night nor noon,
For sunrise stopped upon the place
And fastened it in dawn.                   20

[I Make His Crescent Fill or Lack]

I MAKE his crescent fill or lack,
His nature is at full
Or quarter—as I signify,
His tides do I control.

He holds superior in the sky
Or gropes at my command
Behind inferior clouds,
Or round a mist's slow colonnade.

But since we hold a mutual disc
And front a mutual day, 10
Which is the despot neither knows—
Nor whose the tyranny.

[Forever at His Side to Walk]

FOREVER at his side to walk,
The smaller of the two,
Brain of his brain, blood of his blood,
Two lives, one Being, now.

Forever of his fate to taste,
If grief, the largest part—
If joy, to put my piece away
For that beloved heart.

All life to know each other—
Whom we can never learn, 10
And by and by a change called "Heaven"—
Rapt neighborhood of men,
Just finding out what puzzled us
Without the lexicon.

[Why Do I Love Thee?]

WHY do I love thee, Sir?
Because—
The wind does not Require the grass
To answer wherefore, when
He pass,
She cannot keep her place.

The lightning never asked
An eye
Wherefore she shut 10
When he was by—
Because he knows
She cannot speak,
And reasons not contained
Of talk
There be—preferred by daintier folk.

[Although I Put Away His Life]

ALTHOUGH I put away his life,
An ornament too grand
For forehead low as mine to wear,
This might have been the hand

That sowed the flowers he preferred,
Or smoothed a homely pain—
Or pushed the pebble from his path,
Or played his chosen tune

On lute the least, the latest,
But just his ear could know 10
That what soe'er delighted it
I never would let go.

The foot to bear his errand,
A little boot I know
Would leap abroad like antelope
With just the grant to do.

His weariest commandment
A sweeter to obey
Than "Hide and Seek," or skip to flutes,
Or all day chase the bee. 20

Your servant, Sir, will weary,
The surgeon will not come,
The world will have its own to do,
The dust will vex your fame.

The cold will force your tightest door
Some February day,
But say my apron bring the sticks
To make your cottage gay,

That I may take that promise
To Paradise with me— 30
To teach the angels avarice
Your kiss taught to me.

[So Well That I Can Live Without]

So well that I can live without—
I love Thee;
Then how well is that?
As well as Jesus?
Prove it me
That He loved men
As I love Thee.

[Bereaved]

If he were living—dare I ask?
 And how if he were dead?
 And so around the words I went,
 Of meeting them afraid.

I hinted changes, lapse of time;
 The surfaces of years
 I touched with caution, lest they slit
 And show me to my fears;

Reverted to adjoining lives,
 Adroitly turning out 10
 Wherever I suspected graves—
 'Twas prouder, I thought.

And He—I rushed with sudden force
 In face of the suspense—
 "Was buried"—"Buried!" He!
 My life just holds the trench.

[After Great Pain a Formal Feeling Comes]

AFTER great pain a formal feeling comes—
 The nerves sit ceremonious like tombs;
 The stiff Heart questions—was it He that bore?
 And yesterday—or centuries before?

The feet mechanical
 Go round a wooden way
 Of ground or air or Ought, regardless grown,
 A quartz contentment like a stone.

This is the hour of lead
 Remembered if outlived, 10
 As freezing persons recollect the snow—
 First chill, then stupor, then the letting go.

[I Got So I Could Hear His Name]

I GOT so I could hear his name
 Without—
 Tremendous gain!—
 That stop-sensation in my soul,
 And thunder in the room.

I got so I could walk across
 That angle in the floor
 Where he turned—so—and I turned how—
 And all our sinew tore.

I got so I could stir the box 10
 In which his letters grew—
 Without that forcing in my breath
 As staples driven through.

Could dimly recollect a Grace—
 I think they called it "God,"
 Renowned to ease extremity
 When formula had failed—

And shape my hands petition's way—
 Tho' ignorant of word
 That Ordination utters— 20
 My business with the cloud.

If any Power behind it be
 Not subject to despair,
 To care in some remoter way
 For so minute affair
 As misery—
Itself too vast for interrupting more,
 Supremest than—
 Superior to—

["Till Death" Is Narrow Loving]

"TILL death" is narrow loving;
 The scantiest heart extant
 Will hold you, till your privilege
 Of finiteness be spent.

But he whose loss procures you
 Such destination that
 Your life, too abject for itself,
 Thenceforward imitate—

Until, resemblance perfect, 10
 Yourself for his pursuit
 Delight of nature abdicate,
 Exhibit love somewhat.

[Savior! I've No One Else to Tell]

SAVIOR! I've no one else to tell
 And so I trouble Thee,
 I am the one forgot Thee so.
 Dost Thou remember me?

Not for myself I came so far,
 That were the little load—
 I brought Thee the imperial heart
 I had not strength to hold—

The heart I carried in my own,
 Till mine too heavy be, 10
 Yet strangest—heavier since it went—
 Is it too large for Thee?

[A Wife at Daybreak I Shall Be]

This poem will repay comparison and contrast in theme and imagery with Browning's "Prospice."

A WIFE at daybreak I shall be;
 Sunrise, hast thou a flag for me?
 At midnight I am yet a maid—
 How short it takes to make it bride!
 Then, Midnight, I have passed from thee
 Unto the East and Victory.

Midnight, "Good night!"
 I hear them call.
 The Angels bustle in the hall,
 Softly my Future climbs the stair, 10
 I fumble at my childhood's prayer—
 So soon to be a child no more!
 Eternity, I'm coming, Sir,—
 Master, I've seen that face before.

[Not What We Did Shall Be the Test]

Not what we did shall be the test
 When act and will are done,
 But what our Lord infers we would—
 Had we diviner been.

LETTERS TO T. W. HIGGINSON

[APRIL 16, 1862]

MR. HIGGINSON,—Are you too deeply occupied to say if my verse is alive? <sup>1</sup>

The mind is so near itself it cannot see distinctly, and I have none to ask.

Should you think it breathed, and had you the leisure to tell me, I should feel quick gratitude. 10

If I make the mistake, that you dared to tell me would give me sincerer honor toward you.

I enclose my name, asking you, if you please, sir, to tell me what is true?

That you will not betray me it is needless to ask, since honor is its own pawn.

[APRIL 26, 1862]

MR. HIGGINSON,—Your kindness claimed 20 earlier gratitude, but I was ill, and write today from my pillow.

Thank you for the surgery; it was not so painful as I supposed. I bring you others, as you ask, though they might not differ. While my thought is undressed, I can make the distinction; but when I put them in the gown, they look alike and numb.

You asked how old I was? I made no verse, but one or two, until this winter, sir.

I had a terror since September, I could tell to none; and so I sing, as the boy does of the burying ground, because I am afraid.

You inquire my books. For poets, I have Keats, and Mr. and Mrs. Browning. For prose, Mr. Ruskin, Sir Thomas Browne, and the Revelations. I went to school, but in your manner of the phrase, had no education. When a little girl, I had a friend who taught me Immortality; but venturing too near, himself, he never returned. Soon after my tutor died, and for several years my lexicon was my only companion. Then I found one more, but he was not contented I be his scholar, so he left the land.

You ask of my companions. Hills, sir, and the sundown, and a dog large as myself, that my father bought me. They are better than beings because they know, but do not tell; and the noise in the pool at noon excels my piano.

I have a brother and sister; my mother does not care for thought, and father, too busy with his briefs to notice what we do. He buys me many books, but begs me not to read them, because he fears they joggle the mind. They are religious, except me, and address an eclipse, every morning, whom they call their "Father."

But I fear my story fatigues you. I would like to learn. Could you tell me how to grow, or is it unconveyed, like melody or witchcraft?

You speak of Mr. Whitman. I never read his book, but was told that it was disgraceful.

I read Miss Prescott's Circumstance, but it followed me in the dark, so I avoided her.

Two editors of journals came to my father's house this winter, and asked me for my mind, and when I asked them "why" they said I was penurious, and they would use it for the world.

I could not weigh myself, myself. My size felt small to me. I read your chapters in the Atlantic, and experienced honor for you. I was sure you would not reject a confiding question.

Is this, sir, what you asked me to tell you?

Your friend,

E. Dickinson

[JULY, 1862]

Could you believe me without? I had no portrait, now, but am small like the wren; and my hair is bold, like the chestnut burr; and my eyes, like the sherry in the glass that the guest leaves. Would this do just as well?

It oftens alarms father. He says death might occur, and he has moulds of all the rest, but has no mould of me; but I noticed the quick 20 wore off those things in a few days, and forestall the dishonor. You will think no caprice of me.

You said "dark." I know the butterfly, and the lizard, and the orchis. Are not those your countrymen?

I am happy to be your scholar, and will deserve the kindness I cannot repay.

If you truly consent, I recite now. Will you tell me my fault, frankly, as to yourself, for I 30 had rather wince than die. Men do not call the surgeon to commend the bone, but to set it, sir, and fracture within is more critical. And for this, preceptor, I shall bring you obedience, the blossom from my garden, and every gratitude I know.

Perhaps you smile at me. I could not stop for that. My business is circumference. An ignorance, not of customs, but if caught with the dawn, or the sunset see me, myself the only kangaroo among the beauty, sir, if you please, it afflicts me, and I thought that instruction would take it away.

Because you have much business, beside the growth of me, you will appoint, yourself, how often I shall come without your inconvenience.

And if at any time you regret you received me, or I prove a different fabric to that you supposed, you must banish me.

When I state myself, as the representative of the verse, it does not mean me, but a supposed person.

You are true about the "perfection." Today makes yesterday mean.

You spoke of Pippa Passes. I never heard anybody speak of Pippa Passes before. You see my posture is benighted.

To thank you baffles me. Are you perfectly powerful? Had I a pleasure you had not, I could delight to bring it.

YOUR SCHOLAR

1836 ~ Bret Harte ~ 1902

BRET HARTE is best remembered as the author of stories of the Far West and the Gold Rush era. He broke away from the literature of the Atlantic coast and helped to bring the transition from the legendary material of the stories of Irving and Hawthorne to the more realistic matter to come and to such story writers as O. Henry. A pioneer in "local-color" fiction, he started the "Wild West" vogue which has persisted in cheap popular fiction and in the "westerns" of the films.

Francis Brett Harte (later he signed himself Bret), though writing of California most of his life, was born in 1836 at Albany, New York, of English, Dutch, and Hebrew ancestry. His father tried teaching, lecturing, and translating, but was never prosperous, and died leaving a widow and four children in 1845. He had a large library, however, and the young Harte, described as a studious, precocious boy, had a cultivated background and early literary interests. He read Froissart, Shakespeare, Fielding, Cervantes, Irving, and Dickens, who was his favorite. The family was provided for by relatives for a while, but at the age of thirteen Harte entered a lawyer's office and helped a merchant, so that before he was seventeen he supported himself. In 1853 his mother married, going to Oakland, California, and in 1854 Harte and a sister followed her there. He remained in California from 1854 till 1871, and most of his literary work is based on these years. Much of his earlier life there is obscure. He seems to have drifted into several employments, teaching or tutoring, like his father, perhaps trying placer mining, serving as a clerk in a drug store, and as an express messenger. He set type on the Golden Era of San Francisco, and later wrote articles for that periodical. In 1863 he was given a secretarial post in the branch mint, a position with few duties, which left him time for writing. He next became a contributor to the Californian, established in 1864, and wrote for it an amusing series of parodies of the narratives and the styles of such fiction writers as Cooper, Dickens, Hugo, and Dumas. These he published in 1867 under the title Condensed Novels. In 1868 he became the first editor of the newly established Overland Monthly, and his best stories are associated with this publication. "The Luck of Roaring Camp" was printed in the second issue, "The Outcasts of Poker Flat" in 1869; and these and "Plain Language from Truthful James" ("The Heathen Chine") of 1870 brought him immediate fame. They were not approved by some Californians, who thought they were "likely to discourage immigration" by their reflections on the region and its morals; but they were received with zest in the East. The author was made professor of recent literature at the University of California. The Atlantic Monthly offered him ten thousand dollars for twelve contributions, his output for the coming year. He went east in 1871 and the rest of his work was written on the Atlantic coast or abroad. His later life has little literary significance. He continued to write of California but had exhausted the freshness of his material, and his many later volumes are relatively unimportant. He attempted a novel, Gabriel Conroy (1876), and several dramas, and did much work as a hack writer for magazines. He lived expensively, made debts, and tried lecturing, but he had done his best work. In 1878 he was appointed consul to Crefeld in Rhenish Prussia and went abroad, discouraged, leaving his family in America. Though he continued to send back money, he never returned. He became consul at Glasgow (1880-1885), but was supplanted there by a change in administration. The next years he lived chiefly in London until his death in 1902 of cancer of the throat. He is described as of slender, stylish appearance, unlike the frontiersmen that he painted.

Harte wrote in the days of the vogue of Dickens and in a weak period for American fiction. The Dickens strand in his work is strong. Like the English novelist he blends theatrically human sentiment, pathos, and humor, and he likes to depict human oddities in situations of emotional appeal. He brings together a strange medley of characters often speaking in a dialect of provincialisms, and displays them like a showman, with an eye to drama. In technique he is the finished artist, striving for a unique effect and writing fastidiously. He owes something to Poe and to the French school of story writers. Perhaps most effective in his work is the California background he establishes, with its human diversity, incongruities, and strong contrasts—Spaniards, native Indians, Chinese, miners, and adventurers, good and bad, cultivated and ignorant. He writes of them with realism, yet creates an atmosphere of romance. If fiction depicting the westward movement began with Cooper, it reached its final goal with Harte.

Harte wrote a few short essays on literary figures, none very important. He praised Artemus Ward for the "Americanism" of his type of humor, that is, for its "audacious exaggeration," and he mentioned with approval that its real strength did not lie merely in grotesque spellings. In an essay on "American Humor" he expressed the view that characteristic American humor did not derive from "Sam Slick" or from Lowell's Biglow Papers but arose in the South and West. Mark Twain he termed "the most original humorist that America has yet produced." Of Dickens he said that "no other writer, living or dead, ever transfused fiction with so much vitality." He admired Dickens's "sense of fun," his "wonderful spontaneity," his portrayal of social wrong, and his tenderness in writing of childhood. When, however, he was asked to write an article on "My Favorite Author and His Best Book," he named not Dickens but the elder Alexander Dumas and The Count of Monte Cristo. He stated that "the primary function of the novel is to interest the reader in its story—in the progress of some well-developed plot to a well-defined climax. . . . Monte Cristo is romance, and, as I am told, of a very antiquated type." The main thing, he thought, is for readers to be lifted "temporarily out of their commonplace surroundings and limited horizon by some specious tale of heroism, endeavor, wrongs redressed and faith rewarded." From youth onward romance was his preference.

The standard edition of Harte's works is The Writings of Bret Harte (19 vols., 1896–1903). His Novels and Stories (10 vols.) were published in 1910. There is a one-volume Household Edition of his Poems (1902). Letters of Bret Harte was edited by Geoffrey Bret Harte (1926). Of value also are C. M. Kozlay's Lectures of Bret Harte (1909) and Stories and Poems and Other Uncollected Writings of Bret Harte (1914). Sketches of the Sixties, by Bret Harte and Mark Twain, was published in San Francisco, 1927.

Biographies of Harte include those of T. E. Pemberton (1903), H. W. Boynton (1903), and H. C. Merwin (1911). Noah Brooks wrote of "Bret Harte in California," Century Magazine, LVIII, July, 1899. Of especial importance is Bret Harte, Argonaut and Exile (1931), by G. R.

Stewart, Jr., who also wrote of Harte in DAB, VIII (1932). See also Hamlin Garland, in Roadside Meetings (1930) and in Companions on the Trail (1931).

PLAIN LANGUAGE FROM TRUTHFUL JAMES

(Table Mountain, 1870)

Printed first in September, 1870; popularly known as "The Heathen Chinee." "Truthful James," whose experiences with a Chinese card player are related, was the narrator in Harte's poem "The Society upon the Stanislaus." Curiously, Harte modeled the verse of "Plain Language" on the antiphonal dirge at the end of Swinburne's Atalanta in Calydon. The poem had unparalleled success and circulated everywhere. Harte himself never liked it and could not understand its enthusiastic reception.

WHICH I wish to remark,
And my language is plain,
That for ways that are dark
And for tricks that are vain,
The heathen Chinee is peculiar,
Which the same I would rise to explain.

Ah Sin was his name;
And I shall not deny,
In regard to the same,
What the name might imply; 10
But his smile it was pensive and childlike,
As I frequent remarked to Bill Nye.

It was August the third,
And quite soft was the skies;
Which it might be inferred
That Ah Sin was likewise;
Yet he played it that day upon William
And me in a way I despise.

Which we had a small game,
And Ah Sin took a hand; 20
It was Euchre. The same
He did not understand;
But he smiled as he sat by the table,
With the smile that was childlike and bland.

Yet the cards they were stocked
In a way that I grieve,
And my feelings were shocked
At the state of Nye's sleeve,
Which was stuffed full of aces and bowers,
And the same with intent to deceive. 30

But the hands that were played
By that heathen Chinee,
And the points that he made,
Were quite frightful to see,—
Till at last he put down a right bower,
Which the same Nye had dealt unto me.

Then I looked up at Nye,
And he gazed upon me;
And he rose with a sigh,
And said, "Can this be? 40
We are ruined by Chinese cheap labor,"—
And he went for that heathen Chinee.

In the scene that ensued
I did not take a hand,
But the floor it was strewed
Like the leaves on the strand
With the cards that Ah Sin had been hiding,
In the game "he did not understand."

In his sleeves which were long,
He had twenty-four packs,— 50
Which was coming it strong,
Yet I state but the facts;
And we found on his nails, which were taper,
What is frequent in tapers,—that's wax.

Which is why I remark,
And my language is plain,
That for ways that are dark
And for tricks that are vain,
The heathen Chinee is peculiar,—
Which the same I am free to maintain. 60

HER LETTER

I'm sitting alone by the fire,
 Dressed just as I came from the dance,
 In a robe even you would admire,—
 It cost a cool thousand in France;
 I'm be-diamonded out of all reason,
 My hair is done up in a cue:
 In short, sir, "the belle of the season"
 Is wasting an hour upon you.

A dozen engagements I've broken;
 I left in the midst of a set;                   10
 Likewise a proposal, half spoken,
 That waits—on the stairs—for me yet.
 They say he'll be rich,—when he grows up,—
 And then he adores me indeed;
 And you, sir, are turning your nose up,
 Three thousand miles off as you read.

"And how do I like my position?"
 "And what do I think of New York?"
 "And now, in my higher ambition,
 With whom do I waltz, flirt, or talk?"           20
 "And isn't it nice to have riches,
 And diamonds and silks, and all that?"
 "And aren't they a change to the ditches
 And tunnels of Poverty Flat?"

Well, yes,—if you saw us out driving
 Each day in the Park, four-in-hand,—
 If you saw poor dear mamma contriving
 To look supernaturally grand,—
 If you saw papa's picture, as taken
 By Brady, and tinted at that,—               30
 You'd never suspect he sold bacon
 And flour at Poverty Flat.

And yet, just this moment, when sitting
 In the glare of the grand chandelier,—
 In the bustle and glitter befitting
 The "finest soirée of the year,"
 In the mists of a gaze de Chambéry,
 And the hum of the smallest of talk,—
 Somehow, Joe, I thought of the "Ferry,"
 And the dance that we had on "The Fork";

Of Harrison's barn, with its muster           41
 Of flags festooned over the wall;
 Of the candles that shed their soft luster
 And tallow on head-dress and shawl;
 Of the steps that we took to one fiddle;
 Of the dress of my queer vis-à-vis;
 And how I once went down the middle
 With the man that shot Sandy McGee;

Of the moon that was quietly sleeping
 On the hill, when the time came to go;           50
 Of the few baby peaks that were peeping
 From under their bedclothes of snow;
 Of that ride,—that to me was the rarest;
 Of—the something you said at the gate.
 Ah, Joe, then I wasn't an heiress
 To "the best-paying lead in the State."

Well, well, it's all past; yet it's funny
 To think, as I stood in the glare
 Of fashion and beauty and money,
 That I should be thinking, right there,           60
 Of some one who breasted high water,
 And swam the North Fork, and all that,
 Just to dance with old Folinsbee's daughter,
 The Lily of Poverty Flat.

But goodness! what nonsense I'm writing!
 (Mamma says my taste still is low),
 Instead of my triumphs reciting,
 I'm spooning on Joseph,—heigh-ho!
 And I'm to be "finished" by travel,—
 Whatever's the meaning of that.               70
 Oh! why did papa strike pay gravel
 In drifting on Poverty Flat?

Good night!—here's the end of my paper;
 Good night!—if the longitude please,—
 For may be, while wasting my taper,
Your sun's climbing over the trees.
 But know, if you haven't got riches,
 And are poor, dearest Joe, and all that,
 That my heart's somewhere there in the ditches,   79
 And you've struck it,—on Poverty Flat.

THE LUCK OF ROARING CAMP

Published anonymously in the Overland Monthly for August, 1868. This sentimental story of an abandoned baby and its influence on rough miners of the early days of California mining camps was fresh and original and opened up a new vein in short fiction. It barely reached print, however, for the proofreader was shocked by it and the printer doubtful; but Harte insisted on its appearance and it had at once extraordinary success.

THERE was commotion in Roaring Camp. It could not have been a fight, for in 1850 that was not novel enough to have called together the entire settlement. The ditches and claims were not only deserted, but "Tuttle's grocery" had contributed its gamblers, who, it will be remembered, calmly continued their game the day that French Pete and Kanaka Joe shot each other to death over the bar in the front room. The whole camp was collected before a rude cabin on the outer edge of the clearing. Conversation was carried on in a low tone, but the name of a woman was frequently repeated. It was a name familiar enough in the camp,—“Cherokee Sal.”

Perhaps the less said of her the better. She was a coarse, and it is to be feared, a very sinful woman. But at that time she was the only woman in Roaring Camp, and was just then lying in sore extremity, when she most needed the ministrations of her own sex. Dissolute, abandoned, and irreclaimable, she was yet suffering a martyrdom hard enough to bear even when veiled by sympathizing womanhood, but now terrible in her loneliness. The primal curse had come to her in that original isolation which must have made the punishment of the first transgression so dreadful. It was, perhaps, part of the expiation of her sin, that, at a moment when she most lacked her sex's intuitive tenderness and care, she met only the half-contemptuous faces of her masculine associates. Yet a few of the spectators were, I think, touched by her sufferings. Sandy Tipton thought it was “rough on Sal,” and, in the contemplation of her condition, for a moment rose superior to the fact that he had an ace and two bowers in his sleeve.

It will be seen, also, that the situation was novel. Deaths were by no means uncommon in Roaring Camp, but a birth was a new thing. People had been dismissed the camp effectively, finally, and with no possibility of return; but this was the first time that anybody had been introduced ab initio. Hence the excitement.

“You go in there, Stumpy,” said a prominent citizen known as “Kentuck,” addressing one of the loungers. “Go in there, and see what you kin do. You’ve had experience in them things.”

Perhaps there was a fitness in the selection. Stumpy, in other climes, had been the putative head of two families; in fact, it was owing to some legal informality in these proceedings that Roaring Camp—a city of refuge—was indebted to his company. The crowd approved the choice, and Stumpy was wise enough to bow to the majority. The door closed upon the extempore surgeon and midwife, and Roaring Camp sat down outside, smoked its pipe, and awaited the issue.

The assemblage numbered about a hundred men. One or two of these were actual fugitives from justice, some were criminal, and all were reckless. Physically, they exhibited no indication of their past lives and character. The greatest scamp had a Raphael face, with a profusion of blond hair; Oakhurst, a gambler, had the melancholy air and intellectual abstraction of a Hamlet; the coolest and most courageous man was scarcely over five feet in height, with a soft voice and an embarrassed, timid manner. The term “roughs” applied to them was a distinction rather than a definition. Perhaps in the minor details of fingers, toes, ears, etc., the camp may have been deficient, but these slight omissions did not detract from their aggregate force. The strongest man had but three fingers on his right hand; the best shot had but one eye.

Such was the physical aspect of the men that were dispersed around the cabin. The camp lay in a triangular valley, between two hills and a river. The only outlet was a steep trail over the summit of a hill that faced the cabin, now illuminated by the rising moon. The suffering woman might have seen it from the rude bunk whereon she lay,—seen it winding like a silver thread until it was lost in the stars above.

A fire of withered pine boughs added sociability to the gathering. By degrees the natural levity of Roaring Camp returned. Bets were freely offered and taken regarding the result. Three to five that "Sal would get through with it"; even, that the child would survive; side bets as to the sex and complexion of the coming stranger. In the midst of an excited discussion an exclamation came from those nearest the door, and the camp stopped to listen. Above the swaying and moaning of the pines, the swift rush of the river, and the crackling of the fire rose a sharp, querulous cry—a cry unlike anything heard before in the camp. The pines stopped moaning, the river ceased to rush, and the fire to crackle. It seemed as if Nature had stopped to listen too.

The camp rose to its feet as one man! It was proposed to explode a barrel of gunpowder, but, in consideration of the situation of the mother, better counsels prevailed, and only a few revolvers were discharged; for, whether owing to the rude surgery of the camp, or some other reason, Cherokee Sal was sinking fast. Within an hour she had climbed, as it were, that rugged road that led to the stars, and so passed out of Roaring Camp, its sin and shame forever. I do not think that the announcement disturbed them much, except in speculation as to the fate of the child. "Can he live now?" was asked of Stumpy. The answer was doubtful. The only other being of Cherokee Sal's sex and maternal condition in the settlement was an ass. There was some conjecture as to fitness, but the experiment was tried. It was less problematical than the ancient treatment of Romulus and Remus, and apparently as successful.

When these details were completed, which exhausted another hour, the door was opened, and the anxious crowd, who had already formed themselves into a queue, entered in single file. Beside the low bunk or shelf, on which the figure of the mother was starkly outlined below the blankets, stood a pine table. On this a candle-box was placed, and within it, swathed in staring red flannel, lay the last arrival at Roaring Camp. Beside the candle-box was placed a hat. Its use was soon indicated.

"Gentlemen," said Stumpy, with a singular mixture of authority and ex officio complacency—"Gentlemen will please pass in at the front door, round the table, and out at the back door. Them as wishes to contribute anything toward the orphan will find a hat handy." The first man entered with his hat on; he uncovered, however, as he looked about him, and so, unconsciously, set an example to the next. In such communities good and bad actions are catching. As the procession filed in, comments were audible,—criticisms addressed, perhaps, rather to Stumpy, in the character of showman,—"Is that him?" "Mighty small specimen"; "Hasn't more'n got the color"; "Ain't bigger nor a derringer." The contributions were as characteristic: A silver tobacco box; a doubloon; a navy revolver, silver mounted; a gold specimen; a very beautifully embroidered lady's handkerchief (from Oakhurst the gambler); a diamond breastpin, a diamond ring (suggested by the pin, with the remark from the giver that he "saw that pin and went two diamonds better"); a slung shot; a Bible (contributor not detected); a golden spur; a silver teaspoon (the initials, I regret to say, were not the giver's); a pair of surgeon's shears; a lancet; a Bank of England note for £5; and about $200 in loose gold and silver coin. During these proceedings Stumpy maintained a silence as impassive as the dead on his left—a gravity as inscrutable as that of the newly-born on his right. Only one incident occurred to break the monotony of the curious procession. As Kentuck bent over the candle-box half curiously, the child turned, and, in a spasm of pain, caught at his groping finger, and held it fast for a moment. Kentuck looked foolish and embarrassed. Something like a blush tried to assert itself in his weather-beaten cheek. "The d—d little cuss!" he said, as he extricated his finger, with, perhaps, more tenderness and care than he might have been deemed capable of showing. He held that finger a little apart from its fellows as he went out, and examined it curiously. The examination provoked the same original remark in regard to the child. In fact, he seemed to enjoy repeating it. "He rastled with my finger," he remarked to Tip-ton, holding up the member, "the d—d little cuss!"

It was four o'clock before the camp sought repose. A light burnt in the cabin where the watchers sat, for Stumpy did not go to bed that night. Nor did Kentuck. He drank quite freely and related with great gusto his experience, invariably ending with his characteristic condemnation of the newcomer. It seemed to relieve him of any unjust implication of sentiment, and Kentuck had the weaknesses of the nobler sex. When everybody else had gone to bed, he walked down to the river, and whistled reflectingly. Then he walked up the gulch, past the cabin, still whistling with demonstrative unconcern. At a large redwood tree he paused and retraced his steps, and again passed the cabin. Halfway down to the river's bank he again paused, and then returned and knocked at the door. It was opened by Stumpy. "How goes it?" said Kentuck, looking past Stumpy toward the candle-box. "All serene," replied Stumpy. "Anything up?" "Nothing." There was a pause—an embarrassing one—Stumpy still holding the door. Then Kentuck had recourse to his finger, which he held up to Stumpy. "Rastled with it,—the d—d little cuss," he said, and retired.

The next day Cherokee Sal had such rude sepulture as Roaring Camp afforded. After her body had been committed to the hillside, there was a formal meeting of the camp to discuss what should be done with her infant. A resolution to adopt it was unanimous and enthusiastic. But an animated discussion in regard to the manner and feasibility of providing for its wants at once sprung up. It was remarkable that the argument partook of none of those fierce personalities with which discussions were usually conducted at Roaring Camp. Tipton proposed that they should send the child to Red Dog—a distance of forty miles—where female attention could be procured. But the unlucky suggestion met with fierce and unanimous opposition. It was evident that no plan which entailed parting from their new acquisition would for a moment be entertained. "Besides," said Tom Ryder, "them fellows at Red Dog would swap it, and ring in somebody else on us." A disbelief in the honesty of other camps prevailed at Roaring Camp as in other places.

The introduction of a female nurse in the camp also met with objection. It was argued that no decent woman could be prevailed to accept Roaring Camp as her home, and the speaker urged that "they didn't want any more of the other kind." This unkind allusion to the defunct mother, harsh as it may seem, was the first spasm of propriety—the first symptom of the camp's regeneration. Stumpy advanced nothing. Perhaps he felt a certain delicacy in interfering with the selection of a possible successor in office. But when questioned, he averred stoutly that he and "Jinny"—the mammal before alluded to—could manage to rear the child. There was something original, independent, and heroic about the plan that pleased the camp. Stumpy was retained. Certain articles were sent for to Sacramento. "Mind," said the treasurer, as he pressed a bag of gold-dust into the expressman's hand, "the best that can be got—lace, you know, and filigree-work and frills,—d—n the cost!"

Strange to say, the child thrived. Perhaps the invigorating climate of the mountain camp was compensation for material deficiencies. Nature took the foundling to her broader breast. In that rare atmosphere of the Sierra foothills—that air pungent with balsamic odor, that ethereal cordial, at once bracing and exhilarating, he may have found food and nourishment, or a subtle chemistry that transmuted asses' milk to lime and phosphorus. Stumpy inclined to the belief that it was the latter and good nursing. "Me and that ass," he would say, "has been father and mother to him! Don't you," he would add, apostrophizing the helpless bundle before him, "never go back on us."

By the time he was a month old, the necessity of giving him a name became apparent. He had generally been known as "the Kid," "Stumpy's boy," "the Cayote" (an allusion to his vocal powers) and even by Kentuck's endearing diminutive of "the d—d little cuss." But these were felt to be vague and unsatisfactory, and were at last dismissed under another influence. Gamblers and adventurers are generally superstitious, and Oakhurst one day declared that the baby had brought "the luck" to Roaring Camp. It was certain that of late they had been successful. "Luck" was the name agreed upon, with the prefix of Tommy for greater convenience. No allusion was made to the mother, and the father was unknown. "It's better," said the philosophical Oakhurst, "to take a fresh deal all round. Call him Luck, and start him fair." A day was accordingly set apart for the christening. What was meant by this ceremony the reader may imagine, who has already gathered some idea of the reckless irreverence of Roaring Camp. The master of ceremonies was one "Boston," a noted wag, and the occasion seemed to promise the greatest facetiousness. This ingenious satirist had spent two days in preparing a burlesque of the church service, with pointed local allusions. The choir was properly trained, and Sandy Tipton was to stand godfather. But after the procession had marched to the grove with music and banners, and the child had been deposited before a mock altar, Stumpy stepped before the expectant crowd. "It ain't my style to spoil fun, boys," said the little man, stoutly, eyeing the faces around him, "but it strikes me that this thing ain't exactly on the squar. It's playing it pretty low down on this yer baby to ring in fun on him that he ain't goin' to understand. And ef there's going to be any god-fathers round, I'd like to see who's got any better rights than me." A silence followed Stumpy's speech. To the credit of all humorists be it said that the first man to acknowledge its justice was the satirist, thus stopped of his fun. "But," said Stumpy, quickly, following up his advantage, "we're here for a christening, and we'll have it. I proclaim you Thomas Luck, according to the laws of the United States and the State of California, so help me God." It was the first time that the name of the Deity had been uttered otherwise but profanely in the camp. The form of christening was perhaps even more ludicrous than the satirist had conceived; but strangely enough, nobody saw it and nobody laughed. "Tommy" was christened as seriously as he would have been under a Christian roof, and cried and was comforted in as orthodox fashion.

And so the work of regeneration began in Roaring Camp. Almost imperceptibly a change came over the settlement. The cabin assigned to "Tommy Luck"—or "The Luck," as he was more frequently called—first showed signs of improvement. It was kept scrupulously clean and whitewashed. Then it was boarded, clothed and papered. The rosewood cradle—packed eighty miles by mule—had, in Stumpy's way of putting it, "sorter killed the rest of the furniture." So the rehabilitation of the cabin became a necessity. The men who were in the habit of lounging in at Stumpy's to see "how The Luck got on" seemed to appreciate the change, and, in self-defense, the rival establishment of "Tuttle's grocery" bestirred itself, and imported a carpet and mirrors. The reflections of the latter on the appearance of Roaring Camp tended to produce stricter habits of personal cleanliness. Again Stumpy imposed a kind of quarantine upon those who aspired to the honor and privilege of holding "The Luck." It was a cruel mortification to Kentuck—who, in the carelessness of a large nature and the habits of frontier life, had begun to regard all garments as a second cuticle, which, like a snake's, only sloughed off through decay—to be debarred this privilege from certain prudential reasons. Yet such was the subtle influence of innovation that he thereafter appeared regularly every afternoon in a clean shirt, and face still shining from his ablutions. Nor were moral and social sanitary laws neglected. "Tommy," who was supposed to spend his whole existence in a persistent attempt to repose, must not be disturbed by noise. The shouting and yelling which had gained the camp its felicitous title were not permitted within hearing distance of Stumpy's. The men conversed in whispers, or smoked with Indian gravity. Profanity was tacitly given up in these sacred precincts, and throughout the camp a popular form of expletive, known as "D—n the luck!" and "Curse the luck!" was abandoned, as having a new personal bearing. Vocal music was not interdicted, being supposed to have a soothing, tranquilizing quality, and one song, sung by "Man-o'-War Jack," an English sailor from Her Majesty's Australian colonies, was quite popular as a lullaby. It was a lugubrious recital of the exploits of "the Arethusa, Seventy-four," in a muffled minor, ending with a prolonged dying fall at the burden of each verse, "On b-o-o-o-ard of the Arethusa." It was a fine sight to see Jack holding The Luck, rocking from side to side as if with the motion of a ship, and crooning forth this naval ditty. Either through the peculiar rocking of Jack or the length of his song—it contained ninety stanzas, and was continued with conscientious deliberation to the bitter end—the lullaby generally had the desired effect. At such times the men would lie at full length under the trees, in the soft summer twilight, smoking their pipes and drinking in the melodious utterances. An indistinct idea that this was pastoral happiness pervaded the camp. “This ’ere kind o’ think,” said the Cockney Simmons, meditatively reclining on his elbow, “is ’evingly.” It reminded him of Greenwich.

On the long summer days The Luck was usually carried to the gulch, from whence the golden store of Roaring Camp was taken. There, on a blanket spread over pine boughs, he would lie while the men were working in the ditches below. Latterly, there was a rude attempt to decorate this bower with flowers and sweet-smelling shrubs, and generally some one would bring him a cluster of wild honeysuckles, azaleas, or the painted blossoms of Las Mariposas. The men had suddenly awakened to the fact that there were beauty and significance in these trifles, which they had so long trodden carelessly beneath their feet. A flake of glittering mica, a fragment of variegated quartz, a bright pebble from the bed of the creek, became beautiful to eyes thus cleared and strengthened, and were invariably put aside for “The Luck.” It was wonderful how many treasures the woods and hillsides yielded that “would do for Tommy.” Surrounded by playthings such as never child out of fairyland had before, it is to be hoped that Tommy was content. He appeared to be serenely happy, albeit there was an infantine gravity about him, a contemplative light in his round gray eyes, that sometimes worried Stumpy. He was always tractable and quiet, and it is recorded that once, having crept beyond his “corral”—a hedge of tessellated pine boughs, which surrounded his bed—he dropped over the bank on his head in the soft earth, and remained with his mottled legs in the air in that position for at least five minutes with unflinching gravity. He was extricated without a murmur. I hesitate to record the many other instances of his sagacity, which rest, unfortunately, upon the statements of prejudiced friends. Some of them were not without a tinge of superstition. “I crep’ up the bank just now,” said Kentuck one day, in a breathless state of excitement, “and dern my skin if he wasn’t a talking to a jaybird as was a-sittin on his lap. There they was, just as free and sociable as anything you please, a-jawin at each other just like two cherrybums.” Howbeit, whether creeping over the pine boughs or lying lazily on his back, blinking at the leaves above him, to him the birds sang, the squirrels chattered, and the flowers bloomed. Nature was his nurse and playfellow. For him she would let slip between the leaves golden shafts of sunlight that fell just within his grasp; she would send wandering breezes to visit him with the balm of bay and resinous gums; to him the tall redwoods nodded familiarly and sleepily, the bumblebees buzzed, and the rooks cawed a slumbrous accompaniment.

Such was the golden summer of Roaring Camp. They were “flush times”—and the Luck was with them. The claims had yielded enormously. The camp was jealous of its privileges and looked suspiciously on strangers. No encouragement was given to immigration, and, to make their seclusion more perfect, the land on either side of the mountain wall that surrounded the camp they duly pre-empted. This, and a reputation for singular proficiency with the revolver, kept the reserve of Roaring Camp inviolate. The expressman—their only connecting link with the surrounding world—sometimes told wonderful stories of the camp. He would say, “They’ve a street up there in ‘Roaring,’ that would lay over any street in Red Dog. They’ve got vines and flowers round their houses, and they wash themselves twice a day. But they’re mighty rough on strangers, and they worship an Ingin baby.”

With the prosperity of the camp came a desire for further improvement. It was proposed to build a hotel in the following spring, and to invite one or two decent families to reside there for the sake of “The Luck,” who might perhaps profit by female companionship. The sacrifice that this concession to the sex cost these men, who were fiercely skeptical in regard to its general virtue and usefulness, can only be accounted for by their affection for Tommy. A few still held out. But the resolve could not be carried into effect for three months, and the minority meekly yielded in the hope that something might turn up to prevent it. And it did.

The winter of '51 will long be remembered in the foothills. The snow lay deep on the Sierras, and every mountain creek became a river, and every river a lake. Each gorge and gulch was transformed into a tumultuous watercourse that descended the hillsides, tearing down giant trees and scattering its drift and débris along the plain. Red Dog had been twice under water, and Roaring Camp had been forewarned. "Water put the gold into them gulches," said Stumpy; "it's been here once and will be here again!" And that night the North Fork suddenly leaped over its banks, and swept up the triangular valley of Roaring Camp.

In the confusion of rushing water, crashing trees, and crackling timber, and the darkness which seemed to flow with the water and blot out the fair valley, but little could be done to collect the scattered camp. When the morning broke, the cabin of Stumpy nearest the river-bank was gone. Higher up the gulch they found the body of its unlucky owner; but the pride—the hope—the joy—the Luck—of Roaring Camp had disappeared. They were returning with sad hearts, when a shout from the bank recalled them.

It was a relief-boat from down the river. They had picked up, they said, a man and an infant, nearly exhausted, about two miles below. Did anybody know them, and did they belong here?

It needed but a glance to show them Kentuck lying there, cruelly crushed and bruised, but still holding The Luck of Roaring Camp in his arms. As they bent over the strangely assorted pair, they saw that the child was cold and pulseless. "He is dead," said one. Kentuck opened his eyes. "Dead?" he repeated feebly. "Yes, my man, and you are dying too." A smile lit the eyes of the expiring Kentuck. "Dying!" he repeated, "he's a-taking me with him—tell the boys I've got the Luck with me now"; and the strong man, clinging to the frail babe as a drowning man is said to cling to a straw, drifted away into the shadowy river that flows forever to the unknown sea.

THE OUTCASTS OF POKER FLAT

As Mr. John Oakhurst, gambler, stepped into the main street of Poker Flat on the morning of the 23d of November, 1850, he was conscious of a change in its moral atmosphere since the preceding night. Two or three men, conversing earnestly together, ceased as he approached, and exchanged significant glances. There was a Sabbath lull in the air, which, in a settlement unused to Sabbath influences, looked ominous.

Mr. Oakhurst's calm, handsome face betrayed small concern in these indications. Whether he was conscious of any predisposing cause was another question. "I reckon they're after somebody," he reflected; "likely it's me." He returned to his pocket the handkerchief with which he had been whipping away the red dust of Poker Flat from his neat boots, and quietly discharged his mind of any further conjecture.

In point of fact, Poker Flat was "after somebody." It had lately suffered the loss of several thousand dollars, two valuable horses, and a prominent citizen. It was experiencing a spasm of virtuous reaction, quite as lawless and ungovernable as any of the acts that had provoked it. A secret committee had determined to rid the town of all improper persons. This was done permanently in regard of two men who were then hanging from the boughs of a sycamore in the gulch, and temporarily in the banishment of certain other objectionable characters. I regret to say that some of these were ladies. It is but due to the sex, however, to state that their impropriety was professional, and it was only in such easily established standards of evil that Poker Flat ventured to sit in judgment.

Mr. Oakhurst was right in supposing that he was included in this category. A few of the committee had urged hanging him as a possible example and a sure method of reimbursing themselves from his pockets of the sums he had won from them. "It's agin justice," said Jim Wheeler, "to let this yer young man from Roaring Camp—an entire stranger—carry away our money." But a crude sentiment of equity residing in the breasts of those who had been fortunate enough to win from Mr. Oakhurst overruled this narrower local prejudice.

Mr. Oakhurst received his sentence with philosophic calmness, none the less coolly that he was aware of the hesitation of his judges. He was too much of a gambler not to accept fate. With him life was at best an uncertain game, and he recognized the usual percentage in favor of the dealer.

A body of armed men accompanied the deported wickedness of Poker Flat to the outskirts of the settlement. Besides Mr. Oakhurst, who was known to be a coolly desperate man, and for whose intimidation the armed escort was intended, the expatriated party consisted of a young woman familiarly known as "The Duchess"; another who had won the title of "Mother Shipton"; and "Uncle Billy," a suspected sluice-robber and confirmed drunkard. The cavalcade provoked no comments from the spectators, nor was any word uttered by the escort. Only when the gulch which marked the uttermost limit of Poker Flat was reached, the leader spoke briefly and to the point. The exiles were forbidden to return at the peril of their lives.

As the escort disappeared, their pent-up feelings found vent in a few hysterical tears from the Duchess, some bad language from Mother Shipton, and a Partlian volley of expletives from Uncle Billy. The philosophic Oakhurst alone remained silent. He listened calmly to Mother Shipton's desire to cut somebody's heart out, to the repeated statements of the Duchess that she would die in the road, and to the alarming oaths that seemed to be bumped out of Uncle Billy as he rode forward. With the easy good humor characteristic of his class, he insisted upon exchanging his own riding-horse, "Five-Spot," for the sorry mule which the Duchess rode. But even this act did not draw the party into any closer sympathy. The young woman readjusted her somewhat draggled plumes with a feeble, faded coquetry; Mother Shipton eyed the possessor of "Five-Spot" with malevolence, and Uncle Billy included the whole party in one sweeping anathema.

The road to Sandy Bar—a camp that, not having as yet experienced the regenerating influences of Poker Flat, consequently seemed to offer some invitation to the emigrants—lay over a steep mountain range. It was distant a day's severe travel. In that advanced season the party soon passed out of the moist, temperate regions of the foothills into the dry, cold, bracing air of the Sierras. The trail was narrow and difficult. At noon the Duchess, rolling out of her saddle upon the ground, declared her intention of going no farther, and the party halted.

The spot was singularly wild and impressive. A wooded amphitheatre, surrounded on three sides by precipitous cliffs of naked granite, sloped gently towards the crest of another precipice that overlooked the valley. It was, undoubtedly, the most suitable spot for a camp, had camping been advisable. But Mr. Oakhurst knew that scarcely half the journey to Sandy Bar was accomplished, and the party were not equipped or provisioned for delay. This fact he pointed out to his companions curtly, with a philosophic commentary on the folly of "throwing up their hand before the game was played out." But they were furnished with liquor, which in this emergency stood them in place of food, fuel, rest, and prescience. In spite of his remonstrances, it was not long before they were more or less under its influence. Uncle Billy passed rapidly from a bellicose state into one of stupor, the Duchess became maudlin, and Mother Shipton snored. Mr. Oakhurst alone remained erect, leaning against a rock, calmly surveying them.

Mr. Oakhurst did not drink. It interfered with a profession which required coolness, impassiveness, and presence of mind, and, in his own language, he "couldn't afford it." As he gazed at his recumbent fellow exiles, the loneliness begotten of his pariah trade, his habits of life, his very vices, for the first time seriously oppressed him. He bestirred himself in dusting his black clothes, washing his hands and face, and other acts characteristic of his studiously neat habits, and for a moment forgot his annoyance. The thought of deserting his weaker and more pitiable companions never perhaps occurred to him. Yet he could not help feeling the want of that excitement which, singularly enough, was most conducive to that calm equanimity for which he was notorious. He looked at the gloomy walls that rose a thousand feet sheer above the circling pines around him, at the sky ominously clouded, at the valley below, already deepening into shadows; and, doing so, suddenly he heard his own name called.

A horseman slowly ascended the trail. In the fresh, open face of the newcomer Mr. Oakhurst recognized Tom Simson, otherwise known as "The Innocent," of Sandy Bar. He had met him some months before over a "little game," and had, with perfect equanimity, won the entire fortune—amounting to some forty dollars—of that guileless youth. After the game was finished, Mr. Oakhurst drew the youthful speculator behind the door and thus addressed him: "Tommy, you're a good little man, but you can't gamble worth a cent. Don't try it over again." He then handed him his money back, pushed him gently from the room, and so made a devoted slave of Tom Simson.

There was a remembrance of this in his boyish and enthusiastic greeting of Mr. Oakhurst. He had started, he said, to go to Poker Flat to seek his fortune. "Alone?" No, not exactly alone; in fact (a giggle), he had run away with Piney Woods. Didn't Mr. Oakhurst remember Piney? She that used to wait on the table at the Temperance House? They had been engaged a long time, but old Jake Woods had objected, and so they had run away, and were going to Poker Flat to be married, and here they were. And they were tired out, and how lucky it was they had found a place to camp, and company. All this the Innocent delivered rapidly, while Piney, a stout, comely damsel of fifteen, emerged from behind the pine-tree, where she had been blushing unseen, and rode to the side of her lover.

Mr. Oakhurst seldom troubled himself with sentiment, still less with propriety; but he had a vague idea that the situation was not fortunate. He retained, however, his presence of mind sufficiently to kick Uncle Billy, who was about to say something, and Uncle Billy was sober enough to recognize in Mr. Oakhurst's kick a superior power that would not bear trifling. He then endeavored to dissuade Tom Simson from delaying further, but in vain. He even pointed out the fact that there was no provision, nor means of making a camp. But, unluckily, the Innocent met this objection by assuring the party that he was provided with an extra mule loaded with provisions, and by the discovery of a rude attempt at a log house near the trail. "Piney can stay with Mrs. Oakhurst," said the Innocent, pointing to the Duchess, "and I can shift for myself."

Nothing but Mr. Oakhurst's admonishing foot saved Uncle Billy from bursting into a roar of laughter. As it was, he felt compelled to retire up the cañon until he could recover his gravity. There he confided the joke to the tall pine-trees, with many slaps of his leg, contortions of his face, and the usual profanity. But when he returned to the party, he found them seated by a fire—for the air had grown strangely chill and the sky overcast—in apparently amicable conversation. Piney was actually talking in an impulsive girlish fashion to the Duchess, who was listening with an interest and animation she had not shown for many days. The Innocent was holding forth, apparently with equal effect, to Mr. Oakhurst and Mother Shipton, who was actually relaxing into amiability. "Is this yer a d—d picnic?" said Uncle Billy, with inward scorn, as he surveyed the sylvan group, the glancing firelight, and the tethered animals in the foreground. Suddenly an idea mingled with the alcoholic fumes that disturbed his brain. It was apparently of a jocular nature, for he felt impelled to slap his leg again and cram his fist into his mouth.

As the shadows crept slowly up the mountain, a slight breeze rocked the tops of the pine-trees and moaned through their long and gloomy aisles. The ruined cabin, patched and covered with pine boughs, was set apart for the ladies. As the lovers parted, they unaffectedly exchanged a kiss, so honest and sincere that it might have been heard above the swaying pines. The frail Duchess and the malevolent Mother Shipton were probably too stunned to remark upon this last evidence of simplicity, and so turned without a word to the hut. The fire was replenished, the men lay down before the door, and in a few minutes were asleep.

Mr. Oakhurst was a light sleeper. Toward morning he awoke benumbed and cold. As he stirred the dying fire, the wind, which was now blowing strongly, brought to his cheek that which caused the blood to leave it,—snow!

He started to his feet with the intention of awakening the sleepers, for there was no time to lose. But turning to where Uncle Billy had been lying, he found him gone. A suspicion leaped to his brain, and a curse to his lips. He ran to the spot where the mules had been tethered—they were no longer there. The tracks were already rapidly disappearing in the snow.

The momentary excitement brought Mr. Oakhurst back to the fire with his usual calm. He did not waken the sleepers. The Innocent slumbered peacefully, with a smile on his good-humored, freckled face; the virgin Piney slept beside her frailer sisters as sweetly as though attended by celestial guardians; and Mr. Oakhurst, drawing his blanket over his shoulders, stroked his mustaches and waited for the dawn. It came slowly in a whirling mist of snowflakes that dazzled and confused the eye. What could be seen of the landscape appeared magically changed. He looked over the valley, and summed up the present and future in two words, "Snowed in!"

A careful inventory of the provisions, which, fortunately for the party, had been stored within the hut, and so escaped the felonious fingers of Uncle Billy, disclosed the fact that with care and prudence they might last ten days longer. "That is," said Mr. Oakhurst sotto voce to the Innocent, "if you're willing to board us. If you ain't—and perhaps you'd better not—you can wait till Uncle Billy gets back with provisions." For some occult reason, Mr. Oakhurst could not bring himself to disclose Uncle Billy's rascality, and so offered the hypothesis that he had wandered from the camp and had accidentally stampeded the animals. He dropped a warning to the Duchess and Mother Shipton, who of course knew the facts of their associate's defection. "They'll find out the truth about us all when they find out anything," he added significantly, "and there's no good frightening them now."

Tom Simson not only put all his worldly store at the disposal of Mr. Oakhurst, but seemed to enjoy the prospect of their enforced seclusion. "We'll have a good camp for a week, and then the snow'll melt, and we'll all go back together." The cheerful gayety of the young man and Mr. Oakhurst's calm infected the others. The Innocent, with the aid of pine boughs, extemporized a thatch for the roofless cabin, and the Duchess directed Piney in the rearrangement of the interior with a taste and tact that opened the blue eyes of that provincial maiden to their fullest extent. "I reckon now you're used to fine things at Poker Flat," said Piney. The Duchess turned away sharply to conceal something that reddened her cheeks through their professional tint, and Mother Shipton requested Piney not to "chatter." But when Mr. Oakhurst returned from a weary search for the trail, he heard the sound of happy laughter echoed from the rocks. He stopped in some alarm, and his thoughts first naturally reverted to the whiskey, which he had prudently cached. "And yet it don't somehow sound like whiskey," said the gambler. It was not until he caught sight of the blazing fire through the still blinding storm, and the group around it, that he settled to the conviction that it was "square fun."

Whether Mr. Oakhurst had cached his cards with the whiskey as something debarred the free access of the community, I cannot say. It was certain that, in Mother Shipton's words, he "didn't say 'cards' once" during that evening. Haply the time was beguiled by an accordion, produced somewhat ostentatiously by Tom Simson from his pack. Notwithstanding some difficulties attending the manipulation of this instrument, Piney Woods managed to pluck several reluctant melodies from its keys, to an accompaniment by the Innocent on a pair of bone castanets. But the crowning festivity of the evening was reached in a rude camp-meeting hymn, which the lovers, joining hands, sang with great earnestness and vociferation. I fear that a certain defiant tone and Covenanter's swing to its chorus, rather than any devotional quality, caused it speedily to infect the others, who at last joined in the refrain:

"I'm proud to live in the service of the Lord,
And I'm bound to die in His army."

The pines rocked, the storm eddied and whirled above the miserable group, and the flames of their altar leaped heavenward, as if in token of the vow.

At midnight the storm abated, the rolling clouds parted, and the stars glittered keenly above the sleeping camp. Mr. Oakhurst, whose professional habits had enabled him to live on the smallest possible amount of sleep, in dividing the watch with Tom Simson somehow managed to take upon himself the greater part of that duty. He excused himself to the Innocent by saying that he had "often been a week without sleep." "Doing what?" asked Tom. "Poker!" replied Oakhurst sententiously. "When a man gets a streak of luck, —nigger-luck,—he don't get tired. The luck gives in first. Luck," continued the gambler reflectively, "is a mighty queer thing. All you know about it for certain is that it's bound to change. And it's finding out when it's going to change that makes you. We've had a streak of bad luck since we left Poker Flat,—you come along, and slap you get into it, too. If you can hold your cards right along you're all right. For," added the gambler with cheerful irrelevance—

"I'm proud to live in the service of the Lord,
And I'm bound to die in His army."

The third day came, and the sun, looking through the white-curtained valley, saw the outcasts divide their slowly decreasing store of provisions for the morning meal. It was one of the peculiarities of that mountain climate that its rays diffused a kindly warmth over the wintry landscape, as if in regretful commiseration of the past. But it revealed drift on drift of snow piled high around the hut,—a hopeless, uncharted, trackless sea of white lying below the rocky shores to which the castaways still clung. Through the marvelously clear air the smoke of the pastoral village of Poker Flat rose miles away. Mother Ship-ton saw it, and from a remote pinnacle of her rocky fastness hurled in that direction a final malediction. It was her last vituperative attempt, and perhaps for that reason was invested with a certain degree of sublimity. It did her good, she privately informed the Duchess. "Just you go out there and cuss, and see." She then set herself to the task of amusing "the child," as she and the Duchess were pleased to call Piney. Piney was no chicken, but it was a soothing and original theory of the pair thus to account for the fact that she didn't swear and wasn't improper.

When night crept up again through the gorges, the reedy notes of the accordion rose and fell in fitful spasms and long-drawn gasps by the flickering campfire. But music failed to fill entirely the aching void left by insufficient food, and a new diversion was proposed by Piney,—story-telling. Neither Mr. Oakhurst nor his female companions caring to relate their personal experiences, this plan would have failed too, but for the Innocent. Some months before he had chanced upon a stray copy of Mr. Pope's ingenious translation of the Iliad. He now proposed to narrate the principal incidents of that poem—having thoroughly mastered the argument and fairly forgotten the words—in the current vernacular of Sandy Bar. And so for the rest of that night the Homeric demigods again walked the earth. Trojan bully and wily Greek wrestled in the winds, and the great pines in the cañon seemed to bow to the wrath of the son of Peleus. Mr. Oakhurst listened with quiet satisfaction. Most especially was he interested in the fate of "Ash-heels" as the Innocent persisted in denominating the "swift-footed Achilles."

So, with small food and much of Homer and the accordion, a week passed over the heads of the outcasts. The sun again forsook them, and again from leaden skies the snowflakes were sifted over the land. Day by day closer around them drew the snowy circle, until at last they looked from their prison over drifted walls of dazzling white, that towered twenty feet above their heads. It became more and more difficult to replenish their fires, even from the fallen trees beside them, now half hidden in the drifts. And yet no one complained. The lovers turned from the dreary prospect and looked into each other's eyes, and were happy. Mr. Oakhurst settled himself coolly to the losing game before him. The Duchess, more cheerful than she had been, assumed the care of Piney. Only Mother Shipton—once the strongest of the party—seemed to sicken and fade. At midnight on the tenth day she called Oakhurst to her side. "I'm going," she said, in a voice of querulous weakness, "but don't say anything about it. Don't waken the kids. Take the bundle from under my head, and open it." Mr. Oakhurst did so. It contained Mother Shipton's rations for the last week, untouched. "Give 'em to the child," she said, pointing to the sleeping Piney. "You've starved yourself," said the gambler. "That's what they call it," said the woman querulously, as she lay down again, and, turning her face to the wall, passed quietly away.

The accordion and the bones were put aside that day, and Homer was forgotten. When the body of Mother Shipton had been committed to the snow, Mr. Oakhurst took the Innocent aside, and showed him a pair of snowshoes, which he had fashioned from the old pack-saddle. "There's one chance in a hundred to save her yet," he said, pointing to Piney; "but it's there," he added, pointing toward Poker Flat. "If you can reach there in two days she's safe." "And you?" asked Tom Simson. "I'll stay here," was the curt reply.

The lovers parted with a long embrace. "You are not going, too?" said the Duchess, as she saw Mr. Oakhurst apparently waiting to accompany him. "As far as the cañon," he replied. He turned suddenly and kissed the Duchess, leaving her pallid face aflame, and her trembling limbs rigid with amazement.

Night came, but not Mr. Oakhurst. It brought the storm again and the whirling snow. Then the Duchess, feeding the fire, found that some one had quietly piled beside the hut enough fuel to last a few days longer. The tears rose to her eyes, but she hid them from Piney.

The women slept but little. In the morning, looking into each other's faces, they read their fate. Neither spoke, but Piney, accepting the position of the stronger, drew near and placed her arm around the Duchess's waist. They kept this attitude for the rest of the day. That night the storm reached its greatest fury, and, rending asunder the protecting vines, invaded the very hut.

Toward morning they found themselves unable to feed the fire, which gradually died away. As the embers slowly blackened, the Duchess crept closer to Piney, and broke the silence of many hours: "Piney, can you pray?" "No, dear," said Piney simply. The Duchess, without knowing exactly why, felt relieved, and, putting her head upon Piney's shoulder, spoke no more. And so reclining, the younger and purer pillowing the head of her soiled sister upon her virgin breast, they fell asleep.

The wind lulled as if it feared to waken them. Feathery drifts of snow, shaken from the long pine boughs, flew like white-winged birds, and settled about them as they slept. The moon through the rifted clouds looked down upon what had been the camp. But all human stain, all trace of earthly travail, was hidden beneath the spotless mantle mercifully flung from above.

They slept all that day and the next, nor did they waken when voices and footsteps broke the silence of the camp. And when pitying fingers brushed the snow from their wan faces, you could scarcely have told from the equal peace that dwelt upon them which was she that had sinned. Even the law of Poker Flat recognized this, and turned away, leaving them still locked in each other's arms.

But at the head of the gulch, on one of the largest pine-trees, they found the deuce of clubs pinned to the bark with a bowie-knife. It bore the following, written in pencil in a firm hand:

BENEATH THIS TREE LIES THE BODY OF
JOHN OAKHURST,
WHO STRUCK A STREAK OF BAD LUCK
ON THE 23D OF NOVEMBER 1850,
AND HANDLED IN HIS CHECKS
ON THE 7TH DECEMBER, 1850.

‡

And pulseless and cold, with a Derringer by his side and a bullet in his heart, though still calm as in life, beneath the snow lay he who at once was the strongest and yet the weakest of the outcasts of Poker Flat.

1838 -- John Hay -- 1905

THIS AMERICAN author, diplomat, and statesman was born in Indiana. After graduating from Brown University in 1858 he studied law in the office of Abraham Lincoln, whom he also served as private secretary during his presidency. He held minor diplomatic posts at Paris, Vienna, and Madrid, and in 1870 joined the staff of the New York Tribune in an editorial capacity. During a ten-year residence in Cleveland he had ample opportunity to see the disastrous results of the struggle between capital and labor, which focused his thinking upon one of the most besetting problems in American life. In 1897 President McKinley appointed him ambassador to Great Britain, from which post he resigned a year later to become Secretary of State, an office which he held until his death.

Although Hay achieved fame as one of the great statesmen of his time, he was widely known as an author before he entered public service as a definite career. With the exception of the monumental life of Lincoln, written in collaboration with John G. Nicolay, the literary work upon which his reputation rests had been completed by the time he was forty years old. Pike County Ballads and Castilian Days came out in 1871, and The Bread-Winners, the authorship of which Hay persistently refused to admit, was published in the Century in 1883.

Pike County Ballads (1871) is a significant work, having both historical and intrinsic value. In this work Hay joins Lowell (The Biglow Papers) and Bret Harte in releasing poetry from conventional subject matter, and in showing its possibilities in the regional representation of life. The poems are written in dialect, treating homely themes, yet with a dignity and high moral elevation that make them impressive. He has proved that there is real poetry in the routine lives and experiences of ordinary people, as well as in those more fortunate in their culture and refinement. At one time rather savagely attacked in certain quarters, poems like "Jim Bludso" and "Little Breeches" have become part of our accepted American heritage. George Eliot called the former one of the gems in the language. Castilian Days (1871) is a study of social and political conditions in Spain, able but occasionally rather too polemical. The Bread-Winners (1884) deals with the conflict between capital and labor. It received wide recognition in this country and abroad in spite of faults in treatment and structure. Favoring, as he did, the side of capital, Hay could scarcely be expected to treat his theme with impartial sympathy. It is generally conceded that his greatest work is Abraham Lincoln: A History, written in collaboration with John Nicolay. Although superseded by later biographies, this monumental study of the man and his times can be ignored by no student of Lincoln in the future.

Hay's poetry is collected in the Household Edition. L. Sears, John Hay, Author and Statesman (1914); W. R. Thayer, The Life and Letters of John Hay (2 vols., 1915); T. Dennett, John Hay: From Poetry to Politics (1933), are extensive biographies. His early letters are published in C. Ticknor, ed., A Poet in Exile (1910). ## LITTLE BREECHES

I DON'T go much on religion,
I never ain't had no show;
But I've got a middlin' tight grip, sir,
On the handful o' things I know.
I don't pan out on the prophets
And free-will, and that sort of thing,—
But I b'lieve in God and the angels,
Ever sence one night last spring.

I come into town with some turnips,
And my little Gabe come along,— 10
No four-year-old in the county
Could beat him for pretty and strong,
Peart and chipper and sassy,
Always ready to swear and fight,—
And I'd larnt him to chaw terbacker
Jest to keep his milk-teeth white.

The snow come down like a blanket
As I passed by Taggart's store;
I went in for a jug of molasses
And left the team at the door. 20
They scared at something and started,—
I heard one little squall,
And hell-to-split over the prairie
Went team, Little Breeches, and all.

Hell-to-split over the prairie!
I was almost froze with skeer;
But we roused up some torches,
And sarched for 'em far and near.
At last we struck hosses and wagon,
Snowed under a soft white mound, 30
Upsot, dead beat,—but of little Gabe
No hide nor hair was found.

And here all hope soured on me,
Of my fellow-critter's aid,—
I jest flopped down on my marrow-bones,
Crotch-deep in the snow, and prayed.
. . . . .

By this, the torches was played out,
And me, and Isrul Parr
Went off for some wood to a sheepfold
That he said was somewhar thar. 40

We found it at last, and a little shed
Where they shut up the lambs at night.
We looked in and seen them huddled thar,
So warm and sleepy and white;
And thar sot Little Breeches and chirped,
As peart as ever you see,
"I want a chaw of terbacker,
And that's what's the matter of me."

How did he git thar? Angels.
He could never have walked in that storm;
They jest scooped down and toted him 51
To whar it was safe and warm.
And I think that saving a little child,
And fotching him to his own,
Is a derved sight better business
Than loafing around the Throne. 1870

JIM BLUDSO

OF THE PRAIRIE BELLE

A vivid rendering of an episode from the romantic era of the Mississippi steamboat.

WALL, no! I can't tell whar he lives,
Becase he don't live, you see;
Leastways, he's got out of the habit
Of livin' like you and me.

Whar have you been for the last three year
That you haven't heard folks tell
How Jimmy Bludso passed in his checks
The night of the Prairie Belle?

He weren't no saint,—them engineers
Is all pretty much alike,— 10
One wife in Natchez-under-the-Hill
And another one here, in Pike;
A keerless man in his talk was Jim,
And an awkward hand in a row,
But he never flunked, and he never lied,—
I reckon he never knowed how.

And this was all the religion he had,—
To treat his engine well;
Never be passed on the river;
To mind the pilot's bell; 20
And if ever the Prairie Belle took fire,—
A thousand times he swore,
He'd hold her nozzle agin the bank
Till the last soul got ashore.

All boats has their day on the Mississip,
And her day come at last,—
The Movastar was a better boat,
But the Belle she wouldn't be passed.
And so she come tearin' along that night—
The oldest craft on the line— 30
With a nigger squat on her safety-valve,
And her furnace crammed, rosin and pine.

The fire bust out as she clared the bar,
And burnt a hole in the night,
And quick as a flash she turned, and made
For that willer-bank on the right.
There was runnin' and cursin', but Jim yelled out,
Over all the infernal roar,
"I'll hold her nozzle agin the bank
Till the last galoot's ashore." 40

Through the hot, black breath of the burnin' boat
Jim Bludso's voice was heard,
And they all had trust in his cussedness,
And knowed he would keep his word.
And, sure's you're born, they all got off
Afore the smokestacks fell,—
And Bludso's ghost went up alone
In the smoke of the Prairie Belle.

He weren't no saint,—but at jedgment
I'd run my chance with Jim, 50
'Longside of some pious gentlemen
That wouldn't shook hands with him.
He seen his duty, a dead-sure thing,—
And went for it thar and then;
And Christ ain't a-going to be too hard
On a man that died for men.

1835 -- Mark Twain -- 1910

SAMUEL LANGHORNE CLEMENS (Mark Twain), who now ranks among our major writers, brought humor, realism, and western local color to American fiction. The first author to emerge from beyond the Mississippi, he discarded eastern backgrounds and wrote of the West intimately and authentically. He was, indeed, the man that Whitman prophesied and awaited, and his picturesque personality and individual manner of writing gave him world-wide popularity.

Clemens led an interesting and varied life. He was born on the west bank of the Mississippi River at Florida, Missouri, on November 30, 1835. His boyhood was spent in Hannibal, a little slaveholding town about 100 miles above St. Louis. His father, a lawyer and storekeeper, had moved westward from Virginia to Tennessee, and thence to Missouri. His mother was a Kentuckian. Young Clemens had little schooling. On the death of his father in 1847, he was apprenticed to his brother Orion to learn printing. His principal service, however, was running errands and delivering papers. He grew tired of Hannibal, and in 1853 went to St. Louis, Chicago, New York, and Philadelphia, working at the printing trade, and then back to Keokuk. He took passage at Cincinnati in 1857 and went by steamboat down the Mississippi to New Orleans. On this trip he met the pilot, Horace Bixby, and for fifteen months he tried the life of a "cub pilot" in the Golden Age of steamboat navigation. He committed to memory all the turns and all the shallows and shoals for the 1200 miles from St. Louis to New Orleans, along one of the greatest of American waterways. The romantic spell of the river and the pride and responsibilities of the pilots are reflected in some of his best books. He made a fine record, but the pilot's life ended for him when, at the outbreak of the Civil War, the river was closed to navigation. He enlisted as a Confederate soldier, but his company was disbanded in a few weeks and he did not re-enlist.

In 1861, Clemens' brother Orion was made private secretary to the governor of the Territory of Nevada. Samuel followed him there, and for six years entered into the life of the frontier region. He later recorded his experiences as a prospector and journalist in camps and boom towns in Roughing It (1872). When the Comstock Lode excitement was at its height, he was at Virginia City on a newspaper. Here he met Artemus Ward, one of the journalistic group of humorists who were his nearest predecessors in his field. By 1863 he had discovered that he could write and began to use the pen name of Mark Twain, a term employed in his piloting experience to register depths of water. In another year he had given up mining for journalism, although he remained in the West. He worked for a while on a newspaper in San Francisco. It was here that he came to know Bret Harte. In 1865 he published "The Celebrated Jumping Frog of Calaveras County" in the New York Saturday Press. The following year he visited the Sandwich Islands as a news correspondent, and upon his return he convulsed a San Francisco audience with an account of his experiences, in the first of his many popular humorous lectures. In 1867 he left San Francisco and went to New York, where he published his first book, The Jumping Frog of Calaveras County and Other Sketches. Innocents Abroad (1869) was the result of a commission given him by a California newspaper to join a European tour to the Holy Land and send home letters concerning it. The accounts were written from the standpoint of how a Westerner might see Europe. It was a new kind of travel book, and it made him a national figure. In 1870 he married Olivia Langdon of Elmira, New York, who exerted a strong and lasting influence over him. The following year he moved from Elmira to Hartford, Connecticut, which he made his permanent home. For most of the next forty years he lived there, a noted man of letters, the center of a literary group. In 1873 he published The Gilded Age, written in collaboration with Charles Dudley Warner.

Tom Sawyer, another landmark in American literature, was published in 1876. It was Clemens's desire to picture a real boy instead of another youthful model of all virtue as described by the Sunday-school stories for juveniles. In it he blends romantic and realistic material. The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn (1884) has much the same quality as Tom Sawyer. It is something of a social study of the midwestern frontier; it deals again with the romance of steamboat days on the river and touches on the problem of slavery. In 1889 came his famous travesty of chivalric romances, the mock-heroic A Connecticut Yankee in King Arthur's Court.

Successful though Clemens was as a man of letters, he twice found himself in serious financial straits because of bad speculative investments. In 1895 his publishing house failed, and he lost the fortune he had made from lecturing and writing. Like Sir Walter Scott, he assumed all legal and moral obligations incurred by this failure and wrote copiously in order to pay the indebtedness. He also made a triumphal lecture tour over the world. He not only paid all debts, but retained, in the main, his health. He became a familiar and popular figure with his white clothes, white hair, and rolling gait. His life was not without tragedy, however; his wife died in 1904 and three of his children had also died. In 1907 he was given the honorary degree of Doctor of Letters from Oxford. His death occurred three years later, on April 21, 1910, at Redding, Connecticut.

While Mark Twain drew largely upon his own wide experience and the American frontier scene, recent studies of his reading have made it apparent that he was also strongly influenced by literary tradition and that he had sharply defined literary theories. These are to be found chiefly in his essays on "How to Tell a Story," "Fenimore Cooper's Literary Offences," "In Defence of Harriet Shelley," "Howells," "Is Shakespeare Dead?" "English as She Is Taught," and "What Paul Bourget Thinks of Us," and in passages throughout his works, notably in Chapter XLVI of Life on the Mississippi, where he compares Scott unfavorably with his idol Cervantes. As a determinist, Mark Twain sought to rely on "the slow accumulation of unconscious observation—absorption," on "years and years of intercourse with the life concerned"; he sought not to present characters in a vacuum but rather to show the interpenetration of character and environment, of ideals and the physical history of the race. Revolting against the uniformity of book-English of earlier novelists such as Scott, Cooper, and Hawthorne, he stressed the need for fidelity to the rich varieties of the speech of different levels of societies, of different races, and of the same people under different emotional influences. As DeVoto says, he made "the vernacular a perfect instrument for all the necessities of fiction." After the transcendental idealism, we find Mark Twain seeking everywhere a simple and intimate recording of the life of the senses; he deplored the vogue of "a sad, false delicacy" as making literature insipid and untrue to life. He once insisted that "to simply amuse" the masses "would have satisfied my dearest ambition at any time," and in

"How to Tell a Story" he shows that he was a highly conscious craftsman in writing the humorous story and in testing the psychological effectiveness of his literary manner directly on countless audiences simply by watching their faces and their reactions. "To string incongruities and absurdities together in a wandering and sometimes purposeless way, and seem innocently unaware that they are absurdities, is the basis of the American art." Yet elsewhere he sought, as a believer in rationalism and humanitarian democracy, to pry "up to a higher level of manhood" those Europeans addicted to a feudalistic caste system; this didactic purpose is illustrated, of course, in A Connecticut Yankee and in The Prince and the Pauper. He attacked Scott not only for his "chivalry-silliness" but for his bookish style, urging as his own ideal "a strong, compact, direct, unflowery style [which] wastes no words, and does not gush." He also attacked Dowden's style as "a literary cake-walk," full of "bowings and smirking" and distortions of fact. He thought his friend Howells unexcelled "in the sustained exhibition of certain great qualities—clearness, compression, verbal exactness, and unforced and seemingly unconscious felicity of phrasing," as well as for his mastery of "the right word," "cadenced and undulating rhythm," and "architectural felicities of construction." Mark Twain summarized his "nineteen rules governing literary art in the domain of romantic fiction" in the beginning of his satiric essay on Cooper, whom he finds violating all of them. It is instructive to approach the study of Mark Twain's own fiction by ascertaining to what extent he himself succeeded in practicing each of his own "rules."

Mark Twain is one of few writers who have made the world laugh. His humor lies largely in his burlesque exaggeration and his skillful use of anticlimaxes, hoax passages, and humorous incidents. But he had a serious side also. A moralist at heart, he was a man of thought as well as laughter. He protested against sham and hypocrisy, insincerity and sentimentality, and he had a keen sense of the tragic incongruities of life. He wrote with colloquial ease and vigor. His faculty of description and his skillful use of words made him an excellent narrator and a romancer of distinction. His works are genuinely American, and the best of them have the flavor of the Mississippi.

The best edition of Clemens's work is the Definitive (35 vols., 1922). The Writings of Mark Twain, Collected Edition (25 vols., 1899-1910), does not include "The Mysterious Stranger" (1916) and "What Is Man?" (1917), or the Autobiography, which was edited by Albert Bigelow Paine (2 vols., 1924). Paine also edited Mark Twain's Letters (2 vols., 1917) and Mark Twain's Notebook (1935). A translation from the German by Clemens of Struwelpeter (Slovenly Peter) was first printed in 1935.

The authorized biography is by Paine (2 vols., 1912), now included in the Definitive Edition. My Mark Twain, by W. D. Howells, a personal friend, appeared in 1910. The Life and Letters of W. D. Howells (2 vols., 1928), edited by Mildred Howells, contains Clemens material.

Other accounts are Van Wyck Brooks's The Ordeal of Mark Twain (1920; revised edition, 1933), which leans heavily on Freudian psychology; Mary Lawton's A Life-Time with Mark Twain (1925); Carl Van Doren in DAB, IV (1930); Bernard De Voto's Mark Twain's America (1932); Minnie M. Brashear's excellent Mark Twain, Son of Missouri (1934); Edward Wagenknecht's sane and useful Mark Twain: The Man and His Work (1935); and Ivan Benson's Western Years (1939).

F. G. Meine's Tall Tales from the Southwest (1930) affords a good background for Clemens's humor. For general critical discussion of Clemens, see P. There is a bibliography of Mark Twain in A. B. Paine's biography, and one by Clarissa Rinaker in CHAL, III (1921). See also Brashear's and De Voto's works. M. DeV. Johnson issued A Bibliography of the Works of Mark Twain (1910; 1935), and J. K. Potter, Samuel L. Clemens: First Editions and Values (1932).

THE CELEBRATED JUMPING FROG OF CALAVERAS COUNTY

Originally entitled "Jim Smiley and His Jumping Frog" in the New York Saturday Press, Nov. 18, 1865. Clemens retells in this story an older "tall tale," possibly Negro lore, known along the Mississippi.

In compliance with the request of a friend of mine, who wrote me from the East, I called on good-natured, garrulous old Simon Wheeler, and inquired after my friend's friend, Leonidas W. Smiley, as requested to do, and I hereunto append the result. I have a lurking suspicion that Leonidas W. Smiley is a myth; that my friend never knew such a personage; and that he only conjectured that, if I asked old Wheeler about him, it would remind him of his infamous Jim Smiley, and he would go to work and bore me nearly to death with some infernal reminiscence of him as long and tedious as it should be useless to me. If that was the design, it certainly succeeded.

I found Simon Wheeler dozing comfortably by the bar-room stove of the old, dilapidated tavern in the ancient mining camp of Angel's, and I noticed that he was fat and bald-headed, and had an expression of winning gentleness and simplicity upon his tranquil countenance. He roused up and gave me good-day. I told him a friend of mine had commissioned me to make some inquiries about a cherished companion of his boyhood named Leonidas W. Smiley—Rev. Leonidas W. Smiley—a young minister of the Gospel, who he had heard was at one time a resident of Angel's Camp. I added that, if Mr. Wheeler could tell me anything about this Rev. Leonidas W. Smiley, I would feel under many obligations to him.

Simon Wheeler backed me into a corner and blockaded me there with his chair, and then sat me down and reeled off the monotonous narrative which follows this paragraph. He never smiled, he never frowned, he never changed his voice from the gentle-flowing key to which he tuned the initial sentence, he never betrayed the slightest suspicion of enthusiasm; but all through the interminable narrative there ran a vein of impressive earnestness and sincerity, which showed me plainly that, so far from his imagining that there was anything ridiculous or funny about his story, he regarded it as a really important matter, and admired its two heroes as men of transcendent genius in finesse. To me, the spectacle of a man drifting serenely along through such a queer yarn without ever smiling, was exquisitely absurd. As I said before, I asked him to tell me what he knew of Rev. Leonidas W. Smiley, and he replied as follows. I let him go on in his own way, and never interrupted him once:

There was a feller here once by the name of Jim Smiley, in the winter of '49—or may be it was the spring of '50—I don't recollect exactly, somehow, though what makes me think it was one or the other is because I remember the big flume wasn't finished when he first came to the camp; but any way, he was the curiousest man about always betting on any thing that turned up you ever see, if he could get any body to bet on the other side; and if he couldn't, he'd change sides. Any way that suited the other man would suit him—any way just so's he got a bet, he was satisfied. But still he was lucky, uncommon lucky; he most always come out winner. He was always ready and laying for a chance; there couldn't be no solitary thing mentioned but that feller'd offer to bet on it, and take any side you please, as I was just telling you. If there was a horse-race, you'd find him flush, or you'd find him busted at the end of it; if there was a dog-fight, he'd bet on it; if there was a cat-fight, he'd bet on it; if there was a chicken-fight, he'd bet on it; why, if there was two birds setting on a fence, he would bet you which one would fly first; or if there was a camp-meeting, he would be there reg'lar, to bet on Parson Walker, which he judged to be the best exhorter about there, and so he was, too, and a good man. If he even seen a straddle-bug start to go anywheres, he would bet you how long it would take him to get wherever he was going to, and if you took him up, he would follow that straddle-bug to Mexico but what he would find out where he was bound for and how long he was on the road. Lots of the boys here has seen that Smiley, and can tell you about him. Why, it never made no difference to him—he would bet on any thing—the dangdest feller. Parson Walker's wife laid very sick once, for a good while, and it seemed as if they warn't going to save her; but one morning he come in, and Smiley asked how she was, and he said she was considerable better—thank the Lord for his inf'nit mercy—and coming on so smart that, with the blessing of Prov'dence, she'd get well yet; and Smiley, before he thought, says, "Well, I'll risk two-and-a-half that she won't, any way."

Thish-yer Smiley had a mare—the boys called her the fifteen-minute nag, but that was only in fun, you know, because, of course, she was faster than that—and he used to win money on that horse, for all she was so slow and always had the asthma, or the distemper, or the consumption, or something of that kind. They used to give her two or three hundred yards start, and then pass her under way; but always at the fag-end of the race she'd get excited and desperate-like, and come cavorting and straddling up, and scattering her legs around limber, sometimes in the air, and sometimes out to one side amongst the fences, and kicking up m-o-r-e dust, and raising m-o-r-e racket with her coughing and sneezing and blowing her nose—and always fetch up at the stand just about a neck ahead, as near as you could cypher it down.

And he had a little small bull pup, that to look at him you'd think he wa'n't worth a cent, but to set around and look ornery, and lay for a chance to steal something. But as soon as money was up on him, he was a different dog; his under-jaw'd begin to stick out like the fo'castle of a steamboat, and his teeth would uncover, and shine savage like the furnaces. And a dog might tackle him, and bully-rag him, and bite him, and throw him over his shoulder two or three times, and Andrew Jackson—which was the name of the pup—Andrew Jackson would never let on but what he was satisfied, and hadn't expected nothing else—and the bets being doubled and doubled on the other side all the time, till the money was all up; and then all of a sudden he would grab that other dog jest by the j'int of his hind leg and freeze to it—not chew, you understand, but only jest grip and hang on till they throwed up the sponge, if it was a year. Smiley always come out winner on that pup, till he harnessed a dog once that didn't have no hind legs, because they'd been sawed off by a circular saw, and when the thing had gone along far enough, and the money was all up, and he come to make a snatch for his pet holt, he saw in a minute how he'd been imposed on, and how the other dog had him in the door, so to speak, and he 'peared surprised, and then he looked sorter discouraged-like, and didn't try no more to win the fight, and so he got shucked out bad. He give Smiley a look, as much as to say his heart was broke, and it was his fault, for putting up a dog that hadn't no hind legs for him to take holt of, which was his main dependence in a fight, and then he limped off a piece and laid down and died. It was a good pup, was that Andrew Jackson, and would have made a name for hisself if he'd lived, for the stuff was in him, and he had genius—I know it, because he hadn't had no opportunity to speak of, and it don't stand to reason that a dog could make such a fight as he could under them circumstances, if he hadn't no talent. It always makes me feel sorry when I think of that last fight of his'n, and the way it turned out.

Well, thish-yer Smiley had rat-tarriers, and chicken cocks, and tom-cats, and all them kind of things, till you couldn't rest, and you couldn't fetch nothing for him to bet on but he'd match you. He ketched a frog one day, and took him home, and said he cal'klated to edercate him; and so he never done nothing for three months but set in his back yard and learn that frog to jump. And you bet he did learn him, too. He'd give him a little punch behind, and the next minute you'd see that frog whirling in the air like a doughnut—see him turn one summerset, or may be a couple, if he got a good start, and come down flat-footed and all right, like a cat. He got him up so in the matter of catching flies, and kept him in practice so constant, that he'd nail a fly every time as far as he could see him. Smiley said all a frog wanted was education, and he could do most anything—and I believe him. Why, I've seen him set Dan'l Webster down here on this floor—Dan'l Webster was the name of the frog—and sing out, “Flies, Dan'l, flies!” and quicker'n you could wink, he'd spring straight up, and snake a fly off'n the counter there, and flop down on the floor again as solid as a gob of mud, and fall to scratching the side of his head with his hind foot as indifferent as if he hadn't no idea he'd been doin' any more'n any frog might do. You never see a frog so modest and straightfor'ard as he was, for all he was so gifted. And when it come to fair and square jumping on a dead level, he could get over more ground at one straddle than any animal of his breed you ever see. Jumping on a dead level was his strong suit, you understand; and when it come to that, Smiley would ante up money on him as long as he had a red. Smiley was monstrous proud of his frog, and well he might be, for fellers that had traveled and been everywheres, all said he laid over any frog that ever they see.

Well Smiley kept the beast in a little lattice box, and he used to fetch him down town sometimes and lay for a bet. One day a feller—a stranger in the camp, he was—come across him with his box, and says:

“What might it be that you've got in the box?”

And Smiley says, sorter indifferent like, “It might be a parrot, or it might be a canary, may be, but it ain't—it's only just a frog.”

And the feller took it, and looked at it careful, and turned it round this way and that, and says, “H'm—so 'tis. Well, what's he good for?”

“Well,” Smiley says, easy and careless, “he's good enough for one thing, I should judge—he can outjump any frog in Calaveras county.”

The feller took the box again, and took another long, particular look, and give it back to Smiley, and says, very deliberate, “Well, I don't see no p'int about that frog that's any better'n any other frog.”

“May be you don't,” Smiley says. “May be you understand frogs, and may be you don't understand 'em; may be you've had experience, and may be you an't only a amateur, as it were. Anyways, I've got my opinion, and I'll risk forty dollars he can outjump any frog in Calaveras county.”

And the feller studied a minute, and then says, kinder sad like, “Well, I'm only a stranger here, and I an't got no frog, but if I had a frog, I'd bet you.”

And then Smiley says, “That's all right—that's all right—if you'll hold my box a minute, I'll go and get you a frog.” And so the feller took the box, and put up his forty dollars along with Smiley's, and set down to wait.

So he set there a good while thinking and thinking to hisself, and then he got the frog out and prized his mouth open and took a teaspoon and filled him full of quail shot—filled him pretty near up to his chin—and set him on the floor. Smiley he went to the swamp and slopped around in the mud for a long time, and finally he ketched a frog, and fetched him in, and give him to this feller, and says:

"Now, if you're ready, set him alongside of Dan'l, with his fore-paws just even with Dan'l, and I'll give the word." Then he says, "one—two—three—jump!" and him and the feller touched up the frogs from behind, and the new frog hopped off, but Dan'l give a heave, and hysted up his shoulders—so—like a Frenchman, but it want no use—couldn't budge; he was planted as solid as an anvil, and he couldn't no more stir than if he was anchored out. Smiley was a good deal surprised, and he was disgusted too, but he didn't have no idea what the matter was, of course.

The feller took the money and started away; and when he was going out of the door, he sorter jerked his thumb over his shoulders—this way—at Dan'l, and says again, very deliberate, "Well, I don' see no p'int about that frog that's any better'n any other frog."

Smiley he stood scratching his head and looking down at Dan'l a long time, and at last he says, "I do wonder what in the nation that frog throw'd off for—I wonder if there ain't something the matter with him—he 'pears to look mighty baggy, somehow." And he ketched Dan'l by the nap of the neck, and lifted him up and says, "Why, blame my cats, if he don't weigh five pound!" and turned him upside down, and he belched out a double handful of shot. And then he see how it was, and he was the maddest man—he set the frog down and took out after that feller, but he never ketched him. And—

[Here Simon Wheeler heard his name called from the front yard, and got up to see what was wanted.] And turning to me as he moved away, he said: "Just set where you are, stranger, and rest easy—I an't going to be gone a second."

But, by your leave, I did not think that a continuation of the history of the enterprising vagabond Jim Smiley would be likely to afford me much information concerning the Rev. Leonidas W. Smiley, and so I started away.

At the door I met the sociable Wheeler returning, and he buttonholed me and recommenced:

"Well, thish-yer Smiley had a yaller one-eyed cow that didn't have no tail, only jest a short stump like a bannanner, and—"

"Oh! hang Smiley and his afflicted cow!" I muttered, good-naturedly, and bidding the old gentleman good-day, I departed.

From THE GILDED AGE

Mark Twain said (Autobiography, I, 89-92) that Colonel Mulberry Sellers, the visionary Southern speculator, was not modeled on his father, as many thought, but was his mother's favorite cousin, James Lampton. "I merely put him on paper; he was not a person who could be exaggerated." The novel was dramatized in 1876, and the play had great success, with John T. Raymond in the role of Colonel Sellers.

CHAPTER VIII

[Colonel Sellers, Financial Wizard]

THE supper at Col. Sellers's was not sumptuous, in the beginning, but it improved on acquaintance. That is to say, that what Washington regarded at first sight as mere lowly potatoes, presently became awe-inspiring agricultural productions that had been reared in some ducal garden beyond the sea, under the sacred eye of the duke himself, who had sent them to Sellers; the bread was from corn which could be grown in only one favored locality in the earth and only a favored few could get it; the Rio coffee, which at first seemed execrable to the taste, took to itself an improved flavor when Washington was told to drink it slowly and not hurry what should be a lingering luxury in order to be fully appreciated—it was from the private stores of a Brazilian nobleman with an unrememberable name. The Colonel's tongue was a magician's wand that turned dried apples into figs and water into wine as easily as it could change a hovel into a palace and present poverty into imminent future riches.

Washington slept in a cold bed in a carpetless room and woke up in a palace in the morning; at least the palace lingered during the moment that he was rubbing his eyes and getting his bearings—and then it disappeared and he recognized that the Colonel's inspiring talk had been influencing his dreams. Fatigue had made him sleep late; when he entered the sitting room he noticed that the old haircloth sofa was absent; when he sat down to breakfast the Colonel tossed six or seven dollars in bills on the table, counted them over, said he was a little short and must call upon his banker; then returned the bills to his wallet with the indifferent air of a man who is used to money. The breakfast was not an improvement upon the supper, but the Colonel talked it up and transformed it into an oriental feast. Bye and bye, he said:

"I intend to look out for you, Washington, my boy. I hunted up a place for you yesterday, but I am not referring to that, now—that is a mere livelihood—mere bread and butter; but when I say I mean to look out for you I mean something very different. I mean to put things in your way that will make a mere livelihood a trifling thing. I'll put you in a way to make more money than you'll ever know what to do with. You'll be right here where I can put my hand on you when anything turns up. I've got some prodigious operations on foot; but I'm keeping quiet; mum's the word; your old hand don't go around powwowing and letting everybody see his k'yards and find out his little game. But all in good time, Washington, all in good time. You'll see. Now there's an operation in corn that looks well. Some New York men are trying to get me to go into it—buy up all the growing crops and just boss the market when they mature—ah I tell you it's a great thing. And it only costs a trifle; two millions or two and a half will do it. I haven't exactly promised yet—there's no hurry—the more indifferent I seem, you know, the more anxious those fellows will get. And then there is the hog speculation—that's bigger still. We've got quiet men at work," [he was very impressive here,] "mousing around, to get propositions out of all the farmers in the whole west and northwest for the hog crop, and other agents quietly getting propositions and terms out of all the manufactories—and don't you see, if we can get all the hogs and all the slaughter houses into our hands on the dead quiet—whew! it would take three ships to carry the money.—I've looked into the thing—calculated all the chances for and all the chances against, and though I shake my head and hesitate and keep on thinking, apparently, I've got my mind made up that if the thing can be done on a capital of six millions, that's the horse to put up money on! Why Washington—but what's the use of talking about it—any man can see that there's whole Atlantic oceans of cash in it, gulfs and bays thrown in. But there's a bigger thing than that, yet—a bigger——"

"Why Colonel, you can't want anything bigger!" said Washington, his eyes blazing. "Oh, I wish I could go into either of those speculations—I only wish I had money—I wish I wasn't cramped and kept down and fettered with poverty, and such prodigious chances lying right here in sight! Oh, it is a fearful thing to be poor. But don't throw away those things—they are so splendid and I can see how sure they are. Don't throw them away for something still better and maybe fail in it! I wouldn't, Colonel. I would stick to these. I wish father were here and were his old self again—Oh, he never in his life had such chances as these are. Colonel, you can't improve on these—no man can improve on them!"

A sweet, compassionate smile played about the Colonel's features, and he leaned over the table with the air of a man who is "going to show you" and do it without the least trouble:

"Why Washington, my boy, these things are nothing. They look large—of course they look large to a novice, but to a man who has been all his life accustomed to large operations—shaw! They're well enough to while away an idle hour with, or furnish a bit of employment that will give a trifle of idle capital a chance to earn its bread while it is waiting for something to do, but—now just listen a moment—just let me give you an idea of what we old veterans of commerce call 'business.' Here's the Rothschild's proposition—this is between you and me, you understand——"

Washington nodded three or four times impatiently, and his glowing eyes said, "Yes, yes—hurry—I understand——"

———"for I wouldn't have it get out for a fortune. They want me to go in with them on the sly—agent was here two weeks ago about it—go in on the sly" [voice down to an impressive whisper, now,] "and buy up a hundred and thirteen wild-cat banks in Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky, Illinois and Missouri—<sup>10</sup> notes of these banks are at all sorts of discount now—average discount of the hundred and thirteen is forty-four per cent—buy them all up, you see, and then all of a sudden let the cat out of the bag! Whiz! the stock of every one of those wild-cats would spin up to a tremendous premium before you could turn a handspring—profit on the speculation not a dollar less than forty millions!" [An eloquent pause, while the marvelous vision settled into <sup>20</sup> W.'s focus.] "Where's your hogs now! Why my dear innocent boy, we would just sit down on the front doorsteps and peddle banks like lucifer matches!"

Washington finally got his breath and said: "Oh, it is perfectly wonderful! Why couldn't these things have happened in father's day? And I—it's of no use—they simply lie before my face and mock me. There is nothing for me but to stand helpless and see other people <sup>30</sup> reap the astonishing harvest."

"Never mind, Washington, don't you worry. I'll fix you. There's plenty of chances. How much money have you got?"

In the presence of so many millions, Washington could not keep from blushing when he had to confess that he had but eighteen dollars in the world.

"Well, all right—don't despair. Other people <sup>40</sup> have been obliged to begin with less. I have a small idea that may develop into something for us both, all in good time. Keep your money close and add to it. I'll make it breed. I've been experimenting (to pass away the time,) on a little preparation for curing sore eyes—a kind of decoction nine-tenths water and the other tenth drugs that don't cost more than a dollar a barrel; I'm still experimenting; there's one ingredient wanted yet to perfect the thing, and somehow I can't just manage to hit upon the <sup>50</sup> thing that's necessary, and I don't dare talk with a chemist, of course. But I'm progressing, and before many weeks I wager the country will ring with the fame of Beriah Sellers' Infallible Imperial Oriental Optic Liniment and Salvation for Sore Eyes—the Medical Wonder of the Age! Small bottles fifty cents, large ones a dollar. Average cost, five and seven cents for the two sizes. The first year sell, say, ten thousand bottles in Missouri, seven thousand in <sup>10</sup> Iowa, three thousand in Arkansas, four thousand in Kentucky, six thousand in Illinois, and say twenty-five thousand in the rest of the country. Total, fifty-five thousand bottles; profit clear of all expenses, twenty thousand dollars at the very lowest calculation. All the capital needed is to manufacture the first two thousand bottles—say a hundred and fifty dollars—then the money would begin to flow in. The second year, sales would reach 200,000 <sup>20</sup> bottles—clear profit, say, $75,000—and in the meantime the great factory would be building in St. Louis, to cost, say, $100,000. The third year we could easily sell 1,000,000 bottles in the United States and——"

"O, splendid!" said Washington. "Let's commence right away—let's——"

———"1,000,000 bottles in the United States—profit at least $350,000—and then it would begin to be time to turn our attention toward the real idea of the business."

"The real idea of it! Ain't $350,000 a year a pretty real——"

"Stuff! Why what an infant you are, Washington—what a guileless, short-sighted, easily-contented innocent you are, my poor little country-bred know-nothing! Would I go to all that trouble and bother for the poor crumbs a body might pick up in this country? Now do I look like a man who—does my history <sup>40</sup> suggest that I am a man who deals in trifles, contents himself with the narrow horizon that hems in the common herd, sees no further than the end of his nose? Now you know that that is not me—couldn't be me. You ought to know that if I throw my time and abilities into a patent medicine, it's a patent medicine whose field of operations is the solid earth! its clients the swarming nations that inhabit it! Why what is the republic of America for an eye-water country? Lord bless you, it is nothing <sup>50</sup> but a barren highway that you've got to cross to get to the true eye-water market! Why, Washington, in the Oriental countries people swarm like the sands of the desert; every square mile of ground upholds its thousands upon thousands of struggling human creatures—and every separate and individual devil of them's got the ophthalmia! It's as natural to them as noses are—and sin. It's born with them, it stays with them, it's all that some of them have left when they die. Three years of introductory trade in the Orient and what will be the result? Why, our headquarters would be in Constantinople and our hindquarters in Further India! Factories and warehouses in Cairo, Ispahan, Bagdad, Damascus, Jerusalem, Yedo, Peking, Bangkok, Delhi, Bombay and Calcutta! Annual income—well, God only knows how many millions and millions apiece!"

Washington was so dazed, so bewildered—his heart and his eyes had wandered so far away among the strange lands beyond the seas, and such avalanches of coin and currency had fluttered and jingled confusedly down before him, that he was now as one who has been whirling round and round for a time, and, stopping all at once, finds his surroundings still whirling and all objects a dancing chaos. However, little by little the Sellers family cooled down and crystallized into shape, and the poor room lost its glitter and resumed its poverty. Then the youth found his voice and begged Sellers to drop everything and hurry up the eye-water; and he got his eighteen dollars and tried to force it upon the Colonel—pleaded with him to take it—implored him to do it. But the Colonel would not; said he would not need the capital (in his native magnificent way he called that eighteen dollars Capital) till the eye-water was an accomplished fact. He made Washington easy in his mind, though, by promising that he would call for it just as soon as the invention was finished, and he added the glad tidings that nobody but just they two should be admitted to a share in the speculation.

When Washington left the breakfast table he could have worshiped that man. Washington was one of that kind of people whose hopes are in the very clouds one day and in the gutter the next. He walked on air, now. The Colonel was ready to take him around and introduce him to the employment he had found for him, but Washington begged for a few moments in which to write home; with his kind of people, to ride today's new interest to death and put off yesterday's till another time, is nature itself. He ran up stairs and wrote glowingly, enthusiastically, to his mother about the hogs and the corn, the banks and the eye-water—and added a few inconsequential millions to each project. And he said that people little dreamed what a man Col. Sellers was, and that the world would open its eyes when it found out. And he closed his letter thus:

"So make yourself perfectly easy, mother—in a little while you shall have everything you want, and more. I am not likely to stint you in anything, I fancy. This money will not be for me, alone, but for all of us. I want all to share alike; and there is going to be far more for each than one person can spend. Break it to father cautiously—you understand the need of that—break it to him cautiously, for he has had such cruel hard fortune, and is so stricken by it that great good news might prostrate him more surely than even bad, for he is used to the bad but is grown sadly unaccustomed to the other. Tell Laura—tell all the children. And write to Clay about it if he is not with you yet; You may tell Clay that whatever I get he can freely share in—freely. He knows that that is true—there will be no need that I should swear to that to make him believe it. Good-bye—and mind what I say: Rest perfectly easy, one and all of you, for our troubles are nearly at an end."

Poor lad, he could not know that his mother would cry some loving, compassionate tears over his letter and put off the family with a synopsis of its contents which conveyed a deal of love to them but not much idea of his prospects or projects. And he never dreamed that such a joyful letter could sadden her and fill her night with sighs, and troubled thoughts, and bodings of the future, instead of filling it with peace and blessing it with restful sleep.

When the letter was done, Washington and the Colonel sallied forth, and as they walked along Washington learned what he was to be. He was to be a clerk in a real estate office. Instantly the fickle youth's dreams forsook the magic eye-water and flew back to the Tennessee Land. And the gorgeous possibilities of that great domain straightway began to occupy his imagination to such a degree that he could scarcely manage to keep even enough of his attention upon the Colonel's talk to retain the general run of what he was saying. He was glad it was a real estate office—he was a made man now, sure.

The Colonel said that General Boswell was a rich man and had a good and growing business; and that Washington's work would be light and he would get forty dollars a month and be boarded and lodged in the General's family—which was as good as ten dollars more; and even better, for he could not live as well even at the "City Hotel" as he would there, and yet the hotel charged fifteen dollars a month where a man had a good room.

General Boswell was in his office; a comfortable looking place, with plenty of outline maps hanging about the walls and in the windows, and a spectacled man was marking out another one on a long table. The office was in the principal street. The General received Washington with a kindly but reserved politeness. Washington rather liked his looks. He was about fifty years old, dignified, well preserved and well dressed. After the Colonel took his leave, the General talked a while with Washington—his talk consisting chiefly of instructions about the clerical duties of the place. He seemed satisfied as to Washington's ability to take care of the books, he was evidently a pretty fair theoretical bookkeeper, and experience would soon harden theory into practice. By and by dinnertime came, and the two walked to the General's house; and now Washington noticed an instinct in himself that moved him to keep not in the General's rear, exactly, but yet not at his side—somehow the old gentleman's dignity and reserve did not inspire familiarity.

From LIFE ON THE MISSISSIPPI

CHAPTER VI

A Cub-Pilot's Experience

WHAT with lying on the rocks four days at Louisville, and some other delays, the poor old Paul Jones fooled away about two weeks in making the voyage from Cincinnati to New Orleans. This gave me a chance to get acquainted with one of the pilots, and he taught me how to steer the boat, and thus made the fascination of river life more potent than ever for me.

It also gave me a chance to get acquainted with a youth who had taken deck passage—more's the pity; for he easily borrowed six dollars of me on a promise to return to the boat and pay it back to me the day after we should arrive. But he probably died or forgot, for he never came. It was doubtless the former, since he had said his parents were wealthy, and he only traveled deck passage because it was cooler.

I soon discovered two things. One was that a vessel would not be likely to sail for the mouth of the Amazon under ten or twelve years; and the other was that the nine or ten dollars still left in my pocket would not suffice for so impossible an exploration as I had planned, even if I could afford to wait for a ship. Therefore it followed that I must contrive a new career. The Paul Jones was now bound for St. Louis. I planned a siege against my pilot, and at the end of three hard days he surrendered. He agreed to teach me the Mississippi River from New Orleans to St. Louis for five hundred dollars, payable out of the first wages I should receive after graduating. I entered upon the small enterprise of "learning" twelve or thirteen hundred miles of the great Mississippi River with the easy confidence of my time of life. If I had really known what I was about to require of my faculties, I should not have had the courage to begin. I supposed that all a pilot had to do was to keep his boat in the river, and I did not consider that that could be much of a trick, since it was so wide.

The boat backed out from New Orleans at four in the afternoon, and it was "our watch" until eight. Mr. Bixby, my chief, "straightened her up," plowed her along past the sterns of the other boats that lay at the Levee, and then said, "Here, take her; shave those steamships as close as you'd peel an apple." I took the wheel, and my heartbeat fluttered up into the hundreds; for it seemed to me that we were about to scrape the side off every ship in the line, we were so close. I held my breath and began to claw the boat away from the danger; and I had my own opinion of the pilot who had known no better than to get us into such peril, but I was too wise to express it. In half a minute I had a wide margin of safety intervening between the Paul Jones and the ships; and within ten seconds more I was set aside in disgrace, and Mr. Bixby was going into danger again and flaying me alive with abuse of my cowardice. I was stung, but I was obliged to admire the easy confidence with which my chief loafed from side to side of his wheel, and trimmed the ships so closely that disaster seemed ceaselessly imminent. When he had cooled a little he told me that the easy water was close ashore and the current outside, and therefore we must hug the bank, upstream, to get the benefit of the former, and stay well out, downstream, to take advantage of the latter. In my own mind I resolved to be a downstream pilot and leave the upstreaming to people dead to prudence.

Now and then Mr. Bixby called my attention to certain things. Said he, "This is Six-Mile Point." I assented. It was pleasant enough information, but I could not see the bearing of it. I was not conscious that it was a matter of any interest to me. Another time he said, "This is Nine-Mile Point." Later he said, "This is Twelve-Mile Point." They were all about level with the water's edge; they all looked about alike to me; they were monotonously unpicturesque. I hoped Mr. Bixby would change the subject. But no; he would crowd up around a point, hugging the shore with affection, and then say: "The slack water ends here, abreast this bunch of China trees; now we cross over." So he crossed over. He gave me the wheel once or twice, but I had no luck. I either came near chipping off the edge of a sugar-plantation, or I yawed too far from shore, and so dropped back into disgrace again and got abused.

The watch was ended at last, and we took supper and went to bed. At midnight the glare of a lantern shone in my eyes, and the night watchman said:

"Come, turn out!"

And then he left. I could not understand this extraordinary procedure; so I presently gave up trying to, and dozed off to sleep. Pretty soon the watchman was back again, and this time he was gruff. I was annoyed. I said:

"What do you want to come bothering around here in the middle of the night for? Now, as like as not, I'll not get to sleep again tonight."

The watchman said:

"Well, if this ain't good, I'm blessed."

The "off-watch" was just turning in, and I heard some brutal laughter from them, and such remarks as "Hello, watchman! ain't the new cub turned out yet? He's delicate, likely. Give him some sugar in a rag, and send for the chambermaid to sing 'Rock-a-by Baby,' to him."

About this time Mr. Bixby appeared on the scene. Something like a minute later I was climbing the pilot-house steps with some of my clothes on and the rest in my arms. Mr. Bixby was close behind, commenting. Here was something fresh—this thing of getting up in the middle of the night to go to work. It was a detail in piloting that had never occurred to me at all. I knew that boats ran all night, but somehow I had never happened to reflect that somebody had to get out of a warm bed to run them. I began to fear that piloting was not quite so romantic as I had imagined it was; there was something very real and worklike about this new phase of it.

It was a rather dingy night, although a fair number of stars were out. The big mate was at the wheel, and he had the old tub pointed at a star and was holding her straight up the middle of the river. The shores on either hand were not much more than half a mile apart, but they seemed wonderfully far away and ever so vague and indistinct. The mate said:

"We've got to land at Jones's plantation, sir."

The vengeful spirit in me exulted. I said to myself, "I wish you joy of your job, Mr. Bixby; you'll have a good time finding Mr. Jones's plantation such a night as this; and I hope you never will find it as long as you live."

Mr. Bixby said to the mate:

"Upper end of the plantation, or the lower?"

"Upper."

"I can't do it. The stumps there are out of water at this stage. It's no great distance to the lower, and you'll have to get along with that."

"All right, sir. If Jones don't like it, he'll have to lump it, I reckon."

And then the mate left. My exultation began to cool and my wonder to come up. Here was a man who not only proposed to find this plantation on such a night, but to find either end of it you preferred. I dreadfully wanted to ask a question, but I was carrying about as many short answers as my cargo-room would admit of, so I held my peace. All I desired to ask Mr. Bixby was the simple question whether he was ass enough to really imagine he was going to find that plantation on a night when all plantations were exactly alike and all of the same color. But I held in. I used to have fine inspirations of prudence in those days.

Mr. Bixby made for the shore and soon was scraping it, just the same as if it had been daylight. And not only that, but singing:

"Father in heaven, the day is declining," etc. It seemed to me that I had put my life in the keeping of a peculiarly reckless outcast. Presently he turned on me and said:

"What's the name of the first point above New Orleans?"

I was gratified to be able to answer promptly, and I did. I said I didn't know.

"Don't know?"

This manner jolted me. I was down at the foot again, in a moment. But I had to say just what I had said before.

"Well, you're a smart one!" said Mr. Bixby. "What's the name of the next point?"

Once more I didn't know.

"Well, this beats anything. Tell me the name of any point or place I told you."

I studied awhile and decided that I couldn't.

"Look here! What do you start out from, above Twelve-Mile Point, to cross over?"

"I—I—don't know."

"You—you—don't know?" mimicking my drawling manner of speech. "What do you know?"

"I—I—nothing, for certain."

"By the great Caesar's ghost, I believe you! You're the stupidest dunderhead I ever saw or ever heard of, so help me Moses! The idea of you being a pilot—you! Why, you don't know enough to pilot a cow down a lane."

Oh, but his wrath was up! He was a nervous man, and he shuffled from one side of his wheel to the other as if the floor was hot. He would boil awhile to himself, and then overflow and scald me again.

"Look here! What do you suppose I told you the names of those points for?"

I tremblingly considered a moment, and then the devil of temptation provoked me to say:

"Well to—to—be entertaining, I thought."

This was a red rag to the bull. He raged and stormed so (he was crossing the river at the time) that I judged it made him blind, because he ran over the steering-oar of a trading scow. Of course the traders sent up a volley of red-hot profanity. Never was a man so grateful as Mr. Bixby was; because he was brimful, and here were subjects who could talk back. He threw open a window, thrust his head out, and such an irruption followed as I never had heard before. The fainter and farther away the scowmen's curses drifted, the higher Mr. Bixby lifted his voice and the weightier his adjectives grew. When he closed the window he was empty. You could have drawn a seine through his system and not caught curses enough to disturb your mother with. Presently he said to me in the gentlest way:

"My boy, you must get a little memorandum-book; and every time I tell you a thing, put it down right away. There's only one way to be a pilot, and that is to get this entire river by heart. You have to know it just like A B C."

That was a dismal revelation to me; for my memory was never loaded with anything but blank cartridges. However, I did not feel discouraged long. I judged that it was best to make some allowances, for doubtless Mr. Bixby was "stretching." Presently he pulled a rope and struck a few strokes on the big bell. The stars were all gone now, and the night was as black as ink. I could hear the wheels churn along the bank, but I was not entirely certain that I could see the shore. The voice of the invisible watchman called up from the hurricane-deck:

"What's this, sir?"

"Jones's plantation."

I said to myself, "I wish I might venture to offer a small bet that it isn't." But I did not chirp. I only waited to see. Mr. Bixby handled the engine-bells, and in due time the boat's nose came to the land, a torch glowed from the fore-castle, a man skipped ashore, a darky's voice on the bank said: "Gimme de k'yarpet-bag, Mass' Jones," and the next moment we were standing up the river again, all serene. I reflected deeply awhile, and then said—but not aloud—"Well, the find of that plantation was the luckiest accident that ever happened; but it couldn't happen again in a hundred years." And I fully believed it was an accident, too.

By the time we had gone seven or eight hundred miles up the river, I had learned to be a tolerably plucky upstream steersman, in daylight; and before we reached St. Louis I had made a trifle of progress in night work, but only a trifle. I had a notebook that fairly bristled with the names of towns, "points," bars, islands, bends, reaches, etc.; but the information was to be found only in the notebook—none of it was in my head. It made my heart ache to think I had only got half of the river set down; for as our watch was four hours off and four hours on, day and night, there was a long four-hour gap in my book for every time I had slept since the voyage began.

My chief was presently hired to go on a big New Orleans boat, and I packed my satchel and went with him. She was a grand affair. When I stood in her pilot-house I was so far above the water that I seemed perched on a mountain; and her decks stretched so far away, fore and aft, below me, that I wondered how I could ever have considered the little Paul Jones a large craft. There were other differences, too. The Paul Jones's pilot-house was a cheap, dingy, battered rattletrap, cramped for room; but here was a sumptuous glass temple; room enough to have a dance in; showy red and gold window-curtains; an imposing sofa; leather cushions and a back to the high bench where visiting pilots sit, to spin yarns and "look at the river"; bright, fanciful "cuspidores," instead of a broad wooden box filled with sawdust; nice new oilcloth on the floor; a hospitable big stove for winter; a wheel as high as my head, costly with inlaid work; a wire tiller-rope; bright brass knobs for the bells; and a tidy, white-aproned, black "texas-tender," to bring up tarts and ices and coffee during mid-watch, day and night. Now this was "something like"; and so I began to take heart once more to believe that piloting was a romantic sort of occupation after all. The moment we were under way I began to prowl about the great steamer and fill myself with joy. She was as clean and as dainty as a drawing-room; when I looked down her long, gilded saloon, it was like gazing through a splendid tunnel; she had an oil-picture, by some gifted sign-painter, on every stateroom door; she glittered with no end of prism-fringed chandeliers; the clerk's office was elegant, the bar was marvelous, and the barkeeper had been barbered and upholstered at incredible cost. The boiler-deck (i.e., the second story of the boat, so to speak) was as spacious as a church, it seemed to me; so with the fore-castle; and there was no pitiful handful of deck-hands, firemen, and roustabouts down there, but a whole battalion of men. The fires were fiercely glaring from a long row of furnaces, and over them were eight huge boilers! This was unutterable pomp. The mighty engines—but enough of this. I had never felt so fine before. And when I found that the regiment of natty servants respectfully "sir'd" me, my satisfaction was complete.

CHAPTER VII

A Daring Deed

WHEN I returned to the pilot-house St. Louis was gone, and I was lost. Here was a piece of river which was all down in my book, but I could make neither head nor tail of it; you understand, it was turned around. I had seen it when coming upstream, but I had never faced about to see how it looked when it was behind me. My heart broke again, for it was plain that I had got to learn this troublesome river both ways.

The pilot-house was full of pilots, going down to "look at the river." What is called the "upper river" (the two hundred miles between St. Louis and Cairo, where the Ohio comes in) was low; and the Mississippi changes its channel so constantly that the pilots used to always find it necessary to run down to Cairo to take a fresh look, when their boats were to lie in port a week; that is, when the water was at a low stage. A deal of this "looking at the river" was done by poor fellows who seldom had a berth, and whose only hope of getting one lay in their being always freshly posted and therefore ready to drop into the shoes of some reputable pilot, for a single trip, on account of such pilot's sudden illness, or some other necessity. And a good many of them constantly ran up and down inspecting the river, not because they ever really hoped to get a berth, but because (they being guests of the boat) it was cheaper to "look at the river" than stay ashore and pay board. In time these fellows grew dainty in their tastes, and only infested boats that had an established reputation for setting good tables. All visiting pilots were useful, for they were always ready and willing, winter or summer, night or day, to go out in the yawl and help buoy the channel or assist the boat's pilot in any way they could. They were likewise welcome because all pilots are tireless talkers, when gathered together, and as they talk only about the river they are always understood and are always interesting. Your true pilot cares nothing about anything on earth but the river, and his pride in his occupation surpasses the pride of kings.

We had a fine company of these river inspectors along this trip. There were eight or ten, and there was abundance of room for them in our great pilot-house. Two or three of them wore polished silk hats, elaborate shirt-fronts, diamond breastpins, kid gloves, and patent-leather boots. They were choice in their English, and bore themselves with a dignity proper to men of solid means and prodigious reputation as pilots. The others were more or less loosely clad, and wore upon their heads tall felt cones that were suggestive of the days of the Commonwealth.

I was a cipher in this august company, and felt subdued, not to say torpid. I was not even of sufficient consequence to assist at the wheel when it was necessary to put the tiller hard down in a hurry; the guest that stood nearest did that when occasion required—and this was pretty much all the time, because of the crookedness of the channel and the scant water. I stood in a corner; and the talk I listened to took the hope all out of me. One visitor said to another:

"Jim, how did you run Plum Point, coming up?"

"It was in the night, there, and I ran it the way one of the boys on the Diana told me; started out about fifty yards above the woodpile on the false point, and held on the cabin under Plum Point till I raised the reef—quarter less twain—then straightened up for the middle bar till I got well abreast the old one-limbed cottonwood in the bend, then got my stern on the cottonwood, and head on the low place above the point, and came through a-booming—nine and a half."

"Pretty square crossing, ain't it?"

"Yes, but the upper bar's working down fast."

Another pilot spoke up and said:

"I had better water than that, and ran it lower down; started out from the false point—mark twain—raised the second reef abreast the big snag in the bend, and had quarter less twain."

One of the gorgeous ones remarked:

"I don't want to find fault with your leadmen, but that's a good deal of water for Plum Point, it seems to me."

There was an approving nod all around as this quiet snub dropped on the boaster and "settled" him. And so they went on talk-talk-talking. Meantime, the thing that was running in my mind was, "Now, if my ears hear aright, I have not only to get the names of all the towns and islands and bends, and so on, by heart, but I must even get up a personal acquaintanceship with every old snag and one-limbed cottonwood and obscure woodpile that ornaments the banks of this river for twelve hundred miles; and more than that, I must actually know where these things are in the dark, unless these guests are gifted with eyes that can pierce through two miles of solid blackness. I wish the piloting business was in Jericho and I had never thought of it."

At dusk, Mr. Bixby tapped the big bell three times (the signal to land), and the captain emerged from his drawing-room in the forward end of the "texas," and looked up inquiringly. Mr. Bixby said:

"We will lay up here all night, captain."

"Very well, sir."

That was all. The boat came to shore and was tied up for the night. It seemed to me a fine thing that the pilot could do as he pleased, without asking so grand a captain's permission. I took my supper and went immediately to bed, discouraged by my day's observations and experiences. My late voyage's note-booking was but a confusion of meaningless names. It had tangled me all up in a knot every time I had looked at it in the daytime. I now hoped for respite in sleep; but no, it reveled all through my head till sunrise again, a frantic and tireless nightmare.

Next morning I felt pretty rusty and low-spirited. We went booming along, taking a good many chances, for we were anxious to "get out of the river" (as getting on to Cairo was called) before night should overtake us. But Mr. Bixby's partner, the other pilot, presently grounded the boat, and we lost so much time getting her off that it was plain the darkness would overtake us a good long way above the mouth. This was a great misfortune, especially to certain of our visiting pilots, whose boats would have to wait for their return, no matter how long that might be. It sobered the pilot-house talk a good deal. Coming upstream, pilots did not mind low water or any kind of darkness; nothing stopped them but fog. But downstream work was different; a boat was too nearly helpless, with a stiff current pushing behind her; so it was not customary to run downstream at night in low water.

There seemed to be one small hope, however. If we could get through the intricate and dangerous Hat Island crossing before night, we could venture the rest, for we would have plainer sailing and better water. But it would be insanity to attempt Hat Island at night. So there was a good deal of looking at watches all the rest of the day, and a constant ciphering upon the speed we were making; Hat Island was the eternal subject; sometimes hope was high and sometimes we were delayed in a bad crossing, and down it went again. For hours all hands lay under the burden of this suppressed excitement; it was even communicated to me, and I got to feeling so solicitous about Hat Island, and under such an awful pressure of responsibility, that I wished I might have five minutes on shore to draw a good, full, relieving breath, and start over again. We were standing no regular watches. Each of our pilots ran such portions of the river as he had run when coming upstream, because of his greater familiarity with it; but both remained in the pilot-house constantly.

An hour before sunset Mr. Bixby took the wheel, and Mr. W. stepped aside. For the next thirty minutes every man held his watch in his hand and was restless, silent, and uneasy. At last somebody said, with a doleful sigh:

"Well, yonder's Hat Island—and we can't make it."

All the watches closed with a snap, everybody sighed and muttered something about its being "too bad, too bad—ah, if we could only have got here half an hour sooner!" and the place was thick with the atmosphere of disappointment. Some started to go out, but loitered, hearing no bell-tap to land. The sun dipped behind the horizon, the boat went on. Inquiring looks passed from one guest to another; and one who had his hand on the door-knob and had turned it, waited, then presently took away his hand and let the knob turn back again. We bore steadily down the bend. More looks were exchanged, and nods of surprised admiration—but no words. Insensibly the men drew together behind Mr. Bixby, as the sky darkened and one or two dim stars came out. The dead silence and sense of waiting became oppressive. Mr. Bixby pulled the cord, and two deep, mellow notes from the big bell floated off on the night. The watchman's voice followed, from the hurricane deck:

"Labboard lead, there! Stabboard lead!"

The cries of the leadsmen began to rise out of the distance, and were gruffly repeated by the word-passers on the hurricane deck.

"M-a-r-k three! M-a-r-k three! Quarter-less-three! Half twain! Quarter twain! M-a-r-k twain! Quarter-les——"

Mr. Bixby pulled two bell-ropes, and was answered by faint jinglings far below in the engine-room, and our speed slackened. The steam began to whistle through the gauge-cocks. The cries of the leadsmen went on—<sup>10</sup> and it is a weird sound, always, in the night. Every pilot in the lot was watching now, with fixed eyes, and talking under his breath. Nobody was calm and easy but Mr. Bixby. He would put his wheel down and stand on a spoke, and as the steamer swung into her (to me) utterly invisible marks—for we seemed to be in the midst of a wide and gloomy sea—he would meet and fasten her there. Out of the murmur of half-audible talk, one caught a co-<sup>20</sup>herent sentence now and then—such as:

"There; she's over the first reef all right!"

After a pause, another subdued voice:

"Her stern's coming down just exactly right, by George!"

"Now she's in the marks; over she goes!"

Somebody else muttered:

"Oh, it was done beautiful—beautiful!"

Now the engines were stopped altogether, and we drifted with the current. Not that I<sup>30</sup> could see the boat drift, for I could not, the stars being all gone by this time. The drifting was the dismalest work; it held one's heart still. Presently I discovered a blacker gloom than that which surrounded us. It was the head of the island. We were closing right down upon it. We entered its deeper shadow, and so imminent seemed the peril that I was likely to suffocate; and I had the strongest impulse to do something, anything, to save the vessel. But<sup>40</sup> still Mr. Bixby stood by his wheel, silent, intent as a cat, and all the pilots stood shoulder to shoulder at his back.

"She'll not make it!" somebody whispered.

The water grew shoaler and shoaler, by the leadsmen's cries, till it was down to:

"Eight-and-a-half! E-i-g-h-t feet! E-i-g-h-t feet!"

"Seven-and——"

Mr. Bixby said warningly through his speak-<sup>50</sup>ing tube to the engineer:

"Stand by, now!"

"Ay, ay, sir!"

"Seven-and-a-half! Seven feet! Six-and——"

We touched bottom! Instantly Mr. Bixby set a lot of bells ringing, shouted through the tube, "Now, let her have it—every ounce you've got!" Then to his partner, "Put her hard down! snatch her! snatch her!" The boat rasped and ground her way through the sand, hung upon the apex of disaster a single trem-<sup>10</sup>endous instant, and then over she went! And such a shout as went up at Mr. Bixby's back never loosened the roof of a pilot-house be-<sup>20</sup>fore!

There was no more trouble after that. Mr. Bixby was a hero that night; and it was some little time, too, before his exploit ceased to be talked about by the river men.

Fully to realize the marvelous precision re-<sup>30</sup>quired in laying the great steamer in her marks in that murky waste of water, one should know that not only must she pick her intricate way through snags and blind reefs, and then shave the head of the island so closely as to brush the overhanging foliage with her stern, but at one place she must pass almost within arm's reach of a sunken and invisible wreck that would snatch the hull timbers from under her if she should strike it, and destroy a quarter million dollars' worth of steamboat and cargo in five<sup>40</sup> minutes, and maybe a hundred and fifty human lives into the bargain.

The last remark I heard that night was a compliment to Mr. Bixby uttered in soliloquy and with unction by one of our guests. He said:

"By the Shadow of Death, but he's a light-<sup>50</sup>ning pilot!"

Perplexing Lessons

At the end of what seemed a tedious while, I had managed to pack my head full of islands, towns, bars, "points," and bends; and a curi-<sup>10</sup>ously inanimate mass of lumber it was, too. However, inasmuch as I could shut my eyes and reel off a good long string of these names without leaving out more than ten miles of river in every fifty, I began to feel that I could<sup>20</sup> take a boat down to New Orleans if I could make her skip those little gaps. But of course my complacency could hardly get start enough to lift my nose a trifle into the air, before Mr. Bixby would think of something to fetch it down again. One day he turned on me suddenly with this settler:

"What is the shape of Walnut Bend?"

He might as well have asked me my grandmother's opinion of protoplasm. I reflected respectfully, and then said I didn't know it had any particular shape. My gun-powdery chief <sup>10</sup> went off with a bang, of course, and then went on loading and firing until he was out of adjectives.

I had learned long ago that he only carried just so many rounds of ammunition, and was sure to subside into a very placable and even remorseful old smoothbore as soon as they were all gone. That word "old" is merely affectionate; he was not more than thirty-four. I waited. By and by he said:

"My boy, you've got to know the shape of the river perfectly. It is all there is left to steer by on a very dark night. Everything else is blotted out and gone. But mind you, it hasn't the same shape in the night that it has in the daytime."

"How on earth am I ever going to learn it, then?"

"How do you follow a hall at home in the dark? Because you know the shape of it. You <sup>30</sup> can't see it."

"Do you mean to say that I've got to know all the million trifling variations of shape in the banks of this interminable river as well as I know the shape of the front hall at home?"

"On my honor, you've got to know them better than any man ever did know the shapes of the halls in his own house."

"I wish I was dead!"

"Now I don't want to discourage you, <sup>40</sup> but—"

"Well, pile it on me; I might as well have it now as another time."

"You see, this has got to be learned; there isn't any getting around it. A clear starlight night throws such heavy shadows that, if you didn't know the shape of a shore perfectly, you would claw away from every bunch of timber, because you would take the black shadow of it for a solid cape; and you see you <sup>50</sup> would be getting scared to death every fifteen minutes by the watch. You would be fifty yards from shore all the time when you ought to be within fifty feet of it. You can't see a snag in one of those shadows, but you know exactly where it is, and the shape of the river tells you when you are coming to it. Then there's your pitch-dark night; the river is a very different shape on a pitch-dark night from what it is on a starlight night. All shores seem to be straight lines, then, and mighty dim ones, too; and you'd run them for straight lines, only you know better. You boldly drive your boat right into what seems to be a solid, straight wall (you knowing very well that in reality there is a curve there), and that wall falls back and makes way for you. Then there's your gray mist. You take a night when there's one of these grisly, drizzly, gray mists, and then there isn't any particular shape to a shore.

<sup>20</sup> A gray mist would tangle the head of the oldest man that ever lived. Well, then, different kinds of moonlight change the shape of the river in different ways. You see——"

"Oh, don't say any more, please! Have I got to learn the shape of the river according to all these five hundred thousand different ways? If I tried to carry all that cargo in my head it would make me stoop-shouldered."

"No! you only learn the shape of the river; and you learn it with such absolute certainty that you can always steer by the shape that's in your head, and never mind the one that's before your eyes."

"Very well, I'll try it; but, after I have learned it, can I depend on it? Will it keep the same form and not go fooling around?"

Before Mr. Bixby could answer, Mr. W. came in to take the watch, and he said:

"Bixby, you'll have to look out for President's Island, and all that country clear away up above the Old Hen and Chickens. The banks are caving and the shape of the shores changing like everything. Why, you wouldn't know the point above <sup>40</sup> you can go up inside the old sycamore snag, now."

So that question was answered. Here were leagues of shore changing shape. My spirits were down in the mud again. Two things seemed pretty apparent to me. One was, that in order to be a pilot a man had got to learn more than any one man ought to be allowed to know; and the other was, that he must learn it all over again in a different way every twenty-four hours.

That night we had the watch until twelve. Now it was an ancient river custom for the two pilots to chat a bit when the watch changed. While the relieving pilot put on his gloves and lit his cigar, his partner, the retiring pilot, would say something like this:

"I judge the upper bar is making down a little at Hale's Point; had quarter twain with the lower lead and mark twain with the other."

"Yes, I thought it was making down a little, last trip. Meet any boats?"

"Met one abreast the head of 21, but she was away over hugging the bar, and I couldn't make her out entirely. I took her for the Sunny South—hadn't any skylights forward of the chimneys."

And so on. And as the relieving pilot took the wheel his partner would mention that we were in such-and-such a bend, and say we were abreast of such-and-such a man's woodyard or plantation. This was courtesy; I supposed it was necessity. But Mr. W. came on watch full twelve minutes late on this particular night—a tremendous breach of etiquette; in fact, it is the unpardonable sin among pilots. So Mr. Bixby gave him no greeting whatever, but simply surrendered the wheel and marched out of the pilot-house without a word. I was appalled; it was a villainous night for blackness, we were in a particularly wide and blind part of the river, where there was no shape or substance to anything, and it seemed incredible that Mr. Bixby should have left that poor fellow to kill the boat, trying to find out where he was. But I resolved that I would stand by him anyway. He should find that he was not wholly friendless. So I stood around, and waited to be asked where we were. But Mr. W. plunged on serenely through the solid firmament of black cats that stood for an atmosphere, and never opened his mouth. "Here is a proud devil!" thought I; "here is a limb of Satan that would rather send us all to destruction than put himself under obligations to me, because I am not yet one of the salt of the earth and privileged to snub captains and lord it over everything dead and alive in a steam-boat." I presently climbed up on the bench; I did not think it was safe to go to sleep while this lunatic was on watch.

However, I must have gone to sleep in the course of time, because the next thing I was aware of was the fact that day was breaking, Mr. W. gone, and Mr. Bixby at the wheel again. So it was four o'clock and all well—but me; I felt like a skinful of dry bones, and all of them trying to ache at once.

Mr. Bixby asked me what I had stayed up there for. I confessed that it was to do Mr. W. a benevolence—tell him where he was. It took five minutes for the entire preposterousness of the thing to filter into Mr. Bixby's system, and then I judge it filled him nearly up to the chin; because he paid me a compliment—and not much of a one either. He said:

"Well, taking you by and large, you do seem to be more different kinds of an ass than any creature I ever saw before. What did you suppose he wanted to know for?"

I said I thought it might be a convenience to him.

"Convenience! D——nation! Didn't I tell you that a man's got to know the river in the night the same as he'd know his own front hall?"

"Well, I can follow the front hall in the dark if I know it is the front hall; but suppose you set me down in the middle of it in the dark and not tell me which hall it is; how am I to know?"

"Well, you've got to, on the river!"

"All right. Then I'm glad I never said anything to Mr. W."

"I should say so! Why, he'd have slammed you through the window and utterly ruined a hundred dollars' worth of window-sash and stuff."

I was glad this damage had been saved, for it would have made me unpopular with the owners. They always hated anybody who had the name of being careless and injuring things.

I went to work now to learn the shape of the river; and of all the eluding and ungraspable objects that ever I tried to get mind or hands on, that was the chief. I would fasten my eyes upon a sharp, wooded point that projected far into the river some miles ahead of me, and go to laboriously photographing its shape upon my brain; and just as I was beginning to succeed to my satisfaction, we would draw up toward it and the exasperating thing would begin to melt away and fold back into the bank! If there had been a conspicuous dead tree standing upon the very point of the cape, I would find that tree inconspicuously merged into the general forest, and occupying the middle of a straight shore, when I got abreast of it! No prominent hill would stick to its shape long enough for me to make up my mind what its form really was, but it was as dissolving and changeful as if it had been a mountain of butter in the hottest corner of the tropics. Nothing ever had the same shape when I was coming downstream that it had borne when I went up. I mentioned these little difficulties to Mr. Bixby. He said:

"That's the very main virtue of the thing. If the shapes didn't change every three seconds they wouldn't be of any use. Take this place where we are now, for instance. As long as that hill over yonder is only one hill, I can boom right along the way I'm going; but the moment it splits at the top and forms a V, I know I've got to scratch to starboard in a hurry, or I'll bang this boat's brains out against a rock; and then the moment one of the prongs of the V swings behind the other, I've got to waltz to larboard again, or I'll have a misunderstanding with a snag that would snatch the keelson out of this steamboat as neatly as if it were a sliver in your hand. If that hill didn't change its shape on bad nights there would be an awful steamboat graveyard around here inside of a year."

It was plain that I had got to learn the shape of the river in all the different ways that could be thought of—upside down, wrong end first, inside out, fore-and-aft, and "short-ships"—and then know what to do on gray nights when it hadn't any shape at all. So I set about it. In the course of time I began to get the best of this knotty lesson, and my self-complacency moved to the front once more. Mr. Bixby was all fixed, and ready to start it to the rear again. He opened on me after this fashion:

"How much water did we have in the middle crossing at Hole-in-the-Wall, trip before last?"

I considered this an outrage. I said:

"Every trip, down and up, the leadsmen are singing through that tangled place for three-quarters of an hour on a stretch. How do you reckon I can remember such a mess as that?"

"My boy, you've got to remember it. You've got to remember the exact spot and the exact marks the boat lay in when we had the shoalest water, in every one of the five hundred shoal places between St. Louis and New Orleans; and you mustn't get the shoal soundings and marks of one trip mixed up with the shoal soundings and marks of another, either, for they're not often twice alike. You must keep them separate."

When I came to myself again, I said:

"When I get so that I can do that, I'll be able to raise the dead, and then I won't have to pilot a steamboat to make a living. I want to retire from this business. I want a slush-bucket and a brush; I'm only fit for a roustabout. I haven't got brains enough to be a pilot; and if I had I wouldn't have strength enough to carry them around, unless I went on crutches."

"Now drop that! When I say I'll learn a man the river, I mean it. And you can depend on it, I'll learn him or kill him."

1837 ~ William Dean Howells ~ 1920

WILLIAM DEAN HOWELLS was a leader in championing realism during the latter part of the nineteenth century. Like Jane Austen, whom he greatly admired, he preferred the realism of the commonplace and believed that fiction should deal with ordinary persons, everyday happenings, and well-known scenes. He disapproved of the romantic, the sensational, and the exaggerated, and desired the actual rather than an idealized presentation of life.

Howells was born on March 1, 1837, at Martin's Ferry, Ohio. His grandfather on his paternal side was of Welsh-Quaker strain and his mother of Pennsylvania-German and Irish. His father, a country printer and druggist and a follower of Swedenborg, had tried with no great success to make a living in various places. The family moved to Hamilton, Ohio, in 1840, and later to Dayton. Periods of residence in Columbus, Ashtabula, and Jefferson followed. At one time the family lived in a logcabin on the Little Miami River. At the age of nine, Howells began to set type for his father. He had little of the conventional schooling, and no college experience, but was largely self-educated. This was not an insurmountable handicap for him, however, for, as he tells in My Literary Passions (1895), he read extensively in the classics and knew Chaucer, Shakespeare, Cervantes, Pope, Goldsmith, Macaulay, Dickens, Thackeray, Tennyson, Longfellow, and Hawthorne. He also mastered a number of languages, Latin, Greek, Spanish, French, Italian, and German.

In 1851 Howells was a compositor and reporter in Columbus. The next year he worked on a Cincinnati newspaper, but left it to return to Columbus as the editor of the Ohio State Journal. In these years he won recognition for his literary promise. Poetry was his first ambition, and he wrote it in the eighteenth-century tradition of Pope. He contributed verse to the Atlantic Monthly in 1860 and with J. J. Piatt published Poems of Two Friends. That same year he made a trip to Boston, where he became acquainted with Lowell, Emerson, Holmes, and Hawthorne. As a journalist in Columbus he was called upon to write a campaign life of Lincoln, published in 1860. It was so well received that he was given the political appointment of Consul to Venice, 1861-65. In Venice he studied the Italian language and read European literature extensively. He still wrote verses for the Boston newspapers.

In 1862 Howells married Elinor Mead of Brattleboro, Vermont, whom he had met in Columbus. For a few months in 1865, he acted as editorial assistant on the Nation and then went to the Atlantic under James T. Fields. His experiences in Europe furnished him the material for Venetian Life and Italian Journeys, published in 1866 and 1867. At thirty-five he was made editor in chief of the Atlantic, a connection he retained until 1881. Among the contributors he enlisted as editor were the contrasting literary figures, Mark Twain and Henry James. He wrote many essays for the magazine himself, and in these was apparent a growing tendency toward realism. His book, Their Wedding Journey, partly fiction and partly a travel book, was published in 1872. Thenceforward many novels and essays and a few farces followed, such as A Foregone Conclusion (1875), The Lady of the Aroostook (1879), Dr. Breen's Practice (1881), and A Modern Instance (1881). The last-named, The Rise of Silas Lapham (1884), and A Hazard of New Fortunes (1890) are usually thought to be his strongest novels.

In May, 1885, he moved to New York City, where he was at first on the staff of the Century Magazine and then of Harper's, for which he conducted "The Editor's Study," 1886-91. He was editor of the Cosmopolitan for about half a year, 1891-92. He renewed his connection with Harper's in 1900 and for twenty years conducted "The Editor's Easy Chair." A keen sense of political injustice, enhanced by the reading of Tolstoi and a realization of the failings of democracy, developed within him. His growing socialism is apparent in such books as The Quality of Mercy (1892), The World of Chance (1893), and A Traveler in Altruria (1894), a romance depicting an Utopian age of social equality and happiness. The Eye of the Needle, a sequel to the latter book, appeared in 1907. Howells was made president of the American Academy of Arts and Letters. He was given honorary degrees by Yale, Columbia, Harvard, Princeton, and Oxford. He died, May 11, 1920, but not before he had seen realism triumph far beyond his conception of it.

Howells's long series of works reflect with meticulous accuracy phases of American life during the years from 1870 to 1920. His was a very gentle realism, however, for he omitted the rougher aspects of existence. There is neither misery nor despair in his books, and he turned away from the sordid and neurotic that have so attracted a later generation. There are no breaches of decorum, no crimes or violence in his pages, for though he was regarded as a radical, he was fastidious about the material he used. A democrat in provenience and socialistic in his sympathies, he was an aristocrat in matters of taste. He wrote for parlor reading in a light, friendly manner, and with a steady flow that sometimes has a sparkle or touch of humor. Today his part in the socialistic literature of the nineties and appreciation of his contributions to technique have restored to him something of his old recognition. As a critic he was even-tempered and discriminating, never self-assertive or Olympian. The general function of criticism, he held, should be to "place a book in such a light that the reader should know its class, its function, its character." Many present-day literary historians think that he did his finest work as a critic, and that his best and most lasting book is Criticism and Fiction.

