The cell, equilibrium is supposed to be disturbed by injury to any of the physiological atom-groups-as by a toxin, and this disturbance results in an effort at compensatory repair during which plastic material in excess of the amount required is generated and finds its way into the blood. This Ehrlich regards as the antitoxin which is capable of neutralizing the particular toxin to which it owes its origin, if this is subsequently introduced into the blood. In this theory a specific combining relation is assumed to exist between various toxic substances and the secondary atom-groups of certain cellular elements of the body. The atom-groups which, in accordance with this theory, combine with the toxin of any particular disease-germ Ehrlich calls the toxiphoric side-chain. i., theory of, Emmerich and Löw's, based upon the conclusion that many bacteria generate enzymes capable of digesting the organism by which they were generated and sometimes other organisms as well. i., theory of, exhaustion hypothesis, Pasteur's theory that immunity often afforded to the tissues by an attack of infection or following vaccination against infection is due to an abstraction from the tissues by the organism concerned in the primary attack of something necessary to the growth of the infecting organism. It is opposed to the retention theory of Chauveau. i., theory of, lateral bond. See s., theory of, Ehrlich's side-chain. i., theory of, Metchnikoff's phagocytic. See under Metchnikoff.

The paroxysms may be intermittent, remittent, or irregular. If repeated daily, the fever is designated quotidian; if on alternate days, tertian; if with an interval of two days, quartan. If two paroxysms occur daily, the fever is designated a double quotidian. There may be a tertian form, a paroxysm occurring daily, but only those of alternate days being alike; a double quartan form, and others. A typical malarial paroxysm consists of a cold stage, a hot stage, and a sweating stage, occurring in the sequence given. Intermittent fever is characterized by the occurrence of a complete intermission of the symptoms in the interval between two paroxysms, the temperature becoming normal or subnormal. In remittent fever there is only an amelioration of the symptoms in the intervals. In certain localities in which the malarial organisms are exceedingly numerous or intensely virulent the attack displays a pernicious tendency. Of this type there may be a cerebral form, characterized either by delirium and excitement or by coma and depression; a thoracic form, in which the respiration is accelerated and there is an urgent sense of the need of air; a gastrointestinal form, attended with nausea, vomiting, jaundice, and diarrhea; or an asthenic or algid form, in which there is a condition of marked debility with a striking coldness of the surface and of the breath. To the irregular manifestations of malarial poisoning, which do not at any time present the classic association of chill, fever, and sweat, the designation of "dumb ague" is given. The enlargement of the spleen in chronic malaria is sometimes designated "ague-cake." mercury (mer'-kū-re) [Mercurius, a Latin divinity, the god of traffic]. Symbol Hg; atomic weight 200; quantivalence II. Hydrargyrum. A shining, silver-white, liquid, volatile metal, having a specific gravity of 13.55. It is insoluble in the ordinary solvents, in hydrochloric acid, and in sulphuric acid in the cold; it dissolves in the last when boiled with it, and is readily soluble in nitric acid. It boils at 357 25° C., and solidifies at −39.4° C. Mercury is found pure, but is chiefly obtained as the native sulphide, or cinnabar. It forms two classes of compounds—the mercurous, those in which two atoms of the metal, and the mercuric, those in which one atom, is combined with a bivalent radical The mercuric salts are more soluble and more poisonous than the mercurous. The uses of mercury and its salts are as follows: as a purgative and cholagogue (calomel, blue-mass, mercury with chalk), as an alterative in chronic inflammations, as an antisyphilitic, an antiphlogistic, an intestinal antiseptic, a disinfectant, a parasiticide, a caustic, and an astringent. The absorption of mercury in sufficient quantity causes poisoning, characterized by a coppery taste in the mouth, ptyalism, loosening of the teeth, sponginess of the gums; in severer cases, ulceration of the cheeks, necrosis of the jaws, marked emaciation; at time neuritis develops, and a peculiar tremor. The standard of capacity is the liter, a cubic volume $\frac{1}{10}$ meter in each dimension. The standard of weight is the gram, the weight of $\frac{1}{1000}$ liter (one cubic centimeter) of distilled water at its maximum density. As the unit of microscopic measurement the thousandth part of a millimeter has been adopted. It is called micromillimeter, or micron; its symbol is μ. The multiples in the metric system are expressed by the prefixes deca-, hecto-, and kilo-; the subdivisions by the prefixes deci-, centi-, and milli-.

