Fee (fi), sb.[1] Forms: 4–5 fe, feo, fey, 6 flo, 3– fee Pl 3 fes, 3–4 fees, 5 feese, 5–6 feese, 6 feas, feis, 4– fees See also Feu, Fied sb.[2], Fief sb. [a AF fee, fie = Or *fé, fié, fiet (app implied in fiez pl., fief, fieu, fiu, Pr feu, feus, fieu, fiu, It. feo (prob from Fr. or Pr.; the Langobardic Lat fadefium is a compound of Teut fihu Fee sb.[1]), med L. feodum, feudum (last cited by Du Cange from a charter of), *-um, -us, -a, property. This must be rejected, because such an etymology could directly yield no other sense than that of 'movable property', which is very remote from the sense of feodum as used in early records, viz usufruct granted in requital of service (often opposed to allodium, originally meaning 'inheritance'), of the synonyms, see Allod. The same word as Fief sb., Fief sb.[2], and L. beneficium, i e something granted to a subject by the kindness of his lord A more tenable theory is that the OF fiu is an adoption of the Teut fehu in the contextual sense of 'wages meant for service', the Rom. word certainly had this meaning (see branch II below), and it is conceivable that the feudal sense is a specific application of it The d of L. feodum, feudum, however, is left unexplained by this hypothesis, some regard it as a euphonic insertion (comparing It chiodo nail from vulgar L. clo-vus from clavus), others think it is due to the L analogy of allodium, and others suppose feudum to be a vbl sb. f. fudare = fendere, but each of these views involves serious difficulties It is not impossible that two originally distinct words may have been confused A conjecture proposed by Prof Kern, and approved by some German jurists, is that feudum represents an OHG fehôd*, related to the vb fehôn, which is recorded only in the sense 'to eat, feed upon', but is supposed on etymological grounds to have had the wider meaning 'to take for one's enjoyment'. This would account fairly well for the sense, but involves too much hypothesis to be accepted with confidence It is curious, if the word be of Teut formation, that there is no direct proof of its having been used in any Teut language, nor is it found even in the L text of the Frankish laws]

In the dative felge it was the voiced palatal spirant, and this very early became vocalized to y, giving the γ forms. The δ forms are due to the normal unvoicing of the g where it was final, viz in the nom and accus sing; the resulting sound (x) eventually developed into ch, f, or gh, according to dialect, how ever, it became (k, ?) and in others was dropped (With the forms felf, felk, f the Derby-shire place name Hayfelf is usually spelt Hayfe, Hayfe, but in 1381 Hayfelk.) 7 In college and university use:

a orig The name (corresponding to the Latin socius) given to the incorporated members of a college or collegiate foundation (whether in a University or otherwise . see College 4); one of the company or corporation who, with their head, constitute a 'college'; e g. 'the Provost and Fellows of Chelsea College, of Eton College, of King's College, Cambridge', 'the Warden and Fellows of All Souls, Oxford'.

In colleges chiefly devoted to the purposes of study and education, the Fellows were, in early usage, often included under the term Masters of Arts, the latter term being mostly restricted to junior members of the foundation, who are still under tuition, the term fellow being applied to the Senior Scholars, who have graduated, or otherwise passed out of the stage of tutelage In those colleges that have become educational institutions, undertaking the school or university teaching of youths not on the foundation, the Fellows consist of those graduate members who have been co opted upon the foundation with emoluments from its corporate revenue, and who constitute with their Head (usually called the Master) or Warden the governing body, the governing body of the institution Most colleges of this sort have also Honorary Fellows, who receive no emoluments, and no share in the government When a distinguished man vacates his fellowship, he is often elected an honorary fellow c1460 Pecock Reger III xviii 401 That the master and the fellows kepe the statutis of the college 1531–8 Act 3 Hen VIII, c 23 § 5 Any persone being fellowe or scoler of any of the said Colleges 1644 Hunton Vind Priest Monarch 41 All the Colledges, the Fellowes have an effectuall, and more then morall limiting Power. 1691 Wood Ath Oxon I 77 Thomas Lynacre was chosen Fellow of All-Soules 1818 Hallam Const Hist (1876) Table in Coll of Poems 124 Nothing is so Imperious, as a Fellow of a Colledge upon his own Dunghil 1843 Cole bridge Stud Life & Char (1844) I 198 The country fellows and twenty scholars, with four exhibitioners, form the foundation [of Corpus] 1886 J Laurie Lect Rise Univ xiii 247 It was thus a college composed solely of 'Fellows'.

b On the analogy of the preceding use, the designation 'Fellows' is now applied, in some universities, to the holders of certain stipendiary positions (called 'Fellowships') tenable by elected graduates for a limited number of years, on condition of pursuing some specified branch of study.