Though Howells wrote several works of a critical nature, it was chiefly in Criticism and Fiction (1891) that he dealt with literary theories and abstractions. His creed as a novelist was simple. He believed in the supremacy of truth in fiction. The characters and the settings should be from actuality. They must be true to the author's day and place and true to normal conditions, and the events must be such as might happen to an average person. He stood for an exact depiction of conduct and motive; he observed the life of his time and tried to transfer it to his pages. The everyday and commonplace is not, he thought, either trivial or insignificant. The charge that realism sacrifices distinction and heroism irked him. He engaged in considerable ethical discussion here and there in his works; but his position was that though fiction must be moral, the author must not moralize. He was little influenced by the French realists, for whose subject matter he had an intense dislike. Romanticism he steadily denounced.

Howells left mainly a detailed record of the surface externals of his time, although in The Rise of Silas Lapham he does approach an inward conflict. It is partly because of his abundant description that his narratives move slowly. Some think his particularizing excessive. The story element in his earlier books became less prominent in the later, and scientific purpose loomed larger. And as time passed, he became more impatient of conscious art and style. The mechanics of fiction, the construction, the point of view, and problems of expression, did not much interest him. Nor did he care greatly for the plot itself, though his books show rounded structure, for he felt, as did Henry James, that "plot does not characterize." He preferred to "portray human nature" rather than to "warm up old stories." There is more characterization, more analysis, more talk in his maturer books. Howells's handling of dialogue shows great technical skill. Through it he develops his characters and carries on his story. Indeed, though this was contrary to his literary tenets, the talk of his characters is on a higher level than would be true of such persons in real life. Mainly, Howells wished his books to rely on fidelity alone, and through this fidelity to serve as socializing instruments. He had extensive influence in his day, both as a writer of fiction and as an editor. Among the young realists he sponsored were Frank Norris, Stephen Crane, and Hamlin Garland.

There is no complete collected edition of Howells's works. His daughter Mildred Howells edited his Life in Letters (2 vols., 1928). Many of his works contain autobiographic material: A Boy's Town (1890), My Year in a Log Cabin (1893), Impressions and Experiences (1896), Literary Friends and Acquaintance (1900), New Leaf Mills (1913), The Leatherwood God (1916), and Years of My Youth (1916). O. W. Firkins wrote of Howells in DAB, IX (1932). See also Hamlin Garland, Roadside Meetings (1930) and Friendly Contemporaries (1932). For valuable discussions consult Henry James, "W. D. ### From THE RISE OF SILAS LAPHAM

Silas Lapham is a self-made paint manufacturer, and the new-rich Lapham family is ambitious socially. The novel deals with the contrast between the two social worlds, that of the rather rustic Laphams and that of the Coreys, Boston aristocrats, whose only son Tom is supposed to be interested in Irene, the beautiful younger daughter of the Laphams, but who is really in love with the older daughter, Penelope. Ultimately Lapham has business difficulties and loses his fortune; but in the meantime he develops moral strength and proves himself to be a man of sterling integrity.

A Dinner Party

... THE Coreys were one of the few old families who lingered in Bellingham Place, the handsome, quiet old street which the sympathetic observer must grieve to see abandoned to boardinghouses. The dwellings are stately and tall, and the whole place wears an air of aristocratic seclusion, which Mrs. Corey's father might well have thought assured when he left her his house there at his death. It is one of two evidently designed by the same architect who built some houses in a characteristic taste on Beacon Street opposite the Common. It has a wooden portico, with slender fluted columns, which have always been painted white, and which, with the delicate mouldings of the cornice, form the sole and sufficient decoration of the street front; nothing could be simpler, and nothing could be better. Within, the architect has again indulged his preference for the classic; the roof of the vestibule, wide and low, rests on marble columns, slim and fluted like the wooden columns without, and an ample staircase climbs in a graceful, easy curve from the tessellated pavement. Some carved Venetian scrigni stretched along the wall; a rug lay at the foot of the stairs; but otherwise the simple adequacy of the architectural intention had been respected, and the place looked bare to the eyes of the Laphams when they entered. The Coreys had once kept a man, but when young Corey began his retrenchments the man had yielded to the neat maid who showed the Colonel into the reception-room and asked the ladies to walk up two flights.

He had his charges from Irene not to enter the drawing-room without her mother, and he spent five minutes in getting on his gloves, for he had desperately resolved to wear them at last. When he had them on, and let his large fists hang down on either side, they looked, in the saffron tint which the shopgirl said his gloves should be of, like canvased hams. He perspired with doubt as he climbed the stairs, and while he waited on the landing for Mrs. Lapham and Irene to come down from above before going into the drawing-room, he stood staring at his hands, now open and now shut, and breathing hard. He heard quiet talking beyond the portière within, and presently Tom Corey came out.

"Ah, Colonel Lapham! Very glad to see you."

Lapham shook hands with him and gasped, "Waiting for Mis' Lapham," to account for his presence. He had not been able to button his right glove, and he now began, with as much indifference as he could assume, to pull them both off, for he saw that Corey wore none. By the time he had stuffed them into the pocket of his coat-skirt his wife and daughter descended.

Corey welcomed them very cordially too, but looked a little mystified. Mrs. Lapham knew that he was silently inquiring for Penelope, and she did not know whether she ought to excuse her to him first or not. She said nothing, and after a glance toward the regions where Penelope might conjecturably be lingering, he held aside the portière for the Laphams to pass, and entered the room with them.

Mrs. Lapham had decided against low-necks on her own responsibility, and had entrenched herself in the safety of a black silk, in which she looked very handsome. Irene wore a dress of one of those shades which only a woman or an artist can decide to be green or blue, and which to other eyes looks both or neither, according to their degrees of ignorance. If it was more like a ball dress than a dinner dress, that might be excused to the exquisite effect. She trailed, a delicate splendor, across the carpet in her mother's somber wake, and the consciousness of success brought a vivid smile to her face. Lapham, pallid with anxiety lest he should somehow disgrace himself, giving thanks to God that he should have been spared the shame of wearing gloves where no one else did, but at the same time despairing that Corey should have seen him in them, had an unwonted aspect of almost pathetic refinement.

Mrs. Corey exchanged a quick glance of surprise and relief with her husband as she started across the room to meet her guests, and in her gratitude to them for being so irreproachable, she threw into her manner a warmth that people did not always find there. "General Lapham?" she said, shaking hands in quick succession with Mrs. Lapham and Irene, and now addressing herself to him.

"No, ma'am, only Colonel," said the honest man, but the lady did not hear him. She was introducing her husband to Lapham's wife and daughter, and Bromfield Corey was already shaking his hand and saying he was very glad to see him again, while he kept his artistic eye on Irene, and apparently could not take it off. Lily Corey gave the Lapham ladies a greeting which was physically rather than socially cold, and Nanny stood holding Irene's hand in both of hers a moment, and taking in her beauty and her style with a generous admiration which she could afford, for she was herself faultlessly dressed in the quiet taste of her city, and looking very pretty. The interval was long enough to let every man present confide his sense of Irene's beauty to every other; and then, as the party was small, Mrs. Corey made everybody acquainted. When Lapham had not quite understood, he held the person's hand, and leaning urbanely forward, inquired, "What name?" He did that because a great man to whom he had been presented on the platform at a public meeting had done so to him, and he knew it must be right.

A little lull ensued upon the introductions, and Mrs. Corey said quietly to Mrs. Lapham,

"Can I send any one to be of use to Miss Lapham?" as if Penelope must be in the dressing-room.

Mrs. Lapham turned fire-red, and the graceful forms in which she had been intending to excuse her daughter's absence went out of her head. "She isn't upstairs," she said, at her bluntest, as country people are when embarrassed. "She didn't feel just like coming to-night. I don't know as she's feeling very well."

Mrs. Corey emitted a very small "O!"—very small, very cold,—which began to grow larger and hotter and to burn into Mrs. Lapham's soul before Mrs. Corey could add, "I'm very sorry. It's nothing serious, I hope?"

Robert Chase, the painter, had not come, and Mrs. James Bellingham was not there, so that the table really balanced better without Penelope; but Mrs. Lapham could not know this, and did not deserve to know it. Mrs. Corey glanced round the room, as if to take account of her guests, and said to her husband, "I think we are all here, then," and he came forward and gave his arm to Mrs. Lapham. She perceived then that in their determination not to be the first to come they had been the last, and must have kept the others waiting for them.

Lapham had never seen people go down to dinner arm-in-arm before, but he knew that his wife was distinguished in being taken out by the host, and he waited in jealous impatience to see if Tom Corey would offer his arm to Irene. He gave it to that big girl they called Miss Kingsbury, and the handsome old fellow whom Mrs. Corey had introduced as her cousin took Irene out. Lapham was startled from the misgiving in which this left him by Mrs. Corey's passing her hand through his arm, and he made a sudden movement forward, but felt himself gently restrained. They went out the last of all; he did not know why, but he submitted, and when they sat down he saw that Irene, although she had come in with that Mr. Bellingham, was seated beside young Corey, after all.

He fetched a long sigh of relief when he sank into his chair and felt himself safe from error if he kept a sharp lookout and did only what the others did. Bellingham had certain habits which he permitted himself, and one of these was tucking the corner of his napkin into his collar; he confessed himself an uncertain shot with a spoon, and defended his practice on the ground of neatness and common-sense. Lapham put his napkin into his collar too, and then, seeing that no one but Bellingham did it, became alarmed and took it out again slyly. He never had wine on his table at home, and on principle he was a prohibitionist; but now he did not know just what to do about the glasses at the right of his plate. He had a notion to turn them all down, as he had read of a well-known politician's doing at a public dinner, to show that he did not take wine; but, after twiddling with one of them a moment, he let them be, for it seemed to him that would be a little too conspicuous, and he felt that everyone was looking. He let the servant fill them all, and he drank out of each, not to appear odd. Later, he observed that the young ladies were not taking wine, and he was glad to see that Irene had refused it, and that Mrs. Lapham was letting it stand untasted. He did not know but he ought to decline some of the dishes, or at least leave most of some on his plate, but he was not able to decide; he took everything and ate everything.

He noticed that Mrs. Corey seemed to take no more trouble about the dinner than anybody, and Mr. Corey rather less; he was talking busily to Mrs. Lapham, and Lapham caught a word here and there that convinced him she was holding her own. He was getting on famously himself with Mrs. Corey, who had begun with him about his new house; he was telling her all about it, and giving her his ideas. Their conversation naturally included his architect across the table; Lapham had been delighted and secretly surprised to find the fellow there; and at something Seymour said the talk spread suddenly, and the pretty house he was building for Colonel Lapham became the general theme. Young Corey testified to its loveliness, and the architect said laughingly that if he had been able to make a nice thing of it, he owed it to the practical sympathy of his client.

"Practical sympathy is good," said Bromfield Corey; and, slanting his head confidentially to Mrs. Lapham, he added, "Does he bleed your husband, Mrs. Lapham? He's a terrible fellow for appropriations!"

Mrs. Lapham laughed, reddening consciously, and said she guessed the Colonel knew how to take care of himself. This struck Lapham, then draining his glass of sauterne, as wonderfully discreet in his wife.

Bromfield Corey leaned back in his chair a moment. "Well, after all, you can't say, with all your modern fuss about it, that you do much better now than the old fellows who built such houses as this."

"Ah," said the architect, "nobody can do better than well. Your house is in perfect taste; you know I've always admired it; and I don't think it's at all the worse for being old-fashioned. What we've done is largely to go back of the hideous style that raged after they forgot how to make this sort of house. But I think we may claim a better feeling for structure. We use better material, and more wisely; and by and by we shall work out something more characteristic and original."

"With your chocolates and olives, and your clutter of bric-à-brac?"

"All that's bad, of course, but I don't mean that. I don't wish to make you envious of Colonel Lapham, and modesty prevents my saying that his house is prettier,—though I may have my convictions,—but it's better built. All the new houses are better built. Now, your house—"

"Mrs. Corey's house," interrupted the host, with a burlesque haste in disclaiming responsibility for it that made them all laugh. "My ancestral halls are in Salem, and I'm told you couldn't drive a nail into their timbers; in fact, I don't know that you would want to do it."

"I should consider it a species of sacrilege," answered Seymour, "and I shall be far from pressing the point I was going to make against a house of Mrs. Corey's."

This won Seymour the easy laugh, and Lapham silently wondered that the fellow never got off any of those things to him.

"Well," said Corey, "you architects and the musicians are the true and only artistic creators. All the rest of us, sculptors, painters, novelists, and tailors, deal with forms that we have before us; we try to imitate, we try to represent. But you two sorts of artists create form. If you represent, you fail. Somehow or other you do evolve the camel out of your inner consciousness."

"I will not deny the soft impeachment," said the architect, with a modest air.

"I dare say. And you'll own that it's very handsome of me to say this, after your unjustifiable attack on Mrs. Corey's property."

Bromfield Corey addressed himself again to Mrs. Lapham, and the talk subdivided itself as before. It lapsed so entirely away from the subject just in hand, that Lapham was left with rather a good idea, as he thought it, to perish in his mind, for want of a chance to express it. The only thing like a recurrence to what they had been saying was Bromfield Corey's warning Mrs. Lapham, in some connection that Lapham lost, against Miss Kingsbury. "She's worse," he was saying, "when it comes to appropriations than Seymour himself. Depend upon it, Mrs. Lapham, she will give you no peace of your mind, now she's met you, from this out. Her tender mercies are cruel; and I leave you to supply the context from your own scriptural knowledge. Beware of her, and all her works. She calls them works of charity, but heaven knows whether they are. It don't stand to reason that she gives the poor all the money she gets out of people. I have my own belief"—he gave it in a whisper for the whole table to hear—"that she spends it for champagne and cigars."

Lapham did not know about that kind of talking; but Miss Kingsbury seemed to enjoy the fun as much as anybody, and he laughed with the rest.

"You shall be asked to the very next debauch of the committee, Mr. Corey; then you won't dare expose us," said Miss Kingsbury.

"I wonder you haven't been down upon Corey to go to the Chardon Street home and talk with your indigent Italians in their native tongue," said Charles Bellingham. "I saw in the Transcript the other night that you wanted some one for the work."

"We did think of Mr. Corey," replied Miss Kingsbury; "but we reflected that he probably wouldn't talk with them at all; he would make them keep still to be sketched, and forget all about their wants."

Upon the theory that this was a fair return for Corey's pleasantry, the others laughed again.

"There is one charity," said Corey, pretending superiority to Miss Kingsbury's point, "that is so difficult, I wonder it hasn't occurred to a lady of your courageous invention."

"Yes?" said Miss Kingsbury. "What is that?"

"The occupation, by deserving poor of neat habits, of all the beautiful, airy, wholesome houses that stand empty the whole summer long, while their owners are away in their lowly cots beside the sea."

"Yes, that is terrible," replied Miss Kingsbury, with quick earnestness, while her eyes grew moist. "I have often thought of our great, cool houses standing useless here, and the thousands of poor creatures stifling in their holes and dens, and the little children dying for wholesome shelter. How cruelly selfish we are!"

"That is a very comfortable sentiment, Miss Kingsbury," said Corey, "and must make you feel almost as if you had thrown open No. 31 to the whole North End. But I am serious about this matter. I spend my summers in town, and I occupy my own house, so that I can speak impartially and intelligently; and I tell you that in some of my walks on the Hill and down on the Back Bay, nothing but the surveillance of the local policeman prevents my offering personal violence to those long rows of close-shuttered, handsome, brutally insensible houses. If I were a poor man, with a sick child pining in some garret or cellar at the North End, I should break into one of them, and camp out on the grand piano."

"Surely, Bromfield," said his wife, "you don't consider what havoc such people would make with the furniture of a nice house!"

"That is true," answered Corey, with meek conviction. "I never thought of that."

"And if you were a poor man with a sick child, I doubt if you'd have so much heart for burglary as you have now," said James Bellingham.

"It's wonderful how patient they are," said the minister. "The spectacle of the hopeless comfort the hard-working poor man sees must be hard to bear."

Lapham wanted to speak up and say that he had been there himself, and knew how such a man felt. He wanted to tell them that generally a poor man was satisfied if he could make both ends meet; that he didn't envy any one his good luck, if he had earned it, so long as he wasn't running under himself. But before he could get the courage to address the whole table, Sewell added, "I suppose he don't always think of it."

"But some day he will think about it," said Corey. "In fact, we rather invite him to think about it, in this country."

"My brother-in-law," said Charles Bellingham, with the pride a man feels in a mentionably remarkable brother-in-law, "has no end of fellows at work under him out there at Omaha, and he says it's the fellows from countries where they've been kept from thinking about it that are discontented. The Americans never make any trouble. They seem to understand that so long as we give unlimited opportunity, nobody has a right to complain."

"What do you hear from Leslie?" asked Mrs. Corey, turning from these profitless abstractions to Mrs. Bellingham.

"You know," said that lady in a lower tone, "that there is another baby?"

"No! I hadn't heard of it!"

"Yes; a boy. They have named him after his uncle."

"Yes," said Charles Bellingham, joining in. "He is said to be a noble boy, and to resemble me."

"All boys of that tender age are noble," said Corey, "and look like anybody you wish them to resemble. Is Leslie still homesick for the bean-pots of her native Boston?"

"She is getting over it, I fancy," replied Mrs. Bellingham. "She's very much taken up with Mrs. Blake's enterprises, and leads a very exciting life. She says she's like people who have been home from Europe three years; she's past the most poignant stage of regret, and hasn't reached the second, when they feel that they must go again."

Lapham leaned a little toward Mrs. Corey, and said of a picture which he saw on the wall opposite, "Picture of your daughter, I presume?"

"No; my daughter's grandmother. It's a Stewart Newton; he painted a great many Salem beauties. She was a Miss Polly Burroughs. My daughter is like her, don't you think?" They both looked at Nanny Corey and then at the portrait. "Those pretty old-fashioned dresses are coming in again. I'm not surprised you took it for her. The others"—she referred to the other portraits more or less darkling on the walls—"are my people; mostly Copleys."

These names, unknown to Lapham, went to his head like the wine he was drinking; they seemed to carry light for the moment, but a film of deeper darkness followed. He heard Charles Bellingham telling funny stories to Irene and trying to amuse the girl; she was laughing, and seemed very happy. From time to time Bellingham took part in the general talk between the host and James Bellingham and Miss Kingsbury and the minister, Mr. Sewell. They talked of people mostly; it astonished Lapham to hear with what freedom they talked. They discussed these persons unsparingly; James Bellingham spoke of a man known to Lapham for his business success and great wealth as not a gentleman; his cousin Charles said he was surprised that the fellow had kept from being governor so long.

When the latter turned from Irene to make one of these excursions into the general talk, young Corey talked to her; and Lapham caught some words from which it seemed that they were speaking of Penelope. It vexed him to think she had not come; she could have talked as well as any of them; she was just as bright; and Lapham was aware that Irene was not as bright, though when he looked at her face, triumphant in its young beauty and fondness, he said to himself that it did not make any difference. He felt that he was not holding up his end of the line, however. When some one spoke to him he could only summon a few words of reply, that seemed to lead to nothing; things often came into his mind appropriate to what they were saying, but before he could get them out they were off on something else; they jumped about so, he could not keep up; but he felt, all the same, that he was not doing himself justice.

At one time the talk ran off upon a subject that Lapham had never heard talked of before; but again he was vexed that Penelope was not there, to have her say; he believed that her say would have been worth hearing.

Miss Kingsbury leaned forward and asked Charles Bellingham if he had read Tears, Idle Tears, the novel that was making such a sensation; and when he said no, she said she wondered at him. "It's perfectly heartbreaking, as you'll imagine from the name; but there's such a dear old-fashioned hero and heroine in it, who keep dying for each other all the way through, and making the most wildly satisfactory and unnecessary sacrifices for each other. You feel as if you'd done them yourself."

"Ah, that's the secret of its success," said Bromfield Corey. "It flatters the reader by painting the characters colossal, but with his limp and stoop, so that he feels himself of their supernatural proportions. You've read it, Nanny?"

"Yes," said his daughter. "It ought to have been called Slop, Silly Slop."

"Oh, not quite slop, Nanny," pleaded Miss Kingsbury.

"It's astonishing," said Charles Bellingham, "how we do like the books that go for our heartstrings. And I really suppose that you can't put a more popular thing than self-sacrifice into a novel. We do like to see people suffering sublimely."

"There was talk some years ago," said James Bellingham, "about novels going out."

"They're just coming in!" cried Miss Kingsbury.

"Yes," said Mr. Sewell, the minister. "And I don't think there ever was a time when they formed the whole intellectual experience of more people. They do greater mischief than ever."

"Don't be envious, parson," said the host.

"No," answered Sewell. "I should be glad of their help. But those novels with old-fashioned heroes and heroines in them—excuse me, Miss Kingsbury—are ruinous!"

"Don't you feel like a moral wreck, Miss Kingsbury?" asked the host.

But Sewell went on: "The novelists might be the greatest possible help to us if they painted life as it is, and human feelings in their true proportion and relation, but for the most part they have been and are altogether nox-50 ious."

This seemed sense to Lapham; but Bromfield Corey asked: "But what if life as it is isn't amusing? Aren't we to be amused?"

"Not to our hurt," sturdily answered the minister. "And the self-sacrifice painted in most novels like this—"

"Slop, Silly Slop?" suggested the proud father of the inventor of the phrase.

"Yes—is nothing but psychical suicide, and is as wholly immoral as the spectacle of a man falling upon his sword."

"Well, I don't know but you're right, parson," said the host; and the minister, who had apparently got upon a battle-horse of his, careered onward in spite of some tacit attempts of his wife to seize the bridle.

"Right? To be sure I am right. The whole business of love, and love-making and marrying, is painted by the novelists in a monstrous disproportion to the other relations of life. Love is very sweet, very pretty—"

"Oh, thank you, Mr. Sewell," said Nanny Corey, in a way that set them all laughing.

"But it's the affair, commonly, of very young people, who have not yet character and experience enough to make them interesting. In novels it's treated, not only as if it were the chief interest of life, but the sole interest of the lives of two ridiculous young persons; and it is taught that love is perpetual, that the glow of a true passion lasts for ever; and that it is sacrilege to think or act otherwise."

"Well, but isn't that true, Mr. Sewell?" pleaded Miss Kingsbury.

"I have known some most estimable people who had married a second time," said the minister, and then he had the applause with him. Lapham wanted to make some open recognition of his good sense, but could not.

"I suppose the passion itself has been a good deal changed," said Bromfield Corey, "since the poets began to idealize it in the days of chivalry."

"Yes; and it ought to be changed again," said Mr. Sewell.

"What! Back?"

"I don't say that. But it ought to be recognized as something natural and mortal, and divine honors, which belong to righteousness alone, ought not to be paid it."

"Oh, you ask too much, parson," laughed his host, and the talk wandered away to something else.

It was not an elaborate dinner; but Lapham was used to having everything on the table at once, and this succession of dishes bewildered him; he was afraid perhaps he was eating too much. He now no longer made any pretence of not drinking his wine, for he was thirsty, and there was no more water, and he hated to ask for any. The ice-cream came, and then the fruit. Suddenly Mrs. Corey rose, and said across the table to her husband, "I suppose you will want your coffee here." And he replied, "Yes; we'll join you at tea."

The ladies all rose, and the gentlemen got up with them. Lapham started to follow Mrs. Corey, but the other men merely stood in their places, except young Corey, who ran and opened the door for his mother. Lapham thought with shame that it was he who ought to have done that; but no one seemed to notice, and he sat down again gladly, after kicking out one of his legs which had gone to sleep.

They brought in cigars with coffee, and Bromfield Corey advised Lapham to take one that he chose for him. Lapham confessed that he liked a good cigar about as well as anybody, and Corey said: "These are new. I had an Englishman here the other day who was smoking old cigars in the superstition that tobacco improved with age, like wine."

"Ah," said Lapham, "anybody who had ever lived off a tobacco country could tell him better than that." With the fuming cigar between his lips he felt more at home than he had before. He turned sidewise in his chair and, resting one arm on the back, intertwined the fingers of both hands, and smoked at large ease.

James Bellingham came and sat down by him. "Colonel Lapham, weren't you with the 96th Vermont when they charged across the river in front of Pickensburg, and the rebel battery opened fire on them in the water?"

Lapham slowly shut his eyes and slowly dropped his head for assent, letting out a white volume of smoke from the corner of his mouth.

"I thought so," said Bellingham "I was with the 85th Massachusetts, and I sha'n't forget that slaughter. We were all new to it still. Perhaps that's why it made such an impression."

"I don't know," suggested Charles Bellingham. "Was there anything much more impressive afterward? I read of it out in Missouri, where I was stationed at the time, and I recollect the talk of some old army men about it. They said that death-rate couldn't be beaten. I don't know that it ever was."

"About one in five of us got out safe," said Lapham, breaking his cigar-ash off on the edge of a plate. James Bellingham reached him a bottle of Apollinaris. He drank a glass, and then went on smoking.

They all waited, as if expecting him to speak, and then Corey said: "How incredible those things seem already! You gentlemen know that they happened; but are you still able to believe it?"

"Ah, nobody feels that anything happened," said Charles Bellingham. "The past of one's experience doesn't differ a great deal from the past of one's knowledge. It isn't much more probable; it's really a great deal less vivid than some scenes in a novel that one read when a boy."

"I'm not sure of that," said James Bellingham.

"Well, James, neither am I," consented his cousin, helping himself from Lapham's Apollinaris bottle. "There would be very little talking at dinner if one only said the things that one was sure of."

The others laughed, and Bromfield Corey remarked thoughtfully, "What astonishes the craven civilian in all these things is the abundance—the superabundance—of heroism. The cowards were the exception; the men that were ready to die, the rule."

"The woods were full of them," said Lapham, without taking his cigar from his mouth.

"That's a nice little touch in School," interposed Charles Bellingham, "where the girl says to the fellow who was at Inkerman, 'I should think you would be so proud of it,' and he reflects a while, and says, 'Well, the fact is, you know, there were so many of us.'"

"Yes, I remember that," said James Bellingham, smiling for pleasure in it. "But I don't see why you claim the credit of being a craven civilian, Bromfield," he added, with a friendly glance at his brother-in-law, and with the willingness Boston men often show to turn one another's good points to the light in company; bred so intimately together at school and college and in society, they all know these points. "A man who was out with Garibaldi in '48," continued James Bellingham.

"Oh, a little amateur red-shirting," Corey interrupted in deprecation. "But even if you choose to dispute my claim, what has become of all the heroism? Tom, how many club men do you know who would think it sweet and fitting to die for their country?"

"I can't think of a great many at the moment, sir," replied the son, with the modesty of his generation.

"And I couldn't in '61," said his uncle. "Nevertheless they were there."

"Then your theory is that it's the occasion that is wanting," said Bromfield Corey. "But why shouldn't civil service reform, and the resumption of specie payment, and a tariff for revenue only, inspire heroes? They are all good causes."

"It's the occasion that's wanting," said James Bellingham, ignoring the persiflage. "And I'm very glad of it."

"So am I," said Lapham, with a depth of feeling that expressed itself in spite of the haze in which his brain seemed to float. There was a great deal of the talk that he could not follow; it was too quick for him; but here was something he was clear of. "I don't want to see any more men killed in my time." Something serious, something somber must lurk behind these words, and they waited for Lapham to say more; but the haze closed round him again, and he remained silent, drinking Apollinaris.

"We noncombatants were notoriously reluctant to give up fighting," said Mr. Sewell, the minister; "but I incline to think Colonel Lapham and Mr. Bellingham may be right. I dare say we shall have the heroism again if we have the occasion. Till it comes, we must content ourselves with the everyday generousities and sacrifices. They make up in quantity what they lack in quality, perhaps."

"They're not so picturesque," said Bromfield Corey. "You can paint a man dying for his country, but you can't express on canvas a man fulfilling the duties of a good citizen."

"Perhaps the novelists will get at him by and by," suggested Charles Bellingham. "If I were one of these fellows, I shouldn't propose to myself anything short of that."

"What? the commonplace?" asked his cousin.

"Commonplace? The commonplace is just that light, impalpable, aërial essence which they've never got into their confounded books yet. The novelist who could interpret the common feelings of commonplace people would have the answer to 'the riddle of the painful earth' on his tongue."

"Oh, not so bad as that, I hope," said the host; and Lapham looked from one to the other, trying to make out what they were at. He had never been so up a tree before.

"I suppose it isn't well for us to see human nature at white heat habitually," continued Bromfield Corey, after a while. "It would make us vain of our species. Many a poor fellow in that war and in many another has gone into battle simply and purely for his country's sake, not knowing whether, if he laid down his life, he should ever find it again, or whether, if he took it up hereafter, he should take it up in heaven or hell. Come, parson!" he said, turning to the minister, "what has ever been conceived of omnipotence, of omniscience, so sublime, so divine as that?"

"Nothing," answered the minister quietly. "God has never been imagined at all. But if you suppose such a man as that was Authorized, I think it will help you to imagine what God must be."

"There's sense in that," said Lapham. He took his cigar out of his mouth, and pulled his chair a little toward the table, on which he placed his ponderous forearms. "I want to tell you about a fellow I had in my own company when we first went out. We were all privates to begin with; after a while they elected me captain—I'd had the tavern stand, and most of 'em knew me. But Jim Millon never got to be anything more than corporal; corporal when he was killed." The others arrested themselves in various attitudes of attention, and remained listening to Lapham with an interest that profoundly flattered him. Now, at last, he felt that he was holding up his end of the rope. "I can't say he went into the thing from the highest motives, altogether; our motives are always pretty badly mixed, and when there's such a hurrah-boys as there was then, you can't tell which is which. I suppose Jim Millon's wife was enough to account for his going, herself. She was a pretty bad assortment," said Lapham, lowering his voice and glancing round at the door to make sure that it was shut, "and she used to lead Jim one kind of life. Well, sir," continued Lapham, synthetizing his auditors in that form of address, "that fellow used to save every cent of his pay and send it to that woman. Used to get me to do it for him. I tried to stop him. 'Why, Jim,' said I, 'you know what she'll do with it.' 'That's so, Cap,' says he, 'but I don't know what she'll do without it.' And it did keep her straight—straight as a string—as long as Jim lasted. Seemed as if there was something mysterious about it. They had a little girl,—about as old as my oldest girl,—and Jim used to talk to me about her. Guess he done it as much for her as for the mother; and he said to me before the last action we went into, 'I should like to turn tail and run, Cap. I ain't comin' out o' this one. But I don't suppose it would do.' 'Well, not for you, Jim,' said I. 'I want to live,' he says; and he bust out crying right there in my tent. 'I want to live for poor Molly and Zerilla'—that's what they called the little one; I dunno where they got the name. 'I ain't ever had half a chance; and now she's doing better, and I believe we should get along after this.' He set there cryin' like a baby. But he wan't no baby when he went into action. I hated to look at him after it was over, not so much because he'd got a ball that was meant for me by a sharp-shooter—he saw the devil takin' aim, and he jumped to warn me—as because he didn't look like Jim; he looked like—fun; all desperate and savage. I guess he died hard."

The story made its impression, and Lapham saw it. "Now I say," he resumed, as if he felt that he was going to do himself justice, and say something to heighten the effect his story had produced. At the same time he was aware of a certain want of clearness. He had the idea, but it floated vague, elusive, in his brain. He looked about as if for something to precipitate it in tangible shape.

"Apollinaris?" asked Charles Bellingham, handing the bottle from the other side. He had drawn his chair closer than the rest to Lap-ham's, and was listening with great interest. When Mrs. Corey asked him to meet Lapham, he accepted gladly. "You know I go in for that sort of thing, Anna. Since Leslie's affair we're rather bound to do it. And I think we meet these practical fellows too little. There's always something original about them." He might naturally have believed that the reward of his faith was coming.

"Thanks, I will take some of this wine," said Lapham, pouring himself a glass of Madeira from a black and dusty bottle caressed by a label bearing the date of the vintage. He tossed off the wine, unconscious of its preciousness, and waited for the result. That cloudiness in his brain disappeared before it, but a mere blank remained. He not only could not remember what he was going to say, but he could not recall what they had been talking about. They waited, looking at him, and he stared at them in return. After a while he heard the host saying, "Shall we join the ladies?"

Lapham went, trying to think what had happened. It seemed to him a long time since he had drunk that wine.

Miss Corey gave him a cup of tea, where he stood aloof from his wife, who was talking with Miss Kingsbury and Mrs. Sewell; Irene was with Miss Nanny Corey. He could not hear what they were talking about; but if Penelope had come, he knew that she would have done them all credit. He meant to let her know how he felt about her behavior when he got home. It was a shame for her to miss such a chance. Irene was looking beautiful, as pretty as all the rest of them put together, but she was not talking, and Lapham perceived that at a dinner-party you ought to talk. He was himself conscious of having talked very well. He now wore an air of great dignity, and, in conversing with the other gentlemen, he used a grave and weighty deliberation. Some of them wanted him to go into the library. There he gave his ideas of books. He said he had not much time for anything but the papers; but he was going to have a complete library in his new place. He made an elaborate acknowledgment to Bromfield Corey of his son's kindness in suggesting books for his library; he said that he had ordered them all, and that he meant to have pictures. He asked Mr. Corey who was about the best American painter going now. "I don't set up to be a judge of pictures, but I know what I like," he said. He lost the reserve which he had maintained earlier, and began to boast. He himself introduced the subject of his paint, in a natural transition from pictures; he said Mr. Corey must take a run up to Lapham with him some day, and see the Works; they would interest him, and he would drive him round the country; he kept most of his horses up there, and he could show Mr. Corey some of the finest Jersey grades in the country. He told about his brother William, the judge at Dubuque; and a farm he had out there that paid for itself every year in wheat. As he cast off all fear, his voice rose, and he hammered his arm-chair with the thick of his hand for emphasis. Mr. Corey seemed impressed; he sat perfectly quiet, listening, and Lapham saw the other gentlemen stop in their talk every now and then to listen. After this proof of his ability to interest them, he would have liked to have Mrs. Lapham suggest again that he was unequal to their society, or to the society of anybody else. He surprised himself by his ease among men whose names had hitherto overawed him. He got to calling Bromfield Corey by his surname alone. He did not understand why young Corey seemed so preoccupied, and he took occasion to tell the company how he had said to his wife the first time he saw that fellow that he could make a man of him if he had him in the business; and he guessed he was not mistaken. He began to tell stories of the different young men he had had in his employ. At last he had the talk altogether to himself; no one else talked, and he talked unceasingly. It was a great time; it was a triumph.

He was in this successful mood when word came to him that Mrs. Lapham was going; Tom Corey seemed to have brought it, but he was not sure. Anyway, he was not going to hurry. He made cordial invitations to each of the gentlemen to drop in and see him at his office, and would not be satisfied till he had exacted a promise from each. He told Charles Bellingham that he liked him, and assured James Bellingham that it had always been his ambition to know him, and that if any one had said when he first came to Boston that in less than ten years he should be hobnobbing with Jim Bellingham, he should have told that person he lied. He would have told anybody he lied that had told him ten years ago that a son of Bromfield Corey would have come and asked him to take him into the business. Ten years ago he, Silas Lapham, had come to Boston a little worse off than nothing at all, for he was in debt for half the money that he had bought out his partner with, and here he was now worth a million, and meeting you gentlemen like one of you. And every cent of that was honest money,—no speculation,—every copper of it for value received. And here, only the other day, his old partner, who had been going to the dogs ever since he went out of the business, came and borrowed twenty thousand dollars of him! Lapham lent it because his wife wanted him to: she had always felt bad about the fellow's having to go out of the business.

He took leave of Mr. Sewell with patronizing affection, and bade him come to him if he ever got into a tight place with his parish work; he would let him have all the money he wanted; he had more money than he knew what to do with. "Why, when your wife sent to mine last fall," he said, turning to Mr. Corey, "I drew my cheque for five hundred dollars, but my wife wouldn't take more than one hundred; said she wasn't going to show off before Mrs. Corey. I call that a pretty good joke on Mrs. Corey. I must tell her how Mrs. Lapham done her out of a cool four hundred dollars."

He started toward the door of the drawing-room to take leave of the ladies; but Tom Corey was at his elbow, saying, "I think Mrs. Lapham is waiting for you below, sir," and in obeying the direction Corey gave him toward another door he forgot all about his purpose, and came away without saying good-night to his hostess.

Mrs. Lapham had not known how soon she ought to go, and had no idea that in her quality of chief guest she was keeping the others. She stayed till eleven o'clock, and was a little frightened when she found what time it was; but Mrs. Corey, without pressing her to stay longer, had said it was not at all late. She and Irene had had a perfect time. Everybody had been very polite; on the way home they celebrated the amiability of both the Miss Coreys and of Miss Kingsbury. Mrs. Lapham thought that Mrs. Bellingham was about the pleasantest person she ever saw; she had told her all about her daughter who had married an inventor and gone to live in Omaha—a Mrs. Blake.

"If it's that car-wheel Blake," said Lapham proudly, "I know all about him. I've sold him tons of the paint."

"Pooh, papa! How you do smell of smoking!" cried Irene.

"Pretty strong, eh?" laughed Lapham, letting down a window of the carriage. His heart was throbbing wildly in the close air, and he was glad of the rush of cold that came in, though it stopped his tongue, and he listened more and more drowsily to the rejoicings that his wife and daughter exchanged. He meant to have them wake Penelope up and tell her what she had lost; but when he reached home he was too sleepy to suggest it. He fell asleep as soon as his head touched the pillow, full of supreme triumph.

But in the morning his skull was sore with the unconscious, nightlong ache; and he rose cross and taciturn. They had a silent breakfast. In the cold grey light of the morning the glories of the night before showed poorer. Here and there a painful doubt obtruded itself and marred them with its awkward shadow. Penelope sent down word that she was not well, and was not coming to breakfast, and Lapham was glad to go to his office without seeing her.

He was severe and silent all day with his clerks and peremptory with customers. Of Corey he was slyly observant, and as the day wore away he grew more restively conscious. He sent out word by his office-boy that he would like to see Mr. Corey for a few minutes after closing. The typewriter girl had lingered too, as if she wished to speak with him, and Corey stood in abeyance as she went toward Lapham's door.

"Can't see you tonight, Zerilla," he said bluffly, but not unkindly. "Perhaps I'll call at the house, if it's important."

"It is," said the girl, with a spoiled air of insistence.

"Well," said Lapham, and, nodding to Corey to enter, he closed the door upon her.

Then he turned to the young man and demanded: "Was I drunk last night?" 1885

[Jane Austen]

WHICH brings us again, after this long way about, to the divine Jane and her novels, and that troublesome question about them. She was great and they were beautiful, because she and they were honest, and dealt with nature nearly a hundred years ago as realism deals with it today. Realism is nothing more and nothing less than the truthful treatment of material, and Jane Austen was the first and the last of the English novelists to treat material with entire truthfulness. Because she did this, she remains the most artistic of the English novelists, and alone worthy to be matched with the great Scandinavian and Slavic and Latin artists. It is not a question of intellect, or not wholly that. The English have mind enough; but they have not taste enough; or, rather, their taste has been perverted by their false criticism, which is based upon personal preference, and not upon principle; which instructs a man to think that what he likes is good, instead of teaching him first to distinguish what is good before he likes it. The art of fiction, as Jane Austen knew it, declined from her through Scott, and Bulwer, and Dickens, and Charlotte Brontë, and Thackeray, and even George Eliot, because the mania of romanticism had seized upon all Europe, and these great writers could not escape the taint of their time; but it has shown few signs of recovery in England, because English criticism, in the presence of the Continental masterpieces, has continued provincial and special and personal, and has expressed a love and a hate which had to do with the quality of the artist rather than the character of his work. It was inevitable that in their time the English romanticists should treat, as Señor Valdés says, "the barbarous customs of the Middle Ages, softening and disfiguring them, as Walter Scott and his kind did"; that they should "devote themselves to falsifying nature, refining and subtilizing sentiment, and modifying psychology after their own fancy," like Bulwer and Dickens, as well as like Rousseau and Madame de Staël, not to mention Balzac, the worst of all that sort at his worst. This was the natural course of the disease; but it really seems as if it were their criticism that was to blame for the rest: not, indeed, for the performance of this writer or that, for criticism can never affect the actual doing of a thing; but for the esteem in which this writer or that is held through the perpetuation of false ideals. The only observer of English middle-class life since Jane Austen worthy to be named with her was not George Eliot, who was first ethical and then artistic, who transcended her in everything but the form and method most essential to art, and there fell hopelessly below her. It was Anthony Trollope who was most like her in simple honesty and instinctive truth, as unphilosophized as the light of common day; but he was so warped from a wholesome ideal as to wish at times to be like the caricaturist Thackeray, and to stand about in his scene, talking it over with his hands in his pockets, interrupting the action, and spoiling the illusion in which alone the truth of art resides. Mainly, his instinct was too much for his ideal, and with a low view of life in its civic relations and a thoroughly bourgeois soul, he yet produced works whose beauty is surpassed only by the effect of a more poetic writer in the novels of Thomas Hardy. Yet if a vote of English criticism even at this late day, when all continental Europe has the light of aesthetic truth, could be taken, the majority against these artists would be overwhelming in favor of a writer who had so little artistic sensibility, that he never hesitated on any occasion, great or small, to make a foray among his characters, and catch them up to show them to the reader and tell him how beautiful or ugly they were; and cry out over their amazing properties.

Doubtless the ideal of those poor islanders will be finally changed. If the truth could become a fad it would be accepted by all their "smart people," but truth is something rather too large for that; and we must await the gradual advance of civilization among them. Then they will see that their criticism had misled them; and that it is to this false guide they owe, not precisely the decline of fiction among them, but its continued debasement as an art.

[Decency in American Fiction]

One of the great newspapers the other day invited the prominent American authors to speak their minds upon a point in the theory and practice of fiction which had already vexed some of them. It was the question of how much or how little the American novel ought to deal with certain facts of life which are not usually talked of before young people, and especially young ladies. Of course the question was not decided, and I forget just how far the balance inclined in favor of a larger freedom in the matter. But it certainly inclined that way; one or two writers of the sex which is somehow supposed to have purity in its keeping (as if purity were a thing that did not practically concern the other sex, preoccupied with serious affairs) gave it a rather vigorous tilt to that side. In view of this fact it would not be the part of prudence to make an effort to dress the balance; and indeed I do not know that I was going to make any such effort. But there are some things to say, around and about the subject, which I should like to have some one else say, and which I may myself possibly be safe in suggesting.

One of the first of these is the fact, generally lost sight of by those who censure the Anglo-Saxon novel for its prudishness, that it is really not such a prude after all; and that if it is sometimes apparently anxious to avoid those experiences of life not spoken of before young people, this may be an appearance only. Sometimes a novel which has this shuffling air, this effect of truckling to propriety, might defend itself, if it could speak for itself, by saying that such experiences happened not to come within its scheme, and that, so far from maiming or mutilating itself in ignoring them, it was all the more faithfully representative of the tone of modern life in dealing with love that was chaste, and with passion so honest that it could be openly spoken of before the tenderest society bud at dinner. It might say that the guilty intrigue, the betrayal, the extreme flirtation even, was the exceptional thing in life, and unless the scheme of the story necessarily involved it, that it would be bad art to lug it in, and as bad taste as to introduce such topics in a mixed company. It could say very justly that the novel in our civilization now always addresses a mixed company, and that the vast majority of the company are ladies, and that very many, if not most, of these ladies are young girls. If the novel were written for men and for married women alone, as in continental Europe, it might be altogether different. But the simple fact is that it is not written for them alone among us, and it is a question of writing, under cover of our universal acceptance, things for young girls to read which you would be put out-of-doors for saying to them, or of frankly giving notice of your intention, and so cutting yourself off from the pleasure—and it is a very high and sweet one—of appealing to these vivid, responsive intelligences, which are none the less brilliant and admirable because they are innocent.

One day a novelist who liked, after the manner of other men, to repine at his hard fate, complained to his friend, a critic, that he was tired of the restriction he had put upon himself in this regard; for it is a mistake, as can be readily shown, to suppose that others impose it. "See how free those French fellows are!" he rebelled. "Shall we always be shut up to our tradition of decency?"

"Do you think it's much worse than being shut up to their tradition of indecency?" said his friend.

Then that novelist began to reflect, and he remembered how sick the invariable motive of the French novel made him. He perceived finally that, convention for convention, ours was not only more tolerable, but on the whole was truer to life, not only to its complexion, but also to its texture. No one will pretend that there is not vicious love beneath the surface of our society; if he did, the fetid explosions of the divorce trials would refute him; but if he pretended that it was in any just sense characteristic of our society, he could be still more easily refuted. Yet it exists, and it is unquestionably the material of tragedy, the stuff from which intense effects are wrought. The question, after owning this fact, is whether these intense effects are not rather cheap effects. I incline to think they are, and I will try to say why I think so, if I may do so without offense. The material itself, the mere mention of it, has an instant fascination; it arrests, it detains, till the last word is said, and while there is anything to be hinted. This is what makes a love intrigue of some sort all but essential to the popularity of any fiction. Without such an intrigue the intellectual equipment of the author must be of the highest, and then he will succeed only with the highest class of readers. But any author who will deal with a guilty love intrigue holds all readers in his hand, the highest with the lowest, as long as he hints the slightest hope of the smallest potential naughtiness. He need not at all be a great author; he may be a very shabby wretch, if he has but the courage or the trick of that sort of thing. The critics will call him "virile" and "passionate"; decent people will be ashamed to have been limed by him; but the low average will only ask another chance of flocking into his net. If he happens to be an able writer, his really fine and costly work will be unheeded, and the lure to the appetite will be chiefly remembered. There may be other qualities which make reputations for other men, but in his case they will count for nothing. He pays this penalty for his success in that kind; and every one pays some such penalty who deals with some such material. It attaches in like manner to the triumphs of the writers who now almost form a school among us, and who may be said to have established themselves in an easy popularity simply by the study of erotic shivers and fervors. They may find their account in the popularity, or they may not; there is no question of the popularity.

But I do not mean to imply that their case covers the whole ground. So far as it goes, though, it ought to stop the mouths of those who complain that fiction is enslaved to propriety among us. It appears that of a certain kind of impropriety it is free to give us all it will, and more. But this is not what serious men and women writing fiction mean when they rebel against the limitations of their art in our civilization. They have no desire to deal with nakedness, as painters and sculptors freely do in the worship of beauty; or with certain facts of life, as the stage does, in the service of sensation. But they ask why, when the conventions of the plastic and histrionic arts liberate their followers to the portrayal of almost any phase of the physical or of the emotional nature, an American novelist may not write a story on the lines of Anna Karenina or Madame Bovary. Sappho they put aside, and from Zola's work they avert their eyes. They do not condemn him or Daudet, necessarily, or accuse their motives; they leave them out of the question; they do not want to do that kind of thing. But they do sometimes wish to do another kind, to touch one of the most serious and sorrowful problems of life in the spirit of Tolstoi and Flaubert, and they ask us why they may not. At one time, they remind us, the Anglo-Saxon novelist did deal with such problems—De Foe in his spirit, Richardson in his, Goldsmith in his. At what moment did our fiction lose this privilege? In what fatal hour did the Young Girl arise and seal the lips of Fiction, with a touch of her finger, to some of the most vital interests of life?

Whether I wished to oppose them in their aspiration for greater freedom, or whether I wished to encourage them, I should begin to answer them by saying that the Young Girl had never done anything of the kind. The manners of the novel have been improving with those of its readers; that is all. Gentlemen no longer swear or fall drunk under the table, or abduct young ladies and shut them up in lonely country-houses, or so habitually set about the ruin of their neighbors' wives, as they once did. Generally, people now call a spade an agricultural implement; they have not grown decent without having also grown a little squeamish, but they have grown comparatively decent; there is no doubt about that. They require of a novelist whom they respect unquestionable proof of his seriousness, if he proposes to deal with certain phases of life; they require a sort of scientific decorum. He can no longer expect to be received on the ground of entertainment only; he assumes a higher function, something like that of a physician or a priest, and they expect him to be bound by laws as sacred as those of such professions; they hold him solemnly pledged not to betray them or abuse their confidence. If he will accept the conditions, they give him their confidence, and he may then treat to his greater honor, and not at all to his disadvantage, of such experiences, such relations of men and women as George Eliot treats in Adam Bede, in Daniel Deronda, in Romola, in almost all her books; such as Hawthorne treats in The Scarlet Letter; such as Dickens treats in David Copperfield; such as Thackeray treats in Pendennis, and glances at in every one of his fictions; such as most of the masters of English fiction have at some time treated more or less openly. It is quite false or quite mistaken to suppose that our novels have left untouched these most important realities of life. They have only not made them their stock in trade; they have kept a true perspective in regard to them; they have relegated them in their pictures of life to the space and place they occupy in life itself, as we know it in England and America. They have kept a correct proportion, knowing perfectly well that unless the novel is to be a map, with everything scrupulously laid down in it, a faithful record of life in far the greater extent could be made to the exclusion of guilty love and all its circumstances and consequences.

I justify them in this view not only because I hate what is cheap and meretricious, and hold in peculiar loathing the cant of critics who require "passion" as something in itself admirable and desirable in a novel, but because I prize fidelity in the historian of feeling and character. Most of these critics who demand "passion" would seem to have no conception of any passion but one. Yet there are several other passions: the passion of grief, the passion of avarice, the passion of pity, the passion of ambition, the passion of hate, the passion of envy, the passion of devotion, the passion of friendship; and all these have a greater part in the drama of life than the passion of love, and infinitely greater than the passion of guilty love. Wittingly or unwittingly, English fiction and American fiction have recognized this truth, not fully, not in the measure it merits, but in greater degree than most other fiction.

1843 -- Henry James -- 1916

IT IS NOT certain that Henry James really belongs to American literature, for he resided in Europe and preferred it to America. But it is also doubtful whether he should be termed British, although he became a British citizen. James won distinction as a psychological novelist of fine artistry. He was interested in the leisurely analysis of character and fastidious craftsmanship rather than in incident and action. He concerned himself with spiritual values, aesthetic and intellectual problems, and fine instincts.

The life of Henry James shows no striking outer events. He lived as a spectator who observed but who did not enter into active life. He was not forced to earn his own living, for he was financially independent and had leisure and advantages that other writers were not able to enjoy. He was free to give to the world his best. James's grandfather was an Albany merchant of Irish stock who became a millionaire and could bequeath a fortune to his descendants. His father, Henry James, Sr., was a philosopher and writer and a close friend of Emerson. The older brother, William James, became professor of philosophy and psychology at Harvard.

At the age of twelve, the future novelist went to Europe, where he studied under private tutors at Geneva, London, and Paris. Later he was at Bonn. This cosmopolitan education served to make him European in temperament. In 1860, the family removed to Newport, and in 1862-63, James attended the Harvard Law School, although he did not intend to practice law. His health kept him out of the Civil War. Influenced by friends, he became interested in literary pursuits and writing. He had early been an admirer of Hawthorne, of George Eliot, who, followed by George Meredith, inaugurated the psychological novel, and of Balzac; and these writers left their imprint upon him. From 1864 to 1868 he lived at Cambridge and Boston and contributed stories and reviews to several periodicals. His first volume of fiction, A Passionate Pilgrim and Other Tales, appeared in 1871; and his first long novel, Roderick Hudson, which had been issued serially in the Atlantic, was reprinted in book form in 1876.

The years between 1876 and 1881 were prolific. While living in Massachusetts, James had made several trips to Europe, and in 1876 he resolved to establish his residence abroad. He was an aristocrat by temperament, and he thought American life thin and crude. It was poor in history, its civilization new, and its culture derivative. He was fond of intellectual society and he seemed to find that society only in Europe. He settled first in Paris, where he met Turgenev and Flaubert, but later gave it up for London. His books of this period deal especially with transplanted Americans and their conduct in the trying situation of finding themselves in an older and more sophisticated society. This was the beginning of the International Novel, a field in which he pioneered, its scenes London, Paris, Rome, New York. To this group belong The American (1877), The Europeans (1878), Daisy Miller, his only genuine "hit" (1879), The International Episode (1879), and Portrait of a Lady (1881). Later James lost interest in depicting contrasting cultures and the types they foster. His later novels were hardly successful either in the United States or in England, and he gave up expectation of popularity and began to compose in his own way. The last two decades of his life, 1896–1916, were spent at Rye, on the southeast coast of England, where he lived happily a life of considerable seclusion, although he kept his apartment in London. He had by this time changed his manner of writing from one of direct treatment to an involved style that the public found baffling. He gave much thought to intricacies of method and craftsmanship. His sentences were so filled with parenthetical explanations and qualifications that they became tedious and stultifying. Yet fiction writers abroad and in his own country acknowledge that his ideas of structure have had an unmistakable influence on certain groups of writers. Edith Wharton in this country and Marcel Proust in France have been termed his disciples. He remained prolific in his output, for he was able to dictate his involved sentences. The three later books that he thought his best were Wings of the Dove (1902), The Ambassadors (1903), and The Golden Bowl (1904).

After 1914, his work was affected by the World War. He had been virtually a British citizen for many years, and when America did not enter the war following the sinking of the Lusitania, he took out his naturalization papers in England. He was awarded the high honor of the Order of Merit by King George early in 1916. He died that same year, February 28, in his apartment in London.

James wrote travel books and was a keen and urbane critic, but he is better remembered as a novelist and story writer, whose method is that of the psychological clinic. He sets forth in minute shades the intangible qualities of the soul. His books contain little action or violence and because of the absence of dramatic happenings in them are often said to lack virility. A recurrent theme is that of renunciation. He deals with a restricted area of life. His characters are of one class, well-bred occupationless men and women who lead a sheltered life of leisure and fashion, and who are concerned with the fine art of living, its decorum and problems of taste. To many it seems that the fastidious culture and subtle mental powers of certain European circles he paints existed only in his imagination. James was perhaps the last embodiment of the genteel tradition. The world of which he wrote, a prewar world, has now passed, if it ever existed, in both the Old World and the New.

The literary theories of Henry James deserve attention, partly because of the care with which he recorded them and partly because of the influence he hoped they might have. His earlier stories were commonplace in method, told in bald, straightforward manner by a narrator. Some were realistic American and some had European backgrounds. The novels of his middle period, Roderick Hudson, The American, The Portrait of a Lady, The Princess Cassamassima, and The Tragic Muse, show great growth. For a time he wished to "dramatize" his themes, and relied on abundance of dialogue, with his characters in confrontation. He reached his distinctive method with The Spoils of Poynton (1896), in which are to be found nearly all the characteristic marks of his procedure. He wished a "central subject" and tried to bring out his basic "idea" by focusing on some intelligent, sensitive, and "aware" central person interposed between the reader and the story, who plays the part of a conscious interpreter for the reader. The "central idea" may be the opposition of new and old world ways of living, an abstraction, a situation, a psychological predicament, a single person or an aspect of a person, or a human relationship. His novels are concerned with pivotal facts or episodes in the lives of his characters, and the action is confined to the consciousness of these characters. The novelist does not tell as an author what he wishes his readers to see. The character or situation is set forth within the story itself, through the mind of someone watching the characters, or through the central character. The reader is on the inside. Who is to see and tell the story, who is to be the "center" or dramatic focus, whose is to be the "point of view," are among the questions James asked himself first. A few critics see in this method the beginning of the subjective "stream of consciousness" movement. James prided himself on the "economy" and "elimination" of his mode of presentation, and he believed that it promoted intensity. In What Maisie Knew he registers the impressions of a child. He conveys the whole story, his subject and his personages, through her juvenile intelligence, supplying no other information. Occasionally he makes use of an observer who is only slightly involved in the story, and often a confidant is needed. He never shifts carelessly from the point of view of one person to that of another, in the usual fashion of novelists. Sometimes, however, instead of the restricted point of view of a single character, there are given in contrast the views of other characters in alternation. These he terms a series of "centers," "mirrors," "lighters," "reflectors," or "lamps," each of which sets forth one of the main aspects of the central character or situation.

James often uses the word "picture" when speaking of his fiction, meaning thereby the restricted area through which his idea is developed. He likes a "scene" method of presentation. He relies on dialogue, but it is never to depart from what is "immediately to the purpose." He seeks "unity or pictorial fusion." He speaks of "foreshortening" and the desirability of achieving "balance" between the halves of either side of the "center of structure." There is elimination not only of all official explanation and formal introduction of characters but usually too of description of scenes and other settings. Since the "picture" is there from the start, and there is often no incident, the story seems to make little progress. His process is rather than of unfolding by bits, by gradual revelation, and from a consistent point of view. Indeed, he does not tell a story at all but gives the subjective concomitants of it. The emphasis is on interior states, and the sense of a rounded narrative with a clear ending is slight. He found "no endings in life" and some of his stories seem not to end at all.

James's critical essays have been collected in some six volumes. As a critic he was chiefly influenced by Sainte-Beuve, and in maturity he developed a method of subtle and sensitive impressionism resembling to some extent that of Walter Pater. His critical principles are set forth in his essay called "Criticism" in his volume Essays in London and Elsewhere (1893).

The best edition of James's works is the New York Edition (26 vols., 1907-17). In this he included his prefaces and critical theories. P. Lubbock edited the Letters of Henry James (2 vols., 1920). No standard life has yet appeared. Autobiographical works by James are A Small Boy and Others (1913), Notes of a Son and Brother (1914), and The Middle Years (1917, unfinished). See Edith Wharton, "Henry James in His Letters," Quarterly Review, CCXXXIV, July, 1920; and Hamlin Garland in Roadside Meetings (1930) and Companions on the Trail (1931).

GREVILLE FANE

James wrote a number of tales dealing with writers of fiction, among them "The Death of the Lion," "The Figure in the Carpet," "The Coxon Fund," and "The Author of Beltraffio." The latter, a novelette, is an excellent example of James's skill and subtlety in this special field. In most of these tales, the authors are presented as men of talents, somehow frustrated in the quality of their work, or in its reception, or in their life experiences.

COMING in to dress for dinner, I found a telegram: "Mrs. Stormer dying; can you give us half a column for tomorrow evening? Let her off easy, but not too easy." I was late; I was in a hurry; I had very little time to think, but at a venture I dispatched a reply: "Will do what I can." It was not till I had dressed and was rolling away to dinner that, in the hansom, I bethought myself of the difficulty of the condition attached. The difficulty was not of course in letting her off easy but in qualifying that indulgence. "I simply won't qualify it," I said to myself. I didn't admire her, but I liked her, and I had known her so long that I almost felt heartless in sitting down at such an hour to a feast of indifference. I must have seemed abstracted, for the early years of my acquaintance with her came back to me. I spoke of her to the lady I had taken down, but the lady I had taken down had never heard of Greville Fane. I tried my other neighbor, who pronounced her books "too vile." I had never thought them very good, but I should let her off easier than that.

I came away early, for the express purpose of driving to ask about her. The journey took time, for she lived in the northwest district, in the neighborhood of Primrose Hill. My apprehension that I should be too late was justified in a fuller sense than I had attached to it—I had only feared that the house would be shut up. There were lights in the windows, and the temperate tinkle of my bell brought a servant immediately to the door, but poor Mrs. Stormer had passed into a state in which the resonance of no earthly knocker was to be feared. A lady, in the hall, hovering behind the servant, came forward when she heard my voice. I recognized Lady Luard, but she had mistaken me for the doctor.

"Excuse my appearing at such an hour," I said; "it was the first possible moment after I heard."

"It's all over," Lady Luard replied. "Dearest mamma!"

She stood there under the lamp with her eyes on me; she was very tall, very stiff, very cold, and always looked as if these things, and some others beside, in her dress, her manner and even her name, were an implication that she was very admirable. I had never been able to follow the argument, but that is a detail. I expressed briefly and frankly what I felt, while the little mottled maidservant flattened herself against the wall of the narrow passage and tried to look detached without looking indifferent. It was not a moment to make a visit, and I was on the point of retreating when Lady Luard arrested me with a queer, casual, drawing "Would you—a—would you, perhaps, be writing something?" I felt for the instant like an interviewer, which I was not. But I pleaded guilty to this intention, on which she rejoined: "I'm so very glad—but I think my brother would like to see you." I detested her brother, but it wasn't an occasion to act this out; so I suffered myself to be inducted, to my surprise, into a small back room which I immediately recognized as the scene, during the later years, of Mrs. Stormer's imperturbable industry. Her table was there, the battered and blotted accessory to innumerable literary lapses, with its contracted space for the arms (she wrote only from the elbow down) and the confusion of scrappy, scribbled sheets which had already become literary remains. Leolin was also there, smoking a cigarette before the fire and looking impudent even in his grief, sincere as it well might have been.

To meet him, to greet him, I had to make a sharp effort; for the air that he wore to me as he stood before me was quite that of his mother's murderer. She lay silent forever upstairs—as dead as an unsuccessful book, and his swaggering erectness was a kind of symbol of his having killed her. I wondered if he had already, with his sister, been calculating what they could get for the poor papers on the table; but I had not long to wait to learn, for in reply to the scanty words of sympathy I addressed him he puffed out: "It's miserable, miserable, yes; but she has left three books complete." His words had the oddest effect; they converted the cramped little room into a seat of trade and made the "book" wonderfully feasible. He would certainly get all that could be got for the three. Lady Luard explained to me that her husband had been with them but had had to go down to the House. To her brother she explained that I was going to write something, and to me again she made it clear that she hoped I would "do mamma justice." She added that she didn't think this had ever been done. She said to her brother: "Don't you think there are some things he ought thoroughly to understand?" and on his instantly exclaiming "Oh, thoroughly—thoroughly!" she went on, rather austere: "I mean about mamma's birth."

"Yes, and her connections," Leolin added.

I professed every willingness, and for five minutes I listened, but it would be too much to say that I understood. I don't even now, but it is not important. My vision was of other matters than those they put before me, and while they desired there should be no mistake about their ancestors I became more and more lucid about themselves. I got away as soon as possible, and walked home through the great dusky, empty London—the best of all conditions for thought. By the time I reached my door my little article was practically composed—ready to be transferred on the morrow from the polished plate of fancy. I believe it attracted some notice, was thought “graceful” and was said to be by someone else. I had to be pointed without being lively, and it took some tact. But what I said was much less interesting than what I thought—especially during the half-hour I spent in my arm-chair by the fire, smoking the cigar I always light before going to bed. I went to sleep there, I believe; but I continued to moralize about Greville Fane. I am reluctant to lose that retrospect altogether, and this is a dim little memory of it, a document not to “serve.” The dear woman had written a hundred stories, but none so curious as her own.

When first I knew her she had published half-a-dozen fictions, and I believe I had also perpetrated a novel. She was more than a dozen years older than I, but she was a person who always acknowledged her relativity. It was not so very long ago, but in London, amid the big waves of the present, even a near horizon gets hidden. I met her at some dinner and took her down, rather flattered at offering my arm to a celebrity. She didn't look like one, with her matronly, mild, inanimate face, but I supposed her greatness would come out in her conversation. I gave it all the opportunities I could, but I was not disappointed when I found her only a dull, kind woman. This was why I liked her—she rested me so from literature. To myself literature was an irritation, a torment; but Greville Fane slumbered in the intellectual part of it like a Creole in a hammock. She was not a woman of genius, but her faculty was so special, so much a gift out of hand, that I have often wondered why she fell below that distinction. This was doubtless because the transaction, in her case, had remained incomplete; genius always pays for the gift, feels the debt, and she was placidly unconscious of obligation. She could invent stories by the yard, but she couldn't write a page of English. She went down to her grave without suspecting that though she had contributed volumes to the diversion of her contemporaries she had not contributed a sentence to the language. This had not prevented bushels of criticism from being heaped upon her head; she was worth a couple of columns any day to the weekly papers, in which it was shown that her pictures of life were dreadful but her style really charming. She asked me to come and see her, and I went. She lived then in Montpellier Square; which helped me to see how dissociated her imagination was from her character.

An industrious widow, devoted to her daily stint, to meeting the butcher and baker and making a home for her son and daughter, from the moment she took her pen in her hand she became a creature of passion. She thought the English novel deplorably wanting in that element, and the task she had cut out for herself was to supply the deficiency. Passion in high life was the general formula of this work, for her imagination was at home only in the most exalted circles. She adored, in truth, the aristocracy, and they constituted for her the romance of the world or, what is more to the point, the prime material of fiction. Their beauty and luxury, their loves and revenges, their temptations and surrenders, their immoralities and diamonds were as familiar to her as the blots on her writing-table. She was not a belated producer of the old fashionable novel, she had a cleverness and a modernness of her own, she had freshened up the fly-blown tinsel. She turned off plots by the hundred and—so far as her flying quill could convey her—was perpetually going abroad. Her types, her illustrations, her tone were nothing if not cosmopolitan. She recognized nothing less provincial than European society, and her fine folk knew each other and made love to each other from Doncaster to Bucharest. She had an idea that she resembled Balzac, and her favorite historical characters were Lucien de Rubempré and the Vidame de Pamiers. I must add that when I once asked her who the latter personage was she was unable to tell me. She was very brave and healthy and cheerful, very abundant and innocent and wicked. She was clever and vulgar and snobbish, and never so intensely British as when she was particularly foreign.

This combination of qualities had brought her early success, and I remember having heard with wonder and envy of what she "got," in those days, for a novel. The revelation gave me a pang; it was such a proof that, practicing a totally different style, I should never make my fortune. And yet when, as I knew her better she told me her real tariff and I saw how rumor had quadrupled it, I liked her enough to be sorry. After a while I discovered too that if she got less it was not that I was to get any more. My failure never had what Mrs. Stormer would have called the banality of being relative—it was always admirably absolute. She lived at ease however in those days—ease is exactly the word, though she produced three novels a year. She scorned me when I spoke of difficulty—it was the only thing that made her angry. If I hinted that a work of art required a tremendous licking into shape she thought it a pretension and a pose. She never recognized the "torment of form"; the furthest she went was to introduce into one of her books (in satire her hand was heavy) a young poet who was always talking about it. I couldn't quite understand her irritation on this score, for she had nothing at stake in the matter. She had a shrewd perception that form, in prose at least, never recommended anyone to the public we were condemned to address, and therefore she lost nothing (putting her private humiliation aside) by not having any. She made no pretense of producing works of art, but had comfortable tea-drinking hours in which she freely confessed herself a common pastrycook, dealing in such tarts and puddings as would bring customers to the shop. She put in plenty of sugar and of cochineal, or whatever it is that gives these articles a rich and attractive color. She had a serene superiority to observation and opportunity which constituted an inexpugnable strength and would enable her to go on indefinitely. It is only real success that wanes, it is only solid things that melt. Greville Fane's ignorance of life was a resource still more un-failing than the most approved receipt. On her saying once that the day would come when she should have written herself out I answered: "Ah, you look into fairyland, and the fairies love you, and they never change. Fairyland is always there; it always was from the beginning of time, and it always will be to the end. They've given you the key and you can always open the door. With me it's different; I try, in my clumsy way, to be in some direct relation to life." "Oh, bother your direct relation to life!" she used to reply, for she was always annoyed by the phrase—which would not in the least prevent her from using it when she wished to try for style. With no more prejudices than an old sausage-mill, she would give forth again with patient punctuality any poor verbal scrap that had been dropped into her. I cheered her with saying that the dark day, at the end, would be for the like of me; inasmuch as, going in our small way by experience and observation, we depended not on a revelation, but on a little tiresome process. Observation depended on opportunity, and where should we be when opportunity failed?

One day she told me that as the novelist's life was so delightful and during the good years at least such a comfortable support (she had these staggering optimisms) she meant to train up her boy to follow it. She took the ingenious view that it was a profession like another and that therefore everything was to be gained by beginning young and serving an apprenticeship. Moreover the education would be less expensive than any other special course, inasmuch as she could administer it herself. She didn't profess to keep a school, but she could at least teach her own child. It was not that she was so very clever, but (she confessed to me as if she were afraid I would laugh at her) that he was. I didn't laugh at her for that, for I thought the boy sharp—I had seen him at sundry times. He was well grown and good-looking and unabashed, and both he and his sister made me wonder about their defunct papa, concerning whom the little I knew was that he had been a clergyman. I explained them to myself by suppositions and imputations possibly unjust to the departed; so little were they—superficially at least—the children of their mother. There used to be, on the easel in her drawing-room, an enlarged photograph of her husband, done by some horrible posthumous "process" and draped, as to its florid frame, with a silken scarf, which testified to the candor of Greville Fane's bad taste. It made him look like an unsuccessful tragedian; but it was not a thing to trust. He may have been a successful comedian. Of the two children the girl was the elder, and struck me in all her younger years as singularly colorless. She was only very long, like an undecipherable letter. It was not till Mrs. Stormer came back from a protracted residence abroad that Ethel (which was this young lady's name) began to produce the effect, which was afterwards remarkable in her, of a certain kind of high resolution. She made one apprehend that she meant to do something for herself. She was long-necked and near-sighted and striking, and I thought I had never seen sweet seventeen in a form so hard and high and dry. She was cold and affected and ambitious, and she carried an eyeglass with a long handle, which she put up whenever she wanted not to see. She had come out, as the phrase is, immensely; and yet I felt as if she were surrounded with a spiked iron railing. What she meant to do for herself was to marry, and it was the only thing, I think, that she meant to do for anyone else; yet who would be inspired to clamber over that bristling barrier? What flower of tenderness or of intimacy would such an adventurer conceive as his reward?

This was for Sir Baldwin Luard to say; but he naturally never confided to me the secret. He was a joyless, jokeless young man, with the air of having other secrets as well, and a determination to get on politically that was indicated by his never having been known to commit himself—as regards any proposition whatever—beyond an exclamatory "Oh!" His wife and he must have conversed mainly in prim ejaculations, but they understood sufficiently that they were kindred spirits. I remember being angry with Greville Fane when she announced these nuptials to me as magnificent; I remember asking her what splendor there was in the union of the daughter of a woman of genius with an irredeemable mediocrity. "Oh! he's awfully clever," she said; but she blushed for the maternal fib. What she meant was that though Sir Baldwin's estates were not vast (he had a dreary house in South Kensington and a still drearier "Hall" somewhere in Essex, which was let), the connection was a "smarter" one than a child of hers could have aspired to form. In spite of the social bravery of her novels she took a very humble and dingy view of herself, so that of all her productions "my daughter Lady Luard" was quite the one she was proudest of. That personage thought her mother very vulgar and was distressed and perplexed by the occasional license of her pen, but had a complicated attitude in regard to this indirect connection with literature. So far as it was lucrative her ladyship approved of it, and could compound with the inferiority of the pursuit by doing practical justice to some of its advantages. I had reason to know (my reason was simply that poor Mrs. Stormer told me) that she suffered the inky fingers to press an occasional bank-note into her palm. On the other hand she deplored the "peculiar style" to which Greville Fane had devoted herself, and wondered where an author who had the convenience of so lady-like a daughter could have picked up such views about the best society. "She might know better, with Leolin and me," Lady Luard had been known to remark; but it appeared that some of Greville Fane's superstitions were incurable. She didn't live in Lady Luard's society, and the best was not good enough for her—she must make it still better.

I could see that this necessity grew upon her during the years she spent abroad, when I had glimpses of her in the shifting sojourns that lay in the path of my annual ramble. She betook herself from Germany to Switzerland and from Switzerland to Italy; she favored cheap places and set up her desk in the smaller capitals. I took a look at her whenever I could, and I always asked how Leolin was getting on. She gave me beautiful accounts of him, and whenever it was possible the boy was produced for my edification. I had entered from the first into the joke of his career—I pretended to regard him as a consecrated child. It had been a joke for Mrs. Stormer at first, but the boy himself had been shrewd enough to make the matter serious. If his mother accepted the principle that the intending novelist cannot begin too early to see life, Leolin was not interested in hanging back from the application of it. He was eager to qualify himself, and took to cigarettes at ten, on the highest literary grounds. His poor mother gazed at him with extravagant envy and, like Desdemona, wished heaven had made her such a man. She explained to me more than once that in her profession she had found her sex a dreadful drawback. She loved the story of Madame George Sand's early rebellion against this hindrance, and believed that if she had worn trousers she could have written as well as that lady. Leolin had for the career at least the qualification of trousers, and as he grew older he recognized its importance by laying in an immense assortment. He grew up in gorgeous apparel, which was his way of interpreting his mother's system. Whenever I met her I found her still under the impression that she was carrying this system out and that Leolin's training was bearing fruit. She was giving him experience, she was giving him impressions, she was putting a gagne-pain into his hand. It was another name for spoiling him with the best conscience in the world. The queerest pictures come back to me of this period of the good lady's life and of the extraordinarily virtuous, muddled, bewildering tenor of it. She had an idea that she was seeing foreign manners as well as her petticoats would allow; but, in reality she was not seeing anything, least of all fortunately how much she was laughed at. She drove her whimsical pen at Dresden and at Florence, and produced in all places and at all times the same romantic and ridiculous fictions. She carried about her box of properties and fished out promptly the familiar, tarnished old puppets. She believed in them when others couldn't, and as they were like nothing that was to be seen under the sun it was impossible to prove by comparison that they were wrong. You can't compare birds and fishes; you could only feel that, as Greville Fane's characters had the fine plumage of the former species, human beings must be of the latter.

It would have been droll if it had not been so exemplary to see her tracing the loves of the duchesses beside the innocent cribs of her children. The immoral and the maternal lived together in her diligent days on the most comfortable terms, and she stopped curling the mustaches of her Guardsmen to pat the heads of her babes. She was haunted by solemn spinsters who came to tea from continental pensions, and by unsophisticated Americans who told her she was just loved in their country. "I had rather be just paid there," she usually replied; for this tribute of transatlantic opinion was the only thing that galled her. The Americans went away thinking her coarse; though as the author of so many beautiful love-stories she was disappointing to most of these pilgrims, who had not expected to find a shy, stout, ruddy lady in a cap like a crumbled pyramid. She wrote about the affections and the impossibility of controlling them, but she talked of the price of pension and the convenience of an English chemist. She devoted much thought and many thousands of francs to the education of her daughter, who spent three years at a very superior school at Dresden, receiving wonderful instruction in sciences, arts and tongues, and who, taking a different line from Leolin, was to be brought up wholly as a femme du monde. The girl was musical and philological; she made a specialty of languages and learned enough about them to be inspired with a great contempt for her mother's artless accents. Greville Fane's French and Italian were droll; the imitative faculty had been denied her, and she had an unequalled gift, especially pen in hand, of squeezing big mistakes into small opportunities. She knew it, but she didn't care; correctness was the virtue in the world that, like her heroes and heroines, she valued least. Ethel, who had perceived in her pages some remarkable lapses, undertook at one time to revise her proofs; but I remember her telling me a year after the girl had left school that this function had been very briefly exercised. "She can't read me," said Mrs. Stormer; "I offend her taste. She tells me that at Dresden—at school—I was never allowed." The good lady seemed surprised at this, having the best conscience in the world about her lucubrations. She had never meant to fly in the face of anything, and considered that she groveled before the Rhadamanthus of the English literary tribunal, the celebrated and awful Young Person. I assured her, as a joke, that she was frightfully indecent (she hadn't in fact that reality any more than any other) my purpose being solely to prevent her from guessing that her daughter had dropped her not because she was immoral but because she was vulgar. I used to figure her children closeted together and asking each other while they exchanged a gaze of dismay: "Why should she be so—and so fearfully so—when she has the advantage of our society? Shouldn't we have taught her better?" Then I imagined their recognizing with a blush and a shrug that she was unteachable, irreformable. Indeed she was, poor lady; but it is never fair to read by the light of taste things that were not written by it. Greville Fane had, in the topsy-turvy, a serene good faith that ought to have been safe from allusion, like a stutter or a faux pas.

She didn't make her son ashamed of the profession to which he was destined, however; she only made him ashamed of the way she herself exercised it. But he bore his humiliation much better than his sister, for he was ready to take for granted that he should one day restore the balance. He was a canny and far-seeing youth, with appetites and aspirations, and he had not a scruple in his composition. His mother's theory of the happy knack he could pick up deprived him of the wholesome discipline required to prevent young idlers from becoming cad. He had, abroad, a casual tutor and a snatch or two of a Swiss school, but no consecutive study, no prospect of a university or a degree. It may be imagined with what zeal, as the years went on, he entered into the pleasantries of there being no manual so important to him as the massive book of life. It was an expensive volume to peruse, but Mrs. Stormer was willing to lay out a sum in what she would have called her premiers frais. Ethel disapproved—she thought this education far too unconventional for an English gentleman. Her voice was for Eton and Oxford, or for any public school (she would have resigned herself) with the army to follow. But Leolin never was afraid of his sister, and they visibly disliked, though they sometimes agreed to assist, each other. They could combine to work the oracle—to keep their mother at her desk.

When she came back to England, telling me she had got all the continent could give her, Leolin was a broad-shouldered, red-faced young man, with an immense wardrobe and an extraordinary assurance of manner. She was fondly obstinate about her having taken the right course with him, and proud of all that he knew and had seen. He was now quite ready to begin, and a little while later she told me he had begun. He had written something tremendously clever, and it was coming out in the Cheapside. I believe it came out; I had no time to look for it; I never heard anything about it. I took for granted that if this contribution had passed through his mother's hands it had practically become a specimen of her own genius, and it was interesting to consider Mrs. Stormer's future in the light of her having to write her son's novels as well as her own. This was not the way she looked at it herself; she took the charming ground that he would help her to write hers. She used to tell me that he supplied passages of the greatest value to her own work—all sorts of technical things, about hunting and yachting and wine—that she couldn't be expected to get very straight. It was all so much practice for him and so much alleviation for her. I was unable to identify these pages, for I had long since ceased to "keep up" with Greville Fane; but I was quite able to believe that the wine-question had been put, by Leolin's good offices, on a better footing, for the dear lady used to mix her drinks (she was perpetually serving the most splendid suppers) in the queerest fashion. I could see that he was willing enough to accept a commission to look after that department. It occurred to me indeed, when Mrs. Stormer settled in England again, that by making a shrewd use of both her children she might be able to rejuvenate her style. Ethel had come back to gratify her young ambition, and if she couldn't take her mother into society she would at least go into it herself. Silently, stiffly, almost grimly, this young lady held up her head, clenched her long teeth, squared her lean elbows and made her way up the staircases she had elected. The only communication she ever made to me, the only effusion of confidence with which she ever honored me, was when she said: "I don't want to know the people mamma knows; I mean to know others." I took due note of the remark, for I was not one of the "others." I couldn't trace therefore the steps of her process;

I could only admire it at a distance and congratulate her mother on the results. The results were that Ethel went to "big" parties and got people to take her. Some of them were people she had met abroad, and others were people whom the people she had met abroad had met. They ministered alike to Miss Ethel's convenience, and I wondered how she extracted so many favors without the expenditure of a smile. Her smile was the dimmest thing in the world, diluted lemonade, without sugar, and she had arrived precociously at social wisdom, recognizing that if she was neither pretty enough nor rich enough nor clever enough, she could at least in her muscular youth be rude enough. Therefore if she was able to tell her mother what really took place in the mansions of the great, give her notes to work from, the quill could be driven at home to better purpose and precisely at a moment when it would have to be more active than ever. But if she did tell, it would appear that poor Mrs. Stormer didn't believe. As regards many points this was not a wonder; at any rate I heard nothing of Greville Fane's having developed a new manner. She had only one manner from start to finish, as Leolin would have said.

She was tired at last, but she mentioned to me that she couldn't afford to pause. She continued to speak of Leolin's work as the great hope of their future (she had saved no money) though the young man wore to my sense an aspect more and more professional if you like, but less and less literary. At the end of a couple of years there was something monstrous in the impudence with which he played his part in the comedy. When I wondered how she could play her part I had to perceive that her good faith was complete and that what kept it so was simply her extravagant fondness. She loved the young imposter with a simple, blind, benighted love, and of all the heroes of romance who had passed before her eyes he was by far the most brilliant. He was at any rate the most real—she could touch him, pay for him, suffer for him, worship him. He made her think of her princes and dukes, and when she wished to fix these figures in her mind's eye she thought of her boy. She had often told me she was carried away by her own creations, and she was certainly carried away by Leolin. He vivified, by potentialities at least, the whole question of youth and passion. She held, not unjustly, that the sincere novelist should feel the whole flood of life; she acknowledged with regret that she had not had time to feel it herself, and it was a joy to her that the deficiency might be supplied by the sight of the way it was rushing through this magnificent young man. She exhorted him, I suppose, to let it rush; she wrung her own flaccid little sponge into the torrent. I knew not what passed between them in her hours of tuition, but I gathered that she mainly impressed on him that the great thing was to live, because that gave you material. He asked nothing better; he collected material, and the formula served as a universal pretext. You had only to look at him to see that, with his rings and breastpins, his cross-barred jackets, his early embonpoint, his eyes that looked like imitation jewels, his various indications of a dense, full-blown temperament, his idea of life was singularly vulgar; but he was not so far wrong as that his response to his mother's expectations was not in a high degree practical. If she had imposed a profession on him from his tenderest years it was exactly a profession that he followed. The two were not quite the same, inasmuch as his was simply to live at her expense; but at least she couldn't say that he hadn't taken a line. If she insisted on believing in him he offered himself to the sacrifice. My impression is that her secret dream was that he should have a liaison with a countess, and he persuaded her without difficulty that he had one. I don't know what countesses are capable of, but I have a clear notion of what Leolin was.

He didn't persuade his sister, who despised him—she wished to work her mother in her own way, and I asked myself why the girl's judgment of him didn't make me like her better. It was because it didn't save her after all from a mute agreement with him to go halves. There were moments when I couldn't help looking hard into his atrocious young eyes, challenging him to confess his fantastic fraud and give it up. Not a little tacit conversation passed between us in this way, but he had always the best of it. If I said: "Oh, come now, with me you needn't keep it up; plead guilty, and I'll let you off," he wore the most ingenuous, the most candid expression, in the depths of which I could read: "Oh, yes, I know it exasperates you—that's just why I do it." He took the line of earnest inquiry, talked about Balzac and Flaubert, asked me if I thought Dickens did exaggerate and Thackeray ought to be called a pessimist. Once he came to see me, at his mother's suggestion he declared, on purpose to ask me how far, in my opinion, in the English novel, one really might venture to "go." He was not resigned to the usual pruderies—he suffered under them already. He struck out the brilliant idea that nobody knew how far we might go, for nobody had ever tried. Did I think he might safely try—would it injure his mother if he did? He would rather disgrace himself by his timidities than injure his mother, but certainly someone ought to try. Wouldn't I try—couldn't I be prevailed upon to look at it as a duty? Surely the ultimate point ought to be fixed—he was worried, haunted by the question. He patronized me unblushingly, made me feel like a foolish amateur, a helpless novice, inquired into my habits of work and conveyed to me that I was utterly vieux jeu and had not had the advantage of an early training. I had not been brought up from the germ, I knew nothing of life—didn't go at it on his system. He had dipped into French feuilletons and picked up plenty of phrases, and he made a much better show in talk than his poor mother, who never had time to read anything and could only be vivid with her pen. If I didn't kick him downstairs it was because he would have alighted on her at the bottom.

When she went to live at Primrose Hill I called upon her and found her weary and wasted. It had waned a good deal, the elation caused the year before by Ethel's marriage; the foam on the cup had subsided and there was a bitterness in the draught. She had had to take a cheaper house and she had to work still harder to pay even for that. Sir Baldwin was obliged to be close; his charges were fearful, and the dream of her living with her daughter (a vision she had never mentioned to me) must be renounced. "I would have helped with things, and I could have lived perfectly in one room," she said; "I would have paid for everything, and—after all—I'm someone, ain't I? But I don't fit in, and Ethel tells me there are tiresome people she must receive. I can help them from here, no doubt, better than from there. She told me once, you know, what she thinks of my picture of life. 'Mamma, your picture of life is preposterous!' No doubt it is, but she's vexed with me for letting my prices go down; and I had to write three novels to pay for all her marriage cost me. I did it very well—I mean the outfit and the wedding; but that's why I'm here. At any rate she doesn't want a dingy old woman in her house. I should give it an atmosphere of literary glory, but literary glory is only the eminence of nobodies. Besides, she doubts my glory—she knows I'm glorious only at Peckham and Hackney. She doesn't want her friends to ask if I've never known nice people. She can't tell them I've never been in society. She tried to teach me better once, but I couldn't learn. It would seem too as if Peckham and Hackney had had enough of me; for (don't tell anyone!) I've had to take less for my last than I ever took for anything." I asked her how little this had been, not from curiosity, but in order to upbraid her, more disinterestedly than Lady Luard had done, for such concessions. She answered "I'm ashamed to tell you," and then she began to cry.

I had never seen her break down, and I was proportionately moved; she sobbed, like a frightened child, over the extinction of her vogue and the exhaustion of her vein. Her little workroom seemed indeed a barren place to grow flowers, and I wondered, in the after years (for she continued to produce and publish) by what desperate and heroic process she dragged them out of the soil. I remember asking her on that occasion what had become of Leolin, and how much longer she intended to allow him to amuse himself at her cost. She rejoined with spirit, wiping her eyes, that he was down at Brighton hard at work—he was in the midst of a novel—and that he felt life so, in all its misery and mystery, that it was cruel to speak of such experiences as a pleasure. "He goes beneath the surface," she said, "and he forces himself to look at things from which he would rather turn away. Do you call that amusing yourself? You should see his face sometimes! And he does it for me as much as for himself. He tells me everything—he comes home to me with his trouvailles. We are artists together, and to the artist all things are pure. I've often heard you say so yourself." The novel that Leolin was engaged in at Brighton was never published, but a friend of mine and of Mrs. Stormer's who was staying there happened to mention to me later that he had seen the young apprentice to fiction driving, in a dogcart, a young lady with a very pink face. When I suggested that she was perhaps a woman of title with whom he was conscientiously flirting my informant replied: "She is indeed, but do you know what her title is?" He pronounced it—it was familiar and descriptive—but I won't reproduce it here. I don't know whether Leolin mentioned it to his mother: she would have needed all the purity of the artist to forgive him. I hated so to come across him that in the very last years I went rarely to see her, though I knew that she had come pretty well to the end of her rope. I didn't want her to tell me that she had fairly to give her books away—I didn't want to see her cry. She kept it up amazingly, and every few months, at my club, I saw three new volumes, in green, in crimson, in blue, on the book-table that groaned with light literature. Once I met her at the Academy soirée, where you meet people you thought were dead, and she vouchsafed the information, as if she owed it to me in candor, that Leolin had been obliged to recognize insuperable difficulties in the question of form, he was so fastidious; so that she had now arrived at a definite understanding with him (it was such a comfort) that she would do the form if he would bring home the substance. That was now his position—he foraged for her in the great world at a salary. "He's my 'devil,' don't you see? as if I were a great lawyer: he gets up the case and I argue it." She mentioned further that in addition to his salary he was paid by the piece: he got so much for a striking character, so much for a pretty name, so much for a plot, so much for an incident, and had so much promised him if he would invent a new crime.

"He has invented one," I said, "and he's paid every day of his life."

"What is it?" she asked, looking hard at the picture of the year, "Baby's Tub," near which we happened to be standing.

I hesitated a moment. "I myself will write a little story about it, and then you'll see."

But she never saw; she had never seen anything, and she passed away with her fine blindness unimpaired. Her son published every scrap of scribbled paper that could be extracted from her table-drawers, and his sister quarreled with him mortally about the proceeds, which showed that she only wanted a pretext, for they cannot have been great. I don't know what Leolin lives upon, unless it be on a queer lady many years older than himself, whom he lately married. The last time I met him he said to me with his infuriating smile: "Don't you think we can go a little further still—just a little?" He really goes too far.

SOURCES AND BEGINNINGS

i

Much of the creative energy of early twentieth-century America was consumed by controversies over Darwin and Spencer, and by attempts to form a naturalistic theory of writing from the suggestions offered by those two British theorists of science. The philosophy and psychology of Herbert Spencer was especially adapted to American business apologetics; Spencer was also reassuring to those who wished to combine evolutionary theories with a theory of progress. "The ultimate development of the ideal man is logically certain," he said in Social Statics (1850), "as certain as any conclusion in which we place the most explicit faith. . . . Progress, therefore, is not an accident, but a necessity." In his interpretation of that progress, Spencer clearly indicated that the doctrine of evolution involved also a business philosophy of laissez-faire, and vigorously opposed socialist and humanitarian ideals. The captains of industry found in Spencer's reading of Darwin justification and flattery for themselves. "It would be strange," wrote C. R. Henderson in The American Journal of Sociology in 1896, "if the 'captain of the industry' did not sometimes manifest a militant spirit, for he has risen from the ranks largely because he was a better fighter than most of us. Competitive commercial life is not a flowery bed of ease, but a battle field where the 'struggle for existence' is defining the industrially 'fittest to survive.'"

The titans and the financiers were quick to take up the refrain. "The growth of a large business is merely a survival of the fittest," said John D. Rockefeller. "The American Beauty rose can be produced in the splendor and fragrance which bring cheer to its beholder only by sacrificing the early buds which grow up around it." This is not an evil thing, but "merely the working out of a law of nature and a law of God." Andrew Carnegie, perhaps Spencer's closest American friend, also saw "the light" when he "had found the truth of evolution." The Christian socialists, some members of the ministry, and such journalists as Edward Bellamy thought otherwise. "I assert that the injustice of society, not the niggardliness of nature, is the cause of the want and misery which the current theory [Spencer's adaptation of Malthus] attributes to overpopulation," said Henry George at the end of Book Two of Progress and Poverty (1879). To the "selfishness" of late nineteenth-century capitalism, Bellamy's Dr. Leete (of Looking Backward, 1888) opposed "combination," or "The Brotherhood of Humanity," as "the secret of efficient production." So long as competition, "simply the application of the brutal law of the survival of the strongest and most cunning," persists in the American economy, "the highest development of the individual cannot be reached, the loftiest aims of humanity cannot be realized."

At the beginning of the century, these points of view stood as representative expressions of American thought. Darwin's evolutionary theories had been variously interpreted, at first by Spencer and later by Benjamin Kidd, whose Social Evolution (1894) was eagerly seized upon as a decisive indication that social reform and Darwinism were not irreconcilable. These theories dominated the intellectual life of a country which had just recently finished the Spanish-American War and emerged with colonial possessions and mandates spread over half the globe. The attitude of American thinkers was dominated by the effort to explain American greatness and bigness; its second concern was to find a philosophical position which would somehow account for the enormous strategic advantage which science had assumed since the end of the Civil War. Northern industrialism, having conquered the South in a test of material strength, now pushed forward and westward. Inventions, scientific discoveries, refinements of efficiency brought into business, above all the presence of the dynamo—these were the order of the day. But, although the writers of the twentieth century could not deny the physical strength of these things and the physical energy of those who exploited them, they were not satisfied with a mere acceptance or an easy explanation in terms of material progress, or in Darwinian catch phrases.

Naturalism in American literature was an expression of the scientific condition of the age. The writers of fiction in the late nineteenth century were aware of both the need and the opportunity to justify their work in terms of a philosophical theory which was certainly not perfectly adjusted to their own tempers but seemed to reflect quite satisfactorily the temper of the times. American naturalism had its European sources in Emile Zola's "experimental novel," in George Moore's Esther Waters, in the novels of Thomas Hardy. Zola had said in 1880, "In one word, we should operate on the characters, the passions, on the human and social data, in the same way that the chemist and the physicist operate on inanimate beings and as the physiologist operates on living beings. Determinism dominates everything." Such an approach to literature, while it was seldom used without qualification or reservation, appealed to the novelists of the late nineteenth and the early twentieth centuries. While William Dean Howells had insisted upon "truth" in fiction and described the realist as one who "cannot look upon human life and declare this thing or that thing unworthy of notice, any more than the scientist can declare a fact of the material world beneath the dignity of his inquiry," he had also set limits upon the practice of realism, had in his writings presented for the most part a selectively realistic portrait of certain areas of American and social life. "The manners of the novel have been improving with those of its readers; that is all," he said in answer to critics who would have wanted the novelist to "tell all." "Generally, people now call a spade an agricultural implement; they have not grown decent without having also grown a little squeamish, but they have grown comparatively decent; there is no doubt about that. They require of a novelist whom they respect unquestionable proof of his seriousness, if he proposes to deal with certain phases of life; they require a sort of scientific decorum."

This was polite realism, which, in the opinion of younger writers, could not go far enough or soil its hands enough. The naturalism of Stephen Crane, Frank Norris, Jack London, and Theodore Dreiser was far less "squeamish" and selective. Or, if one of them did follow a principle of selection, it was not Howells's "Young Girl" they had in mind. This is not to say that they followed consistently any philosophy of behavior, or stayed scrupulously and objectively outside their work, as Zola had counseled. Briefly, naturalism, as these writers saw it, did accept, at least in spirit, Zola's belief in "scientific objectivity," which inclined them to the representation of all the crudities of dialect and style implicit in their subjects. On the question of the dominating and controlling causes of the human behavior they were to describe so objectively, they alternated between universal and environmental determinism: fate or society, or society as a passive demonstration of fate, were variously blamed for the behavior of their creatures. Whichever the cause, man seems to act in a blind obedience to his passions and impulses; he is possessed of no free will; he is generally a passive servant of an indifferent universe and acts in terms of "natural law" as expressed either in his own biological condition or in his environment. All of this is oversimplified. Into the history of American fiction went a great number of other determining influences: the Nietzschean idea of the superman, very badly misinterpreted and disarranged, affected the writing of Norris (in A Man's Woman and Moran of the Lady Letty) and of Jack London; socialist reactions against the convenient Spencerian reading of Darwin qualified and directed the realism of many progressive, "muckraking" novelists of the first two decades; the attention to regional detail, careful and repetitious in the work of Sara Orne Jewett, Mary Wilkins Freeman, and others, continued to dominate the fictional attitudes of Ellen Glasgow, Willa Cather, and Elizabeth Madox Roberts, and much later to contribute to the most effective devices of John Steinbeck and of Katherine Anne Porter; the late nineteenth century celebrations of the men of industry were subsequently to be modified into "naturalistic" accountings for their greatness (as in Norris's The Pit and Dreiser's The Financier and The Titan); melodrama in various forms was to enliven and occasionally to direct the course of such novels as Norris's The Octopus. In other words, naturalism, a theory imperfectly understood, was even more imperfectly followed. It led to a great variety of literary practices. But much of the fiction that appeared from 1890 to 1925 represented either an attempt to explain or an effort to escape what in the mind of the American writer was "the dilemma of naturalism."

The effect upon the styles in American fiction was varied. In many cases, naturalism seemed to require, or at the least to excuse, serious weaknesses of style. The effort to imitate the language of the subject led often to a surrender to its manner; the desire to escape selective discrimination led to huge, sprawling, novelistic extensions of the worst vices of journalism; the not infrequent giving in to the temptation for editorializing often revealed appalling sins against good taste. If we will examine a few examples of what might be called "the naturalistic style," we shall be able to note the several manners this fiction assumed. The first is from Stephen Crane's Maggie: A Girl of the Streets (1892), stylistically an extremely poor novel. There are only occasional flashes of Crane's descriptive excellence (which in The Red Badge of Courage, 1895, proved to be great indeed). The short novel is marked by a painstaking attempt to reproduce the letter of New York slum life. The exposition is given in an awkward, often ponderous, manner.

As he became aware that she was listening closely, he grew still more eloquent in his description of various happenings in his career. It appeared that he was invincible in fights. "Why," he said, referring to a man with whom he had had a misunderstanding, "dat mug scrapped like a dago. Dat's right. He was dead easy. See? He t'ought he was a scrapper. But he foun' out diff'ent. Hully gee!"

Another passage, from Crane's The Open Boat (1898), one of his better works, demonstrates the use made of naturalist despair, together with the author's occasional exploitation of the irony of circumstance, so often and so easily employed by naturalist writers. The men who have survived the wreck of their ship move slowly and uncertainly in their boat toward the Florida shore; at times they are heartened, at times depressed, by signs or imagined signs from the shore. The reflections of the men, as given by their author, read as follows:

"If I am going to be drowned—if I am going to be drowned—if I am going to be drowned, why, in the name of the seven mad gods who rule the sea, was I allowed to come thus far and contemplate sand and trees? Was I brought here merely to have my nose dragged away as I was about to nibble the sacred cheese of life? It is preposterous. If this old ninny-woman, Fate, cannot do better than this, she should be deprived of the management of men's fortunes. She is an old hen who knows not her intention. If she has decided to drown me, why did she not do it in the beginning and save me all this trouble? The whole affair is absurd.—But no; she cannot mean to drown me. Not after all this work."

The last, melodramatic struggle in Frank Norris's McTeague (1899) illustrates once again the rather clumsy consciousness on the part of these writers of the necessity openly and circumstantially to prove the rigors of fate and the impotence of man. McTeague has been fighting with his enemy Marcus Schouler and has managed to kill him:

As McTeague rose to his feet, he felt a pull at his right wrist; something held it fast. Looking down, he saw that Marcus in that last struggle had found strength to handcuff their wrists together. Marcus was dead now; McTeague was locked to the body. All about him, vast, interminable, stretched the measureless leagues of Death Valley.

McTeague remained stupidly looking around him, now at the distant horizon, now at the ground, now at the half-dead canary chattering feebly in its little gilt prison.

Here is a final example, this time to illustrate not so much the naturalist's obedience to Zola's call for objectivity as the anxiety of one naturalist author to provide editorial comment, to support overtly what the subject is supposed to demonstrate intrinsically. This is from Theodore Dreiser's Sister Carrie (1900), one of a few landmarks in the history of naturalist writing. It is a comment upon Hurstwood's resolve to steal the money and escape Chicago with Carrie. He has just returned the money to the safe, in a moment of wavering. A minute later he takes it once again, and the safe door is accidentally locked against any further weakening of his will. The occasion is a convenient one for the author's comment:

We must remember that it may not be a knowledge of right, for no knowledge of right is predicated of the animal's instinctive recoil at evil. Men are still led by instinct before they are regulated by knowledge. It is instinct which recalls the criminal—it is instinct (where highly organised reasoning is absent) which gives the criminal his feeling of danger, his fear of wrong.

And so on. The patterns of Dreiser's novels are thus broken in upon, again and again, by the author's unhesitating and unfortunate resolve to provide commentary where exposition, however crude, might have sufficed. As R. P. Blackmur has said about another writer, Dreiser's novels can be described as that kind in which "everything is undertaken with seriousness except the writing."

The very complex picture of naturalism in our literature from 1890 to 1925, suggests several comments upon it:

1. It was the reaction of writers to the domination of science over the national scene. As such, it often borrowed suggestions from the scientists and theorists themselves, but with a variety of reinterpretations and "unscientific" uses.

2. It did not mean the abandonment of Howells's kind of realism, which, as a mild form of anti-romanticism, encouraged local color and regional fiction on the one hand, and on the other provided (in A Traveler from Altruria, 1894, and in Through the Eye of the Needle, 1907) examples and guidance for the social realism of our century. The progressive muckrakers and social novelists of the first two decades were not so much naturalists as social reformists who used the novel as a means of suggesting improvements in a society which the naturalists believed generally to be beyond or beneath improvement. On some occasions, the naturalists themselves left their philosophic positions to assert some kind of social or socialist doctrine, or at least to suggest that the environment might be changed, and men with it.

3. It was often accompanied by contemporary ideas and theories, which yielded such strange results as Jack London's socialism and primitive Nietzscheanism.

4. It was closely associated, and indeed concurrent, with the American confusion regarding the place of science in the national life. The confused attitude toward the machine in American literature, vacillating between worshipful admiration and hatred, is a reflection of the wider confusion in the American feeling toward theoretic and applied science.

5. Finally, it provided incentives at times, at least precedent, for certain stylistic developments in the fiction of America after World War I. The beginnings of naturalist frankness meant the fairly general defeat of Victorian reticence, and psychoanalysis provided a scientific means of rationalizing postwar frankness. The attack upon war heroics in literature is at least partly traceable to the precedent established by Crane's The Red Badge of Courage, though it was by no means the only, or the first, work to treat war in this fashion. It is probable that James T. Farrell, John Dos Passos, Sherwood Anderson, and Ernest Hemingway began their writing in a manner already prepared for them, and with the assurance of a public accustomed to the kind of writing they were to follow. It is a mistake, however, to suggest that these men were predominantly influenced by the earlier naturalists. In a number of ways, the postwar fictionalists belonged to another school of writing, which will be discussed in another section of this essay.

ii

With the exception of the work of Edwin Arlington Robinson, some of whose best poetry was published in the 1890's and 1900's, American poetry could scarcely be called distinguished at the beginning of the twentieth century. The impressive figures of the nineteenth, Walt Whitman and Emily Dickinson, had left the scene; and Stephen Crane's small poetic testimony to Miss Dickinson's manner (The Black Riders, 1895, and War Is Kind, 1899) was scarcely sufficient in quantity or excellence to disturb or challenge the literary world. American poetry was fairly well held in subjection to the late and last Victorian Englishmen. Robinson himself had rather bitterly complained over the product of "the little sonnet men" and appealed for a poet—for a beacon bright

To rift this changeless glimmer of dead gray;
To spirit back the Muses, long astray,
And flush Parnassus with a newer light;

...

"What does it mean, this barren age of ours?" he asked: everything exists, as it always has, for the poet to put to his uses; yet there is no poet competent enough to take advantage:

... Shall there not one arise
To wrench one banner from the western skies,
And mark it with his name forevermore?

The "Sonnet" spoke with some bitterness about observable fact. Robinson's early poems, published in 1896, 1897, 1902, and 1910, were brilliant exceptions to the custom. There were the very slender talents of Richard Hovey (1864-1900) and Bliss Carman (1861-1929), the slightly more impressive work of William Vaughn Moody (1869-1910) and Trumbull Stickney (1874-1904); but for the most part poetry can scarcely be said to have given America a reputation to equal that which Gerard Hopkins, Robert Bridges, and Thomas Hardy had given and were giving England. Poetry needed a radical revision; poets needed to be reminded of the special nature of their art; and, not less important, they needed an opportunity, or as many opportunities as they could get, to be published. Robinson's early difficulty and poverty and Frost's move to England testify to the unfavorable climate which American poets had to endure.

One opportunity appeared in 1912, when Harriet Monroe started her Poetry magazine in Chicago. Marion Reedy, who in 1913 took over the St. Louis Mirror and renamed it Reedy's Mirror, also published new poetry by new and inconspicuous talents—especially the poems from The Spoon River Anthology by "Webster Ford," who toward the end of his tenure in the Mirror announced himself as Edgar Lee Masters. Margaret Anderson's The Little Review, begun in Chicago in 1914, published, often in competition with Miss Monroe, poetry by the new poets; but her influence was very small in the first years.

The beginnings of twentieth-century poetry in America would have been impressive enough, although scarcely revolutionary, without the assistance of Ezra Pound, who had found his way to Europe late in 1907, and who became a "foreign correspondent" for Poetry through most of the 1910's, and for The Little Review toward the end of that decade. While Miss Monroe demonstrated a fine, strong editorial personality, hers was scarcely the discrimination to bring such talent as found its way into the earliest issues of Poetry, without the aid of Pound and his fellows in London. "Can you teach the American poet that poetry is an art, an art with a technique, with media—an art that must be in constant flux, a constant change of manner, if it is to live?" Pound asked her in an early letter. "Can you teach him it is not a pentametric echo of the sociological dogma printed in last year's magazines?" The work of Pound and his fellow exiles and contemporary English writers in London was dedicated to the elimination of the "dull and interminable effusions" of contemporary versifiers, to the reinstatement of poetry as a valid art, and to the inclusion of at least some of the results of the discussions which had been taking place among men like T. E. Hulme, F. S. Flint, Pound, T. S. Eliot, and Richard Aldington.

The first American poet to be introduced as an Imagist was Hilda Doolittle, who went to Europe in 1911 and whose first contributions to Poetry (January, 1913) were signed "H. D., Imagiste." Other poems subsequently published in America included some by her English husband, Richard Aldington, some of Pound's early poems, T. S. Eliot's "Preludes" and "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock," and even a few of D. H. Lawrence's poems. The first Imagist anthology, called Des Imagistes, was issued in 1914 from London. Three others were published in the United States—in 1915, in 1916, and in 1917—under the supervision of Amy Lowell and each time with the title Some Imagist Poets.

The principles which the Imagists stated and restated were such as any really conscientious poet might have followed without having to be told about them. But they were a refreshing challenge to the poetry of the day and were quite seriously needed as a reminder of the function of poetry. T. E. Hulme, whose influence on the group was great, had said, in speaking of what he wished known as "the new classicism" in literature:

The essence of poetry to most people is that it must lead them to a beyond of some kind. Verse strictly confined to the earthly and definite (Keats is full of it) might seem to them to be excellent writing, excellent craftsmanship, but not poetry. So much has romanticism debauched us that, without some form of vagueness, we deny the highest.

To eliminate all forms of vagueness, the first set of Imagist principles struck at the vital necessity for poetic economy and insisted upon the "hard core of objectivity," which was crucial to the Imagist strategy. These principles were published in the January, 1913, issue of Poetry in an article by F. S. Flint; they are, however, part of Pound's exposition of Imagist theory:

1. "Direct treatment of the 'thing,' whether subjective or objective."
2. "To use absolutely no word that does not contribute to the presentation."
3. "As regards rhythm, to compose in sequence of the musical phrase, not in sequence of a metronome."
4. To conform to the "doctrine of the image"—which Pound later defined as "an intellectual and emotional complex in an instant of time."

This was substantially the statement of Imagism during the early years. In 1914 Pound disassociated himself from the group, and his work is not found in the 1915 anthology. "Imagism was a point on the curve of my development. Some people remained at that point. I moved on," he said to Glenn Hughes by way of explaining his break. What he had called "Amygism" continued; and Amy Lowell, having rescued it from Pound, brought it with her to America and proceeded to exhibit, advertise, and defend it in American lecture halls and magazines and in her anthologies and criticism. The revised list of principles, attached to the 1915 anthology, was done principally by Aldington and introduced only a few new ideas to the already established list: for one thing, it emphasized free verse and recommended it by saying that "we believe the individuality of a poet may often be better expressed in free verse than in conventional forms. In poetry, a new cadence means a new idea." It talked also about "the language of common speech" but meant nothing more than the earlier statement had intended. It spoke of the need for "absolute freedom in the choice of subject" but concluded by reiterating the original views of poetry, that it be hard and clear and free of the "vagueness" of which both Hulme and Pound had spoken.

Imagist theory, as it has been summarized, was a necessary and disciplinary step in the development of modern American poetry. The poetry it gave rise to was not often distinguished, and it certainly did not follow consistently the principles as set down. But it impressed, perhaps by virtue of stark contrast with the sadly deficient character of much contemporary verse. In many respects, Imagism was quite consistent with the realism of American fiction. Imagists enjoyed or pretended to an obsessive preoccupation with the hard, objective, irreducible minimum of real fact. The image was designed as the most honest, the most practicable, the least cluttered evidence of reality which poetry was capable of representing. Certainly very little poetry produced since the period of Imagist ferment has failed to reflect in one way or another its elementary and elemental concerns with the language and the technique of poetry.

From 1910 to the present day there have existed at least two major traditions in American poetry. The first of these stems from the Imagist ideas of the second decade; it includes as demonstration and result the poetry of H. D., John Gould Fletcher, Glenway Westcott, Amy Lowell; the early poetry of T. S. Eliot and Ezra Pound; and the work of Wallace Stevens, Marianne Moore, and William Carlos Williams. The second is a nativist tradition, belonging to those poets who followed either the practice of Walt Whitman or his challenging statements concerning the role of the poet in American society. For the most part these poets stayed at home, did not consult French poetics and poetry (from which the Imagists took varied encouragement and aid), were satisfied with American subjects; and they often borrowed from Whitman his expansive, cumulative, catalogic, loose rhythms, his tendency to allow a multitude of impressions to stand as a substitute for tightness of structure and integration of subject matter. They did not often adopt the nationalist optimism of Leaves of Grass, although Sandburg's The People, Yes, and Stephen Vincent Benét's John Brown's Body do in one way or another manage to try for his inclusiveness of vision and subject matter; and Hart Crane (who belongs in both traditions, and in a sense in neither) reflects vividly and earnestly Whitman's attempt to make a kind of mystic order out of the chaos of impressions with which both were supplied and cursed.

iii

The Imagist discussions and debates also produced the beginnings of one of the most important developments in modern American criticism: formalism. Ezra Pound's ceaseless argument for exactness in poetry. and for its declaration of independence from broad, vague, moral generalizations and sentimentalities, provided the first step in formalist criticism. What Pound did was to point to an obvious although neglected fact: the responsibility which an artist owes to his art, to his craft. Bad art, he said, is "immoral art," and explained:

Bad art is inaccurate art. It is art that makes false reports. If a scientist falsifies a report either deliberately or through negligence we consider him as either a criminal or a bad scientist according to the enormity of his offence, and he is punished or despised accordingly.

More particularly, the responsibilities of the good artist are a truthful and exact rendering of the particulars of his experience, the constant working over of the language and rhythm until it exactly and without consequent confusion or vagueness meets the needs of and corresponds to the nature of his sensibility. Attention to form (to an exact determination of what it is and of how it might best be served) is a primary principle of formalist criticism. Another serves both artist and reader as a protection against what the British critic I. A. Richards was to call the "stock response." Modern poetry and formalist criticism have both fought strenuously against the cliché and have often gone to extremes to avoid even the slightest suggestion of it. In the service of this attack, critics like Pound and Eliot spoke of the necessary impersonality of the artist and of his freedom from such sentiment or emotion as might too easily lead to stock or familiar responses. "Poetry is not a turning loose of emotion, but an escape from emotion," said Eliot in 1917; "it is not the expression of personality, but an escape from personality. But, of course, only those who have personality and emotions know what it means to want to escape from these things." In 1919, in an essay called "Hamlet and His Problems," Eliot stated what is one of the most important definitions of modern poetics. The "objective correlative," as he called it in this essay, is simply a means of describing what the poet uses as a dramatic or "external" equivalent of the emotion which lies at the source of his poem. The "artistic inevitability" (he is speaking here parenthetically of Macbeth) consists of the "complete adequacy of the external to the emotion." The only way of finding such an exact correspondence is to give to emotion its "objective correlative": "in other words, a set of objects, a situation, a chain of events which shall be the formula of that particular emotion; such that when the external facts, which must terminate in sensory experience, are given, the emotion is immediately invoked."

In no area of American criticism have the admonitions of exactness and formal accuracy been so freely applied as in the development of poetic theory. The tradition of formalist criticism, and the practice of formal analysis to which it has given rise, began with the work of Pound and Eliot (who studied French critics and artists and were both strongly attracted to T. E. Hulme), and with other spokesmen for Imagism. Eliot was also interested in the place and use of tradition in the body of contemporary criticism and literature. He was not committed, however, to the critical position of the Humanists, whose work held the stage for many years of the second and third decades. The publication of Paul Elmer More's Shelburne Essays began in 1904 and continued until 1936. With Irving Babbitt and such other Humanists as Stuart Pratt Sherman and W. C. Brownell, More advocated adherence to the classical training and tradition of an earlier academic world. The Humanists considered their major foes to be the science and naturalism of their time, and especially the literature which denied "that element in man which is outside of nature and is denoted by consciously directive purpose. . . ." More and Babbitt insisted that all men have standards, that those standards are best preserved in the literature that has endured the test of time, and that man distinguishes himself from animals by the possession of an "inner check." The major controversy which the Humanists encountered occurred in the late 1920's, and was effectively summarized in two symposia: Humanism and America, edited by Norman Foerster (1930), and The Critique of Humanism, edited by C. H. Grattan (1930). Though Eliot has several times critically explored the Humanist position, he has not repudiated it entirely. He finds his quarrel chiefly with its rather vague definitions. Humanism "bears the print of the academic man of letters," he said in 1929. The real Humanist, he insisted, is the man of classical and other training who does not force his views into a dogmatic frame. Eliot also discovered a distressing lack of knowledge of and interest in the formal aspects of art; this ignorance, he said, usually led to a rather uncertain and often vague judgment of tradition. In short, humanism for Eliot is culture, "not any subscription to a common programme or platform, which binds [the Humanists] together."

Humanism, in its various forms, was a strong counterirritant to the progress of theory and the Theory of Progress in the second and third decades. It was essentially moral in its judgment of literature (in More's writings, strongly religious as well), much opposed to experimenting in literature, and inclined to dismiss most new writing as trifling. Another critical development in the first two decades of our century was the impressionism of James Gibbons Huneker. Huneker was a superior journalist, whose principal interest was music and whose chief service to American culture was that of bringing to Americans his versions of foreign artists and philosophers and of insisting upon their value—in short, of at least attempting to give American culture a cosmopolitan air. But his writings were so deliberately forced into a mode of day-to-day cleverness, so poorly informed by inadequate training and capricious understanding, and so often vitiated by strange Laokoön analogies of literature with music, that his value to American criticism was limited. One final critical development was provided by Joel Spingarn, of Columbia University, an adaptation of Croce's expressionism, which allowed for a thorough and indiscriminating democracy of expression. "Poets do not really write epics, pastorals, lyrics, however much they may be deceived by these false abstractions; they express themselves, and this expression is their only form," Spingarn said in "The New Criticism" (1910); and there are as many forms as there are individual poets. Spingarn's expressionism disposed of the Humanist's moral judgment of literature, the formalist's analysis of it, the academic's classification of it. What is left is the assertion that "aesthetic judgment and artistic creation are instinct with the same vital life," that we are all creators, and each of us is distinct and unique in his expression.

The years of our century which preceded World War I were years of expansionism and imperialism in politics, naturalism in fiction, scientism in thought. They carried on the political and economic developments of the post-Civil War years, adapted the ready interpretations of Darwin to an expanding business world. They were also crucial years for the development of twentieth-century literature. Beginnings were made in the establishment of American fictional styles which were to be elaborated upon and refined in subsequent years. An aesthetic of poetry, however unoriginal, was suggested and developed, to prepare the way for the much more elaborate and successful criticism which followed the end of the war.

The war itself brought several changes to the American scene. For one thing, it took many of the young men and transferred them to a foreign, an older, culture, which was to have much to do with the changing literary world in the 1920's. The rather easy and haphazard mixture of socialism, anarchism, Nietzscheanism, and liberalism, which is found in the early years, was to be dissipated with the conclusion of the war. The effects of the war upon such writers as Cummings, Hemingway, and Dos Passos, while not as violent as they seem on the surface, are considerable.

While America enjoyed a fairly consistent prosperity and seized one opportunity after another for extending its influence and increasing its strength, writers spoke of the melancholy naturalistic prison of the human soul, of the environment created by business for its own advantage, or of the impossibility of an art in a completely materialistic civilization. Woodrow Wilson's liberalism turned out eventually to have been a continuation of the naïve American feeling that its notions of right need only to be expressed to be accepted. The disillusionment over the results of the war was implicit in the war's failure to convince young intellectuals of its nobility of purpose or its justice. The popularity among business apologists of the Spencerian view of evolution did not last Spencer's own lifetime. The inferences made by the literary naturalists did survive the war years, however. And a conviction not altogether new to American culture, but still strange enough to be startling, was born of the literary debates and theorizing in London and in American magazines: the conviction that art both possesses intrinsic value and involves special obligations for the artist.

WORLD WAR I AND AFTER

i

When World War I started, Ernest Hemingway was sixteen years old; John Dos Passos, eighteen; E. E. Cummings, twenty; William Faulkner, seventeen. All of these young men volunteered some time before America joined the Allies. One glance at their ages will suggest that they had had scarcely any opportunity for learning about their own country before they arrived in another. They matured, not in the relatively prosperous and at least superficially stable world of prewar America, but in the ambulance corps, in the Red Cross, or in the first World War's equivalent of the concentration camp.

In his Exile's Return (1934), Malcolm Cowley described the condition which made this generation of writers what Gertrude Stein called "the lost generation."

Whatever the doctrines we adopted during our college years, whatever the illusions we had of growing toward culture and self-sufficiency, the same process of deracination was continuing for all of us. . . . Normally the deracination would have ended when we were graduated; outside in the practical world we should have been forced to acquire new roots in order to survive. But we weren't destined to have the fate of the usual college generation, and instead of ceasing, the process would be intensified. . . .

The ambulance corps and the French military transport constituted what Cowley termed "college-extension courses for a generation of writers." What they taught was chiefly the advantage of being near danger and violence; the ambulance service "instilled into us what might be called a spectatorial attitude." Some of these young men had more immediate contact with danger and discomfort than others. Hemingway joined the Italian army and was severely wounded on the Italian-Austrian front; Faulkner joined the British air force and experienced direct and dangerous contact with the enemy; Cummings was placed in a French detention camp for three months because of an error of the military censor. The experiences of these men definitely affected their attitudes toward the postwar world. It was with a sense of having been uprooted, of having to return to a country they did not quite understand, that they viewed the end of the war. "School and college had uprooted us in spirit," Cowley said; "now we were physically uprooted. . . . All our roots were dead now, even the Anglo-Saxon tradition of our literary ancestors, even the habits of slow thrift that characterized our social class."

The feeling of deracination, of having had no training in any culture, of having participated in a war which had little meaning for them, contributed much to the formation and the strengthening of postwar attitudes. What the war did to them, the economy and politics of the 1920's enforced and encouraged. Wilson came back from Paris a defeated man; his time had run out. The era of Republican prosperity began with the election of Warren G. Harding in 1920, continued under Calvin Coolidge, and came to an end only in 1932, after Herbert Hoover had failed to convince the electorate that the depression was only a temporary inconvenience. Added to the superficial prosperity which the American economy enjoyed during these years was the chaotic condition of the European exchange. The American dollar bought excitement, comfort, and a home-away-from-America in almost any part of Continental Europe. Having no fear of economic collapse, confident in the continuing prosperity of America, the postwar intellectuals and artists, together with hundreds of men and women who affected to be both but were neither, traveled freely between New York or Boston and Le Havre, France. They indulged themselves and criticized the land of their origin; they studied and imitated the literature of their adopted country; they published magazines, in which they printed their work and editorially praised it. In spite of the chaos and purposelessness of their Paris life (as it is described in the first half of Hemingway's The Sun Also Rises), they often learned something of the craft of writing and occasionally produced creditable works of literature.

The immediate result was the production of war books. John Dos Passos' One Man's Initiation—1917 (1919) was the first of these. A crude, autobiographical first novel, it described the career of an American ambulance driver in France. E. E. Cummings's The Enormous Room followed in 1922—a story, half autobiographical, of Cummings's internment in La Ferté Macé, a hundred miles west of Paris. In 1921 came Dos Passos' second novel about the War, Three Soldiers, which was chiefly the story of John Andrews, a soldier who wished to become a composer, who deserted the army and withdrew to the French countryside to write his music, and who was finally arrested for desertion. In 1925 What Price Glory? by Maxwell Anderson and Laurence Stallings was produced on Broadway; with frankness of setting and language, it described the lives of several U.S. Marines in the war. At the end of the decade, Ernest Hemingway's A Farewell to Arms (1929) was published. It was not only the best of the war novels; it stated quite clearly the general effect of the war upon the generation which had experienced it. From England came Ford Madox Ford's Tietjens novels (published between 1924 and 1928) and Richard Aldington's Death of a Hero (1929); and from Germany, at the end of the decade, Erich Remarque's All Quiet on the Western Front (1929).

All this work described a fairly general attitude toward the war: it was called an unfortunate, purposeless, cruel, and disillusioning experience. Taking them together, the reader will discover the reasons for the 1920's criticism of American culture, tradition, and institutions. More specifically, he will discover several statements concerning postwar skepticism and the attack not only upon the behavior of the middle class but also upon the language it had used to defend and explain that behavior. Their attitude was a practical "nominalism," which distrusted both political generalities and sentimental clichés. It defended and encouraged the literary economy of the Hemingway school, called much of the philosophical writing of the time a kind of spirited “faking,” and insisted upon a reworking in every individual of standards of conduct. The best statement of this postwar nominalism is found in A Farewell to Arms, the passage which comes just before the retreat from Caporetto. Lieutenant Henry has just finished talking with Gino, an Italian patriot; as Gino finishes, Henry thinks over certain words he has used: the words sacred, glorious, and sacrifice. He cannot associate them with any experience they can accurately be said to describe. “There were many words that you could not stand to hear and finally only the names of places had dignity.” Besides this distrust of abstract words, there was a rather general suspicion regarding the names of philosophers and scientists who had been held up to the young men as bearers of our tradition. Dos Passos’ John Andrews, lying on a hospital cot, “thought of all the long procession of men who had been touched by the unutterable futility of the lives of men, who had tried by phrases to make things otherwise, who had taught unworldliness . . . they had wept, some of them, and some of them had laughed, and their phrases had risen glittering, soap bubbles to dazzle men for a moment, and had shattered.” And E. E. Cummings, who in The Enormous Room had spoken in undisguised scorn of officialdom which held the keys to a prison for all men of good will, spoke in his poems of the 1920’s of the indestructibility of the “sweet spontaneous earth,” which resists all efforts of “prurient philosophers” to label and classify it:

(but true to the incomparable couch of death thy rhythmic lover

thou answerest them only with

spring)

The work of Ernest Hemingway is the best source of information concerning this postwar attitude and its literature. In it one may discover the principal points of view of the 1920’s. His disposal of the substance of cultural statement (the abstract, “glory” words which belong to an established and trusted world) has already been mentioned. From this point, he has offered us some suggestion of what postwar man may accept as an alternative to a fixed philosophy of life:

1. Man’s moral sense was closely related to his immediate experience; morality was tested in terms of immediate consequences: what made you feel good after it was moral; what made you feel disgusted was immoral. In any event, you “paid” for what you got: “No idea of retribution or punishment. Just exchange of values. You gave up something and got something else.”
2. Social criteria were also applicable only to immediate circumstances. The test of a man’s character was the way in which he “got along,” the way he fitted, most of all the manner in which he assumed his position in a group. Poorly adjusted persons reacted openly to their experiences and exaggerated them or sentimentalized over them. Well-adjusted persons understated their reactions. They were uneasy in the presence of displays of rhetoric or sentiment. One oughtn’t to waste too much time trying to explain, even to himself, the meaning of his life.

3. Experiences after the war, especially those of men who had participated, are likely to be violent. This violence cannot be calmed by soothing and vague generalities. Hemingway sought in two ways for a suitable pattern of adjustment to this violence: the first is a kind of primitive idyll, such as the Burguete interlude of The Sun Also Rises: when conditions are “right” and you are with men who share your feeling and your interests, the problem of adjustment seems automatically, if temporarily, to have been solved. The second is a statement of an “aesthetic of violence,” by which a pattern is imposed upon it and it is subdued. This is what the art of bullfighting means to him. It is an aesthetic formalization of native courage, which Hemingway has noted in many other situations as well, and approved of.

Finally, in the course of this statement, Hemingway was to develop a literary style which he thought suitable to it. It is, in one respect, a simple reduction of language and syntax to their essentials. The forceful simplicity of the uncomplicated sentence—or of a series of “and clauses”—the absence of excessive explanation or of any attempt to point out “significance,” the sparseness of dialogue, the half-shy withdrawal from generalizations, the attention to simple description of concrete facts: all of these characteristics of Hemingway’s style impressed his readers and were borrowed and imitated by many writers of the twenties and subsequent decades. A few passages from several writers will illustrate that influence:

It was baking hot in the square when we came out after lunch with our bags and the rod-case to go to Burguete. People were on top of the bus, and others were climbing up a ladder. Bill went up and Robert sat beside Bill to save a place for me, and I went back in the hotel to get a couple of bottles of wine to take with us. When I came out the bus was crowded. Men and women were sitting on all the baggage and boxes on top, and the women all had their fans going in the sun. It certainly was hot. Robert climbed down and I fitted into the place he had saved on the one wooden seat that ran across the top. (The Sun Also Rises, 1926)

Mac touched Jim on the arm, and they went out and shut the door. They didn’t bother to look around when they went out the gate. Mac set out so rapidly that Jim had to stretch his stride to keep up. The sun was cutting downward now, and the wind was stirring in the branches, so that both trees and ground seemed to quiver nervously. (John Steinbeck, In Dubious Battle, 1936)

The man on the load of cotton jumped to the ground, tied the reins to the wagon wheel, and pushed through the crowd to the car where all the swearing was being done. After listening for a while he came back to the street, called a Negro who was standing with the other colored men on the corner, and handed him the reins. The Negro drove off with the cotton towards the gin, and the man went back into the crowd. (Erskine Caldwell, “Daughter,” 1935)

Callahan got Pinkman out of his chair, and the two retrieved their hats and went down the dark stairs and out of the Opera House into the blacked-out street. The snow came down thicker than ever, but melted as it fell. (Robert Lowry, Casualty, 1946)

ii

The 1920's have been described by such phrases as "The Jazz Age" and "The Era of Wonderful Nonsense." Frederick Lewis Allen's Only Yesterday (1931), Mark Sullivan's The Twenties (volume six of Our Times, 1935), and Irene and Allen Cleaton's Books and Battles (1937) have tried to give the social history of the decade. All these books describe what is substantially true of the decade, but the details are either overstated or superficial. Perhaps the best portrait of the times is found in the fiction of F. Scott Fitzgerald. His first novel, This Side of Paradise (1920), gave him enough money for his marriage and for a move to New York, from which most of his subsequent observations of "The Jazz Age" were issued. It was a time of Prohibition and bootleggers, a time of easy money and reckless spending, a period during which many sins against taste were committed in the name of unfettered adolescence. Fitzgerald's novels and short stories underscore several characteristics of the decade: its devotion to the cause of the free and independent woman; the phenomenon of the newly rich, and the protection their wealth afforded them; the search for new physical and social experiences, which proved so often to be simply an acceleration of familiar ones; in general, the psychological tensions endured by a generation which failed to find stability in ways enjoyed in previous times.

The Great Gatsby (1925) is at once the best social portrait of the 1920's and one of the best of modern American novels. In it Fitzgerald achieved a remarkable economy of form, through the use of a narrator who is sufficiently of the cast of characters to know it and to interpret it intelligently, but not so deeply involved in its world as to lose his talent for judging it. He offered a portrait of postwar "magnificence" by means of glimpses of Gatsby's incredible Long Island parties. He presented the postwar flapper, so often inadequately understood in his other work and in numerous cheap imitations of it, in the characters of Daisy Buchanan and Jordan Baker. Finally, he analyzed the psychological effect of wealth upon the American personality: the quick wealth of Jay Gatsby, gained in the Prohibition underworld and serving the one consistent illusion observable in the world described in the book; and the wealth of the Buchanans, which seems to have provided them an immunity from all social and moral responsibility. Fitzgerald was an extremely uneven writer; in this one book, however, he managed to avoid all his excesses and to stay close to the pattern he had originally selected.

The popular intellectual "tone" of the 1920's was that of a cultivated disrespect for the conventions. Young people enjoyed laughing at their elders and didn't mind laughing at themselves. The more cutting the criticism, the more lavish of clever invective, the more popular it became. The pseudo-sophistication of Vanity Fair magazine shared popularity with that of a newer arrival on the scene, The New Yorker. H. L. Mencken's American Mercury, of which he was editor from 1923 to 1933, offered much entertainment to its subscribers and an abundance of data concerning the world of the middle class and its institutions. Mencken's favorite objects of attack were Prohibition, American politics, the clergy, one-hundred-percent patriotism, the "pedagogues," and the cultural ambitions of the middle class. In his Prejudices, of which there were six volumes, published from 1919 to 1927, Mencken inveighed against all of these, acknowledged his America as an immensely amusing place, dismissed the popular literature and defended the work of the less favored novelists, condemned the professorial style, fought a battle with the Humanists (especially with Stuart Pratt Sherman), and in general behaved himself in a manner which gave his readers the considerable pleasure of laughing at their elders and guardians and the institutions they were pledged to uphold.

Mencken's journalism was directed chiefly against the American middle class (the "booboisie," as he called it). Sinclair Lewis's success as a novelist came from the same activity. His was a gift of parody, mimicry, and satirical realism which made his novels of the 1920's successes from the start. Lewis attacked the middle class for many of the same reasons which motivated the attacks of Mencken. But he was at the same time committed to liking the American bourgeoisie in a way quite alien to Mencken's taste. The merciless parody of middle-class hypocrisy and pretense continued throughout the 1920's; only the dedicated scientists of Arrowsmith (1925) escaped it. But in Dodsworth (1929), while he heaped his reproaches upon the idle, foolish wife, Lewis was to suggest that the citizens of the city of Zenith and the state of Winnemac would survive their serious deficiencies—that they were very good people after all, a little unsure of themselves, perhaps, but fundamentally sound. Before he was finished with them, however, Lewis had given all their weaknesses a thorough going over.

iii

As the 1920's were known to the general reader for Lewis's Main Street and Babbitt, they were known to a smaller audience for the publication (in The Dial of November, 1922) of T. S. Eliot's The Waste Land. The poem was much discussed and often misunderstood. It was intended not exclusively as a portrait of contemporary life but as an expression of the adventure of one soul in a world unsupported by faith. The journey of the protagonist through the wasteland to "The Chapel Perilous" is finally rewarded not by a redeeming key to a solution of the modern dilemma of the wasteland but only by a few "fragments" which, he says, "I have shored against my ruins." The Waste Land, together with "Gerontion" (in Poems, 1920) and The Hollow Men (1925), provided the intellectuals of the 1920's with a definitive statement regarding the spiritual weaknesses of the postwar world. In the latter half of the decade, Eliot was to search for and to express more directly a statement of a redeeming faith. Ash-Wednesday (1930) is a description of that search, of the road to conversion; in his critical essays of the decade, Eliot was to remark upon his explorations of other literatures and of theology, steps on the way to his own clarification of principle. His poetry provided the matter and the style for numerous imitations, until many American poets have finally to acknowledge him as the most important influence upon their work.

The publication in 1923 of Wallace Stevens's Harmonium announced the arrival of another important poet. Stevens had shared indirectly in the general excitement provoked by Imagism, but his poems were not limited by any theory or practice but his own. Nevertheless, he shows the great influence of Imagism in his highly original use of language and color and his constant preoccupation with the art of poetry. The work of Marianne Moore demonstrates another individual and unique talent, once more fortifying and illustrating the values of the Imagist influence on American verse. William Carlos Williams contributed to the poetry of the 1920's what are perhaps the most objective and "visual" of all poems within the Imagist tradition.

From April, 1922, to December, 1925, a magazine called The Fugitive was published in Nashville, Tennessee. The editorial board included several of our most important poets and critics: John Crowe Ransom, Allen Tate, and Robert Penn Warren especially. Their production of poetry was not great, but it was substantial enough. Although the opening editorial of The Fugitive had called its contributors "self-convicted experimentalists," they did not belong to any of the experimental "schools" of poetry of the postwar years. They exercised the classical restraint of traditional forms and demonstrated especially a skill in the use of language and metaphor which recalled and proved their intense interest in the metaphysical poetry of England's seventeenth century. All three of them also made substantial contributions to criticism, and Ransom's book The New Criticism (1941) is the best description of modern formalism.

iv

The 1920's were also rich in achievements in the drama. Eugene O'Neill, whose first one-act plays had been produced by the Provincetown Players on Cape Cod, Massachusetts, and in Greenwich Village, offered a considerable number of experiments in the theater, borrowing as he developed from the expressionists of Germany and France, and introducing more innovations to the American theater than its entire previous history had seen. The Emperor Jones was produced in 1920; The Hairy Ape, in 1923; The Great God Brown, in 1926; Strange Interlude, in 1928. All these, and a number of others, introduced expressionist and symbolist devices as means of extending the function and the scope of the stage. Another expressionist drama, Elmer Rice's The Adding Machine, appeared on Broadway in 1923. His Street Scene (1929), a more conventional play, was also highly successful. Other plays of the 1920's included the expressionist comedy by George S. Kaufman and Marc Connelly, Beggar on Horseback (1924), George Kelly's comedies, The Show-Off (1924) and Craig's Wife (1925), and such leftist examples of theatrical expressionism as John Howard Lawson's Processional (1925) and The International (1927).

American drama of the decade can claim considerable progress over the rather pale, pleasant "entertainments" of the early part of the century. It improved in content, expanded greatly in variety of subject, and proceeded, with a remarkable talent for adaptation, to assimilate a great number of suggestions offered it from abroad. In some respects it also solved the problem of the influence of Broadway; at the very least, experimental dramas were produced, first in the independent "little" theaters and then on Broadway itself.

Meanwhile, aside from the war and postwar fiction previously discussed, the most important novels of earlier traditions were written by women. In 1925, Ellen Glasgow published what is perhaps her best novel, Barren Ground, and followed it with The Romantic Comedians (1926) and They Stooped to Folly (1929). Willa Cather's career as a novelist, which had begun quite promisingly in the second decade with O Pioneers! (1913), The Song of the Lark (1915), and My Antonia (1918), continued in the twenties with A Lost Lady (1923), The Professor's House (1925), and Death Comes for the Archbishop (1927). The fiction of these two novelists can for the most part be said to follow a regionalism earlier practiced by such writers as Sara Orne Jewett and Mary Wilkins Freeman; but both Miss Glasgow and Miss Cather are better artists than their predecessors. Both also show some suggestion of the influence of Henry James in their efforts to subtilize their style. In the list of regionalist novels, Elizabeth Madox Roberts's The Time of Man (1926) occupies an important position; it is one of the best examples of its kind.

The fiction of Sherwood Anderson is as much a part of the twenties as is Hemingway's. Although two of his novels appeared before the war, the bulk of Anderson's best work was brought out in the postwar decade. Anderson is concerned chiefly with the problem of the human personality in an age increasingly dominated by industry and the machine. Much of his fiction has the small town for a setting and attempts to show the villager's groping for some kind of articulation or expression. In the preface to Winesburg, Ohio (1919), his characters are called "grotesques"; they are exceptional in their strenuous essays at personal definition. Poor White (1920), in some respects at least his best novel, pictures the confusion of Hugh McVey, who, in his pity for cabbage planters, invents a cabbage-planting machine and lives to see the damage done to his fellows by modern business methods and the disastrous effects of a machine-dominated community. Dark Laughter (1925), like Waldo Frank's Holiday (1923), opposes the white and the Negro civilizations, demonstrating the great advantage of the simpler, more primitive society over the repressed and artificial whites. Many Marriages (1923) is an inferior attempt to illustrate the repressions caused by modern business and to describe one man's revolt against them. Anderson's best work is to be found in his collections of short stories (The Triumph of The Egg and Horses and Men are especially noteworthy). He has proved himself eventually to be a rather groping, undisciplined artist, almost as confused about life as are his characters; but at times he is a writer of considerable talent and insight.

The 1920's were a decade rich in literary achievement. The literature produced in the years before the financial crash of October, 1929, demonstrates a varied assortment of talents and a correspondingly wide variety of literary experiments. It was an unsettled period but an extremely lively and fruitful one. American literature became more clearly conscious of its native value than it had ever been before. The talent was not always disciplined, and some of it was wasted. But important advances were made.

The most interesting characteristic of the decade was its naïve but genuine willingness to risk statement and argument. Not seriously attached to any single dogma, the writers of the time were willing to experiment with many. Since they had witnessed the successful fight for changes in literary styles and fashions in an earlier decade, they continued to experiment with many of their own.

In matters of politics and economics, these writers were often quite immature and generally ignorant; they took for granted the words of Republican presidents and ignored social and political problems. For the most part, they were satisfied to accept the legend of continuing prosperity, of which their political spokesmen had assured them; while they accepted the financial advantages of this prosperity, they devoted much of their time to ridiculing the social pretensions of the men who worked to provide these advantages. The events of October, 1929, were to change all of that. Writers who had idled away the decade in Paris or Berlin or Rome hurried back to America. There was a sudden renewal of interest in economic questions, and a large percentage of writers flocked to the leftist standard. The 1930's were to see the resurgence of "politically responsible" writing, of dialectically narrow criticism, and of social melodrama.