100	meters	= 1 hectometer.
10	meters	= 1 decameter

In common practice, however, the following divisions only are used, the others being expressed in figures.

10 millimeters	= 1 centimeter.
100 centimeters	= 1 meter.
1000 meters	= 1 kilometer
1000 cubic centimeters	= 1 liter.

The following are the equivalent values·

1 meter = 39.37 inches.
1 liter = 1 quart ¼ gill, U. S. measure
1 gram = 15.43 grains.
1 minim = 0.061 cubic centimeter.

TABLE OF ENDOCARDIAL MURMURS

Time	Point of Maximum Intensity	Line of Conduction	Lesion	Quality
Systolic.	Midsternum or to right of it, opposite third rib or second interspace	Toward top of sternum, and along aorta and its large branches.	Aortic obstruction	Usually loud and harsh. Harshness is one of its distinguishing characteristics.
Diastolic.	Midsternum opposite upper border of cartilage of third rib.	Down sternum to ensiform cartilage.	Aortic insufficiency or incompetence.	Soft, blowing, sometimes rough, frequently musical. It has the greatest area of diffusion of all the cardiac murmurs
Presystolic.	Over mitral area around the apex.	Usually not transmitted	Mitral obstruction.	Generally low-pitched, rough, churning, grinding, or blubbering. Subject to great variation of pitch and quality.
Systolic.	Midsternum just above the ensiform cartilage.	Toward the epigastrium.	Tricuspid insufficiency or incompetence.	Low-pitched, superficial, blowing, soft, faint.
Presystolic	Midsternum opposite the cartilage of fourth rib.	Not transmitted.	Tricuspid obstruction.	Undetermined.
Systolic.	Second interspace to the left of sternum or at the level of third rib.	Upward a short distance and to left of sternum, stopping abruptly.	Pulmonary obstruction.	Often harsh and audible over the whole precordia, may be very faint.
Diastolic.	Second left interspace	Down left edge of sternum to ensiform cartilage.	Pulmonary insufficiency or incompetence.	Soft and blowing.

See myœsthesis. m. system, the muscles of the body taken together. m. tissue, the tissue of which muscles are composed; it is of two principal varieties—the striped, striated, or voluntary, and the unstriped, nonstriated, or involuntary muscular tissue. The striped muscular tissue is composed of muscle-fibers, the unstriped of elongated, spindle-shaped cells. A muscle-fiber consists of sarcolemma, muscle-nuclei, and muscle-substance. The sarcolemma is an elastic, homogeneous, connective-tissu sheath which lightly invests the muscle-fiber. The nuclei are fusiform in shape, are situated immediately beneath the sarcolemma, and run parallel with the axis of the fiber. The muscle-fiber itself consists of two substances—a dark, doubly refracting, or anisotropic contractile substance, and a lighter, semifluid, isotropic substance termed sarcoplasm. The contractile substance consists of delicate spindles, the apposition of the thicker portions of which produces the dark transverse disc. The spindles terminate in minute beads, the juxtaposition of which gives rise to the intermediate disc or membrane of Krause. The neutral sarcoplasm fills out the spaces left between the spindles, and, as ordinarily the tapering ends of the spindles are too delicate to be seen, the space between the intermediate and transverse discs—the lateral disc—looks homogeneous. The contractile fibrils into which the contractile substance is divided, formed by the end-to-end union of the spindles, are aggregated into bundles—the muscle-columns—surrounded by a layer of sarcolemma. On transverse section these muscle columns give rise to the appearance known as Cohnheim's fields. The muscle-fibers are held together by delicate areolar tissue—the endomysium. Several grouped together form a primary bundle, which is surrounded by a sheath termed the perimysium. Fasciculi are aggregations of primary bundles, and are the units of which the complete muscle is composed, the latter being surrounded by the epimysium. m.-tone. See muscle-tonus. m. tumor. See myoma.

