Fy, obs form of Fie

Fy- see also Fi-

-fy (fai, suffix, forming verbs The older Eng. vbs. in -fy are adoptions of Fr vbs. in -fier, which are directly adapted from Lat vbs. in -ficare or formed on the analogy of vbs. so originating. (The form -fier was used as the representative of L. -ficare on the analogy of words like sanctifier—sanctificare.) The Lat vbs. in -ficare were originally derivatives of adjs. in -fic-us (see -fic), though subsequently the suffix could be used to form vbs. without the intervention of an adj. They may be divided into three classes (corresponding to three classes of adjectives in -ficus see -fic), all of which are represented by adapted words in Eng. (1) vbs. f. adjs. with the sense 'to make, produce'; as pacificare (orig intr to make peace) pacify, edificare edify, or 'to make or convert into something'; as deificare deify, (2) f. adjs., with the sense 'to bring into a certain state'; as sanctificare sanctify. (3) f. vb.-stems, with causative sense, as horrificare horrify. In med. L. there was a tendency to substitute -ficare for -facere in the few Lat. vbs. so ending, and hence Fr. and Eng. vbs. in -fier, -fy sometimes correspond to Lat. vbs. in -facere, e. g. F stupéfier (Littré in pa. pple. stupéfait as well as stupefié) stupefy, OF satisfier (but mod F. satisfaire) satisfy, F. liquéfier liquefy, F. rubéfier rubefy, med. L. calefacere calefy. Exc. in the case of these few vbs. the ending has normally the form -fy (for the reason see Fic) It is now used as the regular rendering of -ficare in new words adopted from Lat. or formed on assumable Lat. types, and is also freely added to Eng. adjs. and sbs. to form vbs., mostly somewhat jocular in the sense 'to make or convert into a thing', as speechify, 'to assimilate to the character of something', chiefly in pa. pple., as countrified), 'to invest with certain attributes', as Frenchify. (A large proportion of these vbs. are from sbs. and adjs. ending in -y or -ey, the suffix then having the form -fy instead of the usual -ify. An early example is beautify, but the analogy on which this word was formed is not clear.) In a few cases the suffix has been quite irregularly added to vb. stems, words which are either obsolete, as testify, kindrify, orisfy, or merely jocular or illiterate, as argufy. The noun of action related to vbs. in -ify normally ends in -ification, though, by confusion of suffix, petrifaction is used in Eng. where Fr. has more correctly pétrification. The words in which -fy represents L. -facere have their corresponding nouns of action ending in -faction.

The following examples illustrate the freedom with which this suffix has been used in the formation of nonce-words

1602 Dekker Satiromastix Liva, Nay by Sesu you shall bee a Poet, though not Lawrefyed, yet Nettlefyed so. 1647 Trapp *Comm. Fylfot (fi·lfɒt). [The sole authority on which this word has been accepted by modern antiquaries as the name of the mark in question is the passage from the Lansdowne MS. quoted below. The context in which the word there occurs seems to favour the supposition that it is simply fill-foot, meaning a pattern or device for filling the foot of a painted window. There is nothing to show whether the word denoted specifically this device as distinguished from others used for the same purpose, and it is even possible that it may have been a mere nonce-word.] A name for the figure called also a cross-cramponnee (see Cramponnee), and identical with the Swastika of India, the gammadion of Byzantine ecclesiastical ornament; it has been extensively used as a decoration (often, apparently, as a mystical symbol) in almost all known parts of the world from prehistoric times to the present day. G.

G (dʒī), the seventh letter of the Roman alphabet, was originally a differentiated form of C, for its early history see that letter. In Latin G represented the voiced guttural stop; but in the later period of the language it must have been pronounced before front vowels as a palatal, its representation in the Rom. langs. being precisely the same as that of Lat. I consonant (J), hence in OF. G before e, i was pronounced like J, viz. as the assibilated (dʒ).