THE NINETEEN THIRTIES

i

The end of the prosperous twenties occurred in the month of October, 1929. In spite of small recoveries in Wall Street and reassurances from the White House, the stock-market collapse was the beginning of one of the severest depressions in American history. The leftists, who had persisted through the twenties in such magazines as The Liberator (1918-1924) and The New Masses (1926-1947), saw their opportunity; and many uncommitted or only casually committed writers turned leftward with the first definite signs of a crack in the American economy. In many respects, then, the 1930's were the decade of proletarian literature and criticism. John Reed Clubs, designed as cultural centers of leftist activity, were begun in Chicago, Boston, New York, Los Angeles, and other cities. Partisan Review was started in 1934 as an organ of the New York John Reed Club. The New Masses began its period of greatest ideological prosperity. The leftist cause in America was aided and encouraged by British radical activity and literature: Britain's best young poets, W. H. Auden, Stephen Spender, C. Day Lewis, Louis MacNeice, identified themselves in one way or another with the leftist cause; and such British magazines as The Left Review (1934-1938) published them and acted as a center of leftist critical activity.

In the interests of the leftist cause, the naturalist and realist fiction of the early part of our century was imitated by most writers of fiction. Granville Hicks, for a time the most articulate of leftist spokesmen, asserted that our fiction had proved almost always to have been "on the side of the exploited." He suggested that American fiction would find its most successful means of expression in the proletarian novel:

Long experience shows that for the artist there is no health in the bourgeois way of life. If, then, the issue is clearly presented, if it is fully realized that in this war [the class struggle], as in any war, there is no such thing as neutrality, can artists hesitate to ally themselves with the proletariat?

Many of them did so ally themselves; the pages of new and revived little magazines were filled with proletarian fiction and poetry, the Broadway stage often displayed proletarian drama, the strike novel became a literary staple, and literary criticism (often even in rather conservative magazines) emphasized content over form in its evaluation of the new literature. The short fiction of the time employed both the regional detail with which our literary history was long familiar and the Hemingway kind of underwriting. Dialogue became increasingly important, not only as the key expression of the peculiarities of a region, but also as a means of drawing the lines of proletarian heroism. What Hemingway had done with his dialogue in "The Killers" and in other stories, the proletarian writers exploited in the interests of implicit message. The class-war lines of proletarian literature were often very clearly drawn. Detail no longer served a neutral or aesthetic purpose; it was designed cumulatively to document the facts of exploitation and oppression. In the drama, the class war made for a new kind of social melodrama, with the hero and the villain often very clearly identified with economic classes. Poetry was generally written in free verse, which galloped roughly but vigorously to the aid of the oppressed or celebrated elegiacally the early leaders of the Russian revolution.

Proletarian fiction of the 1930's now seems undistinguished and crude. It was often written hastily and according to a half-understood formula, which required that the writer follow certain lines of characterization and plot. There were a few writers who gained distinction either within or in spite of the formula. Of the sixteen contributors whose short stories are included in the anthology, Proletarian Literature in the United States (1935), Albert Maltz, Albert Halper, Erskine Caldwell, Robert Cantwell, James T. Farrell, Josephine Herbst, and John Dos Passos contributed the best work. Of these, only Maltz, Halper, Cantwell, and Miss Herbst belonged strictly and entirely in the proletarian mold. James Farrell's lengthy sociological studies of life in Chicago's lower middle class support rather than provide primary evidence of the leftist revolt. John Dos Passos, who had acquired a reputation long before 1930, published his trilogy of American life, U.S.A. (The 42nd Parallel, 1919, and The Big Money) in the 1930's; and his sympathies can be said to have touched the leftist interests of the time. At any rate, like Farrell's, his work offered what leftist critics described as "documentary evidence" of oppression. But Dos Passos was scarcely ever comfortable in plain Marxist clothes. In the early years of The New Masses, he had asked for an independent, native radicalism, free of Russian directives and taboos; and in Adventures of a Young Man (1939), a novel in general quite undistinguished and mediocre, he pointed to the confusion and abuse in leftist political ranks.

Not directly allied with the extreme leftists—in fact, on several occasions rebuked by them—but sympathetically attracted to the underprivileged and concerned over their welfare, John Steinbeck produced fiction in the 1930's which influenced and excited the general reading public much more effectively than that of any Marxist writer. In Dubious Battle (1936) is undoubtedly the best strike novel of its time and the most readable today. This is primarily because, like his Doc Burton, Steinbeck did something other than "use" the strikers as a mechanism or formula of leftist polemic; he studied them and at the same time considered them as individuals. The Grapes of Wrath (1939), his most successful novel, considers the dispossessed farmers of Oklahoma from a point of view which is substantially democratic and is leftist only because the democratic temper of the times was so. When Tom Joad leaves his family for the last time, it is as an individual who "wants to know," wants "to figure this whole thing out." There is a likelihood that his quest will include some association with Marxist activities, but this is not an exclusive doctrinal message which Steinbeck is trying to offer; rather, Tom Joad sets forth on a journey of democratic inquiry into the evils and inequalities of an abused and misshapen democratic world.

For most leftists of the decade, the Spanish Civil War (1936–1939) was a crucial event. Young men and women of the United States, England, and other countries went to Spain, to serve in the International Brigade or in other ways. The literature reflecting this dress rehearsal for World War II is an important phase of leftist writing. The impact was strongest upon the British poets; or, at least, their poems concerning the event have proved to be the most valuable and lasting. Even a superficial glance at Hemingway's work would have led one to suspect that he too would write of the Civil War. But it was his interest in Spain and in Spaniards rather than any attachment to Marxist ideology which prompted the writing of For Whom the Bell Tolls (1940). The novel poses a moral rather than a political problem. Robert Jordan is not the pasteboard hero of the conventional Marxist melodrama. His joining with the Loyalists is personally motivated, a test of private bravery and conviction. It is of course true that Jordan is a Hemingway character quite different from Nick Adams, Jake Barnes, or Lieutenant Henry. He has acquired a sense of responsibility which is lacking in the early characters—which some of them make a point of denying and rejecting. Jordan speaks to himself of this responsibility:

It was a feeling of consecration to a duty toward all of the oppressed of the world which would be as difficult and embarrassing to speak about as religious experience and yet it was authentic as the feeling you had when you heard Bach, or stood in Chartres Cathedral or the Cathedral at Léon and saw the light coming through the great windows; or when you saw Mantegna and Greco and Breughel in the Prado.

Coming as it did in the latter half of the decade, the Spanish Civil War served in many cases to call attention to the need for "a cause." It was felt that the United States would itself be involved in some form of war against Fascism and Nazism; and when World War II finally did arrive, such writers as Archibald MacLeish and Maxwell Anderson wrote with a view to lining up American literature in a cultural defense against alien social doctrines.

The drama of the left was most effectively forwarded by Clifford Odets. Waiting for Lefty (1935) proved the most impressive piece of theatrical propaganda produced in the decade. The play used the setting, the audience, the stage of the union hall. Its spotlights glaringly illuminated fragments of the lives of exploiter and exploited. And the crescendo of strike calls at the finish was designed to provide the shortest route from literature to action ever found on a literary map. Other dramatists, while less explicit and certainly not as fully committed, did reflect the general social interests of the decade. Perhaps the best of the plays was Anderson's Winterset (1935), a verse-drama based upon the Sacco-Vanzetti executions of 1927, but not, like the author's earlier Gods of the Lightning (1928), committed either factually or doctrinally to that event. It is Anderson's best attempt to write tragedy on a contemporary theme. As the decade moved toward World War II, such writers as Archibald MacLeish were concerned with the problem of pointing forcibly to the menace of war and totalitarianism in the world. MacLeish's Air Raid (1938) and his The Fall of the City (1937), radio-dramas, are his principal contributions to this literature.

The 1930's represent a decade much more sharply political in its literature than that preceding it. Much of the writing of the time is now interesting chiefly to the social and political historian, who will find in it a great variety of responses to the call for political responsibility. He will find too that the definition of that responsibility took many devious turns and caused much bitter debate and an apparently endless and complex explication of Marx's intentions, Lenin's actions, and Stalin's right of succession. The controversies over Russian political affairs clouded the leftist air in American criticism. Radicals had come a long way and over a very complicated road since the comparatively placid days of Upton Sinclair's Helicon Hall.

ii

In 1930 twelve Southerners published a symposium called I'll Take My Stand. All the articles, said the introductory "Statement of Principles," "tend to support a Southern way of life against what may be called the American or prevailing way; and all as much as agree that the best terms in which to represent the distinction are contained in the phrase, Agrarian versus Industrial." Briefly, the symposium opposed the industrial advance of America since the Civil War as a damaging progress toward mechanization, which would eventually mean the end of any definable tradition in the country. The principal villain was, of course, the industrialist himself; but, behind him, providing him with his means and offering a philosophy and method alien to man's best instincts, was the scientist. "The capitalization of the applied sciences has now become extravagant and uncritical; it has enslaved our human energies to a degree now clearly felt to be burdensome." The complaint extended also to theoretical science; and it was this criticism of science which marked much of the work of the Agrarians in American criticism.

The South had remained continuously in the background of our national life. It was a defeated region and presumably also a backward one. Material progress had been a gift of Northern industrialists; the philosophy most people knew as American was pragmatism, suited to the expenditure of creative energies in the application of science either to society or to a series of liberal reforms directly related to an optimistic reading of science. The literature of the early part of the century was a product of this thinking over scientific law and its operation in society. But, as we look back upon the first half of our century, we find that many of the best novelists, some of the most excellent of our poets, and certainly our finest critics have been not only geographically, but culturally and traditionally, of the South.

William Faulkner began his career as a writer in the 1920's, but his best work was published from 1929 on. His novels and short stories treat with a tortured sense of responsibility the problems of Southern life from the early nineteenth century to the latest years of our own. Faulkner's Yoknapatawpha County, a place of his own creation and one which he has brilliantly and painstakingly described in a number of his works, provides a locale for a thorough sociological study of the South. As Robert Penn Warren has said, "no land in all fiction is more painstakingly analyzed from the sociological standpoint. . . . Nature and sociology, geography and human geography, are scrupulously though effortlessly presented in Faulkner's work, and their significance for his work is very great; but the significance is of a conditioning order. They are, as it were, aspects of man's 'doom'—a word of which Faulkner is very fond—but his manhood in the face of that doom is what is important."

It was Faulkner's intention to tell the story of the South; and, by the way, to give the fullest analysis of all its social types, all its personalities, and all its social and moral problems. The violence of his novels is a part of the post-Civil War psychology of a defeated nation: the erratic and often unfortunate means by which the South tried to get back upon its feet; the introduction of new social classes, with a code and a manner opportunistically at variance with the old; the tortured sensibility of the descendants of a Southern aristocracy, now helpless to reassert its position but holding perilously to the memory of it; the raw demonstrations of elemental forces, twisted and misshapen by circumstance. In his novels and short stories, Faulkner has explained the South to an American public.

The complex world of the South and the personality of the Southerner have been subjects for other significant writing. "What shall this land produce?" asks John Crowe Ransom, in "Antique Harvesters":

A meager hill of kernels, a runnel of juice;
Declension looks from our land, it is old

The land itself, "Of the Mississippi the bank sinister, and of the Ohio the bank sinister," has been depleted, worked over and over until it has become "barren ground." The tobacco crops are in the control of corporations which regulate the sales price. The people adjust themselves to such economic circumstance in their own way. The Southern sharecropper received attention in the 1930's from such novelists as Erskine Caldwell, whose Tobacco Road (1932), adapted to the stage, turned into one of the less savory jokes of modern literature. The life of the marginal worker, whether on the farms or in the cities, was treated in other Caldwell novels, such as God's Little Acre (1933) and Journeyman (1935). Caldwell exploited the sensational and the degenerate; and though he did underscore the injustices and inequalities in the economy which affected the people of his novels, his treatment of poor whites leaves them almost wholly without claim to respect or sympathy. Faulkner's As I Lay Dying (1930) and Sanctuary (1931) are far more effective treatments of the subject.

The moral and political problems encountered by Southerners as a result of the North's corporate use of their industry and agriculture are given a sensitive reading in Robert Penn Warren's first novel, Night Rider (1939); in it, the tobacco farmers of Tennessee combine against the great tobacco companies of the South. The development of that combination from its innocent beginnings to the time of its dissolution is told masterfully, with penetration and great psychological acuteness. The novel points more effectively than any other by Warren to the complex nature of evil, its association with good, and the manner in which earnest men of good intention are led toward first the sanctioning, then the commission, of violence. Unlike All the King's Men (1946), Night Rider is not overwritten; and it endures a careful second reading much better than does the more popular recent novel.

From the South have come also such excellent writers of shorter fiction as Katherine Anne Porter and Eudora Welty. Miss Porter's fiction is contained in three collections: Flowering Judas (1935), Pale Horse, Pale Rider (1939), and The Leaning Tower (1944); Miss Welty's, in two collections of short stories, A Curtain of Green (1943) and The Wide Net (1943), and two novels, The Robber Bridegroom (1942) and Delta Wedding (1945). Miss Porter's themes have been those of Southern life and of life in New York and Connecticut. The title story of her latest volume concerns the life of an American student in pre-Hitler Germany. She has generally written with a sure sense of style and a control of form which contrast with the often excessive and overflowing rhetoric of Faulkner, Thomas Wolfe, and often also of Warren. Miss Welty's writing is uneven; her best work to date is found in A Curtain of Green, notably in such stories as "Petried Man," "Why I Live at the P.O.," "Clytie," and "Old Mr. Marblehall." Two other Southern women who have published work of value or promise are Caroline Gordon and Carson McCullers.

Next to Faulkner, the best known of Southern novelists is Thomas Wolfe. The first of his Eugene Gant-George Webber novels, Look Homeward, Angel, was published in 1929. Three others followed in the 1930's, as did two collections of shorter fiction and a brief discussion by him of the writing of his first novel. Wolfe's writing is marked by a strenuous abundance and richness. His characters assume gigantic size; their appetites are huge, their desires enormous and confused, their lives tortured and effusive. Over all of them hangs the pall of their author's rhetoric, imperative, clamorous, and demanding. More typical than fortunate is this example, from Look Homeward, Angel:

[Oliver Gant's] life was like that river, rich with its own deposited and onward-borne agglutinations, fecund with its sedimental accretions, filled exhaustlessly by life in order to be more richly itself, and this life, with the great purpose of a river, he emptied now into the harbor of his house, the sufficient haven of himself, for whom the gnarled vines wove round him thrice, the earth burgeoned with abundant fruit and blossom, the fire burnt madly.

iii

The most satisfactory statements of the Agrarian-Fugitive group have appeared in their criticism. Several of the men who supervised the publication of The Fugitive magazine in the 1920's subsequently became associated with universities and colleges. John Crowe Ransom went to Kenyon College in 1937, where in 1939 he founded the Kenyon Review, which he later edited. Allen Tate has been associated with several colleges and universities. In 1941 and 1942, Cleanth Brooks and Robert Penn Warren edited the brilliant Southern Review at the Louisiana State University; Brooks has since gone to Yale University and Warren to the University of Minnesota. Not associated with the Southern group in terms of geographical origin, but a critic joined to them by virtue of his talent and his interests, Richard P. Blackmur has also contributed important collections of critical essays; he is now associated with the Institute for Advanced Study, at Princeton University.

Briefly, the criticism of these men marks a continuation of the formalist methods initially sponsored by Ezra Pound and T. S. Eliot in the second decade of our century. To the original insistence upon careful analytic attention to poetic form, some of these critics (noticeably Tate) have added a concern with tradition as a necessary background of literary excellence. But a major concern is the identification of poetry as a discipline distinct from that of science, with its own objectives, forms, and meanings. "Art arises in particulars," said Allen Tate in a New Republic essay, "and it arrives at order at the point of impact between the new particulars and whatever organized experience the poet has been able to acquire." In his preface to The New Criticism (1941), Ransom said that "The sciences deal almost entirely with structures, which are scientific structures; but poetic structures differ radically from these, and it is that difference which defines them." The distinction is also one between poetry and prose, and it leads these critics to the careful, acute, and rewarding analyses of poetry which have fortunately become an increasingly significant part of American criticism.

In fiction, poetry, and criticism, the Southerners provide an important share of the literature of the 1930's. Generally undisturbed by the immediate and provoking political and economic issues of the decade, they went about their business with a thoroughness which in its own way has been as great as the preoccupation of the leftists with extra-literary meanings in literature. The result has been twofold: an awakening attention to the South as a region prolific of first-rate literary talent, and a gratifying progress in the development of literary criticism.

THE NINETEEN FORTIES

i

In 1940, when World War II had been several months old, Archibald MacLeish issued "a declaration" called The Irresponsibles. The writers of the 1920's, including MacLeish, had not only been guilty of self-indulgence but had threatened American culture by ignoring it. "What matters now," MacLeish asserted, "is the defense of culture—the defense truly, and in the most literal terms, of civilization as men have known it for the last two thousand years. . . . [But] neither the modern scholar nor the modern writer admits responsibility for the defense. They assert on the contrary, each in his particular way, an irresponsibility as complete as it is singular."

This was one voice in a chorus of objection and denunciation. Van Wyck Brooks, in On Literature Today (1941) and Opinions of Oliver Alston (1941), and Bernard De Voto, in The Literary Fallacy (1944), added their voices. It was something of a cultural panic; American civilization was being threatened, and we were not ready. We could not, after the iconoclasm of the twenties and the thirties, convince our people that our culture was worth defending, for the writers of these decades had laughed it out of countenance. The early years of World War II saw a sort of desperate scrambling for evidences of an American tradition which might stand up to that of other nations. They saw a revival of Walt Whitman, a search for "primary" writers, a denunciation of obscurity and preciousness, an appeal to our writers to be "political," socially aware and socially responsible.

The best poetry of the war—and the best of its literature has been its poetry—scarcely reflects any disturbance over what might justly be termed an inflated issue. The work of our young poets during the war continued to announce itself as poetry, continued to reflect the influences which had been there for twenty or more years, and can withstand analysis as the literary work of individual artists. The poetry of Karl Jay Shapiro, Stanley Kunitz, Randall Jarrell, Robert Lowell, and other new poets was often on the subject of the war. "We know very well that the most resounding slogans ring dead after a few years, and that it is not for poetry to keep pace with public speeches and the strategy of events," said Shapiro in his introduction to V-Letter and Other Poems (1944). Oscar Williams, introducing an anthology of new poetry in 1943, said that "this is an anthology of war poetry, not of propaganda to arouse patriotism. It is the current work of poets who have intensely felt the fact of war, whether their subject matter be swans or strawberries, rifles or love. They write, not of the movement of troops, the horror of the enemy, or the mechanism of the tank, but of the state of the human organism in the emotion of now living."

ii

Literature of the 1940's has developed generally along the lines suggested in these remarks. Writers may be said, perhaps, to be more specifically aware of events than they were in the 1920's; but the awareness has not meant an exclusive commitment to the immediate present. Nor have these writers felt the urgent pressure of any one ideology such as haunted the consciences of their fellows in the 1930's. Indeed, one important fact about the forties is the decline of Marxism as a major factor in literary thinking. The literary discipline worked out by Hemingway in the twenties continues quietly to affect the writing of fiction in the forties. As his style proved more than equal to the task of describing war and battle, so its adaptations have proved the best way of describing combat scenes in World War II. The best-selling fiction of the decade continues to use historical, costume romance and simplifications of psychoanalysis. The fiction which may endure, for a little while at least, draws upon the examples of Henry James, Edith Wharton, and Ernest Hemingway. The work and example of T. S. Eliot continue to affect the writing of the young poets. In addition there is a growing body of critical work, much of it appearing in critical magazines which are associated in one way or another with American universities.

In its August, 1948, issue, Partisan Review published a collection of answers to several questions, under the general title of "The State of American Writing, 1948." The answers were generally either uncertain or critical. "It has been a bad decade so far" said John Berryman. "If the twenties were Eliot's decade, and the thirties Auden's, this has been simply the decade of Survival." We have, according to R. P. Blackmur, "a growing literary expertness in the techniques of expressing the experience of dismay, and the general techniques for creating the conditions of trouble." Clement Greenberg pointed to the stabilization of the literary economy: "The avantgarde has been professionalized, so to speak, organized into a field for careers; it is no longer the adventure beyond ratified norms, the refusal in the name of truth and excellence to abide by the categories of worldly success and failure." John Crowe Ransom pointed to the abundance of what he called "aesthetic theorizing by amateurs. It is a period of Reviews, of Little Magazines, of very serious critical books, which achieve publication on an unprecedented scale because for once there are readers enough to want them."

While such a symposium is scarcely a reliable guide to prediction, it does almost consistently point up the fact of an unsettled condition in the arts. The 1940's have produced no great work because five of their years have been taken up by another kind of activity; they have not produced or sanctioned any philosophy touching upon literature chiefly because writers find themselves exhausted by the release from the Marxist pressures of the 1930's and wary of any subsequent commitment which might lead to further disillusionment. What is mainly happening (outside, and occasionally even inside, the circle of best sellers) is an unceasing attention to the craft of writing—in the universities and in the magazines: a study of it that has led to an enormous increase of interest in the work of Henry James and a continuing attention to the analytics of the new criticism.

The major tendencies in the literary history of our century have made for an American literature genuinely equal to the demands made upon it. Much of the literature written in the name of naturalism, Imagism, expressionism, Marxism, has been crude and naïve; there is a part of it, however, which survives and continues to belong to our cultural life, as testimony to its slow but certain development toward maturity.

1871 ~ Stephen Crane ~ 1900

STEPHEN CRANE was born in Newark, New Jersey, the fourteenth child in a Methodist minister's family. The boy showed early signs of revolt against the confining atmosphere of the parsonage, as well as against the genteel family traditions which generations of Cranes, prominent in state and nation, had built up. He shocked his family by announcing his disbelief in hell, and his schoolmasters by condemning Tennyson's poetry as "swill." Although he studied at Lafayette College and Syracuse University, he did not complete the course at either institution, and was more interested in baseball than in academic distinction. His efforts in journalism were unsuccessful because impressions seemed more important than facts. Commissioned by the Bachelier Syndicate, he traveled through the West and Southwest and into Mexico to write a series of sketches, and was sent by the New York Journal as a war correspondent to Greece. He settled in England where, with the exception of several months in America reporting the Spanish-American War, he lived until his premature death in 1900.

Crane was one of the leaders of the realistic revolt against the saccharine insincerity of the time. The chief tenet in his literary theory was the demand for sincerity. Of his first book, Maggie: A Girl of the Streets (1893), he said, "I had no other purpose . . . than to show people to people as they seem to me. If this be evil make the best of it." Inasmuch as man is born with his eyes he cannot be held responsible for his vision—"he is merely responsible for his quality of personal honesty. To keep close to this personal honesty is my supreme ambition." Life is represented without comment, as it appears to him. Critical values are left to the reader. Thus it is clear that he is a naturalist by virtue of this impersonal and detached treatment, as well as by his refusal to give expression to moral judgments. He is also a determinist, for both Maggie and the recruit in The Red Badge of Courage (1895) are in their respective spheres of the Bowery and war the victims of circumstances over which they had no control. The impressionistic phase of his art is seen in the discarding of detail, and achieving descriptive effect through "snapshot" economy. To be a great artist one must see clearly, and have the gift and inclination to report honestly and sincerely what has been seen.

Although Crane's complete works fill twelve volumes, the two books by which he will be known to posterity are Maggie and The Red Badge of Courage. The former is a short episodic novel, virile, outspoken, almost brutal, in which is recorded the degeneration of a young Irish girl, a habitué of the Bowery, the life of which Crane came to know intimately during his reporting days. Subject matter like this was not considered respectable, and it was three years after the book was privately printed that a publisher was found to sponsor it. In The Red Badge of Courage Crane dealt the death blow to the romantic treatment of war. As a young boy he had listened to Civil War veterans relate experiences when they were not on dress parade, and he came to the conclusion that war was neither glorious nor heroic, but sordid, ghastly, and futile. From this viewpoint he laid bare the soul of the young conscript, the fear, uncertainty, suffering, resentment, and ignorance of everything but the immediate commands of his superiors. Under his hand war became in fiction what it always has been in actuality—a foolish, brutal, ghastly, confused, and unheroic experience. Crane marks the parting of the ways of war and romance.

Crane's poetry anticipated some of the later developments in the new movement. His skill in imagery is unquestioned, although his force is sometimes weakened by a self-conscious effort to say startling things.

Crane's two famous books are Maggie, a Girl of the Streets (1893) and The Red Badge of Courage (1895). The Little Regiment (1896), The Open Boat and Other Tales of Adventure (1898), The Monster and Other Stories (1899), and Whilomville Stories (1900) are collections of short stories. His complete writings are available in W. Follett, ed., The Work of Stephen Crane (12 vols., 1925-6). Selections may be found in V. Starrett, ed., Maggie and Other Stories (1933); V. Starrett, ed., Men, Women, and Books (1921); Henry Hazlitt, Maggie, Together with George's Mother and The Blue Hotel, with introduction (1931); Carl Van Doren, ed., Twenty Stories (1940). The poetry is available in The Collected Poems of Stephen Crane (1930). T. Beer's Stephen Crane (1923) is a full-length biography. T. L. Raymond's Stephen Crane (1923) is a briefer study. From THE RED BADGE OF COURAGE

Crane believed that the closer an artist gets to life the greater his art will be. With this as his guiding principle, he undertook to picture war as it really is, stripped of the melodrama, glamour and heroism which characterized many of the romantic war novels. He achieves his purpose by means of a psychological study of the common soldier from the time he enters the army, recording his reactions to his experiences with minute detail. It should be added that from the viewpoint of style the novel is a piece of excellent writing.

CHAPTER V

THERE were moments of waiting. The youth thought of the village street at home before the arrival of the circus parade on a day in the spring. He remembered how he had stood, a small, thrilling boy, prepared to follow the dingy lady upon the white horse, or the band in its faded chariot. He saw the yellow road, the lines of expectant people, and the sober houses. He particularly remembered an old fellow who used to sit upon a cracker box in front of the store and feign to despise such exhibitions. A thousand details of color and form surged in his mind. The old fellow upon the cracker box appeared in middle prominence.

Some one cried, "Here they come!"

There was a rustling and muttering among the men. They displayed a feverish desire to have every possible cartridge ready to their hands. The boxes were pulled around into various positions, and adjusted with great care. It was as if seven hundred new bonnets were being tried on.

The tall soldier, having prepared his rifle, produced a red handkerchief of some kind. He was engaged in knitting it about his throat with exquisite attention to its position, when the cry was repeated up and down the line in a muffled roar of sound.

"Here they come! Here they come!" Gun locks clicked.

Across the smoke-infested fields came a brown swarm of running men who were giving shrill yells. They came on, stooping and swinging their rifles at all angles. A flag, tilted forward, sped near the front.

As he caught sight of them the youth momentarily startled by a thought that perhaps his gun was not loaded. He stood trying to rally his faltering intellect so that he might recollect the moment when he had loaded, but he could not.

A hatless general pulled his dripping horse to a stand near the colonel of the 304th. He shook his fist in the other's face. "You've got to hold 'em back!" he shouted, savagely; "you've got to hold 'em back!"

In his agitation the colonel began to stammer. "A-all r-right, General, all right, by Gawd! We-we'll do our—we-we'll d-d-d-do—do our best, General." The general made a passionate gesture and galloped away. The colonel, perchance to relieve his feelings, began to scold like a wet parrot. The youth, turning swiftly to make sure that the rear was unmolested, saw the commander regarding his men in a highly resentful manner, as if he regretted above everything his association with them.

The man at the youth's elbow was mumbling, as if to himself: "Oh, we're in for it now! oh, we're in for it now!"

The captain of the company had been pacing excitedly to and fro in the rear. He coaxed in schoolmistress fashion, as to a congregation of boys with primers. His talk was an endless repetition. "Reserve your fire, boys—don't shoot till I tell you—save your fire—wait till they get close up—don't be damned fools—"

Perspiration streamed down the youth's face, which was soiled like that of a weeping urchin. He frequently, with a nervous movement, wiped his eyes with his coat sleeve. His mouth was still a little way open.

He got the one glance at the foe-swarming field in front of him, and instantly ceased to debate the question of his piece being loaded. Before he was ready to begin—before he had announced to himself that he was about to fight—he threw the obedient, well-balanced rifle into position and fired a first wild shot. Directly he was working at his weapon like an automatic affair.

He suddenly lost concern for himself, and forgot to look at a menacing fate. He became not a man but a member. He felt that something of which he was a part—a regiment, an army, a cause, or a country—was in a crisis. He was welded into a common personality which was dominated by a single desire. For some moments he could not flee no more than a little finger can commit a revolution from a hand.

If he had thought the regiment was about to be annihilated perhaps he could have amputated himself from it. But its noise gave him assurance. The regiment was like a firework that, once ignited, proceeds superior to circumstances until its blazing vitality fades. It wheezed and banged with a mighty power. He pictured the ground before it as strewn with the discomfited.

There was a consciousness always of the presence of his comrades about him. He felt the subtle battle brotherhood more potent even than the cause for which they were fighting. It was a mysterious fraternity born of the smoke and danger of death.

He was at a task. He was like a carpenter who has made many boxes, making still another box, only there was furious haste in his movement. He, in his thought, was careering off in other places, even as the carpenter who as he works whistles and thinks of his friend or his enemy, his home or a saloon. And these jolted dreams were never perfect to him afterward, but remained a mass of blurred shapes.

Presently he began to feel the effects of the war atmosphere—a blistering sweat, a sensation that his eyeballs were about to crack like hot stones. A burning roar filled his ears.

Following this came a red rage. He developed the acute exasperation of a pestered animal, a well-meaning cow worried by dogs. He had a mad feeling against his rifle, which could only be used against one life at a time. He wished to rush forward and strangle with his fingers. He craved a power that would enable him to make a world-sweeping gesture and brush all back. His impotency appeared to him, and made his rage into that of a driven beast.

Buried in the smoke of many rifles his anger was directed not so much against the men who he knew were rushing toward him as against the swirling battle phantoms which were choking him, stuffing their smoke robes down his parched throat. He fought frantically for respite for his senses, for air, as a babe being smothered attacks the deadly blankets.

There was a blare of heated rage mingled with a certain expression of intentness on all faces. Many of the men were making low-toned noises with their mouths, and these subdued cheers, snarls, imprecations, prayers, made a wild, barbaric song that went as an undercurrent of sound, strange and chant-like with the resounding chords of the war march. The man at the youth's elbow was babbling. In it there was something soft and tender like the monologue of a babe. The tall soldier was swearing in a loud voice. From his lips came a black procession of curious oaths. Of a sudden another broke out in a querulous way like a man who has mislaid his hat. "Well, why don't they support us? Why don't they send supports? Do they think——"

The youth in his battle sleep heard this as one who dozes hears.

There was a singular absence of heroic poses. The men bending and surging in their haste and rage were in every impossible attitude. The steel ramrods clanked and clanged with incessant din as the men pounded them furiously into the hot rifle barrels. The flaps of the cartridge boxes were all unfastened, and bobbed idiotically with each movement. The rifles, once loaded, were jerked to the shoulder and fired without apparent aim into the smoke or at one of the blurred and shifting forms which upon the field before the regiment had been growing larger and larger like puppets under a magician's hand.

The officers, at their intervals, rearward, neglected to stand in picturesque attitudes. They were bobbing to and fro roaring directions and encouragements. The dimensions of their howls were extraordinary. They expended their lungs with prodigal wills. And often they nearly stood upon their heads in their anxiety to observe the enemy on the other side of the tumbling smoke.

The lieutenant of the youth's company had encountered a soldier who had fled screaming at the first volley of his comrades. Behind the lines these two were acting a little isolated scene. The man was blubbing and staring with sheeplike eyes at the lieutenant, who had seized him by the collar and was pommeling him. He drove him back into the ranks with many blows. The soldier went mechanically, dually, with his animal-like eyes upon the officer. Perhaps there was to him a divinity expressed in the voice of the other—stern, hard, with no reflection of fear in it. He tried to reload his gun, but his shaking hands prevented. The lieutenant was obliged to assist him.

The men dropped here and there like bundles. The captain of the youth's company had been killed in an early part of the action. His body lay stretched out in the position of a tired man resting, but upon his face there was an astonished and sorrowful look, as if he thought some friend had done him an ill turn. The babbling man was grazed by a shot that made the blood stream widely down his face. He clapped both hands to his head. "Oh!" he said, and ran. Another grunted suddenly as if he had been struck by a club in the stomach. He sat down and gazed ruefully. In his eyes there was mute, indefinite reproach. Farther up the line a man, standing behind a tree, had had his knee joint splintered by a ball. Immediately he had dropped his rifle and gripped the tree with both arms. And there he remained, clinging desperately and crying for assistance that he might withdraw his hold upon the tree.

At last an exultant yell went along the quivering line. The firing dwindled from an uproar to a last vindictive popping. As the smoke slowly eddied away, the youth saw that the charge had been repulsed. The enemy were scattered into reluctant groups. He saw a man climb to the top of the fence, straddle the rail, and fire a parting shot. The waves had receded, leaving bits of dark débris upon the ground.

Some in the regiment began to whoop frenziedly. Many were silent. Apparently they were trying to contemplate themselves.

After the fever had left his veins, the youth thought that at last he was going to suffocate. He became aware of the foul atmosphere in which he had been struggling. He was grimy and dripping like a laborer in a foundry. He grasped his canteen and took a long swallow of the warmed water.

A sentence with variations went up and down the line. "Well, we've helt 'em back. We've helt 'em back; derned if we haven't." The men said it blissfully, leering at each other with dirty smiles.

The youth turned to look behind him and off to the right and off to the left. He experienced the joy of a man who at last finds leisure in which to look about him.

Under foot there were a few ghastly forms motionless. They lay twisted in fantastic contortions. Arms were bent and heads were turned in incredible ways. It seemed that the dead men must have fallen from some great height to get into such positions. They looked to be dumped out upon the ground from the sky.

From a position in the rear of the grove a battery was throwing shells over it. The flash of the guns startled the youth at first. He thought they were aimed directly at him. Through the trees he watched the black figures of the gunners as they worked swiftly and intently. Their labor seemed a complicated thing. He wondered how they could remember its formula in the midst of confusion.

The guns squatted in a row like savage chiefs. They argued with abrupt violence. It was a grim pow-pow. Their busy servants ran hither and thither.

A small procession of wounded men were going drearily toward the rear. It was a flow of blood from the torn body of the brigade.

To the right and to the left were the dark lines of other troops. Far in front he thought he could see lighter masses protruding in points from the forest. They were suggestive of unnumbered thousands.

Once he saw a tiny battery go dashing along the line of the horizon. The tiny riders were beating the tiny horses.

From a sloping hill came the sound of cheerings and clashes. Smoke welled slowly through the leaves.

Batteries were speaking with thunderous oratorical effort. Here and there were flags, the red in the stripes dominating. They splashed bits of warm color upon the dark lines of troops.

The youth felt the old thrill at the sight of the emblem. They were like beautiful birds strangely undaunted in a storm.

As he listened to the din from the hillside, to a deep pulsating thunder that came from afar to the left, and to the lesser clamors which came from many directions, it occurred to him that they were fighting, too, over there, and over there, and over there. Heretofore he had supposed that all the battle was directly under his nose.

As he gazed around him the youth felt a flash of astonishment at the blue, pure sky and the sun gleamings on the trees and fields. It was surprising that Nature had gone tranquilly on with her golden process in the midst of so much devilment.

CHAPTER VI

The youth awakened slowly. He came gradually back to a position from which he could regard himself. For moments he had been scrutinizing his person in a dazed way as if he had never before seen himself. Then he picked up his cap from the ground. He wriggled in his jacket to make a more comfortable fit, and kneeling relaced his shoe. He thoughtfully mopped his reeking features.

So it was all over at last! The supreme trial had been passed. The red, formidable difficulties of war had been vanquished.

He went into an ecstasy of self-satisfaction. He had the most delightful sensations of his life. Standing as if apart from himself, he viewed that last scene. He perceived that the man who had fought thus was magnificent.

He felt that he was a fine fellow. He saw himself even with those ideals which he had considered as far beyond him. He smiled in deep gratification.

Upon his fellows he beamed tenderness and good will. "Gee! ain't it hot, hey?" he said affably to a man who was polishing his streaming face with his coat sleeves.

"You bet!" said the other, grinning sociably. "I never seen sech dumb hotness." He sprawled out luxuriously on the ground. "Gee, yes! An' I hope we don't have no more fightin' till a week from Monday."

There were some handshakings and deep speeches with men whose features were familiar, but with whom the youth now felt the bonds of tied hearts. He helped a cursing comrade to bind up a wound of the shin.

But, of a sudden, cries of amazement broke out along the ranks of the new regiment. "Here they come ag'in! Here they come ag'in!" The man who had sprawled upon the ground started up and said, "Gosh!"

The youth turned quick eyes upon the field. He discerned forms begin to swell in masses out of a distant wood. He again saw the tilted flag speeding forward.

The shells, which had ceased to trouble the regiment for a time, came swirling again, and exploded in the grass or among the leaves of the trees. They looked to be strange war flowers bursting into fierce bloom.

10 The men groaned. The luster faded from their eyes. Their smudged countenances now expressed a profound dejection. They moved their stiffened bodies slowly, and watched in sullen mood the frantic approach of the enemy. The slaves toiling in the temple of this god began to feel rebellion at his harsh tasks.

They fretted and complained each to each. "Oh, say, this is too much of a good thing! Why can't somebody send us supports?"

20 "We ain't never goin' to stand this second banging. I didn't come here to fight the hull damn' rebel army."

There was one who raised a doleful cry. "I wish Bill Smithers had trod on my hand, insteader me treddin' on his'n." The sore joints of the regiment creaked as it painfully floundered into position to repulse.

The youth stared. Surely, he thought, this impossible thing was not about to happen. He waited as if he expected the enemy to suddenly stop, apologize, and retire bowing. It was all a mistake.

But the firing began somewhere on the regimental line and ripped along in both directions. The level sheets of flame developed great clouds of smoke that tumbled and tossed in the mild wind near the ground for a moment, and then rolled through the ranks as through a gate. The clouds were tinged an earthlike yellow in the sunrays, and in the shadow were a sorry blue. The flag was sometimes eaten and lost in this mass of vapor, but more often it projected, sun-touched, resplendent.

Into the youth's eyes there came a look that one can see in the orbs of a jaded horse. His neck was quivering with nervous weakness and the muscles of his arms felt numb and bloodless. His hands, too, seemed large and awkward as if he was wearing invisible mittens. And there was a great uncertainty about his knee joints.

The words that comrades had uttered previous to the firing began to recur to him. "Oh, say, this is too much of a good thing! What do they take us for—why don't they send supports? I didn't come here to fight the hull damned rebel army."

He began to exaggerate the endurance, the skill, and the valor of those who were coming. Himself reeling from exhaustion, he was astonished beyond measure at such persistency. They must be machines of steel. It was very gloomy struggling against such affairs, wound up perhaps to fight until sundown.

He slowly lifted his rifle and catching a glimpse of the thick-spread field he blazed at a cantering cluster. He stopped then and began to peer as best he could through the smoke. He caught changing views of the ground covered with men who were all running like pursued imps, and yelling.

To the youth it was an onslaught of redoubtable dragons. He became like the man who lost his legs at the approach of the red and green monster. He waited in a sort of a horrified, listening attitude. He seemed to shut his eyes and wait to be gobbled.

A man near him who up to this time had been working feverishly at his rifle suddenly stopped and ran with howls. A lad whose face had borne an expression of exalted courage, the majesty of he who dares give his life, was, at an instant, smitten abject. He blanched like one who has come to the edge of a cliff at midnight and is suddenly made aware. There was a revelation. He, too, threw down his gun and fled. There was no shame in his face. He ran like a rabbit.

Others began to scamper away through the smoke. The youth turned his head, shaken from his trance by this movement as if the regiment was leaving him behind. He saw the few fleeting forms.

He yelled then with fright and swung about. For a moment, in the great clamor, he was like a proverbial chicken. He lost the direction of safety. Destruction threatened him from all points.

Directly he began to speed toward the rear in great leaps. His rifle and cap were gone. His unbuttoned coat bulged in the wind. The flap of his cartridge box bobbed wildly, and his canteen, by its slender cord, swung out behind. On his face was all the horror of those things which he imagined.

The lieutenant sprang forward bawling. The youth saw his features wrathfully red, and saw him make a dab with his sword. His one thought of the incident was that the lieutenant was a peculiar creature to feel interested in such matters upon this occasion.

He ran like a blind man. Two or three times he fell down. Once he knocked his shoulder so heavily against a tree that he went headlong.

Since he had turned his back upon the fight his fears had been wondrously magnified. Death about to thrust him between the shoulder blades was far more dreadful than death about to smite him between the eyes. When he thought of it later, he conceived the impression that it is better to view the appalling than to be merely within hearing. The noises of the battle were like stones; he believed himself liable to be crushed.

As he ran on he mingled with others. He dimly saw men on his right and on his left, and he heard footsteps behind him. He thought that all the regiment was fleeing, pursued by these ominous crashes.

In his flight the sound of these following footsteps gave him his one meager relief. He felt vaguely that death must make a first choice of the men who were nearest; the initial morsels for the dragons would be then those who were following him. So he displayed the zeal of an insane sprinter in his purpose to keep them in the rear. There was a race.

As he, leading, went across a little field, he found himself in a region of shells. They hurtled over his head with long wild screams. As he listened he imagined them to have rows of cruel teeth that grinned at him. Once one lit before him and the livid lightning of the explosion effectually barred the way in his chosen direction. He groveled on the ground and then springing up went careering off through some bushes.

He experienced a thrill of amazement when he came within view of a battery in action. The men there seemed to be in conventional moods, altogether unaware of the impending annihilation. The battery was disputing with a distant antagonist and the gunners were wrapped in admiration of their shooting. They were continually bending in coaxing postures over the guns. They seemed to be patting them on the back and encouraging them with words. The guns, stolid and undaunted, spoke with dogged valor.

The precise gunners were coolly enthusiastic. They lifted their eyes every chance to the smoke-wreathed hillock from whence the hostile battery addressed them. The youth pitied them as he ran. Methodical idiots! Machine-like fools! The refined joy of planting shells in the midst of the other battery's formation would appear a little thing when the infantry came swooping out of the woods.

The face of a youthful rider, who was jerking his frantic horse with an abandon of temper he might display in a placid barnyard, was impressed deeply upon his mind. He knew that he looked upon a man who would presently be dead.

Too, he felt a pity for the guns, standing, six good comrades, in a bold row.

He saw a brigade going to the relief of its pestered fellows. He scrambled upon a wee hill and watched it sweeping finely, keeping formation in difficult places. The blue of the line was crusted with steel color, and the brilliant flags projected. Officers were shouting.

This sight also filled him with wonder. The brigade was hurrying briskly to be gulped into the infernal mouths of the war god. What manner of men were they, anyhow? Ah, it was some wondrous breed! Or else they didn't comprehend—the fools.

A furious order caused commotion in the artillery. An officer on a bounding horse made maniacal motions with his arms. The teams went swinging up from the rear, the guns were whirled about, and the battery scampered away. The cannon with their noses poked slantingly at the ground grunted and grumbled like stout men, brave but with objections to hurry.

The youth went on, moderating his pace since he had left the place of noises.

Later he came upon a general of division seated upon a horse that pricked its ears in an interested way at the battle. There was a great gleaming of yellow and patent leather about the saddle and bridle. The quiet man astride looked mouse-colored upon such a splendid charger.

A jingling staff was galloping hither and thither. Sometimes the general was surrounded by horsemen and at other times he was quite alone. He looked to be much harassed. He had the appearance of a business man whose market is swinging up and down.

The youth went slinking around this spot. He went as near as he dared trying to overhear words. Perhaps the general, unable to comprehend chaos, might call upon him for information. And he could tell him. He knew all concerning it. Of a surety the force was in a fix, and any fool could see that if they did not retreat while they had opportunity—why——

He felt that he would like to thrash the general, or at least approach and tell him in plain words exactly what he thought him to be. It was criminal to stay calmly in one spot and make no effort to stay destruction. He loitered in a fever of eagerness for the division commander to apply to him.

As he warily moved about, he heard the general call out irritably: "Tompkins, go over an' see Taylor, an' tell him not t' be in such an all-fired hurry; tell him t' halt his brigade in th' edge of th' woods; tell him t' detach a reg'ment—say I think th' center'll break if we don't help it out some; tell him t' hurry up."

A slim youth on a fine chestnut horse caught these swift words from the mouth of his superior. He made his horse bound into a gallop almost from a walk in his haste to go upon his mission. There was a cloud of dust.

A moment later the youth saw the general bounce excitedly in his saddle.

"Yes, by heavens, they have!" The officer leaned forward. His face was aflame with excitement. "Yes, by heavens, they've held 'im! They've held 'im!"

He began to blithely roar at his staff: "We'll wallop 'im now. We'll wallop 'im now. We've got 'em sure." He turned suddenly upon an aid: "Here—you—Jones—quick—ride after Tompkins—see Taylor—tell him t' go in—everlastingly—like blazes—anything."

As another officer sped his horse after the first messenger, the general beamed upon the earth like a sun. In his eyes was a desire to chant a paean. He kept repeating, "They've held 'em, by heavens!"

His excitement made his horse plunge, and he merrily kicked and swore at it. He held a little carnival of joy on horseback.

THE BLUE HOTEL

I

THE Palace Hotel at Fort Romper was painted a light blue, a shade that is on the legs of a kind of heron, causing the bird to declare its position against any background. The Palace Hotel, then, was always screaming and howling in a way that made the dazzling winter landscape of Nebraska seem only a gray swampish hush. It stood alone on the prairie, and when the snow was falling the town two hundred yards away was not visible. But when the traveler alighted at the railway station he was obliged to pass the Palace Hotel before he could come upon the company of low clapboard houses which composed Fort Romper, and it was not to be thought that any traveler could pass the Palace Hotel without looking at it. Pat Scully, the proprietor, had proved himself a master of strategy when he chose his paints. It is true that on clear days, when the great transcontinental expresses, long lines of swaying Pullmans, swept through Fort Romper, passengers were overcome at the sight, and the cult that knows the brown-reds and the subdivisions of the dark greens of the East expressed shame, pity, horror, in a laugh. But to the citizens of this prairie town and to the people who would naturally stop there, Pat Scully had performed a feat. With this opulence and splendor, these creeds, classes, egotisms, that streamed through Romper on the rails day after day, they had no color in common.

As if the displayed delights of such a blue hotel were not sufficiently enticing, it was Scully's habit to go every morning and evening to meet the leisurely trains that stopped at Romper and work his seductions upon any man that he might see wavering, gripsack in hand.

One morning, when a snow-crueted engine dragged its long string of freight cars and its one passenger coach to the station, Scully performed the marvel of catching three men. One was a shaky and quick-eyed Swede, with a great shining cheap valise; one was a tall bronzed cowboy, who was on his way to a ranch near the Dakota line; one was a little silent man from the East, who didn't look it, and didn't announce it. Scully practically made them prisoners. He was so nimble and merry and kindly that each probably felt it would be the height of brutality to try to escape. They trudged off over the creaking board sidewalks in the wake of the eager little Irishman. He wore a heavy fur cap squeezed tightly down on his head. It caused his two red ears to stick out stiffly, as if they were made of tin.

At last, Scully, elaborately, with boisterous hospitality, conducted them through the portals of the blue hotel. The room which they entered was small. It seemed to be merely a proper temple for an enormous stove, which, in the center, was humming with godlike violence. At various points on its surface the iron had become luminous and glowed yellow from the heat. Beside the stove Scully's son Johnnie was playing High-Five with an old farmer who had whiskers both grey and sandy. They were quarreling. Frequently the old farmer turned his face toward a box of sawdust—colored brown from tobacco juice—that was behind the stove, and spat with an air of great impatience and irritation. With a loud flourish of words Scully destroyed the game of cards, and hustled his son upstairs with part of the baggage of the new guests. He himself conducted them to three basins of the coldest water in the world. The cowboy and the Easterner bur-nished themselves fiery red with this water, until it seemed to be some kind of metal-polish. The Swede, however, merely dipped his fingers gingerly and with trepidation. It was notable that throughout this series of small ceremonies the three travelers were made to feel that Scully was very benevolent. He was conferring great favors upon them. He handed the towel from one to another with an air of philanthropic impulse.

Afterward they went to the first room, and, sitting about the stove, listened to Scully's officious clamor at his daughters, who were preparing the midday meal. They reflected in the silence of experienced men who tread carefully amid new people. Nevertheless, the old farmer, stationary, invincible in his chair near the warmest part of the stove, turned his face from the sawdust-box frequently and addressed a glowing commonplace to the strangers. Usually he was answered in short but adequate sentences by either the cowboy or the Easterner. The Swede said nothing. He seemed to be occupied in making furtive estimates of each man in the room. One might have thought that he had the sense of silly suspicion which comes to guilt. He resembled a badly frightened man.

Later, at dinner, he spoke a little, addressing his conversation entirely to Scully. He volunteered that he had come from New York, where for ten years he had worked as a tailor. These facts seemed to strike Scully as fascinating, and afterward he volunteered that he had lived at Romper for fourteen years. The Swede asked about the crops and the price of labor. He seemed barely to listen to Scully's extended replies. His eyes continued to rove from man to man.

Finally, with a laugh and a wink, he said that some of these Western communities were very dangerous; and after this statement he straightened his legs under the table, tilted his head, and laughed again, loudly. It was plain that the demonstration had no meaning to the others. They looked at him wondering and in silence.

II

As the men trooped heavily back into the front room, the two little windows presented views of a turmoiling sea of snow. The huge arms of the wind were making attempts—mighty, circular, futile—to embrace the flakes as they sped. A gate-post like a still man with a blanched face stood aghast amid this profligate fury. In a hearty voice Scully announced the presence of a blizzard. The guests of the blue hotel, lighting their pipes, assented with grunts of lazy masculine contentment. No island of the sea could be exempt in the degree of this little room with its humming stove. Johnnie, son of Scully, in a tone which defined his opinion of his ability as a card-player, challenged the old farmer of both grey and sandy whiskers to a game of High-Five. The farmer agreed with a contemptuous and bitter scoff. They sat close to the stove, and squared their knees under a wide board. The cowboy and the Easterner watched the game with interest. The Swede remained near the window, aloof, but with a countenance that showed signs of an inexplicable excitement.

The play of Johnnie and the grey-beard was suddenly ended by another quarrel. The old man rose while casting a look of heated scorn at his adversary. He slowly buttoned his coat, and then stalked with fabulous dignity from the room. In the discreet silence of all the other men the Swede laughed. His laughter rang somehow childish. Men by this time had begun to look at him askance, as if they wished to inquire what ailed him.

A new game was formed jocosely. The cowboy volunteered to become the partner of Johnnie, and they all then turned to ask the Swede to throw in his lot with the little Easterner. He asked some questions about the game, and, learning that it wore many names, and that he had played it when it was under an alias, he accepted the invitation. He strode toward the men nervously, as if he expected to be assaulted. Finally, seated, he gazed from face to face and laughed shrilly. This laugh was so strange that the Easterner looked up quickly, the cowboy sat intent and with his mouth open, and Johnnie paused, holding the cards with still fingers.

Afterward there was a short silence. Then Johnnie said, "Well, let's get at it. Come on now!" They pulled their chairs forward until their knees were bunched under the board. They began to play, and their interest in the game caused the others to forget the manner of the Swede.

The cowboy was a board-whacker. Each time that he held superior cards he whanged them, one by one, with exceeding force, down upon the improvised table, and took the tricks with a glowing air of prowess and pride that sent thrills of indignation into the hearts of his opponents. A game with a board-whacker in it is sure to become intense. The countenances of the Easterner and the Swede were miserable whenever the cowboy thundered down his aces and kings, while Johnnie, his eyes gleaming with joy, chuckled and chuckled.

Because of the absorbing play none considered the strange ways of the Swede. They paid strict heed to the game. Finally, during a lull caused by a new deal, the Swede suddenly addressed Johnnie: "I suppose there have been a good many men killed in this room." The jaws of the others dropped and they looked at him.

"What in hell are you talking about?" said Johnnie.

The Swede laughed again his blatant laugh, full of a kind of false courage and defiance. "Oh, you know what I mean all right," he answered.

"I'm a liar if I do!" Johnnie protested. The card was halted, and the men stared at the Swede. Johnnie evidently felt that as the son of the proprietor he should make a direct inquiry. "Now, what might you be drivin' at, mister?" he asked. The Swede winked at him. It was a wink full of cunning. His fingers shook on the edge of the board. "Oh, maybe you think I have been to nowheres. Maybe you think I'm a tenderfoot?"

"I don't know nothin' about you," answered Johnnie, "and I don't give a damn where you've been. All I got to say is that I don't know what you're driving at. There hain't never been nobody killed in this room."

The cowboy, who had been steadily gazing at the Swede, then spoke: "What's wrong with you, mister?"

Apparently it seemed to the Swede that he was formidably menaced. He shivered and turned white near the corners of his mouth. He sent an appealing glance in the direction of the little Easterner. During these moments he did not forget to wear his air of advanced valor. "They say they don't know what I mean," he remarked mockingly to the Easterner.

The latter answered after prolonged and cautious reflection. "I don't understand you," he said, impassively.

The Swede made a movement then which announced that he thought he had encountered treachery from the only quarter where he had expected sympathy, if not help. "Oh, I see you are all against me, I see——"

The cowboy was in a state of deep stupefaction. "Say," he cried, as he tumbled the deck violently down upon the board, "say, what are you gittin' at, hey?"

The Swede sprang up with the celerity of a man escaping from a snake on the floor. "I don't want to fight!" he shouted. "I don't want to fight!"

The cowboy stretched his long legs indolently and deliberately. His hands were in his pockets. He spat into the sawdust-box. "Well, who the hell thought you did?" he inquired.

The Swede backed rapidly toward a corner of the room. His hands were out protectingly in front of his chest, but he was making an obvious struggle to control his fright. "Gentlemen," he quavered, "I suppose I am going to be killed before I can leave this house! I suppose I am going to be killed before I can leave this house!" In his eyes was the dying-swan look. Through the windows could be seen the snow turning blue in the shadow of dusk. The wind tore at the house, and some loose thing beat regularly against the clapboards like a spirit tapping.

A door opened, and Scully himself entered. He paused in surprise as he noted the tragic attitude of the Swede. Then he said, "What's the matter here?"

The Swede answered him swiftly and eagerly: "These men are going to kill me."

"Kill you!" ejaculated Scully. "Kill you! What are you talkin'?"

The Swede made the gesture of a martyr.

Scully wheeled sternly upon his son. "What is this, Johnnie?"

The lad had grown sullen. "Damned if I know," he answered. "I can't make no sense to it." He began to shuffle the cards, fluttering them together with an angry snap. "He says a good many men have been killed in this room, or something like that. And he says he's goin' to be killed here too. I don't know what ails him. He's crazy, I shouldn't wonder."

Scully then looked for explanation to the cowboy, but the cowboy simply shrugged his shoulders.

"Kill you?" said Scully again to the Swede. "Kill you? Man, you're off your nut."

"Oh, I know," burst out the Swede. "I know what will happen. Yes, I'm crazy—yes. Yes, of course, I'm crazy—yes. But I know one thing——" There was a sort of sweat of misery and terror upon his face. "I know I won't get out of here alive."

The cowboy drew a deep breath, as if his mind was passing into the last stages of dissolution. "Well, I'm doggoned," he whispered to himself.

Scully wheeled suddenly and faced his son. "You've been troublin' this man!"

Johnnie's voice was loud with its burden of grievance. "Why, good Gawd, I ain't done nothin' to 'im."

The Swede broke in. "Gentlemen, do not disturb yourselves. I will leave this house. I will go away, because"—he accused them dramatically with his glance—"because I do not want to be killed."

Scully was furious with his son. "Will you tell me what is the matter, you young divil? What's the matter, anyhow? Speak out!"

"Blame it!" cried Johnnie in despair, "don't I tell you I don't know? He—he says we want to kill him, and that's all I know. I can't tell what ails him."

The Swede continued to repeat: "Never mind, Mr. Scully; never mind. I will leave this house. I will go away, because I do not wish to be killed. Yes, of course, I am crazy—yes. But I know one thing! I will go away. I will leave this house. Never mind, Mr. Scully; never mind. I will go away."

"You will not go 'way," said Scully. "You will not go 'way until I hear the reason of this business. If anybody has troubled you I will take care of him. This is my house. You are under my roof, and I will not allow any peaceable man to be troubled here." He cast a terrible eye upon Johnnie, the cowboy, and the Easterner.

"Never mind, Mr. Scully; never mind. I will go away. I do not wish to be killed." The Swede moved toward the door which opened upon the stairs. It was evidently his intention to go at once for his baggage.

"No, no," shouted Scully peremptorily; but the white-faced man slid by him and disappeared. "Now," said Scully severely, "what does this mane?"

Johnnie and the cowboy cried together: "Why, we didn't do nothin' to 'im!"

Scully's eyes were cold. "No," he said, "you didn't?"

Johnnie swore a deep oath. "Why, this is the wildest loon I ever see. We didn't do nothin' at all. We were jest sittin' here playin' cards, and he—"

The father suddenly spoke to the Easterner. "Mr. Blanc," he asked, "what has these boys been doin'?"

The Easterner reflected again. "I didn't see anything wrong at all," he said at last, slowly.

Scully began to howl. "But what does it mane?" He stared ferociously at his son. "I have a mind to lather you for this, me boy."

Johnnie was frantic. "Well, what have I done?" he bawled at his father.

111

"I think you are tongue-tied," said Scully finally to his son, the cowboy, and the Easterner; and at the end of this scornful sentence he left the room.

Upstairs the Swede was swiftly fastening the straps of his great valise. Once his back happened to be half turned toward the door, and, hearing a noise there, he wheeled and sprang up, uttering a loud cry. Scully's wrinkled visage showed grimly in the light of the small lamp he carried. This yellow effulgence, streaming upward, coloured only his prominent features, and left his eyes, for instance, in mysterious shadow. He resembled a murderer.

"Man! man!" he exclaimed, "have you gone daffy?"

"Oh, no! Oh, no!" rejoined the other. "There are people in this world who know pretty nearly as much as you do—understand?"

For a moment they stood gazing at each other. Upon the Swede's deathly pale cheeks were two spots brightly crimson and sharply edged, as if they had been carefully painted. Scully placed the light on the table and sat himself on the edge of the bed. He spoke ruminatively. "By cracky, I never heard of such a thing in my life. It's a complete muddle. I can't, for the soul of me, think how you ever got this idea into your head." Presently he lifted his eyes and asked: "And did you sure think they were going to kill you?"

The Swede scanned the old man as if he wished to see into his mind. "I did," he said at last. He obviously suspected that this answer might precipitate an outbreak. As he pulled on a strap his whole arm shook, the elbow wavering like a bit of paper.

Scully banged his hand impressively on the footboard of the bed. "Why, man, we're goin'

to have a line of ilettric street-cars in this town next spring."

"'A line of electric street-cars,' " repeated the Swede stupidly.

"And," said Scully, "there's a new railroad goin' to be built down from Broken Arm to here. Not to mintion the four churches and the smashin' big brick school-house. Then there's the big factory, too. Why, in two years Romper'll be a met-tro-pol-is."

Having finished the preparation of his baggage, the Swede straightened himself. "Mr. Scully," he said, with sudden hardihood, "how much do I owe you?"

"You don't owe me anythin'," said the old man, angrily.

"Yes, I do," retorted the Swede. He took seventy-five cents from his pocket and tendered it to Scully; but the latter snapped his fingers in disdainful refusal. However, it happened that they both stood gazing in a strange fashion at three silver pieces on the Swede's open palm.

"I'll not take your money," said Scully at last. "Not after what's been goin' on here." Then a plan seemed to strike him. "Here," he cried, picking up his lamp and moving toward the door. "Here! Come with me a minute."

"No," said the Swede, in overwhelming alarm.

"Yes," urged the old man. "Come on! I want you to come and see a picter—just across the hall—in my room."

The Swede must have concluded that his hour was come. His jaw dropped and his teeth showed like a dead man's. He ultimately followed Scully across the corridor, but he had the step of one hung in chains.

Scully flashed the light high on the wall of his own chamber. There was revealed a ridiculous photograph of a little girl. She was leaning against a balustrade of gorgeous decoration, and the formidable bang to her hair was prominent. The figure was as graceful as an upright sled-stake, and, withal, it was of the hue of lead. "There," said Scully, tenderly, "that's the picter of my little girl that died. Her name was Carrie. She had the purtiest hair you ever saw! I was that fond of her, she——"

Turning then, he saw that the Swede was not contemplating the picture at all, but, instead, was keeping keen watch on the gloom in the rear.

"Look, man!" cried Scully, heartily. "That's the picter of my little gal that died. Her name was Carrie. And then here's the picter of my oldest boy, Michael. He's a lawyer in Lincoln, an' doin' well. I gave that boy a grand eddication, and I'm glad for it now. He's a fine boy. Look at 'im now. Ain't he bold as blazes, him there in Lincoln, an' honored an' respected gintleman! An honored and respected gintleman," concluded Scully with a flourish. And, so saying, he smote the Swede jovially on the back.

The Swede faintly smiled.

"Now," said the old man, "there's only one more thing." He dropped suddenly to the floor and thrust his head beneath the bed. The Swede could hear his muffled voice. "I'd keep it under me piller if it wasn't for that boy, Johnnie. Then there's the old woman—— Where is it now? I never put it twice in the same place. Ah, now come out with you!"

Presently he backed clumsily from under the bed, dragging with him an old coat rolled into a bundle. "I've fetched him," he muttered. Kneeling on the floor, he unrolled the coat and extracted from its heart a large yellow-brown whisky-bottle.

His first maneuver was to hold the bottle up to the light. Reassured, apparently, that nobody had been tampering with it, he thrust it with a generous movement toward the Swede.

The weak-kneed Swede was about to eagerly clutch this element of strength, but he suddenly jerked his hand away and cast a look of horror upon Scully.

"Drink," said the old man affectionately. He had risen to his feet, and now stood facing the Swede.

There was a silence. Then again Scully said: "Drink!"

The Swede laughed wildly. He grabbed the bottle, put it to his mouth; and as his lips curled absurdly around the opening and his throat worked, he kept his glance, burning with hatred, upon the old man's face.

IV

After the departure of Scully the three men, with the cardboard still upon their knees, preserved for a long time an astounded silence.

Then Johnnie said: "That's the doddangedest Swede I ever see."

"He ain't no Swede," said the cowboy, scornfully.

"Well, what is he then?" cried Johnnie. "What is he then?"

"It's my opinion," replied the cowboy deliberately, "he's some kind of a Dutchman." It was a venerable custom of the country to entitle as Swedes all light-haired men who spoke with a heavy tongue. In consequence the idea of the cowboy was not without its daring. "Yes, sir," he repeated. "It's my opinion this feller is some kind of a Dutchman."

"Well, he says he's a Swede, anyhow," muttered Johnnie, sulkily. He turned to the Easterner: "What do you think, Mr. Blanc?"

"Oh, I don't know," replied the Easterner.

"Well, what do you think makes him act that way?" asked the cowboy.

"Why, he's frightened." The Easterner knocked his pipe against a rim of the stove. "He's clear frightened out of his boots."

"What at?" cried Johnnie and the cowboy together.

The Easterner reflected over his answer.

"What at?" cried the others again.

"Oh, I don't know, but it seems to me this man has been reading dime novels, and he thinks he's right out in the middle of it—the shootin' and stabbin' and all."

"But," said the cowboy, deeply scandalized, "this ain't Wyoming, ner none of them places. This is Nebrasker."

"Yes," added Johnnie, "an' why don't he wait till he gits out West?"

The travelled Easterner laughed. "It isn't different there even—not in these days. But he thinks he's right in the middle of hell."

Johnnie and the cowboy mused long.

"It's awful funny," remarked Johnnie at last.

"Yes," said the cowboy. "This is a queer game. I hope we don't git snowed in, because then we'd have to stand this here man bein' around with us all the time. That wouldn't be no good."

"I wish pop would throw him out," said Johnnie.

Presently they heard a loud stamping on the stairs, accompanied by ringing jokes in the voice of old Scully, and laughter, evidently from the Swede. The men around the stove stared vacantly at each other. "Gosh!" said the cowboy. The door flew open, and old Scully, flushed and anecdotal, came into the room. He was jabbering at the Swede, who followed him, laughing bravely. It was the entry of two roisterers from a banquet hall.

"Come now," said Scully sharply to the three seated men, "move up and give us a chance at the stove." The cowboy and the Easterner obediently sidled their chairs to make room for the new-comers. Johnnie, however, simply arranged himself in a more indolent attitude, and then remained motionless.

"Come! Git over, there," said Scully.

"Plenty of room on the other side of the stove," said Johnnie.

"Do you think we want to sit in the draught?" roared the father.

But the Swede here interposed with a grandeur of confidence. "No, no. Let the boy sit where he likes," he cried in a bullying voice to the father.

"All right! All right!" said Scully deferentially. The cowboy and the Easterner exchanged glances of wonder.

The five chairs were formed in a crescent about one side of the stove. The Swede began to talk; he talked arrogantly, profanely, angrily. Johnnie, the cowboy, and the Easterner maintained a morose silence, while old Scully appeared to be receptive and eager, breaking in constantly with sympathetic ejaculations.

Finally the Swede announced that he was thirsty. He moved in his chair, and said that he would go for a drink of water.

"I'll git it for you," cried Scully at once.

"No," said the Swede, contemptuously. "I'll get it for myself." He arose and stalked with the air of an owner off into the executive parts of the hotel.

As soon as the Swede was out of hearing Scully sprang to his feet and whispered intently to the others: "Upstairs he thought I was tryin' to poison 'im."

"Say," said Johnnie, "this makes me sick. Why don't you throw 'im out in the snow?"

"Why, he's all right now," declared Scully. "It was only that he was from the East, and he thought this was a tough place. That's all. He's all right now."

The cowboy looked with admiration upon the Easterner. "You were straight," he said. "You were on to that there Dutchman."

"Well," said Johnnie to his father, "he may be all right now, but I don't see it. Other time he was scared, but now he's too fresh."

Scully's speech was always a combination of Irish brogue and idiom, Western twang and idiom, and scraps of curiously formal diction taken from the story-books and newspapers. He now hurled a strange mass of language at the head of his son. "What do I keep? What do I keep? What do I keep?" he demanded, in a voice of thunder. He slapped his knee impressively, to indicate that he himself was going to make reply, and that all should heed. "I keep a hotel," he shouted. "A hotel, do you mind? A guest under my roof has sacred privileges. He is to be intimidated by none. Not one word shall he hear that would prejudice him in favor of goin' away. I'll not have it. There's no place in this here town where they can say they iver took in a guest of mine because he was afraid to stay here." He wheeled suddenly upon the cowboy and the Easterner. "Am I right?"

"Yes, Mr. Scully," said the cowboy, "I think you're right."

"Yes, Mr. Scully," said the Easterner, "I think you're right."

v

At six-o'clock supper, the Swede fizzed like a firewheel. He sometimes seemed on the point of bursting into riotous song, and in all his madness he was encouraged by old Scully. The Easterner was encased in reserve; the cowboy sat in wide-mouthed amazement, forgetting to eat, while Johnnie wrathfully demolished great plates of food. The daughters of the house, when they were obliged to replenish the biscuits, approached as warily as Indians, and, having succeeded in their purpose, fled with ill-concealed trepidation. The Swede domineered the whole feast, and he gave it the appearance of a cruel bacchanal. He seemed to have grown suddenly taller; he gazed, brutally disdainful, into every face. His voice rang through the room. Once when he jabbed out harpoon-fashion with his fork to pinion a biscuit, the weapon nearly impaled the hand of the Easterner, which had been stretched quietly out for the same biscuit.

After supper, as the men filed toward the other room, the Swede smote Scully ruthlessly on the shoulder. "Well, old boy, that was a good, square meal." Johnnie looked hopefully at his father; he knew that shoulder was tender from an old fall; and, indeed, it appeared for a moment as if Scully was going to flame out over the matter, but in the end he smiled a sickly smile and remained silent. The others understood from his manner that he was admitting his responsibility for the Swede's new viewpoint.

Johnnie, however, addressed his parent in an aside. "Why don't you license somebody to kick you downstairs?" Scully scowled darkly by way of reply.

When they were gathered about the stove, the Swede insisted on another game of High-Five. Scully gently deprecated the plan at first, but the Swede turned a wolfish glare upon him. The old man subsided, and the Swede canvassed the others. In his tone there was always a great threat. The cowboy and the Easterner both remarked indifferently that they would play. Scully said that he would presently have to go to meet the 6.58 train, and so the Swede turned menacingly upon Johnnie. For a moment their glances crossed like blades, and then Johnnie smiled and said, "Yes, I'll play."

They formed a square, with the little board on their knees. The Easterner and the Swede were again partners. As the play went on, it was noticeable that the cowboy was not board-whacking as usual. Meanwhile, Scully, near the lamp, had put on his spectacles and, with an appearance curiously like an old priest, was reading a newspaper. In time he went out to meet the 6.58 train, and, despite his precautions, a gust of polar wind whirled into the room as he opened the door. Besides scattering the cards, it chilled the players to the marrow. The Swede cursed frightfully. When Scully returned, his entrance disturbed a cozy and friendly scene. The Swede again cursed. But presently they were once more intent, their heads bent forward and their hands moving swiftly. The Swede had adopted the fashion of board-whacking.

Scully took up his paper and for a long time remained immersed in matters which were extraordinarily remote from him. The lamp burned badly, and once he stopped to adjust the wick. The newspaper, as he turned from page to page, rustled with a slow and comfortable sound. Then suddenly he heard three terrible words: "You are cheatin'!"

Such scenes often prove that there can be little of dramatic import in environment. Any room can present a tragic front; any room can be comic. This little den was now hideous as a torture-chamber. The new faces of the men themselves had changed it upon the instant. The Swede held a huge fist in front of Johnnie's face, while the latter looked steadily over it into the blazing orbs of his accuser. The Easterner had grown pallid; the cowboy's jaw had dropped in that expression of bovine amazement which was one of his important mannerisms. After the three words, the first sound in the room was made by Scully's paper as it floated forgotten to his feet. His spectacles had also fallen from his nose, but by a clutch he had saved them in air. His hand, grasping the spectacles, now remained poised awkwardly and near his shoulder. He stared at the card-players.

Probably the silence was while a second elapsed. Then, if the floor had been suddenly twitched out from under the men they could not have moved quicker. The five had projected themselves headlong toward a common point. It happened that Johnnie, in rising to hurl himself upon the Swede, had stumbled slightly because of his curiously instinctive care for the cards and the board. The loss of the moment allowed time for the arrival of Scully, and also allowed the cowboy time to give the Swede a great push which sent him staggering back. The men found tongue together, and hoarse shouts of rage, appeal, or fear burst from every throat. The cowboy pushed and jostled feverishly at the Swede, and the Easterner and Scully clung wildly to Johnnie; but through the smoky air, above the swaying bodies of the peace-compellers, the eyes of the two warriors ever sought each other in glances of challenge that were at once hot and steely.

Of course the board had been overturned, and now the whole company of cards was scattered over the floor, where the boots of the men trampled the fat and painted kings and queens as they gazed with their silly eyes at the war that was waging above them.

Scully's voice was dominating the yells. "Stop now! Stop, I say! Stop, now—"

Johnnie, as he struggled to burst through the rank formed by Scully and the Easterner, was crying, "Well, he says I cheated! He says I cheated! I won't allow no man to say I cheated! If he says I cheated, he's a———!"

The cowboy was telling the Swede, "Quit, now! Quit, d'ye hear—"

The screams of the Swede never ceased: "He did cheat! I saw him! I saw him—"

As for the Easterner, he was importuning in a voice that was not heeded: "Wait a moment, can't you? Oh, wait a moment. What's the good of a fight over a game of cards! Wait a moment—"

In this tumult no complete sentences were clear. "Cheat"—"Quit"—"He says"—these fragments pierced the uproar and rang out sharply. It was remarkable that, whereas Scully undoubtedly made the most noise, he was the least heard of any of the riotous band.

Then suddenly there was a great cessation. It was as if each man had paused for breath; and although the room was still lighted with the anger of men, it could be seen that there was no danger of immediate conflict, and at once Johnnie, shouldering his way forward, almost succeeded in confronting the Swede. "What did you say I cheated for? What did you say I cheated for? I don't cheat, and I won't let no man say I do!"

The Swede said, "I saw you! I saw you!"

"Well," cried Johnnie, "I'll fight any man what says I cheat!"

"No, you won't," said the cowboy. "Not here."

"Ah, be still, can't you?" said Scully, coming between them.

The quiet was sufficient to allow the Easterner's voice to be heard. He was repeating, "Oh, wait a moment, can't you? What's the good of a fight over a game of cards? Wait a moment!"

Johnnie, his red face appearing above his father's shoulder, hailed the Swede again. "Did you say I cheated?"

The Swede showed his teeth. "Yes."

"Then," said Johnnie, "we must fight."

"Yes, fight," roared the Swede. He was like a demoniac. "Yes, fight! I'll show you what kind of a man I am! I'll show you who you want to fight! Maybe you think I can't fight! Maybe you think I can't! I'll show you, you skin, you card-sharp! Yes, you cheated! You cheated! You cheated!"

"Well, let's go at it, then, mister," said 10 Johnnie, coolly.

The cowboy's brow was beaded with sweat from his efforts in intercepting all sorts of raids. He turned in despair to Scully. "What are you goin' to do now?"

A change had come over the Celtic visage of the old man. He now seemed all eagerness; his eyes glowed.

"We'll let them fight," he answered, stalwartly. "I can't put up with it any longer. I've 20 stood this damned Swede till I'm sick. We'll let them fight."

VI

The men prepared to go out of doors. The Easterner was so nervous that he had great difficulty in getting his arms into the sleeves of his new leather coat. As the cowboy drew his fur cap down over his ears his hands trembled. In fact, Johnnie and old Scully were the only 30 ones who displayed no agitation. These preliminaries were conducted without words.

Scully threw open the door. "Well, come on," he said. Instantly a terrific wind caused the flame of the lamp to struggle at its wick, while a puff of black smoke sprang from the chimney-top. The stove was in mid-current of the blast, and its voice swelled to equal the roar of the storm. Some of the scarred and be- 40 dabbled cards were caught up from the floor and dashed helplessly against the farther wall. The men lowered their heads and plunged into the tempest as into a sea.

No snow was falling, but great whirls and clouds of flakes, swept up from the ground by the frantic winds, were streaming southward with the speed of bullets. The covered land was blue with the sheen of an unearthly satin, and there was no other hue save where, at the low, black railway station—which seemed in- 50 credibly distant—one light gleamed like a tiny jewel. As the men floundered into a thigh-deep drift, it was known that the Swede was bawling out something. Scully went to him, put a hand on his shoulder, and projected an ear. "What's that you say!" he shouted.

"I say," bawled the Swede again, "I won't stand much show against this gang. I know you'll all pitch on me."

Scully smote him reproachfully on the arm. "Tut, man!" he yelled. The wind tore the words from Scully's lips and scattered them far alee.

"You are all a gang of——" boomed the Swede, but the storm also seized the remainder of this sentence.

Immediately turning their backs upon the wind, the men had swung around a corner to the sheltered side of the hotel. It was the function of the little house to preserve here, amid this great devastation of snow, an irregular V-shape of heavily encrusted grass, which crackled beneath the feet. One could imagine the great drifts piled against the windward side. When the party reached the comparative peace of this spot, it was found that the Swede was still bellowing.

"Oh, I know what kind of a thing this is! I know you'll all pitch on me. I can't lick you all!"

Scully turned upon him panther-fashion. "You'll not have to whip all of us. You'll have to whip my son Johnnie. An' the man what troubles you durin' that time will have me to dale with."

The arrangements were swiftly made. The two men faced each other, obedient to the harsh commands of Scully, whose face, in the subtly luminous gloom, could be seen set in the austere impersonal lines that are pictured on the countenances of the Roman veterans. The Easterner's teeth were chattering, and he was hopping up and down like a mechanical toy. The cowboy stood rocklike.

The contestants had not stripped off any clothing. Each was in his ordinary attire. Their fists were up, and they eyed each other in a calm that had the elements of leonine cruelty in it.

During this pause, the Easterner's mind, like a film, took lasting impressions of three 50 men—the iron-nerved master of the ceremony;

the Swede, pale, motionless, terrible; and Johnnie, serene yet ferocious, brutish yet heroic. The entire prelude had in it a tragedy greater than the tragedy of action, and this aspect was accentuated by the long, mellow cry of the blizzard, as it sped the tumbling and wailing flakes into the black abyss of the south.

"Now!" said Scully.

The two combatants leaped forward and crashed together like bullocks. There was heard the cushioned sound of blows, and of a curse squeezing out from between the tight teeth of one.

As for the spectators, the Easterner's pent-up breath exploded from him with a pop of relief, absolute relief from the tension of the preliminaries. The cowboy bounded into the air with a yowl. Scully was immovable as from supreme amazement and fear at the fury of the fight which he himself had permitted and arranged.

For a time the encounter in the darkness was such a perplexity of flying arms that it presented no more detail than would a swiftly revolving wheel. Occasionally a face, as if illuminated by a flash of light, would shine out, ghastly and marked with pink spots. A moment later, the men might have been known as shadows, if it were not for the involuntary utterance of oaths that came from them in whispers.

Suddenly a holocaust of warlike desire caught the cowboy, and he bolted forward with the speed of a broncho. "Go it, Johnnie! go it! Kill him! Kill him!"

Scully confronted him. "Kape back," he said; and by his glance the cowboy could tell that this man was Johnnie's father.

To the Easterner there was a monotony of unchangeable fighting that was an abomination. This confused mingling was eternal to his sense, which was concentrated in a longing for the end, the priceless end. Once the fighters lurched near him, and as he scrambled hastily backward he heard them breathe like men on the rack.

"Kill him, Johnnie! Kill him! Kill him! Kill him!" The cowboy's face was contorted like one of those agony masks in museums.

"Keep still," said Scully, icily.

Then there was a sudden loud grunt, incomplete, cut short, and Johnnie's body swung away from the Swede and fell with sickening heaviness to the grass. The cowboy was barely in time to prevent the mad Swede from flinging himself upon his prone adversary. "No, you don't," said the cowboy, interposing an arm. "Wait a second."

Scully was at his son's side. "Johnnie! Johnnie, me boy!" His voice had a quality of melancholy tenderness. "Johnnie! Can you go on with it?" He looked anxiously down into the bloody, pulpy face of his son.

There was a moment of silence, and then Johnnie answered in his ordinary voice, "Yes, I—it—yes."

Assisted by his father he struggled to his feet. "Wait a bit now till you git your wind," said the old man.

A few paces away the cowboy was lecturing the Swede. "No, you don't! Wait a second!"

The Easterner was plucking at Scully's sleeve. "Oh, this is enough," he pleaded. "This is enough! Let it go as it stands. This is enough!"

"Bill," said Scully, "git out of the road." The cowboy stepped aside. "Now." The combatants were actuated by a new caution as they advanced toward collision. They glared at each other, and then the Swede aimed a lightning blow that carried with it his entire weight. Johnnie was evidently half stupid from weakness, but he miraculously dodged, and his fist sent the overbalanced Swede sprawling.

The cowboy, Scully, and the Easterner burst into a cheer that was like a chorus of triumphant soldiery, but before its conclusion the Swede had scuffled agilely to his feet and come in berserk abandon at his foe. There was another perplexity of flying arms, and Johnnie's body again swung away and fell, even as a bundle might fall from a roof. The Swede instantly staggered to a little wind-waved tree and leaned upon it, breathing like an engine, while his savage and flame-lit eyes roamed from face to face as the men bent over Johnnie. There was a splendour of isolation in his situation at this time which the Easterner felt once when, lifting his eyes from the man on the ground, he beheld that mysterious and lonely figure, waiting.

"Are you any good yet Johnnie?" asked Scully in a broken voice.

The son gasped and opened his eyes languidly. After a moment he answered, "No—I ain't—any good—any—more." Then, from shame and bodily ill, he began to weep, the tears furrowing down through the blood-stains on his face. "He was too—too—too heavy for me."

Scully straightened and addressed the waiting figure. "Stranger," he said, evenly, "it's all up with our side." Then his voice changed into that vibrant huskiness which is commonly the tone of the most simple and deadly announcements. "Johnnie is whipped."

Without replying, the victor moved off on the route to the front door of the hotel.

The cowboy was formulating new and unspellable blasphemies. The Easterner was startled to find that they were out in a wind that seemed to come direct from the shadowed arctic floes. He heard again the wail of the snow as it was flung to its grave in the south. He knew now that all this time the cold had been sinking into him deeper and deeper, and he wondered that he had not perished. He felt indifferent to the condition of the vanquished man.

"Johnnie, can you walk?" asked Scully.

"Did I hurt—hurt him any?" asked the son.

"Can you walk, boy? Can you walk?"

Johnnie's voice was suddenly strong. There was a robust impatience in it. "I asked you whether I hurt him any!"

"Yes, yes, Johnnie," answered the cowboy, consolingly; "he's hurt a good deal."

They raised him from the ground, and as soon as he was on his feet he went tottering off, rebuffing all attempts at assistance. When the party rounded the corner they were fairly blinded by the pelting of the snow. It burned their faces like fire. The cowboy carried Johnnie through the drift to the door. As they entered, some cards again rose from the floor and beat against the wall.

The Easterner rushed to the stove. He was so profoundly chilled that he almost dared to embrace the glowing iron. The Swede was not in the room. Johnnie sank into a chair and, folding his arms on his knees, buried his face in them. Scully, warming one foot and then the other at a rim of the stove, muttered to himself with Celtic mournfulness. The cowboy had removed his fur cap, and with a dazed and rueful air he was running one hand through his tousled locks. From overhead they could hear the creaking of boards, as the Swede tramped here and there in his room.

The sad quiet was broken by the sudden flinging open of a door that led toward the kitchen. It was instantly followed by an inrush of women. They precipitated themselves upon Johnnie amid a chorus of lamentation. Before they carried their prey off to the kitchen, there to be bathed and harangued with that mixture of sympathy and abuse which is a feat of their sex, the mother straightened herself and fixed old Scully with an eye of stern reproach. "Shame be upon you, Patrick Scully!" she cried. "Your own son, too. Shame be upon you!"

"Shame be upon you, Patrick Scully!" The girls, rallying to this slogan, sniffed disdainfully in the direction of those trembling accomplices, the cowboy and the Easterner. Presently they bore Johnnie away, and left the three men to dismal reflection.

VII

"I'd like to fight this here Dutchman myself," said the cowboy, breaking a long silence.

Scully wagged his head sadly. "No, that wouldn't do. It wouldn't be right. It wouldn't be right."

"Well, why wouldn't it?" argued the cowboy. "I don't see no harm in it."

"No," answered Scully, with mournful heroism. "It wouldn't be right. It was Johnnie's fight, and now we mustn't whip the man just because he whipped Johnnie."

"Yes, that's true enough," said the cowboy; "but—he better not get fresh with me, because I couldn't stand no more of it."

"You'll not say a word to him," commanded Scully, and even then they heard the tread of the Swede on the stairs. His entrance was made theatric. He swept the door back with a bang and swaggered to the middle of the room. No one looked at him. "Well," he cried, insolently, at Scully, "I s'pose you'll tell me now how much I owe you?"

The old man remained stolid. "You don't owe me nothin'."

"Huh!" said the Swede, "huh! Don't owe 'im nothin'."

The cowboy addressed the Swede. "Stranger, I don't see how you come to be so gay around here."

Old Scully was instantly alert. "Stop!" he shouted, holding his hand forth, fingers upward. "Bill, you shut up!"

The cowboy spat carelessly into the saw-dust-box. "I didn't say a word, did I?" he asked.

"Mr. Scully," called the Swede, "how much do I owe you?" It was seen that he was attired for departure, and that he had his valise in his hand.

"You don't owe me nothin'," repeated Scully in the same imperturbable way.

"Huh!" said the Swede. "I guess you're right. I guess if it was any way at all, you'd owe me somethin'. That's what I guess." He turned to the cowboy. "Kill him! Kill him! Kill him!" he mimicked, and then guffawed victoriously. "Kill him!" He was convulsed with ironical humour.

But he might have been jeering the dead. The three men were immovable and silent, staring with glassy eyes at the stove.

The Swede opened the door and passed into the storm, giving one derisive glance backward at the still group.

As soon as the door was closed, Scully and the cowboy leaped to their feet and began to curse. They trampled to and fro, waving their arms and smashing into the air with their fists. "Oh, but that was a hard minute!" wailed Scully. "That was a hard minute! Him there leerin' and scoffin'! One bang at his nose was worth forty dollars to me that minute! How did you stand it, Bill?"

"How did I stand it?" cried the cowboy in a quivering voice. "How did I stand it? Oh!"

The old man burst into sudden brogue. "I'd loike to take that Swade," he wailed, "and hould 'im down on a shtone flure and bate 'im to a jelly wid a shtick!"

The cowboy groaned in sympathy. "I'd like to git him by the neck and ha-ammer him"—he brought his hand down on a chair with a noise like a pistol-shot—"hammer that there Dutchman until he couldn't tell himself from a dead coyote!"

"I'd bate 'im until he—"

"I'd show him some things—"

And then together they raised a yearning, fanatic cry—"Oh-o-oh! if we only could—"

"Yes!"

"Yes!"

"And then I'd—"

"O-o-oh!"

VIII

The Swede, tightly gripping his valise, tacked across the face of the storm as if he carried sails. He was following a line of little naked, gasping trees which, he knew, must mark the way of the road. His face, fresh from the pounding of Johnnie's fists, felt more pleasure than pain in the wind and the driving snow. A number of square shapes loomed upon him finally, and he knew them as the houses of the main body of the town. He found a street and made travel along it, leaning heavily upon the wind whenever, at a corner, a terrific blast caught him.

He might have been in a deserted village. We picture the world as thick with conquering and elate humanity, but here, with the bugles of the tempest pealing, it was hard to imagine a peopled earth. One viewed the existence of man then as a marvel, and conceded a glamour of wonder to these lice which were caused to cling to a whirling, fire-smitten, ice-locked, disease-stricken, space-lost bulb. The conceit of man was explained by this storm to be the very engine of life. One was a coxcomb not to die in it. However, the Swede found a saloon.

In front of it an indomitable red light was burning, and the snowflakes were made blood-colour as they flew through the circumscribed territory of the lamp's shining. The Swede pushed open the door of the saloon and entered. A sanded expanse was before him, and at the end of it four men sat about a table drinking. Down one side of the room extended a radiant bar, and its guardian was leaning upon his elbows listening to the talk of the men at the table. The Swede dropped his valise upon the floor and, smiling fraternally upon the bar-keeper, said, "Gimmee some whisky, will you?" The man placed a bottle, a whisky-glass, and a glass of ice-thick water upon the bar. The Swede poured himself an abnormal portion of whisky and drank it in three gulps. "Pretty bad night," remarked the bartender, indifferently. He was making the pretension of blindness which is usually a distinction of his class; but it could have been seen that he was furtively studying the half-erased blood-stains on the face of the Swede. "Bad night," he said again.

"Oh, it's good enough for me," replied the Swede, hardily, as he poured himself some more whisky. The barkeeper took his coin and maneuvered it through its reception by the highly nicked cash-machine. A bell rang; a card labeled "20 cts." had appeared.

"No," continued the Swede, "this isn't too bad weather. It's good enough for me."

"So?" murmured the barkeeper, languidly.

The copious drams made the Swede's eyes swim, and he breathed a trifle heavier. "Yes, I like this weather. I like it. It suits me." It was apparently his design to impart a deep significance to these words.

"So?" murmured the bartender again. He turned to gaze dreamily at the scroll-like birds and bird-like scrolls which had been drawn with soap upon the mirrors in back of the bar.

"Well, I guess I'll take another drink," said the Swede, presently. "Have something?"

"No, thanks; I'm not drinkin'," answered the bartender. Afterward he asked, "How did you hurt your face?"

The Swede immediately began to boast loudly. "Why, in a fight. I thumped the soul out of a man down here at Scully's hotel."

The interest of the four men at the table was at last aroused.

"Who was it?" said one.

"Johnnie Scully," blustered the Swede. "Son of the man what runs it. He will be pretty near dead for some weeks, I can tell you. I made a nice thing of him, I did. He couldn't get up. They carried him in the house. Have a drink?"

Instantly the men in some subtle way encased themselves in reserve. "No, thanks," said one. The group was of curious formation. Two were prominent local business men; one was the district attorney; and one was a professional gambler of the kind known as "square." But a scrutiny of the group would not have enabled an observer to pick the gambler from the men of more reputable pursuits.

He was, in fact, a man so delicate in manner, when among people of fair class, and so judicious in his choice of victims, that in the strictly masculine part of the town's life he had come to be explicitly trusted and admired. People called him a thoroughbred. The fear and contempt with which his craft was regarded were undoubtedly the reason why his quiet dignity shone conspicuous above the quiet dignity of men who might be merely hatters, billiard-markers, or grocery clerks. Beyond an occasional unwary traveler who came by rail, this gambler was supposed to prey solely upon reckless and senile farmers, who, when flush with good crops, drove into town in all the pride and confidence of an absolutely invulnerable stupidity. Hearing at times in circuitous fashion of the despoilment of such a farmer, the important men of Romper invariably laughed in contempt of the victim, and if they thought of the wolf at all, it was with a kind of pride at the knowledge that he would never dare think of attacking their wisdom and courage. Besides, it was popular that this gambler had a real wife and two real children in a neat cottage in a suburb, where he led an exemplary home life; and when anyone even suggested a discrepancy in his character, the crowd immediately vociferated descriptions of this virtuous family circle. Then men who led exemplary home lives, and men who did not lead exemplary home lives, all subsided in a bunch, remarking that there was nothing more to be said.

However, when a restriction was placed upon him—as, for instance, when a strong clique of members of the new Pollywog Club refused to permit him, even as a spectator, to appear in the rooms of the organization—the candor and gentleness with which he accepted the judgment disarmed many of his foes and made his friends more desperately partisan. He invariably distinguished between himself and a respectable Romper man so quickly and frankly that his manner actually appeared to be a continual broadcast compliment.

And one must not forget to declare the fundamental fact of his entire position in Romper. It is irrefutable that in all affairs outside his business, in all matters that occur eternally and commonly between man and man, this thieving card-player was so generous, so just, so moral, that, in a contest, he could have put to flight the consciences of nine tenths of the citizens of Romper.

And so it happened that he was seated in this saloon with the two prominent local merchants and the district attorney.

The Swede continued to drink raw whiskey, meanwhile babbling at the barkeeper and trying to induce him to indulge in potatoes. 10 "Come on. Have a drink. Come on. What—no? Well, have a little one, then. By gawd, I've whipped a man to-night, and I want to celebrate. I whipped him good, too. Gentlemen," the Swede cried to the men at the table, "have a drink?"

"Ssh!" said the barkeeper.

The group at the table, although furtively attentive, had been pretending to be deep in talk, but now a man lifted his eyes toward the Swede and said, shortly, "Thanks. We don't want any more." 20

At this reply the Swede ruffled out his chest like a rooster. "Well," he exploded, "it seems I can't get anybody to drink with me in this town. Seems so, don't it? Well!"

"Ssh!" said the barkeeper.

"Say," snarled the Swede, "don't you try to shut me up. I won't have it. I'm a gentleman, and I want people to drink with me. And I want 'em to drink with me now. Now—do you understand?" He rapped the bar with his knuckles. 30

Years of experience had calloused the bartender. He merely grew sulky. "I hear you," he answered.

"Well," cried the Swede, "listen hard then. See those men over there? Well, they're going to drink with me, and don't you forget it. Now you watch." 40

"Hi!" yelled the barkeeper, "this won't do!"

"Why won't it?" demanded the Swede. He stalked over to the table, and by chance laid his hand upon the shoulder of the gambler. "How about this?" he asked wrathfully. "I asked you to drink with me."

The gambler simply twisted his head and spoke over his shoulder. "My friend, I don't know you."

"Oh, hell!" answered the Swede, "come 50 and have a drink."

"Now, my boy," advised the gambler, kindly, "take your hand off my shoulder and go 'way and mind your own business." He was a little, slim man, and it seemed strange to hear him use this tone of heroic patronage to the burly Swede. The other men at the table said nothing.

"What! You won't drink with me, you little dude? I'll make you, then! I'll make you!" The Swede had grasped the gambler frenziedly at the throat, and was dragging him from his chair. The other men sprang up. The barkeeper dashed around the corner of his bar. There was a great tumult, and then was seen a long blade in the hand of the gambler. It shot forward, and a human body, this citadel of virtue, wisdom, power, was pierced as easily as if it had been a melon. The Swede fell with a cry of supreme astonishment.

The prominent merchants and the district attorney must have at once tumbled out of the place backward. The bartender found himself hanging limply to the arm of a chair and gazing into the eyes of a murderer.

"Henry," said the latter, as he wiped his knife on one of the towels that hung beneath the bar rail, "you tell 'em where to find me. I'll be home, waiting for 'em." Then he vanished. A moment afterward the barkeeper was in the street dinning through the storm for help and, moreover, companionship.

The corpse of the Swede, alone in the saloon, had its eyes fixed upon a dreadful legend that dwelt atop of the cash-machine: "This registers the amount of your purchase."

IX

Months later, the cowboy was frying pork over the stove of a little ranch near the Dakota line, when there was a quick thud of hoofs outside, and presently the Easterner entered with the letters and the papers. 40

"Well," said the Easterner at once, "the chap that killed the Swede has got three years. Wasn't much, was it?"

"He has? Three years?" The cowboy poised his pan of pork, while he ruminated upon the news. "Three years. That ain't much."

"No. It was a light sentence," replied the Easterner as he unbuckled his spurs. "Seems there was a good deal of sympathy for him in Romper."

"If the bartender had been any good," observed the cowboy, thoughtfully, "he would have gone in and cracked that there Dutchman on the head with a bottle in the beginnin' of it and stopped all this here murderin'."

"Yes, a thousand things might have happened," said the Easterner, tartly.

The cowboy returned his pan of pork to the fire, but his philosophy continued. "It's funny, ain't it? If he hadn't said Johnnie was cheatin' he'd be alive this minute. He was an awful fool. Game played for fun, too. Not for money. I believe he was crazy."

"I feel sorry for that gambler," said the Easterner.

"Oh, so do I," said the cowboy. "He don't deserve none of it for killin' who he did."

"The Swede might not have been killed if everything had been square."

"Might not have been killed?" exclaimed the cowboy. "Everythin' square? Why, when he said that Johnnie was cheatin' and acted like such a jackass? And then in the saloon he fairly walked up to git hurt?" With these arguments the cowboy browbeat the Easterner and reduced him to rage.

"You're a fool!" cried the Easterner, viciously. "You're a bigger jackass than the Swede by a million majority. Now let me tell you one thing. Let me tell you something. Listen! Johnnie was cheating!"

"Johnnie," said the cowboy, blankly. There was a minute of silence, and then he said, robustly, "Why, no. The game was only for fun."

"Fun or not," said the Easterner, "Johnnie was cheating. I saw him. I know it. I saw him. And I refused to stand up and be a man. I let the Swede fight it out alone. And you—you were simply puffing around the place and wanting to fight. And then old Scully himself! We are all in it! This poor gambler isn't even a noun. He is kind of an adverb. Every sin is the result of a collaboration. We, five of us, have collaborated in the murder of this Swede. Usually there are from a dozen to forty women really involved in every murder, but in this case it seems to be only five men—you, I, Johnnie, old Scully; and that fool of an unfortunate gambler came merely as a culmination, the apex of a human movement, and gets all the punishment."

The cowboy, injured and rebellious, cried out blindly into this fog of mysterious theory: "Well, I didn't do anythin', did I?"

From THE BLACK RIDERS

One of the very earliest attempts at writing free verse. As pioneer work it showed the potential possibilities of this literary form which later writers realized more completely.

XXIV

I saw a man pursuing the horizon;
Round and round they sped.
I was disturbed at this;
I accosted the man.
"It is futile," I said,
"You can never—"

"You lie," he cried,
And ran on.

XXXVI

I met a seer.
He held in his hands
The book of wisdom.
"Sir," I addressed him,
"Let me read."
"Child—" he began.
"Sir," I said,
"Think not that I am a child,
For already I know much
Of that which you hold.
Ay, much."
He smiled.

Then he opened the book
And held it before me.—
Strange that I should have grown so suddenly blind.

From WAR IS KIND

I

Do not weep, maiden, for war is kind.
Because your lover threw wild hands toward the sky
And the affrighted steed ran on alone,
Do not weep.
War is kind.

Hoarse, booming drums of the regiment,
 Little souls who thirst for fight,
 These men were born to drill and die.
 The unexplained glory flies above them,
 Great is the battle-god, great, and his kingdom— 10
 A field where a thousand corpses lie.

Do not weep, babe, for war is kind.
 Because your father tumbled in the yellow trenches,
 Raged at his breast, gulped and died,
 Do not weep.
 War is kind.

Swift blazing flag of the regiment,
 Eagle with crest of red and gold,
 These men were born to drill and die.
 Point for them the virtue of slaughter, 20
 Make plain to them the excellence of killing
 And a field where a thousand corpses lie.

Mother whose heart hung humble as a button
 On the bright splendid shroud of your son,
 Do not weep.
 War is kind.

A newspaper is a collection of half-injustices
 Which, bawled by boys from mile to mile,
 Spreads its curious opinion
 To a million merciful and sneering men,
 While families cuddle the joys of the fireside
 When spurred by tale of dire lone agony.
 A newspaper is a court

Where every one is kindly and unfairly tried
 By a squalor of honest men.
 A newspaper is a market 10
 Where wisdom sells its freedom
 And melons are crowned by the crowd.
 A newspaper is a game
 Where his error scores the player victory
 While another's skill wins death.
 A newspaper is a symbol;
 It is feckless life's chronicle,
 A collection of loud tales
 Concentrating eternal stupidities,
 That in remote ages lived unaltered, 20
 Roaming through a fenceless world.

The wayfarer,
 Perceiving the pathway to truth,
 Was struck with astonishment.
 It was thickly grown with weeds.
 "Ha," he said,
 "I see that none has passed here
 In a long time."
 Later he saw that each weed
 Was a singular knife.
 "Well," he mumbled at last, 10
 "Doubtless there are other roads."

A man said to the universe:
 "Sir, I exist!"
 "However," replied the universe,
 "The fact has not created in me
 A sense of obligation."

1870 -- Frank Norris -- 1902

FRANK NORRIS was one of the leaders in the revolt against the literary fashions of his day. He was born in Chicago, studied art in Paris, and on his return entered the University of California. A year of graduate study at Harvard followed. He served as war correspondent during the Spanish-American War, and in South Africa at the time of the Jameson Raid. A severe attack of fever from which he never fully recovered undoubtedly hastened his premature death. With the exception of journalistic work in San Francisco and a period as a reader for a publishing company, Norris devoted his remaining years to his writing.

The plans he had laid were grandiose and epic in scope. There was to be an epic of wheat, a trilogy dealing with its raising, disposal, and distribution respectively. Only two of the three volumes, The Octopus (1901) and The Pit (1903), were written. Then there was to be a trilogy about the three days at Gettysburg. This, however, was never even begun.

Unlike Garland, Norris did not approach the problem of revolt through the "local" novel alone. In his The Responsibilities of the Novelist (1903), a collection of critical essays, the view is more comprehensive and cosmopolitan. The novelist is confronted with grave responsibilities, for of the three great "molders of public opinion and public morals," the pulpit, the press, and the novel, the novel, he insists, is by far the most powerful. "Every novel," according to his theory, "must do one of three things—it must (1) tell something, (2) show something, or (3) prove something." Obviously a given novel may do all three, and by that token would be superior to others. This also makes it clear that in his judgment any great novel is a purpose novel, that is, "it preaches by telling things and showing things"; in other words it must evaluate what is told and shown, therefore prove something. Yet Norris maintains that as soon as the writer becomes consciously aware of the purpose, the novel will fail, which is another way of saying that the artistic interest must be supreme, a modified version of Shakespeare's suggestion that we may "by indirections find directions out." He laid his plans on a big scale, including the representation of "a whole congeries of forces, social development, race impulses," which opened the way "not to the study of men but of man." He shared the aspirations of one of his characters in The Octopus, the poet Presley, who "strove for the diapason, the great song which should embrace in itself a whole epoch, a complete era, the voice of an entire people."

Norris preferred to think of himself as a naturalist, although like Garland he wrote at times in a romantic vein. McTeague (1899) and Vandover and the Brute (1914), which were begun while he was a student, although not published until later, were written when he was at the height of his rebellion against the literary insincerity of the time, and are outspokenly realistic. The novelettes, Moran of the Lady Letty (1898) and Blix (1899), are as frankly romantic, insofar, at any rate, as they are unusual, spectacular, and bizarre. The Octopus (1901) and The Pit (1903) were written under the spell of his critical theory. Although this forced him into his best artistic and creative behavior, there is question whether the process yielded what was hoped for. In The Octopus he wrote what Frederic Tabor Cooper called "an example of symbolism pushed to the extreme limit"; in The Pit the sociological interest and implications became so absorbing that they victimized Norris the novelist. It is easy to see that Norris was definitely opposed to the ruthlessness and brutality of the capitalistic order, as represented by the railroad, and that his sympathies went out to the "embattled farmers" in their struggle against this powerful force. His realistic novels McTeague and Vandover have been most influential and possess the most likely guarantee of permanence. The work as a whole leaves the impression of incompleteness, "a rugged torso of a broken statue."

Besides the novels mentioned above, Norris wrote Yvernelle (1892) and A Man's Woman (1900). His short stories are found in A Deal in Wheat (1903); The Third Circle (1909); Frank Norris of "The Wave": Stories and Sketches from the San Francisco Weekly, 1893-1897, foreword by C. G. Norris (1931). The Responsibilities of the Novelist (1903) is a collection of critical essays; see also W. E. ### From McTEAGUE

Although Norris also wrote romantic novels, McTeague and The Octopus are realistic in subject matter and treatment. The former is a novel of degeneracy in an adverse environment, the main elements in which are chance and economic pressure. The latter, on the other hand, is built on a larger scale and portrays the losing struggle of the California wheat growers against the economic and political tyranny of the railroads. Norris sought to tell the truth as he saw it with passionate zeal.

CHAPTER X

THAT summer passed, then the winter. The wet season began in the last days of September and continued all through October, November, and December. At long intervals would come a week of perfect days, the sky without a cloud, the air motionless, but touched with a certain nimbleness, a faint effervescence that was exhilarating. Then, without warning, during a night when a south wind blew, a gray scroll of cloud would unroll and hang high over the city, and the rain would come pattering down again, at first in scattered showers, then in an uninterrupted drizzle.

All day long Trina sat in the bay window of the sitting-room that commanded a view of a small section of Polk Street. As often as she raised her head she could see the big market, a confectionery store, a bell-hanger's shop, and farther on, above the roofs, the glass skylights and water tanks of the big public baths. In the nearer foreground ran the street itself; the cable cars trundled up and down, thumping heavily over the joints of the rails; market carts by the score came and went, driven at a great rate by preoccupied young men in their shirt sleeves, with pencils behind their ears, or by reckless boys in bloodstained butcher's aprons. Upon the sidewalks the little world of Polk Street swarmed and jostled through its daily round of life. On fine days the great ladies from the avenue, one block above, invaded the street, appearing before the butcher stalls, intent upon their day's marketing. On rainy days their servants—the Chinese cooks or the second girls—took their places. These servants gave themselves great airs, carrying their big cotton umbrellas as they had seen their mistresses carry their parasols, and haggling in supercilious fashion with the market men, their chins in the air.

The rain persisted. Everything in the range of Trina's vision, from the tarpaulins on the market-cart horses to the panes of glass in the roof of the public baths, looked glazed and varnished. The asphalt of the sidewalks shone like the surface of a patent leather boot; every hollow in the street held its little puddle, that winked like an eye each time a drop of rain struck into it.

Trina still continued to work for Uncle Oelbermann. In the mornings she busied herself about the kitchen, the bedroom, and the sitting-room; but in the afternoon, for two or three hours after lunch, she was occupied with the Noah's ark animals. She took her work to the bay window, spreading out a great square of canvas underneath her chair, to catch the chips and shavings, which she used afterwards for lighting fires. One after another she caught up the little blocks of straight-grained pine, the knife flashed between her fingers, the little figure grew rapidly under her touch, was finished and ready for painting in a wonderfully short time, and was tossed into the basket that stood at her elbow.

But very often during that rainy winter after her marriage Trina would pause in her work, her hands falling idly into her lap, her eyes—her narrow, pale blue eyes—growing wide and thoughtful as she gazed, unseeing, out into the rain-washed street.

She loved McTeague now with a blind unreasoning love that admitted of no doubt or hesitancy. Indeed, it seemed to her that it was only after her marriage with the dentist that she had really begun to love him. With the absolute final surrender of herself, the irrevocable, ultimate submission, had come an affection the like of which she had never dreamed in the old B Street days. But Trina loved her husband, not because she fancied she saw in him any of those noble and generous qualities that inspire affection. The dentist might or might not possess them, it was all one with Trina. She loved him because she had given herself to him freely, unreservedly; had merged her individuality into his; she was his, she belonged to him forever and forever. Nothing that he could do (so she told herself), nothing that she herself could do, could change her in this respect. McTeague might cease to love her, might leave her, might even die; it would be all the same, she was his.

But it had not been so at first. During those long, rainy days of the fall, days when Trina was left alone for hours, at that time when the excitement and novelty of the honeymoon were dying down, when of the new household was settling into its grooves, she passed through many an hour of misgiving, of doubt, and even of actual regret.

Never would she forget one Sunday afternoon in particular. She had been married but three weeks. After dinner she and little Miss Baker had gone for a bit of a walk to take advantage of an hour's sunshine and to look at some wonderful geraniums in a florist's window on Sutter Street. They had been caught in a shower, and on returning to the flat the little dressmaker had insisted on fetching Trina up to her tiny room and brewing her a cup of strong tea, "to take the chill off." The two women had chatted over their teacups the better part of the afternoon, then Trina had returned to her rooms. For nearly three hours McTeague had been out of her thoughts, and as she came through their little suite, singing softly to herself, she suddenly came upon him quite unexpectedly. Her husband was in the "Dental Parlors," lying back in his operating chair, fast asleep. The little stove was crammed with coke, the room was overheated, the air thick and foul with the odors of ether, of coke gas, of stale beer and cheap tobacco. The dentist sprawled his gigantic limbs over the worn velvet of the operating chair; his coat and vest and shoes were off, and huge feet, in their thick gray socks, dangled over the edge of the footrest; his pipe, fallen from his half-open mouth, had spilled the ashes into his lap; while on the floor, at his side, stood the half-empty pitcher of steam beer. His head had rolled limply upon one shoulder, his face was red with sleep, and from his open mouth came a terrific sound of snoring.

For a moment Trina stood looking at him as he lay thus, prone, inert, half-dressed, and stupefied with the heat of the room, the steam beer, and the fumes of the cheap tobacco. Then her little chin quivered and a sob rose to her throat; she fled from the "Parlors," locking herself in her bedroom, flung herself on the bed and burst into an agony of weeping. Ah, no, ah, no, she could not love him. It had all been a dreadful mistake, and now it was irrevocable; she was bound to this man for life. If it was as bad as this now, only three weeks after her marriage, how would it be in the years to come? Year after year, month after month, hour after hour, she was to see this same face, with its salient jaw, was to feel the touch of those enormous red hands, was to hear the heavy, elephantine tread of those huge feet—in thick gray socks. Year after year, day after day, there would be no change, and it would last all her life. Either it would be one long continued revulsion, or else—worse than all—she would come to be content with him, would come to be like him, would sink to the level of steam beer and cheap tobacco, and all her pretty ways, her clean, trim little habits, would be forgotten, since they would be thrown away upon her stupid, brutish husband. "Her husband!" That, was her husband in there—she could yet hear his snores—for life, for life. A great despair seized upon her. She buried her face in the pillow and thought of her mother with an infinite longing.

Aroused at length by the chittering of the canary, McTeague had awakened slowly. After a while he had taken down his concertina and played upon it the six very mournful airs that he knew.

Face downward upon the bed, Trina still wept. Throughout that little suite could be heard but two sounds, the lugubrious strains of the concertina and the noise of stifled weeping.

That her husband should be ignorant of her distress seemed to Trina an additional grievance. With perverse inconsistency she began to wish him to come to her, to comfort her.

He ought to know that she was in trouble, that she was lonely and unhappy.

"Oh, Mac," she called in a trembling voice. But the concertina still continued to wail and lament. Then Trina wished she were dead, and on the instant jumped up and ran into the "Dental Parlors," and threw herself into her husband's arms, crying: "Oh, Mac, dear, love me, love me big! I'm so unhappy."

"What—what—what—" the dentist exclaimed starting up bewildered, a little frightened.

"Nothing, nothing, only love me, love me always and always."

But this first crisis, this momentary revolt, as much a matter of high-strung feminine nerves as of anything else, passed, and in the end Trina's affection for her "old bear" grew in spite of herself. She began to love him more and more, not for what he was, but for what she had given up to him. Only once again did Trina undergo a reaction against her husband, and then it was but the matter of an instant, brought on, curiously enough, by the sight of a bit of egg on McTeague's heavy mustache one morning just after breakfast.

Then, too, the pair had learned to make concessions, little by little, and all unconsciously they adapted their modes of life to suit each other. Instead of sinking to McTeague's level as she had feared, Trina found that she could make McTeague rise to hers, and in this saw a solution of many a difficult and gloomy complication.

For one thing, the dentist began to dress a little better, Trina even succeeding in inducing him to wear a high silk hat and a frock coat on a Sunday. Next he relinquished his Sunday afternoon's nap and beer in favor of three or four hours spent in the park with her—the weather permitting. So that gradually Trina's misgivings ceased, or when they did assail her, she could at last meet them with a shrug of the shoulders, saying to herself meanwhile, "Well, it's done now and it can't be helped; one must make the best of it."

During the first months of their married life these nervous relapses of hers had alternated with brusque outbursts of affection when her only fear was that her husband's love did not equal her own. Without an instant's warning, she would clasp him about the neck, rubbing her cheek against his, murmuring:

"Dear old Mac, I love you so, I love you so. Oh, aren't we happy together, Mac, just us two and no one else? You love me as much as I love you, don't you, Mac? Oh, if you shouldn't—if you shouldn't."

But by the middle of the winter Trina's emotions, oscillating at first from one extreme to another, commenced to settle themselves to an equilibrium of calmness and placid quietude. Her household duties began more and more to absorb her attention, for she was an admirable housekeeper, keeping the little suite in marvellous good order and regulating the schedule of expenditure with an economy that often bordered on positive niggardliness. It was a passion with her to save money. In the bottom of her trunk, in the bedroom, she hid a brass match-safe that answered the purpose of a savings bank. Each time she added a quarter or a half dollar to the little store she laughed and sang with a veritable childish delight; whereas, if the butcher or milkman compelled her to pay an overcharge she was unhappy for the rest of the day. She did not save this money for any ulterior purpose, she hoarded instinctively, without knowing why, responding to the dentist's remonstrances with:

"Yes, yes, I know I'm a little miser, I know it."

Trina had always been an economical little body, but it was only since her great winning in the lottery that she had become especially penurious. No doubt, in her fear lest their great good luck should demoralize them and lead to habits of extravagance, she had recoiled too far in the other direction. Never, never, never should a penny of that miraculous fortune be spent; rather should it be added to. It was a nest egg, a monstrous, roc-like nest egg, not so large, however, but that it could be made larger. Already by the end of that winter Trina had begun to make up the deficit of two hundred dollars that she had been forced to expend on the preparations for her marriage.

McTeague, on his part, never asked himself now-a-days whether he loved Trina the wife as much as he had loved Trina the young girl. There had been a time when to kiss Trina, to take her in his arms, had thrilled him from head to heel with a happiness that was beyond words; even the smell of her wonderful odorous hair had sent a sensation of faintness all through him. That time was long past now. Those sudden outbursts of affection on the part of his little woman, outbursts that only increased in vehemence the longer they lived together, puzzled rather than pleased him. He had come to submit to them good-naturedly, answering her passionate inquiries with a "Sure, sure, Trina, sure I love you. What—what's the matter with you?"

From ESSAYS IN AUTHORSHIP

The Responsibilities of the Novelist

It is not here a question of the "unarrived," the "unpublished"; these are the care-free irresponsibilities whose hours are halcyon and whose endeavors have all the lure, all the recklessness of adventure. They are not recognized; they have made no standards for themselves, and if they play the saltimbanque and the charlatan nobody cares and nobody (except themselves) is affected.

But the writers in question are the successful ones who have made a public and to whom some ten, twenty or a hundred thousand people are pleased to listen. You may believe if you choose that the novelist, of all workers, is independent—that he can write what he pleases, and that certainly, certainly he should never "write down to his readers"—that he should never consult them at all.

On the contrary, I believe it can be proved that the successful novelist should be more than all others limited in the nature and character of his work, more than all others he should be careful of what he says; more than all others he should defer to his audience; more than all others—more even than the minister and the editor—he should feel "his public" and watch his every word, testing carefully his every utterance, weighing with the most relentless precision his every statement; in a word, possess a sense of his responsibilities.

For the novel is the great expression of modern life. Each form of art has had its turn at reflecting and expressing its contemporaneous thought. Time was when the world looked to the architects of the castles and great cathedrals to truly reflect and embody its ideals. And the architects—serious, earnest men—produced such “expressions of contemporaneous thought” as the Castle of Coucy and the Church of Notre Dame. Then with other times came other customs, and the painters had their day. The men of the Renaissance trusted Angelo and Da Vinci and Velasquez to speak for them, and trusted not in vain. Next came the age of drama. Shakespeare and Marlowe found the value of  $x$  for the life and the times in which they lived. Later on contemporary life had been so modified that neither painting, architecture nor drama was the best vehicle of expression, the day of the longer poems arrived, and Pope and Dryden spoke for their fellows.

Thus the sequence. Each age speaks with its own peculiar organ, and has left the Word for us moderns to read and understand. The Castle of Coucy and the Church of Notre Dame are the spoken words of the Middle Ages. The Renaissance speaks—and intelligibly—to us through the sibyls of the Sistine chapel and the Mona Lisa. “Macbeth” and “Tamerlane” résumé the whole spirit of the Elizabethan age, while the “Rape of the Lock” is a wireless message to us straight from the period of the Restoration.

Today is the day of the novel. In no other day and by no other vehicle is contemporaneous life so adequately expressed; and the critics of the twenty-second century, reviewing our times, striving to reconstruct our civilization, will look not to the painters, not to the architects nor dramatists, but to the novelists to find our idiosyncrasy.

I think this is true. I think if the matter could in any way be statisticized, the figures would bear out the assumption. There is no doubt the novel will in time “go out” of popular favor as irrevocably as the long poem has gone, and for the reason that it is no longer the right mode of expression.

It is interesting to speculate upon what will take its place. Certainly the coming civilization will revert to no former means of expressing its thought or its ideals. Possibly music will be the interpreter of the life of the twenty-first and twenty-second centuries. Possibly one may see a hint of this in the characterization of Wagner’s operas as the “Music of the Future.”

This, however, is parenthetical and beside the mark. Remains the fact that today is the day of the novel. By this one does not mean that the novel is merely popular. If the novel was not something more than a simple diversion, a means of whiling away a dull evening, a long railway journey, it would not, believe me, remain in favor another day.

If the novel, then, is popular, it is popular with a reason, a vital, inherent reason; that is to say, it is essential. Essential—to resume once more the proposition—because it expresses modern life better than architecture, better than painting, better than poetry, better than music. It is as necessary to the civilization of the twentieth century as the violin is necessary to Kubelik, as the piano is necessary to Paderewski, as the plane is necessary to the carpenter, the sledge to the blacksmith, the chisel to the mason. It is an instrument, a tool, a weapon, a vehicle. It is that thing which, in the hand of man, makes him civilized and no longer savage, because it gives him a power of durable, permanent expression. So much for the novel—the instrument.

Because it is so all-powerful today, the people turn to him who wield this instrument with every degree of confidence. They expect—and rightly—that results shall be commensurate with means. The unknown archer who grasps the bow of Ulysses may be expected by the multitude to send his shaft far and true. If he is not true nor strong he has no business with the bow. The people give heed to him only because he bears a great weapon. He himself knows before he shoots whether or no he is worthy.

It is all very well to jeer at the People and at the People’s misunderstanding of the arts, but the fact is indisputable that no art that is not in the end understood by the People can live or ever did live a single generation. In the larger view, in the last analysis, the People pronounce the final judgment. The People, despised of the artist, hooted, caricatured and vilified, are, after all, and in the main, the real seekers after Truth. Who is it, after all, whose interest is liveliest in any given work of art? It is not now a question of esthetic interest—that is, the artist’s, the amateur’s, the cognoscente’s.

It is a question of vital interest. Say what you will, Maggie Tulliver—for instance—is far more a living being for Mrs. Jones across the street than she is for your sensitive, fastidious, keenly critical artist, literateur, or critic. The People—Mrs. Jones and her neighbors—take the life history of these fictitious characters, these novels, to heart with a seriousness that the esthetic cult have no conception of. The cult consider them almost solely from their artistic sides. The People take them into their innermost lives. Nor do the People discriminate. Omnivorous readers as they are today, they make little distinction between Maggie Tulliver and the heroine of the last “popular novel.” They do not stop to separate true from false; they do not care.

How necessary it becomes, then, for those who, by the simple art of writing, can invade the heart’s heart of thousands, whose novels are received with such measureless earnestness—how necessary it becomes for those who wield such power to use it rightfully. Is it not expedient to act fairly? Is it not in Heaven’s name essential that the People hear, not a lie, but the Truth?

If the novel were not one of the most important factors of modern life; if it were not the completest expression of our civilization; if its influence were not greater than all the pulpits, than all the newspapers between the oceans, it would not be so important that its message should be true.

But the novelist today is the one who reaches the greatest audience. Right or wrong, the People turn to him the moment he speaks, and what he says they believe.

For the Million, Life is a contracted affair, is bounded by the walls of the narrow channel of affairs in which their feet are set. They have no horizon. They look today as they never have looked before, as they never will look again, to the writer of fiction to give them an idea of life beyond their limits, and they believe him as they never have believed before and never will again.

This being so, is it not difficult to understand how certain of these successful writers of fiction—these favored ones into whose hands the gods have placed the great bow of Ulysses—can look so frivolously upon their craft? It is not necessary to specify. One speaks of those whose public is measured by “one hundred and fifty thousand copies sold.” We know them, and because the gods have blessed us with wits beyond our deserving we know their work is false. But what of the “hundred and fifty thousand” who are not discerning and who receive this falseness as Truth, who believe this topsy-turvy picture of Life beyond their horizons is real and vital and sane?

There is no gauge to measure the extent of this malignant influence. Public opinion is made no one can say how, by infinitesimal accretions, by a multitude of minutest elements. Lying novels, surely, surely in this day and age of indiscriminate reading, contribute to this more than all other influences or present-day activity.

The Pulpit, the Press and the Novel—these indisputably are the great molders of public opinion and public morals today. But the Pulpit speaks but once a week; the Press is read with lightning haste and the morning news is waste-paper by noon. But the novel goes into the home to stay. It is read word for word; is talked about, discussed; its influence penetrates every clink and corner of the family.

Yet novelists are not found wanting who write for money. I do not think this is an unfounded accusation. I do not think it is asking too much of credulity. This would not matter if they wrote the Truth. But these gentlemen who are “in literature for their own pocket every time” have discovered that for the moment the People have confounded the Wrong with the Right, and prefer that which is a lie to that which is true. “Very well, then,” say these gentlemen. “If they want a lie they shall have it”; and they give the People a lie in return for royalties.

The surprising thing about this is that you and I and all the rest of us do not consider this as disreputable—do not yet realize that the novelist has responsibilities. We condemn an editor who sells his editorial columns, and we revile the pulpit attainted of venality. But the venal novelist—he whose influence is greater than either the Press or Pulpit—him we greet with a wink and the tongue in the cheek.

This should not be so. Somewhere the protest should be raised, and those of us who see the practice of this fraud should bring home to ourselves the realization that the selling of one hundred and fifty thousand books is a serious business. The People have a right to the Truth as they have a right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. It is not right that they be exploited and deceived with false views of life, false characters, false sentiment, false morality, false history, false philosophy, false emotions, false heroism, false notions of self-sacrifice, false views of religion, of duty, of conduct and of manners.

The man who can address an audience of one hundred and fifty thousand people who—unenlightened—believe what he says, has a heavy duty to perform, and tremendous responsibilities to shoulder; and he should address himself to his task not with the flippancy of a catchpenny juggler at the county fair, but with earnestness, with soberness, with a sense of his limitations, and with all the abiding sincerity that by the favor and mercy of the gods may be his.

1871 -- Theodore Dreiser -- 1945

DREISER was born in Terre Haute, Indiana, of German immigrant parents, the twelfth child in a family of thirteen. His father was given to an intense religiosity almost fanatical in its manifestations, against which the boy rebelled at an early age, and which by its negative influence colored his mature philosophy of life. His mother, on the other hand, was a somewhat dreamy and poetic soul, whose justness and sympathy endeared her to the son. Although the family had to contend with poverty, and unremitting toil and economy were necessary to keep the family larder supplied, young Dreiser made his way through the public schools of his native state, and into the local university, which he left, however, before taking a degree.

Dreiser's ambition led him in 1892 to Chicago, where he secured a position on the staff of the Chicago Globe. In search of advancement, he went to St. Louis, and for the next two years he was employed by the Globe-Democrat and the Republican. Dissatisfied with his prospects and encouraged by friends to seek the larger opportunities in the East, he went to New York, where for a number of years he edited several second-rate magazines and did special editorial work for Harper's, McClure's, Century, Cosmopolitan, and Munsey's. As editor in chief of all the Butterick publications, a position to which he was appointed in 1907, he achieved signal success both in increasing the subscription lists and in stimulating the intellectual interest of the readers. He retired from editorial work in 1910.

As early as 1900 he had brought out Sister Carrie, his first novel, enthusiastically received by Frank Norris, but viewed askance by the critics on account of its extreme frankness, and consequently withdrawn from circulation. The American attitude changed somewhat in the course of the decade, and Jennie Gerhardt (1911) was received with less antagonism. The Financier (1912) and The Titan (1914) deal with big business, while The "Genius" (1915) is concerned with the life of an artist, and is largely autobiographical. In 1925 he published An American Tragedy in which, against a meticulously drawn background, he portrays what he conceives to be the essentially tragic struggle of the inept and helpless. He also published several volumes of autobiography—A Traveller at Forty (1913), A Hoosier Holiday (1916), and A Book About Myself (1922)—as well as Plays of the Natural and Supernatural (1916), Free and Other Stories (1918), and Chains (1927), collections of "lesser novels and stories." His political views find expression in such books as Dreiser Looks at Russia (1928) and Tragic America (1932). His solution for the current social ills lies in a socialistic control of the economic system for the benefit of the people.

To understand Dreiser one must have some knowledge of his naturalistic philosophy, inspired, to be sure, by science. In this philosophy, described in Hey Rub-a-Dub-Dub (1920), change is the only changeless factor. Life has no significance beyond the limits of experience. Human destiny is determined by environment, a succession of physico-chemical reactions, beyond the control of the individual, and therefore no responsibility of his. Man is swept along by blind forces, apparently causeless, from which he can get no help unless by "accident or per adventure." To him life has neither meaning nor moral purpose; it is merely a "struggle for existence" in various forms, and divides humanity not into the good and the bad, but into the strong and the weak.

In the light of this outlook and philosophy, life becomes for the artist "a thing to be observed, studied, interpreted," "our one great realm of discovery," and art becomes a recording of the facts of life as discovered. Throughout his career Dreiser has manifested the reporter's intense curiosity and passion for fact, unflagging attention to detail—traits which explain at least partially the ponderous quality of the novels. Nothing is allowed to stand between the observing and recording artist and the procession of the changing facts of life; the artist must be free and unhampered in his endeavor "to observe, synchronize, and orientate human knowledge in the most comprehensive form." The novelist is therefore a glorified reporter. Dreiser holds out little hope for great art in America because of the prevailing puritanical attitude and tradesmen's atmosphere. Under these conditions there can be no original thinking, and consequently no leadership (cf. "Life, Art and America," in Hey Rub-a-Dub-Dub).

One of the most conspicuous facts of Dreiser's naturalism was that, partly because of ignorance and partly because of temperament, he was not entirely committed to it. His novels do more than report; they interpret, in extremely awkward parentheses, and offer a clumsy, romantic, and sentimental view of events. He is at his best when he reports, though even here he does not wish to, or does not know when to, stop. The most effective single demonstrations of this thoroughness are the description of Cowperwood's trial and imprisonment (The Financier) and the story of Hurstwood's decline and fall (Sister Carrie).

In the course of the controversies which have raged about Dreiser, he has been subject to savage attacks. His assumption that human conduct revolves rather closely around the focal center of sex and his utter frankness in portraying this conduct aroused violent reactions and opinions. Stuart Pratt Sherman attacked his "representations of animal behavior"; H. L. Mencken and Randolph Bourne rose vehemently to his defense. The controversies have died down, and Dreiser has achieved a definite place in contemporary letters, the acknowledged leader of the "naturalists" in fiction.

Because of the timeliness of his works, the war which raged about them, and the sheer impact of their weighty and bulky analyses of American life, Dreiser achieved a fame which a careful examination of his fiction can scarcely justify. He is one of those novelists in the realist-naturalist tradition who escaped aesthetic censure because of their social importance. The growth of intelligent and careful criticism in twentieth-century America has revised downward the estimate of Dreiser which H. L. Mencken offered to the public in the second and third decades.

Dreiser's novels are Sister Carrie (1900); Jennie Gerhardt (1911); The Financier (1912); The Titan (1914); The "Genius" (1915); An American Tragedy (1925); The Bulwark (1946); The Stoic (1947). The short stories are collected in Free (1918); Twelve Men (1919); Chains (1927); A Gallery of Women (2 vols., 1929); Selected Short Stories of Theodore Dreiser (1947). The following are books of travel, description, and social criticism: A Traveller at Forty (1913); A Hoosier Holiday (1916); The Color of a Great City (1923); Dreiser Looks at Russia (1928); Tragic America (1932). Moods, Cadenced and Declaimed (1926) and Moods, Philosophic and Emotional, Cadenced and Declaimed (1935) contain his poetry. Hey Rub-a-Dub-Dub (1920) is a volume of essays. In the field of the drama he has published Plays of the Natural and the Supernatural (1916); The Hand of the Potter (1918). A Book About Myself (1922 reissued as Newspaper Days, 1931) and Dawn (1931) are autobiographical. ## THE HAND

"The Hand" is an example of Dreiser's attempt to work in the form of the short story; it differs from much of his other fiction in being a consciously contrived study of a man's sense of guilt and fear.

I

DAVIDSON could distinctly remember that it was between two and three years after the grisly event in the Monte Orte range—the sickening and yet deserved end of Mersereau, his quondam partner and fellow adventurer—that anything to be identified with Mersereau's malice toward him, and with Mersereau's probable present existence in the spirit world, had appeared in his life.

He and Mersereau had worked long together as prospectors, investors, developers of property. It was only after they had struck it rich in the Klondike that Davidson had grown so much more apt and shrewd in all commercial and financial matters, whereas Mersereau had seemed to stand still—not to rise to the splendid opportunities which then opened to him. Why, in some of those later deals it had not been possible for Davidson even to introduce his old partner to some of the moneyed men he had to deal with. Yet Mersereau had insisted, as his right, if you please, on being "in on" everything—everything!

Take that wonderful Monte Orte property, the cause of all the subsequent horror. He, Davidson—not Mersereau—had discovered or heard of the mine, and had carried it along, with old Besmer as a tool or decoy—Besmer being the ostensible factor—until it was all ready for him to take over and sell or develop. Then it was that Mersereau, having been for so long his partner, demanded a full half—a third at least—on the ground that they had once agreed to work together in all these things.

Think of it! And Mersereau growing duller and less useful and more disagreeable day by day, and year by year! Indeed, toward the last he had threatened to expose the trick by which jointly, seven years before, they had possessed themselves of the Skyute Pass Mine; to drive Davidson out of public and financial life, to have him arrested and tried—along with himself, of course. Think of that!

But he had fixed him—yes, he had, damn him! He had trailed Mersereau that night to old Besmer's cabin on the Monte Orte, when Besmer was away. Mersereau had gone there with the intention of stealing the diagram of the new field, and had secured it, true enough. A thief he was, damn him. Yet, just as he was making safely away, as he thought, he, Davidson, had struck him cleanly over the ear with that heavy rail-bolt fastened to the end of a walnut stick, and the first blow had done for him.

Lord, how the bone above Mersereau's ear had sounded when it cracked! And how bloody one side of that bolt was! Mersereau hadn't had time to do anything before he was helpless. He hadn't died instantly, though, but had turned over and faced him, Davidson, with that savage, scowling face of his and those blazing, animal eyes.

Lying half propped up on his left elbow, Mersereau had reached out toward him with that big, rough, bony right hand of his—the right with which he always boasted of having done so much damage on this, that, and the other occasion—had glared at him as much as to say:

"Oh, if I could only reach you just for a moment before I go!"

Then it was that he, Davidson, had lifted the club again. Horrified as he was, and yet determined that he must save his own life, he had finished the task, dragging the body back to an old fissure behind the cabin and covering it with branches, a great pile of pine fronds, and as many as one hundred and fifty boulders, great and small, and had left his victim. It was a sickening job and a sickening sight, but it had to be.

Then, having finished, he had slipped dismally away, like a jackal, thinking of that hand in the moonlight, held up so savagely, and that look. Nothing might have come of that either, if he hadn't been inclined to brood on it so much, on the fierceness of it.

No, nothing had happened. A year had passed, and if anything had been going to turn up it surely would have by then. He, Davidson, had gone first to New York, later to Chicago, to dispose of the Monte Orte claim. Then, after two years, he had returned here to Mississippi, where he was enjoying comparative peace. He was looking after some sugar property which had once belonged to him, and which he was now able to reclaim and put in charge of his sister as a home against a rainy day. He had no other.

But that body back there! That hand up-lifted in the moonlight—to clutch him if it could! Those eyes.

II—JUNE, 1905

Take that first year, for instance, when he had returned to Gatchard in Mississippi, whence both he and Mersereau had originally issued. After looking after his own property he had gone out to a tumble-down estate of his uncle's in Issaquena County—a leaky old slope-roofed house where, in a bedroom on the top floor, he had had his first experience with the significance or reality of the hand.

Yes, that was where first he had really seen it pictured in that curious, unbelievable way; only who would believe that it was Mersereau's hand? They would say it was an accident, chance, rain dropping down. But the hand had appeared on the ceiling of that room just as sure as anything, after a heavy rainstorm—it was almost a cyclone—when every chink in the old roof had seemed to leak water.

During the night, after he had climbed to the room by way of those dismal stairs with their great landing and small glass oil-lamp he carried, and had sunk to rest, or tried to, in the heavy, wide, damp bed, thinking, as he always did those days, of the Monte Orte and Mersereau, the storm had come up. As he had listened to the wind moaning outside he had heard first the scratch, scratch, scratch, of some limb, no doubt, against the wall—sounding, or so it seemed in his feverish unrest, like some one penning an indictment against him with a worn, rusty pen.

And then, the storm growing worse, and in a fit of irritation and self-contempt at his own nervousness, he had gone to the window, but just as lightning struck a branch of the tree nearest the window and so very near him, too—as though some one, something, was seeking to strike him—(Mersereau?) and as though he had been lured by that scratching. God! He had retreated, feeling that it was meant for him.

But that big, knotted hand painted on the ceiling by the dripping water during the night! There it was, right over him when he awoke, outlined or painted as if with wet, gray white-wash against the wretched but normally pale-blue of the ceiling when dry. There it was—a big, open hand just like Mersereau's as he had held it up that night—huge, knotted, rough, the fingers extended as if tense and clutching. And, if you will believe it, near it was something that looked like a pen—an old, long-handled pen—to match that scratch, scratch, scratch!

"Huldah," he had inquired of the old black mammy who entered in the morning to bring him fresh water and throw open the shutters, "what does that look like to you up there—that patch on the ceiling where the rain came through?"

He wanted to reassure himself as to the character of the thing he saw—that it might not be a creation of his own feverish imagination, accentuated by the dismal character of this place.

"'Pears t' me mo' like a big han' 'an anythin' else, Marse Davi'son," commented Huldah, pausing and staring upward. "'Mo' like a big fist, kinda. Dat air's a new drop come las' night, I reckon. Dis here old place ain' gonna hang togethah much longah, less'n some repairin' be done mighty quick now. Yassir, dat air's a new drop, sho's yo' bo'n, en it come on'y las' night. I hain't never seed dat befo'."

And then he had inquired, thinking of the fierceness of the storm:

"Huldah, do you have many such storms up this way?"

"Good gracious, Marse Davi'son, we hain't seed no sech blow en—en come three years now. I hain't seed no sech lightnin' en I doan' know when."

Wasn't that strange, that it should all come on the night, of all nights, when he was there? 10 And no such other storm in three years!

Huldah stared idly, always ready to go slow and rest, if possible, whereas he had turned irritably. To be annoyed by ideas such as this! To always be thinking of that MonteOrte affair! Why couldn't he forget it? Wasn't it Mersereau's own fault? He never would have killed the man if he hadn't been forced to it.

And to be haunted in this way, making mountains out of mole-hills, as he thought 20 then! It must be his own miserable fancy—and yet Mersereau had looked so threateningly at him. That glance had boded something; it was too terrible not to.

Davidson might not want to think of it, but how could he stop? Mersereau might not be able to hurt him any more, at least not on this earth; but still, couldn't he? Didn't the appearance of this hand seem to indicate that he 30 might? He was dead, of course. His body, his skeleton, was under that pile of rocks and stones, some of them as big as washtubs. Why worry over that, and after two years? And still—

That hand on the ceiling!

III—DECEMBER, 1905

Then, again, take the matter of meeting Pringle in Gatchard just at that time, within the same week. It was due to Davidson's sister. 40 She had invited Mr. and Mrs. Pringle in to meet him one evening, without telling him that they were spiritualists and might discuss spiritualism.

Clairvoyance, Pringle called it, or seeing what can't be seen with material eyes, and clairaudience, or hearing what can't be heard with material ears, as well as materialization, or ghosts, and table-rapping, and the like. Table-rapping—that damned tap-tapping that 50 he had been hearing ever since!

It was Pringle's fault, really. Pringle had persisted in talking. He, Davidson, wouldn't have listened, except that he somehow became fascinated by what Pringle said concerning what he had heard and seen in his time. Mersereau must have been at the bottom of that, too.

At any rate, after he had listened, he was sorry, for Pringle had had time to fill his mind full of those awful facts or ideas which had since harassed him so much—all that stuff about drunkards, degenerates, and weak people generally being followed about by vile, evil spirits and used to effect those spirits' purposes or desires in this world. Horrible!

Wasn't it terrible? Pringle—big, mushy, creature that he was, sickly and stagnant like a springless pool—insisted that he had even seen clouds of these spirits about drunkards, degenerates, and the like, in street-cars, on trains, and about vile corners at night. Once, he said, he had seen just one evil spirit—think of that!—following a certain man all the time, at his left elbow—a dark, evil, red-eyed thing, until finally the man had been killed in a quarrel.

Pringle described their shapes, these spirits, as varied. They were small, dark, irregular clouds, with red or green spots somewhere for eyes, changing in form and becoming longish or round like a jellyfish, or even like a misshapen cat or dog. They could take any form at will—even that of a man.

Once, Pringle declared, he had seen as many as fifty about a drunkard who was staggering down a street, all of them trying to urge him into the nearest saloon, so that they might re-experience in some vague way the sensation of drunkenness, which at some time or other they themselves, having been drunkards in life, had enjoyed!

It would be the same with a drug fiend, or indeed with any one of weak or evil habits. They gathered about such an one like flies, their red or green eyes glowing—attempting to get something from them perhaps, if nothing more than a little sense of their old earth-life.

