2 Zool and Bot. A classificatory group comprehending a number of species (sometimes a single species) possessing certain common structural characters distinguishing them from those of any other group

The determination of genera and of what characteristics are to be considered generic, is more or less arbitrary and empirical, and admits of continual alteration according to current knowledge of facts and ideas of classification in the respective sciences The genus ranks next under the family or sub family, and above the species it is sometimes divided into subgenus (L. subgenus) and section (L. sectio (always in Latin or considered as Latin) together form the scientific proper name of an animal or plant, the generic name standing first and being written with an initial capital The zoologist Agassiz in his Inl. genus Homo is popularly known as a somewhat flippant or jocular synonym for 'mankind' or 'the human race'

1. Referred to the earth as centre; considered as viewed from the centre of the earth: as the geocentric latitude, longitude, place, etc. of a planet, i.e. that in which it would appear to an observer placed at the centre of the earth.

St George, who at an English synod of 1222 was placed only among saints of the second rank (Conc Oxon viii in Conc Collect Parts 1644 XXVIII), has been recognized as the patron saint of England from the time of Edward III, partly because of his being adopted as patron of the Order of the Garter, and his encounter with the dragon is frequently represented on coins, medals, etc Hence are derived various secondary uses of the name, with or without the prefixed Saint]

Geotropism (dʒĭ·ŏtrŏpĭz'm) Bot. [f. as prec. + -ISM First used in Ger. form geotropismus by A B Frank Beitr. z. Pflanzenphysiol. (1868).] A collective term for the phenomena of irritability presented by various parts of plants in relation to the action of gravity Positive geotropism : the tendency (of roots, etc.) to grow towards the centre of the earth. Negative g. : the tendency (of stems, etc.) to grow away from the centre of the earth.

By C and F. Darwin (1880) the word was used in a narrower sense, as synonymous with the 'positive geotropism' of other writers, the term Apogeotropism being substituted for 'negative geotropism'. Diageotropism, the tendency (of leaves) to grow at right angles to the vertical, is a third variety of 'geotropism' in the original (and still prevalent) wider sense of the word

1875 Bennett & Dyer Sachs' Bot 128 The positive or negative character of geotropism depends as little as that of heliotropism on the morphological nature of the organ

1880 F Darwin in Nature XXXIII 179 The phenomena might result from the ordinary forms of heliotropism and geotropism acting in concert.

A compound of the word which appears in Eng as Falcon, the origin of the first element is disputed, but the prevailing view both among Germanic and Romanic philologists now is that, while the recorded forms in the Teut tongue are adopted from Fr, the ultimate source is the OHG. gīr vulture (MHG. gīr, mod Ger geier), f the root gīr* in OHG gīrag, gīt greedy). The suggestion that the med L. gyrofalco is derived from gyrus gyrare, and refers to the circling manœuvres of the bird in the air, was made by Gerald de Barri (Giraldus Cambrensis) as early as 1188 (Top Hib ed Brewer, 1 xiii) A treatise on hunting by the Emperor Frederic II of Swabia, De Arte Venandi cum Avibus, ed 1596) in which the word is said to be either from the Ger noun, lord, or from the Ger name Gerard The latter suggestion was posh based on the current term falco nobilis denoting a kind of hawk, but according to modern scholarship it is not. Fr. Sp., Pg gerfaucon does not mean 'lord,' but is an alt of gerfaut (the Fr. form is found in Hierobotanicon was adopted by ornithologists (Aldrovandus, Gesner) as the correct Latin form, probably from the observation that it gyro sometimes represents i before n in gerarchia, hierarchy); and it is still used as the scientific name of a sub-genus of the genus Falco. The view of some recent etymologists, that OF gerfaucon represents a popular L accipitalis falco*, and that the first element of this is from Ger geier hawk is very improbable]

German (dʒɜ·mǽn), a[2] and sb[2] Also 6 germayne, 6–7 germaine, germane. [ad. L. Germān-us, used, as adj and sb, as the designation of persons belonging to a group of related peoples inhabiting central and northern Europe, and speaking the dialects from which the 'Germanic' or 'Teutonic' languages have been developed.