In OE. the letter stood for four different sounds, viz. the voiced guttural and palatal stop (in this Dictionary represented by g, g), and the voiced guttural and palatal spirant (here printed ȝ, ȝ). The precise distribution of these sounds is much disputed, but if we confine our view to the very end of the OE. period the following statements may be made. Initial G before back vowels was a guttural stop (g), developed from an earlier spirant. Initial G before front vowels was a palatal spirant (y). Medially and finally, G represented a guttural or a palatal, according to the nature of the associated sounds, in the combinations ng and gg (written cg when palatal, rarely when guttural) it was a stop, and in other positions a spirant. In early ME., or perh. in late OE., the palatal stop developed into the complex sound (dʒ), thus coinciding with the power of G before e, i, in contemporary French.

In early ME the continental form of G (approximately g) was used for the two sounds which the letter had in French, (g) and (dʒ), while the OE form ȝ was used for the sounds peculiar to native words, viz. the guttural and palatal spirants (γ, y) Ormin attempted to differentiate the symbol ȝ into two, ȝ = (dʒ), and ȝ~ (g), but his example was not followed. The symbol ȝ gradually came to assume a form indistinguishable from that used for ȝ in contemporary MSS., in this Dictionary the form ȝ is employed for ME. words. This symbol was commonly used in ME for the sound of (y) initial and final, for the guttural and palatal nvoiced spirant finial or before t (as in snouȝ, dauȝt, miȝt, OE. genȝh, dȝt, nɑ̈ht), and, so long as the sound remained in the language, for the guttural voiced spirant From the 13th c., however, the ȝ was by some scribes wholly or partially discarded for y or gh; a few texts have yh In the 15th c vocabularies the words beginning with ȝ are at the end of the alphabet Caxton uses the symbol sparingly, chiefly before final t The English printers of the 16th c. scarcely use it at all; but in Scotland it survived longer, and has left a trace in the use of z for y in the spelling of surnames like Menzues and Dalziel, and of such words as capercaʒlie, gaberlunzie

In modern English G has the so called 'hard' sound (g) at the end of a word, before a consonant or a, o, u, (exc in gaol, gaoler), and in words of Teutonic etymology before e and i, as in geese, get. Also in Hebrew proper names, as Gethsémane, Gideon. In words from Lat or Romance it has the 'soft' sound (dʒ) before e, i, y, and at the end of a syllable, in words of whatever origin, the sound (dʒ) is represented always by dge or ge, the letter J not being used in this position The combination gu is sounded n initially or at the end of a syllable When the combination ng occurs in one syllable, the g is now silent, serving only to give to the n the value of (ŋ) With regard to the pronunciation of ng in the middle of a dsyllable, modern usage is somewhat inconsistent · in the inflexions and derivatives of verbs the g is silent, as in ɛ̄nger, ɛ̄ngeth, ɛ̄nging (ē as in pāst, a as in pin), but is sounded in the comparatives and superlatives of adjs., as in younger, longer (yʊ'ngəɹ, lɔ'ngəɹ), and the other words generally, as finger (fi ngəɹ).

The combination gh is in a few words (aghast, ghastly, ghost) a mere capricious substitute for g (cf Caxton's frequent ghoos, ghoost, gherle = goose, goat, girl) Elsewhere it chiefly represents the older guttural or palatal spirant (OE. ɣ or h), which in modern pronunciation is either dropped, as in high, night, through, plough, or replaced by (f), as in laugh, rough, tough; a special development has taken place in lough (lɔk).

The twofold sense of the OHG verb seems to be reflected in the Rom. form, which was used for 'to cultivate land' (so in OFr.; see Gain *v.*³, Gainage, Gainor), as well as for 'to gain, win, earn'; the latter sense, which the word retains in mod Fr. and It., may be in part developed from the OHG. sense 'to hunt.']