The Radcliffe and the Craven Travelling Fellowships are the only examples in the ancient English Universities. Fellowships in this sense have been founded in the Scottish Universities, in the University of Durham and the Victoria University, and in some universities and colleges in the U S 1888 Histor Reg Univ Oxf 110 Every Fellow is required to spend at least eight months of each year of his tenure of the [Craven] Fellowship abroad Ibid 112 The first two Fellows were elected [to Radcliffe's Travelling Fellowships] in July 1715 1896 Irvin. Coll. 537 Scholars, Bursars, or Fellows must apply to the Convener of the Science Degrees Committee.

c In some of the younger British universities and colleges, and in some of those in the U S, the 'Fellows' are the members of the governing or administrative body; in others the title is merely honorary, conferred as a special distinction on a limited number of graduates. Cf sense 8

1837 Charter Univ Lond, The Chancellor, Vice Chancellor, and Fellows..shall constitute the Senate of the said University.

8. The title given in various learned societies, either to all their members (as in the Royal Society, the Society of Antiquaries), or to a specially privileged class among them.

In the case of the Royal Society, the official Latin equivalent is sodalis

1664 Gazette, A List of the Fellows of the Royal Society. 1709 Steele Tatler No 15 ¶ 2 A Fellow of the Royal Society, who had writ upon Cold Baths. 1801 Med Jrnl V 314 A Fellow, that is, any Member who resides within seven miles of London 1886 Act 49–50 Vict c 48 § 6 A fellow of a college of physicians.

10. † a. Used as the customary title of address to a servant or other person of humble station Obs

In 14th c. it implied polite condescension, = 'comrade', 'my friend' (cf mod F mon ami similarly used). In Shakspere a time thus notion had disappeared, but the word when addressed to a servant does not seem to have necessarily implied haughtiness or contempt, though its application to one not greatly inferior was a gross insult (cf 9).

†1 = s of the nom case in OF (in this instance a product of analogy) Obs
The ultimate etymology is uncertain Of the many conjectures proposed the most probable is that felleun is a derivative of L fell, fel gall, the original sense being 'one who, or something which, is full of bitterness' (or venom, the two notions, as many languages testify, being closely associated in the popular mind) In support of this view it may be pointed out that the sb has had the senses of 'an envenomed sore' and 'cholera' (see Felon *sb*1) whereas, however, this etymology accounts perfectly for the strangely divergent senses which the adj has in the Rom. langs. 'wicked', 'angry', 'brave', 'melancholy, sad' (It. fellone), 'extremely painful' Of the other suggestions that have been made the most plausible is perhaps that of Prof R Atkinson of Dublin, that felon was originally a Celtic word adopted by the Latins as used in a peculiar sense by Martial and Catullus Some scholars think that felle is from OHG Fillo, an unrecorded derivative of Fillen to scourge cf med L. Filo (raval), others have sought to connect it with the obscure second element in the OE words wælfel (from wæl carnage, occurring only once, as an epithet of the raven) and wilfel, talfel (unusually supposed to be from fell adj, gall, poison, second element of dittor poison) The mod Da. fel horrible, disgusting, has also been compared, the MDu felle is adopted from Fr The Celtic words often cited are out of the question, the OIr word cannot have come from Wales or Ireland, and Gaulish appears not to have possessed the sound f, the Welsh ff and the Irish fh not corresponding etymologically]

Fermentation (fɜ·mĕntē·ʃŏn) [ad L. fermentātiōn-em, n of action f fermentāre to Ferment] The action of fermenting.

1 A process of the nature of that resulting from the operation of leaven on dough or on saccharine liquids.

The features superficially recognizable in the process in these instances are an effervescence or internal commotion, with evolution of heat, in the substance operated on, and a resulting alteration of its properties. Before the rise of modern chemistry, the term was applied to all chemical changes exhibiting these characters, in Alchemy it was the name of an internal change supposed to be produced in metals by a 'ferment', operating after the manner of leaven In modern science the name is restricted to a definite class of chemical changes peculiar to organic compounds, and produced in them by the stimulus of a 'ferment' (see Ferment sb 1), the various kinds of fermentation are distinguished by qualifying adjs, as acetous, alcoholic, butyric, lactic, putrefactive, etc (see those words) In popular language the term is no longer applied to other kinds of change than those which it denotes in scientific use, but it usually conveys the notion of a sensible effervescence or 'working', which is not involved in the chemical sense a in applications covered by the modern scientific sense..