The name does not appear to have been applied to these peoples by themselves, from the earliest records. A view widely held is that it was the name given by the Gauls to their neighbours, the Celtic derivations suggested are from Gîr gar neighbour (Zeuss) and from Irish gairm battle-cry (Ebel). But according to Müllenhoff, Germani was originally the name of a group of Celtic peoples in north eastern Gaul, was transferred from these to their Teutonic conquerors, and afterwards extended to all the Teutonic peoples [etc.]

The pronunciation (dʒɜ·mǽn), for which cf clerk, sergeant, Hertford, was formerly fashionable, but now survives only as dial or vulgar

In English use the word does not occur until the 16th c; the sb. appearing in our quots earlier than the adj. The older designations were Almain and Dutch (Dutchman), the latter, however, was wider in meaning (ur-, for-)geta, OS. (bi-, far-)getan (MDu ver-gheten, Du ver-geten), OHG gezzan, kezzan (once in pple keppendi, ' adeptus', otherwise only in bi-, ant-, ir-, fer-gezzan ; MHG. er-, ver-gezzen, mod G ver-gessen), Goth. Of the compounds of getan which existed in OE. (see above), only begetan and forgetan survive in the modern language, and the normal equivalents beyet and foryet were displaced in later ME. in favour of BEGET and FORGET. Gower is app the last author who employs beyet; foryet disappears in the 15th c. except in Sc, where it is not yet extinct The change was prob due to the influence of the simple verb. Conversely, the solitary example in MS. of yeten without prefix (sense 26) may be referred to the influence of bigeten.

The forms of the pa. pple. retaining the original vowel (ON getenn) are found in literature down to the 16th c, and in the north midlands and Yorkshire getten is still the dialect form From the beginning of the English history of the vb., however, it has, like most verbs with ME open e in the present stem, tended to assume the conjugation of vbs. of the e, a, o series (originally confined to roots ending in a liquid); thus in the 13th c. we find geten, got, gaten parallel with steken, stal, stoken In the 16th c. the pa t was often got, by assimilation to the pa. pple., in the 17th c. this became the normal form, though gat is used in the Bible of 1611 and still occurs in archaistic poetry. In Eng land the form gotten of the pa. pple. is almost obsolete (exc. dial.) being ousted by got, in U.S literature gotten is still very common, although Webster 1864 gives it as 'obsolescent.') Gewgaw, gew-gaw (gy·gɑ). Forms 3 giuegous, 5–8 geuge, (5 geugawe, 7 eugawe, 7–8 geugaw, 6 guegaw, guy-gaw, 7 guegaye, gugau, gugaw; 6– 7 gew(e)gawe, 7 gowgai(e, gew-gaude, 8 geugaw, 9 dial. gewgow, geegaw, 6– gewgaw, gew-gaw. [Etymology and primary sense uncertain; a reduplicated formation such as is commonly found in words of contemptuous signification. If the original application be to a musical instrument, the word may have been invented as an imitation of the sound, cf. Du. gregagen to chuckle, etc. On other occasions, if the primary notion was that of 'a gaudy object', the suggestion may have come from the νῶ Gaw, with its variants or synonyms gow, gew. It is not impossible that the word as applied to a musical instrument may be an independent formation. The mod. Du. giegauw, recorded once in the sense 'flourish, scalloped border', and now preserved only in a phrase of obscure origin belonging to the game of mercels, is supposed by the Du. lexicographers to be an adoption of the Eng. word.

The commonly accepted view has been that the earliest form, which is written giuegous (Ancren Riwle) should be read as geuegous, and that the word is a reduplicated formation from the root of Give. On this supposition it would be identical with Gipp gaff and the MDu. ghiveghave, of which a single example is known. But if this were the etymology, the word would have 3, not g, in the southern texts of the Ancren Riwle (unless indeed these texts have been transcribed from an original in northern dialect). Further, the proposed explanation does not account plausibly for the recorded senses, and it is doubtful whether the assumed development of giuegous into gugaw (15th c.), guygaw (16th c.), gewgaw, is phonetically possible. The pupil utility is that gew = gugaw = guy.

