A جنّت, jannat (or جنّة jannat), Paradise, heaven. Mahomet knew the genius of his countrymen too well, to suppose that they would be captivated with the idea of mere spiritual enjoyments in the world to come, he therefore declared, that as the body in this life takes so much part in the sufferings of the soul, it should in justice partake of its happiness hereafter, by the most exquisite enjoyment of every corporeal sense. A vulgar notion has prevailed, that the Arabian prophet excludes women from his paradise, but he had too high a regard for the sex to be guilty of so impolite a piece of injustice the idea originated from a verse in the Alcoran, which most certainly allows no place there for old women; this gave so much uneasiness to an ancient dame, that she remonstrated to Mahomet upon the cruelty of the exclusion, when the prophet rendered her immediately perfectly happy by declaring that all the old women should be restored to the bloom of youth before they entered those mansions of bliss. The Mahometans believe that there are eight heavens, or different degrees of felicity, for the blessed, and seven hells, or degrees of torment, for the damned, drawing from thence an inference, that the mercy of God surpasses his justice. جنّت الملاد, The paradise of regions: title of Bengal. F. جنّت الماوی, The fourth heaven formed of gold. F. جنّت کش, Obedience. E. جنّت نصیب شدن, To die. F.

A اهلی جنّت ahlī jannat, The inhabitants of paradise. جنّت مکان, Placed in paradise (a mode of speaking of deceased princes).

A جنّت عدن jannat ʿadan, The garden of Eden. The Mahometans assign three places for this terrestrial paradise the first, near Damascus in Syria; the second, towards Obollah in the Arabian Irac or Chaldea; and the third, on a spot bordering upon the desert of Noubendjan in Persia, called Sheb Bouvan, watered by the Nilab; whilst others fix it at Samarcand. The more ancient traditions however place it in the island of Serendib or Ceylon, where they say Adam was interred; agreeable to which opinion the Portuguese have named the mountain, where they pretend to point out the grotto and sepulchre of the father of mankind, Pico d'Adam.

E. در الخلافات, (The gate of the Khalifs, or دار الخلافات, The house of the Khalifs) the imperial palace of the Khalifs, built at Baghdad by Almansor, the second Khalif of the house of Abbas, and enlarged and enriched to an incredible degree of magnificence by his successors, all the furniture and walls being splendidly and profusely decorated with gold, silver, and jewels; but that which commanded the highest veneration, was a piece of the famous black stone of the temple of Mecca, mortised into the threshold of the principal gate, and a large curtain made of the hangings of that temple, suspended from a window over the door-way, to about the height of a man from the ground. This gate no person of whatever rank was permitted to enter, till he had rubbed his eyes with the tapestry and kissed the stone; after which he was obliged to crawl over it, (though raised pretty high above the ground) on his hands and knees, it being considered as the highest degree of impiety to touch it with the feet. Four hundred eunuchs served in the inner apartments, and four thousand other officers were maintained and lodged in the palace, having horses in the royal stables, rich dresses, and every thing suitable to the dignity and splendor of the greatest monarch then in the world. در dar, Tear thou. The Persians say, that four of the principal genii made war upon Tahmuras, the third king of the Pishdadian dynasty, by whom however they were defeated, and imprisoned in frightful caverns, on which account that prince is called in history and romance دیو بند, the chainer of demons. In the Chronicle of Abugafar, there is a tradition, that God created the Genii or Dives long before Adam, and gave them the world to rule over for 7000 years, after which, the sovereignty was vested in the Peris and Dives for 2000 years more, under their sole monarch Gian ben Gian: but these beings disobeying the mandates of God, Ebles (the devil) then an ethereal angel, was sent from heaven to chastise and govern them, when, being joined by a considerable party of malcontents, he gave battle to Gian ben Gian, whom he totally routed, and became in his room absolute sovereign of the earth. Intoxicated, however, with his dignity, Ebles forgot that he was inferior to Omnipotence: to humble him, therefore, Man was created, and the proud angel commanded to obey him; but refusing, he was cursed by God, and doomed to everlasting torment. From this stubborn disobedience, it is added, he was named Iba, The Refractory, Ebles, The Desperate, and Sheitan, The Proud; his original name having been Hares, The Guardian or Protector.