P In the following passage the word is a literal rendering of the Gr κερδαίνειν. The sense of the original is disputed: most scholars, regarding the clause as qualified by the foregoing negative, take the verb as having, with or without a direct object, a bad sense (= 'make gain by base means'), good or bad' (Johnson, = v Gain', so Liddell and Scott, also Revised Version ('gotten') Others assign to the Gr. the sense 'to spare oneself, avoid, save', so De Wette, Alford Blass, and others Both uses of the word occur in Gr writers, it is not at all clear which view was taken by the translators, or whether they deliberately adopted an ambiguous rendering

Gall (gŏl), *sb*² Forms 1 geallu, -a—6 galle, 4–7 galle, 7 gal, 6–9 & gaw, 6– gall [OE geallu wk. masc , a sore on a horse, corresponds in meaning to MSw. galle wk masc , MLG , MHG , mod G galle fem , Du. gal fem. , in Ger and Du the word has or has had (see Grimm Wb, and the Nederl Woordenb) the senses 'pimple or blister generally, barren spot in a field, flaw or rotten place in a rock', etc.

Although all these words are in the several langs formally identical with those repr. GALL sb.[1], and it seems not unlikely that they may be actually identical; the notion of 'venom' (GALL sb.[2] 5) passes easily into that of 'envenomed sore' (cf PRIOR sb.[2]), the other senses illustrated below may be explained as referring to the gall as a part of the carcass which has to be removed as useless and offensive. The ON. and MSw. galle wk. masc., 'fault, defect' (in phrases equivalent to 'without gall'), seems to admit of the same explanation.

It is, however, probable that words of different etymology have influenced the sense development in the Eng and other Teut langs. In the Rom langs the word for GALL sb.[1] (F galle, It galla, Sp agalla) was used for a swelling on the fetlock of a horse (so Ger Feuergalle, windgalle, Eng WINDGALL), and Ger writers of the 16th c. argue that the word ought, being a transferred use of galla gall nut, to be limited to this specific meaning. In Eng the word seems to have been influenced (through GALE sb.[3]) by OF galles, galer to rub, scratch, gall, possibly also by F gale Am., itch, scurf, scab (also, flaw in cloth, whence Eng gauls; the source of these words is unknown, one suggestion being that they are derived from I galla GALL sb.[1])

1 Originally, a painful swelling, pustule, or blister, esp in a horse; (hist.) (GALLANDY). In later use (? influenced by GALL v.) a sore or wound produced by friction.

Gallant (gæ lănt, gălænt), a and sb Forms. 4–6 gallant(e, 5–8 gallaunt(e, 5–6 Sc galland, 6 gallante, -aunt, -aunde, 6– gallant. [a. F galant (recorded from the 14th c.), pa. pple of OF galer to make merry, make a show, connected with gale merrymaking = It, Sp gala; see GALE sb.[2] and GALA). The early senses of the adj. in Fr. are: 'dashing, spirited, bold' (obsolete in Fr, but the source of the prevailing sense in mod Eng.); 'gay in appearance, handsome, gaily attired', and 'fitted for the pleasures of society, attractive in manners, courteous, polished'. The last of these gave rise in mod Fr. to the specialized senses 'politely attentive to women', and 'amorous, amatory', which were adopted into Eng in the 17th c, and are usually distinguished by the accentuation galla nt. The It. galante, courteous, honourable, and Sp galante, gaily dressed, sprightly, galan, galano gaily dressed, seemed to have been adopted from French The use as sb, which is recorded in Eng. somewhat earlier than the adjectival use, was adopted from Fr., in which language all the senses of the sb had been developed.

The origin of the OFr. verb galer is disputed The view of Diez, that it was f the OHG geil = ME Golf, wanton, is now abandoned, as the normal Central French form on that supposition should begin with j, the form galer (for which waler occurs as a variant) points to an original initial w Hence most recent scholars regard the vb as OHG walôn to wander, go on pilgrimage, but the transition of sense offers difficulties that are not fully cleared up]

The Du synonym gleipot is not recorded till a century later than the date of our earliest examples of the English word, and the editors of Kilian's Du Dict. think that its first element may possibly be identical with gles (frequent in the 17th c.), a variant of gales GALLEY *sb*¹ In support of this view, it is pointed out that a Du word kroud-gleis, kroudgleis-kleen mean literally 'potsherd imported in carracks', and a passage is quoted from the Inv te Brussel II 206 which mentions 'glass wares brought in galleys and carracks' (ware les galeas et carakes aenkomende). Further, gleyri-werk is explained by Kilian as meaning Balearic or Majorcan pottery (of MAJOLICA) On the other hand, the word gles is given in Kilian and Du. dicts. of the 19th c. as a name for porcelain clay, but it has not been found in any text, except in the compound glesbuisker, geley buiskes 'porcelain tubes', and it may possibly be accidentally formed by misinterpretation of the compounds a la pot and gleiwerk, gleigrof (glazed pottery)