The whole thing was so terrible and disturbing at the time, particularly that idea of men being persuaded or influenced to murder, that he, Davidson, could stand it no longer, and got up and left. But in his room upstairs he meditated on it, standing before his mirror. Suddenly—would he ever forget it—as he was taking off his collar and tie, he had heard that queer tap, tap, tap, right on his dressing table or under it, and for the first time, which Pringle said, ghosts made when table-rapping in answer to a call, or to give warning of their presence.

Then something said to him, almost as clearly as if he heard it:

"This is me, Mersereau, come back at last to get you! Pringle was just an excuse of mine to let you know I was coming, and so was that hand in that old house, in Issaquena County. It was mine! I will be with you from now on. Don't think I will ever leave you!"

It had frightened and made him half sick, so wrought up was he. For the first time he felt cold chills run up and down his spine—the creeps. He felt as if some one were standing over him—Mersereau, of course—only he could not see or hear a thing, just that faint tap at first, growing louder a little later, and quite angry when he tried to ignore it.

People did live, then, after they were dead, especially evil people—people stronger than you, perhaps. They had the power to come back, to haunt, to annoy you if they didn't like anything you had done to them. No doubt Mersereau was following him in the hope of revenge, there in the spirit world, just outside this one, close at his heels, like that evil spirit attending the other man whom Pringle had described.

IV—FEBRUARY, 1906

Take that case of the hand impressed on the soft dough and plaster of Paris, described in an article that he had picked up in the dentist's office out there in Pasadena—Mersereau's very hand, so far as he could judge. How about that for a coincidence, picking up the magazine with that disturbing article about psychic materialization in Italy, and later in Berne, Switzerland, where the scientists were gathered to investigate that sort of thing? And just when he was trying to rid himself finally of the notion that any such thing could be!

According to that magazine article, some old crone over in Italy—spiritualist, or witch or something—had got together a crowd of experimentalists or professors in an abandoned house on an almost deserted island off the coast of Sardinia. There they had conducted experiments with spirits, which they called materialization, getting the impression of the fingers of a hand, or of a whole hand and arm, or of a face, on a plate of glass covered with soot, the plate being locked in a small safe on the center of a table about which they sat!

10 He, Davidson, couldn't understand, of course, how it was done, but done it was. There in that magazine were half a dozen pictures, reproductions of photographs of a hand, an arm and a face—or a part of one, anyhow. And if they looked like anything, they looked exactly like Mersereau's! Hadn't Pringle, there in Gatchard, Miss., stated spirits could move anywhere, over long distances, with the speed of light. And would it be any trick for Mersereau to appear there at Sardinia, and then engineer this magazine into his presence, here in Los Angeles? Would it? It would not. Spirits were free and powerful over there, perhaps.

There was not the least doubt that these hands, these partial impressions of a face, were those of Mersereau. Those big knuckles! That long, heavy, humped nose and big jaw! Whose else could they be?—they were Mersereau's, intended, when they were made over there in Italy, for him, Davidson, to see later here in Los Angeles. Yes, they were! And looking at that sinister face reproduced in the magazine, it seemed to say, with Mersereau's old coarse sneer:

"You see? You can't escape me! I'm showing you how much alive I am over here, just as I was on earth. And I'll get you yet, even if I have to go farther than Italy to do it!"

It was amazing, the shock he took from that. It wasn't just that alone, but the persistence and repetition of this hand business. What could it mean? Was it really Mersereau's hand? As for the face, it wasn't all there—just the jaw, mouth, cheek, left temple, and a part of the nose and eye; but it was Mersereau's, all right. He had gone clear over there into Italy somewhere, in a lone house on an island, to get this message of his undying hate back to him. Or was it just spirits, evil spirits, bent on annoying him because he was nervous and sensitive now?

V—OCTOBER, 1906

Even new crowded hotels and new buildings weren't the protection he had at first hoped and thought they would be. Even there you weren't safe—not from a man like Mersereau. Take that incident there in Los Angeles, and again in Seattle, only two months ago now, when Mersereau was able to make that dreadful explosive or crashing sound, as if one had burst a huge paper bag full of air, or upset a china closet full of glass and broken everything, when as a matter of fact nothing at all had happened. It had frightened him horribly the first two or three times, believing as he did that something fearful had happened. Finding that it was nothing—or Mersereau—he was becoming used to it now; but other people, unfortunately, were not.

He would be—as he had been that first time—sitting in his room perfectly still and trying to amuse himself, or not to think, when suddenly there would be that awful crash. It was astounding! Other people heard it, of course. They had in Los Angeles. A maid and a porter had come running the first time to inquire, and he had had to protest that he had heard nothing. They couldn't believe it at first, and had gone to other rooms to look. When it happened the second time, the management had protested, thinking it was a joke he was playing; and to avoid the risk of exposure he had left.

After that he could not keep a valet or nurse about him for long. Servants wouldn't stay, and managers of hotels wouldn't let him remain when such things went on. Yet he couldn't live in a house or apartment alone, for there the noises and atmospheric conditions would be worse than ever.

VI—JUNE, 1907

Take that last old house he had been in—but never would be in again!—at Anne Haven. There he actually visualized the hand—a thing as big as a washtub at first, something like smoke or shadow in a black room moving about over the bed and everywhere. Then, as he lay there, gazing at it spellbound, it condensed slowly, and he began to feel it. It was now a hand of normal size—there was no doubt of it in the world—going over him softly, without force, as a ghostly hand must, having no real physical strength, but all the time with a strange, electric, secretive something about it, as if it were not quite sure of itself, and not quite sure that he was really there.

The hand, or so it seemed—God!—moved right up to his neck and began to feel over that as he lay there. Then it was that he guessed just what it was that Mersereau was after.

It was just like a hand, the fingers and thumb made into a circle and pressed down over his throat, only it moved over him gently at first, because it really couldn't do anything yet, not having the material strength. But the intention! The sense of cruel, savage determination that went with it!

And yet, if one went to a nerve specialist or doctor about all this, as he did afterward, what did the doctor say? He had tried to describe how he was breaking down under the strain, how he could not eat or sleep on account of all these constantappings and noises; but the moment he even began to hint at his experiences, especially the hand or the noises, the doctor exclaimed:

“Why, this is plain delusion! You're nervously run down, that's all that ails you—on the verge of pernicious anemia, I should say. You'll have to watch yourself as to this illusion about spirits. Get it out of your mind. There's nothing to it!”

Wasn't that just like one of these nerve specialists, bound up in their little ideas of what they knew or saw, or thought they saw?

VII—NOVEMBER, 1907

And now take this very latest development at Battle Creek recently where he had gone trying to recuperate on the diet there. Hadn't Mersereau, implacable demon that he was, developed this latest trick of making his food taste queer to him—unpalatable, or with an odd odor?

He, Davidson, knew it was Mersereau, for he felt him beside him at the table whenever he sat down. Besides, he seemed to hear something—clairaudience was what they called it, he understood—he was beginning to develop that, too, now! It was Mersereau, of course, saying in a voice which was more like a memory of a voice than anything real—the voice of some one you could remember as having spoken in a certain way, say, ten years or more ago:

"I've fixed it so you can't eat any more, you—"

There followed a long list of vile epithets, enough in itself to sicken one.

Thereafter, in spite of anything he could do to make himself think to the contrary, knowing that the food was all right, really, Davidson found it to have an odor or a taste which disgusted him, and which he could not overcome, try as he would. The management assured him that it was all right, as he knew it was—for others. He saw them eating it. But he couldn't—had to get up and leave, and the little he could get down he couldn't retain, or it wasn't enough for him to live on. God, he would die, this way! Starve, as he surely was doing by degrees now.

And Mersereau always seeming to be standing by. Why, if it weren't for fresh fruit on the stands at times, and just plain, fresh-baked bread in bakers' windows, which he could buy and eat quickly, he might not be able to live at all. It was getting to that pass!

VIII—AUGUST, 1908

That wasn't the worst, either, bad as all that was. The worst was the fact that under the strain of all this he was slowly but surely breaking down, and that in the end Mersereau might really succeed in driving him out of life here—to do what, if anything, to him there? What? It was such an evil pack by which he was surrounded, now, those who lived just on the other side and hung about the earth, vile, debauched creatures, as Pringle had described them, and as Davidson had come to know for himself, fearing them and their ways so much, and really seeing them at times.

Since he had come to be so weak and sensitive, he could see them for himself—vile things that they were, swimming before his gaze in the dark whenever he chanced to let himself be in the dark, which was not often—friends of Mersereau, no doubt, and inclined to help him just for the evil of it.

For this long time now Davidson had taken to sleeping with the light on, wherever he was, only tying a handkerchief over his eyes to keep out some of the glare. Even then he could see them—queer, misshapen things, for all the world like wavy, stringy jellyfish or coils of thick, yellowish-black smoke, moving about, changing in form at times, yet always looking dirty or vile, somehow, and with those queer, dim, reddish or greenish glows for eyes. It was sickening!

IX—OCTOBER, 1908

10 Having accomplished so much, Mersereau would by no means be content to let him go. Davidson knew that! He could talk to him occasionally now, or at least could hear him and answer back, if he chose, when he was alone and quite certain that no one was listening.

Mersereau was always saying, when Davidson would listen to him at all—which he wouldn't often—that he would get him yet, that he would make him pay, or charging him with fraud and murder.

20 "I'll choke you yet!" The words seemed to float in from somewhere, as if he were remembering that at some time Mersereau had said just that in his angry, savage tone—not as if he heard it; and yet he was hearing it of course.

"I'll choke you yet! You can't escape! You may think you'll die a natural death, but you won't, and that's why I'm poisoning your food to weaken you. You can't escape! I'll get you, sick or well, when you can't help yourself, when you're sleeping. I'll choke you, just as you hit me with that club. That's why you're always seeing and feeling this hand of mine! I'm not alone. I've nearly had you many a time already, only you have managed to wriggle out so far, jumping up, but some day you won't be able to—see? Then—"

The voice seemed to die away at times, even in the middle of a sentence, but at the other times—often, often—he could hear it completing the full thought. Sometimes he would turn on the thing and exclaim:

40 "Oh, go to the devil!" or, "Let me alone!" or, "Shut up!" Even in a closed room and all alone, such remarks seemed strange to him, addressed to a ghost; but he couldn't resist at times, annoyed as he was. Only he took good care not to talk if any one was about.

It was getting so that there was no real place for him outside of an asylum, for often he would get up screaming at night—he had to, so sharp was the clutch on his throat—and then always, wherever he was, a servant would come in and want to know what was the matter. He would have to say that it was a nightmare—only the management always requested him to leave after the second or third time, say, or after an explosion or two. It was horrible!

He might as well apply to a private asylum or sanatorium now, having all the money he had, and explain that he had delusions—delusions. Imagine!—and ask to be taken care of. In a place like that they wouldn't be disturbed by his jumping up and screaming at night, feeling that he was being choked, as he was, or by his leaving the table because he couldn't eat the food, or by his talking back to Mersereau, should they chance to hear him, or by the noises when they occurred.

They could assign him a special nurse and a special room, if he wished—only he didn't wish to be too much alone. They could put him in charge of some one who would understand all these things, or to whom he could explain. He couldn't expect ordinary people, or hotels catering to ordinary people, to put up with him any more. Mersereau and his friends made too much trouble.

He must go and hunt up a good place somewhere where they understood such things, or at least tolerated them, and explain, and then it would all pass for the hallucinations of a crazy man,—though, as a matter of fact, he wasn't crazy at all. It was all too real, only the average or so-called normal person couldn't see or hear as he could—hadn't experienced what he had.

X—DECEMBER, 1908

"The trouble is, doctor, that Mr. Davidson is suffering from the delusion that he is pursued by evil spirits. He was not committed here by any court, but came of his own accord about four months ago, and we let him wander about here at will. But he seems to be growing worse, as time goes on.

"One of his worst delusions, doctor, is that there is one spirit in particular who is trying to choke him to death. Dr. Major, our superintendent, says he has incipient tuberculosis of the throat, with occasional spasmodic contractions. There are small lumps or calluses here and there as though caused by outside pressure and yet our nurse assures us that there is no such outside irritation. He won't believe that; but whenever he tries to sleep, especially in the middle of the night, he will jump up and come running out into the hall, insisting that one of these spirits, which he insists are after him, is trying to choke him to death. He really seems to believe it, for he comes out coughing and choking and feeling at his neck as if some one has been trying to strangle him. He always explains the whole matter to me as being the work of evil spirits, and asks me to not pay any attention to him unless he calls for help or rings his call-bell; and so I never think anything more of it now unless he does.

"Another of his ideas is that these same spirits do something to his food—put poison in it, or give it a bad odor or taste, so that he can't eat it. When he does find anything he can eat, he grabs it and almost swallows it whole, before, as he says, the spirits have time to do anything to it. Once, he says he weighed more than two hundred pounds, but now he only weighs one hundred and twenty. His case is exceedingly strange and pathetic, doctor!

"Dr. Major insists that it is purely a delusion, that so far as being choked is concerned, it is the incipient tuberculosis, and that his stomach trouble comes from the same thing; but by association of ideas, or delusion, he thinks some one is trying to choke him and poison his food, when it isn't so at all. Dr. Major says that he can't imagine what could have started it. He is always trying to talk to Mr. Davidson about it, but whenever he begins to ask him questions, Mr. Davidson refuses to talk, and gets up and leaves.

"One of the peculiar things about his idea of being choked, doctor, is that when he is merely dozing he always wakes up in time, and has the power to throw it off. He claims that the strength of these spirits is not equal to his own when he is awake, or even dozing, but when he's asleep their strength is greater and that then they may injure him. Sometimes, when he has had a fright like this, he will come out in the hall and down to my desk there at the lower end, and ask if he mayn't sit there by me. He says it calms him. I always tell him yes, but it won't be five minutes before he'll get up and leave again, saying that he's being annoyed, or that he won't be able to contain himself if he stays any longer, because of the remarks being made over his shoulder or in his ear.

"Often he'll say: 'Did you hear that, Miss Liggett? It's astonishing, the low, vile things that man can say at times!' When I say, 'No, I didn't hear,' he always says, 'I'm so glad!'"

"No one has ever tried to relieve him of this by hypnotism, I suppose?"

"Not that I know of, doctor. Dr. Major may have tried it. I have only been here three months."

"Tuberculosis is certainly the cause of the throat trouble, as Dr. Major says, and as for the stomach trouble, that comes from the same thing—natural enough under the circumstances. We may have to resort to hypnotism a little later. I'll see. In the meantime you'd better caution all who come in touch with him never to sympathize, or even to seem to believe in anything he imagines is being done to him. It will merely encourage him in his notions. And get him to take his medicine regularly; it won't cure, but it will help. Dr. Major has asked me to give especial attention to his case, and I want the conditions as near right as possible."

"Yes, sir."

XI—JANUARY, 1909

The trouble with these doctors was that they really knew nothing of anything save what was on the surface, the little they had learned at a medical college or in practice—chiefly how certain drugs, tried by their predecessors in certain cases, were known to act. They had no imagination whatever, even when you tried to tell them.

Take that latest young person who was coming here now in his good clothes and with his car, fairly bursting with his knowledge of what he called psychiatrics, looking into Davidson's eyes so hard and smoothing his temples and throat—massage, he called it—saying that he had incipient tuberculosis of the throat and stomach trouble, and utterly disregarding the things which he, Davidson, could personally see and hear! Imagine the fellow trying to persuade him, at this late date, that all that was wrong with him was tuberculosis, that he didn't see Mersereau standing right beside him at times, bending over him, holding up that hand and telling him how he intended to kill him yet—that it was all an illusion!

Imagine saying that Mersereau couldn't actually seize him by the throat when he was asleep, or nearly so, when Davidson himself, looking at his throat in the mirror, could see the actual finger prints,—Mersereau's,—for a moment or so afterward. At any rate, his throat was red and sore from being clutched, as Mersereau of late was able to clutch him! And that was the cause of these lumps. And to say, as they had said at first, that he himself was making them by rubbing and feeling his throat, and that it was tuberculosis!

Wasn't it enough to make one want to quit the place? If it weren't for Miss Liggett and Miss Koehler, his private nurse, and their devoted care, he would. That Miss Koehler was worth her weight in gold, learning his ways as she had, being so uniformly kind, and bearing with his difficulties so genially. He would leave her something in his will.

To leave this place and go elsewhere, though, unless he could take her along, would be folly. And anyway, where else would he go? Here at least were other people, patients like himself, who could understand and could sympathize with him,—people who weren't convinced as were these doctors that all that he complained of was mere delusion. Imagine! Old Rankin, the lawyer, for instance, who had suffered untold persecution from one living person and another, mostly politicians, was convinced that his, Davidson's, troubles were genuine, and liked to hear about them, just as did Miss Koehler. These two did not insist, as the doctors did, that he had slow tuberculosis of the throat, and could live a long time and overcome his troubles if he would. They were merely companionable at such times as Mersereau would give him enough peace to be sociable.

The only real trouble, though, was that he was growing so weak from lack of sleep and food—his inability to eat the food which his enemy bewitched and to sleep at night on account of the choking—that he couldn't last much longer. This new physician whom Dr. Major had called into consultation in regard to his case was insisting that along with his throat trouble he was suffering from acute anemia, due to long undernourishment, and that only a solution of strychnin injected into the veins would help him. But as to Mersereau poisoning his food—not a word would he hear. Besides, now that he was practically bed-ridden, not able to jump up as freely as before, he was subject to a veritable storm of bedevilment at the hands of Mersereau. Not only could he see—especially toward evening, and in the very early hours of the morning—Mersereau hovering about him like a black shadow, a great, bulky shadow—yet like him in outline, but he could feel his enemy's hand moving over him. Worse, behind or about him he often saw a veritable cloud of evil creatures, companions or tools of Mersereau's, who were there to help him and who kept swimming about like fish in dark waters, and seemed to eye the procedure with satisfaction.

When food was brought to him, early or late, and in whatever form, Mersereau and they were there, close at hand, as thick as flies, passing over and through it in an evident attempt to spoil it before he could eat it. Just to see them doing it was enough to poison it for him. Besides, he could hear their voices urging Mersereau to do it.

"That's right—poison it!"

"He can't last much longer!"

"Soon he'll be weak enough so that when you grip him he will really die!"

It was thus that they actually talked—he could hear them.

He also heard vile phrases addressed to him by Mersereau, the iterated and reiterated words "murderer" and "swindler" and "cheat," there in the middle of the night. Often, although the light was still on, he saw as many as seven dark figures, very much like Mersereau's, although different, gathered close about him,—like men in consultation—evil men. Some of them sat upon his bed, and it seemed as if they were about to help Mersereau to finish him, adding their hands to his.

Behind them again was a complete circle of all those evil, swimming things with green and red eyes, always watching—helping, probably. He had actually felt the pressure of the hand to grow stronger of late, when they were all there. Only, just before he felt he was going to faint, and because he could not spring up any more, he invariably screamed or gasped a choking gasp and held his finger on the button which would bring Miss Koehler. Then she would come, lift him up, and fix his pillows. She also always assured him that it was only the inflammation of his throat, and rubbed it with alcohol, and gave him a few drops of something internally to ease it.

After all this time, and in spite of anything he could tell them, they still believed, or pretended to believe, that he was suffering from tuberculosis, and that all the rest of this was delusion, a phase of insanity!

And Mersereau's skeleton still out there on the Monte Orte!

And Mersereau's plan, with the help of others, of course, was to choke him to death, there was no doubt of that now; and yet they would believe after he was gone that he had died of tuberculosis of the throat. Think of that.

XII—Midnight of February 10, 1909

THE GHOST OF MERSEREAU (bending over Davidson): "Softly! Softly! He's quite asleep! He didn't think we could get him—that I could! But this time,—yes. Miss Koehler is asleep at the end of the hall and Miss Liggett can't come, can't hear. He's too weak now. He can scarcely move or groan. Strengthen my hand, will you! I will grip him so tight this time that he won't get away! His cries won't help him this time! He can't cry as he once did! Now! Now!"

A CLOUD OF EVIL SPIRITS (swimming about): "Right! Right! Good! Good! Now! Ah!"

DAVIDSON (waking, choking, screaming, and feebly striking out): "Help! Help! H-e-l-p! Miss—Miss—H-e-l-p!"

MISS LIGGETT (dozing heavily in her chair): "Everything is still. No one restless. I can sleep." (Her head nods.)

THE CLOUD OF EVIL SPIRITS: "Good! Good! Good! His soul at last! Here it comes! He couldn't escape this time! Ah! Good! Good! Now!"

MERSEREAU (to Davidson): "You murderer! At last! At last!"

XIII—3 A.M. of February 11, 1909

MISS KOEHLER (at the bedside, distressed and pale): "He must have died some time between one and two, doctor. I left him at one o'clock, comfortable as I could make him. He said he was feeling as well as could be expected. He's been very weak during the last few days, taking only a little gruel. Between half past one and two I thought I heard a noise, and came to see. He was lying just as you see here, except that his hands were up to his throat, as if it were hurting or choking him. I put them down for fear they would stiffen that way. In trying to call one of the other nurses just now, I found that the bell was out of order, although I know it was all right when I left, because he always made me try it. So he may have tried to ring."

DR. MAJOR (turning the head and examining the throat): "It looks as if he had clutched at his throat rather tightly this time, I must say. Here is the mark of his thumb on this side and of his four fingers on the other. Rather deep for the little strength he had. Odd that he should have imagined that some one else was trying to choke him, when he was always pressing at his own neck! Throat tuberculosis is very painful at times. That would explain the desire to clutch at his throat."

MISS LIGGETT: "He was always believing that an evil spirit was trying to choke him, doctor."

DR. MAJOR: "Yes, I know—association of ideas. Dr. Scain and I agree as to that. He had a bad case of chronic tuberculosis of the throat, with accompanying malnutrition, due to the effect of the throat on the stomach; and his notion about evil spirits pursuing him and trying to choke him was simply due to an innate tendency on the part of the subconscious mind to join things together—any notion, say, with any pain. If he had had a diseased leg, he would have imagined that evil spirits were attempting to saw it off, or something like that. In the same way the condition of his throat affected his stomach, and he imagined that the spirits were doing something to his food. Make out a certificate showing acute tuberculosis of the esophagus as the cause, with delusions of persecution as his mental condition. While I am here we may as well look in on Mr. Baff."

1862 -- Edith Wharton -- 1937

BORN IN New York during the Civil War, by birth and breeding belonging to the socially élite, Edith Newbold Jones experienced the changing currents in metropolitan society as they were determined under the impact of post-war influences. On her mother's side she was descended from the Rhinelanders, a family long prominent in the social, civic, and commercial life of New York. Her great-grandfather was a general in the Continental army during the Revolution. She was educated for the most part in Europe, and knew at firsthand the art, literature, and culture of Italy, France, and Germany, a fact which accounts for the reflection of European life in many of her writings. In 1885 she married Edward Wharton, a wealthy banker, established her permanent home in her native city, spending her summers in Newport or Lenox and making frequent trips abroad. After 1906 she lived in Paris. With the exception of the war years, during which she engaged in relief work with whole-hearted devotion, her life is largely a record of publications. In recognition of her war work she was made an Officer of the French Legion of Honor. In 1924 she received the gold medal for literature from the Institute of Arts and Letters.

In The Writing of Fiction (1925), a little book which might be used profitably as a text by aspiring writers, Mrs. Wharton states the main principles which she followed as novelist and short-story writer. Art, she maintains at the outset, is still open to countless experiments which will preserve the artist against becoming stereotyped in method and practice. The primary problem in planning a novel is the selection of adequate material, a choice which must be guided, first, by what the material actually contains, and second, by the writer's ability to extract from it what is significant and illuminating. That is, the writer's vision must be commensurate with his capacity to record what he sees; otherwise, the product is marred by a lack of balance and proportion. The novelist must assume a point of view sufficiently removed from the raw material selected for treatment that it can be considered and recorded in an objective manner; to achieve consistency this point of view, once it is chosen, must not be changed lest the singleness of development, both of character and narrative, be broken. Roughly speaking, she recognizes two types of fiction—the novel of manners and the novel of character—but admits that the classification is arbitrary, and that the best novels are a combination of the two types. In the short story, situation is more important than character; in the novel, character is more important, and must change, either develop or decline, with the lapse of time as the narrative progresses. The length of a story will depend entirely upon the nature of the subject. It should stop when it is ended. Brief and inadequate as this summary of her theory is, it does convey the impression that her art is the result of painstaking reflection, and that it rests upon a carefully planned foundation—one reason for the occasional technical excellence of her work.

Like her master, Henry James, Mrs. Wharton achieved distinction in the short story as well as in the novel. She began her career with a collection of short stories under the title of The Greater Inclination (1899); it was followed by another volume, The Descent of Man (1904), regarded by some as her best work in this field. In later years she published similar collections in Here and Beyond (1926), Human Nature (1933), and The World Over (1936). The list of her novels is so long, and the subject matter and technique so varied, that even a brief characterization of each one is impossible here. The best that one can do is to single out a few more or less typical examples. The Valley of Decision (1902), for instance, is a historical novel about Italy in the eighteenth century, based upon such meticulous research that the background becomes more impressive than the narrative. In The House of Mirth (1905) she tells the story of Lily Bart and her adventures in exploiting the New York social set. The Fruit of the Tree (1907), although unconvincing as a story, illustrates her view of industrialism and social welfare. Critics are practically in unanimous agreement that Ethan Frome (1911) is one of her best works. It is a tale of frustrate love set in a Massachusetts countryside, and told with the concentrated austerity of a Greek tragedy. It is only a partial failure, and that because, in restless obedience to the principle of concentration which dominates the story, she so foreshortens her characters as to make them almost stereotypes. The book is too careful, too precise; in her attempt to make a New England tragedy into a universal one, she reduces her story almost to the level of synopsis. The characters do not act freely, or even with a willed constraint; the total effect is too much like that of a mathematical sum. A group of novels including The Custom of the Country (1913), The Children (1928), Hudson River Bracketed (1929), and its sequel, The Gods Arrive (1932), deal with divorce and social problems. A Backward Glance (1934) is an autobiography treated with the same aloof detachment and objectivity that characterizes her fiction, never very intimate or revealing, and containing, besides personal memoirs, observations on society in New York, London, and Paris, and reminiscences of many noteworthy people whom she met in the course of her life. A chapter is devoted to Henry James.

Mrs. Wharton was a capable and conscientious artist. Her work is marked by painstaking attention to artistic technique, with the result that many of her novels are almost perfect in structure. On the other hand, this self-conscious striving for perfection is at times so obvious that it overshadows the freshness and spontaneity which one expects in art. She is most at home with characters and themes taken from the select and cultured classes of society, and only in Ethan Frome and the short story "Bunner Sisters," does she even partially succeed outside her preferred field. In accordance with her principle that the art of fiction is "fluid," she employed a varying technique in her novels, a method by which in spite of certain typical traits she avoided the use of a set and hackneyed formula. Perhaps her greatest success is the novel The Age of Innocence (1920). In this portrait of late nineteenth-century New York, her best talents survive her worst defects. The casual irony of circumstance, which all but wrecks The House of Mirth, is here brilliantly contained; the characters remain consistent in both exposition and dialogue; and only the conclusion seems musty and dead.

Mrs. Wharton's novels and novelettes include The Valley of Decision (1902); The House of Mirth (1905); Madame de Treymes (1907); The Fruit of the Tree (1907); Ethan Frome (1911); The Custom of the Country (1913); The Age of Innocence (1920); The Old Maid (1924); New Year's Day (1924); False Dawn (1924); The Spark (1924); The Children (1928); Certain People (1930); The Gods Arrive (1932). Collections of short stories: The Greater Inclination (1899); Crucial Instances (1901); The Descent of Man and Other Stories (1904); Tales of Men and Ghosts (1910); Xingu and Other Stories (1916); Here and Beyond (1926); Human Nature (1933). The Writing of Fiction (1925) is a critical essay. ### THE OTHER TWO

Taken from The Descent of Man. Although written early in her career, "The Other Two" illustrates many of the artistic traits which characterize Mrs. Wharton's later work.

I

WAYTHORN, on the drawing-room hearth, waited for his wife to come down to dinner.

It was their first night under his own roof, and he was surprised at his thrill of boyish agitation. He was not so old, to be sure—his glass gave him little more than the five-and-thirty years to which his wife confessed—but he had fancied himself already in the temperate zone; yet there he was listening for her step with a tender sense of all it symbolised, with some old trail of verse about the garlanded nuptial door-posts floating through his enjoyment of the pleasant room and the good dinner just beyond it.

They had been hastily recalled from their honeymoon by the illness of Lily Haskett, the child of Mrs. Waythorn's first marriage. The little girl, at Waythorn's desire, had been transferred to his house on the day of her mother's wedding, and the doctor, on their arrival, broke the news that she was ill with typhoid, but declared that all the symptoms were favorable. Lily could show twelve years of unblemished health, and the case promised to be a light one. The nurse spoke as reassuringly, and after a moment of alarm Mrs. Waythorn had adjusted herself to the situation. She was very fond of Lily—her affection for the child had perhaps been her decisive charm in Waythorn's eyes—but she had the perfectly balanced nerves which her little girl had inherited, and no woman ever wasted less tissue in unproductive worry. Waythorn was therefore quite prepared to see her come in presently, a little late because of a last look at Lily, but as serene and well-appointed as if her good-night kiss had been laid on the brow of health. Her composure was restful to him; it acted as ballast to his somewhat unstable sensibilities. As he pictured her bending over the child's bed he thought how soothing her presence must be in illness: her very step would prognosticate recovery.

His own life had been a gay one, from temperament rather than circumstance, and he had been drawn to her by the unperturbed gaiety which kept her fresh and elastic at an age when most women's activities are growing either slack or febrile. He knew what was said about her; for, popular as she was, there had always been a faint undercurrent of detraction. When she had appeared in New York, nine or ten years earlier, as the pretty Mrs. Haskett whom Gus Varick had unearthed somewhere—was it in Pittsburg or Utica?—society, while promptly accepting her, had reserved the right to cast a doubt on its own indiscrimination. Enquiry, however, established her undoubted connection with a socially reigning family, and explained her recent divorce as the natural result of a runaway match at seventeen; and as nothing was known of Mr. Haskett it was easy to believe the worst of him.

Alice Haskett's remarriage with Gus Varick was a passport to the set whose recognition she coveted, and for a few years the Varicks were the most popular couple in town. Unfortunately the alliance was brief and stormy, and this time the husband had his champions. Still, even Varick's grievances were of a nature to bear the inspection of the New York courts. A New York divorce is in itself a diploma of virtue, and in the semi-widowhood of this second separation Mrs. Varick took on an air of sanctity, and was allowed to confide her wrongs to some of the most scrupulous ears in town. But when it was known that she was to marry Waythorn there was a momentary reaction. Her best friends would have preferred to see her remain in the role of the injured wife, which was as becoming to her as crape to a rosy complexion. True, a decent time had elapsed, and it was not even suggested that Waythorn had supplanted his predecessor. People shook their heads over him, however, and one grudging friend, to whom he affirmed that he took the step with his eyes open, replied oracularly: "Yes—and with your ears shut."

Waythorn could afford to smile at these innuendoes. In the Wall Street phrase, he had "discounted" them. He knew that society has not yet adapted itself to the consequences of divorce, and that till the adaptation takes place every woman who uses the freedom the law accords her must be her own social justification. Waythorn had an amused confidence in his wife's ability to justify herself. His expectations were fulfilled, and before the wedding took place Alice Varick's group had rallied openly to her support. She took it all imper- turbably: she had a way of surmounting obstacles without seeming to be aware of them, and Waythorn looked back with wonder at the trivialities over which he had worn his nerves thin. He had the sense of having found refuge in a richer, warmer nature than his own, and his satisfaction, at the moment, was humorously summed up in the thought that his wife, when she had done all she could for Lily, would not be ashamed to come down and enjoy a good dinner.

The anticipation of such enjoyment was not, however, the sentiment expressed by Mrs. Waythorn's charming face when she presently joined him. Though she had put on her most engaging teagown she had neglected to assume the smile that went with it, and Waythorn thought he had never seen her look so nearly worried.

"What is it?" he asked. "Is anything wrong with Lily?"

"No; I've just been in and she's still sleeping." Mrs. Waythorn hesitated. "But something tiresome has happened."

He had taken her two hands, and now perceived that he was crushing a paper between them.

"This letter?"

"Yes—Mr. Haskett has written—I mean his lawyer has written."

Waythorn felt himself flush uncomfortably. He dropped his wife's hands.

"What about?"

"About seeing Lily. You know the courts —"

"Yes, yes," he interrupted nervously.

Nothing was known about Haskett in New York. He was vaguely supposed to have remained in the outer darkness from which his wife had been rescued, and Waythorn was one of the few who were aware that he had given up his business in Utica and followed her to New York in order to be near his little girl. In the days of his wooing, Waythorn had often met Lily on the doorstep, rosy and smiling, on her way "to see papa."

"I am so sorry," Mrs. Waythorn murmured. "If Lily could have been moved—"

"That's out of the question," he returned impatiently.

"I suppose so."

Her lip was beginning to tremble, and he felt himself a brute.

"He must come, of course," he said. "When is—his day?"

"I'm afraid—tomorrow."

"Very well. Send a note in the morning."

The butler entered to announce dinner.

Waythorn turned to his wife. "Come—you must be tired. It's beastly, but try to forget about it," he said, drawing her hand through his arm.

"You're so good, dear. I'll try," she whispered back.

Her face cleared at once, and as she looked at him across the flowers, between the rosy candle-shades, he saw her lips waver back into a smile.

"How pretty everything is!" she sighed luxuriously.

He turned to the butler. "The champagne at once, please. Mrs. Waythorn is tired."

In a moment or two their eyes met above 10 when Varick had been dealing in "important things." Hitherto he had dabbled only in the shallow pools of speculation, with which Waythorn's office did not usually concern itself.

II

Waythorn, the next morning, went down town earlier than usual. Haskett was not likely to come till the afternoon, but the instinct of flight drove him forth. He meant to stay away all day—he had thoughts of dining at his club. As his door closed behind him he re- 20 flected that before he opened it again it would have admitted another man who had as much right to enter it as himself, and the thought filled him with a physical repugnance.

He caught the "elevated" at the employes' hour, and found himself crushed between two layers of pendulous humanity. At Eighth Street the man facing him wriggled out, and another took his place. Waythorn glanced up 30 and saw that it was Gus Varick. The men were so close together that it was impossible to ignore the smile of recognition on Varick's handsome overblown face. And after all—why not? They had always been on good terms, and Varick had been divorced before Waythorn's attentions to his wife began. The two exchanged a word on the perennial grievance of the congested trains, and when a seat at their side was miraculously left empty the in- 40 stinct of self-preservation made Waythorn slip into it after Varick.

The latter drew the stout man's breath of relief. "Lord—I was beginning to feel like a pressed flower." He leaned back, looking unconcernedly at Waythorn. "Sorry to hear that Sellers is knocked out again."

"Sellers?" echoed Waythorn, starting at his partner's name.

Varick looked surprised. "You didn't know 50 he was laid up with the gout?"

"No. I've been away—I only got back last night." Waythorn felt himself reddening in anticipation of the other's smile.

"Ah—yes; to be sure. And Sellers's attack came on two days ago. I'm afraid he's pretty bad. Very awkward for me, as it happens, because he was just putting through a rather important thing for me."

"Ah?" Waythorn wondered vaguely since when Varick had been dealing in "important things." Hitherto he had dabbled only in the shallow pools of speculation, with which Waythorn's office did not usually concern itself.

It occurred to him that Varick might be talking at random, to relieve the strain of their propinquity. That strain was becoming momentarily more apparent to Waythorn, and when, at Cortlandt Street, he caught sight of an acquaintance and had a sudden vision of the picture he and Varick must present to an initiated eye, he jumped up with a muttered excuse.

"I hope you'll find Sellers better," said Varick civilly, and he stammered back: "If I can be of any use to you——" and let the departing crowd sweep him to the platform.

At his office he heard that Sellers was in fact ill with the gout, and would probably not be able to leave the house for some weeks.

"I'm sorry it should have happened so, Mr. Waythorn," the senior clerk said with affable significance. "Mr. Sellers was very much upset at the idea of giving you such a lot of extra work just now."

"Oh, that's no matter," said Waythorn hastily. He secretly welcomed the pressure of additional business, and was glad to think that, when the day's work was over, he would have to call at his partner's on the way home.

He was late for luncheon, and turned in at the nearest restaurant instead of going to his club. The place was full, and the waiter hurried him to the back of the room to capture the only vacant table. In the cloud of cigar-smoke Waythorn did not at once distinguish his neighbors; but presently, looking about him, he saw Varick seated a few feet off. This time, luckily, they were too far apart for conversation, and Varick, who faced another way, had probably not even seen him; but there was an irony in their renewed nearness.

Varick was said to be fond of good living, and as Waythorn sat despatching his hurried luncheon he looked across half enviously at the other's leisurely degustation of his meal. When Waythorn first saw him he had been helping himself with critical deliberation to a bit of Camembert at the ideal point of liquefaction, and now, the cheese removed, he was just pouring his café double from its little two-storied earthen pot. He poured slowly, his ruddy profile bent above the task, and one beringed white hand steadying the lid of the coffee-pot; then he stretched his other hand to the decanter of cognac at his elbow, filled a liqueur-glass, took a tentative sip, and poured the brandy into his coffee-cup.

Waythorn watched him in a kind of fascination. What was he thinking of—only of the flavor of the coffee and the liqueur? Had the morning's meeting left no more trace in his thoughts than on his face? Had his wife so completely passed out of his life that even this odd encounter with her present husband, within a week after her remarriage, was no more than an incident in his day? And as Waythorn mused, another idea struck him: had Haskett ever met Varick as Varick and he had just met? The recollection of Haskett perturbed him, and he rose and left the restaurant, taking a circuitous way out to escape the placid irony of Varick's nod.

It was after seven when Waythorn reached home. He thought the footman who opened the door looked at him oddly.

"How is Miss Lily?" he asked in haste.

"Doing very well, sir. A gentleman—"

"Tell Barlow to put off dinner for half an hour," Waythorn cut him off, hurrying upstairs.

He went straight to his room and dressed without seeing his wife. When he reached the drawing-room she was there, fresh and radiant. Lily's day had been good; the doctor was not coming back that evening.

At dinner Waythorn told her of Sellers's illness and of the resulting complications. She listened sympathetically, adjuring him not to let himself be overworked, and asking vague feminine questions about the routine of the office. Then she gave him the chronicle of Lily's day; quoted the nurse and doctor, and told him who had called to inquire. He had never seen her more serene and unruffled. It struck him, with a curious pang, that she was very happy in being with him, so happy that she found a childish pleasure in rehearsing the trivial incidents of her day.

After dinner they went to the library, and the servant put the coffee and liqueurs on a low table before her and left the room. She looked singularly soft and girlish in her rosy pale dress, against the dark leather of one of his bachelor armchairs. A day earlier the contrast would have charmed him.

He turned away now, choosing a cigar with affected deliberation.

"Did Haskett come?" he asked, with his back to her.

"Oh, yes—he came."

"You didn't see him, of course?"

She hesitated a moment. "I let the nurse see him."

That was all. There was nothing more to ask. He swung round toward her, applying a match to his cigar. Well, the thing was over for a week, at any rate. He would try not to think of it. She looked up at him, a trifle rosier than usual, with a smile in her eyes.

"Ready for your coffee, dear?"

He leaned against the mantelpiece, watching her as she lifted the coffee-pot. The lamplight struck a gleam from her bracelets and tipped her soft hair with brightness. How light and slender she was, and how each gesture flowed into the next! She seemed a creature all compact of harmonies. As the thought of Haskett receded, Waythorn felt himself yielding again to the joy of possession. They were his, those white hands with their flitting motions, his the light haze of hair, the lips and eyes . . .

She set down the coffee-pot, and reaching for the decanter of cognac, measured off a liqueur-glass and poured it into his cup.

Waythorn uttered a sudden exclamation.

"What is the matter?" she said, startled.

"Nothing; only—I don't take cognac in my coffee."

"Oh, how stupid of me," she cried.

Their eyes met, and she blushed a sudden agonized red.

III

Ten days later, Mr. Sellers, still house-bound, asked Waythorn to call on his way down town. The senior partner, with his swaddled foot propped up by the fire, greeted his associate with an air of embarrassment.

"I'm sorry, my dear fellow; I've got to ask you to do an awkward thing for me."

Waythorn waited, and the other went on, after a pause apparently given to the arrangement of his phrases: "The fact is, when I was knocked out I had just gone into a rather complicated piece of business for—Gus Varick."

"Well?" said Waythorn, with an attempt to put him at his ease.

"Well—it's this way: Varick came to me the day before my attack. He had evidently had an inside tip from somebody, and had made about a hundred thousand. He came to me for advice, and I suggested his going in with Vanderlyn."

"Oh, the deuce!" Waythorn exclaimed. He saw in a flash what had happened. The investment was an alluring one, but required negotiation. He listened quietly while Sellers put the case before him, and the statement ended, he said: "You think I ought to see Varick?"

"I'm afraid I can't as yet. The doctor is obdurate. And this thing can't wait. I hate to ask you, but no one else in the office knows the ins and outs of it."

Waythorn stood silent. He did not care a farthing for the success of Varick's venture but the honor of the office was to be considered, and he could hardly refuse to oblige his partner.

"Very well," he said, "I'll do it."

That afternoon, apprised by telephone, Varick called at the office. Waythorn, waiting in his private room, wondered what the others thought of it. The newspapers, at the time of Mrs. Waythorn's marriage, had acquainted their readers with every detail of her previous matrimonial ventures, and Waythorn could fancy the clerks smiling behind Varick's back as he was ushered in.

Varick bore himself admirably. He was easy without being undignified, and Waythorn was conscious of cutting a much less impressive figure. Varick had no experience of business, and the talk prolonged itself for nearly an hour while Waythorn set forth with scrupulous precision the details of the proposed transaction.

"I'm awfully obliged to you," Varick said as he rose. "The fact is I'm not used to having much money to look after, and I don't want to make an ass of myself——" He smiled, and Waythorn could not help noticing that there was something pleasant about his smile. "It feels uncommonly queer to have enough cash to pay one's bills. I'd have sold my soul for it a few years ago!"

Waythorn winced at the allusion. He had heard it rumored that a lack of funds had been one of the determining causes of the Varick separation, but it did not occur to him that Varick's words were intentional. It seemed more likely that the desire to keep clear of embarrassing topics had fatally drawn him into one. Waythorn did not wish to be outdone in civility.

"We'll do the best we can for you," he said. "I think this is a good thing you're in."

"Oh, I'm sure it's immense. It's awfully good of you——" Varick broke off, embarrassed. "I suppose the thing's settled now—— but if——"

"If anything happens before Sellers is about, I'll see you again," said Waythorn quietly. He was glad, in the end, to appear the more self-possessed of the two.

* * *

The course of Lily's illness ran smooth, and as the days passed Waythorn grew used to the idea of Haskett's weekly visit. The first time the day came round, he stayed out late, and questioned his wife as to the visit on his return. She replied at once that Haskett had merely seen the nurse downstairs, as the doctor did not wish any one in the child's sick-room till after the crisis.

The following week Waythorn was again conscious of the recurrence of the day, but had forgotten it by the time he came home to dinner. The crisis of the disease came a few days later, with a rapid decline of fever, and the little girl was pronounced out of danger. In the rejoicing which ensued the thought of Haskett passed out of Waythorn's mind, and one afternoon, letting himself into the house with a latch-key, he went straight to his library without noticing a shabby hat and umbrella in the hall.

In the library he found a small effaced-looking man with a thinnish gray beard sitting on the edge of a chair. The stranger might have been a piano-tuner, or one of those mysteriously efficient persons who are summoned in emergencies to adjust some detail of the domestic machinery. He blinked at Waythorn through a pair of gold-rimmed spectacles and said mildly: "Mr. Waythorn, I presume? I am Lily's father."

Waythorn flushed. "Oh——" he stammered uncomfortably. He broke off, disliking to appear rude. Inwardly he was trying to adjust the actual Haskett to the image of him projected by his wife's reminiscences. Waythorn had been allowed to infer that Alice's first husband was a brute.

"I am sorry to intrude," said Haskett, with his over-the-counter politeness.

"Don't mention it," returned Waythorn, collecting himself. "I suppose the nurse has been told?"

"I presume so. I can wait," said Haskett. He had a resigned way of speaking, as though life had worn down his natural powers of resistance.

Waythorn stood on the threshold, nervously pulling off his gloves.

"I'm sorry you've been detained. I will send for the nurse," he said; and as he opened the door he added with an effort: "I'm glad we can give you a good report of Lily." He winced as the we slipped out, but Haskett seemed not to notice it.

"Thank you, Mr. Waythorn. It's been an anxious time for me."

"Ah, well, that's past. Soon she'll be able to go to you." Waythorn nodded and passed out.

In his own room he flung himself down with a groan. He hated the womanish sensibility which made him suffer so acutely from the grotesque chances of life. He had known when he married that his wife's former husbands were both living, and that amid the multiplied contacts of modern existence there were a thousand chances to one that he would run against one or the other, yet he found himself as much disturbed by his brief encounter with Haskett as though the law had not obligingly removed all difficulties in the way of their meeting.

Waythorn sprang up and began to pace the room nervously. He had not suffered half as much from his two meetings with Varick. It was Haskett's presence in his own house that made the situation so intolerable. He stood still, hearing steps in the passage.

"This way, please," he heard the nurse say. Haskett was being taken upstairs, then: not a corner of the house but was open to him. Waythorn dropped into another chair, staring vaguely ahead of him. On his dressing-table stood a photograph of Alice, taken when he had first known her. She was Alice Varick than—how fine and exquisite he had thought her! Those were Varick's pearls about her neck. At Waythorn's instance they had been returned before her marriage. Had Haskett ever given her any trinkets—and what had become of them, Waythorn wondered? He realized suddenly that he knew very little of Haskett's past or present situation; but from the man's appearance and manner of speech he could reconstruct with curious precision the surroundings of Alice's first marriage. And it startled him to think that she had, in the background of her life, a phase of existence so different from anything with which he had connected her. Varick, whatever his faults, was a gentleman, in the conventional, traditional sense of the term: the sense which at that moment seemed, oddly enough, to have most meaning to Waythorn. He and Varick had the same social habits, spoke the same language, understood the same allusions. But this other man . . . it was grotesquely uppermost in Waythorn's mind that Haskett had worn a made-up tie attached with an elastic. Why should that ridiculous detail symbolize the whole man? Waythorn was exasperated by his own paltriness, but the fact of the tie expanded, forced itself on him, became as it were the key to Alice's past. He could see her, as Mrs. Haskett, sitting in a "front parlor" furnished in plush, with a pianola, and a copy of "Ben Hur" on the center-table. He could see her going to the theater with Haskett—or perhaps even to a "Church Sociable"—she in a "picture hat" and Haskett in a black frock-coat, a little creased, with the made-up tie on an elastic. On the way home they would stop and look at the illuminated shop-windows, lingering over the photographs of New York actresses. On Sunday afternoons Haskett would take her for a walk, pushing Lily ahead of them in a white enamelled perambulator, and Waythorn had a vision of the people they would stop and talk to. He could fancy how pretty Alice must have looked, in a dress adroitly constructed from the hints of a New York fashion-paper, and how she must have looked down on the other women, chafing at her life, and secretly feeling that she belonged in a bigger place.

For the moment his foremost thought was one of wonder at the way in which she had shed the phase of existence which her marriage with Haskett implied. It was as if her whole aspect, every gesture, every inflection, every allusion, were a studied negation of that period of her life. If she had denied being married to Haskett she could hardly have stood more convicted of duplicity than in this obliteration of the self which had been his wife.

Waythorn started up, checking himself in the analysis of her motives. What right had he to create a fantastic effigy of her and then pass judgment on it? She had spoken vaguely of her first marriage as unhappy, had hinted, with becoming reticence, that Haskett had wrought havoc among her young illusions. . . . It was a pity for Waythorn's peace of mind that Haskett's very inoffensiveness shed a new light on the nature of those illusions. A man would rather think that his wife has been brutalized by her first husband than that the process had been reversed.

IV

"Mr. Waythorn, I don't like that French governess of Lily's."

Haskett, subdued and apologetic, stood before Waythorn in the library, revolving his shabby hat in his hand.

Waythorn, surprised in his armchair over the evening paper, stared back perplexedly at his visitor.

"You'll excuse my asking to see you," Haskett continued. "But this is my last visit, and I thought if I could have a word with you it would be a better way than writing to Mrs. Waythorn's lawyer."

Waythorn rose uneasily. He did not like the French governess either; but that was irrelevant.

"I am not so sure of that," he returned stiffly; "but since you wish it I will give your message to—my wife." He always hesitated over the possessive pronoun in addressing Haskett.

The latter sighed. "I don't know as that will help much. She didn't like it when I spoke to her."

Waythorn turned red. "When did you see her?" he asked.

"Not since the first day I came to see Lily—right after she was taken sick. I remarked to her then that I didn't like the governess."

Waythorn made no answer. He remembered distinctly that, after that first visit, he had asked his wife if she had seen Haskett. She had lied to him then, but she had respected his wishes since; and the incident cast a curious light on her character. He was sure she would not have seen Haskett that first day if she had divined that Waythorn would object, and the fact that she did not divine it was almost as disagreeable to the latter as the discovery that she had lied to him.

"I don't like the woman," Haskett was repeating with mild persistency. "She ain't straight, Mr. Waythorn—she'll teach the child to be underhand. I've noticed a change in Lily—she's too anxious to please—and she don't always tell the truth. She used to be the straightest child, Mr. Waythorn——" He broke off, his voice a little thick. "Not but what I want her to have a stylish education," he ended.

Waythorn was touched. "I'm sorry, Mr. Haskett; but frankly, I don't quite see what I can do."

Haskett hesitated. Then he laid his hat on the table, and advanced to the hearth-rug, on which Waythorn was standing. There was nothing aggressive in his manner, but he had the solemnity of a timid man resolved on a decisive measure.

"There's just one thing you can do, Mr. Waythorn," he said. "You can remind Mrs. Waythorn that, by the decree of the courts,

I am entitled to have a voice in Lily's bringing up." He paused, and went on more deprecatingly: "I'm not the kind to talk about enforcing my rights, Mr. Waythorn. I don't know as I think a man is entitled to rights he hasn't known how to hold on to; but this business of the child is different. I've never let go there—and I never mean to."

* * *

The scene left Waythorn deeply shaken. Shamefacedly, in indirect ways, he had been finding out about Haskett; and all that he had learned was favorable. The little man, in order to be near his daughter, had sold out his share in a profitable business in Utica, and accepted a modest clerkship in a New York manufacturing house. He boarded in a shabby street and had few acquaintances. His passion for Lily filled his life. Waythorn felt that this exploration of Haskett was like groping about with a dark-lantern in his wife's past; but he saw now that there were recesses his lantern had not explored. He had never enquired into the exact circumstances of his wife's first matrimonial rupture. On the surface all had been fair. It was she who had obtained the divorce, and the court had given her the child. But Waythorn knew how many ambiguities such a verdict might cover. The mere fact that Haskett retained a right over his daughter implied an unsuspected compromise. Waythorn was an idealist. He always refused to recognize unpleasant contingencies till he found himself confronted with them, and then he saw them followed by a spectral train of consequences. His next days were thus haunted, and he determined to try to lay the ghosts by conjuring them up in his wife's presence.

When he repeated Haskett's request a flame of anger passed over her face; but she subdued it instantly and spoke with a slight quiver of outraged motherhood.

"It is very ungentlemanly of him," she said.

The word grated on Waythorn. "That is neither here nor there. It's a bare question of rights."

She murmured: "It's not as if he could ever be a help to Lily——"

Waythorn flushed. This was even less to his taste. "The question is," he repeated, "what authority has he over her?"

She looked downward, twisting herself a little in her seat. "I am willing to see him—I thought you objected," she faltered.

In a flash he understood that she knew the extent of Haskett's claims. Perhaps it was not the first time she had resisted them.

"My objecting has nothing to do with it," he said coldly; "if Haskett has a right to be consulted you must consult him."

She burst into tears, and he saw that she expected him to regard her as a victim.

Haskett did not abuse his rights. Waythorn had felt miserably sure that he would not. But the governess was dismissed, and from time to time the little man demanded an interview with Alice. After the first outburst she accepted the situation with her usual adaptability. Haskett had once reminded Waythorn of the piano-tuner, and Mrs. Waythorn, after a month or two, appeared to class him with that domestic familiar. Waythorn could not but respect the father's tenacity. At first he had tried to cultivate the suspicion that Haskett might be "up to" something, that he had an object in securing a foothold in the house. But in his heart Waythorn was sure of Haskett's single-mindedness; he even guessed in the latter a mild contempt for such advantages as his relation with the Waythorns might offer. Haskett's sincerity of purpose made him invulnerable, and his successor had to accept him as a lien on the property.

* * *

Mr. Sellers was sent to Europe to recover from his gout, and Varick's affairs hung on Waythorn's hands. The negotiations were prolonged and complicated; they necessitated frequent conferences between the two men, and the interests of the firm forbade Waythorn's suggesting that his client should transfer his business to another office.

Varick appeared well in the transaction. In moments of relaxation his coarse streak appeared, and Waythorn dreaded his geniality; but in the office he was concise and clear-headed, with a flattering deference to Waythorn's judgment. Their business relations being so affably established, it would have been absurd for the two men to ignore each other in society. The first time they met in a drawing-room, Varick took up their intercourse in the same easy key, and his hostess's grateful glance obliged Waythorn to respond to it. After that they ran across each other frequently, and one evening at a ball Waythorn, wandering through the remoter rooms, came upon Varick seated beside his wife. She colored a little, and faltered in what she was saying; but Varick nodded to Waythorn without rising, and the latter strolled on.

In the carriage, on the way home, he broke out nervously: "I didn't know you spoke to Varick."

Her voice trembled a little. "It's the first time—he happened to be standing near me; I didn't know what to do. It's so awkward, meeting everywhere—and he said you had been very kind about some business."

"That's different," said Waythorn.

She paused a moment. "I'll do just as you wish," she returned pliantly. "I thought it would be less awkward to speak to him when we meet."

Her pliancy was beginning to sicken him. Had she really no will of her own—no theory about her relation to these men? She had accepted Haskett—did she mean to accept Varick? It was "less awkward," as she had said, and her instinct was to evade difficulties or to circumvent them. With sudden vividness Waythorn saw how the instinct had developed. She was "as easy as an old shoe"—a shoe that too many feet had worn. Her elasticity was the result of tension in too many different directions. Alice Haskett—Alice Varick—Alice Waythorn—she had been each in turn, and had left hanging to each name a little of her privacy, a little of her personality, a little of the inmost self where the unknown god abides.

"Yes—it's better to speak to Varick," said Waythorn wearily.

v

The winter wore on, and society took advantage of the Waythorns' acceptance of Varick. Harassed hostesses were grateful to them for bridging over a social difficulty, and Mrs. Waythorn was held up as a miracle of good taste. Some experimental spirits could not resist the diversion of throwing Varick and his former wife together, and there were those who thought he found a zest in the propinquity. But Mrs. Waythorn's conduct remained irreproachable. She neither avoided Varick nor sought him out. Even Waythorn could not but admit that she had discovered the solution of the newest social problem.

He had married her without giving much thought to that problem. He had fancied that a woman can shed her past like a man. But now he saw that Alice was bound to hers both by the circumstances which forced her into continued relation with it, and by the traces it had left on her nature. With grim irony Waythorn compared himself to a member of a syndicate. He held so many shares in his wife's personality and his predecessors were his partners in the business. If there had been any element of passion in the transaction he would have felt less deteriorated by it. The fact that Alice took her change of husbands like a change of weather reduced the situation to mediocrity. He could have forgiven her for blunders, for excesses; for resisting Haskett, for yielding to Varick; for anything but her acquiescence and her tact. She reminded him of a juggler tossing knives; but the knives were blunt and she knew they would never cut her.

And then, gradually, habit formed a protecting surface for his sensibilities. If he paid for each day's comfort with the small change of his illusions, he grew daily to value the comfort more and set less store upon the coin. He had drifted into a dulling propinquity with Haskett and Varick and he took refuge in the cheap revenge of satirizing the situation. He even began to reckon up the advantages which accrued from it, to ask himself if it were not better to own a third of a wife who knew how to make a man happy than a whole one who had lacked opportunity to acquire the art. For it was an art, and made up, like all others, of concessions, eliminations and embellishments; of lights judiciously thrown and shadows skilfully softened. His wife knew exactly how to manage the lights, and he knew exactly to what training she owed her skill. He even tried to trace the source of his obligations, to discriminate between the influences which had combined to produce his domestic happiness: he perceived that Haskett's commonness had made Alice worship good breeding, while Varick's liberal construction of the marriage bond had taught her to value the conjugal virtues; so that he was directly indebted to his predecessors for the devotion which made his life easy if not inspiring.

From this phase he passed into that of complete acceptance. He ceased to satirize himself because time had dulled the irony of the situation and the joke lost its humor with its sting. Even the sight of Haskett's hat on the hall table had ceased to touch the springs of epigram. The hat was often seen there now, for it had been decided that it was better for Lily's father to visit her than for the little girl to go to his boarding-house. Waythorn, having acquiesced in this arrangement, had been surprised to find how little difference it made. Haskett was never obtrusive, and the few visitors who met him on the stairs were unaware of his identity. Waythorn did not know how often he saw Alice, but with himself Haskett was seldom in contact.

One afternoon, however, he learned on entering that Lily's father was waiting to see him. In the library he found Haskett occupying a chair in his usual provisional way. Waythorn always felt grateful to him for not leaning back.

"I hope you'll excuse me, Mr. Waythorn," he said rising. "I wanted to see Mrs. Waythorn about Lily, and your man asked me to wait here till she came in."

"Of course," said Waythorn, remembering a sudden leak had that morning given over the drawing-room to the plumbers.

He opened his cigar-case and held it out to his visitor, and Haskett's acceptance seemed to mark a fresh stage in their intercourse. The spring evening was chilly, and Waythorn invited his guest to draw up his chair to the fire. He meant to find an excuse to leave Haskett in a moment; but he was tired and cold, and after all the little man no longer jarred him.

The two were enclosed in the intimacy of their blended cigar-smoke when the door opened and Varick walked into the room. Waythorn rose abruptly. It was the first time that Varick had come to the house, and the surprise of seeing him, combined with the singular inopportuneness of his arrival, gave a new edge to Waythorn's blunted sensibilities. He stared at his visitor without speaking.

Varick seemed too preoccupied to notice his host's embarrassment.

"My dear fellow," he exclaimed in his most expansive tone, "I must apologize for tumbling in on you in this way, but I was too late to catch you down town, and so I thought——"

He stopped short, catching sight of Haskett, and his sanguine color deepened to a flush which spread vividly under his scant blond hair. But in a moment he recovered himself and nodded slightly. Haskett returned the bow in silence, and Waythorn was still groping for speech when the footman came in carrying a tea-table.

The intrusion offered a welcome vent to Waythorn's nerves. "What the deuce are you bringing this here for?" he said sharply.

"I beg your pardon, sir, but the plumbers are still in the drawing-room, and Mrs. Waythorn said she would have tea in the library." The footman's perfectly respectful tone implied a reflection on Waythorn's reasonableness.

"Oh, very well," said the latter resignedly, and the footman proceeded to open the folding tea-table and set out its complicated appointments. While this interminable process continued the three men stood motionless, watching it with a fascinated stare, till Waythorn, to break the silence, said to Varick: "Won't you have a cigar?"

He held out the case he had just tendered to Haskett, and Varick helped himself with a smile. Waythorn looked about for a match, and finding none, proffered a light from his own cigar. Haskett, in the background, held his ground mildly, examining his cigar-tip now and then, and stepping forward at the right moment to knock its ashes into the fire.

The footman at last withdrew, and Varick immediately began: "If I could just say half a word to you about this business——"

"Certainly," stammered Waythorn; "in the dining-room——"

But as he placed his hand on the door it opened without, and his wife appeared on the threshold.

She came in fresh and smiling, in her street dress and hat, shedding a fragrance from the boa which she loosened in advancing.

"Shall we have tea in here, dear?" she began; and then she caught sight of Varick. Her smile deepened, veiling a slight tremor of surprise.

"Why, how do you do?" she said with a distinct note of pleasure.

As she shook hands with Varick she saw Haskett standing behind him. Her smile faded for a moment, but she recalled it quickly, with a scarcely perceptible side-glance at Waythorn.

"How do you do, Mr. Haskett?" she said, and shook hands with him a shade less cordially.

The three men stood awkwardly before her, till Varick always the most self-possessed, dashed into an explanatory phrase.

"We—I had to see Waythorn a moment on business," he stammered, brick-red from chin to nape.

Haskett stepped forward with his air of mild obstinacy. "I am sorry to intrude; but you appointed five o'clock——" he directed his resigned glance to the time-piece on the mantel.

She swept aside their embarrassment with a charming gesture of hospitality.

"I'm so sorry—I'm always late; but the afternoon was so lovely." She stood drawing off her gloves, propitiatory and graceful, diffusing about her a sense of ease and familiarity in which the situation lost its grotesqueness. "But before talking business," she added brightly, "I'm sure every one wants a cup of tea."

She dropped into her low chair by the tea-table, and the two visitors, as if drawn by her smile, advanced to receive the cups she held out.

She glanced about for Waythorn, and he took the third cup with a laugh.

1869 ~ Edwin Arlington Robinson ~ 1935

THE STORY of Robinson's life is simple and uneventful. Born of Anglo-Saxon ancestry in Head Tide, Maine, where his father was a grain dealer, he was taken by the family to Gardiner at a very early age. After completing the course in the local high school, he entered Harvard in 1891. He remained only two years, because his father's illness made it necessary for him to be self-supporting. In 1896 a small, privately printed volume appeared under the title of The Torrent and the Night Before, to be followed the succeeding year by The Children of the Night. Shortly after this he moved to New York in order to be closer to the literary market. The attention of President Roosevelt was drawn to his work by the publication of Captain Craig and Other Poems (1902) with the very practical result that he offered Robinson an appointment in the New York Custom House, which he held from 1905 to 1910. Robinson was never married. He spent his winters in Brooklyn and his summers at the MacDowell Colony in Peterborough, New Hampshire, where he did most of his writing. After 1910 he published some twenty volumes of poetry, including The Man Against the Sky (1916), Merlin (1917), Lancelot (1920), Tristram (1927), The Glory of the Nightingales (1930), and Matthias at the Door (1931).

Robinson was shy and retiring. He shrank from dramatizing himself, was averse to lecturing and public reading of his poetry, and did not allow himself to become the victim of press-agent and publicity enterprises. Aside from editing the letters of a friend, he devoted himself exclusively to poetry, accepting the slow but growing recognition of his work with quiet dignity.

Robinson is a poet of considerable talent and insight. His best poems are the shorter ones in which his mastery of technique and language are not interfered with by the need to fill pages and to extend what had best been expressed in concentration. For his early poems he used characters (some imagined, some remembered) from "Tilbury Town"; these characters are presented usually in a moment of crisis to which they react blindly, awkwardly, or despairingly. As the poems demonstrate, Robinson is interested both in emphasizing the futile but intrinsically valuable courage of man and in ridiculing pretense and stupidity. In his best poems, the dramatic burden of the incident is carried competently and made significant by form and language. When his "philosophy," which is at best confused, is expressed directly in his poems (as in the title poem of The Man Against the Sky and in "Credo")—that is, not given any or given little dramatic context—the result is very unfortunate. He seems forced to expose the confidence of man, to point to his actual helplessness, and finally to advise a stoicism born of frustration; he is hesitant, vague, tortured, and awkward; his formal excellence collapses under the weight of such necessity. He has given many a cultural historian a field day in these poems, but has scarcely added to his literary importance.

This fondness for the unusual, the eccentric, and the frustrate is paralleled to a degree by the method of artistic treatment. Early in life Robinson came under the enduring influence of Thomas Hardy and George Crabbe. As a result of this influence he stripped poetry of all extraneous adornments, rejected all artistic superfluities, and reduced the matter of presentation to an objectivity of almost steellike hardness. He said he formed the habit, as a young man, of "fishing" for the right word to convey an idea or a mood. He claimed adherence to no literary theory, and endeavored to do "as well as I can what insists on being done." In view of this individualism, it is interesting to note that he avoided free verse, preferring the conventional form, in which he sought to combine the rhythm of speech with that of the verse patterns. The poet must seek the "fearful truth," and present it with utter fearlessness, no matter where it leads. These ideals he steadily pursued; he belonged to no school of poetry, and followed the gleam of his youth irrespective of the bewildering lights of changing poetic fashions. He came upon the scene when poetry in America had become largely a matter of verse-mongering in search of prettiness; naturally, his very austere vigor marked him from the beginning. Indeed, he would have been prominent in any period.

Ultimately, Robinson needs to be judged in terms of his successes, which are as great as his failures, and scarcely less frequent. As such a poem as "Eros Turannos" demonstrates, he is a master of the linguistic and formal disciplines which go into the making of an exact poetry. Although opposed to the experimenting of his contemporaries, he is equally forceful in proving that the traditional poetic forms are alive and worthy of use. He has been his own answer to his appeal (in The Children of the Night, 1890–1897) for a poet who would dispel the gloom of mediocrity which covered his own time; he was himself the one

To put these little sonnet-men to flight
 Who fashion, in a shrewd mechanic way,
 Songs without souls, that flicker for a day,
 To vanish in irrevocable night.

There is a one-volume Collected Poems of Edwin Arlington Robinson (1937). More recent individual volumes are Dionysus in Doubt (1925); Tristram (1927); Sonnets, 1889–1927 (1928); Fortunatus (1928); Modred, a Fragment (1929); The Prodigal Son (1929); Cavender's House (1929); The Glory of the Nightingales (1930); Matthias at the Door (1931); Nicodemus (1932); Talifer (1933); Amaranth (1934); King Jasper (1935). A full-length biography and criticism is Hermann Hagedorn's Edwin Arlington Robinson (1938). M. Van Doren's Edwin Arlington Robinson (1927) is a biographical and critical study. "Edwin A. Robinson," Wilson Bulletin, Nov., 1928, and J. Farrar, ed., The Literary Spotlight (1924) are also biographical. See also *Untriangulated Stars: Letters of E. A. ## THE HOUSE ON THE HILL

A villanelle, giving a glimpse of the vanished New England, the same New England described also by Miss Jewett and Mrs. Freeman.

THEY are all gone away,
The House is shut and still,
There is nothing more to say.

Through broken walls and gray
The winds blow bleak and shrill:
They are all gone away.

Nor is there one to-day
To speak them good or ill:
There is nothing more to say.

Why is it then we stray 10
Around that sunken sill?
They are all gone away,

And our poor fancy-play
For them is wasted skill:
There is nothing more to say.

There is ruin and decay
In the House on the Hill:
They are all gone away,
There is nothing more to say.

RICHARD CORY

Robinson's chief interest was in people, as numerous titles of his poems indicate. "Richard Cory" is a sharply etched portrait.

WHENEVER Richard Cory went down town,
We people on the pavement looked at him:
He was a gentleman from sole to crown,
Clean favored, and imperially slim.

And he was always quietly arrayed,
And he was always human when he talked;
But still he fluttered pulses when he said,
"Good-morning," and he glittered when he walked.

And he was rich—yes, richer than a king—
And admirably schooled in every grace: 10
In fine, we thought that he was everything
To make us wish that we were in his place.

So on we worked, and waited for the light,
And went without the meat, and cursed the bread;
And Richard Cory, one calm summer night,
Went home and put a bullet through his head.

CALVARY

FRIENDLESS and faint, with martyred steps and slow,
Faint for the flesh, but for the spirit free,
Stung by the mob that came to see the show,
The Master toiled along to Calvary;
We gibed him, as he went, with houndish glee,
Till his dimmed eyes for us did overflow;
We cursed his vengeless hands thrice wretch-edly,—
And this was nineteen hundred years ago.

But after nineteen hundred years the shame Still clings, and we have not made good the loss 10
That outraged faith has entered in his name.
Ah, when shall come love's courage to be strong!
Tell me, O Lord—tell me, O Lord how long
Are we to keep Christ writhing on the cross!

GEORGE CRABBE

Crabbe was one of Robinson's favorite poets. This chastely wrought sonnet is a sincere tribute to a fellow poet as well as an excellent evaluation of his work and influence.

GIVE him the darkest inch your shelf allows,
Hide him in lonely garrets, if you will,—
But his hard, human pulse is throbbing still
With the sure strength that fearless truth endows.
In spite of all fine science disavows,
Of his plain excellence and stubborn skill
There yet remains what fashion cannot kill,
Though years have thinned the laurel from his brows.

Whether or not we read him, we can feel
From time to time the vigor of his name 10
Against us like a finger for the shame
And emptiness of what our souls reveal
In books that are as altars where we kneel
To consecrate the flicker, not the flame.

CREDO

I CANNOT find my way: there is no star
 In all the shrouded heavens anywhere;
 And there is not a whisper in the air
 Of any living voice but one so far
 That I can hear it only as a bar
 Of lost, imperial music, played when fair
 And angel fingers wove, and unaware,
 Dead leaves to garlands where no roses are.

No, there is not a glimmer, nor a call,
 For one that welcomes, welcomes when he fears, 10
 The black and awful chaos of the night;
 For through it all—above, beyond it all—
 I know the far-sent message of the years,
 I feel the coming glory of the Light.

THE TOWN DOWN THE RIVER

I

SAID the Watcher by the Way
 To the young and the unladen,
 To the boy and to the maiden,
 "God be with you both to-day.
 First your song came ringing,
 Now you come, you two,—
 Knowing naught of what you do,
 Or of what your dreams are bringing.

"O you children who go singing
 To the Town down the River, 10
 Where the millions cringe and shiver,
 Tell me what you know to-day;
 Tell me how far you are going,
 Tell me how you find your way.
 O you children who go dreaming,
 Tell me what you dream to-day."

"He is old and we have heard him,"
 Said the boy then to the maiden;
 "He is old and heavy laden
 With a load we throw away. 20
 Care may come to find us,
 Age may lay us low;
 Still, we seek the light we know,
 And the dead we leave behind us.

"Did he think that he would blind us
 Into such a small believing

As to live without achieving,
 When the lights have led so far?
 Let him watch or let him wither,—
 Shall he tell us where we are? 30
 We know best who go together,
 Downward, onward, and so far."

II

Said the Watcher by the Way
 To the fiery folk that hastened,
 To the loud and the unchastened,
 "You are strong, I see, to-day.
 Strength and hope may lead you
 To the journey's end,—
 Each to be the other's friend 40
 If the Town should fail to need you.

"And are ravens there to feed you
 In the Town down the River,
 Where the gift appalls the giver
 And youth hardens day by day?
 O you brave and you unshaken,
 Are you truly on your way?
 And are sirens in the River,
 That you come so far to-day?"

"You are old, and we have listened,"
 Said the voice of one who halted; 50
 "You are sage and self-exalted,
 But your way is not our way.
 You that cannot aid us
 Give us words to eat.
 Be assured that they are sweet,
 And that we are as God made us.

"Not in vain have you delayed us,
 Though the River still be calling
 Through the twilight that is falling
 And the Town be still so far. 60
 By the whirlwind of your wisdom
 Leagues are lifted as leaves are;
 But a king without a kingdom
 Fails us, who have come so far."

III

Said the Watcher by the Way
 To the slower folk who stumbled,
 To the weak and the world-humbled,
 "Tell me how you fare to-day.
 Some with ardor shaken,
 All with honor scarred, 70

Do you falter, finding hard
The far chance that you have taken?

“Or, do you at length awaken
To an antic retribution,
Goading to a new confusion
The drugged hopes of yesterday?
O you poor mad men that hobble,
Will you not return, or stay?
Do you trust, you broken people,
To a dawn without the day?” 80

“You speak well of what you know not,”
Muttered one; and then a second:
“You have begged and you have beckoned,
But you see us on our way.
Who are you to scold us,
Knowing what we know?
Jeremiah, long ago,
Said as much as you have told us.

“As we are, then, you behold us:
Derelicts of all conditions, 90
Poets, rogues, and sick physicians,
Plodding forward from afar;
Forward now into the darkness
Where the men before us are;
Forward, onward, out of grayness,
To the light that shone so far.”

IV

Said the Watcher by the Way
To some aged ones who lingered,
To the shrunken, the claw-fingered,
“So you come for me to-day.” — 100
“Yes, to give you warning;
You are old,” one said;
“You have old hairs on your head,
Fit for laurel, not for scorning.

“From the first of early morning
We have toiled along to find you;
We, as others, have maligned you,
But we need your scorn to-day.
By the light that we saw shining,
Let us not be lured away; 110
Let us hear no River calling
When to-morrow is to-day.”

“But your lanterns are unlighted
And the Town is far before you:

Let us hasten, I implore you,”
Said the Watcher by the Way.
“Long have I waited,
Longer have I known
That the Town would have its own,
And the call be for the fated. 120

“In the name of all created,
Let us hear no more, my brothers;
Are we older than all others?
Are the planets in our way?” —
“Hark,” said one; “I hear the River,
Calling always, night and day.” —
“Forward, then! The lights are shining,”
Said the Watcher by the Way. 1908

FLAMMONDE

This is not a mere etching, but a well-rounded picture, filled in with details and comparable to a painted portrait.

THE man Flammonde, from God knows where,
With firm address and foreign air,
With news of nations in his talk
And something royal in his walk,
With glint of iron in his eyes,
But never doubt, nor yet surprise,
Appeared, and stayed, and held his head
As one by kings accredited.

Erect, with his alert repose
About him, and about his clothes, 10
He pictured all tradition hears
Of what we owe to fifty years.
His cleansing heritage of taste
Paraded neither want nor waste;
And what he needed for his fee
To live, he borrowed graciously.

He never told us what he was,
Or what mischance, or other cause,
Had banished him from better days
To play the Prince of Castaways. 20
Meanwhile he played surpassing well
A part, for most, unplayable;
In fine, one pauses, half afraid
To say for certain that he played.

For that, one may as well forego
Conviction as to yes or no;

Nor can I say just how intense
 Would then have been the difference
 To several, who, having striven
 In vain to get what he was given, 30
 Would see the stranger taken on
 By friends not easy to be won.

Moreover, many a malcontent
 He soothed and found munificent;
 His courtesy beguiled and foiled
 Suspicion that his years were soiled;
 His mien distinguished any crowd,
 His credit strengthened when he bowed;
 And women, young and old, were fond
 Of looking at the man Flammonde. 40

There was a woman in our town
 On whom the fashion was to frown;
 But while our talk renewed the tinge
 Of a long-faded scarlet fringe,
 The man Flammonde saw none of that,
 And what he saw we wondered at—
 That none of us, in her distress,
 Could hide or find our littleness.

There was a boy that all agreed
 Had shut within him the rare seed 50
 Of learning. We could understand,
 But none of us could lift a hand.
 The man Flammonde appraised the youth,
 And told a few of us the truth;
 And thereby, for a little gold,
 A flowered future was unrolled.

There were two citizens who fought
 For years and years, and over nought;
 They made life awkward for their friends,
 And shortened their own dividends. 60
 The man Flammonde said what was wrong
 Should be made right; nor was it long
 Before they were again in line,
 And had each other in to dine.

And these I mention are but four
 Of many out of many more.
 So much for them. But what of him—
 So firm in every look and limb?
 What small satanic sort of kink
 Was in his brain? What broken link 70
 Withheld him from the destinies
 That came so near to being his?

What was he, when we came to sift
 His meaning, and to note the drift
 Of incommunicable ways
 That make us ponder while we praise?
 Why was it that his charm revealed
 Somehow the surface of a shield?
 What was it that we never caught?
 What was he, and what was he not? 80

How much it was of him we met
 We cannot ever know; nor yet
 Shall all he gave us quite atone
 For what was his, and his alone;
 Nor need we now, since he knew best,
 Nourish an ethical unrest:
 Rarely at once will nature give
 The power to be Flammonde and live.

We cannot know how much we learn
 From those who never will return, 90
 Until a flash of unforeseen Remembrance falls on what has been.
 We've each a darkening hill to climb;
 And this is why, from time to time
 In Tilbury Town, we look beyond
 Horizons for the man Flammonde.

MINIVER CHEEVY

MINIVER Cheevy, child of scorn,
 Grew lean while he assailed the seasons;
 He wept that he was ever born,
 And he had reasons.

Miniver loved the days of old
 When swords were bright and steeds were prancing;
 The vision of a warrior bold
 Would set him dancing.

Miniver sighed for what was not,
 And dreamed, and rested from his labors; 10
 He dreamed of Thebes and Camelot,
 And Priam's neighbors.

Miniver mourned the ripe renown
 That made so many a name so fragrant;
 He mourned Romance, now on the town,
 And Art, a vagrant.

Miniver loved the Medici,
 Albeit he had never seen one;
 He would have sinned incessantly
 Could he have been one. 20

Miniver cursed the commonplace
 And eyed a khaki suit with loathing:
 He missed the mediaeval grace
 Of iron clothing.

Miniver scorned the gold he sought,
 But sore annoyed was he without it:
 Miniver thought, and thought, and thought
 And thought about it.

Miniver Cheevy, born too late, 29
 Scratched his head and kept on thinking;
 Miniver coughed, and called it fate,
 And kept on drinking. 1907

EROS TURANNOS

SHE fears him, and will always ask
 What fated her to choose him;
 She meets in his engaging mask
 All reasons to refuse him;
 But what she meets and what she fears
 Are less than are the downward years,
 Drawn slowly to the foamless weirs
 Of age, were she to lose him.

Between a blurred sagacity
 That once had power to sound him, 10
 And Love, that will not let him be
 The Judas that she found him,
 Her pride assuages her almost,
 As if it were alone the cost.—
 He sees that he will not be lost,
 And waits and looks around him.

A sense of ocean and old trees
 Envelops and allures him;
 Tradition, touching all he sees,
 Beguiles and reassures him; 20
 And all her doubts of what he says
 Are dimmed with what she knows of days—
 Till even prejudice delays
 And fades, and she secures him.

The falling leaf inaugurates
 The reign of her confusion;

The pounding wave reverberates
 The dirge of her illusion;
 And home, where passion lived and died,
 Becomes a place where she can hide, 30
 While all the town and harbour side
 Vibrate with her seclusion.

We tell you, tapping on our brows,
 The story as it should be—
 As if the story of a house
 Were told, or ever could be;
 We'll have no kindly veil between
 Her visions and those we have seen—
 As if we guessed what hers have been,
 Or what they are or would be. 40

Meanwhile we do no harm; for they
 That with a god have striven,
 Not hearing much of what we say,
 Take what the god has given;
 Though like waves breaking it may be,
 Or like a changed familiar tree,
 Or like a stairway to the sea
 Where down the blind are driven. 1916

LUKE HAVERGAL

Go to the western gate, Luke Havergal,
 There where the vines cling crimson on the wall,
 And in the twilight wait for what will come.
 The leaves will whisper there of her, and some,
 Like flying words, will strike you as they fall;
 But go, and if you listen she will call.
 Go to the western gate, Luke Havergal—
 Luke Havergal.

No, there is not a dawn in eastern skies
 To rift the fiery night that's in your eyes; 10
 But there, where western glooms are gathering,
 The dark will end the dark, if anything:
 God slays Himself with every leaf that flies,
 And hell is more than half of paradise.
 No, there is not a dawn in eastern skies—
 In eastern skies.

Out of a grave I come to tell you this,
 Out of a grave I come to quench the kiss
 That flames upon your forehead with a glow
 That blinds you to the way that you must go.

Yes, there is yet one way to where she is, 21
 Bitter, but one that faith may never miss.
 Out of a grave I come to tell you this—
 To tell you this.

There is the western gate, Luke Havergal,
 There are the crimson leaves upon the wall.

Go, for the winds are tearing them away,—
 Nor think to riddle the dead words they say,
 Nor any more to feel them as they fall;
 But go, and if you trust her she will call. 30
 There is the western gate, Luke Havergal—
 Luke Havergal.

(ca. 1894)

1875 -- Robert Frost -- —

ON HIS father's side Frost is of New England ancestry, the family having lived in New Hampshire for seven generations; his mother was a native of Edinburgh, of Lowland Scotch descent. Although he was born, and for ten years lived, in San Francisco, this western environment seems to have made little impression on his mind so far as the subject matter of his work is concerned. On the death of his father, he and his mother moved to Lawrence, Massachusetts, where his paternal grandfather provided a home for them.

Here he was graduated from the local high school, fell in love with Elinor Miriam White, to whom he was later married, and began to write poetry. He entered Dartmouth College, but remained only a few months because the routine pursuit of courses was distasteful to him. At Harvard his venture was scarcely more successful, for he left without a degree at the end of two years. Until 1912 he combined farming, authorship, and teaching, earning very little as a poet, but attracting wide attention through his original methods as a teacher. From 1912 to 1915 he and his family lived in England, where A Boy's Will (1913) and North of Boston (1914) were published and received with enthusiasm. The University of Michigan offered him an appointment without specified academic duties; later he was on the staff of Amherst College. A number of colleges and universities have conferred honorary degrees upon him, and the Pulitzer prize for poetry was twice awarded to him. His permanent home is in Vermont, where he is a neighbor of Dorothy Canfield Fisher.

Besides A Boy's Will and North of Boston, issued in America in 1915, he is the author of Mountain Interval (1916), New Hampshire (1923), West-Running Brook (1928), and A Lone Striker (1933). Although admittedly one of the most American of our poets, he was in reality "discovered" in England. It was only after assurance came from England that Frost was a poet of high caliber that America became hospitable to him. He is now generally recognized as an important poet; discriminating readers regard him highly, and a few of his poems, like "Mending Wall" and "The Death of the Hired Man," have passed into the common vernacular.

In a sense Frost is a traditionalist, for he writes in the accepted forms and meter, frequently in rhyme, yet allowing himself considerable liberty within them.

Not only is he interested artistically in the present, but in a present of a very limited area. The background of his scene extends from Boston northward and westward some three hundred miles, centering for the most part in New Hampshire, and within the confines of this space he finds the facts of life which he transmutes into art. He is of the soil and loves country life and country people, and in his poetry country people and country scenes predominate. In his choice of subject, one notices a certain exclusiveness, for of the many types that might be found even in so restricted an area as central New England, Frost is concerned primarily with the people of the countryside. Nowhere is there a suggestion of an industrial Manchester or even of his own Lawrence. Only the men and women whose roots extend into the soil intrigue him. Their limited, often frustrate experiences, eccentricities, oddities, tragedies, comedies, passions, and philosophy suggest to him the proper matter for poetry.

In a preface to his Collected Poems (1942), Frost describes "The Figure a Poem Makes": "It begins in delight, it inclines to the impulse, it assumes direction with the first line laid down, it runs a course of lucky events, and ends in a clarification of life—not necessarily a great clarification, such as sects and cults are founded on, but in a momentary stay against confusion." The typical Frost poem is written in conventional form (there are really only two meters in English verse, he says: "strict iambic and loose iambic"), treats of native character and landscape, is highly informed with a playful and sometimes a superficial irony, and is sparing in its decorative effects. The "clarification of life" almost never is so explicit as to become didactic; nor is it heavily weighted (as in Robinson at his worst) by a confused philosophic judgment. It is generally implicit and suggested. Often Frost is inclined to a mild form of sentimentality and his exposition is governed by a rather superficial use of his subject.

"The Death of the Hired Man," while it almost deserves its rather extensive reputation, is not altogether successful because of observations bordering on the cliché; "Mending Wall" is similarly afflicted; and there is a playfulness and archness in some of his attitudes that suggest that he is unwilling really to go as far as his subject would seem to warrant. "An Old Man's Winter Night" is almost pure poetry, free of these disturbing and cheapening qualities. "Two Tramps in Mud Time," while sometimes overly "cute," is an excellent and carefully designed poetic organism, in which the conclusion never escapes its dramatic context.

Even at his worst, Frost is a good poet, his eye always aware of concrete detail, his mind almost always in control of structure. His later poetry (beginning, perhaps, with West-Running Brook, 1928) is increasingly abstract, skeptical, and personal; fewer and fewer poems imply and suggest by means of economically conceived and objective detail; more and more often a statement is made with little or no genuinely concrete evidence or context. The last poems are good enough for a view of Frost as spokesman of his point-of-view; one uses them to enforce and develop inferences made from his earlier verse.

A Boy's Will (1913); North of Boston (1914); Mountain Interval (1916); New Hampshire (1923); West-Running Brook (1928); A Further Range (1936); The Witness Tree (1942) have been brought together in Collected Poems of Robert Frost (1942). In addition he has published The Lone Striker (1933); Three Poems (1935); A Masque of Reason (1945); A Masque of Mercy (1947); Steeple-Bush (1947). He is the author of a play, A Way Out (Seven Arts, Feb., 1917), also included in H. L. Cohen, ed., More One-Act Plays by Modern Authors (1927). S. Cox, Robert Frost, Original "Ordinary Man" (1929), and G. B. Munson, Robert Frost (1927), are biographies. ### THE TRIAL BY EXISTENCE

EVEN the bravest that are slain
 Shall not dissemble their surprise
 On waking to find valor reign,
 Even as on earth, in paradise;
 And where they sought without the sword
 Wide fields of asphodel fore'er
 To find that the utmost reward
 Of daring should be still to dare.

The light of heaven falls whole and white
 And is not shattered into dyes, 10
 The light forever is morning light;
 The hills are verdured pasture-wise;
 The angel hosts with freshness go,
 And seek with laughter what to brave;—
 And binding all is the lushed snow
 Of the far-distant breaking wave.

And from a cliff-top is proclaimed
 The gathering of the souls for birth,
 The trial by existence named,
 The obscuration upon earth. 20
 And the slant spirits trooping by
 In streams and cross- and counter-streams
 Can but give ear to that sweet cry
 For its suggestion of what dreams!

And the more loitering are turned
 To view once more the sacrifice
 Of those who for some good discerned
 Will gladly give up paradise.
 And a white shimmering concourse rolls
 Toward the throne to witness there 30
 The speeding of devoted souls
 Which God makes his especial care.

And none are taken but who will,
 Having first heard the life read out
 That opens earthward, good and ill,
 Beyond the shadow of a doubt;
 And very beautifully God limns,
 And tenderly, life's little dream,
 But naught extenuates or dims,
 Setting the thing that is supreme. 40

Nor is there wanting in the press
 Some spirit to stand simply forth,
 Heroic in its nakedness,
 Against the uttermost of earth.
 The tale of earth's unhonored things
 Sounds nobler there than 'neath the sun;
 And the mind whirls and the heart sings,
 And a shout greets the daring one.

But always God speaks at the end:
 "One thought in agony of strife 50
 The bravest would have by for friend,
 The memory that he chose the life;
 But the pure fate to which you go
 Admits no memory of choice,
 Or the woe were not earthly woe
 To which you give the assenting voice."

And so the choice must be again,
 But the last choice is still the same;
 And the awe passes wonder then,
 And a hush falls for all acclaim. 60
 And God has taken a flower of gold
 And broken it, and used therefrom
 The mystic link to bind and hold
 Spirit to matter till death come.

'Tis of the essence of life here,
 Though we choose greatly, still to lack
 The lasting memory at all clear,
 That life has for us on the wrack
 Nothing but what we somehow chose;
 Thus are we wholly stripped of pride 70
 In the pain that has but one close,
 Bearing it crushed and mystified.

MENDING WALL

Stone walls still serve as fences on many New England farms. During the winter so many of the stones become dislodged by the "groundswell" and by thoughtless hunters that it is necessary to mend the wall in the spring. In case the wall separates adjoining properties, the neighbors "walk the line," each one replacing the stones which have fallen on his side. This custom forms the basis of the poem.

SOMETHING there is that doesn't love a wall,
 That sends the frozen-ground-swell under it,
 And spills the upper boulders in the sun;
 And makes gaps even two can pass abreast.
 The work of hunters is another thing:
 I have come after them and made repair
 Where they have left not one stone on a stone,
 But they would have the rabbit out of hiding,
 To please the yelping dogs. The gaps I mean,
 No one has seen them made or heard them 10
 made,

But at spring mending-time we find them there.
 I let my neighbor know beyond the hill;
 And on a day we meet to walk the line
 And set the wall between us once again.
 We keep the wall between us as we go.
 To each the boulders that have fallen to each.
 And some are loaves and some so nearly balls
 We have to use a spell to make them balance:
 "Stay where you are until our backs are turned!"

We wear our fingers rough with handling
 them. 20

Oh, just another kind of out-door game,
 One on a side. It comes to little more:
 There where it is we do not need the wall:
 He is all pine and I am apple orchard.
 My apple trees will never get across
 And eat the cones under his pines, I tell him.
 He only says, "Good fences make good neighbors."

Spring is the mischief in me, and I wonder
 If I could put a notion in his head:
 "Why do they make good neighbors? Isn't it Where there are cows? But here there are no cows. 31

Before I built a wall I'd ask to know
 What I was walling in or walling out,
 And to whom I was like to give offense.
 Something there is that doesn't love a wall,
 That wants it down." I could say "Elves" to
 him,

But it's not elves exactly, and I'd rather
 He said it for himself. I see him there
 Bringing a stone grasped firmly by the top
 In each hand, like an old-stone savage armed.

He moves in darkness as it seems to me, 41
 Not of woods only and the shade of trees.
 He will not go behind his father's saying,
 And he likes having thought of it so well
 He says again, "Good fences make good neighbors."

THE DEATH OF THE HIRED MAN

MARY sat musing on the lamp-flame at the table

Waiting for Warren. When she heard his step,
 She ran on tiptoe down the darkened passage
 To meet him in the doorway with the news
 And put him on his guard. "Silas is back."
 She pushed him outward with her through the door

And shut it after her. "Be kind," she said.
 She took the market things from Warren's
 arms

And set them on the porch, then drew him
 down

To sit beside her on the wooden steps. 10

"When was I ever anything but kind to him?
 But I'll not have the fellow back," he said.

"I told him so last haying, didn't I?
 'If he left then,' I said, 'that ended it.'
 What good is he? Who else will harbor him
 At his age for the little he can do?

What help he is there's no depending on.
 Off he goes always when I need him most.
 'He thinks he ought to earn a little pay,
 Enough at least to buy tobacco with, 20

So he won't have to beg and be beholden.'
 'All right,' I say, 'I can't afford to pay Any fixed wages, though I wish I could.'
 'Someone else can.' 'Then someone else will have to.'

I shouldn't mind his bettering himself
 If that was what it was. You can be certain,
 When he begins like that, there's someone at him

Trying to coax him off with pocket-money,—
 In haying time, when any help is scarce.
 In winter he comes back to us. I'm done." 30

"Sh! not so loud: he'll hear you," Mary said.

"I want him to: he'll have to soon or late."

"He's worn out. He's asleep beside the stove.
 When I came up from Rowe's I found him
 here,
 Huddled against the barn-door fast asleep,
 A miserable sight, and frightening, too—
 You needn't smile—I didn't recognise him—
 I wasn't looking for him—and he's changed.
 Wait till you see."

"Where did you say he'd been?"

"He didn't say. I dragged him to the house, 40
 And gave him tea and tried to make him smoke.
 I tried to make him talk about his travels.
 Nothing would do: he just kept nodding off."

"What did he say? Did he say anything?"

"But little."

"Anything? Mary, confess
 He said he'd come to ditch the meadow for me."

"Warren!"

"But did he? I just want to know."

"Of course he did. What would you have him say?"

Surely you wouldn't grudge the poor old man
 Some humble way to save his self-respect. 50
 He added, if you really care to know,
 He meant to clear the upper pasture, too.
 That sounds like something you have heard before?

Warren, I wish you could have heard the way
 He jumbled everything, I stopped to look
 Two or three times—he made me feel so queer—

To see if he was talking in his sleep.
 He ran on Harold Wilson—you remember—
 The boy you had in haying four years since.
 He's finished school, and teaching in his college. 60

Silas declares you'll have to get him back.
 He says they two will make a team for work:
 Between them they will lay this farm as smooth!

The way he mixed that in with other things.
 He thinks young Wilson a likely lad, though daft

On education—you know how they fought
 All through July under the blazing sun,
 Silas up on the cart to build the load,
 Harold along beside to pitch it on."

"Yes, I took care to keep well out of earshot."

"Well, those days trouble Silas like a dream. 71
 You wouldn't think they would. How some things linger!

Harold's young college boy's assurance piqued
 him.

After so many years he still keeps finding
 Good arguments he sees he might have used.
 I sympathize. I know just how it feels
 To think of the right thing to say too late.
 Harold's associated in his mind with Latin.
 He asked me what I thought of Harold's saying
 He studied Latin like the violin 80
 Because he liked it—that an argument!
 He said he couldn't make the boy believe
 He could find water with a hazel prong—
 Which showed how much good school had ever done him.

He wanted to go over that. But most of all
 He thinks if he could have another chance
 To teach him how to build a load of hay——"

"I know, that's Silas' one accomplishment.
 He bundles every forkful in its place,
 And tags and numbers it for future reference,
 So he can find and easily dislodge it 91
 In the unloading. Silas does that well.
 He takes it out in bunches like big birds' nests.
 You never see him standing on the hay
 He's trying to lift, straining to lift himself."

"He thinks if he could teach him that, he'd be
 Some good perhaps to someone in the world.
 He hates to see a boy the fool of books.
 Poor Silas, so concerned for other folk,
 And nothing to look backward to with pride,
 And nothing to look forward to with hope, 101
 So now and never any different."

Part of a moon was falling down the west,
 Dragging the whole sky with it to the hills.
 Its light poured softly in her lap. She saw
 And spread her apron to it. She put out her hand
 Among the harp-like morning-glory strings,

Taut with the dew from garden bed to eaves,
 As if she played unheard the tenderness
 That wrought on him beside her in the night.
 "Warren," she said, "he has come home to die: 111

You needn't be afraid he'll leave you this time."

"Home," he mocked gently.

"Yes, what else but home?
 It all depends on what you mean by home.
 Of course he's nothing to us, any more
 Than was the hound that came a stranger to us
 Out of the woods, worn out upon the trail."

("Home is the place where, when you have to go there,
 They have to take you in.")

"I should have called it Something you somehow haven't to deserve."

Warren leaned out and took a step or two, 121
 Picked up a little stick, and brought it back
 And broke it in his hand and tossed it by.
 "Silas has better claim on us, you think,
 Than on his brother? Thirteen little miles
 As the road winds would bring him to his door.
 Silas has walked that far no doubt today.
 Why didn't he go there? His brother's rich,
 A somebody—director in the bank."

"He never told us that."

"We know it though." 130

"I think his brother ought to help, of course.
 I'll see to that if there is need. He ought of right
 To take him in, and might be willing to—
 He may be better than appearances.
 But have some pity on Silas. Do you think
 If he'd had any pride in claiming kin
 Or anything he looked for from his brother,
 He'd keep so still about him all this time?"

"I wonder what's between them."

"I can tell you.
 Silas is what he is—we wouldn't mind him—
 But just the kind that kinsfolk can't abide. 141

He never did a thing so very bad.
 He don't know why he isn't quite as good
 As anyone. He won't be made ashamed
 To please his brother, worthless though he is."

"I can't think Si ever hurt anyone."

"No, but he hurt my heart the way he lay
 And rolled his old head on that sharp-edged chair-back.

He wouldn't let me put him on the lounge.
 You must go in and see what you can do. 150
 I made the bed up for him there tonight.
 You'll be surprised at him—how much he's broken.

His working days are done; I'm sure of it."

"I'd not be in a hurry to say that."

"I haven't been. Go, look, see for yourself.
 But, Warren, please remember how it is:
 He's come to help you ditch the meadow.
 He has a plan. You mustn't laugh at him.
 He may not speak of it, and then he may.
 I'll sit and see if that small sailing cloud 160
 Will hit or miss the moon."

It hit the moon.

Then there were three there, making a dim row,

The moon, the little silver cloud, and she.
 Warren returned—too soon, it seemed to her,
 Slipped to her side, caught up her hand and waited.

"Warren," she questioned.

"Dead," was all he answered.

THE MOUNTAIN

THE mountain held the town as in a shadow.
 I saw so much before I slept there once:
 I noticed that I missed stars in the west,
 Where its black body cut into the sky.
 Near me it seemed: I felt it like a wall
 Behind which I was sheltered from the wind.
 And yet between the town and it I found,
 When I walked forth at dawn to see new things,
 Were fields, a river, and beyond, more fields.
 The river at the time was fallen away, 10

And made a widespread brawl on cobble-
 stones;

But the signs showed what it had done in
 spring;

Good grassland gullied out, and in the grass
 Ridges of sand, and driftwood stripped of bark.
 I crossed the river and swung round the mountain.

And there I met a man who moved so slow
 With white-faced oxen in a heavy cart,
 It seemed no harm to stop him altogether.
 "What town is this?" I asked.

"This? Lunenburg."

Then I was wrong: the town of my sojourn,
 Beyond the bridge, was not that of the mountain, 21

But only felt at night its shadowy presence.
 "Where is your village? Very far from here?"

"There is no village—only scattered farms.

We were but sixty voters last election.

We can't in nature grow to many more:

That thing takes all the room!" He moved his goad.

The mountain stood there to be pointed at.

Pasture ran up the side a little way,

And then there was a wall of trees and trunks:
 After that only tops of trees, and cliffs 31
 Imperfectly concealed among the leaves.

A dry ravine emerged from under boughs
 Into the pasture.

"That looks like a path.

Is that the way to reach the top from here?—
 Not for this morning, but some other time:
 I must be getting back to breakfast now."

"I don't advise your trying from this side.

There is no proper path, but those that have
 Been up, I understand, have climbed from Ladd's. 40

That's five miles back. You can't mistake the place:

They logged it there last winter some way up.
 I'd take you, but I'm bound the other way."

"You've never climbed it?"

"I've been on the sides

Deer-hunting and trout-fishing. There's a brook

That starts up on it somewhere—I've heard say
 Right on the top, tip-top—a curious thing.

But what would interest you about the brook,
 It's always cold in summer, warm in winter.

One of the great sights going is to see 50

It steam in winter like an ox's breath,
 Until the bushes all along its banks
 Are inch-deep with the frosty spines and bristles—

You know the kind. Then let the sun shine on it!"

"There ought to be a view around the world
 From such a mountain—if it isn't wooded Clear to the top." I saw through leafy screens
 Great granite terraces in sun and shadow,
 Shelves one could rest a knee on getting up—
 With depths behind him sheer a hundred feet;
 Or turn and sit on and look out and down, 61
 With little ferns in crevices at his elbow.

"As to that I can't say. But there's the spring,
 Right on the summit, almost like a fountain.
 That ought to be worth seeing."

"If it's there.

You never saw it?"

"I guess there's no doubt

About its being there. I never saw it.
 It may not be right on the very top:
 It wouldn't have to be a long way down
 To have some head of water from above, 70
 And a good distance down might not be noticed

By anyone who'd come a long way up.
 One time I asked a fellow climbing it
 To look and tell me later how it was."
 "What did he say?"

"He said there was a lake

Somewhere in Ireland on a mountain top."
 "But a lake's different. What about the spring?"
 "He never got up high enough to see.
 That's why I don't advise your trying this side.

He tried this side. I've always meant to go 80
 And look myself, but you know how it is:
 It doesn't seem so much to climb a mountain You've worked around the foot of all your life.

What would I do? Go in my overalls,
 With a big stick, the same as when the cows
 Haven't come down to the bars at milking
 time?

Or with a shotgun for a stray black bear?
 'Twouldn't seem real to climb for climbing it."
 "I shouldn't climb it if I didn't want to—
 Not for the sake of climbing. What's its name?" 90

"We call it Hor: I don't know if that's right."

"Can one walk around it? Would it be too far?"

"You can drive round and keep in Lunenberg,
 But it's as much as ever you can do,
 The boundary lines keep in so close to it.
 Hor is the township, and the township's Hor—
 And a few houses sprinkled round the foot,
 Like boulders broken off the upper cliff,
 Rolled out a little farther than the rest."

"Warm in December, cold in June, you say?"

"I don't suppose the water's changed at all. 101
 You and I know enough to know it's warm Compared with cold, and cold compared with warm.

But all the fun's in how you say a thing."

"You've lived here all your life?"

"Ever since Hor

Was no bigger than a——" What, I did not hear.

He drew the oxen toward him with light touches

Of his slim goad on nose and offside flank, Gave them their marching orders and was moving.

THE BLACK COTTAGE

WE chanced in passing by that afternoon
 To catch it in a sort of special picture
 Among tar-banded ancient cherry trees,
 Set well back from the road in rank lodged grass,

The little cottage we were speaking of,
 A front with just a door between two windows,

Fresh painted by the shower a velvet black.
 We paused, the minister and I, to look.
 He made as if to hold it at arm's length
 Or put the leaves aside that framed it in. 10 "Pretty," he said. "Come in. No one will care."

The path was a vague parting in the grass
 That led us to a weathered window-sill.
 We pressed our faces to the pane. "You see,"
 he said,

"Everything's as she left it when she died.
 Her sons won't sell the house or the things in it.

They say they mean to come and summer here
 Where they were boys. They haven't come this year.

They live so far away—one is out West—
 It will be hard for them to keep their word. 20
 Anyway they won't have the place disturbed."
 A buttoned hair-cloth lounge spread scrolling
   arms
 Under a crayon portrait on the wall
 Done sadly from an old daguerreotype.
 "That was the father as he went to war.
 She always, when she talked about war,
 Sooner or later came and leaned, half knelt,
 Against the lounge beside it, though I doubt
 If such unlikelike lines kept power to stir
 Anything in her after all the years. 30
 He fell at Gettysburg or Fredericksburg,
 I ought to know—it makes a difference which:
 Fredericksburg wasn't Gettysburg, of course.
 But what I'm getting to is how forsaken
 A little cottage this has always seemed;
 Since she went more than ever, but before—
 I don't mean altogether by the lives
 That had gone out of it, the father first,
 Then the two sons, till she was left alone.
 (Nothing could draw her after those two sons.
 She valued the considerate neglect 41
 She had at some cost taught them after years.)
 I mean by the world's having passed it by—
 As we almost got by this afternoon.
 It always seems to me a sort of mark
 To measure how far fifty years have brought us.
 Why not sit down if you are in no haste?
 These doorsteps seldom have a visitor.
 The warping boards pull out their own old nails
 With none to tread and put them in their place. 50
 She had her own idea of things, the old lady.
 And she liked talk. She had seen Garrison
 And Whittier, and had her story of them.
 One wasn't long in learning that she thought Whatever else the Civil War was for
 It wasn't just to keep the States together,
 Nor just to free the slaves, though it did both.
 She wouldn't have believed those ends enough
 To have given outright for them all she gave.
 Her giving somehow touched the principle
 That all men are created free and equal. 61
 And to hear her quaint phrases—so removed From the world's view today of all those things.
 That's a hard mystery of Jefferson's.
 What did he mean? Of course the easy way

Is to decide it simply isn't true.
 It may not be. I heard a fellow say so.
 But never mind, the Welshman got it planted
 Where it will trouble us a thousand years.
 Each age will have to reconsider it. 70
 You couldn't tell her what the West was saying,
 And what the South to her serene belief.
 She had some art of hearing and yet not
 Hearing the latter wisdom of the world.
 White was the only race she ever knew.
 Black she had scarcely seen, and yellow never.
 But how could they be made so very unlike
 By the same hand working in the same stuff?
 She had supposed the war decided that.
 What are you going to do with such a person?
 Strange how such innocence gets its own
   way. 81
 I shouldn't be surprised if in this world
 It were the force that would at last prevail.
 Do you know but for her there was a time
 When to please younger members of the church,
 Or rather say non-members in the church,
 Whom we all have to think of nowadays,
 I would have changed the Creed a very little?
 Not that she ever had to ask me not to;
 It never got so far as that; but the bare thought
 Of her old tremulous bonnet in the pew, 91
 And of her half asleep was too much for me.
 Why, I might wake her up and startle her.
 It was the words "descended into Hades"
 That seemed too pagan to our liberal youth.
 You know they suffered from a general onslaught.
 And well, if they weren't true why keep right on Saying them like the heathen? We could drop
   them.
 Only—there was the bonnet in the pew.
 Such a phrase couldn't have meant much to her 100
 But suppose she had missed it from the Creed
 As a child misses the unsaid Good-night,
 And falls asleep with heartache—how should
   I feel?
 I'm just as glad she made me keep hands off,
 For, dear me, why abandon a belief
 Merely because it ceases to be true.
 Cling to it long enough, and not a doubt
 It will turn true again, for so it goes.

Most of the change we think we see in life
 Is due to truths being in and out of favor. 110
 As I sit here, and oftentimes, I wish
 I could be monarch of a desert land
 I could devote and dedicate forever
 To the truths we keep coming back and back to.

So desert it would have to be, so walled
 By mountain ranges half in summer snow,
 No one would covet it or think it worth
 The pains of conquering to force change on.
 Scattered oases where men dwelt, but mostly
 Sand dunes held closely in tamarisk 120
 Blown over and over themselves in idleness.
 Sand grains should sugar in the natal dew
 The babe born to the desert, the sand storm
 Retard mid-waste my cowering caravans—

“There are bees in this wall.” He struck the clapboards,
 Fierce heads looked out; small bodies pivoted.
 We rose to go. Sunset blazed on the windows.

AN OLD MAN'S WINTER NIGHT

ALL out of doors looked darkly in at him
 Through the thin frost, almost in separate stars,
 That gathers on the pane in empty rooms.
 What kept his eyes from giving back the gaze
 Was the lamp tilted near them in his hand.
 What kept him from remembering what it was That brought him to that creaking room was age.
 He stood with barrels round him—at a loss.
 And having scared the cellar under him
 In clomping there, he scared it once again 10
 In clomping off;—and scared the outer night,
 Which has its sounds, familiar, like the roar
 Of trees and crack of branches, common
 things,
 But nothing so like beating on a box.
 A light he was to no one but himself
 Where now he sat, concerned with he knew what,
 A quiet light, and then not even that.
 He consigned to the moon, such as she was,
 So late-arising, to the broken moon
 As better than the sun in any case 20
 For such a charge, his snow upon the roof,

His icicles along the wall to keep;
 And slept. The log that shifted with a jolt Once in the stove, disturbed him and he shifted,
 And eased his heavy breathing, but still slept.
 One aged man—one man—can't fill a house,
 A farm, a countryside, or if he can,
 It's thus he does it of a winter night.

BIRCHES

WHEN I see birches bend to left and right
 Across the lines of straighter darker trees,
 I like to think some boy's been swinging them.
 But swinging doesn't bend them down to stay.
 Ice-storms do that. Often you must have seen
 them
 Loaded with ice a sunny winter morning
 After a rain. They click upon themselves
 As the breeze rises, and turn many-colored
 As the stir cracks and crazes their enamel.
 Soon the sun's warmth makes them shed crystal shells 10
 Shattering and avalanching on the snow-crust—
 Such heaps of broken glass to sweep away
 You'd think the inner dome of heaven had fallen.
 They are dragged to the withered bracken by the load,
 And they seem not to break; though once they are bowed
 So low for long, they never right themselves:
 You may see their trunks arching in the woods
 Years afterwards, trailing their leaves on the ground
 Like girls on hands and knees that throw their hair 19
 Before them over their heads to dry in the sun.
 But I was going to say when Truth broke in
 With all her matter-of-fact about the ice-storm
 (Now am I free to be poetical?)
 I should prefer to have some boy bend them
 As he went out and in to fetch the cows—
 Some boy too far from town to learn baseball,
 Whose only play was what he found himself,
 Summer or winter, and could play alone.

One by one he subdued his father's trees
 By riding them down over and over again 30
 Until he took the stiffness out of them,
 And not one but hung limp, not one was left
 For him to conquer. He learned all there was

To learn about not launching out too soon
 And so not carrying the tree away Clear to the ground. He always kept his poise

To the top branches, climbing carefully
 With the same pains you use to fill a cup
 Up to the brim, and even above the brim.
 Then he flung outward, feet first, with a swish, 40
 Kicking his way down through the air to the ground.

So was I once myself a swinger of birches.
 And so I dream of going back to be.
 It's when I'm weary of considerations,
 And life is too much like a pathless wood
 Where your face burns and tickles with the cobwebs

Broken across it, and one eye is weeping
 From a twig's having lashed across it open.
 I'd like to get away from earth awhile
 And then come back to it and begin over. 50
 May no fate willfully misunderstand me
 And half grant what I wish and snatch me away

Not to return. Earth's the right place for love:
 I don't know where it's likely to go better.
 I'd like to go by climbing a birch tree,
 And climb black branches up a snow-white trunk

Toward heaven, till the tree could bear no
 more,

But dipped its top and set me down again.
 That would be good both going and coming back.

One could do worse than be a swinger of
 birches. 60

THE ROAD NOT TAKEN

Two roads diverged in a yellow wood,
 And sorry I could not travel both
 And be one traveler, long I stood
 And looked down one as far as I could
 To where it bent in the undergrowth;

Then took the other, as just as fair,
 And having perhaps the better claim,
 Because it was grassy and wanted wear;
 Though as for that the passing there
 Had worn them really about the same, 10

And both that morning equally lay
 In leaves no step had trodden black.
 Oh, I kept the first for another day!
 Yet knowing how way leads on to way,
 I doubted if I should ever come back.

I shall be telling this with a sigh
 Somewhere ages and ages hence:
 Two roads diverged in a wood, and I—
 I took the one less traveled by,
 And that has made all the difference. 20

A TIME TO TALK

WHEN a friend calls to me from the road

And slows his horse to a meaning walk,
 I don't stand still and look around
 On all the hills I haven't hoed,
 And shout from where I am, What is it?
 No, not as there is a time to talk.
 I thrust my hoe in the mellow ground,
 Blade-end up and five feet tall,
 And plod: I go up to the stone wall
 For a friendly visit. 10

STOPPING BY WOODS ON A SNOWY EVENING

WHOSE woods these are I think I know.
 His house is in the village though;
 He will not see me stopping here
 To watch his woods fill up with snow.

My little horse must think it queer
 To stop without a farmhouse near
 Between the woods and frozen lake
 The darkest evening of the year.

He gives his harness bells a shake
 To ask if there is some mistake. 10
 The only other sound's the sweep
 Of easy wind and downy flake.

The woods are lovely, dark and deep.
 But I have promises to keep,
 And miles to go before I sleep,
 And miles to go before I sleep.

OUR SINGING STRENGTH

It snowed in spring on earth so dry and warm
 The flakes could find no landing place to form.
 Hordes spent themselves to make it wet and cold,

And still they failed of any lasting hold.
 They made no white impression on the black.
 They disappeared as if earth sent them back.
 Not till from separate flakes they changed at night

To almost strips and tapes of ragged white
 Did grass and garden ground confess it snowed,

And all go back to winter but the road. 10
 Next day the scene was piled and puffed and
 dead.

The grass lay flattened under one great tread.
 Borne down until the end almost took root,
 The rangey bough anticipated fruit
 With snowballs cupped in every opening bud.
 The road alone maintained itself in mud,
 Whatever its secret was of greater heat
 From inward fires or brush of passing feet.

In spring more mortal singers than belong
 To any one place cover us with song. 20 Thrush, bluebird, blackbird, sparrow, and
 robin throng;

Some to go further north to Hudson's Bay,
 Some that have come too far north back away,
 Really a very few to build and stay.
 Now was seen how these liked belated snow.
 The fields had nowhere left for them to go;
 They'd soon exhausted all there was in flying;
 The trees they'd had enough of with once trying

And setting off their heavy powder load.
 They could find nothing open but the road. 30
 So there they let their lives be narrowed in
 By thousands the bad weather made akin.
 The road became a channel running flocks
 Of glossy birds like ripples over rocks.
 I drove them under foot in bits of flight
 That kept the ground, almost disputing right

Of way with me from apathy of wing,
 A talking twitter all they had to sing.
 A few I must have driven to despair
 Made quick asides, but having done in air 40
 A whirl among white branches great and small
 As in some too much carved marble hall Where one false wing beat would have brought down all,

Came tamely back in front of me, the Drover,
 To suffer the same driven nightmare over.
 One such storm in a lifetime couldn't teach
 them

That back behind pursuit it couldn't reach
 them;
 None flew behind me to be left alone.

Well, something for a snowstorm to have shown

The country's singing strength thus brought together, 50
 That though repressed and moody with the weather

Was none the less there ready to be freed
 And sing the wildflowers up from root and seed.

TWO LOOK AT TWO

LOVE and forgetting might have carried them
 A little further up the mountain side
 With night so near, but not much further up.
 They must have halted soon in any case
 With thoughts of the path back, how rough it was

With rock and washout, and unsafe in darkness;

When they were halted by a tumbled wall
 With barbed-wire binding. They stood facing this,

Spending what onward impulse they still had
 In one last look the way they must not go, 10
 On up the failing path, where, if a stone
 Or earthslide moved at night, it moved itself;
 No footstep moved it. "This is all," they sighed,

"Good-night to woods." But not so; there was more.

A doe from round a spruce stood looking at
 them

Across the wall, as near the wall as they.

She saw them in their field, they in hers.
The difficulty of seeing what stood still,
Like some up-ended boulder split in two,
Was in her clouded eyes: they saw no fear
there. 20

She seemed to think that two thus they were safe.

Then, as if they were something that, though strange,

She could not trouble her mind with too long,
She sighed and passed unscared along the wall.
“This, then, is all. What more is there to ask?”
But no, not yet. A snort to bid them wait.
A buck from round the spruce stood looking at them

Across the wall as near the wall as they.

This was an antlered buck of lusty nostril,
Not the same doe come back into her place. 30
He viewed them quizzically with jerks of head,
As if to ask, “Why don’t you make some motion?”

Or give some sign of life? Because you can’t.
I doubt if you’re as living as you look.”

Thus till he had them almost feeling dared
To stretch a proffering hand—and a spell-breaking.

Then he too passed unscared along the wall.
Two had seen two, whichever side you spoke from.

“This must be all.” It was all. Still they stood,
A great wave from it going over them, 40
As if the earth in one unlooked-for favor Had made them certain earth returned their love.

1923

TWO TRAMPS IN MUD TIME, OR A FULL-TIME INTEREST

OUT of the mud two strangers came
And caught me splitting wood in the yard.
And one of them put me off my aim
By hailing cheerily “Hit them hard!”
I knew pretty well why he dropped behind
And let the other go on a way.
I knew pretty well what he had in mind:
He wanted to take my job for pay.

Good blocks of beech it was I split,
As large around as the chopping block; 10
And every piece I squarely hit

Fell splinterless as a cloven rock.
The blows that a life of self-control
Spares to strike for the common good
That day, giving a loose to my soul,
I spent on the unimportant wood.

The sun was warm but the wind was chill.
You know how it is with an April day
When the sun is out and the wind is still,
You’re one month on in the middle of May.
But if you so much as dare to speak, 21
A cloud comes over the sunlit arch,
A wind comes off a frozen peak,
And you’re two months back in the middle of March.

A bluebird comes tenderly up to alight
And fronts the wind to unruffle a plume,
His song so pitched as not to excite
A single flower as yet to bloom.
It is snowing a flake and he half knew
Winter was only playing possum. 30
Except in color he isn’t blue,
But he wouldn’t advise a thing to blossom.

The water for which we may have to look
In summertime with a witching-wand,
In every wheelrut’s now a brook,
In every print of a hoof a pond.
Be glad of water, but don’t forget
The lurking frost in the earth beneath
That will steal forth after the sun is set
And show on the water its crystal teeth. 40

The time when most I loved my task
These two must make me love it more
By coming with what they came to ask.
You’d think I never had felt before
The weight of an axe-head poised aloft,
The grip on earth of outspread feet,
The life of muscles rocking soft
And smooth and moist in vernal heat.

Out of the woods two hulking tramps
(From sleeping God knows where last night, 50
But not long since in the lumber camps).
They thought all chopping was theirs of right.
Men of the woods and lumberjacks,
They judged me by their appropriate tool.
Except as a fellow handled an axe,
They had no way of knowing a fool.

Nothing on either side was said.
 They knew they had but to stay their stay
 And all their logic would fill my head:
 As that I had no right to play 60
 With what was another man's work for gain.
 My right might be love but theirs was need.
 And where the two exist in twain
 Theirs was the better right—agreed.

But yield who will to their separation,
 My object in living is to unite
 My avocation and my vocation
 As my two eyes make one in sight.
 Only where love and need are one,
 And the work is play for mortal stakes, 70
 Is the deed ever really done
 For Heaven and the future's sakes.

THE FIGURE A POEM MAKES

PREFACE TO Collected Poems

ABSTRACTION is an old story with the philosophers, but it has been like a new toy in the hands of the artists of our day. Why can't we have any one quality of poetry we choose by itself? We can have in thought. Then it will go hard if we can't in practice. Our lives for it.

Granted no one but a humanist much cares 10
 how sound a poem is if it is only a sound. The sound is the gold in the ore. Then we will have the sound out alone and dispense with the inessential. We do till we make the discovery that the object in writing poetry is to make all poems sound as different as possible from each other, and the resources for that of vowels, consonants, punctuation, syntax, words, sentences, meter are not enough. We need the help of context—meaning—subject matter. 20
 That is the greatest help towards variety. All that can be done with words is soon told. So also with meters—particularly in our language where there are virtually but two, strict iambic and loose iambic. The ancients with many were still poor if they depended on meters for all tune. It is painful to watch our sprung-rhythmists straining at the point of omitting one short from a foot for relief from monotony. The possibilities for tune from the dramatic tones of meaning struck across the rigidity of a limited meter are endless. And we are back in poetry as merely one more art of having something to say, sound or unsound. Probably better if sound, because deeper and from wider experience.

Then there is this wildness whereof it is spoken. Granted again that it has an equal claim with sound to being a poem's better half. If it is a wild tune, it is a poem. Our problem 40 then is, as modern abstractionists, to have the wildness pure; to be wild with nothing to be wild about. We bring up as aberrationists, giving way to undirected associations and kicking ourselves from one chance suggestion to another in all directions as of a hot afternoon in the life of a grasshopper. Theme alone can steady us down. Just as the first mystery was how a poem could have a tune in such a straightness as meter, so the second mystery is how a poem can have wildness and at the same time a subject that shall be fulfilled.

It should be of the pleasure of a poem itself to tell how it can. The figure a poem makes. It begins in delight and ends in wisdom. The figure is the same as for love. No one can really hold that the ecstasy should be static and stand still in one place. It begins in delight, it inclines to the impulse, it assumes direction with the first line laid down, it runs a course of lucky events, and ends in a clarification of life—not necessarily a great clarification, such as sects and cults are founded on, but in a momentary stay against confusion. It has denouement. It has an outcome that though unforeseen was predestined from the first image of the original mood—and indeed from the very mood. It is but a trick poem and no poem at all if the best of it was thought of first and saved for the last. It finds its own name as it goes and discovers the best waiting for it in some final phrase at once wise and sad—the happy-sad blend of the drinking song.

No tears in the writer, no tears in the reader. No surprise for the writer, no surprise for the reader. For me the initial delight is in the surprise of remembering something I didn't know I knew. I am in a place, in a situation, as if I had materialized from cloud or risen out of the ground. There is a glad recognition of the long lost and the rest follows. Step by step the wonder of unexpected supply keeps growing. The impressions most useful to my purpose seem always those I was unaware of and so made no note of at the time when taken, and the conclusion is come to that like giants we are always hurling experience ahead of us to pave the future with against the day when we may want to strike a line of purpose across it for somewhere. The line will have the more charm for not being mechanically straight. We enjoy the straight crookedness of a good walking stick. Modern instruments of precision are being used to make things crooked as if by eye and hand in the old days.

I tell how there may be a better wildness of logic than of inconsequence. But the logic is backward, in retrospect, after the act. It must be more felt than seen ahead like prophecy. It must be a revelation, or a series of revelations, as much for the poet as for the reader. For it to be that there must have been the greatest freedom of the material to move about in it and to establish relations in it regardless of time and space, previous relation, and everything but affinity. We prate of freedom. We call our schools free because we are not free to stay away from them till we are sixteen years of age. I have given up my democratic prejudices and now willingly set the lower classes free to be completely taken care of by the upper classes. Political freedom is nothing to me. I bestow it right and left. All I would keep for myself is the freedom of my material—the condition of body and mind now and then to summon aptly from the vast chaos of all I have lived through.

Scholars and artists thrown together are often annoyed at the puzzle of where they differ. Both work from knowledge; but I suspect they differ most importantly in the way their knowledge is come by. Scholars get theirs with conscientious thoroughness along projected lines of logic; poets theirs cavalierly and as it happens in and out of books. They stick to nothing deliberately, but let what will stick to them like burrs where they walk in the fields. No acquirement is on assignment, or even self-assignment. Knowledge of the second kind is much more available in the wild free ways of wit and art. A school boy may be defined as one who can tell you what he knows in the order in which he learned it. The artist must value himself as he snatches a thing from some previous order in time and space into a new order with not so much as a ligature clinging to it of the old place where it was organic.

More than once I should have lost my soul to radicalism if it had been the originality it was mistaken for by its young converts. Originality and initiative are what I ask for my country. For myself the originality need be no more than the freshness of a poem run in the way I have described: from delight to wisdom. The figure is the same as for love. Like a piece of ice on a hot stove the poem must ride on its own melting. A poem may be worked over once it is in being, but may not be worried into being. Its most precious quality will remain its having run itself and carried away the poet with it. Read it a hundred times: it will forever keep its freshness as a metal keeps its fragrance. It can never lose its sense of a meaning that once unfolded by surprise as it went.

1879 ~ Vachel Lindsay ~ 1931

LIKE SANDBURG, Lindsay was a native of Illinois. His father was a religious evangelist and his mother, an artist—significant facts because the son inherited traits from both. He was born in Springfield, rich in memories of Lincoln, and with the exception of temporary excursions, he lived there throughout his life. After completing high school, he attended Hiram College for three years, where he came under the influence of a strong academic tradition in oratory, and began to write poetry somewhat oratorical in tone and spirit. The influence is noticeable in much of his later work.

He left college without a degree in order to study art, first in Chicago, later in New York under Robert Henri. For four years he was a lecturer for the Y.M.C.A., and for a year served the Illinois Anti-Saloon League in a similar capacity. After the manner of the ancient troubadours he took at various times extensive walking tours, through the West, the Southwest, and the industrial East, for the purpose of preaching the Gospel of Beauty. He traveled alone, carried no baggage or money, avoided cities. He did carry a supply of Rhymes to Be Traded for Bread, and received both bread and lodging for them. As his fame and popularity grew, he made extensive tours, giving readings from his works in exchange for greater compensation than bread and lodging. He lived for a short time in the State of Washington, where he was married. Later he returned to Springfield.

General Booth Enters into Heaven (1913) was his first volume of poems. It was followed by The Congo (1914), The Chinese Nightingale (1917), Collected Poems (1923), and Every Soul Is a Circus (1929). He also published a number of prose works, chief among which are Adventures While Preaching the Gospel of Beauty (1914); The Art of the Moving Picture (1915); The Golden Book of Springfield, the picture of a Utopia shaped by Art and Beauty; and The Litany of Washington Street (1929), which contains an essay on Whitman and voices his political creed.

Lindsay has been variously called "minstrel missionary," "vaudevillian," and "poet of jazz." He was, besides an evangelist crusading for beauty, a political idealist and humanitarian. One of his major passions was to improve men and reform their habits. Although a Campbellite himself, he preached neither sect nor creed, but the religion of Beauty. On his tramping tours he frequently read to his hosts a group of three poems, "The Proud Father," "The Illinois Village," and "On the Building of Springfield," in which he not only expressed, as he said, his theory of American civilization, but described concretely the process of achieving the beautiful life, as he conceived it. As the central function of his gospel, he believed in making one's home community the most beautiful place in the world. This is precisely what he did himself and advised Clement Wood to do—return to Birmingham and join the Salvation Army, a combination of religion and glorified boasting of the home town. In a larger sense he attacked industrialism and preached a militant agrarianism.

His poetic theory may be gathered from The Gospel of Beauty, The Art of the Moving Picture, the prefaces to his Collected Poems and to Every Soul Is a Circus, and from "The New Localism, an Illustrated Essay for the Village Statesman." This New Localism is based upon his conception of what he calls the New States' Rights, social rather than political in character, and will reach its consummation in the cities and villages of the future, transformed by a new zeal for beauty, in all its phases. According to Professor H. H. Clark, the theory may be summarized as follows: (1) beauty is the mark of civic virtue, while ugliness results from misgovernment; (2) the poet must proceed from the local to the universal; (3) poems are by-products of a happy life and are to be shared with the poet's fellow men; (4) other arts contribute to the creation of perfect poems; (5) poems are to be evaluated on the basis of their broad significance. With similar zeal he strove to bring poetry back to its historic place as a possession of the people as a whole, not only of the esoteric few, to make an appeal to average men as well as to the intellectually and culturally élite.

He wrote in both the traditional form, with stanzaic arrangement and rhyme, as well as in the freer form of the new poetry. For effect he frequently relied upon thumping rhythms and a daring, outspoken style, vocally expressive. To some of the poems he added directions for their proper reading and accompaniment as in "General Booth Enters into Heaven." It was in renderings of poems like this that some critics maintained he became at times a cheap vaudevillian.

Lindsay was, however, more than merely a poet of Middle West localism; in a sense he was representative of the America of his time. "The Congo" is symptomatic of the general interest in the Negro and his early backgrounds; the "Santa Fé Trail" renders forth the raucous noises of our mechanical civilization; "Abraham Lincoln Walks at Midnight" is a pacifist poem of social sympathy and pity; the poems of "Johnny Appleseed" are indicative of the widespread interest in American folklore and its poetic significance.

At his best Lindsay speaks with conviction and authority; at his worst he can be silly and even maudlin. His sense of discrimination seems to have weakened during the later years of his life; at any rate there is a distinct falling off in power and quality. More efficient terminal facilities ready to hand might have saved some otherwise too-thinly expanded pieces.

The successive volumes of Lindsay's poetry are brought together in Collected Poems (rev. ed., 1925). Volumes which have appeared since that time are Going-to-the-Stars (1926); The Candle in the Cabin (1926); Every Soul Is a Circus (1929). There is also Selected Poems, with introduction by H. Spencer (1931). His prose includes Adventures While Preaching the Gospel of Beauty (1914); A Handy Guide for Beggars (1916); "Adventures While Preaching Hieroglyphic Sermons" and "Adventures While Singing These Songs" in Collected Poems; The Art of the Moving Picture (1915, rev. ed., 1922); The Golden Book of Springfield (1920); The Litany of Washington Street (1929). E. L. Masters, Vachel Lindsay: a Poet in America (1935), is an excellent biography. Other biographical studies are S. Graham, Tramping With a Poet in the Rockies (1922); E. L. Masters, "The Tragedy of Vachel Lindsay," American Mercury, July, 1933; A. E. Trombly, Vachel Lindsay, Adventurer (1929); L. C. Wimberly, "Vachel Lindsay," Frontier and Midland, March, 1934. Critical studies are C. Aiken, Scepticisms (1919); L. Jones, First Impressions (1925); A. Kreyborg, Our Singing Strength (1929); C. Wood, Poets of America (1925); T. K. Whipple,

GENERAL WILLIAM BOOTH ENTERS INTO HEAVEN

Lindsay's popularity began with the publication of this poem in Harriet Monroe's Poetry in 1913. Many reviewers praised it, among them William Dean Howells. From this time on he was a prominent figure in the revival of interest in poetry.

(To be sung to the tune of "The Blood of the Lamb" with indicated instrument.)

I

(Brass drum beaten loudly.)

BOOTH led boldly with his big bass drum—
(Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?)
The Saints smiled gravely and they said:
"He's come."

(Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?)
Walking lepers followed, rank on rank,
Lurching bravos from the ditches dank,
Drabs from the alleyways and drug fiends pale—
Minds still passion-riden, soul-powers frail:—

Vermin-eaten saints with moldy breath, 9
Unwashed legions with the ways of Death—
(Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?)

(Banjoes.)

Every slum had sent its half-a-score
The round world over. (Booth had groaned for more.)

Every banner that the wide world flies
Bloomed with glory and transcendent dyes.
Big-voiced lasses made their banjos bang,

Tranced, fanatical they shrieked and sang:—
"Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?"
Hallelujah! It was queer to see Bull-necked convicts with that land make free. 20
Loons with trumpets blowed a blare, blare, blare
On, on upward thro' the golden air!
(Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?)

II

(Bass drum slower and softer.)

Booth died blind and still by faith he trod,
Eyes still dazzled by the ways of God.
Booth led boldly, and he looked the chief
Eagle countenance in sharp relief,
Beard a-flying, air of high command
Unabated in that holy land.

(Sweet flute music.)

Jesus came from out the courthouse door, 30
Stretched his hands above the passing poor.
Booth saw not, but led his queer ones there Round and round the mighty courthouse square.

Yet in an instant all that blear review
Marched on spotless, clad in raiment new.
The lame were straightened, withered limbs uncurled
And blind eyes opened on a new, sweet world.

(Bass drum louder.)

Drabs and vixens in a flash made whole!
Gone was the weasel-head, the snout, the jowl!

Sages and sibyls now, and athletes clean, 40
Rulers of empires, and of forests green!

(Grand chorus of all instruments. Tambourines to the foreground.)

The hosts were sandalled, and their wings were fire!

(Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?)
But their noise played havoc with the angel-choir.

(Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?)

Oh, shout Salvation! It was good to see
Kings and Princes by the Lamb set free.

The banjos rattled and the tambourines
Jing-jing-jingled in the hands of Queens.

(Reverently sung, no instruments.)

And when Booth halted by the curb for prayer 50

He saw his Master thro' the flag-filled air.
Christ came gently with a robe and crown
For Booth the soldier, while the throng knelt down.

He saw King Jesus. They were face to face,
And he knelt a-weeping in that holy place
Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?

From THE CONGO

Many of Lindsay's poems are built upon impressions of sound. "The Congo" represents phases of life among African Negroes; the "Santa Fé Trail" catches the noise of contemporary industrial civilization.

I. Their Basic Savagery

FAT black bucks in a wine-barrel room,
Barrel-house kings, with feet unstable,
Sagged and reeled and pounded on the table,
Pounded on the table,
Beat an empty barrel with the handle of a broom,
Hard as they were able,
Boom, boom, BOOM,
With a silk umbrella and the handle of a broom.
Boomlay, boomlay, boomlay, BOOM.

A deep rolling bass.

THEN I had religion, THEN I had a vision.

10

I could not turn from their revel in derision.

THEN I SAW THE CONGO, CREEPING THROUGH THE BLACK,
CUTTING THROUGH THE FOREST WITH A GOLDEN TRACK.

*More deliberate.
Solemnly chanted.*

Then along that riverbank

A thousand miles

Tattooed cannibals danced in files;

Then I heard the boom of the blood-lust song

And a thigh-bone beating on a tin-pan gong.

And "BLOOD" screamed the whistles and the fifes of the warriors,

"BLOOD" screamed the skull-faced, lean witch-doctors,

20

"Whirl ye the deadly voo-doo rattle,

Harry the uplands,

Steal all the cattle,

Rattle-rattle, rattle-rattle,

Bing!

Boomlay, boomlay, boomlay, BOOM,"

A roaring, epic, rag-time tune

From the mouth of the Congo

To the Mountains of the Moon.

Death is an Elephant,

A rapidly piling climax of speed and racket.

With a philosophic pause.

30

Torch-eyed and horrible,
Foam-flanked and terrible.
BOOM, steal the pygmies,
BOOM, kill the Arabs,
BOOM, kill the white men,
Hoo, Hoo, Hoo.

30

Shrilly and with a heavily accented meter.

Listen to the yell of Leopold's ghost
Burning in Hell for his hand-maimed host.
Hear how the demons chuckle and yell
Cutting his hands off, down in Hell.

*Like the wind
in the chimney.*

40

Listen to the creepy proclamation,
Blown through the lairs of the forest-nation,
Blown past the white-ants' hill of clay,
Blown past the marsh where the butterflies play:—
"Be careful what you do,
Or Mumbo-Jumbo, God of the Congo,
And all of the other
Gods of the Congo,
Mumbo-Jumbo will hoo-doo you,
Mumbo-Jumbo will hoo-doo you,
Mumbo-Jumbo will hoo-doo you."

All the o sounds very golden.

Heavy accents very heavy.

Light accents very light. Last line whispered.

50

II. Their Irrepressible High Spirits

WILD crap-shooters with a whoop and a call
Danced the juba in their gambling hall
And laughed fit to kill, and shook the town,
And guyed the policemen and laughed them down
With a boomlay, boomlay, boomlay, BOOM.
THEN I SAW THE CONGO, CREEPING THROUGH THE BLACK,
CUTTING THROUGH THE FOREST WITH A GOLDEN TRACK.
A negro fairyland swung into view,
A minstrel river
Where dreams come true.

Rather shrill and high.

Read exactly as in first section.

Lay emphasis on the delicate ideas. Keep as light-footed as possible.

10

The ebony palace soared on high
Through the blossoming trees to the evening sky.
The inlaid porches and casements shone
With gold and ivory and elephant-bone.
And the black crowd laughed till their sides were sore
At the baboon butler in the agate door,
And the well-known tunes of the parrot band
That trilled on the bushes of that magic land.
A troupe of skull-faced witch-men came Through the agate doorway in suits of flame,
Yea, long-tailed coats with a gold-leaf crust
And hats that were covered with diamond-dust.
And the crowd in the court gave a whoop and a call
And danced the juba from wall to wall.

With pomposity.

20

But the witch-men suddenly stilled the throng
With a stern cold glare, and a stern old song:—
"Mumbo-Jumbo will hoo-doo you." . . .

With a great deliberation and ghostliness.

Just then from the doorway, as fat as shotes,
 Came the cake-walk princes in their long red coats,
 Canes with a brilliant lacquer shine, 30
 And tall silk hats that were red as wine.

*With overwhelming assurance,
 good cheer, and pomp.*

And they pranced with their butterfly partners there,
 Coal-black maidens with pearls in their hair,
 Knee-skirts trimmed with the jessamine sweet,
 And bells on their ankles and little black feet.
 And the couples railed at the chant and the frown
 Of the witch-men lean, and laughed them down.
 (Oh, rare was the revel, and well worth while
 That made those glowering witch-men smile.)

With growing speed and sharply marked dance-rhythm.

The cake-walk royalty then began 40
 To walk for a cake that was tall as a man
 To the tune of "Boomlay, boomlay, BOOM,"

While the witch-man laughed, with a sinister air,
 And sang with the scalawags prancing there:—
 "Walk with care, walk with care,
 Or Mumbo-Jumbo, God of the Congo,
 And all of the other Gods of the Congo,
 Mumbo-Jumbo will hoo-doo you.

With a touch of Negro dialect, and as rapidly as possible toward the end.

Beware, beware, walk with care,
 Boomlay, boomlay, boomlay, boom. 50
 Boomlay, boomlay, boomlay, boom.
 Boomlay, boomlay, boomlay, boom.
 Boomlay, boomlay, boomlay,
 BOOM."

(Oh, rare was the revel, and well worth while
 That made those glowering witch-men smile.)

Slow philosophic calm.

III. The Hope of Their Religion

A good old Negro in the slums of the town
 Preached at a sister for her velvet gown.
 Howled at a brother for his low-down ways,
 His prowling, guzzling, sneak-thief days.
 Beat on the Bible till he wore it out
 Starting the jubilee revival shout.

Heavy bass. With a literal imitation of camp-meeting racket, and trance.

And some had visions, as they stood on chairs,
 And sang of Jacob and the golden stairs,
 And they all repented, a thousand strong
 From their stupor and savagery and sin and wrong 10
 And slammed with their hymn books till they shook the room
 With "glory, glory, glory,"
 And "Boom, boom, BOOM."

THEN I SAW THE CONGO, CREEPING THROUGH THE BLACK,
 CUTTING THROUGH THE JUNGLE WITH A GOLDEN TRACK.
 And the gray sky opened like a new-rent veil
 And showed the Apostles with their coats of mail.
 In bright white steel they were seated round
 And their fire-eyes watched where the Congo wound.