A

PERSIAN, ARABIC, AND ENGLISH.

ALIF is the first letter of the Arabic and Persian alphabets.

In Persian, when added to a noun, it forms a poetic vocative, as شها, O king, for اي شه, it is one of the imperatives, and the contracted participle of آمدن, to come; when annexed to some adjectives it forms an abstract noun, as گرما warmth, from گرم warm; and it is often affixed redundantly to a word by the poets, without making any alteration in the sense, as گفتا for گفت, he said. In Arabic it is called hamza, as well as [illegible], especially if accompanied by a vowel, or when it is a radical l[illegible]n in pointed books the little orthographical ch[illegible]er it, as أ إ ؤ (pronounced a, u, i, short; and at the beginning of words they have no other method of noting the short vowels. E.) Prefixed to an Arabic verb or noun it marks an interrogation; if it precedes a proper name it denotes sometimes the vocative, when addressing a person near at hand (the remoter vocatives being expressed by ايا &c.). When placed before Arabic nouns of quality, it forms proper names, as احمد, from حمد praise, احسن, from حسن beautiful, &c. It is likewise an interjection; it represents also Sunday, Taurus, &c. in astronomical books, and the number one in arithmetic; having besides a variety of other uses in the forming of plurals, the feminine gender, the comparative and superlative degrees, with many of the inflexions of the Arabic conjugations, moods, and tenses; for all which see the Grammar. Lastly, when superscribed with madda آ it is equal to two alifs (ا ا), having a long broad sound (like a in the English word all), and is then (singly) either the remote vocative, Ho! hark ye! or the interjection of contempt, Fy, pho, &c. (In this form it also occurs at the beginning of many Persian words. F.) For Arabic words beginning with two alifs or hamzas vid. under او or اي. (N. B. In this edition we have uniformly made use of the plain letter a to be pronounced short like the sound we give to u in but, cut, &c. as a substitute for أَ hamza marked with fatah at the beginning of a word, as also for fatah ´, which in the middle or at the end of a word is equivalent to it, both being by [illegible] but for the character آ as an initial, or ا being a mere [illegible]ded by fatah, both being equal in length to two short vowels of the same denomination, the one by nature and the other by position, we have preferred ā to be pronounced broad like a in all. E.)

A اب ab, A father, master, possessor. An inventor of any thing. This word enters into the composition of a great number of Arabic names, varying its termination according to its case, having ابو abū in the nominative, ابا abā in the accusative, and ابي abī in the other cases, as ابوبكر Abūbakar, ابادون Abādūn, ابي اسمعيل Abī Ismaʿīl, &c.

P اب ab, The month of August. Ab in the Syriac language is the name of the last summer month; and as the Persians, Arabians, and Turks, whose common year is lunar, make use nevertheless of the solar year in their astronomical calculations, they are obliged to have recourse to the Syriac calendar for the names of their months; so that ابماه Ab-māh in Persian, شهراب Shahr-āb in Arabic, and Ab-aj in Turkish, signify the month of August, which they sometimes also name Agostos.

A ابّ abb, Preparing for a journey, applying vigorously to any thing, being in earnest, striving. Extending, stretching out. Returning, or wishing to return to one's country Purpose, intention, aim, endeavour, resolution. Fruit, grass, pasturage, meadow verdure. Name of a town, and also of a village Arabia Felix.