1 An apparatus for inflicting the punishment of death by hanging, usually consisting of two uprights and a cross-piece, from which the criminal is suspended by the neck Sometimes used as equivalent to Cross See Cross sb. 1

In OE the sing galga and the pl galgan are both used for 'a gallows', the pl having reference presumably to the two posts of which the apparatus usually consisted Occasional examples of the sing form occur in ME, and even down to the 17th c, but from the 13th c onwards the plural gallows and its later phonetic equivalents have been the prevailing forms So far as our material shows, Caxton is the first writer to speak of 'a gallows', though he also uses the older expression 'a pair (of gallows)' It is of course, possible that the pl form was sometimes treated as a sing much earlier From the 16th c gallows has been (exc arch in 'pair of gallows') used as a sing, with a new plural gallouses, the latter, though the best strictly obso lete, is now seldom used, the formation is felt to be some what uncouth, so that the use of the word in the plural is commonly evaded

[The orig. stem is perhaps ganron-*, the d being a euphonic insertion between n and r as in thunder :—OE. junror. Outside of English the word is found only in Du., LG and South Ger. gander, MLG ganre , the other Teut. languages show different formations, as G. gänserich (earlier gansser), ON. gassr, Sw gäss

Although used as the masc. of GOOSE (OE. gōs:—OTeut. gans*) there is some doubt whether it is etymologically cognate with that word. While goose represents an OAryan hans* with palatal gh, it is possible that OE gandəra may be cognate with Lith gándras stork ; this would imply a root beginning with velar gh-, to which may also be referred OE gand GANNET, OHG. ganazzo, ganzo (MHG ganze, also gens), Du. gent, all meaning 'gander'. It has been conjectured that gander may have been originally the special name of some kind of water-bird, and that its association with goose is accidental, perh arising from the alliterative phrase 'goose and gander'.]

This and the following senses appear to be peculiar to Eng. the ON. drang-gangr, etc., have often been compared, but gangr in those compounds means not 'gang', but the act of going about. It would appear that in nautical use the word meaning 'set of things,' (sense 8) was extended to the sense 'set of persons,' 'crew', which had earlier been expressed by the cognate and like sounding Gwas.

OHG. warjan to defend : —Oll. warian Wear *v.*2]

Senses 1 and 2 agree with the uses of the French word. The further development is app due to confusion with F garnison GARNISON, which had the same meanings of 'defence' and 'supplies', as well as that of 'garrison'. There is not sufficient evidence to show that the last was ever a common sense of F garison. Godefroy gives only one quotation for it. It is also probable that the specially English sense of 'fortress', 'stronghold' (see 3), led to the identification of the two words and to the final adoption of 'garrison' in place of 'garison'.]

2 The Garter, the badge of the highest order of English knighthood Hence, membership of this order, the order itself.

The institution of the order is commonly (on the authority of FROISSART) attributed to Edward III about the year 1344 By the time of Selden (1614) it was traditionally asserted that the garter was that of the Countess of Salisbury, which fell off while she danced with the King, who picked it up and tied it on his own leg, saying to those present Honi soit qui mal y pense. The Garter as the badge of the Order is a ribbon of dark blue velvet, edged and buckled with gold, and bearing the above words embroidered in gold, and is worn below the left knee; garters also form part of the ornament of the collar worn by the Knights Gas (gæs), sb Pl gases (gæ·sēz). Forms: 7–8 gass, 8–9 gas, 7– gas. [A word invented by the Dutch chemist, J. B Van Helmont (1577–1644), but avowedly suggested by the Gr χάος (‘halitum illum Gas vocavi, non longe a Chao veterum secretum’ Ortus Medicinæ, ed. 1652, p. 59 a¹), the Dutch pronunciation of g as a spirant accounts for its being employed to represent Gr χ.