-ferous, in actual use always -iferous (i fĕras), an adjectival suffix f. L. -fer producing (f. ferre to bear) + -ous. In Lat the suffix -fer was always preceded by i, either belonging to the stem as in pestifer pestilential, or the stem-vowel as in vinifer, or inserted as a connecting vowel as in arifer, so that the suffix practically appears in Lat as -ifer, and in Eng as -iferous. In Eng it appeared first in words taken from Lat, either directly or through Fr. adaptations in -fère, as in aurifeious, baccifeious, bifeious, cruciferous, frugiferous, glandiferous, lactiferous, metalliferous, odoriferous, pomiferous, rosiferous, saporiferous, thuriferous, vociferous
On the analogy thus established -iferous became a living English suffix, capable of combining with any Latin stem, and forms an unlimited number of derivatives, esp. in Natural History, as acuiferous, argentiferous, carboniferous, coccoferous, fossiliferous, lucriferous, sanguiferous, umbelliferous.

Fetch (fetʃ), sb 2 [Of obscure origin

Although Grose in our first quot assigns the word to the north of England, there seems to be no other evidence that the simple th was ever in popular use elsewhere than in Ireland The supposition that it is shortened from Fetch-life, or some equivalent compound of the vb seem, would plausibly account for the sense. On the other hand, it may be noted that the Corpus Glossary s 800 has 'Exercs mazre' As face seems to admit of no explanation as a Lat word, it may be conjectured to be OF , and the source of the present sb ; in the archetype followed face and mare (nightmare) may have been given as alternative English glosses on some Lat word, and the compiler may have mistaken the former for a Lat lemma.]

-fic, suffix, repr L. -fic-us 'making, doing' (f weakened root of facĕre to make, do), forming adjs. (1) from sbs , with the sense 'making, causing, producing', as in homĭ-ficus, pācĭfic, or 'performing or causing to be done', as in sacrĭficus, (2) from adjs, with the sense 'performing actions of a certain kind', as magnĭficus, also (in late and med L.) with the sense 'bringing into a specified state', as beātĭficus; (3) from vbs, with the sense 'causing to', as horrĭficus, terrĭficus, (4) from advbs, only in benĕficus, malĕficus, adjs of agency to the phrases bene, male facere to do good, do ill (to) Except in the two last-mentioned words, and in sacrĭficus (contr for sacrifacĭficus*), the suffix -fic-us is always preceded by -i-, which is either the stem-vowel or a substitute for it, or a connecting vowel appended to a consonant-stem Most of the L. adjs in -fĭcus appear in Fr , the termination being adapted as -(i)fique, also in It , Sp , Pg , the form being -fico In Eng the suffix prob first occurred in adoptions from Fr , like magnific, and was often spelt -i-fique down to the 17th c In mediæval and mod L. new formations with -i-fic-us were common, and many of them have passed, in adapted forms, into the Rom langs and Eng , as prolific, scientific In scientific nomenclature new words are still sometimes formed by the addition of the representative of -(i)ficus to L stems , such words, if accepted at all, are usually of international currency, and it is often uncertain in which lang they were first used , Eng examples are acidific, chylific, felific, morbific

Several L adjs in -ficus form their comparatives and superlatives, and their nouns of quality, from a stem in -ficent-. In Eng (but not in Romance) the adapted forms of these tend to -ficent, as beneficent, magnificent, maleficent, munificent

-fication (fikĭ·ʃən), suffix, repr L. -ficātion-em, the regular formative of nouns of action (see -ATION) from vbs in -ficāre see -FY Many words of this formation (chiefly post-classical) were adopted in Fr with their related vbs , the sbs in learned form with the suffix -fication, and the vbs in semi-popular form with the suffix -fier ; on the analogy of these many new formations with these suffixes arose in Fr. From the 14th c. F. vbs. in -fier

with their corresponding agent-nouns in fication have been freely introduced into Eng ; as purify, purification, sanctify, sanctification , and hence the suffix -fication has become the recognized means of forming nouns of action corresponding to vbs. in -fy, except such as represent L. vbs in -ficere (see -FACTION). In general, however, such nouns of action are (unless as mere nonce-wds) formed only on assumable mod L types ; but beautification has been in use since 17th c, and words like Frenchification, transmogrification, ugtification may occasionally be met with. In scientific language the suffix forms many sbs. (some of which have no corresponding vb); examples are acetification, acidification, chrysification, identification, ossification etc