Although the word is known only in the WGer langs (in all of which it is found with substantially identical meaning), it appears to be of pre-Teut formation The sense of the pre-Teut khostis-s*, if the ordinary view of its etymological relations be correct, should be 'fury, anger'; cf. Skr hḍas neut anger, Zend zəšda- ugly; the root khēi-. khos appears with cognate sense in ON gnas to rage, Goth us-gaisnan to terrify (see Gast v) outside Teut the derivatives seem to point to a primary sense 'to wound, tear, pull to pieces'
I. The OE form gást is common in the Exeter Book, and occurs 49 times in the Hatton MS and 3 times in the Bodl. MS of Alfred's transl of Gregory's Pastoral Care; it is app not known elsewhere. The occurrence of gástr-* gástl-* beside gást = gastiz-* is explained by Sievers (Ags Gram. ed 3) as indicating that the word, though recorded only as masc., was orig a neut -as,-es stem it would thus correspond formally to the Skr. word quoted above.
The spelling with gh-, so far as our material shows, appears first in Caxton, who was probably influenced by the Flemish ghest It remained rare until the middle of the 16th c., and was not completely established before about 1590]

The Gr word and its Lat transliteration appear in classical use (chiefly in pl) as the name of a mythical race of beings of enormous stature and strength, represented as the sons of Gæa (Earth) and of Uranus (Heaven) or Tartarus (Hell), and as having warred with the Gods, by whom they were in the end destroyed. The LXX, and (hence) the Vulgate, used the word in passages of the Bible which refer to men of extraordinary stature and strength, and it thus obtained the wider sense in which it is current in the Rom. langs. and in Eng. The mythology of Gr. γίγαντες, like that of many other mythological names, is obscure, the hypothesis of connexion with the root γα, γη- to be born, to beget, is hardly tenable.]

Invented by Carlyle, who gives Sartor Resartus (1837) III 156 the following quotation in explanation of its origin: 'Q What do you mean by "respectable"? A He always kept a gig (Thurtell's trial). This is taken from Pref to XXVII (1828) 1, where the writer says: 'We quote from memory'. In the Times report of the trial (3 Nov 1823) the passage reads 'He always maintained an appearance of respectability, and kept his horse and gig.'

Gingerly (dʒi·ndʒəli), adv and a [f. ginger* (of obscure origin) + -LY²; the adj. appears a few years later than the adv., and may possibly be derived from it.

It seems conceivable that ginger- may represent an adoption of OF genser (gensehur, gentiur, genzor, etc.), properly the comparative of gent (gentil) gentle, fair, etc., but used also as positive, 'pretty, delicate' The form presents no difficulty, as the word would naturally be assimilated to GINGER sb The sense of the OF word agrees closely with that of gingerly in the earliest examples both as adj. and as adv.; though the Eng word was almost entirely confined to one specific application (perh. as a technical term in dancing), which easily developed into a sense very remote from that of the suggested etymon

Notes that appear to share any other plausible conjecture has yet been offered. The usual comparison of Sw. dial. gugla, gaugla, to totter, is inadmissible, both on account of the sound-(dz) instead of (g) in both syllables of the Eng word, and for other reasons. The word derived from GINGER sb would not account for the 16th c. sense]

Give (giv), v Forms and Inflexions see below [A common Teutonic str vb., OE giefan (geaf, gēafon, giefen) OFris. geva, jeva, OS geban (MDu and Du geven, OHG kepan, geban (MHG and G geben), ON gefa Sw gifva, Da give), Goth. giban —O Teut geban*, gaf, gēbum, gebano- By some the root is identified with that of Lith gabénti to bring, OIrish gabim I take