Van Helmont's statement having been overlooked, it has been very commonly supposed that he modelled his word on Du geest spirit, an idea found at least as early as 1775 (Priestley Air Introd 3). Van Helmont invented the term Blas, which has not survived, while gas has been adopted (usually in the same form) in most European languages, viz. Sw. Dan. & Pg. gas, Sp. gas spirant accounts for its being employed to represent Gr χ.

† 1. An occult principle supposed by Van Helmont to be contained in all bodies, and regarded by him as an ultra-rarefied condition of water (see quot. 1652.) Obs

Gas is a far more subtile or fine thing than a vapour, mist, or distilled Oyliness, although as yet, it be many times thicker than Air But Gas is self, masterfully taken, is water as yet masked with the ferment of composed Bodies 1652 tr Blancard's Phys Dict (1693) 95/2 Gas, a name used by Helmont, and signifies a Spirit that will not coagulate, or the Spirit of Life, a Balsom preserving the Body from Corruption. 1743 Lond & Country Brew I 161, 1154 Your Water never is to boil, for Boiling irritates and evaporates the subtile fine, penetrating Gas or Spirit

2 Any aeriform or completely elastic fluid, matter in the condition of an aeriform fluid. Usually applied to those aeriform fluids which remain such at ordinary atmospheric temperatures, the gaseous forms of substances ordinarily found solid or liquid being by preference called vapours.

3 spec. a Gas of a kind suitable to be burnt for illuminating or heating purposes, originally, and still chiefly, = Coal-gas, but now including various artificial mixtures consisting chiefly of carburetted hydrogen, and distinguished by defining words indicating the source from which they are obtained, as water-gas, oil-gas, etc

The first experiments in the use of coal-gas for illumination are said to have been made by Dr Clayton, rector of Crofton about 1688, the practical introduction of gas-lighting was due to Murdoch 1792–1808

The ulterior etymology is obscure. Some scholars refer the word to the root of Get v, supposing the etymological sense to be either 'reception' (= get-ing), 'hole', 'opening') or 'means of reaching' (hence 'way of access'). It is however very uncertain whether it is allied either to Get or to Gate sb.2

The original OE declension was gat, gates, gate in the sing., and gatu, a, um in the plur., according to the phonetic law by which a became æ etc., when a vowel followed in the next syllable Subsequently the g (= j) before æ became palatalized, and the influence of the palatal j caused the change of æ into ea. Hence there evolved the two forms geat- and gat-, which are respectively represented by the a and β types in the later language In late OE the functional distinction between the two types was already disappearing through the operation of analogy, so that we find such forms as gates, gate (sing.) and gatu, geatum (pl.), in Mercian the forms geate, -um (with gutturali are earlier, being due to the influence of the phonetic laws of the dialect In ME the a forms are universal in northern and in north and west midland writers, and also prevailed in the s w (Robert of Gloucester, the Cursor Mundi, Legendary, etc.), the MSS of Chaucer have gate in some passages and yate in others Since the 16th c gate has been the sole form in literary English, dialectally the forms with y remain in northern and midland districts, so far as they have not been displaced by the influence of the literary language, occasionally they are found surviving elsewhere, as in N Devon and at Banbury (Hall Hobson-Jobson).

As to the ulterior etymological relations, the retained Connexion with the root of Get is not supposed for this as for Gate sb.1, some have assumed a root ghad* meaning 'to go', on the ground of the Gl. ada n gatih he went. The spelling gait, gayte first appears in the 15th c, but was almost confined to Sc. and northern writers until the beginning of the 17th c. It remains in the only sense of the word which is current in literary English, viz. (A supposed example of this spelling has been found in the Cotton MS. of the Cursor M, line 13278, but this is prob a mistake: see Gate sb.1)

Gauge, gage (gēdʒ), sb Forms: 5-7 gawge, (6 Sc gadge), 8-9 guage, 5- gage, gauge [a Onf. gauge (Central Of and mod F. jauge), of unknown origin, wanting in the other Rom. langs.