*Exactly as in the first section.
 Begin with terror and power,
 end with joy.*

And the twelve Apostles, from their thrones on high 20
 Thrilled all the forest with their heavenly cry:—
 “Mumbo-Jumbo will die in the jungle;
 Never again will he hoo-doo you,
 Never again will he hoo-doo you.”
 Then along that river, a thousand miles
 The vine-snared trees fell down in files.
 Pioneer angels cleared the way
 For a Congo paradise, for babes at play,
 For sacred capitals, for temples clean.
 Gone were the skull-faced witch-men lean. 30
 There, where the wild ghost-gods had wailed
 A million boats of the angels sailed
 With oars of silver, and prows of blue
 And silken pennants that the sun shone through.
 ’Twas a land transfigured, ’twas a new creation.
 Oh, a singing wind swept the Negro nation
 And on through the backwoods clearing flew:—
 “Mumbo-Jumbo is dead in the jungle.
 Never again will he hoo-doo you,
 Never again will he hoo-doo you.” 40

Sung to the tune of “Hark, ten thousand harps and voices.”

With growing deliberation and joy.

In a rather high key—as delicately as possible.

To the tune of “Hark, ten thousand harps and voices.”

Redeemed were the forests, the beasts and the men,
 And only the vulture dared again
 By the far, lone mountains of the moon
 To cry, in the silence, the Congo tune:—
 Mumbo-Jumbo will hoo-doo you,
 “Mumbo-Jumbo will hoo-doo you.
 Mumbo . . . Jumbo . . . will . . . hoo-doo . . . you.”

Dying down into a penetrating, terrified whisper.

1914

THE SANTA-FÉ TRAIL (A HUMORESQUE)

(I asked the old Negro: “What is that bird that sings so well?” He answered: “That is the Rachel-Jane.” “Hasn’t it another name—lark, or thrush, or the like?” “No. Jus’ Rachel-Jane.”)

I. In Which a Racing Auto Comes from the East

THIS is the order of the music of the morning:—
 First, from the far East comes but a crooning.
 The crooning turns to a sunrise singing.
 Hark to the calm-horn, balm-horn, psalm-horn.
 Hark to the faint-horn, quaint-horn, saint-horn. . . .

To be sung delicately, to an improvised tune.

Hark to the pace-horn, chase-horn, race-horn.
 And the holy veil of the dawn has gone.
 Swiftly the brazen car comes on.
 It burns in the East as the sunrise burns.
 I see great flashes where the far trail turns.
 Its eyes are lamps like the eyes of dragons.
 It drinks gasoline from big red flagons.

To be sung or read with great speed.

10

Butting through the delicate mists of the morning,
 It comes like lightning, goes past roaring.
 It will hail all the windmills, taunting, ringing,
 Dodge the cyclones,
 Count the milestones,
 On through the ranges the prairie-dog tills—
 Scooting past the cattle on the thousand hills. . . .
 Ho for the tear-horn, scare-horn, dare-horn,
 Ho for the gay-horn, bark-horn, bay-horn.
Ho for Kansas, land that restores us
When houses choke us, and great books bore us!
Sunrise Kansas, harvesters' Kansas,
A million men have found you before us.

20

To be read or sung in a rolling bass, with some deliberation.

II. In Which Many Autos Pass Westward

I want live things in their pride to remain.
 I will not kill one grasshopper vain
 Though he eats a hole in my shirt like a door.
 I let him out, give him one chance more.
 Perhaps, while he gnaws my hat in his whim,
 Grasshopper lyrics occur to him.

30

In an even, deliberate, narrative manner.

I am a tramp by the long trail's border,
 Given to squalor, rags and disorder.
 I nap and amble and yawn and look,
 Write fool-thoughts in my grubby book,
 Recite to the children, explore at my ease,
 Work when I work, beg when I please,
 Give crank-drawings, that make folks stare
 To the half-grown boys in the sunset glare,
 And get me a place to sleep in the hay
 At the end of a live-and-let-live day.

40

I find in the stubble of the new-cut weeds
 A whisper and a feasting, all one needs:
 The whisper of the strawberries, white and red
 Here where the new-cut weeds lie dead.
 But I would not walk all alone till I die
 Without some life-drunk horns going by.
 And up round this apple-earth they come
 Blasting the whispers of the morning dumb:—
 Cars in a plain realistic row.
 And fair dreams fade
 When the raw horns blow.

50

On each snapping pennant
 A big black name:—
 The careering city
 Whence each car came.
 They tour from Memphis, Atlanta, Savannah,

Tallahassee and Texarkana.

They tour from St. Louis, Columbus, Manistee,
They tour from Peoria, Davenport, Kankakee. 60

Cars from Concord, Niagara, Boston,
Cars from Topeka, Emporia, and Austin.

Cars from Chicago, Hannibal, Cairo.

Cars from Alton, Oswego, Toledo.

Cars from Buffalo, Kokomo, Delphi,

Cars from Lodi, Carmi, Loami.

Ho for Kansas, land that restores us
When houses choke us, and great books bore us!

While I watch the highroad
And look at the sky, 70

While I watch the clouds in amazing grandeur

Roll their legions without rain

Over the blistering Kansas plain—

While I sit by the milestone

And watch the sky,

The United States

Goes by.

Listen to the iron-horns, ripping, racking.

Listen to the quack-horns, slack and clacking.
Way down the road, trilling like a toad, 80

Here comes the dice-horn, here comes the vice-horn,

Here comes the snarl-horn, brawl-horn, lewd-horn,

Followed by the prude-horn, bleak and squeaking:—

(Some of them from Kansas, some of them from Kansas.)

Here comes the hod-horn, plod-horn, sod-horn,

Nevermore-to-roam-horn, loam-horn, home-horn.

(Some of them from Kansas, some of them from Kansas.)

Far away the Rachel-Jane

Not defeated by the horns

Sings amid a hedge of thorns:— 90

“Love and life,

Eternal youth—

Sweet, sweet, sweet, sweet,

Dew and glory,

Love and truth,

Sweet, sweet, sweet, sweet.”

WHILE SMOKE-BLACK FREIGHTS ON THE DOUBLE-TRACKED RAIL-ROAD,

DRIVEN AS THOUGH BY THE FOUL FIEND’S OX-GOAD, SCREAMING TO THE WEST COAST, SCREAMING TO THE EAST,

CARRY OFF A HARVEST, BRING BACK A FEAST, 100

AND HARVESTING MACHINERY AND HARNESS FOR THE BEAST,

THE HAND-CARS WHIZ, AND RATTLE ON THE RAILS,

THE SUNLIGHT FLASHES ON THE TIN DINNER-PAILS.

And then, in an instant, ye modern men,

Behold the procession once again,

The United States goes by!

Like a train-caller in a Union Depot.

To be given very harshly, with a snapping explosiveness.

To be read or sung, well-nigh in a whisper.

Louder and louder, faster and faster.

In a rolling bass, with increasing deliberation.

Listen to the iron-horns, ripping, racking,
 Listen to the wise-horn, desperate-to-advise horn,
 Listen to the fast-horn, kill-horn, blast-horn. . . .

With a snapping explosiveness.

Far away the Rachel-Jane 110
 Not defeated by the horns
 Sings amid a hedge of thorns:—
 Love and life,
 Eternal youth,
 Sweet, sweet, sweet, sweet,
 Dew and glory,
 Love and truth.
 Sweet, sweet, sweet, sweet.

To be sung or read well-nigh in a whisper.

The mufflers open on a score of cars
 With wonderful thunder,
 CRACK, CRACK, CRACK, CRACK-CRACK, CRACK-CRACK,
 CRACK, CRACK, CRACK,
 Listen to the gold-horn . . .

To be brawled in the beginning with a snapping explosiveness, ending in a languorous chant.

Old-horn . . .
 Cold horn . . .
 And all of the tunes, till the night comes down
 On hay-stack, and ant-hill, and wind-bitten town.
 Then far in the west, as in the beginning,
 Dim in the distance, sweet in retreating,
 Hark to the faint-horn, quaint-horn, saint-horn,
 Hark to the calm-horn, balm-horn, psalm-horn. . . .

To be sung to exactly the same whispered tune as the first five lines.

They are hunting the goals that they understand:—
 San-Francisco and the brown sea-sand.
 My goal is the mystery the beggars win.
 I am caught in the web the night-winds spin.
 The edge of the wheat-ridge speaks to me.
 I talk with the leaves of the mulberry tree.
 And now I hear, as I sit all alone
 In the dusk, by another big Santa-Fé stone,
 The souls of the tall corn gathering round
 And the gay little souls of the grass in the ground.
 Listen to the tale the cottonwood tells.
 Listen to the windmills, singing o'er the wells.
 Listen to the whistling flutes without price
 Of myriad prophets out of paradise.
 Harken to the wonder
 That the night-air carries. . . .
 Listen . . . to . . . the . . . whisper . . .

This section beginning sonorously, ending in a languorous whisper.

Of . . . the . . . prairie . . . fairies 150
 Singing o'er the fairy plain:—
 "Sweet, sweet, sweet, sweet,
 Love and glory,
 Stars and rain,
 Sweet, sweet, sweet, sweet. . . ."

To the same whispered tune as the Rachel-Jane song . but very slowly.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN WALKS
AT MIDNIGHT

(In Springfield, Illinois)

One of the significant poems called forth by the first World War.

It is portentous, and a thing of state
That here at midnight, in our little town
A mourning figure walks, and will not rest,
Near the old courthouse pacing up and down,

Or by his homestead, or in shadowed yards
He lingers where his children used to play,
Or through the market, on the well-worn
stones
He stalks until the dawn-stars burn away.

A bronzed, lank man! His suit of ancient black,
A famous high top-hat and plain worn shawl
Make him the quaint great figure that men
love, 11
The prairie-lawyer, master of us all.

He cannot sleep upon his hillside now.
He is among us:—as in times before!
And we who toss and lie awake for long Breathe deep, and start, to see him pass the door.

His head is bowed. He thinks on men and kings.
Yea, when the sick world cries, how can he
sleep?
Too many peasants fight, they know not
why,
Too many homesteads in black terror weep. 20

The sins of all the war-lords burn his heart.
He sees the dreadnaughts scouring every main.
He carries on his shawl-wrapped shoulders
now
The bitterness, the folly and the pain.

He cannot rest until a spirit-dawn
Shall come;—the shining hope of Europe free:
The league of sober folk, the Workers' Earth,
Bringing long peace to Cornland, Alp and Sea.

It breaks his heart that kings must murder
still,
That all his hours of travail here for men 30
Seem yet in vain. And who will bring white peace
That he may sleep upon his hill again?

1914

THE GHOST OF THE BUFFALOES

A forgotten era in the frontier life on the great plain is here restored and vivified.

LAST night at black midnight I woke with a cry,
The windows were shaking, there was thunder
on high,
The floor was a-tremble, the door was a-jar,
White fires, crimson fires, shone from afar.
I rushed to the door yard. The city was gone.
My home was a hut without orchard or lawn.
It was mud-smear and logs near a whispering
stream,
Nothing else built by man could I see in my dream . . .

Then . . .
Ghost-kings came headlong, row upon row,
Gods of the Indians, torches aglow. 11

They mounted the bear and the elk and the deer,
And eagles gigantic, aged and sere,
They rode long-horn cattle, they cried "A-lala."

They lifted the knife, the bow, and the spear,
They lifted ghost-torches from dead fires
below,
The midnight made grand with the cry "A-la-
la."

The midnight made grand with a red-god charge,
A red-god show,
A red-god show, 20
"A-la-la, a-la-la, a-la-la, a-la-la."

With bodies like bronze, and terrible eyes
Came the rank and the file, with catamount cries,
Gibbering, yipping, with hollow-skull clacks,
Riding white bronchos with skeleton backs,
Scalp-hunters, beaded and spangled and bad,
Naked and lustful and foaming and mad,

Flashing primeval demoniac scorn,
 Blood-thirst and pomp amid darkness reborn,
 Power and glory that sleep in the grass 30
 While the winds and the snows and the great rains pass.

They crossed the gray river, thousands abreast,

They rode in infinite lines to the west,
 Tide upon tide of strange fury and foam,
 Spirits and wraiths, the blue was their home,
 The sky was their goal where the star-flags
 are furled,

And on past those far golden splendors they whirled.

They burned to dim meteors, lost in the deep.
 And I turned in dazed wonder, thinking of
 sleep.

And the wind crept by 40
 Alone, unkempt, unsatisfied,
 The wind cried and cried—
 Muttered of massacres long past,
 Buffaloes in shambles vast . . .

An owl said "Hark, what is a-wing?"

I heard a cricket carolling,
 I heard a cricket carolling,
 I heard a cricket carolling.

Then . . .

Snuffing the lightning that crashed from on high 50

Rose royal old buffaloes, row upon row.

The lords of the prairie came galloping by.

And I cried in my heart "A-la-la, a-la-la,

A red-god show,

A red-god show,

A-la-la, a-la-la, a-la-la, a-la-la."

Buffaloes, buffaloes, thousands abreast,

A scourge and amazement, they swept to the west.

With black bobbing noses, with red rolling tongues,

Coughing forth steam from their leather-wrapped lungs, 60

Cows with their calves, bulls big and vain,

Goring the laggards, shaking the mane,

Stamping flint feet, flashing moon eyes,

Pompous and owlsh, shaggy and wise.

Like sea-cliffs and caves resounded their ranks

With shoulders like waves, and undulant flanks.

Tide upon tide of strange fury and foam,

Spirits and wraiths, the blue was their home,
 The sky was their goal where the star-flags
 are furled,

And on past those far golden splendors they
 whirled. 70

They burned to dim meteors, lost in the deep,
 And I turned in dazed wonder, thinking of
 sleep.

I heard a cricket's cymbals play,

A scarecrow lightly flapped his rags,

And a pan that hung by his shoulder rang,

Rattled and thumped in a listless way,

And now the wind in the chimney sang,

The wind in the chimney,

The wind in the chimney,

The wind in the chimney, 80

Seemed to say —

"Dream, boy, dream,

If you anyway can.

To dream is the work

Of beast or man.

Life is the west-going dream-storm's breath,

Life is a dream, the sigh of the skies,

The breath of the stars, that nod on their pillows

With their golden hair mussed over their eyes."

The locust played on his musical wing, 90

Sang to his mate of love's delight.

I heard the whippoorwill's soft fret.

I heard a cricket carolling,

I heard a cricket carolling,

I heard a cricket carolling,

I heard a cricket say "Good-night, good-
 night,

Good-night, good-night, . . . good-night."

From THE BOOKER WASHINGTON TRILOGY

A MEMORIAL TO BOOKER T. WASHINGTON

I. Simon Legree:—A Negro Sermon

(To be read in your own variety of Negro dialect.)

LEGREE's big house was white and green.

His cotton-fields were the best to be seen.

He had strong horses and opulent cattle,

And bloodhounds bold, with chains that would rattle.

His garret was full of curious things
 Books of magic, bags of gold,
 And rabbits' feet on long twine strings.
But he went down to the Devil.

Legree he sported a brass-buttoned coat,
 A snake-skin necktie, a blood-red shirt. 10
 Legree he had a beard like a goat,
 And a thick hairy neck, and eyes like dirt.
 His puffed-out cheeks were fish-belly white,
 He had great long teeth, and an appetite.
 He ate raw meat, 'most every meal,
 And rolled his eyes till the cat would squeal.

His fist was an enormous size
 To mash poor niggers that told him lies
 He was surely a witch-man in disguise.
But he went down to the Devil. 20

He wore hip-boots, and would wade all day
 To capture his slaves that fled away.
But he went down to the Devil.

He beat poor Uncle Tom to death
 Who prayed for Legree with his last breath.
 Then Uncle Tom to Eva flew,
 To the high sanctoriums bright and new;
 And Simon Legree stared up beneath,
 And cracked his heels, and ground his teeth:
And went down to the Devil. 30

He crossed the yard in the storm and gloom;
 He went into his grand front room.
 He said, "I killed him, and I don't care."
 He kicked a hound, he gave a swear;
 He tightened his belt, he took a lamp,
 Went down cellar to the webs and damp.

There in the middle of the mouldy floor
 He heaved up a slab, he found a door—
And went down to the Devil.

His lamp blew out, but his eyes burned
 bright. 40

Simon Legree stepped down all night—
Down, down to the Devil.

Simon Legree reached the place,
 He saw one half of the human race,
 He saw the Devil on a wide green throne,
 Gnawing the meat from a big ham-bone,
 And he said to Mister Devil:

"I see that you have much to eat—
 A red ham-bone is surely sweet.
 I see that you have lion's feet; 50
 I see your frame is fat and fine,
 I see you drink your poison wine—
 Blood and burning turpentine."

And the Devil said to Simon Legree:

"I like your style, so wicked and free.
 Come sit and share my throne with me,
 And let us bark and revel."

And there they sit and gnash their teeth,
 And each one wears a hop-vine wreath.
 They are matching pennies and shooting
 craps, 60

They are playing poker and taking naps.
 And old Legree is fat and fine:

He eats the fire, he drinks the wine—
 Blood and burning turpentine—

Down, down with the Devil;

Down, down with the Devil;

Down, down with the Devil.

1878 ~ Carl Sandburg ~ —

LIKE HIS contemporary, Lindsay, Sandburg is a product of the Middle West. He is a native of Galesburg, Illinois, the son of Swedish immigrant parents who changed their name from Johnson to Sandburg in order to avoid confusion with the many other Johnsons. The boy contributed to his support by serving in turn as milk peddler, barbershop porter, sceneshifter in a theater, brickyard laborer, dishwasher, and harvest hand—employment which undoubtedly gave direction to his later social sympathies. He saw military service in Puerto Rico during the Spanish-American War, and after his discharge entered Lombard College, from which he was graduated in 1902.

Sandburg chose newspaper work as the most likely means of giving expression to his social ideals, which he also translated into more tangible forms as organizer for the Social Democratic party. For two years he was secretary to the Mayor of Milwaukee.

In 1918 he accepted an appointment as editorial writer on the staff of the Chicago Daily News, a post which he held for many years. The publication in 1914 of "Chicago," for which he received the Levinson Poetry Prize, marks the definite beginning of his career as a poet.

He has published numerous volumes of poetry, chief of them being Chicago Poems (1915), Cornhuskers (1918), Smoke and Steel (1920), Slabs of the Sunburnt West (1922), Good Morning, America (1928), and The People, Yes (1936). He has also edited The American Songbag (1927), a collection of folk ballads and folk tunes on which he is an authority, and which he sings in his platform entertainments. The first two volumes of his monumental study of Lincoln appeared in 1926 under the title of Abraham Lincoln: The Prairie Years—a study completed in 1939 by the publication of four more volumes called Abraham Lincoln: The War Years.

In Good Morning, America Sandburg published thirty-eight "Tentative (First Model) Definitions of Poetry." One gathers from them that Sandburg believes poetry to be expressed in the medium of language, leaving an effect of music, cadence, "wavelengths," and overtones. Inwardly, it seems to be a process of imposing the sublime upon the ridiculous. Its body consists largely of implications, universal deductions from the sphere of the particular. Life is hard, coarse, sometimes brutal; poetry softens it, gives it meaning, beauty, and direction. The most striking characteristic of the definitions is the sharp contrast between the two factors of poetry, as for instance "kinetic arrangement of static syllables," "synthesis of hyacinths and biscuits."

Sandburg is a Socialist, and because he is an insistent pleader for justice to the unfortunate, some have come to regard many of his poems as pieces of propaganda. There can be no question about his sincerity in his sympathy for the downtrodden. The real question is whether the poems are propaganda to the exclusion of art.

In his poetry Sandburg often speaks out openly for "the common man," against the ugliness of industrial America, the venality of the exploiter. He is attracted by the vulgar energy of the industrial city, the factory, and the steel mill. He is like Whitman in often allowing announcement and declamation to substitute for poetic treatment of subject. In some of his shorter poems, his use of imagery suggests an indebtedness to the American and English Imagists who were publishing in Harriet Monroe's Poetry at the same time as he. Sandburg's poetry, however, shows very little of the analytic sense of language, the appreciation of the quality of word and image which characterized the more genuine followers of the Imagist "revolt." He has an enormous "research" energy which he uses to accumulate facts; but these facts are often only superficially organized. One is quite generally led away from the poetry into a consideration of the right or wrong (and the degree or violence of right and wrong) of its subject—forced by a compelling sympathy and sentiment to ignore the serious errors in poetic taste and logical order which he commits.

Sandburg's successive volumes of poetry are Chicago Poems (1916); Cornhuskers (1918); Smoke and Steel (1920); Slabs of the Sunburnt West (1922); Good Morning, America (1928); Early Moon (poems for children) (1930). In biography he has written Abraham Lincoln: The Prairie Years (2 vols., 1926); Abraham Lincoln: The War Years (4 vols., 1939); and Mary Lincoln, Wife and Widow (1932). His only novel, Remembrance Rock, appeared in 1948. Rootabaga Stories (1922), Rootabaga Pigeons (1923), and Potato Face (1930) are stories for children. He is also the compiler of The American Songbag (1927). Biographical information may be obtained in H. Hansen, Carl Sandburg: the Man and His Poetry (1925); D. Karsner, Sixteen Authors to One (1928); W. Yust, "Carl Sandburg, Human Being," Bookman, Jan., 1921; H. Hansen, "Carl Sandburg—Poet of the Prairie," Pictorial Review, Sept. 1925. #### CHICAGO

HOG Butcher for the World,
Tool Maker, Stacker of Wheat,
Player with Railroads and the Nation's Freight Handler; Stormy, husky, brawling,
City of the Big Shoulders:

They tell me you are wicked, and I believe them; for I have seen your painted women under the gas lamps luring the farm boys.

And they tell me you are crooked, and I answer: Yes, it is true I have seen the gunman kill and go free to kill again.

And they tell me you are brutal, and my reply is: On the faces of women and children I have seen the marks of wanton hunger.

And having answered so I turn once more to those who sneer at this my city, and I give them back the sneer and say to them:

Come and show me another city with lifted head singing so proud to be alive and coarse and strong and cunning.

Flinging magnetic curses amid the toil of piling job on job, here is a tall bold slugger set vivid against the little soft cities;

Fierce as a dog with tongue lapping for action, cunning as a savage pitted against the wilderness,

Bareheaded,
Shovelling,
Wrecking,
Planning,
Building, breaking, rebuilding,

Under the smoke, dust all over his mouth, laughing with white teeth,

Under the terrible burden of destiny laughing as a young man laughs,

Laughing even as an ignorant fighter laughs who has never lost a battle, 20

Bragging and laughing that under his wrist is the pulse, and under his ribs the heart of the people, Laughing!

Laughing the stormy, husky, brawling laughter of Youth, half-naked, sweating, proud to be

THE HARBOR

PASSING through huddled and ugly walls
By doorways where women
Looked from their hunger-deep eyes,
Haunted with shadows of hunger-hands,
Out from the huddled and ugly walls,
I came sudden, at the city's edge,
On a blue burst of lake,
Long lake waves breaking under the sun
On a spray-flung curve of shore;
And a fluttering storm of gulls, 10
Masses of great gray wings
And flying white bellies
Veering and whirling free in the open.

A TEAMSTER'S FAREWELL

Sobs En Route to a Penitentiary

GOOD-BYE now to the streets and the clash of wheels and locking hubs,
The sun coming on the brass buckles and harness knobs,
The muscles of the horses sliding under their heavy haunches,
Good-bye now to the traffic policeman and his whistle,
The smash of the iron hoofs on the stones,
All the crazy wonderful slamming roar of the street—
O God, there's noises I'm going to be hungry for.

TO A CONTEMPORARY BUNKSHOOTER

You come along . . . tearing your shirt . . .
yelling about Jesus.

Where do you get that stuff?

What do you know about Jesus,

Jesus had a way of talking soft and outside of a few bankers and higher-ups among the con men of Jerusalem everybody liked to have this Jesus around because he never made any fake passes and everything he said went and he helped the sick and gave the people hope.

You come along squirting words at us, shaking your fist and call us all dam fools so fierce the froth slobbers over your lips . . . always blabbing we're all going to hell straight off and you know all about it.

I've read Jesus' words. I know what he said.

You don't throw any scare into me. I've got your number. I know how much you know about Jesus.

He never came near clean people or dirty people but they felt cleaner because he came along. It was your crowd of bankers and business men and lawyers hired the sluggers and murderers who put Jesus out of the running.

I say the same bunch backing you nailed the nails into the hands of this Jesus of Nazareth. He had lined up against him the same crooks and strong-arm men now lined up with you paying your way.

This Jesus was good to look at, smelled good, listened good. He threw out something fresh and beautiful from the skin of his body and the touch of his hands wherever he passed along.

You slimy bunkshooter, you put a smut on every human blossom in reach of your rotten breath belching about hell-fire and hiccupping about this Man who lived a clean life in Galilee. 10

When are you going to quit making the carpenters build emergency hospitals for women and girls driven crazy with wrecked nerves from your gibberish about Jesus?—
I put it to you again: Where do you get that stuff? what do you know about Jesus?

Go ahead and bust all the chairs you want to.
Smash a whole wagon-load of furniture at every performance. Turn sixty somersaults and stand on your nutty head. If it wasn't for the way you scare the women and kids I'd feel sorry for you and pass the hat.

I like to watch a good four-flusher work, but not when he starts people puking and calling for the doctors.

I like a man that's got nerve and can pull off a great original performance, but you—you're only a bug-house pedlar of second-hand gospel—you're only shoving out a phoney imitation of the goods this Jesus wanted free as air and sunlight.

You tell people living in shanties Jesus is going to fix it up all right with them by giving them mansions in the skies after they're dead and the worms have eaten 'em.

You tell $6 a week department store girls all they need is Jesus; you take a steel trust wop, dead without having lived, grey and shrunken at forty years of age, and you tell him to look at Jesus on the cross and he'll be all right.

You tell poor people they don't need any more money on pay day and even if it's fierce to be out of a job, Jesus'll fix that up all right, all right—all they gotta do is take Jesus the way you say.

I'm telling you Jesus wouldn't stand for the stuff you're handing out. Jesus played it different. The bankers and lawyers of Jerusalem got their sluggers and murderers to go after Jesus just because Jesus wouldn't play their game. He didn't sit in with the big thieves.

I don't want a lot of gab from a bunkshooter in my religion. 19

I won't take my religion from any man who never works except with his mouth and never cherishes any memory except the face of the woman on the American silver dollar.

I ask you to come through and show me where you're pouring out the blood of your life.
I've been to this suburb of Jerusalem they call Golgotha, where they nailed Him, and I know if the story is straight it was real blood ran from His hands and the nail-holes, and it was real blood spurted in red drops where the spear of the Roman soldier rammed in between the ribs of this Jesus of Nazareth.

FOG

THE fog comes on little cat feet.

It sits looking over harbor and city on silent haunches
and then moves on.

NOCTURNE IN A DESERTED BRICKYARD

STUFF of the moon
Runs on the lapping sand
Out to the longest shadows.
Under the curving willows,
And round the creep of the wave line,
Fluxions of yellow and dusk on the waters
Make a wide dreaming pansy of an old pond in the night.

COOL TOMBS

WHEN Abraham Lincoln was shovelled into the tombs, he forgot the copperheads and the assassin . . . in the dust, in the cool tombs.

And Ulysses Grant lost all thought of con men and Wall Street, cash and collateral turned ashes . . . in the dust, in the cool tombs.

Pocahontas' body, lovely as a poplar, sweet as a red haw in November or a pawpaw in May, did she wonder? does she remember? . . . in the dust, in the cool tombs?

Take any streetful of people buying clothes and groceries, cheering a hero or throwing confetti and blowing tin horns . . . tell me if any get more than the lovers . . . in the dust . . . in the cool tombs.

WORK GANGS

Compare this poem with Markham's "The Man with the Hoe."

Box cars run by a mile long.
And I wonder what they say to each other
When they stop a mile long on a sidetrack.

Maybe their chatter goes:
I came from Fargo with a load of wheat up to the danger line.

I came from Omaha with a load of shorthorns and they splintered my boards.

I came from Detroit heavy with a load of flivvers.

I carried apples from the Hood river last year and this year bunches of bananas from Florida;
they look for me with watermelons from Mississippi next year.

Hammers and shovels of work gangs sleep in shop corners
when the dark stars come on the sky and the night watchmen walk and look. 10

Then the hammer heads talk to the handles,
then the scoops of the shovels talk,
how the day's work nicked and trimmed them,
how they swung and lifted all day, how the hands of the work gangs smelled of hope

In the night of the dark stars when the curve of the sky is a work gang handle,
in the night on the mile long sidetracks,
in the night where the hammers and shovels sleep in corners,
the night watchmen stuff their pipes with dreams— 20
and sometimes they doze and don't care for nothin',
and sometimes they search their heads for meanings, stories, stars.

The stuff of it runs like this:
A long way we come; a long way to go; long rests and long deep sniffs for our lungs on the way.

Sleep is a belonging of all; even if all songs are old songs and the singing heart is snuffed out like a switchman's lantern with the oil gone, even if we forget our names and houses in the finish, the secret of sleep is left us, sleep belongs to all, sleep is the first and last and best of all.

People singing; people with song mouths connecting with song hearts; people who must sing or die; people whose song hearts break if there is no song mouth; these are my people.

1920

DEATH SNIPS PROUD MEN

DEATH is stronger than all the governments because the governments are men and men die and then death laughs: Now you see
'em, now you don't.

Death is stronger than all proud men and so death snips proud men on the nose, throws
a pair of dice and says: Read 'em and weep.

Death sends a radiogram every day: When I want you I'll drop in—and then one day he comes with a master-key and lets himself in and says: We'll go now.

Death is a nurse mother with big arms: 'Twon't hurt you at all; it's your time now; you just need a long sleep, child; what have you had anyhow better than sleep?

1920

FOUR PRELUDES ON PLAYTHINGS
OF THE WIND*"The past is a bucket of ashes"*

1

THE woman named To-morrow sits with a hairpin in her teeth and takes her time
and does her hair the way she wants it and fastens at last the last braid and coil and puts the hairpin where it belongs and turns and drawls: Well, what of it?
My grandmother, Yesterday, is gone.
What of it? Let the dead be dead.

2

The doors were cedar and the panels strips of gold and the girls were golden girls and the panels read and the girls chanted:
We are the greatest city,
the greatest nation:
nothing like us ever was.
The doors are twisted on broken hinges.
Sheets of rain swish through on the wind where the golden girls ran and the panels
read:
We are the greatest city,
the greatest nation,
nothing like us ever was.

3

It has happened before.
Strong men put up a city and got a nation together,
And paid singers to sing and women to warble: We are the greatest city,
the greatest nation,
nothing like us ever was.

And while the singers sang and the strong men listened and paid the singers well and felt good about it all there were rats and lizards who listened
. . . and the only listeners left now
. . . are . . . the rats . . . and the lizards.

And there are black crows
Crying, "Caw, caw," bringing mud and sticks building a nest

over the words carved on the door where the panels were cedar and the strips on the panels were gold and the golden girls came singing:

We are the greatest city,
the greatest nation:
nothing like us ever was.
The only singers now are crows crying, "Caw, caw,"
And the sheets of rain whine in the wind and doorways.
And the only listeners now are . . . the rats
. . . and the lizards.

4

The feet of the rats
scribble on the door sills;
the hieroglyphs of the rat footprints chatter the pedigrees of the rats and babble of the blood and gabble of the breed of the grandfathers and the great-grandfathers of the rats.

And the wind shifts
and the wind on the door sill shifts and even the writing of the rat footprints tells us nothing, nothing at all about the greatest city, the greatest nation where the strong men listened and the women warbled: Nothing like us ever was.

A.E.F.

THERE will be a rusty gun on the wall, sweet-
heart,
The rifle grooves curling with flakes of rust.
A spider will make a silver string nest in the darkest, warmest corner of it.
The trigger and the range-finder, they too will be rusty.
And no hands will polish the gun, and it will hang on the wall.
Forefingers and thumbs will point absently and casually toward it.
It will be spoken among half-forgotten, wished-to-be-forgotten things.
They will tell the spider: Go on, you're doing good work.

1876 -- Willa Cather -- 1947

MISS CATHER was born in Virginia, where her great-grandfather had settled after migrating from England by way of Ireland. When she was eight her family moved to a farm in Nebraska. Here she grew up in tomboy enjoyment of the open prairie spaces, the thrills of farm life, and association with persons of varying nationalities. Since there was no available elementary school, she was taught at home, reading the English classics with her grandmother. Later she attended the high school in Red Cloud, and took her B.A. degree at the University of Nebraska at nineteen. During this time she read much French and Russian fiction. Discontented with the meager cultural opportunities of the Middle West, especially the lack of good music, she secured employment on the Pittsburgh Daily Leader. From 1901 to 1906 she taught English in the Alleghany High School, at the same time publishing verse and prose in various periodicals. Her work attracted the attention of S. S. McClure, of whose magazine she became in turn associate and later managing editor. This position brought her in contact with many literary people, developed her sense of literary values, and gave her an indication of public taste. The encouragement she received from her friend, Sarah Orne Jewett, whose Best Stories she later edited with an admiring introduction, undoubtedly influenced her decision to abandon editorial work. She resigned in 1912 in order to devote herself to creative writing.

In her book of collected essays, Not Under Forty (1936), particularly in "The Novel D emeuble" (first published in 1922), she states the general theory of fiction upon which her work is grounded. She distinguishes between novels as entertainment and novels as art. She is interested only in fiction as art. Assuming herself to be a realist, she takes issue with the realistic practice of securing effect by means of piling up details. Realism, in fact, is not at all a matter of recording what one has observed, but a state of mind, an attitude toward one's material. The novel suffers from too many physical properties which clutter up the scene and obscure what is really significant. Her contention is that artistic effects cannot be produced by what is seen or heard, but by what remains unnamed, an overtone, as it were, what she calls "verbal mood, the emotional aura." Her comparison of Balzac with Hawthorne illustrates her point: the former overfurnished his novels, the latter seldom lets the reader see anything; Balzac is the showman who insists on showing all his wares, Hawthorne is indifferent to surroundings, but makes one feel their presence by suggestion. She is a selective realist who insists upon paring down the material properties, indeed the action itself, to the very minimum consistent with the effect she wishes to create. Bare scenes are the ideal setting. Carefully selected properties, wisely chosen action, a minimum of detail, exhibition and suggestion rather than enumeration, and the firm reliance upon the "unnamed thing" as the master key to the finest artistic effects—these are the main principles of her literary creed.

It is precisely this economy and restraint, the refusal to let herself be drawn into emotional debauches, that has led some readers to the conclusion that she is cold and objective, and that her art lacks sympathy. Her very theory of art presupposes a certain sensitiveness to suggestion, for she herself relies upon suggestion instead of veritistic enumeration of details or a mere chronicling of events.

By some critics Miss Cather has been called the novelist of the transplanted European; by others she is associated with those who attack the village and small-town life generally. There is a trace of truth in each suggestion, but neither tells the whole truth. In O Pioneers! (1913) and My Antonia (1918), for instance, she does write about transplanted Europeans and their bitter struggles for economic security and spiritual integrity; nor can it be denied that in some of her novels she has in mind the cultural shortcomings of the small town. The truth of the matter is that her work must be regarded from a larger point of view. The note that runs through practically all her writings is the struggle that man is compelled to wage against his environment. This may take the form of a positive attack against the barrenness of the typical prairie village, as in The Sculptor's Funeral (1920); but it is also true of the professor who was unable to adjust himself when he suddenly found himself in an atmosphere of wealth and luxury, and of Archbishop Latour who after years of labor finally became the victim of life itself. Although she writes against a Midwest background, her theme is universal and limited to no locality. Her backgrounds are so harmonized, almost submerged, that they are absorbed by the personalities of the characters. Her novels are commentaries on the age-old struggle of man against natural and human evils. In A Lost Lady (1923), for example, she projects the gradual degeneration of the heroine, Marian Forrester, against the background of the declining West which was losing its heroic qualities.

Throughout her career, Miss Cather worked for an effect of precision and clarity; this effect is most noticeably achieved in such books as Death Comes for the Archbishop and Shadows on the Rock, books that can scarcely be called novels, so episodic are their contents. Individual sections of them are masterpieces of detail and order, but together they do not enjoy the unity which a novel calls for. Her most successful novels are the two which give most effectively the impression of the plains and prairies: My Antonia and O Pioneers. The Professor's House, sometimes quite satisfactory, is really a collection of unresolved (or arbitrarily resolved) tensions. The Song of the Lark is a strenuous book, a heroic effort to describe a heroine, but awkward and artificial in all but the Nebraska scenes.

The principal theme of Miss Cather's novels is the consequence of a dualism in her interests: she wishes at one and the same time to extol the virtues of provincial life and to hope for or insist upon the advantages of sophistication for her characters. Once she has finished with the pioneer phase of her prairie history, she finds serious defects in the life which survives in the small towns. Her characters take refuge, or find expression, in the arts (principally in music), in religion and in one unfortunate case (One of Ours) in war and patriotism. Her characters need identification with the land, but they also need what the land apparently cannot give them.

In the matter of style, Miss Cather is often an extremely self-conscious imitator of Henry James. There are echoes of James in the dialogue of many of her novels. But they do not seem more than half appropriate; she has neither James's subject nor his sensitivity to character. Her best writing goes into the development of simple plots and the description of ingenuous persons. When the situation becomes complicated and requires subtle handling, her treatment is naïve and awkward: Perhaps for this reason, she has written most successfully of people whose faith is adequate to their needs: the pioneer woman of Nebraska, the priest and early settler of Canada and the Southwest.

Miss Cather's novels are Alexander's Bridge (1912); O Pioneers! (1913); The Song of the Lark (1915); My Antonia (1918); One of Ours (1922); A Lost Lady (1923); The Professor's House (1925); My Mortal Enemy (1926); Death Comes for the Archbishop (1927); Shadows on the Rock (1931); Lucy Gayheart (1935); Sapphira and the Slave Girl (1940). Her short stories appear in The Troll Garden (1905); Youth and the Bright Medusa (1920); Obscure Destinies (1932); The Old Beauty and Others (1948). Her poems are published in April Twilights (1903); April Twilights and Other Poems (1923). R. Rapin's Willa Cather (1930) is a critical and biographical study. ## THE SCULPTOR'S FUNERAL

Published in McClure's Magazine, Jan., 1905. It was issued later in Youth and the Bright Medusa. A general favorite with many of Miss Cather's readers, it seems to have caught the essential attitude of the small town and its effect upon the aspiring young mind.

A GROUP of the townspeople stood on the station siding of a little Kansas town, awaiting the coming of the night train, which was already twenty minutes overdue. The snow had fallen thick over everything; in the pale starlight the line of bluffs across the wide, white meadows south of the town made soft, smoke-colored curves against the clear sky. The men on the siding stood first on one foot and then on the other, their hands thrust deep into their trousers pockets, their overcoats open, their shoulders screwed up with the cold; and they glanced from time to time toward the southeast, where the railroad track wound along the river shore. They conversed in low tones and moved about restlessly, seeming uncertain as to what was expected of them. There was but one of the company who looked as if he knew exactly why he was there, and he kept conspicuously apart; walking to the far end of the platform, returning to the station door, then pacing up the track again, his chin sunk in the high collar of his overcoat, his burly shoulders drooping forward, his gait heavy and dogged. Presently he was approached by a tall, spare, grizzled man clad in a faded Grand Army suit, who shuffled out from the group and advanced with a certain deference, craning his neck forward until his back made the angle of a jack-knife three-quarters open.

"I reckon she's a-goin' to be pretty late agin tonight, Jim," he remarked in a squeaky falsetto. "S'pose it's the snow?"

"I don't know," responded the other man with a shade of annoyance, speaking from out an astonishing cataract of red beard that grew fiercely and thickly in all directions.

The spare man shifted the quill toothpick he was chewing to the other side of his mouth. "It ain't likely that anybody from the East will come with the corpse, I s'pose," he went on reflectively.

"I don't know," responded the other, more curtly than before.

"It's too bad he didn't belong to some lodge or other. I like an order funeral myself. They seem more appropriate for people of some repytation," the spare man continued, with an ingratiating concession in his shrill voice, as he carefully placed his toothpick in his vest pocket. He always carried the flag at the G.A.R. funerals in the town.

The heavy man turned on his heel, without replying, and walked up the siding. The spare man rejoined the uneasy group. "Jim's ez full ez a tick, ez ushel," he commented commiseratingly.

Just then a distant whistle sounded, and there was a shuffling of feet on the platform. A number of lanky boys, of all ages, appeared as suddenly and slimily as eels awakened by the crack of thunder; some came from the waiting-room, where they had been warming themselves by the red stove, or half asleep on the slat benches; others uncoiled themselves from baggage trucks or slid out of express wagons. Two clambered down from the driver's seat of a hearse that stood backed up against the siding. They straightened their stooping shoulders and lifted their heads, and a flash of momentary animation kindled their dull eyes at that cold, vibrant scream, the world-wide call for men. It stirred them like the note of a trumpet; just as it had often stirred the man who was coming home tonight, in his boyhood.

The night express shot, red as a rocket, from out the eastward marsh lands and wound along the river shore under the long lines of shivering poplars that sentinelled the meadows, the escaping steam hanging in gray masses against the pale sky and blotting out the Milky Way. In a moment the red glare from the headlight streamed up the snow-covered track before the siding and glittered on the wet, black rails. The burly man with the dishevelled red beard walked swiftly up the platform toward the approaching train, uncovering his head as he went. The group of men behind him hesitated, glanced questioningly at one another, and awkwardly followed his example. The train stopped, and the crowd shuffled up to the express car just as the door was thrown open, the man in the G.A.R. suit thrusting his head forward with curiosity. The express messenger appeared in the doorway, accompanied by a young man in a long ulster and travelling cap.

"Are Mr. Merrick's friends here?" inquired the young man.

The group on the platform swayed uneasily. Philip Phelps, the banker, responded with dignity: "We have come to take charge of the body. Mr. Merrick's father is very feeble and can't be about."

"Send the agent out here," growled the express messenger, "and tell the operator to lend a hand."

The coffin was got out of its rough-box and down on the snowy platform. The townspeople drew back enough to make room for it, and then formed a close semicircle about it, looking curiously at the palm leaf which lay across the black cover. No one said anything. The baggage man stood by his truck, waiting to get at the trunks. The engine panted heavily, and the fireman dodged in and out among the wheels with his yellow torch and long oil-can, snapping the spindle boxes. The young Bostonian, one of the dead sculptor's pupils who had come with the body, looked about him helplessly. He turned to the banker, the only one of that black, uneasy, stoop-shouldered group who seemed enough of an individual to be addressed.

"None of Mr. Merrick's brothers are here?" he asked uncertainly.

The man with the red beard for the first time stepped up and joined the others. "No, they have not come yet; the family is scattered. The body will be taken directly to the house." He stooped and took hold of one of the handles of the coffin.

"Take the long hill road up, Thompson, it will be easier on the horses," called the liveryman as the undertaker snapped the door of the hearse and prepared to mount to the driver's seat.

Laird, the red-bearded lawyer, turned again to the stranger: "We didn't know whether there would be any one with him or not," he explained. "It's a long walk, so you'd better go up in the hack." He pointed to a single battered conveyance, but the young man replied stiffly: "Thank you, but I think I will go up with the hearse. If you don't object," turning to the undertaker, "I'll ride with you."

They clambered up over the wheels and drove off in the starlight up the long, white hill toward the town. The lamps in the still village were shining from under the low, snow-burdened roofs; and beyond, on every side, the plains reached out into emptiness, peaceful and wide as the soft sky itself, and wrapped in a tangible, white silence.

10 When the hearse backed up to a wooden sidewalk before a naked, weather-beaten frame house, the same composite, ill-defined group that had stood upon the station siding was huddled about the gate. The front yard was an icy swamp, and a couple of warped planks, extending from the sidewalk to the door, made a sort of rickety footbridge. The gate hung on one hinge, and was opened wide with difficulty. Steavens, the young stranger, noticed 20 that something black was tied to the knob of the front door.

The grating sound made by the casket, as it was drawn from the hearse, was answered by a scream from the house; the front door was wrenched open, and a tall, corpulent woman rushed out bareheaded into the snow and flung herself upon the coffin, shrieking: "My boy, my boy! And this is how you've come home to me!"

30 As Steavens turned away and closed his eyes with a shudder of unutterable repulsion, another woman, also tall, but flat and angular, dressed entirely in black, darted out of the house and caught Mrs. Merrick by the shoulders, crying sharply: "Come, come, mother; you mustn't go on like this!" Her tone changed to one of obsequious solemnity as she turned to the banker: "The parlor is ready, Mr. Phelps."

40 The bearers carried the coffin along the narrow boards, while the undertaker ran ahead with the coffin-rests. They bore it into a large, unheated room that smelled of dampness and disuse and furniture polish, and set it down under a hanging lamp ornamented with jingling glass prisms and before a "Rogers group" of John Alden and Priscilla, wreathed with smilax. Henry Steavens stared about him with the sickening conviction that there had been a mistake, and that he had somehow arrived 50 at the wrong destination. He looked at the clover-green Brussels, the fat plush upholstery, among the hand-painted china plaques and panels and vases, for some mark of identification,—for something that might once conceivably have belonged to Harvey Merrick. It was not until he recognized his friend in the crayon portrait of a little boy in kilts and curls, hanging above the piano, that he felt willing to let any of these people approach the coffin.

“Take the lid off, Mr. Thompson; let me see my boy’s face,” wailed the elder woman between her sobs. This time Steavens looked fearfully, almost beseechingly into her face, red and swollen under its masses of strong, black, shiny hair. He flushed, dropped his eyes, and then, almost incredulously, looked again. There was a kind of power about her face—a kind of brutal handsomeness, even; but it was scarred and furrowed by violence, and so colored and coarsened by fiercer passions that grief seemed never to have laid a gentle finger there. The long nose was distended and knobbed at the end, and there were deep lines on either side of it; her heavy black brows almost met across her forehead, her teeth were large and square, and set far apart—teeth that could tear. She filled the room; the men were obliterated, seemed tossed about like twigs in an angry water, and even Steavens felt himself being drawn into the whirlpool.

The daughter—the tall, raw-boned woman in crêpe, with a mourning comb in her hair which curiously lengthened her long face—sat stiffly upon the sofa, her hands, conspicuous for their large knuckles, folded in her lap, her mouth and eyes drawn down, solemnly awaiting the opening of the coffin. Near the door stood a mulatto woman, evidently a servant in the house, with a timid bearing and emaciated face pitifully sad and gentle. She was weeping silently, the corner of her calico apron lifted to her eyes, occasionally suppressing a long, quivering sob. Steavens walked over and stood beside her.

Feeble steps were heard on the stairs, and an old man, tall and frail, odorous of pipe smoke, with shaggy, unkept grey hair and a dingy beard, tobacco stained about the mouth, entered uncertainly. He went slowly up to the coffin and stood rolling a blue cotton handkerchief between his hands, seeming so pained and embarrassed by his wife’s orgy of grief that he had no consciousness of anything else.

“There, there, Annie, dear, don’t take on so,” he quavered timidly, putting out a shaking hand and awkwardly patting her elbow. She turned and sank upon his shoulder with such violence that he tottered a little. He did not even glance toward the coffin, but continued to look at her with a dull, frightened, appealing expression, as a spaniel looks at the whip. His sunken cheeks slowly reddened and burned with miserable shame. When his wife rushed from the room, her daughter strode after her with set lips. The servant stole up to the coffin, bent over it for a moment, and then slipped away to the kitchen, leaving Steavens, the lawyer, and the father to themselves. The old man stood looking down at his dead son’s face. The sculptor’s splendid head seemed even more noble in its rigid stillness than in life. The dark hair had crept down upon the wide forehead; the face seemed strangely long, but in it there was not that repose we expect to find in the faces of the dead. The brows were so drawn that there were two deep lines above the beaked nose, and the chin was thrust forward defiantly. It was as though the strain of life had been so sharp and bitter that death could not at once relax the tension and smooth the countenance into perfect peace—as though he were still guarding something precious, which might even yet be wrested from him.

The old man’s lips were working under his stained beard. He turned to the lawyer with timid deference: “Phelps and the rest are comin’ back to set up with Harve, ain’t they?” he asked. “Thank’ee, Jim, thank’ee.” He brushed the hair back gently from his son’s forehead. “He was a good boy, Jim; always a good boy. He was ez gentle ez a child and the kindest of ’em all—only we didn’t none of us ever onderstand him.” The tears trickled slowly down his beard and dropped upon the sculptor’s coat.

“Martin, Martin! Oh, Martin! come here,” his wife wailed from the top of the stairs. The old man started timorously: “Yes, Annie, I’m coming.” He turned away, hesitated, stood for a moment in miserable indecision; then reached back and patted the dead man’s hair softly, and stumbled from the room.

"Poor old man, I didn't think he had any tears left. Seems as if his eyes would have gone dry long ago. At his age nothing cuts very deep," remarked the lawyer.

Something in his tone made Steavens glance up. While the mother had been in the room, the young man had scarcely seen any one else; but now, from the moment he first glanced into Jim Laird's florid face and blood-shot eyes, he knew that he had found what he had been heartsick at not finding before—the feeling, the understanding, that must exist in some one, even here.

The man was red as his beard, with features swollen and blurred by dissipation, and a hot, blazing blue eye. His face was strained—that of a man who is controlling himself with difficulty—and he kept plucking at his beard with a sort of fierce resentment. Steavens, sitting by the window, watched him turn down the glaring lamp, with its jangling pendants, with an angry gesture, and then stand with his hands locked behind him, staring down into the master's face. He could not help wondering what link there had been between the porcelain vessel and so sooty a lump of potter's clay.

From the kitchen an uproar was sounding; when the dining-room door opened, the import of it was clear. The mother was abusing the maid for having forgotten to make the dressing for the chicken salad which had been prepared for the watchers. Steavens had never heard anything in the least like it; it was injured, emotional, dramatic abuse, unique and masterly in its excruciating cruelty, as violent and unrestrained as had been her grief of twenty minutes before. With a shudder of disgust the lawyer went into the dining-room and closed the door into the kitchen.

"Poor Roxy's getting it now," he remarked when he came back. "The Merricks took her out of the poor-house years ago; and if her loyalty would let her, I guess the poor old thing could tell tales that would curdle your blood. She's the mulatto woman who was standing in here a while ago, with her apron to her eyes. The old woman is a fury; there never was anybody like her. She made Harvey's life a hell for him when he lived at home; he was so sick ashamed of it. I never could see how he kept himself sweet."

"He was wonderful," said Steavens slowly, "wonderful; but until tonight I have never known how wonderful."

"That is the eternal wonder of it, anyway; that it can come even from such a dung heap as this," the lawyer cried, with a sweeping gesture which seemed to indicate much more than the four walls within which they stood.

"I think I'll see whether I can get a little air. The room is so close I am beginning to feel rather faint," murmured Steavens, struggling with one of the windows. The sash was stuck, however, and would not yield, so he sat down dejectedly and began pulling at his collar. The lawyer came over, loosened the sash with one blow of his red fist and sent the window up a few inches. Steavens thanked him, but the nausea which had been gradually climbing into his throat for the last half hour left him with but one desire—a desperate feeling that he must get away from this place with what was left of Harvey Merrick. Oh, he comprehended well enough now the quiet bitterness of the smile that he had seen so often on his master's lips!

Once when Merrick returned from a visit home, he brought with him a singularly feeling and suggestive bas-relief of a thin, faded old woman, sitting and sewing something pinned to her knee, while a full-lipped, full-blooded little urchin, his trousers held up by a single gallows, stood beside her, impatiently twitching her gown to call her attention to a butterfly he had caught. Steavens, impressed by the tender and delicate modelling of the thin, tired face, had asked him if it were his mother. He remembered the dull flush that had burned up in the sculptor's face.

The lawyer was sitting in a rocking-chair beside the coffin, his head thrown back and his eyes closed. Steavens looked at him earnestly, puzzled at the line of the chin, and wondering why a man should conceal a feature of such distinction under that disfiguring shock of beard. Suddenly, as though he felt the young sculptor's keen glance, Jim Laird opened his eyes.

"Was he always a good deal of an oyster?" he asked abruptly. "He was terribly shy as a boy."

"Yes, he was an oyster, since you put it so," rejoined Steavens. "Although he could be very fond of people, he always gave one the impression of being detached. He disliked violent emotion; he was reflective, and rather distrustful of himself—except, of course, as regarded his work. He was sure enough there. He distrusted men pretty thoroughly and women even more, yet somehow without believing ill of them. He was determined, indeed, to believe the best; but he seemed afraid to investigate."

"A burnt dog dreads the fire," said the lawyer grimly, and closed his eyes.

Steavens went on and on, reconstructing that whole miserable boyhood. All this raw, biting ugliness had been the portion of the man whose mind was to become an exhaustless gallery of beautiful impressions—so sensitive that the mere shadow of a poplar leaf flickering against a sunny wall would be etched and held there for ever. Surely, if ever a man had the magic word in his finger tips, it was Merrick. Whatever he touched, he revealed its holiest secret; liberated it from enchantment and restored it to its pristine loveliness. Upon whatever he had come in contact with, he had left a beautiful record of the experience—a sort of ethereal signature; a scent, a sound, a color that was his own.

Steavens understood now the real tragedy of his master's life; neither love nor wine, as many had conjectured; but a blow which had fallen earlier and cut deeper than anything else could have done—a shame not his, and yet so unescapably his, to hide in his heart from his very boyhood. And without—the frontier warfare; the yearning of a boy, cast ashore upon a desert of newness and ugliness and sordidness, for all that is chastened and old, and noble with traditions.

At eleven o'clock the tall, flat woman in black announced that the watchers were arriving, and asked them to "step into the dining-room." As Steavens rose, the lawyer said dryly: "You go on—it'll be a good experience for you. I'm not equal to that crowd tonight; I've had twenty years of them."

As Steavens closed the door after him he glanced back at the lawyer, sitting by the coffin in the dim light, with his chin resting on his hand.

The same misty group that had stood before the door of the express car shuffled into the dining-room. In the light of the kerosene lamp they separated and became individuals. The minister, a pale, feeble-looking man with white hair and blond chin-whiskers, took his seat beside a small side table and placed his Bible upon it. The Grand Army man sat down behind the stove and tilted his chair back comfortably against the wall, fishing his quill toothpick from his waistcoat pocket. The two bankers, Phelps and Elder, sat off in a corner behind the dinner-table, where they could finish their discussion of the new usury law and its effect on chattel security loans. The real estate agent, an old man with a smiling, hypocritical face, soon joined them. The coal and lumber dealer and the cattle shipper sat on opposite sides of the hard coal-burner, their feet on the nickel-work. Steavens took a book from his pocket and began to read. The talk around him ranged through various topics of local interest while the house was quieting down. When it was clear that the members of the family were in bed, the Grand Army man hitched his shoulders and, untangling his long legs, caught his heels on the rounds of his chair.

"S'pose there'll be a will, Phelps?" he queried in his weak falsetto.

The banker laughed disagreeably, and began trimming his nails with a pearl-handled pocket-knife.

"There'll scarcely be any need for one, will there?" he queried in his turn.

The restless Grand Army man shifted his position again, getting his knees still nearer his chin. "Why, the ole man says Harve's done right well lately," he chirped.

The other banker spoke up. "I reckon he means by that Harve ain't asked him to mortgage any more farms lately, so as he could go on with his education."

"Seems like my mind don't reach back to a time when Harve wasn't bein' edycated," tittered the Grand Army man.

There was a general chuckle. The minister took out his handkerchief and blew his nose sonorously. Banker Phelps closed his knife with a snap. "It's too bad the old man's sons didn't turn out better," he remarked with reflective authority. "They never hung together. He spent money enough on Harve to stock a dozen cattle-farms, and he might as well have poured it into Sand Creek. If Harve had stayed at home and helped nurse what little they had, and gone into stock on the old man's bottom farm, they might all have been well fixed. But the old man had to trust everything to tenants and was cheated right and left."

"Harve never could have handled stock none," interposed the cattleman. "He hadn't it in him to be sharp. Do you remember when he bought Sander's mules for eight-year olds, when everybody in town knew that Sander's father-in-law give 'em to his wife for a wedding present eighteen years before, an' they was full-grown mules then?"

The company laughed discreetly, and the Grand Army man rubbed his knees with a spasm of childish delight.

"Harve never was much account for anything practical, and he shore was never fond of work," began the coal and lumber dealer. "I mind the last time he was home; the day he left, when the old man was out to the barn helpin' his hand hitch up to take Harve to the train, and Cal Moots was patchin' up the fence; Harve, he come out on the step and sings out, in his ladylike voice: 'Cal Moots, Cal Moots! please come cord my trunk.'" 30

"That's Harve for you," approved the Grand Army man. "I kin hear him howlin' yet, when he was a big feller in long pants and his mother used to whale him with a rawhide in the barn for lettin' the cows git foundered in the cornfield when he was drivin' 'em home from pasture. He killed a cow of mine that-away onct—a pure Jersey and the best milker I had, an' the ole man had to put up for her. Harve, he was watchin' the sun set acrost the marshes when the anamile got away." 40

"Where the old man made his mistake was in sending the boy East to school," said Phelps, stroking his goatee and speaking in a deliberate, judicial tone. "There was where he got his head full of nonsense. What Harve needed of all people, was a course in some first-class Kansas City business college."

The letters were swimming before Stevens's eyes. Was it possible that these men did not understand, that the palm on the coffin meant nothing to them? The very name of their town would have remained for ever buried in the postal guide had it not been now and again mentioned in connection with Harvey Merrick's. He remembered what his master had said to him on the day of his death, after the congestion of both lungs had shut off any probability of recovery, and the sculptor had asked his pupil to send his body home. "It's not a pleasant place to be lying while the world is moving and doing and bettering," he had said with a feeble smile, "but it rather seems as though we ought to go back to the place we came from, in the end. The townspeople will come in for a look at me; and after they have had their say, I shan't have much to fear from the judgment of God!"

The cattleman took up the comment. "Forty's young for a Merrick to cash in; they usually hang on pretty well. Probably he helped it along with whisky."

"His mother's people were not long lived and Harvey never had a robust constitution," said the minister mildly. He would have liked to say more. He had been the boy's Sunday-school teacher, and had been fond of him; but he felt that he was not in a position to speak. His own sons had turned out badly, and it was not a year since one of them had made his last trip home in the express car, shot in a gambling-house in the Black Hills.

"Nevertheless, there is no disputin' that Harve frequently looked upon the wine when it was red, also variegated, and it shore made an uncommon fool of him," moralized the cattleman.

Just then the door leading into the parlor rattled loudly and every one started involuntarily, looking relieved when only Jim Laird came out. The Grand Army man ducked his head when he saw the spark in his blue, blood-shot eye. They were all afraid of Jim; he was a drunkard, but he could twist the law to suit his client's needs as no other man in all western Kansas could do, and there were many who tried. The lawyer closed the door behind him, leaned back against it and folded his arms, cocking his head a little to one side. When he assumed this attitude in the court-room, ears were always pricked up, as it usually foretold a flood of withering sarcasm.

"I've been with you gentlemen before," he began in a dry, even tone, "when you've sat by the coffins of boys born and raised in this town; and, if I remember rightly, you were never any too well satisfied when you checked them up. What's the matter, anyhow? Why is it that reputable young men are as scarce as millionaires in Sand City? It might almost seem to a stranger that there was some way something the matter with your progressive town. Why did Ruben Sayer, the brightest young lawyer you ever turned out, after he had come home from the university as straight as a die, take to drinking and forge a check and shoot himself? Why did Bill Merrit's son die of the shakes in a saloon in Omaha? Why was Mr. Thomas's son, here, shot in a gambling-house? Why did young Adams burn his mill to beat the insurance companies and go to the pen?"

The lawyer paused and unfolded his arms, laying one clenched fist quietly on the table. "I'll tell you why. Because you drummed nothing but money and knavery into their ears from the time they wore knickerbockers; because you carped away at them as you've been carping here tonight, holding our friends Phelps and Elder up to them for their models, as our grandfathers held up George Washington and John Adams. But the boys were young, and raw at the business you put them to, and how could they match coppers with such artists as Phelps and Elder? You wanted them to be successful rascals; they were only unsuccessful ones—that's all the difference. There was only one boy ever raised in this borderland between ruffianism and civilization who didn't come to grief, and you hated Harvey Merrick more for winning out than you hated all the other boys who got under the wheels. Lord, Lord, how you did hate him! Phelps, here, is fond of saying that he could buy and sell us all out any time he's a mind to; but he knew Harve wouldn't have given a tinker's damn for his bank and all his cattle-farms put together; and a lack of appreciation that way, goes hard with Phelps.

"Old Nimrod thinks Harve drank too much; and this from such as Nimrod and me!

"Brother Elder says Harve was too free with the old man's money—fell short in filial consideration, maybe. Well, we can all remember the very tone in which brother Elder swore his own father was a liar, in the county court; and we all know that the old man came out of that partnership with his son as bare as a sheared lamb. But maybe I'm getting personal, and I'd better be driving ahead at what I want to say."

The lawyer paused a moment, squared his heavy shoulders, and went on: "Harvey Merrick and I went to school together, back East. We were dead in earnest, and we wanted you all to be proud of us some day. We meant to be great men. Even I, and I haven't lost my sense of humor, gentlemen, I meant to be a great man. I came back here to practice, and I found you didn't in the least want me to be a great man. You wanted me to be a shrewd lawyer—oh, yes! Our veteran here wanted me to get him an increase of pension, because he had dyspepsia; Phelps wanted a new county survey that would put the widow Wilson's little bottom farm inside his south line; Elder wanted to lend money at 5 per cent a month, and get it collected; and Stark here wanted to wheedle old women up in Vermont into investing their annuities in real estate mortgages that are not worth the paper they are written on. Oh, you needed me hard enough, and you'll go on needing me!

"Well, I came back here and became the damned shyster you wanted me to be. You pretend to have some sort of respect for me; and yet you'll stand up and throw mud at Harvey Merrick, whose soul you couldn't dirty and whose hands you couldn't tie. Oh, you're a discriminating lot of Christians! There have been times when the sight of Harvey's name in some Eastern paper has made me hang my head like a whipped dog, and, again, times when I liked to think of him off there in the world, away from all this hog-wallow, climbing the big, clean up-grade he'd set for himself.

"And we? Now that we've fought and lied and sweated and stolen, and hated as only the disappointed strugglers in a bitter, dead little Western town know how to do, what have we got to show for it? Harvey Merrick wouldn't have given one sunset over your marshes for all you've got put together, and you know it.

It's not for me to say why, in the inscrutable wisdom of God, a genius should ever have been called from this place of hatred and bitter waters; but I want this Boston man to know that the drivel he's been hearing tonight is the only tribute any truly great man could have from such a lot of sidetracked, burnt-dog, land-poor sharks as the here-present financiers of Sand City—upon which town may God have mercy!"

The lawyer thrust out his hand to Steavens as he passed him, caught up his overcoat in the hall and had left the house before the Grand Army man had had time to lift his ducked head and crane his long neck about at his fellows.

Next day Jim Laird was drunk and unable to attend the funeral services. Steavens called twice at his office, but was compelled to start East without seeing him. He had a presentiment that he would hear from him again, and left his address on the lawyer's table; but if Laird found it, he never acknowledged it. The thing in him that Harvey Merrick had loved must have gone under ground with Harvey Merrick's coffin; for it never spoke again, and Jim got the cold he died of driving across the Colorado mountains to defend one of Phelps's sons who had got into trouble out there by cutting government timber.

1885 -- Sinclair Lewis -- 1951

SINCLAIR LEWIS was born on February 7th, 1885, in a small "Main Street" town, Sauk Center, Minnesota. His father and several of his family were physicians, a fact that partially accounts for the respect he held for the medical profession, which comes through with only a small number of scars from the Lewis attack. After six months at Oberlin Academy, he entered Yale in 1903, where he became an editor of the Yale Literary Magazine and a contributor to the Courant. In one interruption of his college life, he took a position as janitor in Upton Sinclair's socialist enterprise, Helicon Hall, where he met liberal and socialist professors and journalists; he supported himself by editing, translating, and writing. In 1908 he completed his work at Yale and returned to New York, to make his way as a journalist and editor.

Lewis's first novels were potboilers: Our Mr. Wrenn (1914), The Trail of the Hawk (1915), The Innocents (1917), The Job (1917), and Free Air (1919) all precede and are avowedly inferior to Main Street (1920), which had been begun during his Yale years, put aside, and finally considerably changed in style and emphasis. Main Street had the advantage of a public anxious to receive it; it described the small town deserted or still lived in, in a way which satisfied their hatred of it and gave good reason for their own "revolt." The success of the novel was due almost entirely to its motif of attack; it joined ranks with Edgar Lee Masters's Spoon River Anthology (1915) and Sherwood Anderson's Winesburg, Ohio (1919). Lewis became a literary hero. From the small town, he turned to the middle-class industrial city, the city of Zenith in the state of Winnemac. In Babbitt (1922) he created an American type; the hustling, frenetic, boastful, but frightened and vaguely, clumsily romantic businessman, George Follansbee Babbitt, realtor extraordinary. The book is an admirable and effective contribution to the American myth of the all-sufficient world of business, trade, and industry. With impeccable and scathing detail, Lewis described Babbitt's home life, his groping attempts at fatherhood, his business life, his errantry, his tenderness, his loneliness. More remarkable is the locale—what Maxwell Geismar calls “almost a perfectly conceived poetic vision of a perfectly standardized money society; it is our native Inferno of the mechanized hinterland.”

Once established in Zenith, Lewis was scarcely ever to leave it. He saw opportunities for other fantasies of American life, and they followed in fairly regular succession. Arrowsmith (1925), which won him a Pulitzer prize he declined, is a more moderate book, the life of a young doctor, whose career takes him from general practice in Wheatsylvania to research in the McGurk Institute, and finally to a tragic but heroic emergency trip to the West Indies, where his wife dies. In addition to the fairly honest portrait of the dedicated scientist, Lewis offers portraits of such characters as Dr. Almus Pickerbaugh of the Nautilus, Iowa, health department; he refinishes the pictures of Main Street and Babbitt, and in his characterization of Max Gottlieb, Arrowsmith's hero at the University of Winnemac, he demonstrates his whole-hearted approval of the ideals of science.

Elmer Gantry (1927) is a return to the unaffected parody of Babbitt; this time the principal character is a roving evangelist, whose lust for life competes forever with his desire to influence the crowd. When Elmer Gantry finally settles in Zenith, he joins the Lewis group already described in detail in earlier novels. With evident pleasure, and with more venom than he displayed in Babbitt, Lewis takes Gantry through a succession of oily hoaxes, pointing out as he does the unholy alliance of religion with business, the opportunism of ministers, the callous confidence of businessmen, and the cultist gullibility of their wives.

The Man Who Knew Coolidge (1928), a series of monologues, portrays the soul of Lowell Schmaltz, his political opinions, his cultural shallowness, in a series of bourgeois clichés which have never been equaled either in American literature or in American life. The book shows the influence of H. L. Mencken, in whose American Mercury appeared the first chapter, in January, 1928. Dodsworth (1929) shows Zenith vacationing in Europe. The character of Sam Dodsworth is sympathetically drawn. His sober virtues and sound views contrast with didactic clarity with the pale, confused, and superficial quality of his wife's European friends. Ultimately, the American of Zenith is judged quite competent to stand on his own feet, without help from Europe, and Dodsworth presents to the Lewis public a Babbitt quite free of the grotesque inadequacies of the earlier portrait.

Substantially, Lewis is devoted to the American middle class. His most popular portraits seem to have been those which make the American appear most ridiculous. He regrets the fact that the American has done so much to spoil his heritage, but he feels that he is as yet unspoiled by his opportunities. The novels written in the 1930's and 1940's—none of them as good as Babbitt or Main Street—develop further the positive virtues of the American world, while at the same time continuing to ridicule American pretension and hypocrisy.

Lewis refused the Pulitzer prize for Arrowsmith but accepted the Nobel prize (in 1930) for his work in Babbitt. In his acceptance speech, he asserted his opposition to the "safe" principle of American literary obedience to a heritage scarcely yet challenged, while at the same time announcing his confidence in the great opportunities open to American writers. He continued to publish, from time to time, down to the novel World So Wide (1951), in the year of his death; but he was at his best in his early work: Main Street and Babbitt deservedly remain his most widely known books. The character of Babbitt is not a realistic portrait, but through the very exaggeration of his behavior and appearance becomes a classic symbol of his time and place. A posthumous volume of Lewis's correspondence with his publishers, From Main Street to Stockholm, appeared in 1952.

Lewis's novels are Our Mr. Wrenn (1914); The Trail of the Hawk (1915); The Innocents (1917); The Job (1917); Free Air (1919); Main Street (1920); Babbitt (1922); Arrowsmith (1925); Mantrap (1926); Elmer Gantry (1927); The Man Who Knew Coolidge (1928); Dodsworth (1929); Ann Vickers (1933); Work of Art (1934); It Can't Happen Here (1935); The Prodigal Parents (1938); Bethel Merriday (1940); Gideon Planish (1943); Cass Timberlane (1945); Kingsblood Royal (1947); The God-Seeker (1949). Selected Short Stories of Sinclair Lewis was published in 1935. He has collaborated in the production of two plays: Jayhawker (1935), with Lloyd Lewis; and an adaptation of the novel, It Can't Happen Here (1938) with John C. Moffit. Most important of his occasional critical pieces is "The American Fear of Literature" (1931), his Nobel prize address. The only biographical study is Carl Van Doren's Sinclair Lewis, a Biographical Sketch (1933), with a bibliography by Harvey Taylor. Critical studies include James B. Cabell, Sinclair Lewis: A Critical Essay (1932); E. M. Forster, Sinclair Lewis Interprets America (1932); Harry Hartwick, The Foreground of American Fiction (1934); Harlan Hatcher, Creating the Modern American Novel (1935); Annie R. Marble, The Nobel Prize Winners in Literature, 1901-1931 (1932); Stuart P. Sherman, The Significance of Sinclair Lewis (1922); Walter F. Taylor, A History of American Letters (1936); Régis Michaud, The American Novel Today (1928); Maxwell Geismar, The Last of the Provincials (1947); Alfred Kazin, On Native Grounds (1942); V. F. Calverton, "Sinclair Lewis, the Last of the Literary Liberals," Modern Monthly, March, 1934; T. D. Horton, "Sinclair Lewis: the Symbol of an Era," North American Review, Winter, 1939; Lloyd Morris, "Sinclair Lewis—His Critics and the Public," North American Review, Summer, 1938. ### From BABBITT

CHAPTER I

I

THE TOWERS OF Zenith aspired above the morning mist; austere towers of steel and cement and limestone, sturdy as cliffs and delicate as silver rods. They were neither citadels nor churches, but frankly and beautifully office-buildings.

The mist took pity on the fretted structures of earlier generations: the Post Office with its shingle-tortured mansard, the red brick minarets of hulking old houses, factories with stingy and sooted windows, wooden tenements colored like mud. The city was full of such grotesqueries, but the clean towers were thrusting them from the business center, and on the farther hills were shining new houses, homes—they seemed—for laughter and tranquillity.

Over a concrete bridge fled a limousine of long sleek hood and noiseless engine. These people in evening clothes were returning from an all-night rehearsal of a Little Theater play, an artistic adventure considerably illuminated by champagne. Below the bridge curved a railroad, a maze of green and crimson lights. The New York Flyer boomed past, and twenty lines of polished steel leaped into the glare.

In one of the skyscrapers the wires of the Associated Press were closing down. The telegraph operators wearily raised their celluloid eye-shades after a night of talking with Paris and Peking. Through the building crawled the scrubwomen, yawning, their old shoes slapping. The dawn mist spun away. Cues of men with lunch-boxes clumped toward the immensity of new factories, sheets of glass and hollow tile, glittering shops where five thousand men worked beneath one roof, pouring out the honest wares that would be sold up the Euphrates and across the veldt. The whistles rolled out in greeting a chorus cheerful as the April dawn; the song of labor in a city built—it seemed—for giants.

II

There was nothing of the giant in the aspect of the man who was beginning to awaken on the sleeping-porch of a Dutch Colonial house in that residential district of Zenith known as Floral Heights.

His name was George F. Babbitt. He was forty-six years old now, in April, 1920, and he made nothing in particular, neither butter nor shoes nor poetry, but he was nimble in the calling of selling houses for more than people could afford to pay.

His large head was pink, his brown hair thin and dry. His face was babyish in slumber, despite his wrinkles and the red spectacle-dents on the slopes of his nose. He was not fat but he was exceedingly well fed; his cheeks were pads, and the unroughened hand which lay helpless upon the khaki-colored blanket was slightly puffy. He seemed prosperous, extremely married and unromantic; and altogether unromantic appeared this sleeping-porch, which looked on one sizable elm, two respectable grass-plots, a cement driveway, and a corrugated iron garage. Yet Babbitt was again dreaming of the fairy child, a dream more romantic than scarlet pagodas by a silver sea.

For years the fairy child had come to him. Where others saw but George Babbitt, she discerned gallant youth. She waited for him, in the darkness beyond mysterious groves. When at last he could slip away from the crowded house he darted to her. His wife, his clamoring friends, sought to follow, but he escaped, the girl fleet beside him, and they crouched together on a shadowy hillside. She was so slim, so white, so eager! She cried that he was gay and valiant, that she would wait for him, that they would sail—

Rumble and bang of the milk-truck.

Babbitt moaned, turned over, struggled back toward his dream. He could only see her face now, beyond misty waters. The furnace-man slammed the basement door. A dog barked in the next yard. As Babbitt sank blissfully into a dim warm tide, the paper-carrier went by whistling, and the rolled-up Advocate thumped the front door. Babbitt roused, his stomach constricted with alarm. As he relaxed, he was pierced by the familiar and irritating rattle of some one cranking a Ford: snap-ah-ah, snap-ah-ah, snap-ah-ah. Himself a pious motorist, Babbitt cranked with the unseen driver, with him waited through taut hours for the roar of the starting engine, with him agonized as the roar ceased and again began the infernal patient snap-ah-ah—a round, flat sound, a shivering cold-morning sound, a sound infuriating and inescapable. Not till the rising voice of the motor told him that the Ford was moving was he released from the panting tension. He glanced once at his favorite tree, elm twigs against the gold patina of sky, and fumbled for sleep as for a drug. He who had been a boy very credulous of life was no longer greatly interested in the possible and improbable adventures of each new day.

He escaped from reality till the alarm-clock rang, at seven-twenty.

III

It was the best of nationally advertised and quantitatively produced alarm-clocks, with all modern attachments, including cathedral chime, intermittent alarm, and a phosphorescent dial. Babbitt was proud of being awakened by such a rich device. Socially it was almost as creditable as buying expensive cord tires.

He sulkily admitted now that there was no more escape, but he lay and detested the grind of the real-estate business, and disliked his family, and disliked himself for disliking them. The evening before, he had played poker at Vergil Gunch's till midnight, and after such holidays he was irritable before breakfast. It may have been the tremendous home-brewed beer of the prohibition-era and the cigars to which that beer enticed him; it may have been resentment of return from this fine, bold man-world to a restricted region of wives and stenographers, and of suggestions not to smoke so much.

From the bedroom beside the sleeping-porch, his wife's detestably cheerful "Time to get up, Georgie boy," and the itchy sound, the brisk and scratchy sound, of combing hairs out of a stiff brush.

He grunted; he dragged his thick legs, in faded baby-blue pajamas, from under the khaki blanket; he sat on the edge of the cot, running his fingers through his wild hair, while his plump feet mechanically felt for his slippers. He looked regretfully at the blanket—forever a suggestion to him of freedom and heroism. He had bought it for a camping trip which had never come off. It symbolized gorgeous loafing, gorgeous cursing, virile flannel shirts.

He creaked to his feet, groaning at the waves of pain which passed behind his eyeballs. Though he waited for their scorching recurrence, he looked blurrily out at the yard. It delighted him, as always; it was the neat yard of a successful business man of Zenith, that is, it was perfection, and made him also perfect. He regarded the corrugated iron garage. For the three-hundred-and-sixty-fifth time in a year he reflected, "No class to that tin shack. Have to build me a frame garage. But by golly it's the only thing on the place that isn't up-to-date!" While he stared he thought of a community garage for his acreage development, Glen Oriole. He stopped puffing and jiggling. His arms were akimbo. His petulant, sleep-swollen face was set in harder lines. He suddenly seemed capable, an official, a man to contrive, to direct, to get things done.

On the vigor of his idea he was carried down the hard, clean, unused-looking hall into the bathroom.

Though the house was not large it had, like all houses on Floral Heights, an altogether royal bathroom of porcelain and glazed tile and metal sleek as silver. The towel-rack was a rod of clear glass set in nickel. The tub was long enough for a Prussian guard, and above the set bowl was a sensational exhibit of toothbrush holder, shaving-brush holder, soap-dish, sponge-dish, and medicine-cabinet, so glittering and so ingenious that they resembled an electrical instrument-board. But the Babbitt whose god was Modern Appliances was not pleased. The air of the bathroom was thick with the smell of a heathen toothpaste. "Verona been at it again! 'Stead of sticking to Lilidol, like I've re-peat-ed-ly asked her, she's gone and gotten some confounded stinkum stuff that makes you sick!"

The bath-mat was wrinkled and the floor was wet. (His daughter Verona eccentrically took baths in the morning, now and then.) He slipped on the mat, and slid against the tub. He said "Damn!" Furiously he snatched up his tube of shaving-cream, furiously he lathered, with a belligerent slapping of the unctuous brush, furiously he raked his plump cheeks with a safety-razor. It pulled. The blade was dull. He said, "Damn—oh—oh—damn it!"

He hunted through the medicine-cabinet for a packet of new razor-blades (reflecting, as invariably, "Be cheaper to buy one of these dinguses and strop your own blades,") and when he discovered the packet, behind the round box of bicarbonate of soda, he thought ill of his wife for putting it there and very well of himself for not saying "Damn." But he did say it, immediately afterward, when with wet and soap-slippery fingers he tried to remove the horrible little envelope and crisp clinging oiled paper from the new blade.

Then there was the problem, oft-pondered, never solved, of what to do with the old blade, which might imperil the fingers of his young. As usual, he tossed it on top of the medicine-cabinet, with a mental note that some day he must remove the fifty or sixty other blades that were also, temporarily, piled up there. He finished his shaving in a growing testiness increased by his spinning headache and by the emptiness in his stomach. When he was done, his round face smooth and streamy and his eyes stinging from soapy water, he reached for a towel. The family towels were wet, wet and clammy and vile, all of them wet, he found, as he blindly snatched them—his own face-towel, his wife's, Verona's, Ted's, Tinka's, and the lone bath-towel with the huge welt of initial. Then George F. Babbitt did a dismaying thing. He wiped his face on the guest-towel! It was a pancy-embroidered trifle which always hung there to indicate that the Babbitts were in the best Floral Heights society. No one had ever used it. No guest had ever dared to. Guests secretly took a corner of the nearest regular towel.

He was raging, "By golly, here they go and use up all the towels, every doggone one of 'em, and they use 'em and get 'em all wet and sopping, and never put out a dry one for me—of course, I'm the goat!—and then I want one and— I'm the only person in the doggone house that's got the slightest doggone bit of consideration for other people and thoughtfulness and consider there may be others that may want to use the doggone bathroom after me and consider—"

He was pitching the chill abominations into the bathtub, pleased by the vindictiveness of that desolate flapping sound; and in the midst his wife serenely trotted in, observed serenely, "Why Georgie dear, what are you doing? Are you going to wash out the towels? Why, you needn't wash out the towels. Oh, Georgie, you didn't go and use the guest-towel, did you?"

It is not recorded that he was able to answer.

For the first time in weeks he was sufficiently roused by his wife to look at her.

IV

Myra Babbitt—Mrs. George F. Babbitt—was definitely mature. She had creases from the corners of her mouth to the bottom of her chin, and her plump neck bagged. But the thing that marked her as having passed the line was that she no longer had reticences before her husband, and no longer worried about not having reticences. She was in a petticoat now, and corsets which bulged, and unaware of being seen in bulgy corsets. She had become so dully habituated to married life that in her full matronliness she was as sexless as an anemic nun. She was a good woman, a kind woman, a diligent woman, but no one, save perhaps Tinka, her ten-year-old, was at all interested in her or entirely aware that she was alive.

After a rather thorough discussion of all the domestic and social aspects of towels she apologized to Babbitt for his having an alcoholic headache; and he recovered enough to endure the search for a B.V.D. undershirt which had, he pointed out, malevolently been concealed among his clean pajamas.

He was fairly amiable in the conference on the brown suit.

"What do you think, Myra?" He pawed at the clothes hunched on a chair in their bedroom, while she moved about mysteriously adjusting and patting her petticoat and, to his jaundiced eye, never seeming to get on with her dressing. "How about it? Shall I wear the brown suit another day?"

"Well, it looks awfully nice on you."

"I know, but gosh, it needs pressing."

"That's so. Perhaps it does."

"It certainly could stand being pressed, all right."

"Yes, perhaps it wouldn't hurt it to be pressed."

"But gee, the coat doesn't need pressing. No sense in having the whole darn suit pressed, when the coat doesn't need it."

"That's so."

"But the pants certainly need it, all right. Look at them—look at those wrinkles—the pants certainly do need pressing."

"That's so. Oh, Georgie, why couldn't you wear the brown coat with the blue trousers we were wondering what we'd do with them?"

"Good Lord! Did you ever in all my life know me to wear the coat of one suit and the pants of another? What do you think I am? A busted bookkeeper?"

"Well, why don't you put on the dark gray suit to-day, and stop in at the tailor and leave the brown trousers?"

"Well, they certainly need— Now where the devil is that gray suit? Oh, yes, here we are."

He was able to get through the other crises of dressing with comparative resoluteness and calm.

His first adornment was the sleeveless dimity B.V.D. undershirt, in which he resembled a small boy humorlessly wearing a cheesecloth tabard at a civic pageant. He never put on B.V.D.'s without thanking the God of Progress that he didn't wear tight, long, old-fashioned undergarments, like his father-in-law and partner, Henry Thompson. His second embellishment was combing and slicking back his hair. It gave him a tremendous forehead, arching up two inches beyond the former hairline. But most wonder-working of all was the donning of his spectacles.

There is character in spectacles—the pretentious tortoise-shell, the meek pince-nez of the school teacher, the twisted silver-framed glasses of the old villager. Babbitt's spectacles had huge, circular, frameless lenses of the very best glass; the ear-pieces were thin bars of gold. In them he was the modern business man; one who gave orders to clerks and drove a car and played occasional golf and was scholarly in regard to Salesmanship. His head suddenly appeared not babyish but weighty, and you noted his heavy, blunt nose, his straight mouth and thick, long upper lip, his chin overfleshy but strong; with respect you beheld him put on the rest of his uniform as a Solid Citizen.

The gray suit was well cut, well made, and completely undistinguished. It was a standard suit. White piping on the V of the vest added a flavor of law and learning. His shoes were black laced boots, good boots, honest boots, standard boots, extraordinarily uninteresting boots. The only frivolity was in his purple knitted scarf. With considerable comment on the matter to Mrs. Babbitt (who, acrobatically fastening the back of her blouse to her skirt with a safety-pin, did not hear a word he said), he chose between the purple scarf and a tapestry effect with stringless brown harps among blown palms, and into it he thrust a snake-head pin with opal eyes.

A sensational event was changing from the brown suit to the gray the contents of his pockets. He was earnest about these objects. They were of eternal importance, like baseball or the Republican Party. They included a fountain pen and a silver pencil (always lacking a supply of new leads) which belonged in the right-hand upper vest pocket. Without them he would have felt naked. On his watch-chain were a gold penknife, silver cigar-cutter, seven keys (the use of two of which he had forgotten), and incidentally a good watch. Depending from the chain was a large, yellowish elk's-tooth—proclamation of his membership in the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks. Most significant of all was his loose-leaf pocket notebook, that modern and efficient note-book which contained the addresses of people whom he had forgotten, prudent memoranda of postal money-orders which had reached their destinations months ago, stamps which had lost their mucilage, clippings of verses by T. Cholmondeley Frink and of the newspaper editorials from which Babbitt got his opinions and his polysyllables, notes to be sure and do things which he did not intend to do, and one curious inscription—D.S.S.D.M.Y.P.D.F.

But he had no cigarette-case. No one had ever happened to give him one, so he hadn't the habit, and people who carried cigarette-cases he regarded as effeminate.

Last, he stuck in his lapel the Boosters' Club button. With the conciseness of great art the button displayed two words "Boosters—Pep!" It made Babbitt feel loyal and important. It associated him with Good Fellows, with men who were nice and human, and important in business circles. It was his V.C., his Legion of Honor ribbon, his Phi Beta Kappa key.

With the subtleties of dressing ran other complex worries. "I feel kind of punk this morning," he said. "I think I had too much dinner last evening. You oughtn't to serve those heavy banana fritters."

"But you asked me to have some."

"I know, but— I tell you, when a fellow gets past forty he has to look after his digestion. There's a lot of fellows that don't take proper care of themselves. I tell you at forty a man's a fool or his doctor—I mean, his own doctor. Folks don't give enough attention to this matter of dieting. Now I think— Course a man ought to have a good meal after the day's work, but it would be a good thing for both of us if we took lighter lunches."

"But Georgie, here at home I always do have a light lunch."

"Mean to imply I make a hog of myself, eating downtown? Yes, sure! You'd have a swell time if you had to eat the truck that new steward hands out to us at the Athletic Club! But I certainly do feel out of sorts, this morning. Funny, got a pain down here on the left side—but no, that wouldn't be appendicitis, would it? Last night, when I was driving over to Verg Gunch's, I felt a pain in my stomach, too. Right here it was—kind of a sharp shooting pain. I— Where'd that dime go to? Why don't you serve more prunes at breakfast? Of course I eat an apple every evening—an apple 20 a day keeps the doctor away—but still, you ought to have more prunes, and not all these fancy doodads."

"The last time I had prunes you didn't eat them."

"Well, I didn't feel like eating 'em, I suppose. Matter of fact, I think I did eat some of 'em. Anyway—I tell you it's mighty important to—I was saying to Verg Gunch, just last evening, most people don't take sufficient care 30 of their diges—"

"Shall we have the Gunches for our dinner, next week?"

"Why sure; you bet."

"Now see here, George: I want you to put on your nice dinner-jacket that evening."

"Rats! The rest of 'em won't want to dress."

"Of course they will. You remember when you didn't dress for the Littlefields' supper-party, and all the rest did, and how embarrassed you were." 40

"Embarrassed, hell! I wasn't embarrassed. Everybody knows I can put on as expensive a Tux. as anybody else, and I should worry if I don't happen to have it on sometimes. All a darn nuisance, anyway. All right for a woman, that stays around the house all the time, but when a fellow's worked like the dickens all day, he doesn't want to go and hustle his head 50 off getting into the soup-and-fish for a lot of folks that he's seen in just reg'lar ordinary clothes that same day."

"You know you enjoy being seen in one. The other evening you admitted you were glad I'd insisted on your dressing. You said you felt a lot better for it. And oh, Georgie, I do wish you wouldn't say 'Tux.' It's 'dinner-jacket.'"

"Rats, what's the odds?"

"Well, it's what all the nice folks say. Suppose Lucile McKelvey heard you calling it a 'Tux.'"

"Well, that's all right now! Lucile McKelvey can't pull anything on me! Her folks are common as mud, even if her husband and her dad are millionaires! I suppose you're trying to rub in your exalted social position! Well, let me tell you that your revered paternal ancestor, Henry T., doesn't even call it a 'Tux.'! He calls it a 'bobtail jacket for a ringtail monkey,' and you couldn't get him into one unless you chloroformed him!"

"Now don't be horrid, George."

"Well, I don't want to be horrid, but Lord! you're getting as fussy as Verona. Ever since she got out of college she's been too rambunctious to live with—doesn't know what she wants—well, I know what she wants!—all she wants is to marry a millionaire, and live in Europe, and hold some preacher's hand, and simultaneously at the same time stay right here in Zenith and be some blooming kind of a socialist agitator or boss charity-worker or some damn thing! Lord, and Ted is just as bad! He wants to go to college, and he doesn't want to go to college. Only one of the three that knows her own mind is Tinka. Simply can't understand how I ever came to have a pair of shilly-shallying children like Rone and Ted. I may not be any Rockefeller or James J. Shakespeare, but I certainly do know my own mind, and I do keep right on plugging along in the office and— Do you know the latest? Far as I can figure out, Ted's new bee is he'd like to be a movie actor and— And here I've told him a hundred times, if he'll go to college and law-school and make good, I'll set him up in business and— Verona's just exactly as bad. Doesn't know what she wants. Well, well, come on! Aren't you ready yet? The girl rang the bell three minutes ago."

Before he followed his wife, Babbitt stood at the westernmost window of their room. This residential settlement, Floral Heights, was on a rise; and though the center of the city was three miles away—Zenith had between three and four hundred thousand inhabitants now—he could see the top of the Second National Tower, an Indiana limestone building of thirty-five stories.

Its shining walls rose against April sky to a simple cornice like a streak of white fire. Integrity was in the tower, and decision. It bore its strength lightly as a tall soldier. As Babbitt stared, the nervousness was soothed from his face, his slack chin lifted in reverence. All he articulated was "That's one lovely sight!" but he was inspired by the rhythm of the city; his love of it renewed. He beheld the tower as a temple-spire of the religion of business, a faith passionate, exalted, surpassing common men; and as he clumped down to breakfast he whistled the ballad, "Oh, by gee, by gosh, by jingo" as though it were a hymn melancholy and noble.

1876 -- Sherwood Anderson -- 1941

ANDERSON, like his contemporary, Dreiser, hails from the Middle West, having been born in Camden, Ohio, the third of five children. His father, a veteran of the Civil War, popularly known as the colonel, the major, or the captain, lover of fine clothes and good food, was notorious for his thriftlessness and his irrepresible tendency for storytelling. The mother, partly of Italian descent, practical, resourceful, and warmhearted, was the mainstay of the family until her death when Sherwood was fourteen.

Young Anderson, whose education was at best desultory, left school about this time and earned a livelihood in a variety of odd enterprises—hostler, mechanic's apprentice, factory worker, and hobo. He answered the call for volunteers at the outbreak of the Spanish-American War because enlistment offered an avenue of escape from the drab and sordid life which he had been leading. After demobilization he married, settled down, and rose to the presidency of a paint-manufacturing company, well on the way to becoming a prosperous, successful businessman.

But neither business success nor prosperity had any fascination for him. He began to sense what the oncoming industrialism, with its standardization, was doing to society and feared what it would do to him. In a sudden move he left his business and his home to seek the life of his choice in Chicago. Here he wrote advertisements for business concerns, and in his leisure time composed Windy McPherson's Son, (1916), his first novel, which at forty launched him upon a literary career. From this time on, his life was for the most part the record of his books, which appeared with almost annual regularity. In his later years Anderson published a small-town newspaper in Virginia.

His career divides itself into three periods. To the first belong Windy McPherson's Son (1916) and Marching Men (1917), dominated by a "defeated romanticism."

Then came the Freudian influence shown in Winesburg, Ohio (1919), Poor White (1920), The Triumph of the Egg (1921), and Many Marriages (1923). The more recent books, such as Dark Laughter (1925) and Death in the Woods (1933), constitute a third, and more sensual, group. He has also published several volumes of verse and autobiography.

In A Story Teller's Story (1924) he states clearly the theory with which he approached the business of writing. To begin with, he set himself deliberately to restore the intimate relation of life and art between which he felt there had grown an ever-widening breach. Artists had drifted into the habit of doctoring life to fit the conveniences of their art. He objected to the plotted story because it enabled writers to take liberties which transcend the bounds of common sense, as for instance, the transformation of villains into saints, a common American trick. "It was certain there were no plot stories ever lived in any life I had known anything about." In the second place, he would dissociate art and morality, rebelling with equal vehemence against "that absurd Anglo-Saxon notion that they [stories] must point a moral, uplift the people, make better citizens, etc." He insisted that "In the life of the fancy there is no such thing as good or bad," and that morality is, as far as the artist is concerned, a matter of aesthetics. The third point in his theory dealt with the matter of language. Here too he found fault with earlier practices which made average Americans feel and talk in a manner utterly out of harmony with real life. He set himself, therefore, to find the medium of expression which would convey the artist's ideas without violence to his subject.

Anderson is one of the stout rebels against village life, its narrowness, provincialism, frustration, and prejudice, especially as it is changed by growing industrialism. Like Dreiser he was a naturalist, at any rate to the extent of his belief in environmental determinism, but he insisted upon probing beyond the merely physical for an explanation of life. The fact that he experienced difficulty in reaching a satisfactory explanation caused him to brood with melancholy disillusionment, and drove him to employ a symbolism which is at times far from apparent, and to seek refuge in an "intuitive mysticism" which lacks both definition and clarity.

Furthermore, a society dominated by lust for material gain, gradually regimented by a growing standardizing industrialism, presented a spectacle beyond which he saw little hope. His concern for an American civilization built on intellectual and cultural interests is especially noticeable in his earlier novels. Then came the period dominated by the Freudian pre-occupation with sex, as the core and center of all human motives. To the frustration of sex impulses he traced most of the ills and griefs of life. He capitalized it in Winesburg, Ohio, a collection of short stories, as well as in some of his novels. His persistent quarrel with society, indeed with life itself, is its emphasis upon inhibitions rather than unhindered self-expression. His success lay in his short stories rather than the novels, for the sharp and vivid impression of the short story was better suited to his genius than the sustained interest of the novels.

As novelist Anderson wrote Windy McPherson's Son (1916); Marching Men (1917); Poor White (1920); Many Marriages (1925); Dark Laughter (1925); Tar (1926); Beyond Desire (1932); Kit Brandon (1936). His short stories are in Winesburg, Ohio (1919); The Triumph of the Egg (1921); Horses and Men (1923); Death in the Woods (1933). His essays and sketches are collected in The Modern Writer (1925); Sherwood Anderson's Notebook (1926); Hello Towns! (1929); Puzzled America (1935). Mid-American Chants (1918) and A New Testament (1927) contain his poetry. Perhaps Women (1931) is a book of social criticism. A Story Teller's Story (1924) is autobiography. Tar (1926) is likewise autobiographic. ## THE EGG

MY FATHER was, I am sure, intended by nature to be a cheerful, kindly man. Until he was thirty-four years old he worked as a farmhand for a man named Thomas Butterworth whose place lay near the town of Bidwell, Ohio. He had then a horse of his own, and on Saturday evenings drove into town to spend a few hours in social intercourse with other farmhands. In town he drank several glasses of beer and stood about in Ben Head's saloon—crowded on Saturday evenings with visiting farmhands. Songs were sung and glasses thumped on the bar. At ten o'clock father drove home along a lonely country road, made his horse comfortable for the night, and himself went to bed, quite happy in his position in life. He had at that time no notion of trying to rise in the world.

It was in the spring of his thirty-fifth year that father married my mother, then a country schoolteacher, and in the following spring I came wriggling and crying into the world. Something happened to the two people. They became ambitious. The American passion for getting up in the world took possession of them.

It may have been that mother was responsible. Being a schoolteacher she had no doubt read books and magazines. She had, I presume, read of how Garfield, Lincoln, and other Americans rose from poverty to fame and greatness, and as I lay beside her—in the days of her lying-in—she may have dreamed that I would some day rule men and cities. At any rate she induced father to give up his place as a farmhand, sell his horse, and embark on an independent enterprise of his own. She was a tall silent woman with a long nose and troubled gray eyes. For herself she wanted nothing. For father and myself she was incurably ambitious.

The first venture into which the two people went turned out badly. They rented ten acres of poor stony land on Grigg's Road, eight miles from Bidwell, and launched into chicken-raising. I grew into boyhood on the place and got my first impressions of life there. From the beginning they were impressions of disaster, and if, in my turn, I am a gloomy man inclined to see the darker side of life, I attribute it to the fact that what should have been for me the happy joyous days of childhood were spent on a chicken farm.

One unversed in such matters can have no notion of the many and tragic things that can happen to a chicken. It is born out of an egg, lives for a few weeks as a tiny fluffy thing such as you will see pictured on Easter cards, then becomes hideously naked, eats quantities of corn and meal bought by the sweat of your father's brow, gets diseases called pip, cholera, and other names, stands looking with stupid eyes at the sun, becomes sick and dies. A few hens and now and then a rooster, intended to serve God's mysterious ends, struggle through to maturity. The hens lay eggs out of which come other chickens and the dreadful cycle is thus made complete. It is all unbelievably complex. Most philosophers must have been raised on chicken farms. One hopes for so much from a chicken and is so dreadfully disillusioned. Small chickens, just setting out on the journey of life, look so bright and alert and they are in fact so dreadfully stupid. They are so much like people they mix one up in one's judgments of life. If disease does not kill them, they wait until your expectations are thoroughly aroused and then walk under the wheels of a wagon—to go squashed and dead back to their maker. Vermin infest their youth, and fortunes must be spent for curative powders. In later life I have seen how a literature has been built up on the subject of fortunes to be made out of the raising of chickens. It is intended to be read by the gods who have just eaten of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. It is a hopeful literature and declares that much may be done by simple, ambitious people who own a few hens. Do not be led astray by it. It was not written for you. Go hunt for gold on the frozen hills of Alaska, put your faith in the honesty of a politician, believe if you will that the world is daily growing better and that good will triumph over evil, but do not read and believe the literature that is written concerning the hen. It was not written for you.

I, however, digress. My tale does not primarily concern itself with the hen. If correctly told it will center on the egg. For ten years my father and mother struggled to make our chicken farm pay, and then they gave up that struggle and began another. They moved into the town of Bidwell, Ohio, and embarked in the restaurant business. After ten years of worry with incubators that did not hatch, and with tiny—and in their own way lovely—balls of fluff that passed on into semi-naked pullethood and from that into dead henhood, we threw all aside and, packing our belongings on a wagon, drove down Griggs's Road toward Bidwell, a tiny caravan of hope looking for a new place from which to start on our upward journey through life.

We must have been a sad-looking lot, not, I fancy, unlike refugees fleeing from a battlefield. Mother and I walked in the road. The wagon that contained our goods had been borrowed for the day from Mr. Albert Griggs, a neighbor. Out of its sides stuck the legs of cheap chairs, and at the back of the pile of beds, tables, and boxes filled with kitchen utensils was a crate of live chickens, and on top of that the baby carriage in which I had been wheeled about in my infancy. Why we stuck to the baby carriage I don't know. It was unlikely other children would be born, and the wheels were broken. People who have few possessions cling tightly to those they have. That is one of the facts that make life so discouraging.

Father rode on top of the wagon. He was then a baldheaded man of forty-five, a little fat, and from long association with mother and the chickens he had become habitually silent and discouraged. All during our ten years on the chicken farm he had worked as a laborer on neighboring farms, and most of the money he had earned had been spent for remedies to cure chicken diseases, on Wilmer's White Wonder Cholera Cure or Professor Bidlow's Egg Producer or some other preparations that mother found advertised in the poultry papers. There were two little patches of hair on father's head just above his ears. I remember that as a child

I used to sit looking at him when he had gone to sleep in a chair before the stove on Sunday afternoons in the winter. I had at that time already begun to read books and have notions of my own, and the bald path that led over the top of his head was, I fancied, something like a broad road, such a road as Caesar might have made on which to lead his legions out of Rome and into the wonders of an unknown world. The tufts of hair that grew above father's ears were, I thought, like forests. I fell into a half-sleeping, half-waking state and dreamed I was a tiny thing going along the road into a far beautiful place where there were no chicken farms and where life was a happy eggless affair.

One might write a book concerning our flight from the chicken farm into town. Mother and I walked the entire eight miles—she to be sure that nothing fell from the wagon and I to see the wonders of the world. On the seat of the wagon beside father was his greatest treasure. I will tell you of that.

On a chicken farm, where hundreds and even thousands of chickens come out of eggs, surprising things sometimes happen. Grotesques are born out of eggs as out of people. The accident does not often occur—perhaps once in a thousand births. A chicken is, you see, born that has four legs, two pairs of wings, two heads, or what not. The things do not live. They go quickly back to the hand of their maker that has for a moment trembled. The fact that the poor little things could not live was one of the tragedies of life to father. He had some sort of notion that if he could but bring into henhood or roosterhood a five-legged hen or a two-headed rooster his fortune would be made. He dreamed of taking the wonder about to county fairs and of growing rich by exhibiting it to other farmhands.

At any rate, he saved all the little monstrous things that had been born on our chicken farm. They were preserved in alcohol and put each in its own glass bottle. These he had carefully put into a box, and on our journey into town it was carried on the wagon seat beside him. He drove the horses with one hand and with the other clung to the box. When we got to our destination, the box was taken down at once and the bottles removed. All during our days as keepers of a restaurant in the town of Bidwell, Ohio, the grotesques in their little glass bottles sat on a shelf back of the counter. Mother sometimes protested, but father was a rock on the subject of his treasure. The grotesques were, he declared, valuable. People, he said, liked to look at strange and wonderful things.

Did I say that we embarked in the restaurant business in the town of Bidwell, Ohio? I exaggerated a little. The town itself lay at the foot of a low hill and on the shore of a small river. The railroad did not run through the town, and the station was a mile away to the north at a place called Pickleville. There had been a cider mill and pickle factory at the station, but before the time of our coming they had both gone out of business. In the morning and in the evening busses came down to the station along a road called Turner's Pike from the hotel on the main street of Bidwell. Our going to the out-of-the-way place to embark in the restaurant business was mother's idea. She talked of it for a year and then one day went off and rented an empty store building opposite the railroad station. It was her idea that the restaurant would be profitable. Traveling men, she said, would be always waiting around to take trains out of town, and town people would come to the station to await incoming trains. They would come to the restaurant to buy pieces of pie and drink coffee. Now that I am older I know that she had another motive in going. She was ambitious for me. She wanted me to rise in the world, to get into a town school and become a man of the towns.

At Pickleville father and mother worked hard, as they always had done. At first there was the necessity of putting our place into shape to be a restaurant. That took a month. Father built a shelf on which he put tins of vegetables. He painted a sign on which he put his name in large red letters. Below his name was the sharp command—"EAT HERE"—that was so seldom obeyed. A showcase was bought and filled with cigars and tobacco. Mother scrubbed the floor and the walls of the room. I went to school in the town and was glad to be away from the farm and from the presence of the discouraged, sad-looking chickens. Still I was not very joyous. In the evening I walked home from school along Turner's Pike and remembered the children I had seen playing in the town schoolyard. A troop of little girls had gone hopping about and singing. I tried that. Down along the frozen road I went hopping solemnly on one leg. "Hippity Hop To The Barber Shop," I sang shrilly. Then I stopped and looked doubtfully about. I was afraid of being seen in my gay mood. It must have seemed to me that I was doing a thing that should not be done by one who, like myself, had been raised on a chicken farm where death was a daily visitor.

Mother decided that our restaurant should remain open at night. At ten in the evening a passenger train went north past our door followed by a local freight. The freight crew had switching to do in Pickleville, and when the work was done they came to our restaurant for hot coffee and food. Sometimes one of them ordered a fried egg. In the morning at four they returned north-bound and again visited us. A little trade began to grow up. Mother slept at night and during the day tended the restaurant and fed our boarders while father slept. He slept in the same bed mother had occupied during the night, and I went off to the town of Bidwell and to school. During the long nights, while mother and I slept, father cooked meats that were to go into sandwiches for the lunch baskets of our boarders. Then an idea in regard to getting up in the world came into his head. The American spirit took hold of him. He also became ambitious.

In the long nights when there was little to do, father had time to think. That was his undoing. He decided that he had in the past been an unsuccessful man because he had not been cheerful enough and that in the future he would adopt a cheerful outlook on life. In the early morning he came upstairs and got into bed with mother. She woke and the two talked. From my bed in the corner I listened.

It was father's idea that both he and mother should try to entertain the people who came to eat at our restaurant. I cannot now remember his words, but he gave the impression of one about to become in some obscure way a kind of public entertainer. When people, particularly young people from the town of Bidwell, came into our place, as on very rare occasions they did, bright entertaining conversation was to be made. From father's words I gathered that something of the jolly innkeeper effect was to be sought. Mother must have been doubtful from the first, but she said nothing discouraging. It was father's notion that a passion for the company of himself and mother would spring up in the breasts of the younger people of the town of Bidwell. In the evening bright happy groups would come singing down Turner's Pike. They would troop shouting with joy and laughter into our place. There would be song and festivity. I do not mean to give the impression that father spoke so elaborately of the matter. He was, as I have said, an uncommunicative man. "They want some place to go. I tell you they want some place to go," he said over and over. That was as far as he got. My own imagination has filled in the blanks.

For two or three weeks this notion of father's invaded our house. We did not talk much, but in our daily lives tried earnestly to make smiles take the place of glum looks. Mother smiled at the boarders and I, catching the infection, smiled at our cat. Father became a little feverish in his anxiety to please. There was, no doubt, lurking somewhere in him, a touch of the spirit of the showman. He did not waste much of his ammunition on the railroad men he served at night, but seemed to be waiting for a young man or woman from Bidwell to come in to show what he could do. On the counter in the restaurant there was a wire basket kept always filled with eggs, and it must have been before his eyes when the idea of being entertaining was born in his brain. There was something pre-natal about the way eggs kept themselves connected with the development of his idea. At any rate, an egg ruined his new impulse in life. Late one night I was awakened by a roar of anger coming from father's throat. Both mother and I sat upright in our beds. With trembling hands she lighted a lamp that stood on a table by her head. Downstairs the front door of our restaurant went shut with a bang and in a few minutes father tramped up the stairs. He held an egg in his hand, and his hand trembled as though he were having a chill. There was a half-insane light in his eyes. As he stood glaring at us I was sure he intended throwing the egg at either mother or me. Then he laid it gently on the table beside the lamp and dropped on his knees beside mother's bed. He began to cry like a boy, and I, carried away by his grief, cried with him. The two of us filled the little upstairs room with our wailing voices. It is ridiculous, but of the picture we made I can remember only the fact that mother's hand continually stroked the bald path that ran across the top of his head. I have forgotten what mother said to him and how she induced him to tell her of what had happened downstairs. His explanation also has gone out of my mind. I remember only my own grief and fright and the shiny path over father's head glowing in the lamplight as he knelt by the bed.

As to what happened downstairs. For some unexplainable reason I know the story as well as though I had been a witness to my father's discomfiture. One in time gets to know many unexplainable things. On that evening young Joe Kane, son of a merchant of Bidwell, came to Pickleville to meet his father, who was expected on the ten o'clock evening train from the South. The train was three hours late and Joe came into our place to loaf about and to wait for its arrival. The local freight train came in and the freight crew were fed. Joe was left alone in the restaurant with father.

From the moment he came into our place the Bidwell young man must have been puzzled by my father's actions. It was his notion that father was angry at him for hanging around. He noticed that the restaurant-keeper was apparently disturbed by his presence and he thought of going out. However, it began to rain and he did not fancy the long walk to town and back. He bought a five-cent cigar and ordered a cup of coffee. He had a newspaper in his pocket and took it out and began to read. "I'm waiting for the evening train. It's late," he said apologetically.

For a long time father, whom Joe Kane had never seen before, remained silently gazing at his visitor. He was no doubt suffering from an attack of stage fright. As so often happens in life he had thought so much and so often of the situation that now confronted him that he was somewhat nervous in its presence.

For one thing, he did not know what to do with his hands. He thrust one of them nerously over the counter and shook hands with Joe Kane. "How-de-do," he said. Joe Kane put his newspaper down and stared at him. Father's eyes lighted on the basket of eggs that sat on the counter and he began to talk. "Well," he began hesitatingly, "well, you have heard of Christopher Columbus, eh?" He seemed to be angry. "That Christopher Columbus was a cheat," he declared emphatically. "He talked of making an egg stand on its end. He talked, he did, and then he went and broke the end of the egg."

My father seemed to his visitor to be beside himself at the duplicity of Christopher Columbus. He muttered and swore. He declared it was wrong to teach children that Christopher Columbus was a great man when, after all, he cheated at the critical moment. He had declared he would make an egg stand on end and then, when his bluff had been called, he had done a trick. Still grumbling at Columbus, father took an egg from the basket on the counter and began to walk up and down. He rolled the egg between the palms of his hands. He smiled genially. He began to mumble words regarding the effect to be produced on an egg by the electricity that comes out of the human body. He declared that, without breaking its shell and by virtue of rolling it back and forth in his hands, he could stand the egg on its end. He explained that the warmth of his hands and the gentle rolling movement he gave the egg created a new center of gravity, and Joe Kane was mildly interested. "I have handled thousands of eggs," father said. "No one knows more about eggs than I do."

He stood the egg on the counter and it fell on its side. He tried the trick again and again, each time rolling the egg between the palms of his hands and saying the words regarding the wonders of electricity and the laws of gravity. When after a half-hour's effort he did succeed in making the egg stand for a moment, he looked up to find that his visitor was no longer watching. By the time he had succeeded in calling Joe Kane's attention to the success of his effort, the egg had again rolled over and lay on its side.

Afire with the showman's passion and at the same time a good deal disconcerted by the failure of his first effort, father now took the bottles containing the poultry monstrosities down from their place on the shelf and began to show them to his visitor. "How would you like to have seven legs and two heads like this fellow," he asked, exhibiting the most remarkable of his treasures. A cheerful smile played over his face. He reached over the counter and tried to slap Joe Kane on the shoulder as he had seen men do in Ben Head's saloon when he was a young farmhand and drove to town on Saturday evenings. His visitor was made a little ill by the sight of the body of the terribly deformed bird floating in the alcohol in the bottle and got up to go. Coming from behind the counter, father took hold of the young man's arm and led him back to his seat. He grew a little angry and for a moment had to turn his face away and force himself to smile. Then he put the bottles back on the shelf. In an outburst of generosity he fairly compelled Joe Kane to have a fresh cup of coffee and another cigar at his expense. Then he took a pan and filling it with vinegar, taken from a jug that sat beneath the counter, he declared himself about to do a new trick. "I will heat this egg in this pan of vinegar," he said. "Then I will put it through the neck of a bottle without breaking the shell. When the egg is inside the bottle it will resume its normal shape and the shell will become hard again. Then I will give the bottle with the egg in it to you. You can take it about with you wherever you go. People will want to know how you got the egg in the bottle. Don't tell them. Keep them guessing. That is the way to have fun with this trick."

Father grinned and winked at his visitor. Joe Kane decided that the man who confronted him was mildly insane but harmless. He drank the cup of coffee that had been given him and began to read his paper again. When the egg had been heated in vinegar, father carried it on a spoon to the counter and going into a back room got an empty bottle. He was angry because his visitor did not watch him as he began to do his trick, but nevertheless went cheerfully to work. For a long time he struggled, trying to get the egg to go through the neck of the bottle. He put the pan of vinegar back on the stove, intending to reheat the egg, then picked it up and burned his fingers. After a second bath in the hot vinegar, the shell of the egg had been softened a little, but not enough for his purpose. He worked and worked and a spirit of desperate determination took possession of him. When he thought that at last the trick was about to be consummated, the delayed train came in at the station and Joe Kane started to go nonchalantly out at the door. Father made a last desperate effort to conquer the egg and make it do the thing that would establish his reputation as one who knew how to entertain guests who came into his restaurant. He worried the egg. He attempted to be somewhat rough with it. He swore and the sweat stood out on his forehead. The egg broke under his hand. When the contents spurted over his clothes, Joe Kane, who had stopped at the door, turned and laughed.

A roar of anger rose from my father's throat. He danced and shouted a string of inarticulate words. Grabbing another egg from the basket on the counter, he threw it, just missing the head of the young man as he dodged through the door and escaped.

Father came upstairs to mother and me with an egg in his hand. I do not know what he intended to do. I imagine he had some idea of destroying it, of destroying all eggs, and that he intended to let mother and me see him begin. When, however, he got into the presence of mother, something happened to him. He laid the egg gently on the table and dropped on his knees by the bed as I have already explained. He later decided to close the restaurant for the night and to come upstairs and get into bed. When he did so, he blew out the light and after much muttered conversation both he and mother went to sleep. I suppose I went to sleep also, but my sleep was troubled. I awoke at dawn and for a long time looked at the egg that lay on the table. I wondered why eggs had to be and why from the egg came the hen who again laid the egg. The question got into my blood. It has stayed there, I imagine, because I am the son of my father. At any rate, the problem remains unsolved in my mind. And that, I conclude, is but another evidence of the complete and final triumph of the egg—at least as far as my family is concerned.

1896 -- F. Scott Fitzgerald -- 1940

F. SCOTT FITZGERALD was born in Saint Paul, Minnesota, on September 24, 1896. He was educated at the Newman School, in New Jersey, and at Princeton, which he entered in 1913. While in college, he was active in local literary and dramatic circles, helping to edit The Princeton Tiger and the Nassau Literary Magazine. In 1917 he left college to join the army; but his army career, all of it spent in the United States, proved dull and tedious, and he began work on his first novel, which he called at the time The Romantic Egoist. The novel, much rejected and much revised, but still inexpertly done, was finally published by Scribners in 1920, as This Side of Paradise.

The publication of This Side of Paradise marked the beginning of Fitzgerald's role as the interpreter and spokesman of postwar American youth. He married and began living in the city of New York from the receipts of his first novel, plus a number of short stories, some of them slick and smooth as polished glass, sold to The Saturday Evening Post and other commercial magazines. The Beautiful and Damned, his second novel (1922), better but still immature and overly contrived, continued and encouraged his success. Two volumes of short stories, Flappers and Philosophers and Tales of the Jazz Age, were also published in these years.

Fitzgerald's real merit as a writer was not clearly demonstrated until the publication of The Great Gatsby, in 1925. Within a very short space, Fitzgerald captured many of the characteristics of the 1920's: the shady and shadowy path to quick wealth followed by those who took advantage of Prohibition's continuing failure, the frenetic pursuit of entertainment and debauch, the sense of social irresponsibility of the rich, as demonstrated by the Buchanans, and finally the unsteady foundation in a world of unreal values of Gatsby's pathetic but persistent romantic illusion. The story is told with remarkable and compelling economy and grace. Nick Carraway, the narrator, belongs to the cast of characters but is sufficiently isolated from them in spirit to tell it objectively. Fitzgerald's fondness for the glittering phrase is held in restraint; his control of the novel's pace and unity is extremely good. If there are weaknesses, they lie in the author's failure to consider Gatsby objectively; he is deluded almost as much as is his hero.

Another collection of short stories, All the Sad Young Men, followed in 1926. In 1934 appeared Tender Is the Night, a story of Dick Diver's attempt to combine the roles of husband and of psychiatrist. The novel is crowded with characters and incidents which do not always succeed in proving their relevance, but the main line of story is clear enough. In selecting psychiatry as a principal carrier of the plot, Fitzgerald was simply acknowledging the tremendous importance of that science for postwar Americans. A second theme is that of the wealthy expatriate, and Fitzgerald offers a generous number of examples of the Americans who, as he said, for a decade "had wanted only to be entertained."

Another collection of short stories, Taps at Reveille, appeared in 1935, containing one of his best stories, "Babylon Revisited." In his last years, Fitzgerald lived and worked in Hollywood, fighting both debts and illness, and restless under the commercial demands of the film center. He died of a heart attack on December 21, 1940. A few months later, Edmund Wilson published The Last Tycoon, an unfinished novel concerning the film industry, together with notes which suggested the way in which it might have been finished. As it stands, The Last Tycoon shows little advance over Tender Is the Night; the finished portion is chaotic and disorderly, with an added tendency toward sensationalism that had previously been exhibited only in Fitzgerald's slickest satevepost products. His fame rests chiefly upon the accomplishment of The Great Gatsby and several excellent short stories. Beyond that, he can be credited with a remarkable idea, in Tender Is the Night, several fine scenes in that novel, and a number of illuminating sketches of his own life and his times, preserved for us in The Crack-Up (edited in 1945 by Edmund Wilson).

Fitzgerald's novels are This Side of Paradise (1920); The Beautiful and Damned (1922); The Great Gatsby (1925); Tender Is the Night (1934); and The Last Tycoon (1941). Short story collections are found in Flappers and Philosophers (1920); Tales of the Jazz Age (1922); All the Sad Young Men (1926); and Taps at Reveille (1935). One play, The Vegetable, or From President to Postman, was published in 1923. The Crack-Up, edited by Edmund Wilson (1945), contains some sketches, many of them autobiographical, selections from Fitzgerald's notebooks, and some letters. It also includes critical estimates by Wilson, Paul Rosenfeld, Glenway Westcott, John Dos Passos, and others. The most convenient anthology of Fitzgerald's work, The Viking Portable Fitzgerald, contains The Great Gatsby, Tender Is the Night, and a selection of short stories. Critical discussions of Fitzgerald can be found in Paul Rosenfeld, Men Seen (1925); Harlan Hatcher, Creating the Modern American Novel (1935); Maxwell Geismar, The Last of the Provincials (1947); Alfred Kazin, On Native Grounds (1942); John Berryman, "F. Scott Fitzgerald," Kenyon Review, Winter, 1946; William Troy, "Scott Fitzgerald: The Authority of Failure," Accent, Autumn, 1945 (also in Forms of Modern Fiction, ed. W. V. O'Connor, 1948); Arthur Mizener, "Scott Fitzgerald and the Imaginative Possession of American Life," Sewanee Review, Winter, 1946.

THE RICH BOY

I

BEGIN with an individual, and before you know it you find that you have created a type; begin with a type, and you find that you have created—nothing. That is because we are all queer fish, queerer behind our faces and voices than we want any one to know or than we know ourselves. When I hear a man proclaiming himself an "average, honest, open fellow," I feel pretty sure that he has some definite and perhaps terrible abnormality which he has agreed to conceal—and his protestation of being average and honest and open is his way of reminding himself of his misprison.

There are no types, no plurals. There is a rich boy, and this is his and not his brothers' story. All my life I have lived among his brothers but this one has been my friend. Besides, if I wrote about his brothers I should have to begin by attacking all the lies that the poor have told about the rich and the rich have told about themselves—such a wild structure they have erected that when we pick up a book about the rich, some instinct prepares us for unreality. Even the intelligent and impassioned reporters of life have made the country of the rich as unreal as fairy-land.

Let me tell you about the very rich. They are different from you and me. They possess and enjoy early, and it does something to them, makes them soft where we are hard, and cynical where we are trustful, in a way that, unless you were born rich, it is very difficult to understand. They think, deep in their hearts, that they are better than we are because we had to discover the compensations and refuges of life for ourselves. Even when they enter deep into our world or sink below us, they still think that they are better than we are. They are different. The only way I can describe young Anson Hunter is to approach him as if he were a foreigner and cling stubbornly to my point of view. If I accept his for a moment I am lost—I have nothing to show but a preposterous movie.

Anson was the eldest of six children who would some day divide a fortune of fifteen million dollars, and he reached the age of reason—is it seven?—at the beginning of the century when daring young women were already gliding along Fifth Avenue in electric “mobiles.” In those days he and his brother had an English governess who spoke the language very clearly and crisply and well, so that the two boys grew to speak as she did—their words and sentences were all crisp and clear and not run together as ours are. They didn’t talk exactly like English children but acquired an accent that is peculiar to fashionable people in the city of New York.

In the summer the six children were moved from the house on Seventy-first Street to a big estate in northern Connecticut. It was not a fashionable locality—Anson’s father wanted to delay as long as possible his children’s knowledge of that side of life. He was a man somewhat superior to his class, which composed New York society, and to his period, which was the snobbish and formalized vulgarity of the Gilded Age, and he wanted his sons to learn habits of concentration and have sound constitutions and grow up into right-living and successful men. He and his wife kept an eye on them as well as they were able until the two older boys went away to school, but in huge establishments this is difficult—it was much simpler in the series of small and medium-sized houses in which my own youth was spent—I was never far out of the reach of my mother’s voice, of the sense of her presence, her approval or disapproval.

Anson’s first sense of his superiority came to him when he realized the half-grudging American deference that was paid to him in the Connecticut village. The parents of the boys he played with always inquired after his father and mother, and were vaguely excited when their own children were asked to the Hunters’ house. He accepted this as the natural state of things, and a sort of impatience with all groups of which he was not the center—in money, in position, in authority—remained with him for the rest of his life. He disdained to struggle with other boys for precedence—he expected it to be given him freely, and when it wasn’t he withdrew into his family. His family was sufficient, for in the East money is still a somewhat feudal thing, a clan-forming thing. In the snobbish West, money separates families to form “sets.”

At eighteen, when he went to New Haven, Anson was tall and thick-set, with a clear complexion and a healthy color from the ordered life he had led in school. His hair was yellow and grew in a funny way on his head, his nose was beaked—these two things kept him from being handsome—but he had a confident charm and a certain brusque style, and the upper-class men who passed him on the street knew without being told that he was a rich boy and had gone to one of the best schools. Nevertheless, his very superiority kept him from being a success in college—the independence was mistaken for egotism, and the refusal to accept Yale standards with the proper awe seemed to belittle all those who had. So, long before he graduated, he began to shift the center of his life to New York.

He was at home in New York—there was his own house with “the kind of servants you can’t get any more”—and his own family, of which, because of his good humor and a certain ability to make things go, he was rapidly becoming the centre, and the débutante parties, and the correct manly world of the men’s clubs, and the occasional wild spree with the gallant girls whom New Haven only knew from the fifth row. His aspirations were conventional enough—they included even the irreproachable shadow he would some day marry, but they differed from the aspirations of the majority of young men in that there was no mist over them, none of that quality which is variously known as “idealism” or “illusion.” Anson accepted without reservation the world of high finance and high extravagance, of divorce and dissipation, of snobbery and of privilege. Most of our lives end as a compromise—it was as a compromise that his life began.

He and I first met in the late summer of 1917 when he was just out of Yale, and, like the rest of us, was swept up into the systematized hysteria of the war. In the blue-green uniform of the naval aviation he came down to Pensacola, where the hotel orchestras played “I’m sorry, dear,” and we young officers danced with the girls. Every one liked him, and though he ran with the drinkers and wasn’t an especially good pilot, even the instructors treated him with a certain respect. He was always having long talks with them in his confident, logical voice—talks which ended by his getting himself, or, more frequently, another officer, out of some impending trouble. He was convivial, bawdy, robustly avid for pleasure, and we were all surprised when he fell in love with a conservative and rather proper girl.

Her name was Paula Legendre, a dark, serious beauty from somewhere in California. Her family kept a winter residence just outside of town, and in spite of her primness she was enormously popular; there is a large class of men whose egotism can’t endure humor in a woman. But Anson wasn’t that sort, and I couldn’t understand the attraction of her “sincerity”—that was the thing to say about her—for his keen and somewhat sardonic mind.

Nevertheless, they fell in love—and on her terms. He no longer joined the twilight gathering at the De Sota bar, and whenever they were seen together they were engaged in a long, serious dialogue, which must have gone on several weeks. Long afterward he told me that it was not about anything in particular but was composed on both sides of immature and even meaningless statements—the emotional content that gradually came to fill it grew up not out of the words but out of its enormous seriousness. It was a sort of hypnosis. Often it was interrupted, giving way to that emasculated humor we call fun; when they were alone it was resumed again, solemn, low-keyed, and pitched so as to give each other a sense of unity in feeling and thought. They came to resent any interruptions of it, to be unresponsive to facetiousness about life, even to the mild cynicism of their contemporaries. They were only happy when the dialogue was going on, and its seriousness bathed them like the amber glow of an open fire. Toward the end there came an interruption they did not resent—it began to be interrupted by passion.

Oddly enough, Anson was as engrossed in the dialogue as she was and as profoundly affected by it, yet at the same time aware that on his side much was insincere, and on hers much was merely simple. At first, too, he despised her emotional simplicity as well, but with his love her nature deepened and blossomed, and he could despise it no longer. He felt that if he could enter into Paula’s warm safe life he would be happy. The long preparation of the dialogue removed any constraint—he taught her some of what he had learned from more adventurous women, and she responded with a rapt holy intensity. One evening after a dance they agreed to marry, and he wrote a long letter about her to his mother. The next day Paula told him that she was rich, that she had a personal fortune of nearly a million dollars.

III

It was exactly as if they could say “Neither of us has anything; we shall be poor together”—just as delightful that they should be rich instead. It gave them the same communion of adventure. Yet when Anson got leave in April, and Paula and her mother accompanied him North, she was impressed with the standing of his family in New York and with the scale on which they lived. Alone with Anson for the first time in the rooms where he had played as a boy, she was filled with a comfortable emotion, as though she were pre-eminently safe and taken care of. The pictures of Anson in a skull cap at his first school, of Anson on horseback with the sweetheart of a mysterious forgotten summer, of Anson in a gay group of ushers and bridesmaids at a wedding, made her jealous of his life apart from her in the past, and so completely did his authoritative person seem to sum up and typify these possessions of his that she was inspired with the idea of being married immediately and returning to Pensacola as his wife.

But an immediate marriage wasn't discussed—even the engagement was to be secret until after the war. When she realized that only two days of his leave remained, her dissatisfaction crystallized in the intention of making him as unwilling to wait as she was. They were driving to the country for dinner, and she determined to force the issue that night.

Now a cousin of Paula's was staying with them at the Ritz, a severe, bitter girl who loved Paula but was somewhat jealous of her impressive engagement, and as Paula was late in dressing, the cousin, who wasn't going to the party, received Anson in the parlor of the suite.

Anson had met friends at five o'clock and drunk freely and indiscreetly with them for an hour. He left the Yale Club at a proper time, and his mother's chauffeur drove him to the Ritz, but his usual capacity was not in evidence, and the impact of the steam-heated sitting-room made him suddenly dizzy. He knew it, and was both amused and sorry.

Paula's cousin was twenty-five, but she was exceptionally naïve, and at first failed to realize what was up. She had never met Anson before, and she was surprised when he mumbled strange information and nearly fell off his chair, but until Paula appeared it didn't occur to her that what she had taken for the odor of a dry-cleaned uniform was really whisky. But Paula understood as soon as she appeared; her only thought was to get Anson away before her mother saw him, and at the look in her eyes the cousin understood too.

When Paula and Anson descended to the limousine they found two men inside, both asleep; they were the men with whom he had been drinking at the Yale Club, and they were also going to the party. He had entirely forgotten their presence in the car. On the way to Hempstead they awoke and sang. Some of the songs were rough, and though Paula tried to reconcile herself to the fact that Anson had few verbal inhibitions, her lips tightened with shame and distaste.

Back at the hotel the cousin, confused and agitated, considered the incident, and then walked into Mrs. Legendre's bedroom, saying: "Isn't he funny?"

"Who is funny?"

"Why—Mr. Hunter. He seemed so funny." Mrs. Legendre looked at her sharply.

"How is he funny?"

"Why, he said he was French. I didn't know he was French."

"That's absurd. You must have misunderstood." She smiled: "It was a joke."

The cousin shook her head stubbornly.

"No. He said he was brought up in France. He said he couldn't speak any English, and that's why he couldn't talk to me. And he couldn't!"

Mrs. Legendre looked away with impatience just as the cousin added thoughtfully, "Perhaps it was because he was so drunk," and walked out of the room.

This curious report was true. Anson, finding his voice thick and uncontrollable, had taken the unusual refuge of announcing that he spoke no English. Years afterward he used to tell that part of the story, and he invariably communicated the uproarious laughter which the memory aroused in him.

Five times in the next hour Mrs. Legendre tried to get Hempstead on the phone. When she succeeded, there was a ten-minute delay before she heard Paula's voice on the wire.

"Cousin Jo told me Anson was intoxicated."

"Oh, no. . . ."

"Oh, yes. Cousin Jo says he was intoxicated."

He told her he was French, and fell off his chair and behaved as if he was very intoxicated. "I don't want you to come home with him."

"Mother, he's all right! Please don't worry about——"

"But I do worry. I think it's dreadful. I want you to promise me not to come home with him."

"I'll take care of it, mother. . . ."

"I don't want you to come home with him."

"All right, mother. Good-by."

"Be sure now, Paula. Ask some one to bring you."

Deliberately Paula took the receiver from her ear and hung it up. Her face was flushed with helpless annoyance. Anson was stretched asleep out in a bedroom upstairs, while the dinner-party below was proceeding lamely toward conclusion.

The hour's drive had sobered him somewhat—his arrival was merely hilarious—and Paula hoped that the evening was not spoiled, after all, but two imprudent cocktails before dinner completed the disaster. He talked boisterously and somewhat offensively to the party at large for fifteen minutes, and then slid silently under the table; like a man in an old print—but, unlike an old print, it was rather horrible without being at all quaint. None of the young girls present remarked upon the incident—it seemed to merit only silence. His uncle and two other men carried him upstairs, and it was just after this that Paula was called to the phone.

An hour later Anson awoke in a fog of nervous agony, through which he perceived after a moment the figure of his uncle Robert standing by the door.

". . . I said are you better?"

"What?"

"Do you feel better, old man?"

"Terrible," said Anson.

"I'm going to try you on another Bromo-seltzer. If you can hold it down, it'll do you good to sleep."

With an effort Anson slid his legs from the bed and stood up.

"I'm all right," he said dully.

"Take it easy."

"I thin' if you gave me a glassbrandy I could go downstairs."

"Oh, no——"

"Yes, that's the only thin'. I'm all right now. . . . I suppose I'm in dutch dow' there."

"They know you're a little under the weather," said his uncle deprecatingly. "But don't worry about it. Schuyler didn't even get here. He passed away in the locker-room over at the Links."

Indifferent to any opinion, except Paula's, Anson was nevertheless determined to save the débris of the evening, but when after a cold bath he made his appearance most of the party had already left. Paula got up immediately to go home.

In the limousine the old serious dialogue began. She had known that he drank, she admitted, but she had never expected anything like this—it seemed to her that perhaps they were not suited to each other, after all. Their ideas about life were too different, and so forth. When she finished speaking, Anson spoke in turn, very soberly. Then Paula said she'd have to think it over; she wouldn't decide tonight; she was not angry but she was terrible sorry. Nor would she let him come into the hotel with her, but just before she got out of the car she leaned and kissed him unhappily on the cheek.

The next afternoon Anson had a long talk with Mrs. Legendre while Paula sat listening in silence. It was agreed that Paula was to brood over the incident for a proper period and then, if mother and daughter thought it best, they would follow Anson to Pensacola. On his part he apologized with sincerity and dignity—that was all; with every card in her hand Mrs. Legendre was unable to establish any advantage over him. He made no promises, showed no humility, only delivered a few serious comments on life which brought him off with rather a moral superiority at the end. When they came South three weeks later, neither Anson in his satisfaction nor Paula in her relief at the reunion realized that the psychological moment had passed forever.

IV

He dominated and attracted her, and at the same time filled her with anxiety. Confused by his mixture of solidity and self-indulgence, of sentiment and cynicism—incongruities which her gentle mind was unable to resolve—Paula grew to think of him as two alternating personalities. When she saw him alone, or at a formal party, or with his casual inferiors, she felt a tremendous pride in his strong, attractive presence, the paternal, understanding stature of his mind. In other company she became uneasy when what had been a fine imperviousness to mere gentility showed its other face. The other face was gross, humorous, reckless of everything but pleasure. It startled her mind temporarily away from him, even led her into a short covert experiment with an old beau, but it was no use—after four months of Anson's enveloping vitality there was an anæmic pallor in all other men.

In July he was ordered abroad, and their tenderness and desire reached a crescendo. Paula considered a last-minute marriage—decided against it only because there were always cocktails on his breath now, but the parting itself made her physically ill with grief. After his departure she wrote him long letters of regret for the days of love they had missed by waiting. In August Anson's plane slipped down into the North Sea. He was pulled onto a destroyer after a night in the water and sent to hospital with pneumonia; the armistice was signed before he was finally sent home.

Then, with every opportunity given back to them, with no material obstacle to overcome, the secret weavings of their temperaments came between them, drying up their kisses and their tears, making their voices less loud to one another, muffling the intimate chatter of their hearts until the old communication was only possible by letters, from far away. One afternoon a society reporter waited for two hours in the Hunters' house for a confirmation of their engagement. Anson denied it; nevertheless an early issue carried the report as a leading paragraph—they were "constantly seen together at Southampton, Hot Springs, and Tuxedo Park." But the serious dialogue had turned a corner into a long-sustained quarrel, and the affair was almost played out. Anson got drunk flagrantly and missed an engagement with her, whereupon Paula made certain behavioristic demands. His despair was helpless before his pride and his knowledge of himself: the engagement was definitely broken.

"Dearest," said their letters now, "Dearest, Dearest, when I wake up in the middle of the night and realize that after all it was not to be, I feel that I want to die. I can't go on living any more. Perhaps when we meet this summer we may talk things over and decide differently—we were so excited and sad that day, and I don't feel that I can live all my life without you. You speak of other people. Don't you know there are no other people for me, but only you. . . ."

But as Paula drifted here and there around the East she would sometimes mention her gaieties to make him wonder. Anson was too acute to wonder. When he saw a man's name in her letters he felt more sure of her and a little disdainful—he was always superior to such things. But he still hoped that they would some day marry.

Meanwhile he plunged vigorously into all the movement and glitter of post-bellum New York, entering a brokerage house, joining half a dozen clubs, dancing late, and moving in three worlds—his own world, the world of young Yale graduates, and that section of the half-world which rests one end on Broadway. But there was always a thorough and inflexible eight hours devoted to his work in Wall Street, where the combination of his influential family connection, his sharp intelligence, and his abundance of sheer physical energy brought him almost immediately forward. He had one of those invaluable minds with partitions in it; sometimes he appeared at his office refreshed by less than an hour's sleep, but such occurrences were rare. So early as 1920 his income in salary and commissions exceeded twelve thousand dollars.

As the Yale tradition slipped into the past he became more and more of a popular figure among his classmates in New York, more popular than he had ever been in college. He lived in a great house, and had the means of introducing young men into other great houses. Moreover, his life already seemed secure, while theirs, for the most part, had arrived again at precarious beginnings. They commenced to turn to him for amusement and escape, and Anson responded readily, taking pleasure in helping people and arranging their affairs.

There were no men in Paula's letters now, but a note of tenderness ran through them that had not been there before. From several sources he heard that she had "a heavy beau," Lowell Thayer, a Bostonian of wealth and position, and though he was sure she still loved him, it made him uneasy to think that he might lose her, after all. Save for one unsatisfactory day she had not been in New York for almost five months, and as the rumors multiplied he became increasingly anxious to see her. In February he took his vacation and went down to Florida.

Palm Beach sprawled plump and opulent between the sparkling sapphire of Lake Worth, flawed here and there by houseboats at anchor, and the great turquoise bar of the Atlantic Ocean. The huge bulks of the Breakers and the Royal Poinciana rose as twin paunches from the bright level of the sand, and around them clustered the Dancing Glade, Bradley's House of Chance, and a dozen modistes and milliners with goods at triple prices from New York. Upon the trellised veranda of the Breakers two hundred women stepped right, stepped left, wheeled, and slid in that then celebrated calisthenic known as the double-shuffle, while in half-time to the music two thousand bracelets clicked up and down on two hundred arms.

At the Everglades Club after dark Paula and Lowell Thayer and Anson and a casual fourth played bridge with hot cards. It seemed to Anson that her kind, serious face was wan and tired—she had been around now for four, five, years. He had known her for three.

"Two spades."

"Cigarette? . . . Oh, I beg your pardon. By me."

"By."

"I'll double three spades."

There were a dozen tables of bridge in the room, which was filling up with smoke. Anson's eyes met Paula's, held them persistently even when Thayer's glance fell between them. . . .

"What was bid?" he asked abstractedly.

"Rose of Washington Square"

sang the young people in the corners:

"I'm withering there

In basement air—"

The smoke banked like fog, and the opening of a door filled the room with blown swirls of ectoplasm. Little Bright Eyes streaked past the tables seeking Mr. Conan Doyle among the Englishmen who were posing as Englishmen about the lobby.

"You could cut it with a knife."

". . . cut it with a knife."

". . . a knife."

At the end of the rubber Paula suddenly got up and spoke to Anson in a tense, low voice. With scarcely a glance at Lowell Thayer, they walked out the door and descended a long flight of stone steps—in a moment they were walking hand in hand along the moonlit beach.

