(e.g. — mortal, nemo mortalium; — animal is more prudent, nulla beluarum prudentior est); the genit. may also sometimes be expressed by a circumloc. with de, ex (e.g. — man of our army was killed, nemo de nostris cecidit); sometimes it would appear that instead of nullus and nemo we use in Latin nihil (with genit. when it stands for nullus); however, nihil expresses the negative more strongly than nullus = none at all (e.g. there is — one (at all) more miserable than I am, and — one more happy than Catulus, nihil me infelicitius, nihil fortunatius est Catulo; to have — doubt (at all), nihil dubitationis habere); very often we use — when the negative does not refer to anything in general, but to something particular; in this case, which takes place principally when — belongs as an adj. to a noun or refers as a predicate to a noun previously mentioned, we use in Latin the negative non instead of nullus (e.g. you ordered them — ship, navem eis non imperasti). We likewise use non in Latin for

— when the object in English is expressed by a verbal noun (e.g. to have — fear, non timere; to feel — doubt, non dubitare; to feel — hatred against anyone, non odisse alqm, etc.); — one, nemo; at — place, nusquam, at — time, numquam (nunq-), nullo tempore, and at — time, nec umquam; in — respect, nihil, in — wise, nullo modo, nulla ratione. nobody, n. nemo, nullus (= no; as the genit. of nemo, neminis was little used, nullus was used instead), nemo homo; and —, nec ullus, nec quisquam, that —, ne quid; a —, terrae filius. nowhere, adv. nusquam.

WHO. III. conj. to connect the main clause; A, when the sentence with — contains the subject of the copula in the main sentence; 1, when the sentence with — conveys a general idea, render by the Inf., e.g. offici est, etc., or by another noun, e.g. nihil suavius est quam amari or amor, = nothing is more pleasing than — one should be loved; 2, use the accus. and inf., after “it is pleasing, grievous, probable, clear, manifest, evident, true, it appears, it is useful, right, reasonable, necessary, lawful, it is allowed —”; after several of these impersonal verbs, use also quod and ut, see under C and D (e.g. it is pleasing to hear — you are well, gratum est te valere); 3, than —, as —, inf. with an adv. or another noun with an adj. or part., e.g. nulla res tanto erat damno, etc., quam (a noun with an adj. or part.). B, when the sentence with — contains the object of the verb of the main clause, use acc. and inf.; 1, this is the case after all verba sensuum et affectuum, to which belong also “to know, conceive, remind, expect, hope, fear, believe,” etc.; then also after fac, when it is = finge, fancy —, etc., fac qui ego sum esse te; after the verbs “to hope, swear, promise, threaten,” we use the accus. and fut. inf., only after “to hope” we use the accus. and pres. inf. when we speak of anything referring to the present time, and the accus. and perf. inf. when we speak of anything past; 2, after the so-called verba declarandi, as “to say, tell, indicate, remember, convince, teach, prove (efficere),” etc.; 3, also after “to fix, determine, wish, forbid, impose, concede (that anything is so),” etc., the inf., if the sentence with — declares the object, whilst if it contains a wish or intention, we use ut; after “they,” “the people say,” “it is reported,” etc. (dicunt, tradunt, ferunt, produnt, perhibent), either by accus. and inf., or the nom. and indic. (of the passive voice), e.g. dicunt Romulum primum regem Romanum fuisse, or Romulus primus rex Romanorum fuisse dicebatur; dicunt vos adfuisse, or vos dicebamini adfuisse; ad dubito, in the sense “I doubt not,” we find in Cic. always quid. C, when the sentence with — contains a description of anything or a circumst., 1, of the subject, when we can put “which” instead of “—,” by quod, as after “there is reason,” or “there is no reason,” (which, etc.), est (habeo), non est, nihil est quod (we may also use cur, as in English), also after “it is pleasing, rejoicing, I am glad, it is painful,” etc. (e.g. nihil est quod [i.e. illud quod] timeas); also after “we must add (eo or huc accedit),” where we use quod when we speak of a matter of fact, and ut when we refer to anything that is only in progress, always when the thing is only about to happen; 2, of the object when — = “because,” also by quod after “to be glad, rejoice (gaudere), to feel sorry, grieve (dolere), to wonder (mirari),” etc., where we use quod when we speak of a definite fact, but si, if we speak of something merely imaginary or as we suppose it; 3, when — stands for “inasmuch as, inasfar as.” D, always ut or qui (quae, quod) when the sentence with — expresses the purpose, condition, aim, effect, surmise, permission, encouragement, wish or command, as subject or object, or as additional clause; after is sum, non is sum, talis, qualis, is (such a one), ejusmodi, etc.; also qui, etc. (ut is, etc.), after tam, tantus, generally after negations, after quis? and after comparatives with quam, when these words express the degree, measure, up to which anything is said to possess a certain quality; and after nouns to express a purpose (e.g. Caesar sent messengers — they might say, Caesar munus misit qui dicerent); but ut is, etc., to express result; — not, after “to fear, to be afraid,” etc., ne nm, seldom ut, and — alone.

ne; only — not, — by any means, ut ne (ne being placed before — which is prevented), e.g. ut hoc ne facerem (= he took care —, etc.); I say — . . . not, etc., by nego with accus. and infin., e.g. he asserts — there are no gods, deos esse negat. E. — in exclamations, I., when we express a wish, oh — ! ut ! utinam ! o si (see OH); God grant —, etc., facit Deus, ut, etc.; — not ! utinam ne ! 2. in general exclamations, by accus. and infin.