The Onf word is found, along with the related vb gauger, in the 13th c., the earliest sense appears to be 'action or result of measuring', the sense 'instrument of measurement' being prob derivative. The sb is perh. f the vb. Possibly there may be ultimate connexion with jale bowl, galon Gallon (so Littré), or with jalon stake to measure from (so Scheler). Horning's conjecture that the word represents Teut galgeon-* (see Galloon) in its assumed primary sense of 'rod' is not very satisfactory from the Teut point of view, derivation from L. aqualificare* or qualificare (Diez) is impossible

The spelling gauge prevails in this country, except in sense 5. The more normal gauge has been adopted in recent American Dicts. The form gage is a mere blunder.]

Gavelkind (gæ·vĕlkīnd) Law. Forms: 3 gavelikind, -kende, gaulikend, gavelkend, 4–5 gavelkynde, 6–7 gavellkind, gavelkinde, 6– gavelkind [The 13th c. form gavel(i)kende (latinized -kenda) seems to point to an OE gafolgecynd*, sb. neut. (the e for æ being a mark of Kentish dialect), f. gafol GAVEL *sb.*1 + gecynd nature, species, KIND.

When the meaning of the word came to be misunderstood (see 2), attempts were made to assign to it an etymology expressive of the custom of equal division of a deceased person's land among his male children; favourite explanations in the 16th c. were 'give al kinde' (Rastell 1557), and 'give all kyn' (Lambarde 1576); sometimes the word was written in pseudo-etymological fashion as gavealkin, gavel-all-kind. The application of the Kentish term to the Welsh and Irish system of succession has the merit that the word was of Celtic origin. A Welsh derivation from gafael to take, and cenedl race, family, was proposed in the 16–17th c.; an alleged Irish gabhailcinne (from gabháil to take, taking, and cinne tribe, sept) appears with the rendering 'gavelkind' in O'Reilly's Irish Dictionary]

1. The name of a land-tenure existing chiefly in Kent.

The name implies that it was originally a tenure by 'gavel'; i. e. by the payment of rent or fixed services other than military, this agrees with the identification of it with Socage (quot 1553). After the Conquest, the Kentish form of socage was distinguished by certain customs elsewhere generally disused (cf quot 1702). Of these the most conspicuous was the custom by which a tenant's land at his death was divided equally among his sons; hence, even in early times, 'gavelkind' and 'partible land' are used as equivalent terms.

3. transf. & fig. A Welsh custom of dividing property, similar to the Kentish practice.

The Statutum Wallie, 12 Edw. I. c. 13 recounts that the Welsh custom of inheritance differs from the English, 'eo quod hereditas partibilis est inter heredes masculos'; the statute sanctions this custom, but provides that bastard sons shall no longer be entitled to share with those born in wedlock.

-gen (dʒen) suffix, forming sbs. in mod. scientific use; ad. F. -gène, ultimately repr. Gr. -γενής (f. γεν- root of γί-γ-εσθαι to be born, become, γεν-νᾶν to beget, γέν-ος kind, etc.: see Kin) an adjective suffix which has two different uses: (1) giving the sense 'born in a certain place or condition', as in oikogenēs, ἐνδογενής born in the house (respectively f. oikos house and ἔνδον within); (2) giving the sense 'of a (specified) kind', as in ὁμογενής of the same kind, homogeneous, ἑτερογενής of another kind, heterogeneous. The F. -gène in scientific terms has two distinct applications (of different origin) both of which have been adopted in Eng

1 Chem In 1777–9 Lavoisier (Œuvres II. 249) proposed for the recently discovered element (till then known as 'dephlogisticated air', etc.) the alternative names principe acidifiant and principe oxygène, which he states to be etymologically synonymous. In G. de Morveau Nouvenel chimique 1787 (prepared in collaboration with Lavoisier and other chemists) the sbs. oxygène and hydrogène occur, and are explained to mean 'engendrant l'acide' and 'engendrant l'eau', and in Lavoisier's Traité de Chimie 1789 the etymon of the suffix is said to be 'Gr. γείνομαι, j'engendre'. This etymology accounts for Lavoisier's original form oxygène, the change of -gène into -gène must have been due to the observation that -gène did not occur in Gr derivatives, while -gène, from the same root, already existed in hétérogène, homogène (ad. Gr. words in -γενής see above); the fact that the suffix -γενής in Gr. words was not capable of meaning 'that which produces' was overlooked or disregarded The names oxygène, hydrogène were soon adopted into Eng. with the ending -gene, afterwards altered to -gen. On the analogy of these words, a considerable number of new terms have been added to the common (French and Eng.) vocabulary of chemistry, in which the ending -gène, -gen expresses the sense 'that which produces', they are usually names of chemical substances, as nitrogen, endogène, cyanogen, etc., rarely of classes of substances, as halogen, † amphigen