"Darling, darling. . . ." They embraced recklessly, passionately, in a shadow. . . . Then Paula drew back her face to let his lips say what she wanted to hear—she could feel the words forming as they kissed again. . . . Again she broke away, listening, but as he pulled her close once more she realized that he had said nothing—only "Darling! Darling!" in that deep, sad whisper that always made her cry. Humbly, obediently, her emotions yielded to him and the tears streamed down her face, but her heart kept on crying: "Ask me—oh, Anson, dearest, ask me!"

"Paula. . . . Paula!"

The words wrung her heart like hands, and Anson, feeling her tremble, knew that emotion was enough. He need say no more, commit their destinies to no practical enigma. Why should he, when he might hold her so, biding his own time, for another year—forever? He was considering them both, her more than himself. For a moment, when she said suddenly that she must go back to her hotel, he hesitated, thinking, first, "This is the moment, after all," and then: "No, let it wait—she is mine. . . ."

He had forgotten that Paula too was worn away inside with the strain of three years. Her mood passed forever in the night.

He went back to New York next morning filled with a certain restless dissatisfaction. Late in April, without warning, he received a telegram from Bar Harbor in which Paula told him that she was engaged to Lowell Thayer, and that they would be married immediately in Boston. What he never really believed could happen had happened at last.

Anson filled himself with whisky that morning, and going to the office, carried on his work without a break—rather with a fear of what would happen if he stopped. In the evening he went out as usual, saying nothing of what had occurred; he was cordial, humorous, unabridged. But one thing he could not help —for three days, in any place, in any company, he would suddenly bend his head into his hands and cry like a child.

v

In 1922 when Anson went abroad with the junior partner to investigate some London loans, the journey intimated that he was to be taken into the firm. He was twenty-seven now, a little heavy without being definitely stout, and with a manner older than his years. Old people and young people liked him and trusted him, and mothers felt safe when their daughters were in his charge, for he had a way, when he came into a room, of putting himself on a footing with the oldest and most conservative people there. "You and I," he seemed to say, "we're solid. We understand."

He had an instinctive and rather charitable knowledge of the weaknesses of men and women, and, like a priest, it made him the more concerned for the maintenance of outward forms. It was typical of him that every Sunday morning he taught in a fashionable Episcopal Sunday school—even though a cold shower and a quick change into a cutaway coat were all that separated him from the wild night before.

After his father's death he was the practical head of his family, and, in effect, guided the destinies of the younger children. Through a complication his authority did not extend to his father's estate, which was administrated by his Uncle Robert, who was the horsy member of the family, a good-natured, hard-drinking member of that set which centers about Wheatley Hills.

Uncle Robert and his wife, Edna, had been great friends of Anson's youth, and the former was disappointed when his nephew's superiority failed to take a horsy form. He backed him for a city club which was the most difficult in America to enter—one could only join if one's family had "helped to build up New York (or, in other words, were rich before 1880)—and when Anson, after his election, neglected it for the Yale Club, Uncle Robert gave him a little talk on the subject. But when on top of that Anson declined to enter Robert Hunter's own conservative and somewhat neglected brokerage house, his manner grew cooler. Like a primary teacher who has taught all he knew, he slipped out of Anson's life.

There were so many friends in Anson's life—scarcely one for whom he had not done some unusual kindness and scarcely one whom he did not occasionally embarrass by his bursts of rough conversation or his habit of getting drunk whenever and however he liked. It annoyed him when any one else blundered in that regard—about his own lapses he was always humorous. Odd things happened to him and he told them with infectious laughter.

I was working in New York that spring, and I used to lunch with him at the Yale Club, which my university was sharing until the completion of our own. I had read of Paula's marriage, and one afternoon, when I asked him about her, something moved him to tell me the story. After that he frequently invited me to family dinners at his house and behaved as though there was a special relation between us, as though with his confidence a little of that consuming memory had passed into me.

I found that despite the trusting mothers, his attitude toward girls was not indiscriminately protective. It was up to the girl—if she showed an inclination toward looseness, she must take care of herself, even with him.

"Life," he would explain sometimes, "has made a cynic of me."

By life he meant Paula. Sometimes, especially when he was drinking, it became a little twisted in his mind, and he thought that she had callously thrown him over.

This "cynicism," or rather his realization that naturally fast girls were not worth sparing, led to his affair with Dolly Karger. It wasn't his only affair in those years, but it came nearest to touching him deeply, and it had a profound effect upon his attitude toward life.

Dolly was the daughter of a notorious "publicist" who had married into society. She herself grew up into the Junior League, came out at the Plaza, and went to the Assembly; and only a few old families like the Hunters could question whether or not she "belonged," for her picture was often in the papers, and she had more enviable attention than many girls who undoubtedly did. She was dark-haired, with carmine lips and a high, lovely color, which she concealed under pinkish-gray powder all through the first year out, because high color was unfashionable—Victorian-pale was the thing to be. She wore black, severe suits and stood with her hands in her pockets leaning a little forward, with a humorous restraint on her face. She danced exquisitely—better than anything she liked to dance—better than anything except making love. Since she was ten she had always been in love, and usually with some boy who didn't respond to her. Those who did—and there were many—bored her after a brief encounter, but for her failures she reserved the warmest spot in her heart. When she met them she would always try once more—sometimes she succeeded, more often she failed.

It never occurred to this gypsy of the unattainable that there was a certain resemblance in those who refused to love her—they shared a hard intuition that saw through to her weakness, not a weakness of emotion but a weakness of rudder. Anson perceived this when he first met her, less than a month after Paula's marriage. He was drinking rather heavily, and he pretended for a week that he was falling in love with her. Then he dropped her abruptly and forgot—immediately he took up the commanding position in her heart.

Like so many girls of that day Dolly was slackly and indiscreetly wild. The unconventionality of a slightly older generation had been simply one facet of a post-war movement to discredit obsolete manners—Dolly's was both older and shabbier, and she saw in Anson the two extremes which the emotionally shiftless woman seeks, an abandon to indulgence alternating with a protective strength. In his character she felt both the sybarite and the solid rock, and these two satisfied every need of her nature.

She felt that it was going to be difficult, but she mistook the reason—she thought that Anson and his family expected a more spectacular marriage, but she guessed immediately that her advantage lay in his tendency to drink.

They met at the large débutante dances, but as her infatuation increased they managed to be more and more together. Like most mothers, Mrs. Karger believed that Anson was exceptionally reliable, so she allowed Dolly to go with him to distant country clubs and suburban houses without inquiring closely into their activities or questioning her explanations when they came in late. At first these explanations might have been accurate, but Dolly's worldly ideas of capturing Anson were soon engulfed in the rising sweep of her emotion. Kisses in the back of taxis and motor-cars were no longer enough; they did a curious thing:

They dropped out of their world for a while and made another world just beneath it where Anson's tipling and Dolly's irregular hours would be less noticed and commented on. It was composed, this world, of varying elements—several of Anson's Yale friends and their wives, two or three young brokers and bond salesmen and a handful of unattached men, fresh from college, with money and a propensity to dissipation. What this world lacked in spaciousness and scale it made up for by allowing them a liberty that it scarcely permitted itself. Moreover, it centered around them and permitted Dolly the pleasure of a faint condescension—a pleasure which Anson, whose whole life was a condescension from the certitudes of his childhood, was unable to share.

He was not in love with her, and in the long feverish winter of their affair he frequently told her so. In the spring he was weary—he wanted to renew his life at some other source—moreover, he saw that either he must break with her now or accept the responsibility of a definite seduction. Her family's encouraging attitude precipitated his decision—one evening when Mr. Karger knocked discreetly at the library door to announce that he had left a bottle of old brandy in the dining-room, Anson felt that life was hemming him in. That night he wrote her a short letter in which he told her that he was going on his vacation, and that in view of all the circumstances they had better meet no more.

It was June. His family had closed up the house and gone to the country, so he was living temporarily at the Yale Club. I had heard about his affair with Dolly as it developed—accounts salted with humor, for he despised unstable women, and granted them no place in the social edifice in which he believed—and when he told me that night that he was definitely breaking with her I was glad. I had seen

Dolly here and there, and each time with a feeling of pity at the hopelessness of her struggle, and of shame at knowing so much about her that I had no right to know. She was what is known as "a pretty little thing," but there was a certain recklessness which rather fascinated me. Her dedication to the goddess of waste would have been less obvious had she been less spirited—she would most certainly throw herself away, but I was glad when I heard that the sacrifice would not be consummated in my sight.

Anson was going to leave the letter of farewell at her house next morning. It was one of the few houses left open in the Fifth Avenue district, and he knew that the Kargers, acting upon erroneous information from Dolly, had foregone a trip abroad to give their daughter her chance. As he stepped out the door of the Yale Club into Madison Avenue the postman passed him, and he followed back inside. The first letter that caught his eye was in Dolly's hand.

He knew what it would be—a lonely and tragic monologue, full of the reproaches he knew, the invoked memories, the "I wonder if's"—all the immemorial intimacies that he had communicated to Paula Legendre in what seemed another age. Thumbing over some bills, he brought it on top again and opened it. To his surprise it was a short, somewhat formal note, which said that Dolly would be unable to go to the country with him for the week-end, because Perry Hull from Chicago had unexpectedly come to town. It added that Anson had brought this on himself: "—if I felt that you loved me as I love you I would go with you at any time, any place, but Perry is so nice, and he so much wants me to marry him—"

Anson smiled contemptuously—he had had experience with such decoy epistles. Moreover, he knew how Dolly had labored over this plan, probably sent for the faithful Perry and calculated the time of his arrival—even labored over the note so that it would make him jealous without driving him away. Like most compromises, it had neither force nor vitality but only a timorous despair.

Suddenly he was angry. He sat down in the lobby and read it again. Then he went to the phone, called Dolly and told her in his clear, compelling voice that he had received her note and would call for her at five o'clock as they had previously planned. Scarcely waiting for the pretended uncertainty of her "Perhaps I can see you for an hour," he hung up the receiver and went down to his office. On the way he tore his own letter into bits and dropped it in the street.

He was not jealous—she meant nothing to him—but at her pathetic ruse everything stubborn and self-indulgent in him came to the surface. It was a presumption from a mental inferior and it could not be overlooked. If she wanted to know to whom she belonged she would see.

He was on the door-step at quarter past five. Dolly was dressed for the street, and he listened in silence to the paragraph of "I can only see you for an hour," which she had begun on the phone.

"Put on your hat, Dolly," he said, "we'll take a walk."

They strolled up Madison Avenue and over to Fifth while Anson's shirt dampened upon his portly body in the deep heat. He talked little, scolding her, making no love to her, but before they had walked six blocks she was his again, apologizing for the note, offering not to see Perry at all as an atonement, offering anything. She thought that he had come because he was beginning to love her.

"I'm hot," he said when they reached 71st Street.

"This is a winter suit. If I stop by the house and change, would you mind waiting for me downstairs? I'll only be a minute."

She was happy; the intimacy of his being hot, of any physical fact about him, thrilled her. When they came to the iron-grated door and Anson took out his key she experienced a sort of delight.

Downstairs it was dark, and after he ascended in the lift Dolly raised a curtain and looked out through opaque lace at the houses over the way. She heard the lift machinery stop, and with the notion of teasing him pressed the button that brought it down. Then on what was more than an impulse she got into it and sent it up to what she guessed was his floor.

"Anson," she called, laughing a little.

"Just a minute," he answered from his bedroom . . . then after a brief delay: "Now you can come in."

He had changed and was buttoning his vest. "This is my room," he said lightly. "How do you like it?"

She caught sight of Paula's picture on the wall and stared at it in fascination, just as Paula had stared at the pictures of Anson's childish sweethearts five years before. She knew something about Paula—sometimes she tortured herself with fragments of the story.

Suddenly she came close to Anson, raising her arms. They embraced. Outside the area window a soft artificial twilight already hovered, though the sun was still bright on a back roof across the way. In half an hour the room would be quite dark. The uncalculated opportunity overwhelmed them, made them both breathless, and they clung more closely. It was eminent, inevitable. Still holding one another, they raised their heads—their eyes fell together upon Paula's picture, staring down at them from the wall.

Suddenly Anson dropped his arms, and sitting down at his desk tried the drawer with a bunch of keys.

"Like a drink?" he asked in a gruff voice. "No, Anson."

He poured himself half a tumbler of whisky, swallowed it, and then opened the door into the hall.

"Come on," he said.

Dolly hesitated.

"Anson—I'm going to the country with you tonight after all. You understand that, don't you?"

"Of course," he answered brusquely.

In Dolly's car they rode on to Long Island, closer in their emotions than they had ever been before. They knew what would happen—not with Paula's face to remind them that something was lacking, but when they were alone in the still, hot Long Island night they did not care.

The estate in Port Washington where they were to spend the week-end belonged to a cousin of Anson's who had married a Montana copper operator. An interminable drive began at the lodge and twisted under imported poplar saplings toward a huge, pink, Spanish house. Anson had often visited there before.

After dinner they danced at the Linx Club. About midnight Anson assured himself that his cousins would not leave before two—then he explained that Dolly was tired; he would take her home and return to the dance later. Trembling a little with excitement, they got into a borrowed car together and drove to Port Washington. As they reached the lodge he stopped and spoke to the night-watchman.

"When are you making a round, Carl?"

"Right away."

"Then you'll be here till everybody's in?"

"Yes, sir."

"All right. Listen: if any automobile, no matter whose it is, turns in at this gate, I want you to phone the house immediately." He put a five-dollar bill into Carl's hand. "Is that clear?"

"Yes, Mr. Anson." Being of the Old World, he neither winked nor smiled. Yet Dolly sat with her face turned slightly away.

Anson had a key. Once inside he poured a drink for both of them—Dolly left hers untouched—then he ascertained definitely the location of the phone, and found that it was within easy hearing distance of their rooms, both of which were on the first floor.

Five minutes later he knocked at the door of Dolly's room.

"Anson?" He went in, closing the door behind him. She was in bed, leaning up anxiously with elbows on the pillow; sitting beside her he took her in his arms.

"Anson, darling."

He didn't answer.

"Anson. . . . Anson! I love you. . . . Say you love me. Say it now—can't you say it now? Even if you don't mean it?"

He did not listen. Over her head he perceived that the picture of Paula was hanging here upon this wall.

He got up and went close to it. The frame gleamed faintly with thrice-reflected moonlight—within was a blurred shadow of a face that he saw he did not know. Almost sobbing, he turned around and stared with abomination at the little figure on the bed.

"This is all foolishness," he said thickly. "I don't know what I was thinking about. I don't love you and you'd better wait for somebody that loves you. I don't love you a bit, can't you understand?"

His voice broke, and he went hurriedly out. Back in the salon he was pouring himself a drink with uneasy fingers, when the front door opened suddenly, and his cousin came in.

"Why, Anson, I hear Dolly's sick," she began solicitously. "I hear she's sick. . . ."

"It was nothing," he interrupted, raising his voice so that it would carry into Dolly's room. 10 "She was a little tired. She went to bed."

For a long time afterward Anson believed that a protective God sometimes interfered in human affairs. But Dolly Karger, lying awake and staring at the ceiling, never again believed in anything at all.

VI

When Dolly married during the following autumn, Anson was in London on business. 20 Like Paula's marriage, it was sudden, but it affected him in a different way. At first he felt that it was funny, and had an inclination to laugh when he thought of it. Later it depressed him—it made him feel old.

There was something repetitive about it—why, Paula and Dolly had belonged to different generations. He had a foretaste of the sensation of a man of forty who hears that the daughter of an old flame has married. He wired 30 congratulations and, as was not the case with Paula, they were sincere—he had never really hoped that Paula would be happy.

When he returned to New York, he was made a partner in the firm, and, as his responsibilities increased, he had less time on his hands. The refusal of a life-insurance company to issue him a policy made such an impression on him that he stopped drinking for a year, and claimed that he felt better physically, though I 40 I think he missed the convivial recounting of those Cellinesque adventures which, in his early twenties, had played such a part of his life. But he never abandoned the Yale Club. He was a figure there, a personality, and the tendency of his class, who were now seven years out of college, to drift away to more sober haunts was checked by his presence.

His day was never too full nor his mind too weary to give any sort of aid to any one who 50 asked it. What had been done at first through pride and superiority had become a habit and a passion. And there was always something—a younger brother in trouble at New Haven, a quarrel to be patched up between a friend and his wife, a position to be found for this man, an investment for that. But his specialty was the solving of problems for young married people. Young married people fascinated him and their apartments were almost sacred to him—he knew the story of their love-affair, advised them where to live and how, and remembered their babies' names. Toward young wives his attitude was circumspect: he never abused the trust which their husbands—strangely enough in view of his unconcealed irregularities— invariably reposed in him.

He came to take a vicarious pleasure in happy marriages, and to be inspired to an almost equally pleasant melancholy by those that went astray. Not a season passed that he did not witness the collapse of an affair that perhaps he himself had fathered. When Paula was divorced and almost immediately remarried to another Bostonian, he talked about her to me all one afternoon. He would never love any one as he had loved Paula, but he insisted that he no longer cared.

"I'll never marry," he came to say; "I've seen too much of it, and I know a happy marriage is a very rare thing. Besides, I'm too old."

But he did believe in marriage. Like all men who spring from a happy and successful marriage, he believed in it passionately—nothing he had seen would change his belief, his cynicism dissolved upon it like air. But he did really believe he was too old. At twenty-eight he began to accept with equanimity the prospect of marrying without romantic love; he resolutely chose a New York girl of his own class, pretty, intelligent, congenial, above reproach—and set about falling in love with her. The things he had said to Paula with sincerity, to other girls with grace, he could no longer say at all without smiling, or with the force necessary to convince.

"When I'm forty," he told his friends, "I'll be ripe. I'll fall for some chorus girl like the rest."

Nevertheless, he persisted in his attempt. His mother wanted to see him married, and he could now well afford it—he had a seat on the Stock Exchange, and his earned income came to twenty-five thousand a year. The idea was agreeable: when his friends—he spent most of his time with the set he and Dolly had evolved—closed themselves in behind domestic doors at night, he no longer rejoiced in his freedom. He even wondered if he should have married Dolly. Not even Paula had loved him more, and he was learning the rarity, in a single life, of encountering true emotion.

Just as this mood began to creep over him a disquieting story reached his ear. His aunt Edna, a woman just this side of forty, was carrying on an open intrigue with a dissolute, hard-drinking young man named Cary Sloane. Every one knew of it except Anson's Uncle Robert, who for fifteen years had talked long in clubs and taken his wife for granted.

Anson heard the story again and again with increasing annoyance. Something of his old feeling for his uncle came back to him, a feeling that was more than personal, a reversion toward that family solidarity on which he had based his pride. His intuition singled out the essential point of the affair, which was that his uncle shouldn't be hurt. It was his first experiment in unsolicited meddling, but with his knowledge of Edna's character he felt that he could handle the matter better than a district judge or his uncle.

His uncle was in Hot Springs. Anson traced down the sources of the scandal so that there should be no possibility of mistake and then he called Edna and asked her to lunch with him at the Plaza next day. Something in his tone must have frightened her, for she was reluctant, but he insisted, putting off the date until she had no excuse for refusing.

She met him at the appointed time in the Plaza lobby, a lovely, faded, gray-eyed blonde in a coat of Russian sable. Five great rings, cold with diamonds and emeralds, sparkled on her slender hands. It occurred to Anson that it was his father's intelligence and not his uncle's that had earned the fur and the stones, the rich brilliance that buoyed up her passing beauty.

Though Edna scented his hostility, she was unprepared for the directness of his approach.

"Edna, I'm astonished at the way you've been acting," he said in a strong, frank voice. "At first I couldn't believe it."

"Believe what?" she demanded sharply.

"You needn't pretend with me, Edna. I'm talking about Cary Sloane. Aside from any other consideration, I didn't think you could treat Uncle Robert——"

"Now look here, Anson——" she began angrily, but his peremptory voice broke through hers:

"—and your children in such a way. You've been married eighteen years, and you're old enough to know better."

"You can't talk to me like that! You——"

"Yes, I can. Uncle Robert has always been my best friend." He was tremendously moved. He felt a real distress about his uncle, about his three young cousins.

Edna stood up, leaving her crab-flake cocktail untasted.

"This is the silliest thing——"

"Very well, if you won't listen to me I'll go to Uncle Robert and tell him the whole story—he's bound to hear it sooner or later. And afterward I'll go to old Moses Sloane."

Edna faltered back into her chair.

"Don't talk so loud," she begged him. Her eyes blurred with tears. "You have no idea how your voice carries. You might have chosen a less public place to make all these crazy accusations."

He didn't answer.

"Oh, you never liked me, I know," she went on. "You're just taking advantage of some silly gossip to try and break up the only interesting friendship I've ever had. What did I ever do to make you hate me so?"

Still Anson waited. There would be the appeal to his chivalry, then to his pity, finally to his superior sophistication—when he had shouldered his way through all these there would be admissions, and he could come to grips with her. By being silent, by being impervious, by returning constantly to his main weapon, which was his own true emotion, he bullied her into frantic despair as the luncheon hour slipped away. At two o'clock she took out a mirror and a handkerchief, shined away the marks of her tears and powdered the slight hollows where they had lain. She had agreed to meet him at her own house at five.

When he arrived she was stretched on a chaise longue which was covered with cretonne for the summer, and the tears he had called up at luncheon seemed still to be standing in her eyes. Then he was aware of Cary Sloane's dark anxious presence upon the cold hearth.

"What's this idea of yours?" broke out Sloane immediately. "I understand you invited Edna to lunch and then threatened her on the basis of some cheap scandal."

Anson sat down.

"I have no reason to think it's only scandal." 10

"I hear you're going to take it to Robert Hunter, and to my father."

Anson nodded.

"Either you break it off—or I will," he said.

"What God damned business is it of yours, Hunter?"

"Don't lose your temper, Cary," said Edna nervously. "It's only a question of showing him how absurd——"

"For one thing, it's my name that's being 20 handed around," interrupted Anson. "That's all that concerns you, Cary."

"Edna isn't a member of your family."

"She most certainly is!" His anger mounted. "Why—she owes this house and the rings on her fingers to my father's brains. When Uncle Robert married her she didn't have a penny."

They all looked at the rings as if they had a significant bearing on the situation. Edna made a gesture to take them from her hand.

"I guess they're not the only rings in the world," said Sloane.

"Oh, this is absurd," cried Edna. "Anson, will you listen to me? I've found out how the silly story started. It was a maid I discharged who went right to the Chilicheffs—all these Russians pump things out of their servants and then put a false meaning on them." She brought down her fist angrily on the table: "And after Tom lent them the limousine for a 40 whole month when we were South last winter——"

"Do you see?" demanded Sloane eagerly. "This maid got hold of the wrong end of the thing. She knew that Edna and I were friends, and she carried it to the Chilicheffs. In Russia they assume that if a man and a woman——"

He enlarged the theme to a disquisition upon social relations in the Caucasus.

"If that's the case it better be explained to 50 Uncle Robert," said Anson dryly, "so that when the rumors do reach him he'll know they're not true."

Adopting the method he had followed with Edna at luncheon he let them explain it all away. He knew that they were guilty and that presently they would cross the line from explanation into justification and convict themselves more definitely than he could ever do. By seven they had taken the desperate step of telling him the truth—Robert Hunter's neglect, Edna's empty life, the casual dalliance that had flamed up into passion—but like so many true stories it had the misfortune of being old, and its enfeebled body beat helplessly against the armor of Anson's will. The threat to go to Sloane's father sealed their helplessness, for the latter, a retired cotton broker out of Alabama, was a notorious fundamentalist who controlled his son by a rigid allowance and the promise that at his next vagary the allowance would stop forever.

They dined at a small French restaurant, and the discussion continued—at one time Sloane resorted to physical threats, a little later they were both imploring him to give them time. But Anson was obdurate. He saw that Edna was breaking up, and that her spirit must not be refreshed by any renewal of their passion.

At two o'clock in a small night-club on 53d Street, Edna's nerves suddenly collapsed, and she cried to go home. Sloane had been drinking heavily all evening, and he was faintly maudlin, leaning on the table and weeping a little with his face in his hands. Quickly Anson gave them his terms. Sloane was to leave town for six months, and he must be gone within forty-eight hours. When he returned there was to be no resumption of the affair, but at the end of a year Edna might, if she wished, tell Robert Hunter that she wanted a divorce and go about it in the usual way.

He paused, gaining confidence from their faces for his final word.

"Or there's another thing you can do," he said slowly, "if Edna wants to leave her children, there's nothing I can do to prevent your running off together."

"I want to go home!" cried Edna again. "Oh, haven't you done enough to us for one 50 day?"

Outside it was dark, save for a blurred glow from Sixth Avenue down the street. In that light those two who had been lovers looked for the last time into each other's tragic faces, realizing that between them there was not enough youth and strength to avert their eternal parting. Sloane walked suddenly off down the street and Anson tapped a dozing taxi-driver on the arm.

It was almost four; there was a patient flow of cleaning water along the ghostly pavement of Fifth Avenue, and the shadows of two night women flitted over the dark façade of St. Thomas's church. Then the desolate shrubbery of Central Park where Anson had often played as a child, and the mounting numbers, significant as names, of the marching streets. This was his city, he thought, where his name had flourished through five generations. No change could alter the permanence of its place here, for change itself was the essential substratum by which he and those of his name identified themselves with the spirit of New York. Resourcefulness and a powerful will—for his threats in weaker hands would have been less than nothing—had beaten the gathering dust from his uncle's name, from the name of his family, from even this shivering figure that sat beside him in the car.

Cary Sloane's body was found next morning on the lower shelf of a pillar of Queensboro Bridge. In the darkness and in his excitement he had thought that it was the water flowing black beneath him, but in less than a second it made no possible difference—unless he had planned to think one last thought of Edna, and call out her name as he struggled feebly in the water.

VII

Anson never blamed himself for his part in this affair—the situation which brought it about had not been of his making. But the just suffer with the unjust, and he found that his oldest and somehow his most precious friendship was over. He never knew what distorted story Edna told, but he was welcome in his uncle's house no longer.

Just before Christmas Mrs. Hunter retired to a select Episcopal heaven, and Anson became the responsible head of his family. An unmarried aunt who had lived with them for years ran the house, and attempted with helpless inefficiency to chaperone the younger girls. All the children were less self-reliant than Anson, more conventional both in their virtues and in their shortcomings. Mrs. Hunter's death had postponed the début of one daughter and the wedding of another. Also it had taken something deeply material from all of them, for with her passing the quiet, expensive superiority of the Hunters came to an end.

For one thing, the estate, considerably diminished by two inheritance taxes and soon to be divided among six children, was not a notable fortune any more. Anson saw a tendency in his youngest sisters to speak rather respectfully of families that hadn't "existed" twenty years ago. His own feeling of precedence was not echoed in them—sometimes they were conventionally snobbish, that was all. For another thing, this was the last summer they would spend on the Connecticut estate; the clamor against it was too loud: "Who wants to waste the best months of the year shut up in that dead old town?" Reluctantly he yielded—the house would go into the market in the fall, and next summer they would rent a smaller place in Westchester County. It was a step down from the expensive simplicity of his father's idea, and, while he sympathized with the revolt, it also annoyed him; during his mother's lifetime he had gone up there at least every other week-end—even in the gayest summers.

Yet he himself was part of this change, and his strong instinct for life had turned him in his twenties from the hollow obsequies of that abortive leisure class. He did not see this clearly—he still felt that there was a norm, a standard of society. But there was no norm, it was doubtful if there had ever been a true norm in New York. The few who still paid and fought to enter a particular set succeeded only to find that as a society it scarcely functioned—or, what was more alarming, that the Bohemia from which they fled sat above them at table.

At twenty-nine Anson's chief concern was his own growing loneliness. He was sure now that he would never marry. The number of weddings at which he had officiated as best man or usher was past all counting—there was a drawer at home that bulged with the official neckties of this or that wedding-party, neckties standing for romances that had not endured a year, for couples who had passed completely from his life. Scarfpins, gold pencils, cuff-buttons, presents from a generation of grooms had passed through his jewel-box and been lost—and with every ceremony he was less and less able to imagine himself in the groom's place. Under his hearty good-will toward all those marriages there was despair about his own.

And as he neared thirty he became not a little depressed at the inroads that marriage, especially lately, had made upon his friendships. Groups of people had a disconcerting tendency to dissolve and disappear. The men from his own college—and it was upon them he had expended the most time and affection—were the most elusive of all. Most of them were drawn deep into domesticity, two were dead, one lived abroad, one was in Hollywood writing continuities for pictures that Anson went faithfully to see.

Most of them, however, were permanent commuters with an intricate family life centering around some suburban country club, and it was from these that he felt his estrangement most keenly.

In the early days of their married life they had all needed him; he gave them advice about their slim finances, he exorcised their doubts about the advisability of bringing a baby into two rooms and a bath, especially he stood for the great world outside. But now their financial troubles were in the past and the fearfully expected child had evolved into an absorbing family. They were always glad to see old Anson, but they dressed up for him and tried to impress him with their present importance, and kept their troubles to themselves. They needed him no longer.

A few weeks before his thirtieth birthday the last of his early and intimate friends was married. Anson acted in his usual rôle of best man, gave his usual silver tea-service, and went down to the usual Homeric to say good-by. It was a hot Friday afternoon in May, and as he walked from the pier he realized that Saturday closing had begun and he was free until Monday morning.

"Go where?" he asked himself.

The Yale Club, of course; bridge until dinner, then four or five raw cocktails in somebody's room and a pleasant confused evening. He regretted that this afternoon's groom wouldn't be along—they had always been able to cram so much into such nights: they knew how to attach women and how to get rid of them, how much consideration any girl deserved from their intelligent hedonism. A party was an adjusted thing—you took certain girls to certain places and spent just so much on their amusement; you drank a little, not much, more than you ought to drink, and at a certain time in the morning you stood up and said you were going home. You avoided college boys, sponges, future engagements, fights, sentiment, and indiscretions. That was the way it was done. All the rest was dissipation.

In the morning you were never violently sorry—you made no resolutions, but if you had overdone it and your heart was slightly out of order, you went on the wagon for a few days without saying anything about it, and waited until an accumulation of nervous boredom projected you into another party.

The lobby of the Yale Club was unpopulated. In the bar three very young alumni looked up at him, momentarily and without curiosity.

"Hello there, Oscar," he said to the bartender. "Mr. Cahill been around this afternoon?"

"Mr. Cahill's gone to New Haven."

"Oh . . . that so?"

"Gone to the ball game. Lot of men gone up."

Anson looked once again into the lobby, considered for a moment, and then walked out and over to Fifth Avenue. From the broad window of one of his clubs—one that he had scarcely visited in five years—a gray man with watery eyes stared down at him. Anson looked quickly away—that figure sitting in vacant resignation, in supercilious solitude, depressed him. He stopped and, retracing his steps, started over 47th Street toward Teak Warden's apartment. Teak and his wife had once been his most familiar friends—it was a household where he and Dolly Karger had been used to go in the days of their affair. But Teak had taken to drink, and his wife had remarked publicly that Anson was a bad influence on him. The remark reached Anson in an exaggerated form—when it was finally cleared up, the delicate spell of intimacy was broken, never to be renewed.

"Is Mr. Warden at home?" he inquired.

"They've gone to the country."

The fact unexpectedly cut at him. They were gone to the country and he hadn't known. 10 Two years before he would have known the date, the hour, come up at the last moment for a final drink, and planned his first visit to them. Now they had gone without a word.

Anson looked at his watch and considered a week-end with his family, but the only train was a local that would jolt through the aggressive heat for three hours. And tomorrow in the country, and Sunday—he was in no mood for porch-bridge with polite undergraduates, and dancing after dinner at a rural road-house, a diminutive of gaiety which his father had estimated too well. 20

"Oh, no," he said to himself. . . . "No."

He was a dignified, impressive young man, rather stout now, but otherwise unmarked by dissipation. He could have been cast for a pillar of something—at times you were sure it was not society, at others nothing else—for the law, for the church. He stood for a few minutes motionless on the sidewalk in front of a 47th Street apartment-house; for almost the first time in his life he had nothing whatever to do.

Then he began to walk briskly up Fifth Avenue, as if he had just been reminded of an important engagement there. The necessity of dissimulation is one of the few characteristics that we share with dogs, and I think of Anson on that day as some well-bred specimen who had been disappointed at a familiar back door. 40 He was going to see Nick, once a fashionable bartender in demand at all private dances, and now employed in cooling non-alcoholic champagne among the labyrinthine cellars of the Plaza Hotel.

"Nick," he said, "what's happened to everything?"

"Dead," Nick said.

"Make me a whisky sour." Anson handed a 50 pint bottle over the counter. "Nick, the girls are different; I had a little girl in Brooklyn and she got married last week without letting me know."

"That a fact? Ha-ha-ha," responded Nick diplomatically. "Slipped it over on you."

"Absolutely," said Anson. "And I was out with her the night before."

"Ha-ha-ha," said Nick, "ha-ha-ha!"

"Do you remember the wedding, Nick, in Hot Springs where I had the waiters and the musicians singing 'God save the King?'"

"Now where was that, Mr. Hunter?" Nick concentrated doubtfully. "Seems to me that was——"

"Next time they were back for more, and I began to wonder how much I'd paid them," continued Anson.

"—seems to me that was at Mr. Trenholm's wedding."

"Don't know him," said Anson decisively. He was offended that a strange name should intrude upon his reminiscences; Nick perceived this.

"Naw—aw—" he admitted, "I ought to know that. It was one of your crowd—Brakins. . . . Baker——"

"Bicker Baker," said Anson responsively. "They put me in a hearse after it was over and covered me up with flowers and drove me 30 away."

"Ha-ha-ha," said Nick. "Ha-ha-ha."

Nick's simulation of the old family servant paled presently and Anson went upstairs to the lobby. He looked around—his eyes met the glance of an unfamiliar clerk at the desk, then fell upon a flower from the morning's marriage hesitating in the mouth of a brass cuspidor. He went out and walked slowly toward the blood-red sun over Columbus Circle. Suddenly he turned around and, retracing his steps to the Plaza, immured himself in a telephone-booth.

Later he said that he tried to get me three times that afternoon, that he tried every one who might be in New York—men and girls he had not seen for years, an artist's model of his college days whose faded number was still in his address book—Central told him that even the exchange existed no longer. At length his quest roved into the country, and he held brief disappointing conversations with emphatic butlers and maids. So-and-so was out, riding, swimming, playing golf, sailed to Europe last week. Who shall I say phoned?

It was intolerable that he should pass the evening alone—the private reckonings which one plans for a moment of leisure lose every charm when the solitude is enforced. There were always women of a sort, but the ones he knew had temporarily vanished, and to pass a New York evening in the hired company of a stranger never occurred to him—he would 10 have considered that that was something shameful and secret, the diversion of a traveling salesman in a strange town.

Anson paid the telephone bill—the girl tried unsuccessfully to joke with him about its size—and for the second time that afternoon started to leave the Plaza and go he knew not where. Near the revolving door the figure of a woman, obviously with child, stood sideways to the light—a sheer beige cape 20 fluttered at her shoulders when the door turned and, each time, she looked impatiently toward it as if she were weary of waiting. At the first sight of her a strong nervous thrill of familiarity went over him, but not until he was within five feet of her did he realize that it was Paula.

“Why, Anson Hunter!”

His heart turned over.

“Why, Paula——”

“Why, this is wonderful. I can’t believe it, Anson!”

She took both his hands, and he saw in the freedom of the gesture that the memory of him had lost poignancy to her. But not to him—he felt that old mood that she evoked in him stealing over his brain, that gentleness with which he had always met her optimism as if afraid to mar its surface.

“We’re at Rye for the summer. Pete had to 40 come East on business—you know of course I’m Mrs. Peter Hagerty now—so we brought the children and took a house. You’ve got to come out and see us.”

“Can I?” he asked directly. “When?”

“When you like. Here’s Pete.” The revolving door functioned, giving up a fine tall man of thirty with a tanned face and a trim mustache. His immaculate fitness made a sharp contrast with Anson’s increasing bulk, which was 50 obvious under the faintly tight cut-away coat.

“You oughtn’t to be standing,” said Hagerty to his wife. “Let’s sit down here.” He indicated lobby chairs, but Paula hesitated.

“I’ve got to go right home,” she said. “Anson, why don’t you—why don’t you come out and have dinner with us tonight? We’re just getting settled, but if you can stand that——”

Hagerty confirmed the invitation cordially.

“Come out for the night.”

Their car waited in front of the hotel, and Paula with a tired gesture sank back against silk cushions in the corner.

“There’s so much I want to talk to you about,” she said, “it seems hopeless.”

“I want to hear about you.”

“Well”—she smiled at Hagerty—“that would take a long time too. I have three children—by my first marriage. The oldest is five, then four, then three.” She smiled again. “I didn’t waste much time having them, did I?”

“Boys?”

“A boy and two girls. Then—oh, a lot of things happened, and I got a divorce in Paris a year ago and married Pete. That’s all—except that I’m awfully happy.”

In Rye they drove up to a large house near the Beach Club, from which there issued presently three dark, slim children who broke from an English governess and approached them with an esoteric cry. Abstractedly and with difficulty Paula took each one into her arms, a caress which they accepted stiffly, as they had evidently been told not to bump into Mummy. Even against their fresh faces Paula’s skin showed scarcely any weariness—for all her physical languor she seemed younger than when he had last seen her at Palm Beach seven years ago.

At dinner she was preoccupied, and afterward, during the homage to the radio, she lay with closed eyes on the sofa, until Anson wondered if his presence at this time were not an intrusion. But at nine o’clock, when Hagerty rose and said pleasantly that he was going to leave them by themselves for a while, she began to talk slowly about herself and the past.

“My first baby,” she said—“the one we call Darling, the biggest little girl—I wanted to die when I knew I was going to have her, because Lowell was like a stranger to me. It didn’t seem as though she could be my own. I wrote you a letter and tore it up. Oh, you were so bad to me, Anson."

It was the dialogue again, rising and falling. Anson felt a sudden quickening of memory.

"Weren't you engaged once?" she asked—"a girl named Dolly something?"

"I wasn't ever engaged. I tried to be engaged, but I never loved anybody but you, Paula."

"Oh," she said. Then after a moment: "This baby is the first one I ever really wanted. You see, I'm in love now—at last."

He didn't answer, shocked at the treachery of her remembrance. She must have seen that the "at last" bruised him, for she continued:

"I was infatuated with you, Anson—you could make me do anything you liked. But we wouldn't have been happy. I'm not smart enough for you. I don't like things to be complicated like you do." She paused. "You'll never settle down," she said.

The phrase struck at him from behind—it was an accusation that of all accusations he had never merited.

"I could settle down if women were different," he said, "If I didn't understand so much about them, if women didn't spoil you for other women, if they had only a little pride. If I could go to sleep for a while and wake up into a home that was really mine—why, that's what I'm made for, Paula, that's what women have seen in me and liked in me. It's only that I can't get through the preliminaries any more."

Hagerty came in a little before eleven; after a whisky Paula stood up and announced that she was going to bed. She went over and stood by her husband.

"Where did you go, dearest?" she demanded.

"I had a drink with Ed Saunders."

"I was worried. I thought maybe you'd run away."

She rested her head against his coat.

"He's sweet, isn't he, Anson?" she demanded.

"Absolutely," said Anson, laughing.

She raised her face to her husband.

"Well, I'm ready," she said. She turned to Anson: "Do you want to see our family gymnastic stunt?"

"Yes," he said in an interested voice.

"All right. Here we go!"

Hagerty picked her up easily in his arms.

"This is called the family acrobatic stunt," said Paula. "He carries me upstairs. Isn't it sweet of him?"

"Yes," said Anson.

Hagerty bent his head slightly until his face touched Paula's.

"And I love him," she said. "I've just been telling you, haven't I, Anson?"

"Yes," he said.

"He's the dearest thing that ever lived in this world; aren't you, darling? . . . Well, good night. Here we go. Isn't he strong?"

"Yes," Anson said.

"You'll find a pair of Pete's pajamas laid out for you. Sweet dreams—see you at breakfast."

"Yes," Anson said.

VIII

The older members of the firm insisted that Anson should go abroad for the summer. He had scarcely had a vacation in seven years, they said. He was stale and needed a change. Anson resisted.

"If I go," he declared, "I won't come back any more."

"That's absurd, old man. You'll be back in three months with all this depression gone. Fit as ever."

"No." He shook his head stubbornly. "If I stop, I won't go back to work. If I stop, that means I've given up—I'm through."

"We'll take a chance on that. Stay six months if you like—we're not afraid you'll leave us. Why, you'd be miserable if you didn't work."

They arranged his passage for him. They liked Anson—every one liked Anson—and the change that had been coming over him cast a sort of pall over the office. The enthusiasm that had invariably signaled up business, the consideration toward his equals and his inferiors, the lift of his vital presence—within the past four months his intense nervousness had melted down these qualities into the fussy pessimism of a man of forty. On every transaction in which he was involved he acted as a drag and a strain.

"If I go I'll never come back," he said.

Three days before he sailed Paula Legendre Hagerty died in childbirth. I was with him a great deal then, for we were crossing together, but for the first time in our friendship he told me not a word of how he felt, nor did I see the slightest sign of emotion. His chief preoccupation was with the fact that he was thirty years old—he would turn the conversation to the point where he could remind you of it and then fall silent, as if he assumed that the statement would start a chain of thought sufficient to itself. Like his partners, I was amazed at the change in him, and I was glad when the Paris moved off into the wet space between the worlds, leaving his principality behind.

“How about a drink?” he suggested.

We walked into the bar with that defiant feeling that characterizes the day of departure and ordered four Martinis. After one cocktail a change came over him—he suddenly reached across and slapped my knee with the first joviality I had seen him exhibit for months.

“Did you see that girl in the red tam?” he demanded, “the one with the high color who had the two police dogs down to bid her goodbye.”

“She’s pretty,” I agreed.

“I looked her up in the purser’s office and found out that she’s alone. I’m going down to see the steward in a few minutes. We’ll have dinner with her tonight.”

After a while he left me, and within an hour

he was walking up and down the deck with her, talking to her in his strong, clear voice. Her red tam was a bright spot of color against the steel-green sea, and from time to time she looked up with a flashing bob of her head, and smiled with amusement and interest, and anticipation. At dinner we had champagne, and were very joyous—afterward Anson ran the pool with infectious gusto, and several people who had seen me with him asked me his name. He and the girl were talking and laughing together on a lounge in the bar when I went to bed.

I saw less of him on the trip than I had hoped. He wanted to arrange a foursome, but there was no one available, so I saw him only at meals. Sometimes, though, he would have a cocktail in the bar, and he told me about the girl in the red tam, and his adventures with her, making them all bizarre and amusing, as he had a way of doing, and I was glad that he was himself again, or at least the self that I knew, and with which I felt at home. I don’t think he was ever happy unless some one was in love with him, responding to him like filings to a magnet, helping him to explain himself, promising him something. What it was I do not know. Perhaps they promised that there would always be women in the world who would spend their brightest, freshest, rarest hours to nurse and protect the superiority he cherished in his heart.

1898 -- Ernest Hemingway --

HEMINGWAY was born in the Chicago suburban town of Oak Park. He was educated in the public schools, where he distinguished himself as a football player and boxer. Upon graduation (1917) from Oak Park High School he accepted a post as reporter on the staff of a Kansas City newspaper. Before the United States entered World War I, Hemingway served in a French ambulance unit, later enlisting in the Italian army. He saw active service on the Austrian front, where he was severely wounded and twice decorated for bravery in action.

After the armistice he resumed his newspaper work, first in the Middle East with the Toronto Star, and later as Paris correspondent for a Hearst syndicate. During this European stay he continued his active participation in sports, especially tennis, boxing, and fishing, and developed an eager interest in bullfighting, later to figure prominently in one of his novels.

In Europe he began seriously his training for the career of writer. He met Gertrude Stein, Ezra Pound, and Ford Madox Ford; for a while, he helped Ford edit the Transatlantic Review. Miss Stein and Pound were especially important to him as teachers of writing. From each he learned much, and he was independent enough of them to retain his own style, free of any excesses of imitation.

Aside from a few rather immature things which he published in high-school papers, Poetry, and The Double Dealer, Hemingway's career as a published writer began in Europe. He had some pieces published in a German magazine, Der Querschnitt, in 1923. In the same year Three Stories & Ten Poems was published in Dijon, France, by The Contact Publishing Company. In 1924, in our time appeared in Paris; it consisted only of the "chapters," the running commentary of the later (capitalized) version, issued in New York in 1925. The Torrents of Spring, which began as a parody of Sherwood Anderson's Dark Laughter, appeared (Paris) in 1926.

With the publication of The Sun Also Rises (October, 1926) in New York, Hemingway established himself as a writer; his apprenticeship was over, and he became the object of controversy and the leader of a group of writers, many of them expatriates, which was to grow in succeeding years. Men Without Women, another collection of short stories, appeared in 1927; A Farewell to Arms, his most popular novel until For Whom the Bell Tolls, was published first in Scribner's Magazine, then in book form, in September of 1929. In 1932 his long interest in bullfighting and his great and accurate knowledge of the sport received treatment in Death in the Afternoon. Another collection of short stories, Winner Take Nothing, appeared in 1933. The story of one of his hunting expeditions in Africa, The Green Hills of Africa, was published in 1935. To Have and Have Not, his first novel in eight years, came out in 1937. This was followed by The Fifth Column and the First Forty-Nine Stories (1938) and For Whom the Bell Tolls (1940).

Hemingway has acquired a fabulous reputation in his own time. He has had numerous imitators, and has appealed both to the literary avant-garde and to the general public. Several of his stories have already been adapted to the screen, one or two of them with considerable success. He is one of a few primary American influences upon the literature and philosophy of the French existentialists; articles on his work continue to appear in the literary reviews of England and of Continental Europe. In short, he has become a classic in his own lifetime.

Perhaps the most important principle which governs his taste and his writing is the need of simplicity, of absolute candidness, of complete freedom from abstrac-tion or mystification. "If a man writes clearly enough any one can see if he fakes," he said in Death in the Afternoon. It is bad taste, in Hemingway's opinion, to over-emotionalize a situation, to take advantage of facts and to make them serve vague generalizations. Hemingway is the leading exponent of "postwar nominalism"; the lesson of World War I was that the "glory words" mean nothing, are disgusting because they mislead, force men into awkward and artificial situations, make them suffer and die for causes they do not understand, which are remote from their personal lives. "I was always embarrassed by the words sacred, glorious, and sacrifice and the expression in vain," his Lieutenant Henry says in A Farewell to Arms.

Along with such abstract words (only things, and the names of places, have dignity), he condemned obscure, involuted, complicated style, the use of elaborate syntax to confuse or over-extend an impression. Hemingway's style is consistent with his views of writing. The simple sentence, the compound sentence, individual clauses brought together by a series of "and's," flat statement free of what he would call extraneous interpretation or "setting," understatement: all of these are found in most of his writing. The dialogue is sparse, clean, and unexcessive; description is pared to an appropriate minimum; he does not seek "the essential" at the sacrifice of detail.

These characteristics of his style are closely linked with Hemingway's general approach to the postwar world. The "glory words" no longer attract; philosophy confuses and evades responsibility. What is left is the discrete moment of sensation, the isolated demonstration of physical courage, whatever one can clearly identify as an authentic act or gesture. His novels and short stories extol the genuine, discard the artificial, the self-consciously histrionic. Robert Cohn of The Sun Also Rises fails to adjust to the group of Jake's friends because his gestures are unnatural and vague; he dramatizes excessively his self-consciousness. The best aesthetic demonstration of the "clean line" of behavior is to be found in sports: at first fishing, hunting, boxing, whenever they are free of commercialism, are genuine exercises; then, the greatest of them all, bullfighting. Bullfighting provides an aesthetic of action; it is an external demonstration of the Hemingway style—that is, when it is practiced cleanly, without deception, as it is by Pedro Romero, of The Sun Also Rises:

Romero never made any contortions, always it was straight and pure and natural in line. The others twisted themselves like corkscrews, their elbows raised, and leaned against the flanks of the bull after his horns had passed, to give a faked look of danger.

Beginning with To Have and Have Not, Hemingway was slowly to abandon the point of view which his style suggested, and in some respects also to change his style. To Have and Have Not is a poor novel, lacking the tightness and simplicity of design of his early work, and in many respects demonstrating a new kind of affectation, scarcely ever before noticeable in his work. For Whom the Bell Tolls, a crashing success at the box-office, presents a more complicated style, manifests an anxiety on the author's part to "use" his material rather than simply to state it. The book is dominated by the necessity of proof, by the need for attachment to "a cause"; while many incidents are superbly told, and the Spanish character is not unintelligibly remote from his cousins of The Sun Also Rises, Hemingway's wall of defense against doctrine has been broken. It is quite possible that he has gone as far as he can with the early manner and is in process of abandoning it.

Hemingway's novels are Torrents of Spring (1926); The Sun Also Rises (1926); A Farewell to Arms (1929); To Have and Have Not (1937); For Whom the Bell Tolls (1940). His short stories appear in In Our Time (1925); Men Without Women (1927); Winner Take Nothing (1933); The Fifth Column (a play) and the First Forty-Nine Stories (1938). A collection of The Short Stories of Ernest Hemingway appeared in 1942. Death in the Afternoon (1932) is for the most part a factual account (history and description) of bullfighting. Green Hills of Africa (1935) is a book of travel and description. ### THE KILLERS

THE DOOR of Henry's lunch-room opened and two men came in. They sat down at the counter.

"What's yours?" George asked them.

"I don't know," one of the men said. "What do you want to eat, Al?"

"I don't know," said Al. "I don't know what I want to eat."

Outside it was getting dark. The street-light came on outside the window. The two men at the counter read the menu. From the other end of the counter Nick Adams watched them. He had been talking to George when they came in.

"I'll have a roast pork tenderloin with apple sauce and mashed potatoes," the first man said.

10 "It isn't ready yet."

"What the hell do you put it on the card for?"

"That's the dinner," George explained. "You can get that at six o'clock."

George looked at the clock on the wall behind the counter.

"It's five o'clock."

"The clock says twenty minutes past five," the second man said.

"It's twenty minutes fast."

"Oh, to hell with the clock," the first man said. "What have you got to eat?"

"I can give you any kind of sandwiches," George said. "You can have ham and eggs, bacon and eggs, liver and bacon, or a steak."

"Give me chicken croquettes with green peas and cream sauce and mashed potatoes."

"That's the dinner."

"Everything we want's the dinner, eh? That's the way you work it."

"I can give you ham and eggs, bacon and eggs, liver——"

"I'll take ham and eggs," the man called Al said. He wore a derby hat and a black overcoat buttoned across the chest. His face was small and white and he had tight lips. He wore a silk muffler and gloves.

"Give me bacon and eggs," said the other man. He was about the same size as Al. Their faces were different, but they were dressed like twins. Both wore overcoats too tight for them. They sat leaning forward, their elbows on the counter.

"Got anything to drink?" Al asked.

"Silver beer, bevo, ginger-ale," George said.

"I mean you got anything to drink?"

"Just those I said."

"This is a hot town," said the other. "What do they call it?"

"Summit."

"Ever hear of it?" Al asked his friend.

"No," said the friend.

"What do you do here nights?" Al asked.

"They eat the dinner," his friend said.

"They all come here and eat the big dinner."

"That's right," George said.

"So you think that's right?" Al asked George.

"Sure."

"You're a pretty bright boy, aren't you?"

"Sure," said George.

"Well, you're not," said the other little man. "Is he, Al?"

"He's dumb," said Al. He turned to Nick. "What's your name?"

"Adams."

"Another bright boy," Al said. "Ain't he a bright boy, Max?"

"The town's full of bright boys," Max said.

George put the two platters, one of ham and eggs, the other of bacon and eggs, on the counter. He set down two side-dishes of fried potatoes and closed the wicket into the kitchen.

"Which is yours?" he asked Al.

"Don't you remember?"

"Ham and eggs."

"Just a bright boy," Max said. He leaned forward and took the ham and eggs. Both men ate with their gloves on. George watched them eat.

"What are you looking at?" Max looked at George.

"Nothing."

"The hell you were. You were looking at me."

"Maybe the boy meant it for a joke, Max," Al said.

George laughed.

"You don't have to laugh," Max said to him. "You don't have to laugh at all, see?"

"All right," said George.

"So he thinks it's all right." Max turned to Al. "He thinks it's all right. That's a good one."

"Oh, he's a thinker," Al said. They went on eating.

"What's the bright boy's name down the counter?" Al asked Max.

"Hey, bright boy," Max said to Nick. "You go around on the other side of the counter with your boy friend."

"What's the idea?" Nick asked.

"There isn't any idea."

"You better go around, bright boy," Al said. Nick went around behind the counter.

"What's the idea?" George asked.

"None of your damn business," Al said. "Who's out in the kitchen?"

"The nigger."

"What do you mean the nigger?"

"The nigger that cooks."

"Tell him to come in."

"What's the idea?"

"Tell him to come in."

"Where do you think you are?"

"We know damn well where we are," the man called Max said. "Do we look silly?"

"You talk silly," Al said to him. "What the hell do you argue with this kid for? Listen," he said to George, "tell the nigger to come out here."

"What are you going to do to him?"

"Nothing. Use your head, bright boy. What would we do to a nigger?"

George opened the slit that opened back into the kitchen. "Sam," he called. "Come in here a minute."

The door to the kitchen opened and the nigger came in. "What was it?" he asked. The two men at the counter took a look at him.

"All right, nigger. You stand right there," 20 Al said.

Sam, the nigger, standing in his apron, looked at the two men sitting at the counter. "Yes, sir," he said. Al got down from his stool.

"I'm going back to the kitchen with the nigger and bright boy," he said. "Go on back to the kitchen, nigger. You go with him, bright boy." The little man walked after Nick and Sam, the cook, back into the kitchen. The door shut after them. The man called Max sat at the counter opposite George. He didn't look at George but looked in the mirror that ran along back of the counter. Henry's had been made over from a saloon into a lunch-counter.

"Well, bright boy," Max said, looking into the mirror, "why don't you say something?"

"What's it all about?"

"Hey, Al," Max called, "bright boy wants 40 to know what it's all about."

"Why don't you tell him?" Al's voice came from the kitchen.

"What do you think it's all about?"

"I don't know."

"What do you think?"

Max looked into the mirror all the time he was talking.

"I wouldn't say."

"Hey, Al, bright boy says he wouldn't say 50 what he thinks it's all about."

"I can hear you, all right," Al said from the kitchen. He had propped open the slit that dishes passed through into the kitchen with a catsup bottle. "Listen, bright boy," he said from the kitchen to George. "Stand a little further along the bar. You move a little to the left, Max." He was like a photographer arranging for a group picture.

"Talk to me, bright boy," Max said. "What 10 do you think's going to happen?"

George did not say anything.

"I'll tell you," Max said. "We're going to kill a Swede. Do you know a big Swede named Ole Andreson?"

"Yes."

"He comes here to eat every night, don't he?"

"Sometimes he comes here."

"He comes here at six o'clock, don't he?"

"If he comes."

"We know all that, bright boy," Max said. "Talk about something else. Ever go to the movies?"

"Once in a while."

"You ought to go to the movies more. The movies are fine for a bright boy like you."

"What are you going to kill Ole Andreson for? What did he ever do to you?"

"He never had a chance to do anything to 30 us. He never even seen us."

"And he's only going to see us once," Al said from the kitchen.

"What are you going to kill him for, then?" George asked.

"We're killing him for a friend. Just to oblige a friend, bright boy."

"Shut up," said Al from the kitchen. "You talk too goddam much."

"Well, I got to keep bright boy amused. 40 Don't I, bright boy?"

"You talk too damn much," Al said. "The nigger and my bright boy are amused by themselves. I got them tied up like a couple of girl friends in the convent."

"I suppose you were in a convent?"

"You never know."

"You were in a kosher convent. That's where you were."

George looked up at the clock.

"If anybody comes in you tell them the cook is off, and if they keep after it, you tell them you'll go back and cook yourself. Do you get that, bright boy?"

"All right," George said. "What you going to do with us afterward?"

"That'll depend," Max said. "That's one of those things you never know at the time."

George looked up at the clock. It was a quarter past six. The door from the street opened. A street-car motorman came in.

"Hello, George," he said. "Can I get supper?"

"Sam's gone out," George said. "He'll be back in about half an hour."

"I'd better go up the street," the motorman said. George looked at the clock. It was twenty minutes past six.

"That was nice, bright boy," Max said. "You're a regular little gentleman."

"He knew I'd blow his head off," Al said from the kitchen.

"No," said Max. "It ain't that. Bright boy is nice. He's a nice boy. I like him."

At six-fifty-five George said: "He's not coming."

Two other people had been in the lunch-room. Once George had gone out to the kitchen and made a ham-and-egg sandwich "to go" that a man wanted to take with him. Inside the kitchen he saw Al, his derby hat tipped back, sitting on a stool beside the wicket with the muzzle of a sawed-off shotgun resting on the ledge. Nick and the cook were back to back in the corner, a towel tied in each of their mouths. George had cooked the sandwich, wrapped it up in oiled paper, put it in a bag, brought it in, and the man had paid for it and gone out.

"Bright boy can do everything," Max said. "He can cook and everything. You'd make some girl a nice wife, bright boy."

"Yes?" George said. "Your friend, Ole Andreson, isn't going to come."

"We'll give him ten minutes," Max said.

Max watched the mirror and the clock. The hands of the clock marked seven o'clock, and then five minutes past seven.

"Come on, Al," said Max. "We better go. He's not coming."

"Better give him five minutes," Al said from the kitchen.

In the five minutes a man came in, and George explained that the cook was sick.

"Why the hell don't you get another cook?" the man asked. "Aren't you running a lunch-counter?" He went out.

"Come on, Al," Max said.

"What about the two bright boys and the nigger?"

"They're all right."

"You think so?"

"Sure. We're through with it."

"I don't like it," said Al. "It's sloppy. You talk too much."

"Oh, what the hell," said Max. "We got to keep amused, haven't we?"

"You talk too much, all the same," Al said. He came out from the kitchen. The cut-off barrels of the shotgun made a slight bulge under the waist of his too tight-fitting overcoat. He straightened his coat with his gloved hands.

"So long, bright boy," he said to George. "You got a lot of luck."

"That's the truth," Max said. "You ought to play the races, bright boy."

The two of them went out the door. George watched them, through the window, pass under the arc-light and cross the street. In their tight overcoats and derby hats they looked like a vaudeville team. George went back through the swinging-door into the kitchen and untied Nick and the cook.

"I don't want any more of that," said Sam, the cook. "I don't want any more of that."

Nick stood up. He had never had a towel in his mouth before.

"Say," he said. "What the hell?" He was trying to swagger it off.

"They were going to kill Ole Andreson," George said. "They were going to shoot him when he came in to eat."

"Ole Andreson?"

"Sure."

The cook felt the corners of his mouth with his thumbs.

"They all gone?" he asked.

"Yeah," said George. "They're gone now."

"I don't like it," said the cook. "I don't like any of it at all."

"Listen," George said to Nick. "You better go see Ole Andreson."

"All right."

"You better not have anything to do with it at all," Sam, the cook, said. "You better stay way out of it."

"Don't go if you don't want to," George said.

"Mixing up in this ain't going to get you anywhere," the cook said. "You stay out of it."

"I'll go see him," Nick said to George. "Where does he live?"

The cook turned away.

"Little boys always know what they want to do," he said.

"He lives up at Hirsch's rooming-house," George said to Nick.

"I'll go up there."

Outside the arc-light shone through the bare branches of a tree. Nick walked up the street beside the car-tracks and turned at the next arc-light down a side-street. Three houses up the street was Hirsch's rooming-house. Nick walked up the two steps and pushed the bell. A woman came to the door.

"Is Ole Andreson here?"

"Do you want to see him?"

"Yes, if he's in."

Nick followed the woman up a flight of stairs and back to the end of a corridor. She knocked on the door.

"Who is it?"

"It's somebody to see you, Mr. Andreson," the woman said.

"It's Nick Adams."

"Come in."

Nick opened the door and went into the room. Ole Andreson was lying on the bed with all his clothes on. He had been a heavyweight prizefighter and he was too long for the bed. He lay with his head on two pillows. He did not look at Nick.

"What was it?" he asked.

"I was up at Henry's," Nick said, "and two fellows came in and tied up me and the cook, and they said they were going to kill you."

It sounded silly when he said it. Ole Andreson said nothing.

"They put us out in the kitchen," Nick went on. "They were going to shoot you when you came in to supper."

Ole Andreson looked at the wall and did not say anything.

"George thought I better come and tell you about it."

"There isn't anything I can do about it," Ole Andreson said.

"I'll tell you what they were like."

"I don't want to know what they were like," Ole Andreson said. He looked at the wall. "Thanks for coming to tell me about it."

"That's all right."

Nick looked at the big man lying on the bed.

"Don't you want me to go and see the police?"

"No," Ole Andreson said. "That wouldn't do any good."

"Isn't there something I could do?"

"No. There ain't anything to do."

"Maybe it was just a bluff."

"No. It ain't just a bluff."

Ole Andreson rolled over toward the wall.

"The only thing is," he said, talking toward the wall, "I just can't make up my mind to go out. I been in here all day."

"Couldn't you get out of town?"

"No," Ole Andreson said. "I'm through with all that running around."

He looked at the wall.

"There ain't anything to do now."

"Couldn't you fix it up some way?"

"No. I got in wrong." He talked in the same flat voice. "There ain't anything to do. After a while I'll make up my mind to go out."

"I better go back and see George," Nick said.

"So long," said Ole Andreson. He did not look toward Nick. "Thanks for coming around."

Nick went out. As he shut the door he saw Ole Andreson with all his clothes on, lying on the bed looking at the wall.

"He's been in his room all day," the landlady said down-stairs. "I guess he don't feel well. I said to him: 'Mr. Andreson, you ought to go out and take a walk on a nice fall day like this,' but he didn't feel like it."

"He doesn't want to go out."

"I'm sorry he don't feel well," the woman said. "He's an awfully nice man. He was in the ring, you know."

"I know it."

"You'd never know it except from the way his face is," the woman said. They stood talking just inside the street door. "He's just as gentle."

"Well, good-night, Mrs. Hirsch," Nick said.

"I'm not Mrs. Hirsch," the woman said.

"She owns the place. I just look after it for her. I'm Mrs. Bell."

"Well, good-night, Mrs. Bell," Nick said.

"Good-night," the woman said.

Nick walked up the dark street to the corner under the arc-light, and then along the car-tracks to Henry's eating-house. George was inside, back of the counter.

"Did you see Ole?"

"Yes," said Nick. "He's in his room and he won't go out."

The cook opened the door from the kitchen when he heard Nick's voice.

"I don't even listen to it," he said and shut the door.

"Did you tell him about it?" George asked.

"Sure. I told him but he knows what it's all about."

"What's he going to do?"

"Nothing."

"They'll kill him."

"I guess they will."

"He must have got mixed up in something in Chicago."

"I guess so," said Nick.

"It's a hell of a thing."

"It's an awful thing," Nick said.

They did not say anything. George reached down for a towel and wiped the counter.

"I wonder what he did?" Nick said.

"Double-crossed somebody. That's what they kill them for."

"I'm going to get out of this town," Nick said.

"Yes," said George. "That's a good thing to do."

"I can't stand to think about him waiting in the room and knowing he's going to get it. It's too damned awful."

"Well," said George, "you better not think about it."

IN ANOTHER COUNTRY

IN THE fall the war was always there, but we did not go to it any more. It was cold in the fall in Milan and the dark came very early. Then the electric lights came on, and it was pleasant along the streets looking in the windows. There was much game hanging outside the shops, and the snow powdered in the fur of the foxes and the wind blew their tails. The deer hung stiff and heavy and empty, and small birds blew in the wind and the wind turned their feathers. It was a cold fall and the wind came down from the mountains.

We were all at the hospital every afternoon, and there were different ways of walking across the town through the dusk to the hospital. Two of the ways were alongside canals, but they were long. Always, though, you crossed a bridge across a canal to enter the hospital. There was a choice of three bridges. On one of them a woman sold roasted chestnuts. It was warm, standing in front of her charcoal fire, and the chestnuts were warm afterward in your pocket. The hospital was very old and very beautiful, and you entered through a gate and walked across a courtyard and out a gate on the other side. There were usually funerals starting from the courtyard. Beyond the old hospital were the new brick pavilions, and there we met every afternoon and were all very polite and interested in what was the matter, and sat in the machines that were to make so much difference.

The doctor came up to the machine where I was sitting and said: "What did you like best to do before the war? Did you practise a sport?"

I said: "Yes, football."

"Good," he said. "You will be able to play football again better than ever."

My knee did not bend and the leg dropped straight from the knee to the ankle without a calf, and the machine was to bend the knee and make it move as in riding a tricycle. But it did not bend yet, and instead the machine lurched when it came to the bending part. The doctor said: "That will all pass. You are a fortunate young man. You will play football again like a champion."

In the next machine was a major who had a little hand like a baby's. He winked at me when the doctor examined his hand, which was between two leather straps that bounced up and down and flapped the stiff fingers, and said: "And will I too play football, captain-doctor?" He had been a very great fencer, and before the war the greatest fencer in Italy.

The doctor went to his office in a back room and brought a photograph which showed a hand that had been withered almost as small as the major's, before it had taken a machine course, and after was a little larger. The major held the photograph with his good hand and looked at it very carefully. "A wound?" he asked.

"An industrial accident," the doctor said.

"Very interesting, very interesting," the major said, and handed it back to the doctor.

"You have confidence?"

"No," said the major.

There were three boys who came each day who were about the same age I was. They were all three from Milan, and one of them was to be a lawyer, and one was to be a painter, and one had intended to be a soldier, and after we were finished with the machines, sometimes we walked back together to the Café Cova, which was next door to the Scala. We walked the short way through the communist quarter because we were four together. The people hated us because we were officers, and from a wine-shop some one called out, "A basso gli ufficiali!" as we passed. Another boy who walked with us sometimes and made us five wore a black silk handkerchief across his face because he had no nose then and his face was to be rebuilt. He had gone out to the front from the military academy and been wounded within an hour after he had gone into the front line for the first time. They rebuilt his face, but he came from a very old family and they could never get the nose exactly right. He went to South America and worked in a bank. But this was a long time ago, and then we did not any of us know how it was going to be afterward. We only knew then that there was always the war, but that we were not going to it any more.

We all had the same medals, except the boy with the black silk bandage across his face, and he had not been at the front long enough to get any medals. The tall boy with a very pale face who was to be a lawyer had been a lieutenant of Arditi and had three medals of the sort we each had only one of. He had lived a very long time with death and was a little detached. We were all a little detached, and there was nothing that held us together except that we met every afternoon at the hospital. Although, as we walked to the Cova through the tough part of town, walking in the dark, with light and singing coming out of the wine-shops, and sometimes having to walk into the street when the men and women would crowd together on the sidewalk so that we would have had to jostle them to get by, we felt held together by there being something that had happened that they, the people who disliked us, did not understand.

We ourselves all understood the Cova, where it was rich and warm and not too brightly lighted, and noisy and smoky at certain hours, and there were always girls at the tables and the illustrated papers on a rack on the wall. The girls at the Cova were very patriotic, and I found that the most patriotic people in Italy were the café girls—and I believe they are still patriotic.

The boys at first were very polite about my medals and asked me what I had done to get them. I showed them the papers, which were written in very beautiful language and full of fratellanza and abnegazione, but which really said, with the adjectives removed, that I had been given the medals because I was an American. After that their manner changed a little toward me, although I was their friend against outsiders. I was a friend, but I was never really one of them after they had read the citations, because it had been different with them and they had done very different things to get their medals. I had been wounded, it was true; but we all knew that being wounded, after all, was really an accident. I was never ashamed of the ribbons, though, and sometimes, after the cocktail hour, I would imagine myself having done all the things they had done to get their medals; but walking home at night through the empty streets with the cold wind and all the shops closed, trying to keep near the street lights, I knew that I would never have done such things, and I was very much afraid to die, and often lay in bed at night by myself, afraid to die and wondering how I would be when I went back to the front again.

The three with the medals were like hunting-hawks; and I was not a hawk, although I might seem a hawk to those who had never hunted; they, the three, knew better and so we drifted apart. But I stayed good friends with the boy who had been wounded his first day at the front, because he would never know now how he would have turned out; so he could never be accepted either, and I liked him because I thought perhaps he would not have turned out to be a hawk either.

The major, who had been the great fencer, did not believe in bravery, and spent much time while we sat in the machines correcting my grammar. He had complimented me on how I spoke Italian, and we talked together very easily. One day I had said that Italian seemed such an easy language to me that I could not take a great interest in it; everything 10 was so easy to say. "Ah, yes," the major said. "Why, then, do you not take up the use of grammar?" So we took up the use of grammar, and soon Italian was such a difficult language that I was afraid to talk to him until I had the grammar straight in my mind.

The major came very regularly to the hospital. I do not think he ever missed a day, although I am sure he did not believe in the machines. There was a time when none of us be- 20 lieved in the machines, and one day the major said it was all nonsense. The machines were new then and it was we who were to prove them. It was an idiotic idea, he said, "a theory, like another." I had not learned my grammar, and he said I was a stupid impossible disgrace, and he was a fool to have bothered with me. He was a small man and he sat straight up in his chair with his right hand thrust into the machine and looked straight ahead at the wall while the 30 straps thumped up and down with his fingers in them.

"What will you do when the war is over if it is over?" he asked me. "Speak grammatically!"

"I will go to the States."

"Are you married?"

"No, but I hope to be."

"The more of a fool you are," he said. He seemed very angry. "A man must not marry."

"Why, Signor Maggiore?"

"Don't call me 'Signor Maggiore.'" 40

"Why must not a man marry?"

"He cannot marry. He cannot marry," he said angrily. "If he is to lose everything, he should not place himself in a position to lose that. He should not place himself in a position to lose. He should find things he cannot lose."

He spoke very angrily and bitterly, and looked straight ahead while he talked.

"But why should he necessarily lose it?" 50

"He'll lose it," the major said. He was looking at the wall. Then he looked down at the machine and jerked his little hand out from between the straps and slapped it hard against his thigh. "He'll lose it," he almost shouted. "Don't argue with me!" Then he called to the attendant who ran the machines. "Come and turn this damned thing off."

He went back into the other room for the light treatment and the massage. Then I heard him ask the doctor if he might use his tele- phone and he shut the door. When he came back into the room, I was sitting in another machine. He was wearing his cape and had his cap on, and he came directly toward my ma- chine and put his arm on my shoulder.

"I am sorry," he said, and patted me on the shoulder with his good hand. "I would not be rude. My wife has just died. You must forgive me."

"Oh—" I said, feeling sick for him. "I am 50 so sorry."

He stood there biting his lower lip. "It is very difficult," he said. "I cannot resign myself."

He looked straight past me and out through the window. Then he began to cry. "I am utterly unable to resign myself," he said and choked. And then crying, his head up looking at nothing, carrying himself straight and soldierly, with tears on both his cheeks and biting his lips, he walked past the machines and out the door.

The doctor told me that the major's wife, who was very young and whom he had not married until he was definitely invalidated out of the war, had died of pneumonia. She had been sick only a few days. No one expected her to die. The major did not come to the hospital for three days. Then he came at the usual hour, wearing a black band on the sleeve of his uni- form. When he came back, there were large framed photographs around the wall, of all sorts of wounds before and after they had been cured by the machines. In front of the machine the major used were three photographs of hands like his that were completely restored. I do not know where the doctor got them. I always understood we were the first to use the machines. The photographs did not make much difference to the major because he only 50 looked out of the window.

1888 -- Eugene O'Neill -- 1953

O'NEILL laid the foundations of his work as a dramatic artist during years of uncertainty, varied occupations, and vagabonding. He was born on Broadway, the son of the prominent American actor James O'Neill and his wife Ella Quinlan O'Neill. From the former he probably inherited his inclination toward the drama, from the latter his mysticism and love of beauty. For a number of years he accompanied his parents on their theatrical tours. He was educated in private schools and entered Princeton in 1906, but was suspended before the year was out and never returned. After serving as secretary of a mail-order house, he began in 1909 a series of wanderings which in the course of two years took him to Honduras in search of gold, on two theatrical tours as assistant manager and member of his father's troupe, on voyages to Buenos Aires, and back to New York. His experiences as a sailor, his association with the waterfront hangers-on, and his destitute condition and reckless living made a deep impression on his mind, and are reflected in some of the plays he wrote later. After a brief period of newspaper work his health broke, and he was threatened with tuberculosis, the result of excessive strain on his physique.

The months he spent recuperating in a sanatorium mark the turning point in his life. It was during this period that he felt the urge to write, and tried his hand at verse and plays. For a year or more he lived on the shore of Long Island Sound where he carefully built up his health through exercise and regulated routine, read classic and modern drama, wrote more than a dozen plays, and published in 1914 Thirst and Other One-Act Plays at his father's expense. After studying playwriting at Harvard under Professor Baker, from whom he received much encouragement, he became associated with the Provincetown Players, who produced many of his early plays. Feeling that the one-act play was too limited in scope, he brought out his first long play, Beyond the Horizon, in 1920, and was awarded the Pulitzer prize. Later his Anna Christie (1922) and Strange Interlude (1928) were similarly rewarded. The year 1920 marked the end of his apprentice period. Since that time he has been constantly in the public eye, and has brought out many plays of startling originality. He died December 7, 1953, after a prolonged illness.

Negatively O'Neill represents a definite reaction against the romantic glitter-and-tinsel dramatics of the time. On the positive side, the rise and development of the art theater, which freed writers and producers from the inhibiting demands of the commercial theater, made it possible for him to bring new content and form to the contemporary stage. He had seen the seamier, coarser, and more tragic aspects of life, and found in them dramatic possibilities which for the most part had been ignored. Nor was he satisfied with the current stage effects. Thus, with the support of the Provincetown Players and their theaters, he was enabled to experiment in subject and form, thereby introducing many innovations in practical stagecraft. His place therefore is at the very heart of the revolt in the American drama.

Through the success of Bound East for Cardiff (1916) and The Moon of the Caribbees (1919) he gave distinct impetus to the one-act play as a dramatic medium. His fame rests, however, on the impressive list of long plays, beginning with Beyond the Horizon (1920) and containing such well-known titles as The Emperor Jones (1921), The Hairy Ape (1922), All God's Chillun Got Wings (1924), Desire Under the Elms (1925), Strange Interlude (1928), and Mourning Becomes Electra (1931).

He shared with his contemporaries the tendencies of his time; he was a realist in Beyond the Horizon, a naturalist in Desire Under the Elms, a symbolist in The Great God Brown (1926), an expressionist in The Emperor Jones (1921). The main points in O'Neill's literary theory appear in various statements and letters quoted in Clark's Eugene O'Neill: The Man and His Plays, and may be briefly summarized. In preparation for his work he read widely in dramatic literature, including the Greeks, the Elizabethans, Ibsen, and "especially Strindberg," who influenced him very strongly. He determined early to avoid conventional dramatic technique, and expressed dissatisfaction with his In the Zone because it is theatrical sentimentalism. He has been a lifelong experimenter, avoiding mechanistic methods of plot construction, and trying in each case to adapt the technique to the peculiar demands of the theme. Some critics, who did not realize what his plan and purpose were, felt that he was "bungling through ignorance."

As far as the treatment of his material is concerned, he was not satisfied with mere surface realism, and resorted to what he called super-naturalism, for "the old 'naturalism'—or 'realism,' if you prefer . . .—no longer applies." He portrayed phases of life which to many seemed questionable as dramatic or literary subject-matter. His primary interest lay in the representation of character, but that did not prevent him from striving for a symbolism which extends beyond the individual. In The Hairy Ape, for instance, the hero is not merely a specific human being but the symbol of mankind in general. In this way he achieves a universality which transcends the ordinary type of realism.

O'Neill's world is a world of tragedy, somber and unrelieved, the result for the most part of frustration and the ironical tricks which fate plays on man. Many of his characters are dreamers who are forced to battle maladjustment in a limited, material world, and become victims of circumstances. Many of them suffer from the negative ills of spiritual starvation, while others are subject to a more positive inability to shape and control their lives. Incidental to his essentially tragic conception of life, he offers criticism of current tendencies in the larger national life, especially in The Great God Brown, Marco Millions, and The Hairy Ape; but it would be straining the point to say that he is a social critic. His primary purpose is to show the transforming power of tragedy, tragedy as it enters into the lives of people apparently at the very bottom of the scale of existence, but tragedy which through its purgation of the emotions, somewhat in the Greek sense, ennobles and purifies the soul.

O'Neill has been the most ambitious, and the most pretentious, dramatist of the contemporary American scene. He has progressively experimented with varieties of stagecraft and playwrighting. The more complicated the theatrical idea, the longer the play, until it might be said that technique almost takes the place of literary insight. His most brilliant stage successes have been scored, in Strange Interlude and Mourning Becomes Electra, at the expense of clarity and cleanness of conception. But he remains an exciting playwright, as much for his failures as for his successes. The failures are chiefly the result of his inadequacy as a writer; his dialogue is often flat and spiritless; one is attracted by the design more than by the matter. His last play, The Ice-Man Cometh (1946), betrays a muzzy sentimentality, which to this time seems rather to have been the prerogative of William Saroyan. In many respects, the early sea plays remain the most satisfactory; their authenticity (so brilliantly demonstrated in John Ford's film-version, The Long Voyage Home) is unimpaired. Of the experimental plays, The Emperor Jones appears to have a good chance of surviving the later, more ambitious plays.

Only a limited number of O'Neill's long list of plays can be noted: Thirst and Other One-Act Plays (1914); Before Breakfast (1916); Bound East for Cardiff (1916); The Moon of the Caribbees, and Six Other Plays of the Sea (1919); Beyond the Horizon (1920); Gold (1920); The Emperor Jones, Diff'rent, The Straw (1921); The Hairy Ape, Anna Christie, The First Man (1922); All God's Chillun Got Wings, Welded (1924); Desire Under the Elms (1925); The Great God Brown (1926); Strange Interlude (1928); Mourning Becomes Electra (1931); Ah, Wilderness! (1933); Days Without End (1934); The Ice-Man Cometh (1946). The best collected edition is The Plays of Eugene O'Neill (12 vols., 1934-35). There are also The Complete Works of Eugene O'Neill (2 vols., 1924), Collected Plays (4 vols., 1925), and Collected Plays (1943). For biography of O'Neill consult B. H. ## THE EMPEROR JONES

CHARACTERS

BRUTUS JONES . . . . . Emperor
HENRY SMITHERS . . . . . A Cockney Trader
AN OLD NATIVE WOMAN

LEM . . . . . A Native Chief
SOLDIERS . . . . . Adherents of Lem
*The Little Formless Fears; Jeff; The Negro Convicts;
The Prison Guard; The Planters; The Auctioneer;
The Slaves; The Congo Witch-Doctor; The Crocodile God.*

The action of the play takes place on an island in the West Indies as yet not self-determined by White Marines. The form of native government is, for the time being, an Empire.

SCENE ONE

SCENE. The audience chamber in the palace of the Emperor — a spacious, high-ceilinged room with bare, white-washed walls. The floor is of white tiles. In the rear, to the left of center, a wide archway giving out on a portico with white pillars. The palace is evidently situated on high ground, for beyond the portico nothing can be seen but a vista of distant hills, their summits crowned with thick groves of palm trees. In the right wall, center, a smaller arched doorway leading to the living quarters of the palace. The room is bare of furniture with the exception of one huge chair made of uncut wood which stands at center, its back to rear. This is very apparently the Emperor's throne. It is painted a dazzling, eye-smiting scarlet. There is a brilliant orange cushion on the seat and another smaller one is placed on the floor to serve as a footstool. Strips of matting, dyed scarlet, lead from the foot of the throne to the two entrances.

It is late afternoon but the sunlight still blazes yellowly beyond the portico and there is an oppressive burden of exhausting heat in the air.

As the curtain rises, a native Negro woman sneaks in cautiously from the entrance on the right. She is very old, dressed in cheap calico, bare-footed, a red bandana handkerchief covering all but a few stray wisps of white hair. A bundle bound in colored cloth is carried over her shoulder on the end of a stick. She hesitates beside the doorway, peering back as if in extreme dread of being discovered. Then she begins to glide noiselessly, a step at a time, toward the doorway in the rear. At this moment, SMITHERS appears beneath the portico.

SMITHERS is a tall, stoop-shouldered man about forty. His bald head, perched on a long neck with an enormous Adam's apple, looks like an egg. The tropics have tanned his naturally pasty face with its small, sharp features to a sickly yellow, and native rum has painted his pointed nose to a startling red. His little, wash-blue eyes are red-rimmed and dart about him like a ferret's. His expression is one of unscrupulous meanness, cowardly and dangerous. He is dressed in a worn riding suit of dirty white drill, puttees, spurs, and wears a white cork helmet. A cartridge belt with an automatic revolver is around his waist. He carries a riding whip in his hand. He sees the woman and stops to watch her suspiciously. Then, making up his mind, he steps quickly on tiptoe into the room. The woman, looking back over her shoulder continually, does not see him until it is too late. When she does SMITHERS springs forward and grabs her firmly by the shoulder. She struggles to get away, fiercely but silently.

SMITHERS (Tightening his grasp — roughly). Easy! None o' that, me birdie. You can't wriggle out now. I got me 'ooks on yer.

WOMAN (Seeing the uselessness of struggling, gives way to frantic terror, and sinks to the ground embracing his knees supplicatingly). No tell him! No tell him, Mister!

SMITHERS (With great curiosity). Tell 'im? (Then scornfully) Oh, you mean 'is bloomin' Majesty. What's the gaime, any'ow? What are you sneakin' away for? Been stealin' a bit, I s'pose. (He taps her bundle with his riding whip significantly).

WOMAN (Shaking her head vehemently). No, me no steal.

SMITHERS. Bloody liar! But tell me what's up. There's somethin' funny goin' on. I smelled it in the air first thing I got up this mornin'. You blacks are up to some devilment. This palace of 'is is like a bleedin' tomb. Where's all the 'ands? (The woman keeps sullenly silent. SMITHERS raises his whip threateningly.) Ow, yer won't, won't yer? I'll show yer what's what.

WOMAN (Coweringly). I tell, Mister. You no hit. They go—all go. (She makes a sweeping gesture toward the hills in the distance.)

SMITHERS. Run away—to the 'ills?

WOMAN. Yes, Mister. Him Emperor—<sup>10</sup> Great Father. (She touches her forehead to the floor with a quick mechanical jerk.) Him sleep after eat. Then they go—all go. Me old woman. Me left only. Now me go too.

SMITHERS (His astonishment giving way to an immense, mean satisfaction). Ow! So that's the ticket! Well, I know bloody well wot's in the air—when they runs orf to the 'ills. The tomtom'll be thumping out there bloomin' soon. (With extreme vindictiveness.) And I'm bloody glad of it, for one! Serve 'im right! Puttin' on<sup>20</sup> airs, the stinkin' nigger! 'Is Majesty! Gawd blimey! I only 'opes I'm there when they takes 'im out to shoot 'im. (Suddenly.) 'E's still 'ere all right, ain't 'e?

WOMAN. Yes. Him sleep.

SMITHERS. 'E's bound to find out soon as 'e wakes up. 'E's cunnin' enough to know when 'is time's come. (He goes to the doorway on right and whistles shrilly with his fingers in his mouth. The old woman springs to her feet and runs out of the doorway, rear. SMITHERS goes after her, reaching for his revolver.) Stop or I'll shoot! (Then stopping—indifferently.) Pop orf then, if yer like, yer black cow. (He stands in the doorway, looking after her.)

(JONES enters from the right. He is a tall, powerfully-built, full-blooded Negro of middle age. His features are typically Negroid, yet there is something decidedly distinctive about his<sup>40</sup> face—an underlying strength of will, a hardy, self-reliant confidence in himself that inspires respect. His eyes are alive with a keen, cunning intelligence. In manner he is shrewd, suspicious, evasive. He wears a light blue uniform coat, sprayed with brass buttons, heavy gold chevrons on his shoulders, gold braid on the collar, cuffs, etc. His pants are bright red with a light blue stripe down the side. Patent leather laced boots with brass spurs, and a belt with a long-barreled, pearl-handled revolver in a holster complete his make-up. Yet there is something not altogether ridiculous about his grandeur. He has a way of carrying it off.)

JONES (Not seeing anyone—greatly irritated and blinking sleepily—shouts). Who dare whistle dat way in my palace? Who dare wake up de Emperor? I'll git de hide frayled off some o' you niggers sho'!

SMITHERS (Showing himself—in a manner half-afraid and half-defiant). It was me whistled to yer. (As JONES frowns angrily.) I got news for yer.

JONES (Putting on his suavest manner, which fails to cover up his contempt for the white man). Oh, it's you, Mister Smithers. (He sits down on his throne with easy dignity.) What news you got to tell me?

SMITHERS (Coming close to enjoy his discomfiture). Don't yer notice nothin' funny today?

JONES (Coldly). Funny? No. I ain't perceived nothin' of de kind!

SMITHERS. Then yer ain't so foxy as I thought yer was. Where's all your court? (Sarcastically) the Generals and the Cabinet Ministers and all?

JONES (Imperturbably). Where dey mostly runs to minute I close my eyes—drinkin' rum and talkin' big down in de town. (Sarcastically.) How come you don't know dat? Ain't<sup>30</sup> you sousin' with 'em most every day?

SMITHERS (Stung but pretending indifference—with a wink). That's part of the day's work. I got ter—ain't I—in my business?

JONES (Contemptuously). Yo' business!

SMITHERS (Imprudently enraged). Gawd blimey, you was glad enough for me ter take yer in on it when you landed here first. You didn't 'ave no 'igh and mighty airs in them days!

JONES (His hand going to his revolver like a flash—menacingly). Talk polite, white man! Talk polite, you heah me! I'm boss heah now, is you forgettin'? (The Cockney seems about to challenge this last statement with the facts but something in the other's eyes holds and cows him.)

SMITHERS (In a cowardly whine). No 'arm meant, old top.

JONES (Condescendingly). I accepts yo' apology. (Lets his hand fall from his revolver.)<sup>50</sup> No use'n you rakin' up ole times. What I was den is one thing. What I is now's another. You didn't let me in on yo' crooked work out o' no kind feelin's dat time. I done de dirty work fo' you—and most o' de brain work, too, fo' dat matter—and I was wu'th money to you, dat's de reason.

SMITHERS. Well, blimey, I give yer a start, didn't I—when no one else would. I wasn't afraid to 'ire yer like the rest was—'count of the story about your breakin' jail back in the States.

JONES. No, you didn't have no s'cuse to look down on me fo'dat. You been in jail you'self more'n once.

SMITHERS (Furiously). It's a lie! (Then trying to pass it off by an attempt at scorn.) Garn! Who told yer that fairy tale?

JONES. Dey's some tings I ain't got to be tole. I kin see 'em in folks' eyes. (Then after a pause—meditatively.) Yes, you sho' give me a start. And it didn't take long from dat time to git dese fool, woods' niggers right where I wanted dem. (With pride.) From stowaway to Emperor in two years! Dat's goin some!

SMITHERS (With curiosity). And I bet you got yer pile o' money 'id safe some place.

JONES (With satisfaction). I sho' has! And it's in a foreign bank where no pusson don't ever git it out but me no matter what come. You didn't s'pose I was holdin' down dis Emperor job for de glory in it, did you? Sho'! De fuss and glory part of it, dat's only to turn de heads o' de low-flung, bush niggers dat's here. Dey wants de big circus show for deir money. I gives it to 'em an' I gits de money. (With a grin.) De long green, dat's me every time! (Then rebukingly.) But you ain't got no kick agin me, Smithers. I'se paid you back all you done for me many times. Ain't I perfected you and winked at all de crooked tradin' you been doin' right out in de broad day? Sho' I has—and me makin' laws to stop it at de same time! (He chuckles.)

SMITHERS (Grinning). But, meanin' no 'arm, you been grabbin' right and left yourself, ain't yer? Look at the taxes you've put on 'em! Blimey! You've squeezed 'em dry!

JONES (Chuckling). No, dey ain't all dry yet. I'se still heah, ain't I?

SMITHERS (Smiling at his secret thought). They're dry right now, you'll find out.

(Changing the subject abruptly.) And as for me breakin' laws, you've broke 'em all yerself just as fast as yer made 'em.

JONES. Ain't I de Emperor? De laws don't go for him. (Judicially.) You heah what I tells you, Smithers. Dere's little stealin' like you does, and dere's big stealin' like I does. For de little stealin' dey gits you in jail soon or late. For de big stealin' dey makes you Emperor and puts you in de Hall o' Fame when you croaks. (Reminiscently.) If dey's one thing I learns in ten years on de Pullman ca's listenin' to de white quality talk, it's dat same fact. And when I gits a chance to use it I winds up Emperor in two years.

SMITHERS (Unable to repress the genuine admiration of the small fry for the large). Yes, yer turned de bleedin' trick, all right. Blimey, I never seen a bloke 'as 'ad the bloomin' luck you 'as.

JONES (Severely). Luck? What you mean—luck?

SMITHERS. I suppose you'll say as that swank about the silver bullet ain't luck—and that was what first got the fool blacks on yer side of the revolution, wasn't it?

JONES (With a laugh). Oh, dat silver bullet! sho was luck! But I makes dat luck, you heah? I loads de dice! Yessuh! When dat murderin' nigger ole Lem hired to kill me takes aim ten feet away and his gun misses fire and I shoots him dead, what you heah me say?

SMITHERS. You said yer'd got a charm so's no lead bullet'd kill yer. You was so strong only a silver bullet could kill yer, you told 'em. Blimey, wasn't that swank for yer—and plain, fat-headed luck?

JONES (Proudly). I got brains and I use 'em quick. Dat ain't luck.

SMITHERS. Yer know they wasn't 'ardly liable to get no silver bullets. And it was luck 'e didn't 'it you that time.

JONES (Laughing). And dere all dem fool, bush niggers was kneelin' down and bumpin' deir heads on de ground like I was a miracle out o' de Bible. Oh Lawd, from dat time on I has dem all eatin' out of my hand. I cracks de whip and dey jumps through.

SMITHERS (With a sniff). Yankee bluff done it.

JONES. Ain't a man's talkin' big what makes him big—long as he makes folks believe it? Sho', I talks large when I ain't got nothin' to back it up, but I ain't talkin' wild just de same. I knows I kin fool 'em—I knows it—and dat's backin' enough fo' my game. And ain't I got to learn deir lingo and teach some of dem English befo' I kin talk to 'em? Ain't dat wuk? You ain't never learned any word er it, Smithers, in de ten years you been heah, dough 10 to tu'n me out, and I'se got all de money in sight, I resigns on de spot and beats it quick.

SMITHERS. Ho! You got it all planned, ain't yer?

JONES. I ain't no fool. I know dis Emperor's time is sho't. Dat why I make hay when de sun shine. Was you thinkin' I'se aimin to hold down dis job for life? No, suh! What good is gettin' money if you stays back in dis raggedy country? I wants action when I spends. And when I sees dese niggers gittin' up deir nerve to tu'n me out, and I'se got all de money in sight, I resigns on de spot and beats it quick.

SMITHERS. Where to?

JONES. None o' yo' business.

SMITHERS. Not back to the bloody States, I'll lay my oath.

JONES (Suspiciously). Why don't I? (Then with an easy laugh.) You mean 'count of dat story 'bout me breakin' from jail back dere? Dat's all talk.

SMITHERS (Skeptically). Ho, yes!

JONES (Sharply). You ain't 'sinuatin' I'se a liar, is you?

SMITHERS (Hastily). No, Gawd strike me! I was only thinkin' o' the bloody lies you told the blacks 'ere about killin' white men in the States.

JONES (Angered). How come dey're lies?

SMITHERS. You'd 'ave been in jail if you 'ad, wouldn't yer then? (With venom.) And from what I've 'eard, it ain't 'ealthy for a black to kill a white man in the States. They burns 'em in oil, don't they?

JONES (With cool deadliness). You mean lynchin' 'd scare me? Well, I tells you, Smithers, maybe I does kill one white man back dere. Maybe I does. And maybe I kills another right heah 'fore long if he don't look out.

SMITHERS (Trying to force a laugh). I was on'y spoofin' yer. Can't yer take a joke? And 40 you was just sayin' you'd never been in jail.

JONES (In the same tone—slightly boastful). Maybe I goes to jail dere for gettin' in an argument wid razors ovah a crap game. Maybe I gits twenty years when dat colored man die. Maybe I gits in 'nother argument wid de prison guard was overseer ovah us when we're wukin' de roads. Maybe he hits me wid a whip and I splits his head wid a shovel and runs away and files de chain off my leg and gits away safe. Maybe I does all dat an' maybe I don't. It's a story I tells you so's you knows I'se de kind of SMITHERS (Flushing). Never mind about me. What's this I've 'eard about yer really 'avin' a silver bullet moulded for yourself?

JONES. It's playin' out my bluff. I has de silver bullet moulded and I tells 'em when de time comes I kills myself wid it. I tells 'em dat's 'cause I'm de on'y man in de world big 20 enuff to get me. No use'n deir tryin'. And dey falls down and bumps deir heads. (He laughs.) I does dat so's I kin take a walk in peace widout no jealous nigger gunnin' at me from behind de trees.

SMITHERS (Astonished). Then you 'ad it made—'onest?

JONES. Sho' did. Heah she be. (He takes out his revolver, breaks it, and takes the silver bullet out of one chamber.) Five lead an' dis 30 silver baby at de last. Don't she shine pretty? (He holds it in his hand, looking at it admiringly, as if strangely fascinated.)

SMITHERS. Let me see. (Reaches out his hand for it.)

JONES (Harshly). Keep yo' hands whar dey b'long, white man. (He replaces it in the chamber and puts the revolver back on his hip.)

SMITHERS (Snarling). Gawd blimey! Think I'm a bleedin' thief, you would.

JONES. No, 'tain't dat. I knows you'se scared to steal from me. On'y I ain't 'lowin' nary body to touch dis baby. She's my rabbit's foot.

SMITHERS (Sneering). A bloomin' charm, wot? (Venomously.) Well, you'll need all the bloody charms you 'as before long, s' 'elp me!

JONES (Judicially). Oh, I'se good for six months yit 'fore dey gits sick o' my game. Den, when I sees trouble comin', I makes my 50 getaway.

man dat if you evah repeats one word of it, I ends yo' stealin' on dis yearth mighty damn quick!

SMITHERS (Terrified). Think I'd peach on yer? Not me! Ain't I always been yer friend?

JONES (Suddenly relaxing). Sho' you has—and you better be.

SMITHERS (Recovering his composure—and with it his malice). And just to show yer I'm yer friend, I'll tell yer that bit o' news I was goin' to.

JONES. Go ahead! Shoot de piece. Must be bad news from de happy way you look.

SMITHERS (Warningly). Maybe it's gettin' time for you to resign—with that bloomin' silver bullet, wot? (He finishes with a mocking grin.)

JONES (Puzzled). What's dat you say? Talk plain.

SMITHERS. Ain't noticed any of the guards or servants about the place today, I 'aven't.

JONES (Carelessly). Dey're all out in de garden sleepin' under de trees. When I sleeps, dey sneaks a sleep, too, and I pretends I never suspicions it. All I got to do is to ring de bell and dey come flyin', makin' a bluff dey was wukin' all de time.

SMITHERS (In the same mocking tone). Ring the bell now an' you'll bloody well see what I means.

JONES (Startled to alertness, but preserving the same careless tone). Sho' I rings. (He reaches below the throne and pulls out a big, common dinner bell which is painted the same vivid scarlet as the throne. He rings this vigorously—then stops to listen. Then he goes to both doors, rings again, and looks out.)

SMITHERS (Watching him with malicious satisfaction, after a pause—mockingly). The bloody ship is sinkin' an' the bleedin' rats 'as slung their 'ooks.

JONES (In a sudden fit of anger flings the bell clattering into a corner). Low-flung, woods' niggers! (Then catching Smithers' eye on him, he controls himself and suddenly bursts into a low chuckling laugh.) Reckon I overplays my hand dis once! A man can't take de pot on a bob-tailed flush all de time. Was I sayin' I'd sit in six months mo'? Well, I'se changed my mind den. I cashes in and resigns de job of Emperor right dis minute.

SMITHERS (With real admiration). Blimey, but you're a cool bird, and no mistake.

JONES. No use'n fussin'. When I knows de game's up I kisses it good-bye widout no long waits. Dey've all run off to de hills, ain't dey?

SMITHERS. Yes—every bleedin' man jack of 'em.

JONES. Den de revolution is at de post. And de Emperor better git his feet smokin' up de trail. (He starts for the door in rear.)

SMITHERS. Goin' out to look for your 'orse? Yer won't find any. They steals the 'orses first thing. Mine was gone when I went for 'im this mornin'. That's wot first give me a suspicion of wot was up.

JONES (Alarmed for a second, scratches his head, then philosophically). Well, den I hoofs it. Feet, do yo' duty! (He pulls out a gold watch and looks at it.) Three-thuty. Sundown's at six-thuty or dere-about. (Puts his watch back—with cool confidence.) I got plenty o' time to make it easy.

SMITHERS. Don't be so bloomin' sure of it. They'll be after you 'ot and 'eavy. Ole Lem is at the bottom o' this business an' 'e 'ates you like 'ell. 'E'd rather do for you than eat 'is dinner, 'e would!

JONES (Scornfully). Dat fool no-count nigger! Does you think I'se scared o' him? I stands him on his thick head more'n once befo' dis, and I does it again if he come in my way . . . (Fiercely) And dis time I leave him a dead nigger fo' sho'!

SMITHERS. You'll 'ave to cut through the big forest—an' these blacks 'ere can sniff and follow a trail in the dark like 'ounds. You'd 'ave to 'ustle to get through that forest in twelve hours even if you knew all the bloomin' trails like a native.

JONES (With indignant scorn). Look-a-heah, white man! Does you think I'se a natural bo'n fool? Give me credit fo' havin' some sense, fo' Lawd's sake! Don't you s'pose I'se looked ahead and made sho' of all de chances? I'se gone out in dat big forest, pretendin' to hunt, so many times dat I knows it high an' low like a book. I could go through on dem trails wid my eyes shut. (With great contempt.) Think dese ign'rent bush niggers dat ain't got brains enuff to know deir own names even can catch Brutus Jones? Huh, I s'pects not! Not on yo' life! Why, man, de white men went after me wid bloodhounds where I come from an' I jes' laughs at 'em. It's a shame to fool dese black trash around heah, dey're so easy. You watch me, man. I'll make dem look sick, I will. I'll be 'cross de plain to de edge of de forest by time dark comes. Once in de woods in de night, dey got a swell chance o' findin' dis baby! Dawn tomorrow I'll be out at de oder side and on de coast whar dat French gunboat is stayin'. She picks me up, take me to Martinique when she go dar, and dere I is safe wid a mighty big bankroll in my jeans. It's easy as rollin' off a log.

SMITHERS (Maliciously). But s'posin' somethin' 'appens wrong an' they do nab yer?

JONES (Decisively). Dey don't—dat's de answer.

SMITHERS. But, just for argyment's sake—what'd you do?

JONES (Frowning). I'se got five lead bullets in dis gun good enuff fo' common bush niggers—and after dat I got de silver bullet left to cheat 'em out o' gittin' me.

SMITHERS (Jeeringly). Ho, I was fergettin' that silver bullet. You'll bump yourself orf in style, won't yer? Blimey!

JONES (Gloomily). You kin bet yo' whole roll on one thing, white man. Dis baby plays out his string to de end and when he quits, he quits wid a bang de way he ought. Silver bullet ain't none too good for him when he go, dat's a fac'! (Then shaking off his nervousness—with a confident laugh.) Sho'! What is I talkin' about? Ain't come to dat yit and I never will—not wid trash niggers like dese yere. (Boastfully.) Silver bullet bring me luck anyway. I kin out-guess, outrun, outfight, an' outplay de whole lot o' dem all ovah de board any time o' de day er night! You watch me! (From the distant hills comes the faint, steady thump of a tom-tom, low and vibrating. It starts at a rate exactly corresponding to normal pulse beat—72 to the minute—and continues at a gradually accelerating rate from this point uninterruptedly to the very end of the play.)

(JONES starts at the sound. A strange look of apprehension creeps into his face for a moment as he listens. Then he asks, with an attempt to regain his most casual manner.) What's dat drum beatin' fo'?

SMITHERS (With a mean grin). For you. That means the bleedin' ceremony 'as started. I've 'eard it before and I knows.

JONES. Cer'mony? What cer'mony?

SMITHERS. The blacks is 'oldin' a bloody meetin', 'avin' a war dance, gettin' their courage worked up b'fore they starts after you.

JONES. Let dem! Dey'll sho' need it!

SMITHERS. And they're there 'oldin' their 'eathen religious service—makin' no end of devil spells and charms to 'elp 'em against your silver bullet. (He guffaws loudly.) Blimey, but they're balmy as 'ell!

JONES (A tiny bit awed and shaken in spite of himself). Huh! Takes more'n dat to scare dis chicken!

SMITHERS (Scenting the other's feeling—maliciously). Ternight when it's pitch black in the forest, they'll 'ave their pet devils and ghosts 'oundin' after you. You'll find yer bloody 'air 'll be standin' on end before termorrow mornin'. (Seriously.) It's a bleedin' queer place, that stinkin' forest, even in daylight. Yer don't know what might 'appen in there, it's that rotten still. Always sends the cold shivers down my back minute I gets in it.

JONES (With a contemptuous sniff). I ain't no chicken-liver like you is. Trees an' me, we'se friends, and dar's a full moon comin' bring me light. And let dem po' niggers make all de fool spells dey'se a min' to. Does yo' s'pect I'se silly enuff to b'lieve in ghosts an' ha'nts an' all dat ole women's talk? G'long, white man! You ain't talkin' to me. (With a chuckle.) Doesn't you know dey's got to do wid a man was member in good standin' o' de Baptist Church? Sho' I was dat when I was porter on de Pullmans, befo' I gits into my little trouble. Let dem try deir heathen tricks. De Baptist Church done perfect me and land dem all in hell. (Then with more confident satisfaction.) And I'se got little silver bullet o' my own, don't forgit.

SMITHERS. Ho! You 'aven't give much 'eed to your Baptist Church since you been down 'ere. I've 'eard myself you 'ad turned yer coat an' was takin' up with their blarsted witch-doctors, or whatever the 'ell yer calls the swine.

JONES (Vehemently). I pretends to! Sho' I pretends! Dat's part o' my game from de fust. If I finds out dem niggers believes dat black is white, den I yells it out louder 'n deir loudest.

It don't git me nothin' to do missionary work for de Baptist Church. I'se after de coin, an' I lays my Jesus on de shelf for de time bein'. (Stops abruptly to look at his watch—alerily.) But I ain't got de time to waste no more fool talk wid you. I'se gwine away from heah dis secon'. (He reaches in under the throne and pulls out an expensive Panama hat with a bright multi-colored band and sets it jauntily on his head.) So long, white man! (With a grin.) See you in jail sometime, maybe!

SMITHERS. Not me, you won't. Well, I wouldn't be in yer bloody boots for no bloom-in' money, but 'ere's wishin' yer luck just the same.

JONES (Contemptuously). You're de frightenedest man evah I see! I tells you I'se safe's 'f I was in New York City. It takes dem niggers from now to dark to git up de nerve to start somethin'. By dat time, I'se got a head start dey never kotch up wid.

SMITHERS (Maliciously). Give my regards to any ghosts yer meets up with.

JONES (Grinning). If dat ghost got money, I'll tell him never ha'nt you less'n he wants to lose it.

SMITHERS (Flattered). Garn! (Then curiously.) Ain't yer takin' no luggage with yer?

JONES. I travels light when I wants to move fast. And I got tinned grub buried on de edge o' de forest. (Boastfully.) Now say dat I don't look ahead an' use my brains! (With a wide, liberal gesture.) I will all dat's left in de palace to you—and you better grab all you kin sneak away wid befo' dey gits here.

SMITHERS (Gratefully). Righto—and thanks ter yer. (As JONES walks toward the door in rear—cautioningly.) Say! Look 'ere, you ain't goin' out that way, are yer?

JONES. Does you think I'd slink out de back door like a common nigger? I'se Emperor yit, ain't I? And de Emperor Jones leaves de way he comes, and dat black trash don't dare stop him—not yit, leastways. (He stops for a moment in the doorway, listening to the far-off but insistent beat of the tom-tom.) Listen to dat roll-call, will you? Must be mighty big drum carry dat far. (Then with a laugh.) Well, if dey ain't no whole brass band to see me off, I sho' got de drum part of it. So long, white man. (He puts his hands in his pockets and with studied carelessness, whistling a tune, he saunters out of the doorway and off to the left.) SMITHERS (Looks after him with a puzzled admiration). 'E's got 'is bloomin' nerve with 'im, s'elp me! (Then angrily.) Ho—the bleedin' nigger—puttin' on 'is bloody airs! I 'opes they nabs 'im an' gives 'im what's what! (Then putting business before the pleasure of this thought, looking around him with cupidity.) A bloke ought to find a 'ole lot in this palace that'd go for a bit of cash. Let's take a look, 'Arry, me lad. (He starts for the doorway on right as

(The curtain falls.)

SCENE TWO

SCENE—Nightfall. The end of the plain where the Great Forest begins. The foreground is sandy, level ground dotted by a few stones and clumps of stunted bushes cowering close against the earth to escape the buffeting of the trade wind. In the rear the forest is a wall of darkness dividing the world. Only when the eye becomes accustomed to the gloom can the outlines of separate trunks of the nearest trees be made out, enormous pillars of deeper blackness. A somber monotone of wind lost in the leaves moans in the air. Yet this sound serves but to intensify the impression of the forest's relentless immobility, to form a background throwing into relief its brooding, implacable silence.

(JONES enters from the left, walking rapidly. He stops as he nears the edge of the forest, looks around him quickly, peering into the dark as if searching for some familiar landmark. Then, apparently satisfied that he is where he ought to be, he throws himself on the ground, dog-tired.)

Well, heah I is. In de nick o' time, too! Little mo' an' it'd be blacker'n de ace of spades heah-abouts. (He pulls a bandana handkerchief from his hip pocket and mops off his perspiring face.) Sho'! Gimme air! I'se tuckered out sho' 'nuff. Dat soft Emperor job ain't no trainin' for a long hike ovah dat plain in de brilin' sun. (Then with a chuckle.) Cheah up, nigger, de worst is yet to come. (He lifts his head and stares at the forest. His chuckle peters out abruptly. In a tone of awe.) My goodness, look at dem woods, will you? Dat no-count Smithers said dey'd be black an' he sho' called de turn. (Turning away from them quickly and looking down at his feet, he snatches at a chance to change the subject—solicitously.) Feet, you is holdin' up yo' end fine an' I sutinly hopes you ain't blisterin' none. It's time you git a rest. (He takes off his shoes, his eyes studiously avoiding the forest. He feels of the soles of his feet gingerly.) You is still in de pink—on'y a little mite feverish. Cool yo'selfs. Remember you done got a long journey yit befo' you. (He sits in a weary attitude, listening to the rhythmic beating of the tom-tom. He grumbles in a loud tone to cover up a growing uneasiness.) Bush niggers! Wonder dey wouldn't git sick o' beatin' dat drum. Sound louder, seem like. I wonder if dey's startin' after me? (He scrambles to his feet, looking back across the plain.) Couldn't see dem now, nohow, if dey was hundred feet away. (Then shaking himself like a wet dog to get rid of these depressing thoughts.) Sho', dey's miles an' miles behind. What you gittin' fidgety about? (But he sits down and begins to lace up his shoes in great haste, all the time muttering reassuringly.) You know what? Yo' belly is empty, dat's what's de matter wid you. Come time to eat! Wid nothin' but wind on yo' stumach, o' course you feels jiggedy. Well, we eats right heah an' now soon's I gits dese pesky shoes laced up! (He finishes lacing up his shoes.) Dere! Now le's see. (Gets on his hands and knees and searches the ground around him with his eyes.) White stone, white stone, where is you? (He sees the first white stone and crawls to it—with satisfaction.) Heah you is! I knowed dis was de right place. Box of grub, come to me. (He turns over the stone and feels in under it—in a tone of dismay.) Ain't heah! Gorry, is I in de right place or isn't I? Dere's 'nother stone. Guess dat's it. (He scrambles to the next stone and turns it over.) Ain't heah, neither! Grub, whar is you? Ain't heah. Gorry, has I got to go hungry into dem woods—all de night? (While he is talking he scrambles from one stone to another, turning them over in frantic haste. Finally, he jumps to his feet excitedly.) Is I lost de place? Must have! But how dat happen when I was followin' de trail across de plain in broad daylight? (Almost plaintively.) I'se hungry, I is! I gotta git my feed. What's my strength gonna come from if I doesn't? Gorry, I gotta find dat grub high an' low somehow! Why it come dark so quick like dat? Can't see nothin'. (He scratches a match on his trousers and peers about him. The rate of the beat of the far-off tom-tom increases perceptibly as he does so. He mutters in a bewildered voice.) How come all dese white stones come heah when I only remembers one? (Suddenly, with a frightened gasp, he flings the match on the ground and stamps on it.) Nigger, is you gone crazy mad? Is you lightin' matches to show dem whar you is? Fo' Lawd's sake, use yo' haid. Gorry, I'se got to be careful! (He stares at the plain behind him apprehensively, his hand on his revolver.) But how come all dese white stones? And whar's dat tin box o' grub I hid all wrapped up in oil cloth?

(While his back is turned, the LITTLE FORMLESS FEARS creep out from the deeper blackness of the forest. They are black, shapeless, only their glittering little eyes can be seen. If they have any describable form at all, it is that of a grubworm about the size of a creeping child. They move noiselessly, but with deliberate, painful effort, striving to raise themselves on end, failing and sinking prone again. JONES turns about to face the forest. He stares up at the tops of the trees, seeking vainly to discover his whereabouts by their conformation.)

Can't tell nothin' from dem trees! Gorry, nothin' round heah look like I evah seed it befo'. I'se done lost de place sho' 'nuff! (With mournful foreboding.) It's mighty queer! It's mighty queer! (With sudden forced defiance—in an angry tone.) Woods, is you tryin' to put somethin' ovah on me?

(From the formless creatures on the ground in front of him comes a tiny gale of low mocking laughter like a rustling of leaves. They squirm upward toward him in twisted attitudes. JONES looks down, leaps backward with a yell of terror, yanking out his revolver as he does so—in a quavering voice.) What's dat? Who's dar? What is you? Git away from me befo' I shoots you up! You don't? . . .

(He fires. There is a flash, a loud report, then silence broken only by the far-off, quickened throb of the tom-tom. The formless creatures have scurried back into the forest. JONES remains fixed in his position, listening intently. The sound of the shot, the reassuring feel of the revolver in his hand, have somewhat restored his shaken nerve. He addresses himself with renewed confidence.)

Dey're gone. Dat shot fix 'em. Dey was only little animals—little wild pigs, I reckon. Dey've maybe rooted out yo' grub an' eat it. Sho', you fool nigger, what you think dey is—ha'nts? (Excitedly.) Gorry, you give de game away when you fire dat shot. Dem niggers heah dat fo' su'tin! Time you beat it in de woods widout no long waits. (He starts for the forest—hesitates before the plunge—then urging himself in with manful resolution.) Git in, nigger! What you skeered at? Ain't nothin' dere but de trees! Git in! (He plunges boldly into the forest.)

SCENE THREE

SCENE—Nine o'clock. In the forest. The moon has just risen. Its beams, drifting through the canopy of leaves, make a barely perceptible, suffused, eerie glow. A dense low wall of underbrush and creepers is in the nearer foreground, fencing in a small triangular clearing. Beyond this is the massed blackness of the forest like an encompassing barrier. A path is dimly discerned leading down to the clearing from left, rear, and winding away from it again toward the right. As the scene opens nothing can be distinctly made out. Except for the beating of the tom-tom, which is a trifle louder and quicker than in the previous scene, there is silence, broken every few seconds by a queer, clicking sound. Then gradually the figure of the Negro, JEFF, can be discerned crouching on his haunches at the rear of the triangle. He is middle-aged, thin, brown in color, is dressed in a Pullman porter's uniform, cap, etc. He is throwing a pair of dice on the ground before him, picking them up, shaking them, casting them out with the regular, rigid, mechanical movements of an automaton. The heavy, plodding foot-steps of someone approaching along the trail from the left are heard and JONES' voice, pitched in a slightly higher key and strained in a cheering effort to overcome its own tremors.

De moon's rizen. Does you heah dat, nigger? You gits more light from dis out. No mo' buttin' yo' fool head agin' de trunks an' scratchin' de hide off yo' legs in de bushes. Now you sees whar yo'se gwine. So cheer up! From now on you has a snap. (He steps just to the rear of the triangular clearing and mops off his face on his sleeve. He has lost his Panama hat. His face is scratched, his brilliant uniform shows several large rents.) What time's it gittin' to be, I wonder? I dassent light no match to find out. Phoo'. It's wa'm an' dat's a fac'! (Wearily.) How long I been makin' tracks in dese woods? Must be hours an' hours. Seems like fo'evah! Yit can't be, when de moon's jes' riz. Dis am a long night fo' yo', yo' Majesty! (With a mournful chuckle.) Majesty! Der ain't much majesty 'bout dis baby now. (With attempted cheerfulness.) Never min'. It's all part o' de game. Dis night come to an end like everything else. And when you gits dar safe and has dat bankroll in yo' hands you laughs at all dis. (He starts to whistle but checks himself abruptly.) What yo' whistlin' for, you po' dope! Want all de worl' to heah you? (He stops talking to listen.) Heah dat ole drum! Sho' gits nearer from de sound. Dey're packin' it along wid 'em. Time fo' me to move. (He takes a step forward, then stops—worriedly.) What's dat odder queer clickety sound I heah? Dere it is! Sound close! Sound like—sound like—Fo' God sake, sound like some nigger was shootin' crap! (Frightenedly.) I better beat it quick when I gits dem notions. (He walks quickly into the clear space—then stands transfixed as he sees JEFF—in a terrified gasp.) Who dar? Who dat? Is dat you, Jeff? (Starting toward the other, forgetful for a moment of his surroundings and really believing it is a living man that he sees—in a tone of happy relief.) Jeff! I'se sho' mighty glad to see you! Dey tol' me you done died from dat razor cut I gives you. (Stopping suddenly, bewilderedly.) But how you come to be heah, nigger? (He stares fascinatedly at the other who continues his mechanical play with the dice. JONES' eyes begin to roll wildly. He stutters.) Ain't you gwine—look up—can't you speak to me? Is you—is you—a ha'nt? (He jerks out his revolver in a frenzy of terrified rage.) Nigger, I kills you dead once. Has I got to kill you agin? You take it den. (He fires. When the smoke clears away JEFF has disappeared. JONES stands trembling—then with a certain reassurance.) He's gone, anyway. Ha'nt or no ha'nt, dat shot fix him. (The beat of the far-off tom-tom is perceptibly louder and more rapid. JONES becomes conscious of it—with a start, looking back over his shoulder.) Dey's gittin' near! Dey's comin' fast! And I is shootin' shots to let 'em know jes' whar I is. Oh, Gorry, I'se got to run.

(Forgetting the path he plunges wildly into the underbrush in the rear and disappears in the shadow.)

SCENE FOUR

SCENE—Eleven o'clock. In the forest. A wide dirt road runs diagonally from right, front, to left, rear. Rising sheer on both sides the forest walls it in. The moon is now up. Under its light the road glimmers ghastly and unreal. It is as if the forest had stood aside momentarily to let the road pass through and accomplish its veiled purpose. This done, the forest will fold in upon itself again and the road will be no more. JONES stumbles in from the forest on the right. His uniform is ragged and torn. He looks about him with numbed surprise when he sees the road, his eyes blinking in the bright moonlight. He flops down exhaustedly and pants heavily for a while. Then with sudden anger.

I'm meltin' wid heat! Runnin' an' runnin' an' runnin'! Damn dis heah coat! Like a strait-jacket! (He tears off his coat and flings it away from him, revealing himself stripped to the waist.) Dere! Dat's better! Now I kin breathe! (Looking down at his feet, the spurs catch his eye.) And to hell wid dese high-fangled spurs. Dey're what's been a-trippin' me up an' breakin' my neck. [He unstraps them and flings them away disgustedly.] Dere—I gits rid o' dem frippety Emperor trappin's an' I travels lighter. Lawd! I'se tired! (After a pause, listening to the insistent beat of the tom-tom in the distance.) I must 'a put some distance between myself an' dem—runnin' like dat—and yit—dat damn drum sound jes' de same—nearer, even. Well, I guess I a'most holds my lead anyhow. Dey won't never catch up. (With a sigh.) If on'y my fool legs stand up. Oh, I'se sorry I evah went in for dis. Dat Emperor job is sho' hard to shake. (He looks around him suspiciously.) How'd dis road evah git heah? Good level road, too. I never remembers seein' it befo'. (Shaking his head apprehensively.) Dese woods is sho' full o' de queerest things at night. (With a sudden terror.) Lawd God, don't let me see no more o' dem ha'nts! Dey gits my goat! (Then trying to talk himself into confidence.) Ha'nts! You fool nigger, dey ain't no such things! Don't de Baptist parson tell you dat many time? Is you civilized, or is you like dese ign'rent black niggers heah? Sho'! Dat was all in yo' own head. Wasn't nothin' dere. Wasn't no Jeff! Know what? You jus' get seein' dem things 'cause yo' belly's empty and you's sick wid hunger inside. Hunger 'fects yo' head and yo' eyes. Any fool know dat. (Then pleading fervently.) But bless God, I don't come across no more o' dem, whatever dey is! (Then cautiously.) Rest! Don't talk! Rest! You needs it. Den you gits on yo' way again. (Looking at the moon.) Night's half gone a'most. You hits de coast in de maw'nin'! Den you'se all safe.

(From the right forward a small gang of Negroes enter. They are dressed in striped convict suits, their heads are shaven, one leg drags limpingly, shackled to a heavy ball and chain. Some carry picks, the others shovels. They are followed by a white man dressed in the uniform of a prison guard. A Winchester rifle is slung across his shoulders and he carries a heavy whip. At a signal from the GUARD they stop on the road opposite where JONES is sitting. JONES, who has been staring up at the sky, unmindful of their noiseless approach, suddenly looks down and sees them. His eyes pop out, he tries to get to his feet and fly, but sinks back, too numbed by fright to move. His voice catches in a choking prayer.)

Lawd Jesus!

(The PRISON GUARD cracks his whip—noiselessly—and at that signal all the convicts start to work on the road. They swing their picks, they shovel, but not a sound comes from their labor. Their movements, like those of JEFF in the preceding scene, are those of automatons,—rigid, slow, and mechanical. The PRISON GUARD points sternly at JONES with his whip, motions him to take his place among the other shovelers. JONES gets to his feet in a hypnotized stupor. He mumbles subserviently.)

Yes, suh! Yes, suh! I'se comin'.

(As he shuffles, dragging one foot, over to his place, he curses under his breath with rage and hatred.)

God damn yo' soul, I gets even wid you yit, sometime.

(As if there were a shovel in his hands he goes through weary, mechanical gestures of digging up dirt, and throwing it to the roadside. Suddenly the GUARD approaches him angrily, threateningly. He raises his whip and lashes JONES viciously) across the shoulders with it. JONES winces with pain and cowers abjectly. The GUARD turns his back on him and walks away contemptuously. Instantly JONES straightens up. With arms up-raised as if his shovel were a club in his hands, he springs murderously at the unsuspecting GUARD. In the act of crashing down his shovel on the white man's skull, JONES suddenly becomes aware that his hands are empty. He cries despairingly.)

Whar's my shovel? Gimme my shovel 'till I splits his damn head! (Appealing to his fellow convicts.) Gimme a shovel, one o' you, fo' God's sake!

(They stand fixed in motionless attitudes, their eyes on the ground. The GUARD seems to wait expectantly, his back turned to the attacker. JONES bellows with baffled, terrified rage, tugging frantically at his revolver.)

I kills you, you white debil, if it's de last thing I evah does! Ghost or debil, I kill you again!

(He frees the revolver and fires point-blank at the GUARD'S back. Instantly the walls of the forest close in from both sides, the road and the figures of the convict gang are blotted out in an enshrouding darkness. The only sounds are a crashing in the underbrush as JONES leaps away in mad flight and the throbbing of the tom-tom still far distant, but increased in volume of sound and rapidity of beat.)

SCENE FIVE

SCENE—One o'clock. A large circular clearing, enclosed by the serried ranks of gigantic trunks of tall trees whose tops are lost to view. In the center is a big dead stump worn by time into a curious resemblance to an auction block. The moon floods the clearing with a clear light. JONES forces his way in through the forest on the left. He looks wildly about the clearing with hunted, fearful glances. His pants are in tatters, his shoes cut and misshapen, flapping about his feet. He slinks cautiously to the stump in the center and sits down in a tense position, ready for instant flight. Then he holds his head in his hands and rocks back and forth, moaning to himself miserably.)

Oh Lawd, Lawd! Oh Lawd, Lawd! (Suddenly he throws himself on his knees and raises his clasped hands to the sky—in a voice of agon- ized pleading.) Lawd Jesus, heah my prayer! I'se a po' sinner, a po' sinner! I knows I done wrong, I knows it! When I catches Jeff cheat-in' wid loaded dice my anger overcomes me and I kills him dead! Lawd, I done wrong! When dat guard hits me wid de whip, my anger overcomes me, and I kills him dead. Lawd, I done wrong! And down heah whar dese fool bush niggers raises me up to the seat o' de mighty, I steals all I could grab. Lawd, I done wrong! I knows it! I'se sorry! Forgive me, Lawd! Forgive dis po' sinner! (Then beseeching terrifiedly.) And keep dem away, Lawd! Keep dem away from me! And stop dat drum sound-in' in my ears! Dat begin to sound ha'nted, too. (He gets to his feet, evidently slightly reassured by his prayer—with attempted confidence.) De Lawd'll preserve me from dem ha'nts after dis. (Sits down on the stump again.) I ain't skeered o' real men. Let dem come. But dem odders . . . (He shudders—then looks down at his feet, working his toes inside the shoes—with a groan.) Oh, my po' feet! Dem shoes ain't no use no more 'ceptin' to hurt. I'se better off without dem. (He unlaces them and pulls them off—holds the wrecks of the shoes in his hands and regards them mournfully.) You was real, A-one patin' leather, too. Look at you now. Emperor, you'se gittin' mighty low!

(He sits dejectedly and remains with bowed shoulders, staring down at the shoes in his hands as if reluctant to throw them away. While his attention is thus occupied, a crowd of figures silently enter the clearing from all sides. All are dressed in Southern costumes of the period of the fifties of the last century. There are middle-aged men who are evidently well-to-do planters. There is one spruce, authoritative individual—the AUCTIONEER. There is a crowd of curious spectators, chiefly young belles and dandies who have come to the slave-market for diversion. All exchange courtly greetings in dumb show and chat silently together. There is something stiff, rigid, unreal, marionettish about their movements. They group themselves about the stump. Finally a batch of slaves are led in from the left by an attendant—three men of different ages, two women, one with a baby in her arms, nursing. They are placed to the left of the stump, beside JONES.)

The white planters look them over appraisingly as if they were cattle, and exchange judgments on each. The dandies point with their fingers and make witty remarks. The belles titter bewitchingly. All this in silence save for the ominous throb of the tom-tom. The AUCTIONEER holds up his hand, taking his place at the stump. The groups strain forward attentively. He touches JONES on the shoulder peremptorily motioning for him to stand on the stump—the auction block.

JONES looks up, sees the figures on all sides, looks wildly for some opening to escape, sees none, screams and leaps madly to the top of the stump to get as far away from them as possible. He stands there, cowering, paralyzed with horror. The AUCTIONEER begins his silent spiel. He points to JONES, appeals to the planters to see for themselves. Here is a good field hand, sound in wind and limb as they can see. Very strong still in spite of his being middle-aged. Look at that back. Look at those shoulders. Look at the muscles in his arms and his sturdy legs. Capable of any amount of hard labor. Moreover, of a good disposition, intelligent and tractable. Will any gentleman start the bidding? The PLANTERS raise their fingers, make their bids. They are apparently all eager to possess JONES. The bidding is lively, the crowd interested. While this has been going on, JONES has been seized by the courage of desperation. He dares to look down and around him. Over his face abject terror gives way to mystification, to gradual realization—stutteringly.)

What you all doin', white folks? What's all dis? What you all lookin' at me fo'? What you doin' wid me, anyhow? (Suddenly convulsed with raging hatred and fear.) Is dis a auction? Is you sellin' me like dey uster befo' de war? (Jerking out his revolver just as the AUCTIONEER knocks him down to one of the planters—glaring from him to the purchaser.) And you sells me? And you buys me? I shows you I'se a free nigger, damn yo' souls! (He fires at the AUCTIONEER and at the PLANTER with such rapidity that the two shots are almost simultaneous. As if this were a signal the walls of the forest fold in. Only blackness remains and silence broken by JONES as he rushes off, crying with fear—and by the quickened, ever louder beat of the tom-tom.)

SCENE SIX

SCENE. Three o'clock. A cleared space in the forest. The limbs of the trees meet over it forming a low ceiling about five feet from the ground. The interlocked ropes of creepers reaching upward to entwine the tree trunks give an arched appearance to the sides. The space thus enclosed is like the dark, noisome hold of some ancient vessel. The moonlight is almost completely shut out and only a vague, wan light filters through. There is the noise of someone approaching from the left, stumbling and crawling through the undergrowth. JONES' voice is heard between chattering moans.

Oh, Lawd, what I gwine do now? Ain't got no bullet left on'y de silver one. If mo' o' dem ha'nts come after me, how I gwine skeer dem away? Oh, Lawd, on'y de silver one left—an' I gotta save dat fo' luck. If I shoots dat one I'm a goner sho'! Lawd, it's black heah! Whar's de moon? Oh, Lawd, don't dis night evah come to an end? (By the sounds, he is feeling his way cautiously forward.) Dere! Dis feels like a clear space. I gotta lie down an' rest. I don't care if dem niggers does cotch me. I gotta rest.

(He is well forward now where his figure can be dimly made out. His pants have been so torn away that what is left of them is no better than a breech cloth. He flings himself full length, face downward on the ground, panting with exhaustion. Gradually it seems to grow lighter in the enclosed space and two rows of seated figures can be seen behind JONES. They are sitting in crumpled, despairing attitudes, hunched, facing one another with their backs touching the forest walls as if they were shackled to them. All Negroes, naked save for loin cloths. At first they are silent and motionless. Then they begin to sway slowly forward toward each and back again in unison, as if they were laxly letting themselves follow the long roll of a ship at sea. At the same time, a low, melancholy murmur rises among them, increasing gradually by rhythmic degrees which seem to be directed and controlled by the throb of the tom-tom in the distance, to a long, tremulous wail of despair that reaches a certain pitch, unbearably acute, then falls by slow gradations of tone into silence and is taken up again. JONES starts, looks up, sees the figures, and throws himself down again to shut out the sight. A shudder of terror shakes his whole body as the wail rises up about him again. But the next time, his voice, as if under some uncanny compulsion, starts with the others. As their chorus lifts he rises to a sitting posture similar to the others, swaying back and forth. His voice reaches the highest pitch of sorrow, of desolation. The light fades out, the other voices cease, and only darkness is left. JONES can be heard scrambling to his feet and running off, his voice sinking down the scale and receding as he moves farther and farther away in the forest. The tom-tom beats louder, quicker, with a more insistent, triumphant pulsation.)

SCENE SEVEN

SCENE. Five o'clock. The foot of a gigantic tree by the edge of a great river. A rough structure of boulders, like an altar, is by the tree. The raised river bank is in the nearer background. Beyond this the surface of the river spreads out, brilliant and unruffled in the moonlight, blotted out and merged into a veil of bluish mist in the distance. JONES' voice is heard from the left rising and falling in the long, despairing wail of the chained slave, to the rhythmic beat of the tom-tom. As his voice sinks into silence, he enters the open space. The expression of his face is fixed and stony, his eyes have an obsessed glare, he moves with a strange deliberation like a sleep-walker or one in a trance. He looks around at the tree, the rough stone altar, the moonlit surface of the river beyond, and passes his hand over his head with a vague gesture of puzzled bewilderment. Then, as if in obedience to some obscure impulse, he sinks into a kneeling, devotional posture before the altar. Then he seems to come to himself partly, to have an uncertain realization of what he is doing, for he straightens up and stares about him horrifiedly—in an incoherent mumble.

What—what is I doin? What is—dis place? Seems like—seems like I know dat tree—an' dem stones—an' de river. I remember—seems like I been heah befo'. (Tremblingly.) Oh, Gorry, I'se skeered in dis place! I'se skeered! Oh, Lawd, pectect dis sinner!

(Crawling away from the altar, he cowers close to the ground, his face hidden, his shoulders heaving with sobs of hysterical fright. From behind the trunk of the tree, as if he had sprung out of it, the figure of the CONGO WITCH-DOCTOR appears. He is wizened and old, naked except for the fur of some small animal tied about his waist, its bushy tail hanging down in front. His body is stained all over a bright red. Antelope horns are on each side of his head, branching upward. In one hand he carries a bone rattle, in the other a charm stick with a bunch of white cockatoo feathers tied to the end. A great number of glass beads and bone ornaments are about his neck, ears, wrists, and ankles. He struts noiselessly with a queer prancing step to a position in the clear ground between JONES and the altar. Then with a preliminary, summoning stamp of his foot on the earth, he begins to dance and to chant. As if in response to his summons the beating of the tom-tom grows to a fierce, exultant boom whose throbs seem to fill the air with vibrating rhythm. JONES looks up, starts to spring to his feet, reaches a half-kneeling, half-squatting position and remains rigidly fixed there, paralyzed with awed fascination by this new apparition. The WITCH-DOCTOR sways, stamping with his foot, his bone rattle clicking the time. His voice rises and falls in a weird, monotonous croon, without articulate word divisions. Gradually his dance becomes clearly one of a narrative in pantomime, his croon is an incantation, a charm to allay the fierceness of some implacable deity demanding sacrifice. He flees, he is pursued by devils, he hides, he flees again. Even wilder and wilder becomes his flight, nearer and nearer draws the pursuing evil, more and more the spirit of terror gains possession of him. His croon, rising to intensity, is punctuated by shrill cries. JONES has become completely hypnotized. His voice joins in the incantation, in the cries, he beats time with his hands and sways his body to and fro from the waist. The whole spirit and meaning of the dance has entered into him, has become his spirit. Finally the theme to the pantomime halts on a howl of despair, and is taken up again in a note of savage hope. There is a salvation. The forces of evil demand sacrifice. They must be appeased. The WITCH-DOCTOR points with his wand to the sacred tree, to the river beyond, to the altar, and finally to JONES with a ferocious command. JONES seems to sense the meaning of this. It is he who must offer himself for sacrifice. He beats his forehead abjectly to the ground, moaning hysterically.)

Mercy, Oh Lawd! Mercy! Mercy on dis po' sinner.

(The WITCH-DOCTOR springs to the river bank. He stretches out his arms and calls to some God within its depths. Then he starts backward slowly, his arms remaining out. A huge head of a crocodile appears over the bank, and its eyes, glittering greenly, fasten upon JONES. He stares into them fascinatedly. The WITCH-DOCTOR prances up to him, touches him with his wand, motions him with hideous command toward the waiting monster. JONES squirms on his belly nearer and nearer, moaning continually.)

Mercy, Lawd! Mercy!

(The crocodile heaves more of his enormous hulk onto the land. JONES squirms toward him. The WITCH-DOCTOR'S voice shrills out in furious exaltation, the tom-tom beats madly. JONES cries out in a fierce, exhausted spasm of anguished pleading.)

Lawd, save me! Lawd Jesus, heah my prayer!

(Immediately, in answer to his prayer, comes the thought of the one bullet left him. He snatches at his hip, shouting defiantly.)

De silver bullet! You don't get me yit!

(He fires at the green eyes in front of him. The head of the crocodile sinks back behind the river bank, the WITCH-DOCTOR springs behind the sacred tree and disappears. JONES lies with his face to the ground, his arms outstretched, whimpering with fear as the throb of tom-tom fills the silence about him with a somber pulsation, a baffled but revengeful power.)

SCENE EIGHT

SCENE. Dawn. Same as Scene Two. The dividing line of forest and plain. The nearest tree trunks are dimly revealed but the forest behind them is still a mass of glooming shadow. The tom-tom seems on the very spot, so loud and continuously vibrating are its beats. LEM enters from the left, followed by a small squad of his soldiers, and by the Cockney trader, SMITHERS. LEM is a heavy-set, ape-faced old savage of the extreme African type, dressed only in a loin cloth. A revolver and cartridge belt are about his waist. His soldiers are in different degrees of rag-concealed nakedness. All wear broad palm-leaf hats. Each one carries a rifle. SMITHERS is the same as in Scene One. One of the soldiers, evidently a tracker, is peering about keenly on the ground. He grunts and points to the spot where JONES entered the forest. LEM and SMITHERS come to look.

SMITHERS (After a glance, turns away in disgust). That's where'e went in right enough. Much good it'll do yer. 'E's miles orf by this an' safe to the Coast, damn 'is 'ide! I tole yer yer'd iose 'im, didn't I?—wastin' the 'ole bloomin' night beatin' yer bloody drum and castin' yer silly spells! Gawd blimey, wot a pack!

LEM (Gutturally). We cotch him. You see. (He makes a motion to his soldiers who squat down on their haunches in a semicircle.)

SMITHERS (Exasperatedly). Well, ain't yer goin' in an' 'unt 'im in the woods? What the 'ell's the good of waitin'?

LEM (Imperturbably—squatting down himself). We cotch him.

SMITHERS (Turning away from him contemptuously). Aw! Garn! 'E's a better man than the lot o' you put together. I 'ates the sight o' 'im but I'll say that for 'im. (A sound of snapping twigs comes from the forest. The soldiers jump to their feet, cocking their rifles alertly. LEM remains sitting with an imperturbable expression, but listening intently. The sound from the woods is repeated. LEM makes a quick signal with his hand. His followers creep quickly but noiselessly into the forest, scattering so that each enters a different spot.)

SMITHERS (In the silence that follows—in a contemptuous whisper). You ain't thinkin' that would be 'im I 'ope?

LEM (Calmly). We cotch him.

SMITHERS. Blarsted fat 'eads! (Then after a second's thought—wonderingly.) Still an' all, it might 'appen. If 'e lost 'is bloody way in these stinkin' woods 'e'd likely turn in a circle without 'is knowin' it. They all does.

LEM (Peremptorily). Sssh! (The reports of several rifles sound from the forest, followed a second later by savage, exultant yells. The beating of the tom-tom abruptly ceases. LEM looks up at the white man with a grin of satisfaction.) We cotch him. Him dead.

SMITHERS (With a snarl). 'Ow d'yer know it's 'im an' 'ow d'yer know 'e's dead?

LEM: My mens dey got 'um silver bullets. Dey kill him shore.

SMITHERS (Astonished). They got silver bullets?

LEM. Lead bullet no kill him. He got um strong charm. I cook um money, make um silver bullet, make um strong charm, too.

SMITHERS (Light breaking upon him). So that's wot you was up to all night, wot? You was scared to put after 'im till you'd molded silver bullets, eh?

LEM (Simply stating a fact). Yes. Him got strong charm. Lead no good.

SMITHERS (Slapping his thigh and guffawing). <sup>10</sup> Haw-haw! If yer don't beat all 'ell! (Then recovering himself—scornfully.) I'll bet yer it ain't 'im they shot at all, yer bleedin' looney!

LEM (Calmly). Dey come bring him now. (The soldiers come out of the forest, carrying JONES' limp body. There is a little reddish-purple hole under his left breast. He is dead. They carry him to LEM, who examines his body with great satisfaction.)