The word Ramazān implies a consuming fire, whence it is by some conjectured, that this month was formerly stationary in the most sultry period of the summer, and not revolving through all the seasons, as at present, in consequence of the Mahometan year being universally lunar. The Ramazan is greatly revered on many accounts, but particularly from the belief, that it was on the 27th of this month called ليلة القدر (the night of power) that the Alcoran began to descend from heaven, on the anniversary of which all orthodox Mahometans continue most fervently in prayer, imagining that every petition then put up to Omnipotence will be favourably received. Ramazān is also one of the attributes of God, as the pardoner, and likewise the burner of sinners. Another year. E. سال قحط, A year barren for want of rain. The epoch of the Persian solar year is of very high antiquity, their historians and astronomers generally carrying it up to Gem or Gemshid (see جم) above 800 years before the Christian era. It consists of twelve months, of thirty days each, five days more being added to a particular month to make the number in all 365. For some time there was no embolism, similar to our leap year: in consequence of which, their Nōrōz, or new year's day originally fixed at the vernal equinox when the sun enters Aries, unavoidably made a retrograde progression into Pisces; to remedy which, at the end of every 120 years, a month was intercalated, and celebrated with the greatest festivity all over the kingdom. This month, at the end of the first period, followed Phervardin (March); at the second celebration it was placed after Ardibehisht (April); and on the third it succeeded Khurdad (May), the five ascititious days being always annexed to it. In this rotation it continued till the year 636 of the Christian era, when Yezdeghird III. the last king of the Sassanian dynasty, being defeated and dethroned by the Arabians, Persia became a province of the great empire of the Khalifs; and the Mahometan lunar computation being introduced in all civil and religious affairs, the intercalations of the solar year were, from that period, neglected, till 1079, when the Seljukian sultan of Persia, Malekshah Jelaleddin (Emiru'l'Omra (see امير) to the khalif Moktadi) reformed the kalendar, which has since borne his name; bringing forward the Nōrōz from the fifteenth degree of Pisces to the first of Aries, and intercalating an embolismal day every fourth year, which was thence called سال كبسه or leap year. The astronomers, in their tables, add the five ascititious days to the last month Isphendarmaz (February); though they are vulgarly annexed to Aban (October), because they happened to follow that month in the intercalary rotation, at the defeat of Yezdeghird, who had made an alteration in the kalendar, known by his name, which however, in consequence of that event, soon ceased to be publicly attended to. It may here be observed, that the old Persian month was not divided into weeks, every day having a distinct name taken from the angel supposed to preside over it. See ماه

Two princes of this name are much celebrated in the East, (both distinguished by the title of ذو القرنین, Having two horns (of the world), implying that they conquered the globe from east to west, the first supposed to be one of their most ancient kings (See سرّ الدهب) the other Alexander of Macedon, whom they call also Ben Filcos (son of Philip), and Rumi (the Grecian). Some Persian historians say, however, that he was not the son of Philip, but of Dārāb (Darius), who having married a daughter of Philip, sent her back, though pregnant, because he disliked her; that being delivered of Alexander at her father's court, Philip educated him as his son, and bequeathing him his crown with the secret of his birth, he laid claim to the throne of Persia, then filled by his younger brother Darius (by another mother), and supporting his pretensions with a powerful army, defeated him, and reigned as the tenth king of the Caramian dynasty, dividing his empire on his death-bed amongst twenty-four of his principal commanders, the chief of whom they call Lagos (Ptolemy). The Tārīkhi Muntakhab relates, however, that he distributed his dominions in his life time among the sons of those princes whom he had conquered, on the condition of their paying him homage as lord paramount, and furnishing certain quotas of troops; which terms they punctually complied with till his death, when each became independent in his feudal principality. (If there are circumstances in these Eastern details inconsistent with truth, let it be remembered, that they are not more visionary than the legendary improbable fictions which swell the Greek historians). The conquests of Alexander are celebrated in many Persian, Arabic, and Turkish histories, romances, and poems, under the titles of Sikandar nāmah (the book of Alexander), Aīnahi Iskandari (the mirror of Alexander), Bahāristān (the mansion of the Spring), &c.