2 Bot The botanical use of -gène was introduced in 1813 by Decandolle (Théorie de Botanique 210) in the words endogène, exogène, adjs. designating two classes of plants which respectively produce their new tissue internally (Gr. ἔνδο-ν within) and externally (Gr. ἔξω outside) The formation of the words was suggested by the older terms endorhize, exorhize Decandolle gives as the etymon of the suffix 'γενεαι [sic!), j'engendre, je crois', app. his -gène was not a new adoption from Gr. -γενής, but a different application of the -gène already used in chemical terms, which he vaguely remembered to be derived from a Gr. root meaning 'to produce, to grow' The adjs. endogène, exogène first came into Eng. in the adapted forms endogenous, exogenous, Lindley c 1845; formed from these the sbs. endogen, exogen, and the sbs. and adjs. added many analogous terms denoting classes of plants, the first element indicating the part at which the new growth takes place, or some characteristic of their mode of growth, as acrogen, amphigen, dictyogen, thalogen

2. Gram. Each of the three (or in some languages two) grammatical 'kinds', corresponding more or less to distinctions of sex (and absence of sex) in the objects denoted, into which substantives are discriminated according to the nature of the modification they require in words syntactically associated with them; the property (in a sb.) of belonging to, or (in other parts of speech) of having the form appropriate to concord with, a specified one of these kinds. Also, the distinction of words into 'genders', as a principle of grammatical classification

In the Indo-European langs. there were originally three genders, the masculine and feminine, to which respectively belonged the great majority of nouns denoting male and female persons or animals, and the neuter, including chiefly nouns denoting things without sex But great numbers of words denoting inanimate objects were of the masculine or feminine gender, without even any figurative attribution of sex, and in some cases the names of objects possessing sex were of the neuter gender In Semitic, and in the Romance langs, there are only two genders, masculine and feminine In many langs the adjectives, and in some langs the verbs, have inflexional forms to agree with the gender of the sb to which they syntactically refer Mod English has 'natural' as opposed to 'grammatical' gender, i e nouns are masculine, feminine or neuter according as they denote persons of male, female, or of neither sex, and the gender of a noun has no other syntactical effect than that of determining the pronoun that must be used in referring to it For common, decent gender see the words

[The Eng use in this sense follows the Lat use of genus, which in its turn is a rendering of the equivalent Gr γένος The formulation of the Eng grammatical genders is a very rum brogarus, δύσκολα και ὑβρεα και ανουμ is accurately by Aristotle Rhet III V to Protagoras]

b By some recent philologists applied, in extended sense, to the 'kinds' into which she are discriminated by the syntactical laws of certain langs the grammar of which takes no account of sex

Thus the North American Indian langs are said to have two 'gender' animate and inanimate With still greater departure from the original sense, the name 'genders' has been applied to the many syntactically discriminated classes of sb in certain South African langs

2. Production by natural or artificial processes (as of plants, animals, substances, etc.) †Also, mode of formation, nature of origin (obs.).

In mediæval philosophy, following Aristotle, generation (putrefaction and corruption (φθορά) are often mentioned as contrary processes, together comprehending all the changes which take place in the universe. Hence the frequent allusive use of the words, e. g. in quot 1611

II. That which is generated

1 The use of the word in senses 3–6 is largely due to the frequent occurrence of generation in the Vulgate Translators were probably uncertain as to the exact meaning of it in certain passages, as Isa liii 8, to which the following seems to be the earliest reference in English

23 K. E. Allht I. A 827 Hys generacyoun quo recen con, Pat dyzsed for vus in Iherusalem?

4 The offspring of the same parent or parents, regarded as a single degree or step in the descent of a person or family from an ancestor; also, in wider sense, = Degree 3.