SMITHERS (leans over his shoulder—in a tone of frightened awe). Well, they did for yer right enough, Jonesey, me lad! Dead as a 'erring! (Mockingly.) Where's yer 'igh an' mighty airs now, yer bloomin' Majesty? (Then with a grin.) Silver bullets! Gawd blimey, but yer died in the 'eight o' style, any'ow! (LEM makes a motion to the soldiers to carry the body out left. SMITHERS speaks to him sneeringly.)

SMITHERS. And I s'pose you think it's yer bleedin' charms and yer silly beatin' the drum that made 'im run in a circle when 'e'd lost 'imself, don't yer? (But LEM makes no reply, does not seem to hear the question, walks out left after his men. SMITHERS looks after him with contemptuous scorn.) Stupid as 'ogs, the lot of 'em! Blarsted niggers!

(Curtain falls.)

1874 -- Amy Lowell -- 1925

MISS LOWELL came from a distinguished New England family and numbered among her ancestors famous statesmen, educators, writers, and diplomats. Her grandfather was a cousin of James Russell Lowell, and her brothers were Percival Lowell, the astronomer, and Abbott Lawrence Lowell, for many years president of Harvard University. She was a native of Brookline, Massachusetts, where she made her home to the end of her life. Born to great wealth, she had the advantage of private education and much foreign travel. At thirteen, it is said, she began to write verse, but it was not until she was twenty-eight that she made up her mind to make poetry her profession. At thirty-eight she published her first book. Although known primarily as a poet, she also achieved distinction as a critic and biographer. By some it is believed that the unremitting work on her life of Keats, one of her masters, hastened her death.

During her lifetime she published eight volumes of poetry, and three others appeared after her death. Of these Sword Blades and Poppy Seed (1914) and Can Grande's Castle (1918) are representative of her most original and best work. A Critical Fable (1922) tries to do for her contemporaries what James Russell Lowell did earlier in his A Fable for Critics. Six French Poets (1915) and Tendencies in Modern American Poetry (1917) are critical studies variously estimated as to their ultimate value. There are differing opinions about her biography of John Keats (1925), but it is safe to say that she brought together the greatest amount of material concerning Keats ever assembled, and that all future biographers and interpreters will be indebted to her.

In view of Miss Lowell's staid New England ancestry and background it would have been natural for her to become a poet in the classical tradition. Indeed, her first volume, A Dome of Many-Colored Glass (1912), seemed to confirm this anticipation, for most of the poems in it were written in more or less stereotyped forms. Two forces, however, united to change the current of her development. During recent years America with its youthful instability and passion for change had become interested in a changing form of poetic art, referred to in such terms as "new poetry," vers libre, and Imagism. A woman of boundless energy, with a good deal of the pugnacious and belligerent in her nature, she seized the opportunity to make herself the promoter, leader, spokesman, and interpreter of the small group of poets who were struggling to arrive at a new medium of poetic expression. And in her own creative work she began to experiment with new forms in accordance with their Credo, the change being definitely noticeable in Sword Blades and Poppy Seed.

The chief articles in the new creed to which the Imagists subscribed are: (1) to use only the exact word; (2) to substitute cadence for meter; (3) to have free choice of subject matter; (4) to create definite and concrete images that are hard and clear; and (5) to strive for concentration.

Some of the precepts Miss Lowell followed, and others she ignored. She chose her subject matter rather promiscuously from human experience past and present, actual as well as imagined (one of her volumes is entitled Legends); in her development of polyphonic prose as a medium of expression she probably went further than was originally anticipated. On the other hand the exact word, the hard poetic effect, and the clear image are seldom absent.

One wonders why the creed of the Imagists, on the surface harmless enough, should have precipitated discussion and controversy. Some of the suggestions had been followed by poets from time immemorial. Yet controversy did rage as to whether this new thing was actually poetry, and stirred up anew the age-old problem of the relation of prose to poetry. To a certain degree it was undoubtedly due to the aggressive tactics of Miss Lowell, who thrived on argument and loved a fight. While she lived the Imagists were active and aggressive; since her death the movement has declined.

Her poetry, widely experimental, sometimes graceful and rich, is still neither representative of what the Imagists wanted modern poetry to be nor wholly successful intrinsically. Her poems have almost always the character of cold preciousness, of self-conscious experiments, and often of show-pieces or bric-a-brac. She is often quite happy in her effects (as in "Patterns") experimenting with slant rhymes, internal rhyming, and alliteration. But in the main she is valuable chiefly as a saleswoman for "the new poetry," and her poems fill well the role of sample pieces of what might be done with the principles which she preached. She was able to do what Pound could not: she had the money, the patience, and the vigor to help young poets to a hearing. Many of these poets have survived the rather thorough eclipse of her own reputation as a poet.

Miss Lowell's writings include poetry, criticism, and biography. The volumes of her poems are A Dome of Many-Colored Glass (1912); Sword Blades and Poppy Seed (1914); Men, Women and Ghosts (1916); Can Grande's Castle (1918); Pictures of the Floating World (1919); Legends (1921); A Critical Fable (1922); What's O'Clock (1925); East Wind (1926); Ballads for Sale (1927); The Madonna of Carthagera (1927); selections from her poetry are published in J. L. Lowes, ed., Selected Poems of Amy Lowell (1928). In criticism she has written Six French Poets (1915); Tendencies in Modern American Poetry (1917); Poetry and Poets (1930). Her biographical work is John Keats (2 vols., 1925). S. F. Damon, Amy Lowell (1935), is a definitive biography. Briefer accounts are found in R. Hunt and R. H. Snow, Amy Lowell: a Sketch of Her Life and Her Place in Contemporary American Literature (1917); E. S. Sergeant, Fire Under the Andes (1927); H. B. Kizer, "Amy Lowell, a Personality," North American Review, Jan., 1918; H. Monroe, Poets & Their Art (1926). For critical estimates and interpretation consult C. Wood, Amy Lowell (1926); P. H. PATTERNS

I WALK down the garden-paths,
 And all the daffodils
 Are blowing, and the bright blue squills.
 I walk down the patterned garden-paths
 In my stiff, brocaded gown.
 With my powdered hair and jewelled fan,
 I too am a rare
 Pattern. As I wander down
 The garden-paths.
 My dress is richly figured,                    10
 And the train
 Makes a pink and silver stain
 On the gravel, and the thrift

Of the borders.
 Just a plate of current fashion,
 Tripping by in high-heeled, ribboned shoes.
 Not a softness anywhere about me,
 Only whalebone and brocade.
 And I sink on a seat in the shade
 Of a lime-tree. For my passion                    20
 Wars against the stiff brocade.
 The daffodils and squills
 Flutter in the breeze
 As they please.
 And I weep;
 For the lime-tree is in blossom
 And one small flower has dropped upon my bosom.

And the plashing of waterdrops
 In the marble fountain
 Comes down the garden-paths. 30
 The dripping never stops.
 Underneath my stiffened gown
 Is the softness of a woman bathing in a marble basin,
 A basin in the midst of hedges grown
 So thick, she cannot see her lover hiding,
 But she guesses he is near,
 And the sliding of the water
 Seems the stroking of a dear
 Hand upon her.
 What is Summer in a fine brocaded gown! 40
 I should like to see it lying in a heap upon the ground.
 All the pink and silver crumpled up on the ground.

I would be the pink and silver as I ran along the paths,
 And he would stumble after,
 Bewildered by my laughter.
 I should see the sun flashing from his swordhilt and the buckles on his shoes.
 I would choose
 To lead him in a maze along the patterned paths,
 A bright and laughing maze for my heavy-booted lover.
 Till he caught me in the shade, 50
 And the buttons of his waistcoat bruised my body as he clasped me
 Aching, melting, unafraid.
 With the shadows of the leaves and the sun-drops,
 And the plopping of the waterdrops,
 All about us in the open afternoon—
 I am very like to swoon
 With the weight of this brocade,
 For the sun sifts through the shade.
 Underneath the fallen blossom
 In my bosom, 60
 Is a letter I have hid.
 It was brought to me this morning by a rider from the Duke.
 "Madam, we regret to inform you that Lord
 Hartwell
 Died in action Thursday se'nnight."
 As I read it in the white, morning sunlight,
 The letters squirmed like snakes.

"Any answer, Madam," said my footman.
 "No," I told him.
 "See that the messenger takes some refreshment.
 No, no answer." 70
 And I walked into the garden,
 Up and down the patterned paths,
 In my stiff, correct brocade.
 The blue and yellow flowers stood up proudly
 in the sun,
 Each one.
 I stood upright too,
 Held rigid to the pattern
 By the stiffness of my gown.
 Up and down I walked,
 Up and down. 80

In a month he would have been my husband.
 In a month, here, underneath this lime,
 We would have broke the pattern;
 He for me, and I for him,
 He as Colonel, I as Lady,
 On this shady seat.
 He had a whim
 That sunlight carried blessing.
 And I answered, "It shall be as you have said."
 Now he is dead. 90

In Summer and in Winter I shall walk
 Up and down
 The patterned garden paths
 In my stiff, brocaded gown.
 The squills and daffodils
 Will give place to pillared roses, and to asters, and to snow.
 I shall go
 Up and down,
 In my gown.
 Gorgeously arrayed, 100
 Boned and stayed.
 And the softness of my body will be guarded from embrace
 By each button, hook, and lace.
 For the man who should loose me is dead,
 Fighting with the Duke in Flanders,
 In a pattern called a war.
 Christ! What are patterns for?

1886 -- H(ilda) D(oolittle) -- —

HILDA DOOLITTLE was born in Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, spent two years at Bryn Mawr College, and in 1911 went to Europe, where later she married the British poet, Richard Aldington. While in London, H. D. became acquainted with the group of writers who were interested in new poetic theories and practices, and joined enthusiastically with them. It is said that Pound started the Imagist movement to give her poetry a hearing. Even after discounting the claim, one has to admit that H. D.'s verse does preserve more successfully than most the qualities which the Imagists admired. Her writing is clear and objective, sparing but precise in imagery, concentrated and intense. Withal, it is often slight and always limited. Ultimately it demonstrates, better than does the poetry of other Imagists, both the gains made by the school and the limitations which poetry that follows its principles too narrowly suffers.

H.D.'s verse has been published as follows: Sea Garden (1916); The Tribute and Circe (1917); Hymen (1921); Heliadora and Other Poems (1924); Red Roses for Bronze (1931); The Walls Do Not Fall (1944). Collected Poems was published in 1925. She has written one play, Hippolytus Temporizes (1927); translations or adaptations from the Greek include Choruses from Iphigeneia (1916); and Euripides Ion (1936). Critical studies of her work include Babette Deutsch, This Modern Poetry (1935); Glenn Hughes, Imagism and the Imagists (1931); Alfred Kreymborg, "Our Singing Strength" (1929); Amy Lowell, Tendencies in Modern American Poetry (1917); Horace Gregory and Marya Zaturenska, A History of American Poetry, 1900-1940 (1946); R. P. Blackmur, "The Lesser Satisfactions," Poetry, Nov., 1932; May Sinclair, "The Poems of H.D.," Fortnightly Review, March, 1927.

THE GARDEN

I

You are clear,
O rose, cut in rock.

I could scrape the colour
From the petals,
Like spilt dye from a rock.

If I could break you
I could break a tree.

If I could stir
I could break a tree,
I could break you.

10

II

O wind, rend open the heat,
Cut apart the heat,
Slit it to tatters.

Fruit cannot drop
Through this thick air;
Fruit cannot fall into heat
That presses up and blunts
The points of pears,
And round grapes.

Cut the heat;
Plough through it,
Turning it on either side
Of your path.

SONG

You are as gold
As the half-ripe grain
That merges to gold again,
As white as the white rain
That beats through
The half-opened flowers
Of the great flower tufts
Thick on the black limbs
Of an Illyrian apple bough.

Can honey distil such fragrance 10
As your bright hair—
For your face is as fair as rain,
Yet as rain that lies clear
On white honey-comb,
Lends radiance to the white wax,
So your hair on your brow
Casts light for a shadow.

ORCHARD

I SAW the first pear
as it fell—
the honey-seeking, golden banded,
the yellow swarm,
was not more fleet than I,

(spare us from loveliness!)
and I fell prostrate,
crying:
you have flayed us with your blossoms, spare us the beauty 10
of fruit-trees!

The honey-seeking paused not;
the air thundered their song,
and I alone was prostrate.

O rough-hewn
god of the orchard,
I bring you an offering—
do you, alone unbeautiful, son of the god, 20
spare us from loveliness:
these fallen hazel-nuts,
stripped late of their green sheaths,
grapes, red-purple,
their berries
dripping with wine;
pomegranates already broken,
and shrunken figs,
and quinces untouched,
I bring you as offering. 30

1888 ~ T. S. Eliot ~ —

BORN IN Saint Louis, Missouri, Thomas Stearns Eliot was educated at Smith Academy in that city, Harvard (1906–1910), the Sorbonne, Paris (1910–1911), and Merton College, Oxford (1914–1915). At Harvard he was an editor of The Advocate, to which he contributed some poems; and, after finishing his undergraduate course, he remained for one year as a graduate student in philosophy. He continued indulging his philosophical interests at the Sorbonne and at Oxford; in Paris he attended lectures given by Henri Bergson; at Oxford he studied chiefly Greek philosophy. From 1911 to 1914 he was again at Harvard, studying philosophy and philology (including Sanskrit); he was made an assistant in philosophy in 1913–1914.

It is barely possible that, had Eliot not become acquainted with T. E. Hulme and Ezra Pound, he would not have turned to poetry at all. The poems in The Harvard Advocate are interesting college products; but his interests were predominantly in philosophy and theology. For this latter he had the precedent of New England and Saint Louis ministers among his ancestry. Through Pound, Hulme, F. S. Flint, and other young men in the Harold Monro and Egoist circles, Eliot became acquainted with French poetry, French poetic theory, and the first stirrings of Imagism. Most important was Pound, "il miglior fabbro" as he called him in the dedication of The Waste Land in 1922.

The early poems reflect these interests and influences: "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock" appeared in Harriet Monroe's Poetry, April-Sept., 1915; "Preludes" and "Rhapsody on a Windy Night" in Wyndham Lewis's "vorticist" magazine, Blast, July, 1915. In 1915, Eliot contributed to Pound's Catholic Anthology, "Prufrock," "Portrait of a Lady," and several other poems. There is no doubt that these poems (and others, brought together under the title of Prufrock and Other Observations, 1917) reflect the interest of the group in French poetry, French criticism (especially that of Rémy de Gourmont), and the preoccupation of the Imagists with objective representation. Added to these, however, was the interest in the "self-conscious irony" of Jules Laforgue and the rough ironic sketches of urban life in Tristan Corbière's poetry. These early poems of Eliot, brilliantly independent of all of these influences, however noticeable their effect is, reflect Eliot's early thinking upon the facts of modern civilization and its impact upon the modern personality. The setting is often urban; the details, offered sparingly but with penetration, are those of city streets which seem to give tangible evidence of spiritual desolation. Both Prufrock and the Lady are contemporary types, which can be matched in Pound's poetry. Their hesitation, unhappiness, fear, lack of moral incentive are portrayed by means of objective detail and allusion. The Sweeney poems offer another character: the modern vulgarian, obtuse, straightforward, lusty and lustful. The contrast with earlier cultures is much more obvious, much less skillful or subtle, than in the later poems.

"Gerontion," published in Poems, 1920, is a first view of The Waste Land. In 1923, Eliot became editor of The Criterion, a position he held until 1939. The poems written at this time reflect a much wider use of sources; the Jacobean dramatists, Dante's Divine Comedy, and other sources begin to manifest themselves. The wasteland situation, while dramatized in simple form in the early poems, is more fully and more solidly characterized in "Gerontion," The Waste Land (1922) and "The Hollow Men" (in Poems, 1909-1925). By the use of the myth of the Fishing, which he first studied in Jessie Weston's From Ritual to Romance, and of other themes and legends, Eliot presented, in The Waste Land, a theme poignantly applicable to contemporary society. The protagonist of The Waste Land moves through the dry, sterile, desert land of modern life in search of a clue to his personal salvation. "I had not thought death had undone so many," he says, paraphrasing Dante's Inferno; and the waste land is a composite drawn from Dante's hell, Baudelaire's "unreal city," Paris, and modern London. The point is not that modern civilization is necessarily inferior to that of other times, but that all peoples who lack spiritual resources, who have been led to denounce faith, are doomed to an ugly and hysterical kind of sterility. The protagonist does find some clues to his spiritual progress (they are drawn from Hindu scriptures and given in Sanskrit), but they are for him, not for the others. The waste land remains, but "These fragments I have shored against my ruins."

After the postlude called "The Hollow Men," Eliot turned to what may more literally be called religious poetry. In addition to such religious poems as "Journey of the Magi," "A Song for Simeon," and "Animula," he was working in the late 1920's on Ash Wednesday, which finally appeared in book form in 1930. It is a poem which quite literally conveys the hesitations, the alternations of fear and ecstasy, of religious conversion; the source continues to be Dante, but to him are added such religious mystics as St. John of the Cross. In 1927 Eliot became a British citizen, and announced his affiliation with the Anglo-Catholic church. "The World is trying the experiment of attempting to form a civilized but non-Christian mentality," he said in 1931. "The experiment will fail; but we must be very patient in awaiting its collapse; meanwhile redeeming the time: so that the Faith may be preserved alive through the dark ages before us; to renew and rebuild civilization, and save the World from suicide."

If it is true that Eliot's poetry shows a continuous progress toward a more exact and a more positive definition of man's spiritual condition, it is also true that his latest work, while not abandoning the interest in the world of Prufrock and Aunt Helen, is primarily concerned not only with presenting a religious search but also with underscoring the positive attributes of a specific faith. Four Quartets (1943) (besides offering some of the most interesting poetry of our time) is marked by a religious confidence that overcomes in each case the disciplinary (and often rather factitious) despair expressed by the poet. The Quartets are infinitely more subtle, more complex poetry than Ash Wednesday; they are also a completion of the work begun by the protagonist of The Waste Land, in the last section of that poem.

Eliot is by all odds the most significant poet of our century. In training, discipline, equipment, he excels all of his contemporaries. His poetry offers technical skills in a new context of language and allusion. From Pound to the Anglo-Catholic divines, he has run the gamut of sources and influences, borrowing and reshaping whatever his eclectic taste has seized upon. Yet he is a highly personal poet; surprising though it may seem, in view of his enormous influence upon young contemporaries, his poetry reflects an individual search for, then an enforcement of, a personal salvation. His followers have admired him for his skill, his mastery of form and language; they have often been mistaken about his meaning, or imitated one level of meaning (as in Archibald MacLeish's Pot of Earth) in ignorance of the other. He remains, however, the most stimulating and challenging of literary personalities.

See below, page 1076, for a brief summary of Eliot's criticism.

Eliot's poems have been published as follows: Prufrock and Other Observations (1917); Ara Vos Prec (1919); Poems (1919); Poems (1920); The Waste Land (1922); Poems, 1909-1925 (1925); Journey of the Magi (1927); A Song for Simeon (1928); Animula (1929); Ash Wednesday (1930); Marina (1930); Triumphal March (1931); Sweeney Agonistes, Fragments of an Aristophanic Melodrama (1932); Collected Poems, 1909-1935 (1936); Four Quartets (1943). He has published three dramatic pieces: The Rock (1934); Murder in the Cathedral (1935); The Family Reunion (1939); and one translation, that of St. J. Perse's Anabasis (1930). For a list of his critical works, see below, p. 1078. The best of many critical studies of Eliot is F. O. Matthiessen's The Achievement of T. S. Eliot (second edition, 1947); collections of criticism include B. Rajan (ed.) T. S. Eliot: A Study of His Writings by Several Hands (1947) and Leonard Unger (ed.) T. S. Eliot: A Selected Critique (1948). THE LOVE SONG OF
J. ALFRED PRUFROCK

*S'io credesse che mia risposta fosse
A persona che mai tornasse al mondo,
Questa fiamma staria senza piu scosse.
Ma perciocche giammai di questo fondo
Non torno vivo alcun, s'i'odo il vero,
Senza tema d'infamia ti rispondo.*

LET us go then, you and I,
When the evening is spread out against the sky
Like a patient etherised upon a table;
Let us go, through certain half-deserted streets,
The muttering retreats

Of restless nights in one-night cheap hotels
And sawdust restaurants with oyster-shells:
Streets that follow like a tedious argument
Of insidious intent
To lead you to an overwhelming question . . .
Oh, do not ask, "What is it?" 11
Let us go and make our visit.

In the room the women come and go
Talking of Michelangelo.

The yellow fog that rubs its back upon the window-panes,
The yellow smoke that rubs its muzzle on the window-panes

Licked its tongue into the corners of the evening,
 Lingered upon the pools that stand in drains,
 Let fall upon its back the soot that falls from chimneys,
 Slipped by the terrace, made a sudden leap,<sup>20</sup>
 And seeing that it was a soft October night,
 Curled once about the house, and fell asleep.

And indeed there will be time
 For the yellow smoke that slides along the street,
 Rubbing its back upon the window-panes;
 There will be time, there will be time
 To prepare a face to meet the faces that you meet;
 There will be time to murder and create,
 And time for all the works and days of hands
 That lift and drop a question on your plate;
 Time for you and time for me, <sup>31</sup>
 And time yet for a hundred indecisions,
 And for a hundred visions and revisions,
 Before the taking of a toast and tea.

In the room the women come and go
 Talking of Michelangelo.

And indeed there will be time
 To wonder, "Do I dare?" and, "Do I dare?"
 Time to turn back and descend the stair,
 With a bald spot in the middle of my hair—
 (They will say: "How his hair is growing thin!") <sup>41</sup>
 My morning coat, my collar mounting firmly to the chin,
 My necktie rich and modest, but asserted by a simple pin—
 (They will say: "But how his arms and legs are thin!")
 Do I dare
 Disturb the universe?
 In a minute there is time
 For decisions and revisions which a minute will reverse.

For I have known them all already, known them all:—
 Have known the evenings, mornings, afternoons, <sup>50</sup>
 I have measured out my life with coffee spoons;

I know the voices dying with a dying fall
 Beneath the music from a farther room.
 So how should I presume?

And I have known the eyes already, known them all—
 The eyes that fix you in a formulated phrase,
 And when I am formulated, sprawling on a pin,
 When I am pinned and wriggling on the wall,
 Then how should I begin
 To spit out all the butt-ends of my days and ways?
 And how should I presume?

And I have known the arms already, known them all—
 Arms that are braceleted and white and bare
 (But in the lamplight, downed with light brown hair!)
 Is it perfume from a dress
 That makes me so digress?
 Arms that lie along a table, or wrap about a shawl.
 And should I then presume?
 And how should I begin?

Shall I say, I have gone at dusk through narrow streets <sup>70</sup>
 And watched the smoke that rises from the pipes
 Of lonely men in shirt-sleeves, leaning out of windows? . . .

I should have been a pair of ragged claws
 Scuttling across the floors of silent seas.

And the afternoon, the evening, sleeps so peacefully!
 Smoothed by long fingers,
 Asleep . . . tired . . . or it malingers,
 Stretched on the floor, here beside you and me.
 Should I, after tea and cakes and ices,
 Have the strength to force the moment to its crisis? <sup>80</sup>
 But though I have wept and fasted, wept and prayed,
 Though I have seen my head (grown slightly bald) brought in upon a platter,
 I am no prophet—and here's no great matter;
 I have seen the moment of my greatness flicker,
 And I have seen the eternal Footman hold my coat, and snicker,

And in short, I was afraid.

And would it have been worth it, after all,
After the cups, the marmalade, the tea,
Among the porcelain, among some talk of you and me,

Would it have been worth while, 90
To have bitten off the matter with a smile,
To have squeezed the universe into a ball
To roll it toward some overwhelming question,
To say: "I am Lazarus, come from the dead,
Come back to tell you all, I shall tell you all"—
If one, settling a pillow by her head,
Should say: "That was not what I meant at all;
That is not it, at all."

And would it have been worth it, after all,
Would it have been worth while, 100
After the sunsets and the dooryards and the sprinkled streets,
After the novels, after the teacups, after the skirts that trail along the floor—
And this, and so much more?—
It is impossible to say just what I mean!
But as if a magic lantern threw the nerves in patterns on a screen:
Would it have been worth while
If one, settling a pillow or throwing off a shawl,
And turning toward the window, should say:
"That is not it at all,
That is not what I meant at all." 110
. . . . .

No! I am not Prince Hamlet, nor was meant to be;
Am an attendant lord, one that will do
To swell a progress, start a scene or two,
Advise the prince; no doubt, an easy tool,
Deferential, glad to be of use,
Polite, cautious, and meticulous;
Full of high sentence, but a bit obtuse;
At times, indeed, almost ridiculous—
Almost, at times, the Fool.

I grow old . . . I grow old . . . 120
I shall wear the bottoms of my trousers rolled.

Shall I part my hair behind? Do I dare to eat a peach?

I shall wear white flannel trousers, and walk
upon the beach.

I have heard the mermaids singing, each to each.

I do not think that they will sing to me.

I have seen them riding seaward on the waves
Combing the white hair of the waves blown
back

When the wind blows the water white and black.

We have lingered in the chambers of the sea
By sea-girls wreathed with seaweed red and brown 130

Till human voices wake us, and we drown.

PRELUDES

I

THE winter evening settles down
With smell of steaks in passageways.
Six o'clock.
The burnt-out ends of smoky days.
And now a gusty shower wraps
The grimy scraps
Of withered leaves about your feet
And newspapers from vacant lots;
The showers beat
On broken blinds and chimney-pots, 10
And at the corner of the street
A lonely cab-horse steams and stamps.
And then the lighting of the lamps.

II

The morning comes to consciousness
Of faint stale smell of beer
From the sawdust-trampled street
With all its muddy feet that press
To early coffee-stands.
With the other masquerades
That time resumes,
One thinks of all the hands
That are raising dingy shades
In a thousand furnished rooms. 10

III

You tossed a blanket from the bed,
You lay upon your back, and waited;

You dozed, and watched the night revealing
 The thousand sordid images
 Of which your soul was constituted;
 They flickered against the ceiling.
 And when all the world came back
 And the light crept up between the shutters
 And you heard the sparrows in the gutters,
 You had such a vision of the street 10
 As the street hardly understands;
 Sitting along the bed's edge, where
 You curled the papers from your hair,
 Or clasped the yellow soles of feet
 In the palms of both soiled hands.

IV

His soul stretched tight across the skies
 That fade behind a city block,
 Or trampled by insistent feet
 At four and five and six o'clock;
 And short square fingers stuffing pipes,
 And evening newspapers, and eyes
 Assured of certain certainties,
 The conscience of a blackened street
 Impatient to assume the world.

I am moved by fancies that are curled 10
 Around these images, and cling:
 The notion of some infinitely gentle
 Infinitely suffering thing.

Wipe your hand across your mouth, and
 laugh;
 The worlds revolve like ancient women
 Gathering fuel in vacant lots. 1917

MORNING AT THE WINDOW

THEY are rattling breakfast plates in basement
 kitchens,
 And along the trampled edges of the street
 I am aware of the damp souls of housemaids
 Sprouting despondently at area gates.

The brown waves of fog toss up to me
 Twisted faces from the bottom of the street,
 And tear from a passer-by with muddy skirts
 An aimless smile that hovers in the air
 And vanishes along the level of the roofs.

GERONTION

Thou hast nor youth nor age
 But as it were an after dinner sleep
 Dreaming of both.

HERE I am, an old man in a dry month,
 Being read to by a boy, waiting for rain.
 I was neither at the hot gates
 Nor fought in the warm rain,
 Nor knee deep in the salt marsh, heaving a cutlass,
 Bitten by flies, fought.
 My house is a decayed house,
 And the jew squats on the window sill, the owner,
 Spawned in some estaminet of Antwerp,
 Blistered in Brussels, patched and peeled in London. 10
 The great coughs at night in the field overhead;
 Rocks, moss, stonecrop, iron, merds.
 The woman keeps the kitchen, makes tea,
 Sneezes at evening, poking the peevish gutter.
 I an old man,
 A dull head among windy spaces.

Signs are taken for wonders. "We would see a sign"!
 The word within a word, unable to speak a
 word, Swaddled with darkness. In the juvenescence of the year
 Came Christ the tiger 20
 In depraved May, dogwood and chestnut,
 flowering judas,
 To be eaten, to be divided, to be drunk
 Among whispers; by Mr. Silvero
 With caressing hands, at Limoges
 Who walked all night in the next room;

By Hakagawa, bowing among the Titians;
 By Madame de Tornquist, in the dark room
 Shifting the candles; Fräulein von Kulp
 Who turned in the hall, one hand on the door.
 Vacant shuttles 30
 Weave the wind. I have no ghosts,
 An old man in a draughty house
 Under a windy knob.
 After such knowledge, what forgiveness?
 Think now
 History has many cunning passages, contrived corridors

And issues, deceives with whispering ambitions,
 Guides us by vanities. Think now
 She gives when our attention is distracted
 And what she gives, gives with such supple confusions
 That the giving famishes the craving. Gives too late 40
 What's not believed in, or if still believed,
 In memory only, reconsidered passion. Gives too soon
 Into weak hands, what's thought can be dispensed with
 Till the refusal propagates a fear. Think Neither fear nor courage saves us. Unnatural vices
 Are fathered by our heroism. Virtues
 Are forced upon us by our impudent crimes.
 These tears are shaken from the wrathbearing tree.

The tiger springs in the new year. Us he devours. Think at last
 We have not reached conclusion, when I 50
 Stiffen in a rented house. Think at last
 I have not made this show purposelessly
 And it is not by any concitation
 Of the backward devils.
 I would meet you upon this honestly.
 I that was near your heart was removed there-
 from
 To lose beauty in terror, terror in inquisition.
 I have lost my passion: why should I need to keep it
 Since what is kept must be adulterated?
 I have lost my sight, smell, hearing, taste and touch: 60
 How should I use it for your closer contact?

These with a thousand small deliberations
 Protract the profit of their chilled delirium, Excite the membrane, when the sense has cooled,
 With pungent sauces, multiply variety
 In a wilderness of mirrors. What will the spider do,
 Suspend its operations, will the weevil
 Delay? De Bailhache, Fresca, Mrs. Cammel,
 whirled
 Beyond the circuit of the shuddering Bear

In fractured atoms. Gull against the wind, in the windy straits 70
 Of Belle Isle, or running on the Horn,
 White feathers in the snow, the Gulf claims,
 And an old man driven by the Trades
 To a sleepy corner.

Tenants of the house
 Thoughts of a dry brain in a dry season. 1920

JOURNEY OF THE MAGI

"A COLD coming we had of it,
 Just the worst time of the year
 For a journey, and such a long journey:
 The ways deep and the weather sharp,
 The very dead of winter."
 And the camels galled, sore-footed, refractory,
 Lying down in the melting snow.
 There were times we regretted
 The summer palaces on slopes, the terraces,
 And the silken girls bringing sherbet. 10
 Then the camel men cursing and grumbling
 And running away, and wanting their liquor and women,
 And the night-fires going out, and the lack of shelters,
 And the cities hostile and the towns unfriendly
 And the villages dirty and charging high prices:
 A hard time we had of it.
 At the end we preferred to travel all night,
 Sleeping in snatches,
 With the voices singing in our ears, saying
 That this was all folly. 20

Then at dawn we came down to a temperate valley,
 Wet, below the snow line, smelling of vegetation;
 With a running stream and a water-mill beating the darkness,
 And three trees on the low sky,
 And an old white horse galloped away in the meadow.
 Then we came to a tavern with vine-leaves
 over the lintel,
 Six hands at an open door dicing for pieces of silver,
 And feet kicking the empty wine-skins.

But there was no information, and so we continued
 And arriving at evening, not a moment too soon 30
 Finding the place; it was (you may say) satisfactory.

All this was a long time ago, I remember,
 And I would do it again, but set down
 This set down
 This: were we led all that way for Birth or Death? There was a Birth, certainly,

We had evidence and no doubt. I had seen birth and death,
 But had thought they were different; this Birth was Hard and bitter agony for us, like Death, our death.

We returned to our places, these Kingdoms, 40
 But no longer at ease here, in the old dispensation,
 With an alien people clutching their gods.
 I should be glad of another death.

1879 ~ Wallace Stevens ~ —

WALLACE STEVENS' career as poet thus far divides itself into four periods. From 1914 to 1923 he wrote such poems as "Sunday Morning" and "Peter Quince at the Clavier" and published them in little magazines such as Others and Poetry. In these years he was interested in French symbolism, notably Mallarmé, and in certain contributions which the Imagists made to contemporary poetry. His description of beauty is given in "Sunday Morning":

Death is the mother of beauty, mystical,
 Within whose burning bosom we devise
 Our earthly mothers waiting, sleeplessly.

In 1923 his first volume of poems, Harmonium, appeared. In it was the long narrative poem, "The Comedian as the Letter C," whose hero moves away from romanticism to objective realism. The intention of the poem is ironical, but as a whole it suggests a change from Stevens' early preoccupation with symbolist poetry. Except for "Sea-Surface Full of Clouds," published in The Dial of July, 1924, and a few other poems, Stevens published nothing until 1931, when the revised and enlarged edition of Harmonium appeared. In 1935 Ideas of Order was published, and it was followed by Owl's Clover (1936) and The Man with the Blue Guitar (1937). The principal emphasis in these three volumes is upon the human imagination as a faculty for bringing order to reality, which is otherwise chaotic. The song of the girl in "The Idea of Order at Key West," for example, provides the means by which the sea can be known.

It was her voice that made
 The sky acutest at its vanishing.
 She measured to the hour its solitude.

She was the single artificer of the world
In which she sang. . . .

In the most recent development of Stevens' poetry, he has set about the task of presenting a clarified and definitive exposition of the imagination as "The Supreme Fiction" by which we know reality. Notes Toward a Supreme Fiction (1942) and Ésthetique du Mal (1944), both of them included in Transport to Summer (1947), his most recent collection, are key poems in this development. Suggestions also appear in The Man with the Blue Guitar and Parts of a World (1942). The "supreme fiction" (that is, the imaginative form of the world) must be abstract; one must become "an ignorant man again," must see reality pure; the idea must also allow for change, for the introduction of many particulars which are characteristic only of the moment and the place. Finally, the "fiction" must give pleasure, must always be available to new and interesting impressions. This theory, of the imagination as providing a workable order for reality, Stevens has continued to define, explain, and defend. In his essay, "The Noble Rider and the Sound of Words," included in The Language of Poetry (1942), he explains what he means by imagination's role: "The imagination loses vitality as it ceases to adhere to what is real. When it adheres to the unreal and intensifies what is unreal, while its effect may be extraordinary, that effect is the maximum effect that it will ever have."

Stevens has been a vice-president of the Hartford Accident and Indemnity Company for many years. His poetry continues to appear regularly in magazines and in collections; and there is apparently a complete separation between his life as poet and his life as businessman. He has lately taken to prose more often than previously; his name has appeared in several symposia, honoring such contemporaries as Marianne Moore and John Crowe Ransom. His recent poetry contains flatter, more direct statement, less of the purely sensory detail which characterized his early work. He can be said to have inherited many of the interests of the Imagist group but to have developed quite independently of them.

Stevens' poetry has been published in the following volumes: Harmonium (1923; revised and enlarged in 1931); Ideas of Order (1935); Owl's Clover (1936); The Man with the Blue Guitar (1937); Parts of a World (1942); Notes Toward a Supreme Fiction (1942); Ésthetique du Mal (1944); Transport to Summer (1947); A Primitive Like an Orb (1948). His most important prose writing is the essay, "The Noble Rider and the Sound of Words," in The Language of Poetry, ed. Allen Tate (1942). The December, 1940, issue of The Harvard Advocate contains some biographical information provided by Hi Simons, and several critical estimates, by Theodore Spencer, Morton Zabel, and others. Other criticisms can be found in R. P. Blackmur, The Double Agent (1935); Paul Rosenfeld, Men Seen (1925); Gōrham Munson, Destinations (1928); Yvor Winters, The Anatomy of Nonsense (1943); Horace Gregory and Marya Zaturenska, A History of American Poetry, 1900-1940 (1946); R. P. Blackmur, "An Abstraction Blooded," Partisan Review, May-June, 1943; Wm. V. O'Connor, "Wallace Stevens and Imagined Reality," Western Review, Spring, 1948; H. R. Hays, "Laforgue and Wallace Stevens," Romanic Review, July-Sept., 1934; Hi Simons, "Wallace Stevens and Mallarmé," Modern Philology, May, 1946.

SUNDAY MORNING

I

COMPLACENCIES of the peignoir, and late
 Coffee and oranges in a sunny chair,
 And the green freedom of a cockatoo
 Upon a rug mingle to dissipate
 The holy hush of ancient sacrifice.
 She dreams a little, and she feels the dark
 Encroachment of that old catastrophe,
 As a calm darkens among water-lights.
 The pungent oranges and bright, green wings
 Seem things in some procession of the dead, 10
 Winding across wide water, without sound.
 The day is like wide water, without sound,
 Stilled for the passing of her dreaming feet
 Over the seas, to silent Palestine,
 Dominion of the blood and sepulchre.

II

Why should she give her bounty to the dead?
 What is divinity if it can come
 Only in silent shadows and in dreams?
 Shall she not find in comforts of the sun,
 In pungent fruit and bright, green wings, or else 20
 In any balm or beauty of the earth,
 Things to be cherished like the thought of heaven?
 Divinity must live within herself:
 Passions of rain, or moods in falling snow;
 Grievings in loneliness, or unsubdued
 Elations when the forest blooms; gusty
 Emotions on wet roads on autumn nights;
 All pleasures and all pains, remembering
 The bough of summer and the winter branch.
 These are the measures destined for her soul.

III

Jove in the clouds had his inhuman birth. 31
 No mother suckled him, no sweet land gave
 Large-mannered motions to his mythy mind.
 He moved among us, as a muttering king,
 Magnificent, would move among his hinds,
 Until our blood, commingling, virginal,
 With heaven, brought such requital to desire
 The very hinds discerned it, in a star.
 Shall our blood fail? Or shall it come to be
 The blood of paradise? And shall the earth 40
 Seem all of paradise that we shall know?
 The sky will be much friendlier than now,

A part of labor and a part of pain,
 And next in glory to enduring love,
 Not this dividing and indifferent blue.

IV

She says, "I am content when wakened birds,
 Before they fly, test the reality
 Of misty fields, by their sweet questionings;
 But when the birds are gone, and their warm fields
 Return no more, where, then, is paradise?" 50
 There is not any haunt of prophecy,
 Nor any old chimera of the grave,
 Neither the golden underground, nor isle
 Melodious, where spirits gat them home,
 Nor visionary south, nor cloudy palm Remote on heaven's hill, that has endured
 As April's green endures; or will endure
 Like her remembrance of awakened birds,
 Or her desire for June and evening, tipped 59
 By the consummation of the swallow's wings.

V

She says, "But in contentment I still feel
 The need of some imperishable bliss."
 Death is the mother of beauty; hence from her,
 Alone, shall come fulfilment to our dreams
 And our desires. Although she strews the leaves
 Of sure obliteration on our paths,
 The path sick sorrow took, the many paths
 Where triumph rang its brassy phrase, or love
 Whispered a little out of tenderness,
 She makes the willow shiver in the sun 70
 For maidens who were wont to sit and gaze
 Upon the grass, relinquished to their feet.
 She causes boys to pile new plums and pears
 On disregarded plate. The maidens taste
 And stray impassioned in the littering leaves.

Is there no change of death in paradise?
 Does ripe fruit never fall? Or do the boughs
 Hang always heavy in that perfect sky,
 Unchanging, yet so like our perishing earth,
 With givers like our own that seek for seas
 They never find, the same receding shores 81
 That never touch with inarticulate pang?
 Why set the pear upon those river-banks
 Or spice the shores with odors of the plum?
 Alas, that they should wear our colors there,
 The silken weavings of our afternoons,

And pick the strings of our insipid lutes!
 Death is the mother of beauty, mystical,
 Within whose burning bosom we devise
 Our earthly mothers waiting, sleeplessly. 90

VII

Supple and turbulent, a ring of men
 Shall chant in orgy on a summer morn
 Their boisterous devotion to the sun,
 Not as a god, but as a god might be,
 Naked among them, like a savage source.
 Their chant shall be a chant of paradise,
 Out of their blood, returning to the sky;
 And in their chant shall enter, voice by voice,
 The windy lake wherein their lord delights,
 The trees, like serafim, and echoing hills, 100
 That choir among themselves long afterward.
 They shall know well the heavenly fellowship
 Of men that perish and of summer morn.
 And whence they came and whither they shall go
 The dew upon their feet shall manifest.

VIII

She hears, upon that water without sound,
 A voice that cries, "The tomb in Palestine
 Is not the porch of spirits lingering.
 It is the grave of Jesus, where he lay."
 We live in an old chaos of the sun, 110
 Or old dependency of day and night,
 Or island solitude, unsponsored, free,
 Of that wide water, inescapable.
 Deer walk upon our mountains, and the quail
 Whistle about us their spontaneous cries;
 Sweet berries ripen in the wilderness;
 And, in the isolation of the sky,
 At evening, casual flocks of pigeons make
 Ambiguous undulations as they sink, 119
 Downward to darkness, on extended wings.

SEA SURFACE FULL OF CLOUDS

I

IN that November off Tehuantepec,
 The slopping of the sea grew still one night
 And in the morning summer hued the deck

And made one think of rosy chocolate
 And gilt umbrellas. Paradisal green
 Gave suavity to the perplexed machine

Of ocean, which like limpid water lay.
 Who, then, in that ambrosial latitude
 Out of the light evolved the moving blooms,

Who, then, evolved the sea-blooms from the clouds 10

Diffusing balm in that Pacific calm?
C'était mon enfant, mon bijou, mon âme.

The sea-clouds whitened far below the calm
 And moved, as blooms move, in the swimming
 green

And in its watery radiance, while the hue

Of heaven in an antique reflection rolled Round those flotillas. And sometimes the sea

Poured brilliant iris on the glistening blue.

II

In that November off Tehuantepec
 The slopping of the sea grew still one night. 20
 At breakfast jelly yellow streaked the deck

And made one think of chop-house chocolate
 And sham umbrellas. And a sham-like green Capped summer-seeming on the tense machine

Of ocean, which in sinister flatness lay.
 Who, then, beheld the rising of the clouds
 That strode submerged in that malevolent
 sheen,

Who saw the mortal massives of the blooms
 Of water moving on the water-floor?

C'était mon frère du ciel, ma vie, mon or. 30

The gongs rang loudly as the windy booms
 Hoo-hooed it in the darkened ocean-blooms.
 The gongs grew still. And then blue heaven
 spread

Its crystalline pendentives on the sea
 And the macabre of the water-glooms
 In an enormous undulation fled.

III

IN that November off Tehuantepec,
 The slopping of the sea grew still one night
 And a pale silver patterned on the deck

And made one think of porcelain chocolate 40
 And pied umbrellas. An uncertain green,
 Piano-polished, held the tranced machine

Of ocean, as a prelude holds and holds.
 Who, seeing silver petals of white blooms
 Unfolding in the water, feeling sure

Of the milk within the saltiest spurge, heard,
 then,
 The sea unfolding in the sunken clouds?
Oh! C'était mon extase et mon amour.

So deeply sunken were they that the shrouds,
 The shrouding shadows, made the petals black
 Until the rolling heaven made them blue, 51

A blue beyond the rainy hyacinth,
 And smiting the crevasses of the leaves
 Deluged the ocean with a sapphire blue.

IV

In that November off Tehuantepec
 The night-long slopping of the sea grew still.
 A mallow morning dozed upon the deck

And made one think of musky chocolate
 And frail umbrellas. A too-fluent green
 Suggested malice in the dry machine 60

Of ocean, pondering dank stratagem.
 Who then beheld the figures of the clouds
 Like blooms secluded in the thick marine?

Like blooms? Like damasks that were shaken off
 From the loosed girdles in the spangling must.
C'était ma foi, la nonchalance divine.

The nakedness would rise and suddenly turn Salt masks of beard and mouths of bellow-
 ing,
 Would—But more suddenly the heaven rolled

Its bluest sea-clouds in the thinking green, 70
 And the nakedness became the broadest blooms,
 Mile-mallows that a mallow sun cajoled.

V

In that November off Tehuantepec
 Night stilled the slopping of the sea. The day
 Came, bowing and voluble, upon the deck,

Good clown . . . . One thought of Chinese chocolate
 And large umbrellas. And a motley green
 Followed the drift of the obese machine

Of ocean, perfected in indolence.
 What pistache one, ingenious and droll, 80
 Beheld the sovereign clouds as jugglery

And the sea as turquoise-turbaned Sambo, neat
 At tossing saucers—cloudy-conjuring sea?
C'était mon esprit bâtarde, l'ignominie.

The sovereign clouds came clustering. The conch
 Of loyal conjuration trumped. The wind
 Of green blooms turning crisped the motley hue

To clearing opalescence. Then the sea
 And heaven rolled as one and from the two Came fresh transfigurings of freshest blue. 90

1894 -- E. E. Cummings --

THE LITERARY CAREER of Edward Estlin Cummings began as a result of his war experiences. Confined for three months in a French detention camp because of the error of a military censor, he returned to America, to write his account of that experience, The Enormous Room (1922). In this novelized version of autobiography one can discover all of the points of view and biases which Cummings was to show in his poetry and other writings: specifically, his abhorrence of officialdom, which he considers brutal, inefficient, and stupid; his love of the exceptional human being, the eccentric, the people whom he called "The Delectable Mountains" in The Enormous Room; and, less certainly in that book than in later ones, his primary opposition of love and war as antipodal circumstances.

Cummings had already (in 1917) contributed to a volume of Eight Harvard Poets; after his return from the war he produced small volumes of poems almost annually, which were brought together in Collected Poems (1938); since that date he has published 50 Poems (1940) and 2 x 2 (1944). He has written two plays: Him (1927) and Santa Claus: A Morality (1946). His account of his journey to the Soviet Union, Eimi, was published in 1933.

Cummings' views are those of a Bohemian (he has continued to live in Greenwich Village), an unreconstructed poet-anarchist. He is one of a very few writers of the 1920's who have remained quite consistent in their opposition to organized society, their sympathy for the neglected and the ignored portions of our society. He refuses (rather sadly) to subscribe to any revolutionary views, and has quite tellingly denounced the Russian "experiment," preferring to be in what he calls "beautiful hideous imperfection": "I'd just as soon be imprisoned in freedom than free in a jail." To the monster called organized society, its officers and guides, and its military end-product, Cummings opposes love, in all its forms, sacred and profane. His love poetry ranges from the frankly obscene to the quite simply lyrical: "feeling is first," he says, and the beauty of nature and its simple creatures will never be either defined or destroyed by the "doting/fingers of/prurient philosophers" or "the naughty thumb/of science." His satirical attacks upon American institutions and pretensions are gay, witty, and telling: the Cambridge ladies, the patriotic orator, the writer of modern advertising, the politician. He believes that "this monster manunkind" fears knowledge of himself and prefers living in an "Ever-Ever land," and believing that "nothing really exists."

Cummings achieves his effects through methods that are quite unorthodox. He often uses a single grammatical peculiarity to stress and repeat a point: the prefix "un," attached to nouns and adjectives, for example, to suggest the negative character of the mass. More ambitious is his attempt to make the poem force the reader into an almost kinetic appreciation of its subject. By quite unusual uses of punctuation, typography, and syllabification, he regulates the pace of the poem in the reader's mind, creates simultaneous effects (the use of parentheses is especially striking), delays or prolongs impressions, and in general makes of the reading a motor as well as an imaginative exercise.

Cummings' method is unique and inimitable. It is also in danger of being "used up." Once one gets used to the tricks, he may lose interest in the matter, which continues however to be clever and not irrelevant in his latest poems. He has done some especially interesting things with the sonnet form (which was his favorite form in his Harvard years) and has enlivened others. He has been taken too seriously by some critics (who have denounced him as obscene and unintelligible) and not seriously enough by others (who enjoy the typographic exploits without attending the meaning for which they occasionally strive).

Cummings' poems have appeared in Eight Harvard Poets (1917); Tulips and Chimneys (1923); & (1925); XLI Poems (1925); Is 5 (1926); Christmas Tree (1928); W (1931); No Thanks (1935); 1/20 Poems (1937); Collected Poems (1938); 50 Poems (1940); 1 × 1 (1944). Two plays and one ballet have been published: Him (1927); Santa Claus, a Morality (1946); and Tom (1935). Eimi (1933) is a record of Cummings' trip to the USSR. The Spring, 1946, issue of The Harvard Wake is dedicated to Cummings, and contains (in addition to the first publication of Santa Claus) a number of biographical and critical studies by Allen Tate, Paul Rosenfeld, Karl Shapiro, Theodore Spencer, Lionel Trilling, and others. ALL IN GREEN
WENT MY LOVE RIDING

ALL in green went my love riding
on a great horse of gold
into the silver dawn.

four lean hounds crouched low and smiling
the merry deer ran before.

Fleeter be they than dappled dreams
the swift sweet deer
the red rare deer.

Four red roebuck at a white water
the cruel bugle sang before.

10

Horn at hip went my love riding riding the echo down
into the silver dawn.

four lean hounds crouched low and smiling
the level meadows ran before.

Softer by they than slipped sleep
the lean lithe deer
the fleet flown deer.

Four fleet does at a gold valley
the famished arrow sang before.

20

Bow at belt went my love riding riding the mountain down
into the silver dawn.

four lean hounds crouched low and smiling
the sheer peaks ran before.

Paler be they than daunting death
the sleek slim deer
the tall tense deer.

Four tall stags at a green mountain the lucky hunter sang before.

30

All in green went my love riding
on a great horse of gold
into the silver dawn.

four lean hounds crouched low and smiling
my heart fell dead before.

ALWAYS BEFORE YOUR VOICE MY SOUL

ALWAYS before your voice my soul half-beautiful and wholly droll is as some smooth and awkward foal, whereof young moons begin
the newness of his skin,

so of my stupid sincere youth the exquisite failure uncouth discovers a trembling and smooth Unstrength, against the strong silences of your song;

10 or as a single lamb whose sheen of full unshorned fleece is mean beside its lovelier friends, between your thoughts more white than wool

 My thought is sorrowful:

but my heart smote in trembling thirds of anguish quivers to your words,
 As to a flight of thirty birds shakes with a thickening fright
 the sudden fooled light.

20

it is the autumn of a year:
 When through the thin air stooped with fear, across the harvest whitely peer empty of surprise
 death's faultless eyes

(whose hand my folded soul shall know while on faint hills do frailly go
 The peaceful terrors of the snow, and before your dead face which sleeps, a dream shall pass)

30

and these my days their sounds and flowers
 Fall in a pride of petaled hours, like flowers at the feet of mowers whose bodies strong with love through meadows hugely move.

yet what am i that such and such mysteries very simply touch me, whose heart-wholeness overmuch Expects of your hair pale,
 a terror musical?

40 while in an earthless hour my fond soul seriously yearns beyond this fern of sunset frond on frond opening in a rare

 Slowness of gloried air . . .

The flute of morning stilled in noon—noon the implacable bassoon—
 now Twilight seeks the thrill of moon, washed with a wild and thin despair of violin

1899 -- (Harold) Hart Crane -- 1932

THE SHORT LIFE and the poetry of Hart Crane have already provided the subject of two book-length studies and numerous critical essays. His is primarily the story of a failure of discipline which prevented an intrinsically great talent from realizing itself. Born in a town near Cleveland, Ohio, Crane early rebelled against his father, a prosperous candy manufacturer. For some years he tried to adjust himself to the needs of business, but failed to do so, and alternated between Bohemian life in New York and business life in Ohio. In Greenwich Village he made the acquaintance of many young writers and editors, secured publication of his early (rather poor) romantic poems in Bruno's Bohemian and The Pagan (he was an associate editor of the latter for a short while). He began reading widely and without particular order in the metaphysicals, Rimbaud, Eliot, such Americans as Whitman and Melville, and Sherwood Anderson. In 1925, Crane wrote to Otto Kahn outlining the theme of his major poem, The Bridge, and asking for financial aid, which he received. White Buildings was published in 1926. He traveled restlessly in England and France in 1928 and 1929; in this latter year he finally finished The Bridge. On April 26, 1932, returning from Mexico where he had gone on a Guggenheim fellowship, he committed suicide by jumping from the steamship into the Gulf of Mexico.

That life, described brilliantly in Philip Horton's Hart Crane, The Life of an American Poet (1937), is in itself worthy of examination in the light of what he tried to do in his poetry. White Buildings contains the six "Voyages," remarkable and obscure evocations in the manner of Rimbaud, and other short poems. The major effort, the "myth of America," was The Bridge. As Crane planned the poem, the Brooklyn Bridge was to be its central symbol, representing both the mechanical ingenuity of modern man and (through its design) the bridge to infinity. The poem was to touch simultaneously upon America's present and past, to cover its industrial strength, its machinery, its fertile plains. What was finally published as The Bridge contains some of the most remarkable verse in modern American literature, but the major design, as Crane explained it to Otto Kahn, is inadequately executed, and there are sections of the poem which have little or no relevance to the plan. The "Cape Hatteras" section attempts to incorporate the spirit and idiom of modern machinery as poetic subject; the effect is sometimes good, often merely absurd. While The Bridge must be marked finally as a conspicuous failure, it is important as one of a few serious attempts by modern American poets to pursue and complete an ambitious plan for the integration of American life and culture in one definite design. That the poem remains interesting is due to Crane's great talent; that it did not fulfill its original purpose is due to his lack of discipline, his very spotty knowledge of the subject, and the erratic character of its composition.

Crane's poems (White Buildings, 1926, and The Bridge, 1930) have been brought together in The Collected Poems of Hart Crane, edited and introduced by Waldo Frank (1933); this collection contains a number of poems not published in the two volumes. His critical point of view is to be found in essays published as appendices in The Collected Poems and in Philip Horton's Hart Crane, The Life of an American Poet (1937); the latter is also the best biography of Hart Crane available. Brom Weber's Hart Crane: A Biographical and Critical Study (1948) contains new biographical material, as well as an explication of The Bridge. For other criticism, see R. P. Blackmur, The Double Agent (1935); Allen Tate, Reactionary Essays on Poetry and Ideas (1936); Yvor Winters, In Defense of Reason (1947); Horace Gregory and Marya Zaturenska, A History of American Poetry, 1900-1940 (1946); Babette Deutsch, This Modern Poetry (1935); H. H. Waggoner, "Hart Crane and the Broken Parabola," University of Kansas City Review, Summer, 1945. For other titles, see Millett, Contemporary American Authors (1940) and Leary, Articles on American Literature Appearing in Current Periodicals, 1920-1945 (1947).

a headlight rushing with the sound—can you imagine—while an express makes time like
SCIENCE—COMMERCE and the HOLY GHOST
RADIO ROARS IN EVERY HOME WE HAVE THE

WALLSTREET AND VIRGIN BIRTH WITHOUT STONES

WIRES OR EVEN RUNNING brooks connecting cars and no more sermons windows flashing roar
Breathtaking—as you like it. . . ch?

So the 20th Century—so whizzed the Limited—roared by and left three men, still hungry on the tracks, plod-dingly
watching the tail lights wizen and converge, slipping gimleted and neatly out of sight.

The last bear, shot drinking in the Dakotas,
Loped under wires that span the mountain
stream.

Keen instruments, strung to a vast precision
Bind town to town and dream to ticking dream.
But some men take their liquor slow—and count

—Though they'll confess no rosary nor clue—
The river's minute by the far brook's year. 30
Under a world of whistles, wires and steam
Caboose-like they go ruminating through
Ohio, Indiana—blind baggage—
To Cheyenne tagging . . . Maybe Kalamazoo.

Time's rendings, time's blendings they construe

As final reckonings of fire and snow;
Strange bird-wit, like the elemental gist

Of unvalled winds they offer, singing low
My Old Kentucky Home and Casey Jones,
Some Sunny Day. I heard a road-gang chanting so. 40

And afterwards, who had a colt's eyes—one
 said,

"Jesus! Oh I remember watermelon days!"
 And sped

High in a cloud of merriment, recalled
 "—And when my Aunt Sally Simpson smiled," he drawled—

"It was almost Louisiana, long ago."

"There's no place like Booneville though, Buddy,"

One said, exciting a last burr from his vest,
 "—For early troutng." Then peering in the can,

"—But I kept on the tracks." Possessed, resigned,

Hetrod the fire down pensively and grinned, 50
 Spreading dry shingles of a beard. . .

Behind

My father's cannery works I used to see
 Rail-squatters ranged in nomad raillery,
 The ancient men—wifeless or runaway
 Hobo-trekkers that forever search

An empire wilderness of freight and rails.
 Each seemed a child, like me, on a loose perch,

Holding to childhood like some termless
 play.

John, Jake or Charley, hopping the slow freight 60

—Memphis to Tallahassee—riding the rods,
 Blind fists of nothing, humpty-dumpty clods.

Yet they touch something like a key perhaps.
 From pole to pole across the hills, the states

—They know a body under the wide rain;
 Youngsters with eyes like fjords, old repro-bates

With racetrack jargon,—dotting immensity
 They lurk across her, knowing her yonder
 breast

Snow-silvered, sumac-stained or smoky blue—
 Is past the valley-sleepers, south or west. 70

—As I have trod the rumorous midnights,
 too

And past the circuit of the lamp's thin flame
 (O Nights that brought me to her body bare!)

Have dreamed beyond the print that bound her name.

Trains sounding the long blizzards out—I heard

Wail into distances I knew were hers.

Paposes crying on the wind's long mane Screamed redskin dynasties that fled the brain,

—Dead echoes! But I knew her body there,
 Time like a serpent down her shoulder,
 dark, 80

And space, an eaglet's wing, laid on her hair.

Under the Ozarks, domed by Iron Mountain,
 The old gods of the rain lie wrapped in pools
 Where eyeless fish curvet a sunken fountain
 And re-descend with corn from querulous crows.

Such pilferings make up their timeless eatage,
 Propitiate them for their timber torn

By iron, iron—always the iron dealt cleavage!
 They doze now, below axe and powder horn.

And Pullman breakfasters glide glistening steel 90

From tunnel into field—iron strides the dew—
 Straddles the hill, a dance of wheel on wheel.
 You have a half-hour's wait at Siskiyou,
 Or stay the night and take the next train
 through.

Southward, near Cairo passing, you can see
 The Ohio merging,—borne down Tennessee;
 And if it's summer and the sun's in dusk
 Maybe the breeze will lift the River's musk
 —As though the waters breathed that you might know

Memphis Johnny, Steamboat Bill, Missouri
Joe. 100

Oh, lean from the window, if the train slows
 down,

As though you touched hands with some ancient clown,

—A little while gaze absently below
 And hum Deep River with them while they go.

Yes, turn again and sniff once more—look see,

O Sheriff, Brakeman and Authority—

Hitch up your pants and crunch another quid,

For you, too, feed the River timelessly.
And few evade full measure of their fate;
Always they smile out eerily what they seem. 110

I could believe he joked at heaven's gate—
Dan Midland—jolted from the cold brake-beam.

Down, down—born pioneers in time's
despite,
Grimed tributaries to an ancient flow—
They win no frontier by their wayward plight,
But drift in stillness, as from Jordan's brow.

You will not hear it as the sea; even stone
Is not more hushed by gravity . . . But slow,
As loth to take more tribute—sliding prone
Like one whose eyes were buried long ago.

The River, spreading, flows—and spends your dream. 121
What are you, lost within this tideless spell?
You are your father's father, and the stream—
A liquid theme that floating niggers swell.

Damp tonnage and alluvial march of days—
Nights turbid, vascular with silted shale
And roots surrendered down of moraine clays:
The Mississippi drinks the farthest dale.

O quarrying passion, undertowed sunlight!
The basalt surface drags a jungle grace 130
Ochreous and lynx-barred in lengthening might;
Patience! and you shall reach the biding place!

Over De Soto's bones the freighted floors
Throb past the City storied of three thrones.
Down two more turns the Mississippi pours
(Anon tall ironsides up from salt lagoons)

And flows within itself, heaps itself free.
All fades but one thin skyline 'round . . .
Ahead
No embrace opens but the stinging sea;
The River lifts itself from its long bed, 140

Poised wholly on its dream, a mustard glow
Tortured with history, its one will—flow!
—The Passion spreads in wide tongues,
choked and slow,
Meeting the Gulf, hosannas silently below. 1930

1892 -- Archibald MacLeish --

BORN IN ILLINOIS, MacLeish was educated in Glencoe, Illinois, at Hotchkiss School in Connecticut, and at Yale. At Yale he joined such Eli celebrities as Thornton Wilder and Stephen Vincent Benét, edited and contributed to the Yale Literary Magazine, and began writing poetry. He entered the Harvard Law School in 1915 and in 1917 went to France with a hospital unit. In this same year the Yale University Press issued a volume of his poems. Upon his return from the wars, he practiced law in Boston for three years; then, in an effort to find more time for his writing, he sailed with his family to Paris. In 1928 he returned to America and continued writing; he traveled in 1929 to Mexico, at work on Conquistador. He took up journalism in the 1930's, working for Fortune magazine and traveling in America, Europe, and Japan, as a journalist. During the Spanish Civil War, he took up the Loyalist cause, and collaborated with Ernest Hemingway and two others on the film The Spanish Earth. He joined the government service in 1939 as Librarian of Congress, and later in other government posts.

MacLeish is a weather vane for contemporary American poetry. During the 1920's, and especially during the Paris years, he wrote chiefly in imitation of Eliot and of the metaphysicals, in whom Eliot was also interested. His poetry of The Pot of Earth (1925), The Hamlet of A. MacLeish (1928), and other volumes of this decade reflects a preoccupation with the wasteland theme, the manner, the style, the pose, of Eliot's followers. He tried his hand at all manners and all styles, and showed great versatility and a remarkable ability to skim the surface from the talent of his mentors. In the 1930's, he turned to free verse commentary, sometimes satirical, sometimes frankly leftist. Conquistador (1932), for which he won the Pulitzer prize, is a long, elaborate, and often effective account of the conquest of Mexico by Cortez. Land of the Free (1938) is a commentary upon many photographs of the American scene, identifying the social inequalities in the country with the broad irony characteristic of leftist accounts. His verse plays of this decade are attempts to underscore the Nazi-Fascist menace by pointing up the disastrous consequences of our failure to prepare and pointing to the devastation our modern weapons of war might cause. Two of these plays (The Fall of the City, 1937, and Air Raid, 1938) make use of radio techniques, somewhat after the manner of W. H. Auden, but without Auden's subtlety.

In 1940 MacLeish published an essay called "The Irresponsibles," in which he addressed himself to a review of the 1920's and the 1930's, condemning the intellectuals in America and elsewhere for having deliberately closed their eyes to the advance of evil in the world, for their failure of responsibility in a developing world crisis. This was the first of a series of essays and addresses to which MacLeish has since devoted himself. Except for a slender volume of poems (Act Five and Other Poems, 1948) he has confined his writing to occasional public addresses and articles.

MacLeish's poetry at its best is a convenient means of studying the currents and cross-currents of modern American poetry. It is facile, versatile, almost always derivative. His tours de force are clever and have a popular appeal which sends them into and keeps them in the anthologies.

MacLeish's volumes of poetry include Tower of Ivory (1917); The Happy Marriage and Other Poems (1924); The Pot of Earth (1925); Streets in the Moon (1926); The Hamlet of A. MacLeish (1928); Einstein (1929); New Found Land (1930); Conquistador (1932); Frescoes for Mr. Rockefeller's City (1933); Public Speech (1936); Land of the Free (1938); Act Five and Other Poems (1948). A collection, Poems, 1924-1933, was published in 1933. His plays are Nobodaddy (1926); Panic (1935); The Fall of the City (1937); Air Raid (1938). A Time to Speak (1941) is a selection from his prose. It includes "The Irresponsibles," which also appeared in separate publication, in 1940. ## YOU, ANDREW MARVELL

AND here face down beneath the sun
And here upon earth's noonward height
To feel the always coming on
The always rising of the night

To feel creep up the curving east
The earth chill of dusk and slow
Upon those under lands the vast
And everclimbing shadow grow

And strange at Ecbatan the trees
Take leaf by leaf the evening strange 10
The flooding dark about their knees
The mountains over Persia change

And now at Kermanshah the gate
Dark empty and the withered grass
And through the twilight now the late
Few travellers in the westward pass

And Baghdad darken and the bridge
Across the silent river gone
And through Arabia the edge
Of evening widen and steal on 20

And deepen on Palmyra's street
The wheel rut in the ruined stone
And Lebanon fade out and Crete
High through the clouds and overblown

And over Sicily the air
Still flashing with the landward gulls
And loom and slowly disappear
The sails above the shadowy hulls

And Spain go under and the shore
Of Africa the gilded sand 30
And evening vanish and no more
The low pale light across that land

Nor now the long light on the sea

And here face downward in the sun
To feel how swift, how secretly
The shadow of the night comes on. . . . 1930

MEMORIAL RAIN

AMBASSADOR PUSER the ambassador
Reminds himself in French, felicitous tongue,
What these (young men no longer) lie here for
In rows that once, and somewhere else, were young—

All night in Brussels the wind had tugged
at my door:

I had heard the wind at my door and the trees strung

Taut, and to me who had never been before
In that country it was a strange wind blowing

Steadily, stiffening the walls, the floor,
The roof of my room. I had not slept for knowing 10

He too, dead, was a stranger in that land
And felt beneath the earth in the wind's flowing

A tightening of roots and would not understand,

Remembering lake winds in Illinois,
That strange wind. I had felt his bones in the sand

Listening.

—Reflects that these enjoy

Their country's gratitude, that deep repose,
That peace no pain can break, no hurt destroy,
That rest, that sleep— 20

At Ghent the wind rose.

There was a smell of rain and a heavy drag
Of wind in the hedges but not as the wind
blows

Over fresh water when the waves lag

Foaming and the willows huddle and it will rain:
I felt him waiting.

—Indicates the flag

Which (may he say) enisles in Flanders' plain
This little field these happy, happy dead
Have made America— 30

In the ripe grain
The wind coiled glistening, darted, fled,
Dragging its heavy body: at Waereghem
The wind coiled in the grass above his head:
Waiting—listening—

—Dedicates to them

This earth their bones have hallowed, this last gift
A grateful country—

Under the dry grass stem
The words are blurred, are thickened, the words sift 40
Confused by the rasp of the wind, by the thin grating
Of ants under the grass, the minute shift
And tumble of dusty sand separating
From dusty sand. The roots of the grass strain,
Tighten, the earth is rigid, waits—he is waiting—

And suddenly, and all at once, the rain!

The people scatter, they run into houses,
the wind
Is trampled under the rain, shakes free, is again
Trampled. The rain gathers, running in thinned
Spurts of water that ravel in the dry sand 50
Seeping in the sand under the grass roots, seeping

Between cracked boards to the bones of a clenched hand:
The earth relaxes, loosens; he is sleeping,
He rests, he is quiet, he sleeps in a strange land.

1892 -- Edna St. Vincent Millay -- 1950

MISS MILLAY was born in Rockland, Maine, and received her early education in Camden. As a schoolgirl she wrote verses, some of which were printed in magazines. When she was nineteen her "Renascence" was published. After her schooldays she continued the study of literature and music, was for a time a student at Barnard College, and then entered Vassar, from which she was graduated in 1917. In college she took part in dramatic performances, in her senior year playing the leading role in The Princess Marries the Page, a verse drama of her own composition. For several years she was associated with the Greenwich Village and Provincetown Players as playwright and actress. In 1923 she won the Pulitzer prize for poetry and married Eugene Jan Boissevain. She died October 19, 1950.

Miss Millay's first book, Renascence and Other Poems (1917), was followed by numerous volumes, the most widely known of which are Second April (1921), The Ballad of the Harp-Weaver (1922), Fatal Interview (1931), Wine from These Grapes (1934), and Huntsman, What Quarry? (1939). Among her short plays are Two Slatterns and a King (1921), and The Lamp and the Bell (1921). The King's Henchman (1927), a poetic drama, was written as an opera for which Deems Taylor, an American musician, composed the music.

Miss Millay's verse is found in Renascence (1917); A Few Figs from Thistles (1920); Second April (1921); The Ballad of the Harp-Weaver (1922); The Harp-Weaver and Other Poems (1923); Distressing Dialogues (1924); The Buck in the Snow and Other Poems (1928); Fatal Interview (1931); Wine from These Grapes (1934); Conversation at Midnight (1937); and Huntsman, What Quarry? (1939). Collections of her poetry are The Collected Sonnets of Edna St. Vincent Millay (1941) and The Collected Lyrics of Edna St. Vincent Millay (1943). Her plays are: Aria da Capo (1921); The Lamp and the Bell (1921); Two Slatterns and a King (1921); The King's Henchman (1927); The Princess Marries the Page (1932). Her letters have been collected in The Letters of Edna St. Vincent Millay, edited by Alan Ross Macdougall (1952). Biographical accounts: J. Beatty, "'Best Sellers' in Verse: the Story of Edna St. Vincent Millay," American Magazine, Jan., 1932; E. Breuer, "Edna St. Vincent Millay," Pictorial Review, Nov., 1931. For criticism, see R. ## GOD'S WORLD

O WORLD, I cannot hold thee close enough!
 Thy winds, thy wide grey skies!
 Thy mists, that roll and rise!
 Thy woods, this autumn day, that ache and sag
 And all but cry with colour! That gaunt crag
 To crush! To lift the lean of that black bluff!
 World, World, I cannot get thee close enough!

Long have I known a glory in it all,
 But never knew I this;
 Here such a passion is 10
 As stretcheth me apart,—Lord I do fear Thou'st made the world too beautiful this year;
 My soul is all but out of me,—let fall
 No burning leaf; prithee, let no bird call.
 1913

JUSTICE DENIED IN MASSACHUSETTS

This poem was suggested by the case of Saccho and Vanzetti, who after repeated and prolonged trials were finally convicted of murder. On the night of their execution Miss Millay joined a peaceful parade in protest.

LET us abandon then our gardens and go home
 And sit in the sitting-room.
 Shall the larkspur blossom or the corn grow
 under this cloud?
 Sour to the fruitful seed
 Is the cold earth under this cloud,
 Fostering quack and weed, we have marched upon but cannot conquer;
 We have bent the blades of our hoes against the stalks of them.

Let us go home, and sit in the sitting-room.
 Not in our day
 Shall the cloud go over and the sun rise as before, 10
 Beneficent upon us
 Out of the glittering bay,
 And the warm winds be blown inward from the sea
 Moving the blades of corn

With a peaceful sound.
 Forlorn, forlorn,
 Stands the blue hay-rack by the empty
 mow.
 And the petals drop to the ground,
 Leaving the tree unfruited.
 The sun that warmed our stooping backs and withered the weed uprooted— 20
 We shall not feel it again.
 We shall die in darkness, and be buried in the rain.
 What from the splendid dead
 We have inherited—
 Furrows sweet to the grain, and the weed subdued—
 See now the slug and the mildew plunder.
 Evil does overwhelm
 The larkspur and the corn;
 We have seen them go under.

Let us sit here, sit still, 30
 Here in the sitting-room until we die;
 At the step of Death on the walk, rise and
 go;
 Leaving to our children's children this beautiful doorway,
 And this elm,
 And blighted earth to till
 With a broken hoe.

SONNET TO GATH

COUNTRY of hunchbacks!—where the strong,
 straight spine,
 Jeered at by crooked children, makes his way Through by-streets at the kindest hour of
 day,
 Till he deplore his stature, and incline
 To measure manhood with a gibbous line;
 Till out of loneliness, being flawed with
 clay,
 He stoop into his neighbor's house and say,
 "Your roof is low for me—the fault is mine."
 Dust in an urn long since, dispersed and dead
 Is great Apollo; and the happier he; 10
 Since who amongst you all would lift a head
 At a god's radiance on the mean door-tree,
 Saving to run and hide your dates and bread,
 And cluck your children in about your knee.

1885 ~ Elinor Hoyt Wylie ~ 1928

ELINOR HOYT was born in Rosemont, Pennsylvania, the daughter of Henry Martyn and Anne Hoyt. She attended private schools in Bryn Mawr and in Washington, where her father held a government post. Her education was continued through foreign travel. An unhappy marital venture and ennui over the activities of capital society induced her to leave Washington. In 1919 she made her home in New York, where in 1925 she married the poet William Rose Benét. For a time she was associate editor of Vanity Fair and at the time of her death was a contributing editor on the staff of The New Republic. She published four novels and four volumes of poetry in the short period of eight years, which, in view of her careful workmanship, is an almost unparalleled achievement.

Elinor Wylie's poetry was not received with the wide acclaim that greeted some of her contemporaries. Her work does not have inherent popular appeal but has been praised highly by discriminating readers. Some critics have suggested comparison with Emily Dickinson. She belonged to no school, took part in no movement, was apparently unmindful of contemporary currents and popular taste, but like Emily Dickinson, perfected and practiced her art in a way that was satisfying to her own ideals. Her work is carefully wrought and trimmed, abounds in compact phrasing, with an occasional telling epigram, and all in all is characterized by a beauty which is crystalline and often colorful.

Mrs. Wylie's poetry appeared in Nets to Catch the Wind (1921); Black Armour (1923); Trivial Breath (1928); Angels and Earthly Creatures (1929). These, together with hitherto uncollected poems, are available in Collected Poems of Elinor Wylie, foreword by W. R. Benét (1932). Her novels, Jennifer Lorn, The Venetian Glass Nephew, The Orphan Angel, and Mr. Hodge and Mr. Hazard, together with some fugitive prose, were issued in Collected Prose of Elinor Wylie, prefaces by C. Van Doren, C. Van Vechten, S. V. Benét, I. Patterson, and W. R. Benét (1933). For criticism consult W. R. Benét, The Prose and Poetry of Elinor Wylie (1934); J. B. Cabell, One of Us (1930); E. S. THE LION AND THE LAMB

I SAW a Tiger's golden flank,
 I saw what food he ate,
 By a desert spring he drank;
 The Tiger's name was Hate.

Then I saw a placid Lamb
 Lying fast asleep;
 Like a river from its dam
 Flashed the Tiger's leap.

I saw a Lion tawny-red,
 Terrible and brave; 10
 The Tiger's leap overhead
 Broke like a wave.

In sand below or sun above
 He faded like a flame.
 The Lamb said, "I am Love;
 Lion, tell your name."

The Lion's voice thundering
 Shook his vaulted breast,
 "I am Love. By this spring,
 Brother, let us rest." 20
 1921

SUNSET ON THE SPIRE

ALL that I dream
 By day or night
 Lives in that stream
 Of lovely light.
 Here is the earth,
 And there is the spire;
 This is my hearth,
 And that is my fire.
 From the sun's dome
 I am shouted proof 10
 That this is my home,
 And that is my roof.

Here is my food,
 And here is my drink,
 And I am wooed
 From the moon's brink.
 And the days go over,
 And the nights end;
 Here is my lover,
 Here is my friend. 20
 All that I

Could ever ask
 Wears that sky
 Like a thin gold mask. 1921

HEROICS

THOUGH here and there a man is left
 Whose iron thread eludes the shears,
 The martyr with his bosom cleft
 Is dead these seven heavy years.

Does he survive whose tongue was slit,
 To slake some envy of a king's?
 Sportive silver cried from it
 Before the savage cut the strings.

The rack has crumpled up the limb
 Stretched immediate to fly; 10
 Never ask the end of him
 Stubborn to outstare the sky.

Assuming an heroic mask,
 He stands a tall derisive tree,
 While servile to the speckled task
 We move devoted hand and knee.

It is no virtue, but a fault
 Thus to breathe ignoble air,
 Suffering unclean assault
 And insult dubious to bear. 20
 1922

KING HONOR'S ELDEST SON

His father's steel, piercing the wholesome fruit
 Of his mother's flesh, wrought acidly to mar
 Its own Damascus, staining worse than war
 A purity intense and absolute;

While her clean stock put forth a poisoned shoot,
 In likeness of a twisted scimitar,
 Sleek as a lovelock, ugly as a scar,
 Wrong as the firstborn of a mandrake root.

There was a waning moon upon his brow,
 A fallen star upon his pointed chin; 10
 He mingled Ariel with Caliban;
 But such a blossom upon such a bough
 Convinced his poor progenitors of sin
 In having made a something more than man. 20

THE EAGLE AND THE MOLE

AVOID the reeking herd,
Shun the polluted flock,
Live like that stoic bird,
The eagle of the rock.

The huddled warmth of crowds
Begets and fosters hate;
He keeps, above the clouds,
His cliff inviolate.

When flocks are folded warm
And herds to shelter run,      10
He sails above the storm,
He stares into the sun.

If in the eagle's track
Your sinews cannot leap,
Avoid the lathered pack,
Turn from the steaming sheep.

If you would keep your soul
From spotted sight or sound,
Live like the velvet mole;
Go burrow underground.      20

And there hold intercourse
With roots of trees and stones,
With rivers at their source
And disembodied bones.

1921

UNFINISHED PORTRAIT

My love, you know that I have never used
That fluency of colour smooth and rich
Could cage you in enamel for the niche Whose heart-shape holds you; I have been accused

Of gold and silver trickery, infused
With blood of meteors, and moonstones which
Are cold as eyeballs in a flooded ditch;
In no such goblin smithy are you bruised.

I do not glaze a lantern like a shell
Inset with stars, nor make you visible      10
Through jewelled arabesques which adhere to clothe

The outline of your soul; I am content
To leave you an uncaptured element;
Water, or light, or air that's stained by both.
1923

NAMELESS SONG

My heart is cold and weather-worn,
A musical and hollow shell:
The winds have blown it like a horn,
The waves have rung it like a bell.      20

The waves have whirled it round and round,
The winds have worn it thin and fine:
It is alive with a singing sound:
Whose Voice is that? It is not mine.

1887 -- Robinson Jeffers --

JEFFERS, a native of western Pennsylvania, has spent his working years on the Pacific coast. His father was a Presbyterian clergyman and professor of theology, his mother a woman of high character, fine education, and a lover of music. As a boy, Jeffers had the advantage of extensive European travel as well as early training in European schools. While he was a student at Occidental College in California, from which he was graduated in 1905, he contributed verse to campus publications, and developed a passion for poetry which became a determining factor in his life. After completing his course, he pursued at various times graduate study in literature, medicine, and forestry. By 1911 he was convinced that poetry was his primary interest, and withdrew to Hermosa Beach where he spent a year in writing. Flagons and Apples, his first volume, appeared in 1912. Since 1914 he has made his home on the California coast near Carmel-by-the-Sea. He does his writing in the tiny top room of Hawk's Tower which he erected close to his home. He has published numerous volumes, among them being Tamar and Other Poems (1924), Roan Stallion (1925), Cawdor and Other Poems (1928), Thurso's Landing and Other Poems (1932), Give Your Heart to the Hawks (1933), and Solstice and Other Poems (1935).

The early work of Jeffers attracted scarcely any attention, and it was not until 1924 when Tamar appeared that he began to be recognized. Behind the framework of gray landscape, stark tragedies, neurotic characters obsessed by sex and an abounding love of nature, a definite purpose is steadily unfolding, the search for fundamental and ultimate reality. He does not tell tragic stories merely for their own sakes, but as a way of seeking, as it were, the primal irreducible force in the universe. Having revolted early from the Calvinistic theology of his forebears, he set out on an independent quest to find, if possible, a rational theory more satisfying than their explanations. Upon the results of his scientific study, and upon his observations of the Carmel landscape, of which he has grown to be an indigenous poet, he trained the sharp focus of his imagination to see what light there might be on the eternal problems of living.

But the light he sought turned to darkness. Science led him to see man as merely another phenomenon of nature at one with the pounding surf, the stars, and the Carmel landscape, essentially ignorant and helpless as far as his questing is concerned, still held in the clutches of this blind force. He found the world of the twenties a hopeless world. This explains, in a measure at least, his primitivistic treatment of man in his most elemental relations, far removed from the culture and sophistication of the city and the fatalistic mysticism with which he accepts his unhappy fate.

On the other hand, certain very definite characteristics of a more positive nature tend to offset the negative quality of his gloom, hopelessness, and depression. These equalities are found in Jeffers the poet rather than in Jeffers the thinker. Chief of these are his penetrating imagination, which finds poetry in even the most tragic phases of life, and the remarkably original style in which he writes, a style which is personal and unique, and does not seem to fit into any of the accepted categories. On the surface it seems to be formless and uncontrolled, but closer study shows in the apparent formlessness a definite plan in the use of stresses and syllabic quantity which reveals new rhythmic possibilities of the language. He startles and refreshes by his originality of treatment and expression.

Jeffers has published many volumes; of the more important are Tamar and Other Poems (1924); Roan Stallion, Tamar and Other Poems (1925); The Women at Point Sur (1927); Poems (1928); Cawdor and Other Poems (1928); Dear Judas and Other Poems (1929); Descent to the Dead (1931);

Thurso's Landing and Other Poems (1932); Give Your Heart to the Hawks and Other Poems (1933); Solstice and Other Poems (1935). The Selected Poetry of Robinson Jeffers was published in 1938. The most extensive critical and biographical study of Jeffers is L. C. Powell, Robinson Jeffers: the Man and His Work (1934). There is a briefer account in L. Adamic, Robinson Jeffers: a Portrait (1929). Helpful critical discussions and estimates are J. G. Fletcher, "The Dilemma of Robinson Jeffers," Poetry, March, 1934; H. Hatcher, "The Torches of Violence," English Journal, Feb., 1934; G. Sterling, Robinson Jeffers: the Man and the Artist (1926); A. Kreymborg, Our Singing Strength (1929); H. L. ## SCIENCE

MAN, introverted man, having crossed
 In passage and but a little with the nature of things this latter century
 Has begot giants; but being taken up
 Like a maniac with self-love and inward conflicts cannot manage his hybrids.
 Being used to deal with edgeless dreams,
 Now he's bred knives on nature turns them also inward: they have thirsty points though.
 His mind forebodes his own destruction;
 Actaeon who saw the goddess naked among leaves and his hounds tore him.
 A little knowledge, a pebble from the shingle,
 A drop from the oceans: who would have dreamed this infinitely little too much?

TO A YOUNG ARTIST

It is good for strength not to be merciful
 To its own weakness, good for the deep urn to run over, good to explore
 The peaks and the deeps, who can endure it,
 Good to be hurt, who can be healed afterward: but you that have whetted consciousness
 Too bitter an edge, too keenly daring,
 So that the color of a leaf can make you tremble, and your own thoughts like harriers
 Tear the live mind: were your bones mountains,
 Your blood rivers to endure it? and all that labor of discipline labors to death.
 Delight is exquisite, pain is more present;
 You have sold the armor, you have bought shining with burning, one should be stronger than strength

To fight baresark in the stabbing field
 In the rage of the stars: I tell you unconsciousness is the treasure, the tower, the fortress;
 Referred to that one may live anything;
 The temple and the tower: poor dancer on the flints and shards in the temple porches, turn home.

HURT HAWKS

I

THE broken pillar of the wing jags from the clotted shoulder,
 The wing trails like a banner in defeat,
 No more to use the sky forever but live with famine
 And pain a few days: cat nor coyote
 Will shorten the week of waiting for death, there is game without talons.
 He stands under the oak-bush and waits
 The lame feet of salvation; at night he remembers freedom
 And flies in a dream, the dawns ruin it.
 He is strong and pain is worse to the strong, incapacity is worse.
 The curs of the day come and torment him 10
 At distance, no one but death the redeemer will humble that head,
 The intrepid readiness, the terrible eyes.
 The wild God of the world is sometimes merciful to those
 That ask mercy, not often to the arrogant,
 You do not know him, you communal people, or you have forgotten him;
 Intemperate and savage, the hawk remembers him;
 Beautiful and wild, the hawks, and men that are dying, remember him.

II

I'd sooner, except the penalties, kill a man than a hawk; but the great redtail
 Had nothing left but unable misery
 From the bone too shattered for mending, the wing that trailed under his talons when he moved.
 We had fed him six weeks, I gave him freedom, 21
 He wandered over the foreland hill and returned in the evening, asking for death,
 Not like a beggar, still eyed with the old
 Implacable arrogance. I gave him the lead gift in the twilight. What fell was relaxed, Owl-downy, soft feminine feathers; but what Soared: the fierce rush: the night-herons by the flooded river cried fear at its rising
 Before it was quite unsheathed from reality.

1897 ~ William Faulkner ~ —

WILLIAM FAULKNER was born in Mississippi, and has lived, with a few interruptions, in Oxford, Mississippi, all of his life. His major preoccupation has been with the South of his great-grandfather's time and of his own. His fiction has created a Mississippi county, Yoknapatawpha County, described its history and explained its people. During the first World War Faulkner served with the British Royal Air Force in France and was wounded in an airplane accident. His war experiences are reflected in stories in These 13 (1931), and in the novel Sartoris (1929); his interest in aviation appears in these works, and in the novel Pylon (1935). After the war, he spent some little time in New Orleans, where he met and discussed writing with Sherwood Anderson. From this experience came the mediocre "lost generation" novel, Mosquitoes (1927).

But his major concern has been with Yoknapatawpha County. As Malcolm Cowley has pointed out, nine of his books are devoted to that mythical county and its people, "who also appear in parts of three others and in thirty or more uncollected stories." The range of his treatment in these works is as varied as the subject matter. Sartoris (1929) is a fairly conventional novel; The Unvanquished (1938) is a series of sketches and stories, held together by the Sartoris theme, and concluding on a note of naïve romanticism rare in Faulkner's work; As I Lay Dying (1930) and The Sound and the Fury (1929) (the latter Faulkner considers his best book) work several remarkable changes upon the stream-of-consciousness method; Absalom, Absalom! (1936) is a tortured, complex history of the Sutpen family, as told by Quentin Compson, hero of another Faulkner novel, to his roommate at Harvard; Sanctuary (1931) is a tale of unrelieved violence in which are also found grotesquely humorous passages of great effectiveness.

Faulkner's themes, which become what can almost be called obsessions, have been acutely analyzed by Malcolm Cowley (in his introduction to the Viking Portable Faulkner, 1946) and Robert Penn Warren (in a New Republic essay, 1946). His primary concern is with the South, its tradition, and the decay of that tradition in the years following the Civil War. It is not only that the land has been "deswamped and denuded and derivered in two generations," as Ike McCaslin puts it; it is also the responsibility, the sense of guilt, which the Southerner feels for the decline. To quote Cowley's succinct summary:

The Deep South was settled partly by aristocrats like the Sartoris clan and partly by new men like Colonel Sutpen. Both types of planters were determined to establish a lasting social order on the land they had seized from the Indians (that is, to leave sons behind them). They had the virtue of living single-mindedly by a fixed code; but there was also an inherent guilt in their "design," their way of life; it was slavery that put a curse on the land and brought about the Civil War. After the War was lost, partly as a result of their own mad heroism . . . they tried to restore "the design" by other methods. But they no longer had the strength to achieve more than a partial success . . . [and they had also] to fight a new exploiting class descended from the landless whites of slavery days.

It was convenient for Faulkner to invent a county for his people, to give the history of that county as typical of the Deep South, and to create typical figures to represent the peoples of that South: the Sartorises, who carried the burden of tradition and whose attachment to "the code" accelerated their downfall; the poor whites of As I Lay Dying; the Snopeses, who represented the rising class of commercial opportunists of carpet-bagging days and land failures. To these groups Faulkner adds memorable characters who writhe in prolonged, rhetorical debate over the moral issues involved in the South's decline, portraits of idiocy and psychological decay, and crudely brutal and harshly vital characters (like Popeye, of Sanctuary). The collection is astonishing and depressing, but there is no simple view of it. Faulkner has done more than any other writer to convince the reading public of the very complex culture of the South, of the varied and difficult reasons for its difference from Northern culture.

Faulkner's style is often tortured, involved, and needlessly polysyllabic. Usually the involution is an integral and necessary part of the subject; often, however, the lack of discipline shows in his failure to economize, to write cleanly, and without excessive qualification. His experiments (especially with stream of consciousness) are brilliant; his humor, often gargantuan and grotesque, is admirable; his preoccupation with characterization ultimately leads to a complex, rather thick, clarity of outline and depth of portrait. To take a single instance, where Erskine Caldwell (in Trouble in July) is shoddy and sensationalistic, Faulkner (in "Dry September") presents the same situation (a lynching) with a definitive clarity and precision. Faulkner's weaknesses are those of an inadequately disciplined talent, which is great enough to more than survive its occasional abuse and misuse.

Faulkner's novels are Soldier's Pay (1926); Mosquitoes (1927); Sartoris (1929); The Sound and the Fury (1929); As I Lay Dying (1930); Sanctuary (1931); Light in August (1933); Pylon (1935); Absalom, Absalom! (1936); The Unvanquished (1938); The Wild Palms (1939); The Hamlet (1941); Intruder in the Dust (1948). Collections of short stories include Idyll in the Desert (1931); These 13 (1931); Doctor Martino and Other Stories (1934); Go Down, Moses (1942). There are two volumes of poems: The Marble Faun (1924) and A Green Bough (1933). For criticism consult Pelham Edgar, The Art of the Novel from 1700 to the Present Time (1933); Alfred Kazin, On Native Grounds (1942); J. W. ## A ROSE FOR EMILY

I

WHEN Miss Emily Grierson died, our whole town went to her funeral: the men through a sort of respectful affection for a fallen monument, the women mostly out of curiosity to see the inside of her house, which no one save an old manservant—a combined gardener and cook—had seen in at least ten years.

It was a big, squarish frame house that had once been white, decorated with cupolas and spires and scrolled balconies in the heavily lightsome style of the seventies, set on what had once been our most select street. But garages and cotton gins had encroached and obliterated even the august names of that neighborhood; only Miss Emily's house was left, lifting its stubborn and coquettish decay above the cotton wagons and the gasoline pumps—an eyesore among eyesores. And now Miss Emily had gone to join the representatives of those august names where they lay in the cedar-bemused cemetery among the ranked 10 and anonymous graves of Union and Confederate soldiers who fell at the battle of Jefferson.

Alive, Miss Emily had been a tradition, a duty, and a care; a sort of hereditary obligation upon the town, dating from that day in 1894 when Colonel Sartoris, the mayor—he who fathered the edict that no Negro women should appear on the streets without an apron—remitted her taxes, the dispensation dating from the death of her father on into perpetuity. 20 Not that Miss Emily would have accepted charity. Colonel Sartoris invented an involved tale to the effect that Miss Emily's father had loaned money to the town, which the town, as a matter of business, preferred this way of repaying. Only a man of Colonel Sartoris' generation and thought could have invented it, and only a woman could have believed it.

When the next generation, with its more modern ideas, became mayors and aldermen, 30 this arrangement created some little dissatisfaction. On the first of the year they mailed her a tax notice. February came, and there was no reply. They wrote her a formal letter, asking her to call at the sheriff's office at her convenience. A week later the mayor wrote her himself, offering to call or to send his car for her, and received in reply a note on paper of an archaic shape, in a thin, flowing calligraphy in faded ink, to the effect that she no longer went 40 out at all. The tax notice was also enclosed, without comment.

They called a special meeting of the Board of Aldermen. A deputation waited upon her, knocked at the door through which no visitor had passed since she ceased giving china-painting lessons eight or ten years earlier. They were admitted by the old Negro into a dim hall from which a stairway mounted into still more shadow. It smelled of dust and dis- 50 use—a close, dank smell. The Negro led them into the parlor. It was furnished in heavy, leather-covered furniture. When the Negro opened the blinds of one window, they could see that the leather was cracked; and when they sat down, a faint dust rose sluggishly about their thighs, spinning with slow motes in the single sun-ray. On a tarnished gilt easel before the fireplace stood a crayon portrait of Miss Emily's father.

They rose when she entered—a small, fat woman in black, with a thin gold chain descending to her waist and vanishing into her belt, leaning on an ebony cane with a tarnished gold head. Her skeleton was small and spare; perhaps that was why what would have been merely plumpness in another was obesity in her. She looked bloated, like a body long submerged in motionless water, and of that pallid hue. Her eyes, lost in the fatty ridges of her face, looked like two small pieces of coal pressed into a lump of dough as they moved from one face to another while the visitors stated their errand.

She did not ask them to sit. She just stood in the door and listened quietly until the spokesman came to a stumbling halt. Then they could hear the invisible watch ticking at the end of the gold chain.

Her voice was dry and cold. "I have no taxes in Jefferson. Colonel Sartoris explained it to me. Perhaps one of you can gain access to the city records and satisfy yourselves."

"But we have. We are the city authorities, Miss Emily. Didn't you get a notice from the sheriff, signed by him?"

"I received a paper, yes," Miss Emily said. "Perhaps he considers himself the sheriff . . . I have no taxes in Jefferson."

"But there is nothing on the books to show that, you see. We must go by the—"

"See Colonel Sartoris. I have no taxes in Jefferson."

"But, Miss Emily—"

"See Colonel Sartoris." (Colonel Sartoris had been dead almost ten years.) "I have no taxes in Jefferson. Tobe!" The Negro appeared. "Show these gentlemen out."

II

So she vanquished them, horse and foot, just as she had vanquished their fathers thirty years before about the smell. That was two years after her father's death and a short time after her sweetheart—the one we believed would marry her—had deserted her. After her father's death she went out very little; after her sweetheart went away, people hardly saw her at all. A few of the ladies had the temerity to call, but were not received, and the only sign of life about the place was the Negro man—a young man then—going in and out with a market basket.

"Just as if a man—any man—could keep a kitchen properly," the ladies said; so they were not surprised when the smell developed. It was another link between the gross, teeming world and the high and mighty Griersons.

A neighbor, a woman, complained to the mayor, Judge Stevens, eighty years old.

"But what will you have me do about it, madam?" he said.

"Why, send her word to stop it," the woman said. "Isn't there a law?"

"I'm sure that won't be necessary," Judge Stevens said. "It's probably just a snake or a rat that nigger of hers killed in the yard. I'll speak to him about it."

The next day he received two more complaints, one from a man who came in diffident deprecation. "We really must do something about it, Judge. I'd be the last one in the world to bother Miss Emily, but we've got to do something." That night the Board of Aldermen met—three graybeards and one younger man, a member of the rising generation.

"It's simple enough," he said. "Send her word to have her place cleaned up. Give her a certain time to do it in, and if she don't . . ."

"Dammit, sir," Judge Stevens said, "will you accuse a lady to her face of smelling bad?"

So the next night, after midnight, four men crossed Miss Emily's lawn and slunk about the house like burglars, sniffing along the base of the brickwork and at the cellar openings while one of them performed a regular sowing motion with his hand out of a sack slung from his shoulder. They broke open the cellar door and sprinkled lime there, and in all the outbuildings. As they recrossed the lawn, a window that had been dark was lighted and Miss Emily sat in it, the light behind her, and her upright torso motionless as that of an idol. They crept quietly across the lawn and into the shadow of the locusts that lined the street. After a week or two the smell went away.

That was when people had begun to feel really sorry for her. People in our town, remembering how old lady Wyatt, her great-aunt, had gone completely crazy at last, believed that the Griersons held themselves a little too high for what they really were. None of the young men were quite good enough to Miss Emily and such. We had long thought of them as a tableau; Miss Emily a slender figure in white in the background, her father a spraddled silhouette in the foreground, his back to her and clutching a horsewhip, the two of them framed by the back-flung front door. So when she got to be thirty and was still single, we were not pleased exactly, but vindicated; even with insanity in the family she wouldn't have turned down all of her chances if they had really materialized.

When her father died, it got about that the house was all that was left to her; and in a way, people were glad. At last they could pity Miss Emily. Being left alone, and a pauper, she had become humanized. Now she too would know the old thrill and the old despair of a penny more or less.

The day after his death all the ladies prepared to call at the house and offer condolence and aid, as is our custom. Miss Emily met them at the door, dressed as usual and with no trace of grief on her face. She told them that her father was not dead. She did that for three days, with the ministers calling on her, and the doctors, trying to persuade her to let them dispose of the body. Just as they were about to resort to law and force, she broke down, and they buried her father quickly.

We did not say she was crazy then. We believed she had to do that. We remembered all the young men her father had driven away, and we knew that with nothing left, she would have to cling to that which had robbed her, as people will.

III

She was sick for a long time. When we saw her again, her hair was cut short, making her look like a girl, with a vague resemblance to those angels in colored church windows—sort of tragic and serene.

The town had just let the contracts for paving the sidewalks, and in the summer after her father's death they began the work. The construction company came with niggers and mules and machinery, and a foreman named Homer Barron, a Yankee—a big, dark, ready man, with a big voice and eyes lighter than his face. The little boys would follow in groups to hear him cuss the niggers, and the niggers singing in time to the rise and fall of picks. Pretty soon he knew everybody in town. Whenever you heard a lot of laughing anywhere about the square, Homer Barron would be in the center of the group. Presently we began to see him and Miss Emily on Sunday afternoons driving in the yellow-wheeled buggy and the matched team of bays from the livery stable.

At first we were glad that Miss Emily would have an interest, because the ladies all said, "Of course a Grierson would not think seriously of a Northerner, a day laborer." But there were still others, older people, who said that even grief could not cause a real lady to forget noblesse oblige—without calling it noblesse oblige. They just said, "Poor Emily. Her kinsfolk should come to her." She had some kin in Alabama; but years ago her father had fallen out with them over the estate of old lady Wyatt, the crazy woman, and there was no communication between the two families. They had not even been represented at the funeral.

And as soon as the old people said, "Poor Emily," the whispering began. "Do you suppose it's really so?" they said to one another. "Of course it is. What else could . . ." This behind their hands; rustling of craned silk and satin behind jalousies closed upon the sun of Sunday afternoon as the thin, swift clop-clop-clop of the matched team passed: "Poor Emily."

She carried her head high enough—even when we believed that she was fallen. It was as if she demanded more than ever the recognition of her dignity as the last Grierson; as if it had wanted that touch of earthiness to reaffirm her imperviousness. Like when she bought the rat poison, the arsenic. That was over a year after they had begun to say "Poor Emily," and while the two female cousins were visiting her.

"I want some poison," she said to the druggist. She was over thirty then, still a slight woman, though thinner than usual, with cold, haughty black eyes in a face the flesh of which was strained across the temples and about the eye-sockets as you imagine a lighthousekeeper's face ought to look. "I want some poison," she said.

"Yes, Miss Emily. What kind? For rats and such? I'd recom—"

"I want the best you have. I don't care what kind."

The druggist named several. "They'll kill anything up to an elephant. But what you want is—"

"Arsenic," Miss Emily said. "Is that a good one?"

"Is . . . arsenic? Yes, ma'am. But what you want—"

"I want arsenic."

The druggist looked down at her. She looked back at him, erect, her face like a strained flag. "Why, of course," the druggist said. "If that's what you want. But the law requires you to tell what you are going to use it for."

Miss Emily just stared at him, her head tilted back in order to look him eye for eye, until he looked away and went and got the arsenic and wrapped it up. The Negro delivery boy brought her the package; the druggist didn't come back. When she opened the package at home there was written on the box, under the skull and bones: "For rats."

IV

So the next day we all said, "She will kill herself"; and we said it would be the best thing. When she had first begun to be seen with Homer Barron, we had said, "She will marry him." Then we said, "She will persuade him yet," because Homer himself had remarked—he liked men, and it was known that he drank with the younger men in the Elk's Club—that he was not a marrying man. Later we said, "Poor Emily" behind the jalousies as they passed on Sunday afternoon in the glittering buggy, Miss Emily with her head high and Homer Barron with his hat cocked and a cigar in his teeth, reins and whip in a yellow glove.

Then some of the ladies began to say that it was a disgrace to the town and a bad example to the young people. The men did not want to interfere, but at last the ladies forced the Baptist minister—Miss Emily's people were Episcopal—to call upon her. He would never divulge what happened during that interview, but he refused to go back again. The next Sunday they again drove about the streets, and the following day the minister's wife wrote to Miss Emily's relations in Alabama.

So she had blood-kin under her roof again and we sat back to watch developments. At first nothing happened. Then we were sure that they were to be married. We learned that Miss Emily had been to the jeweler's and ordered a man's toilet set in silver, with the letters H. B. on each piece. Two days later we learned that she had bought a complete outfit of men's clothing, including a nightshirt, and we said, "They are married." We were really glad. We were glad because the two female cousins were even more Grierson than Miss Emily had ever been.

So we were not surprised when Homer Barron—the streets had been finished some time since—was gone. We were a little disappointed that there was not a public blowing-off, but we believed that he had gone on to prepare for Miss Emily's coming, or to give her a chance to get rid of the cousins. (By that time it was a cabal, and we were all Miss Emily's allies to help circumvent the cousins.) Sure enough, after another week they departed. And, as we had expected all along, within three days Homer Barron was back in town. A neighbor saw the Negro man admit him at the kitchen door at dusk one evening.

And that was the last we saw of Homer Barron. And of Miss Emily for some time. The Negro man went in and out with the market basket, but the front door remained closed. Now and then we would see her at a window for a moment, as the men did that night when they sprinkled the lime, but for almost six months she did not appear on the streets. Then we knew that this was to be expected too; as if that quality of her father which had thwarted her woman's life so many times had been too virulent and too furious to die.

When we next saw Miss Emily, she had grown fat and her hair was turning gray. During the next few years it grew grayer and grayer until it attained an even pepper-and-salt iron-gray, when it ceased turning. Up to the day of her death at seventy-four it was still that vigorous iron-gray, like the hair of an active man.

From that time on her front door remained closed, save for a period of six or seven years, when she was about forty, during which she gave lessons in china-painting. She fitted up a studio in one of the downstairs rooms, where the daughters and granddaughters of Colonel Sartoris' contemporaries were sent to her with the same regularity and in the same spirit that they were sent to church on Sundays with a twenty-five cent piece for the collection plate. Meanwhile her taxes had been remitted.

Then the newer generation became the backbone and the spirit of the town, and the painting pupils grew up and fell away and did not send their children to her with boxes of color and tedious brushes and pictures cut from the ladies' magazines. The front door closed upon the last one and remained closed for good. When the town got free postal delivery, Miss Emily alone refused to let them fasten the metal numbers above her door and attach a mailbox to it. She would not listen to them.

Daily, monthly, yearly we watched the Negro grow grayer and more stooped, going in and out with the market basket. Each December we sent her a tax notice, which would be returned by the post office a week later, unclaimed. Now and then we would see her in one of the downstairs windows—she had evidently shut up the top floor of the house—like the carven torso of an idol in a niche, looking or not looking at us, we could never tell which. Thus she passed from generation to generation—dear, inescapable, impervious, tranquil, and perverse.

And so she died. Fell ill in the house filled with dust and shadows, with only a doddering Negro man to wait on her. We did not even know she was sick; we had long since given up trying to get any information from the Negro. He talked to no one, probably not even to her, for his voice had grown harsh and rusty, as if from disuse.

She died in one of the downstairs rooms, in a heavy walnut bed with a curtain, her gray head propped on a pillow yellow and moldy with age and lack of sunlight.

The Negro met the first of the ladies at the front door and let them in, with their hushed, sibilant voices and their quick, curious glances, and then he disappeared. He walked right through the house and out the back and was not seen again.

The two female cousins came at once. They held the funeral on the second day, with the town coming to look at Miss Emily beneath a mass of bought flowers, with the crayon face of her father musing profoundly above the bier and the ladies sibilant and macabre; and the very old men—some in their brushed Confederate uniforms—on the porch and the lawn, talking of Miss Emily as if she had been a contemporary of theirs, believing that they had danced with her and courted her perhaps, confusing time with its mathematical progression, as the old do, to whom all the past is not a diminishing road but, instead, a huge meadow which no winter ever quite touches, divided from them now by the narrow bottle-neck of the most recent decade of years.

Already we knew that there was one room in that region above stairs which no one had seen in forty years, and which would have to be forced. They waited until Miss Emily was decently in the ground before they opened it.

The violence of breaking down the door seemed to fill this room with pervading dust. A thin, acrid pall as of the tomb seemed to lie everywhere upon this room decked and furnished as for a bridal: upon the valence curtains of faded rose color, upon the rose-shaded lights, upon the dressing table, upon the delicate array of crystal and the man's toilet things backed with tarnished silver, silver so tarnished that the monogram was obscured. Among them lay a collar and tie, as if they had just been removed, which, lifted, left upon the surface a pale crescent in the dust. Upon a chair hung the suit, carefully folded; beneath it the two mute shoes and the discarded socks.

The man himself lay in the bed.

For a long while we just stood there, looking down at the profound and fleshless grin. The body had apparently once lain in the attitude of an embrace, but now the long sleep that outlasts love, that conquers even the grimace of love, had cuckolded him. What was left of him, rotted beneath what was left of the nightshirt, had become inextricable from the bed in which he lay; and upon him and upon the pillow beside him lay that even coating of the patient and biding dust.

Then we noticed that in the second pillow was the indentation of a head. One of us lifted something from it, and leaning forward, that faint and invisible dust dry and acrid in the nostrils, we saw a long strand of iron-gray hair.

1900 -- Thomas Wolfe -- 1938

THE MAJOR SETTINGS of Thomas Wolfe's novels are the hills of North Carolina and the city of New York. He was born in Asheville, North Carolina, went to the state university at Chapel Hill (1916-1920), where he studied playwriting and edited the college paper and magazine. He took a Master's degree at Harvard in 1922; here he studied under Professor Baker and continued writing plays. After some travel in Europe he became an instructor in English at Washington Square College of New York University, a position he held from 1924 to early 1930. In 1930 and 1931 he again traveled abroad, this time on a Guggenheim fellowship.

The publication, in 1929, of Look Homeward, Angel, began eight years of writing, revising, cutting, quarreling with editors, and publishing the endless story of Eugene Gant—George Webber, continued in Of Time and the River (1935); The Web and the Rock (1939), and You Can't Go Home Again (1940). The Hills Beyond (1941) is still another version of the story to which are added several short stories, some of them touching upon similar themes. In 1936 appeared a short critical and autobiographical piece, The Story of a Novel. In response to favorable and shocked reactions to his first novel, Wolfe attempted to defend the autobiographical character of his work by saying that "my conviction is that all serious creative work must be at bottom autobiographical, and that a man must use the material of his own life if he is to create anything that has substantial value." Use it he did, and in abundance. The hundreds of MS sheets cluttering his apartment, piled into his trunk, and finding their way to editorial cutting rooms point extensively and repeatedly to Wolfe's voluminous concern over the personal and family matters that were to crowd his novels. Much of the order one finds in his work is a gift of his editors (all but the first two of his novels and one of his collections of short stories were published posthumously). Wolfe provided the vigor, the verbiage, the color; his editors (Maxwell Perkins and Edward C. Aswell), the form. What has attracted Wolfe's large following to him is his exuberance, the vigor which he put into the release of his creative energies, the very strong fondness for cumulative detail, and the rhetoric which makes bad writing momentarily seem good, or at least exciting. As Edward Aswell has explained, "Being a Southerner, with a Southerner's innate love of rhetoric, he would often be swept away by the cadence of his own words. Sometimes, more especially in his younger writing, he attached so much importance to the measured flow of his sentences that he might sacrifice his meaning to his music." Aswell goes on, to defend Wolfe's formal failures, by insisting that Wolfe followed but one form—that of the flow of the stream of life; his writing, Aswell says, "has a natural form, an elemental form, the form of which all other forms are but variations on a theme—the form of life itself." However well or poorly such an explanation may hold, Wolfe's novels did have an enormous attraction for readers in the thirties. There are genuine values, and many untutored skills, in the work.

Thomas Wolfe believed that in his later writing he had achieved greater objectivity and a more careful organization of his work. Writing to his editors about "the book" (by which term he meant his manuscript, which he left at his death), he said that it "marks not only a turning away from the books he has written in the past, but a genuine spiritual and artistic change. . . . [he] hoped to obtain, through free creation, a release of his inventive power which the shackling limitations of identifiable autobiography do not permit." He changed the name of his hero from Eugene Gant to George Webber, introduced new scenes and new persons, experimented with social satire and criticism; but the result was not an "objective" account so much as it was a reshaping of the same materials. The last three books do, however, show the effects of his attempts to write objectively, and in some respects at least the characters, released from their author's tight hold upon them, do seem to have more clarity of outline than do those of the Eugene Gant novels.

It is true that Wolfe's theme is that of an American's search for definition: in some respects, like that of Joyce's Stephen Dedalus, it is a search for a spiritual father, but generally it is an attempt to break through the jungle of multiplicity into some cleared spade of spiritual and cultural meaning. Wolfe's characters are tortured persons, whose gusto and appetite lead either to frustration or to confusion. Their appetite consumes them; their rhetoric attempts endlessly and futilely to explain the appetite. The very multitude of impressions offered by locale leads to formlessness and confusion which are not so much corrected in his work as they are demonstrated and commented upon.

The merits of Wolfe's fiction come from these defects. His characters are bloated by over-explanation, but they remain exceptional, striking personalities through many ordeals by rhetoric. His power of social burlesque and parody is enormously effective, and the passages which treat so vigorously of the commercialization of America survive as excellent contributions to social criticism. Finally, Wolfe's great appetite for sensory detail leads often to amazing results. He has been praised for his affirmation of American democracy, which transcends its weaknesses (much of this praise is due to the appearance of Wolfe's posthumous works at the beginning of World War II); and this praise is merited, though the impact of affirmation is too often made, in Wolfe's case, at the expense of clarity and formal excellence.

Wolfe's novels are Look Homeward, Angel (1929); Of Time and the River (1935); The Web and the Rock (1939); You Can't Go Home Again (1940). Collections of short stories are found in From Death to Morning (1935); The Hills Beyond (1941). Excerpts from his work have been collected and arranged in The Face of a Nation (1939) and A Stone, A Leaf, A Door, sel. by John S. Barnes (1945). The Story of a Novel (1936) is partly autobiographical, partly critical. Biographical and autobiographical materials include Thomas Wolfe's Letters to His Mother, ed. John Skally Terry (1943) and Hayden Norwood's The Marble Man's Wife: Thomas Wolfe's Mother (1947). Other biographical and critical studies include H. J. Muller, Thomas Wolfe (1947); Pamela H. Johnson, Hungry Gulliver (1948); J. W. Beach, American Fiction, 1920-1940 (1941); Alfred Kazin, On Native Grounds (1942); Maxwell Geismar, Writers in Crisis (1942); E. B. Burgum, The Novel and the World's Dilemma (1947); H. J. Muller, Modern Fiction (1937); John Peale Bishop, "The Sorrows of Thomas Wolfe," Kenyon Review, Winter, 1939; Henry T. Volkering, "Tom Wolfe, Penance No More," Virginia Quarterly Review, Apr., 1939; Robert Penn Warren, "A Note on the Hamlet of Thomas Wolfe," American Review, May, 1935; Carlos Baker, "Thomas Wolfe's Apprenticeship," Delphian Quarterly, Jan., 1940; E. From LOOK HOMEWARD, ANGEL

* * *

The death of Grover gave Eliza the most terrible wound of her life: her courage was snapped, her slow but powerful adventure toward freedom was abruptly stopped. Her flesh seemed to turn rotten when she thought of the distant city and the Fair: she was appalled before the hidden adversary who had struck her down.

With desperate sadness she encysted herself within her house and her family, reclaimed that life she had been ready to renounce, lived laborious days and tried to drink, in toil, oblivion. But the dark lost face gleamed like a sudden and impalpable faun within the thickets of memory: she thought of the mark on his brown neck and wept.

During the grim winter the shadows lifted slowly. Gant brought back the roaring fires, the groaning succulent table, the lavish and explosive ritual of the daily life. The old gusto surged back in their lives.

And, as the winter waned, the interspersed darkness in Eugene's brain was lifted slowly, days, weeks, months began to emerge in consecutive brightness; his mind came from the confusion of the Fair: life opened practically.

Secure and conscious now in the guarded and sufficient strength of home, he lay with well-lined belly before the roasting vitality of the fire, poring insatiably over great volumes in the bookcase, exulting in the musty odor of the leaves, and in the pungent smell of their hot hides. The books he delighted in most were three huge calf-skin volumes called Ridpath's History of the World. Their numberless pages were illustrated with hundreds of drawings, engravings, wood-cuts: he followed the progression of the centuries pictorially before he could read. The pictures of battle delighted him most of all. Exulting in the howl of the beaten wind about the house, the thunder of great trees, he committed himself to the dark storm, releasing the mad devil's hunger all men have in them, which lusts for darkness, the wind, and incalculable speed. The past unrolled to him in separate and enormous visions; he built unending legends upon the pictures of the kings of Egypt, charioted swiftly by soaring horses, and something infinitely old and recollective seemed to awaken in him as he looked on fabulous monsters, the twined beards and huge beast-bodies of Assyrian kings, the walls of Babylon. His brain swarmed with pictures—Cyrus directing the charge, the spear-forest of the Macedonian phalanx, the splintered oars, the numberless huddle of the ships at Salamis, the feasts of Alexander, the terrific melée of the knights, the shattered lances, the axe and the sword, the massed pikemen, the beleaguered walls, the scaling ladders heavy with climbing men hurled backward, the Swiss who flung his body on the lances, the press of horse and foot, the gloomy forests of Gaul and Caesarean conquests. Gant sat farther away, behind him, swinging violently back and forth in a stout rocker, spitting clean and powerful spurts of tobacco-juice over his son's head into the hissing fire.

Or again, Gant would read to him with sonorous and florid rhetoric passages from Shakespeare, among which he heard most often Marc Antony's funeral oration, Hamlet's soliloquy, the banquet scene in Macbeth, and the scene between Desdemona and Othello before he strangles her. Or, he would recite or read poetry, for which he had a capacious and retentive memory. His favorites were: "O why should the spirit of mortal be proud" ("Lincoln's favorite poem," he was fond of saying); "'We are lost,' the captain shouted, As he staggered down the stairs"; "I remember, I remember, the house where I was born"; "Ninety and nine with their captain, Rode on the enemy's track, Rode in the gray light of morning, Nine of the ninety came back"; "The boy stood on the burning deck"; and

"Half a league, half a league, half a league onward."

Sometimes he would get Helen to recite "Still sits the schoolhouse by the road, a ragged beggar sunning; Around it still the sumachs grow, and blackberry vines are running."

And when she had told how grasses had been growing over the girl's head for forty years, and how the gray-haired man had found in life's harsh school how few hated to go above him, because, you see, they love him, Gant would sigh heavily, and say with a shake of his head:

"Ah me! There was never a truer word spoken than that."

The family was at the very core and ripeness of its life together. Gant lavished upon it his abuse, his affection, and his prodigal provisioning. They came to look forward eagerly to his entrance, for he brought with him the great gusto of living, of ritual. They would watch him in the evening as he turned the corner below with eager strides, follow carefully the processional of his movements from the time he flung his provisions upon the kitchen table to the re-kindling of his fire, with which he was always at odds when he entered, and on to which he poured wood, coal and kerosene lavishly. This done, he would remove his coat and wash himself at the basin vigorously, rubbing his great hands across his shaven, tough-bearded face with the cleansing and male sound of sand paper. Then he would thrust his body against the door jamb and scratch his back energetically by moving it violently to and fro. This done he would empty another half can of kerosene on the howling flame, lunging savagely at it, and muttering to himself.

Then, biting off a good hunk of powerful apple tobacco, which lay ready to his use on the mantel, he would pace back and forth across his room fiercely, oblivious of his grinning family who followed these ceremonies with exultant excitement, as he composed his tirade. Finally, he would burst in on Eliza in the kitchen, plunging to the heart of denunciation with a mad howl.

His turbulent and undisciplined rhetoric had acquired, by the regular convention of its usage, something of the movement and directness of classical epithet: his similes were preposterous, created really in a spirit of vulgar mirth, and the great comic intelligence that was in the family—down to the youngest—was shaken daily by it. The children grew to await his return in the evening with a kind of exhilaration. Indeed, Eliza herself, healing slowly and painfully her great hurt, got a certain stimulation from it; but there was still in her a fear of the periods of drunkenness, and latently, a stubborn and unforgiving recollection of the past.

But, during that winter, as death, assaulted by the quick and healing gaiety of children, those absolute little gods of the moment, lifted itself slowly out of their hearts, something like hopefulness returned to her. They were a life unto themselves—how lonely they were they did not know, but they were known to every one and friended by almost no one. Their status was singular—if they could have been distinguished by caste, they would probably have been called middle-class, but the Duncans, the Tarkintons, all their neighbors, and all their acquaintances throughout the town, never drew in to them, never came into the strange rich color of their lives, because they had twisted the design of all orderly life, because there was in them a mad, original, disturbing quality which they did not suspect. And companionship with the elect—those like the Hilliards—was equally impossible, even if they had had the gift or the desire for it. But they hadn't.

Gant was a great man, and not a singular one, because singularity does not hold life in unyielding devotion to it.

As he stormed through the house, unleashing his gathered bolts, the children followed him joyously, shrieking exultantly as he told Eliza he had first seen her "wriggling around the corner like a snake on her belly," or, as coming in from freezing weather he had charged her and all the Pentlands with malevolent domination of the elements.

"We will freeze," he yelled, "we will freeze in this hellish, damnable, cruel and God-forsaken climate. Does Brother Will care? Does Brother Jim care? Did the Old Hog, your miserable old father, care? Merciful God! I have fallen into the hands of fiends incarnate, more savage, more cruel, more abominable than the beasts of the field. Hellhounds that they are, they will sit by and gloat at my agony until I am done to death."

He paced rapidly about the adjacent wash-room for a moment, muttering to himself, while grinning Luke stood watchfully near.

"But they can eat!" he shouted, plunging suddenly at the kitchen door. "They can eat—when some one else will feed them. I shall never forget the Old Hog as long as I live. Cr-unch, Cr-unch, Cr-unch,"—they were all exploded with laughter as his face assumed an expression of insane gluttony, and as he continued, in a slow, whining voice intended to represent the speech of the late Major: "'Eliza, if you don't mind I'll have some more of that chicken,' when the old scoundrel had shovelled it down his throat so fast we had to carry him away from the table."

As his denunciation reached some high extravagance the boys would squeal with laughter, and Gant, inwardly tickled, would glance around slyly with a faint grin bending the corners of his thin mouth. Eliza herself would laugh shortly, and then exclaim roughly: "Get out of here! I've had enough of your goings-on for one night."

Sometimes, on these occasions, his good humor grew so victorious that he would attempt clumsily to fondle her, putting one arm stiffly around her waist, while she bridled, became confused, and half-attempted to escape, saying: "Get away! Get away from me! It's too late for that now." Her white embarrassed smile was at once painful and comic: tears pressed closely behind it. At these rare, unnatural exhibitions of affection, the children laughed with constraint, fidgeted restlessly, and said: "Aw, papa, don't."

Eugene, when he first noticed an occurrence of this sort, was getting on to his fifth year: shame gathered in him in tangled clots, aching in his throat; he twisted his neck about convulsively, smiling desperately as he did later when he saw poor buffoons or mawkish scenes in the theatre. And he was never after able to see them touch each other with affection, without the same inchoate and choking humiliation: they were so used to the curse, the clamor, and the roughness, that any variation into tenderness came as a cruel affectation.

But as the slow months, gummed with sorrow, dropped more clearly, the powerful germinal instinct for property and freedom began to reawaken in Eliza, and the ancient submerged struggle between their natures began again. The children were growing up—Eugene had found playmates—Harry Tarkinton and Max Isaacs. Her sex was a fading coal.

Season by season, there began again the old strife of ownership and taxes. Returning home, with the tax-collector's report in his hand, Gant would be genuinely frantic with rage.

"In the name of God, Woman, what are we coming to? Before another year we'll all go to the poorhouse. Ah, Lord! I see very well where it will all end. I'll go to the wall, every penny we've got will go into the pockets of those accursed swindlers, and the rest will come under the sheriff's hammer. I curse the day I was ever fool enough to buy the first stick. Mark my words, we'll be living in soup-kitchens before this fearful, this awful, this hellish and damnable winter is finished."

She would purse her lips thoughtfully as she went over the list, while he looked at her with a face of strained agony.

"Yes, it does look pretty bad," she would remark. And then: "It's a pity you didn't listen to me last summer, Mr. Gant, when we had a chance of trading in that worthless old Owenby place for those two houses on Carter Street. We could have been getting forty dollars a month rent on them ever since."

"I never want to own another foot of land as long as I live," he yelled. "It's kept me a poor man all my life, and when I die they'll have to give me six feet of earth in Pauper's Field." And he would grow broodingly philosophic, speaking of the vanity of human effort, the last resting-place in earth of rich and poor, the significant fact that we could "take none of it with us," ending perhaps with "Ah me! It all comes to the same in the end, anyway."

Or, he would quote a few stanzas of Gray's Elegy, using that encyclopaedia of stock melancholy with rather indefinite application:

"—Await alike th' inevitable hour,
The paths of glory lead but to the grave."

But Eliza sat grimly on what they had.

Gant, for all his hatred of land ownership, was proud of living under his own shelter, and indeed proud in the possession of anything that was sanctified by his usage, and that gave him comfort. He would have liked ready and unencumbered affluence—the possession of huge sums of money in the bank and in his pocket, the freedom to travel grandly, to go before the world spaciouly. He liked to carry 10 large sums of money in his pocket, a practice of which Eliza disapproved, and for which she reprimanded him frequently. Once or twice, when he was drunk, he had been robbed: he would brandish a roll of bills about under the stimulation of whiskey, and dispense large sums to his children—ten, twenty, fifty dollars to each, with maudlin injunctions to “take it all! Take it all, God damn it!” But next day he was equally assiduous in his demands for its return: 20 Helen usually collected it from the sometimes unwilling fingers of the boys. She would give it to him next day. She was fifteen or sixteen years old, and almost six feet high: a tall thin girl, with large hands and feet, big-boned, generous features, behind which the hysteria of constant excitement lurked.

The bond between the girl and her father grew stronger every day: she was nervous, intense, irritable, and abusive as he was. She 30 adored him. He had begun to suspect that this devotion, and his own response to it, was a cause more and more of annoyance to Eliza, and he was inclined to exaggerate and emphasize it, particularly when he was drunk, when his furious distaste for his wife, his obscene complaint against her, was crudely balanced by his maudlin docility to the girl.

And Eliza's hurt was deeper because she knew that just at this time, when her slightest 40 movement goaded him, did what was most rawly essential in him reveal itself. She was forced to keep out of his way, lock herself in her room, while her young daughter victoriously subdued him.

The friction between Helen and Eliza was often acute: they spoke sharply and curtly to each other, and were painfully aware of the other's presence in cramped quarters. And, in addition to the unspoken rivalry over Gant, 50 the girl was in the same way, equally, rasped by the temperamental difference of Eliza—driven to fury at times by her slow, mouth-pursing speech, her placidity, the intonations of her voice, the deep abiding patience of her nature.

They fed stupendously. Eugene began to observe the food and the seasons. In the autumn, they barrelled huge frosty apples in the cellar. Gant bought whole hogs from the 10 butcher, returning home early to salt them, wearing a long work-apron, and rolling his sleeves half up his lean hairy arms. Smoked bacons hung in the pantry, the great bins were full of flour, the dark recessed shelves groaned with preserved cherries, peaches, plums, quinces, apples, pears. All that he touched waxed in rich pungent life: his Spring gardens, wrought in the black wet earth below the fruit trees, flourished in huge crinkled lettuces that 20 wrenched cleanly from the loamy soil with small black clots stuck to their crisp stocks; fat red radishes; heavy tomatoes. The rich plums lay bursted on the grass; his huge cherry trees oozed with heavy gum jewels; his apple trees bent with thick green clusters. The earth was spermy for him like a big woman.

Spring was full of cool dewy mornings, spurting winds, and storms of intoxicating blossoms, and in this enchantment Eugene 30 first felt the mixed lonely ache and promise of the seasons.

In the morning they rose in a house pungent with breakfast cookery, and they sat at a smoking table loaded with brains and eggs, ham, hot biscuit, fried apples seething in their gummed syrups, honey, golden butter, fried steak, scalding coffee. Or there were stacked batter-cakes, rum-colored molasses, fragrant brown sausages, a bowl of wet cherries, plums, fat 40 juicy bacon, jam. At the mid-day meal, they ate heavily: a huge hot roast of beef, fat buttered lima-beans, tender corn smoking on the cob, thick red slabs of sliced tomatoes, rough savory spinach, hot yellow corn-bread, flaky biscuits, a deep-dish peach and apple cobbler spiced with cinnamon, tender cabbage, deep glass dishes piled with preserved fruits—cherries, pears, peaches. At night they might eat 50 fried steak, hot squares of grits fried in egg and butter, pork-chops, fish, young fried chicken.

For the Thanksgiving and Christmas feasts four heavy turkeys were bought and fattened for weeks: Eugene fed them with cans of shelled corn several times a day, but he could not bear to be present at their executions, because by that time their cheerful excited gobbles made echoes in his heart. Eliza baked for weeks in advance: the whole energy of the family focussed upon the great ritual of the feast. A day or two before, the auxiliary dainties arrived in piled grocer's boxes—the magic of strange foods and fruits was added to familiar fare: there were glossed sticky dates, cold rich figs, cramped belly to belly in small boxes, dusty raisins, mixed nuts—the almond, the pecan, the meaty nigger-toe, the walnut, sacks of assorted candies, piles of yellow Florida oranges, tangerines, sharp, acrid, nostalgic odors.

Seated before a roast or a fowl, Gant began a heavy clangor on his steel and carving knife, distributing thereafter Gargantuan portions to each plate. Eugene feasted from a high chair by his father's side, filled his distending belly until it was drum-tight, and was permitted to stop eating by his watchful sire only when his stomach was impregnable to the heavy prod of Gant's big finger.

"There's a soft place there," he would roar, and he would cover the scoured plate of his infant son with another heavy slab of beef. That their machinery withstood this hammer-handed treatment was a tribute to their vitality and Eliza's cookery.

Gant ate ravenously and without caution. He was immoderately fond of fish, and he invariably choked upon a bone while eating it. This happened hundreds of times, but each time he would look up suddenly with a howl of agony and terror, groaning and crying out strongly while a half-dozen hands pounded violently on his back.

"Merciful God!" he would gasp finally, "I thought I was done for that time."

"I'll vow, Mr. Gant," Eliza was vexed. "Why on earth don't you watch what you're doing? If you didn't eat so fast you wouldn't always get choked."

The children, staring, but relieved, settled slowly back in their places.

He had a Dutch love of abundance: again and again he described the great stored barns, the groaning plenty of the Pennsylvanians.

On his journey to California, he had been charmed in New Orleans by the cheapness and profusion of tropical fruits: a peddler offered him a great bunch of bananas for twenty-five cents, and Gant had taken them at once, wondering desperately later, as they moved across the continent, why, and what he was going to do with them.

From OF TIME AND THE RIVER

CHAPTER VII

THE train rushed on across the brown autumnal land, by wink of water and the rocky coasts, the small white towns and flaming colors and the lonely, tragic and eternal beauty of New England. It was the country of his heart's desire, the dark Helen in his blood forever burning—and now the fast approach across October land, the engine smoke that streaked back on the sharp gray air that day!

The coming on of the great earth, the new lands, the enchanted city, the approach, so smoky, blind and stifled, to the ancient web, the old grimed thrilling barricades of Boston. The streets and buildings that slid past that day with such a haunting strange familiarity, the mighty engine steaming to its halt, and the great train-shed dense with smoke and acrid with its smell and full of the slow pantings of a dozen engines, now passive as great cats, the mighty station with the ceaseless throngings of its illimitable life, and all of the murmurous, remote and mighty sounds of time forever held there in the station, together with a tart and nasal voice, a hand'sbreadth off that said: "There's hahdly time, but try it if you want."

He saw the narrow, twisted, age-browned streets of Boston, then, with their sultry fragrance of fresh-roasted coffee, the sight of the man-swarm passing in its million-footed weft, the distant drone and murmur of the great mysterious city all about him, the shining water of the Basin, and the murmur of the harbor and its ships, the promise of glory and of a thousand secret, lovely and mysterious women that were waiting somewhere in the city's web.

He saw the furious streets of life with their unending flood-tide of a million faces, the enormous library with its million books; or was it just one moment in the flood-tide of the city, at five o'clock, a voice, a face, a brawny lusty girl with smiling mouth who passed him in an instant at the Park Street station, stood printed in the strong October wind a moment—breast, belly, arm, and thigh, and all her brawny lustihood—and then had gone into the man-swarm, lost forever, never found?

Was it at such a moment—engine-smoke, a station, a street, the sound of time, a face that came and passed and vanished, could not be forgot—here or here or here, at such a moment of man's unrecorded memory, that he breathed fury from the air, that fury came?

He never knew; but now mad fury gripped his life, and he was haunted by the dream of time. Ten years must come and go without a moment's rest from fury, ten years of fury, hunger, all of the wandering in a young man's life. And for what? For what?

What is the fury which this youth will feel, which will lash him on against the great earth forever? It is the brain that maddens with its own excess, the heart that breaks from the anguish of its own frustration. It is the hunger that grows from everything it feeds upon, the thirst that gulps down rivers and remains insatiate. It is to see a million men, a million faces and to be a stranger and an alien to them always. It is to prowl the stacks of an enormous library at night, to tear the books out of a thousand shelves, to read in them with the mad hunger of the youth of man.

It is to have the old unquiet mind, the famished heart, the restless soul; it is to lose hope, heart, and all joy utterly, and then to have them wake again, to have the old feeling return with overwhelming force that he is about to find the thing for which his life obscurely and desperately is groping—for which all men on this earth have sought—one face out of the million faces, a wall, a door, a place of certitude and peace and wandering no more. For what is it that we Americans are seeking always on this earth? Why is it we have crossed the stormy seas so many times alone, lain in a thousand alien rooms at night hearing the sounds of time, dark time, and thought until heart, brain, flesh and spirit were sick and weary with the thought of it; "Where shall I go now? What shall I do?"

He did not know the moment that it came, but it came instantly, at once. And from that moment on mad fury seized him, from that moment on, his life, more than the life of any one that he would ever know, was to be spent in solitude and wandering. Why this was true, or how it happened, he would never know; yet it was so. From this time on—save for two intervals in his life—he was to live about as solitary a life as a modern man can have. And it is meant by this that the number of hours, days, months, and years—the actual time he spent alone—would be immense and extraordinary.

And this fact was all the more astonishing because he never seemed to seek out solitude, nor did he shrink from life, or seek to build himself into a wall away from all the fury and the turmoil of the earth. Rather, he loved life so dearly that he was driven mad by the thirst and hunger which he felt for it. Of this fury, which was to lash and drive him on for fifteen years, the thousandth part could not be told, and what is told may seem unbelievable, but it is true. He was driven by a hunger so literal, cruel and physical that it wanted to devour the earth and all the things and people in it, and when it failed in this attempt, his spirit would drown in an ocean of horror and desolation, smothered below the overwhelming tides of this great earth, sickened and made sterile, hopeless, dead by the stupefying weight of men and objects in the world, the everlasting flock and flooding of the crowd.

Now he would prowl the stacks of the library at night, pulling books out of a thousand shelves and reading in them like a madman. The thought of these vast stacks of books would drive him mad: the more he read, the less he seemed to know—the greater the number of the books he read, the greater the immense uncountable number of those which he could never read would seem to be. Within a period of ten years he read at least 20,000 volumes—deliberately the number is set low—and opened the pages and looked through many times that number. This may seem unbelievable, but it happened. Dryden said this about Ben Jonson: "Other men read books but he read libraries"—and so now was it with this boy. Yet this terrific orgy of the books brought him no comfort, peace, or wisdom of the mind and heart. Instead, his fury and despair increased from what they fed upon, his hunger mounted with the food it ate.

He read insanely, by the hundreds, the thousands, the ten thousands, yet he had no desire to be bookish; no one could describe this mad assault upon print as scholarly: a ravening appetite in him demanded that he read everything that had ever been written about human experience. He read no more from pleasure—the thought that other books were waiting for him tore at his heart forever. He pictured himself as tearing the entrails from a book as from a fowl. At first, hovering over book stalls, or walking at night among the vast piled shelves of the library, he would read, watch in hand, muttering to himself in triumph or anger at the timing of each page: "Fifty seconds to do that one. Damn you, we'll see! You will, will you?"—and he would tear through the next page in twenty seconds.

This fury which drove him on to read so many books had nothing to do with scholarship, nothing to do with academic honors, nothing to do with formal learning. He was not in any way a scholar and did not want to be one. He simply wanted to know about everything on earth; he wanted to devour the earth, and it drove him mad when he saw he could not do this. And it was the same with everything he did. In the midst of a furious burst of reading in the enormous library, the thought of the streets outside and the great city all around him would drive through his body like a sword. It would now seem to him that every second that he passed among the books was being wasted—that at this moment something priceless, irrecoverable was happening in the streets, and that if he could only get to it in time and see it, he would somehow get the knowledge of the whole thing in him—the source, the well, the spring from which all men and words and actions, and every design upon this earth proceeds.

And he would rush out in the streets to find it, be hurled through the tunnel into Boston and then spend hours in driving himself savagely through a hundred streets, looking into the faces of a million people, trying to get an instant and conclusive picture of all they did and said and were, of all their million destinies, and of the great city and the everlasting earth, and the immense and lonely skies that bent above them. And he would search the furious streets until bone and brain and blood could stand no more—until every sinew of his life and spirit was wrung, trembling, and exhausted, and his heart sank down beneath its weight of desolation and despair.

Yet a furious hope, a wild extravagant belief, was burning in him all the time. He would write down enormous charts and plans and projects of all that he proposed to do in life—a program of work and living which would have exhausted the energies of 10,000 men. He would get up in the middle of the night to scrawl down insane catalogs of all that he had seen and done:—the number of books he had read, the number of miles he had travelled, the number of people he had known, the number of women he had slept with, the number of meals he had eaten, the number of towns he had visited, the number of states he had been in.

And at one moment he would gloat and chuckle over these stupendous lists like a miser gloating over his hoard, only to groan bitterly with despair the next moment, and to beat his head against the wall, as he remembered the overwhelming amount of all he had not seen or done, or known. Then he would begin another list filled with enormous catalogs of all the books he had not read, all the food he had not eaten, all the women that he had not slept with, all the states he had not been in, all the towns he had not visited. Then he would write down plans and programs whereby all these things must be accomplished, how many years it would take to do it all, and how old he would be when he had finished. An enormous wave of hope and joy would surge up in him, because it now looked easy, and he had no doubt at all that he could do it.

He never asked himself in any practical way how he was going to live while this was going on, where he was going to get the money for this gigantic adventure, and what he was going to do to make it possible. If he thought about it, it seemed to have no importance or reality whatever—he just dismissed it impatiently, or with a conviction that some old man would die and leave him a fortune, that he was going to pick up a purse containing hundreds of thousands of dollars while walking in the Fenway, and that the reward would be enough to keep him going, or that a beautiful and rich young widow, true-hearted, tender, loving, and voluptuous, who had carrot-colored hair, little freckles on her face, a snub nose and luminous gray-green eyes with something wicked, yet loving and faithful in them, and one gold filling in her solid little teeth, was going to fall in love with him, marry him, and be forever true and faithful to him while he went reading, eating, drinking, whoring, and devouring his way around the world; or finally that he would write a book or play every year or so, which would be a great success, and yield him fifteen or twenty thousand dollars at a crack. Thus, he went storming away at the whole earth about him, sometimes mad with despair, weariness, and bewilderment; and sometimes wild with a jubilant and exultant joy and certitude as the conviction came to him that everything would happen as he wished. Then at night he would hear the vast sounds and silence of the earth and of the city, he would begin to think of the dark sleeping earth and of the continent of night, until it seemed to him it all was spread before him like a map—rivers, plains, and mountains and 10,000 sleeping towns; it seemed to him that he saw everything at once.

1896 ~ John Dos Passos ~ —

JOHN DOS PASSOS was born in Chicago and educated at Harvard (1912–1916). He traveled in Spain to study architecture, while in Europe enlisted in the Volunteer Ambulance Service and served in that and the Red Cross and the American Medical Corps. His first novel, One Man's Initiation—1917 (1920), is a crude autobiographical comment upon war experiences. His next novel, Three Soldiers (1921), is also about the war. Streets of Night (1923) is a novel about adolescent intellectuals.