In OE the strictly West Saxon forms of the infinitive and the pa. pple show the influence of initial g in the substitution of ie (commonly y) for the original a of the root, thus giefan, gifan, gyfan for gefan In other dialects the e was normal, except where it passed into eo (northern ea) by w- or sc-umlaut (which occurs very frequently, perh owing to the analogy of the past and 3rd pers sing pres ind, on the other hand, the regular i of the last mentioned forms is often replaced by the e of the infinitive In midland and southern ME there are three main forms 3e-, 3ev-, and 3even. The third of these is rare, and disappears c 1300 The relation of the other two forms is obscure, as both sometimes occur in the same text as in Ayenb 1340, where the earlier version favours 3even, the later 3eve, but neither is consistent In such cases the difference may be merely graphic, as in the indeterminate vowel-value of texts, however, show an exclusive use of one or other of the forms, thus 3even is regular in the Ancren Riwle, while the Wohnlist has only 3eve; the forms with initial guttural are first recorded in the Ormulum (fourth quarter 12 cent), though the forms with 3 are much more frequent (Apparent earlier instances with initial g occur only in MSS which contain later matter) The g-forms, however, certainly originated in the north (though the want of 12th c northern texts renders direct proof impossible), and, as they do not admit of being like the 3-forms explained as the products of analogy, it seems most probable that they are due to Scandinavian influence The regular form of the infinitive in early northern texts is gef, gyf, which rather corresponds to SW gyfva, Da give, than to ON gefa On the other hand, the pa pple is at an early date written with e as well as i (gefen, getc , see the forms below), and also appears in some parts of the text from a 1250 onwards In the 15th and 16th c the form geve (gyef, etc) is common both in English and Scottish writers, Levins (1570) places it among words of the ei class, and Sylvester (1598) makes the forms extended themselves gradually to the midland dialects Havelok (c 1300) has, like the Ormulum, both the 3 and the g-forms, as also Cursor (1300) has only the former, but his Chronicle (c 1330), according to the two existing MSS, has always g Langland has both types, and all extant MSS of the alliteration, but Chaucer seems to have always written yeve, yaf, and throughout the greater part of the 15th c the palatal forms predominate in midland (including Scots) and are common in southern writers The MSS of Fortescue have g, which is common also in the London documents after 1430 (Morsbach, Eng Schrift sprache 98) About 1500 the palatal forms disappear entirely from the 17th cent they reappear, and have left only very faint traces in the modern dialects

In the 14th–16th c the pa pple was sometimes conformed to the infinitive, as 3eve, 3e, a vbs with i, e losing (cf GET), this took place with both the midland and northern forms, but geven is found more frequently than geven]

B Signification

General sense To make another the recipient of (something that is in the possession, or at the disposal, of the subject).

The verb seems, from the evidence of Goth. ONG and OS., to have primarily denoted the placing of a material object in the hands of another person. This application is one of the most frequent in OE., and is not very frequent in ON., the usual sense (which is found in all the Teut. langs.) is that of freely and gratuitously conferring on a person the ownership of a thing, as an act of bounty. When the notion of 'free gift' was not prominent, the word used was usually Sell. OE. sellan, ON. selja), it may be remarked that according to Prof. Leo's glossary to the Northumbrian gospels, the Last dare is never rendered by ge- or on its compounds, but always by (d, ge-) sella In early ME. the vb sell became obsolete except in the limited sense – L. vendere, and its meanings passed over to give While, however, give thus acquired a widened sense (for the process of development of which cf F donner to give –L dônâre to present), it retained at the same time the specific meaning which it had in OF In mod Eng both the wider and the narrower senses are still current, so that while give may be used as an antitheus of sell, pay, or lend, it may also be contextually equivalent to any of those vbs

The construction, wherever nothing is said to the contrary, is with to (unto) or dative

I trans To bestow gratuitously

1 To hand over (a thing) as a present; to confer gratuitously the ownership of (some possession) on another person (with or without actual delivery of the object)

(Cf Irish from orig klūyo-*.)

In OE and ME the word is chiefly poetic After the 15th c. it seems to have been rarely used, and in the 17th c is almost entirely absent from literature Phillips (1706) marks it as obsolete, and Johnson considered it a merely comic word (see 3; quot 1755)' It again became common towards the end of the 18th c, but the cause of its revival is not apparent]

c. A musical composition, of English origin, for three or more voices (one voice to each part), set to words of any character, grave or gay, often consisting of two or more contrasted movements, and (in strict use) without accompaniment

The glee differs from the madrigal in involving little or no contrapuntal imitation, and from the part-song in the independence of its parts, which form 'a series of interwoven melodies' (Stainer & Barrett)