In reckoning genealogies, each generation is naturally restricted to one individual in the direct line, without regard to collateral descendants

5. The whole body of individuals born about the same period; also, the time covered by the lives of these.

In reckoning historically by 'generations', the word is taken to mean the interval of time between the birth of the parents and that of their children, usually computed at thirty years, or three generations to a century a 1340 Hampole Psalter lii 8 Þou lord will ȝeme vs & kepe vs fra þis generacioun. 1538 Coverdale Mark viii 12 Why doth this generacion seke a token? Geneva[1] (dʒɪnī·vă). Also 8 geneve. -er [ad. Du genever, jenever (the ending being assimilated to that of next), ad OF. genevre (F genièvre) —L. jūniperus juniper.] A spirit distilled from grain, and flavoured with the juice of juniper berries, it is made in Holland, and is hence also called Hollands, formerly Holland's Geneva (Often written with capital G by confusion with GENEVA[2].)

In the shortened form Gin, the name chiefly denotes a spirit of British manufacture, usually an imitation of the Dutch spirit, and usually flavoured not with juniper but with some substitute, but the words are sometimes used indiscriminately. In many years of reference in the 18th c. and even later, geneva is explained as the name of a spirit distilled, or obtained by fermentation, from juniper berries, but it does not appear that this was ever correct

5 (Only in sing.) Native intellectual power of an exalted type, such as is attributed to those who are esteemed greatest in any department of art, speculation, or practice; instinctive and extraordinary capacity for imaginative creation, original thought, invention, or discovery. Often contrasted with talent.

This sense, which belongs also to E genius, Ger genie, appears to have been developed in the 18th c. It is not recognized in Johnson's Dictionary) In sense 4 the word had come to be applied with especial frequency to the kind of intellectual power displayed by a man of science, and when in this application 'genius', as native endowment, came to be contrasted with the aptitudes that can be acquired by study, the approach to the modern sense was very often close. The further development of meaning was probably influenced by association with senses 1 and 2, which suggested that the word had an especial fitness to denote that particular kind of intellectual power which has the appearance of proceeding from a supernatural inspiration or possession, and which seems to arrive at its results in an unexplained and mysterious manner This use, which originated in England, came into great prominence in Germany, and gave the designation of Genieperiode to the epoch in German literature otherwise known as 'Sturm und Drang' period. Owing to the influence of Ger literature in the present century, this is now the most familiar sense of the word, and usually colours the other senses It is so by the first writers of the 18th c that the distinction between 'genius' and 'talent', which had some foundation in Fr usage, was sharpened into the strong antithesis which is now generally current, so that the one term is hardly ever defined without reference to the other . The difference between genius and talent has been formulated very commonly by affirming that genius is native power or endowment in regarding the former as the higher of the two, as 'creative' and 'original', and as achieving its results by instinctive processes which admit of being distinctly analysed

Genteel (dgentī'l), a and sb. Forms 6-8 gentile, 8 gentil, 7- genteel [A re-adoption, at the end of the 16th c, of F. gentil, which had been previously adopted in the 13th c, and had assumed the form GENTLE.

The re-adoption first appears in the form gentile, distinguished from GENTILE (=non Jewish) by retaining the Fr pronunciation of the i and the stress on the last syllable It is probable that it was originally fashionable to retain the Fr nasal sound in the first syll , hence the vulgar pronunciation represented by the spelling 'jontee!', which occurs in comic literature of the early 17th c The fully anglicized spelling genteel came in at the end of the 17th, see also GENTEP, which corresponds more nearly to the pronunciation of the Fr word, in which the i is silent Another attempt to render the Fr sound is gentee.

A few years before the middle of the 19th c the word was much ridiculed as being characteristic of those who are possessed with a dread of being taken for something low', or who attach exaggerated importance to supposed marks of social superiority In seriously laudatory use it may now be said to be vulgarized, in educated language it has always a sarcastic or at least playful colouring.