Dos Passos' real contribution to American fiction began with the publication of Manhattan Transfer (1925). In this novel of New York City from 1890 to 1925, he begins the use of his "collectivist" technique: the book is a collection of fragmentary impressions of and bits of information about a number of New York characters chosen from various classes. There is no settled progression, only biographical and sociological data; and the novel holds to a kind of sociological objectivity, designed to underplay significance and dimension. The newspaperman, Jimmy Herf, may be an exception to this impartiality of treatment; if he is, as so many critics insist, he escapes it by the narrowest of margins. The object is to give information, to provide flesh-and-blood statistics for a sociology and an economics of modern industrial civilization as it is seen in the largest urban monster created by it.

The celebrated and remarkable trilogy began with 42nd Parallel (1930), continued with 1919 (1932), and was completed in The Big Money (1936). Since then, Dos Passos has published Adventures of a Young Man (1939), a story of a young radical and his unhappiness under leftist discipline; and Number One (1943), a novel on the Huey Long theme, describing power politics in the South. In addition, there have been three nonfiction books, collections of essays (In All Countries, 1934; Journeys between Wars, 1938) and a commentary upon America's political inheritance (The Ground We Stand On, 1941).

The trilogy of novels is Dos Passos' most extreme attempt to reform and reshape the structure of the novel. Manhattan Transfer tried to reflect an unsettled world, what might almost be called social chaos. The three novels which followed extend and elaborate upon the form of the earlier one. They are composed of many individual biographies of persons drawn from several classes and covering the United States and its political fortunes from the beginning of the twentieth century to the end of the 1920's. Individual biographical sketches of American heroes and rascals are provided at convenient places; the "Newsreel" offers fragments of appropriate news at each stage of the accumulated narratives; "The Camera Eye" is pointed at Dos Passos himself and provides a series of views of the author's life in terms of the events narrated. The total effect is that of attempted objectivity—a vast collection of interrelated biographical and social data—which is quite definitely slanted to provide an expression of its author's view, and is also arranged to demonstrate over and over again a thesis concerning the overwhelming domination of American life by materialism, the desire above all and at all costs to gain financial security, and, beyond that, affluence. Dos Passos' favorites among the biographies (Thorstein Veblen, Eugene Debs, Robert M. LaFollette, Sr.) underscore this thesis; the objects of his satire (Carnegie, Rockefeller, Hearst, Frederick Taylor, author of speed-ups in assembly-line production) emphasize it further. And the substance of the trilogy, what these devices are designed merely to highlight, is a series of portraits of the consequences for the American personality of American materialism. Only a few characters escape the vulgarity, the selfishness, or the neuroticism which seems the end of man and woman. And the novels do not by any means try to demonstrate a leftist thesis; they are quite free of the Marxist intellectual gymnastics which were practiced by Dos Passos' contemporaries. The Communists are no more intelligent in the trilogy, and they are in many ways more pathetic.

When considered in terms other than the rather ingenious devices Dos Passos has used, his fiction seems shallow and his characters lacking in dimension, as though they were all riding along an immense assembly line of sociological proof. Their behavior is almost entirely external; little attention is paid to motive beyond the obvious, and they are made to act hastily and frantically. Only the camera eye gets beneath the surface, and it not very far. Occasionally, as in the case of Charley Anderson, sheer persistence and accumulation of detail make a character interesting beyond his role as demonstration; at times also, the humorous parody of American life (a result of extravagance in illustration) creates notable effects. U.S.A. (as the trilogy was eventually called) is a monument to a persistent strategy and painstaking labor. It is interesting as social document and, structurally, as formal experiment.

Dos Passos' novels are One Man's Initiation—1917 (1920); Three Soldiers (1921); Streets of Night (1923); Manhattan Transfer (1925); The 42nd Parallel (1930); 1919 (1932); The Big Money (1936); these last three published as U.S.A. in 1938; Adventures of a Young Man (1939); Number One (1943); The Grand Design (1949). His poems appeared in Eight Harvard Poets (1917) and in A Pushcart at the Curb (1922). Plays include The Garbage Man (1926); Airways, Inc. (1928); and Three Plays (1934; the two above plus Fortune Heights). Books of travel and social comment are Rosinante to the Road Again (1922); Orient Express (1927); In All Countries (1934); Journeys between Wars (1938). The Ground We Stand On (1941) is a study of American political principles and their historical sources. Biographical and critical comment is found in Pelham Edgar, The Art of the Novel from 1700 to the Present Time (1933); Harlan Hatcher, Creating the Modern American Novel (1935); J. W. Beach, American Fiction, 1920-1940 (1941); Alfred Kazin, On Native Grounds (1942); Maxwell Geismar, Writers in Crisis (1942); George Snell, The Shapers of American Fiction (1947); Alan Calmer, "John Dos Passos," Sewanee Review, July-Sept., 1932; R. H. Footman, "John Dos Passos," Sewanee Review, July, 1939; Margaret Marshall, "John Dos Passos," Nation, Jan. 6, 1940; Milton Rugoff, "Dos Passos, Novelist of Our Time," Sewanee Review, Oct.-Dec., 1941; Delmore Schwartz, "John Dos Passos and the Whole Truth," Southern Review, Oct., 1938. #### THE PROLOGUE

THE young man walks fast by himself through the crowd that thins into the night streets; feet are tired from hours of walking; eyes greedy for warm curve of faces, answering flicker of eyes, the set of a head, the lift of a shoulder, the way hands spread and clench; blood tingles with wants; mind is a beehive of hopes buzzing and stinging; muscles ache for the knowledge of jobs, for the roadmender's pick and shovel work, the fisherman's knack with a hook when he hauls on the slithery net from the rail of the lurching trawler, the swing of the bridgeman's arm as he slings down the white-hot rivet, the engineer's slow grip wise on the throttle, the dirtfarmer's use of his whole body when, whoaing the mules, he yanks the plow from the furrow. The young man walks by himself searching through the crowd with greedy eyes, greedy ears taut to hear, by himself, alone.

The streets are empty. People have packed into subways, climbed into streetcars and buses; in the stations they've scampered for suburban trains; they've filtered into lodgings and tenements, gone up in elevators into apartmenthouses. In a showwindow two sal-low windowdressers in their shirtsleeves are bringing out a dummy girl in a red evening dress, at a corner welders in masks lean into sheets of blue flame repairing a cartrack, a few drunk bums shamle along, a sad streetwalker fidgets under an arclight. From the river comes the deep rumbling whistle of a steamboat leaving dock. A tug hoots far away.

The young man walks by himself, fast but not fast enough, far but not far enough (faces slide out of sight, talk trails into tattered scraps, footsteps tap fainter in alleys); he must catch the last subway, the streetcar, the bus, run up the gangplanks of all the steamboats, register at all the hotels, work in the cities, answer the wantads, learn the trades, take up the jobs, live in all the boardinghouses, sleep in all the beds. One bed is not enough, one job is not enough, one life is not enough. At night, head swimming with wants, he walks by himself alone.

No job, no woman, no house, no city.

Only the ears busy to catch the speech are not alone; the ears are caught tight, linked tight by the tendrils of phrased words, the turn of a joke, the singsong fade of a story, the gruff fall of a sentence; linking tendrils of speech twine through the city blocks, spread over pavements, grow out along broad parked avenues, speed with the trucks leaving on their long night runs over roaring highways, whisper down sandy byroads past wornout farms, joining up cities and fillingstations, roundhouses, steamboats, planes groping along airways; words call out on mountain pastures, drift slow down rivers widening to the sea and the hushed beaches.

It was not in the long walks through jostling crowds at night that he was less alone, or in the training camp at Allentown, or in the day on the docks at Seattle, or in the empty reek of Washington City hot boyhood summer nights, or in the meal on Market Street, or in the swim off the red rocks at San Diego, or in the bed full of fleas in New Orleans, or in the cold razorwind off the lake, or in the gray faces trembling in the grind of gears in the street under Michigan Avenue, or in the smokers of limited expresstrains, or walking across country, or riding up the dry mountain canyons, or the night without a sleepingbag among frozen beartracks in the Yellowstone, or canoeing Sundays on the Quinnipiac;

but in his mother's words telling about longago, in his father's telling about when I was a boy, in the kidding stories of uncles, in the lies the kids told at school, the hired man's yarns, the tall tales the doughboys told after taps;

it was the speech that clung to the ears, the link that tingled in the blood; U.S.A.

U.S.A. is the slice of a continent. U.S.A. is a group of holding companies, some aggregations of trade unions, a set of laws bound in calf, a radio network, a chain of moving picture theatres, a column of stockquotations rubbed out and written in by a Western Union boy on a blackboard, a publiclibrary full of old newspapers and dogeared historybooks with protests scrawled on the margins in pencil. U.S.A. is the world's greatest rivervalley fringed with mountains and hills, U.S.A. is a set of bigmouthed officials with too many bankaccounts. U.S.A. is a lot of men buried in their uniforms in Arlington Cemetery. U.S.A. is the letters at the end of an address when you are away from home. But mostly U.S.A. is the speech of the people.

From THE 42nd PARALLEL

LOVER OF MANKIND

DEBS was a railroad man, born in a weatherboarded shack at Terre Haute.

10 He was one of ten children.

His father had come to America in a sailing-ship in '49, an Alsatian from Colmar; not much of a moneymaker, fond of music and reading, he gave his children a chance to finish public school and that was about all he could do.

• At fifteen Gene Debs was already working as a machinist on the Indianapolis and Terre Haute Railway.

20 He worked as locomotive fireman, clerked in a store joined the local of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, was elected secretary, traveled all over the country as organizer.

He was a tall shamblefooted man, had a sort of gusty rhetoric that set on fire the railroad workers in their pineboarded halls made them want the world he wanted,

30 a world brothers might own where everybody would split even:

I am not a labor leader. I don't want you to follow me or anyone else. If you are looking for a Moses to lead you out of the capitalist wilderness you will stay right where you are. I would not lead you into this promised land if I could, because if I could lead you in, someone else would lead you out.

That was how he talked to freighthandlers and gandywalkers, to firemen and switchmen and engineers, telling them it wasn't enough to organize the railroadmen, that all workers must be organized, that all workers must be organized in the workers' cooperative commonwealth.

Locomotive fireman on many a long night's run, under the smoke a fire burned him up, burned in gusty words that beat in pineboarded halls; he wanted his brothers to be free men.

That was what he saw in the crowd that met him at the Old Wells Street Depot when he came out of jail after the Pullman strike, those were the men that chalked up nine hundred thousand votes for him in nineteen twelve and scared the frockcoats and the tophats and diamonded hostesses at Saratoga Springs, Bar Harbor, Lake Geneva with the boggy of a socialist president.

But where were Gene Debs' brothers in nineteen eighteen when Woodrow Wilson had him locked up in Atlanta for speaking against war, where were the big men fond of whisky and fond of each other, gentle rambling tellers of stories over bars in small towns in the Middle West, quiet men who wanted a house with a porch to putter around and a fat wife to cook for them, a few drinks and cigars, a garden to dig in, cronies to chew the rag with and wanted to work for it and others to work for it;

where were the locomotive firemen and engineers when they hustled him off to Atlanta Penitentiary?

And they brought him back to die in Terre Haute to sit on his porch in a rocker with a cigar in his mouth, beside him American Beauty roses his wife fixed in a bowl;

and the people of Terre Haute and the people in Indiana and the people of the Middle West were fond of him and afraid of him and thought of him as an old kindly uncle who loved them, and wanted to be with him and to have him give them candy, but they were afraid of him as if he had contracted a social disease, syphilis or leprosy, and thought it was too bad,

but on account of the flag and prosperity

and making the world safe for democracy, they were afraid to be with him, or to think much about him for fear they might believe him;

for he said:

While there is a lower class I am of it, while there is a criminal class I am of it, while there is a soul in prison I am not free.

From THE BIG MONEY

THE AMERICAN PLAN

FREDERICK Winslow Taylor (they called him Speedy Taylor in the shop) was born in Germantown, Pennsylvania, the year of Buchanan's election. His father was a lawyer, his mother came from a family of New Bedford whalers; she was a great reader of Emerson, belonged to the Unitarian Church and the Browning Society. She was a fervent abolitionist and believed in democratic manners; she was a housekeeper of the old school, kept everybody busy from dawn till dark. She laid down the rules of conduct:

selfrespect, selfreliance, selfcontrol and a cold long head for figures.

But she wanted her children to appreciate the finer things so she took them abroad for three years on the Continent, showed them cathedrals, grand opera, Roman pediments, the old masters under their brown varnish in their great frames of tarnished gilt.

Later Fred Taylor was impatient of these wasted years, stamped out of the room when people talked about the finer things; he was a testy youngster, fond of practical jokes and a great hand at rigging up contraptions and devices.

At Exeter he was head of his class and captain of the ballteam, the first man to pitch overhand. (When umpires complained that overhand pitching wasn't in the rules of the game, he answered that it got results.)

As a boy he had nightmares, going to bed was horrible for him; he thought they came from sleeping on his back. He made himself a leather harness with wooden pegs that stuck into his flesh when he turned over. When he was grown he slept in a chair or in bed in a sitting position propped up with pillows. All his life he suffered from sleeplessness.

He was a crackerjack tennisplayer. In 1881, with his friend Clark, he won the National Doubles Championship. (He used a spoon-shaped racket of his own design.)

At school he broke down from overwork, his eyes went back on him. The doctor suggested manual labor. So instead of going to Harvard he went into the machinshop of a small pumpmanufacturing concern, owned by a friend of the family's, to learn the trade of patternmaker and machinist. He learned to handle a lathe and to dress and cuss like a workingman.

Fred Taylor never smoked tobacco or drank liquor or used tea or coffee; he couldn't understand why his fellowmechanics wanted to go on sprees and get drunk and raise Cain Saturday nights. He lived at home, when he wasn't reading technical books he'd play parts in amateur theatricals or step up to the piano in the evening and sing a good tenor in A Warrior Bold or A Spanish Cavalier.

He served his first year's apprenticeship in the machinshop without pay; the next two years he made a dollar and a half a week, the last year two dollars.

Pennsylvania was getting rich off iron and coal. When he was twentytwo, Fred Taylor went to work at the Midvale Iron Works. At first he had to take a clerical job, but he hated that and went to work with a shovel. At last he got them to put him on a lathe. He was a good machinist, he worked ten hours a day and in the evenings followed an engineering course at Stevens. In six years he rose from machinist's helper to keeper of toolcribs to gangboss to foreman to mastermechanic in charge of repairs to chief draftsman and director of research to chief engineer of the Midvale Plant.

The early years he was a machinist with the other machinists in the shop, cussed and joked and worked with the rest of them, soldiered on the job when they did. Mustn't give the boss more than his money's worth. But when he got to be foreman he was on the management's side of the fence, gathering in on the part of those on the management's side all the great mass of traditional knowledge which in the past has been in the heads of the workmen and in the physical skill and knack of the workman. He couldn't stand to see an idle lathe or an idle man.

Production went to his head and thrilled his sleepless nerves like liquor or women on a Saturday night. He never loafed and he'd be damned if anybody else would. Production was an itch under his skin.

He lost his friends in the shop; they called him niggerdriver. He was a stockily built man with a temper and a short tongue.

I was a young man in years but I give you my word I was a great deal older than I am now, what with the worry, meanness and contemptibleness of the whole damn thing. It's a horrid life for any man to live not being able to look any workman in the face without seeing hostility there, and a feeling that every man around you is your virtual enemy.

That was the beginning of the Taylor System of Scientific Management.

He was impatient of explanations, he didn't care whose hide he took off in enforcing the laws he believed inherent in the industrial process.

When starting an experiment in any field question everything, question the very foundations upon which the art rests, question the simplest, the most selfevident, the most universally accepted facts; prove everything, except the dominant Quaker Yankee (the New Bedford skippers were the greatest niggerdrivers on the whaling seas) rules of conduct. He boasted he'd never ask a workman to do anything he couldn't do.

He devised an improved steamhammer; he standardized tools and equipment, he filled the shop with college students with stop-watches and diagrams, tabulating, standardizing. There's the right way of doing a thing and the wrong way of doing it; the right way means increased production, lower costs, higher wages, bigger profits: the American plan.

He broke up the foreman's job into separate functions, speedbosses, gangbosses, timestudy men, orderofwork men.

The skilled mechanics were too stubborn for him, what he wanted was a plain handyman who'd do what he was told. If he was a first-class man and did firstclass work Taylor was willing to let him have firstclass pay; that's where he began to get into trouble with the owners.

At thirtyfour he married and left Midvale and took a flyer for the big money in connection with a pulpmill started in Maine by some admirals and political friends of Grover Cleveland's;

the panic of '93 made hash of that enterprise, so Taylor invented for himself the job of Consulting Engineer in Management and began to build up a fortune by careful investments.

The first paper he read before the American Society of Mechanical Engineers was anything but a success, they said he was crazy. I have found, he wrote in 1909, that any improvement is not only opposed but aggressively and bitterly opposed by the majority of men.

He was called in by Bethlehem Steel. It was in Bethlehem he made his famous experiments with handling pigiron; he taught a Dutchman name Schmidt to handle fortyseven tons instead of twelve and a half tons of pigiron a day and got Schmidt to admit he was as good as ever at the end of the day.

He was a crank about shovels, every job had to have a shovel of the right weight and size for that job alone; every job had to have a man of the right weight and size for that job alone; but when he began to pay his men in proportion to the increased efficiency of their work, the owners who were a lot of greedy small-eyed Dutchmen began to raise Hail Columbia; when Schwab bought Bethlehem Steel in 1901 Fred Taylor inventor of efficiency who had doubled the production of the stampingmill by speeding up the main lines of shafting from ninety-six to twohundred and twentyfive revolutions a minute was unceremoniously fired.

After that Fred Taylor always said he couldn't afford to work for money.

He took to playing golf (using golfclubs of his own design), doping out methods for transplanting huge boxtrees into the garden of his home.

At Boxly in Germantown he kept open house for engineers, factorymanagers, industrialists;

he wrote papers, lectured, appeared before a congressional committee, everywhere preached the virtues of scientific management and the Barth slide rule, the cutting down of waste and idleness, the substitution for skilled mechanics of the plain handyman (like Schmidt the pigiron handler) who'd move as he was told and work by the piece: production;

more steel rails more bicycles more spools of thread more armorplate for battleships more bedpans more barbedwire more needles more lightningrods more ballbearings more dollarbills;

(the old Quaker families of Germantown were growing rich, the Pennsylvania millionaires were breeding billionaires out of iron and coal) production would make every firstclass American rich who was willing to work at piecework and not drink or raise Cain or think or stand mooning at his lathe.

Thrifty Schmidt the pigiron handler can invest his money and get to be an owner like Schwab and the rest of the greedy small-eyed Dutchmen and cultivate a taste for Bach and have hundredyearold boxtrees in his garden at Bethlehem or Germantown or Chestnut Hill, and lay down the rules of conduct; the American plan.

But Fred Taylor never saw the working of the American plan;

in 1915 he went to the hospital in Philadelphia suffering from a breakdown.

Pneumonia developed; the nightnurse heard him winding his watch;

on the morning of his fiftyninth birthday, when the nurse went into his room to look at him at fourthirty,

he was dead with his watch in his hand.

1902 -- John Steinbeck -- —

BORN IN Salinas, California, Steinbeck attended California schools and spent some years (1919–1925) as a special student at Stanford University, leaving without a degree. He went to New York on a freight boat, worked in New York City for a while, then returned to California. As a winter watchman in the Sierra mountains, Steinbeck spent the very considerable leisure time in writing his first novel, The Cup of Gold, which was published in 1929 but caused no stir in literary circles and made no money. The next two novels, The Pastures of Heaven (1932) and To a God Unknown (1933), also failed to bring him either fame or fortune.

The publication of Tortilla Flat, in 1935, brought Steinbeck popularity, which increased steadily with the subsequent appearance of In Dubious Battle (1936) and Of Mice and Men (1937), and reached its peak with the publication of The Grapes of Wrath (1939). Steinbeck also wrote a considerable number of short stories, of which the collection The Long Valley (1938) and the story The Red Pony (first published in 1937 and often reprinted) are the best known.

Steinbeck's principal concern is for "the little man"—the exploited laborer, the independent, the paisano of the hills near Monterey. Though he was taken up by the leftists in the 1930's as a champion of the proletariat, In Dubious Battle is a strike novel not quite appropriate to the Marxist cause. It is the most objective and the most penetrating of the many leftwing novels which were produced in the decade. The characters of Mac, Jim, and Doc represent respectively the hard, practical, Communist organizer, the enthusiastic and eager neophyte who eventually goes beyond his mentor in self-sacrifice, and the objective scientist who looks upon strikes as another activity of man in the mass, available for investigation. "Why do you hang around with us if you aren't for us?" Mac asks Doc in one of the several conversations Steinbeck provides for purposes of ideological statement. "I want to see," Doc answers, and goes on to explain: "A man in a group isn't himself at all, he's a cell in an organism that isn't like him any more than the cells in your body are like you."

However much Steinbeck shared Doc's views, his sponsorship of the workers and of the "little man" generally continued to dominate his writings. Of Mice and Men is a highly contrived, theatrically planned short novel about the migrant workers in California wheat fields. His greatest success, Grapes of Wrath, describes the travels of the Joad family, from drouth-stricken Oklahoma to vigilante and police-controlled California. Throughout, the simplest and crudest gestures of these dispossessed people are endowed with a dignity and purpose which suggest Steinbeck's supreme confidence in them. "We ain't gonna die out," says Ma Joad to her son, Tom. "People is goin' on—changin' a little, maybe, but goin' right on." This speech suggests another affirmative statement, by Carl Sandburg, who in his The People, Yes expressed in poetry what Steinbeck attempted to say in his fiction:

The people will live on.
The learning and blundering people will live on.
The people so peculiar in renewal and comeback,
You can't laugh off their capacity to take it.
The mammoth rests between his cyclonic dramas.

Steinbeck's major themes are thus concerned with the people who have been abused and exploited, and at crucial times deprived of their land or of their means of livelihood. He is especially interested in the simple, naïve souls—small children, old men, the feeble-minded (as in The Pastures of Heaven and Of Mice and Men) and quaint, clever, and eccentric persons who elude social responsibility and thus make a gesture of protest against organized society. Tortilla Flat, Cannery Row (1945), and several of the short stories play up these characters in a manner reminiscent of the treatment Saroyan gives their cousins in his plays.

Steinbeck's literary manner varies from the hard kind of understatement and simple style which is Hemingway's contribution, to the semi-poetic, panoramic sweep of the inter-chapters of Grapes of Wrath. This novel is a curious mixture of simple, effective writing and the strangely didactic, pseudo-epic style of these inter-chapters. The success of the book was at least partly due to the immediate need for a statement such as it provided concerning the vast and obviously oppressive inequalities existing in the national economy. His latest books have steadily declined in effectiveness.

Steinbeck's novels are Cup of Gold, A Life of Henry Morgan, Buccaneer (1929); The Pastures of Heaven (1932); To a God Unknown (1933); Tortilla Flat (1935); In Dubious Battle (1936); Of Mice and Men (1937); The Grapes of Wrath (1939); The Moon Is Down (1943); The Wayward Bus (1947); The Pearl (1947). Short stories include Saint Katy the Virgin (1936); The Red Pony (1937); The Long Valley (1938). He has also written a dramatic version of Of Mice and Men (1937), and three books of travel and social comment, The Forgotten Village (1941), Sea of Cortez (with Edward F. Ricketts) (1941), and A Russian Journal (with pictures by Robert Capa) (1948). Harry Thornton Moore's The Novels of John Steinbeck (1939) is a full-length critical study. ### THE CHRYSANTHEMUMS

THE high gray-flannel fog of winter closed the Salinas Valley from the sky and from all the rest of the world. On every side it sat like a lid on the mountains and made of the great valley a closed pot. On the broad, level land floor the gang plows bit deep and left the black earth shining like metal where the shares had cut. On the foothill ranches across the Salinas River the yellow stubble fields seemed to be bathed in pale cold sunshine; but there was no sunshine in the valley now in December. The thick willow scrub along the river flamed with sharp and positive yellow leaves.

It was a time of quiet and of waiting. The air was cold and tender. A light wind blew up from the southwest so that the farmers were mildly hopeful of a good rain before long; but fog and rain do not go together.

Across the river, on Henry Allen's foothill ranch there was little work to be done, for the hay was cut and stored and the orchards were plowed up to receive the rain deeply when it should come. The cattle on the higher slopes were becoming shaggy and rough-coated.

Elisa Allen, working in her flower garden, looked down across the yard and saw Henry, her husband, talking to two men in business suits. The three of them stood by the tractor shed, each man with one foot on the side of the Little Fordson. They smoked cigarettes and studied the machine as they talked.

Elisa watched them for a moment and then went back to her work. She was thirty-five. Her face was lean and strong and her eyes were as clear as water. Her figure looked blocked and heavy in her gardening costume, a man's black hat pulled low down over her eyes, clodhopper shoes, a figured print dress almost completely covered by a big corduroy apron with four big pockets to hold the snips, the trowel and scratcher, the seeds and the knife she worked with. She wore heavy leather gloves to protect her hands while she worked.

She was cutting down the old year's chrysanthemum stalks with a pair of short and powerful scissors. She looked down toward the men by the tractor shed now and then. Her face was eager and mature and handsome; even her work with the scissors was overeager, overpowerful. The chrysanthemum stems seemed too small and easy for her energy.

She brushed a cloud of hair out of her eyes with the back of her glove, and left a smudge of earth on her cheek in doing it. Behind her stood the neat white farmhouse with red geraniums close-banked round it as high as the windows. It was a hard-swept-looking little house, with hard-polished windows, and a clean mat on the front steps.

Elisa cast another glance toward the tractor shed. The stranger men were getting into their Ford coupé. She took off a glove and put her strong fingers down into the forest of new green chrysanthemum sprouts that were growing round the old roots. She spread the leaves and looked down among the close-growing stems. No aphids were there, no sow bugs nor snails nor cutworms. Her terrier fingers destroyed such pests before they could get started.

Elisa started at the sound of her husband's voice. He had come near quietly and he leaned over the wire fence that protected her flower garden from cattle and dogs and chickens.

"At it again," he said. "You've got a strong new crop coming."

Elisa straightened her back and pulled on the gardening glove again. "Yes. They'll be strong this coming year." In her tone and on her face there was a little smugness.

"You've got a gift with things," Henry observed. "Some of those yellow chrysanthemums you had last year were ten inches across. I wish you'd work out in the orchard and raise some apples that big."

Her eyes sharpened. "Maybe I could do it too. I've a gift with things all right. My mother had it. She could stick anything in the ground and make it grow. She said it was having planter's hands that knew how to do it."

"Well, it sure works with flowers," he said.

"Henry, who were those men you were talking to?"

"Why, sure, that's what I came to tell you. They were from the Western Meat Company. I sold those thirty head of three-year-old steers. Got nearly my own price too."

"Good," she said. "Good for you."

"And I thought," he continued, "I thought how it's Saturday afternoon, and we might go into Salinas for dinner at a restaurant and then to a picture show—to celebrate, you see."

"Good," she repeated. "Oh, yes. That will be good."

Henry put on his joking tone. "There's fights to-night. How'd you like to go to the fights?"

"Oh, no," she said breathlessly. "No, I wouldn't like fights."

"Just fooling, Elisa. We'll go to a movie. Let's see. It's two now. I'm going to take Scotty and bring down those steers from the hill. It'll take us maybe two hours. We'll go in town about five and have dinner at the Cominos Hotel. Like that?"

"Of course I'll like it. It's good to eat away from home."

"All right, then. I'll go get up a couple of horses."

She said, "I'll have plenty of time to transplant some of these sets, I guess."

She heard her husband calling Scotty down by the barn. And a little later she saw the two men ride up the pale-yellow hillside in search of the steers.

There was a little square sandy bed kept for rooting the chrysanthemums. With her trowel she turned the soil over and over and smoothed it and patted it firm. Then she dug ten parallel trenches to receive the sets. Back at the chrysanthemum bed she pulled out the little crisp shoots, trimmed off the leaves of each one with her scissors, and laid it on a small orderly pile.

A squeak of wheels and plod of hoofs came from the road. Elisa looked up. The country road ran along the dense bank of willows and cottonwoods that bordered the river, and up this road came a curious vehicle, curiously drawn. It was an old springwagon, with a round canvas top on it like the cover of a prairie schooner. It was drawn by an old bay horse and a little gray-and-white burro. A big stubble-bearded man sat between the cover flaps and drove the crawling team. Underneath the wagon, between the hind wheels, a lean and rangy mongrel dog walked sedately. Words were painted on the canvas in clumsy, crooked letters. "Pots, pans, knives, scissors, lawn mowers, Fixed." Two rows of articles, and the triumphantly definitive "Fixed" below. The black paint had run down in little sharp points beneath each letter.

Elisa, squatting on the ground, watched to see the crazy loose-jointed wagon pass by. But it didn't pass. It turned into the farm road in front of her house, crooked old wheels skirling and squeaking. The rangy dog darted from beneath the wheels and ran ahead. Instantly the two ranch shepherds flew out at him. Then all three stopped, and with stiff and quivering tails, with taut straight legs, with ambassadorial dignity, they slowly circled, sniffing daintily. The caravan pulled up to Elisa's wire fence and stopped. Now the newcomer dog, feeling outnumbered, lowered his tail and retired under the wagon with raised hackles and bared teeth.

That man on the wagon seat called out, "That's a bad dog in a fight when he gets started."

Elisa laughed. "I see he is. How soon does he generally get started?"

The man caught up her laughter and echoed it heartily. "Sometimes not for weeks and weeks," he said. He climbed stiffly down over the wheel. The horse and the donkey drooped like unwatered flowers.

Elisa saw that he was a very big man. Although his hair and beard were graying, he did not look old. His worn black suit was wrinkled and spotted with grease. The laughter had disappeared from his face and eyes the moment his laughing voice ceased. His eyes were dark and they were full of the brooding that gets in the eyes of teamsters and of sailors. The calloused hands he rested on the fence were cracked, and every crack was a black line. He took off his battered hat.

"I'm off my general road, ma'am," he said. "Does this dirt road cut over across the river to the Los Angeles highway?"

Elisa stood up and shoved the thick scissors in her apron pocket. "Well, yes, it does, but it winds around and then fords the river. I don't think your team could pull through the sand."

He replied with some asperity, "It might surprise you what them beasts can pull through."

"When they get started?" she asked.

He smiled for a second. "Yes. When they get started."

"Well," said Elisa. "I think you'll save time if you go back to the Salinas road and pick up the highway there."

He drew a big finger down the chicken wire and made it sing. "I ain't in any hurry, ma'am. I go from Seattle to San Diego and back every year. Takes all my time. About six months each way. I aim to follow nice weather."

Elisa took off her gloves and stuffed them in the apron pocket with the scissors. She touched the under edge of her man's hat, searching for fugitive hairs. "That sounds like a nice kind of a way to live," she said.

He leaned confidentially over the fence. "Maybe you noticed the writing on my wagon. I mend pots and sharpen knives and scissors. You got any of them things to do?"

"Oh, no," she said quickly. "Nothing like that." Her eyes hardened with resistance.

"Scissors is the worst thing," he explained. "Most people just ruin scissors trying to sharpen 'em, but I know how. I got a special tool. It's a little bobbit kind of thing and patented. But it sure does the trick."

"No. My scissors are all sharp."

"All right, then. Take a pot," he continued earnestly, "a bent pot or a pot with a hole. I can make it like new so you don't have to buy no new ones. That's a saving for you."

"No," she said shortly. "I tell you I have nothing like that for you to do."

His face fell to an exaggerated sadness. His voice took on a whining undertone. "I ain't had a thing to do to-day. Maybe I won't have no supper to-night. You see I'm off my regular road. I know folks on the highway clear from Seattle to San Diego. They save their things for me to sharpen up because they know I do it so good and save them money."

"I'm sorry," Elisa said irritably. "I haven't anything for you to do."

His eyes left her face and fell to searching the ground. They roamed about until they came to the chrysanthemum bed where she had been working. "What's them plants, ma'am?"

The irritation and resistance melted from Elisa's face. "Oh, those are chrysanthemums, giant whites and yellows. I raise them every year, bigger than anybody around here."

"Kind of a long-stemmed flower? Looks like a quick puff of colored smoke?" he asked.

"That's it. What a nice way to describe them."

"They smell kind of nasty till you get used to them," he said.

"It's a good bitter smell," she retorted, "not nasty at all."

He changed his tone quickly. "I like the smell myself."

"I had ten-inch blooms this year," she said.

The man leaned farther over the fence. "Look. I know a lady down the road a piece has got the nicest garden you ever seen. Got nearly every kind of flower but no chrysanthemums. Last time I was mending a copper-bottom washtub for her (that's a hard job but I do it good), she said to me, 'If you ever run across some nice chrysanthemums I wish you'd try to get me a few seeds.' That's what she told me."

Elisa's eyes grew alert and eager. "She couldn't have known much about chrysanthemums. You can raise them from seed, but it's much easier to root the little sprouts you see there."

"Oh," he said. "I s'pose I can't take none to her, then."

"Why, yes, you can," Elisa cried. "I can put some in damp sand, and you can carry them right along with you. They'll take root in the pot if you keep them damp. And then she can transplant them."

"She'd sure like to have some, ma'am. You say they're nice ones?"

"Beautiful," she said. "Oh, beautiful." Her eyes shone. She tore off the battered hat and shook out her dark pretty hair. "I'll put them in a flower pot, and you can take them right with you. Come into the yard."

While the man came through the picket gate Elisa ran excitedly along the geranium-bordered path to the back of the house. And she returned carrying a big red flower pot. The gloves were forgotten now. She kneeled on the ground by the starting bed and dug up the sandy soil with her fingers and scooped it into the bright new flower pot. Then she picked up the little pile of shoots she had prepared. With her strong fingers she pressed them into the sand and tamped round them with her knuckles. The man stood over her. "I'll tell you what to do," she said. "You remember so you can tell the lady."

"Yes, I'll try to remember."

"Well, look. These will take root in about a month. Then she must set them out, about a foot apart in good rich earth like this, see?" She lifted a handful of dark soil for him to look at. "They'll grow fast and tall. Now remember this. In July tell her to cut them down, about eight inches from the ground."

"Before they bloom?" he asked.

"Yes, before they bloom." Her face was tight with eagerness. "They'll grow right up again. About the last of September the buds will start."

She stopped and seemed perplexed. "It's the budding that takes the most care," she said hesitantly. "I don't know how to tell you." She looked deep into his eyes searchingly. Her mouth opened a little, and she seemed to be listening. "I'll try to tell you," she said. "Did you ever hear of planting hands?"

"Can't say I have, ma'am."

"Well, I can only tell you what it feels like. It's when you're picking off the buds you don't want. Everything goes right down into your fingertips. You watch your fingers work.

They do it themselves. You can feel how it is. They pick and pick the buds. They never make a mistake. They're with the plant. Do you see? Your fingers and the plant. You can feel that, right up your arm. They know. They never make a mistake. You can feel it. When you're like that, you can't do anything wrong. Do you see that? Can you understand that?"

She was kneeling on the ground looking up at him. Her breast swelled passionately.

The man's eyes narrowed. He looked away self-consciously. "Maybe I know," he said. "Sometimes in the night in the wagon there —"

Elisa's voice grew husky. She broke in on him. "I've never lived as you do, but I know what you mean. When the night is dark—the stars are sharp-pointed, and there's quiet. Why, you rise up and up!"

Kneeling there, her hand went out toward his legs in the greasy black trousers. Her hesitant fingers almost touched the cloth. Then her hand dropped to the ground.

He said, "It's nice, just like you say. Only when you don't have no dinner it ain't."

She stood up, then, very straight, and her face was ashamed. She held the flower pot out to him and placed it gently in his arms. "Here. Put it in your wagon, on the seat, where you can watch it. Maybe I can find something for you to do."

At the back of the house she dug in the can pile and found two old and battered aluminum saucepans. She carried them back and gave them to him. "Here, maybe you can fix these."

His manner changed. He became professional. "Good as new I can fix them." At the back of his wagon he set a little anvil, and out of an oily tool box dug a small machine hammer. Elisa came through the gate to watch him while he pounded out the dents in the kettles. His mouth grew sure and knowing. At a difficult part of the work he sucked his under-lip.

"You sleep right in the wagon?" Elisa asked.

"Right in the wagon, ma'am. Rain or shine I'm dry as a cow in there."

"It must be nice," she said. "It must be very nice. I wish women could do such things."

"It ain't the right kind of a life for a woman."

Her upper lip raised a little, showing her teeth. "How do you know? How can you tell?" she said.

"I don't know, ma'am," he protested. "Of course I don't know. Now here's your kettles, done. You don't have to buy no new ones."

"How much?"

"Oh, fifty cents'll do. I keep my prices down and my work good. That's why I have all them satisfied customers up and down the highway."

Elisa brought him a fifty-cent piece from the house and dropped it in his hand. "You might be surprised to have a rival sometime. I can sharpen scissors too. And I can beat the dents out of little pots. I could show you what a woman might do."

He put his hammer back in the oily box and shoved the little anvil out of sight. "It would be a lonely life for a woman, ma'am, and a scary life, too, with animals creeping under the wagon all night." He climbed over the singletree, steadying himself with a hand on the burro's white rump. He settled himself in the seat, picked up the lines. "Thank you kindly, ma'am," he said. "I'll do like you told me; I'll go back and catch the Salinas road."

"Mind," she called, "if you're long in getting there, keep the sand damp."

"Sand, ma'am—sand? Oh, sure. You mean around the chrysanthemums. Sure I will." He clucked his tongue. The beasts leaned luxuriously into their collars. The mongrel dog took his place between the back wheels. The wagon turned and crawled out the entrance road and back the way it had come, along the river.

Elisa stood in front of her wire fence watching the slow progress of the caravan. Her shoulders were straight, her head thrown back, her eyes half-closed, so that the scene came vaguely into them. Her lips moved silently, forming the words "Good-by—good-by." Then she whispered, "That's a bright direction. There's a glowing there." The sound of her whisper startled her. She shook herself free and looked about to see whether anyone had been listening. Only the dogs had heard. They lifted their heads toward her from their sleeping in the dust, and then stretched out their chins and settled asleep again. Elisa turned and ran hurriedly into the house.

In the kitchen she reached behind the stove and felt the water tank. It was full of hot water from the noonday cooking. In the bathroom she tore off her soiled clothes and flung them into the corner. And then she scrubbed herself with a little block of pumice, legs and thighs, loins and chest and arms, until her skin was scratched and red. When she had dried herself she stood in front of a mirror in her bedroom and looked at her body. She tightened her stomach and threw out her chest. She turned and looked over her shoulder at her back.

After a while she began to dress slowly. She put on her newest underclothing and her nicest stockings and the dress which was the symbol of her prettiness. She worked carefully on her hair, pencilled her eyebrows, and rouged her lips.

Before she was finished, she heard the little thunder of hoofs and the shouts of Henry and his helper as they drove the red steers into the corral. She heard the gate bang shut and set herself for Henry's arrival.

His step sounded on the porch. He entered the house, calling, "Elisa, where are you?"

"In my room, dressing. I'm not ready. There's hot water for your bath. Hurry up. It's getting late."

When she heard him splashing in the tub, Elisa laid his dark suit on the bed, and shirt and socks and tie beside it. She stood his polished shoes on the floor beside the bed. Then she went to the porch and sat primly and stiffly down. She looked toward the river road where the willow-line was still yellow with frosted leaves so that under the high gray fog they seemed a thin band of sunshine. This was the only color in the gray afternoon. She sat unmoving for a long time.

Henry came banging out of the door, showing his tie inside his vest as he came. Elisa stiffened and her face grew tight. Henry stopped short and looked at her. "Why—why, Elisa. You look so nice!"

"Nice? You think I look nice? What do you mean by 'nice'?"

Henry blundered on. "I don't know. I mean you look different, strong and happy."

"I am strong? Yes, strong. What do you mean 'strong'?"

He looked bewildered. "You're playing some kind of a game," he said helplessly. "It's a kind of a play. You look strong enough to break a calf over your knee, happy enough to eat it like a watermelon."

For a second she lost her rigidity. "Henry! Don't talk like that. You didn't know what you said." She grew complete again. "I am strong," she boasted. "I never knew before how strong."

Henry looked down toward the tractor shed, and when he brought his eyes back to her, they were his own again. "I'll get out the car. You can put on your coat while I'm starting."

Elisa went into the house. She heard him drive to the gate and idle down his motor, and then she took a long time to put on her hat. She pulled it here and pressed it there. When Henry turned the motor off she slipped into her coat and went out.

The little roadster bounced along on the dirt road by the river, raising the birds and driving the rabbits into the brush. Two cranes flapped heavily over the willow-line and dropped into the river-bed.

Far ahead on the road Elisa saw a dark speck in the dust. She suddenly felt empty. She did not hear Henry's talk. She tried not to look; she did not want to see the little heap of sand and green shoots, but she could not help herself. The chrysanthemums lay in the road close to the wagon tracks. But not the pot; he had kept that. As the car passed them, she remembered the good bitter smell, and a little shudder went through her. She felt ashamed of her strong planter's hands, that were no use, lying palms up in her lap.

The roadster turned a bend and she saw the caravan ahead. She swung full round toward her husband so that she could not see the little covered wagon and the mismatched team as the car passed.

In a moment they had left behind them the man who had not known or needed to know what she said, the bargainer. She did not look back.

To Henry she said loudly, to be heard above the motor, "It will be good, to-night, a good dinner."

"Now you're changed again," Henry complained. He took one hand from the wheel and patted her knee. "I ought to take you in to dinner oftener. It would be good for both of us. We get so heavy out on the ranch."

"Henry," she said, "could we have wine at dinner?"

"Sure. Say! That will be fine."

She was silent for a while; then she said, "Henry, at those prize-fights do the men hurt each other very much?"

"Sometimes a little, not often. Why?"

"Well, I've read how they break noses, and blood runs down their chests. I've read how the fighting gloves get heavy and soggy with blood."

He looked round at her. "What's the matter, Elisa? I didn't know you read things like that." He brought the car to a stop, then turned to the right over the Salinas River bridge.

"Do any women ever go to the fights?" she asked.

"Oh, sure, some. What's the matter, Elisa? Do you want to go? I don't think you'd like it, but I'll take you if you really want to go."

She relaxed limply in the seat. "Oh, no. No. I don't want to go. I'm sure I don't." Her face was turned away from him. "It will be enough if we can have wine. It will be plenty." She turned up her coat collar so he could not see that she was crying weakly—like an old woman.

1913 -- Karl Jay Shapiro --

KARL SHAPIRO is one of the most promising of the younger poets who began their careers in the middle and late thirties. Educated at the Johns Hopkins University, Shapiro was first introduced to the public as one of New Directions' Five Young American Poets, in 1941. In 1942 his Person, Place and Thing appeared and established him as a poet of great gifts, one whose mastery of form and whose satirical talent were destined to give him an important position in the newer American poetry. He served in the Pacific area during the war; while there, his V-Letter and Other Poems, collected and edited by his wife, appeared (1944) and was awarded the Pulitzer prize. It is a collection of poems written, with few exceptions, in Australia and New Guinea. A number of them are on war themes, but Shapiro does not wish to be known as a "war poet"; as he says in the introduction to that volume: "I have not written these poems to accord with any doctrine or system of thought or even a theory of composition. I have nothing to offer in the way of beliefs or challenges or prosody. I try to write freely, one day as a Christian, the next as a Jew, the next as a soldier who sees the gigantic slapstick of modern war. . . . Certainly our contemporary man should feel divested of the stock attitudes of the last generation, the stance of the political intellectual, the proletarian, the expert, the salesman, the world-traveler, the pundit-poet."

In 1945 appeared Shapiro's Essay on Rime, which had been begun as a verse letter from New Guinea to a friend of his in Baltimore, and was expanded as a critical statement regarding the "three major confusions" in modern poetry, "In Prosody, in Language, and in Belief." Shapiro's most recent volume, Trial of a Poet (1947) contains much of his magazine verse written since 1945, some excerpts from an Australian volume, called The Place of Love, and a verse-and-prose drama from which the book takes its title. Since his return from the war, Shapiro has taught and lectured at several universities and currently is an associate professor at the Johns Hopkins University.

Shapiro's poems are in Five Young American Poets (1941); Person, Place and Thing (1942); The Place of Love (1943); V-Letter and Other Poems (1944); Trial of a Poet (1947). He has written several critical essays, notably "A Farewell to Criticism," published in Poetry, Jan., 1948; a collection of his essays is due to appear in 1949. For critical comment, see W. V. O'Connor, "Shapiro on Rime," Kenyon Review, Winter, 1946; William Carlos Williams, "Shapiro Is All Right," Kenyon Review, Winter, 1946; David Daiches, "The Poetry of Karl Shapiro," Poetry, Aug., 1945; W. V. O'Connor, Sense and Sensibility in Modern Poetry (1948).

UNIVERSITY

To hurt the Negro and avoid the Jew
 Is the curriculum. In mid-September
 The entering boys, identified by hats,
 Wander in a maze of mannered brick
   Where boxwood and magnolia brood
   And columns with imperious stance
   Like rows of ante-bellum girls
     Eye them, outlanders.

In white cells, on lawns equipped for peace,
 Under the arch, and lofty banister,       10
 Equals shake hands, unequals blankly pass;
 The exemplary weather whispers, 'Quiet, quiet'
 And visitors on tiptoe leave
 For the raw North, the unfinished
   West,
 As the young, detecting an advantage,
   Practice a face.

Where, on their separate hill, the colleges,
 Like manor houses of an older law,
 Gaze down embankments on a land in fee,
 The Deans, dry spinsters over family
   plate,   20
   Ring out the English name like coin,
   Humor the snob and lure the lout.
 Within the precincts of this world
   Poise is a club.

But on the neighboring range, misty and
 high,
 The past is absolute: some luckless race
 Dull with inbreeding and conformity Wears out its heart, and comes barefoot and bad
   For charity or jail. The scholar
   Sanctions their obsolete disease;       30
   The gentleman revolts with shame
     At his ancestor.

And the true nobleman, once a democrat, Sleeps on his private mountain. He was one
 Whose thought was shapely and whose dream was broad;
 This school he held his art and epitaph.
   But now it takes from him his name,
   Falls open like a dishonest look,

And shows us, rotted and endowed,
 Its senile pleasure.                       40

BUICK

As a sloop with a sweep of immaculate wing on her delicate spine
 And a keel as steel as a root that holds in the sea as she leans,
 Leaning and laughing, my warm-hearted beauty, you ride, you ride,
 You tack on the curves with parabola speed and a kiss of goodbye,
 Like a thoroughbred sloop, my new high-spirited spirit, my kiss.

As my foot suggests that you leap in the air with your hips of a girl,
 My finger that praises your wheel and announces your voices of song,
 Flouncing your skirts, you blueness of joy,
 you flirt of politeness,
 You leap, you intelligence, essence of wheel-
 ness with silvery nose,
 And your platinum clocks of excitement stir like the hairs of a fern.                       10

But how alien you are from the booming belts of your birth and the smoke
 Where you turned on the stinging lathes of Detroit and Lansing at night
 And shrieked at the torch in your secret parts and amorous tests,
 But now with your eyes that enter the future
 of roads you forget;
 You are all instinct with your phosphorous glow and your streaking hair.

And now when we stop it is not as the bird from the shell that I leave
 Or the leathery pilot who steps from his bird with a sneer of delight,
 And not as the ignorant beast do you squat
 and watch me depart,
 But with exquisite breathing you smile, with satisfaction of love,
 And I touch you again as you tick in the silence and settle in sleep.                       20

THE FLY

O HIDEOUS little bat, the size of snot,
 With polyhedral eye and shabby clothes,
 To populate the stinking cat you walk
 The promontory of the dead man's nose,
 Climb with the fine leg of a Duncan-Phyfe
     The smoking mountains of my food
     And in a comic mood
 In mid-air take to bed a wife.

Riding and riding with your filth of hair
 On gluey foot or wing, forever coy,      10
 Hot from the compost and green sweet decay,
 Sounding your buzzer like an urchin toy —
 You dot all whiteness with diminutive stool,
     In the tight belly of the dead
     Burrow with hungry head
 And inlay maggots like a jewel.

At your approach the great horse stomps and paws
 Bringing the hurricane of his heavy tail;
 Shod in disease you dare to kiss my hand
 Which sweeps against you like an angry flail;
 Still you return, return, trusting your wing 21
     To draw you from the hunter's reach
     That learns to kill to teach Disorder to the tinier thing.

My peace is your disaster. For your death
 Children like spiders cup their pretty hands
 And wives resort to chemistry of war.
 In fens of sticky paper and quicksands
 You glue yourself to death. Where you are stuck
 You struggle hideously and beg      30
     You amputate your leg
 Imbedded in the amber muck.

But I, a man, must swat you with my hate,
 Slap you across the air and crush your flight Must mangle with my shoe and smear your blood,
 Expose your little guts pasty and white,
 Knock your head sidewise like a drunkard's
     hat,
 Pin your wings under like a crow's,
     Tear off your flimsy clothes
 And beat you as one beats a rat.      40

Then like Gargantua I stride among
 The corpses strewn like raisins in the dust,
 The broken bodies of the narrow dead
 That catch the throat with fingers of disgust.
 I sweep. One gyrates like a top and falls
     And stunned, stone blind, and deaf
     Buzzes its frightful F
 And dies between three cannibals.

1865 ~ Irving Babbitt ~ 1933

WRITER, teacher, and admittedly the leader of the New Humanist movement, Babbitt hailed from the Middle West, his native city being Dayton, Ohio. After his graduation from Harvard he spent two years studying at the Sorbonne. In 1893-1894 he was an instructor in Romance languages at Williams College, returning to Harvard the following year as instructor in French. In 1902 he was promoted to an assistant professorship, and in 1912 to a full professorship, a position which he held until his death. He achieved fame through his writings, lectured extensively before college audiences throughout the United States, and in 1923 served as the Harvard exchange professor at the Sorbonne. The American Academy of Arts and Letters elected him to membership in 1930. Besides his original writings, he edited for college classes books by Renan, Taine, Voltaire, and Racine.

Probably few Americans of modern times have stirred up as much discussion and controversy as Babbitt has in his books, all of which treat some phase or other of his humanistic doctrine. In his first book, Literature and the American College (1908), he describes Humanism as the search for individual perfection through selective discipline. It is aristocratic in temper, and concerns itself only with the individual as against society as a whole. The unique purpose of it is to help man overcome his natural propensity to one-sidedness, as manifested, for instance, in modern educational emphasis upon specialization, or in the human tendency to let one or another aspect of personality, such as the emotions, dominate and control conduct. Babbitt had as his ideal a man who could harmonize within himself all the qualities of his nature, what he calls the opposite virtues, through obedience to the law of measure, which in turn saved him from excesses. This ideal man is characterized by a poised equilibrium of all his powers in which the extremes of the opposing virtues, as seen in the ideas of unity and plurality, or as Plato expresses it, the combination of the "one with the many," are held in balance. Only such a balance can preserve mental sanity. As far as Babbitt is concerned, this ideal, based upon the classical tradition, can stem the tide of excessive sympathy, primitivism, and emotionalism let loose by Rousseau and appropriated by the Romantics. The remainder of the book is a discussion of the educational problems as affected by this approach.

The New Laokoön (1910), an essay in comparative aesthetics, is a study of the confusion of the arts as a result of the Romantic movement. In The Masters of Modern French Criticism (1912) he investigates nineteenth-century French critics to ascertain the movement of thought represented by them, as well as to erect a background against which the anti-intellectual revolt of the day can be studied and understood. The problem of critical standards is involved, and so is the philosophical problem of finding a unifying principle in the flux of life, as against the intuitive sense of change proposed and accepted by some of the newer philosophers. Babbitt returns to the Platonic "one and the many" as the core of the critical and philosophical attitude. Rousseau and Romanticism (1919) attacks the ideals of the Romanticists and the baneful effects, which in his estimation they have had on modern civilization. Democracy and Leadership (1924) is a searching analysis of democratic society in reference to its ability to set up standards for its own development. His last book, On Being Creative (1932), is a collection of miscellaneous essays unified by their general bearing on literary criticism.

Babbitt believed with Arnold that criticism had a determining influence upon creative literature. With that constantly in mind he sought for a philosophy of life in which he could find the necessary critical standards of judgment, and which would point the way for the future development of literature. The entire body of his work is a protest and reaction against many of the younger critics who flouted the application of standards in criticism and viewed them doubtfully in life. The problem resolves itself ultimately to the problem of the essential nature of man. The younger writers and critics accepted the scientific view that man is a biological entity, determined by heredity and environment, two forces for which he is not responsible, and over which he has no control. He is what he is because of these forces, and refuses to take any responsibility for his conduct, aside from the impulses and intuitions which drive him. Against this view Babbitt set his humanistic ideal of man who is not helpless in the clutch of circumstance, but who has shown in the past that he has a power of choice, who has exercised self-control by resorting to an "inner check," and who has therefore determined the course of his conduct through an ethical will to refrain as well as to act. The younger group will accept man even at his worst; Babbitt will accept him only at his best.

He was primarily interested in establishing a philosophy of criticism which permits definite standards, rather than the application of these standards in critical practice. In the Babel of voices released by the Humanist explosion in the late twenties Babbitt was heard only occasionally, sometimes speaking with Jovian authority, at other times taking pains to say over again what he had already said, not always to his advantage.

Babbitt was the author of Literature and the American College (1908); The New Laokoön (1910); The Masters of Modern French Criticism (1912); Rousseau and Romanticism (1919); Democracy and Leadership (1924); French Literature (1928); On Being Creative and Other Essays (1932). The best biographical account is in P. E. More, "Irving Babbitt," American Review, April, 1934. The most exhaustive study of Babbitt is in F. E. McMahon, The Humanism of Irving Babbitt (1931). Other critical studies are: J. L. Adams, "Humanism and Creation," Hound and Horn, Oct.-Dec., 1932; T. S. Eliot, For Lancelot Andrews (1928); G. R. Elliott, Humanism and Imagination (1938); W. In Humanism and America (1930), Norman Foerster collected and edited a group of essays by spokesmen for the Humanist movement. In The Critique of Humanism (1930), C. H. Grattan brought together the views of the opponents.

ON BEING ORIGINAL

First published in the Atlantic, March, 1908; reprinted in Literature and the American College.

THERE has been a radical change during the last hundred years in the world's attitude toward originality. An age of conformity has given way to an age of self-assertion; so that nowadays a man makes a bid for fame by launching a paradox, much as he might have done in the time of Pope by polishing a commonplace. Then, even a person of genuine originality was in danger of being accounted freakish. Now, many a man passes for original who is in reality only freakish. Boileau, speaking for the old criticism, says that Perrault was "bizarre"; Sainte-Beuve, speaking for the new, says that Perrault had genius. From the outset, the neo-classic critics stifled free initiative in the name of the "rules," and opposed to every attempt at innovation the authority of Aristotle and the ancients. The relation of the literary aspirant to the "models" during this period is not unfairly summed up in the words of the comic opera,—

"Of course you can never be like us,
But be as like us as you're able to be."

Later, under French influence, the tyranny of etiquette was added to the tyranny of classical imitation. Aristotle was reinforced by the dancing master. Social convention so entwined itself about the whole nature of a Frenchman of the Old Régime that it finally became almost as hard for him as we may suppose it is for a Chinaman to disengage his originality from the coils of custom. The very word original was often used as a term of ridicule and disparagement. Brossette writes of the Oriental traveler Tavernier that he is "brutal and even a bit original." "When it is desired to turn any one to ridicule," writes Boursault about the same time, "he is said to be an original sans copie." Anything in literature or art that departed from the conventional type was pronounced "monstrous." La Harpe applies this epithet to the Divine Comedy, and points out how inferior the occasional felicities of this "absurd and shapeless rhapsody" are to the correct beauties of a true epic like Voltaire's Henriade.

And so we might go on, as Mr. Saintsbury, for example, does for scores of pages in his History of Criticism, exposing the neo-classic narrowness, and setting forth in contrast the glories of our modern emancipation. But this is to give one's self the pleasure, as the French would say, of smashing in open doors. Instead of engaging in this exhilarating pastime, we might, perhaps, find more profit in inquiring, first, into the definite historical reasons that led to the triumph of the so-called school of good sense over the school of genius and originality; and second, in seeking for the element of truth that lurked beneath even the most arid and unpromising of the neo-classic conventions. For if, like Mr. Saintsbury and many other romanticists, we reject the truth along with the convention, we shall simply fall from one extreme into another.

The whole subject of originality is closely bound up with what is rather vaguely known as individualism. We must recollect that before the disciplinary classicism of the later Renaissance there was an earlier Renaissance which was in a high degree favorable to originality. At the very beginning of this earlier period, Petrarch made his famous plea for originality, in a letter to Boccaccio, and established his claim, in this as in other respects, to be considered the first modern man. "Every one," says Petrarch, "has not only in his countenance and gestures, but also in his voice and language, something peculiarly his own (quiddam suum ac proprium), which it is both easier and wiser to cultivate and correct than it is to alter." And so many of the Italians who followed Petrarch set out to cultivate the quiddam suum ac proprium, often showing real ardor for self-expression, and still oftener, perhaps, using the new liberty merely as a cloak for license. Society finally took alarm, not only at the license, but at the clash of rival originalities, each man indulging in his own individual sense without much reference to the general or common sense of mankind. We need not, however, repeat what we have already said in our first essay about the reaction of the later Renaissance against an excessive individualism. This reaction, especially in France and Italy, soon ran into excesses of its own. Yet we must not forget that, at the moment when the neo-classic disciplinarian appeared on the scene, the great creative impulse of the early Renaissance was already dying out or degenerating into affectation. The various forms of bad taste that spread like an epidemic over Europe at the end of the sixteenth century and beginning of the seventeenth (cultism, Marinism, euphuism, préciosité, etc.), have their common source in a straining to be original in defiance of sound reason. We may say of the writers of these different schools as a class that, in spite of occasional lyrical felicities, they have "all the nodosities of the oak without its strength and all the contortions of the Sibyl without the inspiration."

The school of good sense was the natural and legitimate protest against this pseudo-originality. But this school can be justified on higher grounds than simply as a reaction from a previous excess. It tried to apply, however imperfectly, the profound doctrine of Aristotle that the final test of art is not its originality, but its truth to the universal. The question is one of special interest because we are living in an age that comes at the end of a great era of expansion, comparable in some ways to that of the Renaissance. Now, as then, there is a riot of so-called originality. In the name of this originality art is becoming more and more centrifugal and eccentric. As the result of our loss of standards, the classicist would complain, we are inbreeding personal and national peculiarities and getting farther and farther away from what is universally human.

In other words, the chief ambition of our modern art, which resembles in this respect some of the art of the later Renaissance, is to be original. The first aim of both classic and neo-classic art, on the other hand, was to be representative. Aristotle had said that it is not enough to render a thing as it is in this or that particular case, but as it is in general; and he goes on to say that the superiority of poetry over history lies in the fact that it has more of this universality, that it is more concerned with the essentials and less with the accidents of human nature. The weakness of neo-classic art was that it substituted the rule of thumb and servile imitation for direct observation in deciding what were accidents and what were essentials. It was ready to proscribe a thing as "monstrous,"—that is, as outside of nature,—when in reality it was simply outside the bounds set by certain commentators on Aristotle. The artist had to conform to the conventional types established in this way, even if he sacrificed to them poignancy and directness of emotion. He was limited by the type not only in dealing with any particular literary form,—tragedy, epic, and so forth,—but even in his creating of individual characters. For example, he must be careful not to paint a particular soldier, but the typical soldier, and of course he was not to depart too far from the classical models in deciding what the traits of the typical soldier are. Thus Rymer condemns Iago because he is not true to the "character constantly worn by soldiers for some thousands of years in the world." According to Rymer, again, the queen in one of Beaumont and Fletcher's plays oversteps the bounds of decorum. Some particular queen, Rymer admits, may have acted in this way; but she must be rid of all her "accidental historical impudence" before she can become an orthodox, typical queen, entitled to "stalk in tragedy on her high shoes."

The attempt of the neo-classicists to tyrannize over originality and restrict the creative impulse in the name of the type was bound in the long run to provoke a reaction. To carry through the difficult and delicate task of breaking with convention some man of more than Socratic wisdom was needed; instead, this task was undertaken by the "self-torturing sophist, wild Rousseau." In almost the opening sentence of his Confessions Rousseau strikes the note that is heard throughout the nineteenth century, from the early romanticists to Ibsen and Sudermann: "If I am not better than other men, at least I am different." By this gloating sense of his own departure from the type Rousseau became the father of eccentric individualists. By his insistence on the rights and legitimacy of unrestrained emotion he inaugurated the age of storm and stress, not only in Germany, but throughout Europe. Our modern impressionists, who would make of their own sensibility the measure of all things, are only his late-born disciples.

Emotion, insists the classicist, must be disciplined and subdued to what is typical; else it will be eccentric and not true to the human heart. "The human heart of whom?" cries Alfred de Musset, like a true disciple of Jean-Jacques. "The human heart of what? Even though the devil be in it, I have my human heart of my own—j'ai mon cœur humain, moi." The whole of French romanticism is in that moi. Away with stale authority, usage, and tradition, that would come between a man and his own spontaneity, and keep him from immediate contact with "nature." Let him once more see the world bathed in the fresh wonder of the dawn. To this end let him discard books ("a dull and endless strife") and live as if "none had lived before him."

Every man, in short, is to be an original genius. It was the assumption of this attitude by Rousseau's followers in Germany that gave its name to a whole literary period (Geniezeit). Germany sought its emancipation from convention, not, as Lessing would have wished, through the discipline of reason, but through "genius" and "originality," which meant in practice the opening of the floodgates of sentiment. We can imagine the disgust with which Lessing looked on the Rousseauism of the youthful Goethe. In "Werther," critics are accused of being in a conspiracy against originality. Their rules are compared to a system of dams and trenches with which the critics protect their own little cabbage-patches against genius, whose impetuous waves would otherwise burst forth and overwhelm them, and at the same time astound the world. One thinks of Lessing's admirable defense of criticism, of the passage in which he confesses that he owes all he has, not to genius and originality, but to a patient assimilation of the wisdom of the past. "Without criticism I should be poor, cold, short-sighted. I am, therefore, always ashamed or annoyed when I hear or read anything in disparagement of criticism. It is said to suppress genius, and I flattered myself that I had gained from it something very nearly approaching genius. I am a lame man who cannot possibly be edified by abuse of his crutch."

We are still inclined to side with original genius against what Lessing calls criticism.

Criticism itself has come to mean nowadays mere appreciativeness, instead of meaning, as it did for Lessing, the application of standards of judgment. It may, however, appear some day how much the great romantic leaders, Shelley for example, suffered from the absence of just what Lessing called criticism. Men may then grow weary of a genius and originality that are at bottom only an outpouring of undisciplined emotion. One whole side of our American transcendental school is only a belated echo of German romanticism, which itself continues the age of original genius. There is special danger even in Emerson's conception of originality, and the unbounded deference with which it fills him for the untrained individual. Every man, to become great, merely needs, it would appear, to plant himself indomitably on his instincts; but it is not safe for the average person to trust so blindly to what Rymer would have called his own "maggot." Hawthorne, the best observer of the group, has left an account of some of the nightmare originalities that were developed under the Concord influence.

We read of a certain character in one of Marivaux's plays: "He is a man whose first impulse is to ask, not, 'Do you esteem me?' but, 'Are you surprised at me?' His purpose is not to convince us that he is better than other people, but that he resembles himself alone." The comedy in which this eighteenth-century Bernard Shaw figures was written a number of years before Rousseau assumed the Armenian costume and began to agitate Europe with his paradoxes. Since Rousseau the world has become increasingly familiar with the man who poses and attitudinizes before it and is not satisfied until he can draw its attention to the traits that establish his own uniqueness. The eccentric individualist not only rejoices in his own singularity, but is usually eager to thrust it on other people. His aim is to startle, or, as the French would say, to épater le bourgeois, to make the plain citizen "stare and gasp." Dr. Johnson said of Lord Monboddo that if he had had a tail he would have been as proud of it as a squirrel. Perhaps Rousseau was never more deeply hurt than by the lady who said, on breaking with him, "You're just like other men." This, as a French critic remarks, was a home thrust that one of Molière's soubrettes could not have improved upon. The claim of Rousseau and his earlier followers was to be not simply unique, but unique in feeling. This sentiment of uniqueness in feeling speedily became that of uniqueness in suffering—on the familiar principle, no doubt, that life, which is a comedy for those who think, is a tragedy for those who feel. Hence arose in the romantic school a somewhat theatrical affectation of grief. Byron was far from being the first who paraded before the public "the pageant of his bleeding heart." Chateaubriand especially nourished in himself the sense of fated and preëminent sorrow, and was ready to exclaim at the most ordinary mischance: "Such things happen only to me!" Sainte-Beuve makes an interesting comparison between Chateaubriand and another native of Brittany, the author of Gil Blas. "A book like René," says Sainte-Beuve, "encourages a subtle spiritual pride. A man seeks in his imagination some unique misfortune to which he may abandon himself and which he may fold about him in solitude. He says to himself that a great soul must contain more sorrow than a little one; and adds in a whisper that he himself may be this great soul. Gil Blas, on the other hand, is a book that brings you into full contact with life and the throng of your fellow creatures. When you are very gloomy and believe in fatality and imagine that certain extraordinary things happen to you alone, read Gil Blas, and you will find that he had that very misfortune or one just like it, and that he took it as a simple mishap and got over it."

The same contrast might be brought out by comparing Montaigne and Rousseau, the two writers who, in a broad sense, are the masters respectively of Lesage and Chateaubriand. This contrast is easily missed, because at first glance Montaigne seems an arch-egotist like Rousseau, and is almost equally ready to bestow his own idiosyncrasies on the reader. Yet in the final analysis Montaigne is interested in Montaigne because he is a human being; Rousseau is interested in Rousseau because he is Jean-Jacques. Montaigne observes himself impartially as a normal specimen of the genus homo. Rousseau, as we have seen, positively gloats over his own otherwiseness. Montaigne aims to be the average, or, it would be less misleading to say, the representative man; Rousseau's aim is to be the extraordinary man, or original genius. Rousseau is an eccentric, Montaigne a concentric individualist. The sentence of Montaigne that sums him up is, "Every man bears within him the entire image of the human lot." Rousseau is rather summed up in his phrase, "There are souls that are too privileged to follow the common path," with its corollary that he is himself one of these privileged souls.

The nineteenth century saw the rise of a race of eccentric individualists, especially in art and literature, who, like Rousseau scorned the common path and strove to distinguish themselves from the bourgeois and philistine in everything, from the details of their dress to the refinements of their sensations. In this quest of the rare and the original they attained to a departure from the norm that was not only eccentric, but pathological. Every man was to have the right to express not only his own particular vision of life, but his own particular nightmare. We finally come to a writer like Baudelaire, who builds himself a "little strangely scented and strangely colored kiosk on the extreme tip of the romantic Kamchatka" and "cultivates his hysteria with delight and terror"; who, instead of being true to the human heart, as the old-fashioned classicist would say, makes it his ambition to create a "new shudder." All the modern writer cares for, says M. Anatole France, is to be thought original. In his fear of becoming commonplace he prides himself, like Victor Hugo, on reading only those books that other men do not read, or else he does not read at all, and so comes to resemble that eighteenth-century Frenchwoman who was said to have "respected in her ignorance the active principle of her originality." The danger of the man who is too assimilative, who possesses too perfectly the riches of tradition, is to feel that originality is henceforth impossible. It is related of a French critic that he used to turn away wearily from every new volume of poetry that was submitted to him, with the remark: "All the verses are written."

Genuine originality, however, is a hardy growth, and usually gains more than it loses by striking deep root into the literature of the past. La Bruyère begins his Characters by observing that "Everything has been said," and then goes on to write one of the most original books in French. Montaigne wrote a still more original book which often impresses the reader as a mere cento of quotations. An excessive respect for the past is less harmful than the excess from which we are now suffering. For example, one of our younger writers is praised in a review for his "stark freedom from tradition . . . as though he came into the world of letters without ever a predecessor. He is the expression in literary art of certain enormous repudiations." It is precisely this notion of originality that explains the immense insignificance of so much of our contemporary writing. The man who breaks with the past in this way will think that he is original when he is in reality merely ignorant and presumptuous. He is apt to imagine himself about a century ahead of his age when he is at least four or five centuries behind it. "He comes to you," as Bagehot puts it, "with a notion that Noah discarded in the ark, and attracts attention to it as if it were a stupendous novelty of his own."

We may be sure that the more enlightened of the Cave Dwellers had already made deeper discoveries in human nature than many of our modern radicals. Goethe said that if as a young man he had known of the masterpieces that already existed in Greek he would never have written a line. Goethe carries his modesty too far; but how grateful just a touch of it would be in the average author of today! With even a small part of Goethe's knowledge and insight, he would no longer go on serving up to us the dregs and last muddy lees of the romantic and naturalistic movements as originality and genius. He would see that his very paradoxes were stale. Instead of being a half-baked author, he would become a modest and at the same time judicious reader; or, if he continued to write, he would be less anxious to create and more anxious to humanize his creations. Sooner or later every author, as well as the characters he conceives, will have to answer the question that was the first addressed to any one who designed to enter the Buddhist church: "Are you a human being?" The world's suffrage will go in the long run to the writer or artist who dwells habitually in the center and not on the remote periphery of human nature. Gautier paid a doubtful compliment to Victor Hugo when he said that Hugo's works seemed to proceed not from a man, but an element, that they were Cyclopean, "as it were, the works of Polyphemus." Hugo remained the original genius to the end, in contrast with Goethe, who attained humane restraint after having begun as a Rousseauist.

Romanticism from the very beginning tended to become eccentric through over-anxiety to be original; and romanticism is now running to seed. Many of our contemporary writers are as plainly in an extreme as the most extreme of the neo-classicists. They think that to be original they need merely to arrive at self-expression without any effort to be representative. The neo-classicist, on the other hand, strove so hard to be representative that he often lost the personal flavor entirely and fell into colorless abstraction. Both extremes fail equally of being humane. For, to revert to our fundamental principle, the humanist must combine opposite extremes and occupy all the space between them. Genuine originality is so immensely difficult because it imposes the task of achieving work that is of general human truth and at the same time intensely individual. Perhaps the best examples of this union of qualities are found in Greek. The original man for the Greek was the one who could create in the very act of imitating the past. Greek literature at its best is to a remarkable degree a creative imitation of Homer.

The modern does not, like the Greek, hope to become original by assimilating tradition, but rather by ignoring it, or, if he is a scholar, by trying to prove that it is mistaken. We have been discussing thus far almost entirely the originality of the Rousseauist or sentimental naturalist; but we should not fail to note the curious points of contact here as elsewhere between sentimental and scientific naturalism. The Baconian aims less at the assimilation of past wisdom than at the advancement of learning. With him too the prime stress is on the new and the original.

Formerly there was a pedantry of authority and prescription. As a result of the working together of Rousseauist and Baconian there has arisen a veritable pedantry of originality. The scientific pedant who is entirely absorbed in his own bit of research is first cousin to the artistic and literary pedant who is entirely absorbed in his own sensation. The hero of modern scholarship is not the humanist, but the investigator. The man who digs up an unpublished document from some musty archive outranks the man who can deal judiciously with the documents already in print. His glory will be all the greater if he can make the new document a pretext for writing a book, for attempting a rehabilitation. The love of truth shades imperceptibly into the love of paradox; and Rousseauist and Baconian often coexist in the same person.

A royal road to a reputation for originality is to impugn the verdicts of the past,—to whitewash what is traditionally black or to blackwash what is traditionally white. Only the other day one of the English reviews published the "Blackwashing of Dante." A still better example is Renan's blackwashing of King David, which concludes as follows: "Pious souls, when they take delight in the sentiments filled with resignation and tender melancholy contained in the most beautiful of the liturgical books, will imagine that they are in communion with this bandit. Humanity will believe in final justice on the testimony of David, who never gave it a thought and of the Sibyl, who never existed," etc. The whitewashings have been still more numerous. Rehabilitations have appeared of Tiberius, the Borgias, and Robespierre. A book has also been written to prove that the first Napoleon was a man of an eminently peace-loving disposition. Mr. Stephen Phillips undertakes to throw a poetical glamour over the character of Nero, that amiable youth, who, as the versifier in Punch observes,—

"would have doubtless made his mark,
Had he not, in a mad, mad, boyish lark,
Murdered his mother!"

If this whitewashing and blackwashing goes on, the time will soon come when the only way left to be original will be to make a modest plea for the traditional good sense of the world. This traditional good sense was never treated with an easier contempt than at present. A writer named Bax, who recently published a volume rehabilitating the revolutionary monster Marat, says in his preface: "It is in fact a fairly safe rule to ascertain for oneself what most people think on such questions" (i.e. as the character of Marat), "and then assume the exact opposite to be true." Of most books of this kind we may say what FitzGerald said when Henry Irving made himself up in the rôle of Shylock to look like the Saviour: "It is an attempt to strike out an original idea in the teeth of common sense and tradition." Of course there are in every age and individual, as we have said elsewhere, elements that run counter to the main tendency. One of the regular recipes for writing German doctors' theses is to seize on one of these elements, exaggerate it, and take it as a point of departure for refuting the traditional view. Thus Rousseau says in one place that he has always detested political agitators. We may be sure in advance that some German will start from this to prove that Rousseau has been cruelly maligned in being looked on as a revolutionist.

Even our more serious scholars are finding it hard to resist that something in the spirit of the age which demands that their results be not only just, but novel. Even our older universities are becoming familiar with the professor who combines in about equal measure his love of research and his love of the limelight. In public opinion, the perfection of the type is the Chicago professor whose originality has become the jest of the cheap newspapers. Here are a few Chicago "discoveries," selected almost at random from the many that have been announced from time to time in the daily press:—

Kissing causes lockjaw.

The Pennsylvanians are turning into Indians.

A man does not need to take exercise after the age of thirty-five.

Music is antiseptic.

A dog will not follow an uneducated man.

Marriage is a form of insanity.
 Americans are incapable of friendship.
 Boccaccio was a Swede.

John D. Rockefeller is as great a man as Shakespeare.

Some day a wounded or even worn-out heart of a human may be replaced by a healthy heart from a living monkey, etc.

The Chicago professors would say, and no doubt rightly, that they are misrepresented by these newspaper statements. But we are only giving the general impression. Even the utterance of Dr. Osler that at once gave him such a start over all his academic rivals in the race for notoriety becomes comparatively unsensational when read in its context. The professor with an itch for the limelight has only to pattern himself on Rousseau, the great master of paradox. Rousseau's method has been compared to that of a man who fires off a pistol in the street to attract a crowd. When Rousseau has once drawn his crowd, he may proceed to attenuate his paradox, until sometimes it is in danger of dwindling into a commonplace.

Most good observers would probably agree that contemporary scholarship and literature are becoming too eccentric and centrifugal; they would agree that some unifying principle is needed to counteract this excessive striving after originality. For example, Professor Gummere, who is one of the most distinguished representatives of the scholarly tradition that ultimately goes back to Herder and the Grimm brothers, diagnoses our present malady with great clearness in a recent article on "Originality and Convention in Literature." The higher forms of poetry and creative art, he says, are being made impossible by the disintegrating influences at work in modern life, and by an excess of analysis. He suggests as remedy that we jettison this intellectual and analytical element, and seek to restore once more the bond of communal sympathy. This remedy betrays at once its romantic origin. It is only one form of Rousseau's assumption that an unaided sympathy will do more to draw men together than the naked forces of egoism and self-assertion will do to drive them asunder. Even in his studies of the beginnings of poetry Professor Gummere should, perhaps, have insisted more on communal discipline as a needful preliminary to communal sympathy. However that may be, our present hope does not seem to lie in the romanticist's attempt to revert to the unity of instinct and feeling that he supposes to have existed in primitive life. We need to commune and unite in what is above rather than in what is below our ordinary selves, and the pathway to this higher unity is not through sympathy, communal or otherwise, but through restraint. If we have got so far apart, it is because of the lack, not of sympathy, but of humane standards.

Without trying to enter fully into so large a topic as the impressionism of our modern society, its loss of traditional standards, and its failure as yet to find new, we may at least point out that education should be less infected than it is with a pedantic straining after originality. In general, education should represent the conservative and unifying element in our national life. The college especially must maintain humane standards, if it is to have any reason at all for existing as something distinct from university and preparatory school. Its function is not, as is so often assumed merely to help its students to self-expression, but even more to help them to become humane. In the words of Cardinal Newman, the college is "the great ordinary means to a great but ordinary end"; this end is to supply principles of taste and judgment and train in sanity and centrality of view; to give background and perspective, and inspire, if not the spirit of conformity, at least a proper respect for the past experience of the world. Most of us have heard of Mrs. Shelley's reply when advised to send her boy to a school where he would be taught to think for himself: "My God! teach him rather to think like other people." Mrs. Shelley had lived with a man who was not only a real genius, but also an original genius in the German sense, and knew whereof she spoke. Now the college should not necessarily teach its students to think like other people, but it should teach them to distinguish between what is original and what is merely odd and eccentric, both in themselves and others. According to Lowell this is a distinction that Wordsworth could never make, and Wordsworth is not alone in this respect among the romantic leaders. We must insist, at the risk of causing scandal, that the college is not primarily intended to encourage originality and independence of thought as these terms are often understood. The story is told of a professor in one of our Eastern colleges that he invariably gave a high mark to the undergraduates who contradicted the received opinions in his subjects; but the highest mark here served for the undergraduate who in addition to contradicting the traditional view set up a new view of his own. As this fact became known, the professor was gratified by a rapid growth among his students of independent and original thinking.

The college should guard against an undue stress on self-expression and an insufficient stress on human assimilation. This danger is especially plain in the teaching of English composition. A father once said to me of a "daily theme" course that it had at least set his son's wits to working. But what if it set them to working in the void? The most that can be expected of youths who are put to writing with little or no background of humane assimilation is a clever impressionism. They will be fitted, not to render serious service to literature, but at most to shine in the more superficial kinds of journalism. It is still an open question whether any direct method of teaching English really takes the place of the drill in the niceties of style that can be derived from translation, especially the translation of Latin; whether a student, for example, who rendered Cicero with due regard for the delicate shades of meaning would not gain more mastery of English (to say nothing of Latin) than a student who devoted the same amount of time to daily themes and original composition. We must, however, be fair to our departments of English. They have to cope with conditions not entirely of their own making, of which the most serious is something approaching illiteracy in many of the students that are forced upon them from the preparatory schools. In practice they have to devote most of their time to imparting, not the elegancies, but the simplest decencies of the English language. Ultimately a great deal of what goes on in the more elementary college courses in English may well be relegated to the lower schools,—and the home,—and the work that is done in the advanced courses in composition will probably either be omitted entirely, or else done, as it is in France, in connection with the reading and detailed study of great writers. Assimilation will then keep pace as it should with expression.

Spinoza says that a man should constantly keep before his eye a sort of exemplar of human nature (idea hominis, tamquam naturae humanae exemplar). He should, in other words, have a humane standard to which he may defer, and which will not proscribe originality but will help him to discriminate between what is original and what is merely freakish and abnormal in himself and others. Now this humane standard may be gained by a few through philosophic insight, but in most cases it will be attained, if at all, by a knowledge of good literature—by a familiarity with that golden chain of masterpieces which links together into a single tradition the more permanent experience of the race; books which so agree in essentials that they seem, as Emerson puts it, to be the work of one all-seeing, all-hearing gentleman. In short, the most practical way of promoting humanism is to work for a revival of the almost lost art of reading. As a general rule, the humane man will be the one who has a memory richly stored with what is best in literature, with the sound sense perfectly expressed that is found only in the masters. Conversely, the decline of humanism and the growth of Rousseauism have been marked by a steady decay in the higher uses of the memory. For the Greeks the Muses were not the daughters of Inspiration or of Genius, as they would be for a modern, but the daughters of Memory. Sainte-Beuve says that "from time to time we should raise our eyes to the hill-tops to the group of revered mortals, and ask ourselves: What would they say of us?" No one whose memory is not enriched in the way we have described can profit by this advice. Sainte-Beuve himself in giving it was probably only remembering Longinus.

1880 ~ Henry Louis Mencken ~ —

MENCKEN is a native of Baltimore and has lived in that city all his life. He was educated in private schools and the Baltimore Polytechnic Institute, but looked upon college as a waste of time, inasmuch as he was expected to join his father in the tobacco business. After the latter's death he secured a position on the Baltimore Morning Herald, and served on various papers until 1914, when he became co-editor of The Smart Set with George Jean Nathan. From 1924 to 1933 he edited The American Mercury.

To begin with, Mencken maintains that criticism must be emancipated from the mistaken notion that it deals with ideas at second hand. Criticism is an art, the critic an artist who seeks self-expression as does the poet, painter, novelist, or musician, the only difference being that he proceeds from the vantage point of another's ideas, rather than his own. He has the same desire for the free play of his powers, the same zeal to give permanent form to ideas, and the same hope to draw to himself the attention of thinking people. But the final product is therefore primarily the expression of the critic's ideas. For that reason Mencken approves of the methods of the earlier reviewers who wrote lengthy treatises on subjects suggested by the work or works under consideration. And in whatever he has written, his personality colors and dominates the scene.

Though he is not a scholar in the technical or professional sense of the term, the range of his interests and information is amazing, and he has explored many areas in the world's intellectual and artistic geography. The mere titles of his books convey an idea of this range—The Philosophy of Friedrich Nietzsche (1908), In Defense of Women (1918), Prejudices (six series, 1919–1927), Notes on Democracy (1926), Treatise on the Gods (1930), Treatise on Right and Wrong (1934), and The American Language (which has gone through four revisions, the last in 1936, and has acquired two supplements, each as long as the last version of the original book). He has entered the fields of philosophy, literature and art, linguistics, politics, economics, ethics, and religion.

In method he is iconoclastic and destructive. He rather frowns upon so-called constructive criticism as futile. By some he has been called the debunker of American literature, for many established reputations have fallen under his sturdy hammer strokes. But he is not entirely negative in his thought; he was instrumental in helping to establish reputations, as in the cases of Dreiser and Cabell. To him nothing is sacred, he bows before no idol or standard, feels no reverence for tradition or accepted usage, and belabors Bryan and God with equal vehemence. In philosophy he was in some respects a disciple of Nietzsche; in religion he owes much to Darwin, Spencer, and Huxley.

Besides dullness and stupidity the chief objects of his venom are sham, pretense, and hypocrisy, in whatever form they may appear. He would have human beings emerge from under the dead weight of the past, assert their dignity and power in the light of growing knowledge and intelligence, and achieve their destiny through urges from within rather than through inspiration from without. An American Nietzschean, he is an enemy of both democracy and socialism, and an upholder of the doctrine of laissez-faire. "I am in many fields a flouter of the accepted revelation and hence immoral, but the field of economics is not one of them. Here, indeed, I know of no man who is more orthodox than I am. I believe that the present organization of society, as bad as it is, is better than any other that has ever been proposed. I reject all the sure cures in current agitation from government ownership to the single tax. I am in favor of free competition in all human enterprises, and to the utmost limit."

Mencken wrote against the background of a changing America; ideas, standards, and authority were tested, found wanting, and discarded. In The American Mercury, Mencken appealed to postwar attitudes and, to the great evident enjoyment of the magazine's growing list of subscribers, struck out at conventional stupidities and barbarities, which he collected and arranged with a scholar's zeal. Yet his criticism is chiefly that of a journalist, momentary, clever, typed, and only superficially provided with intellectual background. For all Mencken's intellectual interests (and they were many) he is not a great critic, but rather one who caught the attention of a public which liked whole-hearted and clever attacks upon its scarcely cherished institutions.

Since most of Mencken's books are of a critical nature no attempt will be made to classify them. Representative titles will be listed chronologically as follows: George Bernard Shaw: His Plays (1905); The Philosophy of Friedrich Nietzsche (1908); A Little Book in C Major (1916); A Book of Prefaces (1917); In Defense of Women (1918); The American Language (1919, rev. 1921, 1923, 1935); Prejudices (6 vols., 1919-27); The American Credo, introduction by G. J. Nathan (1920, rev. 1921); Notes on Democracy (1926); James Branch Cabell (1927); Treatise on the Gods (1930); Treatise on Right and Wrong (1934). I. Goldberg, The Man Mencken (1925), is a full-length biographical study. Briefer accounts are available in J. Farrar, ed., The Literary Spotlight (1924); G. J. Nathan, The Intimate Notebooks of George Jean Nathan (1932); E. Clark, Innocence Abroad (1931); O. Hatteras, Pistols for Two (1917), said to have been written by Nathan and Mencken under a pseudonym. Available critical studies are J. W. Beach, The Outlook for American Prose (1926); E. Boyd, H. L. Mencken (1925); J. B. Cabell, Some of Us (1930); V. F. Calverton, The Newer Spirit (1925); H. S. Canby, American Estimates (1929); B. DeCasseres, Mencken and Shaw (1930); C. Van Doren, Many Minds (1924); S. P. Sherman, Critical Woodcuts (1926); S. P. Sherman, Americans (1922); F. L. Pattee, Side-Lights on American Literature (1922); H. Wickham, The Impuritans (1929); Van W. Brooks, Sketches in Criticism (1932); R. Forsythe, Redder Than the Rose (1935); F. Harris, Contemporary Portraits (4th ser., 1923); E. S. Sergeant, Fire Under the Andes (1927); H. M. Parshley, "H. L. Mencken: an Appreciation," American Review, Jan.–Feb., 1925; W. Lippmann, Men of Destiny (1927); B. Rascoe and others, H. L. Mencken (1920); J. B. Harrison, A Short View of Menckanism in Menckenesse (1927); Menckeniana: a Schimpf-lexikon (1928); T. Maynard, "Mencken Leaves 'The American Mercury'," Catholic World, April, 1934; S. Collins, "Criticism in America," Bookman, June, 1930; C. Van Doren, "Smartness and Light. H. L. Mencken: A Gadfly for Democracy," Century, March, 1923; I. Babbitt, "The Critic and American Life," Forum, Feb., 1928; G. K. Chesterton, "The Skeptic as Critic," Forum, Feb., 1929; C. F. Glicksberg, "H. L. Mencken: The Dean of Iconoclasts," Calcutta Review, April, 1938.

FOOTNOTE ON CRITICISM

From Prejudices: Third Series (1922).

NEARLY all the discussions of criticism that I am acquainted with start off with a false assumption, to wit, that the primary motive of the critic, the impulse which makes a critic of him instead of, say, a politician, or a stock-broker, is pedagogical—that he writes because he is possessed by a passion to advance the enlightenment, to put down error and wrong, to disseminate some specific doctrine: psychological, epistemological, historical, or aesthetic. This is true, it seems to me, only of bad critics, and its degree of truth increases in direct ratio to their badness. The motive of the critic who is really worth reading—the only critic of whom, indeed, it may be said truthfully that it is at all possible to read him, save as an act of mental discipline—is something quite different. That motive is not the motive of the pedagogue, but the motive of the artist. It is no more and no less than the simple desire to function freely and beautifully, to give outward and objective form to ideas that bubble inwardly and have a fascinating lure in them, to get rid of them dramatically and make an articulate noise in the world. It was for this reason that Plato wrote the "Republic," and for this reason that Beethoven wrote the Ninth Symphony, and it is for this reason, to drop a million miles, that I am writing the present essay. Everything else is afterthought, mock-modesty, messianic delusion—in brief, affectation and folly. Is the contrary conception of criticism widely cherished? Is it almost universally held that the thing is a brother to jurisprudence, advertising, laparotomy, cha-tauqua lecturing and the art of the school-marm? Then certainly the fact that it is so held should be sufficient to set up an overwhelming probability of its lack of truth and sense. If I speak with some heat, it is as one who has suffered. When, years ago, I devoted myself diligently to critical pieces upon the writings of Theodore Dreiser, I found that practically every one who took any notice of my proceedings at all fell into either one of two assumptions about my underlying purpose: (a) that I had a fanatical devotion for Mr. Dreiser's ideas and desired to propagate them, or (b) that I was an ardent patriot, and yearned to lift up American literature. Both assumptions were false. I had then, and I have now, very little interest in many of Mr. Dreiser's main ideas; when we meet, in fact, we usually quarrel about them. And I am wholly devoid of public spirit, and haven't the least lust to improve American literature; if it ever came to what I regard as perfection my job would be gone. What, then, was my motive in writing about Mr. Dreiser so copiously? My motive, well known to Mr. Dreiser himself and to every one else who knew me as intimately as he did, was simply and solely to sort out and give coherence to the ideas of Mr. Mencken, and to put them into suave and ingratiating terms, and to discharge them with a flourish, and maybe with a phrase of pretty song, into the dense fog that blanketed the Republic.

The critic's choice of criticism rather than of what is called creative writing is chiefly a matter of temperament—perhaps, more accurately of hormones—with accidents of education and environment to help. The feelings that happen to be dominant in him at the moment the scribbling frenzy seizes him are feelings inspired, not directly by life itself, but by books, pictures, music, sculpture, architecture, religion, philosophy—in brief, by some other man's feelings about life. They are thus, in a sense, secondhand, and it is no wonder that creative artists so easily fall into the theory that they are also second-rate. Perhaps they usually are. If, indeed, the critic continues on this plane—if he lacks the intellectual agility and enterprise needed to make the leap from the work of art to the vast and mysterious complex of phenomena behind it—then they always are, and he remains no more than a fugelman or policeman to his betters. But if a genuine artist is concealed within him—if his feelings are in any sense profound and original, and his capacity for self-expression is above the average of educated men—then he moves inevitably from the work of art to life itself, and begins to take on a dignity that he formerly lacked. It is impossible to think of a man of any actual force and originality, universally recognized as having those qualities, who spent his whole life appraising and describing the work of other men. Did Goethe, or Carlyle, or Matthew Arnold, or Sainte-Beuve, or Macaulay, or even, to come down a few pegs, Lewes, or Lowell, or Hazlitt? Certainly not. The thing that becomes most obvious about the writings of all such men, once they are examined carefully, is that the critic is always being swallowed up by the creative artist—that what starts out as the review of a book, or a play, or other work of art, usually develops very quickly into an independent essay upon the theme of that work of art, or upon some theme that it suggests—in a word, that it becomes a fresh work of art, and only indirectly related to the one that suggested it. This fact, indeed, is so plain that it scarcely needs statement. What the pedagogues always object to in, for example, the Quarterly reviewers is that they forgot the books they were supposed to review, and wrote long papers—often, in fact small books—expounding ideas suggested (or not suggested) by the books under review. Every critic who is worth reading falls inevitably into the same habit. He cannot stick to his task: what is before him is always infinitely less interesting to him than what is within him. If he is genuinely first-rate—if what is within him stands the test of type, and wins an audience, and produces the reactions that every artist craves—then he usually ends by abandoning the criticism of specific works of art altogether, and setting up shop as a merchant in general ideas, i.e., as an artist working in the materials of life itself.

Mere reviewing, however conscientiously and competently it is done, is plainly a much inferior business. Like writing poetry, it is chiefly a function of intellectual immaturity. The young literatus just out of the university, having as yet no capacity for grappling with the fundamental mysteries of existence, is put to writing reviews of books, or plays, or music, or painting. Very often he does it extremely well; it is, in fact, not hard to do well, for even decayed pedagogues often do it, as such graves of the intellect as the New York Times bear witness. But if he continues to do it, whether well or ill, it is a sign to all the world that his growth ceased when they made him Artium Baccalaureus. Gradually he becomes, whether in or out of the academic grove, a professor, which is to say, a man devoted to diluting and retailing the ideas of his superiors—not an artist, not even a bad artist, but almost the antithesis of an artist. He is learned, he is sober, he is painstaking and accurate—but he is as hollow as a jug. Nothing is in him save the ghostly echoes of other men's thoughts and feelings. If he were a genuine artist he would have thoughts and feelings of his own, and the impulse to give them objective form would be irresistible. An artist can no more withstand that impulse than a politician can withstand the temptations of a job. There are no mute, inglorious Miltons, save in the hallucinations of poets. The one sound test of a Milton is that he functions as a Milton. His difference from other men lies precisely in the superior vigor of his impulse to self-expression, not in the superior beauty and loftiness of his ideas. Other men, in point of fact, often have the same ideas, or perhaps even loftier ones, but they are able to suppress them, usually on grounds of decorum, and so they escape being artists, and are respected by right-thinking persons, and die with money in the bank, and are forgotten in two weeks.

Obviously, the critic whose performance we are commonly called upon to investigate is a man standing somewhere along the path leading from the beginning that I have described to the goal. He has got beyond being a mere cataloguer and valuer of other men's ideas, but he has not yet become an autonomous artist—he is not yet ready to challenge attention with his own ideas alone. But it is plain that his motion, in so far as he is moving at all, must be in the direction of that autonomy—that is, unless one imagines him sliding backward into senile infantilism: a spectacle not unknown to literary pathology, but too pathetic to be discussed here. Bear this motion in mind, and the true nature of his aims and purposes becomes clear; more, the incurable falsity of the aims and purposes usually credited to him becomes equally clear. He is not actually trying to perform an impossible act of arctic justice upon the artist whose work gives him a text. He is not trying with mathematical passion to find out exactly what was in the artist's mind at the moment of creation, and to display it precisely and in an ecstasy of appreciation. He is not trying to bring the work discussed into accord with some transient theory of aesthetics, or ethics, or truth, or to determine its degree of departure from that theory. He is not trying to lift up the fine arts, or to defend democracy against sense, or to promote happiness at the domestic hearth, or to convert sophomores into right-thinkers, or to serve God. He is not trying to fit a group of novel phenomena into the orderly process of history. He is not even trying to discharge the catalytic office that I myself, in a romantic moment, once sought to force upon him. He is, first and last simply trying to express himself. He is trying to arrest and challenge a sufficient body of readers, to make them pay attention to him, to impress them with the charm and novelty of his ideas, to provoke them into an agreeable (or shocked) awareness of him, and he is trying to achieve thereby for his own inner ego the grateful feeling of a function performed, a tension relieved, a katharsis attained which Wagner achieved when he wrote "Die Walküre," and a hen achieves every time she lays an egg.

Joseph Conrad is moved by that necessity to write romances; Bach was moved to write music; poets are moved to write poetry; critics are moved to write criticism. The form is nothing; the only important thing is the motive power, and it is the same in all cases. It is the pressing yearning of every man who has ideas in him to empty them upon the world, to hammer them into plausible and ingratiating shapes, to compel the attention and respect of his equals, to lord it over his inferiors. So seen, the critic becomes a far more transparent and agreeable fellow than ever he was in the discourses of the psychologists who sought to make him a mere appraiser in an intellectual customs house, a gauger in a distillery of the spirit, a just and infallible judge upon the cosmic bench. Such offices, in point of fact, never fit him. He always bulges over their confines. So labelled and estimated, it inevitably turns out that the specific critic under examination is a very bad one, or no critic at all. But when he is thought of, not as pedagogue, but as artist, then he begins to take on reality, and, what is more, dignity. Carlyle was surely no just and infallible judge; on the contrary, he was full of prejudices, biles, naïvetés, humors. Yet he is read, consulted, attended to. Macaulay was unfair, inaccurate, fanciful, lyrical—yet his essays live. Arnold had his faults too, and so did Sainte-Beuve, and so did Goethe, and so did many another of that line—and yet they are remembered today, and all the learned and conscientious critics of their time, laboriously concerned with the precise intent of the artists under review, and passionately determined to set it forth with god-like care and to relate it exactly to this or that great stream of ideas—all these pedants are forgotten. What saved Carlyle, Macaulay and company is as plain as day. They were first-rate artists. They could make the thing charming, and that is always a million times more important than making it true.

Truth, indeed, is something that is believed in completely only by persons who have never tried personally to pursue it to its fastnesses and grab it by the tail. It is the adoration of second-rate men—men who always receive it at secondhand. Pedagogues believe in immutable truths and spend their lives trying to determine them and propagate them; the intellectual progress of man consists largely of a concerted effort to block and destroy their enterprise. Nine times out of ten, in the arts as in life, there is actually no truth to be discovered; there is only error to be exposed. In whole departments of human inquiry it seems to me quite unlikely that the truth ever will be discovered. Nevertheless, the rubber stamp 10 thinking of the world always makes the assumption that the exposure of an error is identical with the discovery of the truth—that error and truth are simple opposites. They are nothing of the sort. What the world turns to when it has been cured of one error, is usually simply another error, and maybe one worse than the first one. This is the whole history of the intellect in brief. The average man of today does not believe in precisely 20 the same imbecilities that the Greek of the fourth century before Christ believed in, but the things that he does believe in are often quite as idiotic. Perhaps this statement is a bit too sweeping. There is, year by year, a gradual accumulation of what may be called, provisionally, truths—there is a slow accretion of ideas that somehow manage to meet all practicable human tests, and so survive. But even so, it is risky to call them absolute 30 truths. All that one may safely say of them is that no one, as yet, has demonstrated that they are errors. Soon or late, if experience teaches us anything, they are likely to succumb too. The profoundest truths of the Middle Ages are now laughed at by schoolboys. The profoundest truths of democracy will be laughed at, a few centuries hence, even by schoolteachers.

In the department of aesthetics, wherein 40 critics mainly disport themselves, it is almost impossible to think of a so-called truth that shows any sign of being permanently true. The most profound of principles begins to fade and quiver almost as soon as it is stated. But the work of art, as opposed to the theory behind it, has a longer life, particularly if that theory be obscure and questionable, and so cannot be determined accurately. "Hamlet," the Mona Lisa, "Faust," "Dixie," "Parsifal," 50 "Mother Goose," "Annabel Lee," "Huckleberry Finn"—these things, so baffling to pedagogy, so contumacious to the categories, so mysterious in purpose and utility—these things live. And why? Because there is in them flavor of salient, novel and attractive personality, because the quality that shines from them is not that of correct demeanor but that of creative passion, because they pulse and breathe and speak, because they are genuine works of art. So with criticism. Let us forget all the heavy effort to make a science of it; it is a fine art, or nothing. If the critic, retiring to his cell to concoct his treatise upon a book or play or what-not, produces a piece of writing that shows sound structure, and brilliant color, and the flash of new and persuasive ideas, and civilized manners, and the charm of an uncommon personality in free function, then he has given something to the world that is worth 20 having, and sufficiently justified his existence. Is Carlyle's "Frederick" true? Who cares? As well ask if the Parthenon is true, or the C Minor Symphony, or "Wiener Blut." Let the critic who is an artist leave such necropsies to professors of aesthetics, who can no more determine the truth than he can, and will infallibly make it unpleasant and a bore.

It is, of course, not easy to practice this abstention. Two forces, one within and one without, tend to bring even a Hazlitt or a Huneker under the campus pump. One is the almost universal human susceptibility to messianic delusions—the irresistible tendency of practically every man, once he finds a crowd in front of him, to strut and roll his eyes. The other is the public demand, born of such long familiarity with pedagogical criticism that no other kind is readily conceivable, that the critic teach something as well as say something— 40 in the popular phrase, that he be constructive. Both operate powerfully against his free functioning, and especially the former. He finds it hard to resist the flattery of his customers, however little he may actually esteem it. If he knows anything at all, he knows that his following, like that of every other artist in ideas, is chiefly made up of the congenitally subaltern type of man and woman—natural converts, lodge joiners, me-toos, stragglers 50 after circus parades. It is precious seldom that he ever gets a positive idea out of them; what he usually gets is mere unintelligent ratification. But this troop, despite its obvious failings, corrupts him in various ways. For one thing, it enormously reënforces his belief in his own ideas, and so tends to make him stiff and dogmatic—in brief, precisely everything that he ought not to be. And for another thing, it tends to make him (by a curious contradiction) a bit pliant and politic: he begins to estimate new ideas, not in proportion as they are amusing or beautiful, but in proportion as they are likely to please. So beset, front and rear, he sometimes sinks supinely to the level of a professor, and his subsequent proceedings are interesting no more. The true aim of a critic is certainly not to make converts. He must know that very few of the persons who are susceptible to conversion are worth converting. Their minds are intrinsically flabby and parasitical, and it is certainly not sound sport to agitate minds of that sort. Moreover, the critic must always harbor a grave doubt about most of the ideas that they lap up so greedily—it must occur to him not infrequently, in the silent watches of the night, that much that he writes is sheer buncombe. As I have said, I can't imagine any idea—that is, in the domain of aesthetics—that is palpably and incontrovertibly sound. All that I am familiar with, and in particular all that I announce most vociferously, seem to me to contain a core of quite obvious nonsense. I thus try to avoid cherishing them too lovingly, and it always gives me a shiver to see any one else gobble them at one gulp. Criticism, at bottom, is indistinguishable from skepticism. Both launch themselves, the one by aesthetic presentations and the other by logical presentations, at the common human tendency to accept whatever is approved, to take in ideas ready-made, to be responsive to mere rhetoric and gesticulation. A critic who believes in anything absolutely is bound to that something quite as helplessly as a Christian is bound to the Freudian garbage in the Book of Revelation. To that extent, at all events, he is unfree and unintelligent, and hence a bad critic.

The demand for "constructive" criticism is based upon the same false assumption that immutable truths exist in the arts, and that the artist will be improved by being made aware of them. This notion, whatever the form it takes, is always absurd—as much so, indeed, as its brother delusion that the critic, to be competent, must be a practitioner of the specific art he ventures to deal with, i.e., that a doctor, to cure a belly-ache, must have a belly-ache. As practically encountered, it is disingenuous as well as absurd, for it comes chiefly from bad artists who tire of serving as performing monkeys, and crave the greater ease and safety of sophomores in class. They demand to be taught in order to avoid being knocked about. In their demand is the theory that instruction, if they could get it, would profit them—that they are capable of doing better work than they do. As a practical matter, I doubt that this is ever true. Bad poets never actually grow any better; they invariably grow worse and worse. In all history there has never been, to my knowledge, a single practitioner of any art who, as a result of "constructive" criticism, improved his work. The curse of all the arts, indeed, is the fact that they are constantly invaded by persons who are not artists at all—persons whose yearning to express their ideas and feelings is unaccompanied by the slightest capacity for charming expression—in brief, persons with absolutely nothing to say. This is particularly true of the art of letters, which interposes very few technical obstacles to the vanity and garrulity of such invaders. Any effort to teach them to write better is an effort wasted, as every editor discovers for himself; they are as incapable of it as they are of jumping over the moon. The only sort of criticism that can deal with them to any profit is the sort that employs them frankly as laboratory animals. It cannot cure them, but it can at least make an amusing and perhaps edifying show of them. It is idle to argue that the good in them is thus destroyed with the bad. The simple answer is that there is no good in them. Suppose Poe had wasted his time trying to dredge good work out of Rufus Dawes, author of "Geraldine." He would have failed miserably—and spoiled a capital essay, still diverting after three quarters of a century. Suppose Beethoven, dealing with Gottfried Weber, had tried laboriously to make an intelligent music critic of him. How much more apt, useful and durable the simple an exceptional taste and a shrewd talent for discovering and emphasizing literary essentials. He has taught at Southwestern University, Vanderbilt University, Louisiana State University (where he helped to edit The Southern Review), and at the University of Minnesota. The essay on "William Faulkner," printed below, is not only a perceptive study of its subject but a good example of Warren's critical work.

Warren's work includes a biography (John Brown, 1929), poetry (Thirty-six Poems, 1935; Selected Poems, 1944), three novels (Night Rider, 1939; At Heaven's Gate, 1943; and All the King's Men, 1946), and a collection of short stories (The Circus in the Attic and Other Stories, 1947). He has contributed, with eleven other Southern writers, to I'll Take My Stand (1930), and has written, in collaboration with Cleanth Brooks, two textbooks (Understanding Poetry, 1938; and Understanding Fiction, 1943). His critical essays include an introduction to Coleridge's "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner," (1946); essays on Katherine Anne Porter (Kenyon Review, Winter, 1942), Eudora Welty (Kenyon Review, Spring, 1944), Ernest Hemingway (Kenyon Review, Winter, 1947), and William Faulkner (in Forms of Modern Fiction, ed. W. V. O'Connor, 1948); and an essay on "Pure and Impure Poetry" (Kenyon Review, Spring, 1943). For essays on Warren, see Morton D. ### WILLIAM FAULKNER

MALCOLM Cowley's editing of The Portable Faulkner* is remarkable on two counts. First, the selection from Faulkner's work is made not merely to give a cross section or a group of good examples but to demonstrate one of the principles of integration in the work. Second, the introductory essay is one of the few things ever written on Faulkner which is not hagridden by prejudice or preconception and which really sheds some light on the subject.

The selections here are made to describe the place, Yoknapatawpha County, Mississippi, which is, as Cowley puts it, "Faulkner's mythical kingdom," and to give the history of that kingdom. The place is the locale of most of Faulkner's work. Its 2400 square miles lie between the hills of north Mississippi and the rich, black bottom lands. It has a population 20 of 15,611 persons, composing a society with characters as different as the Bundrens, the Snopeses, Ike McCaslin, Percy Grimm, Temple Drake, the Compsons, Christmas, Dilsey, and the tall convict of The Wild Palms. No land in all fiction lives more vividly in its physical presence than this mythical county—the "pine-winey" afternoons, the nights with "a thin sickle of moon like the heel print of a boot in wet sand," the tremendous reach of the big river in flood, "yellow and sleepy in the afternoon," and the "little piddling creeks, that run backward one day and forward the next and come busting down on a man full of dead mules and hen houses," the ruined plantation which was Popeye's hangout, the swamps and fields and hot, dusty roads of the Frenchman's Bend section, and the remnants of the great original forests, "green with gloom" in summer, "if anything actually dimmer than they had been in November's gray dissolution, where even at noon the sun fell only in windless dapping upon the earth which never completely dried."

And no land in all fiction is more painstakingly analyzed from the sociological standpoint. The descendants of the old families, the descendants of bushwhackers and carpetbaggers, the swamp rats, the Negro cooks and farm hands, bootleggers and gangsters, peddlers, college boys, tenant farmers, country store-keepers, county-seat lawyers are all here. The marks of class, occupation, and history are fully rendered and we know completely their speech, dress, food, houses, manners, and attitudes. Nature and sociology, geography and human geography, are scrupulously though effortlessly presented in Faulkner's work, and their significance for his work is very great; but the significance is of a conditioning order. They are, as it were, aspects of man's "doom"—a word of which Faulkner is very fond—but his manhood in the face of that doom is what is important.

Cowley's selections are made to give the description of the mythical kingdom, but more important, they are made to give its history. Most critics, even those who have most naïvely or deliberately misread the meaning of the fact, have been aware that the sense of the past is crucial in Faulkner's work. Cowley has here set up selections running in date of action from 1820 to 1940. The first, "A Justice," is a story about Ikkemotubbe, the nephew of a Chickasaw chief who went to New Orleans, where he received the name of du Homme, which became Doom; who came back to the tribe to poison his way to the Man-ship; and who, in the end (in Faulkner's "history" though not in "A Justice" itself), swaps a mile square of "virgin north Mississippi dirt" for a racing mare owned by Jason Lycurgus Compson, the founder of the Compson family in Mississippi. The last selection, "Delta Autumn," shows us Isaac McCaslin, the man who brings the best of the old order, philosopher, aristocrat, woodsman, into the modern world and who gives the silver-mounted horn which General Compson had left him to a mulatto woman for her bastard son by a relative of McCaslin's. In between "A Justice" and "Delta Autumn" fall such pieces as the magnificent "Red Leaves," the profoundly symbolic story called "The Bear," the Civil War and Reconstruction stories, "Rain" (from The Unvanquished) and "Wash," "Old Man" (the story of the tall convict from The Wild Palms), and the often anthologized "That Evening Sun" and "A Rose for Emily," and the brilliant episode of "Percy Grimm" (from Light in August). There are other pieces included, but these are the best, and the best for showing the high points in the history of Yoknapatawpha County.

Cowley's introduction undertakes to define the significance of place and history in Faulkner's work, that "labor of imagination that has not been equaled in our time." That labor is, as he points out, a double labor: "first, to invent a Mississippi county that was like a mythical kingdom, but was complete and living in all its details; second, to make his story of Yoknapatawpha County stand as a parable or legend of all the Deep South." The legend—called a legend "because it is obviously no more intended as a historical account of the country south of the Ohio than The Scarlet Letter was intended as a history of Massachusetts"—is, as Cowley defines it, this:

The South was settled by Sartorises (aristocrats) and Sutpens (nameless, ambitious men) who, seizing the land from the Indians, were determined to found an enduring and stable order. But despite their strength and integrity their project was, to use Faulkner's word, "accursed" by slavery, which, with the Civil War as instrument, frustrated their design. Their attempt to rebuild according to the old plan and old values was defeated by a combination of forces—the carpetbaggers and Snopeses ("a new exploiting class descended from the landless whites"). Most of the descendants of the old order are in various ways incompetent: They are prevented by their code from competing with the codeless Snopeses, they cling to the letter and forget the spirit of their tradition, they lose contact with the realities of the present and escape into a dream world of alcohol or rhetoric or gentility or madness, they fall in love with defeat or death, they lose nerve and become cowards, or they, like the last Jason in The Sound and the Fury, adopt Snopesism and become worse than any Snopes. Figures like Popeye (eyes like "rubber knobs," a creature having "that vicious depthless quality of stamped tin," the man "who made money and had nothing he could do with it, spend it for, since he knew that alcohol would kill him like poison, who had no friends and had never known a woman") are in their dehumanized quality symbols of modernism, for the society of finance capitalism. The violence of some of Faulkner's work is, according to Cowley, "an example of the Freudian method turned backward, being full of sexual nightmares that are in reality social symbols. It is somehow connected in the author's mind with what he regards as the rape and corruption of the South."

This is, in brief, Cowley's interpretation of the legend, and it provides an excellent way into Faulkner; it exactly serves the purpose which an introduction should serve. The interpretation is indebted, no doubt, to that of George Marion O'Donnell (the first and still an indispensable study of Faulkner's theme), but it modifies O'Donnell's tendency to read Faulkner with an allegorical rigidity and with a kind of doctrinal single-mindedness.

It is possible that the present view, however, should be somewhat modified, at least in emphasis. Although no writer is more deeply committed to a locality than Faulkner, the emphasis on the Southern elements may blind us to other elements, or at least other applications, of deep significance. And this is especially true in so far as the work is interpreted merely as Southern apologetics or, as it is by Maxwell Geismar, as the "extreme hallucinations" of a "cultural psychosis."

It is important, I think, that Faulkner's work be regarded not in terms of the South against the North, but in terms of issues which are common to our modern world. The legend is not merely a legend of the South, but is also a legend of our general plight and problem. The modern world is in moral confusion. It does suffer from a lack of discipline, of sanctions, of community of values, of a sense of a mission. It is a world in which self-interest, work-ability, success, provide the standards. It is a world which is the victim of abstraction and of mechanism, or at least, at moments, feels itself to be. It can look back nostalgically upon the old world of traditional values and feel loss and perhaps despair—upon the world in which, as one of Faulkner's characters puts it, men "had the gift of living once or dying once instead of being diffused and scattered creatures drawn blindly from a grab bag and assembled"—a world in which men were, "integer for integer," more simple and complete.

If it be objected that Faulkner's view is unrealistic, that had the old order satisfied human needs it would have survived, and that it is sentimental to hold that it was killed from the outside, the answer is clear in the work: the old order did not satisfy human needs—the Southern old order or any other—for it, not being founded on justice, was "accursed" and held the seeds of its own ruin in itself. But even in terms of the curse the old order, as opposed to the new order (in so far as the new is to be equated with Snopesism), allowed the traditional man to define himself as human by setting up codes, concepts of virtue, obligations, and by accepting the risks of his humanity. Within the traditional order was a notion of truth, even if man in the flow of things did not succeed in realizing that truth. Take, for instance, the passage from "The Bear":

"All right," he said. "Listen," and read again, but only one stanza this time and closed the book and laid it on the table. "She cannot fade, though thou hast not thy bliss," McCaslin said: "Forever wilt thou love, she be fair."

"He's talking about a girl," he said.

"He had to talk about something," McCaslin said. Then he said, "He was talking about truth. Truth is one. It doesn't change. It covers all things which touch the heart—honor and pride and pity and justice and courage and love. Do you see now?"

The human effort is what is important, the capacity to make the effort to rise above the mechanical process of life, the pride to endure, for in endurance there is a kind of self-conquest.

When it is said, as it is often said, that Faulkner's work is "backward-looking," the answer is that the constant ethical center is to be found in the glorification of the human effort and of human endurance, which are not in time, even though in modernity they seem to persist most surely among the despised and rejected. It is true that Faulkner's work contains a savage attack on modernity, but it is to be remembered that Elizabethan tragedy, for instance, contained just such an attack on its own special "modernity." (Ambition is the most constant tragic crime, and ambition is the attitude special to an opening society; all villains are rationalists and appeal to "nature" beyond traditional morality for justification, and rationalism is, in the sense implied here, the attitude special to the rise of a secular and scientific order before a new morality can be formulated.)

It is not ultimately important whether the traditional order (Southern or other) as depicted by Faulkner fits exactly the picture which critical historical method provides. Let it be granted, for the sake of discussion, that Faulkner does oversimplify the matter. What is ultimately important, both ethically and artistically, is the symbolic function of that order in relation to the world which is set in opposition to it. The opposition between the old order and the new does not, however, exhaust the picture. What of the order to come? "We will have to wait," old Ike McCaslin says to the mulatto girl who is in love with a white man. A curse may work itself out in time; and in such glimpses, which occur now and then, we get the notion of a grudging meliorism, a practical supplement to the idealism, like Ike McCaslin's, which finds compensation in the human effort and the contemplation of "truth."

The discussion, even at a larger scope and with more satisfactory analysis, of the central theme of Faulkner would not exhaust the interest of his work. In fact, the discussion of this question always runs the risk of making his work appear too schematic, too dry and too complacent when in actual fact it is full of rich detail, of shadings and complexities of attitude, of ironies and ambivalences. Cowley's introduction cautions the reader on this point and suggests various fruitful topics for investigation and thought. But I shall make bold—and in the general barrenness of criticism on Faulkner it does not require excessive boldness—to list and comment on certain topics which seem to me to demand further critical study.

Nature. The vividness of the natural background is one of the impressive features of Faulkner's work. It is accurately observed, but observation only provides the stuff from which the characteristic effects are gained. It is the atmosphere which counts, the poetry, the infusion of feeling, the symbolic weight. Nature provides a backdrop—of lyric beauty (the meadow in the cow episode of The Hamlet), of homely charm (the trial scene of the "Spotted Horses" story from the same book), of sinister, brooding force (the river in "Old Man" from The Wild Palms), of massive dignity (the forest in "The Bear")—for the human action and passion. The indestructible beauty is there: "God created man," Ike McCaslin says in "Delta Autumn," "and He created the world for him to live in and I reckon He created the kind of world He would have wanted to live in if He had been a man."

Ideally, if man were like God, as Ike McCaslin puts it, man's attitude toward nature would be one of pure contemplation, pure participation in its great forms and appearances; the appropriate attitude is love, for with Ike McCaslin the moment of love is equated with godhood. But since man "wasn't quite God himself," since he lives in the world of flesh, he must be a hunter, user, and violator. To return to McCaslin: God "put them both here: man and the game he would follow and kill, foreknowing it. I believe He said, 'So be it.' I reckon He even foreknew the end. But He said, 'I will give him his chance. I will give him warning and foreknowledge too, along with the desire to follow and the power to slay. The woods and the fields he ravages and the game he devastates will be the consequence and signature of his crime and guilt, and his punishment.'"

There is, then, a contamination implicit in the human condition—a kind of Original Sin, as it were—but it is possible, even in the contaminating act, the violation, for man to achieve some measure of redemption, a redemption through love. For instance, in "The Bear," the great legendary beast which is pursued for years to the death is also an object of love and veneration, and the symbol of virtue, and the deer hunt of "Delta Autumn" is for Ike McCaslin a ritual of renewal. Those who have learned the right relationship to nature—"the pride and humility" which young Ike McCaslin learns from the half-Negro, half-Indian Sam Fathers—are set over against those who have not. In "The Bear," General Compson speaks up to Cass McCaslin to defend the wish of the boy Ike McCaslin to stay an extra week in the woods: "You got one foot straddled into a farm and the other foot straddled into a bank; you ain't even got a good hand-hold where this boy was already an old man long before you damned Sartorises and Edmondses invented farms and banks to keep yourselves from having to find out what this boy was born knowing and fearing too maybe, but without being afraid, that could go ten miles on a compass because he wanted to look at a bear none of us had ever got near enough to put a bullet in and looked at the bear and came the ten miles back on the compass in the dark; maybe by God that's the why and the wherefore of farms and banks."

Those who have the wrong attitude toward nature are the pure exploiters, the apostles of abstractionism, the truly evil men. For instance, the very opening of Sanctuary presents a distinction on this ground between Benbow and Popeye. While the threat of Popeye keeps Benbow crouching by the spring, he hears a Carolina wren sing, and even under these circumstances tries to recall the local name for it. And he says to Popeye: "And of course you don't know the name of it. I don't suppose you'd know a bird at all, without it was singing in a cage in a hotel lounge, or cost four dollars on a plate." Popeye, as we may remember, spits in the spring (he hates nature and must foul it), is afraid to go through the woods ("Through all them trees?" he demands when Benbow points out the short cut), and when an owl whisks past them in the twilight, claws at Benbow's coat with almost hysterical fear ("It's just an owl," Benbow says. "It's nothing but an owl.").

The pure exploiters, though they may gain ownership and use of a thing, never really have it; like Popeye, they are impotent. For instance, Flem Snopes, the central character and villain of The Hamlet, who brings the exploiter's mentality to Frenchman's Bend, finally marries Eula Varner, a kind of fertility goddess or earth goddess; but his ownership is meaningless, for she always refers to him as "that man" (she does not even have a name for him), and he has only got her after she has given herself willingly to one of the bold, hot-blooded boys of the neighborhood. In fact, nature can't, in one sense, be "owned." Ike McCaslin, in "The Bear," says of the land which has come down to him: "It was never Father's and Uncle Buddy's to bequeath me to repudiate, because it was never Grandfather's to bequeath them to bequeath me to repudiate, because it was never old Ikkemotubbe's to sell to Grandfather for bequeathment and repudiation. Because it was never Ikkemotubbe's fathers' father's to bequeath Ikkemotubbe to sell to Grandfather or any man because on the instant when Ikkemotubbe discovered, realized, that he could sell it for money, on that instant it ceased ever to have been his forever, father to father, to father, and the man who bought it bought nothing."

The right attitude toward nature is, as a matter of fact, associated with the right attitude toward man, and the mere lust for power over nature is associated with the lust for power over other men, for God gave the earth to man, we read in "The Bear," not "to hold for himself and his descendants inviolable title forever, generation after generation, to the oblongs and squares of the earth, but to hold the earth mutual and intact in the communal anonymity of brotherhood, and all the fee He asked was pity and humility and sufferance and endurance and the sweat of his face for bread." It is the failure of this pity which curses the earth (the land in Faulkner's particular country is "accursed" by chattel slavery, but slavery is simply one of the possible forms of the failure). But the rape of nature and the crime against man are always avenged. The rape of nature, the mere exploitation of it without love, is always avenged because the attitude which commits that crime also commits the crime against men which in turn exacts vengeance, so that man finally punishes himself. It is only by this line of reasoning that one can, I think, read the last page of "Delta Autumn":

This land which man has deswamped and denuded and derivered in two generations so that white men can own plantations and commute every night to Memphis and black men own plantations and ride in Jim Crow cars to Chicago to live in millionaires' mansions on Lake Shore Drive; where white men rent farms and live like niggers and niggers crop on shares and live like animals; where cotton is planted and grows man-tall in the very cracks of the sidewalks, and usury and mortgage and bankruptcy and measureless wealth, Chinese and African and Aryan and Jew, all breed and spawn together until no man has time to say which one is which nor cares. . . . No wonder the ruined woods I used to know don't cry for retribution! he thought: The people who have destroyed it will accomplish its revenge.

The attitude toward nature in Faulkner's work, however, does not involve a sinking into nature. In Faulkner's mythology man has "suzerainty over the earth," he is not of the earth, and it is the human virtues which count—"pity and humility and sufferance and endurance." If we take even the extreme case of the idiot Snopes and his fixation on the cow in The Hamlet (a scene whose function in the total order of the book is to show that even the idiot pervert is superior to Flem), a scene which shows the human being as close as possible to the "natural" level, we find that the scene is the most lyrical in Faulkner's work: even the idiot is human and not animal, for only human desires, not animal, clothe themselves in poetry. I think that George Marion O'Donnell is right in pointing to the humanism-naturalism opposition in Faulkner's work, and over and over again we find that the point of some novel or story has to do with the human effort to find or create values in the mechanical round of experience—"not just to eat and evacuate and sleep warm," as Charlotte Rittenmeyer says in The Wild Palms, "so we can get up and eat and evacuate in order to sleep warm again," or not just to raise cotton to buy niggers to raise cotton to buy niggers, as it is put in another place. Even when a character seems to be caught in the iron ring of some compulsion, of some mechanical process (the hunted Negro of "Red Leaves," the tall convict of The Wild Palms, Christmas of Light in Au- gust), the effort may be discernible. And in Quentin's attempt, in The Sound and the Fury, to persuade his sister Caddy, who is pregnant by one of the boys of Jefferson, to confess that she has committed incest with him, we find among other things the idea that "the horror" and "the clean flame" would be preferable to the meaninglessness of the "loud world."

Humor. One of the most important remarks in Cowley's introduction is that concerning humor. There is, especially in the later books, "a sort of homely and sober-sided frontier humor that is seldom achieved in contemporary writing." Cowley continues: "In a curious way, Faulkner combines two of the principal traditions in American letters: the tradition of psychological horror, often close to symbolism, that begins with Charles Brockden Brown, our first professional novelist, and extends through Poe, Melville, Henry James (in his later stories), Stephen Crane and Hemingway; and the other tradition of frontier humor and realism, beginning with Augustus Longstreet's Georgia Scenes and having Mark Twain as its best example." The observation is an acute one, for the distortions of humor and the distortions of horror in Faulkner's work are closely akin and frequently, in a given instance, can scarcely be disentangled.

It is true that the most important strain of humor in Faulkner's work is derived from the tradition of frontier humor (though it is probable that he got it from the porches of country stores and the courthouse yards of county-seat towns and not from any book), and it is true that the most spectacular displays of Faulkner's humor are of this order—for example, the "Spotted Horses" episode from The Hamlet or the story "Was." But there are other strains which might be distinguished and investigated. For example, there is a kind of Dickensian humor; the scene in the Memphis brothel from Sanctuary, which is reprinted here under the title "Uncle Bud and the Three Madams," is certainly more Dickensian than frontier. There is a subdued humor, sometimes shading into pathos, in the treatment of some of the Negro characters and in their dialogue. And there is an irony ranging from that in the scene in Sanctuary where Miss Reba, the madam, in offended decency keeps telling Temple,

"Lie down and cover up your nekkidness," while the girl talks with Benbow, to that in the magnificently sustained monologue of Jason at the end of The Sound and the Fury.

In any case, humor in Faulkner's work is never exploited for its own sake. It is regularly used as an index, as a lead, to other effects. The humor in itself may be striking, but Faulkner is not a humorist in the sense, say, that Mark Twain is. His humor is but one perspective on the material and it is never a final perspective, as we can see from such an example as the episode of "Spotted Horses." Nothing could be more wide of the point than the remark in Maxwell Geismar's essay on Faulkner to the effect that Faulkner in The Hamlet "seems now to accept the antics of his provincial morons, to enjoy the chronicle of their low-grade behavior; he submerges himself in their clownish degradation." All the critic seems to find in Mink Snopes' victim with his lifelong devotion to the memory of his dead wife, and in Ratliff with his good heart and ironical mind and quiet wisdom, is comic "descendants of the gangling and giggling Wash Jones."

The Poor White. The above remark leads us to the not uncommon misconception about the role of the poor white in Faulkner's work. It is true that the Snopeses are poor whites, descendants of bushwhackers (and therefore outside society, as the bushwhacker was outside society, had no "side" in the Civil War but tried to make a good thing of it), and it is true that Snopesism represents a special kind of villainy and degradation, the form that the pure doctrine of exploitation and degradation takes in the society of which Faulkner writes, but any careful reader realizes that a Snopes is not to be equated with a poor white. For instance, the book most fully about the poor white, As I Lay Dying, is full of sympathy and poetry. There are a hundred touches like that in Cash's soliloquy about the phonograph: "I reckon it's a good thing we aint got ere a one of them. I reckon I wouldn't never get no work done a-tall for listening to it. I dont know if a little music aint about the nicest thing a fellow can have. Seems like when he comes in tired of a night, it aint nothing could rest him like having a little music played and him resting." Or like the long section toward the middle of the book devoted to Addie Bundren, a section which is full of eloquence like that of this paragraph: "And then he died. He did not know he was dead. I would lie by him in the dark, hearing the dark land talking of God's love and His beauty and His sin; hearing the dark voicelessness in which the words are the deeds, and the other words that are not deeds, that are just the gaps in peoples' lacks, coming down like the cries of geese out of the wild darkness in the old terrible nights, fumbling at the deeds like orphans to whom are pointed out in a crowd two faces and told, That is your father, your mother." Do these passages indicate a relish in the "antics of his provincial morons"?

The whole of As I Lay Dying is based on the heroic effort of the Bundren family to fulfill the promise to the dead mother, to take her body to Jefferson; and the fact that Anse Bundren, after the heroic effort has been completed, immediately gets him a new wife, the "duck-shaped woman" with the "hard-looking pop-eyes," does not negate the heroism of the effort nor the poetry and feeling which give flesh to the book. We are told by one critic that "what should have been the drama of the Bundrens thus becomes in the end a sort of brutal farce," and that we are "unable to feel the tragedy because the author has refused to accept the Bundrens, as he did accept the Compsons, as tragic." Rather, I should say, the Bundrens may come off a little better than the latter-day Compsons, the whining mother, the promiscuous Caddy, the ineffectual Quentin, and the rest. The Bundrens, at least, are capable of the heroic effort, and the promise is fulfilled. What the conclusion indicates is that even such a fellow as Anse Bundren (who is not typical of his family, by the way), in the grip of an idea, in terms of promise or code, is capable of rising out of his ordinary level; Anse falls back at the end, but only after the prop of the idea and obligation have been removed. And we may recall that even the "gangling and giggling Wash Jones" has always been capable of some kind of obscure dream and aspiration (his very attachment to Sutpen indicates that), and that in the end he achieves dignity and manhood.

The final and incontrovertible evidence that Snopes is not to be equated with poor white comes in The Hamlet (though actually most of the characters in the book, though they may be poor, are not, strictly speaking, "poor whites" at all, but rather what uninstructed reviewers choose to call by that label). The point of the book is the assault made on a solid community of plain, hard-working small farmers by Snopeses and Snopesism. Ratliff is not rich, but he is not Flem Snopes. And if the corruption of Snopesism does penetrate into the community, there is no one here who can be compared in degradation and vileness to Jason of The Sound and the Fury, the Compson who has embraced Snopesism. In fact, Popeye and Flem, Faulkner's best advertised villains, cannot, for vileness and ultimate meanness, touch Jason.

The Negro. In one of Faulkner's books it is said that every white child is born crucified on a black cross. Remarks like this have led to a gross misconception of the place of the Negro in Faulkner's work, to the notion that Faulkner "hates" Negroes. For instance, we find Maxwell Geismar exclaiming what a "strange inversion" it is to take the Negro, who is the "tragic consequence," and to exhibit him as the "evil cause" of the failure of the old order in the South.

This is a misreading of the text. It is slavery, not the Negro, which is defined, quite flatly, as the curse, over and over again, and the Negro is the black cross in so far as he is the embodiment of the curse, the reminder of the guilt, the incarnation of the problem. That is the basic point. But now and then, as a kind of tangential irony, we have the notion, not of the burden of the white on the black, but of the burden of the black on the white, the weight of obligation, inefficiency, and so on, as well as the weight of guilt (the notion we find in the old story of the plantation mistress who, after the Civil War, said: "Mr. Lincoln thought he was emancipating those slaves, but he was really emancipating me").

For instance, we get hints of this notion in "Red Leaves": one of the Indians, sweating in the chase of the runaway Negro who is to be killed for the Man's funeral, says, "Damn that Negro," and the other Indian replies, "Yao. When have they ever been anything but a trial and a care to us?" But the black cross is, fundamentally, the weight of the white man's guilt, the white man who now sells salves and potions to "bleach the pigment and straighten the hair of Negroes that they might resemble the very race which for two hundred years had held them in bondage and from which for another hundred years not even a bloody civil war would have set them completely free." The curse is still operative, as the crime is still compounded.

The actual role of the Negro in Faulkner's fiction is consistently one of pathos or heroism. It is not merely, as has been suggested more than once, that Faulkner condescends to the good and faithful servant, the "white folks' nigger." There are figures like Dilsey, but they are not as impressive as the Negro in "Red Leaves" or Sam Fathers, who, with the bear, is the hero of "The Bear." The fugitive, who gains in the course of the former story a shadowy symbolic significance, is told in the end by one of the Indians who overtake him, "You ran well. Do not be ashamed," and when he walks among the Indians, he is "the tallest there, his high, close, mud-caked head looming above them all." And Sam Fathers is the fountainhead of wisdom which Ike McCaslin finally gains, and the repository of the virtues which are central for Faulkner—"an old man, son of a Negro slave and an Indian king, inheritor on the one hand of the long chronicle of a people who had learned humility through suffering and learned pride through the endurance which survived suffering, and on the other side the chronicle of a people even longer in the land than the first, yet who now existed there only in the solitary brotherhood of an old and childless Negro's alien blood and the wild and invincible spirit of an old bear."

Even Christmas, in Light in August, though he is sometimes spoken of as a villain, is a mixture of heroism and pathos. He is the lost, suffering, enduring creature (the figure like Sam Fathers, the tall convict of The Wild Palms, or Dilsey in The Sound and the Fury), and even the murder he commits at the end is a fumbling attempt to define his manhood, is an attempt to break out of the iron ring of mechanism, to lift himself out of "nature," for the woman whom he kills has become a figure of the horror of the human which has surrendered the human attributes. (We may compare Christmas to Mink Snopes in The Hamlet in this respect: Mink, mean and vicious as he is, kills out of a kind of warped and confused pride, and by this affirmation is set off against his kinsmen Flem, whose only values are those of pure Snopesism.)

Even such a brief comment on the Negro in Faulkner's work cannot close without this passage from "The Bear":

"Because they will endure. They are better than we are. Stronger than we are. Their vices are vices aped from white men or that white men and bondage have taught them: improvidence and intemperance and evasion—not laziness: evasion: of what white men had set them to, not for their aggrandizement or even comfort but his own—" and McCaslin

"All right. Go on: Promiscuity. Violence. Instability and lack of control. Inability to distinguish between mine and thine—" and he

"How distinguish when for two hundred years mine did not even exist for them?" and McCaslin

"All right. Go on. And their virtues—" and he

"Yes. Their own. Endurance—" and McCaslin

"So have mules: and he

"—and pity and tolerance and forbearance and fidelity and love of children—" and McCaslin

"So have dogs:" and he

"—whether their own or not or black or not. And more: what they got not only from white people but not even despite white people because they had it already from the old free fathers a longer time free than us because we have never been free—" 40

And there is the single comment under Dilsey's name in the annotated genealogy of the Compsons which Faulkner has prepared for the present volume: "They endured."

Technique. There are excellent comments on this subject by Cowley, Conrad Aiken, Warren Beck, Joseph Warren Beach, and Alfred Kazin, but the subject has not been fully explored. One difficulty is that Faulkner is an incorrigible and restless experimenter, is peculiarly sensitive to the expressive possibilities of shifts in technique and has not developed (like Hemingway or Katherine Anne Porter—lyric rather than dramatic writers, artists with a great deal of self-certainty) in a straight line.

Provisionally, we may distinguish in Faulkner's work three basic methods of handling a narrative. One is best typified in Sanctuary, where there is a tightly organized plot, a crisp, laconic style, an objective presentation of character—an impersonal method. Another is best typified by As I Lay Dying or The Sound and the Fury, where each character unfolds in his own language or flow of being before us—a dramatic method in that the author does not obtrude, but a method which makes the subjective reference of character the medium of presentation. Another is best typified by "Was," "The Bear," or the story of the tall convict in The Wild Palms, where the organization of the narrative is episodic and the sense of a voice, a narrator's presence (though not necessarily a narrator in the formal sense), is almost constantly felt—a method in which the medium is ultimately a "voice" as index to sensibility. The assumptions underlying these methods, and the relations among them, would provide a study.

Cowley's emphasis on the unity of Faulkner's work, the fact that all the novels and stories are to be taken as aspects of a single, large design, is very important. It is important, for one thing, in regard to the handling of character. A character, Sutpen, for instance, may appear in various perspectives, so that from book to book we move toward a final definition much as in actual life we move toward the definition of a person. The same principle applies to event, as Conrad Aiken has pointed out, the principle of the spiral method which takes the reader over and over the same event from a different altitude, as it were, and a different angle. In relation to both character and event this method, once it is understood by the reader, makes for a kind of realism and a kind of suspense (in the formal not the factual sense) not common in fiction.

The emphasis on the unity of Faulkner's work may, however, lead to an underrating of the degree of organization within individual works. Cowley is right in pointing out the structural defect in Light in August, but he may be putting too much emphasis on the over-all unity and not enough on the organization of the individual work when he says that The Hamlet tends to resolve into a "series of episodes resembling beads on a string." I think that in that novel we have a type of organization in which the thematic rather than the narrative emphasis is the basic principle, and once we grasp that fact the unity of the individual work may come clear. In fact, the whole subject of the principle of thematic organization in the novels and long stories, "The Bear," for instance, needs investigation. In pieces which seem disjointed, or which seem to have the mere tale-teller's improvisations, we may sometimes discover the true unity if we think of the line of meaning, the symbolic ordering, and surrender ourselves to the tale-teller's "voice." And it may be useful at times to recall the distinction between the formal, forensic realism of Ibsen as opposed to the fluid, suggestive realism of Chekhov.

Symbol and Image. Cowley and O'Donnell have given acute readings of the main symbolic outline of Faulkner's fiction, but no one has yet devoted himself to the study of symbolic motifs which, though not major, are nevertheless extremely instructive. For instance, the images of the hunt, the flight, the pursuit, such as we have in "Red Leaves," The Wild Palms, the episode of "Peter Grimm" in Light in August, "The Bear," "Delta Autumn," "Was," and (especially in the hordes of moving Negroes) in The Unvanquished. Or there is the important symbolic relationship between man and earth. Or there is the contrast between images of compulsion and images of will or freedom. Or there is the device of what we might call the frozen moment, the arrested action which becomes symbolic, as in the moment when, in "An Odor of Verbena" (from The Unvanquished), Drusilla offers the pistols to the hero.

Polarity. To what extent does Faulkner work in terms of polarities, oppositions, paradoxes, inversions of roles? How much does he employ a line of concealed (or open) dialectic progression as a principle for his fiction? The study of these questions may lead to the discovery of principles of organization in his work not yet defined by criticism.

The study of Faulkner is the most challenging single task in contemporary American literature for criticism to undertake. Here is a novelist who, in mass of work, in scope of material, in range of effect, in reportorial accuracy and symbolic subtlety, in philosophical weight, can be put beside the masters of our own past literature. Yet this accomplishment has been effected in what almost amounts to critical isolation and silence, and when the silence has been broken it has usually been broken by someone (sometimes one of our better critics) whose reading has been hasty, whose analysis unscholarly and whose judgments superficial. The picture of Faulkner presented to the public by such criticism is a combination of Thomas Nelson Page, a fascist and a psychopath, gnawing his nails. Of course, this picture is usually accompanied by a grudging remark about genius.

Cowley's book, for its intelligence, sensitivity, and sobriety in the introduction, and for the ingenuity and judgment exhibited in the selections, would be valuable at any time. But it is especially valuable at this time. Perhaps it can mark a turning point in Faulkner's reputation. That will be of slight service to Faulkner, who, as much as any writer of our place and time, can rest in confidence. He can afford to wait. But can we?