——No name is more famous in the east than Solomon: he succeeded his father David, according to their belief, when only twelves years old; at which age, however, Omnipotence placed under his obedience, not only mankind and animals, but even the elements, and the Genii good and bad. His throne was magnificent beyond idea, 12000 seats of gold being arranged on the right for the patriarchs and prophets, and 12,000 on the left for men learned in every science. The birds were his constant attendants, screening him like a canopy from the inclemencies of the weather; whilst the zephyrs, wafting him wherever he wished to go, rendered horses or any earthly carriage unnecessary.——All the wonderful traditions, however, relative to Solomon, it must be observed, are not confined to the son of David. The heroic or fabulous ages of the Persians go far beyond those of the Europeans, the world, agreeably to their system, being peopled thousands of years before Adam, by etherial or igneal beings, governed by a succession of seventy-two Solomons. The supernatural powers supposed to be vested in those anteadamite monarchs, as well as in the king of Judah, are figured to have been chiefly derived from the curious talismans they were said to have possessed, (to which allusions are often made, not only in their poems and romances, but even in their graver works, and in the Alcoran itself), as the Khātim, or Muhri Sulīmānī, the seal of Solomon; the Tēghi ātesh, or the flaming sword; the Jabah, or the impenetrable cuirass, and the Sapar, or the shield; which last, they add, was bequeathed by Jan ben Jan, one of the anteadamite kings, to the father of mankind, who carried it to Serendib (Ceylon), where it was many ages afterwards discovered by Caiumaras, the first king of Persia; from whom descending to his grandson Thahmuras, it was by that prince employed to successfully in his wars with the Dives, that he got the surname of Div band, or chainer of demons. See جان س جان—ديو—پري, دامباك, &c. These, it may be said, are Persian tales but let us not ridicule them, they are dignified by the Homer of Persia, Ferdusi, in his Sulīmān nāmah, as the mythology of the ancients was rendered important by the Homer of Greece. Every age and every nation have their fooleries; many received opinions even of modern times will not bear the touchstone of truth; and the sorcery laws of our country are a far more authentic disgrace to human nature than all the wild yet pleasing fictions of the East.

The origin of the elevation of this family however must be traced to a private ancestor of that prince, called صفي الدين, (the purity of religion), who was cotemporary with Tamerlane. He resided at Ardebil, in Media; where his reputation for virtue was so high, that he was visited by that conqueror, as Diogenes was formerly by Alexander. Tamerlane on this occasion was so charmed with his conversation, that desiring him to ask any thing in his power to grant, the sage pointed to a number of young Carmanian captives, (whom this scourge of mankind according to custom meant to sacrifice on the first public festivity,) and requested their liberty they were immediately delivered to him as slaves; but the generous philosopher furnishing them with every thing necessary, sent them free to their native country. As they were of the first families in Carmania, their sense of his benevolence found no bounds, they were constant in their attentions, and magnificent in their gifts; a respect little short of adoration was paid to him; and it was chiefly owing at length to the attachment and courage of the descendants of those grateful Carmanians that his posterity mounted the Persian throne.

After this important victory, Gao discovering the retreat of the young Feridun, placed him on the throne, in return for which, that prince gave him, as a feudal principality, Isfahan, with the surrounding districts (known afterwards by the name of Parthia, now Persian Irak). The blacksmith's apron became from that period the great standard of Persia, being from him named Dirafsh Gavani, (the banner of Gao). By Feridun and succeeding princes; it was richly ornamented with jewels, and lodged in the royal treasury; whence it was never carried to the field but when the king marched in person. It is said to have fallen at length into the hands of the Arabians, who found it among the other spoils of Yezdegird, the last king of the Sassanian dynasty who was defeated by Saad, general to the khalif Omar, in the year 636 of our era. See سال. Faridūn is the boast of the Persians, as a model of every virtue; but his reign is so much disguised by fable that, without placing confidence in the facts, we must only consider them as objects of popular belief. Khondemir, an historian of character, and the Tarikh Gozideh, gravely give him a reign of above five hundred years, which alone justly renders much of the rest suspected. The same length of reign is assigned to this prince, in a book of Persian Cosmogony called Bohun Dehesh, written in the Pehlevi or old Persic, and asserted, by the Parsis of Guzerat, to be one of the works of Zoroastre; though part of it, at least, from allusions to particular events, must have been written since the seventh century of our era. Zoroastre is said to be one of his descendants.