Filibuster (fi·libʌstə), sb. Forms: 6 fibutor, 8–9 flibustier, 9 filibustier, fillibuster, flibuster. [The ultimate source is certainly the Du. vrijbuiter, in Kilian vrybuyter (see Henkoorter). It is not clear whether the 16th c. Eng. form fibutor, of which we have only one example, was taken from Du. directly or through some foreign lang. Late in the 18th c. the F. form flibustier was adopted into Eng., and continued to be used, with occasional variations of spelling, until after the middle of the present century. About 1850 54, the form filibuster, ad. Sp. filibustero, began to be employed as the designation of certain adventurers who at that time were active in the W. Indies and Central America; and this has now superseded the earlier flibustier even with reference to the history of the 17th c.

The mutual relation of the forms is involved in obscurity. It is possible that the corruption of fr into fl may be due to the influence of the word flibot (see Fly-boat), whence F. flibot, Sp. flibote, but against this it may be urged that in our first quot. the word seems to be applied to marauders on land. In Fr. the form forbustier occurs in the sense of Eng. freebooter) occurs in Du. Tertre Hist. des Ant. Isles (1667) III. 151, but flibustier is app. first recorded in A. O. Oexmelin (Alexquemeling) Hist. des Avanturiers (1686), this writer says that it comes from the Eng. flibustier 'corsair'; in the earlier ed. of the work in Dutch (1678) the word does not occur. It is possible on the one hand that the corrupt form of the Du. word may be of Eng. origin, and may have been taken into F. from its use in the Eng. colonies in the W. Indies, or, on the other hand, that the F. form arose in the European wars of the 18th c., and is the immediate source of Garrard's flibutor. In any case the insertion of the s probably originated in ſr as a mere sign of vowel-length, though from the Dictionnaire de Trévoux we learn that the s was already pronounced in 1704. In the Dict. étymologique of Ménage (who died in 1692), s.v. Aloet, the form Flibustier occurs, with the explanation doubtless erroneous) 'celui qui gouverne un flibot'. The sp flibustero is presumably ad. F. flibustier.]

b spec. The compromise of a fictitious or collusive suit for the possession of lands ; formerly in use as a mode of conveyance in cases where the ordinary modes were not available or equally efficacious.

The procedure was as follows. The person to whom the land was to be conveyed sued the holder for wrongfully keeping him out of possession, the defendant (hence called the cognizor) acknowledged the right of the plaintiff (or cognizee), the compromise was entered on the record of the court ; and the particulars of it were set forth in a document called the foot of the fine (see FOOT). This method of conveyance was resorted to by married women till 1833 when it was abolished by any other process), and as a means of barring an entail The cognizor was said to acknowledge or levy a fine, sometimes the vb do or levy was used intrans with fine as the subject. It has been suggested that finikin is the original form and is of Du origin, cf MDu Apinkens adv. accurately neatly, prettily (Kilian). On this hypothesis the word finical and finick ab and vb must in some way have been evolved from finikin The conjecture however is unsupported by evidence, and finical appears 70 years earlier than the earliest known instance of finikin.)

Firmament (fɜ·mămĕnt) Forms 4 6 fer-, fyrmament(e, 3– firmament [ad. L. firmāmentum, f. firmāre to strengthen, f. firmus firm. Cf. OF. firmament

In class. Lat the word means 'something which strengthens or supports' (cf 3). In the Vulgate it was adopted, in imitation of the στερέωμα of the LXX (properly 'firm or solid structure', f. στερεοῦν to make firm or solid, f. στερεός firm, solid), as the rendering of Heb. רָקִיעַ rāqîaʿ, applied to the vault of the sky. The Heb. word prob. means 'expanse', from the root רָקַע rāqaʿ, which in the Bible has the senses 'to tread', 'to beat out (metals)', 'to spread out', but in Syriac the vb. means 'to condense, make firm or solid', whence the Gr. and Lat. renderings of the vb.)