Nerve-cells have one or more elongated processes, and in accordance with the number of these are designated unipolar, bipolar, or multipolar. The processes are of two kinds: the axis-cylinder process and the protoplasmic processes. The axis-cylinder (Deiters') process either becomes an axis-cylinder depressor, an afferent nerve, irritation of which depresses or inhibits the vasomotor center. n., efferent, one carrying impulses from the central nervous system to the periphery. n.-endings, the terminations of nerves at the periphery or in the nerve-centers. n., exodic, an afferent or centripetal nerve. n., exodic, an efferent or centrifugal nerve. n. of expression, the facial nerve. n.-fiber, a fiber having

the property of conducting invisible or molecular waves of stimulation from one part of an organism to another, and so establishing physiological continuity between such parts without the necessary passage of waves of contraction. There are two kinds of nerve-fibers: the medullated, or myelinic, and the nonmedullated, or amyelinic. A typical medullated fiber consists of the axis-cylinder, which may be surrounded by a sheath, the axilemma; the medullary sheath, or white substance of Schwann; the neurilemma, or sheath of Schwann. The non-medullated, pale, or Remak's fibers do not possess a medullary sheath, but consist only of axis-cylinder and neurilemma. The nerve-corpuscles are more abundant than in medullated nerve-fibers. Medullated nerve-fibers are found in the cerebrospinal nerves, while nonmedullated fibers occur in the sympathetic nerves and tend to form plexuses. n., frigorific, a sympathetic nerve stimulation of which causes a fall of temperature; the vasoconstrictor nerves are frigorific nerves. n.-grafting, the transplanting of a portion of healthy nerve from an animal to man, to reestablish the continuity of a divided nerve. Syn., neuroplasty. n.-head, the optic disc or papilla. n. hillock, a slight elevation observed where a nerve-fiber enters a muscle. n., inhibitory, one the stimulation of which inhibits or lessens the activity of an organ. n., mixed, one made up of both afferent and efferent fibers. n., motor, one containing only or chiefly motor fibers. n.-papillæ, papillæ of the skin containing tactile corpuscles, nervous plexuses, or Krause's corpuscles and sometimes blood-vessels. n.-plexus, a grouping of nerves. n., pressor, an afferent nerve, irritation of which stimulates the vasomotor center. n.-process, the axis-cylinder process of a neuron. n., secretory, an efferent nerve, stimulation of which causes increased activity of the gland to which it is distributed. n., sensory. Same as n., afferent. n., spinal, one of those arising from the spinal cord and making its exit through an intervertebral foramen. There are 31 pairs of spinal nerves. n.-storm, a sudden outburst or paroxysm of nervous disturbance. n.-stretching, mechanical elongation or tension of a nerve for the relief of neuralgia, spasmodic contraction, and other pathological conditions. n.-suture, neurorrhaphy. n., sympathetic, one of a system of nerves distributed chiefly to the blood-vessels and to the viscera. See sympathetic. n., thermic. Same as n., calorific.

n.-tire, neurasthenia. n.-tree, a neurodendrite. n., trisplanchnic, the system of sympathetic nerves. n., trophic, a nerve, the function of which is to preside over the nutrition of the part to which it is distributed. n. tumor, a neuroma. n.-unit, a neuron. n., vasoconstrictor. See n., vasomotor. n., vasodilator. See n., vasomotor. n., vasomotor, any one of the nerves controlling the caliber of the blood-vessels; they are of two kinds—those stimulation of which causes contraction of the vessels—vasoconstrictor nerves— and those stimulation of which causes active dilation—vasodilator nerves. Ordinarily vasomotor is synonymous with vasoconstrictor.

P., moist opium should contain not less than 9% of crystallized morphine. Opium acts as a narcotic, producing deep sleep, which, however, is often preceded by a stage of mental excitement and exhilaration; on awakening there may be headache, nausea, or vomiting. It slows the pulse and increases its force and raises blood-pressure; small doses do not depress the respiration, but large doses do so in a marked degree. It checks the motor activity of the stomach and intestine, and lessens all secretions except that of the skin; it produces contraction of the pupil. When taken in poisonous doses it causes unconquerable drowsiness, passing into deep sleep, with slow, full respiration, slow pulse, and contracted pupils; later cyanosis develops, the respiration becomes exceedingly slow, and the pulse rapid and feeble; death takes place from failure of the respiration. See poisons, table of. There is a chronic form of opium-poisoning produced by the habitual use of opium or morphine, and characterized by mental depression, a deterioration of the moral sense, and attacks of diarrhea.