A religious order of mendicants thus named by the Arabians; by the Persians Darvēsh or Sof; and by the Indians (such as are of the Hindu religion) Yōgī, or Sannyāsī. In this singular class of men, who, in Hindostan, despise every species of clothing, there are a number of enthusiasts, but a far superior proportion of knaves; every vagabond of abilities, who has an aversion to labour, being received into a fraternity, which is regulated by laws of an uncommon and secret nature. The Hindoos view them with wonderful respect, not only on account of their sanctified reputation, but from a substantial dread of their power: the Fakeer pilgrimages consisting often of many thousands of naked saints, who exact wherever they pass a general tribute; and their character is too sacred for the civil power to take cognizance of their conduct. The men they treat with little regard to politeness; but to the ladies they behave with infinite gallantry; the course of their pilgrimage being in general marked by a decisive cure of all female sterility: the former therefore, for the most part abandon the villages on their approach; but the women, in seeming amazement at the terror of their male friends, undauntedly face this formidable host. The prayers of the Fakeers are then solicited with much eagerness, and they are too holy to deny comfort to their fair devotees on these occasions however a slipper or a staff is always left as a signal at the door, which effectually convinces the husband, should any blunder unluckily direct him homeward, that his intrusion would be unpardonable, and subject him to a chastisement he seldom cares to hazard. It is astonishing, at the same time, what tremendous voluntary penances these people impose upon themselves, to gain a superior influence over the people: some suspend themselves by the shoulder-blades to iron hooks; some stand from the rising till the setting of the sun, like statues on their pedestals, exposed in that sultry climate to all the influence of his scorching rays; some clench their fists till the nails, piercing their palms, appear through the back; some load themselves with chains; some gash themselves with knives; some hold their arms constantly perpendicular; whilst others twist their heads till they look directly backward. Every invention, in a word, of perverted ingenuity is exhausted in distorting and deforming nature; some, of the most elevated enthusiasts, striking off even their own heads, on great solemnities, as a sacrifice to the Ganges, which they worship: if the nerves of the self-devoted victim are powerful enough to dismember it completely, he unquestionably goes to heaven, if not, his former sanctity is questioned, and his future happiness remains a doubt. The Fakeers and dervises in Arabia and Persia wear coarse woollen garments.

A قاف Kāf, A fabulous mountain, anciently imagined by the Asiatics to surround the world, and to bind the horizon on all sides. In their writings, therefore, to paint the rising of the sun, they say, "When the star of day appeared from the height of Kāf, the world "was enlightened:" whilst they express the whole extent of the earth, by, "از قاف تا قاف, From Kāf to Kāf." To account for the first or false twilight (called الفجر الكاذب), which is followed by an intenser darkness immediately before dawn (named الفجر الثّاني or الفجر الصّادق, The second or true crepuscle), the Eastern astronomers supposed a window in Kāf, some degrees below the summit, through which the sun's rays being conveyed as he rose, the world after he had passed was left in temporary obscurity till he appeared again above the horizon. Since, however, some of their philosophers have applied themselves to the study of geography, they have discovered Kāf to be Mount Caucasus, or Imaus, to the east, and Mount Atlas to the west; over which the sun, in those countries, appears to pass when he rises and sets. In the Alcoran (for even Mahomet was carried along by this popular belief) Kāf is said to rest upon a stone, called Sakhrat, formed, according to some learned doctors, of one entire emerald, the reflection from which, they say, gives the azure appearance to the sky; whilst its movements produce earthquakes, vulcanoes, and all the extraordinary phenomena of nature. On Kāf the Eastern poets and romances have fixed the residence of the Dives or Genii (supposing them to have been here confined by Tahmuras, and other ancient heroes of Persia); here too, they say, lies Fairy land; and here they place the city of Aherman (the principle of evil), where Argenk, a Genie king, they add, built a splendid palace, in a gallery of which were portraits of the different kinds of rational beings who inhabited the globe before Adam. The Eastern nations are very curious in their paper, both in their books and in their letters, the most scrupulous etiquette being observed, when addressing great men, to send them precisely that sort of paper which custom has annexed to their rank. To the king, the ground upon which they write is gold, to subahs, and feudatory princes, it is generally ornamented with flowers of gold and other decorations, descending thus, through inferior ranks, with a variety of gradations, both in quality and size, till it becomes either quite plain, or is powdered slightly with gold dust. A great man may be flattered by sending him a paper superior to his dignity, but to err in the other extreme, is considered as an insult which he will not easily forgive. Kāghiz implies likewise a charter or patent, presented by the kings of Persia to those whom they mean to honour; by virtue of which, the governors of every district, through which a Kāghidār travels, must supply him, the moment he presents it, with carriages and every necessary, to which his rank is intitled. كاغذ وصلي, Pasteboard.
